STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

YUGOSLAVIA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, yesterday representatives of the Croatian Canadian community met with parliamentarians from this House. They asked for Canada's assistance in involving the world community in working toward a permanent peace and to recognize Croatia's right to self-determination.

As the United Nations has a proven track record with similar interventions, members from all sides of the House agree that the first step should be third party mediation by the United Nations in the form of peacekeeping troops.

We must act now to stop the Yugoslavian strife. Untold numbers of people are suffering and dying from the ongoing violence and repression. Independent bodies, such as Amnesty International, have faced difficulties in obtaining accurate information as to the variety and the extent of the suffering caused by this conflict.

If Canada is to uphold its responsibilities within the new internationalism, it must ensure that human rights, individual rights and minority rights are placed above the absolute rights of sovereign states. The United Nations can and must facilitate this.

As the UN Security Council prepares for its special meeting tomorrow on this issue, I call upon the government and this House to contact the UN today to request the UN send peacekeeping troops to Croatia immediately.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the House join me in urging the government to respond quickly to the plight of western farmers. But at the same time, let us not forget that agriculture is a vitally important industry to Atlantic Canada as well.

Atlantic farmers are looking for a clear and unequivocal indication from the Government of Canada that the supply management system now in place and so vital to Atlantic agriculture is a principle that will be recognized as being sacrosanct by the Government of Canada and one that will not be bargained away during GATT negotiations.

Similarly, Atlantic farmers are concerned with the continuing erosion of the effectiveness of the feed freight assistance program. They are looking for a clear indication that the government intends to implement the second phase of the Atlantic livestock feed initiative. Livestock and poultry products in Atlantic Canada generate an annual farm gate value of $500 million. There are some 4,000 commercial scale farms with over 25,000 persons employed in the industry.

I urge the government, and in particular the ministers of agriculture and regional development, not to forget Atlantic farmers and to keep their representatives well informed of the government's intentions.

FISHERIES

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, thousands of the men and women who make their living fishing and working in the plants and all their families are facing the most severe economic disaster in memory.

The fishery along the coast of Labrador and the northeast coast of Newfoundland has been nearly a complete failure. Even officials of fisheries and oceans have never seen anything like it. Thousands are without sufficient fish or work to even qualify for unemployment insurance.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has been hinting that something might be done some day. The people of Cartwright cannot wait for "some day". The people of Fogo cannot wait for "some day". These communities need help today. You cannot feed and clothe a family on air and empty promises.

The Newfoundland fishery needs a catch failure program for the future, but what the fishery needs now is an immediate aid program. This disaster is a federal responsibility. The government must act, and it must act today.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate General Electric Canada of Peterborough which has just won a multimillion dollar high technology contract to export robotic fuelling machines for the second CANDU reactor sold to South Korea.

The CANDU reactor is unique in the world for its superb design, which allows the reactor to be refuelled while it is producing electricity at full power.

G-E Canada is predicting the contract will generate 65 person-years of work in Peterborough over the next five years.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the $1.2 billion cash sale to South Korea of the CANDU reactor was signed at Christmastime last year by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. G-E Canada's world class nuclear energy technology speaks volumes for our country's high-tech competitiveness in the tough, global marketplace.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to join me and other members of the House in applauding this significant Canadian achievement.

PREMIER FRANK MCKENNA

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, September 23, because of his honesty, hard work and determination, the people of New Brunswick rewarded Premier Frank McKenna with a second consecutive landslide victory.

Since he was first elected premier in 1987, Mr. McKenna has provided the province with principled and credible leadership. By emphasizing issues important to all New Brunswickers such as education, environmental protection and the economy, Mr. McKenna has proven himself worthy of the trust of New Brunswickers.

[Translation]

Furthermore, with his talent as leader, Mr. McKenna has succeeded in reducing unemployment and made New Brunswick the leader in economic growth in North America. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that in the next four years, New Brunswickers and Canadians will be very well served by the McKenna government and the example he gives us all. I wish to extend my sincere congratulations to Mr. McKenna and all members of his government and wish them best of luck for the next four years.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Jean Charest, Minister of the Environment and the Hon. William K. Reilly, Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency were co-recipients of the 1991 Gold Medal of the America's Society in New York City on Monday, September 23. The award honours distinguished service in the cause of greater Canadian-American friendship and understanding.

This year, the Gold Medal was presented in recognition of the Canada-U.S. Air Quality Accord and its implications for controlling acid rain on both sides of the border. Minister Charest accepted the medal on behalf of the Prime Minister and the people of Canada.

We are all very proud of the honour bestowed on Canada, and I wish to thank the minister for including me in the official party at the presentation ceremony. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, along with most members of the House, I have had a great interest in the acid rain issue.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadian women continue to suffer terrible side effects and horrible scars and their lives are endangered from breast implants, especially the Meme. The government still continues to refuse to act by claiming that anecdotal evidence is insufficient. However, about ten years ago, the government banned UFFI and paid millions of dollars to have it removed from homes on the basis of equally anecdotal evidence.

Does the government consider houses more important than women? Mr. Speaker, women and we men who share their lives and see their suffering demand the immediate withdrawal of the Meme implant and stricter control of the testing of all other breast implants on the market. Secondly, we want immediate concrete assistance for women with the Meme implant so that they can have it removed.

TRADE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, what would be the economic impact of Quebec's separation on the rest of Canada? It would certainly disrupt interprovincial trade, and because all of the provinces, with the exception of British Columbia, export significant amounts to Quebec, separation would undoubtedly necessitate the negotiation of a Canada–Quebec trade agreement.

In return for signing such an agreement, Quebec would likely want a say in the fiscal and monetary policies of the new Canada since they would impact on the repayment of Quebec's share of our national debt.

With the Quebec market gone, the United States might terminate not only the free trade agreement but the auto pact as well. The new Canada would definitely be out of the G–7. Its credit rating would go down and its borrowing costs would go up.

Who will pay the costs of separation? The average Canadian.

MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, Canadian milk producers are rightly concerned. The Government of Canada has just ended another round of GATT negotiations and according to many people, it may be prepared to sacrifice Article XI of GATT that enables Canada to set farm product supply management policies.

Farmers have benefited from a quota system for over 20 years and milk producers in particular need such a system, without which their industry would be flooded with foreign overproduction, especially from the United States.

We in the Liberal Party still support our quota system. I call on the Conservative government opposite to also support supply management, this system that has served us so well for more than two decades.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Minister of Forestry announced a $100 million six-year initiative entitled "Partners in Sustainable Development in Forestry". This program will support, within the productive force of Canada, the establishment of a network of large-scale exemplary model forests demonstrating the very best in comprehensive management practices.

As part of this plan the Government of Canada will accelerate and expand forestry research across the nation. For example, Forestry Canada Maritimes Region will take a lead role in the development of a national program for integrated insect management with special emphasis on the spruce budworm, the spruce budmoth and the white pine weevil.

Along with other scientific activities such as examining the potential impacts of climate change, this research will usher in a new era of forest science and technology in the maritime provinces of Canada.

The model forests will clearly represent the leading edge of Canada's commitment to sustainable development.

ISRAEL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in 1975 the United Nations General Assembly adopted Resolution 3379 declaring that Zionism is a form of racism.

Canada vigorously opposed that resolution then and we should certainly join in current efforts at the UN to repeal it today. At the same time, Canada must make it very clear to the Israeli government that UN Security Council resolutions on the Middle East, particularly 242 and 338, must be respected. Israel's ongoing violation of international law in the occupied territories including deportations, collective punishment, detentions and violence, and in particular illegal settlements must stop now.

Certainly Canada must extend no loan guarantees to Israel until these fundamental violations of international law and UN Security Council resolutions end. There will only be lasting peace when Arab countries end their state of war against Israel and when the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination and statehood have finally been realized. The suffering has gone on far too long.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was delighted to hear in the Canadian constitutional renewal proposal the government saying: "The charter of rights should be amended to guarantee property rights".

In May 1988 my private member's motion to add the words "and the enjoyment of property" to section 7 of the charter was adopted by a vote in the House of Commons.

Had Meech Lake passed, the Prime Minister in April 1987 assured Canadians that other constitutional issues such as property rights would be dealt with.

As a member of Parliament, I am pleased that a backbencher can sometimes succeed in bringing about major constitutional reform, first through a successful vote in the House and now through the Prime Minister who, true to his word, has included that same constitutional issue of property rights, for which I lobbied, in the Canadian proposal for constitutional renewal.

FISHERY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): The lobster fishing industry in Prince Edward Island remains in a chaotic state because of the stubborn refusal of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to rescind its decision on increased carapace size and to roll back the minimum size in all P.E.I. districts to the former 2.5 inch measure.

The situation concerning carapace size has reached the point of absurdity. P.E.I. has three different fishing zones and three different carapace sizes in effect. Fishermen who live across the road from one another may fish in two different zones and, as a result, not have equal opportunity to earn a living. Buyers in the eastern sector may end up with lobsters from two different zones and two different minimum sizes in the same truck.

What the government should do is roll back the increases already in effect in Districts 25 and 26A. Fishermen in District 25 suffered a decrease of over 25 per cent in the last two years. There is a market for small lobsters. There is no conservation problem. There is no reason to continue this policy.

I ask the minister to put an immediate freeze on all further scheduled increases, to study the disastrous effects the increases have already had and to listen to the voices of the fishermen and processors. If he does these things I am sure he will rescind his earlier decision—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, it is a good beginning. The proposals tabled by the Prime Minister yesterday Shaping Canada's Future Together are precise where needed, open-ended where necessary.

Most English speaking Canadians readily recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec, with its unique language, culture and civil code. However, many of these same people balked at the Meech Lake notion of "distinct society", fearing the unknown. The proposed section 25.1 should dispel these fears by spelling out the meaning of the concept and its limitations.

The open-endedness of the proposals will be a boon to the new special joint committee. It will be up to them, for example, to design the new reformed Senate, based not only on the government's recommendations but on what Canadians tell them.

The provincial governments have now been heard from, and the government has recognized the realities of the amending formula. Political reality in autumn 1991 will not accept a region based approach, however desirable a piece of political science. Any change to section 41 requires unanimity, but all of the changes offered yesterday are achievable under the general formula of 7/50.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Why will the Prime Minister not do the right thing and recognize the inherent right to self-government of the aboriginal people of Canada in the Constitution right now. Why wait 10 years?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is a good thing that we are going quickly to the special joint committee so that these matters can be discussed there.

It is a legitimate question and an important one. As the Leader of the Opposition from his long experience in Indian Affairs will know, the proposal in this document is a very substantial step forward toward the entrenchment in the Constitution of a general right of self-government for the aboriginal people. The 10 year period that is set out is a period that allows for negotiations based upon a certainty among the aboriginal people of their constitutional rights. As the Leader of the Opposition will know, in effect, for those people who conclude negotiations, that constitutional right vests earlier because we are prepared to entrench negotiations that are achieved. I think it is a sensible, reasonable position.

What we are seeking in these proposals is something that will find acceptance across the country. I believe this will, but naturally that and other matters are capable of being discussed in the special joint committee that will hold its first meeting later this day.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister. Why does he not do exactly what was done in 1981? After a long debate there were a lot of lawyers around town telling us we could not do what we did; but we did it. It was done in committee by the three parties in this House of Commons. The same argument was made; we had to wait some years to be able to do this, and the House of Commons decided to do it at that time. Why don't we do the same thing with self-government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I am very pleased that the Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of his party, is endorsing here on the floor of the House the concept of self-government. Certainly that will help us in the deliberations that we undertake.

• (1420)

Our problem with this issue is not a problem with lawyers. Sure, there are too many of them around town.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. minister.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, Maureen is in Halifax.

Our problem, Sir, is to find a proposal that can find general acceptance across the country and that will establish the best circumstances in which we can move forward toward a system of justice for our aboriginal people, status people and others.

As the Leader of the Opposition knows, this government has already taken historic action this summer with the establishment of a royal commission which will deal with some of the issues.

Constitutional issues are urgent. We believe that there is a chance to take a very large step forward toward entrenching a right to self-government, and we hope we will have the support of the Parliament of Canada in doing that.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, still on the subject of the Constitution, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Why did the proposals tabled yesterday take such a timid approach to economic union, when three provinces, and perhaps the majority of Canada's population, will be allowed to opt out, and when in the Allaire report, the Quebec Liberal Party supported the following proposal, and I quote: "Canadian legislatures must drop all restrictions on the free circulation of persons, goods and capital." Why not do in Canada what has already been done in Europe?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposal concerning sections 121 and 91 is basically a response to requests by Mr. Parizeau, Mr. Bourassa, the Quebec Liberal Party and everyone who wants a stronger and tighter economic union in this country. That is exactly what we are suggesting. Our proposals reflect the traditional claims of a number of interested parties, including the leading players in Quebec. The new powers proposed under section 91 would allow the federal government to make laws for the efficient functioning of the economic union. However, this new power is not unlimited, being subject to approval by 7/50, with an opting out provision for Quebec, for instance.

So the nonsense we heard last night on television from people who said this power would savage Quebec is just not true, and Canadians and Quebecers know it isn't true.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The vast majority of Canadians and Quebecers are in favour of economic union. However, if we are going to get anywhere in this debate, we must first lay a number of fears to rest. Obviously, economic union does not and should not affect our major economic development institutions: La Caisse de dépôt et placement, the Caisses populaires and the Heritage Fund. Does the Prime Minister agree with this position?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what my hon. friend has just said. In any case, the objectives of economic union are quite clear. They are: to enhance productivity in Canada, to improve our competitive position and to make our country more prosperous. According to the MacDonald Commission and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, one of the benefits of economic union would be an annual savings of $1,500 for every Canadian family with two children. I think we can say that for the average Canadian, this is indeed a vast improvement.

Our main objective in this respect is to achieve economic union, something, as I said earlier, Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bourassa have always wanted and something General de Gaulle always wanted for Europe, a Europe that will be integrated in 1992. In Europe it all started with the Treaty of Rome, and then it was General de Gaulle. I always thought if it was good enough for General de Gaulle, it is good enough for me.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I remember General de Gaulle, and I am not so sure about that, Mr. Prime Minister!

[English]

I have a supplementary question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

In the constitutional project the government has proposed that property rights be enshrined, that the residual powers be transferred to the provinces, and that mining and forestry be withdrawn from the federal ambit. These are very controversial proposals and they are going to engender a great deal of debate. Regrettably, however, that is for another day.

My question is quite specific. Will the minister assure this House that there is nothing in any one of these proposals that will in any way, shape or form inhibit the federal government's authority either to enact or enforce strong, national, environmental legislation?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may give those assurances to the hon. member on behalf of my hon. friend. In any case, a new low in political commentary was reached last night when Canadians and Quebecers were told that constitutional reform was a threat to the Caisse de dépôt, the Caisse populaire, and Hydro-Québec. Why not the Nordiques and Michel Louvain? This is insane! It is ludicrous. Quebecers are smarter than that. They know perfectly well that these constitutional proposals are intended to strengthen Canadian unity and to strengthen our economic union, and thus improve the economic well-being of every family in Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In the constitutional package the government proposes to turn over residual powers to the provinces. This could mean, of course, that in future if an area is not labelled in federal jurisdiction it would be turned over to the provinces.

The environment is not specifically under federal jurisdiction in the Constitution, which would by implication mean that jurisdiction could completely be turned over to the provinces.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is it this government's intention to abandon federal responsibility for the environment?

I would remind the Leader of the New Democratic Party that such actions as the Government of Canada has had to take regarding residual power, regarding the peace, order and good government clause, has been done under the national and the emergencies portions of that clause. It is a portion which, if she reads the document, she will see the Government of Canada intends to retain for itself.

I would also remind her of the suggestion by this government of the inclusion in the preamble to the Constitution of references to sustainable development, making it clear not only that environment is an issue of interest to us all but that a sustainable, respected environment is considered by this government to be a fundamental value of the country.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Clearly, I think, all Canadians would agree that concern for our environment must be a concern of all Canadians, but the government does propose in its constitutional reforms to turn over such areas as forestry and mining to the provinces. It may also turn over such things that are mentioned in legislative areas such as wildlife, conservation protection, transportation of dangerous goods, and soil and water conservation. All of these areas are environmental areas. Obviously they affect all provinces and territories of this country and there must be some kind of federal overview.

I want to ask the minister: Will his government commit today to supporting a clear statement in the Constitution that the federal government has jurisdiction over the environment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this government's concern for the environment is very clear in the references to which I referred earlier. If we were going to propose moving the environment, we would have done so. We did not propose it because we do not intend to do that. We believe it is a field in which existing federal jurisdictions must be respected and must be maintained.

• (1430)

If the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants to propose a change that would weaken the federal power over the environment then she is free to do that in the committee, but it is not our intention to do that.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Obviously, the environment does not respect boundaries. Canadians must have a right to clean air and clean water. My question for the minister is: Can he quite simply guarantee Canadians these rights to a clean environment through a social charter?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for the first time, it is proposed to entrench environmental concerns in the Constitution. That is part of our proposal.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party talks about rights. As she knows, the word "right" has some implications. I can clearly indicate our government's determination to keep and respect existing federal jurisdiction over the environment.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Aboriginal people and northerners are disappointed with the government's constitutional proposal. The constitutional aspirations of northerners are put off indefinitely. In the government's proposal, aboriginal people are asked to wait 10 years while their right to self-government is defined.

Why has the government put the north and aboriginal people on the constitutional back burner?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do not have the hon. member's skill in Inuktitut. In fact, some of the things they say about me in that language are certainly hard to translate in a favourable way.

Two serious points are raised by the hon. member. With regard to the territories and the question of evolution of government, we have made it clear that we would grandfather arrangements to allow existing territories to move to provincial status on the basis of 7/50. I know that is not what would be the first preference of people in the territories. As became clear in discussions I had with the heads of government of the two territories earlier this week, that is regarded as better than the existing situation.

With regard to native people and the historic step that we are proposing to recognize and entrench in the Constitution, their general right to self-government—

An hon. member: It already exists.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The hon. member is incorrect. It is not something that already exists. This is a substantial change in the constitutional proposals of the country that we believe can be made acceptable across the country. We would certainly propose to begin immediately discussions on that basis, and we would certainly propose to entrench immediately negotiations of self-government arrangements that were made.

I think the hon. member would share my view that it would be wrong for us now to try to define a particular regime of self-government, given the diversity of cultures, traditions and situations of aboriginal people across the country.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. I congratulate the minister on a speech he made to the Queen's University Alma Mater Society in Kingston.

Yesterday's constitutional proposal again asks aboriginal people to wait for 10 years while their right to self-government is described. In a speech on September 9, I point out, the minister responsible said that defining the exact meaning of self-government would be unwise and impractical because it would not allow for growth and recognition of differences. All we are saying is: Recognize the inherent right to self-government.

How does the minister reconcile his earlier statements with the limitations put on self-government's definition in yesterday's proposal?

The Government of Ontario, acting within its own jurisdiction, has opted for an inherent right. I said at the time that the Government of Ontario was a little ahead of the rest of us on that issue and that I expected it would probably stay there on that particular issue.

Nonetheless, what we are proposing is a very substantial change in the status quo, a very substantial move toward recognizing both the history of the first peoples of this country and the current reality in Canada. I think it will be regarded generally as something that is not only a major step forward as a proposal but also is a proposal that has a reasonable prospect of being accepted.

What we are trying to do in these matters is be pragmatic and find things that we can get accepted so we do not just talk about change, we achieve change. This is a change which together we can achieve.

TAXATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

It was reported earlier this week that the federal government intends to agree that the nine provinces that do not already do so can collect their own personal income taxes directly from individual taxpayers.

Is this true? If so, why does the government want to create an additional burden of paperwork and cost and an additional burden of taxation for individual taxpayers in most parts of this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, on June 24, I think the hon. member will remember that a discussion paper was released for the purpose of soliciting opinions on whether provincial requests for greater flexibility over their personal income tax collection could be accommodated within the tax act.

We are receiving those views at the present time, and we would be very pleased to receive a brief from the hon. member.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell this House the additional cost of the paperwork and administration if the nine provinces that do not already do so begin collecting their own income taxes directly from individuals in the country?

If he cannot tell us that figure, why is he launching down this course of additional burden for taxpayers already overburdened by the taxes imposed on them by this government?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, of course I am sure that is one of the factors that will be taken into consideration.

If we take a look at the goods and services tax where we tried to have a national tax, one tax, one collection system right across this country, harmonizing that system, and if the hon. member agrees that the income tax collection system by the federal government on behalf of provinces saves paperwork, then I am sure he will support a national sales tax system.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Earlier today in Ottawa, the prairie wheat pools made another request for a $1 billion cash payment to prairie farmers.

In view of the fact that the average farm income for prairie farmers this year per family is much less than the previous five-year average, I want to know on behalf of the farmers on the prairies of this country whether or not the Prime Minister will now accede to that wish and make sure there is $1 billion payment to prairie farmers some time this fall.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I had a chance yesterday to meet with the prairie pools. We have had a chance over the last number of weeks to attend farmers' rallies where a lot of concern is expressed about the financial problems that farmers face. We all know that they are facing some extremely difficult times. This government has been with our farmers in the past and has been letting them know that it intends to do everything it can to support them in the future.

There is more to it than just financial support. We have to do everything we can at the international level, which we are doing. The Prime Minister is taking a lead in this to try to resolve the very debilitating trade war that is putting our farmers in such an unfair position.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I specifically asked, Mr. Speaker, whether or not there would be a $1 billion pay-out to the farmers some time this fall. I asked that in view of the fact that the average income of family farmers in the prairies, even with the aid that is already there, is less than $6,500 a year.

I would like to direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister, if I may. If there is no pay-out to the farmers this fall of $1 billion, can he explain to the House why it is the policy of the Government of Canada to make sure that the farm income on the prairies is about one-quarter of the national poverty rate?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we had an opposition day in the House last Thursday and we had a very good discussion. It was basically a non-partisan approach to the problem. We all recognize that the problem is there. If you look at the track record of this government, it has been very substantial in supporting agriculture through a very difficult time.

We have absolutely no intention of abandoning our farmers in a problem which they are not making themselves. We have just harvested one of the best crops on record with very high quality. Food is in demand around the world. We intend to see that our farmers get through this so that they can take advantage of better prices when things turn around.

I say again what I have been saying to farmers, and I was at both rallies in Manitoba with some very frustrated and concerned farmers, as well as business people who rely on farmers. We intend to do everything we can to support our farmers to get them through this very difficult situation.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows that the prairie wheat pools have been asking for $1 billion in emergency assistance to farmers to cover the losses in the 1990 crop year. The Prime Minister knows that the situation on the farm is critical. The Prime Minister should also realize that the government's efforts to help so far have fallen short of the mark. In fact, one of his own colleagues, the member for Brandon—Souris, has said on the public record and I quote: "Government efforts to support farmers have not been good enough".

When will the Prime Minister announce emergency assistance to farmers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Without repeating what I said in reply to the previous two questions, Mr. Speaker, we have a process in place to deal with some of these problems.

The member will know that we had a major meeting in Winnipeg about a month ago. There is a meeting again next week to deal with this so-called third line of defence. We have yet to hear the recommendations of that committee.

We understand the problem. I believe very much that we understand the problem. I say again, we are going to do the very best we can to address a problem that needs to be addressed because the farmers are not putting themselves in the kind of situation they are in.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister knows that mass rallies are springing up right across the country: Lucknow, Ontario, Miami and Russel, Manitoba. There are others planned across the prairies. Farmers are rallying to protest because the government has not provided the emergency transitional assistance which it promised last spring when the farm safety network system was being put in place, and because they face the worst financial crisis in a generation.

Since the minister has attended some of these rallies, I ask him how many more farmers have to rally the way they have in these communities? How many more have to lose their farms? How many farmers' families have to be destroyed before this government will act?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): The hon. member does not need to get rhetorical and get emotional to make the point.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, to listen to the hon. member, you would think that the whole problem is the result of this government's policies. Let me point out that there has been a substantial amount of support in the past for this industry.

I happened to attend both rallies that the member is talking about. There is another major one planned for Saskatchewan in Rosetown on Monday. Our members will be there in support of the agriculture industry. To say it again, we are waiting to see what is going to come out of the third line of defence meeting next week in Winnipeg and see what the farmers themselves have to say.

In the meantime, the member should know what we have said, which is that we are going to do the very best we can to support our farmers to get them through this very difficult period.

INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, International Nickel Company of Canada announced yesterday the elimination of 600 jobs in Sudbury. This government's high dollar and high interest policy savages an industry already facing other difficulties. I ask the Prime Minister: will he instruct his finance minister to put an end to this government's disastrous economic and fiscal policies.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is very much aware that the International Nickel Company sells nickel all around the world and the reduction in orders it has had is a result of a world-wide effect in the nickel market primarily related to difficulties in the automotive industry.

I am not happy at all when I see 600 people being laid off there, but I have to recognize that it is not just a problem in Canada, it is an international problem. We in Canada have to understand how we can help those people who are being laid off and that will be done as a result of the policies that are already in place from this government.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, originally the announcement two months ago was for 200 jobs. On September 9, they announced it would increase the number to 400 jobs. And today it has been increased to 600 jobs. Meanwhile, the value of the dollar has kept on increasing.

The people of Sudbury, the people of Canada, ask when will it end. When will the Prime Minister and his government listen to Canadians, stop the de-industrialization of our country and bring forward new economic policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I repeat my point that Government of Canada policies cannot do much about the world-wide glut of nickel that is in place in the United States and other countries of the world. That is not something we can control.

My hon. friend referred to some aspects of government policy. We have seen interest rates in this country fall about 5.5 percentage points since May of last year, at the peak. We have seen a narrowing in the spreads between interest rates in Canada and the United States. This is designed to help the economic recovery that is under way now, as my hon. friend is very much aware. We have seen an improvement in economic performance in the second quarter of this year by 5 per cent in annual terms. So we are getting back on track again. The policies we will be implementing in the future will reinforce that process.

IRAQ

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Earlier this year the UN Under-Secretary General described conditions in post-war Iraq as near apocalyptic and found that Iraqi children had stopped growing, due to lack of food.

A Harvard medical team said that over 55,000 children under five had died because of poor diet, sanitary conditions and lack of medical care.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: What concrete urgent action is our government taking as a war-time coalition partner to assist dying children in Iraq, and to ensure particularly at this time, that Canadian wheat sales to Iraq resume now.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is, of course, very concerned about the loss of life anywhere. Through humanitarian agencies under the auspices of the United Nations, Canada has made what we believe are significant contributions to be of assistance.

I think the greatest thing that could happen on behalf of the children of Iraq, and on behalf of the people of Iraq, would be if Saddam Hussein stopped acting like an international outlaw and conducted himself in such a way as to return to the international community. Then, and only then, will all of the people of Iraq find the peace and the prosperity to which they are entitled.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, surely innocent children in Iraq should not be the victims of that kind of mad policy.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Last September the Prime Minister co-chaired the World Summit for Children. That summit issued a declaration which stated that the essential needs of children and families must be protected, even in times of war and in violence-ridden areas.

In view of the fact that the Harvard study team to which I referred previously has estimated that 170,000 children under the age of five years will die as a result of the delayed effects of this war in the gulf, I want again to ask the Prime Minister what steps is Canada taking now to assist these children to avoid death, starvation, and devastating medical conditions. What are we doing to help the children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, although some 34th in population I believe, Canada's contributions to the United Nations and all of her associated funds, including UNICEF, ranks us with the top four or five in the world.

Our contributions to UNICEF and our leadership on behalf of children is, I think, generally acknowledged to be very significant. One of the great tragedies is that there are some 40,000 children who die each day in the developing countries of Africa and throughout the developing world for want of an investment of $5 per child.

Canada has provided, I think, quite substantial leadership and we are in the process of doing more to assist children throughout the world. It is an enormous tragedy when an innocent child dies for want of food or because of conditions created by its government.

We are working through the United Nations, the Security Council, and all of the agencies of the United Nations. We have done a lot and we are ready to do much more to assist children in developing countries and, indeed, in Iraq obviously.

But principally the problem of the children in Iraq comes from the leader of Iraq. If he wanted to correct many of these problems, he could do so immediately by conducting himself in a civilized way, by ceasing to act as an international outlaw and by returning to the family of nations.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The document on constitutional reform tabled yesterday proposes, and I quote: "To provide the Parliament of Canada with a new power to make laws for the efficient functioning of the economic union of Canada."

Yet, the government is claiming today, as it did yesterday, that it has no intention of interfering with the operation of basic financial institutions in Quebec such as the Deposit and investment Fund or the Desjardins Movement. Besides the good intentions, is the Prime Minister not forced to recognize that the extremely vague wording of this proposal actually provides such power to the Parliament of Canada and could therefore put Quebec in the unbearable situation of having to use the notwithstanding clause?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member only read the first paragraph. He failed to read the next two, which state, and I quote: "Federal legislation under this new power could not be enacted without the approval of at least two thirds of the provinces representing 50 per cent of the population."

An hon. member: Like in 1982!

Mr. Mulroney: Well, there is yet another article. There are three in all. The third one states that if Quebec for instance did not support the legislation, it could opt out altogether.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): There you go, Mr. Speaker, the truth is out. The Parliament of Canada—and correct me if I am wrong—would then have the power to pass legislation that would cripple Quebec financial institutions and force the Quebec government to manage its economy through notwithstanding clauses all the time. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the Prime Minister that, as he is no doubt aware, ministers come and go and governments come and go, and that a Liberal government in this House tried and pass Bill S-31, which would have had that very effect.

How can we be sure today that there will never be across this room a government that will use these powers for that purpose?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use these words, but I have to. What the hon. member has just said is totally dishonest!

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the right hon. minister knows that his reply exceeded the bounds. I would ask him to withdraw and continue his reply.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, if my choice of words was unparliamentary, naturally I will follow the rules. But I must point out that the behaviour of the hon. member who is afraid to face facts and is attempting to deceive the people of Quebec, that too is inadmissible in a democracy such as ours.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Recently an historic agreement to settle outstanding land claims was reached by the federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan. Mr. Ovide Mercredi, the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, was reported in the media as saying that this agreement should not be construed as a solution for other provinces.

This causes me some great concern. Is it wrong to assume that this agreement could not at least be considered a basis for future federal-provincial agreements?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina—Wascana has asked a very important question about the extent of this government's commitment to honour our historic treaty obligations.

I want to tell members of the House how proud we were to be able to sign an historic treaty land entitlement agreement with the province and the premier of Saskatchewan, the Hon. Grant Devine, a week and a half ago, which will bring a doubling of the land base to some 27 treaty land entitlement bands in Saskatchewan by an additional 1.5 million acres and $481 million toward that settlement.

This is an honourable settlement which was highly commended by the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations when he present on that occasion.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the government would have Canadians believe that the recession is over and a recovery is well under way. Well, Canadians are not buying it. In fact, the Canadian homebuilding industry does not believe it and thinks nothing is further from the truth.

Mr. Gary Reardon, president of CHBA, says that the industry is only working at 60 per cent and thousands of construction workers are still waiting for this government's recovery.

My question is to the minister responsible for housing. Will the minister finally implement the 5 per cent down payment plan for first-time homebuyers that will allow thousands to purchase their first home and thousands to return to work?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the member realizes, because he has been involved in many of the discussions we have had in this place and in others, that there are many ways that we can try to assist those people trying to get into the housing market.

Those proposals are being considered but to date there has been no decision made. We will advise the member when we do make that decision.

• (1500)

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government sat on the proposal for over a year. This proposal has proven its worth in the past and it will not cost taxpayers any money.

I want to ask the government again: When will it take its head out of the sand and do something for the home building industry in this country and for home buyers who are waiting to buy their first homes?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the mortgage rates today are at the lowest they have been in six or seven years. That is the best way we can help people to buy homes. Every time interest rates drop one percentage point, thousands of Canadians become eligible to put their down payments to buy homes.

Interest rates have dropped 5.5 per cent in the last year and that is the most important thing we can do for the home building industry.

ATLANTIC MARINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns a report from his own department which recommends a user fee be charged to all vessels visiting Atlantic Canadian ports for navigational aid use.

Quite simply, this is just yet another tax which will further cripple the competitiveness of the Atlantic marine industry.

My question is: Will the minister guarantee in this House today that he will under no circumstances implement this new tax on the marine industry in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows, a user fee policy was introduced and put to consultation by the transportation department last year. After receiving all the input of the different stakeholders in that industry, we are at the present time reconsidering the situation and will make our final proposal known pretty soon.

HEALTH

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am going to surprise many colleagues in the House by directing my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and complimenting him and the CBC for the tremendous review and introspection they did of his mitosis on Monday night's The Journal from whatever it is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: I know the problems. Quite frankly, I used to sit in the same caucus with the hon. member. Frankly he and I have not shared some views and I thought he was very personal when I had my problem on the Meech Lake thing.

My question is on the proposals laid before the House by the Prime Minister yesterday. Quite frankly, the house of federation I find tremendously confusing. But would he give us an assurance that regardless of whatever comes out of the proposals, but especially because of the proposals, that the uniform medicare system of medical treatment to Canadians, which I think is one of our fundamental prerogatives or rights, will stay intact?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join my hon. friend in congratulating the minister not only for an excellent appearance, but also for the assurance that he has given in respect of medicare which will remain a strong and important dimension of Canadian national unity.

I would like to give him more assurances in other areas, but I will only be able to do that when the CBC does a similar flattering profile on me.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to hear the hon. member from Alberta use the term "dishonest" when speaking to one of our colleagues in this House, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

Mr. Speaker: One moment, please. The minister withdrew what he said, so the incident is closed. Does the hon. member have another point of order?

Mr. Plamondon: I have a comment for the Chair. The minister said that he would conform to the Standing Orders but he did not withdraw the term "dishonest". I would ask him to do that.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of people which under Standing Order 36 I would like to table in the House.

These Canadians are praying and calling upon Parliament to assist the grains and oilseed producers who are experiencing a terrible cash shortfall this year. They are urging the government, as my colleague from Algoma did earlier today, to provide assistance in these very difficult times.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by constituents from the Ottawa-Carleton region.

The petitioners are requesting that the film The Burning Times be withdrawn from circulation and that the National Film Board publicly apologize to Catholics.

It is their view that the presentation is historically inaccurate and that commentary is entirely biased against and hostile to the Catholic Church. In their view the film attempts to foster hatred and misunderstanding of the Catholic religion.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several persons from southwestern Ontario.

First they petition Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada and, second, to re-examine this government's priorities in terms of decreased funding for Canadian institutions and this government's insistence on privatization.

EDUCATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by Canadians.

Given the fact that we must become more internationally competitive, given the fact that we need a professional and skilled labour force, and given that there is a shocking 38 per cent rate of illiteracy across this great country, these petitioners are calling upon the government to begin with its provincial counterparts to begin to put together some semblance of national standards with regard to our young people in their pursuit of education and careers in this country.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present a petition to the House today which requests this government to address the very critical issue surrounding the problems faced by grain and oilseed producers in this country who do not have the cash to carry through this fall, let alone think to next spring. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to provide assistance as proposed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture on August 29, 1991.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, I too am presenting a petition from the farming community. They have had a disastrous year of extremely low prices and are having great difficulty in attempting to recoup their input costs. They are in disastrous trouble and are requesting the government to come forward with support this year.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and the motion of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular bill and to bring to the attention of all citizens the devastating effects of this type of legislation and what it is going to mean to those people who are disadvantaged; the poor, the sick, the elderly and women in our communities.

I wish to bring to the attention of the House exactly what is taking place with this legislation. It is referred to affectionately, or not affectionately, as the cap on CAP. The second CAP stands for the Canada Assistance Plan and we all know what it does for those people who are disadvantaged.

It is ironic that someone from a have not province in Atlantic Canada is be up speaking and urging the government to reconsider this legislation, as it is going to affect what we call the have provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. In looking at all the social programs in Canada, I think this is the thin edge of the wedge. While it may be affecting the rich provinces, and some will say they are best able to afford this situation, I am not sure that everyone realizes that over a five-year period a little over $2 billion in federal transfer payments will be stopped. That will have an adverse affect on these provinces.

The plan was created with a positive foundation of helping everyone, and to help each area of the country, with the federal government contributing 50 per cent of the cost. There was no ceiling on the amount of contributions because there is no ceiling on the adverse effects of a bad economy. We have seen that in the last couple of years with the adverse effects of the recession, the government's high dollar policy, high interest rate policy, and all of those things have transcended all provincial boundaries. Yet the disadvantaged need help. They need the resources of CAP.

The CAP funding went to single parent families, mentally and physically disabled persons, the aged, children in care and those in need of protection from abuse or neglect, the unemployed, families and individuals in crisis, low income workers and battered women. These are just some of the different groups in our society which have been adversely affected by the recession and which are in need of assistance. Now there is going to be a cap on that assistance.

The other thing which a lot of people forget and I think it is worth while to point out is that over half of Canada's poor live in these rich provinces. They are going to be adversely affected. We have seen what has happened in Ontario, with the Ontario government, rightly or wrongly, having to go into massive deficit financing. We know for sure that those people just enumerated are not going to receive the help and the assistance they really deserve because even our rich provinces are not in a position to provide that type of support.

Another interesting fact, and a shocking one, is that children make up the largest group of those who rely on welfare. My information is that they make up approximately 37 per cent of the total. That is a shocking figure. The aim of this legislation is to adversely affect those people. To adversely affect children, in my humble opinion, and I am sure you will agree, Madam Speaker, if not anything else, is morally wrong.

Additionally, to give some of the facts and figures associated with this particular problem, spending in these areas has increased more than what the cap is going to be, so there will be a shortfall. On average across the country, it is at 7 per cent. Over the last couple of years, Ontario has seen an increase of 15 per cent, and the federal government's cap is at 5 per cent, all of which is totally unacceptable in my view.

There are some interesting facts as they relate to provinces such as New Brunswick which is experiencing the cutbacks to those types of social programs in which federal government involvement is necessary. I quote from a recent newspaper clipping about health care and health care standards in New Brunswick where health and community services minister Ray Frenette made the following comments: "The federal government should not expect provinces to maintain high health care standards if they aren't willing to help pay for it".

Frenette went on to say: "The area most likely to be affected by restraint measures is New Brunswick's $1 billion health care budget. Federal funding has been needed just to keep pace with the ever-escalating costs of medical care".

"Last year the McKenna government put restraints on doctors' use of medicare systems and scaled down hospital construction plans to save money. Frenette would not say what kind of restraints could be employed in 1991-1992 but said costs would far outstrip the level of funding available."

This is one province that is facing very serious problems in the area of health care standards and if we are attacking those standards, what is going to happen with the rest of the social safety net in existence in this country?

We all acknowledge that the Canada Assistance Plan is the largest single source of funding for social services in Canada. It accounts for approximately 38.5 per cent of provincial spending. If we put on a cap that is less than what is actually needed, then the shortfall has to come from somewhere. It is going to be transmitted all the way down the system so that if the federal government opts out or cuts back, then provinces will have to pick up the slack. If provinces cannot pick up that slack, it will be handed on to the municipalities.

I know the situation is different in New Brunswick and municipalities are not responsible for social programs, but in other provinces municipalities are responsible. I know for a fact that municipalities in Ontario are facing very serious problems as a result of the social responsibilities being sent down the line. The municipality is the one level of government which is least capable of affording the increased cost but now they will face the largest burden as a result.

I would like to leave the House with the comments contained in an article by Ronald Melchers in Perception: "In abrogating its commitment to contribute equally with the provinces to the alleviation and prevention of poverty, the federal government is abrogating the sacred trust of Canada's social programs. CAP is the fundamental and minimum element of Canada's social safety net. Beyond the minimum subsistence it provides there is only the dependency of charity. With the Canada Assistance Plan Act in 1966, Canada joined the advanced nations of the world by accepting the essential responsibility of government for the subsistence of its citizens. With Bill C-69, and an extension of that, Bill C-32, Canada would take a great leap backwards."

There is no question in my mind that we are taking a great leap backwards by proceeding in this fashion with this legislation. We must maintain the social safety nets that bind this country together. It is one of the major threads that makes all of us Canadians, that holds us all together. We cannot end up with a two-tiered social safety net and we cannot end up with a two-tiered medicare system. We must put into place sufficient funding so that all Canadians from sea to sea to sea are treated equally. This legislation will do just the opposite. It is a reprehensible piece of the legislation and the government should reconsider their ill-advised scheme of capping the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have this short period of time to address this particular piece of legislation, sometimes referred to as the cap on CAP.

This bill originally emanated from a desire on the part of the government to place some controls on federal spending. Taken by itself, I do not see that as a bad thing. We in this House realize that the federal government has been spending a lot more than it has been collecting in taxes. Notwithstanding that the taxpayer has been screaming "ouch" for quite a while, we still do not have enough tax revenue to cover the kind of expenditures we are being called upon as a nation to dispense.

So from the simple perspective of fiscal management, any initiative to regulate spending is welcome.

The principal problem we have here in opposition with this piece of legislation is that this fiscal management initiative, or so it is addressed and described, is blind. It is blind to the poor. It is blind to the provincial administrators who take the federal money and dispense it to the various provincial mechanisms. It is blind to the realities out there on main street Canada this year.

The reason why it is blind is because the funding that we dispense federally is not placed directly into the hands of the recipient it is intended to assist. These expenditures are set aside and used for welfare and social assistance costs right across the country. Therefore, when we in the House of Commons approve this kind of spending, we know that those dollars are going to virtually end up in every part of this country.

When we entered into the agreement to share fifty-fifty with the provinces in that spending, I think it fair to assume that we did not get out the measuring stick and try to calculate how much we were actually going to spend year after year. We simply agreed to share 50 per cent of whatever the provinces, through their own municipalities, decided should be spent in social assistance.

Perhaps that was an initial flaw when we addressed this. In any event we are in the present and the government feels that it must put a cap, a limit on what we do spend.

In my riding in Ontario, there have been two separate large macroeconomic issues that have occurred.

One is our made-in Canada recession which has swelled the numbers of individuals who really are in need of social assistance. When we talk about social assistance, we are usually talking about the basics of food and shelter. So the numbers of those who are truly in need in my province, and I am sure it is the case in many parts of the country, have grown.

Second, the number of refugees who have come to Canada over the last three, four, five years, has swelled the ranks of those who are in need. That is a problem that is particularly evident in the Toronto area, and I am sure it is a problem in other large municipalities where many refugees, at least on an interim basis, settle.

In the face of this large growth in the number of poor, in the number of needy who really do need the assistance, the government has taken this opportunity to say that we must artificially cap our spending at 5 per cent.

The 5 per cent figure does not face two structural realities, not the two historic facts I have just mentioned. It does not take account of the fact that when we put the cap in place, the raw numbers of poor may increase. I have already referred to the numbers of "poor" who have been harmed and on whose backs collectively we appear to be fighting inflation by means of our self-induced made-in-Canada recession. It is not their fault. That is how our Bank of Canada and this government decided to proceed last year.

Second, it does not take into account that the real costs to the poor for those basics of food and shelter may, in certain localities, increase to more than 5 per cent. The cost of shelter in Vancouver, Whitehorse, St. John's and Toronto may in fact—and it is not the fault of the poor nor the fault of this House necessarily, it is simply an economic fact— increase to more than 5 per cent.

In that way this legislation fails to face those realities faced by the poor. I accept that there are fiscal realities at the same time, but my caucus and I cannot accept that this fiscal tool, the 5 per cent cap is fairly applied. For that reason, we feel we have to oppose this legislation.

I would like to think that before the cap was put in place and before it was in force that the government here, which we oversee in this House, would recognize that a hungry child on street number one was just as hungry as the child in the next block. If in fact we are going to cut back on the money we are putting in to the system to provide the food and those basics, we must find another way to make sure that hungry child number two is treated as well as hungry child number one.

I think of the parable of the loaves and the fishes. It is fortunate that the good Lord did not have to work within a budget at that time. He did not. He had a couple of other fiscal tools at his disposal. Until and unless this bill, as hard as it is, as fiscally needed as it is, can take account of those very real Canadian poor realities, Madam Speaker, we cannot support it.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill as strongly and as forcefully as I can. Bill C-32 is a bad piece of legislation and the government should withdraw it and start over. This bill extends for a further three years the cap on social assistance payments by the federal government to the provinces in three provinces; Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. It will have a devastating impact on millions of Canadians. It is important to underline what this bill reveals about this government and its priorities as it tackles the issues before this country.

Listen to what CAP serves. Listen to what social programs are served that are now being held down under this legislation. The Canada Assistance Program, which is funded jointly by the federal and provincial governments across this country, benefits abused and neglected children in need of protection, mentally and physically disabled persons, one parent families, seniors, the unemployed and the working poor, battered women, families and individuals in crisis. The program serves homes for the aged, nursing homes, shelters for homeless and shelters for battered women, residential welfare institutions and rehab centres. It services child welfare services and child care through subsidies to low income Canadians.

What this government is doing with this bill is imposing a further limit for another five years on the legitimate needs of those who are served under the Canada Assistance Program.

In British Columbia, the province from which I come, there are already 43,400 people a month served by food banks, 18,000 of whom are children. We have an unemployment rate of over 10 per cent in British Columbia, and it is rising. Thousands more are under-employed, barely scraping through an existence that could be described as below the poverty line.

The Canada Assistance Program is one of the few programs in this country designed to help the poor. We in Canada have over a million children below the poverty line, one of the worst records in the western world. In British Columbia, as in Canada as a whole, the gap between rich and poor is obscene, and yet this government proposes to try to deal with its budgetary problems by imposing a cap on CAP.

In British Columbia alone it has been estimated that this bill will cost the provincial treasury, in its attempt to shift from the federal treasury to the provincial treasury, over $900 million in the next three years. We, unfortunately, at least for the next three weeks, are blighted by a government that simply passes on the bill to the poor.

Rita Johnston has already said in some public statements that faced with this bill, they are simply going to pass it on to the poor. "It is little enough", she says, "that we are doing now for those people who are not able to help themselves". She certainly has that right. To follow on the quote: "If we are having to look at the taxpayers of British Columbia assuming more of the responsibility than they presently do, it is going to be a hardship". In future provincial budgets she says "You are going to see us saying 'no' and 'not right now' more often than you have in the past". And this is a provincial government which has one of the worst records in Canada for dealing with the poor and those who have not.

This bill, having a direct impact on the poor, must not proceed.

The government raises its fiscal problems in answer to the criticism it has been getting from this side of the House on this bill, and yet the Conservative government over the last six years has actually reduced taxes to the large corporations by 20 per cent, while their profits have increased by 34 per cent in the same period of time. Liberal and Conservative tax loopholes at the rate of $6 billion a year are not being touched by this government.

Instead, it chooses to attack the poor in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

Madam Speaker, this is a bad bill. It should not proceed. We will vote against it.

• (1540)

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, I wanted to say it is a pleasure to stand up in the House and speak on this Bill C-32, but this bill really punishes people. While the government would have us believe that it is simply a bill to try and deal with its deficit and debt and its budgetary problems, I think one needs to look at what the Canada Assistance Plan does, has done and will do for the people of Canada.

It becomes clear that putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, especially in the provinces of Ontario, B.C. and Alberta, essentially says to the provincial governments and the municipal governments: "We, the federal government, do not believe that we have a responsibility beyond the 5 per cent increase to look after the people who are in need in your provinces that find themselves in some difficult circumstances".

In 1965, Prime Minister Pearson brought in the Canada Assistance Plan to a certain extent, as it has been said, as his declaration of war on poverty. I and my colleagues, about eight months ago, travelled across this country to look at the effects of the government's economic policies and the effects upon the men and women, the workers in this country, and what was occurring because of this government's made-in-Canada recession.

In 35 cities across the country we found that there was an awful lot of pain and anguish, that men and women were losing their jobs and having to go on welfare because their unemployment insurance benefits were exhausted. Because of another of this government's bad, ill-fated attempts at creating equality under Bill C-21, people were forced off unemployment insurance on to the social welfare rolls in the municipalities.

Municipal leaders, provincial leaders, business leaders and social community groups said that the recession was having a devastating effect on people's lives. In fact, the provincial and municipal governments were now forced financially to deal with the great needs out there and that the federal government had essentially washed its hands and its responsibility, its social obligation, its moral obligation that it has had since 1965 to essentially assist people, no questions asked.

Yes, everyone would agree that we need to get our financial house in order, that one needs to look at waste in government and to target our expenditures, but surely we do not need to essentially gut the most important social net that we have in this country and that is the Canada Assistance Plan.

I want to deal again with what is behind the Canada Assistance Plan. In its preamble, the Canada Assistance Plan states that its objectives are to alleviate poverty and to prevent and remove the causes of poverty and the dependence on public assistance.

Well, we may be in the 1990s, and some people may have it good, but there are a lot of people who do not have it so good; the 1.5 million unemployed. Last year there were over 1,800,000 people were assisted through social assistance, with the help of the provincial and municipal governments for such things as welfare, dental care, home care, safe housing for abused women, foster homes for abused children, subsidized child care for low income families, shelter, clothing, food and emergency shelters for the homeless. If you look at what the Canada Assistance Plan stands for, it stands for helping people. Surely the government, if it wanted to essentially save some money, could look at other areas within its budget controlled areas to deal with the budget, but not to gut the social net that is there to help our citizens.

To suggest that Ontario, B.C. and Alberta can best look after the needs of people themselves, and hence the federal government putting the cap on CAP, is surely trying to create two different kinds of citizens in this country; those who come from the richer provinces and those who come from the not so fortunate provinces. Yes, the government introduced Bill C-69 in its last budget. It was only supposed to be for two years. The provinces fought it in the courts but the courts suggested that the federal government had the power to do as it did, which was to change its social contract. The government did it again this year and said that it was going to continue to impose this pain and suffering on municipalities, the provinces and the people by extending it for a third year.

I find this really hypocritical because the government's constitutional plan laid out yesterday talked about co-operation, about a federation of the councils in which the provincial governments would sit down with the federal government to discuss the budget and co-ordination of programs. This government talks about one way to deal with other governments but does exactly the opposite through legislation such as Bill C-32.

If the constitutional plan as the Tories envision it was in place, would they have the gall and guts to do this to the provinces, to put a cap on CAP? It would not be allowed. The Constitution would not allow this government to do what it is now trying to do through the back door by putting a cap on CAP.

The government and the Prime Minister talk about a compassionate society, about the fact that this country has to be united and that we have to work together to solve our constitutional problems, our economic problems, and our social problems. Yet at the first opportunity, where does it attack? It attacks the very social fabric of this country by tearing apart the safety net that previous Liberal governments had put in place, and this government is prepared to watch people go through that net.

It is prepared to say that while we want to deal with our deficit, the provinces and the municipalities must deal with the deficit. Municipal leaders, especially in Ontario where they are facing elections this month, have had to increase their property taxes because their welfare rolls are ballooning 100 and 200 per cent. The provincial governments are having to put more money into those social assistance benefits. Why? Because this government has forgotten its moral obligation to help each citizen of this country.

I find it reprehensible that this government can talk about co-operation, about a compassionate country, about unifying this country while at the same time it is prepared to take a scalpel to our social net and our social benefits and leave people to fend for themselves.

I am not sure that Canadians can accept that kind of government. I think they want more than that. Does this government really want to deal with budgetary problems it has created? The Tories have had seven years under the best of economic conditions to deal with their budget, yet our deficit is still at $30 billion. Our debt has gone from $200 billion to $400 billion. I suggest that the problem is not with the Canada Assistance Plan but with this government.

We need a new vision for this country and a new government to deal with it.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, like my colleague from London East I rise to discuss Bill C-32. I suppose a debate such as this one on Bill C-32, which is an attempt to limit the Canada Assistance Plan, helps distinguish what it means to be a Conservative in this country for average Canadians tuning into this parliamentary debate.

I say that because it is part of their agenda to interfere with a program that has been in existence since 1966, a program that allows a national federal government, under a cost sharing agreement with provincial governments, to provide social assistance programs for Canadians who deserve them when they need them.

For a Conservative government during one of the worst recessions in this country's history, which was made by the Conservative government, to introduce a piece of legislation such as Bill C-32, does not speak too highly of the winds this country has had to go through in order to arrive at the Canada Assistance Plan. Does the government realize that Canadians are going through some very tough times?

The solutions to our social problems are good, solid economic policies and programs. However, we do not have those economic programs. We do not have good economic times.

My own city of Toronto is quite often labelled as the fat cat city but let me tell the government that there is an underbelly to metropolitan Toronto as well. There happens to be double digit unemployment in the city of Toronto, including in my own riding.

There are a record number of plants closing in the city of Toronto. There are a record number of plants moving south and a record number of people unemployed for the first time in their lives, embarrassed to be unemployed and embarrassed to go to their members of Parliament to fill out a UIC claim. They are embarrassed because they feel their dignity is under attack.

There are a record number of people going from full-time jobs to part-time jobs. There are a record number of students graduating from our universities and college fraternities who cannot find their niche in society.

There are a record number of people lining up at our food banks. The numbers are greater than during the Great Depression which this country knew some years back. There are a great number of people in the city of Toronto with children who go hungry.

This government needs to listen. This government needs to open its eyes and recognize that Canadians are hurting. Yes, Canadians want, expect and deserve good, solid economic management. However, Canadians also recognize that in time of legitimate need there has been a history and tradition in this country which is part of the Canadian social contract that they contributed during the good times and there will be some allowance, some assistance, some social safety net for the rainy days, the troubling days.

A bill like Bill C–32 would remove in large measure the ability of provincial governments like the one in Ontario where the recession has been the worst, where the manufacturing base has been hit the worst, where most of the plant closings have been. This bill will begin to undermine the underpinnings which have kept that safety net there for Canadians who have to endure the tough times.

This government simply cannot ignore its economic policies, its dollar policy, fiscal policy, its interest rate or its lack of an economic plan to put Canadians back to work. It cannot ignore that fact while also at the same time begin to remove itself from any social obligations as a response to that economic malaise.

It cannot do both at the same time and expect Canadians to be confident, to survive and to have any sense of dignity about living in a country that has been the pride and envy of countries around the globe.

We cannot have both at the same time. If we try to do those things at the same time—that is, ignore the economic needs and remove the social underpinnings—we are going to create a situation where many Canadians across the country will be able to make their ends meet.

How many of us as members of Parliament meet Canadians in our constituency offices on Saturday mornings and see people in desperate situations? They are working middle class Canadians who are finding it more difficult to stay working middle class. They come to us and say: "How do I make things work? I have children who go to school to feed and clothe". Both parents are working. The mortgage on their house is unpaid yet. Property taxes continue to go up. GST is a reality. Increased taxes from all levels. Then, when you really, legitimately need some help through no fault of your own and you do not control the economic lifeblood of your community, there is going to be even less for you when you go looking for the types of programs that have been a pillar since 1966, since Mr. Pearson introduced the Canada Assistance Plan.

Now that we have a constitutional proposal, let the government think of the role of the national government, of national standards, of trying to give dignity and a sense of decent lifestyle to Canadians from coast to coast. If it is serious about a true national role, then it cannot be serious about moving Bill C–32 through the House at this stage.

Even in the worst case scenario there may be an argument when economic times are good. However, the experiences of real Canadians and real communities across the country are far different. In fact, we probably cannot legislate based on good and bad times anyway because we are going to know both in this country.

What Canadians want to know and be reassured of is that while we are going to have economic roller coasters, that there is a base, a foundation, a contract, a consistency, a stability of some minimum in this country that should not be constantly attacked. We have seen moves by this government since 1984 in the social arenas, whether it was the pensioners one year or the Canada Assistance Plan this year. We have seen moves to begin to unravel programs that we fought for and that political blood has been expended on. We cannot begin to unravel and undo in short order what it has taken this country generations to build.

I believe in this time of cynicism, when Canadians are lacking confidence in their institutions and in their members of Parliament, part of that is a feeling that we are losing too much too quickly as citizens and as a country, whether it is defined through sovereignty, whether it is defined through our close relationships to the Americans to the free trade, whether it is open skies, and even domestically, when one begins to lose the things that have been of value and have given definition and sense of purpose to the term "Canadianism".

We on this side of the House are urging government members to reconsider Bill C-32, to understand the hurt out there and to begin to feel and share the hurt. If they feel it and begin to share it, they will not move on Bill C-32, because to feel it and share it would be to have a sense of compassion and a sense of duty.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I too would like to speak on the bill before the House. Bill C-32, would effectively cap the CAP for the three so-called wealthy provinces: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

You may, Madam Speaker, being from a province which is not subject to this bill, say: "Well, that is fine. You are wealthy people in Alberta. You have no poor people there". I doubt that you would say that, but some people might think that. Therefore, one makes a sacrifice to try to balance the budget.

In starting, I would point out that on the weekend the Department of External Affairs has allegedly spent $140 million on a communications system that does not work.

You will have noticed, Madam Speaker, that last year the federal government spent $500 million on sending its public servants—one of whom I used to be—around the country. The government is spending about $160 billion a year now on some things which I think to most Canadians are simply beyond our means to afford.

I will spend time on this, although I realize I only have a few moments. I would like to talk a little bit about poverty in Alberta since a lot of people think it does not exist. There is a lot of poverty in Alberta. There is a lot of poverty in single families in my own constituency, and I have met a lot of them, invariably women because, as you know, divorce or separation, is instant povertization for women. In fact, one single parent told me recently that by her estimates, the husband's income actually goes up substantially when they separate, the wife's goes down enormously.

There is a great deal of poverty in Alberta and unfortunately it has been growing rapidly. There are 49,000 households in Alberta living below the poverty line. There is the working poor, which you know about as well. Children in Alberta are now marginally worse off than those of the average Canadian. I wonder how many people outside of British Columbia and Alberta know that. It is actually higher for Alberta than it is nationally.

There are all kinds of indications which I think are irrefutable that poverty and the working poor children in Alberta are not living in the lap of luxury at all. What this bill does, as I am sure you know very well by now, Madam Speaker, is it is going to make it harder for us to provide assistance. It is going to make it harder for us to provide education. It is going to make it harder for the people in Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario to provide things which probably are part of the glue that holds Canada together.

If this government removes enough of the glue that holds us together, I fear enormously for the future of my country. You may say that they are only doing it to these three provinces. What are we going to do next year when they do it to Manitoba, or to Saskatchewan where the farm price is probably unprecedented in this century, including the Depression years. If they can do it to three provinces, they can do it to any province.

I would ask members of this House to urge the government to withdraw the bill, not to go ahead with it given the present economic situation, because it will weaken the ability of three provinces in this country with thousands and thousands of poor families, families who need educational assistance, families who need hospital assistance, to provide those services.

According to the government's estimates, the three affected provinces will lose $2.13 billion in federal transfers over the five-year period through to 1995-96. Provincial estimates are significantly higher.

Under CAP, as you know, Madam Speaker, the federal and provincial governments share equally in the costs of basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies to persons who so qualify. Services are provided for poor people and lower income people through CAP and include such things as dental care, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, subsidized child care for low income families.

The cap on CAP, as it has been termed, has been extended by the Conservative government and, of course, as we know the court has now recently ruled that it can do that. As a result of that ruling, the government will seek repayment of CAP funds transferred to the three provinces, including $40 million to British Columbia, $400 million to Ontario, and I am afraid I do not know how much for Alberta.

This party, I am proud to say, has consistently opposed the cap on CAP. We do not support the Conservative government's measures to transfer the burden of the national debt and federal deficit reductions on to the backs of poor Canadians, in this case the three provinces at issue.

I am delighted that so many speakers on this side of the House have got up to oppose this bill. I assume, Madam Speaker, you are going to hear shortly from a colleague from Sudbury who will do the same. I think it is a very sad day, as an Albertan and a western Canadian, when a government is going to bring in a measure that will do significant harm to our fellow citizens in the three provinces which have difficulty getting by at the end of the month.

I would put it to you, Madam Speaker, that the bill makes a mockery of the 1984 election pledge of the now Prime Minister that social programs are "a sacred trust". It also digs the grave for universality. I believe it could well turn out to be part of the—perhaps tombstone is too strong a word—end of medicare as some health experts argue. Anti-poverty groups have said that the poor will be left defenceless. The Native Council of Canada has called this bill and its earlier predecessor C-69 "a national disaster for people already living in Third World conditions."

The bill is unacceptable to my party and, I believe, it is unacceptable to the vast majority of Canadians and certainly the vast majority of people living in the three affected provinces.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C-32, which is a bill to extend the cap on CAP. CAP, in essence, is the Canada Assistance Program which is the bill that provides or matches moneys to provinces for a number of welfare and social programs which affect, by and large, seniors, children, women and those people who are unfortunate enough to no longer have a job, to no longer collect unemployment insurance and are really in desperate need of welfare. Of course, we do have a law that states that if a person qualifies in the municipalities, they must pay them the money.

As you know, this creates a tremendous burden on municipalities and so the property taxes end up being increased. In my community and in many communities in Ontario, already the property tax base is very high. People have been taxed to death and it continues to happen.

I must say something. It seems very strange to me to be standing here in this House, in essence speaking for the people of Ontario, defending the people of Ontario and speaking for the NDP government in Ontario, saying that we all know it has a huge deficit and this will certainly increase its deficit, but I wonder, over the last little while, why I have not heard any of my colleagues from the NDP rise and deliver any kind of speech on this subject. It seems rather passing strange to me that I, as a Liberal, am here defending the position of Bob Rae's NDP government in Ontario when I know that he has many colleagues here who do not seem to be standing up to speak on this subject.

Nevertheless, I feel very strongly about the issue. I feel that someone has to stand up and speak for those who have a very difficult time defending themselves in our social system.

I do agree with deficit reduction and with controlling the amounts of moneys that are spent. I find that very commendable, but I often wonder how a government can, on the one hand, say we are going to control the deficit and we are going to control it on the backs of those who have nothing, and then turn around and have money for many of the projects that please them and their friends. We have any amounts of moneys for computer programs and computer systems. We had one just the other day that we heard about in External Affairs. It was scheduled to cost $28 million and it is costing $148 million. There was money for that. There will be money, I am sure, for many other projects which happen to appeal to the Conservative government's friends.

It surprises me that suddenly there is no money to match for those provinces that are seemingly the richer provinces, although I would beg to differ now after what has been happening in Ontario with the massive long-term loss of jobs in the industrial sector.

This is not like the last recession in the 1980s. If you can recall in the early 1980s, we did have a very terrible recession in the country. It was very much a world-wide recession.

In the early 1980s, the jobs were put on hold. They did not disappear forever. These jobs are gone now. It seems to me that we have to give some consideration to the burden that will fall on the provinces and on the municipalities because obviously the provincial government has no room in its budget to take up the slack of what this government is not going to give them. It has already overspent in many areas, so it is going to pass it on to municipalities and municipal taxpayers.

I was once an alderman and a regional councillor, and I can recall how terrible it was for us to keep raising taxes. The people of Sudbury pay just about the highest municipal taxes in the province of Ontario, and yet already the budget for welfare has surpassed anything that they predicted. Obviously, that money will have to come from somewhere.

It is not just the welfare rolls. It is the other areas, the seniors and the homes for seniors. Every day we read of some of these homes which are inadequately funded. I was reading just the other day of one home—I am not sure where it is—where the staff actually had to go out and do the laundry because there had been no laundry delivered. There was no money to make sure that they had clean linen.

Have we forgotten that we do have a duty to our seniors, to make sure that they are well cared for? We must not forget that we owe them a debt. They did many things for us, and now it is our turn to do for them.

We must also not forget those who will follow after us, that is, our children. You all know, of course, of the desperate need of many of our children. Many of our children live below the poverty line. They live in homes where the income is very low. They live in homes where there is only one parent. That parent may not have a job. That parent may be living on social assistance.

What happens to these children? What kind of hope can we give them? I am convinced that somewhere, somehow we have to start co-operating with all levels of government. It is not fair for one government to decree to another one. Somehow there has to be a mechanism put into place so that every level of government can sit down and say: "Listen, we have these problems. We do have the problem of the deficit and the debt. Yes, we acknowledge that."

We also have a problem with people who are unemployed and with people who are on social assistance. We have children. We have the middle income, ordinary taxpayer who is absolutely pushed to the limit. In any of the subdivisions where people have kept their homes to see their property tax base continually increase year after year, is there any wonder why there is a revolt?

Do we forget that it does not matter which pocket the dollar comes from, be it the right pocket or the left pocket? It is all from the same person.

I think there should be some way that we could sit down together. Let us not pass this bill, Bill C-32. Let us come back with some kind of project where all levels of government will work together to help all sectors. Perhaps we could come up with some answers.

I know it is not easy, but there are no easy answers. Obviously, this is not the answer that it should be. It is certainly not an easy answer.

I plead with the members on the other side of the House. I know there are many of them who are compassionate. They do not all believe that they should hurt people. I plead with them to please all sit together, work together and try to resolve some of these problems.

Slashing, cutting or decreeing do not help. They really do not help.

I on the other hand would be very happy to sit down with these people and say: "Yes, let us all tighten our belts, but let us not forget those who need our help also". There are many instances where we can ourselves cut back on our spending and help those who cannot help themselves.

I think it is horrendous that now in the 1980s it seems that wherever we go there are food lines and people who are hungry. It is national disaster in a country with the numbers of resources and with the standard of living that we have that we should have that kind of a disaster befall us.

I understand that it is not always easy to address these issues, but it is certainly a very worth-while one. I have to ask again whether our friends to the left will be prepared to stand up and defend the province of Ontario. In my riding, we have three provincial NDP members. I wonder what they think of this. I wonder if the people from their party here in the national capital are willing to stand up and speak to this point. I have not heard any of them. I gather perhaps a few have spoken to the issue.

Have they just walked away from the fate of our poor Canadians? I do not know.

I can understand the people from the Conservative Party not wanting to rise because they are ashamed. I would be ashamed too if I was doing that to those who have less than I have. I can sympathize. I would be ashamed also.

An hon. member: I am not ashamed.

Mrs. Marleau: The member across the way tells me he is not ashamed. I think he is an exception. Otherwise, why are they not standing up and defending their position and saying why they are going to do this to all of these poor people.

I want to thank you, Madam Speaker, for your patience, and I want to ask that you do everything in your power to convince this government to be fair and honourable with regard to our poorest.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to rise and speak on debate on Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. The Canada Assistance Plan is a program created back in 1966 to permit the federal government to enter into cost sharing agreements with provincial governments for the provision of social assistance and also social welfare services for Canadians in need.

What does this bill do? It reaffirms, I believe, the agenda this government has been pursuing for seven years now, which is to attack the fundamental social safety that this country had established over decades and at the same time to pursue financial debt and deficit reduction in a clearly unbalanced way which ignores the tremendous social debt and deficits we all face in this country. Good government requires a balanced pursuit of both economic opportunity and social justice.

The bill introduced under the name of the Minister of Finance implements a measure announced in the 1991 budget and will drain—and the federal government admits this—more than $2.2 billion in federal transfers to affected provinces over five years through 1995 and 1996.

The provinces, for their part—and we are talking about Ontario, Alberta and B.C.—expect the actual lost dollars to be much higher. Regardless of the final figures the same people do suffer. The provinces affected by these restraint measures are home to about half of the poor families in Canada, and 54 per cent of all welfare recipients under CAP live in these provinces.

The result is that the majority of the most vulnerable people living in this country are very hard hit by this measure. Of course the impact of this bill must be added to a similar measure passed as part of the 1990 budget which cut the growth of the same CAP transfers through 1991 and 1992.

What is the federal government targeting for cuts with this measure? It is kind of a fly–by–night operation. Under the Canada Assistance Plan the federal and provincial governments share equally in the cost of basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies needed by those most needy in our society.

Only a Conservative could question these vital programs as luxuries or frivolous spending. That is the conclusion from Bill C–32. Under CAP, services are provided for children who are in care and are in need of protection due to abuse or neglect, mentally and physically disabled persons, also one parent families, the aged, the unemployed, families or individuals in crisis, low income workers, and battered women.

Do these sound like people with the luxury of tightening their belts as the Minister of Finance keeps telling us? CAP services include dental care, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, and subsidized child care for low income families. Many Canadians agree with financial responsibility in government, but do these sound like programs where federal dollars are being squandered or wasted? Hardly, and I would expect most Canadians do agree.

The restraints in Bill C–32 are bad enough in their own right, but they also confirm once again to the whole country this government's approach of attacking the most vulnerable in our society. It reminds everyone that for those at the bottom of the income ladder Tory times are indeed tough times. It tells those who today must look to government for a hand to get in line behind the government's crusade against the deficit. It also says, once again, that this government will pursue the deficit problem alone above all others.

As Canada enters the 1990s there are compelling reasons to fear for the survival of the nation's social safety net, and it is because of this government. Since 1984 the Conservative government has pursued a legislative and fiscal agenda that demonstrates an abrupt departure from traditional values and priorities in this country.

One example is the erosion of universality of children's benefits and senior citizens in the legislation to tax back family allowances and old age pensions. It is true, as one observer put it, that under the Conservatives the responsibility of social policy has seemingly shifted focus from the Department of National Health and Welfare to the Department of Finance, hardly the social conscience of the federal government.

We are only now discovering what it means to have left the economists and tax lawyers at Finance in charge of social policies.

This government's record in a relatively short seven years stands as a clear rejection of Canada's proud record in advancing the cause of social justice and of enhancing our social safety net as a symbol of caring society.

In looking back, 1940 brought the Unemployment Insurance Act; 1945, the universal family allowance; 1944, the National Housing Act; and 1941, Central Mortgage and Housing. These were all measures which took steps to decrease the gap between rich and poor in this country.

The 1950s extended social safety in this country. Income security provisions for the elderly and for the disabled were substantially revised. In 1956 legislation was passed to furnish 50 per cent of provincial social assistance payments and share in the cost of provincial hospital insurance programs.

The 1960s brought the Canada Pension Plan, the old age security guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Assistance Plan. Through the 1970s these programs delivered to Canadians the kind of society they wanted and they believed in. The early 1980s continued this trend with the Canadian Health Act reaffirming universal medical coverage and an end to provincial extra billing.

This was a record of the past that Canadians had spoken in favour of through past governments. And what was the goal through all these developments? They enabled the country to bring together its collective resources to enhance the development of the individual man, woman, and child and the individual's opportunity to succeed in life through education, health, and home.

Who would argue today that those were not good steps for Canada and every Canadian? Yet this government appears to believe its greatest achievement has been in reversing this proud record, and often in sneaky, backhanded sorts of way, never through the front door and never as a policy choice put before the Canadian people in an election.

This government has seen fit since 1984 to attack Canada's achievement as a country, that of a balanced agenda between economic opportunity and social justice, an attack that continues with Bill C–32.

Canadians will all remember the regressive steps under this government. There were cuts to medicare and post–secondary education through the EPF restraint, the clawback of old age pensions and family allowance benefits, the removal of the interest income deductions from the income tax forms, a measure which so helps seniors. Also there were cuts to unemployment insurance programs that have affected every part of the country. Special fees on student loans make the burden of education even bigger. Deindexation of the child tax credits, abandonment of child care, not once but three times, cuts to housing programs, and the list goes on.

Bill C–32 is yet another in the long list of regressive steps this government has taken over the years in reducing social expenditures in the name of fiscal restraint and deficit reduction. But this bill is also a very important symbol of this government's short–sighted approach, an approach of ignoring many of the real social needs facing this country while blindly focusing on the deficit.

As ministers opposite were whisked off to work this morning in their fancy limousines, hundreds of thousands of Canadians got out of bed but no longer had jobs to go to. This government appears oblivious to the plight of the beggar on the street. It is oblivious to the families slipping below the poverty line. It has little feeling for the family that cannot adequately feed and clothe itself. It is demonstrating all of this in Bill C–32 because its aim is to limit the benefits to those in this country who need help the most. Those hon. members know that that is true.

Deficit reduction is a top priority of this government. The Prime Minister says it, the last Minister of Finance said it, and the new Minister of Finance says it. What the government has not learned is that deficit reduction is not a social policy. You cannot substitute good, sound forward looking social policy for a policy of deficit reduction. Good government always requires a much more balanced approach.

The government has failed to learn that it has to consider, along with the country's economic and financial deficits, the tremendous social debt and deficits that we also face. One cannot ignore one in favour of the other, as this government has done. One cannot abandon ones social targets and social policy goals in order to accommodate some sort of blind, narrow-minded view that the deficit should be our strait-jacket. This government has made the mistake of not forging a balanced approach.

Deficit reduction alone is not going to answer many of the real needs that are facing this country: job training, education, research and development. Deficit reduction is not a policy that improves the skills of one member of our work force, nor does deficit reduction feed people waiting in line at various food banks. For these challenges you need other policies, strong social policies on things like child care, income balance with economic policies. If we are going to build a caring and compassionate Canada we need all of those.

Canadians might again be able to look to their national government as a true reflection of values that we share as a people, a more equitable society. More economic as well as social concerns are all part of our national agenda.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak to Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. The purpose of Bill C-32 is to amend legislation that caps amounts paid by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan to provinces that do not receive equalization payments.

The government has set a ceiling of 5 per cent on transfers to these provinces for 1990-91 and 1991-92. Today, Bill C-32 will maintain the 5 per cent ceiling until 1994-95. These provinces, Madam Speaker, are Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

In his speech on September 23, the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization) argued that this bill was important as part of the government's restraint program. According to the minister, spending restraint was necessary to put the country's fiscal house in order. However, we must not forget it was this government's poor economic policies that were responsible for the first made-in-Canada recession.

Although the government keeps saying the recession is over, there are daily indications that the opposite is true. Today, 600 jobs were lost in the riding of Sudbury, the riding of my hon. friend right next to me. So even if the minister says the recession is over, it is not, Madam Speaker. It is still a fact of our daily lives.

My point is that this recession, whose effects we experience daily, has heightened the need for the kind of services provided under the Canada Assistance Program. As you know, Madam Speaker, contributions to the plan help meet Canadians' most fundamental needs, including food and shelter as well as various forms of social assistance. In fact, the Minister of State for Finance said as much in his speech last Monday.

That is why I wonder how the minister can justify extending these ceilings when Canadians need this kind of support more than ever before. Canadians have been hard hit by the GST, by lay-offs and by the recession created by this government, and now that same government has decided to cap assistance to Canadians in three provinces. That's Tory logic for you!

The Minister of State continued his statement by saying that Bill C-32 is based on the same economic doctrine that the government has pursued since 1984. That worries me a lot, Madam Speaker. I remember that in 1984, the Prime Minister based his whole election campaign on the creation of jobs, jobs, jobs. Seven years later—and it must be pointed out, Madam Speaker, that throughout those seven years, we experienced economic growth as never before in Canada. Nevertheless, after seven years and the tremendous economic growth of 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987, we find ourselves with the same unemployment rate as in 1984 when the Prime Minister wanted to create jobs and more jobs, as he promised all Canadians—he would create jobs and give them prosperity.

But here we are in a recession made in Canada by this same government and payments to the provinces are being cut. Madam Speaker, during the summer, like many members, I used the break from Parliament to go door to door and visit my constituents. In my riding of Saint-Léonard, because the federal government had cut transfer payments to the provinces, the provinces cut transfer payments to the municipalities and the municipality of Saint-Léonard had to impose a garbage tax on all citizens, be they owners, tenants or business people. The people of Saint-Léonard got the bill just as I was going door to door. I can tell you that they were not happy; they were desperate. They told me, "Look, this has got to stop. Always taxes and more taxes."

When I tried to explain the situation to them, I understood one thing, Madam Speaker: It is all very well, and it would have been easy, to say to my constituent, "This is not my field. I am a federal representative and this is a municipal matter. Go and see your city councillors." But they knew very well where it was coming from. They said, "This started at the federal level. You cut at the federal level, the province cut funds to the municipalities, but it is always the same taxpayers who pay." On one hand, we increase taxes and on the other, we cut services. Therefore the citizens are desperate, Madam Speaker, and of course this cannot continue. They have really had enough.

Since we returned, Madam Speaker, we have had all sorts of debates on Montreal. There are 10,000 more unemployed in Montreal since 1986. Every day, something closes. How will we get out of this? If we cut public assistance at the same time that people need it more than ever, it definitely cannot help the situation. Things will get worse and that is why crime is rising and we have all the troubles we do today in our society. It is because the economic situation is so terrible, the burden is so heavy that the people are really desperate.

Madam Speaker, I know that my time is running out—we are in a ten-minute period—but before concluding, I would not want to forget to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal, who led this debate for us in the Official Opposition. I would like to congratulate her on the outstanding work she has done in the past few days.

And I hope that when the time comes to vote, government members will think of the poor, the sick and the homeless in their ridings who need these programs that support public assistance.

Madam Speaker, a fair and adequate social policy cannot be replaced with only deficit cutting. I agree that a more balanced solution must be found for the country's economic and social problems. The Canada Assistance Plan is the cornerstone of our social security regime. It is a last resort for many Canadians, whatever province they live in, because the problems are the same everywhere, Madam Speaker. All this bill accomplishes is the destruction of social security measures. That is the Conservatives' real agenda.

[English]

I would like to cite an article from the Winnipeg Sun in the month of August. The title says it very clearly: "Feds will make poverty worse. The poor will always be with us, but thanks to the Mulroney Tories, there will be more of them and they will be worse off". We cannot say more clearly what the situation is. That is where we are collectively as a people today. The government is leading the attack on the poor, and we hear Canadians say that they have no more.

I remember a young woman who came to see me in my office in the month of August. She said: "Well, Mr. Gagliano, it is nice for you to say that we should be proud of our country, should be proud of our Canada. How can I be proud of my country when it has been two years since I finished school and I cannot find a job? It is easy for you, you have a job, but I do not have a job".

Those are feelings we get from our constituents when we go back to our ridings. This is first day of the debate on national unity. In a room not far away from this House members of Parliament and senators are meeting to start the unity debate. I hope they will remember that if we want to keep this country together we need economic prosperity. We need economic and social policies that can keep Canadians hoping there will be better days; so that our young people can go to school knowing that after they graduate they can get a job; so that our seniors and our poor people, whenever they are in need, can have a roof over their heads, can have food on the table to eat and adequate health care services to take care of them.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, it distresses me very much to have to debate this particular bill, Bill C-32 today. It makes me so angry that this government which had called this country's social programs a sacred trust has brought forward Bill C-32 to the House, asking for our approval to its cap on CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan.

It says to me that this government is terribly out of touch with the people of this country. If there is one thing that we as politicians hear across this country day after day after day, it is that we are out of touch. I like to think that I am not out of touch with the people in my riding. I cannot understand how a government can be so insensitive and morally bankrupt to bring in such a bill as this legislation today.

The other day the minister, in presenting this bill to the House, said that he was putting the cap on CAP in order to get our debt under control. He said the cut funding would be used to support programs Canadians want. What Canadians? If this government had sat down and had told the people of Canada of its vision and ideas for the future of this country and talked about the different options, I do not believe there is one Canadian who would be willing to see individual Canadians suffer as they are today in this country through poverty and lack of assistance.

This bill proposes to continue the cutback of funding to the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, supposedly the three richest provinces in this country. Yet we have heard week after week and month after month how Ontario, my province, is suffering day after day with more industries closing, more bankruptcies and more and more people unemployed.

It has affected the citizens of my riding of Northumberland most severely. If members of the government have not heard in their own ridings how it impacts on people individually, I would like to say a few words about how it is impacting on the people in my riding.

The government's lack of vision and support of a healthy economy in this country through various fiscal and monetary policies that are inappropriate has caused the constant growth of the unemployment rate in Northumberland.

In 1988 in my riding of Northumberland, unemployment rates did not rise above 5.9 per cent. In August 1989, the rate was 3.7 per cent. In 1990, the rate rose in August to 7.9 per cent. This year in August, the rate was 10 per cent, but what is more significant is that this represented a decline from earlier rates this year which were above 16 per cent.

My riding is suffering terribly. People are not even on the unemployment rolls any more because there are not jobs for them to go to after their unemployment insurance is exhausted. They are going on to the welfare rolls, the very programs that this Canada Assistance Program was put in place to assist.

The number of people who are receiving welfare in my riding has increased dramatically, a change from August 1989 when the offices providing social assistance had only about 200 cases, to August of this year when the number of cases approached 900.

Statistically, the curve for social assistance decreases in August in my riding, but this year the curve from January forward has shown a steady incline. There is great concern that we have not seen the end of this curve rising this year as more and more of the people who are presently on unemployment insurance are required to seek social assistance as their only way to survive.

The people who receive social assistance are also having to line up with their families at food banks and be cared for by volunteers in different programs across my riding of Northumberland.

The cap on CAP not only has a very direct impact on those who are poorest in our society, those who are most deserving and needy of the type of assistance provided by this program, but it also impacts upon those professional people who are working in agencies trying to provide services that are covered with funding from the CAP program.

In addition to those professionals, it also affects the volunteers who are working many hours, compassionately trying to provide necessary services for those most in need in my riding.

At this time of year in communities across the riding of Northumberland, United Appeal programs are taking place. Those programs are not successful without the contributions of many volunteers. In the past, the government provided assistance to the programs that those volunteers are involved with was a spur. It helped our volunteers to go forward and to provide the many hours of work to the benefit of the poorest in our area. The same thing is true for communities across this country.

The cap on CAP affects several programs, and they have been outlined by other speakers before me. Just to recapitulate, the CAP program provides social assistance from persons in need including single parents. Single parents with children are judged in our society to be the very poorest of the poor in our communities. Social assistance helps to provide for our aged, for our disabled, for our unemployed as I have indicated, and those unsung heros, those people who are low income working people with children who just are not able to survive on minimum wages. The CAP provides care in homes for aged people. It provides child care facilities and it provides transition homes for battered women.

The decline in our economy has had a dramatic impact on children in my riding of Northumberland. In 1991, the number of child care cases rose by 88.4 per cent from the 1984 level; from 509 cases to 959. In the same period, the child abuse cases rose by 279 per cent.

If you talk to the police forces in my communities they will tell you that no, unlike in the cities where drug abuse and drug related crimes are on the rise, it is not such a large problem in my community, but the calls that are surging up in number and that cause the most difficulty are cases of family violence. They attribute, very directly, the increase in the cases of family violence to the difficulty that families are having with their personal economies, families that suddenly find themselves unemployed, unable to cope with the economic obligations they have, not just to themselves personally, but to their families as well.

It is recognized that of those Canadian citizens receiving social assistance or welfare in this country, 40 per cent of them are children. The cap on CAP will have a direct impact on the suffering of children in this country.

Our Prime Minister went to New York last year in September for a summit for children which tried to urge all countries around the world to ratify a convention for the rights of the child. Children have the right to live well. By well I mean they have the right to food, housing and clothing, the basic needs. The cap on CAP, this bill, will prevent many children from having those very basic rights which are theirs.

I cannot say more about how distressed I am that day after day I go home to my riding and hear of more individual cases of families whose plans have changed because of a declining economy. That our government feels that cutting back on our debt problem on the backs of the poor is the way to resolve problems, to my mind, is very faulty thinking. In fact, we create a snowball effect where the costs of poverty will only increase by allowing more people to lapse into even more severe poverty.

There is no way that I can support this Bill C–32.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a question of privilege.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): As I walked down the halls of Parliament this afternoon, Madam Speaker, I noticed that the Joint Committee on the Constitution which was established pursuant to the order of reference made by House on June 19, 1991, was sitting. Upon checking the official parliamentary returns I found that the membership has yet to be appointed. Having made all the necessary arragements to represent the Bloc Québécois on this Joint Committee, I was surprised that the committee be allowed to convene before its members have been appointed and their names published in the Debates of this House, so that I could see if I can sit on the committee or if I have been excluded from it.

I raised the issue with the committee, but I was told that the membership list had been left with the table officers after the House adjourned last night, claiming that the House was not sitting at that time.

The order of reference just can't be read that way, because if you take the trouble of mentioning in the order of reference that the list of members can be tabled when the House is not sitting, that also means that it can be presented when it does and only during the hours the House is sitting for publication the next day. Otherwise, the order would just state: the clerk of the committee can file the list with the table officers at any time. It would not mention specifically what to do "if the House is not sitting at the time".

Therefore, I consider that from the moment that the House has been sitting be it only one hour on a given day, the government or the person responsible for the tabling of the list should have tabled it while the House was sitting. The government cannot surreptitiously file a document with the Clerk during silent hours and think that it will be good enough. I repeat, it would not make any sense if that were the case. Otherwise, the government is going to start filing all kinds of documents and wait until we have adjourned for the day at 8 p.m. to table them and expect that is going to be just fine.

That being said, as regards the way my privileges as a member of Parliament were breached, I cannot tell from reading the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons whether I have been appointed or excluded as a member of the Bloc Québécois.

My second point is this. On the list tabled yesterday the names of 32 members of Parliament appear, while according to the order of reference there were to be 30 members. The Table can certainly make this list available to you, Madam Speaker.

We can see that the four last names at the bottom of the list, all from the New Democratic Party, are asterisked. The inference seems to be that it will be up to the whip of that party to decide who will be a replacement one day and an ordinary member the next and vice–versa and so on. I understand that it may be difficult for the NDP to designate members, but the problem is that members like that are bound to cost us a lot in travel expenses, such as hotel rooms outside of Ottawa, in Ottawa and across the country, and much more just because they have joined the committee as I do not know what.

So, for these two reasons, Madam Speaker, I maintain that the committee which is officially sitting today and hearing as we speak the minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, is sitting illegally. This committee made various decisions this afternoon. As a member of Parliament, I could not move or second anything, I could not call for a vote, I could do absolutely nothing, while I, as a member of this House, had at least as much right as anyone else to be there and take such action. So this committee, which among other things has decided to broadcast its proceedings and incur substantial expenses, is now sitting illegally.

That is why I speak to you this afternoon on one hour's notice, instead of doing so at three o'clock, the time usually reserved for questions of privilege. I ask you, Madam Speaker, given the illegal situation in which the joint committee is operating—and I would point out that I am surprised that I, an elected representative who has won an election, am refused the right to participate, but unelected senators are appointed. But that is another problem that we can talk about later, Madam Speaker.

So there are now 30 or 32 people, we do not know the exact number, sitting and pretending to act as a committee of this House, but doing so illegally, incurring expenses and sowing confusion everywhere among all Canadians and Quebecers.

Madam Speaker, I ask you to rule immediately on these two questions.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I would like to help clear things up in order to assist you in the consideration of a very important matter, and an important claim by the hon. member. I want to indicate very clearly that when what used to be called the striking committee, the subcommittee to House management, finally reached an agreement on the manner in which to implement the agreement reached between the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and my leader, the member for Yukon, it was very late in the day yesterday.

Regretfully, that subcommittee had not been called together during the summer to come up with the membership of the committee. In fact, the first formal call from the clerk of the committee to get us together was not until I believe Monday morning, and we worked through a number of days. It was not until late yesterday that we actually had the wording to agree to. By the time the signatures of the three Whips were obtained to approve it as a decision of that subcommittee and it was transmitted through the vice-chair of the committee to the clerks, it was after the hour of adjournment.

Notice had to be given for an organizational meeting at three o'clock this afternoon, so due notice was necessary. It would have been very difficult for it to be done during Orders of the Day at three o'clock today when we had a room full of members, senators, media and interested public in the Railway Committee Room wanting to begin the process.

We believe we followed the motion adopted in this House on June 18, 1991 which says very clearly: "If the House is not sitting at the time of such Standing Committee on House Management Report, such report shall be deemed concurred in upon its being filed with the Clerk of the House of Commons".

The second point I wish to raise concerns the size of the committee. The motion does require 20 members of the House of Commons to be appointed. A list of 18 members' names is placed on the record. In addition, member no. 19 and member no. 20 are shown with asterisks with the provision that as Whip of my caucus I can rotate any two of four listed members into those two positions. The motion adopted in the House on June 18 gives the Whips of all three caucuses—the government caucus, the Official Opposition caucus and the New Democratic Party caucus—the power to substitute members of that committee. What we have done is not inconsistent with that decision.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that you give serious consideration to this matter, review with your clerks the procedure that was used and report back accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, as the Official Opposition Whip, I would like to say, as the hon. member for the New Democratic Party said earlier, that we have been trying since Monday to decide on the membership of this committee, in accordance with the Standing Orders. Unfortunately, due to questions of interpretation and negotiations that took place between the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it was not until late last night that we were able to reach an agreement and thus enable the committee to sit today.

We feel it is very important for the committee to start sitting immediately, and we believe we acted in accordance with the Order adopted on June 18 in this House for appointing 20 members of the House of Commons and 10 members of the Senate. Yes, there are three NDP members on the committee, and the NDP whip will be entitled to substitute two other names. In the motion we filed yesterday with the Clerk of the House of Commons, it is clear there are three members belonging to the New Democratic Party and two rotations are allowed. The same courtesy or privilege was extended to the four members who may replace or substitute for the three regular members. The same proportion was granted, and applies to, the government and the Official Opposition, Madam Speaker.

So I think we acted in accordance with the Order adopted in this House in June and in accordance with the motion adopted by the Standing Committee on House Management and the same motions adopted here in the House.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, the Order of the House provides that 20 members of the House of Commons and 10 members of the Senate would be appointed. I have the list of senators and members of the House of Commons who were appointed, and there are 22 members of this House.

The Order was for 20, not 22. I find this rather odd, because in fact, this is infringes on our privileges as members. We were not consulted. We were not told about this. I feel the Chair should intervene to clear up this matter, and I think the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead made a very valid point in his question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I apologize for intervening a second time. I just want to make it clear that the issue before us does not deal specifically with whether independent members of this House have the right or the obligation to be members of that committee. That is a separate issue, and we would certainly not object to independent members participating. In fact, according to normal House rules, any member of the House can participate in the committee. Usually that is done after the normal round of questions, but everyone has the right to participate in the committee at any time.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am not an expert on the way various committees are suppose to function, but I think it is quite clear that the Chair should take this under advisement and consider the matter further, because both issues seem to be fairly complex.

I do find it rather amusing that a political party should find it so difficult to decide who should be appointed. As for substitutions, as you know, all the parties will appoint substitutes. Nevertheless, I wonder why a party should have so much trouble deciding who is going to be a full-time member of the committee.

Madam Speaker, I would advise you, and I say this with a great deal of respect since you know far better than I do how to deal with these matters, to take the question under advisement and report back to the House in the near future.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, while you probably want to take this under advisement and report to the House at a later date, I bring to your attention the motion which was put forward by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs on June 18, 1991. You might want to reflect on that particular motion which subscribes to the comments referred to by the chief opposition Whip.

With regard to comments made by my other colleagues concerning infringement upon their rights, I wish to read for the benefit of members, Madam Speaker, as well as you, the provisions of Standing Order 119 which read as follows:

> Any Member of the House—

That includes members who may represent different political persuasions from the three main parties in this House. They continue:

> —who is not a member of a standing, special or legislative committee, may, unless the House or the committee concerned otherwise orders, take part in the public proceedings of the committee, but may not vote or move any motion, nor be part of any quorum.

Although you may not be a designated member of a particular standing, legislative or special committee, the provisions under the Standing Orders, as indicated by Standing Order 119, all members would have an opportunity to participate in the public proceedings.

There is a certain decorum, a certain approach that chairpersons of the respective committees follow. As the rules indicate very clearly, committees are the masters of their own rules and their own proceedings and can proceed in accordance with that particular directive.

I share that with you, Madam Speaker, because I think you probably might want to take this under advisement. I think you might want to reflect on the motion of June 18, as well as the provisions of Standing Order 119.

Mr. Gérin: Of course, Madam Speaker, the second of the two points I raised, concerning the NDP in fact being represented by five members, could be dealt with right now and fairly easily if the Chief Whip of the NDP, who is in the House, told the Chair that the five names shown on the list that I will officially file with the clerk— —and you will notice that it includes the names of the hon. Lorne Nystrom, Phillip Edmonston, Lynn Hunter, Howard McCurdy and Ian Waddell.

As I was saying, if the Chief Whip would immediately tell the House that two of these five names were put down by mistake, that would solve half of the problem. The only thing left to do after that would be to check if the two members struck off the list made, seconded or voted on a motion, or made amendments to a motion this afternoon. Because one can wonder whether it was number 31 or 32 who passed the motion or voted on it, or if the same person requested that I not be entitled to vote myself. The question is: who voted to exclude me? The problem could be solved if the whip would just rise and tell us which of the two extra NDPs will be in a bad mood tomorrow morning?

On my first point, I would remind you, Madam Speaker, that when it says that the House is sitting, it obviously means that the House is sitting that day. Otherwise, we will not use that expression again, never. It would not make sense any more.

The point of the matter is that the interpretation of a word must make sense. Sentences must be interpreted so as to mean something. If it did not mean anything, it would not have been mentioned.

So, Madam Speaker, I table the list of members of the committee, which I got from the joint committee this afternoon and which indicates there are 32 members. It is hard to tell which ones are for real any more. Would it not be better to have a member of the Bloc Québécois on the Committee to represent the proponents of sovereignty? We do not know any more.

I now file this document officially with the Table Officers.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, of course I do not know exactly what happened in discussions between the three whips. I speak now as a parliamentarian. It isn't always easy. An agreement was reached last night. Now I am normally a very disciplined person who bows to decisions that are made to promote harmony in the House and enable committees to operate effectively. I don't argue. However, I must say I was surprised when I attended the committee session this afternoon. I am very fond of this committee. I was a member in 1972 and travelled across Canada in the process. I have chaired many parliamentary committees, so I think I am in a position to offer a few comments you may wish to consider.

I am very surprised to see that the poor clerk— We have no right to ask a clerk to choose. The clerk's position on a committee is neutral. The clerk is an officer of the House.

[English]

I will proceed from now on in English. I see that in the membership, attendance and voting lists coming from the committee's directorate.

—there are 10 senators. Then we get to the MPs. There are 18 members of the House of Commons, with no distinguisghing characteristics, and then I see four names marked with an asterisk. I know what this may mean, but I wish we were told officially what is going on.

Everyone knows that my respected Whip, who is aware of my interest in constitutional matters, knows that I am available. He knows that, and I am telling him now, in front of everybody. He may not appreciate my carrying on and on about this, but I want to say that I am available, and if Misses Ouellet, Allmand, Guarnieri and Duhamel are not available and he wants to consider me, I will be available. The Standing Orders provide that the Whip files with the clerk, and all the clerk is supposed to do is say: The Liberal Party Whip or the Conservative Party Whip or the NDP Whip asks that Mr. Mark Assad, who is also interested in the question since he has been a member of other committees, substitute for Mr. Ouellet or whomever. So the same rules for everyone. No exceptions, because in that case, next week I will ask my Whip, my House Leader, to list a series of names of Liberal members marked with an asterisk, and then we will see who is important and who is not so important.

I respected my party's decision. They selected six members. We know they cannot be available all the time, all year. So the Whip will decide who replaces whom, as appropriate, at least as far as disciplined people like me are concerned, who respect our institutions. And I want to repeat publicly that I will be available if he thinks it is appropriate, and even if he doesn't, there is no law against a member who has a keen interest in the matter to go and sit down and listen. That is what I am doing, that is what I will do, and I am sure my Whip will understand.

So we have a document that is rather unusual. Well, in concluding, I must say that as a senior member of Parliament, this is the first time in 27 years and some months that I ever saw anything like this happen. I would like to understand what is going on, but I don't want an answer immediately. Patience is one of my virtues. I would therefore urge the Chair to take this under advisement and then report back to the House and let us know exactly what should be done.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I did not plan on getting up a third time, but I think it is important that the House know that prior to the commencement of the organizational meeting this afternoon, a form entitled Committee membership or substitutions or changes was delivered to the clerk of the committee. It says: "Pursuant to Standing Order 114, notification is hereby given of substitutions or changes in the membership of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada and that committee member 19 was replaced by Mr. Edmonston and committee member 20 was replaced by Ms Hunter" .

I can assure the hon. member that at no time were more than three votes cast by the New Democratic members of that committee. At no time did any of the other New Democratic members move or second motions in that committee.

Unless something happened in committee this afternoon that I am not aware of, I do not believe there was any motion put forward by anyone to request an increase in the size of the committee to provide for full membership by Independents. That decision was taken in this House back in June by a standing vote in which, incidentally, my caucus voted against the creation of this committee and its composition in terms of the numbers of members. If there were to be any change, it should have happened back in June when this House was seized with that motion.

Mr. Gérin: I just want to ask a very simple question. Who are the three permanent members of the NDP?

Mr. Prud'homme: I want to know too. It is no joke. It is a parliamentary committee of the House of Commons. You have three members. Who are they? It is as simple as that.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I can say that today the members of the New Democratic Party caucus who are voting members of the special committee are Mr. Nystrom, Ms. Hunter and Mr. Edmonston. That may be different tomorrow if the committee meets tomorrow, just as down the road different Liberal members and different Conservative members will be sitting on those committees; but today those three people I named are the voting members of the day.

Mr. Prud'homme: I submit, very respectfully to you, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member is absolutely right in what he said. Today those three members are members of the committee. Fine. If he wants to change them tomorrow, all he has to do is do as anyone else who is a Whip and send a message to the clerk informing him that it is Mr. X who was forgotten today, who may happen to be Mr. Waddell for Mr. Edmonston, and that is the usual way. But why would the five names appear in the paper? The hon. member knows that I do not take direction from my caucus or from anybody. I am interested in a harmonious development of the rules of the House and I follow that. It is too bad if some people do not like it. It is embarrassing for me because I like to have good relationships, but this is not a harmonious way. Only three names at any one time should appear. Only six Liberal names at any one time should appear. Only ten senators at any one time should appear.

Of course, the hon. Whip is entitled to change it tomorrow or every day, but is he telling me and the House that only these five will be allowed now? What if these five members cannot attend and you want to have three? Why do you not put another asterisk? Are you going to name your entire caucus and therefore my Whip should do the same?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead gave the Chair an hour's notice and raised a question of privilege that has stimulated some most interesting debate and involved members on all sides of the House. First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for clearly and briefly presenting the points that concern him. I also want to thank the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry.

The point raised is fairly complex. The hon. member told me first that he thought that the members of this committee were not appointed according to the rules. He told me about this morning's Debates or Journals in which the list of members did not appear. He seems to want to accuse the government of tabling the list "on the sly", as he said. Furthermore, he asks me to rule quickly, now, to decide for or against someone now.

I understand his impatience, but I also think that he would allow me time to act a little more circumspectly, to take the time to recheck with the clerks the special order of June 18 or 19, which I do not have at hand, and to find out at what time the members of the committee were named, and then determine what "when the House is sitting and when the House is not sitting" really means, a point he called into question just now.

So if he, who is a lawyer, is unable to give a single interpretation of that, he will allow me a little time to find out and report back to the House.

• (1720)

The second point that he raised concerns the names of the members appointed to this committee; the hon. member maintains in his first point that they were not appointed according to the rules. The representatives of the New Democratic Party are mentioned. The hon. whip of that party told us how he saw things; other members gave us their opinions. I think that the Chair and the Clerk together will have to look into these matters and perhaps discuss them again to have the opinion of the whips who took part in these appointments. I want to assure the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that I will come back to the House as soon as possible with answers that are as precise as possible.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and on the motion of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I rise today to add my voice to the cause of those on this side of the House who have taken serious issue with the government's introduction of Bill C–32, the bill laughably entitled an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

I say "laughably" as one might be referring to decapitation as a head cold.

Before I begin my remarks, however, I would like to express my concern for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. David Walker, who is currently under the weather in his hometown of Winnipeg. I realize that it is not the custom of this House to refer to the absence of a member, but I should like to make an exception in this case. The member for Winnipeg North Centre has been a strong, thoughtful opponent of this legislation and I will be hard pressed to do him justice today. I wish him a speedy recovery.

In the absence of the aforementioned hon. member, I am pleased that so many members of our caucus have risen to speak against Bill C–32. My colleagues have been quick to point out the obvious inequities which are contained in this bill.

I note that yesterday and the day before, no fewer than 20 members of my caucus have risen to voice their concerns and their dismay with this government. I am, therefore, glad to have an opportunity to make my own comments today on behalf of my constituents in Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

What I believe we have before us today is a classic example of the government attempting to close the barn door after the horse has escaped. It goes beyond this, however. It is far more insidious. We have a government which is trying to shift the burden of the national debt for which it is primarily responsible on to the backs of provincial and municipal governments. It is a loathsome example of buck passing, and it is the Canadians who are least able who will ultimately pay the price.

Informed members of the media have questioned the motivation for this and similar acts coming from this government. They have suggested that this is part of an over-all electoral strategy on the part of the government to project itself as fiscally responsible. It is becoming abundantly clear to more and more Canadians that fiscally responsible is the last adjective one would use to describe this government's dismal economic record.

This is the government which inherited a public debt of $167 billion in 1984 and which has managed in seven short years to balloon this debt to over $400 billion today. This is a government which took on a deficit of $16 billion per year in 1984 and which has raised that deficit to over $30 billion.

In light of this, how can the Minister of State for Finance claim as he did in this House on Monday that his government "has taken steps to reduce government spending so that we can live within our means".

What this government is trying to do is off-load the debt in the name of fiscal responsibility on to the backs of the provinces and the municipalities. In the case of Bill C-32, it has chosen to do that by cutting into some of the most critical areas of social assistance. In doing so, it has devoided itself of the tough decisions as to who will suffer as a result.

I need not remind members of this House that the Canada Assistance Plan was established under the government of the Right Hon. Lester Pearson in 1966.

It allowed the federal government to enter into cost sharing agreements with provincial governments for the provision of social assistance and welfare service to those Canadians most in need.

It is these same Canadians whom the government would today abandon so callously. Bill C-32 provides for the implementation of one of the more despicable measures of the 1991 federal budget, namely, the extension of the 5 per cent cap on the rate of growth in transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan from two years to five years.

The original cap in growth was introduced in the 1990 federal budget for those provinces not receiving equalization payments, namely, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. There can be no denying that this cap and the extension of it will severely weaken the ability of the governments of those provinces to provide federal/provincial cost sharing social assistance programs. The government estimates that the cost to the province of Ontario alone will be $1 billion per annum. Over-all, this cap will cost the affected provinces some $2.135 billion at a time when the Canadian economy is attempting to pull out of the recession brought on by this government.

We all know that the province of Ontario has been devastated by this recession, and by the consequences of other misguided policies of this government, the free trade agreement, which has prompted a flood of companies to move south to the United States, and the GST, which has accelerated the practice of cross-border shopping and has affected businesses all along the Ontario—U.S. border.

We in Atlantic Canada are not immune to the consequences of a severely weakened Ontario economy because sooner or later, and generally somewhat after the worst effects of the recession in Ontario, we will experience the worst effects of the recession in Atlantic Canada. Already we are starting to feel that as our economy in eastern Nova Scotia sinks ever and ever deeper into recession.

Let us examine more closely those areas of social assistance that are most likely to be affected: subsidized housing for low income Canadians, foster homes for abused children, safe houses for abused women, essential living services for disabled Canadians.

Are these the Canadians who should be paying the burden of this government's fiscal mismanagement? I suggest not, Madam Speaker, not in Ontario, not in British Columbia, not anywhere.

These are just a few examples. Underlying each example is the common knowledge that the Canadians who will be most adversely affected are those Canadians who are the most defenceless, the poor, the sick, women and children. But come election time, you can be sure that members of this government will be trumpeting their interpretation of events, how they restored a sense of fiscal responsibility. Such empty words when you consider the human potential that has been lost, and the suffering inflicted as a result.

Yesterday in this House, the Prime Minister introduced his government's plan for renewing confederation. It was obvious that his government has learned, to the detriment of Canadians, that you cannot exclude people from the process without grave results. The government has now pledged an open process wherein proposed changes will be considered and acted upon. Yet this government, through the introduction of this bill, continues to exclude those Canadians who most desperately need our help. It has not learned from its experience with Meech Lake that to exclude people, either politically or economically, is to do a grave injustice to the history and to the culture of our nation.

The government has seen fit to include the protection of property rights in the Charter, yet it does not see the merit in protecting those who have no property, those most in need of help. This government has consistently ignored the plight of disadvantaged Canadians, as it continues to do with Bill C–32.

In conclusion, I would say that the experiences of the past suggest that if the government does not reform its way in this regard, in this most crucial of areas, it risks not only the lives of our least advantaged citizens. It risks the very nation itself.

• (1730)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the government today with this bill is continuing its assault on the poorest and the most disadvantaged people in Canada. This thrust is not new.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the first measure taken by this government, after it assumed office in 1984, in the realm of social policies was to try to deindex the pensions of Canada's seniors. Seniors revolted en masse. They appeared on the Hill. Finally, the government had to back down. Had those seniors not had the will or the means to fight back, we in this House alone as members of Parliament would not have had the strength to make it happen. It was their demonstration of political will which forced this government to back down.

What do the Conservatives do? They continue their assault. They went about clawing back seniors' pensions and they were able to get that through. The heart had been taken out of many of the seniors who protested.

That assault continues today with their measure to take away the Canada Assistance Plan. This Canada Assistance Plan, as has been explained by my colleagues, is the last resort for those who suffer from poverty. When a person can get no assistance elsewhere, they have to resort to the social programs that come under the Canada Assistance Plan.

This was a plan entered into whereby the federal government said to the provinces: "We will bear half the cost of your ultimate social assistance programs". What has it done? It put a cap on it of 5 per cent a year for Ontario. This cap was put on at a particular time in our economic history. It was put on in June 1990 when unemployment in Ontario was at 5.8 per cent.

All of us are concerned about the deficit and our national debt. If we can find ways to economize, we want to do it. Maybe back in June 1990 there was some justification, although I disagreed with it vehemently at that time because it was a program for the most needy in our society. There was maybe some justification when Ontario had only 5.8 per cent unemployment to cut back on the CAP program.

It did not take the Conservatives very long to come forward with another program. Eight months later, in February 1991, they said not only will this 5 per cent ceiling exist for two years, but they brought in a budget that said it is going to go for five years. This capping of the CAP is taking $2.135 billion away from the poor people of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

When they brought in that extending bill in the budget of February 1991, unemployment was no longer 5.8 per cent in Ontario. It was 9.5 per cent. Today, unemployment in Ontario is still slightly below our national average, but it is up to 9.9 per cent.

Even if you can say that the justification was that they had to save funds and they were going to impose that onus on the rich provinces, such as Ontario, back in 1990 that justification no longer existed. In February 1991 when they brought in the budget, or today when we are asked to vote on this bill, unemployment is high in Ontario.

In June 1990, when they brought this bill in originally, unemployment in Toronto was 4.5 per cent. Today it is above the national average. It is a disgrace that Canada's foremost city has unemployment of 10.8 per cent. What does this mean in terms of the poor of my city, the metropolitan Toronto area? What does this mean to the poor in Ontario?

Not only is unemployment dramatically up from when they brought in this bill, but welfare has risen incredibly. Welfare is up in the province of Ontario 64 per cent over a year ago, and yet the CAP program is going to cut it off at a 5 per cent increase. It has absolutely no relation to the needs of the people.

Maybe under some neo–Conservative philosophy this would be justified, if these people had alternatives. Maybe some neo–Conservative is going to say: "Let these people on welfare go out and get a job", but how can you find a job in the Toronto area when the unemployment is 10.8 per cent today? It is not their fault they are unemployed. It is this government, which has brought in what is admitted to be a deliberately "made in Canada" recession; a recession it sparked in its monomaniacal attempt to deal with inflation. In the name of inflation, it went about taking us up to a record spread in interest rates above the U.S. rates. Never before in the history of Canada have Canadian interest rates been 5.8 per cent higher than American interest rates.

What did this do? It drove up our dollar. It drove up our dollar some 29 per cent from its low of a few years ago to its high today of over 88 cents.

The Tories say to us, as the Minister of Finance did the other day in this House, that isn't it a sign of confidence in our economy that our dollar is so strong. Mr. Speaker, it is absolute insanity.

The Liberal Party task force on deindustrialization travelled across this province for three months, starting in April. We listened to the people, the businesses—big businesses, small businesses—labour unions, experts, municipal councillors, the unemployed. We met with them in their town halls, their union halls, their closed down plants. The message was the same; this government gave us free trade, but at the same time it gave us free trade it took away our ability to compete. Our dollar went up some 20 per cent; it raised our interest rates; it has given us 32 tax increases so we cannot compete with the Americans in taxes. And then we have a government in Ontario that is threatening all sorts of other legislation, which means businesses will not come into Canada.

All of us on this side of the House hope that the recession is over, and there are a few signs that maybe things are getting better. But I was just talking with a major contractor who builds industrial buildings. I said: "How are you doing?" He said: "Well, I can hold on; I can hold on for maybe another year. It is just because I have a few buildings in the bank". He said: "But there are no new industrial construction projects going on". This is the story you are getting everywhere. Over the two and a half years since free trade came in, Canada has lost 261,000 or 13 per cent of all its manufacturing jobs. And, Mr. Speaker, with the recession, hopefully coming to an end, many of these jobs are not going to come back. They have moved to the United States and Mexico and with them have gone south the hopes of many young Canadians.

So here we have a government created policy of making a recession in Canada, a policy that anybody could have told you—and we told you—was going to drive the jobs out of Canada. What are we doing to the people who are suffering the most, the people on welfare, the people whose unemployment insurance has expired, the people who want jobs but cannot get them, the single parents, the disabled, the elderly?

What are we doing to help them? We are cutting payments available to them for welfare. Mr. Speaker, there are times in the life of a society when you have to stand up and say enough is enough, it is not fair, it is not right, it is not proper. Our society is going to be judged, not by the SkyDomes or the coliseums or the large buildings on Bay Street, or the ports and the docks. This is not the legacy we are passing on to our children. History will judge us on the way we treated our fellow human beings, the measure of compassion and caring. Did we, in their time of need, respond when we have the riches?

We will be remembered for the way we treated the weakest in our society, the people who do not have the means to rise up and rebel, the people who are not mobilized and organized, and can stand on Parliament Hill and rub the Prime Minister's face in what he is doing to them. We shall try in this House, but for these people what a pittance, the CAP program itself should not be enough. We should be investing in these people, giving them retraining and the capability to rise up and become active parts of our economy and our society.

It is that which we ask. What this government is doing is a shame to all of us as Canadians.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take the opportunity to make a few comments on Bill C-32, which is an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. What this means is that the federal government will cut the Canada Assistance Plan payments to certain provinces, in this case, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

This plan was brought into the House of Commons back in 1966. It gives the provinces the authority to enter into cost sharing arrangements with the federal government for the provision of social assistance and social services. The federal government pays 50 per cent of the costs that are approved under this plan.

We have had the Canada Assistance Plan for 25 years. Yes, there have been problems. There were times when the provinces have expressed their concerns about this plan. I think that on the whole, this plan has worked relatively well.

I know in my own province of Prince Edward Island it has been the means whereby my province has been able to provide many services that otherwise would not have been possible.

The proposed amendment to the Canada Assistance Plan that we have before us this afternoon means that the federal government will drain $2.2 billion in federal transfers from the provinces affected, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. That is a lot of money, $2.2 billion over a five-year period.

I want to give you a brief outline as to what this money is spent on. Children who are in care, and need protection due to abuse or neglect, mentally and physically disabled persons, one-parent families, the aged, the unemployed, families or individuals in crisis, low income workers, battered women.

Those are just a few examples of what the funding that comes from the federal government to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan is used for. I know that the legislation we have before us today, Bill C-32, really does not pertain to the Atlantic area.

My concern is about the future and I have a real concern which I want to express this afternoon. This government has shown that it is heartless enough to cut the funding for services in the area where 50 per cent of the disadvantaged live in this country. If it cuts the funding for that 50 per cent, what is to stop the federal government from going after the other 50 per cent outside these provinces.

Basically my concern is that if this government goes ahead with Bill C-32, and I imagine it will because it has the majority, it will mean that the federal government will have its foot in the door, setting what I think is a very dangerous precedent.

I know in my own province of Prince Edward Island that we receive approximately $30 million a year under the Canada Assistance Plan. As I said, the federal government pays roughly 50 per cent of the services that the province provides under this plan. This funding goes toward very essential services, services that are really needed in the province. We have the homemaker service in Prince Edward Island which is a very popular program. It is one which means that the elderly are able to live in their own homes because of services provided by people that come into the home.

Many of the individuals who take advantage of that service are people who are 70, 80 or older. Most of them have spent many years living in that community. In rural areas—certainly my district is mainly rural—we generally lack facilities to serve the needs of the elderly. That is why the homemaker service is particularly important. It is important that these people are able to stay in their own homes, in their own familiar surroundings where a lot of their friends are living, in a community where they have made a tremendous contribution through their earlier years.

That is one program that is offered in my province because of the funding from the Canada Assistance Plan. It is a wonderful program and certainly one that the seniors wholeheartedly endorse.

There are many other programs that the province funds from money from the federal government under CAP. It runs the sheltered workshops for the mentally handicapped. It runs group homes for people requiring that assistance. It helps to sponsor community agencies that help with transportation for the disabled. In many cases if the disabled were not able to be transported by that agency they would probably have to stay at home. This way they are able to get out to various events, meetings, and various types of entertainment.

The money that the province of Prince Edward Island gets through CAP is spent on very essential services.

There are others such as counselling and foster homes for abused children.

Mr. Speaker, you just signalled that I only have two minutes left, so I do not have time to elaborate on all of the tremendous services my province is able to offer because of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Certainly, as a former minister of social services, I understand the increasing cost pressures these services place on the provincial budget. I also know the resolve of provinces such as Prince Edward Island to ensure that these services are adequately maintained.

When the federal government cuts back on CAP, as it is doing with the bill before us this afternoon, it places great financial pressure on the affected provinces at a time when most provinces are trying to practise fiscal restraint.

As I stated earlier, the Canada Assistance Plan is essential in my province of Prince Edward Island. I know that this legislation today does not affect the Atlantic area now but my concern is for the future. By passing this legislation—as I said, the government has a majority so no doubt it will pass—this government will demonstrate once again that it is willing to implement its fiscal policies on the backs of the disadvantaged.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, if passed will put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan transfers to Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

This government believes that these three provinces do not need federal equalization payments, but this government does not tell the public that over 50 per cent of all welfare recipients under the CAP shared programs live in these three provinces. Ontario alone will lose about $1 billion this year because of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

What happens when the transfer payments are reduced or cut? People suffer. This government says that Ontario is a have province. What does that mean? What do we have in this have province of Ontario?

We have raging unemployment. That is what we have in Ontario. We have massive numbers of plant closures, such as the plant closure in Swansea in my riding. We have people who have been employed all their adult lives who find that their unemployment benefits have run out and they still have no job. These are people in their mid-fifties. Some, who are 60, have to work because their companies have not provided adequate pensions for their retirement.

What do these people do? They go on welfare. It is either that or beg for food from food banks. How humiliating. How depressing. Two years ago, there were 36,000 welfare cases in metro Toronto. Last year, that figure jumped to 50,000 and this year there are almost 88,000 cases. This is what we have in a have province.

Recently, a Liberal task force held hearings across Ontario, including the major cities and small villages. I joined the task force when it held hearings in metropolitan Toronto. We heard presentations by Mr. Alan Tonks, chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto Corporation. We heard a brief by Mayor Art Eggleton of the city of Toronto. These two gentlemen alone represent and serve over two million people. They serve more than many premiers serve. People do not realize that some of these cities have populations larger than many entire provinces. These two gentlemen are responsible for providing services to and caring for over two million people. Both of these gentlemen said, and I will never forget it, that the federal government has abandoned the big cities.

We heard in Question Period about how Montreal has been abandoned and about the economic woes of that city. The government has abandoned Windsor. We have been hearing about the prices and the unemployment there. It has abandoned Hamilton and the city of Toronto.

Here are some more startling statistics. There are 130,000 people in metropolitan Toronto who are currently collecting unemployment insurance benefits. Can this government give me assurances that when its claims are exhausted they will get jobs? I think not. They are going to go on social assistance. Does the Prime Minister still think that Ontario is a have province? Does he think that B.C. and Alberta are have provinces?

I recently asked my constituents some questions in a survey sent to every household in my riding. In the comments section my constituents said over and over again that every Canadian should be equal and that every province should be equal. They know that Bill C–69 was wrong. They know that this bill, Bill C–32, is wrong. This government is not treating all Canadians equally when the provinces are divided into have and have not provinces.

When one is very ill one should have equal access to hospital care. Where is the principle of universality that we cherished in this country for so long? It is the backbone of fairness in Canada, and this government is blatantly ignoring that fact.

Metro Toronto hired 350 new case workers for welfare last year and has been forced to hire 250 more this year. One of my constituents came to me recently and asked for a letter of reference from me. I have known him for about 15 years now and he had a very successful photography business. He came to me and said: "Mr. Flis, I have had to sell off all of my equipment and I need a letter of reference". I said: "You need a letter of reference to go on welfare?" "No", he said, "I want to work for welfare". The number of welfare offices and personnel is growing by leaps and bounds to serve these 88,000 welfare cases. I complimented him because rather than go on the welfare rolls himself he applied to work in the welfare office to serve others.

The Conservative government hangs its hat on the Supreme Court ruling that the federal government does have the authority to unilaterally limit increases to the Canada Assistance Plan. However, the federal government has a moral obligation to assist provinces in providing services and care to those who need help the most: disabled persons, those requiring dental care, seniors who now are bedridden and require intensive care, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, subsidized child care for low income families, and the label low income families can be deceiving.

One of my constituents, a single mother, wrote to me recently and explained that she is a very fortunate person because she is earning $37,000 a year. She gave me a breakdown of what she pays for rent, what she pays for child care, and what she pays for other services. At the end of the month she has only $34 left to spend to take her children to a movie or wherever. She is seriously thinking whether it is worth getting up at six in the morning to do this day in and day out and she is contemplating whether she should go on welfare.

Well, if someone earning $37,000 is having difficulty, imagine the people getting an income of $15,000 or $20,000 a year.

My party recommended to this government how to take some of these people off welfare rolls, but the government will not listen. We agree in helping to reduce the deficit. We agree in bringing the public debt down. We have thousands of self-exiles in Canada who, while they were waiting for landed immigrant status, could not work. The government would not give them work permits to work. They wanted to work but this government felt it was more profitable to put them on welfare rather than give them work permits. Then they put a cap to reduce transfer payments to the provinces. The provinces passed that on to the cities like Toronto to pay welfare to these people. I cannot understand how this government can say it is managing this country very well. It is no wonder with this kind of mismanagement that the welfare rolls in Toronto are growing by leaps and bounds. It is no wonder that students come to me who cannot afford to go to university this fall because these of cuts and putting caps on CAP.

I hope that everyone listening will lobby, will appeal, that this Bill C-32 be killed.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too am glad to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of my constituents of Winnipeg North, the Liberal Party, and my other colleagues in the Liberal caucus who would like to speak as well, but time does not permit. This is a very important bill entitled an act to Amend the Canada Assistance Plan. In fact, I wonder whether we can call this an act to amend Canada. There is really nothing left untouched by the Tory government, nothing which is holy.

Nothing is given back, only taken away. The Conservatives took away the trains and the CBC. They tax tobacco but use none of the revenue to help people quit smoking. They freeze transfer payments, endanger medicare and reduce funds available for student loans, then they take the loan money and tax students three cents for every dollar they receive.

This is a heartless government. And the thing that makes it most heartless is how little it cares care for the children of Canada. A cap on the Canada Assistance Plan cuts social programs. Who benefits from social programs? The people who have nothing, and many of the people who have nothing are children.

The welfare rolls are full of children. These kids often go to school with empty stomachs because their mothers cannot afford food. How can you concentrate on math and reading and reading when your stomach is empty? These children cannot learn with barriers like the ones the government is erecting for them.

The government professes to wanting a leaner machine where the excess is trimmed and the bottom line is cost-efficiency. Well, the bottom line for a hungry child is this.

His family is poor. His father was laid off. It is because of free trade, the plant manager said. His mom stays home to care for his little sister. They cannot afford day care. He goes to school hungry. He is small for his age, unhealthy, humiliated, and falling further and further behind in school. The other children tease him, call him names because of his old clothes. Is this the face of the leaner system? Does cost-cutting mean taking security away from a child and his parents?

Only 6 per cent of the federal deficit is attributed to social programs. Meanwhile the government can raise, according to the book The Quick and the Dead—Brian Mulroney, Big Business and the Seduction of Canada by Linda McQuaig, an additional $6.8 billion by closing off tax breaks.

Let me just say a word about this book written by Linda McQuaig, a leading journalist. This book is a shocking portrait of greed and ambition in the highest places and what it has done to the fate of the nation. Are we trying to amend, with this bill, Canada?

Why not close the tax breaks and stop taking food from the mouths of children? Is the government afraid it will become unpopular with the people it feels matter most, the rich company executives and their heirs? Are they the people who make up that 12 per cent still in the polls supporting this government? Are the other 88 per cent of Canadians in the middle class and the working poor? I imagine so.

No, the government could not risk jeopardizing its popularity by offending the wealthy and big business. Forget the small businesses of this country. Forget that most taxes in this country are paid by the middle class.

Once an author and philosopher, John Ruskin, said in his work Unto This Last, Essay iii:

> Whereas it has long been known and declared that the poor have no right to the property of the rich, I wish it also to be known and declared that the rich have no right to the property of the poor.

Why does this government not leave the poor what they have, and try to improve the lot of the poor, instead of taking what little they have left?

For 1.5 million Canadians, they no longer think about the problems of income tax, and as likely, property tax is no longer a concern either. Why? Because the government took away their jobs and will probably take away their homes as well through its strictly private marketplace, rules-of-the-jungle boardroom logic. They are unemployed and fearful about the future of their families. To be unemployed and poor in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia feels no different than being unemployed in any other province, including my province of Manitoba. Poor is poor.

And 54 per cent of these poor people live in the three aforementioned provinces to be affected by this bill. The government calls these provinces rich. Rich compared to what provinces? It is relative. Should every province's greatest aspiration be to have a deficit as well? I worry about the precedent it is setting for the other provinces later on, because this government has an obsession with deficit reduction.

I would just like to briefly call to the attention of the House that the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology in its report of January 1, 1991 on children and poverty, Toward a Better Future clearly states that it will invest in our poor children. We will reap fivefold more in 20 years if spending on the poor is not deficit spending but investment in the future of our country.

This is a finance bill, according to the government. At the briefing session held for the opposition, officers from the Department of Finance explained the purpose of the bill, the need for restraint and cautioned: "The government cannot be a good financial steward on behalf of Canadian taxpayers if such transfers were allowed to grow without any restraint".

Where was the briefing from the Department of National Health and Welfare, explaining how, on behalf of Canadians, the government was showing itself a good social steward by forcing this bill through the House? I did not see the minister of health stand to defend this bill. I wonder if he is ashamed of his government. I believe he should be.

He knows he has lashed the burden of the national debt on to the backs of the sick, the youth, the unemployed and the seniors of Canada. It is battered women, forsaken children and all the abused who have been harnessed with the debt. There is no security, no safety, in this place called Canada.

Making the poor pay the national debt has become the life force driving this government.

I would like to conclude by just recalling that on November 24, 1989, almost two years ago, this House of Commons unanimously passed a motion which read: "That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000."

I would also like to call to the attention of this House that in 1965, almost 26 years ago, in the Speech from the Throne, the Canada Assistance Plan was one of the five elements in a program designed to abolish poverty in Canada. What have we done today? There is a bill before us to abolish the very basic program that will abolish poverty in the country. That, I think, is the sensitivity of this government. Truly pachydermatous, Mr. Speaker. No social conscience at all. I wish this government would wake up and withdraw this bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find a predisposition in the Chamber for unanimous consent to the following motion, which was being worked on for a good part of the day:

> That notwithstanding the Standing Orders and usual practices of the House, that when the second reading debate begins on Bill C-19, an act respecting bank and banking, it shall be deemed that Bill C-28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, and Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations, and to provide for related and consequential matters are called jointly with Bill C-19 for second reading debate,
> That Standing Order 11(2) be suspended for the duration of the debate,
> That the debate be held on the subject matter covered in the three said legislations,
> That immediately after Bill C-19 has been disposed of, The Speaker shall put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment, all the questions necessary to dispose of both Bill C-28 and Bill C-34 at second reading in that order, and that Bills C-19, C-28 and C-34 be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member was going to go on and add another paragraph and talk about the reduction of the Prime Minister's salary down to $1, but since he did not do that, I think there might be disposition within our party to give our consent to the contents of this motion.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am also House leader today.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation and we are quite prepared to support this motion. I just want to point out that we are facilitating debate in this House by combining three bills and one would hope that the government will allow those members who wish to speak to do so without resorting to any time allocation or closure.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I might just respond to my friend that if the Prime Minister were paid by private sector standards for the responsibility and the skill, the salary might be six or seven times as large as he now gets at a minimum.

Mr. Speaker, I think you might also find a predisposition on the part of the House for unanimous consent to the following motion:

> That when the debate collapses on Bill C-32 this day, that the question not be put and that the Chair call it seven o'clock and begin the Private Members' hour debate.

The effect of that, if the House is that way inclined, for all those members who are waiting behind the curtains and other places, would be that there would be no vote today and probably the next substantive vote in the House would likely occur Monday about six o'clock, so members would have greater certitude about the impact of that motion.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to give the consent of my party with regard to the second motion. Just to clarify it so that there is no doubt, my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence, my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings, my colleague from Ottawa South and my colleague from Halifax will be the speakers who will follow. Then, in accordance with the motion, as read by the chief government Whip, it would then be called seven o'clock with no vote tonight and presumably a vote later, next week.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it my intention to call the item on Friday morning and, if nobody rises, then we would have the voice vote and a deferral which would then take us through until Monday at 6 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the first motion à propos des projets de loi à incidences financières.

Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the second motion on Bill C-21, is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions of Mr. Hawkes agreed to.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and the motion of Mr. Vincent (p.2536).

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you have noticed, as some of my other colleagues have noticed, that over the course of this debate there has been nary an individual who has risen to speak in favour of this bill. It is probably because all of those who are following this debate, both inside and outside this House, must be impressed with the nature of the negative components of this bill.

We are all familiar with the government's stated claim that what it wants to do is address the national debt and the deficit and put the country back on an economic keel that is appropriate for the aspirations and the needs of all Canadians everywhere in this country.

Yet it comes forward with a piece of legislation like Bill C-32, which extends all the negative elements we saw in the last session with Bill C-69 where we put a cap on the Canada Assistance Program.

It highlights just a couple of points that are worth noting. Some of my colleagues from this side of the House, more particularly from my party, have been eloquent, articulate, precise and forceful in the arguments that point to the fact that this is a most unjust bill. It is unjust for a couple of reasons.

First, it indicates that the government is transferring its responsibility for the national debt and for the deficit on to the provinces, and through them on to citizens who are least capable of maintaining the responsibility for that debt.

All members of this House are already familiar with the fact that when this government came to power in 1984 the national debt was high at $170 billion, but today, after seven years of this government, after five years of unprecedented economic growth and wealth and prosperity in Canada, after those kinds of conditions, our national debt stands at well over $400 billion and is approaching $420 billion.

The government is now turning to provinces and residents of those provinces. The government's economic policies in this Parliament turned conditions around to the negative and the disadvantage of all citizens. The government has now decided that three provinces, in particular Alberta, British Columbia and my province of Ontario, must now bear the brunt and responsibility of the government's inefficiencies, inadequacies, incompetence and downright stupidity when it comes to economic policies and fiscal and monetary management in this Parliament.

An hon. member: They do not know what they are doing either.

Mr. Volpe: We are looking at a bill that essentially says that citizens of this country, no matter where they live, used to be equal in the sense that they had the same opportunity of access to government services. They had the same standing before law and they could get the same quality of services for the taxes that each and every one of them equitably paid. Now these citizens from these three provinces are to be treated differently.

Citizenship now has gradations of quality. Citizenship can no longer bring to an individual the same level of services in one province as it will in another.

• (1820)

At one time yes, perhaps Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario might have enjoyed greater prosperity. Not so today, and thank you in large measure, in fact almost exclusively, to the government's policies. We have seen them. We have seen evidence. We have seen enumeration of documentation, of statistics from independent sources, business communities, labour communities, our own Statistics Canada, pointing to the destruction of manufacturing in Canada as a result of the free trade agreement, pointing to the weakening of the national government's ability to deliver programs thanks to the government's spending habits, none of them indicating for a moment a priority which should be working toward national unity that the government talked about so eloquently over the course of the last two days in its Canada unity package.

How can unity be developed when it has already been decided that through legislation Canadians will be treated differently from one province to another? How can we address unity? How can we talk about responsibility when at the same time we propose a bill such as Bill C-32 that essentially denies the federal government's responsibility when this program was put forward to share equally with the provinces in the cost of basic necessities for all Canadians such as: food, shelter, clothing, utilities and household supplies.

That was a basic principle that is now being eroded with this bill. We already attacked it, aggressively so with Bill C-69 in the last session, and we are doing it more nefariously again with Bill C-32.

My colleagues have already pointed out to government members, who seem to close their ears and their eyes to these sorts of things, that with this bill the federal government will renege on $2.135 billion until 1995 that would normally go to those provinces.

If citizens from three provinces are to be denied what is theirs by law, what is theirs by virtue of their participation in this country, what are we doing to the value of Canadian citizenship? What are we doing to the confidence Canadians have in their politicians, their elected government, to ensure that what is provided for them is the appropriate net that guards them against the vagaries of the economies and the vagaries of a cyclical marketplace? Well, not very much.

The other point I wanted to raise is that as with the other government fiscal and economic policies, and I am being generous now, this one is either ill-timed or wrongly focused. What are we doing? We are asking this House to accept a reduction of moneys designed to provide services that are generally put in place for those least advantaged.

Who are the least advantaged? Some 54 per cent of all individuals who fall in that poorer category live in the provinces that are being attacked by this bill, 54 per cent who would otherwise require the kinds of services that are now going to be cut. Make no mistake about this, what this bill is doing is cutting services such as dental care, essential services for the disabled. It is providing fewer foster homes for abused children, less housing for abused women, and less housing for low income families.

Where is that going to hurt most? You heard my colleague from Willowdale talk about the plight of Ontario manufacturing. Ontario, which used to be a have province, is being reduced to a have not province thanks to the government side. I see a couple of the members and parliamentary secretaries beating their chests, taking credit for the devastation that is being wreaked on Ontario. I think that is shameful, especially shameful because this cap on CAP represents an additional increase in taxes. Who is being asked to pay more? In Ontario alone this bill might represent an additional reduction that will cost Ontario taxpayers an additional $1 billion in this coming year. That works out to about $112 per person or roughly $450 for the average family. Look at the increase in taxation. For those who are lucky enough to have a job, that comes on top of the 25 per cent increase in unemployment insurance last year and an additional 35 per cent in unemployment insurance premiums this year. The fact of the matter is that those who were able to bear the burden of taxation are no longer in such a condition.

We see, for example, and I regret to say this very much, in my own city of Toronto welfare cases have increased by 73 per cent from July 1990 to July 1991. There is an anticipation that it will increase to 250,000 over the course of this coming year. When we are talking about people who are in need, we need not go any further than look at Toronto. The unemployment rate is the highest of major cities. It has doubled since last year, 10.8 per cent this summer; over 226,000 people on unemployment rolls, thanks to this government's economic policies.

They are going to ask these same people to pay more. Where will they turn when their unemployment runs out? To welfare cases again.

I know you are asking me to stop, Mr. Speaker. Let me leave you with these terrible thoughts that should encourage everyone in this House to vote against this bill. In my own riding there are only 20 per cent of the factories still operating. We have lost the manufacturing sector and we have 85 per cent unemployment in construction.

What we need is a government that gets its priorities straight, focuses its financial responsibilities appropriately and asks those who can pay to pay.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I too want to spend some time in the House this evening talking about this ridiculous bill that the government is going to ram-jam down the throats of this House and the throats of Canadians, Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

I just want to take a couple of minutes to explain to people what the Canada Assistance Plan is and then I am sure it will become very clear in their minds the false results and the foolishness that the government is carrying on in cutting back on this funding.

The Canada Assistance Plan is a program that assists those less fortunate in Canada to have some of the services that we in Canada are proud to say that up until now we have been able to provide for that unfortunate sector of our society. The program assists provinces on a fifty-fifty basis, up until this bill is concluded by this majority government, for the funding of many of those services.

The Liberals have always opposed the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, as it is referred to, the cap on CAP. I can tell you that the Liberals will continue to oppose that, because it is not what we in the Liberal Party stand for.

What is happening is the government again is transferring the debt of this country over on to the backs of those who can least pay. I know they say it has been challenged in court. We all know that the British Columbia government challenged it and at the provincial level it won. But the federal government took it further than that and it went to the Supreme Court. At that stage the federal government won.

We can say therefore that what is being done is legally correct. I ask Canadians: Is it morally correct?

Mr. Volpe: Absolutely not.

Mr. Vanclief: My colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence says: "Absolutely not". It is not morally correct.

We brag in Canada about treating all Canadians equally. What is happening with this bill now is back in the 1990 budget the government said that it was going to cap it, that the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario were going to get increased funding up to 5 per cent above the previous year but, if there were anything required above that, too bad, those three provinces would not receive anything above 5 per cent. In the other provinces in Canada, if the requirement was there, they would live up to the moral expectation and moral responsibility of the federal government to do that. However, for those three particular provinces there is a cap at 5 per cent.

An hon. member: That's an increase.

Mr. Vanclief: Yes, that is an increase. No question that is an increase but it is not a fair increase to the province of Ontario, the province that I come from, for example—and I will refer to that for a moment—along with others. Ontario has been totally devastated in the last couple of years by hundreds of thousands of jobs leaving our province and hundreds of thousands more people going on social benefits and requiring social packages. That is all because of the actions of this government.

However, there is no ceiling for the other provinces. We as parliamentarians owe it to the other seven provinces to give them a warning that this government now has its toe in the door. Yes, the government has done it legally. It is legally correct, but it is not morally correct. I want to point that out.

Fifty-four per cent of the people in this country who require those social services are in the three very provinces in which the government is capping the increases—54 per cent.

One of the jobs, duties, and obligations of a central government is to collect the wealth from throughout the country and share and distribute it equally throughout the country, or as equally as it possibly can be done. I also point out to this House and to the members opposite that it is not only their duty to do that across the country but a duty and obligation to do that within each province as well. The government is certainly shirking its duty and responsibility.

This money provides such essential services to the poor and low income people as providing and assisting them with dental care, essential living services for disabled people, foster homes for abused children, safe houses for abused women, and subsidized child care for low income families. This is the type of assistance to Canadians that this government is reneging on and is backing away from. Again I repeat it is shirking its responsibility.

It began on this course in the 1990 budget and said it was going to cap it for two years. Then along came the 1991 budget and the government extended that period. Now it is going continue it until 1995. Take warning, the rest of the provinces in Canada, your time will come. The Tories will do it to you as well. The toe is in the door.

I just want to give few figures before I wind up, to show how this is affecting my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings. I talked to some of the people in Hastings County, in particular, as recently as today and asked: "What is happening? Do we have an increased need for this?" Here are the figures. The increase in welfare rolls in Hastings County from August 1990 to August 1991 was 58 per cent. If we go back one more year prior to that, from August 1989 to August 1991, there was a 91 per cent increase. In the County of Hastings alone, compared to the large city of Toronto, it is not a lot in total numbers. Some 4.94 per cent of the people depend on social assistance for their existence. That is a total of 5,154 people.

The number of unemployment claimants in my area has risen 20 per cent from August 1990 to August 1991. With the changes this government saw fit in its lack of wisdom to put forward in Bill C-21, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, we are seeing more and more people fall off the end of the UI rolls who have to be picked up by the social services roll. That adds to that cost.

We do not need that in Ontario. We do not need this in Canada, and we do not need it for our low income people. The government is being penny wise and pound foolish at a time when we should as a country and as a nation realize the importance of assisting these people, the important resource these people can be for our work force, our places of business and everything else. At a time when we should be investing in them, this government is divesting itself of these people and shirking its responsibility.

This is an absolutely foolish move on the part of the government. We will pay for this as a country, as a nation, and as time goes on.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I stand here today to take part in this debate on Bill C-32. I think it is appropriate to discuss this legislation today right after the government tabled its proposals with regard to the Constitution of Canada. I believe this bill deals directly with the relations between the federal government and the provinces.

[English]

I am uncertain whether this bill is more iniquitous or more deceitful. It is definitely both, but I am not sure which one prevails.

It is iniquitous for many of the reasons my distinguished colleague from Prince Edward county said. It is a cut to those provinces—the three provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta—where more than 50 per cent of Canadians in need of social assistance live. It is a cut in real terms, in the sense that it is a limit on the amount of increase that will go to those provinces at a time when the economy, particularly in the province of Ontario, is very weak and has been weak from the beginning of the recession in the second quarter of 1990 until today.

Whether we are technically out of a recession is not the point. In Canada we say recessions start when the curve begins down and they end when the curve begins to go up. Even if a recovery has begun in the sense that the curve is beginning to go back up, we are still far from reaching the point on the curve we were at when the recession began.

We are going to continue to go through a period of time in which many Canadians are going to require social assistance. This is then a particularly iniquitous time to be cutting back on the payments to those provinces where the majority of needy people live.

What I am really unhappy about, as I said a moment ago in French, is that this bill comes at a time when all Canadians are debating some of the very important aspects of our federation. It comes at a time when the strain of keeping Canada together is weighing on all of us involved in public life, both at the federal and provincial levels.

This is a unilateral decision by the federal government to cut back on long established shared cost programs.

Ms. Clancy: Shame.

Mr. Manley: It comes at a time when the need has never been greater partly because of the recession, which was described by the Conference Board of Canada as the first ever made-in-Canada recession and was brought on by the policies of the government opposite.

An hon. member: Nobody else had a recession.

Mr. Manley: My friend from Stratford says that nobody else had a recession. I quoted the Conference Board of Canada. It was not the Liberal Party that said this. Outside economic analysts say that this is the first time that a recession has actually been provoked in Canada by Canadian policies. I might add they were Canadian policies that were pursued particularly in 1989. Why did we have high interest rates in 1989? Because the government opposite pursued a policy in 1988 of attempting to buy an election when growth in Canada was about 5 per cent. It cut taxes. It permitted a much more open monetary policy and the result was high inflation in 1989 and high interest rates bringing on a recession in 1990. What did it do about it? It cut the payments to the provinces for social assistance by capping them at a 5 per cent increase.

Not only is the need brought on by the recession, but at the same time it brought in a program of unemployment insurance reforms which throughout Canada has resulted in many more people being in need of social assistance. Furthermore, it has pursued a completely hopeless policy in dealing with a large number of claimants for refugee status in Canada, which take people who have sought protection by being on our shores, and during the time that they await determination of their refugee status, are unable to work in Canada and therefore have to go on social assistance.

Who pays for that? It is paid for by the municipality with provincial support. As we know, as a result of this bill and Bill C-69 which preceded it last year, the support which was to come to the provinces from the federal government is being capped at 5 per cent, when the need is being generated by the federal government itself.

I think the official title of this bill is an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. It should be called the federal transfer of debt act. This is in effect an attempt to confuse the Canadian people into thinking that the government opposite is actually doing something about its deficit and debt problem, when in reality what it is doing is transferring its debt to the provinces.

Then we have the disgraceful performance of the Prime Minister of Canada going overseas, washing our linen before investors in Japan, criticizing the Ontario government, whose policies with which I do not happen to agree, but upon whom the federal government has transferred $1 billion of debt this year alone through this particular cap on CAP.

What the province and the federal government need to do, and I do not think there should be any cause for disagreement about this, is sit down together and make sure that there is an agreement on design and delivery of social assistance. Give the federal government a role in designing these programs so that there is co-operation flowing both ways. Then lock in the commitment to help fund the programs as agreed.

What we have here is the provinces spending federal money, granted without control, without limit, but the federal government cutting back the funds without consultation. No wonder things are not working right.

The transfer of debt to the provinces is not the way to solve any one's debt problem. Last week, we had the Minister of Finance in this House blaming provincial government borrowing for keeping the Canadian dollar as high as it is. Excuse me, but if the federal government, through the cut in transfer payments for post-secondary education and health care and the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan payments is forcing provincial deficits up, how can the Minister of Finance stand up in this House and criticize the provincial governments for borrowing too much? That is why I suggest that this really is as deceitful as it is iniquitous.

This is not an easy time for federations around the world. Canada has an opportunity, by making our federal system work, to be an example for federations elsewhere. My suggestion to the government is this, that they back off this ridiculous plan, and that they go to the discussion table with the provinces and say: "We have a problem, not the federal government, not the provincial governments, but we Canadians have a problem.

Let's find a way to address that problem collectively and co-operatively. Let's find solutions to the issues that confront us; recession, a weak economy, poverty in our cities, crime in our cities and the fact that our biggest deficit in Canada is soon not going to be the financial deficit which is big enough, but the deficit in wasted human lives and lost hope."

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill as I have risen to speak on many others in nearly three years as the member for Halifax. I begin my remarks with a sense of disappointment, almost a sense of depression and certainly a sense of gloom.

The Canada Assistance Plan should be one of those programs that applies in all Canadian jurisdictions at the same rate, in the same way and for the same benefit to those who are in need. To put a cap on CAP is to effectively say to three provinces: "The poor people in your province are not as poor as poor people in other provinces."

I am an Atlantic Canadian, which everyone knows. I am a Nova Scotian, which everyone knows. Since we made the collective decision 124 years ago to come into Confederation, a decision that we have never regretted and a decision that we are proud of, we have, as Nova Scotians, seen a steady decline in our prosperity.

There are a number of reasons for that. There are shifts in world economy, there are specific government programs that have worked against the interests of Atlantic Canada in favour of the centre of the country, but I am not going to get into those specifics. Suffice it to say that poverty is not an unknown factor in the Atlantic region of this country. Extreme poverty is sadly not an unknown factor. There are very few people who live in the four eastern provinces of this country who cannot describe poverty on a firsthand basis. Maybe they, themselves, have not been poor—lucky them—but they have seen it, they have worked with it and they have worked against it.

Perhaps it seems odd. In one sense, certain members of the government have tried to say that capping CAP in the so-called have provinces will somehow create more benefit in the have not provinces. That is not what Canada is about, and that is not what members from the other have not regions want. It is certainly not what our constituents want.

We believe in the universality of our social safety net. We believe that one of the sacred trusts, dare I use those words that have been so sadly soiled in the last few years, for the people of Canada is the whole issue of dignity in social programs. To maintain the dignity of those people who must rely upon governments for help, the whole concept of universality is key.

If suddenly three provinces are held to a different standard, to a different amount of money on percentage bases and per capita bases, then that means there are different levels of Canadians. In this time of constitutional crisis, in this time of what we all pray will be constitutional and national renewal, this is something we do not need.

There are not different levels of Canadianism. There are not different levels of citizenship. There may well be different levels of talent and different levels of need and different levels of commitment, but when it comes to access to government services, one Canadian is supposed to be the same as another. To put a cap the CAP in three provinces is to give the lie to that statement.

What is it going to mean in actual practice in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario? It is going to mean that those provincial governments, faced with the cap over the next five years, are going to have to rob Peter to pay Paul. They are going to have to take from their own provincial coffers for programs that are desperately needed to cover off the need for social assistance.

While we are looking at what this particular pernicious piece of legislation does, we cannot look at it in a vacuum, because there are other things that are happening that are affecting provincial and municipal budgets in this country today that are a direct result of the policies of this government. I refer, of course, to the reforms, and I use that word in its loosest term, to the Unemployment Insurance Act that we saw rammed through in the last Parliament. No one in this Chamber will ever forget it.

What that has effectively done is disembowl the unemployment income insurance program in this country. It has driven people, who in the past, might have been able to tide themselves over through periods of unemployment, particularly in this recession which has seen the highest rate of bankruptcy in the history of this country, and particularly in a recession created in this country by the policies of this government. But that is gone. Any kind of safety net from unemployment insurance is effectively out the window.

It is certainly out the window in my region and I know it is out the window in parts of northern and eastern Ontario, northern Canada generally, northern British Columbia and northern Alberta. It is certainly out the window in a lot of the major cities such as Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton and the major cities of Ontario. UI as we know it does not exist any more and all of us who sit in this Chamber are aware of it. Certainly those of us on this side of the House mourn its loss.

What does that do? That again puts extra pressure on hard pressed provincial governments and hard pressed provincial budgets. These governments had a right to expect some sort of stability from a federal government that claims to believe that all Canadians are equal.

We hear again that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are rich provinces. In Nova Scotia where I represent the people of Halifax, the poor people are no poorer in the long run than poor people in Toronto or the homeless in Vancouver or poor people in northern Ontario. Poor people are poor people and provincial governments are governments and there is only so much they can do. There is only so much that can be stretched to cover what is necessary for people to survive.

We did not even have time to touch on the whole concept of the dignity of people who need to think that emergency measures such as social assistance and unemployment insurance are there to hold them up and help them. Capping the CAP, like gutting unemployment insurance, is an assault on low income people across this country. It is an assault on provincial governments across this country. It is an assault on municipal governments across this country. It is the federal government standing up and saying: "The Canadian social safety net, the Canadian social contract exists no longer. We now live in a time where you sink or you swim and if you cannot swim, do not look to me for a life preserver, do not look to me for assistance."

This is not what Canada is about. This is not what we were elected and what my colleagues on the other side were elected to do here. This is not the Canadian way. It is not something that any of us can continue to stand for.

Private Members' Business

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to an order made earlier this day and to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

PUBLIC SERVICE

MOTION TO AMEND THE PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Public Service Superannuation Act so that any Public Service employee who has lost his or her job on or after January 1st, 1988, as a result of a Public Service downsizing programme, and who had reached fifty years of age and had to his or her credit not less than ten years of pensionable service, would be entitled to receive a pension reduced by the product obtained by multiplying: a) five per cent of the amount of the pension that would have been payable if the employee had been fifty-five years of age at the time of the loss of his or her job b) 55 minus the age of the employee at the time of the loss of his or her job.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to ask today that the amendments already submitted in motion M-385, which pertains to the Public Service Superannuation Act, be accepted.

The thrust of my motion is to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act in order to address the plight of people who lost their jobs due to downsizing.

At present, employees aged between 50 and 54 receive a considerably smaller pension than those who are facing the same situation, but who are 55 years old or over.

[English]

When an employee in the Public Service becomes redundant due to downsizing and that person is 55 years of age or over and he or she has been employed on a full-time basis in the Public Service for a minimum of 10 years, the Public Service Superannuation Act says: "If at the time he ceases to be so employed and he has reached 55 years of age, has been employed in the Public Service on a full-time basis for a period of or for periods totally at least 10 years and does not voluntarily retire from the Public Service, an annual allowance payable immediately on his so ceasing to be employed equal to the amount of the deferred annuity referred to in clause (a), reduced by the product obtained by multiplying: (1) 5 per cent of the amount of that annuity, by (2) 30 minus the number of years to the nearest one-tenth of a year of the pensionable service to his credit".

In other words, if a person is between 60 and 65 and is laid off from the federal government, he or she receives a full pension. A laid off employee who is between the age of 55 and 60 receives a pension reduced by 25 per cent or what he or she would receive at 60 years of age.

The act continues with this statement: "except that in any such case the whole or any part of the reduction provided for by this clause may be waived by the Treasury Board".

It is my understanding that Treasury Board has used this waiver in some cases when the person affected was 55 years of age or over.

• (1900)

People who are laid off from the federal government see their pension reduced unless there is a waiver from the Treasury Board.

[English]

The reality of current government practices is that many people under the age of 55 are being laid off through no fault of their own. Statistics which were obtained by my office for the period January 1, 1990 to December 31, 1990 indicate that a total of 357 employees who had been appointed under the Public Service Employment Act to indeterminate and permanent positions lost their jobs in that calendar year. Of these, 60 were over the age of 55 and 31 were between the ages of 50 and 54. The other 266 employees were 49 years of age and under.

The riding I represent has no less than 10,000 people who declared, during the 1986 census, that they worked for the federal public service. This is one of the largest concentration of civil servants in a given region of the country.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, people in my riding are going to be particularly affected by downsizing by contracting out, by relocation and other measures that the government chose to impose on its civil servants.

[English]

The case must be made here for those people 50 years of age and over. Unfortunately, society is not totally accepting of the re-employment of people in that age bracket. It is neither a pleasant nor a seemingly fair statement, but it is true.

Employment centres and private consulting firms, such as Casey and Associates Business Centres Limited, located in my riding, are faced with this reality each day. The owner, Fernande Casey, at 53 years of age a senior executive with the federal government who had 28 years experience, was the victim of this outdated legislation. Her only recourse was to accept a reduced pension or engage legal counsel to try to waive the penalty to her pension. It cost her thousands of dollars, months of anguish and considerable personal suffering. She now assists and counsels numerous former public servants in coping with this economic impact. She is frequently bringing to my attention the harsh reality that many of her clients face. After dedicating one's adult years to the Public Service, the shock and reality of layoff and the uncertainty for re-employment is devastating for many of her clients.

Her challenge begins with building their confidence, and then finding employment. She is quick to point out that most of her clients are former public servants, 50 to 60 years of age, an age group that is not particularly attractive to many employers and with skills that are not easily transferred from the public to the private sector. Where does a former public servant who has specialized, say, in staffing or in preparing ministerial briefing notes look for employment in the private sector? Jobs are extremely difficult to come by in Canada's present economy for the young, let alone for the grey culture.

After dedicating ones adult years to the Public Service, what a shock it must be—I repeat, Mr. Speaker—what a shock it must be to arrive at work to the reality of a layoff and the uncertainty of re-employment.

In October 1990 I asked the President of the Treasury Board to provide me with statistics concerning people in the age 50 to 54 category who had lost their positions in the Public Service because of the government's downsizing policy. Treasury Board's answer to me was as follows: "Since February 1, 1990, 149 employees in the age category 50 to 54 have been laid off from the Public Service. Of this number, 36 have been reappointed to the Public Service.

Thirty-six people only succeeded in finding another job in the Public Service.

The private sector might have hired about the same number. So that leaves two-thirds of the employees out of jobs.

[English]

Should these laid off employees between the ages of 50 and 54 be forced to take their pension, they are dealt with in the Public Service Superannuation Act as follows: Section 13(1)(c)(2)(d) states that their annuity will be deemed as being the same as for those who are aged 55 and over, with a reduction of 5 per cent of the total amount of the pension for each year between the ages of 50 and 60.

What this amounts to is a further reduction of 25 per cent in benefits between those received by an employee who is laid off at 50 and one who is laid off at 55. Specifically, a laid off employee who is 55 has his or her pension reduced by 25 per cent for five years. One who is between 50 and 54 has his or her pension reduced a further 25 per cent, for a total reduction of 50 per cent.

All of these calculations take into consideration that each has at least 10 years of pensionable employment.

[Translation]

With my resolution, I want to try and correct this situation through amendments to the Act. Consequently, Parliament should recognize that an employee should not be subjected to actuarial reduction if he loses his job through no fault of his own. The Public Service Superannuation Act stipulates that a Public Service employee who has reached fifty years of age and has to his credit ten years of pensionable service is entitled to a pension. Parliament should not be guilty of age discrimination towards a group of employees. By reducing their pension, we are punishing these employees and making their situation worse than it is now.

[English]

In June 1990 the House of Commons passed Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts. Regulations made pursuant to the bill clarify in general terms provisions for all Canadians who wish to receive early retirement benefits. Specifically, this bill, C-52, requires that there be no reduction in the amount of early retirement benefit in a registered pension plan if the individual receiving the benefits qualifies in law as pensionable.

I wish to remind this House that the Public Service Superannuation Act does in fact provide for pension benefits for 50-year-old laid off employees with at least 10 years of service, and, as such, these employees are considered to be individuals qualifying in law for early retirement benefits.

In the eighth report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, tabled June 7, 1990, an agreement was reached between the committee and the Department of Finance regarding modification of the proposed regulations. Concerning early retirement, it was suggested that "there be a provision in the regulations allowing consideration of payment of pensions at an earlier date without actuarial reduction to members who are retiring because of automation, plant closure or downsizing."

Again, in July 1991, the Minister of Finance released draft amendments to the income tax regulations which provided for special benefits for individuals in both the private and public sectors who are terminating employment as a result of a downsizing program that has been approved by the Minister of National Revenue.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am only going to all this trouble to show how Parliament reacted to the phenomenon of early retirement. I also want to draw your attention to the fact that, even if most provincial civil servants are entitled to early retirement at age 55 without any reduction whatsoever, in some provinces, such as in British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, for example, given specific circumstances and for a limited time, like through a down-sizing period, laid-off employees are entitled to early retirement without any reduction.

In Saskatchewan, that applies to laid-off employees as well as civil servants affected outside of Regina. Again, Mr. Speaker, I am pointing out those precedents so that this House recognize the realities Public Service is faced with in the 1990's, when finding how other jurisdictions have solved the matter.

• (1910)

Nobody could anticipate the circumstances we are now in when the Public Service Superannuation Act was first passed by Parliament.

[English]

I conclude with the following example of the pension benefits of one of my constituents who was forced to retire because of downsizing in the federal Public Service. This gentleman chose a pension when he was age 50. Consequently, his pension was reduced by 5 per cent a year until the age of 60; that is to say, 5 per cent times 10 years equals a 50 per cent reduction of his total pension.

Had this gentleman been age 55 at the time of lay off he would have received the maximum amount. He wrote to me, and I quote: "My feeling is that the eligible people in this group with at least 10 years service should only have their benefits reduced from the age 55, not 60, as is the current practice. This would mean that I would receive 75 per cent of the maximum amount, instead of the present 50 per cent".

We must act fairly. As a result of the government's policy of downsizing, a segment of its employees are experiencing financial penalty. This can be rectified by acceptance of my motion and amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

I call upon the government to recognize that the act requires amending. This should be accomplished quickly so that when the full effects of Public Service 2000 are felt employees in the 50 to 54 years of age category are not further disadvantaged.

We must act fairly. We must recognize the quality with which public servants discharge their numerous and important tasks. Our attitude in our work relationships with the Public Service will reinforce the benefits of PS-2000. And we will know that employees having to leave the government between the ages of 50 and 54 will not be further disadvantaged.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member for Carleton—Gloucester for presenting this Motion M-385. As the New Democratic critic for pensions I fully endorse the proposal put forward by the member.

So we are clear on what we are talking about here, the motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Public Service Superannuation Act so that any Public Service employee who has lost his or her job on or after January 1st, 1988, as a result of a Public Service downsizing program, and who had reached fifty years of age and had to his or her credit not less than ten years of pensionable service, would be entitled to receive a pension reduced by the product obtained by multiplying:—

The member uses the 5 per cent formula at the age of 55. Downgrading it from the age of 55 to 50 would in fact be treating them the same way as someone reaching the pension at age 60 and downgrading it to 55. I had in my riding a person working for Parks Canada who has experienced the very thing we are discussing.

He is below the age of 55. Parks Canada is downsizing. He was called in and told that he would be eligible for a payout and he would be eligible for his pension rights. He accepted the proposal, took his leave, and waited anxiously for his payout and his pension. After a short period of time he was notified that he did not qualify for the pension and he did not qualify for the payout. He was left completely out.

I have a situation—and this is not a public servant but we are talking about a Crown corporation—in the post office. A senior person, not represented by a union, was six months from the date of receiving her pension, of qualifying for her pension, and Canada Post phased out the post office.

They came in and offered her a buyout. They gave her $16,000 as a buyout. Not even the private sector would have treated this employee that way. It would have carried her for the six months so that she could at least qualify for her pension. They bought her out for $16,000. She then transferred that money into an RRSP figuring that she would have to protect her pension rights.

Then she went down to the unemployment insurance office to claim unemployment insurance and found out that she did not qualify for unemployment insurance because she had been bought out. This person not only lost her pension but she lost her unemployment insurance. That is what is happening.

When downsizing is taking place this government must be held responsible. This government must be held responsible for the public servants, and I do not think this bill has gone far enough. I want to say to the member that I support his bill fully.

In my view, in this case because of the 10 years this employee has received there should be no penalty. There should be no penalty whatsoever. The government, being the employer, should be the one who should have to offset that for the five-year period to ensure that the employee receives an equitable pension.

Five years from now when this takes place and the employee reaches the age of 55, the cost of living and the various things which will have taken place will impose a tremendous penalty on this public servant. It will not be his or her fault.

Certainly, he or she is not going to be able to go out. The government says they can transfer their pensions from one area to another. The member has rightly said that at age 50 or above it is very hard to find employment.

The employer has a responsibility either to find another location for that employee to ensure that he or she can reach pensionable age or find a mechanism such as the member has put forward. This change is long overdue and I would urge the government to consider it because of the policies it is bringing in.

I do not agree with some of the changes the Conservatives are talking about with regard to PS 2000 and other programs. For goodness' sake, if they are going to start changing and downsizing then they must take a look at the over-all Superannuation Act and how it affects these employees or bring in some type of training for these people who are let go because of downsizing so that they can carry on in another area.

That is not happening. The sad thing is that we are going to see more and more of this take place. The member's timing is right on. I would urge the government to consider this and let this bill come back, be debated and introduced into legislation.

If it does not we are going to be faced with problems for the social programs. Why should we go through this when the people qualified with their 10 years and when they have carried out their duties for that length of time. Many of them might be between the ages of 50 and 55. They are not all 50. We have a period of five years to find some mechanism to ensure that these people are not going to be left out of their pensions because of the actions of the government.

I urge the government to allow this bill to proceed and to encourage this type of mechanism so that employees who have worked for us for many years will receive a decent pension and not be left out, so that they will be able to carry on.

I fully support the member's bill.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to address the substance of the motion today.

The intentions of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester are praiseworthy because the motion's aim is to ensure the financial security of former and present Public Service employees whose employment has or will be lost as a result of downsizing of the Canadian Public Service. As I understand the motion, it proposes that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended to alter the way in which the pension benefits will be calculated for employees who are at least 50 years of age and have 10 or more years of pensionable service and who have lost their Public Service employment as a result of a layoff or downsizing in their area of work.

For employees in such circumstances, the pension benefits would be calculated by reducing the pension which would be payable at age 55 by 5 per cent for every year that the employee's attained age is less than 55.

I assume first of all that by virtue of the proposed formula anyone whose employment has been terminated under these circumstances and who has already reached 55 years of age would not have any reduction in pension. Basically, this is what happens now under the existing terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act, although Treasury Board approval is required in each case.

There is, however, one difference between the existing superannuation legislation and the proposal in the motion, and that is with respect to the service requirements which an employee needs to qualify for the benefit.

Under the present law, to qualify for a waiver of pension reduction an employee must be at least age 55 and have 10 or more years of employment in the Public Service. Under the motion this requirement reads 10 years of pensionable service.

Pensionable service under the Public Service Superannuation Act is made up of a variety of kinds of service, not all which needs to be with the Public Service of Canada. If, for example, an employee has imported pension credits from an outside employer, under the terms of a reciprocal pension transfer agreement those pension credits are considered to be pensionable service.

Under the proposed amendment being discussed today, as the motion is worded a person could have 10 years of pensionable service and qualify for an unreduced pension, even though almost none of it was employment in the Public Service of Canada.

To use another example, the Public Service Superannuation Act does not yet permit the accounting of service where an employee regularly works fewer than 30 hours per week. An employee could have worked in the Public Service for 10 years but, if some of that employment was on a part-time basis, he or she would not qualify for the benefits under the proposed wording of the motion today.

I would therefore argue that in the terms of qualifying for special treatment on layoff or downsizing, the existing criterion of requiring 10 years of employment rather than 10 years of pensionable service is fair since it recognizes actual employment in the Public Service, either full or part-time, as opposed to pension credits which can be transferred to the superannuation plan from an outside employer.

The proposal's application to employees over age 55 seems relatively straightforward. However, in the case of employees between ages 50 and 55, it is not completely clear to me how the proposal is intended to operate. The motion proposes that eligible employees receive a pension reduced by multiplying the number of years that the employee is less than age 55 by 5 per cent of the amount of the pension that would have been payable if the employee had been 55 years of age at the time of the loss of his or her job.

Does the hon. member, in referring to the pension that would have been payable if the employee had been 55 years of age, mean a reduced or an unreduced pension? Under the Public Service Superannuation Act, at age 55 only those public servants with 30 or more years of pensionable service would be entitled to draw an unreduced pension.

Employees at age 55 with fewer than 30 years service would be entitled to a reduced pension. For example, if an employee was laid off at age 52 with 26 years of service, under the existing law he or she would be able to receive an immediate annual allowance reduced by 20 per cent. Under the formula proposed in the motion, because of the way the PSSA operates the same individual at age 55 would still have a 20 per cent reduction. The motion would require that this reduced pension would be further reduced by 15 per cent because the employee is three years younger than age 55.

It is possible that the hon. member means to propose that in the above example we are to assume that the employee would also have three more years of pensionable service by age 55, in which case his or her pension would under the existing terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act be reduced by only 5 per cent.

If we were to take this 95 per cent pension and reduce it further by 15 per cent as proposed under the formula set out in the motion, we end up with a pension benefit very close to an amount which is provided under the existing arrangement under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

The employee in this example would receive 81.5 per cent of his or her unreduced pension under the proposed formula instead of 80 per cent under the present terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

For the employee who does not have more than 25 years of service at the time of the layoff, the situation is marginally better. At age 52, with 15 years of service, an employee's reduction under the existing Public Service Superannuation Act would be 40 per cent. This means a 60 per cent pension would be payable. By age 55, the reduction would be only 25 per cent. Under the proposed amendment that 75 per cent pension would then be reduced by a further 15 per cent so that the employee would receive 64.5 per cent of his or her unreduced pension.

This example, as in the earlier one, is not clear whether the hon. member proposing the motion intends that service be imputed to employees covered when he refers to the pension that would have been payable if the employee had been 55. If that is the case, then the proposal becomes costly and would in fact be unacceptable under the newly revised income tax provisions and the regulations governing tax assisted retirement savings.

Under a defined benefit pension plan such as the Public Service Superannuation Act, pension credit cannot be given for service which does not actually take place. If the hon. member is assuming that at age 55 all Public Service pensions should be unreduced, we would be looking at an extremely costly proposal since it would be in effect lowering the retirement age under the pension plan. Such a proposal would be so far out of line with private sector practice as to be unacceptable.

Turning to the retroactive nature of the proposed motion, it would be quite unusual to provide pension improvements on a retroactive basis at all, much less to cover a period of almost four years. Prospective pension changes are the norm because of the liabilities associated with such improvements as well as the administrative complexities of recalculating benefits and making retroactive adjustments in the case of the active pensioner and the survivors of any who have died.

In conclusion, I must report to the House that the motion is technically flawed and its exact application is not immediately clear. If it is to improve pension arrangements for persons laid off between the age of 50 and 55, it needs to be recast to accomplish the objective. Nevertheless, it is the case that the existing pension arrangements are already relatively generous and although they favour the older worker, that is so because of the difficulties older workers face obtaining other employment after being laid off from the Public Service.

In the case of somewhat younger workers, the reduced pension is available to supplement their incomes in the event that subsequent employment is not obtained at a comparable salary to their Public Service earnings.

Public Service pensions are, as members know, indexed to the cost of living.

• (1930)

Hon. members may also wish to bear in mind that the public servants receive severance and other benefits under the work force adjustment policy so that they are treated fairly in relation to their private sector counterparts who find themselves in similar circumstances.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to commend the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and for the proposal he has put forward in regard to this matter and also for the example of the employee with the parks service.

However, before the government would table such a bill I would submit that the proposal would have to be explained thoroughly. I am sure that the President of the Treasury Board would want to have the views of his advisory committee on the matter.

Quite apart from the specific proposal that is in front of us, I think that this House should consider the merits or otherwise of proceeding with a single change to the pension plan for public service in advance of a comprehensive public sector pension reform package. I believe the whole matter should be looked at. I am sure individuals would agree that if there is a change made in this particular area it may impact in another area we are not completely aware of and perhaps provide a penalty to some other individual.

I believe that members are well aware that work has gone on for some considerable time on changes to the federal Public Service statutory pension plans. In fact, I understand that the President of the Treasury Board hopes to be presenting a reform package to the House in the near future.

The impetus for reform, in fact the need for reform, comes from a number of sources. For example, in the various studies which followed the coming into force of section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms there were a few areas where the government made a commitment to consider the matter in the context of pension reform.

While some of these matters were dealt with in the so-called "remarriage bill" which was enacted by this Parliament in June 1989, there are still a few matters needing attention in the whole area of pension reform.

While I am not sure that this is a strict section 15 issue, one of the items which stems from the Equality for All report of the parliamentary committee on equality rights is the problem of providing for the division of pension credits on marriage breakdown. This is one particular area about which I am sure many members of this House have also had constituents come in and make complaints or ask for reforms to be made.

Under the current statutes there is no provision to pay pension benefits to anyone other than the plan member or the member's surviving dependants except in response to a court order for family maintenance. This last order is provided for under the Garnishment and Pension Diversion Act which is limited to situations where the non-member spouse is entitled to maintenance under a court order.

The Garnishment and Pension Diversion Act does not apply to situations where property, that is family assets, are being divided. I am sure many members have received representations, as I have mentioned, from former spouses of public servants that the pension plan should be amended to accommodate court order division of pensions as part of an equalization of family assets on marriage breakdown. Obviously this is a matter that should be looked at.

Another very important pressure for pension reform is the Income Tax Act where recent changes instituted a fair set of rules for tax relief granted in respect of contributions to pension plans. The Income Tax Act and its regulations now set out the maximum benefits that a pension plan can provide and still have a registered status. Only contributions to a registered pension plan are tax deductible. We recognize that employers may want to make income arrangements for retired employees that exceed the registered pension plan limits, but the tax act does provide for retirement compensation arrangements.

The tax treatment of retirement compensation arrangements is different from the treatment of registered pension plans.

I really do not want to go much further into the new tax rules for retirement savings. However, I do want to emphasize that there is a new system which all private pension plans must adhere to. I think that members will agree that it is important that federal Public Service pension plans be structured in compliance with the current Income Tax Act requirements.

Yet another pressure for reform of federal public sector plans is recognition of the requirements of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985.

The statute which was enacted applies to all pensions provided by an employer engaged in a federal undertaking. However, it specifically does not apply in respect of pension plans related to employment in right of Canada.

While the Income Tax Act, because it has to do with a fair allocation of the tax burden, is concerned with the maximum benefits a pension plan can provide, the focus of the Pension Benefits Standards Act has more to do with the protection of persons who are members of pension plans. The carrying out of this protection is done by regulating a wide range of matters, including funding and investment, the trust nature of pension funds, plan members' rights to information, joint employee-employer committees, protection of plan members in cases of sales, acquisitions and mergers, and a prohibition against retroactive reduction in accrued benefits.

The Pension Benefits Standards Act of 1985 also sets out minimum requirements in terms of what a pension plan is to provide. These minimum requirements extend to matters such as maximum waiting periods for membership, coverage of part-time employees, two-year vesting and lock-in, that is the right to a pension benefit, maximum rate of interest on refunds of contributions, guaranteed portability options, access to a pension upon early retirement, and minimum pre-retirement and post-retirement survivor benefits.

As hon. members know, the public sector pension plans are good, solid and fair plans. However, while the plans do exceed certain of the minimum requirements of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, there are some of the requirements which are not met.

Pension reform should address any non-compliance with these requirements which are imposed on private pension plans in the federal sector. The foregoing relates more or less to the external pressures for pension reform. I think hon. members are also well aware of the many internal pressures for action, including, of course, an early retirement program for correctional service employees.

The point I wanted to make by this survey of the pressures for reform is that it does not seem prudent or efficient to move on a single issue in advance of a major reform package. In terms of the thrust of the motion itself, both the Income Tax Act and the regulations and the Pension Benefits Standards Act have something to say about early retirement. It is obvious that any change should be assessed in the context of parliamentary directions to private pension plans.

There is a broader issue too, namely, the possibility of constraining any future redesign of the pension plan which would take into account all of the reform pressures.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I think it is premature to consider this motion on the eve of the presentation of a total pension reform package, and the items I mentioned should be considered in this entire package.

Again, it is noteworthy that the member has brought this particular matter forward. We have had examples cited to us. There is obviously something that should be done with regard to Public Service pension plans in these matters, but it should be done in the context of a total reform package. I am sure the hon. member will be pushing the President of the Treasury Board to put that reform package in front of Parliament just as soon as possible.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): In following up on the comments of my colleague who just finished speaking, I am certain the hon. member from Carleton—Gloucester will be pushing Treasury Board for changes. I am sure there are many of us who will be also standing with him to encourage some of those changes. I would like to commend him for his interest, his compassion and his feeling for the employees of the federal government. I think it is commendable and it is something that we all are interested in.

I had the opportunity this summer to meet with members of the superannuates association in Red Deer. They outlined to me the history of negotiations they have had with Treasury Board, some of the concerns that they have been expressing to different governments over many, many years. They have a lot of concerns they are hoping will be addressed at the same time.

I would like today to comment on the motion before us in the context of the already generous early retirement provisions in the Public Service Superannuation Act. While the government and each one of us here recognizes that there is always room for change and improvement in any scheme, the existing early retirement arrangements under the act already go a long way toward meeting the needs of Public Service employees.

The Treasury Board as the employer is apparently satisfied that when older workers must leave the Public Service work force before reaching retirement age, they have adequate and fair pensions and some flexibility in their pension options. Mr. Speaker, you know as I do that Treasury Board has the responsibility to evaluate employee benefit programs, to ensure that the employees are fairly recompensed and that their benefit plans are adequate.

We as members also have a responsibility to government employees and we have to balance that responsibility with another one that we have to the Canadian taxpayer. We have also got a responsibility to those superannuates who are already on pension and no longer working for the government.

As has been mentioned, the present plan is under scrutiny. It is also under scrutiny by the private sector. Many of them are looking at it jealously. In comparison to many of them, it is a generous program.

For the benefits of the members of this House who are not aware of some of the current conditions, I would like to briefly go through the retirement benefits that are in place now and available to public servants under the existing pension plan.

To begin with, public servants' normal pensionable age is 60. Thus, any public servant who has at least five years of pensionable service and has reached age 60 is entitled to an immediate pension. This pension will be calculated on the basis of 2 per cent of the plan member's average salary over his or her highest six consecutive years of service.

For those members in the House who are listening and notice, I should perhaps expand on that. The individual who has worked for only five years, I am told, will have his pension based on the average of the total service, not on six years, because of course they did not have enough service for that.

The typical employee though does not start work for the federal government at age 55. Many, many start much younger. The Public Service Superannuation Act contains special early retirement provisions for employees who have reached at least age 55 and have 30 or more years of pensionable service. These people may retire on an unreduced pension. It is a pension based on the same formula as I just described for normal retirement; that is, 2 per cent per year of the average salary times years of service.

There has been much talk about retirement age in the last few years. I should comment that for pension plans age 65 is still the most widely accepted normal retirement age under employee sponsored pension plans in Canada. According to the 1988 StatsCanada study of pension plans in our country, 90 per cent of all pension plans covering 80 per cent of the total membership in those plans still provide for normal retirement at age 65.

I should like to point out as well that not only does the Public Service Superannuation Act provide for a relatively earlier normal retirement age, but it also provides for relatively earlier special retirement provisions. Special early retirement provisions exist in only a small percentage of Canadian pension plans. Where they do, age 60 is the most frequent age of entitlement and 30 years of service is the most common minimum period.

In terms of early retirement provisions, that is, provisions for reduced pensions in situations where employees leave the workforce before having reached age 60 or age 55 with 30 or more years of service, the Public Service Superannuation Act provides two benefit formulae for calculating pensions. The formula used depends upon the pensionable service credit which an individual has to his or her credit on retirement and the contributor's age.

The normal retirement formula for any plan member who has reached age 50 is to reduce the pension which would be payable at retirement age. For those in the business of employee benefits, this reduction is normally called a deferred annuity. It is 5 per cent per year for each year that the employee's age is less than 60 years. At age 55 an individual's pension would be reduced by 25 per cent, that is the age difference of five years multiplied by 5 per cent to equal 25 per cent.

Using this formula at age 50 the individual's deferred annuity would be reduced by 50 per cent. This formula roughly equates to an actuarial reduction. Such a reduction takes into account the fact that a retirement pension which begins to be paid earlier than at normal retirement is paid over a longer period of time. Accordingly, it should be reduced to take into account that longer period of time over which the payments are spread as compared to the payment period for a pension which is deferred until the plan member reaches retirement age.

Actuarial reduction is quite a mouthful. It simply means, as they have said here, that they anticipate or expect that everybody is going to live to a certain age and should you retire early, they are going to reduce your pension by an amount so that you will collect approximately the same amount of money should you live to be the same age as the average Canadian.

There is a second formula in the Public Service Superannuates Act which gives an advantage to employees with long service. Long service is recognized in employees who have 25 or more years of service and have reached age 50. In those circumstances, a pension would be reduced by the greater of 5 per cent for each year that the employee's age is less than 55, or 5 per cent for each year that the employee's pensionable service credit is less than 30.

For example, an employee aged 52, with 29 years of service would receive a pension equal to his or her deferred annuity reduced by 15 per cent. That is the greater of the reduction done by age, because 55 minus 52 is 3 times 5 per cent, which would equal a 15 per cent reduction.

Of course for the person with 30 years of service minus 29, which would have been a 5 per cent reduction, because it was the greater, it is reduced by 15.

Under this same formula an employee aged 50 or more who leaves the workforce with 25 or more years of pensionable service would have a maximum reduction of 25 per cent. In other words, the employee would receive 75 per cent of his or her deferred annuity. This compares, of course, to the person without the long service award who would in the same situation see his pension reduced by 50 per cent.

There is, as some hon. members might know, one more special retirement provision which completes the retirement package for Public Service employees. I refer to the provision whereby the Treasury Board can waive the early retirement reduction or penalty, as it is sometimes called. The Public Service Superannuation Act sets out those conditions. The employee must have reached age 55, must have at least 10 years employment in the Public Service and must retire on an involuntary basis. Since this provision was introduced in 1971, it has been applied in many individual cases of layoff or where a Public Service employee's position has been declared redundant.

However, in recent years the Treasury Board has gone further and has given pre-approval in principle to the waiver of pension reduction in any case where an employee has been declared surplus under the terms of the Public Service Workforce Adjustment Policy.

This means that eligible older workers who lose their employment through workforce adjustments or downsizing exercises will not actually have their pensions reduced, even thought they have not reached age 60 or met the 55 with 30 years service thresholds.

I might finally add that all early and special retirement pensions are indexed under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act from the year following the year leaving employment. This immediate indexing provides an invaluable measure of security for employees who leave the workforce in advance of reaching retirement age.

As I said earlier, it is an easy matter to devise better pension arrangements. The difficulty lies in paying for them. Among the most costly of pension improvements is lowering the age at which unreduced pensions are paid. Given the already generous pensionable ages under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the fact that the proposal we are debating would fall into the category of the more expensive kind of improvement, it is difficult for me to support today's motion. Even though it would apply to a relatively small segment of the Public Service pension population, it would still be viewed as excessive by members of the private sector workforce, many of whom have either no pension coverage at all or have less comprehensive coverage. I believe that our Public Service pension arrangements must be kept in line with those of other Canadian employers.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, a significant part of the discussion that is going on here this evening is rather dry and boring. It is unfortunate that it is hard to liven up a debate such as this. I do appreciate the efforts of all of those involved in the debate this evening, but once again, it is pretty hard to liven up some of the cold figures that are brought forward.

I know I have limited time and I have quite a prepared presentation to make this evening. It is my hope that if this debate is renewed that those involved with the debate will inform me so that I can come before the House and possibly continue the presentation if I am not able to complete it this evening. It is unfortunate that when the speaker's list was put up there was not a little more consideration with respect to the information of which I am in possession of. There is a little bit more history, and quite possibly by presenting the history preceding the other debate it would be more valuable to those with us this evening.

The Public Service Superannuation Act covers approximately 308,000 Public Service employees and sets out the terms of their pension coverage. At the present time, full unreduced pensions are payable under the act when a plan member reaches age 60 with at least five years of pensionable service to his credit, or at age 55 with 30 years of pensionable service, or at any age if retirement is due to disability, provided that the person has completed at least five years of pensionable service.

The act also provides reduced early retirement pensions, known as annual allowances. This means that any plan member with at lest five years of pensionable service can retire as early as age 50 and immediately start to receive a pension. However, the pension that is payable is reduced by 5 per cent for each year that the plan member is less than the age of 60, which means that the maximum reduction is 50 per cent.

This reduction is made and is indeed necessary under the costing arrangements of the act to reflect the longer period over which that early pension will be payable. The reduction for plan members who retire at age 50 or with 25 or more years of pensionable service is related either to age 55 or to 30 years of pensionable service, rather than age 60. The maximum reduction possible is 25 per cent, rather than 50 per cent.

In cases of layoffs the Treasury Board may waive the reduction provided the plan member is at least age 55 and has a minimum of 10 years pensionable service to his credit. This provision was introduced by way of an amendment to the act in 1971 and was rendered more generous by a Treasury Board decision of July 1987 that makes the waiver of reduction more or less automatic where employment is lost due to downsizing.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester would mean that in such cases an annual allowance would be payable up to five years earlier than it is at the moment. As well, although the potential maximum reduction of 25 per cent would remain the same, logic would dictate that the existing waiver of reduction policy should be extended to cover the new arrangement.

The consequent payment of a pension over a longer period of time starting at age 50 rather than at age 55 would result in increased cost with the size of that increase directly related to the number of pensions being paid out under these circumstances. These are costs which would have to be paid for by active plan members and the government, as the employer, and could result in increased contributions. With their contribution already equal to 7.5 per cent of their salary, any increase, however small, might not be well received by plan members.

I would just like to remind the House that a change in design, which this proposal is, would be more effectively achieved by the Public Service pension plan reform process than through an amendment to the act since the government has indicated its intentions to introduce a Public Service pension reform bill this autumn. Until this bill is tabled, any impact it may have on the early retirement features of the current plan cannot be assessed. I will, however, remind hon. members that a previous Public Service pension reform initiative, Bill C-33, which died on the Order Paper when the last federal election was called, would have brought considerable changes to the Public Service pension arrangements.

This is not the appropriate time to describe all the proposed changes, but I would like to indicate that the financial and accounting side of the plan would have been revised to observe more closely the requirements and constraints imposed by the government on other employers and to enhance the financial security of the Public Service arrangements.

The cost for post reform service would have been shared equally between the government, as employer, and plan members with benefits being fully funded as they were earned.

A joint employer plan member Pension Management Board would have been established for the Public Service to permit any plan member involvement in the operation of the pension plan and to reflect the equal cost and risk sharing of the new arrangements.

The Pension Management Board would have significant input on the plan design. It was to have six months from its appointment to report to the President of the Treasury Board on its recommendations for the changes to be made to the Public Service pension plan to bring it into line with the standards and practices required of other employer sponsored pension plans.

These changes would then have formed a basis for phase II of Public Service pension reform. I think then that hon. members can see that the Pension Management Board would have looked at each and every element of the Public Service pension plan. It would have been able—

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present this morning.

The first one, signed by Canadians from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, calls upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services which were cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have been asked by a number of citizens of my community of Thunder Bay to table a petition which expresses concern about the situation in eastern Europe, particularly in the Baltic States. It calls upon Parliament to allocate and activate credits for feed grain to Lithuania and the neighbouring Baltic states.

EAST TIMOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today pursuant to Standing Order 36 in regard to the situation in East Timor.

Indonesia has occupied East Timor since 1975 in contravention of international law. This military occupation has caused death of hundreds of thousands of East Timorese men, women, and children.

Canada has shown its world-wide support in the work of the United Nations and has recently sent armed forces to aid Kuwait in the removal of an aggressor state.

Constituents from my riding and throughout British Columbia ask that the Canadian government work toward the elimination of the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor and the genocide of East Timorese people.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise today in my duty as member of Parliament to present a petition with many hundreds of names. It refers to the action by the Government of Canada to introduce the pay and benefits of members of Parliament in January 1, 1991, and these Canadians are calling upon Parliament to rescind these budgetary measures and set a good example for the rest of Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The debate is therefore on the substance of all three bills.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, today marks an important milestone on a journey which began several years ago. The legislation before us today is a major work of reform, the reform of the legislation governing Canada's financial institutions.

We first want to indicate that we are fully aware of the contributions made by former Ministers of Finance and the finance committee of this House and the other place. We also want to pay tribute to the contributions made by countless individuals and groups, both in the industries affected directly and among the general public.

This particular stage of financial institutions reform includes four bills. The first of these was Bill C-4, which has already been considered in committee and which applied the principles of reform to the federally chartered trust and loan companies. The other three bills are C-19, which applies these principles to the chartered banks; C-28, which applied them to federally chartered insurance companies; and C-34, which applies them to federally regulated financial co-operatives.

In each case, the basic approach taken in the bill is the same. There are differences between the bills, however, because each applies the underlying principles of reform to a different type of institution. Shortly I want to look at the ways in which reform has been applied to each of these three bills which are awaiting second reading. Before I do this, however, I want to review the more general aspects of our reform which apply to all three pieces of legislation.

One of the most important points is that this process of reform will bring all federal legislation governing financial institutions into harmony to a degree we have not previously experienced; a major achievement and one of which this government is proud.

The goals of reform are clear and easy to understand. They are: to enhance protection for depositors and policy holders; to benefit consumers by increasing competition and the spectrum of services offered by financial institutions; to strengthen the ability of our financial institutions to compete at home and abroad; and to lay the groundwork for discussions with the provinces about harmonization, because jurisdiction in the general field of financial institutions is a shared one.

These goals, Madam Speaker, are important and I am pleased that we have been able to embody them in legislative and regulatory reform.

I know that members of the House are familiar with the general outlines of the proposals. We have dealt with them already in Bill C-4 and its predecessor. But I do want to speak specifically about certain issues.

The first of these is the problem of self-dealing. Tougher rules will be implemented; the self-policing role of directors and auditors will be made more effective through mandated roles and responsibilities; the superintendent of financial institutions will have increased powers to require information that will enable problems to be anticipated; and the superintendent is therefore being given new access which has not previously been available.

Second, consumers will find shopping for financial services more convenient and will benefit from a wider choice of financial products since banks, trust and loan companies and insurance companies will be allowed to compete more directly with each other. By opening new avenues for growth of our financial institutions, the new provisions will strengthen the ability of these institutions to meet the new challenge that has evolved in the global marketplace.

Financial institutions will be able to diversify by owning institutions operating in other segments of the industry. For example, banks will be allowed to own trust companies and insurance companies; and insurance companies will be able to own other financial institutions. By virtue of their wide ownership, mutual insurance companies will be able to own chartered banks. Significant changes in the ownership of financial institutions will be subject to approval by the Minister of Finance, who will take account of whether transfers are in the best interests of the Canadian financial system.

Together, these proposals set out a framework for fair competition that will allow all institutions to have good opportunities for participation in financial sector activities. These bills and their regulations cover a very wide range of changes because of the size and the importance of the financial sector and the wide range of institutions and situations which have to be covered. After all, looking at the sectors as a whole, there are more than 3,000 Canadian financial institutions with assets of some $900 billion. Of the 25 largest institutions with total assets of $760 billion, 23 are chartered and regulated federally.

But it is not just the sheer size of the sector which gives it importance.

We must not forget that the health of these institutions is key to the vitality and strength of our economy as well as to our security and the security of savers and investors.

The activities of these institutions affect our mortgages and our purchases of goods and services. The financial sector shelters and invests savings and makes available investment needed for new and expanded industries.

I believe these institutions will operate more effectively and competitively and will meet the needs of Canadians more efficiently as a result of reforms we have put forward. We have recognized the importance of financial institutions in developing a legislative and a regulatory approach that protects the public while encouraging and not inhibiting innovation and competition. We have done this while also recognizing the competing interests within the financial community itself, and while we have sought as wide an agreement as possible not all interests could be completely reconciled. In such cases, we have looked to find a reasonable balance.

I want to go over the particular provisions of Bill C-19, Bill C-28 and Bill C-34 which are unique to each bill.

Bill C-19, which applies to the chartered banks, is very similar to its predecessor, Bill C-95 from the previous session. There have been some relatively small modifications. I want to indicate what the specific changes are.

First, because it is based on Bill C-4, this bill recognizes and incorporates amendments made in committee to Bill C-83, the bill of the previous session relating to trust and loan companies.

Second, a number of changes affecting only banks have been made as a result of comments received since Bill C-95 was tabled.

Third, this bill contains new wording for the section which restricts the retailing of insurance by banks. This section was section 4.17 in the previous bill and is now section 4.16. The proposed new wording sets out clearly the intent of the government's policy. This has been done to meet concerns that the corresponding section of Bill C-4 relating to trust and loan companies on which the previous wording was modelled, does not constitute a clear and certain statement of the intentions to restrict deposit taking institutions from engaging in retailing insurance.

I should add that revised draft regulations issued with Bill C-19 reflect these changes as well as comments and submissions on previously issued draft regulations relating to retailing of insurance.

This means that the banks and the trust and loan companies will be restricted from retailing most insurance products in their branches. This ensures that insurance will continue to be sold by qualified licensed insurance brokers and agents working independently from any deposit taking institution.

Our general approach to the question of ownership of financial institutions has been applied to the special needs of the chartered banks. We have maintained the principle of wide ownership for schedule 1 banks, including the six largest Canadian banks. This ensures that no one person or group of associated persons can own more than 10 per cent of any class of bank shares.

The second bill, Bill C-28, affects insurance companies. In addition to the ownership provisions to which I have already referred, certain elements of the reform are tailored to meet the needs of these institutions. There will be enhanced powers given to insurance companies to make consumer and commercial loans.

In addition, this legislation recognizes the important place of mutual companies within the system. These companies are granted new powers to raise capital through the issuance of debt and preferred shares.

Finally, the legislation recognizes the position of participating policy holders and establishes new rules for communicating with them and seeking their approval for fundamental changes.

Bill C-34 applies the general principles to a third part of the sector, federally regulated financial co-operatives. To an even greater extent than the other parts of the sector, these institutions operate under shared jurisdiction with the provinces.

Currently, one federal association is governed by the act while six registered centrals are governed by both the federal act and legislation of their provinces. Local credit unions continue to be incorporated provincially and are governed solely by provincial legislation.

This legislation grants associations of power to provide a range of services comparable to those that may be provided by trust and loan companies under Bill C-4. A key difference is that associations continue to be restricted to providing their services primarily to their members.

The new legislation permits associations to provide services in the fulfilment of the trade association function which they service with respect to other co-operative institutions.

In adapting the investment rule set out in Bill C-4 to the particular situation of federally regulated financial co-operatives, this legislation takes into account the important liquidity function served by the associations.

Finally, this bill will increase the access of federal associations to capital by permitting them to issue preferred shares to non-members. These shares will be restricted from carrying full voting rights to ensure that control of associations remains within the co-operative system.

Returning to the general outline of our policy, I want to reiterate that our proposals represent a balancing of individual, national, international, federal, provincial, commercial and prudential concerns.

The proposals in this package serve the public interest very well. They will strengthen the financial institution sector and will permit our financial institutions to grow and prosper and contribute to the economic vitality of Canada.

I ask all hon. members to work together with the government to expedite consideration of these bills in this package.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in second reading this morning on Bill C-19, the new Bank Act, and Bill C-28, the new insurance act. My colleague from Moncton will be discussing the co-operative act on behalf of my party.

I want to make it very clear at the beginning that the Liberal Party of Canada supports in principle this new legislation. The banking and the insurance industries have been waiting a long while for this new legislation. While our party has some concerns about both bills, we will seek to have those concerns addressed when the bills get to committee.

The current insurance legislation is already decades old and the Bank Act is more than a decade. Both are badly in need of modernization, although the insurance act is more outdated and this government has been dragging its feet for six years on financial sector reform ever since it was elected.

The government's reform process started in 1985 with the green paper. A year later it was followed by a blue paper, and last September the government released the white paper on financial reform. All in all, six years have passed since the first green paper was released. The legislation we are debating this morning is certainly long overdue.

When the government proposed in this new legislation, in the new Bank Act, that this legislation we are dealing with today would be reviewed five years after it comes into force, my party suggested that the review would be better three years after it comes into force.

We argued that by 1997 it will be 12 years after the publication of the green paper which started the whole process and seven years after the first financial reform bill was introduced into the House of Commons.

Twelve years is a long time in a fast moving industry such as financial services. The government members on the committee obviously felt differently about our proposal as they defeated our amendment.

For too long this government has been holding back federally regulated Canadian financial institutions with outdated legislation. Our financial institutions must be given the new powers they need to compete in the new global business environment. We must also ensure that our consumers are well served and that the strength of the Canadian financial sector is not only protected but enhanced. This is why our party is supporting this legislation in principle.

In addition to helping our financial institutions compete, another major objective of reform is to protect depositors. Here again the government's slowness in this whole area may have been damaging.

The government's new reform package gives the Superintendent of Financial Institutions more powers than ever before, powers such as the setting of accounting standards, the inspection of the books of the parent of a financial institution.

If this legislation had been passed it might have made a difference with Standard Trust. I questioned the Superintendent of Financial Institutions about this at the finance meeting on November 28. At that time I asked the superintendent if he felt that he had been hindered by inadequate legislation in dealing with Standard Trust. I want to read his reply directly from Hansard:

> It is very difficult for me to go beyond that with respect to this particular company because, as I said, pretty well everything else we have done here, as with all of the companies, is confidential.
> To stand back from this, however, there are a number of things contained in this bill that might, and I say "might", have made a difference to this or other situations in which there are or might be developing difficulties.
> The first is the provision I referred to that gives us a lot more leverage on accounting policies. That might have made a difference.
> The second is the provision that gives us access to information to parent companies and related companies. It is possible that might have made a difference.
> The third is the establishment of business conduct review committees of directors to review any related party transactions, and finally of course there is the whole regime of prohibitions and bans of related party transactions. All of these might have made a difference. I do not know.

No one knows for sure but the 150,000 Standard Trust depositors whose accounts were frozen on April 18 probably wish that the government had kept its promise and put those new accounting rules in place a few years ago.

Another example concerns the new insurance legislation. Under Bill C-28 the insurance companies, until that becomes law, will continue to have to make complex legal arrangements to accomplish things which the old act allows but makes very difficult.

Those extra legal bills are being charged to and paid for by the consumer or policy holders in the way of higher premiums.

With this new legislation that we have before us this morning insurance companies will be allowed to act more freely, and this should mean lower legal bills.

Just to give a simple example as to how outdated this legislation is, under the current act the board of directors of an insurance company must approve all employees' salaries who earn more than $40,000. Obviously that rule was established decades ago when in those days we probably had only two or three top executives earning over $40,000. Now that is a very simple example of how outdated this government has allowed Canada's insurance legislation to become.

I think those examples illustrate very well why the government must move as quickly as possible to improve financial sector legislation.

This morning I want to discuss both Bill C-19 and Bill C-28 in some detail. As I mentioned earlier, my colleague from Moncton will deal with the Co-operative Act on behalf of my party. Together these two acts, the Bank Act and the insurance act, comprise about 1,400 sections, well over 800 pages. Each bill is over an inch thick. This morning I want to try and highlight a few of the most important sections of each bill and some of the issues that they raise.

I will begin by discussing the sections that the two bills have in common and there are many.

The first major item is natural person powers. In other words, both insurance companies and banks will be able to do anything that is not clearly prohibited by legislation. Under the current legislation insurance companies can only do what is clearly permitted by their legislation. So that in itself is a big change.

Some of the other common elements in the banking and insurance company legislation are measures to protect the soundness of this legislation. Of course the main reason for having factors like this in these two bills is to protect the savings of the Canadian consumers. We do not want what has happened in the United States to happen here. We want to be sure, positively certain, that our depositors are protected.

In this legislation both types of institutions, banks and insurance companies, will be required to ensure that one-third of their board of directors is unaffiliated with the company. For example, if an insurance company has 21 directors sitting on a board, at least seven cannot be among other things an employee of the company, an officer of the company, someone who has a substantial investment in the company, or someone whose company does more than 10 per cent of his or her business with the insurance company.

By doing this the government of course is trying to ensure some degree of independence on the board, and we agree with that.

An insurance company or a bank will also need to have in place proper procedures for dealing with conflict of interest.

• (1040)

They will have to establish two committees: an audit committee and a conduct review committee. Of course these committees again will help to protect depositors and consumers.

The audit committee is there to review any problems raised by the auditor's report and the conduct review committee will review possible self-dealing situations.

Self-dealing might exist, for example, where a director of a company has influence over the company in such a way that it would benefit him personally.

One item that we in the Liberal Party were pleased to see in both bills was a consumer complaint section. This section is actually based on a Liberal amendment to the Trust and Loan Companies Act which the finance committee passed in March.

As I said, this was an amendment that we proposed in the finance committee to the trust and loan legislation. We are extremely pleased that the government has now included this in the Bank Act and the Insurance Act. What that does is ensure the legal right of customers to complain about a problem they have with the bank, insurance company or other financial institutions. They can complain about service charges or other concerns that they have.

First of all, they take their complaint to the institution itself. If it is not resolved there then they can go directly to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. They have the legal right to do so. For example, the bank forecloses on a loan to a farmer. The farmer thinks the bank's action was unjust. He now has the legal right to see the bank's consumer complaints officer. If together the officer and the farmer cannot resolve the problem, the farmer could take his complaint right to the top, to the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

The superintendent now has to include in his annual report a section on these complaints. The number and types of complaints received by the superintendent's office will be detailed in this section, as well as a general description of how those complaints were resolved.

Certainly we on this side of the House hope that by legally requiring banks and other financial institutions to have complaint procedures in place we can ensure that customers who do have complaints will be better served.

There are some other elements of the insurance legislation that are also found in the banking bill, such as the new ownership rules. Insurance companies will now be able to own financial institutions such as schedule banks and trust companies. Of course, banks will be able to own insurance companies and trust companies. Both will also be able to own corporations that are in the financial services family such as the financial leasing companies and information processing companies.

The legislation limits the flexibility of insurance companies and banks to invest in these other corporations I have just mentioned. If these financial institutions do not wish to own at least 51 per cent, then they will not be allowed to own more than 10 per cent. For example, they cannot invest in 30 per cent of the company. It has to be 10 per cent or 51 per cent.

It seems that the government's goal here is to reduce the risk of a bank getting into a new kind of business that it is not familiar with and not able to control. The banks and the insurance companies argue that these new rules will prevent them from getting into joint ventures and getting into a business with a major partner or a partner who has the expertise to help them in running the company. Again, this is something that we certainly want to look at in committee.

There are many common elements to the two bills, but there are obviously some major elements in the new acts which are unique to the insurance and the banking industry. I want to start with the insurance bill.

Insurance companies will soon have full commercial and consumer lending powers. In other words, they will be able to make loans to the general public, not only to their policy holders.

Those insurance policy holders will also get new rights under the new act. They will be treated more like shareholders of a corporation. They will receive regular notification of their rights as policy holders and those who express an interest will receive notice of company board meetings.

Policy holders will also have the right, where the numbers are sufficient, to make proposals to the board of directors.

In a very important change in this legislation, mutual insurance companies—and I am talking here about companies that are owned by their policyholders—will get the right to issue preferred shares and thereby raise much needed capital.

The government has also released a proposal that would allow mutual companies to demutualize or accept shareholders as well as policyholders. This alternative method of raising capital raises many issues, such as how would the policyholders rank as compared to the shareholders? There are several questions around this whole issue that certainly will have to be addressed in committee.

Briefly those are some of the major elements of the new Insurance Act. While we understand that the insurance industry is generally quite pleased with this new legislation, we have yet to hear from various interest groups.

There is one group that we have heard from, the Canadian Bankers' Association. It has some concerns about Bill C–28, respecting the insurance act. It feels that it does not effectively restrict insurance companies from accepting deposits or offering cheque writing services. As we know, banks are prohibited under this legislation from selling insurance and they want insurance companies to keep out of the banking business.

The Canadian Bankers' Association also wants insurance companies to face the same requirements as banks and trust companies in terms of disclosure of service charges, networking arrangements and turning over unclaimed accounts to the government.

They have some other concerns as well, all of which we will be addressing in committee.

I would like to turn now to the main sections of the new Bank Act. One of the main provisions in the new Bank Act would continue to prohibit banks from moving any further into the insurance market.

We in the Liberal Party have heard arguments for and against, and I want to take a few minutes this morning to talk about some of these arguments from both sides of the issue.

• (1050)

We have been told that if banks could sell insurance, it would be cheaper and it would be more convenient for consumers.

We were told that there would be no risk of tied selling. What I mean by tied selling is that a bank would try to pressure a customer into buying insurance from the bank by threatening them that they would deny a mortgage.

We were told that around the world, and even here in Canada, deposit–taking institutions sell insurance with no consumer problems and they sell at very competitive prices.

We have also heard many reasons on the other side of this issue; why banks should not receive broad insurance powers. First of all, we were told that there is no evidence that banks could sell life insurance, the main product they want to sell, any more cheaply than insurance companies over the long term. It is argued that, yes, in the short term banks may undercut the prices of insurance companies in order to gain the market share and consumers would benefit in the short term. But in the long term, the argument goes, it is still far from certain that banks would offer life insurance at super competitive prices.

For example, in 1989, there was a study done by the Public Interest Research Centre that claimed consumers could save a lot of money if banks could sell insurance. However, that study has been discredited by a 1991 study done by Eckler and Partners.

We have also heard the argument to give the banks broad insurance powers would be unfair because of the size of the banks. With assets of $126 billion, one bank, the Royal Bank, is larger than the entire insurance industry put together. There are six major banks involved. Together, the six big banks account for 90 per cent of the $584 billion in Canadian banking assets.

So it is argued that there is a very real possibility of unequal competition.

It has been suggested also that it is possible that there could be a very short but intense battle between the huge chartered banks and the much smaller life insurance companies which could lead to massive dislocations in the insurance industry.

The insurance industry in Canada comprises 170 companies and 20,000 agents, so a lot of Canadians could lose their jobs and a very successful insurance industry that serves rural and urban Canadians could be permanently damaged by such a battle between unequals.

There is also some evidence to suggest that tied selling, which I described earlier, could be a problem. There was a survey done by the Canadian Life Health Insurance Association. They did a study on the insurance regulators. This study was done in 1990. They wrote to and received letters from 22 United States' insurance regulators. The response confirmed that many states do not permit banks to enter the insurance business and those that do have significant concerns about the coercion and misuse of customer information.

That does not necessarily mean that we might have the same problem here in Canada, but it is certainly a factor which we have to consider when looking at this issue. One of the areas which is certainly related to insurance is the question of banks selling life annuities. Life annuities are a retirement product now only sold by insurance companies. The banks want a share of the market. They argue that as the Canadian population ages, more and more of their customers will require life annuities and they should be able to buy them from their banks.

The banks argue that Canadians will benefit if they enter the life annuity market. They feel that life annuities are crucial to any retirement plan. With their superior distribution system, the banks say it will be easier for Canadians to prepare for retirement. On the other hand, the insurance companies argue that life annuities should be part of the over-all ban on banks selling insurance.

This is another area that we certainly want to explore further in committee. As you can see, we have had some very conflicting views to date on whether banks should be able to sell insurance. Certainly, we are considering our position in the Liberal Party very carefully because there is a lot at stake.

The next section that I want to deal with involves consumers. That is whether banks and trust companies should be able to enter the auto leasing business. Again, we have heard arguments on both sides of the issue. We have heard that consumers would get lower prices, that it would be more convenient if people could lease a car through a bank rather than an auto dealer.

There are concerns again on the other side of this issue, that it might be unfair competition. A bank with a loan to a car dealer would have detailed information on that car dealer. Armed with that information on their main competitor, a bank could undercut the car dealer long enough to drive him out of business. Here again, we have to consider very carefully our position on this issue.

Leaving consumer issues and turning to international matters for a moment, the new Bank Act changes the rules for foreign banks setting up in Canada. The legislation now says in effect to qualify for a foreign Schedule 2 bank licence, an applicant must prove to the government it is a bank in its home country.

Given that definition, certainly we in the Liberal Party and others were quite surprised, extremely surprised when American Express was granted a foreign bank licence. AMEX is clearly not a bank in the United States as the spirit of the law and the government's own guidelines required. The government, however, said AMEX met its legal definition of a bank.

It is also curious that AMEX, a major supporter of the free trade agreement, received its licence on November 21, 1988. All members of this House remember what day that was. Of course, it was election day. That is when AMEX received its licence.

This certainly raises serious questions about whether the government was playing politics with the Canadian financial sector.

Whatever the case, Bill C-19 could set the stage for more AMEXs because the new Bank Act says the government can grant a foreign Schedule 2 bank licence if the applicant is either a bank or it is a widely held financial institution, or is in some way engaged in the financial services business. This section runs counter to the government's September 1990 white paper where it is stated that a foreign applicant had to be either a bank or a regulated financial institution in its home jurisdiction.

• (1100)

The new Bank Act says nothing about being regulated, and this has Canadian banks very worried. They are worried that the new act could open the door to a whole range of unregulated non-bank foreign institutions, including the financial arm of huge American commercial companies like Ford, Chrysler, Sears, IBM and General Electric.

These foreign non-banks do many of the things that our Canadian banks do. They raise money not through deposits, but by taking short-term loans known as commercial paper. This sounds like banking, even though these institutions are unregulated and commercially linked.

They would obviously be regulated if they entered Canada as banks. Allowing such commercially linked companies into Canada raises concerns about fairness to Canadian banks and about the soundness of the Canadian financial institutions. One can therefore legitimately ask whether the government is putting our banks at a disadvantage with this new legislation.

We are also concerned about the degree of discretion that the new Bank Act gives the finance minister in handing out these foreign bank licences. The minister can decide what is a financial institution and what is meant by "widely held".

What this does, of course, is leave the government open to intense lobbying by foreign institutions which maybe should not qualify for a Canadian banking licence and whose presence here in Canada could undermine confidence in the Canadian banking system. As we saw in the case of AMEX, when international politics and banking mix, Canadian financial institutions are often the losers.

All these questions are extremely important and they must be dealt with in committee. The government's changes to the foreign bank role raises the whole issue of international trade and financial services.

As Canadians know, this country is involved in two sets of international trade negotiations: first, with the United States and Mexico, and second, with other GATT countries. GATT of course, stands for General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

While this government has not yet revealed its strategy for these negotiations, it seems very clear that the foreign countries will demand similar treatment to that given Americans under the free trade agreement. We in the Liberal Party want to state once again that the government must not use these trade negotiations to weaken the competitive position of Canadian financial institutions.

I would like to conclude my remarks by briefly summarizing the stand of my party. The Liberal Party supports in principle the government's new Bank Act and insurance act, although we have some major concerns, many of which I have mentioned briefly today. Certainly we look forward to reviewing and addressing these concerns in the finance committee.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. There have been some discussions and I think you would find unanimous agreement to allow my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt, to speak for 40 minutes on these three bills.

As you would appreciate, if they had been done separately he would have about 60 minutes. He is being very conservative today in the time he wants. You will notice that I did not ask for unlimited time because, as we found out in the past, he can go on at great length.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I agree with everything the hon. member said, particularly his last comment. We are happy to accede to the request.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that there is also agreement on my right. Therefore I will recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt and he will be allowed his 40 minutes.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I will try to stay within the 40 minutes I have been allotted.

These three bills are very complex. I thought long and hard as to how I could take such very complicated and convoluted legislation and put it in a way that people who are listening and watching could understand the complexities, the twisting and the turnings of the operations of the financial institutions of this country.

I thought I should put it in a way that people understood. I said: "Who best could describe things in a way that people could understand but Aesop?" Therefore I have put my opening remarks in the terms of Aesop's Fables.

Is everybody ready? Are we all gathered around? Once upon a time, shortly after 1929, certain animals were put in cages and there were four cages. In cage number one were the rabbits. These rabbits, I would say, are the equivalent of investment brokers. We have rabbits as investment brokers.

In the next cage was put lions, big, king of the beasts, and they are the banks. They were put in their cages and the lock was put on.

In the third cage was put the mongoose. I do not know what the plural of mongoose is. I think it is mongeese or maybe it is mongooses. They were put in the third cage, and they were the insurance companies, and a lock was put on the cage.

In the fourth cage was put the cobra, and the cobra were the trust companies, and the gatekeeper put the lock on the cage. We had the four cages: the rabbits, the lions, the mongoose and cobra. Everybody knows, there they are after 1929. Before 1929 they did terrible things to each other so they were put in the cages.

In 1987 somebody whose begins with t and ends with y, a four letter word, stealthily in the night went and opened the rabbits' cage and the lions' cage. Well, everybody knows that lions eat rabbits. That is what happened. The lions ate up the rabbits; the banks ate up the investment brokers.

That reminds me of a limerick:

A smiling young investment broker from Vancouver

Went for a ride on a banker.

They came back from the ride with the broker inside

And a smile on the face of the banker.

That is what happened. Maybe it was not supposed to happen, but everybody knows that if we put lions and rabbits together, the lions will eat the rabbits. That is what happened.

Here we are today, in 1991, and somebody beginning with a t and ending with a y, a four letter word, in Bill C-19 and Bill C-28 are stealthily going to open the cages separating the cobra, the mongoose and the lion.

We know what will happen. We know what mongoose do to the cobra; it kills them. Then what do the lions do to the mongoose? They are going to eat them. As sure as shooting, we are going to end up, when the dust settles, with a brand new animal.

It will have a lion's head. It will have the body of the cobra, the feet of the rabbit and the teeth of the mongoose. Do you know who it feeds on? Consumers. And who is there to keep this animal with all these attributes, this new creation, this new hybrid, to separate this monster from his feed.

Well, we call in somebody called OSFI. You see him there with his lion tamer's hat and his little whip, and that is all that is between this hybrid monster and consumers.

What I have tried to portray in this little fable is in fact the reality of Bill C-19, Bill C-28, Bill C-4 financial institutions which we previously called Bill C-83. What we are doing with these bills today is that we are opening up the cages. We in this party have always said when you do that, when you collapse the pillars, when you open the cages, what will result is a concentration of economic power.

One morning we will wake up and there are not going to be any Hulk Hogan's wrestling out there. There will just be one huge sumo wrestler, which we have cultivated to go and wrestle globally. That is a danger.

I do not have to remind members of the realities in California where previous deregulation under Ronald Reagan there were many banks and financial institutions in California. If we go there today, it is predominated by two particular banks: the Bank of America and Securities Pacific. There is also a smaller one, First Interstate Bank of California. All of that is going to shake down and, sure as shooting, eventually there is only going to be one bank in California.

We have serious concerns. When you open the cages, you cannot control the animals, and the biggest and the most aggressive one will survive. We have said consistently that we have to keep the pillars in place. There is no problem, as far as we can see, with banks entering into joint venture arrangements to market insurance products. But the minute you allow this feeding frenzy, sure as shooting one morning we are going to wake up and there is only going to be one financial institution, one giant, super financial institution at which all Canadians are going to do their banking and their financial services.

That is not going to be healthy for the marketplace. I am absolutely amazed that a Conservative government that worships so grovelingly at the altar of the marketplace would in fact destroy the marketplace. In fact, the reason they were put in the cages after 1929 was because of their rampant behaviour in 1929. Now we are opening it up. We want a market that can be regulated, because we want it to make sure that it behaves in a socially responsible manner.

The Tories are destroying the market through this monopoly. Historically it shows that to control a monopoly you need another monopoly. Therefore the Tories, quod erat demonstrandum, are for big government. We are going to have to have a monstrosity to control a monopoly.

Look at the bills and the regulations. Everywhere in these bills and regulations you will see: "The minister shall" or "OSFI shall" or "the government shall". It seems to me we ought to be striving for built-in structures that by their very nature regulate the industry.

It seems to me that if you work toward getting those kinds of built-in rules, regulations and structures, then you have a check and a balance: for example, the pillar structure, for example the 10 per cent ownership rule.

There is another concern that this deregulation will allow financial institutions to become so huge, so economically powerful that they will challenge the state. They become in fact major private governments. There are three powers which they are headed to control: the power to create money, the power to control productivity, that is real wealth, and the power to control technology. What we are developing here as I said before is a huge sumo wrestler.

If we listen to the banks, that is all they talk about. They want to go global. What we are going to have is a huge ubiquitous sumo wrestler. He will be everywhere because you will not be able to keep him inside your borders. He will transcend, cross borders. You think we have got a problem with cross-border shopping. Wait until we get cross-border financing because we do not have an international regulator that is going to keep an eye on them. I can just see BCCIs all over the place.

We are really dealing here with the destruction of the national market for the sake of global competition. Banks will be allowed to own insurance companies. The banks cannot retail insurance. I mean, how stupid. We have 7,000 branches. I can just see myself wanting insurance for my car. I do not see absolutely anything wrong with the bank marketing the insurance policies of insurance companies.

If I want insurance for my car, I go down to my bank branch and say to the clerk: "I want insurance. Here is my car, here is the year", and so on. There is no reason he or she could not crank it up on the computer, show me a whole rack of companies and pick the policy and the company that suit my needs. I could also suggest that it would be done at a better rate.

In fact playing this little verbal les jeux de mains, if I may, in trying to say that the banks cannot do it, there is not anything in there that they cannot dipsy-doodle around.

They are going to set up little subsidiaries of insurance companies. They are going to direct market through their credit cards to their customers. They are going to build up a customer base. It is stupid and ridiculous. It does not make any sense. I say you put them back in their cage and put the lock on it. If they are bankers, they do banking; if they are insurance companies, they do insurance business; if they are trust and loan companies, they do trust and loan business. It is a simple matter.

All we have got to do is look south to what has happened. They wanted to deregulate. Well they deregulated the s and l's all right. They gave them all kinds of powers to go and get involved in real estate operations. This bill has got some real stuff on real estates for financial companies. Have they got stuff. We are going down the road. They are going to be developers too. Do remember what I said about the lion eating the whole gang? All right, we will come to it.

It seems to me that these bills are releasing the dynamism of the Canadian banking system, not to serve the consumer and the public but to predict the system. They eat it up. That is what I think these bills are all about. That is really the principle and the philosophy behind them. Already we are over-banked. We have banks banking. Now you are going to have insurance companies taking deposits. They are selling financial instruments. You have trust companies all over the place. For 26 million people we are over-banked.

I want to tell you very quickly that the feeding frenzy is going to start. It is not good when the end result is the development of a hybrid animal, one only, one super financial institution.

An hon. member: The banks need competition.

Mr. Rodriguez: They need competition among themselves and that is what we have to make sure they do. They are in the banking business. That is what they are in. Insurance companies are to sell insurance and are not to do banking. That is the principle.

I heard the former chairman of the finance committee expound that theory time and time again: "You are a banker, do banking. You are an insurance company, do insurance".

An hon. member: Would American Express sell insurance?

Mr. Rodriguez: I will get to American Express, don't worry.

We oppose changes to the financial institution structure that concentrate the economic power because we think in that kind of environment the consumers are the losers, the society is the loser. We say banks should not own insurance companies.

We have another concern and it all ties in. I am going to sort of weave this in like a mosaic. Brother, I cannot turn my back on that guy; he has got his sword. Excuse my back, do not get angry.

The other aspect of the bill that concerns me is the question of ownership. For financial institutions, we think one of the best safeguards and one of the best controls is wide ownership. That is why we put into the Bank Act that no group or individual shall own more than 10 per cent of the equity of a bank. That is what we said, and I think it has worked well. The major banks in this country are not the problem in terms of what they do, in terms of kerfuffling; it is the trust companies. Look at what we have done. We have allowed them to be closely held. The 10 per cent rule does not apply to trust companies, and yet in these bills we are giving them all the powers of banks.

They are laughing. They can do all the things. I do not need to remind you that when you start mixing up commercial operations with financial institution operations you are headed for trouble. We just saw Standard Trust. What is a guy who is an expert in the mining business doing in the banking business? That is what we have. How would you react to a Lavelin bank or, dare I say it, a Campeau bank or an Algoma bank? They could have established under these rules. Is that not wonderful?

This is very dangerous. I am not the only one who feels this way. This party is not the only one that feels this way. I want to quote a fellow by the name of E. Gerald Corrigan. He is the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. He appeared before the United States Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs on Thursday, May 3, 1990. This is what he said:

> Second, I remain strongly opposed to the merging of banking and commerce and to any arrangements that would even remotely contemplate the ownership and control of bank holding companies or financial services holding companies containing depository institutions by commercial concerns. Here too, on an earlier occasion, I spelled out before this Committee the reasons for my concerns in this regard, and I have provided an extract of that in earlier testament as Appendix V–I still look with concern, if not alarm, at the economic, financial—and perhaps even social—implications of Exxon owing Chase Manhattan, Ford owning Citicorp, or RJR Nabisco owning J. P. Morgan. Obviously, those examples draw more than a little hyperbole in order to stress the point. But once that door is opened, there is absolutely no way to anticipate how events will shake out over time. Therefore, and absent that compelling public policy reason I spoke of in my earlier testimony, I would strongly urge that we maintain a strict separation of banking and commerce.

Not only do we have in our banking and financial institution structure non-financial upstream ownership, but we are now heading down the road to downstream non-financial ownership. There are provinces that are actively contemplating that move.

That is a serious concern and it ought to be a serious concern for all members. We gave OSFI improved powers after the banks in the west failed. We gave Mr. Mackenzie additional powers, and yet in spite of that we have had an ineffective supervisory system. Still we have had the case of Standard Trust and we will probably end up with more.

The next concern we have is what I touched on before, and that is the financial institutions playing in the real estate market. Bill C-19 proposes that banks, financial institutions, can be allowed to invest up to 70 per cent of their regulatory capital in real estate holdings, 70 per cent. You are talking here about tens of billions of dollars because you are throwing into it trust companies, insurance companies and banks—tens of billions of dollars.

In the short run they may be bailing out developers in the industry at the moment with this, but think of the potential for conflict of interest. The same people who have developers as their customers will be competing with their customers.

Think of the stranglehold if you applied those tens of billions of dollars to three or four major cities in this country. Think of how you can control the real estate market. Think of the potential of that economic power. I want to bet the bottom dollar that when that happens, you will never see real estate come down in the major cities again, never.

We will have effectively kept the price up. What is this mad dash? It seems to me that the rules at the present time are quite sufficient. What do you think about them pulling in loans prematurely, seizing real estate, and purchasing it themselves?

This again is opening the gates. I do not want to mix my metaphors here or as somebody would say open Pandora's box. Where will it end? We have a problem with that.

Another interesting thing is harmonization. These are the kinds of things we should be working on. Presently every province has its own rules for financial institutions. Superimposed on top of that are the federal rules. You have Ontario which gives the "Ontario equals" approach.

These are widely divergent. For example, look in this bill, Bill C-19. There is a 10-50 provision. If a bank wants to purchase a financial entity, it can purchase only less than 10 or more than 50.

The province of Ontario has a basket provision that says: "When you reach a certain level, you cannot go beyond it". So we have the possibility of while a financial institution is trying to maintain the federal rule it violates the provincial rule.

We have tons of examples of conflicts between provincial and federal regulations and rules with respect to financial institutions. We have an example: Scotia McLeod by the way was one of the rabbits. McLeod, Weir, Young is what it used to be called. It was one of the rabbits in the cages.

That was one of the rabbits that the bank or the lion, the Bank of Nova Scotia, ate back in 1987. They have called it ScotiaMcLeod. It is really a subsidiary of the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Under the present law, its investment broker can actually be right inside the golden tower. He has his counter right there in the golden tower in Toronto. He has his plaid jacket. It is called the McLeod tartan so you can recognize him on the floor of the stock exchange. They have team colours and everything. It is amazing. These animals have their own teams and wear little caps with colours on them.

He is allowed to be in the bank. The bank can refer its customers who want investment services to the ScotiaMcLeod guy. In British Columbia they now say that stock brokers and investment brokers can be trained and hold an insurance licence.

You are going to have this guy with this plaid jacket and hat. He is a broker and also an insurance agent, and he is on the property. You are not supposed to do that under the federal legislation. You cannot advertise your insurance services in the bank, so what are you going to do?

What we have is a spectre in British Columbia of the bank passing on to the investment broker information about the customer who wants investment services, and that broker is also the insurance agent.

This law says that the bank cannot pass on to its insurance subsidiary any personal information about its customers. It can only do direct mailing and advertising via its credit card. Isn't this amazing? We have this guy who is both broker and insurance agent and he is doing all kinds of things, all kinds of synergies around the cages. This is absolutely fantastic. But there it is.

There is another anomaly. If the banks set up an insurance subsidiary, the bank is not allowed under the legislation to pass information about its customers directly to the subsidiary. Yet an insurance company which owns a trust company can pass all sorts of information to its insurance company without any restrictions at all. There is an anomaly in the legislation if what is good for one is not good for the other.

We say there should be harmonization. It seems to us, and we have said this time and time again, that in fact there should be a national task force organized involving the provinces to harmonize the rules that govern financial institutions. In fact, Madam Speaker, I am prepared to go even further. I will stick my neck out and say that if the provincially incorporated financial institutions want access to the federal deposit insurance and to the clearing system, then they ought to conform to federal rules. If they don't, they can set up their own deposit insurance, as Quebec has done, and they can make their own arrangements with respect to clearing. But I expect that would be very difficult for them to do. But you have to have some standard rules by which everybody is playing. You cannot have one playing off against the other.

The next aspect of this bill that bothers us, Madam Speaker, is what is called foreign entities coming into Canada and entering the Canadian financial markets. Of course, we know that on election day 1988 the Minister of Finance of the time announced that American Express would be a bank. That opened up the door. This bill confirms that foreign non-banks can come in any time they want and they can choose how they want to come in. They can come in, of course, as an insurance company or a trust company; they can come in as Sears Financial or Toyota Financial or BCCI. They don't even have to be a bank, they can come in. And it seems to me that if none of these structures fit them—insurance company or whatever—they can always have the option, brother, they can always have the option of going provincial. So you can come in provincially. If what is there federally does not fit you, you can go provincial and do all those things.

I might just say, with respect to the free trade agreement with the United States, that Canada gave away the store on financial institutions and we got no equivalent access to the American market.

Now, that is not just the NDP, Madam Speaker. I want to quote from Linda McQuaig's latest book The Quick and the Dead, page 172, when she says:

> Canada also gave considerable ground in the key area of financial services where barriers to entry had traditionally been strongest. Under the Canada–U.S. agreement, for instance, American banks, security firms and insurance companies would be entitled to virtually the same privileges as their Canadian equivalents in the Canadian market.

And Doug Peters, who is the senior vice-president and chief economist at the Toronto Dominion Bank said this: "There is no particular breakthrough in the free trade agreement to allow Canadian banks any greater access to U.S. markets than they already have".

Nothing has changed.

The other area I want to touch on is the area of joint ventures. I have been very concerned about the fact that there are approximately 900 single industry towns across this country. In most of them the banks and major financial institutions have branches and they do very well. They take the deposits of the people of the community. But when the industry on which the town is based goes down the tubes, brother they are out of town, first on the Greyhound heading for Toronto. So where is the social responsibility?

I looked for some flexibility in this bill because I know that the Bank Act, for example, forbids a bank from any kind of commercial involvement in terms of taking equity. I looked for some flexibility within this bill to see if there is a provision whereby under certain very specific and approved conditions, banks can live up to their social responsibility in those single industry towns. I do not think it is fair that it has to be some government agency that gives a grant or backs a loan and takes the chances and the risks all the time. Them that has been getting ought to give sometimes.

In conclusion, our concerns are very clear.

An hon. member: No Sumo wrestlers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Absolutely no Sumo wrestlers, my friend. Give this man the prize. He was listening. No Sumo wrestling, we want good old fashioned Yukon Erics and Hulk Hogans. We want these institutions to concentrate on serving Canadians, to do the things for which they have received the charter. We want them back in their cages and we want the locks snapped shut on them.

We want to apply the ownership rules to all financial institutions. I recognize that some are very small financial institutions. But one of the witnesses we heard was Canada Trust, which is as large as a bank and would like to become a bank, but in fact cannot.

I believe the 10 per cent rule should be applied to financial institutions. We should strictly enforce non-financial upstream ownership and no downstream financial involvement.

We want a restriction on their entry into the real estate market. That is very dangerous; very dangerous.

Harmonization; it has to come. I saw a reference to it in the constitutional proposal. It has to come. We cannot have this patchwork of rules all across the country and people dipsy-doodling and doing whatever they want to do all over the place. What they cannot do here, they will do there. You cannot have rules in conflict. You cannot increase the cost to financial institutions to comply with all of these rules.

Foreign entries into Canadian financial markets, I say, it is quid pro quo. You do not come in unless you are a bank. If you come in, you obey the Canadian financial institution rules. You have to be a financial institution.

Joint ventures—I appeal to the government to consider putting into the act some provisions with the appropriate safeguards to permit, whatever those safeguards might be. It may be a limited equity for a short period of time in a specific single industry area, but where the banks and financial institutions can live up to some community responsibility, a responsibility to the community in which they have operated.

We intend to go to the committee to try and get these changes. In the last session, on Bill C-83, the last time we dealt with the Trust and Loans Act, which is now Bill C-4, we attempted to make some changes. I sensed there was no support among, particularly, the government members, so I did not put the amendments that I wanted to put. I am saving them for the report stage.

They deal with these questions. I do not see any problem with banks marketing insurance which is developed and owned by insurance companies, because they will get around it anyway and all you are doing is putting a cost up anyway.

An hon. member: It will close small businesses.

Mr. Rodriguez: The fact is it will not close small businesses. That is a good point, so let us deal with it. How will they close small businesses? The insurance companies will own the insurance policies. The bank is marketing their insurance. In any case, the bank is already setting up its subsidiaries to market the insurance. So if the brokers are concerned, they should be concerned with the banks doing what they are doing now.

An hon. member: Come to Quebec, it is not too bad.

Mr. Rodriguez: In other jurisdictions, in Europe, those same insurance companies that do not want the banks to market insurance have subsidiary financial institutions that market insurance, and it has not done anything to the marketplace.

In fact, I will tell you what the banks are doing: they are going right into the insurance companies and raiding their brokers. They are taking their brokers, who are already trained, and putting them into their insurance subsidiaries. So they are already doing it.

Madam Speaker, we are going to try in the committee to put a human heart into the bill and a human face on financial institutions. I hope I have explained it well here today so that everybody understands how these beasts operate. Now, Madam Speaker, let us get them back in the cages, put the lock on them, and that is it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That was a 40-minute speech and not a speech with unlimited time. I have to ask the consent of the House concerning questions and comments. Normally after a 40-minute speech there are no periods allowed for questions or comments. We extended his time. If the House agrees, I will call questions or comments.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened with great attentiveness to the speech of the member for Nickel Belt and there were many points that he raised where I agreed with him completely.

However, there were also many parts of his speech when he talked about the concentration of power with the banking institutions, for instance, he reminded me of Conrad Black. I never thought I would see the day in this House when the member for Nickel Belt would be promoting such a concentration of power in the banking institutions. I really could not quite understand where he was coming from.

What I hear from many small, medium-size and even larger corporations in this country is that there is a concentration of power in the lending institutions and there is a perceived feeling that there is very little competition. In other words, if I am a small or a medium-sized businessman and I go to my corner Royal Bank or Bank of Nova Scotia, and if I am turned down, generally speaking I feel that this is the end of the road for me.

I think that is one of the problems we have in this country right now. The Minister of Finance can stand up here and quote statistics day in, day out, about how interest rates have come down to 9.5 per cent or 9.25 per cent and all the banks post these interest rates with posters and all the rest. Then small business goes in and tries to get a loan and they have no luck because the credit is limited in the country and the reserves of capital have been used up.

My understanding of this bill—and I am coming to my question for the member—is that the insurance companies with large pools of capital will now be able to come into the marketplace and be in a better position to assist those small and medium sized businesses with proper loans.

I would never have thought that the member for Nickel Belt would have seen that as a bad thing, to help small and medium sized business by giving the major banks more competition. I would like to ask him why he sees it like that. We have a regulator and we have a superintendent, so why is he against creating more hope, market or opportunity for the small and medium sized businessman to get at other sources of capital to expand business?

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

I want to suggest that he look at the plethora of options that a small business person has. I mean, there are credit unions and these credit unions are in every community. Their mandate is to serve the community. I am a member of the credit union where I live and we have a board. Small businesses apply and get loans. We have that.

What I am saying in my speech is that in fact what this bill does is open up the cages, and no insurance company is even close to the size of a bank. The danger is that the banks will eat them up. You will wake up one morning and the dream that you have of insurance companies actually having pools of capital that they want to get into will not be the story they are telling us. That is why they want to demutualize. With all these pools of capital, they want to become banks. But from all the evidence we have heard we are over-banked. They are going to start eating each other up, and that is the danger.

If you really want to protect the marketplace, do not open up the cages and let the lions eat the mongoose and the rabbits and the cobras, but have regulations built in that allow them to do the things that you want them to do.

I do not buy the argument that by allowing insurance companies to become banks this great competitive market will be created.

I mentioned to you in my speech what happened in California. When Ronald Reagan deregulated the whole idea was to allow more players to come in. There would be more money around, more credit and all the rest of it. What is the situation today? There are two major banks in California and soon there may be only one.

We have the same experience with the airline industry. Deregulate the airline industry, take the rules out, and you will encourage more people to put money into the airline business. Today we have two airlines. They are both shaky and there is talk that there will only be one. This bill is about deregulation, brother. I am telling you that if you let the animals out of the cage you will not have any competition in the long run. Sure, in the short run you are going to have a lot of little fish out there lending money, but in the long run they will all be gone like the dodo. That is what I am saying.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I would just like to clarify what my colleague has said dealing with the selling of insurance by financial institutions.

I understand that there were questions raised during this speech as to: "My gosh, would this be in the interest of the consumer? Would this be in the interest of even the insurance brokers?"

I have heard this debate before. In fact I have participated in in this debate in Quebec. Perhaps my colleague from Vancouver would be interested in this debate involving Quebec, because the Caisse Populaire Desjardins wanted to get into the business of selling insurance. We held hearings. They were lengthy hearings dealing with whether the Caisse Populaire Desjardins should sell insurance. Essentially the brokers came by and said: "If you do, we are going to lose our jobs. If you do we will not have a better price for the insurance that is being sold. Finally if you do, you are going to end up controlling the market".

I argued against these points because I said it was nonsense. It has been a very good experience for the past five years. The Caisse Populaire Desjardins has not abused its position. There has not been a single complaint of tied selling. We have been watching it very carefully.

Also, if we say that the bottom line has to be competition, and I agree it has to be, then as the hon. Liberal colleague had said it should bring down prices and make for better service, and it does. Not a single job that I can see has been lost from this increase in competition.

I just want to mention something concerning partisan debate. If we cannot accept that members of the NDP or members of the other parties can say things which other members might feel does not quite fit in ideologically as they see us, if we cannot get beyond that, how far can we go in this debate? In this House reasoned debate should prevail, and I mean reasoned debate, not just partisan debate. That is part of it. As someone coming from Quebec, I know the Quebec situation and have lived through this question of whether banks be allowed to sell insurance. Having had this debate, I would ask you to do your homework or at least come to Quebec.

We know what the benefits are for consumers. If the bottom line for Liberals and Conservatives is protection of consumers, then get out of your partisanship and take a look at what happens elsewhere. Come to Quebec and you will see that the reasons that you invoked do not work. No one will lose their job. Prices will be more competitive and consumers will be better served in the long run.

Competition is where it is at. You should be in favour of competition and not just simply the NDP.

Mr. Rodriguez: Very briefly, Madam Speaker, I just wanted to add that when my colleague, the hon. member Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, was the premier of British Columbia, they brought in the public auto insurance. Who do you think was given the task of selling it? The credit unions and the agents. The brokers did not lose their jobs. People in rural communities and cities could get their insurance through their credit union or their broker. No one lost their jobs.

I just want to touch, for my good friend in the Liberal Party for whom I have a great deal of respect, on this question of competition. I want to say from the heart that this business of competition is not some altar where we have to go and genuflect and worship. Often when you open up things without proper regulations and controls, it is the strongest who will survive. There is no respect for those who are not able for one reason or another to compete. You need strong referees. You need strong rules. I think that is what we want, fairness in the system.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on the legislation before the House dealing with financial institutions. It was also very enjoyable to listen to the hon. member for Nickel Belt give his rendition of financial institutions and his feebled fable about caging all of the different institutions. My worry is that if we carry the NDP approach to its logical conclusion, we would have all of our institutions caged. We have all been to zoos and seen exactly what happens with a bunch of caged animals. They have no life, no vitality, no will to really do anything. What we have to do is try to strike the right balance in our system so that we do have that measure of competitiveness and aggressiveness and those types of things tied in with the proper regulations so that the consumer is protected.

My colleague from Malpeque has given a very extensive discussion on the pieces of legislation before the House. I want to talk in some measure about the Co-Operative Credit Association Act and what is going to happen there. As well, I just want to talk about our financial institutions generally and where they are going with the legislative program before the House.

As background, all agreed that we would come forward with legislation in all four pillars of financial institutions and deal with them all at the same time. We now have all those pieces of legislation before the House.

Quite frankly, it is hoped that we have the will to deal with all of this legislation quickly. I would not want to recount the history of how long it has taken us to get to where we are today, but I believe that most of the financial institutions have been worn down to such an extent that they are fully supportive of the legislation only to move forward and get something done as far as financial institutions are concerned.

In fairness, I think there is a good compromise in much of the legislation that was brought forward. We on this side of the House will be supportive of this legislation going to committee, getting the input that is necessary and giving us an opportunity to make the necessary changes to fine tune the legislation and allow us to come forward with better legislation.

In dealing with the Co-operative Credit Association Act and the legislation in that area, I think we are presented here in Canada with an opportunity to strengthen this organization. It is a good organization. A lot of people are members of credit unions or co-operatives. They know of their involvement in the community. They know the commitment that credit unions and co-operatives have to individual members. It is that approach that is going to help the consumer as we proceed in these very difficult times with globalization, increased competition from outside our borders and with all the problems associated with that particular area.

Co-ops can provide that measure of personalized service that is of concern to the individual which larger financial institutions may not provide.

I believe that the co-op movement has made a tremendous contribution to our economy and it is now opening up other opportunities. I think they can make that contribution to the small business person and to the individual because they make a lot of their decisions not on the basis of high-falutin theories and programs that have designations as to who qualifies and who does not. They do it on the basis of the individual. They size up the loan, in large measure, on the basis of the individual. It would be nice to see that at least one financial institution is capable of looking at loans on that basis.

This legislation also provides a benefit to the co-op or the credit union in the sense of allowing them to raise capital. One of the problems credit unions have faced, and indeed all co-ops have faced, is that the only way they can raise capital to do business is either through the sale of memberships or through debt. This legislation is going to give them an opportunity to raise capital through equity. That is a positive step and I compliment the government on that.

I look forward to hearing what the credit unions and co-operatives have to say in that particular area, as to whether the legislation works or whether there should be other ways to assist credit unions in raising capital.

All in all, the legislation is a very thick document that covers a broad range of items. I think it will bring the credit union into a situation in which it is competitive with the other financial institutions and will give it an opportunity to make its contribution to our economy.

If I can, I would like to move from the credit unions and talk generally about financial institutions. The buzzword that we hear all the time is this business of "competitiveness". It is interesting to watch the NDP trying to turn itself inside out and accomplish competitiveness in one sense and be non-competitive in every other sense.

It would be nice if it could get its act together and go down on one side of the issue or the other, rather than around the circle as it has this morning.

My hon. friend says that it does not know what it is doing, and I think this morning was a clear indication that it has not got the foggiest idea of how the economy runs. Its members have all left. I am sorry, I am not supposed to mention that they have all left. I guess they did, but I am not supposed to say that, so I withdraw that reference to the fact that they are no longer here.

An hon. member: They went right for the gate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The more I listen, the more I think it is the hon. member for Moncton who is running around the rules.

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, I accept your admonition.

I would like to say that there is a tremendous opportunity for us to put our financial institutions into a very competitive mode, to deal with the things that are happening in the global economy and to bring benefit to consumers.

I think we all agree that competition will lower prices to consumers, present new and different products and do all those things that will ultimately be beneficial to consumers. In our attempt to heighten competition we must be very vigilant in order to have those protections in our system so that we may protect consumers as well from those types of calamities that have occurred in the United States, with the failure of the savings and loan organizations and with the number of banks that have gone under.

We in Canada have not escaped unscathed. We have seen what has happened with Standard Trustco and BCCI, the Bank Credit Commerce International. We have to be vigilant and we have to make sure that the supervisory role and regulations are in tact.

As we have heightened competition we must also protect the downside by heightened supervision so that those institutions remain strong and vibrant.

I notice as well in the recent document coming down dealing with our Constitution we have recognized the opportunity that a restructured Canada and a restructured Constitution will be present for financial institutions.

Reading a report in The Globe and Mail of September 25 in the "Report on Business", there is the hope that coming out of some of the constitutional changes there will be the removal of some of the duplication and harmonization of rules and regulations.

I will quote from one of the articles in there which is headlined "A Ray of Hope for the Financial Sector: Ottawa aims to deal with duplication of trust company security regulations". The article goes on to say that the industry has long argued against duplication of financial service regulations and would prefer being governed by one national set of rules as the banks are.

I think that is a positive step, if we could move toward that particular area. That will require the provinces and the Canadian government to work out an acceptable arrangement.

It is mentioned in the document, talking about the streamlining of proposals and avoiding duplications between the different levels of government, and all will benefit as a result of that.

I should say as well that I am concerned about the Canada–Mexico–U.S. trade deal as it relates to financial institutions. We got caught in the last round of negotiations in which we opened our borders and the Americans did not. We did not get the access to the different marketplace items that we were supposed to obtain in the negotiations. I am very much concerned that as we proceed into the next phase and deal with Mexico, we will face roughly the same problems because Mexico has a very closed, restricted area of financial institutions. We will be opening up our institutions to the involvement of Mexico's financial institutions and we may not get the quid pro quo of being able to deal in that country and to have the financial institutions of this country in the Mexican economy.

As I have indicated, we in the Liberal Party are supportive of the general direction, the thrust of the legislation. We are looking forward to the opportunity of getting the advice and the contribution from the many institutions and sectors that are affected. We are looking forward to being able to make positive contributions to the debate on our financial institutions. We must do something to strengthen those institutions, to allow them to compete in the global sense, to allow them to provide to our consumers a wide range of products, and at the same time give our consumers the protection to know that their investments in those institutions are safe and that those institutions are sound.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to address you on this matter.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Moncton. I want to come at this debate from a little different angle today because I think that most of us in this country have a different experience with banks than quite often we talk about in this House.

I have been walking the streets of my riding a lot in the last few months because the House has not been in session. Because we have a severe downturn in the economy a lot of the banking institutions have very tough lines of credit. What I hear quite often from businessmen and home owners is that the banks of this country seem to want to lend you money when you do not need it, but when you really need it they seem to want to shut you down; they do not seem to have any to give you.

A small businessman came to me the other day and said: "They announced the bank rate and the Bank of Montreal the other day reduced its prime rate to 9.5 per cent". The fellow got all excited and he went over to the bank and the bank manager said: "Yes, that is our rate but I do not have any money to lend you".

I hear this more and more and more in this country. I have had experiences myself with banking institutions in this country in which I have found on many occasions, not on every occasion, the bank managers to be very regimented in their thought process. I found them not to be very creative. I have found that their lives seem to be run by the central office, Bay Street. In other words, the head office will send out a memo that they are to cut back on lines of credit, or they are not to lend any more money out, or they are going through an added process whereby "before you advance money double check with us".

This does two things. It takes away from the creativity of the bank manager this centralized control. I am going to repeat myself a lot in the House over the next few weeks until I really feel that we can get to the government on this.

The second thing is that it really works against the hope factor that entrepreneurs need if they are going to grow, take chances and create jobs in this country. Quite often there is a fine line between continuing the fight to stay in business during tough times and just throwing in the towel.

I had a very specific situation just a month ago. There were a couple of doctors in my community who rescued a manufacturing firm in Woodstock, Ontario. The name of the firm is Amertek. It makes the finest fire truck in North America, probably the most unique fire truck in the world, so unique that it has received orders from the U.S. military. It has outbid American and European manufacturers. Currently this Amertek fire truck guards the President of the United States at the White House and also at Camp David. This fire truck served in the Persian Gulf and when its competitor fell flat because of the heat and sand conditions the Canadian fire truck was the only one that rose to the occasion. As a result of that it got additional orders.

To get to that point it needed a lot of additional research and development and as a result there was a tremendous strain on its line of credit with the bank. I am not going to mention the bank because I do not want to cause embarrassment to the bank and I do not want to cause any backlash for this great Canadian manufacturing firm, Amertek.

It went through a shocking experience because as it was putting this new order on line, and just as it was getting it rolling, about to deliver its first batch of trucks, the bank manager came back and cut its line of credit by 20 per cent without notice. It had payrolls to meet, suppliers to meet, and it just could not believe it, without notice. I should not say without notice. It naturally had some discussion with the bank manager but obviously after losing in this discussion the bank manager just called up one day and said its line of credit was cut by close to 20 per cent.

Thanks to the Canadian Commercial Corporation which is under the minister of trade this company was rescued. It is delivering its fire trucks. It has another order from Egypt. It has 180 of the finest craftsmen in the country working in Woodstock, and on and on it goes.

I do not believe the centralized power of the banking institutions in this country is right. I do not believe it is serving the Canadian taxpayer. I do not believe it is serving small and medium sized businessmen. I realize that we need to have credit regulations. I support the idea of making sure that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has access to books and records of all financial institutions, but what I am against is this feeling that there are five or six major banks in this country. There is a perception that they are a clique and they are all in the same bathtub. If you are shut out at one bank, you are basically shut out at all five.

Somehow we need to communicate to small and medium sized businessmen especially that there are other options. There are other options for capital out there. We can go back to the committee and make adjustments on certain aspects, but the main thrust of this bill I totally support. We need more competition in the financial arena. We need to create more hope in the marketplace for small and medium-sized entrepreneurs in this country.

Just this Monday I talked to the chairman of a major trading house in downtown Toronto. We talked about the fact that there seemed to be so little capital in the market, so little capital for banks to lend to get the economy going again. There have been such large borrowings because of our deficits, not only federally but provincially, which are causing a tremendous strain on our dollar, pushing it upward because of the offshore conversions. However, there are many insurance companies that do have large pools of capital. So, from my reasoning, any effort that would allow a restructuring so that those pools of capital could be more readily available to those smaller and medium-sized businesses is a good thing for the country.

If business has a feeling of confidence in the sense that it is properly financed, then the entrepreneurial spirit naturally is willing to take more risk, and in that process of taking more risk it is going to create more jobs. If we can create more jobs, it is going to put less pressure on our unemployment insurance disbursements, our welfare disbursements and our refugee fund for that matter.

Right now the problem we have in this country is that we have about two million people unemployed. We have entrepreneurship in this country that is almost in a frozen stiff mode. It is basically working from month to month. There is a nervousness and a low morale out there in terms of business. Their bank lines are tight, there is not a lot of cash going around and, as a result, they are not taking any chances.

I know the hon. member from Mississauga supports this. What we have to do is somehow figure out a way to get that entrepreneurial spirit unleashed again. Right now, I believe the best way to do that is try and let that entrepreneurial spirit have a feeling that just because businesses are turned down at one of the major banks in this country, it is not the end of the line.

The member for Mississauga South mentioned to me earlier today that there are about 55 banking institutions in this country to which business has access. That is an important point to know, because I believe that most of us who come from a small business background have a perception there is only the big five banks. Most people do not realize that there is a whole litany of financial institutions out there. I think somehow we, in this House, have to promote the fact that there are a lot of financial institutions.

However, I think that the insurance companies, which have these large pools of capital, should, with regulation, be given the opportunity—and maybe we can do this in committee—to organize their lending practices in a way that it can meet certain social objectives. The member for Chambly says it will not happen. The converse is that if we do absolutely nothing, we keep the status quo. Keep them in their cages. I cannot support that right now and I will tell you why I cannot support it. I have not seen any sign from the major lending institutions in this country that their attitude toward small and medium sized business is going to change without some other competitors coming at them.

The member has a different view than I do and I do respect his experience in Quebec. I would also like to refer to the experience in Quebec of the member for Chambly, and I stand to be corrected, where the caisse de dépôt et placement will actually go out and invest in smaller and medium-sized business and convert equity in that business into loans. Is that not correct?

I can handle something like that. I wish that our major lending institutions would be more progressive. You have to understand where I am coming from. I am trying to unleash the entrepreneurial spirit that exists in this country.

Right now the mechanisms we have in place are not doing that. I think that the caisse de dépôt system of investing in small and medium-sized businesses is a great one. I think that that idea should be promoted and expanded to every region of the country. I think it is a progressive measure.

We need something similar in southern Ontario right now. If we had a situation like this, then an organization like Amertek, which was nearly put out of business a month ago had it not been for the rescue—and it was a constructive approach from the Canadian Commercial Corporation—we would have lost that potential. I am behind this bill. Until I am convinced otherwise, I have to stay my ground.

The other thing my colleague, the member from Prince Edward Island talked about was the commercial complaint section. Very few people who do business with banks realize that there is a commercial complaint section. This is a new feature of the bill, where all of the complaints have to be registered in the Superintendent of Financial Institutions' report. I think that is a very important feature for the people of Canada to understand.

If any one of us as members of Parliament or anyone in business makes a mistake, we certainly are accountable. If we are perceived to have done something wrong, we get up in the morning and read about ourselves on the front page of any paper of this country or see ourselves on national television. It seems to me that the financial institutions of this country have some kind of a special sort of status. They are protected from being challenged when they are not treating consumers fairly. I like that particular aspect of the bill, where there is a consumer complaint section, so that if someone feels that they are not being treated fairly, they have access. They have a recourse. In other words, if you feel the local branch manager is not treating you fairly under this new bill, you now can call the consumer complaint section, put your complaint forward and that actual complaint, whether it is justified or not, has to be reported by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. I think that is a good thing.

I certainly support the New Democratic Party's view on credit unions. The credit unions in this country, which have done a fantastic job in western Canada especially, do not seem to be as high profile in my part of the country, the Toronto region. I think there is an option of opportunity there in putting forward the services that credit unions have. I am certainly not against credit unions.

All in all, the point that I want to make is that the major banking institutions in this country right now, perceived or otherwise, do not seem to be putting forth an image that they are there to really motivate, to assist the entrepreneurial spirit in this country. I have met many bank managers in my career and some of them are downright smug. Can you believe it?

We have to communicate in a constructive way with our lending institutions the fact that as their attitude towards entrepreneurship in this country goes, so goes our general economy. Anything that will advance the competitive spirit, anything that will advance a greater respect to the spirit that drives this country and creates jobs, I must get behind. Unless in committee this bill can prove to me to do otherwise, I am in total support of it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend one question. He says he supports the bill because he has a real problem with the way banks have operated.

Can he explain to me how come he is in bed with the banks, because the banks want this bill. They want it. I want to know if he cannot see that the banks are the powerful ones now and they will become more powerful with these added provisions.

For example, already one of the banks is in the development business. It is going to build a big building for Ontario Hydro. The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is already a developer. Can he not see that loosening up and opening the cages will do exactly what he does not want them to do? In fact, he is on the same side as the bankers with respect to this bill. Why does he think they want it?

If they thought it was in any way going to encroach on their power, they would be furiously lobbying every member of this House. Yet he is on the same side as the banks in wanting this bill. I find that rather contradictory.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I have enormous respect for the member for Nickel Belt. This is only the beginning of my fourth year in the House of Commons. I watched him for years before that when I had the privilege of working in Mr. Trudeau's office. I have always thought that he made a lot of sense.

I cannot believe I am working against myself on this bill. This bill is going to committee and as I said in speech, if this bill is not going to meet the objectives of creating a more competitive market, if this bill is not going to do some of the things that the caisse de dépôts in Quebec are doing for smaller and medium-sized business, if this bill is not going to stimulate an attitude which will allow more capital to come into the market, then I have a different view of this bill than you do.

Just because bankers want it does not mean to say that there are not aspects of the bill that cannot serve the general good. I do not see this as consolidating the banking institutions any more. How can it be consolidating the banking institutions position when, in fact, we are creating more competitors for them?

It is not just the insurance companies. It is foreign institutions. I stand to be corrected on that by the member for Mississauga South. Is this not going to allow more foreign institutions—

An hon. member: BCCI.

Mr. Mills: You can use BCCI as an example. I think AMEX, American Express, is a good example. I was reflecting on that when my colleague for Malpeque spoke earlier.

The American Express approval by the cabinet is something that I do not think we have ever taken full advantage of in this country. We think of American Express right now, most of us in terms of a green card or for a few of us, a gold card. But it dawned on me today while listening to my colleague from Malpeque in this House that the American Express is no different today from the Bank of Montreal or the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Maybe we should be telling that to all our small and medium size businesses, telling them to go out there and test it. This is again where we talk about broadening the competitive base. I am not against American Express having a banking charter as long as it lives up to the responsibilities and duties of a banking institution. If we find from small business and others across this country that it is not lending money, well then I think we bring it back to the committee and say it is a farce, it is a joke. However, we have not tested that yet.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to question my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood because I thought that in his brief intervention he made considerable sense.

What I was having trouble with was the hon. member for Nickel Belt's speech which, while lengthy, left me confused as to the position of the New Democratic Party. I know that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is not an expert on that, but he heard the speech of the hon. member for Nickel Belt and I wonder if he could illumine us. What is the position of New Democratic Party members? They say they favour increased competition, at least with insurance companies. I thought they said they were in favour of allowing banks to take over insurance companies and offer insurance as part of a package.

An hon. member: Oh, no.

Mr. Milliken: I heard the hon. member for Chambly say that he supported the fact that Quebec caisses were able to sell insurance as well. He said if it was good for them to be able to sell it, it must be all right for banks to sell it. Yet now they are saying that is not their position, that it is not okay for banks to sell it. Or, is it? I think the hon. member for Nickel Belt is terribly confused. I wonder if the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was able to make more sense out of that speech than I was.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands is making this very difficult for me. I was, as I said in my previous question, a bit confused by the member for Nickel Belt. I can tell you that subsequent to his speaking I walked along the hall and spoke to him because I did not understand where he was coming from. To my colleague for Kingston and the Islands, in fairness he did—not in the House but behind the curtain—clarify some of his points of view. If I could dare—

Mr. Milliken: To put words in his mouth.

Mr. Mills: To put words in his mouth, right. The member for Nickel Belt is not against competition. He is not against helping small and medium sized business. We have a different point of view. He is concerned about the fact that it is only going to be short-term competition by allowing these other financial institutions to compete in the free flow of capital.

I differ from that view. I think it will be more than a short-term gain. I think it will produce a long-term benefit to everyone. With respect to his point about being concerned about people losing their jobs, I would need more information on that because I cannot see that.

As far as the member for Chambly goes, I like his idea about the caisse de dèpôt et de placement investing in small and medium size businesses. I wish we could figure out a way to steal that idea from Quebec and bring it to Ontario and other parts of the country. I wish our larger financial institutions would maybe take a page out of the caisse de dépot's book.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I enter the debate only for the purpose of going over in this House some of the history of this legislation and the great deal of work that has been done by members on all sides of the House in actually formulating the bills we have before us and Bill C-4 that has been dealt with by the finance committee.

First of all, this issue became an important issue in 1982. The then government formed a committee called the Dimma committee. It studied the re-regulation of banks and other financial institutions, trust companies, insurance companies and the like.

After the 1984 election, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, then Minister of State for Finance, produced a green paper. That green paper was an analysis of the financial companies that we had in the country. Immediately after that paper, the finance committee of this House made a thorough study of the financial implications of the green paper and produced for the House a very long report.

That long report was to some extent influenced by the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank, the Northland Bank, and the collapse in that one year alone of one trust company, mortgage company or insurance company every month in 1985.

We have done a great deal of work here. As a result of the report of the finance committee and as a result of the report of the Estey Commission inquiring into CCB and Northland as a result of the work by the Senate, the government produced a blue paper under the auspices of the hon. member for London West who was then Minister of State for Finance.

That paper met a great deal of discussion right across Canada, with every institution and members on all sides of this House. I particularly remember the efforts of the member for Kamloops who was leading for the New Democratic Party on the finance committee at that point. He was followed up by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, Michael Cassidy, a former member. Raymond Garneau and Mrs. Nicholson from Toronto of the Liberal Party both worked very diligently with the committee trying to work out how these institutions might be organized and how the legislation might be worked out.

I want to say that the legislation that we have is non-partisan legislation developed as a result of a great deal of consultation and work by members of this House going back to the Parliament of 1981, 1982 and 1983 and moving forward since then.

This legislation has the approval of almost every person involved in the insurance industry in this country, almost every person involved in the credit union movement in this country, almost every person involved in the trust company industries in this company, and the approval of the Canadian Bankers' Association across the board.

They all have their own little extra that they would like out of the bills. We are going to have to make some arbitrage there, but the leading spokesman of every one of these organizations and their lobby groups has been to see me as the former chairman of the finance committee and other members of this House. They have said how important this legislation is in order to re-regulate and make things work in a more modern way for the good of us all.

While we have done a lot of work, we have more work to do in the finance committee in terms of making sure that the bills work as well as they can. I think this House should be commended for the effort particularly of members of the House for making sure that the bills are the kind of bills they are and are now before the House.

This is a non-partisan bill. This is not an NDP bill, a Liberal bill or a Conservative bill. This bill has been developed by this Parliament, the previous Parliament and the previous Parliament by members deliberately working together to come to grips with the issue.

I think we have some more work to do, but we ought to move ahead as quickly as we can to make sure the matter receives that detailed consideration that it must yet receive.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I was listening very carefully to what the hon. member was saying. I also particularly respect what he has to say because of his experience on the finance committee as chairman.

He mentioned in passing—and I find it very intriguing—that he feels that there is some work to do. That means that he is not completely satisfied with the bill. I am sure that there is no bill which is perfect and there is always some work to be done.

I would like him to take this opportunity in a non-partisan way because he is right, it is not an NDP bill. It is far from an NDP bill, I can assure him of that, but it is not a Conservative bill and it is not a Liberal bill. If he has some reservations as he seems to have indicated, I would like to know what they are because perhaps we will find a certain commonality of objections. Perhaps that would also help the committee when it looks further into this question.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, as I explained to the member for Malpeque, these three bills that we have right here represent a little over three and one-quarter or three and one-half inches of compressed printing. The other bill we have already passed is another inch and a bit of compressed printing. We have a good four and one-half inches or more of compressed printing in trying to develop a financial system.

I think that there are some small conflicts. For example, I see no reason why banks should be required to have two auditors, whereas trust companies and insurance companies can get along with one. I have spoken to people in all of the industries on that. There has been some concern and there is room for some discussion. It just seems to me that it is really the depositor who pays. It is really the insurance person who pays and, if you increase the overhead of an organization, they can pay less in interest to their depositors and they are less efficient.

There have been some representations in connection with insurance companies and their right to borrow in the marketplace. I want to look at that and I want to look at their ability to take in what amounts to deposits.

I think there is some misapprehension around when you talk about insurance staying in insurance and banking staying in banking. None of these institutions have been operating that way for a very long period of time. For example, insurance companies in this country really only do 20 per cent of their business as insurance. That may seem strange but in effect our major life insurance companies are really in the business of selling annuities.

They are in the business of selling deposit receipts and in effect they are operating as come to your home bankers.

This legislation brings that into line and so it is important that it be passed. It is important that we understand that the overlaps that already exist in the financial community are very significant. It is important that the regulation of that be as set out pretty well in the bills.

I want to say that at this point what we are really looking at is fine tuning legislation that has had a pretty good run over with the finance committee already. You may recall the hearings held well before Christmas of last year for all the witnesses dealing with a white paper produced by the present minister. It resulted in a great deal of agreement. We then spent a great deal of time on clause by clause consideration of what is now Bill C–4. I expect that when you are talking about differences and things that must be changed, we are really talking about very minor matters.

To a large extent all of the issues have been in a sense brokered to make sure that it works out that each head of financial responsibility, each pillar if you want to put it that way, has its defined area. That defined area can be easily examined and inspected to make sure of the sanctity of depositors' money, the sanctity of the rights of people who pay premiums for insurance and so on.

We have to make sure that these companies that are given privileges and benefits and are allowed to do a certain class of business in Canada that is really for the benefit of the public, operate for the benefit of the public and operate in a way to ensure the protection of deposits. Our whole work has to be to make sure that these companies operate as well as they can.

I think we are getting there, so when you ask me what has to be done there are only a few things.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I was assuming that at this point we were resuming debate. May I have clarification from the Chair?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bernier): Are there any more questions?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bernier): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Chambly.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to my colleagues and particularly to the former chairman of the finance committee. I found him to be both to the point and concise, and I am going to try to follow his example and do the same thing.

I would like to mention that we must not play any semantic games here. This is a major piece of legislation. This is a piece of legislation that I believe will have major effects on consumers across this country. It is something that has taken three, four, five years to get to this point. It will certainly not harm these institutions which have had record years if we take the time to look seriously at the potential consequences. I feel that in doing so we will benefit consumers generally.

My general feeling here is that if something is not broken why fix it. I am not quite sure that the system as it is now needs the intervention of Parliament, needs this legislation at this time. I must say most emphatically that the NDP is not against competition. We want to see competition. After saying that, we are quite properly against this bill because, after rational analysis, non–partisan I believe because we have looked at the bill itself and not just the ideology, we do not think that this bill provides what it pretends to provide. That is why we have debate going on today.

I would like to mention certain aspects of Bill C–19 and in my comments I would like to target the question of abusive power, possibly, as well as the banks selling insurance.

On banks selling insurance, in one sense we are much in favour of that. As I said I used the Quebec analogy. As a Quebecer I am very pleased to see that Quebec has taken the lead in this. I must respond to what some of my Liberal colleagues have said: "That means that banks should be able to own insurance companies".

I am saying that it does not mean that. Quebec has a caisse populaire system, which I am completely in favour with, selling insurance policies.

And I would like to explain for the benefit of my Liberal colleagues that a number of years ago, we in Quebec realized that letting credit unions sell insurance could be beneficial to the entire community. I remember we had the same kind of debate in the National Assembly. At the time insurance brokers told us that if we let credit unions sell insurance, they would all lose their jobs.

There were also consumer groups—and this was one of the few times I disagreed with them—who said: If we let credit unions sell insurance, it will cost us a lot more, because they will force us to buy insurance from them by engaging in tied-in selling, which means they won't give us a mortgage or anything else unless we buy insurance from them. They will take advantage of the power they have over the market.

Another objection was that the Caisses populaires Desjardins were so powerful in Quebec that they would control the market. I heard my Liberal colleagues saying it can't be done and that jobs will be lost. There were the same old arguments that people would lose their jobs, that it would be a closed market, that there would be so many problems that it would restrict entrepreneurship. All I can say is that in Quebec, speaking of entrepreneurship, I don't think there has ever been any legislation that would be able to reduce the spirit of entrepreneurship in that province.

However, there is a difference when we are talking about letting banks sell insurance on the same terms as the credit unions. Credit unions, and especially the Caisses populaires Desjardins, do not have the same mandate as the banks. A credit union's responsibilities are different, because it is owned by its members. The Caisse populaire Desjardins and other credit unions are not banks. In other words, they are not bankers. My colleague referred to a smug, anti-consumer attitude. Credit unions don't have that attitude, not at all. They are truly integrated organizations, which is to say they are an integral part of the community and reflect the community's needs.

I think it is somewhat exaggerated to say that since the Caisses populaires Desjardins and other credit unions in Quebec sell or market insurance, this means that companies, and especially banks, should have the right to purchase insurance companies. I say no. As was said by the chairman of the Finance Committee—in fact, he was quoted by my colleague from Nickel Belt—let the banks do the banks' work and let other companies do theirs. I think that is very sensible, and I fully endorse my colleague where he quotes the former chairman of the Finance Committee.

I would like to say a few words about abusive powers, because I have worked for a long time as a consumer advocate. I have seem examples of abuse of power by banks. I remember clearly my experience with the Banque nationale du Canada, the BNC. I believe the president at the time was Michel Bélanger, one of the joint chairs of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. In my brief to the commission, I mentioned the fact that the Banque nationale du Canada had a certain view of Quebec society, and that it was a corporate view. I do not endorse that kind of view nor the vision of the Banque nationale du Canada as expressed in its actions.

The case I quoted was mentioned in a judgment by the Supreme Court, and I am referring to Houle vs Banque nationale du Canada. The Supreme Court judgment contains a number of facts relating to abusive power, and they are absolutely terrifying. We have a bank that pushed the president or owner of a small business into bankruptcy because it did not give the owner of this small business a chance to pay its debts. It proceeded with a seizure before the judgment, and the gentleman was obliged to declare bankruptcy. !ALP/jc1300-2

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Chambly, for the time being, and I am sure he will wish to continue his speech later this afternoon.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, over the last 30 years, Quebec has acquired economic and political institutions to meet its needs. It did so in its own way, with its own resources. The general public and business people are proud of these achievements. Moreover, they are working very hard to make them more effective.

Today the federal government wants to meddle in our affairs. It wants to create new powers, new standards, new agreements and impose them on Quebecers. That is totally unacceptable. First, it will lead to new confrontations and aggravate the existing tensions. Second, it will make the political and legislative process more cumbersome, slow it down and hurt Quebec's economic development.

I therefore call on Quebecers to reject the federal government's constitutional proposal.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the people of El Salvador has endured the devastation, destruction and death of a 12-year old civil war.

Yesterday, leaders of the FMLN and the Salvadoran government signed a peace agreement under the auspices of the UN that brings hope for a ceasefire before the end of the year.

As well, measures agreed to in this peace accord will set a constructive course towards the democratization of the political process in El Salvador.

New Democrats have long supported a peaceful resolution of the civil war and we have consistently raised in the House of Commons concerns of the Salvadoran people regarding human rights violations, international aid and Canada's policies in Central America.

We applaud the efforts of Secretary General Perez de Cuellar for his role in the negotiations that led to this accord and urge both the FMLN and the representatives of the Salvadoran government to stay the course of peace.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the PVY-N situation in the Canadian Prince Edward Island potato industry has become farcical. The industry has been thrown into chaos. Borders are closed and millions of dollars are lost and now we find that testing proceedings which led to all this are found to be flawed.

In a follow-up test, 8 out of 10 samples originally labelled positive have been found to be negative, an 80 per cent error rate. Agriculture Canada, badly understaffed in the technical area, made a call. That call was in large part wrong.

Now we have a case in Saskatchewan where a tuber imported from the United States has tested positive. This diagnosis was confirmed in three separate labs.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to intervene in the situation and order a complete retesting program to eliminate the errors made, take action to have the U.S.A. institute a testing program the same as the one forced on P.E.I., apply the same import restrictions against the United States as they have applied against us and, finally, call a full-scale into the entire problem so that once and for all the air will be cleared and the industry will know where it stands, both nationally and internationally.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, aggressive advertising, exchange rates and tax on gasoline are all major factors in the cross-border shopping issue.

Over recent years all members will know that cross-border shopping has been on the rise and same day trips to the U.S. are increasing at an alarming rate in border communities like mine of Sarnia—Lambton.

This trend cannot continue. Cross-border shopping has severe economic consequences for Canada, as well as serious implications for federal and provincial governments. Both are concerned about the negative impact on employment.

Both are also losing considerable tax revenues. A study by the consulting firm Ernst and Young estimated the total tax loss, excluding income taxes, was $15 million for 1990 in Sault Ste. Marie alone. So what does this figure mean again? It means tax loss for the provinces and, of course, the retailers are suffering, especially in border communities like mine that is on the leading edge of this phenomenon.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Yugoslavia, federal forces in the Republic of Croatia attacked targets in the town of Vinkovci with napalm and cluster bombs.

According to western news sources, one of their targets was a barn that had been converted into a field hospital and was clearly marked with a red cross. Mr. Speaker, as a signatory to the Geneva Convention and the UN Charter of Rights, Canada must denounce the use of napalm and cluster bombs on civilian and Red Cross targets. We must use our influence in the world community to put an end to the atrocities being committed in Croatia.

This is a situation which poses a serious threat to world order. The world stood up and took notice when Saddam Hussein threatened the use of chemical weapons against the innocent people of Kuwait. It must do the same today for the inhabitants of Croatia, and Canada must lead the way.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I sat on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission for a long time. I kept quiet out of respect for my colleagues and the institution I represent.

Throughout this commission, people called for a plan for society. They kept asking for economic union. They demanded recognition of the distinct society. I can say that the document the Prime Minister has just presented gives Quebec all that.

The party poopers, bogeymen, eternal skeptics, wreckers, the Bouchards, Laroses, Brassards and their ilk are at work demolishing our house, which is part of our national heritage. The laws covering heritage, in Quebec as in Canada, will not allow these dream merchants, these charlatans to achieve their personal ends by demolishing what Quebecers cherish most: our feeling of belonging and our pride.

And to those who would not know that, I say it in French, in our Parliament in Ottawa.

MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, last week Canada's first female Minister of Justice compromised every feminist principle she claims to espouse. Recently her colleague, the Conservative member of Parliament from Burlington, referred to a female member of the Liberal caucus as a slut.

The Minister of Justice said this was okay because he was provoked. She said the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: We have a longstanding tradition that in statements by members there should not be a personal attack against any other member in the House. The hon. member is, I think, very much on that course and it does disturb me. If the hon. member wants to finish his statement and make a point, I will of course hear him.

Mr. MacLellan: The point is that it is inconceivable that such a dangerously partisan defence of the indefensible would come from the Minister of Justice, who convened a Women and the Law conference and who frequently refers to herself as a feminist.

May I suggest to the minister that she re-evaluate her own principles when she suggests that sometimes a woman deserves to be attacked with such venom and hatred because of her—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member is a long time and distinguished member of this House and I know that he feels very strongly on the issue. However, I think we ought to proceed and hear another member.

The hon. member for Portage—Interlake.

S. O. 31

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, when I asked Deborah Wehrle, a charming law student at the Ottawa Law Society, her opinion on the constitutional package, here is what she said:

> The constitutional package presented to Canadians on Tuesday, September 24, sets out an innovative plan to remove barriers to interprovincial trade in Canada. This change will help ensure economic recovery and future prosperity. Let us take a cue from Europe. Diverse European countries have committed themselves to the elimination of trade barriers in a common market to enhance their competitiveness. This sets a fine example. In Canada we are already united as one nation. We have a great tradition of hard work and co-operation. It is time for Canadians to recognize the key to our 124 years old success story. Our country has prospered because of a commitment to rise above our differences, to overcome geographical distances, and pool our strengths.

• (1410)

The Conservative Party is committed to creating a strong domestic market which can compete globally. It is time to focus on creating an effective, internal market and strong economic union to ensure prosperity in Canada in the 21st century and beyond.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about Algoma Steel.

In May of this year, I asked the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology what he thought of employee ownership. He endorsed the principle. He suggested I speak to the Minister of Finance about it. I asked him in the House of Commons, and he endorsed the principle.

I met with the minister last week. He said: "I cannot give you an answer. I am waiting for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology", so it is back in his ball court.

If I may, I will quote the Minister of Industry and Science. He said: "I will help Algoma when I am convinced it will dramatically be restructured".

It has been restructured. It is in the process of being restructured. We will lose 1,600 or 1,800 jobs. What is the definition of restructuring to the minister, 3,000 people or when the whole plant is closed down?

We ask the minister to make a recommendation to the Minister of Finance to assist us now, be it tax credits, older worker adjustment, bridge pensions or whatever. We ask them not to be passive spectators at the table for Algoma restructuring. The federal government must participate.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, today I applaud the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to send Joseph Kindler and Charles Ng back to the United States.

No longer will Canada be considered by the likes of Ng and Kindler as a safe haven to escape capital punishment.

No longer will the likes of these men consider sliding down the wall on bed sheets to escape justice in the United States.

No longer will the victims in the United States be denied justice in seeing Ng face the charges for the 19 violent murders he is accused of in California.

My thanks go out to all members of this House, the justice committee and victims of Violence International for assisting in this seven year fight to extradite Ng and Kindler. I am doubly pleased to be able to advise the United States victims in the Ng case that they will finally see justice.

In closing, a special thanks to the 185,000 Canadians and Americans who wrote to members of this House of Commons urging for justice to be seen to be done in the United States and to return Ng to the proper justice he deserves.

ARMENIA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday Armenians voted 99.3 per cent in favour of independence, marking the end of 71 years of communist rule.

This was an historic moment for a people so touched by persecution, occupation and natural disaster.

In 1915, the genocide at the hands of the Ottoman Empire killed 1.5 million Armenians. Armenia gained independence in 1918, only to be occupied in 1920 by the Soviet Union.

Over the last three years, Armenians have suffered the worst ethnic violence in the republics, with 2,000 killed.

The people of Armenia and the Armenian community here in Canada have dreamed of the day when their country would be independent. Today, we share in that joy.

Armenia faces a number of economic challenges: the exodus of Armenians from Azerbaijan and the 1988 earthquake that left 500,000 homeless.

We look forward to the day when Armenians of Nagorno-Karabakh become part of Armenia. We seek recognition by the world community and Canada of the genocide.

We call upon the Government of Canada to recognize Armenia and to help Armenia achieve its aspirations of becoming a prosperous, democratic nation.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers are starting to discover the real motives behind the negative attitude of the Bloc Québécois leader. Every time he opens his mouth, we realize that he has nothing more to propose and that he is only seeking to destroy Canada. His national sport is rejecting out of hand any proposal that does not come from his small mind.

From listening to him, Mr. Speaker, the children and uninformed people in Quebec would end up believing that all the Caisses populaires would move to Alberta. Nothing less than a scare campaign from the Bloc Québécois.

Mr. Speaker, Quebecers will not accept for much longer the permanent indignation and half-truths that come out of the mouths of Bloc Québécois members. Instead of making concrete proposals, the leader of the Bloc Québécois prefers to act in the federal Parliament like a puppet of Jacques Parizeau or Gérald Larose. What a shame for Quebecers!

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, more than five years ago this government had promised to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. Canadians still await this important legislation. Yesterday, Judge Joseph McDonald ruled that the Canadian Human Rights Act is unconstitutional because it fails to protect lesbians, gay men and bisexuals from discrimination. The right to be free from discrimination based on sexual orientation has been put into law in Quebec, the Yukon, Manitoba and Ontario.

I call on this government and this Minister of Justice to introduce long-awaited amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. It is time to ensure that Canadian lesbians, gay men and bisexuals can live in dignity and freedom from discrimination.

FORESTRY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was a very important day for anyone concerned with this nation's forests. Our minister announced in Toronto the new program Partners in Sustainable Development of Forests. This initiative will help establish a network of forests that will become working models for sustainable forest development. The model forest will demonstrate the most advanced scientific methods, techniques and forestry practices.

The partners program will promote a broad balance between all users of our forests and demonstrate Canada's commitment to our international responsibilities as one of the world's major forested nations. Through the key partnerships with provinces, with industry, with forest owners, with native groups and environmental organizations, this program is another example of Canada's support for the principle of sustainable development.

Oral Questions

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, our government recently released a package of proposals to renew the Canadian federation. It is my hope that Canadians will look at these proposals and put forward their concerns and ideas in an open and rational manner. This should not be regarded as an emotional issue. This is primarily about federalism, economics and history.

Canadians are on the brink of undoing that which the European Economic Community has striven toward for 50 years. Quebec separation means the isolation of the maritimes. That could lead to a separate Ontario and a separate British Columbia and hence, the destruction of a country that has developed to become one of the two most preferred countries to live in in the world.

Our country's future is in our hands. Canadians, I urge you to grow up, wake up, familiarize yourselves with our history in order that we may have a future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. The Bank of Canada Act says that the Bank's role is to use monetary policy to mitigate "fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment—".

The proposals on economic union tabled this morning want to eliminate any reference to production, trade and employment. I therefore ask the Minister of Finance why he wants to take from the Governor of the Bank of Canada the obligation in setting monetary policy to ensure job creation for the unemployed in this country.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition would share the view that in order to achieve sustainable growth, one must have price stability. There is clearly historical evidence of that fact. As a matter of fact, if one were to look at some of the leading industrialized nations of the world, particularly looking at Japan and Germany, one would find that they have had excellent growth and more than reasonable price stability.

What this attempts to do is clarify the mandate of the Bank of Canada. It has been criticized in some quarters as being overly broad, ambiguous and can tend to be contradictory on occasion. It is in that respect that we are attempting to clarify the role of the Bank of Canada to achieve price stability, and to achieve price stability, you can achieve sustainable growth with job activity.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have been obsessed with fighting inflation for five years now. Today we have a high for the last six years in unemployment, and we still have a very high level of inflation.

I want to know from the minister why he wants to take away the responsibility of the governor of the bank, in setting the monetary policy, the obligation to look at the unemployed. Why does he want to give a green light to the governor of the bank to not care at all about the level of employment in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there may be a fundamental difference in the goals and objectives of this government as compared to the position of the Liberal Party.

What the leader of the Liberal Party would advocate is high inflation, high interest rates, high deficits, slow growth and high unemployment. That is the record of the past. If one looks at the period in Canada from 1950 to 1973, one will note that there were inflation rates that averaged about 2.8 per cent with growth in excess of 5 per cent. When inflation was up around 9 per cent, the rate of growth fell to about 3 per cent or 3.1 per cent.

It is not only Canada that is pursuing this goal and objective. The over-all goal and objectives of the Group of Seven countries is designed to achieve price stability and sustainable growth. The goals and objectives of the OECD are likewise. Just recently, Mr. Laidler of the C.D. Howe Institute said that the target of price level stability is both appropriate and feasible and the bank's mandate should be updated accordingly.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, you can have growth and you can have price stability but you have to make sure in the process that you do not create unemployment in the country. One good way to achieve this is to have an economic union. I am very pleased to realise that at last the government has read the document Securing the Canadian Economic Union in the Constitution that I tabled in this House 10 years ago, and that was opposed by all the members of that party. Never in this document did we want to take away the responsibility from the governor of the bank to look after the unemployed in Canada.

Will this government change its policy and make sure that the monetary policy of Canada takes into account that we have to create jobs for Canadians and zero inflation will not do any good if we have 25 per cent of the population not working? What we want is jobs for Canadians.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the best way to create jobs is through sustainable growth and sustainable growth can be achieved through price stability.

I am very pleased that the hon. member is pleased about the over-all package. I am sure that he would be pleased to note that in connection with the question that he just put, the document at page 39, in consideration of price stability, says: "Monetary policy should be conducted with due cognizance of the path to price stability that best contributes to other Canadian objectives". One of those Canadian objectives is obviously growth, job creation and economic activity throughout the country from coast to coast to coast.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

The minister speaks about doing nothing more than clarifying the mandate of the Bank of Canada, but in the document he tabled today he says "their references to mitigating fluctuations in production trade and unemployment—should be eliminated." That is not elimination, that is massacring.

If the Minister of Finance is serious about encouraging jobs, production and growth, why does he want to take any references about them out of the mandate of the Bank of Canada? How can he be taken seriously if those words are eliminated?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is being taken seriously because this issue is being taken seriously around the world. Whether it is the Group of Seven industrialized nations, whether it is the OECD group of nations, whether it is the United States, whether it is Japan, whether it is Germany, all are committed to the goals of price stability because if you have price stability you will have sustainable growth and if you have sustainable growth, you will have job creation activity.

Right here in Canada the C.D. Howe Institute which certainly is not a Conservative think tank—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member quotes it quite often. I remind the hon. member that the recommendation that was published in a paper by Mr. Laidler said "the target of price level stability is both appropriate and feasible and the bank's mandate should be updated accordingly", and that is precisely what we are doing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister boasts about his policies of price stability. What have they brought us? A made-in-Canada recession, one and a half million people unemployed, our export industries in absolute crisis.

I ask the minister why, through the policies announced today, does he want to continue to enforce forever on Canadians policies of recession and unemployment and force the provinces to do the same thing. Can he explain that to Canadians who are already suffering the burdens of his misguided policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absurd in his interpretation. I have tried to make that clarification in response to earlier questions. What the hon. member is really proposing is a policy of high inflation, high interest, high deficits, slow growth and high unemployment. Canadians have had enough of that. The only way to achieve sustainable growth is through the containment of inflation and price stability.

All we have to do is look at what has happened in Japan: low inflation, high growth, prosperity. Germany: low inflation, high growth, job creation.

You can go around the country and prosperity is linked very clearly with sustainable growth and price stability, and that is what we are attempting to achieve.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Price stability is indeed important but those people who do not have jobs, who cannot buy anything, are more concerned with getting a job and contributing their skills to society.

Yesterday the minister indicated in committee that he might be willing to reconsider the proposal to make reducing inflation the central priority of the Bank of Canada. I ask the minister if he will commit today, and convince his colleague the Minister of Finance, that this party's policy of full employment, is an important priority for the Bank of Canada.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if my memory is correct, what I said yesterday more precisely was that if the language in our document did not adequately reflect our intention then I would look at a chance to try to make the language more precise.

There is no question at all as my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has said about the commitment of this government to job creation. This is almost a red herring that members of the House are trying to bring across the trail of the House today. That, of course, is their privilege.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. It is essential that jobless men and women find a job, and the unemployment rate causes great concern across Canada. There are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians today. So, I ask the minister again: is he willing now to recognize that full employment should be one of the primary objectives of this government and that the Bank of Canada should do its share too?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to do two things today. First, I will indicate that the government of Canada fully supports policies based on substantial and permanent employment opportunities across Canada. And it is policies such as the one my colleague the Minister of Finance has just described that can have that effect. Second, if the hon. member has an amendment, an improvement or anything else to propose, she is welcome to do so.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs talk about the importance of price stability. We are trying to say, simply, open up the process, recognize the reality of Canada, that there are many people out there crying for this government to make sure that they can earn a respectable living. There are many others who need shelter in this country.

I ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs this: In the government's proposal it indicates that housing can be made an exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Many Canadians depend on the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to finance social housing, so I want to ask the minister if his government is to go ahead with the idea of transferring its responsibilities to make sure that the funding that is presently spent for social housing will also be transferred to the provinces.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of our proposal is to indicate that not simply are we interested in changes in theory in the way federalism operates, we are also prepared to look at specific changes in the way powers are exercised. We are following certain principles here.

One of those principles that we want to follow is a greater respect for the constitutional jurisdiction that has been established. Another is one of efficiency, of trying to have policies carried out by the level of government that is most effective and most able to carry them out.

As I indicated yesterday, in other fields like the environment it is the determination of this government to continue to guard and to keep and to exercise all of the powers that are ours. But we have made it clear that we are prepared to discuss with the provinces means by which there can be a recognition of their exclusive jurisdiction in domains, in fields like housing.

I think that as the hon. member considers these proposals she will see that that is a constructive way to give reality to the principles that I think we all in this House espouse of trying to have a more effective federal system, including one that allows provinces like the province of Quebec to take account of the particular challenges and situation that they face.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the debate on the economic union, we note a great discrepancy between the point of a new hold by Quebec which sees the role of the state as the driving force of economic development and that of the government as expressed in its plan which overlooks it.

So, here is my question: to close yesterday's debate, is the government prepared to entrench in the Constitution the right of the provinces not only to create, but to maintain and innovate on their own initiative, new economic development institutions such as the Quebec Deposit Fund or the Heritage Fund?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps any confusion that may exist over what is in or what is not in the document can be dispelled today with the release of the document. There has been a lot of debate about what the document might contain or what its implications are. With regard to many of the concerns that have been expressed, for example in Quebec about the fact that the federal government would immerse itself into provincial budget-making, I don't think there is anything in the document that reflects that at all.

I think the release of the document will clarify many of the items that the hon. member has referred to.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, perhaps something was lost in the translation. I asked, very clearly, if the government was prepared to guarantee within the Constitution the right of the provinces to develop their own economic institutions like the Heritage Fund and the Caisse de dépôt.

My question now is to the Minister of Industry and Trade. It is not enough to build an economic union that is done on the basis of yesterday's economy, and that is the linkage this government has failed to make. There is not much use advocating the free circulation of goods if there are no goods to circulate or nobody to buy them. Will the government undertake specifically in its forthcoming paper on competitiveness to target at least 25 per cent of our Gross National Product as a firm objective for manufacturing in order to give Canadians jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member loses his credibility when he makes the statement he just made, that we have not made the linkage between unity and the strength of our economy. That is absolutely clear in the Speech from the Throne and it was absolutely clear in the Prime Minister's statement on Tuesday. It is absolutely clear in the document.

As the member also pointed out, we have these two documents coming out on competitiveness and learning which reinforce the statements we have already made. Clearly, we are going to be putting in place a consultation process that will respond to the questions the hon. member has been asking. In that way we will ensure that we have an increasing degree of export activity, of international activity which will affect the manufacturing sector the hon. member is concerned about.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board why the government has decided, while refusing to budge on the zero per cent increase of salaries to public servants, to continue to give performance pay to over 4,000 managers in the Public Service, in some cases up to 10 per cent of their salaries. Pourquoi ce double standard?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): For the managers of the Public Service, a former government, and I think it was a Liberal government, decided that they would be dealt with in two ways. They took away 15 per cent of the wage budget and decided to have a basic pay. Instead of having, as there is for the unionized employees, the seniority which will go up even if we have the zero per cent unionized, the same treatment is given to the managers.

This is a system that was put in place for the managers who will get zero pay increase and will get the seniority the same as the unionized employees.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, let us get this straight. The minister has already said to the press that there would be no increase in bonuses because that is rolled into and considered a part of the salary that would be frozen.

I want to ask the minister if this now means that the Chief Executive Officer of CN will now be frozen at his $80,000 Christmas bonus that he received last year on top of his $300,000 salary and the Chief Executive Officer of Canada Post will now be frozen at the $70,000 like he got last Christmas on top of his $250,000 a year salary? The poor fellows, frozen out in the cold. Why they will soon call the minister Mr. Freezie.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): As he grows in years, the hon. member will become wiser and learn not to believe everything that is written in the newspapers.

As far as the top managers of the Crown corporations are concerned, we have not yet received the recommendation which is prepared by the Board of Governors. I can tell him what the decision of the government is. When we receive this recommendation, the answer will be zero.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this government has shown once again that it has a double standard.

While the Conservatives have forced restraint and hard times on most working people, the government has found the money to provide fat bonuses for Crown executives and senior managers.

The Treasury Board minister thinks it is fair to give a bonus, maybe as high as $84,000 to the President of CN, whose profits have taken a nosedive. Yet, to the clerks in the Public Service making only one quarter of Mr. Lawless' bonus, the government has said zero per cent, no matter how productive they are.

• (1440)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I guess I am too smart. I gave the answer before I got the question.

If zero per cent is such a fat number, why does PSAC not accept it?

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the members of PSAC were offered the same kind of bonus, they would certainly take it in a hurry—the same bonus.

If a $366,000 wage is not incentive enough, what is? If we figure 4,000 members, a 10 per cent bonus, that is $24 million.

There is a principle of fairness. You cannot on the one hand insist there is no money for pay equity while you throw away money on fat-cat bonuses. Will the government eliminate this double standard and put this money where it is most needed?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have answered this question. When we get the recommendation for performance allowances for managers, whatever they are, the answer of the government will be that they will be zero per cent.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last week, Mr. Lou MacEachern from Calgary, Alberta received the Entrepreneur of the Year Award. Upon receiving his award he announced that because of the GST, because of the high dollar and because of all the other red tape in this country, he was selling his business employing 300 people and leaving the country.

When is this government going to stop drowning small business in red tape and high taxes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I happened to be there that same evening and Mr. MacEachern made it very clear that he was not leaving the country.

He did make some points and some of the points I have some sympathy with. I think that it is important to realize that—

Mr. Tobin: Which ones do you have sympathy with?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If you will ask the question, I will give you the answer.

If the hon. member had been at that dinner, he would have seen and heard from a large number of people who were at that function who are entrepreneurs who did not agree with what Mr. MacEachern has said, who are going to go out and build businesses, take on the opportunities and the challenges that are there and beat the world. That is the type of entrepreneurialism that is alive in Canada and it is going to be reinforced by the policies that will be flowing from our competitiveness agenda.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister talks about being sympathetic. He talks statistically week after week about a lower interest rate by the Bank of Canada. What good is a lower interest rate by the Bank of Canada when its own FBDB and other chartered banks, even with the lower rate, will not lend it out to entrepreneurs and Canadian companies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that this government does not have a policy of directing the chartered banks as to what they should or should not do with lending. That is not the way this government or any government has acted.

What we have been doing and what I would commit to the hon. member is that we are exploring every opportunity, every idea that comes in that will give us a better sense as to how we can encourage a greater amount of financing for venture capital, for entrepreneurs, for growing businesses.

If the hon. member has any suggestions to put forward as to how we can increase the amount of finance available, then I am quite prepared to look at them in a very serious way. If they are satisfactory ones, I would be happy to pass them on to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and encourage him to bring in some of these in his budget.

INCOME TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, when one of my colleagues asked if the federal government intends to allow all provinces to collect their own personal income taxes directly from individual taxpayers, the minister side-stepped the issue.

I ask the minister to provide the House today with a straight answer to this very serious question.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there are in existence tax agreements between the federal and provincial governments wherein the federal government collects tax for the provinces. The provincial taxes are based upon the rate of federal tax.

It has been the desire of the provinces to seek a greater degree of flexibility and to examine these agreements. It is for that reason the federal government has issued a discussion paper on this particular issue, based on a number of principles, namely flexibility, transparency, harmonization and simplicity.

The hon. member should know that every individual province should withdraw from the tax agreements on its own accord. What we are attempting to do through this discussion is ensure that there is a harmonized tax system in place. If it needs improvement, we will improve it.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Will the minister at least tell this House whether he agrees with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business that this proposal could result in a massive tax grab and spawn a terrible, complex income tax system?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business does make a very valid point.

That debate is going on right now. She may want to check with her own provincial minister of finance, who was party to this proposal, wanting a full-scale discussion on this issue of tax on income and provincial tax agreements. Obviously the views of Mr. Bulloch will be taken into serious consideration by the group that is studying this. Certainly it will be taken into serious consideration by the federal government and I hope by the provincial governments as well.

MEME BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday the food and drug administration announced that breast implant manufacturers must provide doctors with information for patients on the risks of implants. It must be written in easily understandable language.

His deputy minister has stated to the press that a similar move is not necessary in Canada. Will the minister now issue the same directive in Canada for products remaining on the market, while the safety and effectiveness data is reviewed on these products?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member from Coquitlam is aware that three years ago the Department of National Health and Welfare produced a booklet on breast augmentation. She also knows that information was available in Canada for women well before it was in the United States.

In answer to the specific question she raised, I was informed yesterday by the deputy minister about the U.S. directive to the implant makers. I will ask the same thing of the makers of the implants sold in Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer.

Is this the book we are talking about, the booklet that the Canadian Quebec Association of Plastic Surgeons, the Canadian Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery has put out? Is it the booklet that says: "In conclusion, in most cases the results of this operation are excellent and the level of patient satisfaction is high."

Surely the minister must ensure that this new information from the food and drug administration, which we have all been waiting for, is given to women in some straight talk, and not in suggestions that there is no problem with breast implants.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not appreciate that the member said that what is in that document is not accurate information. It is very good information. The department updates the booklet periodically, and we will do it soon.

I just want to say that the information given by the Department of National Health and Welfare to women about breast implants has always been in terms of scientific reality.

I look forward to the member agreeing with me that that information is what should be provided. I repeat what I said yesterday. If there is any other information which can help women concerning the breast implant we will be delighted to provide it to women.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. With the Leader of the Bloc Québécois, Mr. Claude Béland of the Fédération des caisses populaires said that what bothered him was the proposal to legislate the economy, which was rejected as out of hand. Even Premier Bourassa of Quebec, in referring to the proposed economic union, said there were important risks and that the proposal was unacceptable in its present form.

I therefore want to ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs who is using scare tactics? Is he prepared to say that Messrs Bourassa and Béland are using scare tactics, telling lies and being dishonest? In fact, they were repeating exactly what was said by the Leader of the Bloc Québécois yesterday. Will he admit that his proposal puts Quebec's powers in jeopardy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Premier Bourassa said that the proposal was not acceptable in its present form. When he said that, he was not referring to the credit unions or other specific areas. If the hon. member is suggesting that Premier Bourassa was making specific references, he is wrong. The hon. member asked me who is using scare tactics. Is Mr. Béland? No. Is Mr. Bourassa? No. Is Mr. Lucien Bouchard? Yes. Is Mr. Lapierre? Yes.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Since the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is trying to separate the sheep from the goats, I would like to ask him this: Yesterday, in response to a question by the Leader of the Bloc Québécois, the Prime Minister said, referring to new federal powers, and I quote: "The third one states that if Quebec for instance did not support the legislation, it could opt out altogether".

However, it says in the papers this morning that his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said it was only meant to give a province time to adjust.

I want to know whether this third article is a transition measure or a right to opt out permanently. Who is using smoke and mirrors here, the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the smoke and mirrors all come from the hon. member for Shefford, and he keeps trying to confuse the issue. This is an important question, and I answered it yesterday before the Parliamentary Committee when I said that the committee had the power to decide whether the right to opt out should be extended or established on a permanent basis. I hope, now that is clear, that the hon. member for the separatist party of Canada will stop trying to confuse Canadian citizens.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Small Businesses and Tourism.

On July 18, 1991 the Minister for Small Businesses and Tourism attended the cross-border shopping summit in Toronto which brought together representatives of business, labour, consumer groups, mayors, and provincial cabinet ministers from Ontario.

At that time a number of commitments were made on behalf of the federal government. One of particular importance was a commitment to look at the reduction or removal of third country tariffs on consumer goods that do not compete with similar Canadian made products, yet ultimately do affect the competitiveness of our retailers.

Could the minister report to the House on what progress has been made in bringing this commitment to fruition.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question and advise him that the department is reviewing, on a case by case basis, the tariffs on non-U.S. origin consumer goods, particularly those that have had a significant effect upon retail prices.

As we do this review we will obviously be in a position to take the necessary corrective action.

I appreciate the interest of the hon. member and assure him that the matter is well in hand.

JUSTICE

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Justice.

Since the Manitoba justice inquiry report was released on September 8, the government has chosen to ignore the report's proposals which would serve greatly to improve the unfair treatment of aboriginals in the delivery of justice.

Will the minister commit today to establishing a joint federal-provincial-aboriginal task force to implement the urgent changes to the justice system?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, I appreciate my hon. friend's question.

The government is in no way ignoring the results of the inquiry in Manitoba, nor are we ignoring the results from the other inquiries that have recently been held. In fact, we are taking these into account.

My hon. friend will know that the Minister of Justice recently convened in Whitehorse a conference on the administration of justice for native people. It was quite worth while. I was in attendance myself and I think we all got a lot out of it. We are awaiting the results of the various seminars that were held. I can assure my hon.

friend that the government intends to act on these matters.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

It is quite clear, from the minister's response and even from the government's constitutional package, that the government lacks the knowledge, the courage and the leadership to proceed with self-government for aboriginal Canadians.

Since the Manitoba inquiry is a model for self-government, will the minister recognize the right of aboriginal people to establish their own justice system as part of their inherent right to self-government immediately and not also delay that for 10 years?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that the government, as do all members of the House, always seeks more knowledge and more ways to appraise ourself to help solve a problem; there is no question about that.

I would also tell my friend that we are not lacking in courage and determination to tackle this problem.

Finally, I would say to my hon. friend what has been said by the Minister of Justice and myself. We think that the present system of justice is flexible enough to take into account the concerns of native people. We are working on it and I would appreciate my hon. friend's co-operation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Once again, Canada faces embarrassment on the world stage over its failure to act to protect the environment. The environmental group, Great Lakes United, feels it has to go as far as asking the United States to investigate the abysmal failure of the government to meet its international commitments under the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement.

When and how will the government do something about the increasingly dangerous toxic state of the Great Lakes, or is it waiting to be forced to act by the court of world opinion?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me first correct something. I think the hon. member may have made an error. She mentioned that the group asked the United States. I think it is the United Nations that they asked, not the United States.

There are obviously very important problems concerning the Great Lakes, but I think even the hon. member would recognize that some substantial progress has been made, although a lot remains to be done. This government is committed to pursuing its efforts in that area. Next week the International Joint Commission is meeting and I intend to be there, as does my counterpart, Mr. Bill Riley. We hope to update participation at the IJC and report on what we intend to do in the future.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in fact relationships with the American government on this issue were badly damaged by the repeated deferrals of this government on a joint pollution prevention plan and eventually Canada backed out totally of that agreement.

We have heard the promises. The minister made another one in front of the environment committee in June, saying that discussions on that agreement are on track and an announcement can proceed fairly rapidly. It is now September, nearly October. Poisons in the Great Lakes are not vanishing. What is the minister going to do about Canada's vanishing credibility on this?

• (1500)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree at all with the member when she says our relationship with our American counterparts is damaged on this issue. It is not true at all.

Just Monday of this week I was in New York with my counterpart to accept an award on behalf of all Canadians for the air quality accord. I think there is general consensus in this country and on all sides of this House that that was a major achievement on which we can model other initiatives.

In the area of the Great Lakes, I also remind the member that we have been active. There has been the St. Lawrence Seaway initiative of $110 million. In 1989 the government announced the $125 million Great Lakes action plan and more recently the pollution prevention action plan, a $25 million initiative. There has been action on that front.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in his response to the environment standing committee's report Out of Balance distributed today, the Minister of the Environment notes that Canada is committed to stabilizing its emissions of CO2 at 1990 levels by the year 2000 and that that is a central element of the government's green plan.

Yet last week when I put the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, he said: "It is Canada's policy to stabilize Canada's greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000". There was no mention of C02 specifically and no mention of a 1990 cap.

My question to the Minister of the Environment is: Is there a 1990 cap as the government's policy for C02 emissions by the year 2000?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Yes.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I ask him how he can possibly square that answer with the report of the National Energy Board on its energy supply and demand in Canada figures released last week, which projects Canadian C02 emissions to rise by more than 1 per cent a year every year from 1990 to 2010.

Where is the cap? Where even is the stabilization?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I recommend that the member read the National Energy Board report. He would find that it does not take into account the projected actions the government intends to undertake to reach that objective.

The situation we are facing today with C02 emissions is very similar to the one that we face with C02 emissions in the case of acid rain. When we knew we wanted a cap, we did not know at the time exactly how that would be undertaken, but we knew where we wanted to go. It is the same situation today, and we will set out to do that as we progress.

There is no contradiction there, none at all, and the member should read the National Energy board report. Then he will find that out for himself.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Right Hon. Peter Brooke, member of Parliament, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I would also advise the House that the hon. member for Beaver River rises on a matter of personal privilege to pay a tribute.

THE LATE SENATOR STAN WATERS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Senator Stan Waters who passed away yesterday in Calgary after a battle with cancer.

Senator Stan Waters was born in Winnipeg on June 14, 1920 of English immigrant parents. He was educated in prairie schools including Garneau—Strathcona High School in Edmonton.

In 1933 his parents sent him to England for one year to broaden his educational experience. He then entered the University of Alberta in 1938 before joining the war.

In 1941 Senator Waters left the University of Alberta to join B Squadron of the King's Own Regiment at Stettler as a private, and later that year as a corporal went overseas with his regiment.

On being commissioned in 1942, he volunteered for the newly formed Canadian parachute corps and after training was assigned to the U.S.-Canadian First Special Service Force which specialized in commando and parachute operations.

With the First Special Service Force, Stan fought through the costly mountain battles in southern Italy and the assault landing at Anzio. His unit was the first to enter Rome on June 4, 1944. Stan attained the rank of major when the unit was disbanded. He then joined the First Canadian Parachute Battalion and fought in northwest Europe in 1945.

After the war he served in a wide range of command and staff appointments, including command of the Princess Patriot's Canadian Light Infantry and the First Canadian Infantry Brigade in Calgary. He also served on UN peacekeeping assignments and NATO duties in Europe.

In 1971 he was promoted to Lieutenant-General and from 1973 until 1975 he commanded the Canadian army. A series of larger appointments in Ottawa afforded Stan an opportunity to observe closely the operation of Canada's government and its departments.

Following a distinguished military career, he joined the Mannix organization in Calgary in July 1975.

His transition to the business world was both swift and successful. In just over six months he became president of the Loram Group engaged in national and international activities, in heavy construction, oil and gas, coal, engineering and manufacturing.

This private sector experience, with all of the driving forces of Alberta's complex economy, gave Stan invaluable knowledge and skill in developing policy for the west and for Canada.

To his private sector career, Stan brought the loyalty, leadership, sense of service and drive developed during an extensive military career.

In August 1989 he was nominated by the Reform Party of Canada to contest the election for senatorial selection in Alberta. On October 16, 1989 he was elected by a large margin, nearly double that of the votes of the next candidate. After a wait of nearly nine months the Prime Minister acceded to the wishes of the Alberta electorate and appointed Stan Waters to the Senate in June 1990.

I was here when Senator Stan came to Ottawa in June 1990 to be sworn in as Canada's first ever elected senator. How exciting it was to be part of that historical occasion. During Senator Waters' one year in the Senate I appreciated his deep knowledge and understanding on a wide variety of issues. What company and comfort he offered to me on a personal basis, as well as politically.

I will always remember Stan Waters' ram-rod straight, military fashion commanding respect from all he came in contact with. I will also always remember Stan whisking into my office, slumping, relaxed into a chair and saying: "Well, Deborah, what can we do for the nation today?"

Stan was honest, direct and took a no-nonsense approach to whatever had to be done. He never compromised his beliefs.

I was fortunate to know Stan on a very personal basis. We shared a platform often. We travelled together and ate supper together while here in Ottawa. He was genuinely concerned about me as a person and would jump to my defence on any issue as a father would guard his daughter.

In closing, my life has been enriched by knowing Stan Waters. He was a great proponent of Senate reform, and I was pleased to see the government put Senate reform on the constitutional table before his death. That is a tribute to him as a pioneer in the Senate reform movement.

Canada has lost a great statesman. To Stan's wife, Barbara, his children Claudia, Mark, Virginia, Caroline and their families, I want to say thank you for sharing Stan with all of us.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, we wish to associate ourselves with the regrets already expressed at the passing of Senator Waters.

Stanley Waters led an exemplary and straightforward life with strong convictions, and he had the determination to pursue those convictions.

He joined the army during World War II and he worked his way up rank by rank to the very top, holding the rank of Lieutenant-General, Commanding Officer of the army contingent of the Canadian Forces at retirement.

He then turned to the world of business, working as a general manager of the well respected Mannix group for almost 15 years.

He held strong political views and, even though we in this party do not share all of them, we admired him for his tenacity and determination in pursuing them.

Among his views that we do share is the desirability of an elected Senate. When the opportunity arose for him to contest an election for the Senate he had the strength of character not only to contest and to win that election but to wait patiently for the many months that it took the Government of Canada to accept the verdict of the people.

It is unfortunate that Senator Waters' health prevented him from serving longer in the Senate where he was an active spokesperson for a point of view somewhat different from the others found in the Upper Chamber.

We want to join with our colleagues in expressing our deepest sympathies to Mrs. Waters, their daughters and their son at this most difficult time.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to join with the hon. member for Beaver River and the House leader of the Liberal Party in this tribute to the late Senator Stan Waters.

I knew Stan for a number of years. I basically knew him when he arrived in Calgary after retirement from the army and had met him prior to that when he was still serving in the army. He was an outstanding Canadian. Of that there is no doubt. His military service record established that clearly. He was a member of the famous Devil's Brigade, which was the subject of a movie. The Devil's Brigade was so-named by the Germans who found this Canadian-American group pretty fearsome. He rose to become the commander of the army, and upon retirement moved to Calgary and took a senior position with the Mannix group of companies. Another graduate of the Mannix group of companies was Peter Lougheed. That company seems to turn out politically active people.

Stan was an ally and a supporter for most of his politically active life. We differed in the last couple of years of his life but never about the question of the value of an elected Senate. In that regard his efforts are applauded and were a valuable contribution to the evolution of the constitutional structure of this country.

I too would like to join with other members of this House in offering our condolences to his wife and children, and say to them that in this difficult period they at least have the comfort of knowing that their husband and father was an outstanding Canadian who gave tremendously to this country.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend the condolences of the New Democratic Party caucus to the family and friends of Senator Stan Waters. Like most Albertans and the overwhelming majority of Canadians I did not know Stan Waters but I sure as heck knew of him.

Stan was one of those giants whom occasionally Alberta—and other areas of the country but Alberta in particular—seems to produce: a person of monumental integrity, granitic determination with a dedication to what he thought was the right thing to do, which was sufficient to help him past virtually all obstacles. In this he exemplified what is best in the Albertan and the Canadian spirit.

We have all lost a champion with the death of Stan Waters. However, I am certain that his legacy will live far beyond him and stand Canadians in good stead for decades to come.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to say that Senator Waters, whom I knew for about ten years, was always a person who was compassionate, approachable and caring. I would like to express my deepest sympathies to Mrs. Waters and the family and all of the grandchildren.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of Calgary Northeast I wish to express our deepest sympathy to the Waters family. We all knew Stan as a strong committed man of principles, a man who will take his place in history as one who contributed to raising the awareness of all Canadians about the undemocratic powers of some of our federal institutions.

General Waters represented Albertans with great dignity. We are especially proud of his contribution to political change and his place in history as Canada's first elected senator. He will be remembered as a great Canadian.

Mr. Speaker: So that the House knows where we are proceeding next, I am going to take the usual Thursday afternoon question, and then I have a question of privilege which I must hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, would the government House leader indicate to the House the business for Friday and next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Tomorrow it is my intention to call Bill C–32 for completion at second reading, Bill C–11 for completion at third reading, and Bill C–21 for completion at second reading.

On Monday it would be my intention to resume debate on the financial reform package. With the indulgence of the opposition I would like to have our usual discussions about the business of the House for the remainder of next week.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Question Period today I directed a question through you to the minister of trade about the entrepreneur of the year, Mr. MacEachern, announcing that he was selling his business and leaving the country. The minister of trade stood up and denied that assertion.

My staff double–checked the claim I made and as late as yesterday afternoon the information I received was confirmed. I believe that the minister of trade inadvertently misled the House when he denied the assertion that I made. In fact, Mr. MacEachern is selling his business and leaving the country.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. government House leader in a moment. I would just point out to the House that this is a dispute of fact and I have grave doubt as to whether it really is a point of order. The hon. government House leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Being a seat– mate of the Minister for International Trade I saw The Calgary Herald article in which Mr. MacEachern said that at 58 he was certainly not leaving Canada. He was not going to expand in the way he had in the past but he intended to carry on in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. government House leader. I think perhaps the exchange illustrates the difficulty we have where there may be a difference of opinion or debate on a question of fact.

However, I do not want hon. members to feel for a moment that they should be precluded from rising on a point of order on something they may have said which they may wish to clarify.

The exchange itself illustrates the fact that we must be careful in these matters.

PRIVILEGE

ACCESS TO THE DOCUMENT OUTLINING CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the House of Commons for 12 years, and during that time, my interest has been, above all, the debate on the Constitution.

As an observer, I have attended all federal–provincial conferences on the Constitution, and I have always taken my duties and responsibilities as an elected representative very seriously. A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, a document was tabled in the House, a document said to be the most important one in this session, considering the future of relations between Quebec and Ottawa, whatever form that will take.

Mr. Speaker, I heard today—and this is why I wish to raise a question of privilege—I heard today that I, as an elected representative, was given access to this document at 10 a.m. on Tuesday, when the Prime Minister rose in the House. I also heard that Mr. Paul Desmarais, Mr. Roger D. Landry, The Globe and Mail and others who were not elected by anyone and whose only qualification is that they have either influence or a lot of money, were given access to this document, directly by the Prime Minister, sometime on Monday.

Mr. Speaker, I can hardly find words to express this affront to Parliament and to the people who elected me. How can people elected to represent 75,000 or 80,000 people, with a mandate to deal with issues that concern the future of our country, be ignored in this way and given this information at the last minute? Are there citizens in this country who, because of their influence, are more equal than others?

Are we as members, and especially as members of the opposition expected to tolerate having to rush through a document we are supposed to analyse? Unlike the traditional parties, we did not even have a briefing session, while other individuals outside this House, on the basis of financial or other influence, are entitled to certain privileges, and the rest— I am sure they are supporters of the government.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how far this House can go in taking such an affront. How can we believe that the government respects the elected representatives of the people when it uses a double standard? And I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that not having access at the same time as Paul Desmarais or Roger D. Landry prevented me from being able to react as quickly as all members who had access, or the party leaders. According to my information, only the party leaders had a briefing. There was unwillingness even to leave the document with them. The leaders of the official parties were not trusted, but the friends of the government were!

Mr. Speaker, I would like you, as the guardian of the rights of this House and the guardian of members' individual rights, to reflect on this lack of respect for Parliament, this infringement on democracy. I would like to submit to you copies of the articles that were published. I can even tell you that I am sure that Lysiane Gagnon had a very good idea of the text before all the members did, judging by her article of Tuesday morning.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this affront to Parliament and infringement on democracy deserves your consideration and I await word from you as to how this affront can be rectified.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I would have appreciated some advance notice of this particular question from the member, especially as he began with an argument which he attempts to base upon the precedents of the House.

There is a longstanding precedent of giving warning when people are serious about engaging in a discussion of this kind. We do not usually raise these questions unless we are trying to make a political point. Then we raise them suddenly. If we are really concerned about the precedents of the House, we raise it in a different kind of way.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what your attitude is but I fail to hear anything coming from the mouth of the member relating to the privileges of the House. The member has a grievance. Following his grievance to its logical conclusion would mean that the government could not discuss anything with anyone until it had tabled something in the House of Commons.

If the member searches his memory, he will find that some days in advance members were given more than adequate warning that at 10 a.m. on Tuesday of this week there would be ministerial statements and a document would be available to members.

The member may have noticed that I was in my place throughout the presentation by the Prime Minister and the responses by the leaders of the two opposition parties and had no copy of the document. He had it a good hour ahead of me because it was made available in the lobbies as quickly as possible after the commencement of the announcement, as promised.

If you are looking for parliamentary precedents, Mr. Speaker, you only have to go back to June 18, 1987, when, I think, the member for Shefford was in the federal cabinet. The Speaker rose on a question of privilege based on a set of principles much like the member for Shefford has alluded to based on the premise that there was some obligation on the part of the Crown to notify the House. That was about a financial statement rather than a budget.

The argument presented from the other side was an attempt to use budget precedents to deal with the financial statement. Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there was no such obligation. Previous Speakers have ruled that there was no such obligation on the government. Certainly in this instance there was no such obligation on the government.

I could go one step further and remind the member for Shefford that in other parliaments based on the British parliamentary tradition when members choose to change their stripes from the party they were elected with they must resign their seats and run in a by-election. Then they can return to the House with some legitimacy.

The member was not elected to tear this country apart, yet he claims in this House that that is his intention.

Mr. Speaker: I think we are getting away from the point of order.

House of Commons

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague from Shefford has raised quite an important question of privilege, and I support him in it. Because last Monday, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs clearly indicated, and I quote:

[English]

"We have given an indication in fairly general terms to a number of organization, including as she would know"—

—the hon. member who asked the question—

[English]

"—the Canadian Labour Congress, as to where we intend to move in this document". But the document has not been circulated.

It is important to emphasize that. Moreover, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs continued in the same vein, saying:

[English]

"It will come first to the House of Commons".

We would be the first to have the documents, except for 12 copies that would go to the provincial premiers, and we think that is appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, as members of the House of Commons, we need information, before those who are not members receive it. If you have some respect for the House of Commons, you cannot send such documents to Mr. Desmarais, the Globe and Mail or Mr. Landry. It is unparliamentary and undemocratic, and I think that my hon. colleague raises a very important question of privilege because this is not the first time it has happened. Not only the hon. member from the Bloc Québécois but all members are concerned, because this government has acted in such a way many times.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of this House, you are asked to rule clearly on this point, to avoid recurrences of this practice in future.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to the statement by the hon. member for Shefford and the support given to it by the hon. member for Chambly. I also considered the comments of the hon. member for Calgary West.

We are faced here with a situation where several members are not at all happy that some people received the document in question before it was presented in the House of Commons. But I think that it is very important to consider immediately the difference between a document on constitutional proposals, for example, and the Budget. It is a very different situation. There is a difference. In fact, the members for Shefford and Chambly are not the only ones in such a situation, that is who did not receive the document in question before it was presented in the House of Commons. Indeed, this situation could apply to any member of the House, except some Cabinet members, perhaps. But the point made by the hon. member for Shefford is very clear. It may be grounds for a complaint, but I believe it is necessary to find out whether the grievance is serious enough that the hon. member was impeded in the performance of his parliamentary duties. The hon. member, who is a veteran here, well understands the difference between a grievance, a complaint and a question of privilege.

It therefore falls to me as Speaker to make a clear decision. According to the long tradition of this place and the circumstances involved here, this is not a question of privilege. I thank the hon. member for Shefford and the hon. member for Chambly for their presentation and also the hon. member for Calgary West for his statement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House that as all members know the hon. member for Edmonton North—

I apologize to the hon. member and to his constituents—who is a veteran of this House and is of course one of the acting speakers is not able to be with us for some weeks having had an operation. We are looking forward to his return.

In the meantime, we have had to make some changes and we have had to seek the help of hon. members to take the chair from time to time during debate. I know that hon. members will, when it is not possible for me or others to be here and when we have called upon our colleagues in the House to take the chair, pay those colleagues who have volunteered to take this very dangerous position the greatest co-operation and courtesy.

It is in this sense that I advise the House that the hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk is prepared to take my place for at least an hour or so. Thank you very much.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): I am sorry to interrupt your leaving, Mr. Speaker. I wish that you would convey to the hon. member for Edmonton North the sincere best wishes of every member of this Chamber who recognizes that his illness will hopefully be only temporary and we will enjoy his chairpersonship as soon as possible again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the distinguished member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, an old, old friend of mine, a former premier of my province and a veteran parliamentarian, that I appreciate very much his comments. I will pass them on to the hon. member who I think will also appreciate them with exactly the same sense of understanding as is extended by the hon. member.

Sometimes in this House we are disputatious, sometimes we have disagreements, but this is an example of the high regard that we hold for distinguished members of this place among each other. I thank the hon. member very much.

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motions that Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking; Bill C-28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, before we had a brief intermission, we were talking about Bill C-19 relating to the Bank Act. I was talking generally about why we as a party are not in favour of this act but are in favour of allowing banks to market and sell insurance policies. I was supporting myself and my party in this position through the experience of the Quebec caisse populaires which have been doing it for so many years.

I have talked to some of my colleagues on the Liberal side as well as the Conservative side, and one of the things we do know about caisse populaires is that in marketing insurance the satisfaction of customers can vary depending on how the caisse populaire operates. Once again, because caisse populaires are responsible to their owners who are the people in the community, there can be some caisse populaires perhaps being more responsible and more competitive than others. I am willing to grant my colleagues that.

The important difference between what the caisse populaires do and what the banks would do if they became owners—and that is the key word—of insurance companies is that the banks would not necessarily be responsible to their communities. They would be responsible to their shareholders. Insurance companies would not be responsible to their communities per se but to their shareholders which would be the banks.

It must be understood that this is not a position which is anti-corporation. It is not a position which is partisan or is anti-bank. What we are trying to be is pro-consumer. We want to see competition. We want to see the banks get in there and market insurance as the caisse populaires have done because we believe, as with the caisse populaires as I said before, this would bring about competition, competitive rates, competitive services, and at the same time employees would not lose their jobs. As a matter of fact in Quebec it has done very well, particularly from 1985 to 1991.

I just wanted to explain why we are in favour of allowing the banks to market insurance plans but not becoming owners of insurance companies.

I would just like to mention one last thing for those of us in this House who are from the prairies, who have seen the kind-heartedness of the banks when it comes to farmers who cannot pay their mortgages. I am concerned about what happened with banks owning insurance companies and farmers or consumers not being able to pay their insurance premiums. What would happen? What power could be brought to bear?

I really think that where banks and co-operatives primarily deal as marketers that augments competition and at the same time it protects consumers. That is why our party, which wants to maximize consumer protection, is in favour of that aspect.

I want to bring to the attention of the House the point about abuse of power. I am concerned about the abuse of power as we give more power to the banks. As a consumer advocate, I have seen it work in the sense of being very much against the consumer interest.

I mentioned a very interesting Supreme Court case of Houle v. Banque nationale du Canada. The judgment is in French and English and it shows how the banks with the power they have can actually put a small business owner into bankruptcy. I was referring to the Belanger-Campeau Commission where the co-chairman was actually the head of the Banque nationale du Canada and he objected very strenuously to my presentation of a brief in which I criticized the Banque nationale du Canada, referring to the Houle v. the Banque nationale du Canada decision in the Supreme Court of Canada. He had said that was not a proper complaint to make. I think it is.

Mr. Belanger referred to the fact that there is already a lot of protection for consumers. No matter what powers we give the banks today or with the passage of this legislation consumers will have a complaint mechanism. That is true. There is theory and there is reality. The reality is that there is not all that much protection.

Who protected them? I have a report here which is very interesting. It is actually a citation from a book called The Economics of Government Regulation, Theory and Canadian Practice. It is written by John C. Strick, and it is very interesting.

It says: "The increasing number of failures of financial institutions during the 1980s and the difficulties incurred by others brought the effectiveness of these early warning systems and the regulation of financial institutions into question. Mismatched assets and liabilities, the questionable quality of loans and lack of diversification were among the causes of failures of trust companies and the failure of the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank."

I am worried about what little power we really do have over the banks as far as their practices are concerned, and I agree with my hon. colleague from Nickel Belt when he said: "Let's keep them in their respective cages. Let's give them the limited powers they have. Let bankers be bankers."

I think the central thing is that we should look at what happened with American Express. I wrote a letter to the president of American Express more than a month ago. I have not received a response. The letter that I sent to him was referring to restaurant owners of Quebec who found out that the 5 per cent that they were asked to pay American Express for clients to use their credit cards was exactly double that which restaurant owners have to pay in the United States.

They thought it was unfair. They are boycotting American Express in my province. I just asked the president of American Express to explain to me why we have this anomaly, and I have yet to receive a reply. Talk about complaint mechanisms.

When a member of Parliament cannot get a reply, who can?

In summation, I want to talk about American Express and interest rates.

Take a look at the lowering of interest rates that we all, as parliamentarians, have seen and that the other side has often reminded us of. I appreciate that reminder from the government side, but every time I see my statement from Visa or the other companies, I see the interest rates not going down appreciably, but staying the same.

What is our complaint mechanism? We have none. What is the social responsibility of the banks? I do not think it is very large in their estimation. What about the possibility of getting the banks to be socially responsible in bringing down their interest rates? If we are talking about 21 per cent, that is only the middle ground. Some of the interest rates are as high as 28 per cent. That is not socially responsible.

I referred to my hon. colleague from Nickel Belt. He presented a private members' bill trying to create a ceiling so that there will be only a certain number of percentage points above the general rate. That has not been dealt with but I think it is an interesting idea.

The summation is this. Our party is in favour of competition. We are in favour of giving the banks more diversification because through Third World loan problems, through the recession, banks need some protection, perhaps through diversification. We are not in favour of allowing the banks to become so globalized, such a predator or awesome creature that we all get eaten alive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Monteith): The hon. member's time has expired. It is now the 10-minute question and comment period.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to first of all make a couple of comments and then ask my colleague a question.

There is perhaps no other Canadian who has made a reputation as a consumer advocate as my colleague from Chambly has. As a matter of fact, Ralph Nader in the United States is known as the Phil Edmonston of the United States, just to show you how effective he has been.

My colleague has made a very, very good point about the role of credit union movements and the fact that ordinary people are represented through their participation in a co-operative effort in the financial institution they own and share in.

Their decisions are made not just on economic bases but on social bases as well. The case in Quebec has demonstrated an option of people power through the credit union movement.

I will be speaking later in the day about our own experience in British Columbia.

I would ask the member, in all the years of work that he has done prior to coming to this Chamber, why is it that the governments that he has experience in fighting have not been the kind of spokespersons and leadership people in advocating the expansion of the role of the caisse and credit unions in competition with the banks? Why are they afraid of that competition?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament from Quebec I have seen, as a result of the last referendum in Quebec in which Quebec was forced to turn inward and pretty well give vent to its entrepreneurial spirit, Quebec deciding it was going to go on its own economically as much as the law allowed it to do at that time.

It was good because following the last recession, Quebec was full of ideas that were quite remarkable and many people, even one of my Liberal colleagues, had mentioned that it was more of a Quebec incorporated. It has been Quebec incorporated and I think it was a good thing for the country.

Quebec was forced to think of new ideas because it found itself alone. It was not really alone, but it felt alone, and it felt it had to take its own economic path.

I see a similar situation occurring in other provinces. I can tell you that when we are talking about what happened with the Caisse de dépôt in Quebec. The province of Ontario in the past few weeks has been sending out messages to the extent that it would like to have the same economic leverage and the same economic orientation as Quebec had using that fund in order to bring about economic reform, economic redevelopment, industrial development, more or less making Ontario incorporated. I think it is a good idea.

What we are talking about essentially is, I believe, doing away with these myths of partisanship of "Well, if we are Liberal we have to think this way, or we are NDP so we have to think this way, or if we are Conservative—"

The points presented by this government and its Constitution proposition show that many things are on the table and many things will be looked at in a non-partisan way. I think that is a good beginning.

When we talk about the banks and economic philosophy I would like us to continue to try to stay away from pure ideology and—

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a phrase commouly used in Quebec: good common sense. That is what is called for. We must take a pragmatic approach, have a reasonable view on things. In a way Quebec is extremely pragmatic, if I may say so, and it never sought to curb entrepreneurship. Quite the contrary, it went as far as giving the Caisse de dépôt an opportunity and the tool to promote entrepreneurship in the province.

I am seeing the same thing with Bob Rae in Ontario. Especially given this social conscience in the sense that it not about just making money, but making money by creating jobs and trying to involve the people, the consumers, the businessmen and women, the union members, the grass roots, the people in the field.

I can tell you that, in Quebec, we have a solidarity fund. I expect Ontario to follow suit, as well as British Columbia and Alberta, because that idea makes good common sense.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, in response to my hon. colleague's question, I think that our present economic problems will inevitably dictate that we take Quebec and other provinces—like British Columbia with auto insurance—as models in the future.

I think that the people who are watching us are not interested in demagogy or partisanship. They do not want that. They want pragmatic, practicable ideas.

Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased by that, because I remember my constituents in Chambly telling me the day I was elected: "Phillip, stay away from partisanship. Use good common sense. That is what we elected you for." I think that we can all benefit from such advice.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I too want to add my congratulations to you for taking over the chair in the absence of our friend from Edmonton North. I wish to express my feelings and best wishes to the Acting Speaker and Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole for a full and speedy recovery. I see him not only as a competent Deputy Chairman in this House, but as a colleague of this House of Commons and a friend. I certainly wish him the very best.

I think that for the benefit of our other colleagues in this House, I would be very much remiss if I did not tell them about the International Ploughing Match last week in my riding. Mr. Speaker, you look every bit as much at home in the chair as you did on the seat of that tractor when you won the VIP competition in ploughing. I bow to you. I only finished second. I have to say it was against very experienced competition.

Mr. Speaker, you look almost as equally at home as you did in the cross-cut saw and the log sawing competition. I should explain to the minister of fisheries that it was a 16 inch hardwood log and the member for Kenora-Rainy River and I went through it in 22 seconds. The Speaker and his colleague went through it in a slightly longer time. When I say a 16 inch hardwood log, the minister of fisheries knows that we use the same ruler for measuring logs as we do for measuring fish. There can be some discrepancies. Of course, I did not say whether it was the butt of the log or the small end of the log that we cut from.

In any event, I was very proud of the way my colleagues participated in their competitions at the international ploughing match. It was an excellent match and one that I will always be proud of, as I am proud of the members who attended that event within my constituency.

We have heard several members today mention the company of American Express. I think it would be wrong if I did not point out one of the experiences I have had in just the last few days. When we have corporate concentration in the marketplace with huge companies involved, how do we resolve a problem? This goes back a few years when I used my card on numerous occasions.

As a result of a mistake made by the company in crediting the wrong amount, an amount other than what was written on my cheque when I paid the account, I was threatened and harassed. Finally we got it straightened out. To this day I do not know whether that experience is a blemish on my credit rating or not.

I was shocked and very, very upset when my new card came about three months ago —and because I am of Scottish ancestry I hate to pay for something I do not need—I decided that I was going to cut it up and send it back and ask to have my account closed.

The company charges $55 for membership. If we do not use the card, cut it up, and send it back. Naturally the account should be closed and that $55 should be written off.

However, I received a notice the next month that I owed $55. Just yesterday, I received a notice saying that my account was going to be cancelled unless I paid that $55, in spite of the fact that I notified the company in writing, cut up the card and sent it back to them.

How do you deal with a company like that? The reason I am talking about this today is because this morning I wrote them a letter and sent it by registered mail explaining these details. Tomorrow morning I am going to send them another letter and include a copy of Hansard. We will see what action that brings.

I took part in the debate on the amendments to the last Bank Act back in the early 1980s and I welcome the opportunity to participate in the second reading debate on Bills C-19 and C-28. I want to make it very clear that the Liberal Party of Canada supports in principle this new legislation.

The banking and insurance industries have been waiting a long time for this new legislation and, while our party has some concerns about both bills, we will not stand in the way of their passing. We will seek to have our concerns addressed when the bills go back to committee.

I just want to touch on a few of those concerns, the concerns that I as a farmer have, and which I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you must have as you represent a riding not unlike the one I represent.

I am very concerned because over the last several years our farm industry has been the subject of attack from various sectors. We have been the subject of an attack that accused our marketing systems of ripping off the consumer.

I conducted a study this summer. I did not take any time off my job as a parliamentarian, but I conducted a major study, with the assistance of my competent staff: Nick Heisler, my research assistant, and Susan Mogensen and Sue Richardson. We called this study "Compare the Share". One of the things shown very clearly, these figures are from Statistics Canada or Agriculture Canada, on a graph—and this is an illustrated study, it is very easy to read—is that farm input prices go up across the graph while income figures go the other way.

No business can survive with that sort of thing happening. A lot of those increases in inputs was a result of interest rates. There is a big difference between the interest rates in Canada and those in the U.S. There is also a big difference between the fuel prices in Canada and the U.S. However, some of the shockers—and they are all in this study—include that the producer price for milk went up by 19 cents a litre in the last 10 years, well below the rate of inflation, while the price between the producer and the consumer increased by 73 cents a litre, or 97 per cent. That is an increase in the inflation rate of 9.7 per cent per year, and that is not acceptable.

For cheese, the producer price increased by $1.53 per kilogram while the spread between the cheese factory and the consumer increased by $5.34 per kilogram, an increase of 86.4 per cent. Again, double the level of inflation.

For chicken, the processor-retail spread increased by $2.20 per kilogram, an increase of 87 per cent, while the producer price increased by 28 cents per kilogram. At the same time as corn prices in Ontario declined over the last 10 years, the consumer price of corn flakes increased by 97 per cent. The price of wheat to the farmer declined in the last 10 years while the retail price of sweet cookies increased by 111 per cent, solid cookies by 132 per cent, whole wheat cereals by 192.6 per cent and crackers by 235 per cent.

During this whole time, we experienced a period of high interest rates, which were raised to counteract inflation, to bring down inflation; interest rates which created hardship for countless Canadian people, particularly primary producers.

We keep hearing the buzz word "competitiveness", that we have to be more competitive to compete in the global market. Yet, we see the devastation in our communities in close proximity to the U.S. border caused by cross-border shopping. The fact of the matter remains that, due to the concentration of the food industry, after the food leaves the processor there are increases in the price of these food products several times the rate of inflation, and they are ignored by government.

Why didn't the Governor of the Bank of Canada look into this cause of inflation? Where has he been? I keep thinking of the bird that flew the coop. Why was he not monitoring this increase, and where was the Bureau of Competition? We know where some of them were, they were criticizing our farm producers and telling us we had to be more competitive and attacking our marketing board systems, which are the most sophisticated systems in the world.

This study completely vindicates our farm marketing board systems. They have provided food to the Canadian consumer, high quality food at very reasonable prices. Yet, the consumer has been ripped off after the food has left the processor.

I am concentrating on the concentration in the marketplace. If this concentration is allowed to continue it is going to create more hardship for other sectors of society.

This is happening. We know the Minister of Agriculture has funded the Canadian Consumers Association to do a study of marketing boards, a study based on false assumptions. Why was there not an examination done of the concentration in the corporate sector? I want to emphasize that point. One of the retail food chains in western Canada—where there is a population of somewhere between 7.5 million people and 8.5 million people—serving the area from Thunder Bay west to the Pacific coast sent $545 million in dividends back to the parent company in the United States last year. How can we have it both ways, telling our own people that we have to be more competitive when $545 million is leaving this country in the form of dividends? It doesn't add up.

The Canadian farmer has to have a fair share of the consumer's food dollar or he will not survive.

I am deeply concerned about the concentration of power in the corporate sector. I fear that this will become a government of corporate decision. Who will provide the counterbalance to the marketplace if this concentration continues? Until now, in the rural sector, in the farm sector, those marketing boards provided that counterbalance to the marketplace. If they are traded away at GATT, where is that counterbalance going to come from?

It was just a year ago that the Minister for International Trade at the time, now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, chastized the Minister of Agriculture for the $8.8 billion worth of subsidies to farmers, $2.2 billion of that going to Canadian dairy farmers. That was not a subsidy. Their actual subsidy was $267 million. You know that, Mr. Speaker.

The government was using an aggregate measure of support, which was a concocted figure. It took the difference between what American farmers received for milk and what Canadians received for milk and called that a $2.2 billion subsidy, completely ignoring the fact that our input costs are 25 per cent higher on this side of the border. If that is a subsidy to our Canadian dairy producers, then I maintain that the fact that our interest rates in Canada are 25 per cent higher than those in the United States must be considered a subsidy to the banks. If it is sauce for the goose it is sauce for the gander. I hope this government realizes that before it starts giving away the store at the GATT negotiations coming up in the near future.

I fear the same thing is going to happen with the financial institutions.

I just want to make a quote from a news article. It is an editorial that says:

> The growing monopolistic control of agribusiness and food companies continues. Our federal government has not only allowed this growing concentration but has often encouraged it. We believe this concentration of agricultural and food enterprises is depressing farm commodity prices and depressing our economic recovery. About six corporations dominate the grain business. The big three control 80 per cent of the fed beef business and four or five of these companies also dominate the poultry and hog business. Some of the biggest companies own cattle feed yards, plus hog raising and poultry raising facilities. They are grain traders, grain exporters, feed manufacturers and food processors. We still "wonder" because strange things are happening. Total supplies of grains and beans are at the lowest levels in 30 years yet prices continue at record lows. During the past four weeks the bottom has fallen out of the cattle markets. Meat packers say prices are lower because USDA reports show there is a glut of fat cattle in the feedlots.

Mr. Speaker, this must sound familiar to you because you are a farmer yourself, but that is an editorial out of The Thumb Farm News in the State of Michigan. I submit that the same thing is going to happen in Canada if this continues.

I also want to quote from another article in another issue of the same paper. The headline is "Feeding a hungry world from an empty shelf". I just want to say that this article points out very clearly that the supplies of grain and corn in the U.S. at the present time are at very, very low levels. It says:

The only meaningful supply of surplus food is in Western Europe and Canada. We are approaching our fall harvest with indications we'll have a reduced corn and bean harvest—.This in turn could reduce future milk, meat and poultry production. Meanwhile U.S. farm prices, adjusted to 1982 dollars, are the lowest in history and showing little signs of increasing.

The price discovery system in the marketplace is not working. Our Canadian farmers are the victims of this and they are the victims of the Export Enhancement Programs. I must say that even the United States Senate is now questioning crop estimates in the U.S., questioning the fact that USDA estimates are far higher than the actual fact and are misleading the market and misleading the American people and, consequently, reflecting on world markets.

This ties in with our Canadian farm income. When I look at the farm debt structure in Canada, I shudder. This industry cannot continue under current conditions and if this government trades away our dairy and poultry sector at GATT, you will see a tremendous erosion of assets immediately. I would suggest we look at the breaks the banks got on loans to Third World countries, a write-off in tax revenue of about $3 billion since the mid-1980s. I would suggest that the Canadian farmers should have the same treatment.

It is through no fault of the farmers or mismanagement that the grain prices collapsed. It is through no fault of theirs that they are in dire difficulties. Their dairy and poultry sectors are the only sectors in our Canadian economy that are showing a reasonable return on investment, management and risk, a return that has been questioned now in terms of aggregate measures support and other fancy names that are looked upon as subsidies. I want to make sure that this is on the record. We must stop this madness of thinking of trading away the best system of any country in the world, a system that has ensured ample quantities of high quality food to our Canadian consumers at reasonable prices and I ask specifically for this government to watch the corporation structure in this country and the concentration of power. More specifically, I ask the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Bureau of Competition to examine more closely the causes of inflation and take action to prevent it so that the Canadian consumer is not being ripped off. The farmers of this nation have an income that is commensurate with the rest of society, an income that will allow them to survive and continue to produce ample quantities of food, not only for the people of Canada, but for the millions of starving people around the globe.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a very brief observation.

I was struck by the presentation of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. He highlights a point that has not been raised today with great vigour. While he has focused by way of explanation and by way of illustration on the circumstances that prevail in the farming community, he has touched a point that is central to all of us. The consumer, despite the fact that our party accepts this legislation in principle, has yet to receive the appropriate safeguards.

My colleague points to the inequities in our economy, especially as it relates to farm gate prices and to the conditions that ought to be nurtured so that we can give a fair return to a very important sector of our economy. The producers of agricultural products are finding themselves in a situation where they are reaping, in real dollars, much less than they were a decade ago. We have not been fortunate enough over the course of the last seven years to have a government that would address that reality.

Our colleague has pointed out so lucidly that we have seen a correspondingly high rise in retail prices, while the producer end of that whole process remains at a point inferior to that enjoyed a mere one decade ago.

It appears to me that under this legislation we are doing the same thing again except on the banking side. We are not taking a look at the consumer and perhaps we are not paying sufficient attention to the infrastructure we are putting in place.

Had we looked at things much more carefully in the agricultural sector, we might have been able to provide our producers and the agricultural component of our economy with a fair return. This would seem to be justified by those of us from an urban area and by the end price a consumer pays for products which emanate from the agricultural community.

I wonder whether my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex could give us an indication of what we might do to rectify the absolutely low returns our producers in the farming community are getting and at the same time satisfy the requisites of the general consumer for lower prices than the ones we are currently forced to pay.

My colleague from Lambton—Middlesex did a tremendous job at the international ploughing competition. He was there as a competitor, a friendly rival and he gave an education to urban members such as myself. At the same time he highlighted the importance of the agricultural community and the overall economy of Canada.

I wonder if he would give us an observation on that.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I have given this a lot of thought over the years. I have always been involved in farm organizations. I have seen the ups and downs. I have seen the stability that was brought to these organizations through the involvement of this House by providing legislation to the producers.

It was legislation that brought stability to both the poultry and dairy sectors and was introduced in 1935 under a Conservative government. It created the Canadian Wheat Board that brought stability to that sector in the prairies that is suffering extensively at this time. It is legislation that as I indicated earlier developed the most sophisticated marketing systems of any country in the world.

I am very upset that this legislation may be undermined by negotiations that are taking place behind closed doors. This House has no input into it, and I have to wonder how any democratic society can proceed to neuter legislation passed through this Chamber behind closed doors in secret negotiations that do not involve those producers themselves.

I spoke on this subject on March 18 in a "late show" when I talked about the fact that this government has done nothing to counteract the export enhancement subsidies, provisions made in the free trade agreement under chapter 18 whereby a country is not satisfied with the action of another country.

I should refer back even further to the free trade agreement to when they agreed not to subsidize in each other's market. But the provisions are there in chapter 18 to ask for consultation and compensation for losses incurred. That has not happened.

I think, too, that we should support and enhance our producer marketing boards, agencies and commissions rather than taking away their legislative powers. There are rumours that they may lose their cost of production formulas. The rumours are that they may lose the protection of article 11, which provides that any country having a system of planned production within that same country can apply those same restrictions to imports.

It has been very effective in Canada. The United States has had such protection for years since the mid-1950s under article 22 of GATT. We may lose that. If they think it is a trade-off or a fair trade to trade article 11 with article 22, they are dreaming. Our input costs are 25 per cent higher here.

How do you break into another market in another country if your input costs are higher? It is impossible. I think what consumers should demand of marketing boards, is that the board of directors of those corporations be responsible for the huge increases in price to the consumers. Corporations have control of the food from the time it leaves the processor.

We have had 36 food processing firms close down in Ontario since January 1989. We know they are not the cause of the rip-off, but it is after it leaves that processor. Let us appoint consumers to those boards of directors. It is only fair. If you are going to have them on the one hand on producer agencies, let's have them on the other.

Those corporations are far more powerful than any of our marketing boards here in Canada. They control far larger dollar volumes of food.

I think we should be looking at the possibility of calling a royal commission of inquiry into the food chain after the food leaves the processor until in fact it arrives in the consumer's shopping cart.

I think we have to even strengthen article 11 to the point where it will include provisions for those countries practising sustainable agriculture.

I believe too that if our farmers are going to have to compete against products from other countries, the same health regulations should apply in those countries. The same herbicides and pesticides, other chemicals and hormones that are banned in Canada should be banned on all imported foods. These are things we can do to ensure the quality of imported food arriving on a consumer's table if we have to import it. Our own food in Canada is some of the best and highest quality in the world. I for one want to see those quality standards maintained even in imported foods.

I could go on and on with my colleague here. His question was right to the point. I have to commend him on his display of expertise in horseshoe pitching at the international ploughing match last week. I was delighted to be his host. You saw his expertise. For a member from downtown Toronto he did extremely well—

An hon. member: What's the matter with downtown Toronto?

Mr. Ferguson: —and I hear rumours that another colleague here who just commented was afraid to show his competence in the competition. He did not come in but I will take him down to the farm some day and I am sure you will come over and help me, Mr. Speaker. We will give him some instruction so he will be prepared to participate next year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Monteith): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence—Trade; the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—COSIC; the hon. member for Halifax—Port of Halifax; the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys—Rights of the Child; the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park—Canadian Passports.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker I want to take this House back and try to reconstruct as best I can from the facts we have on record a story which I believe is sordid and which requires rectification.

It began some time in mid-1986. A company by the name of 158792 Canada Limited with its head office at 101 McNab Street, Markham, Ontario applied for a bank licence. This was not an ordinary bank licence in Canada but a licence as a Schedule B bank, a foreign bank coming into Canada.

Many foreign bank licences had been granted under the normal provisions of the law, a law which had been opened up very widely since 1980. In the ordinary course of events these banks were automatically granted their charters and their rights to do business in Canada. It was part of the policy of the previous government and this government.

However, something happened. The application for this bank licence became stalled. For 27 months our officials here in Ottawa sat on this application and would not grant it.

Let us go forward a couple of years. In the 1988 election, and the election campaign that took place on a very heated basis in 1980, there were some dramatic swings in the polls and the major issue facing Canadians was that of free trade. Canadians can legitimately be for or against free trade and were at that time because it was a major issue.

One thing that happened which I think is unusual in Canadian election history is that during the latter parts of that election campaign massive funds and massive lobbying started to pour in to Canada and smear campaigns were all over the television and the newspapers.

Who was launching this campaign? There was a massively financed campaign in the United States in support of free trade led by Mr. James Robinson and Mr. Ross Johnson. Mr. James Robinson is the president of American Express and Mr. Robinson, a director of American Express, was with J. R. Nabisco.

In Canada a lobby spearheaded by the Business Council on National Issues, whose chairman was David Culver, led the campaign for free trade. Is it any coincidence that Mr. David Culver was also a director of American Express U.S.? What we had on election day was not only the victory of the Conservative government which we all know about. Many Canadians, most people in Canada, did not vote for free trade. However, something happened on November 21, election day, apart from the electoral results. An Order in Council was passed.

How could the Clerk of the Privy Council scurry around on election day in bad weather and get the signatures of three cabinet ministers on a particular Order in Council? This Order in Council passed November 21, 1988, election day, was an Order in Council to create the Amex Bank of Canada.

On December 17, 1988, published in the Globe and Mail—and that was a Saturday just before Christmas—was a small ad saying that 158792 Canada Limited intended to apply for letters patent in order to become Amex Bank of Canada.

The member for York Centre realized in January 1989 what was happening and called for an inquiry. On February 1, 1989 I raised this issue publicly, asking for full details. On February 3, the Minister of Finance—I do not know whether it was out of embarrassment or out of a sense of what he thought was justice, I certainly thought it was the proper thing to say at the time— said to Canadians through this House: "We will not grant letters patent to Amex Bank Limited until such time as all of the financial legislation dealing with the banks is in place". It had been on the table for many years but the government was working to bring it to a head.

Why did we object vehemently to this indication that American Express would be able to carry on business in Canada as a bank at this particular time? Very briefly, American Express was in breach of five out of nine of the government's own guidelines for the admission of foreign banks to Canada. That is why the competent members of the bureaucracy had sat on this application for over two years and had not allowed it to go through. Five out of the nine guidelines of this government were breached the moment Amex Bank Limited was entitled to carry on business in Canada.

This was unprecedented. No wonder the minister was embarrassed and said: "We will give you the legislation before they have a chance to carry on their banking business". This was not to be.

Later, in spring 1989, we were told "No, we cannot wait for the bank legislation to come down. It is too urgent that American Express be granted its licence to do business in Canada". Finally, on April 25, 1990, the government bit the bullet—I am sure there were members of that government who did not want to have to bite that bullet—and issued the letters patent to American Express giving it the right to carry on the banking business in Canada in breach of five of the government's nine guidelines, which had not been changed. This was opposed by the Canadian Banking Association and by every person in Canada who believes that no person should be above the law.

Why this unseemly haste? Why did the government have to put the cart before the horse to grant privileges to a company. Did it have something to do with the free trade deal and the leadership shown by American Express both in Canada and in the United States in supporting the free trade deal? They are entitled to do that. Everyone is entitled to fight openly for the policies they want to see for Canada, but it is not fair for a government to give special privileges and break its own guidelines to anyone, regardless of how close they are as political cronies.

In this Bank Act amendment what do we see dealing with this particular issue, American Express. We see that the government has not even dealt properly with the issue at hand. It has tried retroactively to change the guidelines for the admission of foreign banks. It says: "You do not have to be a bank in your home jurisdiction. We will expand that. We will expand it to cover companies such as American Express".

American Express was not a bank in its home jurisdiction, the United States, nor was it regulated as a bank in its home jurisdiction of the United States. So what has the government done? It has said that pretty well any financial institution from the United States or abroad can come into Canada.

In the guidelines the minister brought down last fall for the reform of federal financial institutions, it said that schedule II bank designations would be expanded to include non-banks owned by widely regulated financial institutions that are not themselves banks.

The key phrase was "regulated financial institutions". Do we find that phrase "regulated financial institutions" in the new guidelines to deal with this type of situation? No, the government has taken out the word "regulated". So any type of so-called financial institution now has the privilege to sweep through the door as a result of the legislation this government is attempting to pass to justify retroactively its privileged treatment of American Express. Is this good for Canada's financial institutions and for our financial climate? It creates a great deal of uncertainty.

Does it mean that institutions such as Ford Credit, Chrysler Credit, Sears, IBM and General Electric—which are huge financing institutions; they issue commercial paper and extend credit to the customers who buy their products—will be able to come into Canada to compete with our banks?

BCCI was a foreign bank that came into Canada. However, I believe there is some indication that maybe its ultimate owner was simply a non-bank holding company from Luxembourg.

Is it fair to impose upon bank regulators in Canada the obligation to supervise all of these foreign banks and the few that are Canadian? The vast multitude which are now doing business in Canada are foreign; over 60 of our banks are foreign. Is it fair to impose upon our bank regulators the necessity to regulate these and examine what they are doing in every other jurisdiction, in order to determine whether they are sound, whether they are obeying the laws, whether they are legal, and whether they are laundering money? No. We want at least to ensure, and the taxpayers of Canada want the right to ensure, that banks coming into Canada from abroad are regulated according to the high standards which we think are appropriate. In that way we will protect Canadian investors, Canadian users of the banks. That is right and fair. Why open this whole thing up?

That is not the only consideration. In the free trade agreement—and we did not see the final version in September—in the final version are contained some annexes. There is an annex B called "tourism services". Inserted in annex B, which extended free trade to various service industries, were tourism services including tourism related services of a financial nature. I would like to know who it was who lobbied the government to include tourism related services of a financial nature into the free trade deal at the last minute. Canadians have a right to know.

Was it one of the giants of international tourism? Was it a foreign firm? Why was it put in? Who was going to benefit from it? Why was it not included up front when these documents were being considered in September? Why was it slipped in, in November 1988?

Another problem we face in terms of the free trade deal with the United States is that our banks did not receive reciprocity with American banks. They did receive national treatment. That means that American banks coming into Canada can do as Canadian banks do here. American Express can also do in Canada some things that Canadian banks cannot do. It can sell all sorts of goods on its plastic. It has the ability to be in the tourism business. Do Canadian banks receive the same treatment in the United States as American Express does here? They do not.

Under the Glass–Steagall Act, Canadian banks cannot acquire U.S. securities firms. We did not get that right under the free trade agreement. American banks have privileges in Canada that Canadian banks do not have in the United States.

Another instance is the McFeddran Act. In the United States there are certain limitations on interstate branch banking. Canadian banks going into the United States are still subject to those restrictions. American banks coming into Canada are not subject to those branch banking restrictions.

We did not even get a fair trade for our Canadian banks. Not only were the laws of Canada breached to grant special privileges to American Express, but our own financial institutions are put at a competitive disadvantage.

The banks are asking Canadians to give them extended privileges: insurance, the ability to get into auto leasing, and many other things. These are privileges they have not been granted.

The banks have a point: "Why can't you give us at least the same privileges you are prepared to give to American Express? Why should we be hamstrung as financial institutions?"

The bank serves two functions in Canada. One is as a service industry to help finance, as intermediaries of deposits from every one of us, investment and business and job creation.

• (1640)

They are a key tool to a dynamic, growing economy. Let us look at them as an industry on their own, the employment and the innovations they are bringing, the technological changes and what they can do for our GNP, both in Canada and through their international banking operations.

When the banks come to the House of Commons and say to government "we want more privileges", how can this government with clean hands say: "No, we will not give them to you but we were happy to give them to American Express"?

I was hoping that the bank legislation would have dealt with this issue. I would hope that the committee would have a full opportunity to hear officials from American Express, the government and our bureaucrats as to why they held up this application for some 24 to 27 months.

I believe that this is an issue which needs a full airing, and I believe it is critical to restore confidence in a non-partisan operation of all our laws to all Canadians.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I really listened with a great deal of interest to a very well presented, unemotional, clear yet carefully documented and thoughtful look at why Mr. Grinch has come to visit Canadians not only through the free trade agreement in one or two areas, but also in a very important sector of our society, the banking sector.

I really want to thank my colleague and seatmate here for having brought this to the attention of Canadians. It is certainly something that very few of us I know were aware of. I would like to ask you, seeing as how we do not have a level playing field in either this area or in a number of other areas because of the badly negotiated agreements done by our colleagues across the floor, to explain firstly why the major banks of this country did not intercede or intervene.

Second, can you assure that when this bill goes to committee the big boys are not going to stop the playing field and are going to pull in the kinds of reports or the kinds of openness which will allow us a little glimpse into why Father Grinch got cinched in this deal, or singed?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I thank very much my seatmate, the member for Mount Royal, for this question.

First of all let me say this. When Canadian banks became aware of what was happening in this area they spoke out. The Canadian banks were the ones that were appalled by the lack of treatment according to law. They were appalled by the lack of rule of law, and they were appalled by the discretion which the minister took into his own hands in order to breach his own guidelines and grant favoured treatment.

Mrs. Finestone: Five out of nine.

Mr. Peterson: He broke five out of nine guidelines, and so the Canadian banks were on record on this particular issue.

The Canadian banks are still on record because they are worried. Now that the government has passed these wide open guidelines to justify retroactively what it did in terms of American express, all sorts of other financial institutions are going to be able to sneak in through the back door and compete in Canada.

If this is the intention of the government, let it come forth and tell us why it wants to see the Fords, the Sears and the Chryslers coming in here with their credit unions as banks. Let it make the case, and a case might be made in many of these cases. I would like to hear what it is.

It will be a very different set of financial institutions that we have in Canada. It will impose very different regulatory requirements. It will be a very big burden on our regulators here if we are going to allow every type of financial institution, whether regulated in the home jurisdiction or not, to come into Canada.

Please, Canadians deserve to be told what they are getting and why they are getting it and have open discussion and debate on it. It was not sufficient.

The minister told us with respect to American Express: "It is already in Canada doing some financial activities, therefore we might as well give it a bank licence so we can regulate it as a bank". That is not a justification that washes. This is going to committee and I hope that the hon. member for Mount Royal will come with her usual probing questions and sense of justice to ask members of the Department of Finance and members of the banking establishment how it was that this licence could ever have gone through.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Willowdale, in his very able and lucid speech, talked about the granting of this nefarious licence to American Express that the government engaged in on election day in 1988.

Based on his extensive knowledge of world affairs, and particularly the dealings of the banks, could he inform the House whether in his view the granting of this licence had anything to do with funds that were contributed to those organizations that were advertising in favour of free trade during the election campaign, which necessarily implied a vote in favour of the Conservative Party?

Mr. Peterson: I cannot stand in this House and say that it was a quid pro quo and that somebody said: "We will support you in free trade massively if you grant us a bank licence".

An hon. member: It is a giant coincidence.

Mr. Peterson: I do not know. The facts are that the leading advocates of free trade in the last days of the election campaign of 1988, south and north of the border, were very closely linked to American Express. Shortly after that, a special privilege was granted by the Government of Canada to American Express on election day, November 21, 1988, and that was not the best of weather. People did not want to have to be out doors.

A clerk of the Privy Council, in order to have an Order in Council passed, had to scurry around and get the signatures of three cabinet ministers. I would like to see who those three cabinet ministers were. I think we have a right to know.

Why was it so urgent that this Order in Council be signed on election day? Was it because maybe the results of the election were not certain and that regardless of what the electoral outcome was, American Express had to get its Order in Council. I do not know. Is it normal to have Orders in Council signed every election day? I would like to know what the practices of past governments were. How many Orders in Council are signed on election day?

An hon. member: Where did they find the ministers on election day? Surely they were in their ridings campaigning.

Mr. Peterson: They had to go to the ridings to find the ministers.

I think there are enough unanswered questions. I say this to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who knows so much about the procedures of this House, and I seek his counsel and guidance on this. What would the best procedure be? Would it be to have this come before the finance committee?

Mr. Milliken: Yes.

Mr. Peterson: Would it be a special committee of Parliament? I welcome your views on how we would proceed. I believe this is a way beyond being a partisan matter. It is something which has concerned the banks of Canada for a long period of time. Our reputation as a nation among a community of nations is one which above all else respects the laws. There are no privileges and all are treated equally. It is a reputation which has been among the word's finest and must continue to be unsullied. That is worth fighting for.

I believe as members of Parliament we have an obligation to ensure that is done.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate which is a very important one because it is only once every 10 years that we really get to take a broad view of the banking system in this country and how it operates.

I guess I found it ironic that I was on my way flying to Ottawa to speak on a bill on banking and I needed to drive from Prince Albert to Saskatoon to catch the plane. I stopped in my home town of Laird, Saskatchewan to see my parents who had just finished harvesting. They are still farming at 75 years of age because it is not profitable for young farmers to get started. My parents informed me they were quite distressed that the bank in Laird, Saskatchewan was closing, a bank that had been there I think since 1912 or 1914.

In my mind that serves as the backdrop as to what I wanted to say about this legislation. As with so much of the legislation that we see here, this legislation is directed at something that might solve a problem and might be helpful in inner Canada but might well be a total disaster again in what might be termed outer Canada. I want to give credit to the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast for introducing the terms inner and outer Canada. I think they describe things very well.

When it comes to inner Canada perhaps there is an argument that can be made for the kind of things we are seeing in this bill: the deregulation, the allowing of different kinds of financial institutions to merge and carry on businesses and partnerships, and so on. Perhaps there is an element of truth in the fact that in order for Canadian financial institutions to compete at the global level, to be there in Geneva, Paris, Stockholm, Tokyo, and wherever you all have to be in order to function at that level of finance, we need bigger institutions to be able to play the game at that level.

What we are in danger of creating here is what the hon. member for Nickel Belt described today as a whole cast of uncontrolled sumo wrestlers. These beings that are being created here are so huge that just the physical size of them makes them virtually impossible to regulate. It makes it virtually impossible to bring them under any kind of public interest kind of umbrella.

Maybe that makes sense for the wheelers and dealers in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal and those people who feel that the free trade deal that we have already signed and perhaps the free trade deal with Mexico is a bonanza for them and the people they represent as shareholders and so on. I do not represent those kinds of people so I have not had the opportunity to converse with them personally, but I know what people think about the banking system in outer Canada.

In outer Canada the banking system is viewed quite differently, Mr. Speaker, as you know, representing a rural constituency yourself. Small business people, main street people, abhor many of the practices that the banks carry out, particularly in smaller communities. When I talk to the business community in Prince Albert, a city of 35,000, I hear nothing but a litany of tales about lines of credit being cut off, about loans being unreasonably turned down even for very worth-while enterprises by well established companies, but it seems that when somebody writes a story in Toronto that says Saskatchewan is in trouble, all of a sudden all the money dries up in Saskatchewan. That is just a common pattern that has been happening to our province at least for the last number of years.

This fact is more than amply demonstrated in the surveys that we as members get from independent business organizations that rank banking and banking services very low as far as helping them to do business.

Then we have the whole perception of the banking system in rural Canada. To rural Canada nowadays the banking system means foreclosure. It means being taking to court by the banks. What I am concerned about is that not only is the government not intervening in any meaningful way to enhance the financial situation of farmers, but in a situation where these financial institutions are all combining and forming conglomerates you could well end up getting your farm seized or machinery seized because you have not paid an insurance bill, for example. It will vastly widen the scope of what banks are able to do to the farmer and other consumers and business people because of the inter-relationships that will exist.

I might add also that this is made even worse by the fact that instead of having the stable agriculture system we once had, we have moved to increasing instability. This is not only because of the international factors but because we have got into the political ad hoc mode of supporting agriculture so that farmers have to go to the banker and try to convince them that yes there is an election coming in Saskatchewan and the federal government will likely be coming up with some money in order to get a loan. That is the kind of situation that we place the farm population in.

Another aspect of outer Canada that I would like to raise in this debate is that facing frontier Canada. Part of my constituency includes virtually all the northern half of Saskatchewan which is made up of 43 isolated communities in the forest, many of them Indian communities, mining communities and so on. There are a lot of communities spread out across Canada that are much like that.

Over the years the banking system has made untold billions of dollars out of those communities. There have been hundreds of millions of dollars in wealth generated by the mines, forests and fishing. Those banks have never seen a responsibility to return any part of that to those communities in terms of service. There are only three banking institutions in the north half of Saskatchewan. That means business people there are sometimes a two, three or four hour drive, sometimes even a flight away from a banking institution to do any banking. People who want to establish a line of credit simply cannot because banks will not recognize anyone more than 50 miles away as being in their trading area.

We have a banking system that makes untold billions of dollars out of frontier areas but does not even show up to provide a service. I would like to comment on some breakthroughs being made in that area by peoples' own initiatives. I am speaking now of the major initiative being launched by Arctic co-operatives to develop credit unions in the Northwest Territories and also in my own constituency. The Buffalo Narrows Credit Unions will for the first time supply a banking service to northwest Saskatchewan.

My question comes out of this. We are now talking about the banking system in this country and it is clearly not working. We are seeing another retreat on another front that pertains to exactly the same question. That is the question that was raised in Question Period today by our leader, the member for Yukon, that is the move by this government to restrict the functions of the Bank of Canada. They are proposing to restrict the functions of the Bank of Canada to controlling inflation, to keeping inflation at zero per cent. That is a vast diminution in the role of the Bank of Canada.

Explicitly in the past the Bank of Canada had to pay attention to things like growth, unemployment and providing service to the regions. That is not in the Bank of Canada's mandate any more. I am asking in this legislation if we are not going to do it through private sector banking or through the Bank of Canada, what kind of mechanism do we have in this country to ensure that capital goes to the places where it is needed and to provide services some place other than where the big shots feel they can make some money? That question is fundamentally unanswered, and I think my basic criticism of this bill is that it is far too narrow in how it views the banking system.

In closing, my time is getting short. I would like to make some mention of what I think is a positive aspect of this legislation, and that is the changes to the Co-operative Credit Associations Act. The credit union system is a success story and does hold hope for outer Canada and for all those Canadians that will be marginalized in the post-free trade world.

There are about 2,600 credit unions in this country with 9 million members. Over one-third of Canadians are members of credit unions. They have assets of approximately $69 billion in this country. They are a significant institution already. With this legislation I have to give the government, the finance committee and others credit. They have given the credit union movement some new tools whereby it can get into commercial lending and can have some of the same powers and advantages that trust companies have. It is going to be able to raise capital from outside its membership base in order to be competitive.

I believe these are steps forward. It will also make it possible for the credit union system to better finance the rest of the co-op movement in providing services and economic hope to many of the regions of this country.

With that and recognizing the time, I would just like to say that the government has taken one step forward in a very important area, and that is the area of ensuring that credit unions and co-operatives can play their legitimate roles.

However, on the other hand we are still continuing the headlong retreat from the kind of financial system and the kind of economic structure in this country that will allow each Canadian to know that this country's economy is there to serve them and not to just serve the wealthy and the powerful.

INCOME TAX

QUARTERLY INSTALMENTS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James) moved

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be obligated to pay only one annual instalment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I deem it a privilege to have initiated this motion and I am honoured to lead off today's debate.

The senior citizens of this country are being denied a choice I think they deserve. They have worked long and hard for retirement and they deserve the option of not paying income tax in quarterly instalments. Senior citizens and self-employed individuals owing more than $1,000 in income tax must pay quarterly instalments of their estimated annual income tax. Payment dates must be strictly adhered to and estimates of the next year's income must be reliable. That is the law.

I was drawn to this issue by a number of senior citizens in my riding who, like thousands of other Canadian seniors, have miscalculated their income tax or accidentally or inadvertently missed a payment date.

When this happens the government slaps huge interest charges on the late payment. Instead of giving them the benefit of the doubt, Revenue Canada automatically assumes that these seniors are maliciously trying to withhold taxes and defraud the government.

The vast majority of Canadians do not ever have to worry about missing a tax payment. It is simply taken off every one of our paycheques. But most seniors do not have that luxury. Like the self-employed they have to do the calculating themselves.

The government would like everybody to pay income tax on the weekly or bi-weekly schedule because ideally income tax should be paid as income is earned.

On the face of it, quarterly instalments sound like a fair compromise between bi-weekly payments and an annual lump sum payment. But for many members of our society this compromise simply is not working. I will bring forward testimony to that effect in a few minutes.

The government justifies mandatory quarterly instalments by claiming that allowing an annual lump sum payment would be like giving seniors loans in the amount of the tax payable. In theory this is true but in practice many seniors end up actually lending the government money between tax instalments.

Often seniors will overestimate and hence overpay the government because they are unable to guess how much income they will be earning.

The other justification the government uses to support mandatory instalments is that it is trying to help Canadian seniors avoid possible budgeting problems.

Pardon my cynicism, Mr. Speaker, but I doubt many Canadians appreciate this government giving out financial advice. We hardly need to treat retired Canadians like adolescents. The majority of our seniors have been paying income tax for decades, and they have learned how to budget after living through the depression and several recessions.

Research has shown that seniors can generally be characterized as economy conscious and they are less likely to use credit cards. This is hardly an age group that takes the attitude buy now, pay later. They could probably teach this government a thing or two. Enough has already been taken away from our seniors. They face old age security clawbacks, a crumbling health care system and caps on the funding of other social programs.

Our country has not prepared itself for an aging society. We often treat the elderly as a burden, not as an asset, and then every three months we turn around and tell them to pay up. I think we are a bit callous.

It certainly would not hurt this House to demonstrate a little bit of compassion and flexibility for once. Yes, we would be making an exception for one segment of our society, but this is not a case of benefiting one segment while depriving another. All Canadians could eventually benefit from this motion.

I cannot believe that the option of paying taxes at one time would really be too expensive for the government. As it is, an army of Revenue Canada employees must be paid to assess and reassess every tax instalment a senior citizen makes. Even retired accountants must have a difficult time accurately predicting every penny they will earn in the coming year. The single payment option could eliminate this guess work on the part of the senior and eliminate the need for ongoing scrutiny of his or her account at Revenue Canada.

The government might claim that estimating income should not be difficult for a senior citizen; after all they are usually retired so their income should not change much from one year to another. On paper this should hold true and it probably works out fine for many seniors, I will grant you that, but there are plenty of seniors who do not have straightforward incomes. They have investments that change from year to year. They have part-time jobs and they can have enormous differences in medical deductions from year to year.

To top it all off, if they do accidentally pay less than they owe, they are not told so. They are simply told to pay the difference with interest—I underline that, with interest. No reminder, no statement showing where they erred; just give us the interest you owe us. No business in this country treats its customers like that. We are given 30 or 60 days to pay our bills. We are told in advance how much we will owe if we do not pay on time.

The government may justify this by saying that our seniors should know how much to pay and when to pay it because they are the ones who calculated the instalments in the first place. This argument lacks one crucial aspect, though. It does not take into account the fact that all of us, all of us, are likely to get a little confused and a little forgetful when we reach a certain age. This is not something that we should be punished for. It is simply a fact of life with many older citizens and it is something the government should learn to work around.

Because of quarterly instalments, it is very common to see people paying tax on income they have never seen. A number of my constituents have told me that although their Canada Savings Bonds and other investments do not mature until the fall, they are still forced to pay tax on them in the month of March.

One woman wrote: "Paying quarterly means paying on income I have not yet received. Thus, I am losing interest on money paid in advance while Revenue Canada collects interest on it. This to me is the same as my paying double interest".

Today's seniors grew up without the social programs that our young people now take for granted. Seniors do not blithely take what they can get from the government. Often they are too proud to ask for the services they deserve. On the other hand, they tend to give to this country. They volunteer. They fight hard on behalf of other groups and they pay their taxes.

It is rare that this Parliament has the chance to give something back to the people of Canada. So much of our time is spent debating policies that take things away from Canadians. For once we can do the right thing and make the lives of some senior citizens just a little easier.

If we can admit that the present system has failed many seniors, then we are on the right track. If we can save a few people from the headaches and confusion caused by quarterly income tax payments, then I believe we have succeeded.

I brought the motion to the attention of my constituents several months ago. I have received a lot of mail on this issue. With the Chair's indulgence, I would like to enter into the parliamentary record portions of letters I have received on this issue in support of seniors and in support of this proposed tax change.

Here is a copy of a letter I received. It went to Revenue Canada. A portion of it states:

"Enclosed you will find cheques totally $1,099.55. The cheque for $162.89 is so-called instalment interest which you have the unmitigated gall to charge me. The cheque for $936.66 covers two instalments of $468.33 for March 15, 1991 and June 15, 1991.

I am a senior citizen and for the many, many years that I have paid income tax, I have always paid in full on April 30, as required. I see no reason to change this procedure and I take exception to being told that I must pay quarterly or be charged interest".

That is a letter I received, dated June 7, sent to Revenue Canada and a copy of it was sent to me.

Here is another letter, dated July 30. I will read just a portion of it:

"I have never been notified for my 1990 taxes that I should pay quarterly. My taxes for 1990 amounted to $6,046.38, of which $1,796.77 had already been deducted monthly from my pension, leaving $4,249.61 to be paid. I sent my cheque and Revenue Canada sent me a letter saying I did not owe anything.

Two months later I received a letter requesting $336.00, since I had not paid quarterly. I was told I should now pay $1,062 quarterly for my 1991 taxes. I have paid my $336 and I still maintain it is not fair".

Here is another letter I received from a constituent, dated July 25, 1991. The letter starts off:

"Five months to Christmas. I heartily agree with that proposal of seniors paying income tax once a year only. It is ridiculous for a senior person to pay tax in March on interest income received in November on Canada Savings Bonds".

Here is another letter in support of this motion. This letter is also dated July 25. It comes from a constituent of mine. In part it says: "We are on a fixed income and every $100 earned helps us to meet our daily expenses and stay off the welfare lines. We try to live from interest income, and if the quarterly payments we now make to Revenue Canada could be left invested for the full year, it would be a step in the right direction."

Here is a recent letter that I received on the issue. It is dated September 12. It is a very short letter, and it is to the point:

> Re: Making a fairer tax law.
> We agree with you that the law, as it presently stands is unfair and should be corrected. You have our support, and we wish you every success in your endeavour to correct this injustice.

I have still another letter. This one is dated July 24 and it says in part: "It will not be too many years before we, too, will be pensioners. Truthfully, we would not relish the bother of paying our taxes quarterly."

I have another letter dated July 25. I will read just a portion of it. "With this letter, I would like to advise you that I am in complete agreement with your proposed motion before Parliament to do away with the quarterly income tax payments for seniors."

We get an idea of the strong feelings that pensioners have on this particular issue. I will continue with a few more letters, since I have another four or five minutes.

This letter is dated August 6. "As a pensioner, I find it a real hassle each year trying to determine what tax I should pay to keep from being penalized. Your proposal is an excellent idea, and I wish you great success with the motion being put before Parliament."

Here is just the first paragraph of a letter I received dated July 29: "With reference to your recent bulletin regarding the income tax assessment for seniors, my wife and I strongly endorse your proposal."

I have another letter, also from the month of July: "It certainly lifts my spirits to know you are doing your best for the elderly people in Canada. My stepmother is almost 80 years old and has served in the armed forces, and worked for the government until her retirement. She has never collected unemployment insurance and neither did my father. Of course, they paid into it.

Now, when my stepmother has a few years of leisure time, she is very worried about all the red tape involved in this quarterly tax payment."

This letter is dated August 22 and is from another senior citizen: "I am a senior citizen and I do not like to be told to pay every three months. I think once a year is all we should have to pay our taxes."

This letter is dated August 12. It is very short and to the point: "I am writing in support of your motion that would relieve pensioners from making compulsory quarterly income tax payments."

Here is one that is a little longer, and this will be the last letter that I will enter into the record. This letter writer entered into some calculation. It goes like this:

> Dear Mr. Harvard:
> Here is a classic case where the federal government is beating up on an 86 year old widow because she is about $200 short on paying 75 per cent of her taxable income and $549.44 short on paying the full amount.
> This was the total tax payable for 1990: $2,398.19
> This was the total tax credits for 1990: $1,848.75
> Balance due and paid by cheque in April, 1991: $549.44
> Interest and/or penalties on $549.44 was: $61.44

The writer continues:

> Every month from January to November, 1990, through deductions from her late husband's pension cheques, $100 was paid and in December, 1990, $175 was paid for a total taxes paid of $1,275 for the 1990 taxation year. The interest or penalty was charged because the amount paid ($1,275) over the 12 months of 1990 was not 75 per cent of the taxable income that should have been paid on the net income and therefore a note from the Federal Government, I quote, "have charged you instalment interest as one or more of these payments was late or insufficient".
> Another person may owe $5,000 to $10,000.00 at the end of the year but if they have paid 75 per cent of the taxable income in that year, then there is no interest or penalty charges on the $5,000 to $10,000.00 that was not paid in that tax year.
> The problem can be solved by general averaging over the last three years with no cost to all taxpayers.

The writer of this letter finishes off by saying:

> The Federal Government issue Old Age Pension cheques and C.P.P. cheques every month by computer so they have the capability to initiate deductions every month from those cheques. Thus seniors remembering to write cheques four times a year would be eliminated.

• (1720)

I think those letters are a strong testimony that senior citizens in this country are in support of this motion and would welcome a change.

I would welcome support from Parliament on this motion and I think this is a chance for all of us to do something for Canadians who have worked so hard for their country. I know that they would welcome it.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I am glad that I happen to be on House duty this afternoon so that I became aware of the hon. member's motion because I myself have an interest in this subject.

I imagine that there probably is not a member of Parliament who has not received representations from people and, in particular, senior citizens, who have come with their concerns about the fact that they have been required to pay instalment interest on their taxes or instalments on their taxes and in many cases they have been unaware of the need to do this in the past because perhaps they just, for the first time, came over the limit requiring such payments, and have been caught and have been required to pay interest and penalties.

I have, therefore, been considering this question of what might be done to relieve this matter. I would like to offer some comments to the hon. member as to why I do not think his particular method of solving the problem would be a good one, but I also would like to give him a suggestion as an alternative that might achieve the same end that I have been considering and plan to put forward myself through the vehicle of my own committee, the finance committee, of which I am the chair. I am hoping that perhaps I can convince him that my method might be superior and perhaps he would agree.

I think that we have to understand why we have instalments in the first place. By and large, they are for people who earn money that is not taxed at source. People who earn a wage receive a monthly pay cheque, have their taxes deducted monthly or perhaps more often from their salary and automatically remit it to the government. For people who are self-employed and receive income either through business that they are engaged in or through investments, interest, dividends and others, we require those people to pay income tax on a quarterly basis because to say that they only had to pay at the end of the year would be treating wage earners, who must pay monthly through their automatic deductions, unfairly.

In order to try to make it fair we say that people who earn income from interest and other sources should have to pay at least quarterly.

Over-all, I think that the theory is correct; for senior citizens or anyone else. I do not think we should necessarily identify senior citizens because there are many other people who may be required to pay instalments such as the operators of small business, just starting them up, where the amounts are relatively small.

The problem is that the $1,000 amount that requires people to pay instalment interest has been eroded by inflation to the point that a great number of people are being caught in the system who should not be in the system.

I would like to say to the hon. member that I think the objective here is to take a lot of people who are earning a relatively small amount of money, interest income or other income, and say: "You should not have to pay instalments, you should only have to pay once a year." I think that is proper. However, rather than apply a rule to all seniors that they do not have to pay instalments we should try to raise the limit from $1,000 of income tax owing to something more reasonable like a $10,000 annual income tax bill, at which point people will have to pay instalments.

That would be fair to everyone, seniors or people who are not seniors. It would also require that those earning investment income on amount—if someone has $1 million in the bank and is earning $100,000 a year—should have to pay instalment payments, just like wage earners have to pay monthly payments.

The difficulty in attempting to exempt a group of people is that it also exempts people who, some of us suggest, should be paying even more taxes. Those are people who are wealthy and perhaps have millions of dollars and are receiving dividends and interest of substantial amounts. We are not suggesting, or would want to suggest, that those people should somehow be exempted from paying their taxes on a regular basis.

I would suggest that what we try to do is focus on raising the limit and saying only those people who owe tax over $10,000, as opposed to the current $1,000 rule, would have to pay. This would take off the tax rolls for instalment payments 95 per cent of seniors, probably, as well as a certain number of other people who would then simply have to pay at the end of the year when they filed their tax return.

I would invite the member to put forward this suggestion, either in the form that he has it now or in another form depending on how he feels about my comments to the finance committee. I would like to tell him that we intend—the hon. member for Ontario was actually here in the Chamber— to strike a subcommittee shortly in which we want to hear suggestions from members of Parliament and others. The member should pass this idea on to the member for Ontario. We are hopefully going to hold hearings in which we can take ideas like this, examine them carefully and be in a position to make recommendations to the Minister of Finance for his next budget.

We are hoping to commence that process shortly after Thanksgiving. I am hopeful that the member will take the opportunity to pass this suggestion on. Also, I would invite all other hon. members to forward their suggestions on this and other subjects. We are looking for ideas, not ideas that are going to cost the treasury a lot of money, but ideas like this one which do not involve a lot of money. It would relieve the administrative burden for a lot people who are caught in the system inadvertently simply because the rule has been in place for 20 or 30 years without adjustment for inflation. All those people have been brought into the system who were really not intended to be in the system when the rule was first put in place. This would provide fairness for all taxpayers.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, first of all let me congratulate my colleague from Winnipeg for this exceptional idea. I also thank my colleague from the government side for suggesting that the Tories would at least look at the concept the member has brought forward. I would suggest though that the government member's rationale that a 30 year old might take exception to a 75 year old getting a break that he or she might not get is the only comment to which I would take exception.

This is an exceptional idea. It is something that has been brought forward to me by many seniors as well. It is an aging population and more and more people will not want to take advantage of this quarterly tax instalment the government has in place.

I wrote to Revenue Canada and asked why it is doing this. The answer was: "We don't necessarily want to do it, but it is Finance that is dictating to us". It said in the statement that the options to seniors are clearly defined in the enclosed instalment guide. I will get to that instalment guide in just a moment to show how clearly defined it is for seniors. I suggest that it is not even clear for an accountant who deals with this each and every day.

When I spoke to a senior official in Finance in Ottawa about this ruling against seniors and self-employed people, he said: "I do not believe this. It is dictatorial. I think seniors should have the choice. I think there is probably a mistake here. I will get back to you".

A week later he said: "I am sorry. I was mistaken. It is Finance. It is income tax legislation. There is nothing we can do about it. I am sorry". The fact that even Finance suggested that it is mean-spirited gives me some hope that the government and the department will take a serious look at a ruling that seniors would say discriminates against them because they are seniors.

Why does the government have to be a financial adviser to a senior citizen? They are suggesting: "Allow me to decide what I will do with my money". The government suggestion is: "We are doing you a favour. We will allow you to pay every three months instead of hitting you hard at the end of the year". However, the seniors are saying: "I do not want that option. Don't do me that favour, please".

The fact is that Revenue Canada will get it out of the senior anyway because it can withhold the GST refund as it so often does. It will hold it against the person for the next five years. There is no danger of Revenue Canada not getting its just desserts. It will get its money one way or another.

It was also suggested to me not to worry that seniors would get an invitation. They receive an invitation to get involved in this quarterly instalment. Here is the invitation. Now, I must admit it has been photocopied and it is not in its booklet form. It is a veritable semantic quagmire that defies understanding by anyone, let alone a senior citizen, who reads it. In fact, here is the notice of assessment: "You may be required to pay your taxes for 1990 by quarterly instalments".

As an ex-educator I see the operative word as you "may" be. Not you must or you are obligated to. A senior will read that and say: "Great, I don't have to do this". However, later on they will get hit and they will get hit hard.

These are not necessarily wealthy people. Someone who has a total income of $21,000 a year is not wealthy.

This is from the Declaration of Taxpayers' Rights: "You are entitled to expect that the government will make every reasonable effort to provide you with access to full, accurate and timely information about the Income Tax Act and your rights under it". It says: "You are entitled to an impartial hearing".

I have had seniors come in and say: "I want to protest this". So, I protest on their behalf. Revenue Canada says: "Okay, you may protest and we will hold everything up. But, if the ruling is withheld then the interest will accrue. So you are in big trouble". Wait until I get to the amount of interest charged these seniors when they do not get their quarterly instalment in on time.

Here it is: "A new penalty was introduced in the 1990 taxation year for taxpayers who make late or insufficient instalment payments. A penalty of 50 per cent is charged on the amount by which the instalment interest exceeds the greater or the following amounts". We thought finance companies were mean-spirited.

Here is an example for a senior citizen to follow. "Peter is required to make four instalment payments in 1991 of $1,535 on March 15, June 15, September 15 and December 15. However, he does not make his first payment until March 31", that is 16 days late. "To compensate for making a late payment, Peter pays his June instalment on May 29, rather than on June 15. By paying his June instalment early no instalment interest will be charged when his 1991 return is assessed next year, as long as his remaining payments are paid on time". Do you understand that, Madam Speaker? Nobody understands it.

This is a tip for seniors: "If you realize during the year that your instalments have been less than the required amount"—how would you realize that—"or if one or more of your payments had been late, you can reduce or eliminate an instalment interest charge by overpaying your next payment by paying it early". Again, nobody understands this, let alone a senior.

There is so much here that I am certainly not going to read all of it and I do not want to bore anybody with it. However, it goes on. Near the end of the document, this instalment guide, this invitation says it "uses plain language to explain the common income tax situation". Well, it is not plain language.

I think I am getting away from the principle. We believe that seniors should be given the choice. They should be able to opt out of this wonderful program that Finance has provided them. They should be able to opt out.

Finally: "Improving This Guide: This guide is reviewed each year. If you have any comments or suggestions to improve the explanations provided in this guide, we would like to hear from you". Seniors across this country, and it would appear many of our colleagues, are suggesting to Finance Canada that it should scrap the guide, scrap the quarterly instalments, and give seniors a choice because they want the choice. Surely senior citizens have earned the right to decide when they will pay their taxes. They are not trying to cheat the tax collector. They will pay one way or another, they just want the option.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make a few comments this afternoon on the motion before the House. I just want to read the motion into the record again:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

I want to commend my colleague from Winnipeg St. James for putting this motion before the House so that several of us can have a chance to comment on it and the House can consider it.

What is the issue at stake? The issue is that seniors no longer holding salaried jobs and who may very well be on pensions of some sort, some more than others, are required to pay income tax on a quarterly basis. They must estimate their annual income and determine from that how much they pay every three months.

What is the problem? Well, the problem is that many times they underestimate their payment. They may be late, and, when and if they do, they suffer harsh penalties and terms of interest that are imposed upon them by Revenue Canada.

The facts are that seniors and other individuals owing more than a thousand dollars in tax per year must pay quarterly instalments or pay the price for not doing so. Payment dates must be strictly adhered to and estimates of next year's income must be reliable. Each year, thousands of Canadians make simple errors in calculating what they expect their income to be for the next year, and they may at times miss the date. Yet, the federal government chooses to treat them, for what may be a very innocent mistake, as people who are attempting to defraud the government and punish them with interest charges on these late payments.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mr. Vanclief: On the face of it I admit that quarterly instalments sound like a fair compromise between the majority of people who have their income tax deducted at source and an annual lump sum payment, though we have to take a look at what it does.

• (1740)

Quarterly instalments are meant to act as equalizers to prevent the preferential treatment of one segment of society over another. However, for many members of our society this compromise simply does not work and is not fair.

As I said, often seniors will over-estimate and hence, they can over-pay because they are unable to guess—and that is what it is in many cases—how much their income will be. Interest rates fluctuate up and down. They do not know what their earnings will be for the year so what is one-quarter of what they are going to make? I remember one gentleman who came in to my office and had sent $350 in every quarter. At the end of the year he got a printout back showing he had paid up in full as of April 30. Then it said that he should have paid by instalment in the previous year. Because he had not, they gave him a warning. In other words, do a better job next year.

As this gentleman said to me, Madam Speaker, he used to have a skylight in the roof of his family room, but after he read that letter, he now has another hole. He said he was absolutely livid after having sent the money based on his calculation, he miscalculated and then was penalized for having done so.

The government suggested the quarterly instalments assist Canadian seniors to avoid budgetary problems. I suggest that these people who have gone through depressions, the Second World War, recessions and are now coping with the government's high level of tax, do not need any lessons in budgeting. If they have problems, heaven help the rest of us.

Seniors are not adolescents needing a guiding hand to learn how to handle their money. They taught us, with the exception of the government that we have at the present time. I am sure they could teach them a few things if only the government would listen.

As my colleague from Winnipeg St. James has said, enough has already been taken away from our seniors. They have had old age security clawback, a changing health care system, caps on funding and other social programs. This government is treating its seniors as if they are a burden, not the asset that they are. Then every three months this government turns around and says: pay up.

Madam Speaker, it would not hurt this House to demonstrate a bit of compassion and understanding and appreciation to the seniors of this country for what they have done during their more active years. I compliment the chairman of the finance committee, the member for Edmonton Northwest from the government benches who just spoke a few minutes ago. As he said, he is chairman of the committee. I compliment him on his suggestion but I point out to him that he is chairman of that committee and I am sure my colleague who spoke earlier this afternoon will give some thought to the suggestion of raising the matter. If we are not going to annual instalments maybe the next best thing we can do is raise the limit somewhat above the $1,000.

Yes, we would be making an exception for one segment of our society, Madam Speaker, but I think we owe it to them. We have an opportunity here in this Parliament to give something back to the seniors in Canada. For once we can do the right thing and make the lives of our senior citizens a little easier. I recommend strongly to the finance committee that it listen to this motion, that it pay attention to this motion, and take some positive steps in that direction.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, as I rise to speak I think of a certain Manitoba senior who recently said to me: "What is wrong with them in Ottawa? Why don't they listen to us?"

The government may not have been listening, Madam Speaker, but my hon. colleague from Winnipeg St. James is listening. I thank him for his initiative and for giving me the opportunity to speak on this motion.

I read again for the record:

> That in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects senior citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

In essence, this motion asks this government to allow seniors to pay their income tax in one annual instalment and to be given an exemption if they wish to have one. I listen to the seniors. In fact I say this government better start listening to them.

Seventy years ago, only one in 20 Canadians was over the age of 65. By the year 2021, one of every five Canadians will be a senior. Unlike the stereotype most people have of seniors, they are not feeble and frail. Very few of them are actually frail. Sixty-seven per cent of seniors aged 65 to 74 years say their health is good or excellent.

These people are individuals who have led full lives. They have friends and family. They have grandchildren and hobbies. They like sports and stay tuned to current affairs and politics. They regularly watch us in Parliament, in this House. I am sure many seniors today are watching us as we debate this bill.

Many seniors use retirement to go back to school. Unlike in the past when universities and colleges used to be places for the young only, these days every age group in society is represented.

Let us trample the myths that surround old age. These people are busy. They are too busy to be troubled by completing income tax returns every three months. They do not want to be married to a bookkeeper or spend countless evenings calculating estimated earnings. Why can they not pay their taxes once a year? Is it such a difficult wish to grant to our seniors who have helped build this country?

The Manitoba Society of Seniors often helps older men and women who are having trouble doing their taxes. Carol Roberts, Executive Director of the Society says the tax situation is "definitely very frustrating for seniors".

Seniors sometimes have to take money out of the bank early, or lose a month's interest on a bond in order to pay their taxes. At the same time, the Department of Revenue says: "Quarterly income tax payments are easier for seniors because it teaches them how to budget."

I repeat: "it teaches them how to budget." Have you ever heard anything so ridiculous, Madam Speaker? These people made a home in Canada and raised their families. Indeed, they have built this nation, as I said. They saw good times and bad, lean and plenty. Many saved money to see them through their retirement years. Many keep working until their final days, and the government believes that these seniors do not know how to budget.

This to say the least, is insulting. In fact I think seniors could teach the Prime Minister, this government and the Minister of Finance something about budgeting. Ms. Roberts says: "A yearly tax payment will cut down on expenses and worry. It is only common sense."

Where has common sense fled Madam Speaker? It is not only with taxes that seniors are having trouble. They are finding that the government has replaced the mailman with a superbox that sits on the corner, three blocks from their home.

In the winter in Winnipeg North, my constituency, that means three blocks of ice, snow and howling wind between them and a letter from their son or daughter. It is three blocks of rain or subzero cold between them and their pension cheque. Little thanks Canada Post, for sacrificing service for profit.

It was not until the government tried to deindex pensions that it felt the full wrath of seniors. I was glad to see that the government had the common sense then to turn and flee from such a foolish plan.

The government now has another splendid opportunity to redeem itself, to cast off its cloak of arrogance and insensitivity. It can demonstrate that it listens to common sense and decency and accept this private members' bill.

• (1750)

Once in awhile there is merit in listening to our seniors. I hope the government will see that. In fact, if the government would listen more it would begin to learn fast because our seniors are trustworthy. They have experience and they have wisdom.

I strongly support this bill of my Liberal colleague, the member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate on this motion. I do want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James for bringing it forward. Back in April or May seniors had submitted their tax returns for the 1990 income tax year. They had met their obligations. They put their returns in the mail and, yes, many of them included the amount owing in their return, only, lo and behold, to receive a notice. Whether it be in late April or early May or mid-May, the government said to them: "Yes, we have your cheque. We have the amount. We agree with everything that you have said relative to the tax owing, but there is this problem. You did not pay these quarterly instalments as you should. You did not submit to us 75 per cent of the tax owing on an instalment basis and therefore, although we agree that you paid your tax bill, there is a penalty and there is interest". He and I think most members of the House received those kinds of submissions this spring.

Certainly it was a new submission that I had received. It is not one that I had run into last year or the year before. I am not sure why, but anyway it happened this year. In that sense I can understand why the member brought forward this kind of presentation.

I should point out that I did have some seniors come into my office. One lady in particular in her late seventies came in with her husband who was in his early eighties. They had the problem that has been described. There was income earned, there was marginal tax paid, and at the end of the year they submitted their returns only to receive this letter that said: "You should have made quarterly instalments".

The question that was asked by this lady who did the return was: "Why was I not told? Why was I not aware that I had to make these instalments?" I mentioned to her that one of the things the government does annually—there are a number of documents, I think some of which were referenced by one of the other members who spoke— is to include in one of the OAS payments that is made by the Government of Canada a notice about the quarterly instalment requirements and how it is possible for a senior, in fact for anyone receiving government cheques, to create a deduction process so that they can make not only quarterly instalments but monthly if they prefer.

The lady mentioned to me: "Well, gee, I guess there should be more emphasis on that because I would like to take advantage of those quarterly instalments. I would like to because I find it difficult to write a cheque for $2,800 at the end of the year. We prefer to pay $700 a quarter". Yes, it is budgeting, and I can certainly understand comments from one of the members from Winnipeg that seniors certainly know how to budget. Nobody is debating that. They do, but some do have difficulty as I am sure all members in this House will agree, making ends meet. There is just not enough money to go around for all the things that they feel they need or would like to do.

Sometimes if you only have to make that quarterly payment there is a tendency to borrow that $10 from that bank account and replace it next month or the month after. Well next month comes and you do not replace it, and particularly for seniors it becomes very difficult. I understand what some of the members have said, that seniors pride themselves in paying their bills. You can just see it when the tax bill is due in a municipality. Who are the people who are lined up to make sure that they pay that bill on time? Senior citizens.

It is a problem if you allow them to make one payment a year. Some of them do prefer to have that option of making those quarterly instalments.

In this motion the member has put forward, nothing prevents that from happening if a senior wanted to make those quarterly instalments.

I come to the other side of this equation, quarterly instalments for simply a blanket suggestion of seniors, and there are very few seniors who fit into this category. Imagine a circumstance, as was described by several speakers, in which people receive the Canada Savings Bonds interest in October or November, but they really have to pay the taxes six months before, in March. Not just Canada Savings Bonds, there are many seniors who have registered retirement income plans that pay out toward the end of the year, or savings certificates at banks. Interest payments are like that.

Imagine another circumstance. For example, the Bronfmans are shareholders in large corporations and those corporations might only pay dividends in December. I do not know what the income of the Bronfmans is, but it is certainly substantial.

Imagine saying to them: "We realize you have a million dollars in dividends this year, which you got paid in December, but it is okay, you do not have to make any quarterly instalments on that kind of income".

I can tell you that members opposite and members on this side, I for one, would be rather upset to think of people like the Bronfmans, the McCains, the Irvings, the Reichmans only making payments once a year. I have great difficulty with that. That is why I have some difficulty with the concept of the motion the way it is presented.

We heard the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest talk about a proposal within the finance committee. I can tell you that when I started to receive these calls back in April, when we were setting up the agenda of the finance committee, that was one of the very clear suggestions I made. We should review a number of tax proposals that do not necessarily cost the government less revenue or more revenue. The way they are structured is not working.

I had this one in mind and a number of others. The committee agreed, with the support of all members of the committee, Liberal, NDP and Conservative members, that there are some tax things we ought to look at.

I can tell the hon. member that in support of what the member for Edmonton Northwest indicated, the committee will be receiving submissions and we hope to start our work on this subject and others that relate very closely to this within about the next three weeks, with the aim of producing a report with specific recommendations.

I guess I would comment that although I do not necessarily support this motion the way it is written, I do support the idea that there ought to be a group of people, seniors and others, who are on that very low threshold of income. Those who have to pay more than $1,000 a year of income tax should be given the option of only paying their tax once a year. They can choose that option. For that lady who came into my office who would prefer a quarterly system, I certainly would not want to deny that option to her if that is what she prefers.

I think there should be a mechanism in place whereby some people can make their tax payments once a year and that should be at income tax time, the end of March. I think there is a threshold that I am sure we in this House can come to that would be acceptable, so that a lot of seniors would not be faced with the challenge.

What is that threshold? I am not sure. I use the names of maybe four families whose names are well-known. I do not know how much they make. We can all only speculate on that matter. I guess what I am saying is that I do not think these kinds of things should be blanket rules for all people. There are a number of senior citizens who are still working. Seniors beyond age 65 who are gainfully employed on a monthly basis and receive cheques have to have their income tax deducted at source.

There are some seniors who have one method of income who have to pay monthly or bi-weekly, or however they are paid, and you would establish another rule for other seniors who receive their income in a different fashion.

I like the idea of what is being presented by the member. I can say that as a member of the finance committee we have discussed this in a preliminary stage. Our workload has not permitted us to get on to the subject yet. Even yesterday we had a discussion on the subject and said: "Okay, we want to get going on some of these other issues".

There are a couple of other things on the finance committee agenda, but we are within the next week hopefully going to release a request for members of Parliament to deal with this kind of tax suggestion. I suspect in our work with our constituencies we know of a number of these kinds of things, where for a very minor change we would satisfy an awful lot of people. It would not cost the Government of Canada really any money or any lost revenue, but it would be a very positive thing to do to make the system of taxation in this country as fair as possible to as many people as possible, if it is possible to have taxation fair.

Nobody likes to pay taxes. We all recognize that there are a lot of things we get from government that have to be paid for. People are willing to pay their share, but let us make it so that some people who find it a little more difficult to pay their share on a monthly or quarterly basis have an easier way to do it. I look forward to that debate in the finance committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I want to take up a question that I raised March 31, 1991 with respect to international trade, specifically as it was impacted by the free trade agreement.

I was very specific on that day inasmuch as I asked the Minister of Finance to take a close look at the way that Customs officials on the American side of the border were monitoring Canadian products going into the American market. They were doing it with a severity that was being harmful to our own products moving south. At the same time Canadian Customs officials were being a little bit more generous in the way that they were applying Canadian Customs regulations on products of American origin.

The Minister of Finance at the time gave me an indication that he would look into the matter. When I gave him very specific items of indication, especially relative to the printing industry and the impact on 70,000 employees of the printing industry, the minister at the time said that he would look into it with more precision and would get back to me.

Today is September 26. In the meantime, what we have seen is that there has not been any effort to level the playing field. The free trade agreement was supposed to level the playing field between Canadian and American marketplaces, between Canadian producers and American producers. We were going to open up the markets on one side and on the other. No such thing has happened.

I pointed out on March 31, and I gave very specific examples, that American clients of Canadian producers were actually closing accounts because the consumers in the United States were rejecting products marked "made in Canada". I find that absolutely shameful.

The tardiness of the minister's response is absolutely inexcusable. It is absolutely inexcusable because we have had a series of studies that have been produced since then that have indicated the impact of the free trade agreement on Canadian jobs and on Canadian manufacturers.

For example, one study gave us an indication that 315,000 manufacturing jobs in the first 29 months of the post-free trade agreement were lost, most of them from the province of Ontario. They moved south. There is a sorry admission by the senior advisory to the then Minister of Finance: "The problem now is that we are losing manufacturing activity itself to the United States and that once these jobs go outside Canada they aren't coming back". He preferred to remain anonymous for understandable reasons.

Not only are we losing trade, we are actually losing our ability to produce products so that we can generate trade. The main reason for it again is because what is happening is that the states bordering on Canada are engaging in a very competitive, aggressive, and I might say perhaps not totally ethical, attack on our manufacturing sector.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association last spring surveyed some 635 members and 237 of them concluded that it would be cheaper to operate in the U.S., in states bordering on Canada. Some 156 of them had been approached by state governments to relocate south. The incentives are lower taxes, lower land costs, lower operating costs, and other kinds of subsidies that we cannot offer. Those kinds of subsidies were not supposed to be a part of the free trade agreement.

I was looking forward to getting a response from the Minister of Finance to give Canadians an explanation as to why we would tolerate those kinds of practices south of the border that drain away our manufacturing sector but we cannot do the same thing here.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Madam Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to provide some clarification in response to the question raised by the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence regarding U.S. requirements for country of origin markings which have raised concerns in the Canadian printing industry.

According to the U.S. Tariff Act of 1930, all foreign goods imported into the United States must show the country of origin in a readily visible location and in as legible, indelible and permanent a manner as the nature of the item allows. The U.S. Congress wanted the ultimate purchaser to be able to know the country of origin upon inspection of the item, before he decides whether or not to buy it.

Madam Speaker, the government understands the concerns of the Canadian printing industry. During the free trade talks with the United States, we tried to reach an agreement on eliminating these requirements for Canadian goods.

The U.S. government refused to consider substantial changes in its marking regulations. We intend to raise the matter again with the United States and Mexico during the trilateral talks on North American free trade. We will make every effort to have these requirements eliminated for goods originating in Canada, but we are not very clear as to what kind of measures will be accepted during these talks.

We also raised the matter with GATT in the Uruguay Round. Madam Speaker, the hon. member also raised the question of Canadian marking regulations. This is a matter for the Minister of National Revenue, but I can inform the hon. member that the hon. Otto Jelinek recently wrote to the president of the Canadian Printing Industries Association, giving the assurance that customs officials at Revenue Canada were reviewing the administration of the regulations on marking of imported goods to guarantee that the regulations are administered according to the same rules and in the same spirit.

COSICS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, earlier, on September 23, I asked a question in this House about the notorious COSICS contract.

Let me refresh the memory of the House as to what we are talking about. In the summer of 1987 three bids were entered on the COSICS computer contract for External Affairs. Fenco-Lavelin was one of them, SHL Systemhouse was one, and DMR was the other.

In October 1987 the bidders were advised that there would be a bid recall and to re-submit bids by January 1988. Unfortunately the bids apparently were visible from one bidder to the other, which means that the bidder who had the least advantage was able to find information to enhance the bid.

Be that as it may, there were three bidders—the same ones again—in January 1988. After the bidding process was over, the losing bidders alleged that there was bid rigging in the process and the RCMP was invited to investigate the situation.

With regard to another related inquiry, an alleged sting operation against a member of the other place, the Marin commission of inquiry heard testimony from one of the losing bidders, a Mr. Ducros, who said that he had lunch in a Montreal restaurant with, and I will read it from the transcript: "Senator Michel Cogger" and another Senator, and that name is blanked out. The name is on the court document that I have in hand. It is blanked out. The only thing that we know is that the last letter is "u."

There have been numerous similar allegations with regard to this bid. There have been cost overruns of a magnitude which is unbelievable. We have now heard, in an interview that the Minister of Supply and Services gave earlier this week, that the whole system, after spending some $53 million for the first phase, not only does not work but will not work. The only thing it will do is connect Ottawa and Washington. To connect Ottawa and Washington all we need to do is put someone with a briefcase on a plane three times a day.

We don't need to spend $53 million and have all this scandal, and then be denied information. I am very anxious to know the answer. Who is this person with eleven letters in his name, the last one a "u"?

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the Department of Supply and Services, on behalf of the Department of External Affairs, signed a contract to acquire a Canadian on-line secure information and communications system.

To date, the Department of External Affairs has spent $53 million, not $140 million, of a budget totalling $56 million for the first phase of COSICS, a new secure telecommunications system to replace the old system that the department uses throughout the world on behalf of all departments.

Therefore, Phase I of COSICS is within the budget allocated by the Treasury Board ministers in 1987. The project is two years late. This is not an excuse, I agree, but it is one of the most complex and important data transmission projects ever undertaken in Canada. Phase I of COSICS is operational; since late 1989, it has become the mainstay of our North American secure communications system, with 1,100 daily users. Now that system installation is complete, we expect final approval of system security by the end of the year.

Madam Speaker, the department has not stopped the project, on the contrary. This project was designed in two phases, precisely for the purpose of checking system reliability. The rapid progress of technology in this field since 1987 well shows the wisdom of this approach, and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will surely agree with me. The department is using personal computers to make up for lost time and to complete the project within the limit set by the 1987 budget.

Madam Speaker, I will certainly not answer speculative questions about a twelve-letter name supposedly on a document we have not seen that the hon. member says he has. I have no information and it is not for me to play that role. Let the court do its job, Madam Speaker!

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise this evening, as I have done repeatedly in this House this year and last year, in what is so far a futile attempt to convince this government that there is a crisis facing the port of Halifax.

The latest occasion was Thursday of last week when I asked the Prime Minister about a report that had been initiated by Ports Canada and that we understand to be completed but that was not going to be made public, was not going to be given to members of Parliament for the city of Halifax, the city of Dartmouth, and in Nova Scotia generally. I asked whether the Prime Minister had any words which could lead us to believe that there was an interest in saving one of the great ports of this country which is in clear and desperate distress.

The response, I am afraid, was again evasion. It is my submission that this government must act now to stop the decline into obscurity of what has historically been Canada's greatest port. It is not as though we are asking for a handout.

Halifax has managed to get by with a great deal less assistance than some of our competitors. We do not mind that. We are not complaining but we do note that there are virtually free ice-breaking and pilotage fees for the port of Montreal. We note also that there have been MIL bailouts in the order of $350 million.

I note most particularly, as I have noted before, that there was a decision by the Government of Canada to assist CP Rail in the purchase of the Delaware and Hudson railway. This is a thorn in the side of Haligonians, and Nova Scotians generally.

This railway is now drawing business away from the port of Halifax. It is drawing it in great numbers, to the direct advantage of the port of New York.

This government speaks of competitiveness, presumably in an effort to rationalize our practices with those of the United States. That is fine, too. The port of Halifax has been and can be competitive if the government does not close it down as a result of its policy.

The Americans, for example, have invested $750 million to upgrade the ports of New York and Baltimore. What kind of environment is that subsidy to those ports going to create for Halifax? What is it going to do to Saint John? What is it going to do to Montreal?

Given the government's silence on this matter, apparently the government believes that the ramifications will not make much difference. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, they will, they do, and they have.

When will the government open its eyes to the fact that CN Rail is currently uncompetitive, grotesquely so? It is uncompetitive because of the National Transportation Act, because it took CN eight years to wake up to the fact that its rail rates were too high, and because the government taxes the railway far more than its American competitors are taxed.

We need the federal government to help us create the famous and oft talked about level playing field. Make CN Rail competitive. Lessen the tax burden, both on the port and on the vital infrastructure surrounding it.

If the government gives Halifax a fighting chance instead of subsidizing its competitors, then we in Halifax can do what we have always done best. We in Halifax want the chance to do what we have always done best. What is that?

It is to move the world's goods through our port, the port of Halifax, the port that is the best in the world if we only have the chance to show it.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think we have answered the question on numerous occasions for the member.

Whether she cares to admit it the difficulty facing the port of Halifax is the product of a highly competitive global trading environment that all our ports are facing.

It is time that everyone who is concerned about Halifax started to work together. It is clear that we on this side of the House are doing so. As the Prime Minister told the hon. member last week, he met with the premier of Nova Scotia, who brought constructive and thoughtful proposals for the benefit of the Halifax harbour.

In addition, both the Canada Ports Corporation and CN have been working very hard to increase their marketing competitiveness. CN has firmly committed itself to the Halifax route and it is presently leasing double-stacked cars to service containerized freight traffic.

In addition, the railway is increasing the overhead clearances of the Halifax-Moncton portion of the CN main line. The provincial government of Nova Scotia has committed up to $11.1 million to acquire modern, double-stacked rail cars.

My hon. friend opposite in her question mentioned a specific report concerning competitiveness. As I understand it, the Ports Corporation conducted an analysis of the container situation. The Ports Corporation has made the decision not to release the report.

Instead, it is confident that what is more important for the port of Halifax is that it has undertaken an exhaustive program of consultations with the groups that have an interest and a role to play in the continuing viability of this great port.

I would like the House to know, for the record, that none of us is in the least bit complacent about the problems facing the port of Halifax. Nevertheless, it would be more useful to extol the virtues of this port rather than focusing on the negative at every opportunity.

The member could perhaps also admit that even with today's problems, the port output is still well above what it was five years ago. Indeed, since 1984, according to the Halifax Port Corporation, the port experienced continuous growth until this year.

I can assure the member, as the right hon. Prime Minister said, that this government will be working in partnership with the provincial government, the railway and the port officials for Halifax's future prosperity.

Adjournment Debate

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, this government, to the embarrassment of all Canadians, is refusing to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Madam Speaker, as you know, we are signatories of this document. Our very own Prime Minister co-chaired the conference which produced the convention, yet he and his government steadfastly refuse to ratify it. I do not think that this is acceptable.

However, I believe I know why this is happening. Part of the convention reads:

> Any child that is deprived of liberty shall be held separate and apart from adults unless it is not in the interests of that child to do so.

These few lines are very progressive. It is a valuable document and our government, by not ratifying it, is preventing much needed protection for children. Why? Because these words stand in contrast to the government's own policy of transferring young offenders to adult prisons to serve their sentences.

There is a very great concern out there, particularly in the large cities, about young offenders and the fact that these young offenders are committing so many crimes and are back out on the street in a short period of time. However, what the people do not realize is that the problem with young offenders originates with the government and its policies, that the government incarcerates young offenders with adult criminals where they are assaulted physically and sexually, learn more about crime and how to commit it and are back out on the street in a relatively short period of time without any kind of rehabilitation.

This is wrong. Certainly the young offenders should be incarcerated until they have the proper rehabilitation and assistance. This may mean longer periods of time. Certainly that is acceptable. But what is not acceptable is to put young people out on the street again without proper assistance. To incarcerate them with adults is only exacerbating the problem and making these young people, when they get out of incarceration, more susceptible to committing other crimes.

It is being done because building youth detention facilities is not a politically positive move. It reflects, in all of us, the shortcomings of we as human beings, but it is necessary to have a youth program that is going to serve the needs of that youth. The problems of violence in our cities is now rampant. We have to look at it realistically. We have to ratify this agreement and government has to look at this question.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question of the hon. member with respect to the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

As you all know, the convention came into force on September 2, 1990. Canada had signed the convention on May 28, 1990.

The Department of Justice has co-ordinated the review of federal legislation and policies in light of the convention. We are proud to underline the fact that Canadian legislation and policies dealing with children's rights are progressive and go far beyond the objectives of the convention.

With respect to the specific issue of the detention of children, the convention provides that a child deprived of liberty shall be separated from adults unless it is in his or her best interests not to do so. Although we are in agreement with this principle, we consider that it is necessary to enter a reservation. There are two reasons for that reservation.

The first one is that we must be able to take into account other relevant considerations, such as the well-being of other children kept in custody or the safety of the public.

The second one is that we are currently in the process of consulting with the provinces and the territories on the issue of the appropriate placement of young offenders.

We need time to complete this process in a responsible fashion. We are trying to develop a response which is the most appropriate, taking into account all of the circumstances of young offenders who have been transferred to the adult court and other young offenders.

The hon. member has suggested that the situation of young offenders being held in custody is going to be made worse by Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, which is presently before the House of Commons. He refers to the proposed amendment to test for the transfer of a young offender to the adult court but which retains the principle of the interest of society and specifies that this principle includes the objective of affording protection to the public and to the rehabilitation of the young person.

The objective of the federal government is to ensure that the best possible decision can be made at a transfer hearing in the interest of both the youth before the court and of the public. The proposed test is not advanced to secure more transfers, and transfer as an option is intended to remain an exceptional procedure.

Given the range of interpretation to date on the current test, it was viewed as highly desirable to lessen the unequal application of the test and to reinforce the notion that both the needs of the youth and the protection of the public are primary considerations.

It is our understanding that all provinces and territories support ratifications of this important convention and we are working together to promote and improve the situation of young offenders kept in custody. The reservation would permit us to ratify the convention before the end of the year, before awaiting the completion of the federal–provincial–territorial consultation.

CANADIAN PASSPORTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, last week in this House I raised the matter of issuing false passports, as did the leader of my party, and as did the member for Scarborough West, our immigration critic. Since then I have been increasingly concerned by the attitude displayed by this government and the response received.

When I travel to other countries, I am treated very well, thanks to my Canadian passport. When my constituents become Canadian citizens, they are amazed at the respect the Canadian passport garners them at border points where before they had been less than welcome.

Will this continue? Will Canadians still be so welcome when the international community hears that this government will issue a false passport in three days if you go in person and in two weeks if you use the mail–in program?

The minister responsible said, and I quote: "Security is our highest priority in the issuing of passports".

I did some checking and security is not exactly air tight in the passport office. I was shocked to find that the guarantors are checked at random. In my career as principal and as member of Parliament, I have signed dozens of forms as guarantor. In over 30 years I only had two calls to check, to verify whether I knew the applicant applying for the passport.

When the guarantors are checked, after the passport is issued, how does the minister propose to get the documents back after the fact, particularly since the fraudulent passport was probably mailed to a false address?

I was also shocked at the ease with which birth certificates can be forged, sometimes with as little as a bottle of white–out and a photocopier. Clearly, there must be more stringent measures adopted.

I call on this government to immediately develop national standards for birth certificates, standards which are the same for all provinces. Huge amounts of money are spent in the printing process to ensure that Canadian passports cannot be forged. In relative terms precious little time is spent to ensure that the passports are not issued based on false documentation.

I call on this government to use the $5 million surplus in the passport revolving fund to hire enough people to call every guarantor personally on the telephone. Sometimes a constituent comes to my office asking for help getting some kind of a travel document while they are waiting for landed immigrant status in Canada. I cannot say how many times I have been asked: "Are you asking us to push this case without the proper security checks? Are you asking us to compromise the integrity of the Canadian travel document?"

No. I am asking that the integrity of Canada and of the Canadian passport be upheld at all costs. As a Canadian citizen, I expect this government to do something about the situation. I expect that only Canadian citizens will have our passport. Not spies, not criminals, not drug lords, not people whose only claim to our passports is that they are rich enough to be able to afford the $20,000 to $50,000 currently being charged on the black market for this document.

In closing, the Secretary of State for External Affairs says that she has asked her department to investigate and make a full report. I ask the parliamentary secretary if the minister will table that report in this House and when?

As well, will she assure this House that her minister will table one accurate report rather than the three or four versions she issued in the Al Mashat report?

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, on September 19, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about reports in the newspapers pertaining to the issuance of fraudulent passports.

Internationally, the Canadian passport is reputed to be one of the most secure travel documents. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out, we are taking very seriously the matter of security as it affects the issuance of passports. The Passport Office works very closely with the RCMP to ensure the integrity of our travel documents.

I may point out that the procedures and technology we use are constantly being evaluated to respond to these challenges. No system, whatever security measures are taken, is entirely safe from fraud and false statements.

Hon. members should realize we must strike a balance between increased security and our ability to provide an efficient service at reasonable cost. It has always been our objective to maintain the right balance.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated that departmental officials will be drafting recommendations for improving passport security. We believe that such measures could be implemented at relatively low cost, with as little inconvenience as possible to the Canadian public.

Madam Speaker, in concluding, I hope that my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will consider the positive recommendations made by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBERSHIP OF THE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA—SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to Government Orders, I wish to share with hon. members the Chair's ruling on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead earlier this week.

Wednesday, September 25, 1991, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead raised a question of privilege concerning the membership of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. He alleged that when the committee started sitting, it did so unlawfully because, first of all, the report of the House Management Committee listing the membership of the Special Joint Committee was filed with the Clerk of the House after the hour of adjournment on Tuesday, September 24, and an order adopted by the House on June 19, 1991, did not prescribe this procedure for a day when the House was sitting.

Second, he objected to the fact that the House Management Committee's report listed 22 names of members, while letting the Whip of the New Democratic Party select two members from a list of four names to fill two of the three seats to which the party was entitled on the Special Joint Committee.

The hon. members for Saint-Léonard, Cape Breton—East Richmond, Calgary North and Saint-Denis, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council intervened to clarify certain points for the Chair, and I appreciate their contribution.

Before responding to the specific points raised by the hon. member, I must inform him that the question he raised is not a question of privilege. However, there is certainly some basis for raising a point of order, and the Chair's response will be along those lines.

Regarding the first point raised by the hon. member, I wish to point out that the wording of the special Order, adopted by the House on June 19, 1991, and published in the Votes and Proceedings of that day at page 226, does not refer to adjournments of the House but simply to those times when the House is not sitting, which in the Chair's opinion may include extended periods of adjournment such as the summer recess, shorter periods of adjournment such as from one sitting day to the next, or the period comprised by the weekend.

Consequently, the Chair rules that the report filed by the House Management Committee with the Clerk at 7.28 p.m. on Tuesday, March 24, was filed in accordance with the Order of the House of June 19, 1991 and therefore does not present a problem.

I also wish to point out to the hon. member that said report was published in the Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, September 26 and was available on the Table of the House on September 25.

Let us consider the second point raised by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

[English]

The report of the Standing Committee on House Management lists the initial membership of the special committee and goes on to note how the NDP Whip will fill two of the three places allotted to the party. It is important to note that under the terms of the special order, the Whip of each party is given full control of the membership for that party and the power to substitute at will.

Do the terms of the standing committee report reach back into the special order and put constraints on the NDP Whip by stating that in filling two of the three places allotted to the NDP, their Whip is limited to choosing from the pool of the four NDP members named in the report? The Chair's reading of the committee's report cannot conclude otherwise. And yet, does this not impose a restriction on one of the parties that was never envisioned in the terms of the order of June 19, 1991?

Under ordinary circumstances the standing committee report would have been presented to the House and could have been scrutinized by the House before a motion for concurrence was entertained. There would have been ample opportunity for the House to seek clarification of questions raised by the unusual form of the report. However, the terms of the order of June 19 last have, in effect, denied the House and the Chair such an opportunity by deeming the report concurred in.

We are now faced with scrutinizing the terms of the report after the fact; indeed, after the special committee has held its organization meeting, elected its officers and begun its hearings. In departing from the strict terms of the order of June 19, 1991, which instructed that a 20-member committee be struck, and in deviating from the traditional form of reports for striking committee memberships, the Standing Committee on House Management has placed the Chair in a quandary. The procedural authorities warn against the consequences of such action. In Bourinot Parliamentary Procedure fourth edition, at pages 469 to 470, it states:

> It is a clear principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference. This principle is essential to the regular despatch of business; for, if it were admitted that what the House entertained, in one instance, and referred to a committee, was so far controllable by that committee, that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end; and, as often as circumstances would afford a pretence, the proceedings of the House would be involved in confusion.

The interventions of hon. members Wednesday made clear that the report has, indeed, sown widespread confusion about the membership of this special committee. The difficulty lies in the designations member No. 19 and member No. 20, and in the explanatory note narrowing the terms of the order of June 19, 1991. This cannot be allowed to stand.

The Order of the House of June 19, at page 226 of the Votes and Proceedings, provides in the second paragraph that the House Management Committee will simply "designate" 20 members of this House as members of the Special Joint Committee. There is no reference to additional members or members designated by numbers marked with an asterisk, in connection with a list of substitutes.

In Canadian parliamentary practice, a striking committee has a very narrow mandate.

Unless the House specifically authorizes them to do so, such committees may only report names of members who are to sit on parliamentary committees.

By failing to observe the Order of the House of June 19, the House Management Committee went beyond its mandate. At first, the committee appointed only 18 members; subsequently, it proposed a substitution procedure for two numbered seats set aside for the NDP.

The Chair finds the second part of the House Management Committee's report clearly inadmissible, and in this respect, the objection raised by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is well founded.

That being said, should the Chair therefore reject out of hand the report of the House Management Committee, with all the serious consequences this might entail? I think it would not make sense to reject all the work done by the House Management Committee and the Special Joint Committee. The three Whips were acting in good faith in their concerned efforts to respond to a request by the New Democratic Party.

I therefore see no satisfactory reason for starting the selection process over again and thus forcing the Special Joint Committee to interrupt its work. Consequently, the Chair rules that the 18 members designated as members of the Committee were formally appointed by the House pursuant to the report of the House Management Committee and in accordance with the Order made on June 19; the Chair also rules that the remaining part of the House Management Committee's report is null and void. Finally, the Chair asks the Striking Committee to file a supplementary report, in addition to the report filed on September 24, designating two more members of the New Democratic Party, and when this report is tabled in the House or filed with the Clerk, pursuant to Order of June 19, said supplementary report shall also be deemed to have been adopted pursuant to Order of June 19, 1991.

In concluding, the House will understand that this ruling is an unusual one on the part of the Chair, but it is not unprecedented. On February 14, 1944, and April 23, 1975, the Chair intervened in matters concerning committee reports. Those instances were not entirely identical to the question before us today, but the intent of today's ruling reflects the intent of the rulings made by my predecessors, who in similar circumstances also refused to categorically bring the business of the House to a halt.

I wish to thank hon. members for their patience.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, September 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F; and the motion of Mr. Vincent (p. 2536).

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I ask the House to be patient, but in the debate on Bill C-32 of Monday, September 23, 1991, I am misquoted in Hansard and I would simply like to make a correction, because what is there makes no sense. Madam Speaker, I said in French that one-parent families in my riding are headed by women 85 per cent of the time. In English, "mère" was mistranslated as "mere children". I also think that there is a mistake in the following sentence:

[English]

There are single parent families in Ottawa—Vanier, in my riding. Twenty per cent of all families are single parent families and 85 per cent of these are headed by mere children. It should be saying "with mothers without children."

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier): I am sorry, that should be "mothers with children."

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the Chair and hon. members this mistranslation or typographical error and I think that he can be assured that we will have the correction made before the final version is printed.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Chambly.

• (1020)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, in resuming debate on Bill C-32, I think it is important that we go back to a general explanation of why this bill is as important as it is.

CAP, which is the Canada Assistance Plan, was first established by the Liberals in 1966. Very seldom do we ever give credit to other parties because of partisan debate in this House, but we in the NDP do realize that in 1966 this was a fine idea.

CAP gave constitutional responsibility for programs of income redistribution, including social assistance programs paying money to Canadians anywhere in Canada. It was a shared program and it was working—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realize there is a very important conversation going on, but the two Whips should know better than to stand between the Speaker and whomever has the floor, please.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am glad Your Honour brought that to our attention. I was going to do the same and bring to the attention of the House the two Whips meeting and talking on the floor of the House.

I think it is rather repugnant, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is a Friday morning. I appreciate the hon. member's sense of humour.

I do apologize for having interrupted the hon. member. The member for Chambly has the floor.

Mr. Edmonston: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Your concern was also my concern. I also appreciate the gentle humour that we seem to be engaged in. We are getting on the right foot for a Friday morning, and I think that is a good sign.

As I was saying, the Canada Assistance Program is very important. It was started by the Liberals in 1966. Even the Nielsen report, which was commissioned by the Conservative government as to finding ways that we could streamline government, make it less expensive and more efficient, said that CAP or the Canada Assistance Program was a very good program. It lauded the way that the program had made for more harmonious relations between provinces and Ottawa, although it did concern itself with the cost, particularly the open-ended portion of the Canada Assistance Program.

Because the Nielsen report concerned itself with the cost and the open-endedness, this fifty-fifty cost sharing program, the government many years later, about actually a year ago, gave clear signs that it intended to cap CAP. Once again I say that the program gives constitutional responsibility for income redistribution including social assistance programs to Canadians anywhere in Canada. In every province one would have an equal chance of obtaining an equal amount of money.

This concerned a great deal the Conservative side of this House mainly because of the expense. Of course it is a fifty-fifty cost sharing deal. Whenever the provinces had increased costs, they can rely upon the federal government to pay 50 per cent of those increased costs. That was the seed of discord or discontent on the government side because the federal government was seeing the provinces increasing their costs and it did not have much of a say except to pay the increased costs itself.

So a bill came down. It was Bill C-69 and it imposed a two-year freeze on the CAP for British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. It is interesting that Bill C-69 considered British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario as rich provinces. If we take a look at Ontario right now with the unemployment, the deficit, the recession, and the problems that free trade caused in Ontario and for a lot of other people, we see that Ontario is far from being a rich province.

An hon. member: British Columbia too.

Mr. Edmonston: British Columbia, my hon. member tells me as well. What we have here is a definition of provinces as being rich when they are not. With Bill C-69 and imposing a two-year freeze I believe we have the government trying, to the best of its ability perhaps, to cut expenses and at the same time doing it on the backs of people who are least able to afford these cuts.

Bill C-69 was challenged. It went to the Supreme Court of Canada, after winning in the lower courts, the courts of first instance. The provinces challenged the bill saying: "The government made an agreement with us that it was going to pay for these programs". When a government makes a political agreement, and with this government where political agreements we thought were sacred, we find that that is not the case. If you shake hands—

An hon. member: A sacred trust.

Mr. Edmonston: "A sacred trust", the member from the government side says. We have heard that before.

The Supreme Court decision essentially said no, that Parliament is supreme, that Parliament can shake hands with you at one moment and then stab you in the back at the next, and that when Parliament is in session, if you accept the supremacy of Parliament, no one's purse or life is safe.

We saw that very clearly with Bill C-69. Now we are looking at, as a result of the Supreme Court making it very clear that Parliament has this power, the government coming back again with Bill C-32, which extends the freeze for three more years.

Our party is very much concerned about this. We have to look behind the freeze and see who does this affect mostly. We have to look at the people who are mostly concerned with the Canadian Assistance Program. I will just give a very quick rundown of who these people are: abused and neglected children in need of protection obviously, mentally and physically disabled persons, one parent families, seniors, the unemployed and the working poor, battered women, families and individuals in crisis.

Because of the capping of CAP there has been a movement on the part of a number of provinces. I can tell you in particular about the movement in Ontario and by our party here in Ottawa. We wanted to put into the Constitution a social contract, provisions whereby the people I have just named would be protected. There would not be a constitutional right for the government to make an agreement and then go back on its word.

People ask: "How will this social contract immediately affect myself or Canadians?" It would not allow the government to do what it did under Bill C-69 and what it is trying to continue to do under Bill C-32. It is extremely important when we talk about a social contract that our fellow Canadians understand that what we are trying to do partially is to repair the abuse—and I would say the abuse of process, even, although it was legitimate according to the Supreme Court decision—that we saw the government do in its initial legislation, Bill C-69, and is continuing to do in this legislation, Bill C-32.

Therefore it is obvious that our party is against this piece of legislation. We were against the practice. We did not think it was fair in these constitutional times, I can tell you.

[Translation]

—Madam Speaker, that we Quebecers are looking more and more for reasons to remain in Canada. We are looking more and more for reasons to trust the federal government. We see legislation like Bill C-69 and Bill C-32 as a provocation. It is an example of a government that wants to withdraw from its responsibilities. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that in Quebec, we are having a big debate on the relevance of the federal government and also the overlapping of jurisdiction. The basic problem is: Can we Quebecers trust this government?

An hon. member: Phil, have you become a separatist?

Mr. Edmonston: Someone is asking me whether I have become a separatist. No, I am a Quebecer. I am a Quebecer like others here. I am trying above all to give both sides of the story. I am saying what many Quebecers are saying.

• (1030)

The problem here is not just Quebec. As my friend from Alberta just said, Quebec is asking the same questions as Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario have asked. Now that we are trying to bind this country together, actions of this government are breaking us apart and causing rifts everywhere. That is the basic problem.

You know, a Liberal senator said that perception is reality. Well, Quebecers' perception of our actions here in Ottawa is that federalism as it is now is not working. In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would say that it is mainly due to the acts of this government, which has removed national institutions one after another.

So, Madam Speaker, of course our party is against this bill and as a Quebecer, of course I support my party.

THE RAILWAY ACT

The House resumed from Monday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read a third time and passed.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I do not know the number of times I have risen to speak about the port of Halifax, either in direct relationship to the At and East subsidy or on other matters relating to the crisis situation affecting the port of Halifax today.

The At and East subsidy maintained fixed rail costs for moving grain and flour to eastern Canadian ports, notably the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John, New Brunswick. It was designed to make these eastern Canadian ports competitive with ports on the eastern seaboard of the United States and other Canadian ports. It was a simple theory and one that worked.

In July 1989 the At and East subsidy ended without, I might add, the benefit of legislation. On July 15, 1989 the subsidy was cut and the fallout began in the port of Halifax and in the port of Saint John. We have waited for the government either to see the error of its ways or at least bring the bill through the House. Finally, here we are two years and two months later, two years and two months without this subsidy, and now we have finally reached third reading of this bill. It is not something that will go unnoticed by the people of Halifax and the people of Saint John.

What has been the effect on these two ports of the cancellation of this subsidy? We all know what the effect was on Saint John, New Brunswick. The grain elevator there is closed. The jobs are gone. The port has taken a crippling blow. Elsie Wayne, the well known and articulate mayor of Saint John, has made her plea and it has landed on deaf ears in this government. Saint John has taken a serious, serious wound.

In Halifax the grain elevator is down to one-quarter of its normal capacity. The same can be said for the flour mill in the port of Halifax. The number of jobs lost is a serious blow to the economy of Halifax and the life of the port, which is the lifeblood of the city and to some degree of the province and the region.

In 1988, the last full year of the At and East subsidy, 337,914 tonnes of grains and 182,957 tonnes of flour came into the port of Halifax under the At and East subsidy. According to Captain Claude Bell of the Halifax Port Corporation roughly one stevedore is employed for every 1,000 tonnes of grain and flour exported.

It means that in that area alone we are looking at a loss of approximately 500 jobs in a city with a population of approximately 100,000. This loss is not inconsiderable. This loss is something that can and will create major hardship in a city that for years has prided itself on its self-sufficiency, particularly because of its port.

The At and East subsidy has been in effect since the early 1960s. As I said before, this was to allow the eastern ports of Saint John and Halifax to compete adequately with the superports on the east coast of the United States, New York and Baltimore in particular.

Since the cancellation of At and East—to add insult to injury, to pour salt in the wounds of Haligonians and Dartmouthians and Nova Scotians and New Brunswickers—among other things Canadian Pacific Rail has, with the able financial assistance of this government, purchased the D&H railroad. The D&H railroad out of the eastern U.S. ports is a direct and serious competitor with CN rail on the Halifax to Montreal run. Are there subsidies any more for CN rail? No. At and East is dead. Even without legislation it has been dead for two years, two months and two weeks.

At and East is dead but D&H is thriving. D&H is going along just fine, thank you very much, with the able assistance of the Government of Canada. There are jobs in Maryland and New York State. Those ports are getting along just fine. There are jobs on the D&H railroad.

What is happening in Halifax, what is happening in Nova Scotia? Five hundred jobs lost at the port, more jobs lost from the rail and so on and so on; a litany of disaster that is epic in its proportions. But that is all right. Let the free market forces bear. Things are good in Baltimore and New York. Halifax will just have to learn to get along without the assistance of the national government.

At and East has some other ramifications for the people of Nova Scotia as well. I am going to leave the full description of these problems for my colleagues who know more about the agricultural industry than I do.

I want to talk about one thing. In Nova Scotia this year we had a wonderful summer of weather as far as tourism was concerned. We had hot sunny days and beautiful blue skies. However, in the month of July we had one-quarter our normal rainfall. Consequently, for farmers in the province of Nova Scotia the hay crop is less than half its normal annual output. That is going to make things very tough for livestock farmers in the province of Nova Scotia.

What was the other benefit from At and East to the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? It was a fairly good and reasonably priced source of feed grain. That is gone. The hay crop is less than half its normal output. The livestock producers in the province of Nova Scotia, and in the maritimes generally, are going to suffer as a result of that. I know that my colleagues who know a great deal more about agriculture would agree with me that this is going to be a very, very difficult time for livestock producers in Nova Scotia.

The province of Nova Scotia is a small province. When one sector is hit the spin-off, the bouncing ball effect, the ripple effect hits everyone in the province. That is why Haligonians are as concerned about the Sydney steel plant as residents of industrial Cape Breton. That is why the people of South West Nova are as concerned about the port of Halifax as Haligonians. That is why all Nova Scotians know that the problems of the farmers throughout our rural areas are problems for all of us.

We are small. The population of the province is at most 800,000. In the metropolitan area represented by the member for Dartmouth and myself—and I believe there is another member, but I cannot remember who it is at the moment—250,000 of those people live. However, they are concerned about the whole province and the economic future and stability of that province.

At and East has been effectively dead for two years, two months and two weeks. Today, the government finally puts the bill through for the last time. The people of Nova Scotia and the people of Halifax-Dartmouth will remember. They will remember well who caused their once mighty port to suffer and decline. Nova Scotians have long memories.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, as you mentioned earlier, it is a Friday morning. The Chamber usually has some of its better speeches on Fridays because the members know we have to ensure that the government has learned its lesson for the weekend until we return on Monday. I hope that in the few moments I have, I will instil a little discipline on the other side.

I have spoken to this bill that is before us a number of times, as have other members on this side of the House. It is a regressive piece of legislation that the government bungled when it first tried introduce it.

The member for Halifax indicated that the At and East subsidy, which was an absolutely essential part of our grain transportation system and infrastructure in Canada, has been dead for awhile. It has been over two years now.

The government introduced a bill, and before the bill ever passed it decided that it was going to do away with the subsidy.

I spoke, and I think this is the third time, in debate on this so I am not going to speak specifically about the impact on the agricultural sector in Atlantic Canada, particularly Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, of the removal of the subsidy. Suffice it to say that this is one of those examples of the government selectively deciding to punish Atlantic Canada for being the eastern part of the country or maybe because it saw good sense in the last election and elected mostly Liberals.

Unfortunately, the people of Atlantic Canada, who knew better than to try and re-elect this government because they knew what in the name of goodness was going to happen to the country, elected Liberals. We will have to wait a little longer to rectify the damage that has been done by this government's policies, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

I want to talk a little bit about what has happened to the port of Halifax. The At and East program, a subsidy for the movement of feed grains to east coast ports, is gone. I have said in previous speeches that I am certainly not one of those people who gets up and says: "Well then you should do away with any freight rate assistance in western Canada or you should go up the St. Lawrence Seaway and do away with any infrastructural subsidy that takes place". There is free ice-breaking, free aids for navigation and things like that on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Surely to goodness there is something called fairness. If the government is going to treat us one way, then everybody else should receive the same treatment. If it is going to treat the west one way it should treat the east the same way. This government does the old divide and conquer. At the port of Halifax, the loss of the At and East program was just one in a number of crippling body blows inflicted by this government.

My hon. colleague from Halifax spoke very succinctly about the problems in the port of Halifax that had been caused by the loss of the At and East subsidy. She talked about the 500 jobs that have disappeared in an area of only 100,000 people.

But more than that is happening in the port of Halifax. Just to give you an idea about what the At and East started, I want to let you know what has happened in Halifax in the last 12 months. The port of Halifax is one of the most efficient ports in North America. It is not one of these places where one says: "Well, there is a lot of fat to cut, so you should cut the fat and you will be more competitive," It is extremely competitive and that is recognized in the shipping industry around the world.

There is a problem because the government's transportation policies have caused the port of Halifax not just to lose $20 million or $30 million, but if one adds the At and East subsidy loss to the loss of traffic in the last 12 months, we are looking at nearly $60 million worth of traffic. We are looking at 500 jobs lost with the reduction or the elimination of At and East, and we are looking at at least another 400 jobs that have been lost in the last number of months.

This government has been asked repeatedly in the House of Commons to address the problems facing the port of Halifax, to stop its assault and battery on the port of Halifax and its business, and it has consistently refused to do so.

Another little body blow was delivered just in the last little while. The government has decided to change some of the regulations dealing with meat inspection on frozen meat that enters Canada. Why in the name of goodness would it do that? Was it because it did not think it was efficient? No. It was because Canadian Pacific rail lobbied the government effectively to change the regulations.

The regulations usually work like this. When frozen meat products come into Canada, through a port usually, it is inspected at the port. However, now that Canadian Pacific has acquired the D&H line through the United States and is actively undercutting ports like the port of Halifax, what has it done? It has said: "Look, federal government, we have to get more traffic moving towards central Canadian markets through our ports in the United States because we've got a rail line there. If you just change your regulation that any frozen meat product that is coming into Canada via a U.S. port will not be stopped at the border and will only be inspected when it reaches the warehouse, we'll be able to steal some business from ports like Halifax".

Approximately 50,000 tonnes of frozen meat product was imported through the port of Halifax last year alone from Australia and New Zealand. What does the government care? Does the government care that a change in one regulation might lose that traffic to the port of Halifax and might put it through the ports in Philadelphia or New York? It does not care at all. It did not even consult with the industry, it changed the regulation.

The At and East was the beginning of a large crack that this government instituted in the competitiveness of the port of Halifax. I do not think it is about to end. I asked in this House for the Minister of Transport to order the National Transportation Agency, the NTA, to hold an inquiry because we have heard from people in the industry that things like the loss of the At and East, things like a less than competitive schedule by Canadian National, things like perhaps a too high fee per tonne shipped by Canadian National between the port of Halifax and the inland ports in Montreal, or even perhaps the fact that the St. Lawrence Seaway is subsidized.

They tell us in Halifax when we deal with trains shipping things from the port of Halifax to Montreal or Toronto that it has to be full cost recovery. After all, that is why we lost At and East. That is why it cannot look at freight rates or try to lower the rates that CN charges because there has to be cost recovery.

Madam Speaker, do you know what? We lost business and 400 jobs in the port of Halifax when Hapag–Lloyd left and took $24 million in traffic with them. Do you know where it went? Fifty per cent of it went to New York, 50 per cent went up the St. Lawrence Seaway to Montreal.

All we are asking for in the east is not that other places get pummelled and kicked and battered like Atlantic Canada, but we demand fair treatment for the Atlantic coast transportation infrastructure and most importantly for the ports on the Atlantic coast.

This is not the last time, Madam Speaker, that you are going to hear myself and other members from the Atlantic speaking. Because, if we lose our transportation infrastructure, if our ports lose their competitiveness because of negligence or because of design by this government, through things like the loss of the At and East, we will not be able to compete. We are in a period of constitutional renewal again and we are talking about trying to ensure equality in this country. Yet every single time that the government decides to come in and save a dollar here or a dollar there, it seems to hit the Atlantic harder than anywhere else.

There was a document released yesterday by this government. It talked a great deal about the need for an economic union. I fully support that. I think nearly every Canadian would support the idea of unrestricted movement of goods, traffic and people in this country. But, my goodness, how can one legitimately have an economic union in this country when the government, by every action it has taken in the transportation sector in Atlantic Canada, has removed or lessened our ability to trade and compete internally?

If the port of Halifax is weakened, if we lose a container terminal, if we lose a flour mill, if we lose a grain elevator, it means we cannot compete. If it allows Canadian National to keep its rates high so nobody will bother shipping through our ports but will go down and ship through the United States, very soon after CN will say: "You know, our traffic has decreased because of our rates and our service, therefore we are going to apply for rail line abandonment". We have heard this story before. We have been at this movie. We did not like it then and we certainly do not like it now.

In conclusion, this bill has been before this place so often I might have spoken on it 10 times. If I could get away with it, I would speak on it 20 times because this is a bill that shows callousness and the absolute lack of good judgment. This is the type of bill that goes a long way to destroying unity in this country, because the country is not going to stay together if people do not believe it is in their economic interest. When you see a government single out any region of this country for particularly brutal treatment by the way it legislates, if you think that does one thing for national unity then I should have a chat with you because I certainly do not think it does.

This bill is one that is probably going to pass sooner as opposed to later, because it has been on the government agenda for a long time. The people of Atlantic Canada, the agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada, the businesses in Atlantic Canada, the flour mills and the people who have lost their jobs have already been stung by this bill before it has ever been passed by the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada. In conclusion, I make my final appeal for the government to come to its senses, to withdraw this bill, to reinstate the At and East program, and to do so immediately.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise today and participate in the debate on the At and East freight rates. As eloquent as the statements by the members from the Atlantic provinces may have been, this is not merely an Atlantic problem. I would like to explain why that is so.

In previous stages of this debate, a debate which has been going on for a long time, western members of the New Democratic Party have stood solidly with people from Atlantic Canada to fight this particular manoeuvre, and I think people are aware of that.

The reason we have fought this is because the principles at stake here are very important, and there are several of them. First of all, what we are looking at here is another case of the government dismantling the infrastructure that holds this country together, particularly the transportation infrastructure. This country was originally built on a transportation infrastructure. The national dream of John A. Macdonald and his successors was clearly based on tying this country together economically with a transportation infrastructure.

Our agricultural economy was based on that. It was early recognized that our major grain producing regions in this country, in other words the prairie basin, were far removed from any kind of tidewater, far removed from ports where grain could move into export markets. This is in contrast to all our major grain competitors in the world. In Australia virtually all the grain is grown within 200 miles of the coast. The same is true in Argentina. United States has major waterways. The Mississippi river system which empties its heartlands provides for cheap water based transportation out of its heartlands.

Western Canada and the prairies were the only grain producing regions in the world, virtually, that did not have a big enough internal market to absorb its production, and that was far from tidewater.

The infrastructure that was put in place was a very important part of the fabric of this country. It was particularly an integral part of the agricultural industry as it developed in this country.

What have we seen? We have seen this whole infrastructure come under increasing attack by a change in philosophy that says that infrastructure is not important, that it is not the government's job to ensure that the larger picture is looked after, that it is merely the government's job to make sure that whatever entrepreneurial organization or corporation, be it a railway, grain company or whatever, can make an extra dime on $1 million here or there.

This government and the government before it had abandoned the idea that it is the job of the federal government in this country to hold the infrastructure together. The erosion obviously started with the whole attack on the Crow rate, which I remember so well as being launched by the former Minister of Transportation, Jean-Luc Pepin.

Although we still have a western transportation act that includes some elements of that old Crow rate structure, certainly the major part is gone. Year after year it is being eroded and made less and less effective.

Another critical element of that whole debate is this At and East question. What At and East did was two things. First, it allowed western grain to get to the maritimes at a competitive rate so that the maritime agricultural industry had access to that grain. Second, it allowed for an alternate set of ports to be used in times when they were needed. Particularly that was important because these are ports that are open 12 months a year and not frozen in, in the winter, as the Great Lakes ports are.

We do have ports on the west coast that are open all year round, but we do not have any way to get to the Atlantic Ocean 12 months a year without going to the maritime ports. At and East gave us the capacity to do that.

What have we seen? We saw what I think is one of the most shameful legislative processes that I have seen take place since I became elected in 1988. Surely it is incumbent on the government to treat its own legislation and its own legislative processes with some respect, but it did not do that in this case.

It must have felt that somehow or other the maritime voice would not be heard here, that there were so few farmers in maritime Canada that their voice would not be heard or that the 500 workers who are about to be laid off or who have lost their jobs did not matter. I do not know what the thinking of the government was. I have trouble reading its mind.

What I do know was that on July 19, 1989 the government unilaterally, and probably illegally, cut off the At and East payments. It made them inoperative and it has been operating on that basis ever since.

Here we are over two years later still without legislative authority to consummate what the government had done by fiat. That is a totally unacceptable way of going about things from a legislative point of view, especially on a question that is as important to the national infrastructure as this one.

I would urge government members to reconsider what they have done here, not only in terms of At and East but to make sure first of all that the whole process does not happen again.

I think that if this government has any moral guts and moral convictions it should compensate the people for the losses that they have incurred over the last two years while the At and East rates have been illegally gone.

A further backdrop to this whole situation is the crisis that is facing agriculture in general in this country. Surely this is the wrong time to start pulling apart our agriculture infrastructure piece by piece by piece. We are seeing it happen with rail line abandonment in western Canada. We have seen off-loading of federal cost shared programs like crop insurance on to the provinces which can ill afford them. This is creating a patchwork of programs across the country.

That is the opposite direction from which we would like to be going. A very real cash flow crisis is endangering probably one-third to one-half of Canadian farm families and maritime farm families are no exception.

It is making it impossible for livestock producers and for people that depend on the flour milling industry in the maritimes even to plan in the short run, let alone the long run.

It is one more hammer blow to the economic well-being of farmers, not only in maritime Canada, but right across the country. If those maritime markets are lost as a result of the At and East going, it means that western Canadian farmers have one less opportunity to sell their grain within their own market.

I recognize the time is getting short, Madam Speaker. What we need is an agriculture industry that can serve our farming community from coast to coast to coast, that can ensure that we have an infrastructure which can ensure security of food for Canadian families right across this country, and not chip away our security of food supply the way this government is doing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I want to commend the Supreme Court of Canada for its decision yesterday to send Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler back to the United States where they face the possibility of being executed.

Charles Ng allegedly took part in the brutal torture and murder of at least 12 victims in California. Members of the Victims of Violence, both in the U.S.A. and in Canada, will be pleased and relieved with yesterday's decision.

Charles Ng made a mockery of our extradition laws by exploiting the appeal options and costing Canadian taxpayers over $6 million since 1985. I have brought up the Charles Ng case in the House of Commons on several occasions, pressing the government to have Mr. Ng sent back to the United States, and to toughen our extradition laws.

I urge the Minister of Justice to have Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, passed quickly so that we will send a clear and strong message to U.S. criminals that Canada is no longer a safe haven for murderers—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, the events in the wonderland of Tory trials and tribulations become curiouser and curiouser. Yesterday an unusual gag order was placed on all testimony at the tax appeal of former Tory MP, Michel Gravel. Not only will the testimony that will be heard in future hearings be kept secret until the end of the case, but even the evidence that was widely reported last week will now be hidden away.

This is not the first time Canadians have been prevented from finding out just what is said under oath about the constant stream of Tories facing accusations of fraud, breach of trust and influence peddling. We will not find out what was said during 17 days of hearings into allegations of corruption by more than a dozen prominent Tories until the end of all the court actions involving former Tory minister Roch LaSalle.

Likewise, the role played by Senator Michael Cogger, another mystery—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows he should not make attacks on people.

PUBLIC TRANSIT

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, the federal government's unilateral disengagement from public transit services affects thousands of its employees and is completely inconsistent with its responsibilities as a major employer and a corporate citizen for the environment, the congestion of roads and bridges, and even energy efficiency. Furthermore, this refusal of the federal government to honour its previous commitments is unacceptable and totally unjustified and unjustifiable.

Madam Speaker, I support Gatineau city council, which urges the federal government to reconsider its position and to honour the commitment which it made on its own initiative under the previously mentioned tripartite agreement through the NCC.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, Canada's official recognition of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania has understandably excited and delighted the proponents of Quebec's independence. So did the Prime Minister's statement that Canada will also recognize the results of a referendum on Ukrainian independence.

But will the Quebec sovereignists recognize the right of self-determination of the Crees and Inuit in northern Quebec? No, no, says Mr. Parizeau, that is Quebec. Surely, the right of self-determination is a right for all.

HAMILTON AIRPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, did you know that for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, Hamilton airport saved the day. Travelling to Toronto to deliver a speech, the minister's plane was unable to land at Pearson International and instead had to rely on Hamilton airport to make the landing. Again the lesson is clear; more air traffic must be redirected to Hamilton.

The junior transport minister, the member for Lincoln and the Minister of Transport disagree with common sense. The Minister of Transport would like to waste $800 million in taxpayers' money, not on improving Hamilton airport as an incentive for more business, but for a face lift on two terminals at Pearson. He should listen to his Conservative colleague from Bramalea—Gore—Malton, whose riding includes Pearson International, and whose ideas do make good sense. His suggestions? "The government should start making plans for another airport. I have toured Hamilton airport and I liked what I saw, a good alternative to relieve some of the pressure at Pearson".

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, this year marks the seventh National Family Week. In 1991, it focuses on families and the home environment. Families are the cornerstone of our society, the fabric of our great nation. Our children are our most valuable asset. The development, welfare and education of the young are critical to the success of Canada in this changing, highly competitive world.

I believe that National Family Week is a time to commit ourselves again to our families by building stronger relationships with our wives, husbands, children and other families members for whom we care.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, rather than getting the $1 billion they so desperately need, Canada's farm families are once again being put through the political wringer by the PCs.

This Monday we saw the bizarre spectacle of this government voting down a motion to provide an emergency payment which its own members on the agriculture committee had recommended. This followed positive signals by the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and a promise of a third line of defence when GRIP and NISA were introduced.

Now we hear from PC committee rooms in Saskatchewan that they are expecting an announcement of a stabilization payout during the third week of Grant Devine's campaign.

It is time to quite playing politics with farm families. If this government has an announcement to make on grain stabilization, it should make it now and not when it suits Grant Devine.

The Prime Minister might also reread my letter of August 7, inviting him to come to Prince Albert for an agriculture summit. By going back to John Diefenbaker's hometown and listening to farmers, he might start to regain the credibility he has lost in rural Canada.

LOWER ST. LAWRENCE REGION

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Madam Speaker, in the last year and a half, 6,000 jobs were created in the Lower St. Lawrence region.

According to the August 1991 labour market bulletin published by Employment and Immigration Canada, the Lower St. Lawrence region had 91,700 people at work in August 1991, the highest level ever recorded for that period. This outstanding performance officially and unequivocally contradicts those who talk about job losses in the region.

The bulletin indicates a gain of 3,700 jobs in the Lower St. Lawrence between May and July 1991. The economist responsible for the bulletin wrote that the Lower St. Lawrence region continued to turn in an amazing labour market performance in August 1991. We can see that employment has grown steadily in the Lower St. Lawrence region for 17 months now. These statistics are very revealing and show once again that, thanks to the dynamism of its businesses and our government's initiatives, the Lower St. Lawrence is one of only four of Quebec's thirteen regions that—

TORONTO PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have good news today for the people of Broadview—Greenwood. I would like to announce that the world class Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra will be playing the 1992 season on the Danforth. It will be playing at the Music Hall and music conductor Paul Robinson will be featuring guest artists from all over the world.

The first concert will take place on Sunday, October 27, featuring Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2, with guest virtuoso, Latvian artist Arthur Ozolins.

We want to let everyone in this House know that culture is alive and well in Broadview—Greenwood in downtown Toronto.

We welcome all people, not only from Toronto, but from all over Canada. Join us for a concert with the Toronto Philharmonic Orchestra and while in Toronto, enjoy one of the 300 restaurants.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, Western Economic Diversification was announced in 1987. Its beginnings were slow for Manitoba, but today the evidence of western diversification's tremendous success of job creating and attracting new investment is spectacular. Businesses in Portage La Prairie in my constituency have received in the last two years close $18 million in interest free loans and $12 million in a southern development initiative.

Just listen at this; WMC Enterprises, Go For Cart, South Port Aerospace, Western Combine, Southern Development Initiative. Can Oat is presently being opened by the minister as I speak.

It pays to elect a good, hard working Conservative member of Parliament. It gets things done.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, the Acadian community of the Atlantic provinces is concerned about the future of Radio-Canada as an instrument for promoting the French culture in Canada. For nearly a year, the coalition for French-language television in Acadia has opposed the transfer of federal powers over culture and communications to the provinces and has particularly demanded an increased presence for the French CBC in the region.

At a time when we deplore Canadians' misunderstanding and ignorance of one another, it is inconceivable to turn culture and communications over to the provinces. Such a transfer of jurisdiction would further isolate the official-language communities. We cannot allow ourselves to shake an already vulnerable Acadian culture any more. The coalition deserves the support of all parliamentarians who believe in the importance of culture and communications for maintaining and developing a national identity based on the diversity and richness of its communities, including the Acadian community of the Atlantic provinces.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, October 7 to the 13 marks the seventh National Family Week to be celebrated across the country. The theme of the week, "You've Got What it Takes", promotes the need for individual family members to work at improving their family environments.

Traditionally the family has been a source of strength and comfort to its members. We know that whether we win or lose, our families will continue to love and to support us.

Unfortunately not all people belong to such strong and loving family units, so it is important that as we celebrate our own good fortune we do not forget about the women and children who suffer abuse within their families.

Family week is a good time to consider how we can all work together; individuals, communities and governments to reach out and help those who find themselves the victims of family violence. Improvements in family life are starting points for improvements in the over-all quality of life within our society.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, on February 21, 1990, the Minister of State for Privatization said that the future of Canada's energy industry "depends on the development of our vast reserves. To be a partner in these initiatives, Petro-Canada needs equity capital.".

After privatization, Petro-Canada has nearly completed the sale of its holdings in Syncrude's oil sands development project. Strike one.

Speaking in committee on November 6, 1990, the minister said that privatization is "the best way for Canada to grow, to create employment". But now Petro-Canada is selling off its one-third share of the new MTBE gasoline additive plant in Edmonton. Strike two.

At that same committee meeting, the minister said that money from the privatization sale "will help out the company immensely especially with its involvement in Hibernia and Terra Nova". However, Petro-Canada is now trying to sell a chunk of its holdings in those offshore projects.

That is three strikes. They're out.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, how would you or any member of this House like it if you had not been paid for the past year?

This is happening to potato farmers in Prince Edward Island who have not been compensated for the 1990 crop under the Plant Protections Act because of the PVY-N virus.

After strenuous negotiations between the province of Prince Edward Island, its farmers, and the federal government, a compensation package was hammered out in the spring of 1991. To this date only one-quarter of the compensation cheques have been received by farmers. Why, Madam Speaker? Is it deliberate?

To make matters worse the application forms for the 1991 crop are not available yet. This is totally unconscionable. There is one thing that potato producers or any farmers hate to do and that is plough down their crops. To plough down a crop unnecessarily, as many had to do this year it seems, and to find that the promised compensation is nowhere in sight, and not even in the application forms, is truly heartbreaking.

P.E.I. farm families are living on bank loans which are costing additional money. Why is this happening, Madam Speaker? This government has to answer this question and get the cheques—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time allowed has now expired.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst is scaring Acadians with his erroneous claims that the federal government intends to hand over Radio-Canada to the provinces. I think he is making a big mistake here. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst is following in the footsteps of Bloc Quebecois members with their habit of using scare tactics.

I want to give Quebecers and French Canadians outside Quebec the assurance that the federal government intends to maintain its jurisdiction over Radio-Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I don't know where I should direct my question, because the front benches are pretty empty—

An hon. member: There is no minister.

An hon. member: There is no one!

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask whomever answers on behalf of the government whether it is true, as I read on page 19 of the government's constitutional proposals, that agricultural supply marketing boards, a system that is used across Canada, would be an impediment to the mobility of goods in Canada. Is it true that the government intends to terminate a system that is used not in just one province but in every province in this country, a system that has provided farmers with a measure of production and income stability? Does the government really intend to put an end to price stabilization boards?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, allow me to reassure the Leader of the Opposition. We raised a very important issue. These boards have played a very important stabilizing role in the economy of this country. I can inform the hon. member that our reform proposals provide that these boards will be protected, thanks to policies in the national interest.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): I am very pleased, Madam Speaker, but they should not put it in the paper if they do not want to take marketing boards out.

I would like to ask a supplementary question of the same minister. At this moment the price of a bushel of wheat in Canada is the lowest in real terms since 1931. The government is talking about a program that was in effect last year and is talking about a program that will take effect next year. In the meantime, thousands of farmers are being driven from their farms.

I want to know from this government if it has the intention of doing something, not last year, not next year, but this year to make sure that the farmers can stay on their farms and not be forced to move to the cities to try to find jobs that do not exist anyway because of the economic policies of this government.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition should consider what the Canadian government's position has been in recent years with respect to grain. I believe that this government in particular has paid a great deal of attention to grain producers.

I may add that the Leader of the Opposition is also aware that as far as the grain sector is concerned, our current problem is an international one. The fact that prices are so depressed is above all a result of the incredible price war between the European Common Market and the United States.

• (1120)

GATT trade negotiations resumed just a week ago, and I believe that next Tuesday or Wednesday, the Minister of Agriculture will have a meeting in Europe with Mr. MacSharry, who is responsible for agriculture at the European Community.

I myself will be meeting Mr. Dunkel at the talks a few days later, to defend Canadian interests at the international level so that normal price levels can be restored on a long-term basis.

Meanwhile, Madam Speaker, we have introduced two programs, GRIP and NISA, which were designed by and for farm producers, and under these programs hundreds of millions of dollars will be available this year. We have defended the interests of our farmers—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think this is starting to sound like a speech. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I know they have a program that will apply next year. What about this year? That is the question. It is not a speech that the farmers are waiting for, it is help this year. While Canadian farmers are being driven off their land, thousands and thousands of fishermen in Atlantic Canada are being driven off the sea.

The situation is so bad and the catches were so poor this summer that thousands of them will not even qualify for unemployment insurance this winter.

I want to know from the President of the Treasury Board if he has something in mind for these fishermen in Atlantic Canada so they can have a decent winter and qualify for programs of this government which should be there when we have a crisis like we are having today.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his concern shown about the tremendous failure that has been experienced by the Atlantic fishermen this year. It is indeed a tragedy that the fishermen off the coast of Labrador have had literally no fish caught, and there are portions of Newfoundland that have had very, very serious losses.

This government is concerned about it. This government acted this spring when there were ice conditions that we had never seen before in our lifetimes. It put $18 million into the hands of the fishermen, the people who could not get out to fish. We are busy working as diligently as we can on this. This Minister of Fisheries was back in Newfoundland last week, met with the premier, met with the leadership within the fishing industry, and there will be in the coming days announcements made as to what we can do to help those people who are in need.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. We have heard these speeches for the last two weeks. Almost every day for the last two weeks a member of Parliament from Newfoundland and Labrador has been on his feet in this House pointing out the depth of the tragedy and the failure in the inshore fishery. I have talked to fishing families who have not paid a bill in months, fishing families who do not know whether their light and power is going to be cut off, fishing families who are down to their last few bits of groceries in the cupboard, fishing families who literally live in fear of whether or not they can feed their children in the next few weeks. The government says: "We are investigating it".

Madam Speaker, we want action now. Will the President of the Treasury Board tell us today that, yes, there will very soon be an answer to the desperate plea for help from the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, specifically Newfoundland and Labrador?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I could remind the member opposite that there are hearing aids around here if he is having difficulty being heard. I can tell him that everything is being done and there will be aid given to these people. However, you cannot, at the snap of your fingers, design a program which is unprecedented. We have not had a program like this, but there will be.

I repeat exactly, and he can read what I answered to his leader just in the last question.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, to the same minister. You cannot design a program at the snap of your fingers.

You also cannot turn away the facts of nature. This is an unprecedented year, but it is also true that we have a window of opportunity now that is going to evaporate.

If you do not do something now for the coast of Labrador, it will be too late in November. You have to act now: not next week, this week. Announce today that you are going to have that program.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, again to the member for Labrador, we did act this year.

That program has been finished, because that was the ice compensation program. It amounted to some $18 million. I know the hon. member opposite has recognized and acknowledged that that was done. There will be action in the near future for the people whom he is concerned about.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, since last week we have had government workers at the bargaining table. We have had the grain rolling to port for prairie farmers, farmers who this year have had a bumper crop and record low prices.

Today, this will all stop. This government will allow negotiations to break down. We just heard from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who said that the government is concerned about grain and about farmers.

Will the President of the Treasury Board not appoint a mediator to this dispute to ensure that the grain keeps rolling?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should be a little more careful in describing the situation.

We did not break the negotiations. As late as seven o'clock yesterday, we made two very important offers to the unions. They said: "We will consider them, and we will come back to you."

Today, we had Mr. Bean appearing on television saying: "We cannot solve this at the negotiating table." I disagree fully with the hon. member. I myself am beginning to wonder whether PSAC really wants a settlement negotiated.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, regardless of what the President of Treasury Board said about Crown corporations' executive bonuses yesterday, the fact is that last February, on the eve of the budget, 41 senior executives of Crown corporations did receive bonuses.

Four thousand of 4,700 senior managers in the Public Service received bonuses as high as 10 per cent of their salary over the summer during the same time that this government was refusing to negotiate pay equity for women in the Public Service.

Is there not a tiny bit of hypocrisy here? Will the minister not reconsider mediation to see just what is fair?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, there is no hypocrisy whatsoever.

The hon. member knows very well that we have these arrangements with our senior managers. They have been in place for decades. We have them also for Crown corporations.

What is clear is that this year, April 1991 to April 1992, everybody will have what I call a "zero" year. It will be zero for salary increases, and it will be zero dollar bonuses for all these people which is in most cases a decrease in salary of 5 per cent.

We are trying to be fair in difficult circumstances. We took many difficult measures at budget time, including removing 10 per cent of our managers. This is not an easy thing to do, so I think she should stop making comparisons and look at fair settlements.

I think the package we put on the table with PSAC is, indeed, fair.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the minister will agree that collective bargaining has been a well established practice with government workers as well.

The minister may not like the union and the minister may not like Daryl Bean, but surely this government does not despise its workers or hold them in such disdain that it will hammer them back to work without having appointed a mediator to attempt to resolve this dispute in a fair manner.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I repeat again that last evening at seven o'clock, we put on the table a very important proposal which would have guaranteed employment to employees whose jobs within the private service are to cease as a result of contracting out and privatization.

This is something that the union has been seeking for a long time. We have managed to sit with them and work something out. We made a proposal last night.

We also offered to guarantee a lump sum payment to all their employees earning up to $27,000. We increased the package yesterday to them and included a lump sum payment of $500. We have many other items that we put on the table, but they have not replied on any one of them.

• (1130)

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

For weeks we have been urging the government to appoint a mediator as a fair way of ending the dispute with its employees in a manner that respects the collective bargaining process. The government has failed to do the sensible thing and, once again, Canadians are the losers.

When will the minister come to his senses? When will he appoint a mediator who can bring some sanity and some fairness to the situation and restore services to the public?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to know if the hon. member would perhaps allow me before I answer her question to give some information to the Leader of the Opposition pertaining to his first question.

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. minister wants to add something or to make a correction to a previous question, I will of course recognize him after Question Period. He may want to answer the question which is on the floor now.

Mr. Loiselle: Excuse my inexperience, Madam Speaker. I will repeat again what I have just said, that we have been going through a process of negotiation. Do not forget that we had been at this for 90 days before the strike. We had 60 days of negotiation, and we had 30 days of conciliation. There was a third party involved and we did not seem to be getting anywhere.

We sat again in good faith. We put offers on the table. They were discussed for one week, so we were certainly making progress. Yet again last night we came forward with two proposals that were new for PSAC.

They said: "We will consider them and come back to you", and they have not done so. We are at the table and waiting for them to come back.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my second question is for the same minister.

What the minister is saying is that he is refusing to do for his own employees what he has already done for postal workers and try to reach a sane and sensible settlement while services continue. What the minister is telling Canadians is he is prepared to make them the victims on the battleground of his dispute with his own employees.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mrs. Catterall: The public is suffering because this minister and this government are too stubborn to do the right and fair thing and try to get a solution.

I ask the minister one more time to do as we have recommended, to respect the collective bargaining process, which is the law of this land, and appoint a mediator, who is neither friend of the government nor friend of the union, who can bring some fairness, some stability and some sanity to this mess. Will the minister do that or not? If not, why not?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated to the hon. member that there is an ongoing process. We did not break off negotiations. We made new offers and I expect them to be considered.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

On May 27 in this House I asked the minister to instruct the National Transportation Agency to hold a full inquiry into the competitiveness of the port of Halifax. Instead of an inquiry, we hear now that the minister is considering a new tax on all vessels plying Canadian waters, a new tax which will further reduce the competitiveness of the port of Halifax.

My question is this: Since the minister has said that he is reconsidering this new tax, will he also reconsider my request of May 17 and order the National Transportation

Agency to hold a full inquiry into the competitiveness of the port of Halifax?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, we have been working with the people in the port of Halifax, with the shippers and with the carriers to do what we can to enhance the port of Halifax.

I think the hon. member should take into consideration the fact that the port of Halifax at the current time is certainly in a condition where the tonnage going through the port of Halifax is down.

We should also remember that the port of Halifax right now is well above where it was five years ago. Historically it has been a victim of the cyclical change as far as transportation and shipping are concerned. We know it is in a downturn right now and we are working with the port to attempt to help in whatever way we can to increase tonnage through the port.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is on the same issue, but it is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The government has bowed to pressure from Canadian Pacific Railway and has changed its regulation with respect to the inspection of refrigerated meat products entering Canada. The result of this change is that it will be easier for imported meat products to enter the Canadian market through U.S. ports, not Canadian ports.

Given the fact that the port of Halifax sees over 50,000 metric tons of refrigerated meat products go through its port every year, I want to ask the minister if he will immediately rescind these new regulations which are going to be crippling and perhaps be the death-knell on the competitiveness of the port of Halifax.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, we all know that from time to time we have problems with the borders in some specific cases, as the hon. member is mentioning. However, we should know that Canada is a net exporter as well in this sector and we must be very careful about import-export regulation at the borders.

What we want is to be more competitive and get more products out of the borders as well, to improve our capacity to export. We have the capacity to look after those borders and those regulations. I can assure the hon. member that we are going to look after these problems and get back to him on the specifics.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I want to return to the Constitution and ask the Deputy Prime Minister, whoever that may be, a question.

Under the proposed amendment to section 121 of the Constitution, which will now read to include, if passed, the free flow of not only goods but also of services, people and capital, I would like to ask the minister, for example: What would happen if this section is part of the Constitution to a Crown corporation like Sask Energy in Saskatchewan that Grant Devine tried but failed to privatize two years ago? If this provision were in effect, would it require, for example, Sask Energy in that case to be privatized, forcing it to live by the same legal and financial and tax regimes as the private sector and private energy corporations? Would that be the case under the free flow of capital under section 121?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the intent of article 121 is very clear but, as was raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition earlier on about the les offices de commercialisation, it is written later on that certain institutions like those in particular which are targeted would be protected under a national interest.

Bill C-21 indicates that we should strive to remove all the obstacles, most of them, but we make provision for regional development, for regional disparity and for other interventions which might be judged to be of national interest.

In any case, it is only when the proper legislation is drafted that we can see how this will apply. I am not in a position at this time to pass judgment on the interpretation of a piece of law which has not even been written yet.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I think that is the very case in point. Here is the government minister saying he cannot pass judgment on law, and yet they are proposing the constitutional amendment. Sask Energy is not a marketing board. What guarantee is there that it be declared in the national interests? Those are the questions I ask. They are very important, Madam Speaker.

In addition to that real question, I would like to ask the following of the minister. In The Toronto Star this morning the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is saying that once a provincial government opts in to a certain provision under the new amendment to section 91 of the economic union, a subsequent government cannot opt out. Thus that subsequent government is committed to the guidelines of the previous government. In the words of the minister, and I quote: "You are caught, you are bound in that situation", which theoretically means that the Ontario government might have been prevented from taking its most recent direction in its budget a few months ago.

The Minister of Finance said the opposite. My question is: Which minister has the proper interpretation—the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs who said there is a prohibition or the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I must say in terms of the aspects being raised by the hon. member about the budget making process or the macro-economic approach that what we have proposed is basically something which should be obvious to all Canadians. We have 11 governments operating in this country. Surely they would not want to be at cross purposes. In my view it is very clear that provincial government are sovereign governments. In the end, if they can get into a deal, the same method should allow them to get out of it.

In my view the problem raised by the hon. member does not exist. What we want is to create a mechanism whereby governments can sit together, look at the situation together, try to reach a consensus, and then hopefully act accordingly for the good of all Canadians.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last Saturday I had the honour to be in Armenia as Canada's official observer during their historic referendum for independence. The Armenian citizens voted overwhelmingly, 99.31 per cent, for independence to rid themselves of the oppressive yolk of communism which lasted over seven decades. The atmosphere was euphoric on Saturday, but now the new government must face the harsh realities toward building a free—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member does have a question.

Mr. Attewell: Madam Speaker, my question is: Will Canada work closely with the Armenian government to provide all possible technical aid and assistance as it builds for the future?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for acting as my personal representative at the referendum on independence which did indeed produce excellent results for Armenia.

We will be ready to stand by and assist in Armenia. I would point out that during the earthquake a couple of years ago in that region, Canada was one of the first and major donors and, that in London this summer at the G-7, the Prime Minister committed $25 million to technical assistance within the republics of the Soviet Union. That funding too will be available to the Armenians.

We have a task force actively engaged in assessing Canada's expertise and how it can be matched. I am sure that Canadians of Armenian descent as well will want to be involved directly in assisting their country.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

CN is selling its rail line from Truro to Sydney, Nova Scotia. Tenders are being called today. This line is vital to the economy of eastern Nova Scotia, including to Stora Forest Industries on which more than 2,000 jobs directly depend.

Why has the minister allowed CN to sell this vital rail line in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, CN has made a proposal under a formula that is possible within this country. The one caveat that is in there is that the bid received will not be entertained if it does not maintain the same level of service that is currently there on that particular line.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I remind the minister of section 99 of the Financial Administration Act which authorizes the Governor in Council to issue directives to Crown corporations.

Will the minister direct CN today to stop its privatization of the Truro to Sydney line? I also remind the minister of the Route Canada application in which the government allowed CN to privatize Route Canada and a few years later it went bankrupt.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, until the tenders are placed, until the offers are received and until we see what the entire situation is on that line, no decision will be made.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

This weekend marks the first anniversary of the United Nations World Summit for Children. Its main goal was to encourage governments to sign and ratify the Convention on the Rights of the Child. As we know, Canada has yet to sign and ratify this convention.

My question to the acting Prime Minister is what steps does the government still have to take before honouring this agreement?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think this government and the Prime Minister have made it very clear that we have a long-standing commitment to this particular process and things are advancing as they should. We maintain that commitment. The Prime Minister has made it time and time again.

I would just like to reiterate to my hon. colleague that our position has not changed.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, that is the most frustrating answer I have ever received in this House. We know that money to help the needy is scarce at all levels of government, and especially since this government has put a cap on CAP, which is where the money is going to have to come from.

Given this strait-jacket that the government has put on the provinces, I really would like to ask the minister whether this convention and the summit have merely been an exercise in public relations by the Prime Minister?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, absolutely not. I have been in New York for most of this week at the United Nations and I raised the issue of the children's summit a year ago in my speech. I also was discussing with colleagues in other countries the over-all and co-ordinated response that we are expecting.

Canada will be responding very shortly. We have worked very actively on our response. I am sure the hon. member will be pleased when she sees it, and she will see it very soon.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the bankruptcy statistics, which were released today, shows signs that the recession is not over and that recovery is still stalled. Business bankruptcies are up 7 per cent since July, and over all bankruptcies are up 17 per cent from last year.

I would like to ask this government what it is doing to change its economic policies given that unemployment is rising, given that the manufacturing sector output is falling, and given now that business bankruptcies are increasing?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the rate of bankruptcies in this country is totally unacceptable. We do not take enjoyment in seeing either personal or business bankruptcies.

One thing I can say, however, is that the rate of bankruptcies, the trend, is down not up and that is a positive sign. We believe with the drop in interest rates, which again dropped yesterday some nine bases points, that that trend has continued over a period of time. We believe that will help businesses naturally recover and recovery in this country.

We, of course, still firmly believe, and we have great support in that, in getting inflation down and interest rates down. Keeping them both down is going to be the best thing we can do in this country for business recovery. We are working toward that end.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the government claims in fact that lower inflation is the path to recovery and yet the Bank of Canada has just reported that 41 per cent of present inflation has come from the GST and other taxes.

Why is the government pushing up inflation with these taxes at the same time that it claims to be seeking lower inflation? Surely there is a major contradiction here that is hurting people right across this country.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. One thing he fails to point out though is that the government predicted that inflation would increase 1.25 per cent because of the goods and services tax. That is exactly what happened.

The opposition said it would go up 7 per cent, as I remember.

The other major cause of the increase in inflation due to government policy is the increase in cigarette tax. That is the other major reason.

Does the hon. member oppose that tax?

TAXATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting Minister of Finance.

This week, Inter-City Products, a Canadian company, closed one of its American plants and moved jobs to Canada. Last week, Colgate-Palmolive, an American company, closed one of its Canadian plants and moved jobs to the United States.

Would the minister not agree that Canadian owners are more likely to preserve Canadian jobs? If he does, will the government encourage more Canadian ownership by increasing rather than decreasing the dividend tax credit?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the best way to keep companies in Canada is to ensure that our economic policy, our trade policy and our tax policy are all conducive to international competitiveness. That is what it is all about.

That is what the free trade agreement is all about and that is what the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax which penalized our Canadian producers over their competitors off-shore is all about.

We believe that our corporate tax rate is in line with our competitors, and we adjusted our tax in tax reform in 1987 to that effect.

I read with interest about the 300 jobs that are heading to Brantford. They are closing down a plant in the United States and moving the jobs to Canada.

I visited IBM just recently. It is opening a new plant in Brockville, and it is enlarging its operation in London, all because of the free trade agreement. There is adjustment going on, but there is a lot of good news for Canada in this.

PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday, Donohue Matane Inc. announced it was shutting down indefinitely, laying off 400 people.

Some analysts days that the paper industry cannot compete with the Canadian dollar at 88 cents.

Here is my question to the minister: will the minister review his monetary policy to give a break to a region where the unemployment rate exceeds 25 per cent?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I will remind the member for Saint-Léonard who just talked about the exchange rate how difficult it is to control the value of the Canadian dollar and correct this idea members opposite seem to have that the government could bring it down artificially at the touch of a button.

Foreign borrowing by the provinces for the first six months of this year totals some $10 billion, which is more than for all of last year. Such loans naturally translate into dollars, creating a huge demand for Canadian currency. So the price goes up. The value of our currency is set by the demand on the market, not by some government decision.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, maybe I should remind the minister that, just last week, at the 1991 economic rendez-vous in Quebec, the economic stakeholders passed a resolution urging the federal government to act and review its monetary policy to boost, so to speak, Quebec's economy. My question is quite simple. He asked the new minister responsible for Quebec economic development to— the Minister of National Health and Welfare had made a flashy announcement in Matane to save this area with over 25 per cent unemployment. Where is he today? What does he intend to do for these 400 new unemployed men and women in Matane?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, let me point out to my hon. friend that there are a lot of other factors involved in the decision to curtail production at the Matane mill.

The fact of the matter is that demand has very seriously declined by 10 per cent this year alone. Prices have fallen by 22 per cent this year for this kind of product.

It is tragic of course that a new mill like this, as well equipped as it is in technology, should not have overcome its initial start-up period and break its way into the market.

As I have said, the mill is well equipped with the very best in technology both in the environmental and technical sense. It bodes well for the future. I hope that the shut-down is not for too long a period.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, in the port of Halifax, the At and East grain subsidy is dead. Government contribution to the new double stacking program between Halifax and Montreal is strictly provincial. A new tax is being planned and federal government policy makes it easier to import meat products through American ports into Canada. Yet the Prime Minister said last week that he has concrete proposals.

I ask the Minister of Transport: What are these concrete proposals? For a change, what is the good news for the port of Halifax?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern about her particular area of the country and that indeed is why we are all in this House, to work to make this country grow and make it prosper.

As I mentioned earlier, the port of Halifax does have some problems right now. It is caught by a problem with tonnage on the high seas being reduced. Therefore it is no longer going in. The container traffic certainly is down at the port.

It is, however, still higher than it has been in the past. There are projections that it will improve again in the future. In the mean time, we are working with the port. As the hon. member knows, the province has worked. The federal government has worked with port officials to see what can be done.

It is something we must all work together on, along with the member for Halifax. One of the things that she should keep in mind also is that when it comes to port competitiveness, the municipality also plays a part in this. She may know that the municipal taxes paid by the port of Halifax are higher than what it they are in other North American ports, such as New York and Montreal. We all must work together to make the port work more effectively.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, the question was: What is the federal government going to do? The question has been: What is the federal government going to do? Pretty words and nice phrases will do nothing for the port of Halifax whose business is down from last year, which the minister knows well.

If the minister cannot tell us what the federal government plans to do, and it appears that she cannot, maybe she can tell us why Ports Canada refuses to release its report on the competitiveness of ports like Halifax.

What is the government hiding? What is the bad news?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, nothing is being hidden. Ports Canada will release that report when it has the report finished and is in a position to—

Ms. Clancy: It's finished.

Mrs. Martin: —and all of the necessary background work is done to release it, it will release it.

The member must also remember that we have to look after all ports in this country, not just the port of Halifax. We are concerned about it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Good job in St. John's.

Mrs. Martin: We are concerned about it.

The hon. member is calling out about St. John's. She might want to talk to her colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon about the port of Thunder Bay and how it has benefited by what has been done.

Ms. Clancy: It will sell well in Halifax.

Mrs. Martin: I know it will sell well in the port of Halifax, Madam Speaker, because this member is representing her riding. There are other ridings in this country also that have to be represented when it comes to ports. We are working on the port of Halifax and we will continue to work.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

LITERACY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, last May the government promised to cut Canada's illiteracy rate in half by the year 2000. According to the government's own figures, 4.5 million Canadians are basically illiterate or marginally literate. This means the government will have to come up with funds to provide literacy training for 2.25 million Canadians over the next nine years. Yet there is no new funding in the minister's budget and the minister continues to fund only short-term pilot projects.

My question is for whomever is sitting in for the minister today, or for the Minister of Finance. This is a promise in the last throne speech of this government. How can the government expect to deal with Canada's literacy problems, which are costing this country $10 billion annually unless there is sufficient money in the minister's budget to provide long-term funds to support literacy programs?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has correctly indicated, it was referred to in the throne speech, like many other initiatives which are part of the government's global agenda. With respect particularly to prosperity, we all are aware that we have serious problems in this country, one of them being illiteracy, the other one being the drop-out rate in high schools. The government is putting into place the appropriate programs to deal with those problems in co-operation with the provinces which have specific jurisdictions with respect to education.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Pilot projects funded by the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship have a proven record of success in improving literacy. Yet these projects lose their funding after a year or two because of the government department's short-term funding policy.

An example is the Write Place in Parksville, British Columbia, which, although very successful, had its funding cut and was forced to close its doors three weeks ago.

My question to the minister is: Why does this funding program punish success? When is he going to address illiteracy problems seriously by providing ongoing funding for successful literacy programs?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I cannot answer with respect to the specific program to which my colleague refers. I will certainly have it looked into and will get back to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

A few moments ago the President of the Treasury Board said that agricultural marketing boards would be protected under the national interest clause of the constitutional proposal.

Why then, two days after the constitutional proposal, did the government table the economic union document which qualifies agricultural marketing boards as undesirable trade impediments? Is the government in favour of or against marketing boards? Canadians want to know.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in the document on the economic union we list all kinds of organizations or rules preventing full mobility in Canada. Of course, marketing boards are on that list. However, marketing boards serve other purposes also, such as the external market as was well explained by my colleague this morning.

In some instances the national interest would prevail. In this particular instance it is our intention to make it prevail.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the document on the Canadian economic union clearly mentions agricultural supply marketing boards as an internal barrier that it would not be desirable to maintain.

Why does the minister consider our marketing boards to be "detrimental"? Is he for or against marketing boards for our farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we have always said that we took a political decision to maintain marketing boards and I can tell my colleague again that, with his help and the other party's help, we will do all we can to maintain agricultural marketing boards.

Point of Order

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS—MARKETING BOARD

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I raise a point of order, in view of the opposition leader's first question, simply as a reminder that of course the document must be read in full, as a whole.

He read an excerpt in which institutions or obstacles to free movement are mentioned. Obviously, a board that regulates and controls is by definition an obstacle. Some obstacles are desirable. On page 22 of the document on economic union, it says precisely, under "Managing the Internal Market", that the government proposes to adopt laws, programs, practices, but "the amendment —allows for exceptions for reasons of national interest".

I tell him that this is an exception in the national interest. It is on the lower right-hand side of page 22.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. minister, but when making a correction, one should not get into debate. Does the Hon. Leader of the Opposition wish to speak?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, yes, I wish to speak, because the government is completely confused!

In a document, the government says that it wants to maintain marketing boards; in another, it says that it wants to do away with them. While that is going on, thousands and thousands of farmers do not know what will happen to them. These people owe money to the banks and have obligations to meet. We ask the government: Are you for or against? If you are in favour, take out what is in the second document. If you are not, take out what is in the second document everywhere it is mentioned.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Leader of the Opposition was also getting into debate. The beginning of one debate started another. I think that we will continue with Routine Proceedings. Did the Hon. Minister of Transport wish to speak?

[English]

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning an answer I gave to the member for Halifax.

I said that the port of Halifax was paying more taxes. I meant to say that the container terminals were paying more taxes in the port of Halifax. I just wanted to clarify that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. minister for the clarification.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF EIGTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the eighth report of the Standing Committee on House Management and, if the House agrees, I intend to move adoption of this report later today.

[Editor's Note: The Clerk of the House read the report.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent to dispense with reading the document?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rocheleau: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Yes, Madam Speaker, I would like to hear the names of committee members, since the Bloc Quebecois has already asked to be on those committees. I would like to know which of my colleagues are on them. I would like to hear it, personally.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are copies on the Table. I am sure that the hon. member can refer to them and I can even send him a copy right now.

Mr. Rocheleau: You are too kind, Madam Speaker, but I think that all Canadians would like to know who are representing them.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since there is no unanimous consent, I would ask the Clerk to read it to us.

[Editor's Note: The Clerk of the House read the report. See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, this morning you ruled about the New Democratic Party trying to put asterisks next to their nominees to the Constitution committee. I would like to have the assurance that in this case all the nominees of the NDP do not have stars next to their names so that they do not get any special treatment from the House of Commons.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, as the member is doubtless aware given his long years of experience in the House, all New Democrat members are stars.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, I apologize for making the hon. members listen to the complete list of committees and the members from this place who compose them. I just want to point out that we from the Bloc Quebecois had offered our full collaboration to participate in any of these committees, but were appointed only to those dealing with matters of general interest, as substitutes.

We are not considered full-fledged members of this House and it shows.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I ask that Notice of Motion No. 33, standing in my name on the Order Paper under Private Members' Business, be withdrawn.

It relates to amending the Hazardous Products Act for children's sleepwear. There are many times that we criticize the government for not doing what we wish it to do. This is one instance where the government has done something in favour of all consumers across Canada as it should with regard to fire retardant material for children's pyjamas.

I checked back and looked at the law. It has been corrected and it represents a much better situation today than when this motion was first presented.

To finish, I would like to say that I spoke with the chief health officer of Winnipeg, the doctor who began the crusade. He is very happy with what has been done by the government.

I think that the people working in the Hazardous Products Branch of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should be complimented for the work that they did.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

SELECTION OF CHAIRMEN

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I think you would find disposition in the House to accept the following motion, seconded by the member for St. Leonard. It is a follow-up to the eighth report:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order or the practice of the House or its standing or standing joint committees, the incumbent chairman of the standing and standing joint committees shall continue in office until the committee concerned shall otherwise order, provided that those standing or standing joint committees whose chairmen cease to be members of the committee shall proceed to the election of a new chairman as their first order of business.

This is a motion that we did pass on October 8, 1989. It is normal practice when these kinds of situations arise.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have 10 petitions.

This petition is circulated by the Association of Iroquois and Allied Nations. It is signed by a number of people from Saskatchewan, all the way through to the province of Nova Scotia.

The petition reminds the members of Parliament that the first nations of Canada are immune from taxation by virtue of their aboriginal and treaty rights in spite of the fact that the federal government has set in place a goods and services tax which will affect aboriginal people.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibility to the first nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of first nations citizens both on or off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserve lands.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by more than 3,000 people in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

They come from all over Highlands—Canso, and the petition concerns the Scotia Synfuels project. The economy in eastern Nova Scotia and in Cape Breton is severely depressed at the moment.

The petitioners feel that the Scotia Synfuels project represents the best hope for industrial development in eastern Nova Scotia. It would create an additional 2,000 jobs for the Cape Breton economy and would provide us with a made-in-Canada energy source. It would use some of our natural assets, namely, our coal in Cape Breton and our very good deep water port.

The petitioners humbly pray and beseech Parliament that this government will support this very worth-while project.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I have been asked to present a petition to have Bill C-21 changed in order to give equal paid leave to adoptive parents.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

RAILWAY ACT

The House resumed from Monday June 17, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-11, an Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing another speaker, I would simply like to say a few words to hon. members of this house. As was the case yesterday, in the absence of one of our colleagues, some hon. members who chair committees and are part of this panel, have been kind enough to accept to replace him in the Chair for short periods, and I know that you will extend the person who will replace me for the next hour or so the same courtesy you have always shown me. I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for accepting to take my place for a short while.

The hon. member for Egmont.

[English]

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I would like at this time to address the April 1989 budgetary decision of this government that terminated the At and East export grain and flour subsidy. This decision, which was actually implemented in July 1989 reflects the callous disregard that this government has repeatedly shown toward the aspirations of the people of Canada, particularly the people of Atlantic Canada.

Over two years after the actual implementation of its decision, this government is still seeking the approval of Parliament for its action. Yes, it is seeking over two years of retroactive approval. What a display of contempt for Parliament.

The removal of this subsidy was supposedly made in an effort to reduce government spending and reduce the deficit. No one quarrels with the desire to reduce the deficit, but a little research and two years of experience shows that the removal of this subsidy has had the opposite effect and actually increased the deficit as well as increased unemployment and aggravated other social problems.

In September 1989 the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission submitted a study showing that the net savings in removal of this subsidy would be minimal and that a small, one-time expenditure in the upgrading of the Saint John terminal to enable the off-loading of ships, would have allowed this subsidy to impact positively on the well-being of the economy of the Atlantic area.

Rather than study this document, and have the courtesy to respond to the suggestions contained therein, this government did not even have the courtesy of giving a response to the people of Atlantic Canada.

It would appear that the much touted policy of consultation with the people before a decision is made does not extend to the Atlantic provinces. The closure of CFB Summerside is another example of this.

I would like to take a few minutes at this time to review briefly some of the contents of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission submission. I hope this will remind this government of the Atlantic provinces' desire and need to keep open the terminals at Halifax and Saint John in order to serve the needs of the people in this region and provide jobs.

This study showed that in 1988, the last year that the subsidy was in place, the cost to the Government of Canada was slightly over $32 million. The study also showed that the economic loss of this decision would be approximately $27.5 million, for a net savings of only $4.5 million. The same study showed that upgrading the Saint John terminal by providing a marine receiving facility, so that ships could be unloaded, would reduce the cost of the subsidy by $22 million. This would then change the subsidy from being a cost of $4.5 million to a gain to the economy of $17.5 million if the subsidy was retained.

These figures illustrate that the decision to remove the subsidy was made on the false assumption that there would be a drop in the cost to the Canadian economy when in fact the study showed the opposite effect would occur.

There were other recommendations made that would ensure that the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John would be able to continue as viable operations and that the export of grain and flour would continue to move through the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

• (1230)

These recommendations included permit plan C feed grain to come to Halifax and Saint John by water; eliminate the countervail duty on U.S. corn— I believe this has been done—provide facilities in Saint John to receive grain by water; use the port of Halifax to export flour; allow feed grain to be imported from foreign countries.

When this issue was debated over two years ago, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission said, and I quote:

> The termination of the At and East rate structure will have serious economic consequences for the Maritime ports as well as for other activities that depend on the movement of export grain and flour through the ports. These activities include grain elevators, port employment and railway employment. There are also negative implications in relation to flour milling and the movement of domestic feed grains in the Atlantic Region. The importance of maintaining the Halifax grain elevator as a viable operation is of critical economic importance to the entire Atlantic region.

The Saint John grain elevator serves only the export market. However, the rail traffic provided by the movement of export grain over that portion of the rail line from Montreal to Saint John was an important contribution to the viability of that line.

The shipment of export flour through the Port of Halifax contributed significantly to employment at the port.

The At and East export grain and flour subsidy program had important implications for several domestic industries in the Atlantic region, including local livestock producers, flour milling and the railways.

With the cancelling of this program, the continued viability of the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John is in jeopardy.

Let us now look at what has happened in the two years since the decision to terminate the At and East.

The Saint John elevator has closed with the accompanying job loss. A study of what will make it viable indicates that if this government insists on continuing its present policies, it will never reopen.

Two hundred and fifty tonnes of export grain are required, mainly because the market for feed grain is limited. Without some form of government action, this is an unrealistic expectation.

In Halifax, we now export only 60,000 tonnes of grain. Feed grain demand cannot make up the shortfall. The port needs 400,000 tonnes to make a profit and ensure long term viability. Without some form of government action, this will not happen.

We have already seen substantial job loss at the port of Halifax. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in an extensive study this year has concluded, and I quote:

> Under current operating circumstances, if the government takes no action to assist them, the long term viability of grain elevators in Atlantic Canada is in doubt.

To achieve financial viability requires an increase in export grain for Atlantic elevators. If this does not happen, Saint John will stay closed and Halifax will close.

The loss of this economic activity in the two ports involved will have a terrible impact.

But we must keep in mind what will happen in the agricultural sector. Cost of feed grain is predicted to rise by $10 a tonne. That would make our livestock and poultry industry non-competitive and these industries would die. The warning signs are already there. Only a government as blind and insensitive as this one could ignore these signs.

Atlantic Canada has already been the victim of this government's policies in many areas, the fishery, transportation, small craft harbours, the post office, and the list goes on.

Surely Atlantic agriculture deserves a better fate than that which will surely befall it if the AT and East subsidy is not restored.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise once again to speak on this legislation. It is a piece of legislation which comes at a time when the transportation infrastructure of Atlantic Canada is so much in peril and under attack. At a time when this government, as announced this week, has proposed major plans to create an economic union and a common market across Canada, the At and East subsidy and the legislation which in effect kills this subsidy without any reasonable form of replacement fly in the face of the laudable objective of creating a viable economic union across Canada.

If in Atlantic Canada we do not have an adequate and competitive transportation infrastructure, which has been part of the reason for being part of this country since Confederation, how can we realistically expect to participate in a viable economic union? Those are the fundamentals of this debate today.

This comes virtually two years after the At and East subsidy was cancelled without even recourse to Parliament. In fact, the previous legislation, Bill C-26, which was in effect in the last Parliament, was enacted after the subsidy had been removed and after the consequences of the subsidy, namely the closure of the Saint John terminal and the downsizing of the Halifax terminal, had already taken effect.

This raises the procedural point related to this legislation, that is the arrogance with which the government has treated this particular matter in initially introducing the legislation after the fact. On top of that, to add insult to injury, it reintroduced it in this Parliament without going through the proper legislative steps which are expected after a government begins a new Parliament with a Speech from the Throne.

The abuse of Parliament and the arrogance by which this legislation was introduced are additional insults to the people of Atlantic Canada.

I do not want to confine my remarks at this time to the procedural matter because the substance of this legislation is also very important. In fact, the At and East subsidy was a vital way of lowering the price of agricultural products produced in Atlantic Canada by enabling grain to move across the country to the farmers of Atlantic Canada. Therefore, the loss of a subsidy without an adequate replacement places the farmers of Atlantic Canada in additional jeopardy, not to mention the millers in Halifax.

What is also surprising about this whole affair is the fact that the government had an option. The government had an alternative to cancelling this subsidy. In fact, it even commissioned a study which provided the government with a more efficient and viable way of assisting the movement of grain in eastern Canada. This would mean that those people and industries so vitally dependent on this service would not have to go without. They would be able to continue to receive the benefits that the At and East subsidy, perhaps not as efficiently as it might have and perhaps more costly than it might have, provided to the farmers and the millers of Atlantic Canada.

Instead the government has chosen to cancel the subsidy, to eliminate this program, and then come to Parliament a long time after the fact for approval.

This is a further insult to the people of Atlantic Canada. It is an insult because they are losing their vital infrastructure and do not have a sense that they have a say about it. When they offer their opinion, when they agree to participate—as the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission did in working on this study and in providing advice through the committee on transport on how to modernize, update, and re-orient the subsidy programs available to eastern Canada—the federal government has chosen to ignore their advice. It says: "We are pressing on in the way we planned to, thank you very much, but we do not want to listen. We have our minds made up".

It is this kind of disregard for the views of Atlantic Canadians and the associations which represent them which has been a hallmark and a trademark of this government. It is in evidence with this particular piece of legislation.

We on this side of the House want to demonstrate by our opposition to this bill the fact that in Atlantic Canada we are concerned about transportation. We are concerned about being able to play on an equal playing field. We are not willing to accept, lying down, the transportation infrastructure as represented by this piece of legislation.

DEBT SERVICING AND ACCOUNT REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, September 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing of the debt of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): At the time we adjourned the debate, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre had the floor. He has 15 minutes left. The floor is his again.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 is what we are debating today. The government is calling it the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act.

We are willing to let this bill go to committee, but we are not going to let it go to committee without making some comments about it.

First, in my view this act is somewhat misleading. When the government tells the public that it is opening an account in order to reduce the debt, it is almost telling the public that there is some surplus of funds coming in and it is going to take that surplus and put it toward the reduction of the deficit. The reality is that there is no surplus fund whether the government is going to open one account, two accounts, three accounts or 100 accounts for that matter. The bottom line is that there is a deficit in terms of the total revenues the government is receiving on an annual basis compared to its total expenditures on an annual basis.

Taking everything into account, there is a shortfall. Opening a separate account and setting up a bureaucracy to manage it, or for that matter even trying to give the illusion that the government is doing something about deficit reduction when in fact nothing is done through this account, is somewhat misleading and puzzling.

I think the government is doing this because a lot of the people who are still and will always be opposed to the goods and services tax, which is now the law, are saying: "If the government were to take the net revenue from the GST and put it toward the deficit reduction, we would not mind it that much. But the government is spending the money unwisely and mismanaging the economy. That is why we are upset about it".

The government in its wisdom thought: "Let us put out some sort of public relations gimmick and try to make the public feel that we are doing something about deficit reduction by opening an account", and it did open the account. All of the revenue from the GST, or the surplus revenue from the GST, will go to that account.

In 1988, and prior to that, when the then Minister of Finance was talking about the GST, if I recall correctly and the public does recall that, the idea was that the GST would be revenue neutral. Supposedly, the main intention of the GST was to replace the manufacturers' sales tax because the manufacturers' sales tax was a bad tax and because the government wanted to come up with something it called progressive. It replaced the manufacturers' sales tax with the GST. It was never, as I recall, the intention of the government to have a surplus.

However, now that there is a surplus it wants to put it toward deficit reduction.

It is interesting to know that the so-called surplus will not happen before the year 1996. Even then there will be no surplus. One would wonder why government is opening an account now when it is not going to be able to do anything with this account until 1995-96. That is why I believe that the government's move is somewhat misguided, misleading and unwise. It is raising the expectation of the public about something that is not going to be effective until 1995-96.

Even then, any chartered accountant or anyone who knows about addition and subtraction would say that there is no need for a separate account. The deficit in 1990-91 is approximately $30.5 billion. The projection for 1991-92 is $30.5 billion again. The projection for 1992-93 is $24 billion; 1993-94, $16.6 billion; 1994-95, $10 billion; and in 1995-96, $6.5 billion. Even until then we will still be in a deficit position, assuming that all of the government forecasts are good. We know from past experience that most of the time those forecasts were not on target.

The total debt which is right now about $388 billion will be $476 billion by the year 1995-96. When the Liberals were in government in 1982-83 the total debt was $167 billion. Six years later, the total debt has almost more than doubled.

Telling the public that we want to reduce the deficit is a very nice thing to do. However, doing something about it is something else.

In my view, if the government is really serious about reducing the deficit, it should focus on investing in the future of Canadians. Rather than cutting services, attacking the Public Service, smashing the infrastructure of national institutions that we pride ourselves on, the government should focus on investment. Like anything else in a democracy, in a country where we have the freedom of choice, the freedom to to invest and make money, the government should follow its own philosophy by investing. That investment is in the future of Canadians and our youth.

Mr. Speaker, you will be somewhat disappointed to learn that, more than anything else in Canada, we have a human resource deficit. Right now approximately 38 per cent of Canadians, or four out of every 10, have some difficulty reading or writing in either one of the two official languages. In my view, that is a deficit. Approximately one out of every three youths drop out before he or she finishes high school. That is a deficit. The productivity of the labour force in Canada, compared to other industrial countries, ranks right at the bottom. That is a deficit.

Those are the kinds of things the government should be looking at if the government is really serious about deficit reduction.

The shocking thing is the literacy level. Unless you have a literate workforce and a literate population, there is no hope. You can buy the best technology in the world and put it in the industrial sector, but if you do not have a labour force that is capable of using it and utilizing it, there is no point.

In June 1991, I sponsored a forum that many of my colleagues attended. We brought in representatives from government, labour, business and the educational sector. In fact, we had 122 representatives here on Parliament Hill in Room 200 West Block. The theme of the event was a partnership between the public and the private sectors to attack the question of literacy.

I would like to share with the House and with Canadians some of the recommendations that came out of that forum on literacy. I would hope that the government would take these recommendations, which I am going to put on the record, look at them one by one and implement them. In that way, we could deal with our human deficit and perhaps address the budget deficit.

First, those people who attended the forum recommended that the federal government's role should be one of leadership as it steps up its emphasis on education through public policy avenues.

Second, it recommended that the federal government should establish a national strategy on literacy to include a policy, a national education minimum standard and a national awareness program and campaign, something which the government is not doing.

The government should encourage employers and union investment in training for workers. It was suggested that the recipients of social welfare benefits should be encouraged and be given incentives to upgrade their literacy skills.

The government, among other things, while it is levying taxes day and night, should consider a training tax, providing business with an incentive to provide literacy training. It was suggested that a national registry should be set up to consolidate resources, grants and contact persons in relation to literacy programs, projects and other activities.

It was also suggested that the federal government should encourage the provinces to carry out a complete revision of their school systems, their education objectives and their curricula to arrest the literacy problem and to prevent its perpetuation.

Also, Mr. Speaker, it was suggested that a monitoring mechanism should be developed to police federal transfer payments for education. When the federal government gives money to the provinces for post-secondary education, the provincial government should not be allowed to spend that money on building roads, bridges or on other programs, something which is not happening now.

The federal government should consider establishing both a mobile education system that transcends provincial boundaries and a federal ministry of education to oversee federal involvement in education.

It is also suggested that national education standards be developed and include, among other things, notes of excellence. More than anything, it suggested that the federal government should set up immediately a national task force to look at the question of literacy and education in Canada.

These are some of the recommendations that came out of the forum. The government should look at them very closely and address each one individually.

There were recommendations for business. It was suggested that business also should promote literacy by building the self-esteem of workers and by providing incentives.

It was suggested that businesses should establish more co-operative and liaison programs with schools, and and that business should help promote literacy awareness by sponsoring media-based educational campaigns.

That magnificent group of people recommended that the media have a role to play. It suggested that the media and Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission should not only support initiatives to promote literacy awareness, but also take a leading role in devising a national advertising campaign aimed at fighting illiteracy.

Our society as a whole must recognize that literacy is a basic human right. We must examine or redefine our technology and attitude when we talk about people who have literacy problems. We should set a goal to at least reduce by half the number of those who need literacy training, who are either in or have completed remedial programs by the year 2000.

These are recommendations that came out of the literacy forum 1991. The government is at liberty to look at them. I will be more than happy to provide members with a complete report.

The reason why I moved a little off the topic is to let the government know the problem is there as a result of lack of investment. If the government is really serious about reducing the deficit, it should move forward and invest in the future of Canadians. It should not just throw on the table some sort of a gimmick called "deficit reduction account". I am not buying it, my constituents are not buying it and the people of Canada are not buying these kinds of proposals because they do not make any kind of sense whatsoever.

One thing which bothers me in this proposal is the fact that it wants to put into this account all the gifts that are given to the Crown. There are organizations out there, especially charitable organizations, that benefit from people's contributions. We are going to see the government competing with charitable organizations for the same dollar. Rather than John giving his $15, $50 or $100 to the United Way the government will be saying to him: "Look, you have another option. Put it toward deficit reduction." What a shameful way for the government to proceed with its proposal.

I could go on and speak about this subject for a long, long time. I want to see this bill going to committee so that special interest groups and my colleagues will have a chance to make amendments and suggestions.

• (1300)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it is a solid thing that the member for Ottawa Centre continues to bring to the attention of the House the fact that we have a serious illiteracy problem in this country. That brings to my mind the fact that this bill is basically a smoke and mirrors bill.

When we started off talking about the goods and services tax in this House, the government put forward the premise that this was going to be a revenue neutral tax. We now know, after almost a year's implementation of this bill, that it has been a massive tax grab.

Who has suffered the most? We have approximately 2 million people in this country who are out of work. As we are going through this period of restructuring, with that number of people out of work, and the government always talking about competitiveness, it seems to me that this would be a perfect opportunity to pick up on the point of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, where we get into skills development. If we are going to become world class competitors, we need to have the basic skills of reading and writing.

If foreign companies are going to invest in this country, what is the first thing they do? They look at the labour force. Right now the labour force in this country needs help. We need skills development training. We need help. The Frontier Colleges of the world—I cite Frontier College because it is from my home town, Toronto—are constantly in need of funds.

Here is the irony of this whole situation. We have this debt reduction fund which does not make any sense. It should be going into the general revenue fund because it is all the same balance sheet. Why the government, when there are 2 million people unemployed, would not take this excess from the GST and put it into skills development, put it into a major attack on illiteracy in this country, I cannot figure it out.

My question for the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is simply this. Does he not think that taking the excess from the GST and putting it into skills development/illiteracy fund would be a much better investment in the human capital of this country which would ultimately create an international opportunity for foreign capital to come here, which would ultimately reduce the deficit and debt and interest rates? I believe that if we are going to reduce the deficit and debt of this country, we have to show that we have an intelligent skilled workforce. Right now we have 2 million unemployed, many of them sitting at home doing nothing.

My question to my colleague is: Does he not think that would be a better use of the funds that are in excess from the GST?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his excellent intervention. Certainly he always has the right ideas at the right time. I think it is an opportune time for the government to be listening, especially in light of the fact that it is going through this constitutional debate across Canada.

Yes, he is absolutely right. That money would be better spent if it were invested in the future of Canadians, into the labour force and into training and retaining of our workers. Of course, there is no question about it.

He is saying this because he knows about Siemens, which is a well recognized company internationally, with a great reputation and a leading industry. The president or somebody from Siemens was saying that they have concerns about our ability as a society to provide the necessary workforce in order to support their industry.

Of course, this is one company, but there are thousands of other companies that might not even speak out publicly. But they might quietly decide to move elsewhere. Yes, this account should have been called an investment account in the future of Canadians. While the government is looking and addressing the question of the Constitution, I think the public should note that one of the things the government is considering is in fact abandoning its role in the area of employment training. I think that is extremely dangerous in light of the fact that there is a lack of leadership—

An hon. member: No national standards.

Mr. Harb: Absolutely. There is a lack of leadership in the area of training and retraining of employees and workers across Canada.

I just want to give one example of the shameful state of our education system. When a student goes to university in Newfoundland and he or she wants to move to a university in British Columbia, he or she cannot even get the equivalent credit for their courses because of the lack of co-operation between the provinces in the area of education. It is no different when it comes to the mobility of the workforce, because between different provinces as it is right now, there is no free trade when it comes to the mobility of the work force.

Of course, my friend and my colleague is dead on in his suggestion.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, let me at the outset congratulate you on the fair, temperate and judicious manner in which you are conducting the business of the House in the chair. You truly, sir, are an ornament in this Chamber.

Having said that, let me just very briefly set out the two main reasons why I cannot support this wretched little bill. The first reason is that it is a sleight of hand. It is a joke. It is a joke on the Canadian taxpayers to say that we are going to take this excess from the GST and somehow dedicate it to payments that would be made regardless.

If I may draw a brief analogy. Let us say for a moment that I am owed money for the regular provision of labour from Jill, Judy and Jocelyn and I owe money for the goods I purchase that enables me to do the labour for which I am paid. I owe money to Sarah, Sandy and Samantha. It does not matter from which of Judy, Jill or Jocelyn I receive the money. It does not matter which pocket I put it in, I still eventually have to pay money out to Sarah, Sandy and Samantha. Now, I can if I wish, I suppose, say all right, all the money I get from Jill I am going to transfer straight over to Sarah and that somehow that makes that money different and special. But it does not, Mr. Speaker, because even if I was receiving no money from Jill, I would still have to pay Sarah. For that purpose I would simply have to draw on the funds I received from Judy and Jocelyn.

For the government to hold that this bill will set up a regime in which the treatment of the moneys received by the imposition of the GST is special or separate or distinct or in any way other than simply the transfer of funds that would be transferred anyhow is, to be charitable, Mr. Speaker, modestly deceptive.

The second reason I oppose this bill is in fact the more important. I oppose the GST. I have opposed the GST since it was first suggested. I fought against the GST in Edmonton and in the standing committee. I remain resolutely opposed to the GST. It is the wrong tax. It is an unfair tax. It is a discriminatory tax. It is not a tax on which any fair minded government would rely for the raising of revenues.

And yet, this bill presupposes the existence of the GST. For that reason, principally, I cannot support it. I would note that in this regard the government seems to be taking a leap straight out of Reform Party policy. I am quoting now from policy resolution No. 20 passed at the Reform Party's annual national convention earlier this year which reads: "Resolved that the Reform Party support the establishment of a debt retirement fund to which all revenue raised by the GST or proceeds from the sales of Crown assets could be applied rather than being included in the federal government's budgetary process".

Of course, the Reform Party in passing that resolution was engaged in exactly the same sleight of hand that characterizes the government's legislation now. But it is interesting, I submit, to note that the Reform Party did pass this motion explicitly, in my opinion, approving the collection of the GST thereby.

I say this only to note that although the Reform Party at the time of its introduction and passage spoke vigorously against the GST, it seems now to have accepted it and indeed to encourage its collection for the purposes set out in its resolutions.

I would close by noted that the introduction of this bill by the government has affected at least one major service for the Canadian people, and that is that it now is clear which parties support the collection of the GST and which do not. That means that the New Democratic Party is now the only party that is unequivocally, irrevocably opposed to the GST.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): As I said earlier, there are no more questions and comments. Therefore, the next speaker is the hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment you on what you have brought to this House. I think you have been extremely fair. It is a pleasure to see you in the chair. You should be there much more often. Perhaps we can do something about that.

I rise today to give 10 minutes of debate on this piece of legislation, but before I do that, I want to correct the record. The previous speaker from the New Democratic Party, as New Democrats always do, like to try to make the people believe that they are holier than thou, they are the only party, the only people in the world who care about taxation, they are the only group that cares about the poor and the disadvantaged, they are the only people who have all of the answers. We see this time and time again in this House. I would just like to make it clear that the Liberal Party has always opposed the regressive goods and services tax and it is the Liberal Party that is looking for meaningful ways of real tax reform.

I want to mention something to you, Mr. Speaker. These members opposite who are always good for getting up and saying "I, I, I, I, I" should have a little read of some publications from my hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who has put considerable time and effort into putting forward some proposals for true tax reform.

You will all recall that the goods and services tax was phase two of tax reform. It was supposed to make us all much better Canadians and we were supposed to be jumping up and down. We were to be so happy with this tax reform because it was going to be fair, it was going to be equitable, it was going to be revenue neutral and it was going to be harmonized so there would only be one tax. All those things that this government misled the people of Canada into believing would be in phase two of tax reform went down in flames when we saw the GST legislation.

My hon. colleague for Broadview—Greenwood has spent a considerable amount of time talking to people in our party and in other parties and people across the country. He has sought the advice of experts. He has paid a lot of money out of his own pocket because he believes, as do the people in the Liberal Party, the members here, that what Canada needs to get this economy going again, that what Canada needs to collectively get over the psychosis about language, culture, east and west, centre and north, is finding some way to turn on Canadians. The way that you do that is not by coming in with a goods and services tax, the way that you do it is not by causing a recession, the way that you do not do it is by coming in and ripping apart your social programs. It is by giving them jobs, by making sure that the economy is strong and by putting fairness and equity into the tax system.

I want to tell my hon. friends opposite to the left of me, in the New Democratic Party, that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has put a proposal together which is exciting, which is positive, which is reform-minded and which would do all those things that my hon. colleagues to the left could never even dream of doing collectively and that my hon. colleagues opposite in the government just do not have the will to do.

Bill C-21, this debt reduction bill, is a farce. It is an absolute farce. Every time I hear about the GST it sounds like The Lies My Father Told Me. Mr. Speaker, do you remember that play and that movie?

It is almost the same as dealing with statements by the Minister of Finance. He told Canadians that it was going to be revenue neutral. He said it would be fair. He said it would be equitable. He said it was going to be all these wonderful things. Every single thing the Minister of Finance told us about the GST—guess what—did not turn out to be factual, did not turn out to be the way it really was.

We find out that the GST, which was supposed to be revenue neutral, is going to be a cash cow. It is going to be milking money out of every senior citizen's pocket across Canada. The two million unemployed my colleague mentioned still have to pay the GST, and the one million children who live below poverty are going to be nailed by this regressive tax.

When the government gig was finally up the Canadian people said: "We don't believe a word you are telling us about this tax". The government said: "Oh, boy, we have to do something; they are on to us. Let's get the legal drafters in from Finance, the same people who used to do Mr. Wilson's speeches. They were pretty good at making things real fuzzy when it came to finances and putting proposals forward to the Canadian public". Do you know what the government did? It came up with a bill that is a sham. It is smoke and mirrors. It is the worst kind of deception to put before the people of Canada.

The national debt has more than doubled in seven years because of the mismanagement of the Conservative government at a time of record revenues. Revenues increased more than we have ever seen because the government continued to raise taxes, but it doubled the deficit during a time of record revenues. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that is bad fiscal management. If revenues increase and the debt increases it means the government is spending like a drunken sailor. I say that with all respect to sailors across the country; I don't really like to lump them in with the Tories. I have more respect for them than that.

What has happened here is that the Tories said: "Okay, fine, we now have to pay about $40 or $45 billion a year just to service the debt". They said: "Boy, the GST is doing what we always meant it to do before the Canadian people found out what we meant. It is going to raise more revenue, a couple of billion dollars more". The Tories need a slush fund to go into the next campaign with, rather than say: "We are going to create a fund. If there is $3 billion more collected by the regressive, awful, terrible GST—which is a sop on Canadian taxpayers' wallets—than by the tax it replaced, the manufacturers' sales tax, we will take that $3 billion and not just pay $40 billion in interest charges on the debt. We will take the $3 billion more which we have to pay anyway—it is all in the same pot—and apply it against the debt".

That is not what this bill does. That is what they are trying to tell Canadians, as they try to make everything a little fuzzy around here. They are trying to fool Canadians into believing that any excess revenue from the GST is going to be applied against the debt. Simply not true. It is false, f-a-l-s-e; false, not truthful. If the members opposite would be honest with themselves and their constituents they would tell them that.

If the GST raises an extra $4 or $5 or $10 billion there will not be an extra $4 or $5 or $10 billion applied against the debt. No, sir, Mr. Speaker. It is going to go into a little fund to re-elect Tories. That is exactly what they are going to do over there.

They are going to create a fund and try to buy Canadians again, this time with their own money, this time after the fleecing they have just given the Canadian public in squeezing those extra $5 or $6 billion from seniors and individuals on fixed incomes, single parent families, and even from children.

In principle, we support this type of an initiative. However, we want to see the government come clean with Canadians. If it is going to raise more money then put it in the bill that it is going to collect $3 billion more from the GST than the FST, the federal sales tax it replaced. Why not put it right in the bill? Then the government will take that and put it right on top. If the government does that, it will certainly have the support of the Liberal party. When the Liberal government takes over there will not be any smoke and mirrors in dealing with the taxpayers' dollars because we will facilitate real, meaningful, fair tax reform, the type of tax reform which my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has spent so much of his time and talents in putting before the Canadian people.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about the GST and I hear my Liberal colleagues, I feel that my reportorial skills are challenged to follow them. I listened to what the leader of the Liberals said during his leadership campaign about the GST. He said he would tinker with it, he would modify it, he would look at it. Not one time did he say—I stand to be corrected— that he would abolish it. That was the Liberal leader.

The New Democratic Party has one position. We have always had one position. We feel that the GST is wrong. We feel that there is need for fiscal reform and we feel this should be abolished.

If I can have the same quiet, attentive reaction from my colleagues as we on this side try to give them, I will try to explain myself.

As the GST was not visible, not fair and mainly because it was misrepresented to consumers and Canadians across this country we, as a party, said we would abolish it.

That does not mean that everything the hon. member said is not factual. As a matter of fact, I would agree that one of his own members has presented a very interesting paper on fiscal reform, a very interesting paper on tax reform. I am surprised that the party, as far as I have seen, has not given it even greater credibility.

Rather than pointing fingers at each other and saying: "You did not do this, or you did that, or you are not correct in your actions", we should look at some constructive proposals. They are around. There have been a number of constructive proposals but the GST is not one of them.

My colleagues from Quebec would agree with me.

I am quite sure that Conservative and Liberal members from Quebec will agree with me that Quebecers are against the GST, the majority of them are against the GST. This is one of the reasons why hon. members, especially those on the government side, will have pots of problems.

Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to say is that the public, in its majority, is against the GST, against that type of practice. The present problem is that we are faced with a bill which tries to make us believe that the GST will be solely used to reduce the deficit. The government is constantly claiming that it has no more money, that the cupboard is bare.

An hon. member: This is true.

Mr. Edmonston: The hon. member say it's true. In that case, how could you find— I have a good question for you—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): Would the hon. member address his comments to the Chair as the Standing Orders require.

Mr. Edmonston: You are right, Mr. Speaker. The problem is that when people are asking me interesting questions I am tempted to answer directly. From now on, I will do so through you.

I think that the money that we are going to collect through the GST is going into some kind of slush fund, a type of fund severely criticized by the hon. member from the Liberal party, who is probably very knowledgeable in terms of slush funds. Because indeed it is common practice in Canada, and if the Conservatives are doing it, it is because the Liberals have perfected the way of collecting money and spending it just before an election.

I could talk about the past, about some people, senators now, who were masters at this kind of fund raising.

Mr. Speaker, I think this bill continues a long tradition which is to try and make Canadians believe that we are doing something, that we are paying our debts. The government is trying to make us believe that it is doing one thing when, in reality, it is doing something entirely different.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is something which is very difficult to accept because in Quebec we know that the money we are going to pay as GST is not going to help reduce the deficit. We have seen the government give away $250 million, while saying that the cupboard was bare, just before an election was called in British Columbia. It found $250 million to inject in a scientific program that federal scientists themselves denounced as a black hole. This is serious!

How are people from Quebec—

An hon. member: This is cynical!

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, of course it is cynical, but this is really— I think that people in Quebec and every Canadian are asking themselves how the government can argue it does not have any money when it is able to find $250 million the day an election is called in British Columbia? And I am expecting the same in Saskatchewan. And again just before the next federal election is called. The government is pretending it does not have any money. There is the GST, all the money produced by the GST, it does not recognize it yet, but don't worry the money will be spent one day.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I say we must vote against this bill which is not clear at all. This is not a bill which will really contribute to a reduction of the debt. I think it is essential to reduce the deficit and there is an easy way to do it. You know what it is?

An hon. member: Raising taxes!

Mr. Edmonston: No, no, Mr. Speaker, not raising taxes. Not at all. The way to reduce the deficit now, Mr. Speaker, is to reduce government's spending.

I am wondering. While civil servants are ready to go on strike again because they have come to distrust this government, this same government is prepared to give millions of dollars to its most senior employees, the mandarins of the civil service, the crème de la crème in Ottawa. It is giving out a lot of money—

Some hon. members: That is not true!

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, some hon. members say it is not true. They should read the papers. All members opposite have to do is listen to government members, Mr. Speaker. It is true that they contradict each other a lot, but still, Mr. Speaker, government expenditures have to be cut.

Now, as I guy from Quebec, I can tell you that I notice a great deal of overlapping between jurisdictions. I could never figure out why we needed 40 departments. The number of departments has doubled. Yet, I am sure that the people of Canada and the people of Quebec are not better served today than they were 20 years ago. In fact, I would say that we Canadians and Quebecers are not served as well with 40 departments than we were a while back with just half that number.

I for one do not believe in big government. Humongous expenditures and deficit reduction do not go hand in hand. That is what Quebec has been trying to do for a long time, and it is not alone. All the provinces are talking about the same thing. They are talking about a problem which this government, has, that is, to face reality. There is a double reality at this time. First, throughout the country, people have had it, they are fed up. As we say in French: "they have had their trip".

• (1330)

Mr. Speaker, by that I do not mean that the Canadian people want to go on a trip.

[English]

I am not saying that they want to take a trip. They would prefer to see this government take a trip, permanently, because it has done the thing that the Prime Minister said he would do.

The Prime Minister said that this government would bring people together. It would bring its interests together, and it has.

Do you know in what way? Practically everybody now distrusts this government, and that is the reality. The other reality is we only have to endure it for maybe another 15 or 18 months and there will be a major change.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, they say things will improve, but what can you say in ten minutes? Nevertheless, I will try to clarify a few points.

But first of all, Mr. Speaker, my congratulations. I am delighted to see my hon. friend from Saint-Denis in the chair today. He is the senior member of this House, and I don't see why he is not in the chair on a permanent basis. I say this with all due respect for the current Speaker. They are both gentlemen worthy of our esteem.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today has been called a smoke screen. That may well be. In any case, this legislation is cosmetic, because it does not alter the fact that we have a national debt of about $400 billion by the end of the year and that we have to pay our debts at interest rates that are sometimes kept under control by the government but sometimes may be very high, with as a result, annual interest charges of 30 to 40 billion dollars. That is a lot of money.

Mr. Speaker, I say this legislation is probably cosmetic because it does nothing to alter the fact that Canadians are the most heavily taxed people in the world. It will not alter the fact that we have a government that may not be as good at running the country as we would like it to be and which in a budget it brought down—in February 26, if I am not mistaken—announced that it would introduce legislation—Bill C-21 before the House today—which would create a fund within the Public Accounts, a new account to which certain revenues would be credited and from which certain expenditures would be debited.

I dont't know whether my wife is listening, but suppose that to pay the mortgage on our house, we had a bank account called "mortgage payments", but we still have the same income, and suppose she deposited a certain amount of money every month in this "mortgage reduction" account. After a few months, the mortgage company or the bank would call her up and say: "Where is the money you owe us in mortgage payments, Mrs. Gauthier?" She would answer: "Well, I have a nice new account called "mortgage reduction" and it's in my bank account". He would probably say: "Will you please send it over, Mrs. Gauthier?"

That is what I mean by smoke screen and cosmetic legislation. This is a measure that does not entirely satisfy Canadians because they were led to believe that GST revenues would be sufficient to pay off the national debt. That is absolutely false, Mr. Speaker!

It is also a measure the right wing of the Conservative Party likes to promote, since their policy is to have Canadians believe, through different book-keeping practices, that we are solving our main national problem, the debt.

Mr. Speaker, of course, this would be a good initiative if the government had additional sources of revenues. But, as I said earlier, we are one of the most taxed nations.

Last summer, I went door to door to meet the people in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier. My constituents were not interested in talking about the Constitution or the environment. They said to me: "Mr. Gauthier, can you tell us how come our income and our purchasing power have gone down with all these damn taxes we have been subjected to the last few years? " It is not easy, Mr. Speaker, for ordinary Canadians to understand why the rich, who earn $100,000, are getting richer, while the poor are getting poorer. Mr. Speaker, the middle class is sick of being taxed by this government.

Therefore, this bill is a fraud. I will vote against it, not because there is no rationale for this bill or because it could not be accepted if we had sources of additional revenues but because we are overburdened with taxes and overtaxed on the national level, Mr. Speaker. I think this bill is simply intended to mislead Canadians, a kind of account introduced into the public accounts, an account that does not mean much, an account, as I said a moment ago, that will not satisfy Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to outline the effects of that legislation. We hear about the revenues of the GST and of gifts that Canadians would give to the federal government, and I even have correspondence from the minister of Supply and Services explaining to us what we should answer Canadians who want to make gifts into this account and to the government.

Here is what it says: "Finance Department—Explanation." As was announced in the February 1991 Budget, the Bill would guarantee the following: 1) The revenue from the Goods and Services Tax, the GST, as well as the net profit from the sale of Crown corporations and contributions made by taxpayers and companies will be paid into the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account. 2) These revenues will be used for the servicing of the debt and, as they grow, for the reduction of the debt outstanding. 3) The account will be examined annually by the Auditor General.

Mr. Speaker, that is the aim of this legislation. There is no mention in there about other revenues. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in there about a solution to the national problem of a debt that is too high, a debt which will be a burden for our children and our grandchildren.

[English]

I just want to end my comments because there is not much one can say once one has said that this is a smoke screen. It is a measure that does not affect the annual deficit.

I want to read from a Library of Parliament research office document—it is not mine—because I think it is quite eloquent:

> The annual deficit, and therefore the annual change in the net debt position of the government, is determined by total revenues and total spending. This bill would control neither element. This bill and legislation to be introduced in the future to control program spending would ensure that higher GST revenues could not be used to fund exceptionally high program spending growth.

Some people in this House believe, with an election coming hopefully in 1992 as it rightfully should after the government being four years in power, it should be going to the people for reconfirming its status. Some of us believe strongly this government is getting ready to have a slush fund for political partisan purposes. We object to that and we will vote against it.

• (1340)

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, thank you for having pronounced well the name of my riding.

I rise today to take part in the debate of Bill C-21 on second reading. Second reading is the stage when we discuss the principle of a bill. We have today before us an Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada. If the purpose of this bill is to establish an account to reduce the deficit of Canada, I think Canadians as a whole agree with the principle of deficit reduction. I am one of those Canadians; I acknowledge that the current deficit and the debt created by a series of deficits are far too high and have to be reduced.

One of the priorities of this government and the next governments is to try to reduce the deficit and the debt. I have no objection with this principle. But there is another principle even more important, the credibility principle. The Minister of Finance and his predecessor know that governments need a minimum of credibility to be able to manage the economy properly. It is most important for the Minister of Finance and other ministers with economic portfolios if they are to manage our economy, mainly at the macroeconomic level, using the instruments available to them, particularly the government budget.

That is the principle which I want to discuss over the next few minutes, Mr. Speaker. I want to talk about the fact that the government, particularly the Minister of Finance, has decided to introduce this bill seven years into its mandate, after having doubled our national debt, after having maintained the annual deficit at about the same level, right in the middle of a recession, contrary to promises and commitments it made at the beginning of its first mandate. Canada's economy was experiencing growth and was even overheating for a certain period of time, just before the last elections.

This government, which has doubled the debt after promising to reduce it, has lost all credibility. To realize that, one only has to read what economic columnists say and look at the recent economic history of Canada. Just before the last election, when the government should have put the brakes on spending and on the growth of the money supply, for which the Governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible, so as to restrain inflationary pressures, the government did the opposite. The Minister of Finance, who was so conscious of his credibility as a prudent manager of the Canadian economy, did exactly the opposite of what he should have done before the election. Mr. Speaker, this led to higher inflation just after the election, another surge in prices. After the election, the Minister of Finance told us that we were in a crisis, we had to put on the brakes, restrain spending, increase taxes, because the economy was going into recession. That is what happened, Mr. Speaker.

Now, how can a finance minister claim to have credibility if he does exactly the opposite of what an economic manager should do?

I am now coming to the goods and services tax. If the finance minister had had the courage before the election to tell us that the goods and services tax would be an incredible source of revenue, that it would bring all kinds of money in to the government, which would use these funds to reduce Canada's debt, if the government had had the courage before the last election to be frank with Canadians, maybe we on this side of the House would have been prepared to accept the principle of the goods and services tax that the government later imposed on us.

I will conclude in a minute or two, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to quote a source that the government opposite should know and should keep in mind about what I am saying. It confirms what I have just said. This confirmation comes from the OECD.

[English]

—in English, it is the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development.

Last week the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development gave this government a failing grade in its management of the Canadian deficit. It basically said exactly what I have just stated, that the government started off in its early years dealing with the deficit. Then it threw all caution to the winds.

We are now in the recession which this government created through its mismanagement of the economy and through its willingness to expand expenditures just before the election, to essentially buy the last election.

No wonder on this side of the House we are suspicious that that is exactly the intention of the government with this particular account. While we support the principle of using an account to reduce the deficit, we are extremely suspicious of the government's intentions since, in the past, its credibility has been so severely tarnished.

We will be studying this in committee, and we will want to tighten this legislation. We will want to make amendments to this to make sure that this government cannot weasel out of its commitments just before the next election.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times my colleagues and I have risen to speak against the GST. I do not know how many voices have been raised in this House against a tax grab, an unfair tax, a hidden tax, a tax that attacks the people of Canada.

In my riding, Mr. Speaker, the feeling against the GST is hostile, widespread and ongoing. One might even say the feeling can be measured in exactly the same manner as the feeling in my riding against the government.

When I fly home to Halifax, I take a cab from the airport into the city. My taxi driver, who has been driving a taxi in the Halifax area for over 30 years, reminds me every single time I get in his cab that it is the issue which is breaking his back, and it is the issue, along with government policy that is wreaking havoc with his life economically and every other way.

Mr. Speaker, this debt reduction bill we are being asked to consider today is nothing more than smoke and mirrors. Why does the government have a debt this size? Why has the deficit doubled since these people took office? Why? Because they do not know how to properly manage the economy.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Milliken: They could not manage a lemonade stand.

Ms Clancy: I am sure, as my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands says, they could not manage a lemonade stand.

An hon. member: I have not contributed a nickel to the debt.

Ms Clancy: I am sure you have not, and you will not either. Somebody will have to pay it, but it will not be the hon. member from Alberta.

It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, how the truth hurts. It hurts, but it also rouses the people on the other side from their torpor, from their—dare I say it—stupor. The hon. members sitting there in their Friday afternoon rest period suddenly come alive to the fact that somebody is standing up and taking them to task and calling them to account for their grotesque mismanagement of the financial affairs of this country.

I have been accused on many occasions of being a partisan member of this House.

An hon. member: Unjustly. Unjustly.

Ms Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I wear the label "partisan" proudly. I was born into this party, my parents—at least my mother—was born into this party, my grandfather was born into this party and so on. I come from a proud tradition of liberalism in Atlantic Canada.

An hon. member: If you thought for yourself you would be a New Democrat.

Ms Clancy: No, I would never be a New Democrat. We are practical people. One of the reasons I am proud of that heritage is because it is a heritage that mixes practicality—as I just mentioned to my hon. friend from Windsor—with compassion.

You did not inherit the other 50 per cent of the deficit, my friend from Ontario says. No, they doubled it. I believe it is doubled but it may be bigger than that by now. My friend from Kingston and the Islands knows the answer. But it has more than doubled, I believe, in the last seven years. Creative mathematics is a strong point on the other side, unfortunately creative management is not.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk, and talk quite seriously about mixing practicality and compassion, we talk about a tradition of which the majority of Canadians approves. Canadians do not believe that you settle your financial problems on the backs of those least able to take care of it.

Ms Clancy: They do not believe that the poor and the sick and the needy, that those who are unable to help themselves, should have to bear the burdens this government is placing upon them.

When I was first elected in 1988 and came to this House, I have to admit I had certain prejudices that Atlantic Canadians carry. We tend to think, wrongly, that we are the only area of the country to really understand poverty, unemployment and suffering. Sadly I have learned in the nearly three years that I have had the privilege to sit in this House that that is not the case. There are poor people in Ontario. There are poor people in Quebec and poor people in western Canada. I am not sure whether there are poor people in Newmarket or not. But there are poor people outside of Atlantic Canada.

In every region, in every province, in all of the territories of this country it is necessary to ensure that programs are available that are compassionate, that speak to the people and say your government cares.

At the same time those programs and government policy must speak to the poor, the middle class, the wealthy and say: "We care, but we are responsible as well. We will bring you good government so that not only will you be able to have a decent life, but your children will have a decent life as well".

Right now in this country the biggest fear for the largest number of people is: "I might be hanging on today, but what is going to happen tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow"?

This government has lost its compassion, if it ever had any. But most particularly this government has lost any appearance of competence in learning how to manage and pay off its debt and its deficit. This debt reduction bill is a magician's sleight of hand, perpetrated on the people of Canada. It is not going to do anything. It is not going to significantly reduce the debt.

Mr. Mills: More paperwork.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood says: "More paperwork", and he is absolutely right. Perhaps, if the government took a leaf from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood's book, and talked about things like flat taxes and fairness to Canadians, it might be in a better position than it is in today. However, that would take a certain level of comprehension as to what the whole problem is about. Unfortunately, it appears that level of comprehension is sadly lacking in the government benches.

I began and I end with the same plea, that compassion and practicality have served this country well in past governments and they will serve this country well in future governments. I say to this government that the GST is not the answer to debt reduction in this country. I further say that it well knows that the GST is not the answer to debt reduction in this country. I further fear that this government does not have a clue as to what the actual answer to debt reduction in this country might be.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, we have before us this Friday afternoon Bill C-21, and as with all bills at second reading, we are talking about the principle of the bill.

The people of Scarborough West, being a practical people, want to know what the principle of any bill is that is taking up the time of the House of Commons.

Of course, the first question one has to ask is: Why is the bill before us? What is the genesis, what is the raison d'être of having this bill before us? For that, we have to take a little bit of an historical journey and it begins with the government's desire to impose the goods and services tax on the people of Canada.

Everyone in this country will remember that time after time, in speech after speech, all we heard was that the goods and services tax was going to be revenue neutral and that the people of Canada understood revenue neutral. For example, if the manufacturers' sales tax was, in fact, bringing in $18 billion a year, the GST, this marvellous replacement would bring in $18 billion a year. Therefore, there would be no increase in tax. So went the logic. Indeed, it would be revenue neutral. In fact, the people of Canada would not be paying more than they had paid under the antiquated old system. This litany was repeated virtually daily until finally the goods and services tax, despite the will of the vast majority of Canadians, was imposed on Canadians. Of course, what became very clear very quickly was how absolutely and categorically false the claim of revenue neutrality turned out to be.

We very quickly saw shortly after the imposition of the GST that indeed the tax was not revenue neutral and that it was going to develop hundreds of millions of dollars and, indeed, billions of dollars in extra tax revenue.

Now, not surprisingly, the people of Canada, who were vastly opposed to the goods and services tax, got even angrier when they found this out. Not only did they have to accept this unfair tax, not only did they have to swallow it and pay it, but what was told to them, that it would be revenue neutral, was categorically false.

They continued to complain. They did not just complain to the opposition members of Parliament, they obviously and clearly complained to the members on the government side who no doubt heard an earfull. They saw thousands upon thousands of petitions signed by hundreds of thousands of people. They saw what happened to the government of this country, and to the other place, as a result of the goods and services tax. Then they saw that what it had said all along to justify the goods and services tax was a big lie and that it could not be justified on the basis of revenue neutrality.

What to do, then, in order to regain face with the people of Canada? Well, we know that Canadians are prepared to carry their weight. We know that Canadians want to reduce the debt. They know that if they have to tighten our belts, and it is going to result in some meaningful debt reduction, they are prepared to do it.

Lo and behold, instead of admitting that: "Yes, we were wrong. We told you incorrect information knowing it to be incorrect information time and time again. No, the tax is not going to be revenue neutral. It is going to bring in lots of money.", the government comes up with this debt reduction. I will call it the correct name, the debt servicing and reduction account.

What is supposed to be put in there? It is supposed to be credited with revenues from the goods and services tax, net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations and contributions from individuals or businesses. Well, the people of Scarborough West say: "Why Bill C-21?" The government knew all along that this tax was not going to be revenue neutral. Why did it not put the provisions of Bill C-21 in the goods and services tax legislation that it brought forward and have the forthrightness to tell the people of Canada the facts.

The government did not have that forthrightness and so now, in a further effort to sell an unpopular tax, it comes up with this so-called debt servicing and reduction account to take the revenues from the goods and services tax, which were not supposed to have excess revenues. The money that is going in here is money that was never supposed to have been collected, according to the government and the finance minister of the day.

All of this money that the government never should have collected, that it told Canadians would not be collected, that they would not be taxed on, the big lie is now being legitimized in this debt servicing and reduction account.

What are we to do on this side of the House? As a matter of principle, there are certain facts. It is a fact we have the goods and services tax whether we like it or not. Those who have watched the debates of this House know perfectly well how hard the Liberal Party fought in this House and in other places to defeat the goods and services tax. We do not take any lessons from the New Democratic Party on our fight against the goods and services tax. Everybody knows how hard we fought.

What do we do? The goods and services tax is a fact. Excess revenues are being collected. It is a fact. It is now admitted. What do we do with those excess revenues? Do we let them go into the consolidated revenue fund and let the government of the day spend them for the various projects it is spending them on to raise our national debt to over $400 billion and blame it on a party that has not been in power for seven years, which is its usual litany? Again the big lie. Or, do we say: "All right, let's grapple with the facts as they stand". We have to do something with that money, and Canadians say: "If we are going to pay this hated tax then let's see some benefit from it. Let's put it into a debt reduction fund and apply it to reducing the debt".

In principle this proposal makes sense, but I want this House and the people of Canada to remember the history of how we got here not in a straightforward manner but through the big lie and justifying the big lie with the so-called debt servicing reduction account.

When we get to committee we are going to want to make sure that this legislation is nailed down, air tight and waterproof, so that the amount collected, the excess revenues from the goods and services tax, is be used for nothing but what it was promised to be used for, that is the reduction of the debt. If that is not guaranteed then the government will not receive the support not only of the opposition but of the Canadian people for this scam to try and hide the big lie.

Mr. Langdon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that arises from the last two speeches in which the member for Halifax indicated she was against the legislation and this member has indicated he intends to vote for the legislation. Which is the actual Liberal position?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): I regret this is debate. The member has participated. I must listen to the point of order of the gentleman before saying whether it is or it is not a point of order. I have to be fair and listen first. I definitely regret to say to the hon. member that he knows it is not a point of order.

Another member is rising on a point of order. I have no choice of course but to listen first to see if it is a point of order, and he probably knows already if it is one or not. However I will act promptly.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member, my colleague from Halifax, the position of the Liberal Party is crystal clear and has been so stated by speaker after speaker. We are talking about the principle of the bill which is a reduction of debt. Who can be opposed to that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): I am sure the House appreciates that debate. May I ask if the House, seeing no other speaker, is ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): May I call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Prud'homme): Therefore, it being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Member's Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

REDRESS FOR INTERNMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should:

(1) acknowledge that the internment, disenfranchisement and related repressive measures taken against Canadians of Ukrainian origin between 1914 and 1920 were unwarranted and unjust and contrary to the principles now adopted and reflected in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms;

(2) instruct Parks Canada to erect historical markers at each of the 26 concentration camps where Ukrainians were interned and undertake the archaeological restoration of the Castle Mountain internment camp in Banff National Park with a permanent historical educational exhibit; and

(3) undertake negotiations with the redress committee of the Civil Liberties Commission of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress on the question of redress to the community.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had the privilege of winning a draw on Private Members' Business. I was delighted that my motion was drawn in the recent draw and that I can now present it to the House. I have a number of items on the Order Paper under the Private Members' Business section and I am pleased to at least have one come forward, even if it is for a brief debate. I had hoped that perhaps at the end of the hour the government might allow the motion to pass so that we could possibly see some government action in this particular area, which I know the government is, in fact, considering.

Many Canadians are unaware of the plight of the Ukrainian Canadians who were interned during World War I. In fact, when the war broke out, the government said that Canadian Ukrainians who had emigrated to Canada from the western Ukrainian territories of Galacia and Bukovyna, both of which were then part of the Austro–Hungarian Empire, were enemy aliens and they posed a threat to national security.

The government took the view that this threat required that these particular persons, who were in many cases Canadian citizens, ought to be interned and held in camps for the duration of the war. Accordingly, about 5,000 Ukrainian Canadians were in fact interned by the federal government in 26 camps that were located across Canada. One of those camps happened to be in my riding of Kingston and the Islands and was in the famous old fort there, Fort Henry, which was built some time in the middle of the 19th century.

Approximately 88,000 others, most of them Ukrainian Canadians, were forced to report regularly to local police and to internal security authorities, this, in spite of the fact that in many cases these persons posed absolutely no risk, security or otherwise, to the Canadian state.

I would like to read a quotation from a book written by Lubomyr Luciuk, a constituent of mine who is a professor at Queen's University in the Department of Geography. Mr. Luciuk is a well–known Canadian Ukrainian and a member of the committee that is seeking redress in this case. He has written a little pamphlet called A Time for Atonement, subtitled Canada's First National Internment Operations and the Ukrainian Canadians, 1914 to 1920. I quote from his book at page 19:

> Upon each individual's arrest, whatever valuables they might have had were seized. Some of this confiscated money was stolen. As early as 1915, General Otter wrote that "difficulties have arisen in accounting for the moneys received".
> In his final report, he observed that as many of those interned were residents of Canada and possessed real estate and securities, etc., such have been turned over to the Custodian of Enemy Alien Properties for the future decision of the government.

Over $32,000 in cash was left in the Receiver General's office at the end of these internment operations. The estimated present day value is $1.5 million.

What the property, security and other valuables that were also confiscated might now be worth has yet to be calculated. The human costs of these internment operations are, of course, incalculable.

The internment went on for a considerable period, until 1920 in fact, but the internment was not the only problem that was faced by these citizens. In 1917, many members will recall that the government at the time passed the Wartime Elections Act which disenfranchised most Ukrainian Canadians as well as many others.

Members will recall that the vote was given to wives of men serving in the Armed Forces. It was also taken away from Canadians of German origin and other ethnic groups involved in the First World War on the other side.

It was not an Election Act of which Canadians can be proud. Frankly it was a national disgrace. The government rigged the elections very much in its favour so that it could win the 1917 election campaign which saw the Union Government—as it was then called—run and win the election in that year.

It paid for it in due course, as a historical footnote. In 1921 it was thrown out and replaced by a very sound administration under the very distinguished and capable William Lyon Mackenzie King.

In 1918, an already censored Ukrainian language press was closed down. This obviously was right near the end of the war. During the war Ukrainian Canadians were often maligned in regional and national newspapers. They were forced to work as poorly paid labourers in remote areas and were often relocated away from their homes and families.

Those imprisoned had their property confiscated, as I have already indicated. Some committed suicide while they were in prison and some were killed in unsuccessful escape attempts.

When the war ended, a large number of Ukrainian Canadians were still interned. The government changed their status from that of "enemy-alien" to "Bolshevik" and kept them locked up for fear that they might be sympathetic to the new communist regime in the Soviet Union.

Not until 1920 were the camps finally closed down. There was never any evidence presented in any public place that the Ukrainian Canadians posed a threat to national security. Indeed, the government never produced any evidence to that effect at all. In January 1915 the British foreign office informed the federal government that Ukrainian Canadians should be treated as friendly aliens. The government was told that many Ukrainians, like other nationalities within the Austro-Hungarian empire, were opposed to Austro-Hungarian rule and would not be sympathetic with Canada's enemy in the war.

The motion I have put before the House is one that is supported by the Ukrainian-Canadian Congress. The Congress wishes the government to formally acknowledge the unjust and unwarranted treatment these persons received during the First World War.

They would like to have the event commemorated by having historical markers established at the various internment sites, including Fort Henry in Kingston, which was the first site used as an internment camp.

I should also note as an historical footnote that the same fort was used during World War II to house prisoners of war. The International Red Cross said that it was not a suitable place to house prisoners. One can only imagine what the condition was during the First World War when apparently no international organization was involved in checking on the internees.

The Ukrainian-Canadian Congress has asked the firm of Price Waterhouse to compile a study on the financial losses of the internees. The report is due later this autumn. Once it is complete the committee would like to discuss the matter of redress with the government.

The treatment of Japanese-Canadians interned during World War II has clearly established some kind of precedent. It is certainly clear that given the number of years that have elapsed since the Ukrainian internment took place very few internees must still be alive. Accordingly, the Congress is not seeking redress on an individual basis but rather the establishment of a trust fund for the Ukrainian community in Canada which could be used for various purposes of that community.

The purpose of the motion I have put before the House is to urge the government to look at the facts, look at the record and see if something cannot be done to commemorate the evil perpetrated by our country on these people at that time.

These were innocent citizens of our country, never convicted of any crime, who just happened to have come from an area with which Canada was at war. As a result they were deemed unsuitable to carry on their daily lives on their farms and their homes wherever they happened to live in Canada, they were rounded up and herded into these camps. They were separated from their friends, from their families, from their communities and held far longer than was necessary solely because the government perceived that there might be a security risk to our country because they came from that particular part of Europe.

With great respect, it is clearly a situation which calls for some kind of relief. I am not suggesting, as I indicated earlier, that payments be made to individuals. Neither is the Ukrainian-Canadian Congress. The Congress seeks redress for the community and seeks to have the fact of this internment commemorated in plaques at the various locations across Canada where these internments took place.

In closing, perhaps I can quote an article by my friend Mr. Luciuk and Bohdan Kordan, both members of the Ukrainian Canadian community, published in the Kingston-Whig Standard. I think the article summarized the views of their community. They wrote as follows:

> What happened can never, of course, be undone, and no amount of financial compensation, to individuals or to the community, can truly make up for the injustices experienced by these Canadians. But by dealing with this issue expeditiously the government of Canada can make good on its publicly stated commitment to treating fairly with any group of Canadians who, as a result of discriminatory and unjustifiable actions on the part of the federal authorities, suffered grievous damages. By doing so the government will not only help to fill in a blank page in Canadian history but will in the process, ensure that no other Canadians, of whatever ethnic, religious or racial origin, are ever again subjected to such a national humiliation and gross violation of their fundamental human and civil rights.

I know that the government is sympathetic to the plight of these people, to the plight they suffered many years ago. I know that the government is considering moving on this issue. I urge the government to take the matter in hand, handle it with dispatch and seek to come to a satisfactory arrangement to ensure that the fact that this kind of thing went on in our country is not forgotten but indeed commemorated as a sad reminder of how we sometimes disregard the notions of fairness, equity, and justice which we so often take for granted in Canada today.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, let me at the outset commend the hon. member for bringing his motion forward. It is timely and I am pleased to be able to address the motion and acknowledge the treatment of Ukrainian Canadians at the hands of past governments.

We all agree that mistreatment of Canadians because of their origin is unacceptable. Unfortunately, the history of our country has not always reflected the principles of justice and equality that make us proud Canadians today. Thankfully this sad chapter in our history is now behind us.

The course of history cannot be changed, however. These events must be brought out into the open. This concerns each of us. We firmly believe that Canadians must be aware of situations like this one and that it is important to set the record straight.

Our government today is committed to building a strong multicultural society, one that abides by the rules of justice, human rights and mutual respect.

The basis of this commitment is a clear understanding of how Canada came to be. We must be able to confront our history and face up to our past.

The Prime Minister has committed himself to a formal apology regarding the matter of Ukrainian Canadians interned during the First World War.

We must not forget that Ukrainian Canadians helped build this country. We must not forget that the history of Ukrainian Canadians is closely interwoven with the growth and the achievements of the prairies. Their contribution to Canadian life, which began in the 1800s, continues today.

As Canada's fifth largest ethnocultural group, the Ukrainian Canadian community is present in every sphere of activity: cultural, professional, educational, political, religious and financial. With a network of over 1,000 organizations and a highly organized structure the community has a voice in over 150 towns and cities across this country.

Ukrainian Canadians have come a long way. Ninety per cent of the community is Canadian born and therefore fully integrated into the mainstream of Canadian culture.

Nonetheless, Ukrainian Canadians are strongly attached to their heritage and therefore determined to maintain their culture, language and identity.

Ukrainian Canadians are a perfect example of the country we are thriving to build. They are full-fledged Canadians with a Ukrainian heritage giving them a unique flavour. They personify our multicultural society.

As people committed to their language, religion, and cultural heritage the Ukrainian community has long been the most outspoken advocate of a multicultural nation, one that recognizes that diversity is a fundamental characteristic of our country and a vital part of being Canadian.

In 1986 the Ukrainian community produced an in-depth study entitled Building the Future: Ukrainian Canadians in the 21st Century. As the title suggests, the document is proof that Ukrainian Canadians are turned toward the future. They are men and women of action.

The document established a strategic process of renewal and co-ordination within the Ukrainian community in Canada. It sets specific goals in education, arts, communication, and cultural development, as well as public policies and programs.

The document clearly stated that multiculturalism is the key to maintaining their culture while participating fully in the larger Canadian society.

Ukrainian Canadians promote the concept of functional trilingualism. Many of them exemplify this by being fluent in English, French and Ukrainian.

Ukrainians can definitely pride themselves in being among the architects of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act passed in 1988.

Because they refused assimilation Ukrainian Canadians have met challenges of integration while retaining the essential qualities of their heritage.

Our country is proud of the numerous Ukrainian Canadian personalities who contribute to the innumerable facets of Canadian life: at Rideau Hall with Governor General Ray Hnatyshyn, in the Supreme Court with John Sopinka, in the world of sports with hockey players like Dale Hawerchuk and Mike Bossy, in the business world with Bill Teron, to name a few among many.

These people, and thousands more, confirm the enormous contribution of Ukrainian Canadians to the economic and social development of this land. The Ukrainian Canadian community has come a long way. Despite difficulties Ukrainian Canadians have done well. They are a strong and vital community and one that continues to prosper.

This year Ukrainian Canadians are celebrating the proud centenary of Ukrainian settlement in Canada. The official opening, held at the end of August, marked the beginning of the festivities to unfold throughout the country during the next 12 months.

The official closing of the centennial celebration in October 1992 will coincide with the triennial Congress of Ukrainian Canadians.

Many special events are planned by individuals and organizations on national, regional, provincial and local levels. What better time for these Ukrainian Canadians to commemorate and honour their rich historical past, salute their present and create a vision for the future? The government stated in this week's proposals for constitutional reform:

> It is true that this country and its creation have not taken place without pain and suffering. The aboriginal people, in particular, have paid a high price for other peoples' search for freedom. Canada has not always been inclusive and many have been left out of the benefits of citizenship. Yet, despite these gaps which we are only now acknowledging and trying to remedy, Canada remains deeply symbolic of freedom in its broadest sense. Many around the world still long to come to our shores, to share in what we have built. People in other nations continue to risk their lives and sacrifice their security for freedoms that previous generations have already guaranteed for us in this country.

What better time for all Canadians to recognize the contribution of this vibrant community, one which has undergone tremendous change over the past 100 years, but one that retains values, traditions and a language and all fundamentals of our Canadian way of life.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I too would like to thank and congratulate the hon. member for Kingston for bringing this matter to the House today. It is a matter that has cried out for effective treatment for a long time.

I would like to start by asking you, and through you, the other members present here today, to conjure up a picture in your mind. Place yourself on highway 1A, the road that was there before the Trans-Canada Highway 1 was built, northwest of Banff in the Bow River Valley, within the Canadian Rockies. About half way up Highway 1A, between Banff and Lake Louise, at a junction in front of the towering Castle Mountain, is a wall of rock that stretches, literally for miles, rising up on the east side of the Bow River Valley.

Place yourself there in your mind, on the road, in the flatlands of the valley in winter. Few people stop along this road, especially in the winter. The scenery is stupendous. The towering mountains are brilliant in their fresh coat of snow, and with every gentle wisp of breeze, the pine trees drop a cascade of snow in a sparkling dazzle of crystals and colour. Occasionally, a car swishes by speeding toward Banff to the south, or Lake Louise and other points to the north.

If, while standing there, you close your eyes and stand stock still, and again use your imagination, you can see another scene, a shockingly disturbing scene, right there, and not very long ago.

Between 1914 and 1920, in one of the most shameful episodes of Canadian history, thousands of recent immigrants to Canada were imprisoned there. The concentration camp near Castle Mountain, outside Banff, was only one of the 26 such internment camps scattered across the country. Thousands of Ukrainians, and other people of east European descent, were designated enemy aliens, stripped of their property and denied their civil rights. Over 80,000 people, mostly of Ukrainian origin, were forced to carry identification papers and report to local police. Over 8,000 others were separated from their families, confined behind barbed wire and forced into hard labour.

What was the crime that justified this imprisonment, this massive injustice perpetrated under the provisions of the recently passed War Measures Act? There was not one. These Ukrainians were simply recent immigrants who happened to hold Austrian passports. Many simply did not have a job. These were not enemies of Canada.

In fact, the British Government expressly informed the Canadian government that these Ukrainians should be considered friendly. Many of them had fled their homes to avoid being conscripted into the Austro-Hungarian army.

Even though they had committed no crime, these new Canadians were forced to build the internment camps that contained them, to build the roads, including the predecessor to that Highway 1A, to clear the land, to cut wood and work on railway construction projects.

Later, they were forced to work at miserable pay for private companies. Every year thousands of us drive past these sites that used to be internment camps, yet few Canadians know the extent of the hardship that was caused in Canada to our own.

Canada should finally acknowledge that this gross injustice occurred here. We can never right the wrongs that were committed, but we can teach our children what happened, why it happened, in the hope that they may learn from the past so that such injustice may not happen again.

For this reason, I and the New Democratic caucus and party of which I am a member, very strongly support several steps.

First, an official acknowledgement by the government of the serious injustices that were inflicted on these Ukrainian Canadians.

Second, the placement of historical plaques at appropriate sites near those 26 internment camps.

Third, the establishment of a national redress commission to review requests for redress of discriminatory acts of past Canadian governments, and recommend appropriate and expeditious action to deal with this and other dark episodes in our history.

In addition, Madam Speaker, we support the partial reconstruction of that Castle Mountain camp in Alberta, as an educational site to which Canadians, and other visitors, could go and be encouraged to pause along their drive through the majestic Rockies, and reflect on what they themselves might do to ensure that such a sorry event never occurs in Canada again. Perhaps, as well, they could reflect on what it is that human societies can do to themselves when the idea of the enemy, the other, the apart, the separate, becomes a more compelling idea than the certain knowledge that we are all of us brothers and sisters.

Madam Speaker, this is a motion completely worthy of the non-partisan support of all elements in this House. I greatly hope it receives that support.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to speak in response to the motion by the hon. member, especially in light of the importance of the issues being raised.

Canada today is a vibrant and tolerant country that recognizes the essential nature of its multicultural reality. Ukrainian Canadians have been major exponents of the recognition of the multicultural nature of Canada. Canadians can trace their origins to every part of the world. People from all over the world have played a major part in settling the land, developing our resources, building cities and forging transportation links over vast distances.

The internment of Ukrainian Canadians during the First World War is not a proud moment in our history. It is a history, however, that has to be told. The government takes this issue very seriously and is looking into how best to set the record straight and to symbolize our recognition of this very sad event in our history.

In more recent times, the Government of Canada has acted to protect its citizens from this kind of treatment. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equal protection and benefit of the law, without discrimination. Through the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, the Parliament of Canada has recognized that our society is fundamentally multicultural in nature and has committed itself to the full and equitable participation of individuals and communities of all origins in shaping Canada's future.

The War Measures Act, as an example, has been repealed by this government. Encouraged to immigrate to Canada by Canadian governments, Ukrainians were a vital part of the settlement process of Canada, particularly in the prairies. Ukrainian settlers in the prairies wanted no more than the chance to live and work in dignity in this country of Canada.

• (1440)

The Ukrainians were among the founding settlers of Canada. They were especially important in settling the prairies.

Between 1891 and 1914, 170,000 Ukrainians came to Canada. Between the wars another 68,000 Ukrainians came to Canada. After the Great War, 33,000 more Ukrainians immigrated to Canada.

Ukrainians did settle in small numbers in Canada long before the mass immigration that took place in 1891. According to the publication The Canadian Family Tree, there were soldiers of Ukrainian origin in the de Meuron and Watteville regiments which fought for Canada in the War of 1812.

Some Ukrainians settled in Manitoba during the period of Lord Selkirk. There were also Ukrainians in Manitoba who came from the United States prior to 1891.

In the beginning the Ukrainians faced a very difficult life in the prairies as they broke into this land and broke the land itself. In spite of this harsh existence, community cultural and social life grew with development of a variety of organizations, women's groups, newspapers and periodicals, architecture, folk arts and poetry over the years.

In 1905 the Ukrainian Mutual Benefit Association was founded in affiliation with the St. Nicholas Ukrainian Catholic Church in Winnipeg. Among these Ukrainian workers and farmers there emerged a credit union movement, which began in 1939 when the new Community Savings and Credit Union was founded in Saskatoon.

By the end of the 1960s over 60 Ukrainian credit unions served an estimated membership of 50,000. Over time the Ukrainian-Canadians, like their fellow citizens, have become an urban people.

According to the 1981 census, there were 63,000 Ukrainians in Edmonton, 59,000 in Winnipeg, and 51,000 in Toronto. Other major centres of Ukrainian population are Vancouver, Montreal, Calgary, Saskatoon, Hamilton, Thunder Bay, Regina and the Niagara Peninsula.

Of the 529,615 Ukrainians in Canada in 1981, 59 per cent lived in the prairie provinces and 25.3 per cent lived in Ontario. Much of the cultural struggle for the Ukrainian Canadian community has involved the maintenance of its language.

In recent years bilingual and even trilingual education, with French included, has been offered in the publicly supported education systems of the prairie provinces.

Ukrainians are a vital part of the cultural fabric of Canada. The Ukrainian Community Development Committee report for the prairie regions published in 1986 by the Ukrainian Canadian committee noted that "the Ukrainian situation as an ethnocultural minority is a very special one, permanently woven into the fabric of Canadian society".

Over 1,000 organizations exist within the Ukrainian community. The paintings of William Kurelek, inspired by his experience on the prairies, have been widely recognized. George Ryga is a writer of Ukrainian origin of national stature.

Ukrainians have long been involved in municipal politics as well. William Harwylak in Edmonton and Stephen Juba in Winnipeg have been prominent mayors. The first Ukrainian elected to a provincial legislature was Andrew Shandro in 1913 in Alberta. In 1926 Michael Luchkovich became the first Ukrainian elected to the House of Commons. Over 200 Ukrainian Canadians have been elected provincially and another 60 have been elected to the House of Commons. In 1970 Stephen Worobetz became Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan. A former hon. member of this House, His Excellency Ray Hnatyshyn, now serves the country as Governor General.

During the Second World War approximately 40,000 Ukrainian Canadians served in the Canadian Armed Forces. Ukrainian-Canadians play a vital role in Canadian life. They are important advocates of recognition of the multicultural nature of Canada. However, we must not forget the treatment of Ukrainians which took place during the First World War.

We must ensure that present and future generations of Canadians understand the reality of Canadian history, including events such as the Ukrainian internment. Many Canadians are unaware of the details of these events, or even that they took place. They are seldom mentioned in the official history books, in museum exhibits, or in popular press reports about historical events.

I am grateful to the hon. member for this motion and for the occasion to speak about the Ukrainian internment. More important, I am grateful to those members of the Ukrainian Canadian community for increasing public awareness about this history.

Without this knowledge of history, we risk repeating the same mistakes whenever world crises break out to stoke the embers of fear and intolerance.

One of the most important conclusions of the Spicer commission report last summer was that Canadians need a greater knowledge of their history, of themselves and of each other.

If we are to remain together as a country, we must encourage the recounting and hearing of our histories.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I attended a meeting on behalf of the minister about a year and a half ago at which the Ukrainian redress committee had a press conference to tell their story.

It is the story of a minority in Canada that still hurts.

This motion which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has presented is one that should be given every consideration by the government. The government is committed to doing something to redress this historical wrong committed by a previous Government of Canada. The suggestions by the hon. member are certainly excellent and should be given every consideration.

I will certainly support the referral of the motion.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I want to thank all hon. members, and the members for Burlington, Edmonton East, Carleton—Charlotte and Don Valley North for their kind interventions.

As there is unanimity on this point I wonder if rather than drop the motion it could be carried by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think I will also find unanimous consent to call it four o'clock p.m.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Black moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in preparing my speech for today, my assistant and I went through the newspaper clippings we have on the Montreal massacre and on violence against women in general. There was much there. There is so much to say that I cannot possibly include even a small fraction of it in my speech today.

The news photos of the night of the massacre recalled to us the horror and the shock we all felt on December 6, 1989, when we first heard the news report that a man had entered into the engineering classroom at the École Polytechnique in Montreal, separated the men from the women and shot the women with a legally purchased semi-automatic weapon.

Afterward, a disturbing debate took place about whether this was just the isolated act of a madman or if it was connected to the death of 100 women every year in domestic violence situations, connected to the death and the injuries to women as a result of being sexually assaulted by men who hate women, men who do not see women as equal human beings.

Some people sought to reassure themselves that the massacre was an isolated act by a madman so that they could think that it would never happen again. It has happened before, it happens now and it will continue to happen.

The different thing about this massacre was that it was 14 young women killed all at once. Theodore Bundy murdered 36 women. Edward Jackson, a regular churchgoer, a respected doctor and father, raped 32 women. Larry Takahashi was found guilty of raping 16 women, and another 122 rape charges against him were never heard. It is these names we remember, the names of the people who do violence against women.

We do not remember the names of the victims. The victims are nameless and faceless to us, just as they were to the killers and to their attackers. I want to name the names. I am glad and appreciative that the members of this House wish to stand alongside me, and commemorate those who died. They are: Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne-Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznick, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michele Richard, Annie St. Arneault, Annie Turcotte, Maryse Langanière.

I want to express my deepest sympathies to the families of these young women, to the families of the students, one of whom committed suicide shortly after the massacre and to the families of women and young people who have died of abuse, hatred and the madness in our society that does nothing to prevent this violence from taking place. These events have left us all with scars of pain.

December 6 will be remembered as a horrific and grisly day but I and many others wish something positive to come of it.

I want to talk about one of the survivors of the massacre, a young woman whom I admire very much. Heidi Rathjen has become one of the leaders in Canada on the issue of gun control. This young woman, who went on to graduate from the Ecole Polytechnique, has appeared before two parliamentary committees on gun control. She has helped to amass over 500,000 signatures on a petition for stricter gun control. She has engaged in public speaking right across this country about this issue.

Just like Ms. Rathjen, I think we must all become active on the issue of violence against women. We cannot just continue to talk about it. People are dying.

Marc Lepine had a list of 19 women whom he wanted to kill. He called them "radical feminists" and he wanted them dead because he thought they had ruined his life.

These women were high profile, successful people. Talent and hard work counted very little to Mr. Lepine. He felt that they had taken his place in society because he was a male and deserved the best even without their talent, even without hard work, without any of the skills and abilities that had got these women to the place they were. Some people still maintain the Montreal massacre had nothing to do with sexism.

Lepine's suicide note said his rampage was due to "political reasons". He said: "Even if the mad killer epithet will be attributed to me by the media, I consider myself a rational person, forced to take extreme acts." He accused women of wanting to keep all the advantages of being women while seizing the advantages that were men's.

These attitudes are out there. Lepine did not invent them. They are the attitudes that promote violence against women. The attitude that women have a place in life and if they step out of that place, they can be targets for abuse from name-calling to being beaten and murdered, that women are a proper target for the rage and the frustration that is felt by some men, that women are not real human beings with real feelings and real ambitions with just as much right to pursue them as men, that men have some sort of right to sex and other services from women are attitudes that must be changed.

This year a newspaper article discussing date rape said: "Meeting a woman in a bar and drinking with her for several hours before going to her place is not a date. That's a pick-up."

A so-called pro-family newspaper blamed violence against women on the feminists just as Marc Lepine blamed them. He blamed everything on the feminists. The newspaper wrote that the cause of violence against women is the destruction of the family. How does this explain the cases of violence that we have all seen in families in the 1800s, even in the 1500s?

Wife beating was legal in Canada and elsewhere at one time. Women could not even receive a divorce even though they had been repeatedly beaten and beaten to a pulp.

Some right wing groups have commandeered the term "family values" to mean something sick and twisted. They do not want to promote the health and well-being of family members at all. They only want to provide a justification to male family members to abuse women and children and get away with it.

A co-ordinator for a sexual assault support centre has said that the issue of violence against women was brought to the forefront by the Montreal massacre, and that many women did not realize the extent to which angry men would take their fury out on women. I think that is especially true of young women. You just do not grasp that anyone, anyone you think is a friend, or even a stranger, would want to hurt you, or would have so little regard for your own wishes.

Many survivors of sexual assault are simply in shock that any one would want to do that to them. It does not matter how they dress, how old they are, or who they are, they are targeted simply because they are women.

That crisis centre received 2,327 calls in six months, and it is one of only two crisis centres in a small city. Some calls were from women who had been abused in childhood and were just beginning to come to terms with that abuse.

Chia-Tsu Liu was an abused wife in Toronto who was hacked to death by her husband when she left him and refused to return.

Nina de Villiers went jogging one day and never came back. She had been active in the movement to end violence against women and she was found dead.

A 13-year old girl was doused with gasoline by her former 15-year old boyfriend and set on fire. She had reported threats to the police before this horrible situation but no one had helped her.

Twenty people watched as an 11-year old girl was gang raped at a party in Toronto.

One female Toronto city councillor thinks violence against women is exaggerated because she does not know of anyone among her friends or family who have told her of an assault.

A young woman in my circle of friends told me that she told her mother that she was sexually assaulted when she was 17 and her mother asked her what she had done to deserve that. That same young woman escaped the sexual advances of her uncle when she was only 14 and never told her family. She was afraid she would not be believed.

Mr. Speaker, I hid from my own mother the advances of a family "friend" when I was less than 12 years old.

With society's "blame the victim attitude", many women feel uncomfortable and embarrassed about telling anyone they have been abused. They fear they will not be believed and they blame themselves.

Front line rape crisis centre workers say only one in 20 women who contact them report the crime to the police. When they do, they are often put on trial every bit as much as the assailant.

We have seen recent stories of abuse in residential schools, orphanages, assaults which occurred up to 20 years ago. All the allegations made at the time were hushed up, covered up, and ignored. This is not the way to solve a serious problem in our society. We must talk about it. We must tell survivors of abuse that there is support for them, that they do not have to face this alone and face society alone. We must discuss the solutions and, more importantly, we must act on them.

I hope that the bill I have introduced will go a small way towards that, to call attention to the problem and to implement some solutions. I did not call it a day of remembrance and action for nothing. Without the action the bill is worthless.

There are very few women who are untouched by violence, women of all ages, of all physical types, from every culture, every racial group, every religious and socioeconomic background. All are assaulted. Disabled women and aboriginal women are particularly vulnerable to assault. Not only is there evidence to show that disabled women are more often the targets of abuse, but they are treated very poorly by the courts.

This year a man was acquitted of raping a deaf mute woman who kicked and fought him. She tried to defend herself. The man was acquitted because the deaf mute victim did not tell him that she did not want to have sex. How is a deaf mute woman supposed to verbalize that she does not want sex? Should not the kicking and the fighting be enough?

Sixty-two per cent of all women murdered in Canada are victims of domestic violence. Yet in Alberta, 911 operators would not send police to a house in which a man was beating down the door to rape a woman because they thought it was a domestic dispute.

One in four women is sexually assaulted. Others who have not been assaulted or harassed still feel fear when walking, particularly alone, at night.

This cycle of violence must be stopped. Marc Lepine grew up being beaten by his father. In one study, 25 per cent of the children in a shelter for battered women said it was okay for a man to hit a woman if the house was messy.

Violence against women is not natural behaviour, it is learned behaviour. We hold up violent heroes for young boys to emulate. We treat women with a lack of respect in the work place and in the home. Women are the butt of jokes. Women are used as objects to sell products. Women who succeed are often accused of sleeping their way to the top. I do not think anyone has accused a successful man of that.

Boys are given unrealistic expectations of what it means to be a man. Physical strength and power over others is seen as manly. Expressing one's feelings, taking care of others, resolving problems in a non-violent, supportive way, are not considered to be manly attributes. The bravado, the strutting and the machismo put on to male children hurts those male children, hurts women and hurts all of society. Children learn these attitudes all too well and the whole cycle of violence begins again.

Instead we need to teach children that every individual is different. There are men and women who are physically strong and men and women who are not. There are men and women who are intelligent and there men and women who are less so. Whatever you are, it does not make you better or a worse human being than anyone else.

The House of Commons subcommittee on the status of Women, of which I am a member, released many positive recommendations that received all party support at the subcommittee level. These included strong and consistent violence prevention and media literacy education in our schools across the country; gender equality issues should be part of the school curriculum in elementary, junior and high schools; mandatory gender equality training for judges and for the RCMP; and gender sensitivity training programs for members of Parliament. MPs decide which programs stay, which ones go, how money will be spent, what benefits people have. They have a direct impact on the lives of 26 million Canadians, over half of whom are women. I am sad to say that some members here do not have adequate knowledge and sensitivity to the problems women face to make those good decisions about women's lives.

Another recommendation was for an effective, affordable housing policy and to look into removing the assailant from the family home, rather than removing the victim from the home.

It called for a strong rape shield law and for the repeal of the honest belief defence for rapists. The subcommittee called for stronger gun control legislation. Most important, for the short term, the subcommittee called for adequate funding for services for abused women and children. Shelters for battered women are still turning away abused women and their children because of a lack of space.

We can start by restoring the funding to the Canada Assistance Plan which funds, among other social programs, shelters for battered women. We can take action on the subcommittee's recommendations now and not await until December 1992, when the Panel on Violence Against Women reports and probably restates many of the same recommendations that we made on the subcommittee.

I want to extend my warm appreciation to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women for her support and for ensuring the support of her party. I want to extend my appreciation also to the hon. member for Halifax, my friend, for her support and for her party's support and also to the House leader of the Bloc Quebecois for his party's support.

I would also like to thank my own New Democrat colleagues. I want to thank them for their understanding and for their support on these issues. I want to thank the people across Canada who have written some very wonderful letters to me, letters of encouragement and support.

Most of all I want to thank the women who have worked so hard all of these years, staffing shelters for battered women, raising funds for shelters for battered women; the women who have worked in rape crisis centres; and the women and men who have marched in the streets and have lobbied the government on issues of violence against women. These people, these caring men and women will be the real agents for change in our society. Without them, it will not happen.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in support of this bill to establish December 6 as a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

On December 6, 1989, 14 young women at the University of Montreal were killed by a gunman who did not know them but who singled them out because he hated women. The shock and the horror of the tragic event was felt throughout our country. This tragedy touched all Canadians, women and men alike. Many Canadians felt a personal sense of loss. Many Canadians, and particularly women, lost a sense of safety and security they had fell all their lives. Many Canadians saw in this brutal slaying an extreme example of the terror and the violence inflicted on women every day.

Violence against women takes many forms, including emotional and psychological abuse, physical assault, sexual assault and murder. It does not respect any boundaries but threatens women of all ages, cultures, backgrounds, abilities, geographical locations and economic situations.

Women centred violence exist in a continuum in our society that includes sexless jokes, pornography, harassment, prostitution, date violence, child abuse and incest.

The statistics on violence against women in Canada are shocking. One in ten Canadian women is assaulted by her male partner. One in four girls will be sexually assaulted before reaching the age of 18. Eighty per cent of aboriginal women have experienced violence and almost half of the disabled women in this country have been sexually abused during childhood, while 40 per cent have been raped, abused or assaulted as adults. Nor are elderly women free from violence. Female victims of elder abuse outnumber male victims two to one.

These statistics are considered only modest estimates. Many abused women and girls are often too ashamed or frightened of reprisal to speak out or seek help. Some victims try to bury the violence deep in their thoughts and deny its existence. They do not fully understand the deep-seated trauma that such violence inflicts and that it will, in all likelihood, stay with them for the rest of their lives.

We make a serious mistake if we think that the effects of this violence are strictly personal. Its legacy is widespread throughout our society. Not only do innocent victims pay the price long after the physical abuse is over, but we pay along with them.

When the results of this violence are chronic depression, high incidents of addictions and eating disorders, deliquency, crime and suicide, we all pay and our society is diminished by this cost.

I would like to quote the words of a Manitoba woman who, as a child, endured an estimated 2,600 incidents of sexual abuse at the hands of her father. She said: "My father took away my childhood. I still mourn for it and I will always miss the innocence. I will miss the opportunity to have the choices that were taken away from me. When I think back to certain situations I was put into as a child, I keep thinking to myself that poor little girl, that poor little girl".

Violence against women is a thief, stealing away the things that are most precious to us: love between husband and wife, trust between parent and child, the ability to live without fear, and a state of emotional health that allows us to enjoy and participate in life to the fullest.

Many of us take pride in our Canadian sense of equality and fair play. We have long believed we live in a progress society, one that places compassion and respect for people from all walks of life at the centre of our national ethos. But the tragedy at the Ecole Polytechnique and the violence that occurs daily in our homes and on our streets are reminders of how far we have yet to go.

Violence against women is deeply rooted in our society. It is based on attitudes and stereotypes that encourage the belief that women are subordinate to men. Stereotypical views hold that a man is the head of the household, that a woman must honour and obey her partner, and that children are to be seen and not heard. These stereotypical views create a serious imbalance between men and women and between adolescent males and females. On the other hand, men are expected to control and dominate; on the other hand, women and girls are expected to be dependent and vulnerable.

When such stereotypes combine with a societal tolerance for violence, the result is an exposure and sometimes deadly mixture: men who abuse their power, men who turn on those closest to them, men who use violence as a means of dealing with their anger and frustration.

It should come as no surprise to us, then, that women are kicked and slapped, hit with hard objects and cut with knives. It should come as no surprise that each year in Canada an average 100 women are murdered by their male partners or that in 1990 there were 27,000 reported incidents of sexual assault. It should come as no surprise that 14 innocent women could be brutally gunned down simply because they were women.

Canadians have long been tempted to look away, to say to themselves it is someone else's problem, and to believe that the dirty linen of domestic violence should not be aired in public. Some still assume that such violence should be dealt with behind closed doors.

However the truth is that violence against women is not someone else's problem. It is our problem. It belongs to all of us. When we look the other way, we become silent accomplices. When we think of violence as belonging to someone else, we deny our responsibility for its existence. When we do not want to air the dirty linen, we ignore the plight of the thousands of women who need our help and compassion.

When we hide violence behind closed doors we are guilty of encouraging the sexist view of women as persons who can be abused, raped and murdered. As long as some women are beaten by their husbands, as long as others are sexually assaulted on dates, as long as still others experience harassment at their jobs, women are being denied the basic right to security of person.

When a person is denied this basic right she suffers on many levels. She cannot walk the streets without being frightened. She cannot be safe in her home or at a university or in the work place. She cannot function without continually looking over her shoulder and worrying about the people with whom she has to deal.

There is a tragic link between violence against women and the inability of women in Canada to achieve equality in our society. Violence against women is deeply rooted in our socializing processes, our power structures and our institutions. This is a systematic problem touching on all aspects of our society including the justice system, the media, the health system, education and social services.

Equality for women goes hand in hand with the eradication of violence. Economic equality will provide women with the freedom to leave abusive situations and rebuild their lives and those of their children. Political equality will allow women to participate in decisions that affect their lives and the lives of their families. Societal equality is key to breaking down stereotypes and eliminating the traditional sexist attitudes that promote violence against women.

Our efforts to address violence against women must recognize the social, economic and political structures that currently confine women to unequal roles. At the same time, we must continue to find ways to expand the opportunities and choices available to women.

When Canadians learned about the massacre in Montreal they responded in many different ways. The government provided leadership and vision through its commitment to Canada's first national inquiry into violence against women and its $136 million renewal of the family violence initiative. In a struggle to eliminate violence against women the government recognizes that it is essential to co-ordinate our efforts with provincial and municipal governments, women's groups, service clubs, business and labour and professional associations.

Many Canadian organizations responded to the Montreal tragedy by a renewed commitment to opening career opportunities for women, particularly with respect to science and engineering. The Canadian Federation of University Women, Canadian Council of Engineers, Memorial Foundation, Societé Alfred Dallaire and the Ecole Polytechnique are among the organizations, institutions and corporations that have established scholarships in memory of the victims.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when tragedy invades our lives, we tend to react first with a feeling of horror, a feeling of helplessness, and over all the questioning as to why this has taken place. On that December night almost two years ago, a night that I think all of us will remember with exceptional clarity all of our lives, I remember the particular horror, the particular feeling of helplessness and over all the questioning as to why this had happened.

On that night in December it happened that I was dining with a group of my colleagues and one of our colleagues was late. As we waited for him we wondered why he was late. When he joined us he gave us the terrible news that was just then coming across the television screens and the radio airwaves in Canada. As he told us, one could tell in the crowded restaurant in Ottawa that the news was filtering to other tables, to other people. As we all remember, it seemed to deepen the horror that this took place in the pre-Christmas season when at least on the face of it we are all supposed to be mirroring a feeling of both peace on earth and good will toward all of humankind. When evil takes place, we are left with a feeling of what can we do, how can we combat it, but when good comes out of evil there is always a sense of accomplishment and a feeling that terrible as the originating event was, there is some sense of balance restored if some good takes place.

I think that in both the existence of this bill brought forward by my friend, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, and in the kind of co-operation that took place among the three parties in the House, from the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and, in some small part, from my own participation, we saw an indication of how a horror cannot be redressed, cannot be cured, cannot be obliterated, but can be the catalyst for something that will, in the long run, please God, improve what is a terrible situation.

The tragedy at Ecole Polytechnique was the most extreme symptom, result, reaction if you will, to an epidemic running not just through our country, but through world society. The fact that we have managed to grow a few blossoms on the graves of those wonderful young women who were cut down at the very beginning of what should have been wonderful and fulfilling lives sometimes does not seem as if it is nearly enough. And, of course, it is not nearly enough, it is just the first few steps of what must be concerted action.

This is a private member's bill supported by all parties and all of us in all parties are happy, I even say delighted, that this has taken place.

But, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby brought forward this bill, as she herself said in her speech, it is not just to have a day of remembrance, it is to have a day of action.

I am not going to go through a litany of the grotesqueries that have taken place against women just since I came into this House. My colleague has given a number of examples, examples that we are all too familiar with. My colleague from the government party talked about the fact that it is not something that can be confined to one particular cultural group, to one particular socio-economic class, to one particular geographic region, it is something that runs rampant throughout the world.

I think that there was always violence against women. I think this was one of the prices that women paid for being in the nurturing position, for being the maintainers of home and hearth and, therefore, not being those who provided the wherewithal for home and hearth and the protection.

I think that what has happened, particularly in the last 20 years, when we have seen the women's movement become, as many of us who have worked in it have always believed, perhaps the most cataclysmic drive for social change that this world has ever seen. It changes those things that many of us believe to be unchangeable, immutable and many of us feared changes to what we believed was immutable. Many of us feared it because it changed the way families are structured. It changed the way our daily, personal and private lives went on. That is why I say it was cataclysmic.

• (1150)

In the face of cataclysmic change, there is obviously going to be cataclysmic reaction.

Even though there was always violence against women, the influx of women into the work force, the changing of the face of national institutions such as this one—40 may not change the face and its features, but at least it changes it to a degree in its topography.

It frightens people and when people are frightened, they behave in a manner that is unacceptable. Sadly, in the case of this society and societies around the world, some of them are behaving in a manner that is lethal.

I applaud the government and most particularly the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women on the appointment of the blue ribbon panel. When I heard the names of the participants on this panel, I knew that their work would result in the kind of report on the issue of violence against women that all of us, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby and all women in the House, have been asked for in one form or another. Many men in the House as well have supported us on this.

That is only one aspect. I bring forward today, along with my support of this bill, two other areas that need government action. not through the avenue of private members, but through government policy.

The first is one that the government is working on, the House is dealing with, but that all of us are very, very concerned about. I refer to the whole question of gun control.

We all know that there are very strong feelings and opinions on both sides of the gun control issue, but there are certain facts that are just not changeable. They are there.

One fact is that in the case of spousal murder, guns are the single most common cause of death, the single most common. That has to be stopped and it can only be stopped by tougher gun control legislation, legislation with teeth.

The second area that has to be taken care of is that of the rape shield which fell last month under the Supreme Court of Canada. I agree with the Legal Education and Action Fund and with various other women's groups in this country that we do not wish the Minister of Justice to be precipit, because this is a difficult and challenging area of law.

We in this Chamber and the women and men of Canada, the vast majority of whom I know are supportive, need to hear that the minister is working on this, that women in fear of assault will have legislation to protect them.

In closing, I want to once again commend the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women and those men in all parties of this House who continue to be supportive of what is a mainstream, serious and frightening issue. It may be the single most serious issue that any of us have been called on to deal with in our political lives.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with my colleagues on all sides of the House in speaking just for a couple of minutes on this issue.

It is now two years since 14 young women were massacred in Montreal for the sole reason that they were pursuing a professional career that is stereotypically denoted as a man's job. While this killing justifiably evoked shock and outrage from people all across Canada, a silence surrounds the hundreds of women who are victims of domestic violence each year.

One in four Canadian women will be sexually assaulted in their lifetimes. While 12 per cent of women in Canada are assaulted each year by their partners, approximately 100 of these assaults result in death. The figures for reported sexual assault are assumed to be lower than the actual number of crimes against women committed each year. Many women choose not to report a crime because of the trauma and difficulty involved in prosecuting the assailant. At the moment the penalty for assault is often lower than that of breaking and entering. For example, a few years ago a 26 year old man received a suspended sentence for assaulting a 13 year old girl.

The government condones or appears to condone this warped priorization by failing to grant the necessary funding to women's groups which are working to end these crimes and to provide support for the victims.

Canada is a signatory to a United Nations document which recognizes the need to achieve a peaceful social environment for women that is compatible with human dignity.

Statistics show that most men who commit violence against women come from a background that encourages that type of behaviour. Thus education and positive preventative action is necessary to stop the vicious circle in which so many women and their families are entrapped.

The bill before the House this morning, and I congratulate my colleague for presenting this bill, represents a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. It would be a positive demonstration of our commitment to end this violence and grant women the right to safety in our society.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION ACT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order adopted Tuesday, September 17, 1991, and in accordance with Standing Order 100, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

The House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto—Mr. Loiselle—Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

—On clause 2: Definitions

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Resuming debate. The President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Chairman, today, members of the Public Service Alliance are back on strike. Services to the Canadian public—including services essential to safety and security—are being disrupted.

The government is therefore asking Parliament to enact the Public Sector Compensation Act and put an end to the strike.

On Friday, the head of the Public Service Alliance broke an agreement he had made with me on September 17, not to strike as long as negotiations continued. This action, Mr. Chairman, is most unfortunate. Only 13 days ago, the parties agreed to return to the table, without preconditions, and to make every reasonable effort to reach a settlement.

During this past week, negotiators on both sides held a total of 35 meetings at the various bargaining tables. Treasury Board negotiators bargained seriously and in good faith, Mr. Chairman, and I say this with no hesitation. The offers we brought to the tables were reasonable and within the government wage restraint policy.

The government's wage policy, Mr. Chairman, is well known and has not changed—it was announced in the Budget last February. Its details are a matter of record and familiar to most members of this House. They form part of a series of measures announced in the Budget to bring the country out of the recession while containing the deficit and inflation.

These measures, I may recall, included capping payments to the provinces, freezing total federal program spending, reducing the number of managers, setting inflation targets and constraining wages.

On June 19, before the summer recess, I advised the House that we could not afford to negotiate any increase in wages this year.

[English]

I want to remind hon. members that whatever views they may hold on the current situation with the alliance, the government and the country are faced with a fiscal situation that must be addressed. We owe it to the Canadian public to live within the measures announced in the February budget. The deficit and inflationary pressures must both be contained so that interest rates can be brought down and economic recovery can continue.

The measures announced in the budget are working. The recovery has begun and it is now being jeopardized by the strike. I can sympathize with the alliance leadership and understandably they are unhappy with the government's zero and three per cent wage offer.

I said in June, and I repeat today, that the government's offer is not very palatable to the Public Service unions any more than it has been to the government. Yet, we have signed agreements with other unions which have taken what I believe is a very responsible approach. They chose to negotiate settlements within the government's wage restraint program. In doing this, they have agreed to join the ranks of public servants in four other provinces, and that must not be forgotten, that have a wage policy of zero per cent for at least 12 months and, in some cases, for two years.

The Public Service Alliance may be the reason Parliament is now considering passage of Bill C-29, but this union has not been singled out in our application of zero and three. Everyone is subject to the zero, three program.

As I stated in the House last week, performance pay is being suspended for 1991-92, not only for senior management, but for Governor in Council appointees, including the heads of Crown corporations.

• (1210)

When combined with the freeze in salary for this year, the suspension of performance pay results in an average reduction of 5 per cent in compensation for this group of employees. These are harsh, but necessary, measures in times of restraint.

The question of wage restraint, Mr. Chairman, has been a most difficult issue for the Public Service Alliance. We knew it would be and I personnaly wish that the government could offer more money to its employees.

As I have said on numerous occasions, 0 and 3 is not what our employees deserve, and it is certainly not a measure of their contribution to public service. It is, however, all that Canadian taxpayers can afford.

Knowing that the government must remain firm in its resolve to restrain spending, we have been as generous as we could in offering to improve the benefits to employees. The offer we placed on the table last week provided for substantial improvements in areas important to the Alliance, such as employment security and protecting the purchasing power of certain groups of employees.

We offered improved benefits in many other areas, and I wish to review these for hon. members, Mr. Chairman, because there is evidence of the very serious efforts Treasury Board has made to reach a fair and reasonable settlement.

My strong preference has always been to negotiate rather than legislate, and I provided our negotiators with the best possible mandate that we could provide as a responsible government under the circumstances. The Public Service Alliance has been greatly concerned about the employment security of its members, especially as it relates to future contracting out and privatization. I think that the concern has been overstated, because the federal government's Work Force Adjustment Policy is one of the best employment protection plans in Canada. About one half of one per cent of employees have lost their jobs through work force adjustment.

[English]

The policy provides six months' notice of loss of a job, and employees are given priority for other jobs in the Public Service for which they are qualified or can be retrained.

Retraining can be given for up to two years. Even after being laid off, employees retain their priority for new Public Service job openings for one year. We know of very few other employers, if any, which provide better employment security.

Yet the alliance is asking for more guarantees. In an effort to reach a settlement, we put more guarantees on the table. We told the alliance that we were prepared to guarantee the employment of employees whose jobs are transferred to the private sector as a result of contracting out or privatization.

We also said that those who choose to work for the contractors would receive six months' salary to compensate for lower benefits in the private sector. Finally, we said that a reasonable job offer would be made to any other employees affected by work force adjustments.

On another matter, the alliance argued that some employees would be seriously affected by the zero per cent this year, and that employees earning higher incomes are more easily protected from the increases in the cost of living.

We responded to this concern by offering a one time lump sum payment of $500 to all indeterminate employees in the Public Service earning less than $27,000 a year, which is roughly equal to the average earned income in Canada at the present time.

Some 35,000 employees would qualify for this payment.

The Alliance complained that the government was not commited to the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. This is a complex issue that we have worked hard with all unions to resolve.

In January 1990, when the Alliance withdrew from a joint study and when we saw that the outcome was being delayed further, we decided to go ahead and pay out retroactive lump-sum payments of $317 million to 73,400 Public Service employees. Equalization adjustments worth $81 million continue to be paid yearly.

These were the amounts, Mr. Chairman, that, based on current data, the government calculated to be required under the equal pay for work of equal value provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Because the method of calculation is presently under dispute before a human rights tribunal, the payments were not being incorporated into salary, but provided as seperate equalization payments. However, Mr. Chairman, in an effort to reach a settlement, we offered to incorporate these equalization payments into the base salaries of our clerks and secretaries. Doing this would provide these employees with a larger salary base from which future salary increases would be calculated, giving them more money and, eventually, a better pension.

[English]

Treasury Board offered improved benefits in other areas. It offered to pay 100 per cent of the premiums of the Public Service health care plan. It offered to raise the level of reimbursements claimable under the dental plan. It offered to increase the employer's contribution to the premium for disability insurance to 85 per cent from 75 per cent. It offered to increase the number of work place day care centres to 15 from 10. It offered to improve, among other things, vacation leave, shift and weekend premiums and meal allowances.

There is only a limited amount of money available. The cost of any improved benefits would have to be paid out of the departmental budgets established at the time of the last budget. For this year, it would mean that some departments would have to reduce their rate of hiring to replace public servants who retire.

We made, I am convinced, the best offer that a responsible government can make today. To the alliance, it is not enough. We must not forget that the country faces a $400 billion national debt. The interest on that debt amounts to more than $40 billion a year. The cupboard is bare and the alliance is calling for a mediator. The cupboard is bare and the alliance is asking for more.

The wages and benefits that federal employees currently enjoy are a cut above that of the average Canadian worker. Employees represented by the alliance earn an average salary of $33,500 a year, including equal pay, compared to a national average earned income of $27,100. They have a pension plan that is fully indexed to the cost of living. They enjoy, as I mentioned earlier, one of the highest levels of employment security in Canada, and their over-all benefits are at least comparable to other major employers.

This week Treasury Board is publishing in newspapers across the country an outline of the offer that the alliance rejected. The government has a responsibility to Canadians who must be made aware of the serious efforts we made to reach a negotiated settlement.

• (1220)

It is important that Canadians understand the kind of wages and benefits federal employees already enjoy. It is important because the government and all Canadians have endured serious disruptions in service earlier this month, disruptions that began again this weekend as the alliance called its members back to the picket lines.

These disruptions put safety and security at risk, and jeopardize economic recovery. I have already reported to this House that grain terminals could no longer handle this year's harvest, that businesses were facing imminent layoffs because of delivery delays, and essential services were being affected.

We cannot allow these disruptions to resume. The Public Service Alliance of Canada is unwilling to accept the best offer that can be made. The Government must therefore assume its responsibility and legislate an end to the strike.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: Hon. members are already familiar with Bill C-29. We debated its provisions in this House not two weeks ago. I will therefore be brief in reviewing its provisions.

Bill C-29 would extend all collective agreements and compensation plans, so that all strike activities will become illegal. All employees would have to return to work or they could face fines of up to $1,000 a day. Union representatives could be fined as much as $50,000 a day and union itself, $100,000 a day.

As I indicated earlier, the legislation would ensure that everyone is subject to the 0-3 program. This includes the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators, Parliamentary staff, the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The heads and employees of other government bodies that are non-commercial in nature and not normally self-financing are also covered.

The wages of two groups—the Auditing Group and the Computer Systems Administration Group—would be adjusted for the period preceding the current fiscal year, but increases would be limited to zero and three per cent for the following years.

The agreements signed with four unions—agreements that, I am happy to say, are within the 0-3 guidelines—would not be changed by C-29. The bill excludes benefits and services provided under the terms arrived at through the National Joint Council, a union-management consultative body. In this way, Treasury Board can continue to discuss them with all the unions.

[English]

Many of the improvements contained in the offer to the alliance relate to items normally discussed at the National Joint Council. These include improvements to health insurance, disability insurance and the dental plans. These improvements were not accepted by the alliance and will not be included in the legislation. To give due regard to the consultative process set up through the National Joint Council, we would like to extend for 30 days the work force adjustment policy and bring these matters back to the National Joint Council and discuss them with all Public Service unions.

The other improvements contained in the offer to the Public Service Alliance would normally be lost to employees. The government is prepared, however, to make one exception. The government agrees that it is easier for higher income earners to protect themselves from cost of living increases when their salaries are frozen.

I am prepared to provide for a one time $500 lump sum payment to all indeterminate employees earning less than $27,000 a year. The cost of this provision will be absorbed within existing departmental budgets.

I am sure that hon. members will agree that these employees deserve special consideration and I urge them to vote in favour of this amendment.

In conclusion, the Public Sector Compensation Act is based on the premise that all of us working in the public sector should contribute to national economic recovery. Because of current economic conditions, the government cannot offer more.

It is unfortunate that we were unable to reach a settlement and had to resort to legislation. Parliamentarians, the Canadian public and our employees, the vast majority of whom are hard working and dedicated to public service, hope for a negotiated settlement.

We must now turn our attention to the task of bringing order back to the Public Service. I ask for the co-operation of all members in ensuring speedy passage of this legislation.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I understand from the rules that because we are in Committee of the Whole members get a maximum of 20 minutes to either raise questions or to make statements and, in this particular instance, the President of the Treasury Board to clarify certain aspects of his remarks.

I would like to begin my remarks by asking the minister if he can confirm or deny as to whether over the weekend representatives of the union attempted to get in contact with him for the purposes of exploring various avenues which were open to both parties concerning this particular dispute.

While the minister is on his feet, will he indicate to the House as to why he and his representatives were not available to respond to the concerns raised by the other side?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to answer this question. You will recall, as I stated in my opening remarks, that on September 17 we came to an arrangement between the union and Treasury Board, an arrangement that was so positive that all sides in this House agreed that we would postpone legislating and give negotiation a chance to succeed.

We proceeded in good faith. We had during the week 35 meetings at different tables. We made on Thursday evening two new offers and we expected them to be considered. We did not walk away from the table. PSAC did and called a strike, thereby changing the terms under which we had agreed to go back to the table unilaterally. Under those circumstances we felt that it did not act in good faith and we have to go back to the original plan and legislate.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, the minister has confirmed for members of the House that by his very answer, or lack of details and precision in his answer, representations were made to him over the weekend and that the minister as President of the Treasury Board, who stood in this Chamber not more than a week ago and talked about examples of bargaining in good faith, did not make himself available this weekend, or his staff members, to entertain any proposals from the other side in order that there might be a resolution of this particular issue.

I am somewhat puzzled and annoyed that the President of the Treasury Board would not avail himself of every opportunity to try to bring some peace and dignity to the collective bargaining process.

It does not stop there. I understand that the minister would like to be part and parcel of this debate. He will have his opportunity to participate in the debate. We would love to hear from the minister in his usual colourful language.

I want to put on the record that it was not all that long ago that a decision was made by the Public Service Staff Relations Board which charged that this government and this minister were bargaining in bad faith.

Mr. Loiselle: That is not true.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. minister says: "That is not true". He will have an opportunity to explain the raison d'être of that particular decision and how it affects the collective bargaining process between the government on the one hand and members of the Public Service on the other hand.

The minister knows very well that they have been bargaining in bad faith. What they offered to the unions to go back to the bargaining table was nothing more than a sham to buy time so that they could come back into this House and provoke a situation across this country. That underlines the Tory agenda. I stood in this Chamber not more than 10 days ago and said as much as that and now, today, we have clear, unequivocal evidence that we are in that kind of situation as viewed by the decisions and the actions of the President of the Treasury Board.

I want to ask the minister a second question. Can he share with members of this House the amendments that are being rumoured in terms of what he intends to amend in this particular statute?

I am fully aware that he does not have to do that until we get into a clause-by-clause situation, but I ask the minister this because members of the government House leader's office have been informing us that we will be receiving copies of the amendments which the minister intends to table on the floor of the House of Commons. Could we hear those amendments?

Mr. Loiselle: I suppose the hon. member finds some comfort in listening to himself. I could very easily ask him to telephone the president of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and ask him: "Did you or did you not find the government acting in bad faith?" His answer will be no.

He was asked two questions by the union: did the government act in bad faith and, second, did we make every reasonable effort? The board said we have acted in good faith but we had not made every reasonable effort.

We said: "Okay, let's find a way to go beyond that". We were convinced we had made every reasonable effort: 90 days or 60 days of negotiations, 30 days of conciliation with a union that had started initially, the day after the budget, by saying that "this is a political fight. We will never accept it. We want to fight the government".

We tried to bring back the discussion. As for offers that he described as sham, I would like him to go and tell Canadians, the 146,000 of them who lost their jobs—they have been asking questions about them for the last few weeks—how they would like to accept these offers, all of them.

Do he realize that last year only 230,000 some Canadians tried to enter this terribly badly mistreated Public Service! I tell him that our Tory agenda is to try to get the finances of this country in order; not to destroy the Public Service but to protect it. If we had continued going the Liberal way it would have been disastrous for them, by putting our fiscal situation in order at the time of recession, by doing what other Liberal governments have done. We have negotiated. They have not. They have legislated. We spent 90 days at the table. They have legislated the first day, good Liberal governments. It is because the situation is difficult, and this is what we are faced with. We are committed to try not to raise taxes, not increase the deficit and get the economy to pick up again.

As for the amendments, I do not have the definite list here but I can say that they are reasonably minor. One of them would allow me to proceed with what I have said I would like to do: have this lump sum payment of $500 because the act would otherwise prevent it. There is an amendment which deals with a mistake in conciliation in the French version. It allows me basically to first define compensation.

We are now negotiating with some of our other employees while this bill is in front of the House, until such time as it receives Royal Assent, to continue these negotiations and possibly come to terms. We are bringing in an amendment to correct an oversight in the French version, line 31. We would complete the list of new separate employers because since the bill was printed two new ones have come on stream—it is a minor thing again—the Canadian Polar Commission and the Federal Office of Regional Development. These are the minor amendments we intend to introduce.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note that the minister now says on the floor of the House of Commons that it is their intention not to raise any new taxes for the purposes of additional revenue.

May I remind the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues on the front benches that since 1984 there has been a proliferation of taxes on Canadians across this country numbering some 33 new tax increases.

When the minister stands in his place and makes the suggestion that it is not their intention to raise any taxes and that they are concerned about the public purse and the management of the Canadian economy, I can only say that it is not very believable coming from the President of the Treasury Board.

There was a period of time some years ago when the Canadian economy was flourishing at a phenomenal rate, but there was no decrease in the debt of the national government.

An hon. member: It was not the deficit.

Mr. Dingwall: Now the hon. minister behind him says: "It was not the deficit". They like to change their line of argument when it comes to dealing with individuals.

Second, this minister seems to think that he knows all the answers or would like to know all the answers when it comes to dealing with the unemployed. There are many constituencies in this country that have unemployed.

I suggest to the minister that by playing this group off against another group does very little to enhance morale in the Public Service. It does very little to enhance any economic opportunities outside the Public Service.

To make this catcall that there are all sorts of individuals out there who would like to have these jobs, we all know that. The question is: Why has the government provoked an unnecessary strike on the Canadian people? Why has the government done that?

While the minister is on his feet—because I know my time is limited—would he indicate how many of his cronies, his fat cat friends are going to be receiving their bonuses and the magnitude of their bonuses? What will they be? Will he explain that to the Canadian people?

Mr. Loiselle: I have great respect for the hon. member. I hope he will not get into the habit of throwing away things like that which finally tend to disgrace this place.

I am trying to explain fairly what the opposition is. I do not expect him to agree; I know that from the start. He can throw numbers around and try to convince people of things that are wrong.

I will start with his last question. I have said in this House that the government policy at budget time was that everybody would get a zero year. I have said in this House that from April 1, 1991 to April 1, 1992 everybody will have a zero year and those who get a bonus will not get it. They will get zero per cent for that year. That will come of course at the end of the year because the committee sits then. It will come when it is due. They will not get it anyway.

Second, he talks about raising taxes. Should we have taken the Liberal approach to budget making or to fiscal policy? If we had followed the same route, where would our deficit be? It would be $100 billion. Where would our debt be? It would be $700 billion.

We have change the course by cutting $30 billion. Of course we have put the taxes in order. We have made cuts which were opposed each time by the opposition, all of it. We have tried to get our House in order. Each time it was never the right cut, and we managed to get as much income as possible. We have made good progress so that in a few years' time we will not need to borrow any more. It is a tough problem because of what you made of our fiscal situation.

As far as playing one group against another, I would like to remind the hon. member that we are not playing any group. We are asking everyone to contribute his or her share. Is it being against the union to announce to our managers that we will abolish 10 per cent of their positions? Is it being against the union to announce to the provinces that we would cut the growth of transfers for the following year? Is it against the union to put some order, to freeze our operating budgets?

We are asking everyone to make an effort. We did it so as to send out a signal to the others that there was some concern about the recession. There is too much government spending. Obviously, when you have to pay $40 billion interest on your debt, you have a major problem.

We sent out this message, and it was well received because good sound Liberal governments have done the same. Basically this government has tried to be consistent and do a very difficult and unpopular job of getting public finances in order.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Chairman, in his opening remarks the minister alluded, in response to a question, to the offer was made to members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Can he confirm that he will continue to put on the table the $500 lump sum payment to approximately 35,000 employees? Will he guarantee employment for employees whose jobs were transferred to the private sector, the improved benefits including those for the dental, health insurance, disability insurance, vacation leave, shift premiums, et cetera, as well as payments totalling $81 million a year?

Will the minister agree that that will be included in his amendments?

Mr. Loiselle: Should I? It does not seem to be a very good offer. You call it a sham.

An hon. member: That is right, and now he wants it assured.

Mr. Loiselle: Maybe I should withdraw it. If he had listened to me, I said just a little while ago that we are prepared to pay the $500 because we find that reasonable, but we will find the money from within the operating budget.

All the other issues can be dealt with. It is provided for in the bill, through the NJC. We will do it then and discuss with all unions the job security issue and the other issues.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board said in his remarks that the chair of the Public Service Staff Relations Board did not find him in fact to have bargained in bad faith.

I would suggest that was the minister's interpretation of the ruling that the chair of the Public Service Staff Relations Board made and not the widely held interpretation.

The minister spoke of citizen safety. I have never, in 30 years as a worker who has worked in the area of collective bargaining, seen an employer who has been so provocative, who has been so sinister, who has been so double dealing as the negotiators from the employer's side in this dispute.

Last Friday the minister said Mr. Bean broke his agreement with the government. In fact, last Friday Daryl Bean from my office, late in the afternoon, spent three hours attempting to reach the minister. During a number of those hours we were aware that the minister was on the third floor of this very building. Mr. Bean wanted to speak to the minister about negotiations, about a new package, and the minister refused.

There have been a large number of people over the weekend who have attempted in fact to arrange for a meeting, or at least discussions between the union and the employer over the weekend so that we could in fact avoid this process we are going through today.

There was a call by Shirley Carr to the Minister for International Trade who assured her that he would in fact pass the message on to the minister. There was a call from Jack Munro who is going to a convention in Toronto today. He was most concerned and called Mr. Spector and was assured that the minister would be advised. Our own leader's office attempted to reach the minister on Friday night.

On Friday, at a meeting between Mr. Capello and Daryl Bean in the evening, there was a meeting set for 2 p.m. on Saturday for further discussions and negotiations. Mr. Capello went to the telephone and returned and said he did not have a mandate to pursue the negotiations and come to the bargaining table on Saturday. This was in spite of the fact that Mr. Bean on Friday night had advised Mr. Capello that he had in fact a new proposal to put before the minister.

I think that the question that was asked by my hon. colleague, the House leader for the Liberals, was a very fair and a very legitimate question. That question was: Did the minister get those messages and, if in fact he got the messages, why did he choose not to make any effort to try and resolve this dispute until it became full blown again today?

There was a meeting on Sunday that the minister spoke to me about earlier, but that meeting was not with Mr. Capello nor with the minister. That meeting was with Mr. Ian Deans of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, who does not have a mandate to negotiate.

Although Mr. Bean had told the minister and told Mr. Capello that he had a new proposal to put on the table, this government took this dispute, put it into the political forum, and then took the weekend off.

I would ask the minister to explain to Canadian people, to this House, and to the Public Service Alliance how, when so much was at stake in this country, the government side could take the weekend off.

The minister said he preferred to negotiate rather than legislate. He said it a few minutes ago in his remarks. We just outlined a whole weekend of people, parliamentarians, people from the labour movement, the President of the Public Service Alliance, and heaven knows who else, who have urged this minister, through various people, to come to the bargaining table. This minister has the temerity to get up in this House and expect us to believe that he would rather negotiate than legislate.

The minister spoke about a one time lump sum for all those earning less than $27,000. He was speaking rather quickly, but I think he said less than $27,000. That would be 35,000 employees.

What about the other 120,000 employees who work for this government? Is the minister seriously suggesting that he expects the union to accept worker pitted against worker? Does he expect the union to accept a proposal that includes 35,000 people, but excludes 120,000 people? Does the minister sincerely believe that any union negotiator could take that back to their membership and expect a ratification? If the minister knows so much about collective bargaining, I find it very hard to believe that he would believe that that was possible.

The minister spoke about equal pay for work of equal value and lump sum payments. That is laudable. I really appreciate that the minister believes in the concept of equal pay for work of equal value. If that is the case, I would like to ask the minister another question: Will he withdraw this government's appeal to the Human Rights Board of the equal pay for work of equal value decision?

The minister talked about Treasury Board improving benefits. I share the question of the member from the Liberal Party who asked whether those benefits would be incorporated into this bill.

The minister spoke about the cost of any improved benefits which would have to come out of departmental budgets. I would ask the minister if that means there will be job losses as a result of those improvements coming through departmental budgets.

The Treasury Board ads this weekend say what the union walked away from. I would suggest that the minister should have a meeting with the Public Service Alliance and see what the minister has refused to look at coming from the union.

The minister referred to safety and security being at risk and that the union is unwilling to accept the best offer that can be made. Surely the minister would, at the very least, take a look at what the union's offer is.

If the minister is not willing to take a look at this offer, we can only conclude that the minister has another agenda, and it is not bargaining with the Public Service Alliance of Canada. I would suggest that the other agenda is a fight for the hearts and the minds of the Canadian people, and that it is a cynical, devious way to impose its will on every group within the public sector: those who were at the table and those who were not, those who are unionized and those who are not, including the RCMP, the military, CSIS and a three-page list of others.

I think it is time for the minister to fess up and not try and fool the Canadian people about what his agenda is. I would, as the last question in this part of my intervention, ask the minister if he does have an alternate agenda to get this legislation through so that he has everybody encompassed, not just the Public Service Alliance?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the president of PSAC was in the hon. member's office when he decided, as an answer to our latest proposal, to go on strike.

No? Well he must have been very close then, from what I hear.

We did not leave the table, PSAC did. We made offers on Thursday evening and the following day. As an answer, they went out on strike. We took it that our offer did not seem to be agreeable to them and, therefore, we said: "What choice do we have?"

We had an arrangement. They say we have new proposals now. We had been at this for 90 days before the strike. We had 35 meetings last week, extensive meetings at many tables. Where were these offers? It sounds a little strange to me that suddenly some new offers would emerge that would be acceptable.

Mr. Bean knew, before we went back to the negotiations, exactly what our position was. We said that we had a limited margin of manoeuvre but we would do everything we could to make it as positive as possible, and that is what we did. We do not seem to be able to reconcile this with his request. Therefore, we have no choice but to proceed with the bill.

The hon. member says: "I have never seen an employer who acts in such a provocative way." I could give you names of dozens of employers who had to lay off people all over Canada.

Some hon. members: Let's hear them.

Mr. Loiselle: They were in a much better financial position than we are. We have a debt of $400 billion, and a deficit of $30 billion, and we are trying, all around our budget, to try to make these cuts and lower the deficit as we have been over the last few years.

The hon. member said that at the last minute Mr. Bean wanted to make offers. Well, I personally found it rather surprising that he decided to go on strike at ten o'clock on Friday, and to learn, as we are still at the table, on television that the negotiations are over. We did not break the negotiations, he did. Now he can always claim that he could have acted otherwise, but I do not agree with that.

The hon. member says that we are pitting members against members and we may have a secret agenda. We have only one agenda. It is to try to get the finances of this government and of the country in order. It is a difficult agenda. It makes for very, very difficult decisions that affect everybody. Of course, it is at a time when we are in a recession, as we were at budget time, where we knew there would be some recovery in the summer and early fall, but that could be threatened by governments losing control over their finances, because during a recession you have more money going out and less coming in. But these are considerations we took into account. We also saw that there was a great threat to the inflation path, which is a great menace to our employees and to our workers. So we decided to send out a clear signal, to set inflation targets, and to act accordingly.

One of the greatest threats in the analysis that was made of the over–all economy was that the unit labour cost had increased by 25 per cent in Canada over the last few years, compared to zero in the United States, and we were not being competitive.

Therefore, we decided that as part of a package, dealing with managers, transfers, and operating budgets, we would ask our employees to make an additional sacrifice, thereby sending a message which was received.

Most provinces have taken difficult decisions. Some of them have gone beyond. They have not negotiated, as we have, and tried to get the best possible deal. They have legislated. In some instances, zero per cent for two years. Therefore, I consider that we acted, not in a provocative way, but in a responsible way.

The member referred to equal pay for work of equal value. I am glad that she recognized that this government, at least, has done something very important to conform itself to the law, by giving, in one lump sum payment again, $370 million, which is a considerable effort in our present circumstances.

Then we said that we would continue to contribute to some 75,000 employees $81 million a year. This is our analysis of our commitments.

The member asked: "Will you withdraw your appeal"? What are we appealing? We disagree very strongly with an interpretation that has been given of the meaning of these principles which were approved by the House. We are just trying to get confirmation that our interpretation is right. This is what we are doing.

The alternative proposal would cause a lot of ratcheting, where averages would be made, and would cause all kinds of destruction within the system. We feel that is not at all what the House intended. Therefore, we are proceeding in a way we think is right.

We say that we will be taking these additional resources for the $500 one time, lump sum payments out of the operating budgets, and that some positions will be threatened. Of course. I do not disagree with that. Do we start printing money, borrowing more money, or raising taxes? We are trying to manage within our existing resources. It is tough, but we are doing it. It will mean that posts will stay there, but they will not be filled as quickly as they would otherwise. We will try to come up with these sums through a better allocation of the existing resources.

Again, I would repeat that when the member says we have not made every reasonable effort over the weekend, I would ask where she has been over the last few months. We have been at the table for 60 days. We have been at conciliation 30 days. We went back and stayed for 35 different meetings and not one offer came from PSAC.

In the still of the night, having decided to go back on strike against the solemn agreement we had reached in my office, she says maybe we should sit down and talk. Well, I do not agree with that at all. I think the only way now is for us to legislate.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the minister answered one or two of my questions. I noted that he referred to everything I referred to, but chose not to answer most of what I asked.

I want to make it perfectly clear to the minister that when I referred to Daryl Bean being in my office, I referred to him being in my office on Friday, late in the afternoon. The minister said to me, earlier today, that he was aware that letters went out from the union on Thursday. Do not try to confuse when anybody made decisions about things, or when people decided to start bargaining or not to bargain.

The minister said he wanted to make it clear that he thought it was unfortunate that the union brought in a last minute offer. Well, I would think that if the minister has ever been to the bargaining table: "It ain't over until it is over". People continue to try until the last minute to avoid a labour dispute.

Mr. Bean called a strike, which is very usual. He has a legal right to call a strike and he then had an offer.

• (1300)

All the way through bargaining people change their offers based on what gets put in front of them, what will fly, what will not fly. It is not unusual to have new offers all the way through bargaining to take something and try to change it, massage it so that it will be acceptable to the other side.

The minister should not try to infer that they are the only puritans here who ever tried to settle this dispute.

The minister referred to the Human Rights Commission and that he wanted to make sure his interpretation was right instead of the Human Rights Commission's decision. It is so like this government. If it does not like the Human Rights decision, it appeals it. If it does not like the conciliation, it ignores it. If it does not like the union, then it hammers it.

I think what is important here is for us to take a look at why we are at this point in this dispute. I would really like an answer from the minister: Was it his plan to end up having this legislation passed so that he could encompass everyone and not just the Public Service Alliance?

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, this is obviously a somewhat philosophical disagreement. The hon. member is giving me pointers on how to conduct bargaining. I would point out that, last Thursday night, we tabled new and improved proposals and that, as far as we were concerned, Mr. Bean had gone to consult with his membership and would be back to let us know what they said. The decision was his to go on TV at 10 o'clock on Friday to advise us that they were going on strike.

He chose to put an end to the bargaining process, which I deplore because we did try to bargain. Sixty days of bargaining following the tabling of the Budget, 30 days of conciliation, 35 meetings during which the union obviously never intended to accept the government wage policy. As a matter of fact, Mr. Bean stated publicly: "This is no ordinary strike. It is a political strike. We are after the government's skin." Still, we did not make a fuss. We said: "Listen, he is entitled to his opinion. We will give it a try." We could have done like several provincial governments and refuse to bargain, but now we are being blame for not having bargained enough. Those governments, Liberals and others, legislated zero per cent wage increases on the very day of the Budget and, in some instances, reopened collective agreements that had already been signed. And now they come and take us to task! They imposed zero per cent settlements for two years and they come and give us a lecture! And we are told that it was provocation to act responsibly in the administration of our budget! Go and ask the Canadian people who were laid off these last few months how they would feel about accepting such offers. And how do you explain that 234,000 people applied last year to join this public service of Canada which treats its employees so poorly according to the hon. member?

We have bargained in good faith. Mr. Bean gave his answer when he announced they were going on strike. Now, our answer to him is: "We had an understanding. If you strike, we will legislate you back to work. The strike is on and so is the legislative process.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Chairman, I want to make some introductory comments and ask some information of the minister before moving an amendment to clause 2. It seems to be something that the minister himself has failed to deal with in the amendments that he has suggested will be moved.

I want to go back to the process. Some time earlier this year, five, six, seven months ago, depending on the particular group in question, the government was in a position to negotiate with its employees. The minister keeps saying that it did negotiate. He tries to deny that the Public Service Staff Relations Board made a finding of bargaining in bad faith.

I can only quote from the findings of the Public Service Staff Relations Board: "The insistence on conditions precedent to negotiating terms and conditions of employment at the bargaining table is incompatible with the requirement to make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement. Accordingly, the board declares that the employer has acted contrary to section 51 of the act and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the act".

That is precisely what bad faith bargaining is. The board ordered this government to comply with the law of Canada. The government instead chose to use this decision and its legal obligation to go back to the bargaining table as a bargaining tool, another sledge-hammer to hold over peoples' heads to force them back to the bargaining table under conditions which would see the bill that is now before us passed very quickly, with little debate and with no amendments.

An hon. member: Send the Tories packing.

Mrs. Catterall: The key issue here is that problems should be resolved by talking. The minister has refused, as President of the Treasury Board, to speak directly to the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada since last week.

He has not returned calls from the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, whose responsibility it is to make sure this system works. Mr. Deans is chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and is anxious to offer his services in an attempt to reach a fair settlement here without having to resort to strikes and back to work legislation.

The government has adamantly refused to take a reasonable step of appointing a mediator who might shine some light on this situation, who might actually lead us through the tunnel to a conclusion.

An hon. member: Where is the mediator, Gilles?

Mrs. Catterall: One has to ask why the government refuses to appoint a mediator. I can only conclude that it is precisely for that reason that it does not want light shed on this situation, that it does not want an objective view of the situation made available to the Canadian public which can then determine whether the government is acting fairly. I believe it has already passed judgment on that.

People know it is not fair when somebody earning $500,000 gets a bonus of $80,000, which is equivalent to the full and entire salary of four Public Service employees.

I want to touch on a few things that the minister has touched on before I come to some questions. I want to touch on this very generous "$500" that is being offered to the lowest paid employees.

I wonder if the minister when he responds to some of these points can tell us why he thinks it is fair that somebody earning $26,999 under his offer would get a signing bonus of $500, but the person earning $27,000, one dollar more, would get no such bonus. The person earning $26,9999 ends up earning more than the person earning $27,000. That seems like a little bit of an "Alice in Wonderland" scenario and perhaps the minister could explain it to some extent.

An hon. member: That is Tory economics.

Mrs. Catterall: The minister knows perfectly well that $500 on a $20,000 income that gets spent entirely on goods and services that a family needs—you do not have any money to save and you have no money for luxuries—does not pay the increase in costs brought about by the goods and service tax for that same family or individual in the past year.

The minister also knows perfectly well that if people were out on strike for a matter of seven days, the savings to the government were far more than the cost of that $500. The savings were far more.

Members across the way keep shouting: "Where are we going to get the money, where are we going to get the money to treat people responsibly who are responsible for no more in their payroll than 3 per cent of the entire national budget".

I guess I would ask the minister to look at the other 88 per cent of the budget and say: "Are these the people who really have to carry the burden of this government's mismanagement of the economy?"

In six consecutive budgets this government, increasingly tightening the ratchet, has said to the people: "We are going to get rid of public servants", and it brags about cutting 90,000 jobs and affecting 34,000 individuals, "we are going to restrain their pay so that they are losing money against inflation." They are actually losing purchasing, not just staying even. That is going to solve the government's deficit and debt.

People might have believed that in the government's first budget in 1988 or its second budget in 1989 or its third one in 1990, but by 1991 and 1992 they are starting to get a little suspicious that this government does not know what it is doing. It keeps proposing the same solutions and it never solves the problem. The problem continues but it keeps proposing more extreme versions of the same solution.

Anybody who has not been able to solve the problem in six years knows it is time to start looking for another solution.

I would like to hear the minister explain why the employees of the government get nothing this next year, but people on contract—and people on contract are earning more than the entire payroll of the Public Service Alliance—have no limits placed on them. I would like to hear the minister's explanation for that.

Finally, I want to talk about pay equity. I make it absolutely clear that for the Liberal Party, pay equity is not negotiable. I resent, on behalf of every woman in Canada, that this government is placing pay equity on the bargaining table to be bargained away in exchange for other benefits. This is a legal right that women in Canada have, the right to equal pay for work of equal value.

We will be proposing amendments that require Treasury Board to immediately implement a roll into salary of those equalization payments which it has been making to women instead of full wages and salaries in recognition of the work they do and to, within a year, fully implement pay equity.

There are a number of issues that will be raised, but given that we are now on clause 2, I want to talk particularly about the bonuses. The minister has done an absolutely phenomenal amount of skating in the last week, having introduced a bill just two weeks ago that specifically exempts bonuses and any other type of premium differential, other emolument or benefits paid in respect of circumstances specified by the Treasury Board, i.e. $80,000 extra for people who are already making $500,000. I did not hear him mention, and maybe I missed it, that he is taking that exception out of the bill now.

Having specifically exempted those bonuses from the application of the zero, three per cent budget guidelines, he was then faced this week with having to say: "Well, no, no, no, they are not going to get any increase on those, they are not going to get any bonus or any performance pay or any of that stuff at all."

Until I see it in legislation, I do not really know what the minister means and I do not think anybody out there knows what he means. They know that two weeks ago he tabled legislation that exempted bonuses from the zero per cent freeze and the 3 per cent cap and then they saw him this week trying to skate around that and pretend that he was going to do something else. If he is going to do something else, let him do it in legislation.

Before the President of Treasury Board responds to some of the points I have made and allows me perhaps the opportunity to make other changes, I know it is highly unusual to move amendments to the definition clause of a bill, however there is really no other place in the bill where this is dealt with.

I move:

That Clause 2 be amended at page 3 by deleting lines 2 through 6 and substituting the following therefor:

—amount of pay—

What we are taking out is that this bill does not include allowances, bonuses, differentials, premiums or other emoluments or benefits paid in respect of circumstances specified by Treasury Board. That makes it very clear that the commitments and statements the minister made this week that zero and three apply to bonuses are in fact true in legislation and not just in rhetoric.

The minister has often commented—and I would not use personal examples except that the minister uses it so often—that he has been through a 20 per cent reduction in his salary. I suspect that that 20 per cent reduction was not on a $20,000 salary. The next time he uses that example he might want to tell people exactly how much he was earning after his 20 per cent reduction and how that compares to so many of the people who are now without a contract.

One final comment: One thing I have found most discouraging this week was when the President of Treasury Board refused to speak directly to the president of the Public Service Alliance and communicated through his staff. He had staff report that they were prepared to give this $500 bonus to 35,000 members of the alliance. Wow, 25,000 of those were women! How any employer can brag that 25,000 of 35,000 of its lowest paid employees are women and that it has not implemented full pay equity, I fail to understand.

You have the motion moved, Mr. Chairman, and I would appreciate the minister's comments on some of the points I have raised.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair will consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West and will take the admissibility of this motion under advisement.

That being said, I again recognize the President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made a great number of points. I will try to address them as succinctly as possible. I think one of her first points was to deny that we had made, I would say, an honest effort at negotiating.

I would like to remind the hon. member that this sounds a little strange inasmuch as we have reached settlement with some of our unions within the zero–three range. We have reached agreement with unions. We have even obtained conciliation board reports recommending acceptance of settlements within the zero–three range.

It is not so far-fetched. We have made efforts and we have been successful. For example, with PIPS the board report recommends acceptance of a settlement within the range. Therefore, I should not think that we were not throughout the exercise failing to try to achieve a settlement. Far from it. We have tried from the start. We knew that the zero-three perspective was not a pleasant one, and we understand that.

The hon. member referred then to article 51 in which she said that we had been found, therefore she concludes, guilty of acting in bad faith. I would insist that this is not the case. The union asked the Public Service Staff Relations Board two questions: Did Treasury Board act in bad faith and, second, did they make every reasonable effort?

Article 51 contains these two possibilities. The board came to the conclusion that we had not made every reasonable effort, not that we had acted in bad faith. I think that should be clearly stated.

The hon. member then said that I refused to meet with the president of PSAC. I must admit that we have been in touch with PSAC at the table away from the table. My negotiators have been talking to Mr. Bean on an ongoing basis. I have been kept fully informed. I met him before we decided to sit down, and I told him how it would unfold and what the limits were of our mandate. He agreed to sit under those conditions, that he would bring his members back and we would end the legislation. Then the negotiations took place and the information was that no counterproposal was coming. What is the point of having a mediator? We had our proposal on the table and the answer we got is that they went back on strike. Therefore I do not see any point in having further negotiations since we have not been making progress for the last few months.

The hon. member mentioned once or twice the bonus question. I suggest that her salary and her allocations are higher than those of many members of PSAC, and I suppose there is a reason for that. So is mine.

We have also chairmen of large corporations who have to compete in the real world. Of course when somebody gets $300,000 in salary it is seen as a very high amount. I must say that it is. That being said, managers also have a component which is performance pay. This is a valid way. We have set out a board to grant them.

What will happen for 1991—and I would like this to be very clear—is that we have frozen everything. We have frozen everything. These bonuses are given at the end of the year, from April 1991 to April 1992. They will be evaluated and, whatever the recommendation, they will get zero. I cannot recommend them now, but I guarantee at budget time the decision was everybody would have a zero year.

We will come to members of Parliament. We begin on January 1. This is our year. Bringing it forward will cause all kinds of problems, like it will cause Parliament to have a higher increase but for a shorter period of time. We said let us maintain it as we have with the unions. They did not get their contract ended at budget time. Some of them ended in August and others in September.

For the managers, they already started in April to have their salary frozen. Their bonus will be paid at the end. They will be paid zero dollars.

I would like that to be put to rest. In my view even for our managers in the Public Service, I think it is a good idea to have this combined salary and performance pay. This is a very good way of rewarding our managers. This was done anyway by taking the money from within. That being said, this year they will also get zero, which is indeed going back 5 per cent.

She talked about the money we could have saved by people being out on strike and not being paid. I would tell her with respect that when people are out on strike—public servants are important persons—they create a vast amount of destruction in the country. This has occurred, so it is far from clear at this time that the over-all balance will be positive. When you have in the grain industry the destruction we have seen, when we have in the airports the destruction we have seen, there is much less money coming into the government. In the end we may end up losing and not gaining any money.

As far as saying that $20,000 is not much money, I would not disagree with her at all. Of course it is not much. That is why these agreements, these salaries have been negotiated in the past. That is where we are through good negotiations.

I would say that this year we will freeze everyone, but we understand that for a certain group of people it is more difficult. We decided to make an effort within the capacity we have by freezing and taking the money from within the operating budget.

We can throw more money out, pay more money, grant higher salaries, but the alternative is a greater problem for us or for any government down the road. Next year we will be paying close to $41 billion in interest on the debt. We can of course go out and borrow $1 billion and make people happy for a little while, but this is a road to disaster. Our own employees would be very quickly threatened. They cannot be immunized from the over-all problem that is facing this economy and they should be part of the solution, as other Canadians are part of the solution.

She referred to people on contract. If they are hired on contract, they usually have the same treatment as the indeterminate employees and other contracts where you try to get, whatever contract you give, the lowest possible cost.

As for pay equity, I would like to know where her party has been all these years. We are the government that has given $317 million for pay equity and which year after year is committing $81 million for pay equity, not the Liberal Party. This problem has been an ongoing one and at long last we are doing something about it. The member should congratulate us instead of blaming us.

The member said that I took a cut. There was a decision taken by the Quebec government. I must say that I do not remember how much money I was making. I can probably confirm that it was not $50,000 but, whatever it was, it was a substantial cut. I did not like it. It was certainly much worse than a freeze and it went throughout the system. Some of those who had lower salaries did have to take this in their stride.

As for cutting off, why cut at $27,000? Of course there has to be a cut-off point, but we are managing as you will see in our proposal a gradation so that we will try not to have people pass over others and so on.

Basically the hon. member has raised a number of points. I have tried to answer most of them. I would like to go back to the basic principle. We made this decision at budget time because we needed to be sure that the finances of this country and our management would not be derailed. There was a recession with far fewer taxes coming in and far more money going out. There was a danger that when the economy started picking up again, the governments would be there scooping all the money available. We did not want that. We sent out a clear signal that we were committed to clear inflation targets.

Do you know what, Mr. Chairman? It works. The recession is ending and the economy is picking up again. That is why we cannot allow this strike to disrupt this very fragile recovery.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I find it a very unusual process we are going through today, listening to the minister. The government sounds like it is willing to negotiate. It sounds as though somehow the Public Service Alliance has forced them into this horrible situation of back-to-work legislation. It some how tries to give us the impression that it has been reasonable.

However, the whole record of what has happened since budget day in February indicates that the government itself has been reluctant to negotiate openly, has been stonewalling and is trying to have its own definition of what the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruling was all about.

When it knows that there is an offer by the Public Service Alliance, and it has known for a number of days now, it is refusing even to look at that offer.

The minister any number of times today has said: "Mr. Bean called the strike". Somehow he says that that means we do not have to negotiate any more. The government knew at ten o'clock Friday morning that there would be a strike. Their negotiator had meetings scheduled even after the strike was called, and they met. The government had not said: "Okay, there is a strike. We stop meeting". They actually had a meeting at seven o'clock Friday evening. At that time, after the strike had been going on for over five or seven hours, depending on which part of the country you were in, the government said: "We are walking away from the table". It did that knowing that there was something coming from the workers, from their union.

It is as if this government does not want negotiations to succeed. It is as if it was afraid that it might get an offer which was reasonable. We know that any progress that has been made to date has not been made at the government initiative.

The government said: "Zero, that is what we are offering". We will have an amendment today which says that it is going to give a lump sum payment of $500 to those at the lower end of the pay scale, not to be rolled into their wages, not to count for their pension plans or any other benefit they may have in the long run, but it will give them this lump sum payment.

It did not do that out of generosity, because that has not been the government position from day one. It did in in reaction to public opinion. This government knew it was being devastated by public opinion on how it was treating its employees at the low end of the pay scale. All of a sudden it starts to move.

Why did it go back to the negotiating table two weeks ago? Not because it wanted to negotiate, but because it had a ruling by the Public Service Staff Relations Board that indicated it was violating its own laws, that it had not made every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement.

Again, the government knew it was not winning the battle of public opinion. It could not defy its own laws. As the ruling of that board stated, it is an employer like other employers and should be expected to follow the laws of Canada.

When I listen to the minister saying: "Well, it's the union's fault. It wanted too much. It said our budget was political and it was going to fight this political budget", I think he should actually listen to what he is saying. It did not want to negotiate. It refused to negotiate money until it had to negotiate money. It was not going to do anything for the employees at the low end of the pay scale until, again, the public forced it into it.

Now we have a situation in which members of cabinet have been called, people in the Prime Minister's Office have been called saying: "Get back to the negotiating table". My colleague from Mission—Port Moody went over to him earlier and said: "You know you've got an offer. Why don't you go see what it is".

I hear one of the Conservative backbenchers, pardon me, he is a member of the cabinet now and that is the Prime Minister's mistake, saying: "Why didn't the union make that offer Friday morning?" The point is, we have had time.

This government did not announce to the public that it was bringing back this legislation until this morning. It had time Friday to consider this offer. It had all day Saturday to consider this offer. It had all day Sunday to consider this offer. It is unreasonable for the government not to make every reasonable effort to resolve this dispute in a peaceful manner.

Whether there was a strike Friday afternoon or not, the government has had the ability to listen to its employees, to sit down with its employees. As the heckling and hackling from across the way indicates, that is not its chosen route. It does not want to sit down and negotiate. It does not want to work in good faith.

The minister does not have to withdraw the legislation from the House. He could be meeting right now. He could be sitting and trying to work this out, but that is not the government's way. That is not this government's way.

I find it ironic that at the same time that the Prime Minister and others from the government have called upon Canadians to try to work things out with regard to the Constitution, saying we should be listening to each other, talking with each other and not prejudging the situation, this government is not doing exactly that with its own employees. It is refusing to talk. It is refusing to consult. It has prejudged the situation because it will not even look. It will not even meet with the workers to see what the workers are now offering.

I find it ironic that this morning we have some indication that with the mediator we are having some progress in the talks between CUPW and Canada Post.

One of the things that has been suggested over the last two or three weeks is that we have a mediator to try and resolve the dispute with the Public Service Alliance. The government has refused to do that, and yet it was its own Minister of Labour who insisted that Canada Post and CUPW sit down with a mediator and try to resolve their dispute. Again, the federal government is saying: "We don't play by the rules that everybody else must play by". It does not play by the same rules that it expects everybody else to play by with regard to our Canadian Constitution. It does not play by the same rules that it expects Canada Post and the postal workers to play by. It sets its own rules. That has been its approach from day one.

I am going to give the minister a chance to respond. I want to ask him a very simple question: What harm does it do if, while we are proceeding with this legislation, he should sit down and meet with the senior people from the alliance and hear what they have to say? What harm would that do to the public of Canada?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I do not share at all the interpretation put on our negotiations by the hon. member. He seems to forget that this did not start Friday; it started some months ago. We have been at the table with PSAC for 90 days. We were at it again this week. What good faith can we have in PSAC?

Let me read you a document signed jointly by the two of us:

> PSAC has agreed—and directed its members to return to work at that time and for as long as negotiations continue.

It left the table. We did not. We put new offers which it did not want, and we feel it is useless to continue this process because it has acted in bad faith, indicating to us that it was not at all interested in pursuing these negotiations. We did not walk away from the table, it did.

Mr. Murphy: The minister has refused to answer the question I asked. I cannot force him to do that in the House.

I do not think we should spend time worrying about whose fault something is right now. If you take a look at the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruling, whether the minister likes it or not, many people would certainly perceive that he and the government were found guilty of bad faith bargaining, whether the words were specific or whether it was general, saying that the government did not make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement, and those words are found in that ruling.

I again ask the minister the question that many reasonable Canadians would ask: What harm does it do him, what harm does it do the government, to sit down and meet with the leadership of the alliance—while this legislation is proceeding, if necessary—and why will he not do that for the benefit of the public of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, while we had chosen to negotiate—that is why I find my colleague's accusations strange—several other governments facing situations similar to ours chose to legislate.

Mr. Blaikie: Answer the question!

Mr. Loiselle: That is precisely the question. The government chose negotiation. It did so in good faith. We returned to the table; we made new proposals and the union chose to leave the table, saying that our proposals were unacceptable—I suppose so, otherwise why would they have quit? Therefore, I do not see how this process could serve any purpose whatever, except to waste our time again.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Before recognizing the next speaker, the Chair, after considering the motion presented by the hon. member for Ottawa West, declares it in order.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to speak to Bill C-29, introduced by the President of the Treasury Board.

I have been covering my riding for many weeks. In fact, in three months, I took part in 12 open-line shows and heard a number of comments from the average working man in my riding and, and today, Mr. Speaker, we are proud to support a bill that although it may hurt one group of citizens, those citizens enjoy considerable security, unlike many others who have lost their jobs, are living on welfare and are constantly looking for work, not just in Beauce but across Quebec and Canada.

When I was elected a second time in 1988, this government was elected to make certain decisions. Canadians and Quebecers were saying: "You must reduce the deficit, you must deal with the deficit and with excessively high government spending. You must control inflation. Interest rates are too high".

Since that time, since November 21, 1988, we have taken steps that were not popular but they were necessary. The Prime Minister has said, both inside and outside the House, that our government was faced with a disastrous situation as far as the country's finances were concerned. We know this government's record, and we know the measures we took were not popular. However, we had to do this, we had to take corrective action, and I think we are on the right track.

Mr. Chairman, we are now experiencing a recession. Economic recovery may still be fragile and perhaps hardly noticeable, but at least there are encouraging signs across the country and especially in my region. I would like to point out, however, that this recession is a global phenomenon. Today, if the government does not take the necessary action, it may end up like other countries that have faced problems even worse than those we are facing today.

It is not easy to defend the government's bill. It isn't easy to tell people: You won't get a raise this year. Your wages will be frozen during the first year, and you will get 3 per cent the next year and 3 per cent the year after. It isn't easy, but in the circumstances it is the sensible thing to do. It takes a lot of courage to support this kind of decision by our government but I do so willingly, because I know it is in the best interests of the people of Beauce and the people of Quebec.

In Beauce yesterday afternoon, I saw 132 people at a meeting, where I was asked all kinds of questions about this bill. Finally, I asked how many of these 132 men and women, all adults, had job security. One had job security: he was a federal employee who worked in Quebec City for Agriculture Canada, so he wasn't even a resident of my riding. So out of 132 people, 131 did not have job security.

Mr. Chairman, today we are faced with a situation that will get completely out of hand if we do not take corrective action. When we talk about the problems facing all regions across this country—in Quebec for instance, in Central Quebec, Abitibi, the Gaspé, the Montreal area, the Lower St. Lawrence—in all these regions the economy is in trouble, and people are doing everything they can to keep existing industries alive.

In the private sector, sacrifices are made to keep businesses afloat, to avoid going bankrupt. Some employees have accepted not just a wage freeze but wage cuts to keep jobs that pay $6.50, $7.00 or $7.50 an hour, so I think our federal employees are not being treated that badly.

Mr. Chairman, let me give you some figures. I believe that federal public servants now, if I am not mistaken, have an average annual salary of $37,621—yes, that is the average—fully indexed pensions, one of the best job security plans in Canada.

Furthermore, they have a dental plan fully funded by the government and benefits like health insurance and disability insurance. I asked the people of Beauce whom I saw yesterday, "How many of you have such benefits?' ' Not one. These programs are fully paid for by the government. Sick leave with full salary, generous leave and vacation benefits, family benefits like paid maternity leave.

So, Mr. Chairman, when we talk about wall-to-wall protection, of course there is room for improvement. If we were in a better financial position, we could give them increases of 2, 3 or 4 per cent this year, but we decided to set a zero increase for one year.

Mr. Chairman we have a job to do here, all of us, whatever party we belong to. We must consider the interest of the country, that is, the interest of those who live here. I am encouraged that many people support us. You will read the editorials this morning in the various newspapers, and I know that the English-language editorials throughout the other provinces encourage us to continue this debate and end this purely political strike.

Mr. Chairman, there are ways to solve these political strikes. Mechanisms exist, customs and traditions must be observed. It is called democracy. In two years, if these public servants are not satisfied, they will vote against the government and will express their opposition democratically, not by coming to invade Parliament with people who are not even public servants but have been brought together to disrupt the atmosphere of Parliament.

Here is what the editorialist of Le Soleil, which is quite a serious newspaper in Quebec, called our civil servants this morning: the government's spoiled children. That was not written by a Conservative MP but by an independent editorialist, who more often than not has been strongly critical of the government. "Donahue closes brand-new plant in Matane." "Massive layoffs at Domtar." "Number of welfare recipients and unemployed reaches new high." "Montreal's economy literally collapsing." That was how he began his editorial.

Day after day, the headlines are full of layoffs the private sector is forced to go through. But I must tell you that I do not believe that Conservatives dominate the political situation in England, Germany and France, but they still have the same recession we do.

Job security has become a priceless asset in recent years, what with two recessions. This protection is even more valuable in the public sector, sheltered from the economic difficulties related to competition and productivity, which can lead private companies to lay off workers even though they have a job security clause on paper.

The only ones who have not been hit by the recession in the past two years are public servants at all levels—municipal, provincial and federal. Name me some people who have been hit by the recession! Mr. Chairman, the people of Beauce listening to us today are shocked at the attitude of public servants who act in this way and do not agree to make the sacrifice imposed on other Canadians and Quebecers.

Here is another editorialist, Pierre Gravel in La Presse. As far as I know, he is not connected to the Conservative Party. "Nothing works any more. A miraculous eleven-day strike was not enough to establish a productive dialogue between Ottawa and its 150,000 public servants and nothing indicates that a new miracle will produce results in the short term."

His editorial, which is too long to read in full, Mr. Chairman, says: "The confrontation has ceased to be just a labour conflict between the government and its unionized employees and again become what it always was: an essentially political debate with the government over its budget priorities."

• (1350)

In the present situation, exacerbated by constitutional tensions, Canada cannot afford, Mr. Chairman, to have its public service tied up for a long period of time. Neither can it put up with its devastating effects on industrial or business concerns which are already in a sorry state.

Therefore, the government must have the courage, the guts, of seeing its logic through and must pass as soon as possible special legislation to suspend the right to strike of civil servants and to set their conditions of employment.

About the union members, and I will close with this, as far as the author of an editorial published in La Presse this morning is concerned: "they must understand that it is no longer on the picket lines that their political fight is to be fought but at the place where democratic societies pass judgement on governments' decisions, that is in the polling booth. Make your views known at the next election."

Now, I have a piece of advice for Mr. Daryl Bean, president of our civil servant's federation. I heard Mr. Bean say on television this week end that they were going out on strike, leaving the table because the other side as bargaining in bad faith—a fact the President of the Treasury Board denied earlier—and that there would be acts of violence. I think that his role is to prevent such acts of violence and to tell his members to demonstrate publicly but peacefully.

Mr. Bean even declared to a Hull radio station this morning—I heard him—that he would defy the law and was ready to go to jail. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation can subdue these people who are giving Canadians, Quebecers and people from Beauce a bad image with their exaggerated demands.

Why does the government offer zero–three–and–three to civil servants while the inflation rate is at 6 per cent? We were asked that question. That fact of the matter is that this country and this government are facing a difficult financial situation. Members opposite know it full well, particularly those from the Liberal Party to whom we owe this accumulated deficit going back to nearly 25 years. The wage restraint policy affecting government employees is but one of the steps taken by this government to reduce the deficit and the inflationary pressures. We are going to succeed, no doubt about that, Mr. Chairman.

I must warn you that my colleagues are going to speak in favour of this bill. We will pass it, even if it hurts, because we are not here to win a popularity contest but to administer public funds as best we can with the tools at our disposal.

In my opinion, based on what civil servants from my area told me over the weekend and last week on the phone, in letters or in person when they came to meet me at my office, people are not ready to go on strike, they do not want to strike. Daryl Bean makes decisions alone with his senior executive for the major cities, but in our area, in the riding of Beauce, our civil servants accept their working conditions. Sure we have secretaries earning $27,000 or $28,000 a year, but in our area, some heads of families do not even earn that much. They do not get half or even one quarter of that amount in UI or welfare benefits.

So, when I see hundreds of people lined up at Employment and Immigration offices today to try and find out if there are jobs left in Quebec and in Canada, I tell myself these people must be protected.

There is one thing the opposition failed to mention earlier: four unions did accept the zero–three–three formula which was also put forward in seven of the Canadian provinces. I am referring to the civil service unions representing engineers, controllers, translators, physicists and merchant officers. All of them have accepted the policy. They submitted to it. How many of the strikers would rather be back at their desks, working and receiving their salary at the end of the week? There are thousands of them, but they are forced today to follow the lead.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, there is a degree of urgency. I hear that the legislation could be in effect by the end of the week but that is much too late. We should be sitting night and day to put an end once and for all to this strike that should not be going on in the present political circumstances.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. There have been consultations and, in the best fashion of this House, we are trying to create a little better sense for members about the orders for the rest of the day.

I think you will find acceptance for the following motion.

I move:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or usual practice of the House, during the proceedings in Committee of the Whole on Bill C–29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, whenever consideration of a clause, schedule or any amendment is completed, it shall forthwith be stood until later this day for further debate or amendment, or for the question to be put, and
> That any amendment tabled with the Chair prior to 9 p.m. this day be deemed proposed and be put without further debate at 10 p.m. this day.

If members were to adopt this motion, that would in effect put forward until ten o'clock this evening any amendments that any members want to make on the bill. Then, we would have any standing votes needed to take place to separate on any of those issues take place at ten o'clock, therefore leaving members free during the day to attend committee meetings, of one kind or another, that normally occur on a Monday.

That would not, by the way, disturb the votes that have been deferred until 6:15 this evening with the six o'clock bell. Those votes would take place at the scheduled time of 6.15 p.m. All votes on Bill C–29 would then take place at ten o'clock this evening.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) Mr. Chairman, I just want to confirm that we have had the discussions and to ensure that the people watching understand that this in no way reduces the amount of time available for debate on this very important issue. In fact, it ensures maximum debate within the time that the House has allocated to us.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, just to clarify, I assume that this will not preclude members of Parliament from introducing their amendments, and thereafter, giving a short, succinct explanation of those amendments.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, as we move along with clauses, all of that is possible.

Under the normal rules for Committee of the Whole, if ten o'clock came because of the closure, then no further amendments could be put. What we are saying is that if that happens, we want any amendments which have been tabled prior to nine o'clock this evening to be at least considered by the House. They become votable, even though we never get to that particular clause where that amendment could then be put. We are making it a fairer system for all members because of the time constraints. There is more time for debate, and any amendment can be put. That is the thrust of what we are trying to do.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I understand the intent of the hon. member is that there will be an adjudication on each of the amendments that are put forward. What I am suggesting is that members would be given a brief opportunity just to explain very succinctly as to what the substantive point in their amendment might be at any point in time.

Since the President of the Treasury Board has, I believe, circulated copies of his amendments to members of the House, and we will be doing the same with all parties with regard to our amendments, perhaps we could have just a brief moment or two to explain what that amendment would be.

Perhaps the hon. member might want to agree with our amendments. Then he would be in a better position to persuade his colleagues of the rationale and the good sense that we are putting forward.

Mr. Hawkes: In terms of the spirit of this motion and the House at this time, I think it would be wise for members, as early as possible this day, to indicate to the Canadian people and the House that they do have amendments, and what the thrust of them are, so that we can have time to consider them.

I am worried. At ten o'clock we do not want to start with explanations of amendments during the formal amending process.

I think there would be a tendency in the House to relax a little our usual fairly relaxed rules about relevance and let people speak, when they get the floor, to things that are on their minds that affect any part of this bill. This is my sense of what we are willing to do today.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, you will understand my concern, since 26,000 federal public servants live on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River. If I understand correctly, we will be able to table amendments to the bill this afternoon. But to do so, we need authorization and the right to speak. Can the Speaker assure me that we will have the right to speak this afternoon?

• (1400)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may point out that members do not have to rise in the House to table amendments, according to the terms of the motion regulating today's debate.

As far as recognizing the hon. member is concerned, the Chair will be alert, but there are many members who wish to speak, and of course I will try to recognize as many members as possible.

The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Chairman, I think you will understand that some clarification is required when tabling an amendment. I would have liked to speak this afternoon or this evening, since there are considerable implications for constituents in the Outaouais region.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will bear in mind what was said by the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer.

A motion has been moved by the Government Whip. Does the House give its consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

S. O. 31

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock, when debate is resumed I will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[English]

It being 2 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

IRVING KURZ

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Constable Irving Kurz of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was honoured this weekend by the Red Deer Chamber of Commerce when it selected him as citizen of the year.

Constable Kurz has dedicated over 1,990 hours of volunteer time, setting up a program for victims of crime. He is recognized nationally for the instigation of this program.

In addition to this he works as a volunteer in a host of other organizations which include the Alberta Mental Health Association, the Red Deer Native Friendship Society, the Alberta Family and Community Support Service Review, Red Deer and the Intercity Suicide Prevention Council, the Central Alberta Women's Emergency Shelter, the Sexual Assault Centre, the Family Violence Committee and the Volunteer Week Steering Committee.

Red Deer is very proud of its volunteers and the numbers of hours those volunteers donate each year. Even by our standards, Irving's record is outstanding. Constable Irving Kurz is an asset to his community and exemplifies the very best qualities of those who serve Canada and the uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, did you know that this government is denying millions of dollars to Canadians who qualify for certain programs?

For example, I met a gentleman of 81 years of age who should have been getting the supplement, yet he had not been. It was made retroactive for three years but he lost 13 years of compensation he should have had.

In another case, I met a widow of a veteran who raised five children, the oldest being 12 years, by herself and did not get any of the assistance to which she was entitled. Through that process she lost her home. She is trying to get some of that money back to educate one of her children and she cannot even get that.

When will the government stop this practice? When will it start being fair to Canadians who deserve the money they should get?

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, over the past weekend it was interesting to hear the leader of the Reform Party take some credit for the constitutional proposals introduced in this House by the government almost a week ago.

Included in this self-attributed victory was the issue of property rights which are now proposed to be entrenched in the Constitution. It would be very nice if Preston Manning stopped rewriting history. I wonder where the Reform Party leader was on July 1, 1960 when Prime Minister John Diefenbaker proclaimed the Canadian Bill of Rights by saying: "Every individual has the right to life, liberty, security of person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law."

The right to own property was on the Conservative agenda 31 years ago, as it is today. Canadians, in particular western Canadians, will be very familiar with the work done by the Chief, and no doubt are surprised at what Mr. Manning said.

It makes one wonder what the Chief would say if he were in this House today, probably something about the south end of a horse, looking at it from the north.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public does not support the federal government's autocratic and authoritative method of dealing with its public servants. The public knows that the civil servants are dedicated, hard working and deserve respect and fair treatment.

The public wishes the government to return to the bargaining table and offer its employees a fair and equitable wage settlement. Thousands upon thousands of residents in my riding of Surrey North and British Columbia have signed petitions opposing the back to work legislation, urging the government to return to the negotiating table and enter into a fair contract.

It is time for this government to come to its senses, to show some leadership, and to settle this strike fairly and equitably.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, no one can deny the strong correlation which has developed between the rise of cross-border shopping and the level of taxation on gasoline in Canada. This relationship is supported by a number of recent studies and surveys on cross-border shopping.

In Ontario, John Winter Associates developed a model for cross-border shopping based on consumption patterns. Close to the border there is a 15-minute convenient zone where consumers are willing to cross the border for every-day items, such as gasoline, on a weekly or biweekly basis.

A recent Ontario small business survey of seven border community regions found that one-third of those interviewed confirmed shopping in the United States in April 1991. Of this figure, 80 per cent purchased gasoline on a regular basis in the United States. Consistently gasoline was the most frequent cross-border purchase.

These results represent a very dangerous trend for Canadian consumers. It is now time for the federal government to act to rectify this situation. Retailers in our border communities look forward to such action.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, across Canada this fall, certainly across Prince Edward Island, minor hockey associations are gearing up for another season.

This year the GST will be a factor many of them would rather not have to face. Hockey associations must pay GST on expenses like ice time and hockey equipment. They are not eligible for a tax rebate.

These are non-profit organizations. An extra 7 per cent in expenses therefore must come either out of their budget, from the players or their parents. That is the bottom line.

This policy is unfair and stands in sharp contrast to the government's stated goal of recognizing the important role of non-profit organizations in Canadian society.

I call on the government to review the effects this new tax is having on non-profit organizations like minor hockey and figure skating associations and to establish a policy that treats these valuable organizations with the fairness they deserve.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, one of the most pressing issues facing Nova Scotia today is the construction of a four lane highway from the border of Nova Scotia on to Truro. This highway has a high rate of accidents, all too often resulting in deaths and injuries.

Nova Scotia is unique in that it has only one main highway into the province and this highway also serves as the only road on to Newfoundland.

With the elimination of the railroad in Newfoundland and the reduction in rail service in Nova Scotia, the burden on the present system is no longer acceptable. The Hon. Kenneth Streatch, Minister of Transport for the province of Nova Scotia is in Ottawa today to negotiate with the federal government for funding to proceed with the highway.

As one who travels this over-burdened route regularly I can personally attest to the unacceptable situation first hand. I urge the federal ministers involved to come to agreement with the province so that this project can proceed quickly.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I found it interesting that earlier we had indications from the mediator appointed in the postal dispute that he is making some progress in his talks with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and Canada Post.

I find it ironic that this government has refused the same request in connection with its own employees. It has refused to appoint a mediator in the dispute between the Public Service Alliance and Treasury Board.

• (1410)

I wonder how the Minister of Labour can ask, and order, Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to sit down with a mediator when the very same government refuses to use a mediator to try and resolve the Public Service dispute.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, much concern is being expressed in southern Nova Scotia that the search and rescue and fisheries patrol helicopter will be removed when the current contract with Cougar Helicopters expires next year. I understand that while DFO has not withdrawn its support and funding for the service, Transport Canada has decided to withdraw its support. The result is that the contract will not be renewed.

The presence of the helicopter based in Yarmouth has directly resulted in the saving of several lives, including a group of 10 persons recently. Similarly, the presence of the helicopter has had a very positive impact on reducing illegal fishing activities throughout the western Scotia–Fundy region. The helicopter has effectively done what it is supposed to do. The need continues to exist. I urge DFO and DOT to get together to work something out to ensure that this essential service continues.

FUEL ECONOMY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the concern of most car drivers is to get the most out of the amount of gasoline purchased. The more efficient the car, the greater the savings to the driver. In addition, less gasoline burned means less pollution.

Some car companies, not the big three, continue to prove that the car industry can produce more fuel efficient cars, however, the 1992 car models show an over-all decline in fuel efficiency. Clearly we need fuel economy standards set and enforced by the federal government.

The environment committee urged the government to do just that, but the government's reply last week was disappointing. We have to wait until the end of 1992 when legislation may be submitted to Parliament, with no certainty that it will become law or to what model year it will apply. Years and years could go by before the consumer will benefit from improvements in fuel economy.

Why this lack of political will on the government's part?

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Alliance of Canada decided without further consultation to have its members go on a general strike for a third week. Admittedly, the government is imposing a wage freeze for the first year of the contract, but the union's logic denouncing this famous 0 per cent is costing its members nearly 6 per cent of their annual salary. Each week on strike means a loss of 2 per cent of their annual salary.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government is offering 0 per cent, but the Alliance is imposing a 6 per cent loss on its members. This strike is going nowhere. Even schoolchildren realize that the union leaders Daryl Bean and Johane Hurens are using their members as hostages, not to improve their working conditions but for political reasons, to shake the government and support their accomplices in Parliament, the NDP members.

It is time to assume our responsibilities and to end this masquerade, which is in bad taste.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Extendicare Hearst, a nursing home in my riding of Cochrane—Superior, will face a crisis situation in mid-October if funding is not increased. The funding for all nursing homes in Ontario is $34 per day per patient less than funding for municipal homes for the aged. This is unfair and will undoubtedly result in a reduction of staff at Extendicare Hearst or possible closure of the facility.

[Translation]

The rising cost of living, of supplies and of salaries for the medical staff, as well as the extra burden imposed by the GST, weigh very heavily on the finances of this centre. In short, if this establishment does not receive additional help, it will not be able to give its 61 residents the level of care they need. This situation is likely to worsen their health and seriously affect our seniors' quality of life. I therefore urge the provincial government to rectify this situation immediately.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to know where the Reform Party stands on gun control. Does Preston Manning want to strengthen Bill C-17 or does he want to weaken it? Does he want to abolish it? His supporters think so.

Would the Reform Party put this issue to a national referendum? This is the usual Reform Party position: put a difficult issue to a referendum; until then be all things to all people. What kind of leadership is this? It is not leadership. It is abdication of leadership.

I challenge Preston Manning and the member for Beaver River to come out from behind the bushes. Tell Canadians in detail where they stand on Bill C-17. Come clean with Canadians on gun control.

WELFARE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Winsor): Mr. Speaker, today we read that more than 600,000 people in Quebec are on welfare. At least one quarter of that number are children. We are seeing a dramatic drop in the standard of living of all Quebecers. Six years ago, Moisson Montréal supplied food banks with $1 million worth of food. This year it will be $6 million.

This increase was caused by nothing else except the federal government's bad management. Plants are closing everywhere, as a result of the high interest rates maintained by John Crow, the Bank of Canada's resident miser. Pretty soon 200 workers in Port Cartier will be out of a job.

It is time the Tory government admitted its mistakes. Emergency economic assistance should be given to regions it has wrecked.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this is the first anniversary of the World Summit for Children. The summit, chaired by our own Prime Minister, promised the children of the world that 50 million of their number would be saved from death within the next decade.

Tragically 14 million children did not live to see this anniversary. They led lives bankrupt of the care and comfort necessary for survival. They died from starvation or preventable diseases. Many were the victims of war.

Everyone, especially children, want to believe the 71 world leaders including our Prime Minister honoured their promises. Honouring promises begins at home.

I ask the government to table in this House the agenda for bettering children's lives. How will cuts to social programs help our children? Will cuts in Third World aid help world children?

We have the means to help them. I urge this government to now show the will to keep its promises.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government's handling of the Public Service strike is taking a terrible toll on the Canadian economy. The prairie pools estimate that the strike by grain inspectors and weighers is costing western farmers $36 million in lost sales a week, every week. There is great danger that the farmers might lose their markets abroad.

I would like to know from the minister: Why did not the government at least designate grain inspectors and weighers as essential workers as they have done with at least one-third of the Public Service?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, these designated employees are agreed upon by both parties and so far in this particular case indeed it has not occurred. This is something we will have to look at because I would not disagree with him that the impact is very traumatic for farmers, some of whom have been trying to get the message to us that they are in a very difficult position.

That is why I was hoping that through going back to the negotiating table with PSAC, putting new offers on the table, we would get somewhere. I think everybody agreed to that. That is why we agreed to a suspension of the legislation. Unfortunately we got our answers on the television cameras by people reneging on a very solemn agreement and going back on strike.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at this very moment, 26 cargo vessels are anchored in Vancouver, and Canadian farmers are desperate. The minister said they were unwilling to reach an agreement with these essential employees—the weighers and inspectors. I want to ask the minister how many times they tried to get this agreement? According to our information, the government didn't try very hard, and one strongly suspects the government wanted to pit the farmers against the unions, to satisfy their right-wing agenda.

• (1420)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I don't think the present situation is helped any by statements that may be clever politically but do nothing to solve the problem.

I may remind the Leader of the Official Opposition of a statement made by Mr. Daryl Bean even before we brought down our Budget, which means before the then Minister of Finance announced the government's position on wages. He said they would start getting ready for a strike the day after the Budget speech, if the federal government dared to cap public service wages. The next day, he added that he didn't care whether the government brought in legislation or not. It didn't make the slightest difference because he had no intention of obeying the legislation.

If you think this creates a climate that is favourable to negotiations, I can't say I agree. We tried to resume negotiations in a spirit of calm, within a restricted mandate, because raising taxes or increasing the deficit was out of the question. We are trying to reduce spending, and we have done so in all areas, as many other governments have done, including liberal governments in similar circumstances. However, instead of negotiating as we did, they brought in legislation immediately. We tried to reach a settlement through the bargaining process.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the minister that in no case did the provincial government give bonuses up to $60,000 and $80,000 a few weeks before they made that decision.

If the minister were serious—he was just telling us that he knew since before the budget that the union was in a mood to have a confrontation—why was he negligent in not making sure that in between there was a mediator who would have been able to make some suggestions to the government and the union to resolve the difficulties? Why did he sought confrontation rather than mediation?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the only thing we sought to confront was the deficit and the debt of this country.

The Leader of the Opposition, and I am surprised at his position, tried to make cheap political gains by talking about the bonus. It is not true. He knows it very well. I can reaffirm here in this House very solemnly that none will get an increase in salary and nobody will get any dollar in bonus. That should be put to rest.

As for taking these difficult decisions, our choice at budget time because of the recession with less money coming in and more going out was not to say: "Well, let us carry this over, borrow the money the Liberal way". We decided to tighten the belt. We did not tackle the union. We took 10 per cent of manager jobs away. We capped the transfers to the provinces. We took many, many difficult decisions including the zero, three. We wanted to show leadership. Provinces have followed and it is working.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, what this country needs right now is a spirit of tolerance and understanding. Yet the government is pursuing an agenda of confrontation and dissension among Canadians and with its own employees, bent on increasing what little sagging popularity it has left now.

I ask the minister: When will the government start managing responsibly and stop disrupting the lives of Canadians? I appeal to him, even now at the eleventh hour: Will he appoint a mediator? Will he try to settle this fairly and justly?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think of the two, the employer and the employees, particularly PSAC. It is PSAC which is not being responsible. When you see things as we saw Saturday and again this morning in a veterans' hospital where people are prevented from providing services to people badly in need, this is not being reasonable.

As for the mediator, this is a process which can be useful—of course, I would not deny that—providing there is a chance we can get some agreement.

We sat with PSAC for 60 days of negotiations and 30 days of conciliation. They went on strike. We said: "Well, let's go back and have a last try at it". We were at it for 35 different meetings. We put offers on the table, very important offers given the restraint we have to live under, on Thursday evening. We got the answer the next day: they were on strike. What had they agreed to? They agreed not to go back on strike until negotiations were terminated, and they were not.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruled that the government wasted months not bargaining well. I urge him, now that he has mentioned the chance of negotiations, if there is even a chance, surely we can spare Canadians the agony that they are going through and the agony that his employees are going through and appoint that mediator and take that small chance, however little it may be, instead of publishing advertisements all across the country, at great cost to the taxpayers. They are only bound and determined to tell Canadians what to believe at their own expense.

I ask the minister: Will he immediately withdraw these ads, concede that there is a chance, appoint a mediator and use this money to reach a reasonable settlement?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will agree that the citizens of Canada who have been considerably disturbed by these strikes have a right to know what we have offered. Let them decided about that.

As far as, again as the hon. member said, going back to the negotiating table, I will read a joint agreement from Treasury Board and PSAC which said: "It will remove its picket lines and direct its members to return to work at that time and for as long as the negotiations continue". We did not leave the negotiating table; they did.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board said today that the government's only option was to go ahead with back-to-work legislation. I believe that it is this government's last resort. It is a failure for this government. The strikers have said that they would return to work if the government named a mediator. Will the government appoint a mediator immediately and sit down at the table?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I already explained that the government would not accept a mediator because PSAC had already shown its bad will by refusing to follow a very clear negotiating process. They left the table. During months of negotiations, in the 90 days leading up to the strike and at 35 intense meetings, they never put a single proposal on the table. All of a sudden, faced with this legislation, they show that they have a particularly fertile imagination. Personally, I have lost confidence in the leaders of this union. I deeply regret it, and we will be prepared to negotiate, if you want. But when the conditions of the agreement we have are respected, the public servants will be at work.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government's continuous refusal to reach beyond and sit down at the table ensures that Canadians are going to lose confidence in this government. In fact, they already have lost confidence in this government.

I would ask the President of the Treasury Board again, if the minister truly wants to see a resolution in the interest of those farmers for whom he has expressed concern and for whom we all have concern, if he wants to see a resolution to this for small business and those who may be hurt: Is the government's position so weak that he refuses to go in front of a mediator? Why will he not appoint a mediator now and sit down with one?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if our intention had been to deal with the unions without negotiation it would have been very simple. We could have legislated. Many other provinces have done the same. We chose to negotiate. We have done it in an open way. We thought there was a fair chance of explaining our position.

Canadians across this country have been going through a very difficult recession. Hundreds of thousands of them have lost their jobs. We wanted our public servants to make an additional effort. I know they deserve better conditions, but paid how; by increasing taxes or increasing the deficit? This is the greatest threat to our Public Service, a mismanagement of the fiscal situation.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, all we are asking on this side of the House is that this government make an extra effort.

We know that the legislation can be passed within 48 hours, yet there is nothing preventing this government now from continuing to negotiate. Tougher agreements than this have been negotiated in 48 hours.

Will the minister use the remaining time to negotiate an agreement with the Public Service Alliance, rather than settle for the failure of back-to-work legislation?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly committed—I made it very clear this morning—to proceed with the legislation. We will see how events unfold until then, but the legislation is going to go through.

Now that it is inevitable, I hope for the good of our own employees who are losing pay—and this is again a sad result of these strikes—we will deal with it expeditiously.

As I have said, if we go back to our original agreement which was applauded by everyone in this House, we will then consider what to do.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

This afternoon in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, over 1,500 farmers are gathering to protest the lack of action by the government because they face the worst financial crisis in a generation for Canadian farmers.

Last winter, the government committed itself to providing a third line of defence financial assistance to these producers. When is the government going to provide this assistance?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed the hon. Minister of Agriculture will be attending this meeting in Rosetown. He will be putting forth very clearly the litany of programs and support that this government has provided to the agricultural industry.

The hon. member knows that a third line of defence program was announced this spring that has exceeded $500 million. He also knows that moneys will be flowing very soon under the Net Income Stabilization Account program and under GRIP. Something in the order of $1.5 billion plus will be flowing into the hands of the farmers before Christmas.

The moneys that are flowing under the programs that have been established under the safety net program, the special program designed with the farmers in the spring, will provide in excess of $2 billion over the next 12 months.

That is not chicken feed, as we say out in western Canada. Those are real, hard, cold dollars. I think it clearly demonstrates that we are in fact dealing very co-operatively with the producers of Canada, recognizing the very serious difficulties they face primarily due to the trade war.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, last year the Farm Credit Corporation seized over 600 farms in Saskatchewan worth over $160 million.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that most of the programs he has been talking about now do not provide the support for the losses that farmers suffered in the 1990–91 crop year. They are asking for special assistance, a third line of defence. The government has not met that commitment.

When is the Deputy Prime Minister going to stop stonewalling? When is he going to stop taking up more and more time? When he is going to stop the smoke and mirrors show that he has been putting on and provide the cash that the farmers are asking for?

These farmers are not rallying 2,000 or 3,000 at a time for the fun of it. They are rallying because they are in a desperate financial situation, and they are asking the government for help.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member understands the significance of $2.5 billion, because it is $2.5 billion that will flow into the hands of the agricultural industry over the next 12 months.

Some $550 million to $600 million has indeed been provided under a special third line of defence program that was announced in the spring. There is money that is now flowing under the Net Income Stabilization Account. There is money that will be flowing under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, GRIP, the interim payment of which will be in the hands of the producers sometimes between the middle of October and the end of October.

That is cash.

Mr. Foster: Those farmers haven't received one red cent, and you know it.

Mr. Mazankowski: They may not have received the cash, but that is cash that is flowing to the farmers right now. Why would the hon. member try to discard that? $2.5 million is not chicken feed. That is hard, cold cash and the farmers will appreciate it very much, I am sure.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The drought committees in Essex and Kent counties, comprised of the Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, commodity groups and agricultural sales groups, have all worked very hard for two months to put together reports of the impact of the drought in Kent and Essex counties.

When the Essex County committee requested to meet with the minister to present this very comprehensive report, it was asked to meet with the minister's policy advisor.

Will he today make the proper commitment and make certain that the federal Minister of Agriculture takes the time to meet with the farm community and the individuals who are showing tens of millions of dollars lost this year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is a process in place which evaluates these situations. It is a third line of defence committee that is composed of farmers, representatives of the provincial government and the federal government. The work of that committee is ongoing.

As a matter of fact, my understanding is that it will be meeting in Winnipeg, I believe, later this week. It is my understanding that there will be—

An hon. member: The wrong province.

Mr. Mazankowski: We are dealing with this on the basis of a national program, and the third line of defence committee does not deal only with the province of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. It deals with the national situation.

It is under that auspices that we will attempt to ascertain the losses and to determine what sort of cash flow will be necessary, what kind of cash flow will be in the hands of the producers, and evaluate it on that basis. That is the established process to avoid the business of ad hoc programs which that member and other members have sought to discontinue. We agree with that. We have a process in place. Let us follow it.

PLYWOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In recent newspaper accounts, the U.S. trade representative implicitly threatened to levy a retaliatory tariff on Canadian plywood entering the U.S. Her remarks were, and I quote:

> Unfortunately, history proves that in our dealings with the Canadians in timber issues, nothing less than a hard headed approach by our government appears to ensure fair resolution of disagreements.

Has the minister investigated this issue? Will he ensure that Canada will not be bullied by the Americans when it comes to plywood like we were with the softwood surtax?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is helpful for the hon. member to tremble every time an American speaks about trade with Canada. I want to give him some facts to help him relax and he will not be so concerned.

We have removed the surtax. This has had a very strong positive effect already on the Canadian economy. We have marshalled our arguments very well. We do not think the Americans have any possible reply which will stand up. Thank heavens we have the bi-national panel to enforce it.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

At the meeting of the provincial, federal and territorial ministers of health held in Winnipeg, the standards of the Canada Health Act were upheld, including the prohibition of user fees.

The province of British Columbia did not send its minister of health to this important meeting and the premier of B.C. continues to advocate user fees.

My question is: Has the federal minister of health informed the premier of the province of British Columbia that user fees in that province will not be tolerated?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to comment on any declaration coming particularly from a premier in a province where there is an election.

I want to repeat what I said in Winnipeg. I said that of course we are opposed basically to any user fee. As long as there is none applied—and there is none to my knowledge, no user fee in the country that is being applied now—there is no reason to to do or say that we will do something. But if anything occurs, I will take my responsibility.

• (1440)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The reduction of Established Programs Financing to the provinces and territories continues to cripple their ability to uphold the standards of the Canada Health Act.

What assurances were given to the ministers of health at their recent meeting that the federal government will restore and maintain the federal funding for health care?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the member quoted what has been said in Winnipeg. However, he missed a part of the declaration which said that we should take into account the fiscal reality of the country. It was also in the declaration by the ministers of health.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has become painfully obvious that the Canadian airline industry is in a serious nosedive, thanks to the government's combined policies of deregulation, open skies, and its high interest, high dollar monetary regime.

Given that our two remaining national air carriers, Air Canada and Canadian, will continue to struggle to survive unless there are some major concessions from the federal government, what immediate plans does the government have to assist our airline industry and to protect the tens of thousands of Canadian jobs that are dependent on it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. member knows that Air France is not a Canadian airline and that it had to lay off a large number of employees last week. I presume he also knows that the four or five American airlines that have had to do the same thing are not of Canadian origin. Therefore the aviation industry throughout the world at the present time is in great difficulty because of the gulf war last year, the tremendous increase in gas prices and the number of people who are not travelling at the present time.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the minister ought not to be concerned about Air France, he should be concerned about Air Canada and Canadian and start at home.

Given that the government continues to maintain that an open skies agreement is part of the answer, can the minister explain to Canadians how Air Canada and Canadian will be assisted by allowing the large American carriers which he just quoted to come into Canada, fly across our country freely without any restrictions? Why not say no to cabotage and yes to a healthy Canadian controlled airline industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. member is aware that at the present time American carriers handle over 60 per cent of transborder traffic and earn $500 million more annually from this market than do Canadian carriers. About 13 million passengers move annually between the two countries, generating $2.3 billion in revenue. Scheduled air services between Canada and the U.S., including local and regional services, are provided to 84 cities.

The present open skies agreement is flawed. We have entered into open skies discussions with the Americans because we want to improve the level playing field for Canadian airlines and give them a better lease on life.

RAILWAYS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. Canadian National is scheduled to sell its rail line from Truro to Sydney, Nova Scotia by the fall of 1992.

Will the Minister of Transport explain to the House why the Government of Canada is allowing Canadian National to privatize this essential transportation link in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN has been given a mandate by this government to be as commercially profitable as possible. Therefore, CN is properly trying to find all the means of making sure that it will be competitive and will be able to stay in business. They are examining at the present time the possibility of making the line more profitable and therefore they are examining the possibility of privatizing that line if they can get a good deal that would provide improved service for the area. No decision has been made.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The minister knows that this railway line is the lifeline for many of our industries; coal, steel, lumber and fish, in order that they can move their products to essential Canadian markets.

I ask the minister why the sale, why the cause of uncertainty? Will he not now do the right thing and order CN to rescind this privatization order and keep this railway line intact? Will he tell them to do that?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I repeat that the intention of CN is to improve the performance of that line to give better service to the clientele at a better rate, making themselves more competitive and making the industry they serve more profitable and therefore be able to maintain better commercialization.

There is no cause for alarm. CN is examining the situation and the possibility of improving the service at a better price and I think they should be commended for doing that.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child requires the government to ensure the development of institutions, services and facilities for the care of children.

In recent weeks the government House leader and the minister of health have made contradictory statements on the government's willingness to fulfil its many promises to Canadians on a national child care program.

Since the Prime Minister has committed Canada to ratifying the UN convention and it is now the first anniversary of the UN summit on children, which our own Prime Minister co-chaired, will the minister tell Canadian parents and their children who have been waiting for so long when will you implement their national child care program? When, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Speaker: I know it was probably a momentary indiscretion but I would ask hon. members when they put their questions to address the ministers through the Chair.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe we are particularly sensitive to the problems of children, who are the most vulnerable part of Canadian society. I think we have done a lot but we we want to do still more, particularly at different levels.

With regard to the question on child care, I want to remind my colleague that we did in 1988 present something that was turned down particularly by the Liberals in the Senate. So far, we have presented the exemption of tax for Canadians.

We are looking now at new strategies, bearing in mind that since 1988 many problems have arisen on the issue of children, particularly in terms of child poverty and violence. Last year we put $136 million in these areas. We want to do more.

At the same time we have to take into account and put in perspective the previous comments of the President of Treasury Board. We can only do what the fiscal reality of the country allows us to do.

I hope that she will not ask me to raise taxes, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, Article 24 of the UN charter guarantees a child's right to health care services. Article 27 guarantees a child's right to an adequate standard of living. Article 28 guarantees the child a right to an education.

How can this government comply with those articles since it has deindexed the family allowance, capped the Canada Assistance Plan which funds child care services, cut back on funds for medicare and cut back on funds for post-secondary education? How can this government comply with those articles of that UN convention?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said before. We all agree in this House that all that can be done for children should be done. But I think a lot of members of Parliament agree that it has to be done in light of the country's capacity to pay. We have to provide the resources.

I am surprised that my colleague and her party does not understand that we can spend money forever, as did the former government, but there is a time when we have to pay for the services we give. We need the resources. We still believe, as do a lot of Canadians, that the better we manage the fiscal reality and the resources, the better service we will give to Canadians. It cannot be sorted out in the way that will not consider both, Mr. Speaker.

RAIL SAFETY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it concerns railway safety.

The CN rail crossing at Stewiacke, Nova Scotia is a complex intersection of five roads intersected by a rail line. Over many years there have been a total of 11 accidents resulting in deaths and injuries. The residents of the area have been demanding barrier gates for years and even decades.

I wonder if the minister could give us an update. Is there any progress towards eliminating this dangerous situation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I am glad the hon. member has raised this point. Like the hon. member, I am also very concerned about railway safety. This particular item has been raised with my department and a decision is being made. I think the hon. member will receive a very favourable answer very shortly.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

I am sure the minister is aware that the National Research Council has been looking at a proposal to establish the Institute for Instrumental Diagnostics in the city of Winnipeg, a very important research development for the entire country.

The governing council of NRC met last week to make a decision which was contingent upon the federal government providing $7 million of special financing to take care of the capital cost.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister in that capacity or as Minister of Finance if the federal government has now committed its support to that new research centre, and can he tell us if the decision has been a favourable one so we can go ahead and start this important work in the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, allow me to answer on behalf of the Minister for Science.

In no way are we pulling back from Winnipeg. I am happy to tell the hon. member that NRC's presence will remain very strong there. It is a question though of whether we will have a new institute or not. The whole question of expanding NRC programs and putting them into a new institute is what they are currently reviewing. What they are reviewing is an expansion and not a withdrawal. Their commitment to stay in Winnipeg for its present services is, of course, very firm.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I never thought the question of withdrawal of services was the issue. What I was asking about was this: Is this federal government prepared to match the offer of the National Research Council to establish a special Institute for Instrumental Diagnostics, which is a field of substantial growth around the world, which Canada can take a world-class leadership role in, for the sum of $7 million contribution? Compared to other contributions that have been made, I would say that is a good bargain.

I want to know this, perhaps from the Minister of Finance: Has he committed through his own department to make that commitment so that the NRC can go ahead and expand and develop that new research centre in the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the NRC is resolved to continue the strength of its program in Winnipeg. There is no doubt about that. However, in terms of creating a new institute, it has not made a decision to do so.

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Three weeks ago, on the Great Whale issue, the court ordered the government to meet its responsibilities arising from the James Bay Agreement. My question is, Will the Minister finally get with it? Will he comply with the federal court's judgement?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): It is done, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment. When? You have had three weeks to make this announcement and you have been forced into it. The reason that this—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must address the question to the Chair. The hon. minister may want to answer it.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, Great Whale is only one project. There are two others, one in Manitoba and one in Ontario. It was a year ago that we asked this government to appoint a panel to study the cumulative effects of the three projects.

It has been a year and the government has not acted. It is still sitting on its duff. When is it going to act?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first, in the case of Great Whale, the Federal Court ruling was quite clear in ordering the federal administrator to act immediately in enforcing the ruling. As I previously answered, that has been done.

The decision on whether to appeal or not has not yet been made. We are examining the ruling. The Department of Justice is examining the ruling and we will be informing the member accordingly.

Now on the issue of doing an assessment on the cumulative impact of different projects on James Bay and on Hudson Bay, we have had discussions with the provinces and we will continue to have discussions. I am happy to inform the member that we have not abandoned the idea of undertaking such a project. Quite the contrary, we expect to be able to make an announcement as soon as we have completed our discussions.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The government has claimed that the recession is finished, but the growth of output figures which were released today show that recovery in fact is very slow; only .2 per cent in July, the same slow rate which existed in June.

Will the government not try to speed this recovery up to help people across this country, to get people back to work, to reduce interest rates significantly and to see to it that the value of the Canadian dollar is brought down to help our exports so that people are helped across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what is encouraging is that this is the fourth consecutive month in which there has been an increase in the Gross Domestic Product and I think that is a clear indication that we are on the road to recovery.

What is also very encouraging is that the output of the goods producing industries expanded by .6 per cent, led by a strong growth in the manufacturing sector. The manufacturing sector is showing strength, expanding in July for the fourth consecutive month. Since its trough in March, we have experienced an increase in the manufacturing sector of 5.1 per cent.

We have never said that this was going to be a robust turn around. We said that we would have a recession that would be much less severe than the one in 1981–82 and that has been the case. The peak to trough decline in 1981–82 was over 5.5 percentage points. In this particular case, it is about 2.5 per cent to 2.8 per cent. So the decline was not as severe and it was not as long. We have had a good second quarter and we anticipate, for the third and fourth quarters, we will have moderate recovery and that is what the statistics are proving. We should be very satisfied with that.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, if this government is satisfied with the rate of growth, which will not decrease unemployment in this country, then this government should quit today.

Is the minister prepared to accept a .2 per cent rate of growth per month, which is not one month now but two months in a row of slow growth? Is he prepared to accept that when it means that unemployment in this country will stay over 10 per cent until well into next year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course I am not prepared to accept that and I certainly have not.

What I am saying is that we are on the road to sustainable recovery and durable recovery which will produce growth at a rate of about 3.5 per cent. Incidentally this seems to be one of the best anticipated growth rates of all industrialized countries in the world, certainly of the OECD. That I think is good news.

He asks about interest rates. Interest rates have come down by more than 5.5 percentage points. We saw a 9 basis point decrease last week. We expect, with the inflationary pressures receding, that interest rates can come down further still. If that is the case then we will be on the road to sustainable recovery with price stability, and that is the goal and the objective of this government. It will provide jobs. It will provide sustainable growth and will preserve the integrity—

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I have received a number of calls from people in southern Nova Scotia who are concerned about the speculation that the search and rescue helicopter and fisheries patrol helicopter contract will not be renewed when it runs out.

I wonder if the minister could assure fishermen and others in southern Nova Scotia that this very important service will continue to be there and operating out of southern Nova Scotia.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the helicopter contract in question was entered into several years ago. The period of the contract does not expire until March 1992.

There was certainly no decision made that once the contract expires there will be no further helicopter service there. The contract and the experience are now being evaluated by the department, and a decision will be made before next March as to whether this service will continue. It is a $2.35 million annual contract providing about 700 hours of fishery surveillance and it is available for search and rescue work.

I understand the feelings of the hon. member with respect to this matter. Certainly his views will be given every consideration when the time comes for a decision to be made with respect to this matter.

MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last week the minister tabled his economic union document in the House in which he says about marketing boards, and I quote: "The balance of risk is now clearly shifting against the desirability of many of our internal barriers and our ability to sustain them". He refers to marketing boards as being some of these so-called barriers.

I want to know from the Minister of Finance and former Minister of Agriculture: Is he still in favour of marketing boards or has he now changed his mind?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what that has to do with it.

The hon. member raises the point in the document. I might draw to his attention at page 55 that any modifications to the common market clause would also take into consideration the fact that equalization or regional development programs would not be affected, or any programs that were declared by Parliament to be in the national interest. If it is so deemed to be declared in the national interest that marketing boards should be categorized as such then it will certainly be exempt.

Mr. Chrétien: Are you in favour or not? Yes or no?

Mr. Mazankowski: If the hon. the Leader of the Opposition would wait and be patient for my answer, these are proposals that are advanced for the purposes of debate and discussion. The hon. Leader of the Opposition said with respect to the internal market that the programs did not go far enough.

It would be interesting to hear what he has to say about it.

TRIBUTES TO THE LATE JEAN-THOMAS RICHARD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, with respect and affection, I wish to point out today the death of an outstanding fellow citizen, Jean-Thomas Richard, my predecessor in this House for 27 years. Born in Sandy Hill, where he always lived, Jean-Thomas Richard married Margaret Maloney and was the father of John, Michael, Maria, Suzanne, Pierre, Tom and Adèle.

A lawyer by profession, he was a member of this House from 1945 to 1972. The riding was called Ottawa East and in 1972, Mr. Speaker, I had the honour to succeed him.

A hard-working man of the people, always available to his constituents—it would be hard not to admire and respect him. I know that he had many friends in this House. Those who had the privilege to really know him as more than the energetic, ever-present member of Parliament that he was, will attest to his kindness, friendliness, honesty and generosity of mind and spirit. He was present. He was also at the service of his fellow citizens.

Few challenges would have deterred Jean-Thomas Richard in his 84 years. One might even have thought that he would have defied death itself. His name Thomas suited him. He questioned a lot. He doubted everything.

I join all citizens of Ottawa—Vanier, Mr. Speaker, in extending to the Richard family our sincerest condolences.

[English]

Twenty-seven years in the service of his constituents in this House stands by itself as an achievement of note. J.T., as we called him and as he was called affectionately by his friends, sat in your chair, Mr. Speaker, on many occasions on Friday afternoons. He always ended his Friday duties by bidding his fellow parliamentarians "a good safe trip home and a pleasant weekend with your families and your constituents".

Speaking for all those who loved him, speaking for all citizens of my riding of Ottawa—Vanier, we say to his family, his numerous friends, Jean-Thomas Richard will be sadly missed. He was a great Canadian.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Richard had left this House by the time I was elected, but I had the privilege to know him while he was a member of Parliament and understood and respected the very long and dedicated service that he gave to this country.

On behalf of the government and my party, and personally, I want to associate ourselves with the words of regret just expressed by my colleague for Ottawa—Vanier.

The Richard family has maintained a very active interest in public affairs and public life in the country. Even after his departure from this House of Commons, Jean Richard maintained a very lively interest in the affairs of Parliament and the affairs of the economy and most particularly in the integrity of this country.

My wife's family lived at the time in parts of what was then his constituency. They did not at that time agree on political questions, but Jean Richard was very much admired and respected by all of the people he served for so long in this House of Commons.

[Translation]

On behalf of the government, myself and the Progressive Conservative Party, I wish to lend our support to what the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier said and offer the family of Jean-Thomas Richard our sincerest condolences.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party caucus, I would like to associate us and my colleagues with the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier about a former member of Parliament from his constituency, Mr. Richard, and say that we join with all members of the House in expressing to his family our sympathies and condolences and join with those members of Parliament here who remember this particular member of Parliament. I am not one of them.

It is unfortunate that it is only on occasions like this of sadness and bereavement when we get to reflect and sometimes even come to know about those who have served before us in this place.

I hope that the long and distinguished record the hon. member had will be a comfort to his family as it was a service to Canada.

• (1510)

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, it is with very serious and sincere intent that I rise today to say a few words about the late Jean T. Richard. He had been in this House for several years before I arrived here as a new member. I must say that having come here as a new member, Jean T. Richard was a great adviser and he had put in many years as a very successful practising politician.

He was one of those members who is what we consider today a good old time politician who had lots of time for his constituents. He would take the odd day and would take a travelling tour of eastern Ontario and visit several other ridings.

Those of us in this House know how important it is that MPs from whatever party go out and visit some of the ridings that have not seen a member for some time and to visit other members in the region. It creates a great rapport. I think we would be well served today if some of us took on some of those practices of these excellent old time practising politicians. They certainly knew their work and they did their homework.

He was very proud to be a member of Parliament in this House. He served Ottawa—Vanier well, as has the present member, who has spoken so well about Jean Richard this afternoon.

I valued Jean Richard as a great friend and a great adviser. He was a hard worker in this House. It is rather ironic today that we should be paying this tribute to him today when we have this Public Service legislation before the House. Jean T. Richard was always up on his feet when a Public Service bill of any type was before this House of Commons. He represented his constituents extremely well.

I want to say that it is very, very important that we recognize long time serving members such as Jean T. Richard at this time. It brings home to all of us the realistic feeling that he is one who has put a great deal into this House. He served eastern Ontario well. He served the Public Service community well and he had a great feeling for Canada. He was a bilingual person who spoke anywhere he was asked to go in the country.

I want to extend my personal feelings to the members of his family today. He was a husband, father and grandfather for whom we can all have a great deal of respect and admiration.

PRIVILEGE

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege and I ask your guidance in terms of how we can best deal with this issue respecting an ad that appeared in The Ottawa Citizen today, September 30, 1991, concerning the government's dispute with the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

I understand from the minister's comments earlier this morning that this ad also appeared in other papers across the country.

I have provided you with a copy of this advertisement. The section of it that causes me concern is this. The advertisement begins with a description of the offer made by the Government of Canada to the Public Service Alliance of Canada and it refers to:

> A wage offer consistent with the Government's budgetary guidelines—

It goes on to describe those guidelines as applying to:

> —Public Service employees, Ministers, Members of Parliament and Senators, as well as their staffs, the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; 0 per cent in the first year, and 3 per cent in the second year.

My concern about this ad arises from the fact that it describes the wage offer to the alliance as a wage offer consistent with the government's budgetary guidelines. It then goes on to say: "Guidelines which apply to all the following," as I have just read.

In fact, the government's budgetary guidelines, to the best of my knowledge, did not apply to the Canadian Forces and to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and may not, except by inference, have applied to the staff of members of Parliament and senators.

It is my view that in stating that the budgetary guidelines do apply to those two groups, in particular the forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the government, in this advertisement, is anticipating passage of legislation which is still before this House, still subject to amendment, and still subject to whatever disposition this House may make of it and whatever disposition the other place may make of it.

To state that these guidelines, as offered to the Public Service Alliance, do apply, I believe is not consistent with actions that have been taken by the government in Parliament, and indeed pre-empts decisions that this House may take in its debate today and tomorrow.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you have a careful look at this advertisement, in particular that section of it, and determine whether there is a question of privilege, in which case the proper motion would be moved.

I know, Mr. Speaker, you have dealt with similar situations in terms of public advertising, anticipating decisions of Parliament in this and in the previous Parliament. I wonder if you could advise as to whether there is a question of contempt involved in this advertisement and what the appropriate action would be if you find so.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I would urge you to take this matter very seriously as you have in the past when it has been raised in other forms, that the judgment of the House of Commons not be anticipated by the government, either by the kind of ad which has been referred to by the hon. member, or in advertising, or in any other way.

To do so is, in my judgment, a breach of the privilege of the House of Commons. It does not enable us to do our job as we are called upon to do. That is to make decisions when government is, in the course of advertising or in the course of placing the kind of ads referred to by the hon. member, basically predicting what the outcome will be and anticipating what the outcome will be and declaring the process of this House to be irrelevant.

It is basically saying that it will have its way and it is so confident of having its way that it can take out this kind of ad. I think that shows a contempt, not only for this House, but for the entire democratic process. I hope that you would take these things into account when you render a judgment on whether or not this is indeed a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any further members rising on this matter?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I was having a conversation. I wonder if I could just get the member to repeat the gist of what he was saying.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, initially I thought that the reluctance of any government members to rise had to do with the fact that what they are now being criticized for is the kind of thing they so righteously and self-righteously criticized when they were in opposition.

The fact of the matter is that it initially was not my question of privilege. I was saying that to take out the ad that was raised in the initial question of privilege by the hon. member for Ottawa West is to anticipate the outcome of the debate in the House of Commons. This declares the process irrelevant, the taking out of an ad on the basis of what the government thinks will happen in the course of the debate. I find that to be a violation of the privilege of the House of Commons.

We cannot do our job, as real decision makers, if the government, by taking out ads, is acting as if the decision has already been taken.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am at a considerable disadvantage. I wonder if you might just give us a few minutes to get a copy of the ad and see what the member is talking about.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West has risen in the House on a question of privilege and has brought to the attention of the Chair an ad which was placed in one or more newspapers which reads:

> To all Canadians: Here's What The Public Service Alliance of Canada Walked Away From

It goes on to describe the consequence of the attempted negotiations which were taking place.

The hon. member for Ottawa West has referred to, specifically, the opening paragraph, which reads:

> A wage offer consistent with the Government's budgetary guidelines which apply to Public Service employees, Ministers, Members of Parliament and Senators, as well as their staffs, the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police: 0 per cent in the first year, and 3 per cent in the second year.

Whether this is anticipating legislation may depend on how one wants to look at the wording. But clearly, the hon. member's intervention is incorrect because her argument is that the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and maybe staffs of members of Parliament and the senators, were not included in the government's budgetary guidelines.

Now that is the issue that is in front of us. I am prepared to step this down for a few minutes and I will listen to the hon. member for Calgary West, say in 10 minutes or as soon as possible, unless he wishes to argue it now.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, as you were talking, somebody did bring me a copy of the ad. I think I am prepared, at least in a preliminary way, to deal with it.

The ad states, I think, rather clearly that the President of the Public Service Alliance has called for a resumption of strike action rather than respond positively to the following offer made by the Government of Canada. So it is an offer made by the Government of Canada.

It is my understanding that all parts of that offer exist within the possibility of present control. For instance, the part dealing with members of Parliament and senators is dealt with by the Parliament of Canada Act. As for the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, there are acts that allow the government certain prerogatives when it comes to these issues.

We may, indeed, be superseding those acts with a piece of legislation that is before us, but at the moment, there is nothing in the offer that was not possible for the government to bring into being. That is my preliminary understanding. I will be glad to check that one more time, but I do not think there is anything inconsistent within the parameters of government responsibility today. The government is responsible for these issues and this indeed was an offer.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am going to deal with the matter now because of what is before the House and I think it is better to deal with it rather than delay.

First of all, the hon. member for Ottawa West is raising a matter which has been before the House before and especially in a ruling which I had to give many months ago with respect to certain ads that were published by the Government of Canada relating to the goods and services tax and which was done in quite explicit language and, in my opinion, quite improperly. They were printed in such a way that anybody reading it would assume or could easily assume that the legislation had, in fact, been passed by the House of Commons and would come into effect on a certain date which was stated in the ads. After listening carefully to certain remarks I decided then that the ad was not appropriate because it was doing exactly what ought not to be done, and that was making a very clear indication to anybody reading it that the legislation had in fact been passed.

I decided that it stopped just short of a contempt for reasons which I explained in that judgment. Nonetheless the matter gave the Chair a great deal of concern and, as has been said on a number of occasions since by both sides of the House, it is a matter that we should watch very carefully.

That is of course the point that the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona are making, that this is much the same.

I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for bringing the matter to my attention and, as I say, these matters are not always easy to be absolutely sure of at first glance, but a principle and a serious one is of course involved.

I have had a chance to consider the ad very carefully. First of all the ad is, as the hon. member for Calgary West said, indicating an offer made by the government to the Public Service staff, the Public Service Alliance, during the discussions which have been taking place over a number of days.

The paragraph to which the hon. member for Ottawa West takes exception reads:

> A wage offer consistent with the Government's budgetary guidelines which apply to Public Service employees, Ministers, Members of Parliament and Senators, as well as their staffs, the Canadian Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police: 0 per cent in the first year, and 3 per cent in the second year.

It may well be depending on how one wants to analyse that sentence—and I do not intend to be a grammar teacher here—that the hon. member for Ottawa West is pretty close to the mark when she says that this might give somebody the idea that the Canadian Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, members of Parliament and senators' staffs were included in the government's budgetary guidelines. I would say that is an argument which certainly is a credible one.

One might also argue on the other side that it depends on how you read it. But I certainly have to say in my view that the hon. member for Ottawa West has put forward a credible argument and I think that, depending on how much one knows about the background, the sentence in itself does create some confusion.

But I have looked at the ad carefully and where it falls away from being exactly the same or even nearly the same as the ad on the GST is that this is not talking about in my view legislation which "has been passed or is in place". It is talking about an offer made under circumstances in which I think it would be reasonable to assume the government would then have to do whatever was imperative to place that offer into effect in the event that the offer was accepted. I find that it stops short of the contempt that the hon. member for Ottawa West is asking me to find.

However, I again say that there is some confusion even in my mind, and I of course am not in a position to argue the facts on it, about that original paragraph. I do not think it is a confusion which leads to a contempt, although it certainly may lead to a question of debate in the House.

I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for bringing it to my attention. I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona for intervening, and I thank the hon. member for Calgary West.

I would ask hon. members, whenever possible, when dealing with those who write these ads to take care that what is in the ads is accurate and to take very great care that what is in the ads does not anticipate beforehand something that this House may or may not do.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to 14 petitions. [Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CANADA–EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

PRESENTATION OF FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House in both official languages the first and second reports of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association.

The first report concerns the 19th annual meeting of the delegations of the Canadian and European Parliaments. I want to ask all my colleagues in the House to take special interest in this report as it deals with the forestry and the great whale projects. The Europeans have a great deal of interest in these projects.

We recall what they did to the fur industry and so I would urge support in these and being aware of what the European Parliaments are studying about Canada.

The second report deals with the bilateral exchange in Turkey and the U.S.S.R.

This took place in June 1991. I would like to say, particularly to the Minister of Agriculture, who is in Brussels, that there is a great deal of interest in Turkey for Canada.

The GAP project is one in which Canada could become very much involved as Turkey expands its agricultural capabilities and I would hope that we would become involved.

The U.S.S.R. is open to Canadians. It would like to have a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians there in the very near future.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–302, an act to amend the Criminal Code (offences against the foetus.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament, as a father and a grandfather, I believe very strongly in the sanctity of human life.

It is my commitment to the constituents in my riding to work to protect the rights of the unborn. That is the purpose of this bill. I am honoured to present it in this House today.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

EMPLOYEES' RIGHT TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to submit a petition, pursuant to the Standing Orders, which calls upon the government to give up or reject wage control and to reaffirm its support for the free exercise of all Canadian workers right to collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker, the present government is prepared to deprive Canadian workers of their right to collective bargaining, to threaten them with lay–offs, especially by contracting out to interfere with the conciliation and arbitration processes, and to legislate them back to work.

These petitioners are asking that action be taken without delay to correct this situation.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have here before me, in accordance with the rules and regulations governing such, three petitions to present to the House.

Two address the question of the work stoppage, the strike today. These petitioners deplore the fact that the government has botched up this whole process. They note that the workers want to get back to work so as not to disrupt what is happening in Canada today. This is a good point, they indicate, to appoint a mediator so that we can get them back to work and get the country moving again.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My second petition deals with the 3 per cent administrative tax which some people consider perhaps even illegal, certainly immoral. That is the one, Mr. Speaker, you will recall, where you have to pay up front for the student loan that you need in order to continue your post-secondary education studies.

The petitioners are particularly angry when the government talks about competitiveness and all of those buzzwords and when it taxes students in spite of the fact that they have already been penalized with the goods and services tax on books.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a duly approved petition here from residents of the community of Westport in my riding. I believe that every resident in R.R. 2 Westport has signed this petition.

What they are petitioning against is the manner in which Canada Post awards rural route contracts these days.

We had a loyal, faithful rural route carrier who had been in business there for 25 years. He missed one day in 25 years and found that his contract was taken away from him on the basis of a few dollars. This is inherently the problem when a government would have a position where it would base it strictly on money.

The petitioners are asking that the minister in charge and Canada Post re-examine the basis on which rural route contracts are awarded so that contracts will not be awarded solely on the basis of money.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today signed by numerous residents of various communities across Ontario and Quebec.

These residents are opposed to the federal back-to-work legislation. They reject the imposition of wage controls. They call on the government and this Parliament to reaffirm its support for the free collective bargaining process in Canada and call upon the government to withdraw this bill and proceed to the negotiating table where these matters should be settled.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition signed by a number of Canadians. These citizens are asking this House to demand that the government reject this bill which purports to force government employees back to work.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject wage control and to reaffirm its support for the free exercise of all Canadian workers' right to collective bargaining.

[English]

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition to the House. It asks that the government take immediate steps to ban methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonal from all automotive fuels in Canada.

I was shocked when I read in the June issue of the Canadian Medical Journal that a substantial percentage of infants in the city of Montreal are iron deficient. We are aware that medical researchers in laboratory tests using animals find that when there are iron deficiencies the uptake of manganese is increased. This would indicate these infants in Montreal and across Canada, whose blood brain barriers and immune systems are not yet in place, may be victims of this insidious neurotoxic substance that will accumulate in their systems over a period of time.

In the name of the children of Canada, I ask this government to ban methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonal now.

TAXATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present further petitions asking Parliament to acknowledge that it is the federal government's high interest rate-high dollar policy and 33 new taxes or tax increases since 1984 that are the source of inflationary pressure, not wage demands; that the wage compensation package proposed by the government has no flexibility and treats everyone the same whether a clerk, deputy minister or president of a Crown corporation.

• (1540)

We have learned that well in this past week.

The petitioners ask Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here signed by several hundred petitioners, Canadian citizens from Sault Ste. Marie, the district of Algoma, North Bay and a number of other communities throughout Ontario, in which they deplore the imposition of 33 new taxes since September 1984 and state that these increased taxes have deepened the recession and caused inflation.

They call upon the government not to impose wage controls and to reconfirm its support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I also have a large number of petitions to present today pursuant to Standing Order 36 from Canadians from many parts of the country: New Brunswick, the Northwest Territories, Yukon, the national capital region and from northern Ontario, all protesting the government's action in raising taxes 33 times since 1984 and proposing to terminate the collective bargaining rights of public servants across Canada.

WAGE FREEZE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to table a petition signed by a large number of Canadians opposed to the way the Conservative Government is mistreating its public servants by refusing to negotiate with them.

The petitioners now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to ask the House of Commons to reject the wage freeze requested by the Conservative Government.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order passed on Tuesday, September 17, 1991, and Standing Order 100, I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The House in Committee of the Whole under the chairmanship of Mr. DeBlois, resumed study of Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Upon recess, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier had the floor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Chairman, the amendment in front of us is quite simple and will allow members of the government and the President of the Treasury Board to tell us what their offer is made of.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by my colleague for Ottawa West suggest to apply the wage freeze to the following definitions, and I quote clause 2, page 2: "—does not include—and this would be eliminated from the bill—any allowance, bonus, differential, premium or other emolument or benefits paid in respect of circumstances specified by order of the Treasury Board."

The object of this amendment is specifically to give the President of the Treasury Board the opportunity of being clear about the position of the government regarding bonuses, premiums and other benefits.

You will recall that last week, there was quite an outcry when we learned that big shots, people already so well paid that they needed a yearly bonus, were about to receive or had already received bonuses which in the case of Mr. Lawless of CN Rail amounted to $84,000, when his annual salary is a mere $365,000. Not bad! The bonus for Don Lander would be about $62,000 for an annual salary of $250,000. Nothing to complain about! And the list goes on. Atomic Energy of Canada: $50,000 on a $208,000 salary.

The general public and the Public Service employees feel somewhat disgusted when they see how generous this government, which refused to recognize the needs of its own employees, could be, how it could so freely give away the taxpayers' money to the big shots at Crown corporations.

Mr. Chairman, that is the first thing you have to acknowledge. Were it not for this government's lack of integrity, as we perceive it back home, we could still be at the negotiating table today. The civil servants and the unions were shocked, Mr. Chairman, and I don't blame them. It is insulting to be told that legal, logical collective bargaining is out of the question, while the government tries some new tricks, as was the case with the chairman of Canadian National and the chairman of Canada Post.

I think Bill C-29 which is now before the House, Mr. Chairman, puts an end to 25 years of collective bargaining between civil servants and the federal government. Things will never be the same. The Conservative government has now created such an awful mess that I do not see how we can solve this, unless we go back to the table and negotiate in good faith and, after this unfortunate experience, go back and rewrite, review, and revise all the legislation relating to the civil service, such as the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act in particular, and the Financial Administration Act.

[English]

Parliament passed the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1967. It established the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Parliament set the bargaining process in motion with a deliberate preference for the operational principle of the adversarial system. It was a choice that was made by this House in 1967.

Certain areas are restricted from collective bargaining and others by arbitration. Certain members of personnel were excluded from union membership. Others were designated as those who performed services essential to the public health and safety and could not join their fellow unionists in the event of a strike.

Public Service unions were given two possible routes to resolve disputes. One is binding arbitration. The other is the appointment of a conciliator who assists in non-binding recommendations for settlement. If an impasse exists and no resolution is possible, Public Service employees have a right to withdraw their work, that is they have a right to strike.

In my opinion, public servants have a good case to make when they complain that collective bargaining granted to them in 1967 is too restrictive.

• (1550)

Those of us who have been in this House for some years know and recall how this Progressive Conservative Government in 1984 said: "We are going to review the Public Service Staff Relations Act. We are going to try and give you more in terms of flexibility".

I want to remind the House that under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, such things as bargaining, promotions, demotions, staffing levels, or what we call classification positions, lay-offs and pensions are non-negotiable. You cannot bargain on those things. Those are things that can be bargained under the Canada Labour Code, but they cannot be bargained under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Federal public sector employees are usually dead last when compared to the private sector, when compared to municipal or provincial employees' salary packages. The last time I looked at it, it was clear to me that this so-called fat cat image that was promoted by some right-wing politicians in Canada was making people believe that Ottawa public servants and 75 per cent of the others who work outside of Ottawa—the National Capital has about 25 per cent of the total public servants of Canada— were fat cats, that they were over-paid and under-worked.

In those days the government did not help the image. I can recall and I am sure everyone in this House can what Mr. Mulroney was saying about public servants in 1983. I will not repeat it because I thought in those days that it was wrong to do this kind of goading of public servants in trying to score with the right wingers of Canada.

This government has definitely, definitely goaded, provoked public servants into a situation which, in my view, is not their fault by the government's sole responsibility. The Public Service Staff Relations Board said the government did not negotiate in good faith.

Mr. O'Kurley: They did not say that.

Mr. Gauthier: Read the judgement. Read the decision. I can quote it for you. Page 10 of that decision: "This board, in general, shares the view expressed in the cases cited above. The obligation provided under the Public Service Staff Relations Act to bargain in good faith and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement is not substantively different for this employer than it is for any other employer in any other jurisdiction—" and so on.

Whether you like it or not, the Public Service Staff Relations Board said clearly, at least to my ears, in English and in French that this government did not bargain in good faith.

I come back to my original thought. This Mulroney government has destroyed any chance of employer-employee peace in the near future. Further, it has abandoned good faith bargaining with its employees. In my view, it has purposely, deliberately provoked the Public Service of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, thousands of loyal and competent employees in the Public Service are affected by this legislation. That includes clerks, secretaries, librarians, information officers.

I would like to go back to the three or four points that were raised this morning. We talked about pay equity. What is pay equity, Mr. Chairman? I have here a definition of that term. Pay equity: the obligation to pay the same salary to men and women in the same organization if the work they perform is deemed to be of equal value. The value of the work is based on a combination of the following factors: 1) skills and knowledge; 2) physical and mental effort; 3) responsibilities; and 4) working conditions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is the whole problem of regional pay. Electricians working for the Public Service of Canada receive $3.94 less in St. John's, Newfoundland, than in Victoria, BC. A first-class fireman employed in a federal airport earns $8,000 less per year than his municipal counterpart.

The other item involves job security. People say, and that is what the government's ad says, that public servants enjoy a certain degree of job security. Mr. Chairman, everyone knows that 13,000 positions have been cut since 1985. The government spends $5 billion for contracting out without establishing if it is cost-efficient. I defy anyone to find out how much contracting out costs the government. Try to find it in the books. Can any member in this House, can even the President of Treasury Board tell me where to find the total cost of contracting out government services? Unions say $5 billion. We can therefore believe that it is much higher. As things stand right now, it is impossible to know with certainty. Even the Public Accounts Committee that I chair has tried, without success, because bookkeeping is done in such a way as to make it impossible to have a clear and exact picture of the cost of contracting out.

As for the cost of living, Mr. Chairman, civil servants as each and everyone of us have been taxed by this government ever since the Tories came to power in 1984. That was seven years ago! The cost of living index has risen by 5,8 per cent since September 1990. Everything has gone up, the cost of living, taxes, income taxes, for civil servants as for everyone else. The government's annual salary budget, including social benefits but excluding the Armed Forces, totals $12 billion; that of the civil servants members of the Alliance represents $4,8 billion, that is to say 3 per cent less than the federal government's expenses. Those who are now on strike, Mr. Chairman, represent less than 3 per cent of the pay envelope.

Interests on the debt alone are totalling $41 billion a year. We talked about the debt last week and I refer those interested by that matter to read last week Hansard. They will get their money's worth!

Mr. Chairman, 67.9 percent of those who earn less than $30,000 in the Public Service of Canada are women. Sixty-eight per cent, Mr. Chairman! Fifty per cent of the members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada earn less than $27,000 a year.

Several thousand public servants affected by the strike earn less than $20,000. I will come to that because constituents have sent me letters and have called me to explain their situation.

In 1990, 84,470 public servants earned less than $35,000. In 1982, Mr. Chairman, during a debate in this House, Michael Wilson found—and I emphasize it—"unfair" the 6 and 5 per cent salary increases offered to public servants. He was asking the government of the day—and I quote—"to provide a salary restraint program that would have some flexibility so that people on low incomes who are in the worst economic position today could be treated differently and those who warranted some merit increases could be treated differently". That is what Michael Wilson said in the House of Commons on June 29, 1982. Mr. Chairman, I do not know where he is today, but in 1982 that same minister was against treating public servants unjustly especially those who earned less than average.

Mr. Chairman, section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the 1982 Constitution Act reads as follows: "Every individual is equal before and under the law—"

Would big companies in Canada have the same right as the federal government to act like the governement is presently doing? Would they have the right to refuse to negotiate in good faith, to refuse to appoint a mediator, to impose their own choices?

• (1600)

The Tory government is trying by all means to draw the public's attention away from the causes and effects of free trade, of the GST, and to impute them to the lowest paid of its public servants.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on and on, but I only have 20 minutes and I would like to ask a few questions to the President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

There is no good reason to have abandoned 25 years of hard work in employee-employer relations in favour of a power struggle which is becoming increasingly ugly. This Tory policy of finding an enemy within the public servants of Canada is wrong, very wrong, dead wrong.

The Conservatives under Mr. Mulroney are trying to create an anti-public service atmosphere and they are failing. They are trying to distract Canadian attention from their own unpopular image. They are trying to find a scapegoat.

Mr. Mulroney himself, the Prime Minister, is trying to fool some Canadians into thinking that public servants are the enemy. I resent that strategy and so do many thousands of public servants.

In my riding, the average pay of a member of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which is striking today, is $27,000. Many in my riding earn less than $25,000. I resent very much this government telling my constituents that they must accept lower pay, no job security, no pay equity, no rights to bargain. At the same time, this government is burdening them with high taxes, including the GST, increases in unemployment insurance premiums, high interest rates, 5.8 per cent inflation. The government is asking them to accept sacrifices while not providing the means to bear these sacrifices.

Public servants suffered for the last seven years under this government, which came into power in 1984 with the avowed—and I remember very clearly because we fought it at that time and we fought an election on this issue—objective to slash jobs in the Public Service, to demoralize the public servants by contracting out the jobs they had, to privatize Crown corporations, to unjustly decentralize. I come back to the Farm Credit Corporation move which was just announced last week.

What a coincidence. On the same day that we started looking at Bill C-29, this bill to force them back to work, we hear the government found, I am told, $10 million to move 200 public servants to Regina. On that same day a Tory government called an election.

I could read into the record, if the minister wants to hear them, letters from members of the Farm Credit Corporation of Canada who take exception to being used as pawns in this political game of his.

I only have one minute, and I want to ask the minister the essential questions on this debate. There is an amendment before us put by the member for Ottawa West. That amendment reads:

> That clause 2 be amended at page 3 by deleting lines 2 through 6 and substituting the following therefor:
> —amounts of pay—

In other words, the gifts that were given were called by some editorialists luxury bonuses that were given to certain people. Is the government going to support this amendment, making it clear to all Canadians that there will be no bonuses, no indemnities, no special treatment for its friends in higher offices?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I first wish to inform the hon. member that the government is very firmly determined not to leave any doubt on the matter of bonuses and performance pay.

I repeat once again that, for the current fiscal year, the year running from April 1991 to April 1992, the salary of these people has been frozen in April 1991. When it is time for a bonus, at the end of April 1992, they will receive zero cent.

As for the legislation, I can say that I receive his proposal positively. I am told that the wording presents only one risk, by preventing the Treasury Board, for example, from adjusting travel allowances, or such other matters. Which does not worry him at all, I think.

With your permission, I will ask my counsels to discuss with Opposition members, to see if we can find a suitable wording; but, we very clearly have no intention to go back on that issue. It will be done through legislation, or another way, but it will be a matter of wording. Not being a lawyer, and I do not apoligize for that, I will not go into the subject.

However, I would remind the hon. member that, because of the present situation, it is risky to talk about these bonuses which were never given. I would thus recommend him some caution.

He also made a little exaggerated statement when he said that we are ending 25 years of negotiations. Would he have wanted us to do as two liberal governments did, those of Newfoundland and New Brunswick, and impose a 0 per cent raise in the Budget? We preferred, after 25 years of negotiations, trying to solve this problem by means of negotiation. We did sit at the bargaining table for 60 days. Then we went to conciliation. We were in conciliation for 30 days without having a single proposal from the Public Service Alliance allowing us some hope of progress.

In other words, if we made a hard decision in the Budget by establishing pay raise parameters at 0-3-3 for three years, it is because of the difficult situation our country is currently facing. We must not lose track of what is happening in the country. Quite a number of companies have experienced hard times and as we are getting out of our recession, we must send them a very clear message, telling them that we are determined to do our share.

Further on, he said that we tried to solve our budgetary problems on the backs of public servants. No. What we are asking public servants is to do their bit, along with many others. We ask unionized workers to do their share. We also asked managers to do their bit, since we will cut their number by 10 per cent. We asked the provinces to do their share, by reducing the rate of increase of their transfers. These will continue to grow, but the growth rate will be reduced. We asked all departments to do their share, since we intend freezing their overall operating costs.

So we asked everybody, be it the Prime Minister, the ministers, the opposition leaders and all the members of this House, to do their bit. If our process was such as he describes, can it be that four unions managed to use it and sign agreements accepting the 0-3-3? How can it be that binding conciliation reports recommended settlements within the parameters we established? Is it not because the Public Service Alliance, even before the budget was laid down, and immediately after, stated that it had absolutely no intention of negotiating, that it was launching into a political fight?

As for us, we made serious efforts. I told you the number of full days we spent at the table. Only this week, we had 35 negotiation meetings.

Now we could have done like those other Canadian governments who took even harsher measures. We had to take these measures because of an extremely difficult situation. With its deficits and its debt, the government takes up too much room. It takes up all the money available. Next year, we will pay $41 billion in interests. We are taking up all the money. And all the businesses wishing to get going again are stuck because we have them nothing. At budget time, we decided to make an effort. We saw there was also a risk of inflation brought upon by a very high increase in manpower costs, an increase of 25 per cent as compared to the United States for the last few years. So we wanted to send a very clear signal to everyone: Careful! We have to get with it. And the best way to do it, as one of the major employers in Canada, would be to take our responsibilities. The hon. member spoke of loyal employees who are being affected. He spoke of less favoured people whose salaries are much lower and who will be affected. But it is not the Treasury Board who terrorized people on picket lines. It is not the Treasury Board who accused those people of being scabs and scum of the world. It is the leaders of the PSAC who should ask themselves what kind of respect they have for their own employees.

On the other hand, knowing how difficult the salary freeze is on them, we have offered those less favoured employees, as I indicated this morning, who earn less than $27,500, a $500 bonus, a lump sum payment which will help them to make it through this difficult period.

The member also spoke of job security. He said that for one thing the government is proud to have slashed 13,000 jobs. What we have eliminated is positions. We have made the public service less expensive. But we have protected our employees since 1986. Between 1,300 and 1,400 public servants over a quarter of a million lost their jobs. And, in most cases, it was because they did not want to move to another place while we were willing to provide them with adequate training and to help them, for two years, to find something else. As an employer, we have nothing to be ashamed of.

We will not excuse ourselves for trying to manage more rigorously the country's finances or to maintain services at a lower cost.

The member spoke of regional rates of pay, he said we paid certain classes of employees lower salaries in Newfoundland than we did in Toronto. That is obvious and it is indeed our policy in a number of areas not to interfere in a certain region and completely disorganize the local market with salaries that are not in accordance with the local reality. So it is our policy not to do that according to the best rules both of good management and employees well-being.

So, if I may, Mr. Chairman, I would essentially invite the hon. member to think about my remarks and to try to be a little more level-headed in his accusations. In summary, no merit bonuses or performance awards will be given this year, that is for the year 1991-1992, if we find a satisfactory wording. Anyway, there will be none at all if we find a satisfactory formulation. As for me, I do not oppose in any way the fact that this be included in the law if it does not stop us from making adjustments, if you will, to travel expenses, etc., that are adjusted almost periodically.

And as for the negotiation, I want to ensure the hon. member that it has been done in good faith, that we have really tried to find a solution and that we are not the ones who left the table. The union is the one who dit it.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's comments about the amendment before us. He said that except for the wording that could perhaps be tightened, or qualified again or redone, he would accept to include or exclude, if you will, the bonuses and all that.

I would like to ask him a very specific question. He said that the bonuses are excluded, that there will be no bonuses. But the answer is that there will be no raises if there are no bonuses.

Mr. Loiselle: The raise was due on April 1st, but it was not granted. These people were given a zero raise; therefore, they are in the year zero. So, when comes the time for the bonus at the end of the year they will receive a cheque for the amount of zero cent, zero dollar.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: So, before recognizing the member from Saint-Maurice, I recognize the member from Mission—Coquitlam.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions which I would like to ask the minister, specifically under section 2. I will try to be very specific. If I could just give the minister the questions, possibly he could answer them all at once.

First, under section 2, subsection 1(a), I would like to know if the minister could tell us which workers are covered under the Canada Labour Code.

Second, is it the intention of the government to impose wage controls on all workers under federal jurisdiction?

Third, are other workers under the Canada Labour Code next, such as those who are not listed here?

Fourth, this is the section that refers to the Canada Labour Code. Why are those under the Canada Labour Code being included in this pre-emptive way, beyond those who are in the Public Service Alliance?

Fifth, is the Government of Canada the collective bargaining agent for all of these workers?

Sixth, under 2(1)(b), is the government intruding on parliamentary privilege under this section?

Seventh, under 2(1)(b), are not MP's budgets now global with the right to determine numbers of employees and rates of pay?

Eighth, under 2(1)(c), this is under "Definitions." Will the government explain its intrusion upon, and pre-emption of, other collective agreements that have been negotiated in good faith by Public Service Alliance of Canada and other recognized bargaining agents?

Ninth, under 2(1)(c), because by law, a member's, meaning members of Parliament, staff is not entitled to be represented by a union, does the minister intend that those workers who are staff for the NDP caucus, and who have collective bargaining rights under voluntary recognition, shall be stripped of their rights under their collective agreement?

Tenth, under that same section, will the government respect the collective agreement signed between parliamentary association support staff and the NDP caucus?

Eleventh, does the minister believe in the principle of free collective bargaining?

I would also like to ask the minister: Under "compensation", under the (b)(ii) part of that definition, does this clause mean that the minister will grant adjustments to compensation, from time to time, at his discretion, with the approval of Treasury Board?

Does this not mean that the minister can be swayed by lobbying, pressure tactics and at his own whim? Does this clause mean that the minister can remove whole groups or sections now covered by this legislation? Does it mean then that it is an escape clause for the minister? Does subsection (b)(ii) also mean that those persons under the definition of "employee" who do not have a bargaining agent can appeal directly to the minister as individuals, groups or departments? Under this clause, what kind of directive policy, regulation or agreement is the minister capable of recommending under section (b)(ii)?

Is the minister intent on passing this legislation, that goes far beyond the back to work order, and then make deals with the powerful or with his friends? Is it not the minister's intent to cut his own deals after this legislation is passed? If it is not his intent, why is this clause in a "compensation" definition of the legislation?

Under "compensation plan", does this include the agreement between PSAC and the NDP caucus? Does the minister intend that individual MPs and senators will bargain with the minister and Treasury Board for their own future salary increases? Does this clause include operating budgets of MPs and senators?

Under the section that is referred to as "employee" under "Definitions" are MPs, cabinet ministers and senators now considered to be employees? Why, in establishing this legislation, has the minister not included his friends, CEOs and senior executives of Crown corporations?

Under the definition of "strike", does this mean that an individual cannot be on strike unless he or she is acting in concert with others? Does this section include workers who judiciously follow work place rules who, therefore, appear to be working more slowly than normal, when normally they cut corners for speed and efficiency? Does this section include members of Parliament, cabinet ministers and senators?

Under the "wage rate" definition, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask why this bill does not apply to bonuses paid to senior managers. Will the minister explain the difference between compensation and reimbursement for expenses? Will the minister explain what allowances are not included? Will the minister explain what bonuses are not included? Will the minister explain what differentials and premiums are not included?

The definition of "emolument" using the Oxford Dictionary is: "profit from office or employment, salary." Will the minister explain what will be realized and by whom? Will the minister explain what benefits are not included?

Under the "Expiration of compensation plans", can the minister tell us how many employees do not have a set date for revision of wage rates, and when those revisions would take place?

• (1620)

Finally, I would like to ask the minister if he would agree to a unanimous consent request to call Mr. Bean and Mr. Capello to the bar as witnesses during Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the last question is no, but to the others, she has been throwing them faster than I can write them so I will wait for the transcription and I will provide the answers as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate because I feel the present situation has gone on long enough and that Parliament should be allowed to legislate, as soon as possible, and end to the dispute between the leaders of the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Government of Canada, or more specifically, Treasury Board.

Perhaps I may first comment on the tragi-comic role played by the Leader of the Opposition during Question Period today. The Leader of the Opposition rose in the House looking very stern and very angry. He was outraged that as a result of this dispute, farmers and especially Western farmers had lost up to $30 million per week. He said it did not make sense. The strike had been going on for two weeks, people had lost up to $30 million and this was jeopardizing the grain transportation industry in Western Canada, and finally the minister had not even considered designating these workers as providing an essential service.

It was rather interesting to hear the Leader of the Opposition tell us that after two weeks, the strike had caused irreparable harm, that it had to be settled quickly and that he was angry at the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Chairman, in 1975, the present Leader of the Opposition, who is so upset today, was then the member for Saint-Maurice and President of the Treasury Board of Canada. Do you know what happened in 1975? There was a strike in Western Canada. Grain shippers went on strike when the Leader of the Opposition was President of the Treasury Board. This morning, he was angry at our government for letting the strike go on for two weeks. He said it did not make sense and that we were going to destroy the economy of Western Canada. Do you know what the Leader of the Opposition did way back when, Mr. Chairman? He let the strike by grain shippers go on, not for a week, not for two or three weeks like the strike we have now, but for 31 days. He was President of the Treasury Board. He even went so far as to say the country would understand that sometimes we had to put up with some inconvenience because of a minor strike. Interesting. This was a strike by the people who shipped grain in Western Canada. A strike that lasted 31 days. But when he was President of the Treasury Board, it wasn't important. When the hon. member for Quebec City is President of the Treasury Board and the strike goes on for 14 days and negotiations are broken off, that is serious stuff, and so he rants and raves on the floor of the House.

On top of that—if the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would care to listen—do you know, Mr. Chairman, what kind of settlement the federal government granted its employees from the West in 1975, after they were on strike for 31 days? The Canadian people who are following this debate will understand why we have such a terrible deficit in this country and why it is so difficult to get it under control. After these 31 days of strike, the present leader of the opposition finally granted a 29.2 per cent wage increase over a two-year period! That is what he managed to do, Mr. Chairman, with the consequences that we know on the next generations of Canadians, these children who are yet to be born and who will have to pay during their entire lifetime for the mistakes that government made in the 1960s and 1970s.

Mr. Plourde: He gave them more than they were asking for.

Mr. Pronovost: He did indeed give them more than they were asking for, as the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup has just pointed out. The union was asking for slightly less, and the President of the Treasury Board sought to buy peace by giving them an extra one per cent. That is going a little too far!

Earlier I was listening to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and I can understand him, considering that his constituency is made up mostly of federal public service employees. I understand that he should stand up for them because they are his constituents. I too have many federal civil servants in my riding. For the province of Quebec, I may have more relatively speaking, Mr. Chairman, considering my riding is partly rural and partly urban. Yet, I will never toady to the local PSAC leaders. I refuse to do so although I know that these people are being penalized today. That is true! You know that nobody finds it amusing to get a 0 per cent increase.

On the other hand, the President of the Treasury Board came up with a proposal to give employees in the lower brackets, in view of the financial situation of the country, a $500 increase. And what did Daryl Bean think of that? He called it a slap in the face. Five hundred dollars; a slap in the face!

With the number of unemployed and welfare recipients in my riding of Shawinigan, Mr. Chairman, I know that many men and women in Quebec who would not mind getting a $500 slap in the face from the federal government. How many people across the country, do you figure? Personally, I am happy that federal civil servants are entitled to a slew of fringe benefits. I am not jealous. I think that we treat them well. Maybe union leaders should be reminded that there are in Canada millions and millions of workers who do not have a dental plan entirely paid for by the government or fully indexed pensions.

Mr. Chairman, civil servants' pensions are fully indexed. This is a monetary advantage for which Canadian taxpayers will pay for years and years to come. It is still reasonable.

I heard the Liberal member from the Ottawa area—because you see, since most federal civil servants are in the Ottawa area, we are no longer in the Quebec round or the Canada round but in the Ottawa round. You saw that today, Mr. Chairman. All members from the Ottawa area are out to defend the public servants and I understand them in a way.

They said that because the Liberals were in the habit of spending, the federal government will not save on the deficit we have by cutting a little from the Public Service. But for people in Shawinigan and my riding, Mr. Chairman, millions and billions of dollars are sizable sums of money. This government's wage control plan will save the federal treasury $675 million this year and about $3.5 billion over five years. That may not be much for the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, because when he was in power, he spent.

Mr. Boudria: I was not even here.

Mr. Pronovost: But you were here in thought anyway. You drove around in the buses and heard what the MPs were saying. At that time you drove a bus, you were a House of Commons employee. You knew what was going on. Already a Liberal at heart!

Mr. Chairman, for the Liberals, a saving of $3.5 billion a year is not much. But the people in Saint-Boniface in my riding know that this plan, which applies to all MPs, ministers, RCMP officers, everyone without exception, and will save $3.5 billion and they realize that this government has at least taken note of the situation.

We will go even further. I just heard some Liberal members say that the four federal public service unions that accepted the 0-3-3 offers caved in to the government.

That is strange, but I will take the province of Quebec as an example. In the first six months of this year, public service unions in Quebec signed an agreement providing for no wage increase, without going on strike. Even comrade Gérald Larose of the Confédération des syndicats nationaux signed this document with Mr. Daniel Johnson, President of the Quebec Treasury Board. Gérald Larose, the president of the CSN, the most militant of all unions not only in the Province of Quebec but also in Canada, said: We don't like it, but the Quebec government has no choice because workers in the private sector have to make sacrifices and provincial civil servants should do the same.

Fernand Daoust of the FTQ and Lorraine Pagé of the Centrale de l'enseignement du Québec took a similar position. They said: We do not like it, but we have to realize that the Quebec government is in a fiscal position that has an impact on all Canadians. All those union leaders signed that document. They didn't put anything in shambles anywhere. In Nova Scotia, the provincial government has imposed a freeze at 0 per cent. In Saskatchewan, an increase of 2 per cent over two years. In Manitoba, 0 and 2 per cent. In Newfoundland, 0 per cent. In New Brunswick, 0 per cent. The most generous government, in the whole of Canada at the present time, is the federal government, with 0, 3 and 3. And we have a national strike, the consensus is broken.

• (1630)

I would like to say this: In Quebec, in 1972, we had a terrible strike in the Quebec Public Service. Union leaders from the CNTU, the FTQ and the CEQ were sent to jail. The social contract was totally torn apart. But unions in Quebec and the government understood something: the superior interest of the nation in such a bargaining. You cannot, Mr. Chairman, paralyze a country like it's being done today. Especially when you have seen what Mr. Daryl Bean and Johane Hurens can do.

People are saying that if the federal government is going to freeze salaries at 0 per cent, it is going to hurt. They are right, it is going to hurt, and I recognize it. This is being said when we known that, since February, the government was going to do it, we did not try to hide it like the Hon. Member for Lac Saint-Jean, leader of the Bloc Québécois, who rolled back salaries in the Public Service in Quebec by 20 per cent without telling anyone. At least we said in February: "here is our fiscal policy, here is what we are going to do." This is what the Hon. Member did. He did many other things, but we will keep that for later.

When you are in a situation, Mr. Chairman, where you have to freeze salary at 0 per cent increase, it is no joke, but this is reality. At the same time, the Public Service Alliance of Canada is dragging its members into a strike which has been going on for three weeks now. Every single week of strike is about 2 per cent of the annual salary. These three weeks of strike mean that members of the Alliance will now have an increase of minus 6 per cent. The Public Service Alliance of Canada, madam Chairman, has just imposed a 6 per cent cut to all its members and they dare telling us that 0 per cent increase is awful.

Daryl Bean and Johane Hurens are playing the New Democratic Party's game, Madam Chairman. They are allies, they are siamese twins. They are trying to make the government fall, to weaken the government, but I think that on this side of the House, as well as among most Canadians, it is understood that this an unacceptable political game.

I would also like to say that today's situation is the result of the irresponsibility of some union leaders who have broken law and order.

[English]

Yes, Madam Speaker, an appeal and a disrespect for law and order that is being displayed at numerous locations in the country today and yesterday. Let us take an example. At the Ste-Anne-de-Bellevue Hospital in Quebec, a hospital for elderly Canadian veterans, an injunction had to be obtained yesterday to limit picketers and to attempt to have these PSAC members obey the law.

This morning this court injunction was ignored. Picketers threw eggs and tomatoes at designated, essential employees, including nurses who have a legal obligation to report for work. They delayed these people from reporting for work which could have threatened the lives of many hospital patients.

All through the Atlantic provinces and Quebec this morning, picket lines were not only violating the Criminal Code of Canada by blocking access to many federal facilities, but they were directly violating an order issued last week by the Public Service Staff Relations Board not to delay designated, essential employees from reporting to work.

This union was directed to answer the cease and desist order by the board today in St. John's, Newfoundland, Saint John, New Brunswick, Dartmouth, Halifax, Gander, Montreal and Ottawa.

Picket lines today are flagrantly violating the order of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and are delaying or preventing essential services from being performed.

At the Sydney, Nova Scotia, airport this morning some 200 picketers from many federal offices in Sydney blocked the airport, preventing essential services personnel from reporting. They agreed on that. Only three out of 37 employees were able to get into work, thus requiring the closure of the airport from 5.30 a.m. to 9.45 a.m.

[Translation]

At Dorval this morning, strikers destroyed facilities and did some damage in a number of buildings. Strikers also threw nails on the access roads to Dorval. This is an interesting point, Madam Chairman.

[English]

In Ottawa here today at the taxation office on Cumberland Street, 300 picketers blocked access to the building by lying down in the street, requiring the presence of the Ottawa anti-riot squad.

At federal prisons in Drummondville, Cowansville and Ste-Anne des Plaines, designated correctional officers were being delayed or prevented from relieving their colleagues on the overnight shift.

[Translation]

Madam Chairman, I could go on forever about incidents that jeopardize public safety, the safety of veterans in hospitals like Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue in Quebec, and the safety of meat inspection—what could be more important than ensuring the safety of the food Canadians eat? Today we had a situation that reminds me of the wild cat strike we had in Quebec in 1972. The President of the Treasury Board said—and I am reaching the end of my speech—that he negotiated with Daryl Bean for 90 days. Well, Madam Chairman, I can tell you that people in Shawinigan and Grand-Mère, in my riding, think 90 days with Daryl Bean is a long time.

The President of the Treasury Board was extremely patient to listen to all these complaints, especially since in February, and I think Canadians should remember this, when the federal Budget was brought down, Daryl Bean and Johane Hurens said in the lobby of the House that they were going to call a general strike. They promised Canadians they would. They would paralyse the country and get rid of this government.

I can see why members of the New Democratic Party would get involved in this kind of strategy, because strikes and demonstrations make them feel good. However, I have trouble understanding Liberal members who have been in power and know what it means to be responsible, Madam Chairman. I realize they are trying to protect their power base in ridings in the Ottawa area, where members were elected by public servants, but they should have the guts to explain to their constituents, to those public servants, that because of the present financial situation in this country, we cannot give more. The same applies to the other provinces and a whole series of enterprises in the private and public sector.

Madam Chairman, in concluding I would like to say that Parliament should conclude this debate as soon as possible and if it does, I hope we will be ready to vote on this bill immediately, because Canadians must realize that the Parliament of Canada is ready to act in a emergency. I know that according to what was negotiated with the opposition, the debate will be extended until 10 p.m this evening and tomorrow evening, but Canadians, Madam Chairman, would have preferred a different approach.

In concluding, I wish to congratulate the President of the Treasury Board for his courage and I want to ask all Canadians to try and bring their influence to bear on Liberal and NDP members, to make them change their destructive attitude towards the Canadian government.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Chairman, I would like, first, to congratulate the member for Shawinigan who just spoke. Of course, I might not be in agreement with everything he said, but I do not doubt his sincerity and I listened closely to what he had to say. No one is for this strike, Madam Chairman. I would even go so far as to say that the strikers themselves did not want to strike. No one wishes for a strike. And no one will make me believe that those of my constituents who earn $24,000, $23,000 or $22,000 a year are happy today to be picketing to defend their rights. Nobody will make me believe that they do not have anything better to do or that they can afford the luxury of these activities. That is not the point, because I am sure that they cannot afford it and that they have other things to do than to stay outside in the cold and the bad weather, as they are doing today.

• (1640)

[English]

I also want to say that I do not support at all any kind of violence on the picket line or elsewhere. I do not agree with those who blocked the entrance to the air base here in Uplands a few days ago, and school children had a hard time getting home from school. Nor do I agree with the other violent incidences that the member from Shawinigan has described. I think that they are bloody awful and the people who perpetrated them are wrong. I want to say that unequivocally.

Some bosses within the Public Service have told their employees: "You come into work despite the fact that you are on strike or I will get you later if you do not". That is wrong. It is wrong as well for Mr. Daryl Bean to say publicly, as he was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen a few weeks ago, that scabs get what they deserve, or something like that, even though some of those so-called scabs were really designated workers and, in any case, most of them were members of that union. That, too, is wrong.

There is no monopoly on stupidity. The government has negotiated in bad faith in my opinion, and there have also been other actions which are wrong. Two wrongs make just that; two wrongs and not one right.

[Translation]

When the President of the Treasury Board appointed a mediator, a few days ago, and when the civil servants accepted to return to the bargaining table, Mr. Capello and the others should not have had their hands tied by the government saying to them: "You can negotiate whatever you want, but we will never depart form the 0 per cent rule.' ' What kind of negotiations is that, Mr. Chairman?

[English]

The government keeps saying and keeps pretending, telling Canadians who are unemployed and others: "Well, wouldn't you like to have the job of so and so who is employed and who is on strike." Everyone who is unemployed wishes they had the job of someone who is working, but what a strategy, to divide Canadians and to tell them: "Wouldn't you like to have the job of someone else."

Since when do we promote that kind of envy between our citizens, pretending it is the right thing to do?

Some say that federal public servants make all kinds of money, that they are just making oodles of money doing their job. There is a story in The Ottawa Citizen and I have a copy of it here. It is a comparison of various jobs in the public and the private sector. Here is what The Ottawa Citizen came up with. It has, for instance, a clerk 3 in the federal Public Service making $25,839 a year; a clerk 3 in the private sector making $24,930 a year. This is not a very big difference. Let us look at other positions. A senior program analyst, for instance, one of those computer experts, in the Public Service, $42,500 a year; in the private sector, $45,400 a year. Let us look at a receptionist in the Public Service, average salary $20,500; in the private sector, $22,500. In other words, the private sector pays $2,000 more a year.

The point is not to compare people who are working with those who are unemployed. Those who are unemployed are not working, that is obvious. Even the minister should understand that. The point is not to mislead Canadians into believing that people who work for the public and for the people of Canada are overpaid because it is not true.

Every morning when I come to work, I arrive on Parliament Hill at 7 a.m.. I drive on Catherine Street here on Ottawa. I see people in front of the immigration office standing in the rain at six-thirty and seven o'clock in the morning waiting for the office to open at eight o'clock so that they will be able to be served that day.

There is such a line-up of people wanting service from the Government of Canada and such a shortage of work force to do the work that Canadian citizens have to stand out in the rain for half a day to be served by their government.

[Translation]

Would you say that such a situation is acceptable, Madam Chairman? I am not talking about Canadians abroad, who are waiting at the Canadian embassy, or elsewhere, although that situation does exist too. I am talking about what is going on here, in the City of Ottawa, a few blocks away from Parliament. And that, Madam Chairman, is a poor service that is being provided to Canadians.

The government can brag, as much as it wants, about cuts it made in the Public Service, but it cannot call it a satisfactory service, it should not say that Canadians are well served anymore. When my constituents phoned me, out of frustration, because they cannot get through the office of the Canada Pension Plan here in Ottawa, even though they let the phone ring for 20 minutes, or half an hour, and nobody answer, and when in despair, they called their members of Parliament to try to contact that office, we cannot say that it is a good service that is being provided to Canadians, Madam Chairman! Call it cuts and call it fast savings for the government, but for the constituent, who has been waiting half a day in line at the door, or half an hour, or one hour, on the phone for nothing, how much is worth the time he has wasted? How much is worth the time of those people who are waiting for services to which they are entitled to as Canadian citizens?

The minister does not have to wait on the phone, and neither do I. Members of this House do not have to wait on the phone because they have special lines to help their constituents, and rightly so, because nothing could be done for them otherwise. I suggest, Madam Chairman, that the government should know that it is not providing a good government service to the Canadian population.

[English]

Now the government says that civil servants have a guaranteed job for a lifetime, or something of the sort. We have before us in this House the constitutional proposals of the government that were tabled. In those constitutional proposals certain powers are to be devolved, are to be sent to the provinces.

I have an article from La Presse September 19 in which a Quebec minister, André Bourbeau, states quite clearly that for those services that will be transferred under that proposal to the province, he does not need to hire any civil servant, he will do that with the personnel that he has already. What is going to happen to the people working in those sectors?

Mr. Harb: They'll lose their jobs.

Mr. Boudria: Exactly, that is the point my colleague for Ottawa Centre says quite astutely. Those people will lose their jobs. That is a statement from the Quebec minister.

[Translation]

Madam Chairman, The President of the Treasury Board has a lot of work to do if he wants Canadians to believe him when he says that we must tighten our belt.

Speaking of work and of belt tightening, I have here my own records on government expenditures, Madam Chairman. With your permission, I will tell you about those expenditures.

[English]

I have an article here which is entitled, "Computer fiasco costs $140 million to the taxpayers".

[Translation]

I have here the list of limousines that were bought for the minister since 1988.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Yes, the limousines bought since 1988! Would you like me to read that list, Madam Chaiman? If you insist, I shall read it to you.

[English]

Let us start with the limousines. I have a whole list of limousines here that were purchased since 1988.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boudria: I know the members are a little touchy across the way when I raise that subject: $762,568 of limousines since the election of November 21, 1988.

My colleague has asked me to repeat it: $762,568. Would you believe that one minister has had three limousines since November 21, 1988?

An hon. member: Who's that?

Mr. Boudria: Yes, one minister has had three limousines since November 21, 1988.

An hon. member: Which one?

Mr. Boudria: All right, my colleague says: "Which one". Because of popular demand I will have to say it. The President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boudria: The minister who is telling us today that they must tighten their belts has changed cars three times in two and a half years. I have got it right here: 1988 Pontiac, 1989 Ford LTD, 1991 Ford LTD Crown Victoria, all of that since the election of November 21, 1988.

An hon. member: Are you serious?

• (1650)

Mr. Boudria: I am very serious. You know why I am serious about it? The information was given to me by the hon. government House leader from Hansard of June 19. I believe the government House leader. I really do. He would never lead us astray. Harvey is always right.

Let us continue—

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Chairman, all that might sounds very interesting, but if I had been President of the Treasury Board any longer—what, besides, would have not displeased me—I might have had three limousines, but I still have the same one. Maybe it has been purchased by my predecessors, but I have the same car as before being appointed to the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: I invite the minister to pick up Hansard of June 19, 1991, signed by his colleague the government House leader.

The member who is now President of the Treasury Board is listed with what I have just read and I always believe Harvey because Harvey will never lead me astray.

I want to get into the goods and services tax. Do you remember the goods and services tax, the dreaded GST? When the government started the goods and services tax it hired 4,200 people to administer it. Now, this is a government that wants to tighten its belt. Furthermore, it had to buy all these computers and to go with the computers it had to buy the hardware and then the software. I have a computer expert right beside me here.

I invite him to listen to this: The total amount of contracts awarded from January 1, 1991, to June 30, 1991, for software on the GST, and this again is in response to an Order Paper question by the government House leader so it has to be 100 per cent accurate, is $9,343,771.00

An hon. member: Amazing.

An hon. member: Terrible.

Mr. Boudria: My colleagues are shocked. I do not blame them.

Let me give the House another one. This one here has upset a number of Canadians. The government spent $350,000 to build a doghouse in Rigaud.

An hon. member: A doghouse?

Mr. Boudria: A doghouse for customs and excise, for 12 dogs. You know why? Because the old doghouse was on the tennis courts and they had to remove it from there so that whoever could play tennis. To replace it the government spent $350,000. Again, that was provided to me through a request to Access to Information and it cost me $462 to find that information through Access to Information. I know it is accurate because the information came to me from the Minister of Public Works Canada and he always tells the truth.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I would like to draw the attention of the honourable member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on the fact that I know that he always has many documents before him and that the Rule of the House is certainly among those documents. I think that he might find it to his advantage to read particuliarily subsection 2 of section 101, on page 69. Once he will have read it, I will continue to listen to him very attentively.

Again, the honourable member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Chairman, I might be wrong, but I believed, this morning, that there had been unanimous agreement in the House, shortly before 2 o'clock, to allow us to make comments on any part of this bill and not only on the text of the amendment that we were debating, in order to be able to offer all amendments simultaneously at 9 o'clock.

I believe that there was mutual consent to this effect and that any member could discuss any part of the bill, in the mean time. I invite the Chairman to comment, if I am wrong.

The Chairman: What was agreed is this, I believe: You can debate the various sections of the bill.

If you want to use section 2, definitions and interpretation, you can speak on any section of the bill. But, if I return to section 101 where it is said that speeches in Committees of the House must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration, I would like nevertheless that we stick to the bill before us. I simply wanted to draw the attention of the member on that with no intent of implementing this rule with extreme severity.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Chairman, I am sure that you did understand that I was speaking of line 44, on page 2 of the bill, which deals with wage rate. It is obvious that the wage rate is affected by the fact that the government has no money, or at least it says that it has no money since it has wasted it on some other things, Madam Chairman. That is why I raised that point with the President of the Treasury Board, and that I told him that if he would make a better use of the taxpayers' money, he would have some left for line 45, on page 2 of the bill, whose purpose is, of course, to adjust the wage rate of the civil servants.

I want to make sure that the minister knows that we need the necessary funds in order to do that, obviously.

[English]

In closing, I just want to remind the minister of the editorial in today's Ottawa Citizen which is entitled "Bad Mistake on Both Sides". I will agree that there were bad and serious blunders on both sides.

I want to remind the minister that the public interest is his job. It is the job of this government and the job of this House to discharge what is in the best interests of the public.

Even if both sides were evenly wrong, which I do not think they are, on this count, I want to remind the minister that it is his job to administer the Government of Canada in the best interests of the taxpayers of our country. The negotiator who was appointed the other day had his hands tied behind his back and could really offer nothing in terms of wage compensation, save $500 to some of the lower salaried employees. I say that the government acted in such a way that this process was doomed to failure.

I just want to conclude by asking one question of the minister in terms of how this thing is going to work: I notice that a person making $26,999 a year will now be making $500 more, $27,499. That person's senior or supervisor, or lead hand or whatever they are called in that particular department where they happen to be working, might be making $27,300 and now you will have the more junior employee making more than the senior one. I have some difficulty in understanding how that is possibly going to work. I say to the minister that he should at least have provided some sort of a top up to people over $27,000 a year, even if, heaven forbid, it would be on a sliding scale, but not to arrange it in such a way that someone who makes more money will make less money than someone who makes less money. I have a hard time understanding how that could possibly ever work.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Chairman, in answer to the last question of the hon. member, I will tell him that we did exactly what he is suggesting, that is the necessary gradation to avoid any overlapping. In any case, we must not forget also that it is a lump sum. We have made that gradation so that people would not make "a step ahead" which would have messed up the pay scales paid needlessly.

That being said, the hon. member is making fun of expenditures made by the government on some items such as the GST, which are quite legitimate and quite necessary expenditures. He went on and talked about kennels, and I hope the hon. member is not against the fact that the government is fighting drugs, that he would not want that those services be deprived of the necessary tools to do that job. That is what we are doing, and I am not making any apology for it, far from it. Those are legitimate expenditures.

As for the illegitimate expenditures, I would say that it is rather the case with the union which is responsible for some big losses incurred following this useless strike which will ultimately, cause a very serious prejudice, to such an extent that it will take quite a while for those employees, for whom everybody seems to be so much preoccupied, to catch up for what they have just lost.

• (1700)

So, for the last time, I would ask people to get back to their sense.

As far as responsibilities are concerned, the hon. member suggested that we have—

[English]

We have a job, as president of Treasury Board, as government, to discharge our responsibilities and protect the higher interests of the country.

I would repeat again what I said earlier today: that is precisely what we did at budget time. We could have gone the Liberal way: borrow money, find money outside, spend it when we do not have it.

We ask our employees not to accept what is called a reasonable offer, but to accept what is a reasonable solution to a difficult environment. They have to consider the facts. When we talk about comparisons, we do not ask them to rejoice in the fact that they have a job, and in some cases, not so well paid as the hon. member has rightly said, but at least they have one.

During the pre-budget consultations, if there was one message that came across very clearly on all sides, it was that the government is spending too much. As a matter of fact, we will have a $30 billion deficit this year, so we needed to send out a very clear message of our determination to act. As I have said earlier, we have taken many different measures, of which one deals with salaries.

We are not asking the members of the Public Service to pay for all of this deficit, but to bring their contribution, as everybody else is doing.

[Translation]

He said that we tied the hands of our bargaining agent and would never budge from 0-3. I believe the government's position was clearly established in the Budget speech, which announced the government would propose a plan that would substantially reduce inflation and that one of the key measures sending this message was a decision to freeze wages this year, with subsequent increases of 3 per cent during the next two years. That is what we have done, and we did it to send a message to industry and other governments to be very prudent and avoid spoiling our chances for the economic recovery now taking place after a very severe recession. We were right, because in the weeks following the Budget, one province after another adopted our approach, with the difference that most provinces decided to legislate zero per cent. In some cases, they legislated zero per cent for two years.

We said we had some flexibility. Not much, but we would try to progress within those limits, and instead of legislating, we would negotiate. And then we heard the abrasive annoucements by the president of PSAC, who said that he was starting a great political debate. During days, weeks and months of negotiations, we tried to get back to more serious matters, but to no avail. On Thursday, at 7 p.m, we put a number of new proposals on the table. We indicated new options for flexibility but our offers weren't even considered. The answer was that a strike was called.

The hon. member said we should avoid giving the impression that Public Service employees make too much money. I agree. Far be it from me to claim that Public Service wage scales are entirely out of line with the private sector, but perhaps he would like to think about what Daryl Bean said. When someone has to go to the private sector, they ask for almost a year extra. Is it because people are better off here than in the private sector? In any case, it is always the same Canadians who are strick with those problems and who have to pay taxes.

So we had to send a very serious message that we were determined to deal with the problem, and that is what we have done, Madam Chairman.

The Chairman: Are there any more speakers on clause 2?

[English]

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): I would like to say at the outset that the government's offer of zero, three and three is fair when you consider all factors. The offer was made in the hon. Michael Wilson's budget in February of this year.

But the Daryl Beans, the Bob Whites, the Shirley Carrs of Canada have shown terrible judgement by rejecting the government's offer and forcing a strike. The taxpayers of Canada are furious at the union's decision.

This is a time for union leaders to take off their blinders and make decisions which are good for the country. This is a time when governments, management and labour must share some common goals about the economic future of this country. This is not a time for strident, militant threats by labour.

It is a time for union leaders to understand the realities of the real world. No one likes to propose a zero increase in salaries. As the largest employer in Canada, however, we must show leadership.

The total salary cost of the government is approximately $10 billion. The fringe benefits amount to 28 per cent, or $2.8 billion. The total salary and benefits, therefore, is $12.8 billion and there are approximately 400,000 employees in total, including 196,000 civil servants.

Canadians are just emerging from a tough and difficult recession. Unemployment is high. The people of Canada are fed up with high taxes. They blame all three levels of government. They expect us to show more restraint and leadership in the handling of their tax dollars.

Yet, when the government takes steps to make true our commitment of restraint and fiscal responsibility, we are met with strong protests by the unions.

The government's recent proposal applies to all 400,000 employees. It includes all Armed Forces, RCMP, judges, et cetera. It includes the Prime Minister, cabinet ministers and all MPs. There is a formula for MP's raises each year. It works out to approximately 1 per cent less than inflation. The increase this year, effective January 1, 1991, was 3.78 per cent.

When this legislation passes, it will mean that MP's salaries will be frozen for all of 1992 and be increased by 3 per cent in 1993. I personally welcome this legislation. Obviously, Daryl Bean and his executive do not.

Marjorie Nichols' recent comments in The Ottawa Citizen were very interesting and I quote:

> A private sector union boss who proposed leading his troops into the streets to protest low salary increases at auto parts plants in Ontario would be sent away for a long rest. Yet, that is precisely what the PSAC President, Daryl Bean has done and the opposition parties are applauding.

Ms. Nichols goes on to say:

> It is simply not good enough for the Grits and the New Democrats to keep hurling the accusation that the government has destroyed free collective bargaining in the public service. Obviously, the bargaining process has been short circuited by the government's restraint program, which limits public service salaries to 0-3-3 per cent over the next three years. A recession has precisely the same impact on bargaining in the private sector.

I could not say it any better than Ms. Nichols. Listen to this point.

> The government has a moral duty to all of its shareholders, the citizens of Canada, to set an example and hold the line against reinflation that would boost interest rates and stamp out the recovery.

And in her closing lines she says:

> Anyone who believes that this strike is about money, must also believe in the tooth fairy. This is a political strike by a politicized union, supported by political parties with political agendas of their own.

This strike is not about money. It is about people playing politics with the salaries and job securities of workers, many of whom cannot afford to be on strike.

Several provincial governments have shown leadership in these difficult times by freezing the salaries of their civil servants.

Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Manitoba have all passed legislation in recent months to freeze salaries, that is, zero increases.

There have been some notable exceptions. The NDP government in Ontario is busily introducing double digit increases across the board. It has shown callous disregard for the taxpayers of Ontario and for the health of the Ontario economy.

• (1710)

I personally believe that the right to strike should be taken away from all public servants. I believe that all the jobs of public servants should be designated as essential services. We should not allow this chaos every few years. Strikes are too costly.

Some people, particularly small business owners, never survive. In the metro area we were burdened with a crippling TTC strike, on top of the PSAC and the Canada Post strikes.

Fortunately Canada Post workers have agreed for the time being at least to go back to work while the mediator meets with labour and management.

Once these strikes are settled, I believe we need to pause and rethink the process. There must be a better way. The economic harm inflicted by such strikes must end. The labour movement should reassess some of its outdated policies and practices. It would be very interesting to have legislation requiring a mandatory release of the public union, their executives' salaries and recent salary increases.

It would also be worth considering the merits of having all union votes, not just some, conducted by secret ballot. I believe a great deal of pressure and intimidation of fellow union members goes on now.

Government must also rethink the right to strike of Canada Post workers. I have already recommended that the right to strike be stripped away from Canada Post. It is an essential service. Strikes cause too much grief and havoc among seniors, veterans, charitable organizations and small businesses.

An alternative to my proposal to ban strikes at Canada Post would be to end the monopoly Canada Post now enjoys. In other words, let the private sector into the game.

The most recent comprehensive study of the problems faced by Canada Post was conducted by Alan Marchment. In his report, he recommended the privatization of the corporation if Canada Post failed to achieve its objectives of service and financial self-sufficiency in 1990.

In closing, I want to say it is disappointing that it will likely take another week to pass this legislation. I am discouraged but not surprised that the Leader of the Opposition and his Liberals and the Leader of the NDP and her New Democrats could not resist the temptation to make this debate into a political charade.

They obviously do not care about the harm being done to the average Canadians who are losing their jobs. They do not care about the economic hardships being created right across Canada. The Canadian people will not be fooled by their shallow political rhetoric.

The Leader of the Opposition will probably order his Liberal senators to stall and delay Bill C-29 as long as possible, inflicting further economic hardship on Canadians.

I have had many telephone calls and letters about the strike by PSAC. Almost all the calls and letters are supportive of the government's back to work legislation. They are against the Public Service trying to hijack the government and they are very angry and frustrated by the harm being done to them.

Let me share with you comments I had from two business people from my riding of Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville. I recently spoke with Maureen Hyman who owns a business in my riding. She has struggled throughout the recession to keep her family business alive. Miss Hyman is growing very frustrated with the strikes that are plaguing Canada.

She says that this country is in total chaos. She says that the notion of job security especially during difficult economic times is ludicrous. Nobody should have job security. Where is their job security in the private sector? Nobody should be given a job for life. That is total nonsense. Miss Hyman does not believe that workers should be given the opportunity to strike and disrupt the lives of Canadians.

I also heard from Joseph Wileman who lives and works in my riding. He called me to express his disapproval with the position taken by PSAC to strike. Mr. Wileman who was a public servant years ago insists that the Public Service should not be unionized.

They may not get a pay raise right now, but their job security more than makes up for that. He went on to say that they have a job, and they should be quite satisfied.

People in the private sector take a pay cut when a recession hits. Just this morning, Grant Heichert telephoned from Stouffville. He was upset with the union. He said: "If the union refuses to comply with the legislation, the union should be banned and broken up. If the workers refuse to go back, fire them".

In summary, Canadians all across the land are angry about this strike.

Here we are, just starting to recover from a severe recession; thousands of Canadians have lost their jobs, many Canadians who have jobs are worried about the security of their current jobs. They do not understand how Canada's civil servants can be so unrealistic in their pay demands.

Canadians are fed up with taxes. They blame all three levels of government, as I said a while ago. They feel angry and frustrated. They at least want their taxes which are collected to be used carefully and frugally. They certainly do not want civil servants to get salary raises at this time.

Canadians believe most civil servants are relatively well off, when you weigh such factors as job security, generous benefits and comparatively high salaries and fully indexed pensions.

This strike is creating severe economic harm. Grain farmers face the possibility of drastic cuts in cash flow because of the lack of shipping facilities; many manufacturers use the just-in-time inventory method, accordingly they have been paralysed; men and women have been forced out of work; sales have been lost.

I urge the general membership of PSAC to reconsider the unwise and insensitive leadership it is being given by its leaders. The government's offer is fair. It should have been accepted months ago. Now, because of the bad advice by Daryl Bean, we must pass this back to work legislation this week to prevent further economic damage.

The Chairman We are still debating on clause number 2. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Chairman, we are talking about the back to work legislation and about the bargaining between the federal government and the Public Service Alliance Union. In my view, if the minister is really interested in seeing an end to this crisis he could quite easily appoint a mediator right now and everybody would come out as a winner. The public servants will come out as winners and also the government will probably save face with the public servants as well as their families across the country, and as well with the general public.

The government is saying it did not act in bad faith and the union as well as the Public Service said yes, it was acting in bad faith. Here we go: A decision which was made by the Public Service Staff Relations Board states the following, and I will read it for the record:

> Insistence on conditions precedent to negotiating terms and conditions of employment at the bargaining table is incompatible with the requirement to make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement. Accordingly, the Board declares that the employer has acted contrary to section 51 of the Act and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the Act.

I cannot see anything that could be clearer than this statement. If anything, the government should have blushed, gone back to the negotiating table, discussed with the employees, and if it could not come to a conclusion then it should have gone to arbitration.

We heard quite a bit from the hon. members across the way on the government side about the fact that government employees are overpaid. Just for the record, survey after survey clearly states that the public servants, when it comes to their annual increase, are not in parity with the private sector increases.

For instance, in the private sector in 1989 the employees received on an average of 5.3 per cent, while the federal administration paid its employees 4.2 per cent. In 1990, the public sector on the average paid its employees 5.9 per cent, while the public servant received an average of 5.3 per cent. In 1991, the first quarter, the private sector paid on an average of 5.5 per cent, while the public servant received on the average of 5.4 per cent.

That is to say that all of those increases were somewhat lower than the inflation rate.

What is happening now? Why are the public servants complaining and why are they on strike? At issue are many of the points that the President of the Treasury Board was talking about, such as job security.

• (1720)

For instance, since 1984 until now there is in excess of 13,000 employees who have lost their jobs. The government continues to move in the direction of downsizing the Public Service. Many of those public servants are worried about the possibility of losing their jobs, like anyone else in any sector.

Pay equity is another concern. Despite the fact that a giant management–union committee came up with the results of a study that said that we have to get on with pay equity legislation, we have yet to see some sort of compliance with that.

There is another issue which has been raised by the public servants and that is the national rate of pay. It is surprising that most of the public servants are not paid for what they do, but for where they live. Some members still receive regional rates of pay. An electrician in Newfoundland, for example, is receiving approximately $4 less than an electrician who is doing the same job in British Columbia, which is highly unfair.

There is wage disparity. The pay for people who work in the federal government is lower than those who work in the private sector. As my colleague indicated a little earlier, a comparison between the public sector and the private sector clearly states that there is disparity. The reason for that disparity is because of the fact that the federal government's way of dealing with public servants has been underhanded.

On average a public servant receives approximately $11.73 per hour. When we look at the private sector, a labourer in the private sector—and I heard one of my friends saying something unparliamentary perhaps, but we will deal with that later— earns approximately $14.56 per hour, up to $15.35.

If we are to compare specifics in both the public sector and the private sector, let us take for examples, secretaries, receptionists and telephone clerks. On average these people earn approximately $20,500 a year. While in the private sector on average people who do the same kind of work earn approximately $23,500. There is about $3,000 difference between what the public servant earns and what the private sector is paying.

We move on to the other side of things, professionals for instance in the Public Service. Take for example the computer programmers. On average a computer programmer in the public sector earns $42,500 a year, while his colleague in the private sector earns $46,400 a year. There is approximately $4,000 difference between what the private sector pays and what the public sector pays.

There are approximately 55,000 secretarial and clerical workers who deserve a 6 per cent pay increase and who are making almost $26,400. Most of those people, I might add, are women.

The government is saying: "My way or no way". It has offered the $500 one time lump sum to the public servants. I might add this $500 would be offered for one year and next year they will go back to their previous salary. They have been on strike now for about seven days. I would suggest that the government has already made $500 through savings because of the fact that the public servants are on strike. The government can solve the problem, but obviously it does not have any intention to do so.

Contracting out is one of the concerns that the public servants have. It is interesting to note that in 1990 the government itself admitted to the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee that it did not know whether contracting out was cost effective.

My suggestion to the government is that when it is spending in excess of $5 billion of taxpayers' money it had better know whether it is cost effective. It had better know whether it is saving taxpayer's money.

This whole question of government action and inaction on this issue is cause for alarm in my constituency of Ottawa Centre where many of these people live and work. It is interesting to know that a poll concluded that four out of five Canadians believe they will be personally affected by cuts in government services. In many federal departments there is a need for more public servants, not less. All you have to do is go to 200 Catherine Street in my riding at 5.30 or 6 o'clock in the morning and you will be surprised to learn that there is in excess of 20 to 30 people lining up to get services from Employment and Immigration.

I would challenge my colleagues to dispute the fact that in the Department of Employment and Immigration there is need for more public servants, not less. Simply put, it is because there is an overload on the system and this is known by many of my colleagues.

A majority of 52 per cent of the Canadian public says that a reduction in the availability of federal government services due to budget cuts will have a negative affect on the future of Canada. It will because the Public Service of Canada is the most basic, fundamental infrastructure to any growth and unless you have that infrastructure in shape and in order there is no hope for anything else to function. These are the people who are making, introducing and implementing the law at the federal level.

A strong majority, which is approximately 71 per cent of the Canadian public, believes it is paying more in taxes and receiving less in services. That is certainly not because public servants are not doing their best.

Two out of three Canadians feel public employees are hard working and do an honest day of work. That is contrary to what one of my colleagues was stating a little earlier, that many public servants are fat cats. I have not seen a single fat cat public servant. If any one of my colleagues knows of a single fat cat public servant, maybe he should contact my office and let me know, or maybe he should contact the President of the Treasury Board.

We have one of the finest Public Services in the world and certainly the way we are dealing with it is not the best way.

The government should go back to the negotiating table. The Public Service wants to see the government going back to the negotiating table.

I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board one question. I know he has repeatedly answered this question by side-stepping it, by saying that he does not want to hire an arbitrator. The media asks him questions. The opposition asks him questions. The Public Service Alliance union has asked him the question.

I would suggest that the majority of the people would like to see the government answer this question: Why would he not proceed with the appointment of a mediator? If the mediator is to come up with a decision that the government is not happy with, it can do whatever it wants to do then. I might suggest that the reason why the government does not want to appoint a mediator is because it knows it is going to lose. It knows that based on the fact that we have been putting suggestions in this House and before Canadians the government is really not dealing with public servants the way it should be dealing with them.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Chairman, I would like to take on some of the points that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has raised.

I am a little bit flabbergasted by some of his statements. Being from Ottawa Centre, I would expect him to be more aware of the reality of the Public Service. He said that 13,000 employees have lost their jobs. This is not the case. We have removed positions but we have been very careful to find other jobs for the employees who are there. We have done it through attrition. It is very exceptional that members have to leave the Public Service against their will.

• (1730)

I would give him a number. We are one of the largest employers in Canada. We have 225,000 people working for us. From 1986 to now, I would think it is in the order of 1,500 persons who had to leave the Public Service against their will. If this is not the best job security ever, I do not think you can find it.

I think the hon. member should be very careful in making statements that we are not concerned about job security. We are.

The hon. member referred to the decision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and he again stated that the commission had found us to have negotiated in bad faith. In all fairness, I would ask him to put the question to Mr. Ian Deans, chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

Section 51 covers two things: "bad faith" and "every reasonable effort." The union put the two questions to the board and the board decided that we had not made every reasonable effort, but did not say that we had acted in bad faith.

We have made additional efforts, because we had 35 different meetings last week negotiating with the union. We put forward offers to them that were not even considered. That is why I do not see the point of continuing this process.

He has given us numbers with respect to the private sector. Would the civil servants of Canada like to have the same treatment as was given to thousands and thousands of Canadians during the recession who lost their jobs, who had to re–open their collective agreements in order to maintain their companies' competitiveness and to try to weather the recession.

We have been very fair. Of course, zero per cent is not what they deserve, but it is what this country can afford at this particular time, and it is also showing a sign of concern about what is happening across the country.

When you say that in 1981 settlements in the private sector were at 5.5 per cent, for those who found the settlement, but in the first two months 146,000 Canadians would have loved to have a zero per cent offer.

He said we should need more public servants. Do we need to raise taxes, increase the deficit, borrow more money? Companies that are in opposition just fold up because they cannot afford to continue. We continue because we are a government. But we cannot overdo it. We have to be very careful not to go beyond a certain capacity. Otherwise, it is our very capacity to continue to maintain a good, strong public service that would be threatened.

Just remember that next year the interest only on our debt will be $41 billion. This is money that we do not have, that it is not possible to use for salaries, services to Canadians. We could increase it to $43 billion. For every dollar we get, 35 cents goes to servicing the debt. We can let it go to 50 cents or 53 cents, and what would happen then to the civil service?

So we need to balance this. We felt that at this time in the recession, when we made the budget, we had to look ahead and make sure that the government was sending out the right signals, and was making decisions that would help the economy pick up again, as it is doing now.

The hon. member says we should go back to the negotiating table. I would tell him that we have negotiated for 60 days. We have been in conciliation for 30 full days. We came back to the table after the strike for 35 meetings, and never did we get an offer from PSAC. In any case, they are the ones who left the table, not us.

The Chairman: There are only three minutes left. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Thank you, Madam Chairman. I hope the President of the Treasury Board is not suggesting it is normal to try and reduce the deficit by bearing down on those in the public sector who earn less than $30,000.

[English]

I hope very much that the President of the Treasury Board is not trying to solve the deficit question by attacking the public servants' salaries. As he knows, the money that the government pays to the public servant does not account for more than 12 per cent. In fact, it is less than 12 per cent of the total expenditure.

He alluded to the fact that next year we are going to have a deficit of $40.5 million. I hope that figure is not accurate. We have been hearing that the deficit was going to be reduced this year.

An hon. member: It was reduced. Interest on the debt.

Mr. Harb: Interest on the debt, okay. I will take this one back.

In any event, the 13,000 jobs we are talking about were lost. Whether somebody has been laid off or fired is irrelevant. Those jobs that were there are no longer there, so the people who have been doing them could be on UI or on the welfare roll.

I would like to ask the minister how he can justify penalizing 55,000 people in the Public Service who are earning less than $30,000 a year? How could he have the heart to expect those people to bite the bullet? The inflation rate was in excess of 5 per cent over the past year or so. There is no guarantee the inflation rate is going to be close to zero per cent. He knows it.

He knows as well that everything should be in line with the cost of living. Why would he just force the public servant to bite the bullet while everybody else is getting off the hook?

Why do 55,000 workers, Madam Chairman, who make less than $30,000 have to pay the price?

The Chairman: Does the hon. member wish an answer? There is not very much time.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Chairman, the principle that they do not seem to understand on that side of the House is that there is something called the "capacity to pay".

When we arrived in government in 1984, for every dollar that was coming in, the government was spending $1.33. You can be popular with the Public Service. You can be popular with Canadians by borrowing money and spending more than you collect in taxes. We have turned that around.

We are paying the debt, and we think that by putting our House in order, we are providing a future for our Public Service. If we were not to do it, we would not be really caring for them. It would be very quickly threatened as are all our programs.

I do not agree with them at all that you do not pay into account. In which world do we live? The capacity to pay is not taken into account. We need more civil servants: I agree with him. How do we pay them, by borrowing more money? Do we go the way of Argentina, down the drain? We do not want that. We keep a balance.

It was a tough recession, and instead of letting it go with rates of interest of 22 per cent, inflation rates of 10 per cent and 14 per cent, we have taken the other direction: tighten up and leave some room for the economy to prosper. Do not take all the room that is available.

That is why we have taken this measure. It is not at all to punish anyone. It is a small contribution we are asking, compared to what Canadians have to go through. It is difficult. I understand that, but I think it is reasonable.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The hon. member wants to speak to clause 2?

I just wanted to make sure that hon. members are aware of the motion introduced earlier today, which allows amendments to be tabled. If hon. members want to know what those amendments are about, it will be necessary perhaps, at one point, to suspend debate on clause 2 and move on to other clauses.

However, I do not mean to tell hon. members what to do. I just want to refresh their memory in order to make things easier for them a little later.

The hon. member for Laval East has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: Point of order, Madam Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Chairman, you just raised two important points. I do not want to interfere in any way with the hon. member's right to speak, but there is a practice which is common for Committees of the Whole and that I think we should follow in order to allow all hon. members of this House who want to table amendments to do so before supper so that we can see them, understand them and make a decision on each of those amendments.

• (1740)

The other point is this. I noticed that each time a member has the floor, the president of the Treasury Board takes 20 minutes, sometimes 15 minutes, to launch into a debate. He has been using this tactic since this morning. I think this is out of order.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Now listen. This is not in keeping with the usual practices of the committee of the whole. Standing Orders provide that each member has 20 minutes and the minister's answer must be included in this 20 minute period. What happened today, at least up to now, is that each time a member took the floor, the minister's answer was almost as long as the member's question. That way, fewer members will be able to participate. The minister will have to take into account the 20 minute constraint the way it used to be done.

The Chairman: I agree with the hon. member up to a point. The fact remains, I think, that when a member has the floor and wants to ask questions, he or she should keep in mind that there should be enough left for the minister to answer the question or questions. I can understand the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier's point, but I think that, if a member speaks for 19 minutes and then asks 11 questions in a row, the minister cannot be expected to reply to all 11 questions in the minute that is left.

I think it is a matter of good will on the part of all members and I will remind the House again of the motion adopted earlier this afternoon to the effect that any amendment tabled with the Chair prior to 9:00 p.m. will be deemed proposed and be put without further debate at 10:00 p.m. Some hon. members may want to know about the contents of the amendments. So, all I had in mind when I suggested that we move on to other sections was to allow members who had made amendments to tell us about them in their speeches.

Resuming debate, on section 2 still. The hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Chairman, I appreciate all the advice we have been given here today. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has a lot of experience and I have great respect for him, but today's debate was on things people want to talk about, like their riding and the workers they represent.

I must begin, Madam Chairman, by saying that public servants are not found only in Ottawa. I heard members from the other side who represent the Ottawa area speak today. That is well and good, but there can't be public servants only in Ottawa. There must be some in Laval, in Abitibi, in Rivière-du-Loup, in Montreal.

So I was rather amazed to see how much those people had to say. I represent Laval, which has many civil servants. I must tell you that there are five prisons in my riding. These five prisons have many public servants. They are also workers who I think do an excellent job and are very unhappy about getting no increase. The only thing I can tell those people listening to us and who will read what I say is that I too am getting no raise. We are in the same boat. So what many people said is untrue, and I see the hon. member get up with a smile on her lips. She was the first to—I listened to the radio today; they were all public servants who called in and were asked whether they agreed with the strike. Certainly, they sometimes gave themselves away when they talked. They said that the government was stepping on them. That proves right away that they are people who work as public servants. They were asked to answer the survey.

The hon. member even mentioned in some of her questions that MPs had voted themselves generous increases and then froze salaries. How many times have we heard that? How many times, and people believe it because someone said so.

Well, I would like to tell people that MPs here have gone backward, not forward, since 1984: they had an average annual increase of 2.9 per cent compared to inflation of 4.3 per cent.

Those of us who have been here since 1984 and made the calculations, taking into account the cost of living and the increases received, have found that the loss in salary is $7,000. But that is alright, we are just members of Parliament. I know many people will be delighted to hear that. As I stated in an radio interview this afternoon: "The listerners will be happy to hear that members of Parliament, ministers and even the Prime Minister are affected by the wage freeze. Figure that, we are all in the same boat."

I heard horror stories today, Madam Chairman. People come to see us at our offices and tell us: "We want to work." Some people are on strike, and they have the right to be. But others are not and want to go to work but are being prevented.

An hon. member: Day in and day out.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce: Day in and day out, they are threatened. I was talking earlier, outside, to a fellow whose wife was threatened when she showed up for work. "Should she go in tomorrow? he asked me." My answer was: "Let her go to work tomorrow. I will escort her myself." Imagine, threatening people because they want to go to work!

The funny part of it Madam Chairman, is that people come to us and say: "I used to work for Air Canada, but I lost my job. I would certainly take a zero per cent increase."

Others worked for Canadian or other airlines and lost their jobs. They tell us: "I would sign a ten-year contract at zero per cent, just to have a job." That is when it dawned on me, Madam Chairman.

I have been in politics since 1984 and meet people at my office all the time, like everyone else.

An hon. member: Day in day out!

Mr. Della Noce: When they came to us. I ask them:"What can I do for you?" A common answer is: "I want a job, but I want to work for the federal, provincial or municipal government." Why? "Because I want job security." That is when it dawned on me that it is not so much a job that they want, but rather a position, a place where they are safe. That is what they are after, because they know that when you work for the government, there may be a zero per cent wage increase, but there is job security and many other marginal benefits.

So, people want two things: some want to go to work and others want a position. The concept of jobs seems to have disappeared. Yet, in my riding, people do want jobs and would be ready to accept increases below zero per cent to get one.

Remember what happened in Quebec. When I hear the Bloc on the other side say outside now, and the member for Hull, who is with the Bloc, whose leader cut Quebec public servants not 0, not 5, not 10, not 15, but 20 per cent. Today they are in bed together. They sit next to each other holding hands and embracing. Fine press conferences together. But do they really take the people for fools?

The member for Hull says anything, anywhere in any way, although public servants had their pay cut by 20 per cent.

An hon. member: He is not here.

Mr. Della Noce: He is not here? He will be back soon.

So, Madam Chairman, many people here today are talking in favour of the public servants, but I think it has much more to do with vote getting. Everyone wants to protect his own bailiwick, especially the members from Ottawa.

Today, I listened to an open-line radio show, just to find out. Of maybe 37 calls, 36 came from public servants, who were asked whether they agreed with the strike. They said, "Of course. The government is squeezing us. The Treasury Board President lied to us." However, if anyone behaved correctly, it was the Treasury Board President. The minister accepted everything. He put the bill on hold. He agreed with the NDP. He agreed with the Liberals. They agreed. There was a chance it might work. It did not. Now, what do we see on television—unfortunately, I saw it too—violence. I saw Daryl Bean say that there would be violence. He was the first to break down the door at the entrance here, even though it is not his property. Daryl Bean used to be a mechanic. It hurts me to see people like that.

In my riding, for example, residents of Laval called us and still call us every day to say, "Send a message to the President of Treasury Board. Tell him not to give up and to maintain order." They have a good job. It is true that they deserve more; we also deserve more here. Everyone deserves more. But where will you get the money? There is no more money. The bag is empty. It is finished.

So what must we tell people? Be glad we saved 6,000 jobs. Air Canada employees in Laval would have liked to keep their jobs. They liked their jobs.

I see people who are glad that MPs' salaries were finally frozen. I told my son to take my MP card and to tell the director that I was a member of Parliament and that my salary had been frozen. But my son had to pay $1,500 nevertheless. I do not know if the director misunderstood him, or if he does not like members of Parliament, but my son, who is attending the University of Montreal, must pay $1,500 and not $500. It happened that my salary had been frozen too. That is most unpleasant. Such a freeze is not pleasant for the Public Service, and it is not pleasant for me neither.

• (1750)

That is not pleasant to see violence. I have organized strikes myself and I use it to put the baseball bats under the truck. There is always room for negotiation.

I would ask my colleague from Toronto, who has some lessons to teach me, to cool down. And I would suggest to him to go outside to calm down the civil servants instead of boosting them up because you are the one who are boosting them up instead of telling them the truth. Go and tell them to calm down. They have a good job and they should stick to it. It is not a job, it is a position. They have all the job security in the world!

They were negotiating and the President of the Treasury Board made a generous offer to them. Mr. Bean, whe should be called "Uncle Bean", had saved face. Mr. Bean came along and then left the table, all of sudden, and we would be the ones who are dishonest? The civil servants say that the government is dishonest. Who left the table first? Is it the government? No, it is them who quit first.

Let us talk about the poor hon. members! We hear nothing but falsities here. I see unkindness and falsities when I hear those Hon. members say here that we have voted —And they give, as an example, the $80,000 bonuses! But they did not mention that those people had seen their salaries cut by 15 per cent, so that we could be in a position to give them bonuses if they were doing a good job.

I have always been with the private sector and I suggest that a man who works hard deserves a bonus. I am not against bonuses. But even the bonuses were frozen, as the minister has explained once more this afternoon. He said that it was a zero freeze for everybody. There will be no bonuses!

I have seen some extraordinary things since this morning. I heard civil servants repeat again and again that it was the government's fault. The opposition did such a good job at that, and I include the Bloc Québécois, that if the Montreal stadium is falling part, it is Mulroney's fault there too. It is not him who sold the cement!I know who sold the cement to build the stadium, and it is not Brian Mulroney.

For some of my colleagues, it is always the fault of the poor guy who tries to fix up the mess you left us with. Somebody said, this afternoon, that we should have fixed that problem after 7 years of government. But the mess is so big that it will take more than 7 years to straighten things up, it will take another 20 years before we can pay up the debts we have inherited from you. Seven years is not long enough! The interest rates were so high— they had reached 13.5 per cent. You have not been in business much! Personally I have been in business for 25 years. Management is important.

I was talking about essential services. What is this nonsense about essential services? Who gives essential services? It is a joke. Let's go and see in the hospitals if they give you essential services. Let Mr. Bean go and see if his brother or his father were there! He would see what services are not provided to our senior citizens. Where are essential services for those who are in need? Nails have been thrown on the ground, people have been beaten, and pushed, essential services are provided— It is utter nonsense! There is no such thing as essential services. They tell people if you go back to work your name will go up on the wall and next week we will give you a wallopping. I am looking forward to seeing these people. I cannot wait for the names to be out. Some people have the right to strike, others have the right to work, because their heart is still in their work.

Back home, we often heard people say: we were called— I do not know if they go to work, but send them back to work. The least we could do is send them back to the office! You know what people say: I am sorry you had to hit them with a law— You can take a horse to water but you cannot make it drink. But at least we are going to try. We are going to keep them from in front of the offices, because they are bothering those who still want to work, who still take their work to heart. I know some people in my riding office who give 110 per cent to their work. They come in at 5 a.m. to help our people. Those people want to work, let them be! If you do not want to work, step aside, stay on the grass, the weather is fine, Indian summer will be here soon. But these people say: Tell the minister to push, not to draw back, we are behind him. They say everyone is in favour of this strike, and that is not true. They will not shoot at each other. Come on! They have not reached such an extreme. But they shot themselves in the foot when they quit the bargaining table.

As the minister explained it so well this afternoon, they have settled for a freeze of zero per cent in Nova Scotia. That freeze has been ruled. In the Province of Quebec, a few years ago, the chief of the Bloc Québécois settled once for 20 per cent less than what we can offer. Wage settlement has been less than 2 per cent in Saskatchewan, it is zero in Manitoba; and it is zero per cent for six months and less than 3 per cent for 1992 in Quebec. It has been zero per cent in Newfoundland, zero per cent in New Brunswick, and a limitation has been imposed upon wage increases in British Columbia. That is to say that some people understood before we did that that policy was necessary. Everybody has abided by the agreement and everybody is treated equally. You think that the unemployment rate is only—

Earlier today, I was looking at some information with my colleague from Abitibi, who said that in his riding, the unemployment figure is 12 per cent; it is 13.1 per cent in Lac-Saint-Jean and 14.8 per cent in Gaspé and we are talking at ways to go through some difficult times as far as unemployment rates are concerned. There are eight areas; we find that one region, among others, has been hit for quite a while, and that is the important region of Montreal and Laval.

My colleague from Saint-Léonard is always making references to Montreal, but he never talks about Laval. He did not say that Laval sits just next to Montreal. There are always some windfalls, either economically positive or negative, but Montreal is often mentioned as the area. But when we talk about Montreal, as does my colleague, we must include Laval. It is true that we have gumption in Laval, and that we do not have the NPD style, that is to hate money and love the guy. We like everything, and if the guy has some money to invest at home, he is very much welcome. We have an extraordinary and enterprising mayor, and we are on the go!

There are some people in Montreal that do not see business that way! There has been some problems. My colleague from Saint-Léonard submitted to us a whole list of problems. He quoted every articles on that subject that has been published for the last six months. He did a good job at it since he told the truth, but he forgot conviently to mention the Merck Frosst Project. He did not mention that article, since it is positive news on a 300 job and $300 million project. He has also mentioned refineries. He said that four refineries closed their doors in Montreal. We are not responsible for the dismantling of those refineries. It is Marc Lalonde's policy, his Energy Program that did it. He closed 11 refineries in Canada, including the four plants located in Montreal. Things cannot go well with such a policy. It is obvious that they will be a little worst.

But in conclusion here today, Madam Chairman, allow me to quote the editorial in La presse of September 30 where Pierre Gravel says: "Considering the actual economic situation, aggravated by the constitutional tensions, Canada cannot afford a long paralysis of its public service or its disastrous effects on trade and commerce industries already in bad shape. So, the government must have the courage to go all the way and to pass as soon as possible a special law suspending the right to strike and establishing the working conditions in the public service." That is exactly what business people and industries at home told me: "The situation is bad enough already.

Leave us alone with your pressures and your strike! We can no longer stand this." And they are right.

When you know that the average civil servant, a member of the Public Service—one who has a position, not a job—is earning $33 500, while, back home, the average worker who has a job, not a position, no security, nothing, earns $27 000 and, watching the whole show on television, he does not appreciate it very much. He does not consider that as a joke, and he phones me, so that I will tell the minister to go ahead and sock it to them! We have nothing against these public servants; they do a great job. I say it and I will repeat it, again and again; they serve Canada well, better than ever before. But one thing must be clear: more money means more taxes. When you ask people to give more in taxes, do not ask members in Ottawa, do not ask civil servants, but ask the unemployed at the other end, who pay taxes. Ask them if they agree to give more. I can tell you that a lot of people must be saying: we are fed up with taxes, we pay too much, there have been too many tax hikes, that is enough! You must start cutting back. But where?

We must start putting our own house in order. So, if people can be more businesslike and less political, maybe this country will fare better. If we don't fight the deficit, we become violent, we have confrontation, that is all we do instead of solving problems like a businessman should do, that is, if you earn $1000 a month, you cannot spend $3500. The manager becomes an extraordinary friend, he comes knocking at our door to visit us. The first month, everything is fine, the second month, it is not as good and the third month, he takes everything away, leaving us nothing. That's life. Of course, the government cannot go bankrupt. But it was very clear to people like Pierre Gravel, a well known journalist in Montreal, who knows what he is talking about. Then, he does not always agree with the government.

An hon. member: Not often!

Mr. Della Noce: But there is one thing. He said: Let's get going, guys, it's urgent, because there are people who desperately need services, and there are people who want to travel. Today, someone was asking about air transportation. Transportation is taking a nose dive. It is not just in Montreal or Toronto, it is a global phenomenon. But now, we are making it lose still more ground; it will break down completely if things go on like they have, if we stop people from travelling, those who still have the courage or the money to do so. But think about those who are out of a job in the regions of Gaspé, Abitibi, Bellechasse—

An hon. member: Témiscamingue.

Mr. Della Noce: —Témiscamingue, everywhere, in Trois-Rivières, these people are wondering what civil servants have to complain about and why the NDP stands up for them. No wonder.

An hon. member: They are the ones who have organized that!

Mr. Della Noce: For violence, there are strike organisers. But there is no blood, and they are not happy, so there will be some, soon. Carry on, there will be some. But when there is, you will be the first ones to try to wipe it off.

Such things make no sense. That is what the people in my riding tell me. That is why no one voted for you there, and they probably never will, because the people want jobs, and they don't like it when you prevent them from working. It is not the government who prevents them from working. It is other people who want to protect not their job, but their union, their position. They prevent others from working to gain strength. I was listening to them on television, this afternoon—

The Chairman: I am sorry, but I must interrupt the hon. member. His time is up.

It being 6 o'clock, shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again later this day or at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Léonard on a point of order.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I think there could be unanimous consent so that the vote we just had on second reading and referral to the Legislative Committee of Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be equally applied to the motion by the Minister of Transport for third reading of Bill C-11, an Act to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I agree provided that it be indicated that I voted against C-11.

• (1830)

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, there would be agreement on the government side to have that applied. I would also like to take the opportunity to remind members that at the conclusion of Committee of the Whole at ten o'clock this evening the voting will start but there will be no bell. It is a very unusual procedure. Members perhaps should be reminded that there will be no bell at ten o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker I thank the hon. government Whip.

The House has heard the terms of the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Leonard. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Everyone has noted the dissension of the hon. member for Rosemont.

Government Orders

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto—Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

On Clause 2—Definitions

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order. You may remember earlier this day we passed a motion to set in place a somewhat different way of proceeding in Committee of the Whole to allow every member of the House the opportunity to make sure that any amendments they had for this piece of legislation would be put to the House before the close of business this day and have a chance to be voted on.

Because it is 6.30 p.m. and we are still on Clause 2, there have been discussions and I think you would find a predisposition, Madam Chairman, to next recognize the member of the Official Opposition who would be in a position to explain to the House a series of amendments which have or will be tabled with the Table shortly so that they are available to all members. There would be some explanation of that, followed by a representative of the New Democratic Party who would do likewise for its amendments.

There may be other members of the House who have tabled amendments and would like to explain them. We could conclude with the President of the Treasury Board who could explain his amendments and respond to any of the others that he chose to at that point. Then I think we would be in a position to move through clause 3, clause 4, and sort of speed it up a little. Hopefully members would then be disciplined in their questions and their responses to the clauses under consideration.

From that point on, those who had more general comments to make on clause 2 might find that opportunity as early as tomorrow on third reading stage. It might be more appropriate for 20-minute speeches to take place at that point and enable us to be targeted between now and seven o'clock, more specifically on proposals for amendment that could come from anywhere in the House.

I think that predisposition exists.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Chairman, I would like to confirm that indeed there were discussions before the vote. It was agreed that a member from each party would introduce various amendments, as well as any other member who would wish to do so, in order that we can continue the debate and explain all of the amendments before 10 o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): There were discussions and the proposal as put by the government Whip is acceptable to the NDP caucus.

I might say it is an unusual procedure, but I think it responds to an unusual situation, and for that matter an unusual interpretation of the motion which was adopted by unanimous consent earlier today.

Some of us thought at that time that it was simply a way of dealing with amendments which might not have had the opportunity to be moved from the floor, but the government had a different understanding. It has met the problem with that understanding by consenting to this particular arrangement, and I thank it for that because it will give everybody an opportunity to say what amendments they have tabled and why.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): I think, given the limit on time for debate, it is relatively important that for the rest of our discussions in Committee of the Whole all members be aware of amendments that have been or will be tabled.

I would therefore like to move the following amendments in addition to the one already moved to clause 2. The first of those amendments would be, and I move:

That Clause 3 of Bill C-29 be amended by adding immediately after line 31 on page 3 the following:

(e) persons engaged as independent contractors.

What this does is ensure that people engaged from outside the Public Service to perform work for the Public Service of Canada are treated exactly the same as those employed within the Public Service.

We in the Official Opposition see no reason for limiting employees of the government, whether term employees or continuing employees, to no salary increase for a year and only 3 per cent for the following year and for providing preferential treatment to persons engaged as independent contractors performing the same work. If the government were serious about fiscal restraint then surely that fiscal restraint applies to people hired from outside to perform the same work.

This offers opportunity for even more savings because independent contractors constitute a larger amount of spending at $5 billion than the entire payroll of the Public Service Alliance of Canada with which the government is now in dispute.

With respect to my next amendment, hon. members might wish to insert my proposed new clause 5 immediately after line 2 on page 4, following clause 4 and before the existing clause 5 of Bill C-29. The proposed clause 5 now deals with pay equity and reads as follows. I move:

That Bill C-29 be amended by adding after line 2 on page 4 the following:

5. (a) Forthwith on the coming into force of this act

(i) Treasury Board shall revise the classification system to incorporate fully into pay scales the compensation now paid to certain employees and groups of employees as equalization payments in respect of pay equity;

(ii) Treasury Board will cease all actions before the Human Rights Commission in opposition to the Commission's ruling on any matter related to equal pay for work of equal value.

(b) One year after the coming into force of this Act, the Treasury Board shall revise classifications as necessary to implement full pay equity as agreed to between the Treasury Board and bargaining agents for the employee.

(c) For any employee or group of employees for which the Treasury Board and the bargaining agents have not been able to reach agreement pursuant to section 5(b) on new classifications to implement equitable pay scales, all disputes will be deemed immediately referred to the Human Rights Commission for binding resolution.

To put in simple terms what this accomplishes, it takes an archaic provision whereby the government provides token payments to female dominated groups of employees in lieu of fully equivalent salary. They are token payments. Equalization payments are not pay equity. Only pay incorporated in the salary scale is pay equity.

With respect to the amounts required to implement that, the amount available for pay equity is already being paid in equalization payments. It could just as easily be incorporated for the same amount into salary scales, and one of the conciliation board reports has already determined that the government has set aside money for that.

This further provides that full pay equity will be implemented within one year after the coming into force of this act for a number of groups and employees for which pay equity is in dispute. After 14 years, it seems to me it is time to do that.

This amendment is put forward because the bill specifically contains provisions to allow for the implementation into the classifications of pay equity. This is an amendment to those provisions, but more from the point of view that the Official Opposition does not believe that pay equity is negotiable. It is the law. It is a right. It is not an item to be negotiated against any other consideration.

The fourth amendment I put forward is:

That Bill C-29 be amended by deleting everything after line 3 on page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

Forthwith, on the coming into force of this act, the chair of the Public Service Staff Relations Board shall name a mediator acceptable to both parties who will endeavour to mediate all matters referred to the mediator and to bring about agreement between the parties;

6. The Chair shall refer to the mediator all matters relating to the compensation plan for any employee or group of employees covered by this act which has expired and for which no new compensation plan has been established.

7. The mediator shall report to the chair on the resolution of all such matters on the date fixed by the board.

The effect of this amendment is to delete all the provisions of this act relating to the imposition of a wage freeze and wage controls and to delete all provisions of the act that suspend collective bargaining rights for employees of the Government of Canada.

It is also to substitute for those provisions the establishment of a mediation process to lead to the resolution of all matters in dispute.

The fifth amendment is:

That Bill C-29 be amended in clause 7 on page 4 by deleting line 33 and substituting the following therefor:

What this does is change a provision that the Canadian Human Rights Act, as it might apply to any of the provisions of this act, is superseded by or, in the words of the bill, "subject to the act".

In the view of the Official Opposition, the Human Rights Act should not be subject to the provisions of this act, because this act is contrary to the provisions of the Human Rights Act. Therefore, we move:

That line 33 on page 4, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Rights Act, the terms

Therefore, deleting the part which would subject the Canadian Human Rights Act to this bill once enacted.

Motion No. 6 refers to clause 8, on page 5.

That Bill C-29 be amended in clause 8, by deleting line 42 on page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

award, including wage rates and other terms.

What this does is amend clause 8, which prevents any provisions relating to wage rates or conditions of compensation being included in any agreement that may be reached by arbitration or collective agreement. We believe that wage rates and other terms should be arbitrable or subject to collective bargaining.

The seventh amendment and second last, refers to clause 10, page 6. The amendment is:

That Bill C-29 be amended in clause 10 by deleting lines 20 through 42 on page 6, and substituting the following therefor:

10(a) by such amounts as are agreed upon by the parties as a result of collective bargaining.

What that does is take out an imposed settlement and allows for the possibility of compensation plans being implemented that are reached as a result of collective bargaining.

The final amendment I propose:

That Bill C-29 be amended in clause 11, on page 7, by deleting lines 14 through 22 and substituting the following therefor:

11(1) The previous compensation plan and wage rates may be adjusted by such amounts as are agreed upon by the parties as a result of collective bargaining and any wage rates so adjusted shall

The effect of that is to allow for the inclusion of compensation as agreed to in collective bargaining in collective agreements.

I table a copy of these amendments and commend them to the House. I particularly urge the government to look seriously at those clauses relating to pay equity and to agree, after 14 years of a Human Rights Act in this country, that pay equity is not a bargaining chip.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Chairman, on behalf of the New Democratic caucus I would like to table amendments, starting with the amendment on clause 3.

That clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 13 to 42 and that clause 3 be further amended by striking the word "not" at line 43.

The reason for this amendment is that we feel very strongly that this act is far too broad. The application of the act is including and sweeping in everybody who may have any remote connection to the federal government. It is certainly far too broad under the act.

• (1850)

We feel very strongly about subclause (4) "For greater certainty this act does not apply to persons engaged as independent contractors".

We want to take the word "not" out, because we feel very strongly that independent contractors would be excluded from this act, when you could have two people working side by side, one earning a different salary than the other, and certainly one getting an increase and the other not.

An hon. member: Well, one is Brian's political friend.

Ms. Langan: Well, it might be the Prime Minister's political friend. We very strongly feel that those amendments should take place.

Under clause 5, we suggest that subclause 5.(1) be amended by an addition at line 11 of "with the exception of a mediated mutually agreed upon settlement having been arrived at before or after proclamation of this act."

Obviously, what that means is that we feel very strongly that one further step in collective bargaining has been missed by this government with its mediation, and that if mediation were undertaken and achieved after the act is passed, obviously the act would become redundant.

We urge the government and other hon. members to seriously consider this amendment.

In addition, under subclauses 5.(1) and 5.(2) we would like to put a new amendment, that subclauses 5.(1) and 5.(2) would have no force or effect should a mediated settlement be arrived at. Again, we feel very strongly that the minister should be appointing a mediator and that the minister should be taking those steps.

Under clause 6 the amendment we have would say that clause 6 should be amended by adding at line 30 on page 4 the following:

> —with the exception of a mediated, mutually agreed upon settlement having been arrived at before or after the proclamation of this act.

A new subclause 6.(1) "that proposed section 6 would have no force or effect should a mediated settlement be arrived at."

The reason is because these clauses spell out the time frames and who is in and who is out, and when they are in and when they are out, and we want to make very clear that we believe a mediation should take place and that if a mediated settlement is achieved that these people should not be further penalized.

Under clause 7 our amendments are that clause 7 be amended by adding immediately following line 42 on page 4 "for greater certainty any order by the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal respecting pay equity in the federal public service shall be exempted from the application of this act."

We feel very strongly as do others on this side of the House, in the Official Opposition as well as our caucus, about negotiating something that is already law and having it subjected to human rights tribunals because the minister does not implement it, and then being further subjected to appeal before that tribunal. We would like to see in this legislation clarification that that will not take place and that pay equity will be implemented.

Regarding clause 7, clause 7 be amended by replacing the word "may" with the word "shall", at line 43 at page 4. Everybody is aware, I think, that the word "shall" compels the minister as opposed to "may" which leaves considerable discretion on the part of the minister.

We would ask that the amendment on clause 7 at line 43 on page 4 be changed to read:

> The Treasury Board shall change any terms and conditions of a compensation plan that is extended—

We then asked the minister, in a further amendment:

> That clause 7 be amended at line 5 on page 5 by striking out the words "in the opinion of the Treasury Board".

The reason that we are asking that the lines "in the opinion of the Treasury Board" be struck is that we do not think the Treasury Board should have discretionary opinions. We feel very strongly that once a collective agreement is arrived at, it should be mutually arrived at by two parties. That should be sufficient and Treasury Board should not be overruling. Again under clause 7, line 10 on page 5, we are asking to replace the word "may" with the word "shall".

The final one is on clause 7, that it be amended at line 28 on page 5 by striking out the word "not", which is:

> The Treasury Board may not make or authorize any increase in wage rates pursuant to subsection (3) or (4) that is not in accordance with section 10.

We believe that collective bargaining should provide a circumstance under which this can take place.

The amendment under clause 8 is that at line 42 on page 5 we strike out the words "other than wage rates or other terms and conditions of the compensation plan". We believe that a freely negotiated and ratified collective agreement should be respected.

Under clause 9 the first amendment would be at line 5 on page 6. We would strike striking the word "not". The reason for that is that we do not agree there should be 12 months following the introduction of the 0 per cent. We believe that the wages again should be freely negotiated.

Then that clause 9 be further amended at line 7 on page 5 by an amount equal to the Canadian Consumer Price Index for the immediately preceding year. It probably is pretty evident to everyone who is listening why we would have put that in rather than a 0.

Clause 9 be amended at line 11 by striking out the words "three per cent" and inserting immediately following by "an amount equal to the Canadian Consumer Price Index for the immediately preceding year."

Again we believe that 3 per cent should not be a pre-condition, but that we should at least be negotiating within the framework of the cost of living.

That clause 9 be amended by the addition of a new subsection (3):

Notwithstanding any other act of Parliament, but subject to section 11, every compensation plan for employees to whom this act applies shall be deemed to include a no layoff provision.

I think that clause speaks for itself.

We would ask that clause 12 be amended at line 36 on page 7 by replacing the term "Treasury Board" with the words "Public Service Staff Relations Board"; that clause 12, subsection (2) be amended at line 42 on page 7 by replacing the words "Treasury Board" with the words "Public Service Staff Relations Board"; and that clause 12, subsection (3) be amended at line 1 on page 8 by replacing the words "Treasury Board" with the words "Public Service Staff Relations Board".

We really believe very strongly that it would be far more appropriate for the Public Service Staff Relations Board to be overseeing the administration of collective agreements for the public sector than to be having Treasury Board, a more political body, overseeing collective agreements.

The amendment to clause 13 would be that clause 13 be amended at line 10 on page 8 by striking out the word "no". Again it is in response to our belief that a freely negotiated agreement should be honoured and bargainers should be going to the table without pre-condition or prohibition.

Clause 14 be amended at line 36 on page 8 by inserting immediately following "are" the words "being forced". Clause 14 would then read:

(a) to fail to give notice to employees participating in the strike that they are being forced to resume the duties of their employment immediately;

I think that clause speaks for itself.

On clause 20, that clause 20 on page 9 be amended by striking out all words following the word "Majesty" on line 27. The reason for that is that we believe very strongly that there is a slight conflict between having an organization fined for failing to comply with the law and then the employer receiving the fines. We believe that section 20 should be amended as stated.

• (1900)

The final clause that we have an amendment for is:

That clause 25 be amended by inserting at line 29, on page 11, immediately following the word "force", the following:

only once the report of an independent mediator is received by the minister. If the report of the mediator is refused by the minister, this act will not come into force.

Again we believe that a mediated solution would be the appropriate solution and that a mediator should be able to bring both parties together to a mutually agreed to solution.

The final amendment is:

That clause 25 be amended by inserting sub paragraph 2, line 33 on page 11 to read:

Notwithstanding clause 25(1), this act shall come into effect six months hence.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Are there any other members wishing to table amendments?

The Hon. President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Chairman, like my colleagues from the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, I would like to propose three amendments. I will be brief since copies of these amendments have already been distributed to our colleagues who can read them. I would simply say that the first one allows us to make an exception to the rule regarding compensation so that, as I said in my speech, we could pay a lump sum of $500 to people earning less than $27,000 less than that with that sum being reduced step by step for those earning between $27,000 and $27,500.

The objective of this amendment is to make sure that it is not prohibited by the Act.

The second amendment would allow the Governor in Council to order pay adjustments, again outside the bill, up to the time when the bill received Royal Assent. What we are requesting is enough flexibility, up to the time when the bill is assented, to continue bargaining with some unions and possibly come to some agreement.

Finally, the third and last amendment, dealing with section 23 is required in order to correct a mistake, to add something which was forgotten in the French version at line 31. It adds the word "cent" before the word "trois", to read "cent trois pour cent". So I would say this is only a technical amendment to the translation.

These are our amendments. As to the amendments proposed by my colleague from the Liberal Party, I note that the first one asks that we apply the same rule of 0, 3, 3 to independent contractors to whom we contract out.

We cannot accept that amendment because if we need, for instance, the services of a secretary who is working for that contractor, we would be forcing her employer to settle wage claims for at zero and 3 for a year, and we would go well beyond what we wish to do as an employer. We consider that this amendment is not acceptable.

In the case of the next amendments, that is amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 7, on the sheet that been handed to us, as well as amendment Nos. 10 and 11, they are all amendments linked to the mediation process and they would put us in a position of mediation. I have already explained earlier to this House that the government, for the reason that I have already mentioned very clearly, did not intend to accept it.

If we proceed to the third paragraph, on page 2, we find that those amendments deal with the wage equity. I had also the opportunity today to explain why, for instance, we did not intend to withdraw our appeal before the court, because it is a very important appeal that deals with some principles. There has been a conflict between us and the other party as to the definition of the extremely important principle of wage equity, and that is why, of course, we want to maintain our prerogative and why we are not prepared to forego such prerogative as this amendment would have us to do.

I remind that amendments at the bottom of the page, that is that "Bill C-29 be amended in clause 2" etc., and "that Bill C-29 be amended in clause 7", would prevent us from granting other premiums such as the bilingualism premiums. I have a whole list of premiums — —which are given shift premiums, weekend premiums, stand by premiums, pedagogical factor allowance, overtime meal allowance.

[English]

[Translation]

We made it abundantly clear that we do not want that at all when we say that premiums would be limited to zero. That is why this clause is not acceptable for the simple reason that we cannot limit bilingualism premiums at zero per cent. That is not our intention at all. We are talking about wages and remuneration.

As for his concern about the clause on page 4, substituting the following therefor Rights Act the terms, I would like to remind him that there may be some confusion here. The government has no intention whatsoever to avoid the human rights legislation. I believe that it is absolutely clear in the way it is stated the French version of the bill and the problem might be in the interpretation that the hon. member could legitimately make when he wondered if we intended to override that legislation. That is not the case at all. On the contrary, we said that we totally agreed that it should be subject to the Act.

In the last amendment, which is on page 3 of the document provided by my colleague of the Liberal Party, we are asked to amend clause 8 by striking out line 42 at page 5 and substituting the words "including wage rates and other terms". This would imply reopening the salary question which is precisely what we considered to be a constraint at Budget time, and we have no intention to reopen it.

As for the amendments presented by my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam, she recommends that clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 13 to 42. We do not really know by what these lines would be replaced, and it would be impossible to know to whom the law applies. Therefore, this motion is obviously unacceptable because it eliminates altogether the people to whom the law applies. We do not know anymore to which law it applies.

Amendment to clause 5 at page 5. Again, this is an unacceptable change because it focuses once more on mediation, and that we will maintain the 0 and 3. We have already said very clearly where we stood on that matter.

On clause 7, we are asked to make an addition following line 42 at page 4:

> for greater certainty, any order by the Canadian Human Rights tribunal respecting pay equity shall be exempted from the application of this act.

This is already implicitly covered I would submit, Mr. Chairman, by the opening words which say in clause 7(1):

7.(1) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament except the Canadian Human Rights Act

Therefore, the Human Rights Act applies.

She says:

That clause 7 be amended at line 5 on page 5 by striking the words:

In the opinion of Treasury Board,

This is fully within the prerogative of Treasury Board under the Financial Administration Act to deal with personnel management. This only recognizes a principle.

As for striking the word "not", we stick, of course, to the zero, three. We would only have to amend it if we were prepared to go beyond that. I think she knows very well where we stand on this.

On clause 8, she recommends that we strike the words "other than wage rates or other terms and conditions of the compensation plan."

It would cover monetary items. The purpose of this bill is precisely to prevent this occurrence.

• (1910)

On clause 9:

That clause 9 be amended at line 5 on page 3 by striking the word "not" by an equal amount to the Canadian consumer, not at all. We are not prepared to legislate the Consumer Price Index. I have indicated that we have to fight this and make sure that we break the vicious circle which would carry us to higher deficits, higher taxes and higher debt. We are not prepared to accept that.

That clause 9 be amended at line 11 by striking the words "3 per cent", well this is a 3 per cent year and we will hold on to that.

Another item, that clause 9 be amended by the addition of a new subparagraph, I would say that this is a wage restraint bill, not a job security bill, which can be dealt with in the proper form which is the National Joint Council.

That clause 12 replaces the words "Treasury Board" with the word "Public Staff Relations Board", I beg to remind the hon. member that this is the employer. The Public Service Staff Relations Board is an adjudicative body which does not deal with matters such as the enforcement of an act. Sometimes I wonder, I must say, but they are supposedly an adjudicative body.

An hon. member: Why don't you talk to the judge?

Mr. Loiselle: He said he wanted me to talk to them. I am not supposed to talk to a judge, you know. I did not. But everybody else has, it seems. I wonder.

On Clause 14, by inserting the words "being forced", this is not helpful and I do not think it would add anything to enforce penalties.

Again, Clause 25 is related to mediation. The effect of the last amendment on Clause 25 is beyond what is not in the agreement with what we are trying to achieve.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, these are roughly the amendments we are moving in an effort to tie up a number of loose ends in our bill. This is what I had to say about the proposals made by the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party. Thank you.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, could the Chair please explain if we are still on clause 2, or if we are going to have an opportunity to move on to clause 3?

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Speaker is in the hands of the House and it is up to hon. members to let me know when no one else wants to discuss clause 2. In accordance with a motion passed earlier today, clause 2 will be set aside for a vote by 10 o'clock tonight. At that time, I will deal with clause 3.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Chairman, the member for Mission—Coquitlam has raised a point of order as to whether or not we are going to clause 3. Maybe we should remind the committee that the informal agreement we had in the House an hour or so ago, put to the House by the government Whip, was that a speaker for each of the three parties in the House, the government, the Official Opposition and the NDP, would in umbrella fashion explain and/or introduce any amendments for whatever clause.

Having done that, and that has been accomplished, we have had the member for Ottawa West, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, and now the president of the Treasury Board. That round is completed.

As I understand the agreement we made an hour or so ago, we now revert to our debate on clause 2. I had risen a moment ago because I wanted to be the next speaker for the Official Opposition in that respect.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the member wanted to speak on clause 2. I am not challenging his right to do that.

I am not sure you were in the House when the Whip for the government side explained that in the agreement we were going to try to move through some of the other clauses after we had introduced our amendments.

I have no objection to the hon. member speaking. I just wondered if we were going to start now moving through the clauses as had been agreed by all three parties.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, just to clarify it. If the member for Mission—Coquitlam wants to move on to clause 3, she can merely ask that we stand clause 2 and move on to clause 3. It is straightforward.

If the member wants to speak on clause 2, then we are officially on clause 2. We have not moved off it.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I appreciate the comment made by the hon. member for Burlington, but having said this, it is nevertheless true that, since the beginning of our proceedings in committee of the Whole all hon. members dealing with clause 2 have taken this opportunity to deal with all the issues connected with that bill and I intend to keep the same flexibility and allow all hon. members to discuss clause 2 as well as any other features of the bill, when I recognize them in the House, if the House agrees. I think this formula is very flexible and allow every hon. member given the large number of people who want to participate in the debate, to discuss clause 2 as well as the other clauses of the bill.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say on clause 2, and perhaps some other clauses of Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto. That is the gentle characterization of what we are doing here today.

I suppose it is the nature of bill drafting that one has to be fairly innocuous or genteel in putting labels on those bills. I have no difficulty with that. But let us be aware that what the government seeks to do here today is more Draconian than talking about compensation in the public sector.

I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Laval Est—

[Translation]

—who just made a speech. The member for Laval-est said to this House: "We have nothing against those people", meaning the civil Servants who are now on strike. I would like to tell him this: What you say and what you do are two different things.

[English]

I want to say to the gentleman from Laval Est that his actions contradict what he is saying. We have an expression that says: "your actions speak louder than your words." It is not enough for him and others to stand in this Chamber and say: "We have nothing against those people," when every single action of the government, and those who toe the line over there, indicate clearly that it must have an awful lot against these people in the union, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, because how else, I say to him, can you explain the toying with them, the aggravation, the setting them up over the past few weeks?

My colleague and friend from Ottawa West raised the question today in Question Period on this very issue. She said in her first question that the government was much more concerned with its place in the polls, that these 160,000 people were pawns in a game.

If you look at the way the government has gone about this, it is a two-faced approach on this issue. The old "now you see it, now you do not" approach, the government changing the ground rules to suit its particular purpose at the time.

• (1920)

First, it told these employees there would be negotiations. Now it refuses to negotiate. First it said that salaries could go up, but it would mean job losses. Now it says zero increase and the job losses continue.

It is very difficult. It is always difficult to deal with a moving target. It is always very difficult when you have a government that places no stock at all in credibility, no stock in its word at all. To use the expression that is almost worn out, but still very revealing, a government that rolls the dice as it sees fit.

The sad result, of course, is that there are many thousands of people out there on strike in front of this building today, and countless other buildings, in Ottawa and the national capital region and across this country. Of course they are. I suppose, all of them, to a man, to a woman, do not particularly want to be there. That should come as no secret to anybody. They have been goaded into it by a government that does not care an awful lot about the pain or inconvenience it inflicts on people. It has goaded these people into this strike. It has been a contrived confrontation from the beginning.

I put it to you, Mr. Chairman, that this strategy was mapped out a long time ago. It was part of the contrivance, part of the plan, part of the way to grasp at straws, to hang on by the fingernails, to find a way for this government to redeem itself in the public eye, to play tough with a group of people, to go out there and show that there is going to be restraint, or else.

There is another side of this that needs to be put on to the record. I cannot get very excited about the way the government is handling this particular grievance. I heard some insinuations a few moments ago. At the same time, there is always the danger that because one criticizes one side one is thereby thought to be embracing all the actions of the other side.

I stand here representing about 85,000 or 86,000 Canadians who happen to live in the riding of Burin—St. Georges. Relatively few of those people, a mere handful of them actually, are involved as members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. I suppose, on a per capita basis, I probably have fewer people in that union than almost any other member in this Chamber. My riding is a very rural riding of 158 communities. The largest communities have a population of are 7,000 or 8,000, communities like Stephenville and Marystown and Port aux Basques. However, most of them are much smaller communities of 50, 60 or 100 people. In those communities you will not find government services. I am not saying there is an absence of services, but there is an absence of a government installation. The services are usually delivered from outside the community, from more urban centres such as St. John's or Cornerbrook, or in some cases Stephenville or Halifax or Moncton or so on. On a per capita basis we do not have a lot of PSAC people.

But that is not the issue. Surely, members of this Chamber ought not to have their participation and debate determined on that basis alone. I also represent 86,000 people, including many thousands of taxpayers, who are going to be footing the bill for whatever settlement there is here. They are going to be putting up with whatever inconvenience or lack of service during the course of this strike.

As I have said, I do not have many of those members directly in my riding. I want to give an example, just to illustrate a point I think is important.

The point I alluded to just now is that because we criticize the government, do not, anybody, be under the illusion that somehow we embrace all the activities of PSAC on this.

For example, I do not at all embrace the way it has in a very partisan way tried to politicize the entire issue. I do not embrace that at all. I am sure that comes as no secret to many people in this Chamber.

There is something else that I do not at all subscribe to. I will give a specific example. My friend and colleague from Gander—Grand Falls has a community in his riding called Gander. I happen to go through that community to use the airport on a fairly frequent basis, last Friday afternoon being one of those occasions. It was just after the union had decided to go back on the picket lines.

I arrived just after a particular incident had taken place. I was not witness to this, so it is second-hand in this situation. I was informed about it by a person at the airport who did it mainly just to make conversation with me. We were passing time together, and that individual decided to tell me about this particular incident. I want to tell the committee, because it is revealing.

An elderly woman had approached the airport in a car as a passenger late in the afternoon, hours after the picket lines went up. She was a woman in her sixties. She was to take a flight from Gander to St. John's, a 25 or 30 minute flight, to have a CAT scan, a medical examination, for her particular medical problem.

Her case was known to the people on the picket line. Her age was known, it was obvious to see. Her circumstances were known. The importance of her getting to that airport to get that flight was known.

That woman was obliged to vacate the car in which she was travelling and walk for just about a mile, carrying her luggage, to get to the airport.

What point was served? If they wanted to do that to the President of the Treasury Board, make him walk a mile to get to the airport with a suitcase, I suppose it could be considered that they are aiming at the target.

What did that poor little old woman have to do with those people getting a settlement. I think we all know the answer.

I was talking a moment ago about this government engaging in a contrived confrontation. It is like an argument, it takes two. You cannot have a confrontation unless you have people on both sides willing to engage in the confrontation.

I have to say on this one in passing, before I get on to some of the other issues in this bill, that given the example I have just put before the committee, that woman approaching Gander airport last Friday, either the union leadership is not very bright, else it is just anchoring to get legislated back to work.

I do not believe for a fraction of a second that we have to embrace all the antics that are going on out there in the name of strike action. I would hope that the union leadership would smarten up and realize it is not those little old ladies I am talking about who are the brunt of its problem, but if it wants to take it out on this government, it has a duty and a right to do so. I will be there with it.

Let us come to some of the issues, because I just wanted to set the record straight on that one. It bothers me that some of the people out there are missing the real issue here. The real issue is to inconvenience the government. The real issue is to get the message home to the government.

I doubt the President of the Treasury Board even heard about that incident until I told him just this last minute, not that he should have, but I am just saying to the union that if it thought that woman, and she was mirrored many times across the country, was going to bring the government to its knees, maybe it was mistaken on that one.

• (1930)

In this business everything is black or white. I suppose the reason I do not have a full bench of NDP members here is because they have all rushed out to call Daryl baby now, and get their latest instructions from him and tell him what little old Rog has said here in the Chamber about them. In the age of black and white, I suppose, I will now be blacklisted as a fellow who does not like unions.

I happen to like them very much. I just do not like some of their tactics. When they go interfering with the freedom of some senior citizen who wants nothing more than to get to a doctor on time, then it is time for them to have a little pow-wow and refocus on what their target is. I do not believe it is those people out there who are innocently suffering on account of some tactics of which I cannot believe for a second anybody in his or her right mind is actually approving.

I say to my NDP friends, while they are calling the union, maybe they could pass on a message or two. Maybe they could tell the union that yes, I, this member, supports pay equity. I happen to know people in my riding and people across the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and people across the country, carpenters and labourers, who are getting $4 less an hour than their counterparts in Vancouver.

Here is a carpenter in Vancouver and he gets so much an hour for doing a job for the government. He is employed by the government, he is a civil servant, he is a member of PSAC and he is getting a certain wage in Vancouver. His counterpart in Newfoundland, doing the same thing, driving the same size nails, drawing out the same nails, squaring off the same board, using the same kind of a Skil saw, maybe wearing the same brand of overalls, is getting $4 less an hour.

What is the difference? Is the fellow in Newfoundland doing a sloppier job than the fellow in Vancouver? That is entirely possible, I suppose, because the law of averages says that you are going to have some sloppy carpenters in Newfoundland, some sloppy ones in Vancouver. You would not mind if they were paying the sloppy ones $4 less. All the carpenters in Newfoundland who work as members of the PSAC union for the government are getting that rate. What is their sin? Is their sin that they are sloppy, as opposed to competent? No, no, oh, no. Their sin is that they are living in Newfoundland instead of in Vancouver.

You talk about discrimination. This government is paying a carpenter in Newfoundland $4 less an hour than if that same carpenter were in Vancouver.

To extend the example, this government pays the carpenter in Newfoundland $2 less than his counterpart in Ontario. You do not need a strike. You do not need negotiations to tell you that fair is fair. This government says to women librarians that because they are women it is going to pay them several thousand dollars less. It is happening right in this city to librarians.

Again I make the point: it is not on the basis of whether they are sloppy or incompetent or thorough or experienced or a novice. Oh, no, none of the above. The only question in effect is: are you a women or are you a man? If you are a woman you get paid several thousand dollars less a year than if you were a man.

We do not need strikes. We do not need collective agreements. We do not need negotiations to settle those questions. These were settled in the minds and hearts of Canadians many, many years ago. That is addressed in one of the amendments put forward by my colleague from Ottawa West. Take those things off the table. Pay equity should not even be a negotiable item. That should be a given. The government will now say it as it should have said a long time ago, and oh, yes, it said it, the Prime Minister has said it many times. Like so many other things, he has not exactly put his money where his mouth is.

Let the government say now that it recognizes its error on this. It is not a matter for negotiation that a carpenter in Newfoundland should be paid less than one in Vancouver; that a woman librarian in Ottawa or wherever should be paid thousands of dollars less than a male librarian. That is disgusting, it is absolutely disgraceful. It is unthinkable.

Let us not get these things wrapped up in government's ability to pay. When we get to the stage in this country at which we have a government that can justify discrimination on the basis of the pocketbook, can justify using the public purse to discriminate against people because they happen to be female or happen to be living in one part of the country or another, it is time for somebody over there to smarten up. This has nothing to do with Tory politics or right wing politics. Certainly, lowering the agenda is not that right wing. It cannot be. That has to do more with basic insensitivity, basic stupidity.

Does the President of the Treasury Board not actually have some women in his riding who voted for him at one time. Surely, he is not expecting them to vote for him again if he keeps up this nonsense.

Does he not have some carpenters, some labourers in his riding who are getting less money than they would if they were living in some other province in Canada?

If the minister had nothing going for him, only an instinct for survival, forget looking after the deficit and all the other things he is worrying about these days, if he only has an instinct for survival, an instinct to stay alive, he should rush out there and cure this one, this pay equity issue. This has nothing to do with negotiating. When you have to negotiate something like this, it shows how out of touch with reality you really are.

There are so many more things I could say about this bill, given the time. I see by the signal that my time is up. Perhaps I will get another crack at it later in the evening.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Chairman, I just want to set the record straight. The hon. member who just spoke asked if the NDP was out getting our marching orders from Daryl Bean. I want to let the House know that we were getting our share of the dinner before the hon. member finished and got up to the food.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Chairman, to the legitimate point of order, as always, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, as is often the case with her, is away behind. I already had my dinner before she got to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to congratulate—

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Did you have your dinner?

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: No, not yet, I am still waiting for my three limousines!

I would like to congratulate my colleague from Burin—St. George's for his remarkable performance in French. I was quite impressed when he started his remarks by answering a question from my colleague from Laval, and I invite him to do so more often. He did extremely well, indeed. He reminded us that the hon. member for Laval said we have nothing against these people, meaning public servants. In French, he said: What you say and what you do are two different things. I understand, of course, that a 0 per cent increase or a salary freeze, is not, on the face of it, the most pleasant way to tell our employees we greatly appreciate their work. That is the reason why, as the months went by, I took so much time, as did the government, to explain to our employees that was one of many measures we had to take, a difficult, painful, but still necessary decision to make. The hon. member said we have tried since the beginning—

He said it was a contrived confrontation that we had been seeking for political purposes to confront the unions. I will tell him that if one were to look at what other Liberal governments have done this year in other provinces, they have not taken the decision we have to sit down and negotiate. They have just legislated zero per cent. We chose to try and make an effort to improve it.

He said: "You have been shifting the ground rules or changing the ground rules by saying first it will be three and then it will be zero. In February, what we said was that the wage budget would remain at zero, but if we could soon enough come to some agreement where we could balance 1 per cent against 2,000 positions, we could give 1 and then 2 and then 3 per cent. It would be a very high cost. This was not considered by the union. When we sat down, and June came, it was too late. We could not find a saving within the wage budget to proceed this way. We have been, I think, very fair and very consistent. We did not change the rules.

He mentioned a lot about pay equity. I wonder where the members of that party were over the last decade. We are the government which decided in 1990 to give $370 million, in a lump sum payment, for pay equity. We have also agreed to pay, on an ongoing basis, $81 million to allow for catching up. We are not only talking about pay equity as they do, but we are acting. I would certainly compare our record to that of the Liberal Party any time.

He also refers to regional pay. He said it was unfair to pay carpenters in his riding less than what is paid in Toronto or in other provinces in Canada. We have a policy, in certain areas of regional pay, which seems to be fair. I do not see why the Canadian government, which gets its money from the taxpayer, should create a totally unfair competition at the regional level. We try to follow the market pressure in each area and react accordingly.

This, in my view, seems fair because we have to compete with others in that particular area. We do it, I think, as a way of managing well. This is a fair and accepted way.

On the whole, I would like to repeat in closing, we have not chosen confrontation. Far from it. We have chosen negotiation. It is sad that finally the union, as it said the day before the budget: "We are never going to accept this if they so decide to freeze our wages. We are going to go on strike," and they said: "This is a political strike."

It is their problem. For us it is not a political decision. It is a good sound fiscal decision we have taken.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of words for the minister. I could not help but interject after the minister stated a moment ago that it is okay to pay people in the Public Service less in the province of Newfoundland, for example, or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island than people are paid in a similar job in other parts of Canada.

In other words, what the minister has just said is that one's wage rate should depend upon where one works, that is, in what province one works. That is quite a statement from the President of the Treasury Board. The President of the Treasury Board speaks on behalf of the government for all policies relating to wages.

In other words, does it mean that the Government of Canada now is trying to pay secretarial staff, clerks, radio announcers with the CBC, who are in competition with private radio, clerks who work for the federal government, who are in competition with clerks in the private sector, secretarial staff, managers, all of our professionals what it figures is the going rate in that particular province?

That is totally unacceptable. That is discrimination of the worst kind. That is discrimination depending upon where one lives, where the border is. I notice in section 7 of the bill it refers to work-sharing agreements approved under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Right now under this government you collect unemployment insurance depending upon where you live, not where you work. In other words, you take the government's policy and depending on where you work, that is the sole determinant of how much money you get.

Then when you leave your place of work and you go home to draw unemployment insurance, it depends on where you live, where you take up residence, as to whether or not you qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. In some places it is 10 weeks, other places it is 14 weeks, other places it is 20 weeks, and so on.

It is an outrageous form of discrimination, Mr. Chairman, and the minister just verified it. He said that it is only fair to the private sector in the places affected. I want to remind the minister that some of these employees qualify because they live in those same areas for environmental bonuses, or what is commonly referred to as isolation pay. Why? Because they are living in an area in which the cost of living is higher than if they were living in another area where the cost of living would not be so high.

On the one hand the minister turned around and said in this Chamber a few moments ago that they are going to pay carpenters less if they live in Newfoundland than if they lived in some other province, they are going to pay pipe fitters because they do less if they live in Newfoundland than if they live in some other province in Canada, they are going to pay tractor operators less if they live in Newfoundland—oh, no, work in Newfoundland. Excuse me because it is not where you live. It is where you work which is the sole determinant of how much money you make.

I bring up this point simply to point out that this is one of the things that has demoralized people in the Public Service. You wonder why somebody would willingly go out on a picket line and remove their income from their family. It has to be pretty important to these people to say: "I am going to give up a day's work, or week's work now. I am going to give that up and I am going to have it docked on my next pay cheque". They are being docked on their next pay cheque for the days they were out on the picket line in September. Why would you want, in this day and age, in this country, to lose a week's pay?

The reason for it is because of the demoralization of the Public Service. This is one of the things the minister just said a moment ago and it is enough to make you angry. Regional rates of pay, he says, are okay. You live in Newfoundland, he says you should get paid less for doing the same job than if you lived in the province of Quebec.

What an outrageous statement for the President of the Treasury Board to make on behalf of the Government of Canada. What an outrageous statement for the minister to make.

It is not only that why people go out on strike and sometimes do things they should not really do. The other part of the story is connected with the way the government has treated these employees. After this period is over, this bill will re-enact the same types of agreements, same wage scales, same rapport they had with union members prior to this legislation.

Three years ago the Government of Canada brought in a system under the orders of the President of the Treasury Board to get rid of employees in the Public Service. When you make a decision to get rid of employees in the Public Service, the people who get hit the worst are of course people who live the furthest down the line. They are the first ones to go.

We had upper management in the Public Service being paid money called "productivity bonuses" to get rid of employees in the Public Service. How would that make you feel?

Here you are, sitting in an office in Grand Falls, Newfoundland, sitting in an office in Gander, Newfoundland, or in St. John's, Newfoundland and you know that this President of the Treasury Board has approved a system whereby certain managers along the way will get bonuses if they meet the government's guidelines of getting rid of person years in the Public Service, because that is what was in effect.

In other words, you had one manager ordering other managers to get rid of employees so that he could get his bonus. Then, further down the line, you had managers wondering whether a manager above them was ordering him to be got rid of so he could get an extra bonus.

In other words, you had everybody looking back over their shoulder wondering who was getting paid off to get rid of you. What a system to be living under. The President of the Treasury Board could rightly be called the terminator because he was terminating people by giving bonuses to upper management in the Public Service.

That certainly is not a very good working environment for people in the Public Service. Here they are now, some of them, getting less pay than people in other provinces, and the President of the Treasury Board stands up here tonight and says: "That is the proper thing to do. You should get less pay because you live in the province of Newfoundland, or Nova Scotia".

If you lived in Quebec or Ontario, you would get higher wages. If you lived in British Columbia, you would get higher wages still. That is what the President of the Treasury Board just said.

On top of that, a system of pay-offs for lay-offs in the Public Service. We can understand why the Public Service has been totally demoralized and why the public of Canada are the real losers, because public service to the people of Canada has gone downhill ever since this government took office.

They stand in this Chamber and they say once a year: "Here is a report from this auditing firm saying that it takes two days for a letter to get from one province to another." Canadians are sitting out there and wondering why it takes their letter two weeks to get there. Of course, the reason is that the things that they are judging are only the letters that are pumped out of a computer or a typewriter and have the address exactly in the centre of a letter so it can be read by a machine.

The grandmother who sits down and writes a letter to her granddaughter at university somewhere writes it. She does not type it. The letter takes two weeks to get there, or three weeks. A Christmas present takes a year sometimes. We come across these cases.

People applying to universities, and their student loans going between one province and another. Every member of Parliament has cases now of the mail not arriving at all because public service to the people of Canada under this President of the Treasury Board and under this Government of Canada has gone downhill. Service to the people of Canada has been substantially reduced because the Government of Canada will not treat its public servants properly.

It is not very good to be working in a job today and not know when you are going to lose it or when some manager somewhere is getting a Christmas bonus to take your job away, and wondering why you are making less than somebody in another province and why the President of the Treasury Board stood up here tonight and said: "That is great. That is fine. We are in total agreement with it." Shame on the President of the Treasury Board.

I want to ask him one question. I want to just get this straight on this bonus business that was brought up recently. I just want to get it straight. He can stand up and say yes, that is correct, or no, it is not correct.

If I understand him correctly, what he has said is this: There are really three types, of bonuses. One is a performance pay by managers in the Public Service. Of the 4,700 managers in the Public Service, 97 per cent of them qualified for performance pay this past year. Now, that is one type of performance pay. That runs from 3 per cent to 10 per cent, as I understand it, Mr. President of the Treasury Board through you, Mr. Chairman. Now, that is one type of bonus, which is really a part of, as the President of the Treasury Board explained in the House, the salary. The President of the Treasury Board said that that was negotiated years ago and about 15 per cent was taken off of their range of the salary scale and that amount of money which would have been spent anyway was being used as performance pay for management in the Public Service. That is the massive number—4,600 public servants. That is one group.

Then there is another group which involves Crown corporations, people who sit on boards and commissions; in other words, mostly Order in Council appointments. In fact all of them are. That is a completely separate group now from the public servants. If the minister understands me correctly, am I to understand that the bonuses for both those groups will be removed from April 1, 1991 to March 31, 1992, for that working period? Did I understand him correctly when he stood up in the House that that is what he said? Is that correct, I am wondering, Mr. Chairman? Is that correct, or is it not correct? If it is correct, it is oui, it is yes, and that will settle it.

Mr. Loiselle: But with a nuance, if I may say so. It is that the calendar year is not exactly the same for both groups. For the Crown corporation it is April to April, as he has said. So, zero salary, and at the end of the year zero bonus. For the managers, it is June to June. So, they have zero since June and when the time comes after that period to get their performance pay, it will also be zero.

If I may, on the other point raised by the hon. member—

Mr. Baker: Just for one year? And everybody loses it as soon as—

Mr. Loiselle: Yes, exactly. The hon. member talked a lot about the performance pay, and he said that I had decided that people who work in Newfoundland would get less. Not at all; they may get more, for all I know. What we say is that we try to adjust a certain number of our categories of employees, a very small number in all, if I may say so. Because out of a quarter of a million employees there are 26,000 to whom these regional pays apply, in nine occupational groups. This policy which, from listening to the comments of the hon. member sounds so horrible, must not be so horrible because it was implemented by the Liberal government.

If I may go on and explain why we maintain this. First of all, when there are occupational groups for whom the outside pay data indicates significant regional variation from the Canadian average, this is taken into account. Where you have occupational groups where the area of recruitment and the mobility of employees in the Public Service is limited, and when occupational groups for which regional rates would contribute to the achievement of fair and competitive rates of pay in the labour market, these are the elements on which we base our decision. In my view this is a fair approach.

• (2000)

On another aspect of the issues raised by the hon. member, he said that since we arrived in power the service has gone downhill. I would like to remind him that when we came to power, for every dollar that Canadians were paying in taxes, the Liberal government was spending $1.33.

They were playing at being Father Christmas, which is all right for a while, but obviously, at one time or another, one has to face this reality and one has to act accordingly and try to bring one's expenditure within one's capacity to pay.

This is what we have been trying to do, I must admit with great difficulty. The opposition has opposed every one of our proposals to try to bring our fiscal situation to a better position.

Basically, we are trying to improve service, to find new ways of providing services, and to use the best possible methods. I think that we should be commended for this. In the reform program I introduced in the House, PS 2000, it says that people are looking behind their backs at the bosses, and so on. This is what we are trying to change. We want to empower people and allow them in the regions to get on with the job, find good people, help them get the best training, and then let them get on and not have Ottawa on their back all the time.

This is what we are trying to do because we find it is a good way of using our good employees.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 2 stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan wish to speak on Clause 2?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to speak on Clause 10 but if two more Liberals want to make free speeches we will never make it to Clause 4.

An hon. member: What do you want to do?

Mr. Stupich: Call it Clause 10 if you like.

The point of my conversation, Mr. Chairman, is ask a couple of questions and I will be brief.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I think it is very important to remind all hon. members that on Clause 2 the——discussion is very broad and open. However, when we reach clauses 3, 4 and 5, comments will have to be much more succinct and deal exclusively with these specific clauses.

[Translation]

As long as we are considering clause 2, the discussion is wide ranging. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make sure I understand the point the Chair is making quite clearly. As far as I can gather from the discussions the three parties had in this House before noon, the amendments were to be tabled and members would then be allowed to refer generally to any of them at any point in tonight's debate.

If the Chair is now saying that, as soon as we are through debating clause 2, discussion will be limited to the content of the clause under consideration at the time, I think that will be more of a problem and that some members may depart from clause 2. As a matter of fact, we were told this morning—if I recall correctly and I would ask for advice from the Chair—that we could address the issue in a much broader way than we normally do as we are dealing with a special order of the House.

Could the Chair please clarify that point for us?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is quite simple, but first, I will hear the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls on the same point of order.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, if I might just speak to that point of order, I can understand your difficulty. On the one hand, as I interpret it, the rules of procedure apply to motions. In effect, all of the motions have been presented to the Chamber. Since all of the motions when they were laid on the table are taken as presented to the House and before the House, that is my understanding of what happened in the Chamber today. Every motion that was tabled was actually before the Chamber because if they were not before the Chamber when they were tabled then you cannot vote on them.

They must be before the House now. It is a very irregular procedure that has been adopted by the government. The Government of Canada, in trying to wrap up all the debate in one day, has practically destroyed the whole logic behind motions and when one can speak to them and what one can say and what one can amend.

Mr. Chairman, I can understand your difficulty, but I do believe that all of the motions are presently before the House. The hon. member down here with the NDP should be permitted to speak on any of the motions at any moment in time.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. members who just spoke. I think I can sum up what everybody is thinking by saying that as long as hon. members stay on Clause 2, they can address the whole of Bill C-29, any clause, any amendment. In other words, the discussion remains wide open as long as we stay on Clause 2. If this is the way hon. members wish to proceed, the Chair will just accept it.

So, in that perspective, I recognize the hon. member for Portneuf on a point of order.

Mr. Ferland: On a point of clarification. There are some twenty-five clauses in this bill. We have till 10 p.m. tonight, in fact we have two hours left to adopt the twenty-five clauses. I understand that if the twenty-five clauses have not been read, at 10 p.m., they will be deemed as having been read, considered and discussed by members of Parliament. Is that correct?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: That is correct.

Mr. Ferland: That means, Mr. Chairman, that if we stay till 10 p.m. on Clause 2, Canadian citizens will not be able to get from the President of the Treasury Board explanations on twenty-three clauses of this bill. Is that correct?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Yes, being understood that on Clause 2, as I just said, hon. members can talk about any clause and any amendment tabled during the day. So, as you can see, the rule has been made very flexible to allow for the widest discussion possible, even if we stay on Clause 2.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): The President of the Treasury Board said, on repeated occasions earlier today, when he did not answer a question that was put to him by two of my colleagues, that: "All we were trying to fight, or combat, is the deficit."

The deficit this year is expected to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $34 billion. All of the members of the alliance, all of their salaries put together, if they were to donate that back to the government for a full year, that would total something like one-seventh of the deficit. There would be a lot to make up from other sources. This is a pretty weak way to attack the deficit if that is all we are doing, if that is the only effect. What we are looking at is only a small portion of the total bill for the employees in the alliance, rather than the total thing.

That was not really the point I wanted to make. We are talking about a total salary bill of $4.8 billion. If all of those people who were to get the expected increase in inflation this year, which at this point is running at about 6 per cent, it would total $288 million.

Currently, we are spending $1.2 billion keeping our troops in NATO. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board gave any consideration at all to speeding up the withdrawal from NATO, which is scheduled to take place in 1994 and 1995, so as to take one-quarter of that amount of money back this year, so that he could meet even a 6 per cent increase in wages paid to the employees. Did he give any thought to that, in view of the fact that the U.S.S.R. armed forces are leaving just as quickly as they can find transport and alternative accommodation back home? That is one possibility.

I just have one other question, Mr. Chairman, and then I will let the President of the Treasury Board answer. There is an alternative.

• (2010)

The Department of National Revenue—Taxation estimated that each year the Crown is losing $1.2 billion through inadequate enforcement of the Income Tax Act. One can only assume when it made that public it knew people would hear about it and wonder about it, and that in one way, it was simply asking Treasury Board to approve the hiring of more auditors.

Now consider that $1.2 billion, and once again one-third of it would be enough to give a 6 per cent increase to all of the Public Service Alliance employees, and have $12 million left over. Did the President of the Treasury Board actually receive such a request from the Department of National Revenue, that is to hire more auditors to close some of this leakage, and turn it down, or did he never hear from DNR when they wanted more auditors?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has come forward with a couple of proposals that I will try to deal with.

He talks about NATO. I do not want to get into this debate, but I can explain to him that should we accelerate any changes he will know very well that, for the first year, it will probably cost us more money than it does now. It is always a difficult and costly operation to make such a transformation. So I do not think there is any savings there to be accomplished.

We have already indicated otherwise that we are proceeding with some changes in Europe and they will be dealt with as expeditiously as possible. We can say that they have already been booked and provided for.

As for the Department of National Revenue, we have, indeed, granted additional persons to tighten up and make sure that there is a better enforcement. But I would also like to remind him that members of his party have been getting up, over the last little while, talking to us about bankruptcies. Much of the reasons why we have this income tax which is theoretically due, but cannot be easily collected, is because of that. This is an impact when companies or individuals are in difficulty and cannot meet their obligations. So we have granted additional human resources and a budget to do that.

I would say that in the bill that will be introduced, if it has not been done so by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on the spending limits, we make provisions for spending which brings in additional revenue. We will certainly look at that as one way possibly, but again I would say that we have tried to have as efficient an organization as possible. We tried to improve enforcement, but this is an end of a recession and of course it is not always easy to collect all the money which is owed the government.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his answers, but I would remind him that, as late as the Auditor General's latest report, he was still complaining about the shortages of auditors and pointing out that an extra auditor could bring in something like $375 million or $750 million, depending upon the area of his or her investigation.

I do not expect the minister to have this information at his fingertips right now, but I would like to know by how many the audit staff in National Revenue was increased in each of the last three years.

With respect to bankruptcies and the like, yes, we have been complaining about the way in which government policies, in part the free trade deal itself, the high interest rate, the high dollar, all of these things have certainly exacerbated the situation as far as companies going bankrupt is concerned. But my colleagues have not been complaining quite so much about that as they have about the large corporations that are able to evade or avoid tax. That is where the auditors, according to DNR itself, Department of National Revenue—Taxation, feels that it could be getting a lot more money in, not going after the ones that are going bankrupt, but going after the ones that are doing very well in living close enough to the rules to get away with it.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I think I heard this from the NDP source, large corporations are running away. They fail to recognize that this government is the one that imposed a minimal tax on capital, which had never been done before. We have closed about 200 different loopholes which existed. So we have done our share.

As for the number of corporations or so-called companies, most of them are small companies that are marginally profitable and have great difficulty carrying on. We can put the pressure on them and have more of them go into bankruptcy.

The banks and the financial institutions for the first time have a minimal tax on assets. This brings in $2 billion. It was not there when we came in. We have not been giving any gifts. The hon. member mentioned, and it is frequently heard, high dollars.

One of the reasons we want to tackle the deficit and the debt, and it is not that it is fun per se, is because it is one of the major causes of the high dollar. We are all borrowing heavily.

The provinces, in the first six months of 1990, have gone on foreign markets and have borrowed $10 billion in foreign currency. This currency, in turn, is changed into Canadian dollars and so there is a huge demand for Canadian dollars and the price goes up. This is the reality of it.

It is very interesting. You can sit down, not invest in a company, buy government certificates and go sit in Florida. We want to change that. We want to make room for entrepreneurs. We can find cheaper money.

This is why we want to fight the debt and the deficit, not for the fun of it, but because it is central to the well-being of Canadians and a sound economic policy is necessary. It is tough because we get requests from the NDP to spend, spend, spend.

I repeat that next year we will paying $41 billion on interest on our debt. This is horrible. Should we increase it more? Where will we get the money? That is the problem we have to deal with, and we are trying to balance these various responsibilities as well as we can.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I deeply regret that this is not the appropriate time to engage in a discussion of macroeconomic policy and that sort of thing.

I would just note in passing that given the minister's remarks of a few moments ago, he and his government must find it strange given the rigorous treatment that he claims they have given to their allies in the corporate sector, that in spite of this, the relative proportion of taxes paid by corporations continues to decline and that paid by individuals continues to rise.

I wish the government success and solace as it works its way through the puzzlement in this regard.

I would like to take this time in a fashion started by my friend and colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan to pose a series of questions to the minister. These questions will be presented at the table and I understand that answers will be forthcoming.

It strikes me as a useful exercise that these questions be put in the public record and be made part of this debate tonight.

If I may proceed, sections 3 and 4 have already been covered by my colleagues, and I wish to start with clause 5 of the bill and ask the following questions with regard to clause 5, which extends the collective agreement existing on February 26, 1991 for a period of two years.

(1) To which contracts do this clause apply?

(2) How many workers are affected?

(3) What are the wage rates for the workers affected by this clause?

(4) By this clause, is the government suspending free collective bargaining for a period of two years?

(5) Is this not a violation of International Labour Organization Convention number 87, and perhaps other conventions?

(6) How many times since the signing of the ILO conventions has the government been found to have been in violation of ILO conventions?

(7) Why is the government persisting in this bill when it must know that it is yet again in violation of ILO conventions.

(8) Is this an indication of the government's attitude toward international conventions which it is ostensibly bound by?

(9) Is the minister aware that the Government of Canada has violated ILO conventions more often than any other country?

With regard to clause 6, which extends the collective agreement which had expired on or before February 26 for a period of one year:

(1) Would the minister explain this clause?

(2) Is it not usual that when two parties negotiate a collective agreement they mutually establish an expiry date?

(3) Has the minister chosen to apply the hammer of this legislation rather than negotiate those expired agreements covered by clause 6?

(4) Is this clause included because the minister has no faith in the collective bargaining process?

(5) Possibly this clause is included because the minister is uncertain of the ability of Treasury Board to negotiate?

(6) Does the minister consider pre-empting free collective bargaining for expired agreements without exhausting all avenues available, including mediation, to be fair?

(7) Will the minister be abandoning free collective bargaining in the future and merely imposing collective agreements?

(8) Does the minister not consider his failure to reach a fair agreement through collective bargaining a failure in his role as minister?

(9) If not, does he not then consider the need for this legislation a failure of the process?

• (2020)

With regard to clause 7, which provides that any settlement reached by a decision of the Canadian Human Rights Commission on pay equity will be excluded from the restraint measures of the act, as well as other provisions:

(1) Does this act apply to any pay equity settlements ordered by a Canadian Human Rights tribunal?

(2) Will the minister continue to appeal decisions set out by the Human Rights tribunals concerning pay equity?

(3) Does this clause mean that the only way pay equity will be included for workers caught in this act will be through a complaint to the Human Rights Commission?

(4) How many workers are eligible for pay equity increases?

(5) How much money is the government saving annually by failing to implement the 1977 pay equity legislation fully?

(6) Has the government taken into account that it would immediately realize approximately one-third of pay equity payments in the form of taxation?

(7) Would the pay equity increases not stimulate the economy through those workers who are eligible for pay equity having more disposable income?

(8) With specific regard to subclause 7(2), what are the parameters under which Treasury Board will be establishing its opinion in respect of a conversion, in respect of a revised classification?

(9) With specific regard to subclauses 7(3) and 7(4), under what circumstances might this clause be implemented and is this clause another attempt to pre-empt bargaining?

(10) With specific reference to subclause 7(6), does this include future work sharing agreements?

(11) What employees will be affected by this clause?

(12) How many employees will be affected?

Moving on to clause 8, which provides for changes to the collective agreement by mutual agreement for non-wage settlements to that collective agreement. Questions:

(1) Does the minister intend the Treasury Board and the Public Service Alliance to return to the bargaining table to negotiate non-wage items?

(2) What would be included under non-wage and conditions of the compensation plan?

(3) How many non-wage, non-compensation items are still outstanding at the various tables?

(4) If the parties are unable to effect an agreement on these items, does the minister plan to appoint a mediator or an arbitrator?

(5) Does the minister consider pay equity matters to be included within this clause?

Moving on to clause 9, which imposes the zero per cent wage increase and the 3 per cent wage increase for the second year of this—

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): On a point of order, Madam Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Manicouagan on a point of order.

Mr. Langlois: Madam Chairman, I am very much interested in this debate tonight and I would have liked to take note of all the questions the hon. member is asking, but he proceeds at such a pace that it is impossible for members on this side to hear, let alone understand his questions. I will have no choice but to ask him to repeat his questions or else to write them down for me, Madam Chairman.

[English]

Ms. Langan: On a point of order, Madam Chairman. I think we have already indicated that we would be providing the minister with copies of these questions. It is our understanding that in the past the discussion in Committee of the Whole was to question the minister. Because this Committee of the Whole has turned into a debate, we wanted to be sure that we did have an opportunity to raise these questions and would obviously have to be satisfied with answers to these questions at a later time.

We have told the minister that we would provide him with the questions in written form.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Chairman, all what we hear might be true, but the fact is that for interpreters and other peoples who do their best to interpret what is being said, it is almost impossible to work at the spead the member is reading his text. And those, in this House, who want to listen in French to what is being said or even people at home and people who receive the electronic signal have the same problem. So I think we should ask the member to read his text so that it can be interpreted at a reasonable spead because, honestly, I cannot see how anybody can interpret at that speed. It is ridiculous, madam Chairman.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Chairman, given the great interest of the questions raised by my colleague of the NDP, I would greatly appreciate if it was possible for him to start all over again, since the translation was hard to follow for those who are more fluent in French. Could he repeat his questions from the start because we find them very interesting and we would like to understand them.

[English]

The Chairman: I realize that the hon. member for Edmonton East was also following in French what was being said. It would be appreciated if maybe we could make it possible for everyone to understand who is interested. It was slightly, I would imagine, difficult for our interpreters to follow at this rhythm. Let us all make an effort and I am sure we will be able to understand. It will be appreciated if those questions can be given in writing to the minister and the other member.

The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Chairperson, first of all I wish to assure you that written copies of the questions will be supplied both to the minister and to the Table. I do apologize for perhaps speaking with too much celerity to now. It was only my attempt to husband closely the time of the House. I have sent most of the remaining sheets, save three, of questions that I have out to be photocopied and will supply the translators with photocopies which I hope will aid in the process. I will try for the remainder of these questions not to conduct myself with such vitesse.

Moving then to clause 9, which again imposes the zero and 3 per cent caps. The questions for the clause are one, if the wage increase is zero per cent, is this clause extending that increase retroactively? Two, does the minister consider zero per cent to be fair in light of average settlements in the private sector, settlements that in 1990 averaged 5.9 per cent? Three, does the minister consider zero per cent to be fair in light of the cost of living projected to rise by 5.8 per cent? Four, does the minister consider having 20,000 workers in the public sector earning below the poverty line to be fair? Five, will the 3 per cent—how about those people who are losing their jobs, the hon. member asks.

The unfortunate fact of the matter is that the government seems to have created this dichotomy. I am advised not to rise to debate.

Five, will the 3 per cent in the second year be calculated on the base rate after pay equity has been added? Six, does the minister consider 3 per cent on his salary of $143,000 which would amount to $4,300 as opposed to 3 per cent on a worker's salary who earns $20,700 which would amount to a mere $621, to be a fair arrangement? Seven, if the minister requires at least 40,000 workers to be essential, does he not believe these workers are important enough to be fairly compensated? Eight, does the minister just consider these workers to be numbers on a balance sheet as opposed to being individual people who labour on his behalf and on behalf of us all?

• (2030)

With regard to clause 10, which allows for the payment of retroactive wage increases for three groups which have reached agreements with the Treasury Board, these groups will fall under the zero to three per cent guidelines after the expiry of any agreement reached.

(1) With regard to subclause 10(a), does this clause mean short-term gain for long-term pain by those here covered 10?

(2) How many workers fall under this clause?

(3) What are the departments and classifications covered?

(4) When do these agreements expire for the zero and three to kick in?

(5) Will there be layoffs attached to the wage increases this year?

(6) Will there be layoffs attached to the 3 per cent future increases?

With regard to subclause (b) I would like to ask the following:

(7) Who would be in the "any other case" category?

(8) Will there be any layoffs attached to 4.2 per cent increases mentioned in this clause?

I do hope the photocopying gets back quickly. Clause 11 of course allows for any arbitration award to hold subject to the wage guidelines imposed by Treasury Board. It is intended to accommodate those agreements reached between February 26, 1991 and the tabling of this bill.

The questions with regard to this section are:

(1) Do lines 10 to 15 mean that regardless of what has been agreed to between February 26, 1991 and the tabling of this document Treasury Board may arbitrarily adjust wages up or down?

(2) Can the minister explain just who is Treasury Board in this clause?

(3) Dealing with subclause 11(2), does this clause mean unions were forced to waive their collective bargaining rights for two years following expiry of current agreements?

Clause 12, one of my personal favourites, concerns administrative aspects of the bill. The questions for subclause 12(1).

(1) Does Treasury Board normally have the powers and duties of clause 1?

(2) Is this clause stripping the Public Service Staff Relations Board of its duties and functions?

(3) Is Treasury Board taking on the role of collective bargaining cops?

(4) With regard to subclause 2, does the Public Service Staff Relations Board not normally receive information and documentation to determine compliance with acts relating to government workers?

(5) Does this clause make the Treasury Board the anti-inflation board of the nineties?

(6) With regard to subclause 3, what form would these directives take?

(7) If the employer continues to fail to comply, what are the consequences?

Moving to clause 13, which provides for any agreement reached outside the confines of the act to have no force or effect, the questions are:

(1) What are the wage rates, although we might appropriately these days talk of rage rates? However, the question is what are the wage rates that public sector workers but for this act have received?

(2) Will the minister not agree that this clause is redundant?

Moving to clause 14, it provides that no bargaining agent or representative or officer of a bargaining unit shall advise the continuation of the strike if there is a strike and no employee shall participate in a strike.

With regard to subclause 2(a) which defines condoning or acquiescing, I would ask the following:

(1) What kind of notice is the bargaining agent required to give?

(2) What does immediately mean? The next shift, half way through a shift, the next day? What is the notice period, given the use of the term "immediately"?

With regard to subclause 2(b), the questions would be:

(3) What does the minister consider to be reasonable steps, reasonable being the term used in the subclause?

(4) What if those reasonable steps fail?

(5) Is the union being set up to be a cop for the government?

(6) Has it occurred to the minister that he can legislate these people back to work, but he cannot legislate work place morale?

With regard to subclause 2(c), the question would be:

(7) What might "anything" be? What would the minister see to be encouragement not to resume the duties of their employment?

(8) Does the minister not consider his handling of these negotiations to be all the encouragement some workers might need to fail to resume the duties of their employment?

Clauses 15 to 17 impose fines of a maximum of $100,000 per day on the union for the continuation of a strike, fines of a maximum of $50,000 per day on representatives of the union, and a maximum of $1,000 per day on individual members participating in a strike.

With regard to clause 15, the questions are:

(1) Does the minister not consider his role in this bargaining and the inflamed situation he has created to be at least equal to that of the bargaining agent?

(2) What will be the minister's penalty for his role?

With regard to clause 16, what will the minister be doing to determine if representatives or bargaining agents contravene clause 14?

(3) Will the minister commission surveillance teams to use listening devices, peek in windows, and follow these people? Perhaps CSIS or the RCMP, groups that are also embraced by the legislation.

With regard to clause 17, one question: What would be a legitimate excuse for not returning to work at the prescribed time? Or, is there any excuse that would be deemed legitimate? Surely there must be some.

An hon. member: Death, probably.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I am not even certain they would accept that.

Clause 18, which declares the bargaining agent to be a person, the question is: Who might that person be?

Clause 19, failure to pay the fine will not result in imprisonment. The question is: Is this clause included because the minister is worried that the jails are not big enough to accommodate all those workers who just may be angry enough not to comply?

Clause 20, which provides for the failure to pay the fine, will result in Treasury Board recovering the amount of the fines from the check-off of union dues by the employer.

On subclause 20(1), the questions are:

(1) The minister should be given credit for creativity. Obviously he does not want any martyrs, but does the minister not consider this section to be unadulterated union busting?

(2) The union will be penalized by withholding of union dues by this government for fines that may be accrued by angry individual union members, even though the bargaining agent may have made every effort to get the individual to return to work. Is this fair?

With regard to subclause (2), the questions continue at number 3. It is a handy section. The minister whips the workers into terrible anger, beats them up with back-to-work legislation, fines them for any defiance, and then collects union dues from their paycheques and it goes back to the government. Is there not a tiny bit of conflict of interest here?

(4) Would the minister not consider it fairer to apply those dues to pay equity adjustments for those workers entitled to pay equity?

With regard to clause 21 which allows the Governor in Council to add departments not already covered to the application of the act and with regard to subclause (a), could the minister explain just who he might have managed to miss in this legislation?

With regard to subclause (b), again which agencies, boards, commissions, or Crown corporations is the minister referring to? The third question: Is the minister suggesting the government has not done its homework and so finds it necessary to write a clause that includes anyone else who might turn up?

Finally, and I know this comes as welcome news to everyone in the House—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I trust I am not going too fast.

With regard to clause 22 which allows the Governor in Council to terminate the application of the act with regard to any particular employee or group, the questions are:

(1) Under what circumstances might this section be implemented?

(2) Is there some faint hope implied here that the government might suddenly understand that 20th century industrial relations preclude blaming workers for bad fiscal management?

(3) Is this another escape clause for the government to help its friends?

(4) Does this mean after this legislation is passed the minister might cherry-pick his way through and lift this legislation for some, maybe for department heads, or deputy ministers or some other group the minister favours?

Those are the questions that will have been placed on the table and will be provided to the minister to which certainly we crave answers, answers to which in our submission all Canadians are entitled.

• (2040)

It is unfortunate that such answers will not be forthcoming prior to the final consideration of this bill by this House, because the answers might, just might, cause some of the members in this House to rethink their opinions with regard to this bill. It is a long shot, but as a New Democrat from Alberta I am used to long shots.

Before sitting down, which I know is the event at this point most hon. members are having the greatest hope for this evening, I would like to point out just two things. First, even allowing that this bill is obscenely unfair on the face of it, there are provisions within it that render it obscenely unfair squared, raised to the second power. I refer specifically to subclauses 7(2) and 3(4).

These clauses together allow the government at whim to exempt virtually anyone it chooses, any group of people, any area of the Public Service, any individual. The government clearly has no intention of achieving fairness even in the application of this odious bill.

The Chairman: I am sorry, I will have to interrupt the hon. member. Considering that we have a 20-minute time period for interventions and taking into consideration the time which was involved in points of order, there is not even time for the minister to ask a question of his own.

The 20 minutes being completed, I would need unanimous consent to allow the minister to—

Mr. Loiselle: I would only say that of course I will take these questions into consideration, but my guess is that if I were to average my answer it would be no.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Chairman, I rise here to speak to this back-to-work legislation. I fear I do not have the knowledge of clauses in the bill that my predecessor has. However, I must say that it is not the clauses that bother me as much as the whole bill and the politics behind the bill.

This is not a bill based on rules. This is the Conservative philosophy of politics based on power, sheer power over who is going to do what, who is going to listen to whom, and who is going to be the patsy. I think about the poor person who will bear the brunt of this government's terrible legislation.

I would venture to say that it is not going to be this government's and I say Conservatives' powerful friends, absolutely not. They would have us believe that this is a bill to fight the deficit. Maybe it will fight the deficit, but it is not really about fighting the deficit. It is about who is going to pay the price. That is what this is all about.

How can they talk about controlling the deficit? On the one hand they have money to pour into the Spicer commission that travelled the country first class. I mean, hey, these were all friends of the government; this is fine, there is no problem, expense has no limits. Do you want to live in a first-class hotel? Who are we to question? You are working for the Conservative government, the holiest of holies.

On the other hand, you have the poor typist over there. Well, I am sorry, you cannot have an increase because we have no money; we are so pure and we do not spend money on ourselves.

"Forget the fact that the day before the budget we voted bonuses and pay increases for our top management. I mean that was last year and they were our friends. We have to look after our friends." This is about power, let nobody forget this. It is about power. I have no illusions because power knows no rules. When you are in power and when you want to have the upper hand and you have it, you do what you want when you want. It has nothing to do with people. Rules have to do with people.

Where are the rules in this one? You have a budget and you announce 0 per cent, 3 per cent and 3 per cent, and we are a perfection. You go to your backbenchers and you say: "You know we have to fight the deficit." I have to tell you that in my previous occupation I understood about deficits, yes, and I commend you in your fight for the deficit. I believe that we have to control the deficit, but not at the expense of the poorest of the poor, of the lowest wage earners. Come on now. If you had led by example, I would have been the first one to say what great people you were. That is the worst mistake of all. How can we go to these people and say to them: "I am sorry, we have no money for you. We have money for everybody else and we have had money for everybody else." All of a sudden, notice there is an election in B.C.: "We have money for the KAON TRIUMF project, don't we." Do we have money for that KAON project?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mrs. Marleau: Sure we did. Now we are going to move something to Saskatchewan, there is an election there.

Mr. Boudria: Oh, that is a coincidence.

Mrs. Marleau: Coincidence, purely coincidence. We have money for those things and I expect that there will be money for other pet projects of this government.

This is not co-operation. This is power. It is saying: "This is what I like, this is what I don't like. These are the people who are expendable." That is wrong.

These people across the way talk about being in tune with business. I come from Sudbury, which is perhaps the union capital of Canada if not the world, and the big businesses in my municipality learned a long time ago that the worst thing that you can do is turn everybody in the union off by decreeing that it shall be that way and going out and spending the money the way you feel like it. All that does is create more problems.

How, when you are in business, can you expect people to work for you in a good and in a happy manner and be productive? Productive is the word of the 1990s. You have to be productive and you have to be competitive. How can you be happy and do these things when you are being ordered from above? How about co-operation? How about conciliation? Why not appoint a mediator? Why not? There is nothing wrong with that.

I know we are proposing that kind of a motion. There is nothing wrong with that. I know the government is afraid that it is going to cost it a little bit more. Just cut back a little bit on some other expenses on the other side, some of your friends over there, some of the contracts that you let out. That is the other sham about this whole thing: "We have cut back on civil servants, are we not good?" We forget we have got all these contractors on the side and they cost as much. You do not have control over how much that costs you. Every time you subcontract it is take it or leave it. You have no choice at that point.

Do not tell me that you run a tight ship just because you have got numbers to prove it. There is creative accounting and then there is magic of accounting and you can make things say beautiful things if you want to and it is all in the eye of the beholder if you can manoeuvre it.

I ask the minister one question: Why will he not consider a mediator? Why not? I think it is a very important point.

Before I sit down and let you answer that question I have another one, a big one on my side.

The other question is: How are you going to control costs of the subcontracts you let out everywhere? You just tell me for one second how you are going to control the costs? How about the cost of the advertising that you have?

• (2050)

I notice that all of a sudden there is money for a big advertising campaign because it is going to make you guys look good. Believe me, I can understand you need to look good. I believe it. You really are in need of looking good.

That is not going to help you, because you are misjudging the people of Canada. They know what this is all about. There is a new reality and that is that people are aware. You cannot treat them like fools. They understand. They really understand.

The other thing about pay equity is that everybody bandies pay equity around but it is a real thing. It is not a make believe project. Why does it have to be part of negotiations? If you are worth something, you are worth it. You should not have to negotiate for it. What is this? I understand about being a woman and sometimes having a bit of a rough time. I can take that. I can take it from you because I can dish it out as well or better. That is okay.

There are many people out there who need to have that recognition. I ask: when and why is that a part of this package? It is like the inherited right to self-government by the native people. It is a right. Why does anybody have to negotiate it. It is there. Why do we need to have an understanding about it?

These are some of my questions, and I really am preoccupied with these things because I feel that you are trying to impose your will. You are being sanctimonious about fighting the deficit and the debt. What kind of grand gesture are you prepared to make to convince first me, and the rest of the people out there, that this is not just using lower echelons of the Public Service to achieve your ends while at the same time controlling the agenda, controlling what comes to you and your friends?

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Chairman, this all sounds very good but I wonder what the hon. member will say when I tell her that Liberal governments in Canada have done worse.

We have negotiated for 90 days, and this week we had 35 sessions. Clyde Wells did not negotiate 90 days. He legislated zero. New Brunswick legislated zero. Some governments have done it for two years. We tried to negotiate with our members.

Far from doing the power trip you describe, we could have done it easily, we sat down and negotiated. This is the difference between them and us. Today, we are being reproached for going on a power trip. That is easy. We just order it. We could have legislated zero at budget time.

Mrs. Marleau: You did.

Mr. Loiselle: We did not. We said we would introduce legislation if the need was there to negotiate. There were many other aspects that could be offered in a deal. We sat with our unions and tried to make a deal. We worked at it this week again during 35 different meetings. We made new offers on Thursday that were not even considered.

Basically, if we are a Conservative and if we try to reach agreement on the basis of zero, three, we are terrible people. If a Liberal had dictated that through legislation, it is good I suppose. This is why I do not accept at all this nonsense about looking for power. It would have been easy to use power.

We tried negotiating within a very difficult framework, therefore she said that we cut back but we spent more money by giving out contracts. Why have we managed to turn around a $16 billion operating deficit? We could not even pay the salaries. We had to borrow money. We turned it into a $14 billion surplus. It is a $30 billion turnaround. This is what we have done, and we are very proud of this.

Mrs. Marleau: I listen to this and I think to myself, where does he live?

Did you not listen to your own leader's budget speech? I was sitting here. I heard 0, 3 and 3. We will bring in 0, 3 and 3. We will allow you to legislate. That is like holding the gun to the head and saying: "We will not let you talk to us. Say exactly what we want, or else, pow." What kind of negotiating is that?

You talk about the provinces and say: "They gave 0 per cent." They negotiated. They did not decree first and then say nothing to anybody.

They did not give everybody else a big raise and then turn around and say "no way". There is a difference. Wake up, wake up. How many more polls do we need to have in this country for this particular government to wake up? The people of Canada want you to listen and to co-operate and stop with this decree. That is no way to govern. That is not democracy. Just because you say so does not mean it is right.

I was at a number of functions this weekend in my riding and one of the things they said was "why can these people not sit down with you and talk reasonably?"

An hon. member: They don't know how.

Mrs. Marleau: I agreed: Why? It is a frustration out there. I know you mean well and I am going to give you credit for that; I know you want to do well, but you do not know how. You talk about past governments and past deficits and past all this stuff. I have to tell you that since you have been in power you have had some of the best growth years. As a matter of fact, before the election in 1988, how crass can you be? You loosened up your fiscal policy, you let the interest rates come down, you brought down the income tax rate, and you went on a free for all. You paid and you bought and you gave and you had a great time to try and get re-elected. You did not win the election on all those giveaways before the election. That did not win it for you. What won it for you was the free trade debate and the outside influences which came and actually bought and scared people into voting for free trade. You did not even have a majority there.

What I want to say is this: As soon as the election was over and this government came back in 1988, all of a sudden you had a tightening of fiscal policies and you had an increase in everything. Then we had to have a recession, we had to have a recession.

When are you going to start taking responsibilities for your own actions? I am not saying we have always been perfect, but what I am saying is you are not either. Let us sit down and work at this together because this is our country; this is not just your country, this is our country and we want to make the best of it. It is high time that you realize that this is a two-way affair. I do not want to blame you for all my troubles and you should not blame me for all of yours.

I think you should take your responsibilities and start admitting that there are times when even you have made mistakes. I am willing to admit that we have made mistakes, are you willing to admit that you have made mistakes? Obviously, this is a big mistake you are making now, because when you have legislated these people back to work what kind of productivity do you think they are going to give you? What kind of love of their job do you think they are going to give you? What kind of Public Service 2000 are you going to have? Do you think we are going to have this whole new public service in which we are going to be very good and we are going to give you authority? Authority to do what? To do nothing.

I am asking you, how do you expect Public Service 2000 to work when this is all over? Are we going to end up worse off than we have ever been because you had one of the best unions working for you? It did not demand high settlements. It has taken less than the average for the last number of years. What have you done? You have turned it from a very reasonable union to this very unhappy, terrible force that is taking over. What have you done with this confrontation? How are you going to solve these problems? Putting them back to work is not going to solve your problems.

What kind of programs do you have? After you have decided and decreed them back to work, what are you going to do then?

Mr. Loiselle: I would like to go back to a couple of examples of similar actions that have been taken in Canada to help the hon. member understand that maybe we had to deal with a very difficult recession at budget time and we wanted to do our share.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Chairman, we are in clause-by-clause consideration of a certain Bill C-29, not bills that have been passed and disposed of previously. The minister has been asked questions specifically relating to Bill C-29. I believe under the Standing Orders of the House he should confine his response to providing information to the House on the clauses of the bill before us.

• (2100)

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. minister will come to things that will be totally relevant to the bill in front of us. The hon. member, who has been here all day, I am sure will admit that everyone has been using clause 2 to go fairly far on points that were outside of the bill. Even the hon. member's colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will agree with me.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Chairman, I understand that hon. members have been a little all over the place. My feeling is that we had agreed that we would proceed this way. I also have been answering these questions all over the place. I was trying to explain to the hon. member, who questions the philosophy behind our action, so she would understand why we did it. This is extremely important for our bill.

We were faced with a very difficult situation, much more difficult than that of Newfoundland, for example, where our debt is much higher, our deficit is higher. Therefore we had to take tough measures. But we were not as tough as Newfoundland, and I do not hold it against them.

It is very relevant that the premier of Newfoundland, the government of that province, passed an act in April 1991 that there would be no salary increases, no benefit improvements. We have accepted to increase the benefits for employees.

What he did, a horrible Liberal government is it not, was cancel previously negotiated increases due in 1991–92. We did not do that. We proceeded very openly at budget time and we said that we had a mandate to go and negotiate other things. They were on the table. We negotiated for 90 days and again last week for 35 different meetings. We tried to reach a negotiated settlement and I would not like the hon. member to hold this against us.

The alternative would have been perhaps to do like Nova Scotia: a two-year freeze on wage increases. In Quebec the unions have said: "Yes, it is a reasonable thing to do in these times and places," and they have agreed to a 0 freeze for six months and 3 per cent for 12 months.

Basically, this is in the ballpark of efforts that all Canadians have to make at this time to help our country get out of this recession quickly and get on with the recovery.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The 20 minute period is over. The hon. member for Portneuf is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Ferland: Madam Chairman, since this morning I have been listening carefully at the two opposition parties and I must say, Madam Chairman, that I am far from being edified by these people who should stand for those who in fact have no means to defend themselves right now.

I never heard these opposition members defend the interests of the workers involved in this dispute. I heard no opposition member tell Mr. Bean that he was responsible for the loss of 4 per cent of his members' wages. Normally, the opposition members should have stood for those people. But they have not done it, Madam Chairman.

The ten days of work that those workers lost, they lost it because their union reresentatives have badly informed them, because their union representative want to play politics.

Madam Chairman, perhaps it would be time for some union leaders in Canada, rather than hiding behind workers, to have the courage to do like me and the other members of Parliament and to run for election, try to get elected here to make sure that the laws are implemented as they should be for the greater welfare of all Canadians.

They probably forgot to do something else. They forgot to say something that probably the workers and unionized members of the Public Service do not know. The President, Mr. Bean, gave his union's unionized staff at 3 per cent increase this year, but to do so, he cut 20 jobs. Probably the union members would have accepted a freeze this year to save their jobs. But it was all right. It was fine because a union leader was subjecting his union's employees to it. That is called union solidarity. But it is not really that.

Madam Chairman, it is time to let the voiceless speak. This morning's Le Soleil says that 609,500 people in Quebec are on welfare. There will soon be a million in Ontario. Those people do not have an average salary of $33,500 a year. They are on welfare, Madam Chairman. The opposition did not talk about it. Of course not. They say, "Take from these people and raise the salaries of those who are already well protected." Those people do not have job security.

The MUCTC will cut 500 jobs. Why? Because it seems that the union representatives do not want to accept certain adjustments to the agreement that would save 500 jobs. Sacrosanct "acquired rights" mean that those who came in before the 500 concerned are protected. They do not care about the others. I am not sure that union members care about their neighbours. However, it seems that the union leaders want to save face, not try to defend the basic interests of working people.

In my riding, Madam Chairman, it was announced that 50 jobs would be cut at Domtar at Donnacona, in addition to 53 others a few weeks ago and 35 a few months ago.

Since December 1, or perhaps I should say between January this year and next January, about 130 jobs will have been lost. That is at the paper plant. I am not counting the 135 jobs that were lost on August 2, again in Donnacona, when the Domtar insulation board plant closed its doors.

I am not talking about 500 IVI employees in Val-Bélair, the only plant in that town. I am not talking about Bois Sylve in Saint-Raymond, a small municipality with a population of 6,000. Bois Sylvex: 225 workers. Saint-Raymond Paper: 250 jobs lost. They don't talk about these people. Of course not. You think they had job security? No, they didn't. Job security was part of the collective agreement they had with the company but the company no longer exists, and that was the end of their job security. We hear the same refrain in my own riding and across Canada. These people are not defended by the opposition. What the opposition is doing here is protecting their friends. What they are doing is making political capital out of all this. That is what our NDP and Liberal friends are doing today. They couldn't care less about the bottom of the pyramid.

Well, I can tell you that at Domtar in Donnacona and at IVI in Val-Bélair and throughout the riding, those people would have accepted a three-year wage freeze to keep their jobs, three years, without making a fuss. Even that didn't help. When it was announced the plant was closing, they agreed to re-open the collective agreements. Everything was on the table. The plant was closing down. Why? Because these plants have to compete. That is a fact of life people have to live with every day in that area. I didn't hear anyone mention this in the House today. Of course not. They are defending people who are much better oganized.

The average Public Service salary is $33,500 per year. The average salary in Canada is $27,400. We are asking people who earn an average of $27,400 a year in this country to raise the incomes of those who have job security.

I read in today's newspaper what is offered to them. "A $500 lump sum payment to approximately 35,000 employees earning less than $27,000." But, workers in the private sector, earning that salary will not receive such an amount this year.

"Guaranteed Employment for employees laid-off as a result of contracting out or privatization." In the private sector, such things do not exist.

"A guarantee of a reasonable job offer to all other employees affected by workforce adjustments, as long as they are mobile and able to recycle." Such a guarantee does not exist in my riding.

"A commitment to assume all dental costs and to raise the ceiling for orthodontic services from $2,000 to $2,500." Such things are unknown to people in my riding, who work for $15,000, $16,000, and $18,000.

"An increase of the employer contribution to disability insurance premiums from 75 to 85 per cent." They do not know that either. When you do not have a job, it is not part of your contract.

"An increase of on-site day care facilities from 10 to 15."

"From April 1, 1992, six-week annual vacation after 29 years of service." As far as I am concerned, some people back home are now on holidays for life.

"Shift bonuses increased from $1 to $1.10 an hour and weekend bonuses, from $0.75 to $1 an hour, as well as meal bonuses, from $6 to $7." In my riding, there are people who are working and who do not get meal bonuses. Really, there are limits.

Will the Official Opposition of this House, which is supposed to defend the people without a voice, say that these high officials have a higher status than anybody else in Canada? I am not the only one who says it; in an other editorial, today, they talk about the Spoiled Children of the System. What I find sad is that Mr. Bean's behaviour has caused some editorialists to denounce public servants and workers who do a damned good job.

I have been working with people at the grassroots for 7 years. Not with the union representatives, in Ottawa, who drive around in their little car, with their expense account and salaries that the people at the grassroots don't even get. I work with people who know what it means to be serving Canadians. These people know it, except that Mr. Bean says: "If you don't walk out, we will make you walk out."

An hon. member: That is true.

Mr. Ferland: If you don't walk out, we will take care of you afterwards if we can't now. These are threats. Is that union democracy? Is that what the NDP and the Liberal Party are defending? Is that what Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition defends, violence on the pickets lines?

Mr. Boudria: No, no. I already talked about that.

Mr. Ferland: Really, there are damned limits.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Companies, Madam Chaiman, are presently facing a terrible problem. In the Gaspé Peninsula, Donohue just went bankrupt which means loss of 600 direct jobs and 1,000 more in related industries. It is these people who are going to pay for the wage increases. They too would have accepted a three year freeze.

You have to draw the line somewhere. I think that comes a time when Her Majesty's loyal Opposition must be able to clearly tell Mr Bean: "You are organizing your people and we are not going to be a party to it." That's it, you should denounce him but you don't. He has really cost his members 4 per cent, but you don't talk about it. Then, I am going to say it. There are people working for the Public Service who live in my county and who do not agree with Mr. Bean's behaviour, not one bit.

An hon. member: In mine too.

Mr. Ferland: They have only been partly informed. People who work for the Public Service have told me: "It seems 62 per cent voted in favour of the strike, but I have never been consulted." How many are there in Canada who have not been consulted either? Their representative in Ottawa, God the Father, has decided for them, and he told them if they did not strike he would force them. This is not the way to do things, Madam Chairman. I cannot accept that in this House the majority of hon. members do not stand up for those who cannot speak here. It is unthinkable. They try to have the Canadian people believe that we want to score political points at the civil servants' expense. What do they think we are, fools? These people work with us every day. Am I going to turn the civil servants against me on purpose? Come on, it does not make sense.

An hon. member: It is obvious.

An hon. member: It is stupid.

Mr. Ferland: Yes, it is stupid to believe that. It makes no sense, but that is what they are trying to put across on the radio and TV. They have open-line shows to lead everyone to believe that everyone agrees, when we know very well that it was rigged; we know how it's done. There are specialists who know how across the way.

But there are limits! People must not be taken for fools or for imbeciles either. There are problems, due to a misunderstanding of some people who lead public servants, be they at the municipal, provincial or federal level or for school commissions; it is always the same story. They say that essential services have to be negotiated. Are any services provided by the federal, provincial or municipal governments not essential? Can anyone tell me that a government service at any level is not essential? All these services are essential. Were they not, private enterprise would provide them. It is as simple as that. They are all essential.

I think that they are quite well paid and you can compare it with anyone. But I rather get the feeling that what bothers you in the opposition most is that you are affected too; your salaries are frozen as well and you don't seem to like that. Your salaries are frozen and will go up 3 per cent next year if things are going well, as far as I am concerned. There are limits, and we are not close to being poor.

But, you seem more disturbed by the fact that you should receive the same treatment as the average man. We are paid by the taxpayers, who give us money, but we owe them some explanations. I will not ask my constituents, who can hardly make a living for their families, to raise my salary, oh no! And I think that people are aware of that.

Many companies, Madam Chairman, are now negotiating. Unions have asked bosses what they could do to save their companies, to save tomorrow's jobs. These negotiations are presently going on back home. But, you get here and, because this is government, there are no negotiations. The key to the success is to hold the people hostage. The dissatisfied bus driver stops driving his bus. Who is walking? The moron taxpayer. Not me, I have my own car. But there are many people who do not own a car and who need public transportation.

What happened last week in Toronto? The population was taken hostage. On what grounds? Could these citizens object in any way? No! What happens during a public hospital strike? Who are the first to suffer? Are they the workers or the people who are taken hostage in the hospitals?

If you were to conduct a poll across the country, you would see that more and more people believe that those who choose to work in the Public Service should not have the right to strike. I hear that comment more and more. I think that we pay them pretty well. It is easy for you to ask us to pay them, but you still have not told us where we should take the money. Indeed, you would simply print some more.

You not only mortgaged your grandchildren's future but that of your great-grandchildren as well. If someone is paying the bill today, it is the workers, the 609,000 welfare recipients in Quebec, the million of them in Ontario. They are the ones who are paying the bill now for all the nonsense done over the last 20 years.

You pride yourselves on standing up for the poor in this House. But that is not true. You are not standing up for the poor, but for the best paid workers in Canada. I find your behaviour unacceptable. You should denounce Mr. Bean much more severely than you have done up to now, especially you, the members of the NDP, because he is betraying his own members, giving them incorrect information, improperly transmitting the message to the base and preventing workers from going back to work. These workers are willing to end the strike since they fully realize that you cannot ask the taxpayers for more money. Mr. Bean tells them that, if they do go back to work, he will deal with them physically.

Well, this is not true, Madam Speaker. It is time to put an end to this nonsense. I hope that by 10 o'clock tonight someone from Her Majesty's loyal Opposition will rise and properly defend these people.

[English]

Mr. MacLellan: I love it when I hear the complaints about Ian Deans being appointed to that job. I wonder who it was who appointed him.

I want to just reiterate that when the government throws mud in a fan it is going to get some of it back in its face.

I hope the President of the Treasury Board will be coming back. I have some things I wanted him to hear.

I am very concerned about the way this strike has progressed. The President of the Treasury Board and the government obviously have precipitated this strike and then chose to go back into negotiations, but not really meaningful negotiations. I think that has really exacerbated the problem.

When one looks at the federal government's advertisement about: "Here's what the Public Service Alliance of Canada walked away from", it is really galling to see what the government purports to be an offer to these people.

For one thing, the $500 lump sum payment to approximately 35,000 employees earning less than $27,000 a year. The government has said it guarantees employment for employees whose jobs are transferred to the private sector, as a result of contracting out or privatization. Those who chose to work for the contractor would receive six months salary to compensate for lower benefits in the private sector. This is not meaningful negotiation.

The next one is a guarantee of a reasonable job offer to all employees affected by work force adjustments. One would expect that if there were going to be work force adjustments, that there would be a reasonable offer of employment. But we do not have the government's definition of what "reasonable" is. When we look at the track record of this government, "reasonable" in its eyes is completely different from the definition of "reasonable" that most of us have become accustomed to. I do not think one can look at the government when it is bargaining and use the word "reasonable" with any kind of assurance. I am sure the striking Public Service did not.

The most incredible one was that the government mentioned payments totalling $81 million, now made under equal pay to be incorporated in employees base salaries, thereby increasing the dollar value of future raises and pensions.

Why would the government not do that in the first place? It would be the decent thing to do instead of using it as a bargaining chip at a time when the workers were expecting meaningful negotiations.

Considerable work went into this by all parties, hoping that there would be an equitable settlement to this strike. We thought the government was sincere when the offer to go back to the bargaining table was made. That the government was sincere in doing something to bring about an end to this strike.

Then, we heard about the bonuses that were paid to senior members of the Public Service and to the heads of the Crown corporations. It is absolutely incredible that these people would receive that kind of an increase. I know it has been going on for some time. That kind of money was given to these people without justification. The government did not do anything about it, until it was actually confronted with it. It said it was just going to freeze the bonuses. Then, finally, it was embarrassed into doing away with these bonuses.

Is Mr. Lander, the president of Canada Post, paid a bonus per post office closed?

An hon. member: Probably, with this government.

Mr. MacLellan: Is Mr. Lawless, the president of Canadian National Railways, paid per mile of railroad track that is taken out of service? Is he paid because he sold a CN route to a private company which went bankrupt in 15 months, with 2,000 people unemployed, without any kind of benefits? They would be wiped out completely and not even be able to make the payments on their trucks. They and their families would be absolutely destitute. There has been no response from this government. For the government to take three years to get an RCMP report, is that how they measure the benefit of the people they pay those bonuses to?

There is not one bonus to Mr. Lawless, but two bonuses to Mr. Lawless because he was also president of VIA Rail. The fact is they were not going to leave it at that.

The first offer was that the government was going to freeze the bonuses. Oh, yippee, yippee. That meant that it was going to actually increase the bonuses.

Mr. Lawless in all his magnificence was going to get more than he had got before. Why not? He is going to sell the rail line in eastern Nova Scotia. That has got to be worth at least $30,000 in the minds of the government. He is going to get rid of a railroad that has been in existence since the mid-19th century on whom people in eastern Nova Scotia depend.

It was going to sell it to somebody of substance, some worth-while company that had the revenues to be able to take it over. It is not as if we have not heard that before with Route Canada. There was supposed to be a marvellous company. It was supposed to carry on the trucking firm, but it did not.

It is one thing to cut off the services, to destroy the Canadian symbols, but it is another thing to insult completely the intelligence of Canadians from coast to coast.

The measure of this government is: "If you are a big shot, you get paid because we need you to keep the little person under control. We want to keep the small person under our thumbs". That is the thinking that Canadians from coast to coast attribute to this government.

The government wonders why there is a strike at the present time. It is because the mood is sour, because Canadians do not trust this government. They are fed up with this government and they do not believe anything this government says.

The only thing they will absolutely give any credit to is what this government does and it has done very little, if anything, to try to fix this very tragic situation.

Why is the government not including independent contractors in this? Last spring, when his own officials were asked, they said that the independent contractors were paid more than public servants, yet they did not know really if the independent contractors were saving any money for the government. They did not know if this was saving any money for the government, because they did not keep track. They did not keep track.

We do not know what this whole government thrust of giving money to the independent contractors is doing. We do not know if it is helping the country or not, because the government does not keep track. It does not want to keep records.

Has the President of the Treasury Board got a hold of his department? Does he know whether the step of giving work to independent contractors is saving money? I want to know if he can give us some examples of that so that we can have information we were not able to get last spring.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has covered a lot of ground. I will try briefly to go over each of his points.

He said that he had the feeling that we entered this round of negotiation without really being serious and that we had not gone through meaningful negotiation. I would like to disagree very strongly with him. He knows full well that at a time when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are thrown out of a job, job security is something very precious.

When I sat with Daryl Bean to get the negotiations going again, I spoke to him very bluntly about the wage budget. We explored together the areas where we could make some progress. Certainly this was a central issue. That is why it is there. It is for the union. At a time when everybody in Canada is worried about his or her future we felt that we could move on that and do our best to try to give some job security to our employees.

• (2130)

I would say that on that point we have a good record. I did not feel we needed to go very far. We are Canada's largest employer. We have nearly 225,000 employees working under Treasury Board rules. Out of those, at a time of deep recession as we are reminded every day by the opposition, 106 employees had to leave against their will, and in most instances it was because, for reasons I respect, they could not move. We were prepared to retrain them. We are prepared to spend two years with our employees to retrain them and help them find other jobs.

Even though we have tried to remove or limit the weight of government from 1986 until now, in a work force of 225,000 people we have lost only 1,500 persons who had to leave against their will. This is a very good record, and I do not know of anyone who has a better record. It is a better record than Daryl Bean's record in his own staff.

Listen to Daryl Bean a few months ago when he said: "Oh, these are tough times; I cannot go beyond this. I have to close positions". We are all going through rough times and trying to deal with them as best we can. We thought that job security, being something well identified, we could move on that.

You said: "We thought the government was sincere". We were sincere, and the lump sum payment is not something indifferent. It is something that was reasonable in our view for the lower income people who of course have to suffer more because of the zero year. We were quite happy to put that on the table.

We did not do like some other Liberal governments in Canada that have removed all benefits this year. We tried to improve them: dental care, medical and, as you have stated, a long list of benefits.

The hon. member says that we are trying to destroy the Canadian symbols. I would like to remind him that when we came to power in 1984, for every dollar that Canadians were paying in taxes to Ottawa the federal Liberal government was spending $1.33. Of course you can make a lot of people happy. Of course you can throw money around that you do not have. But sooner or later it catches up with you in a huge debt, and this is what we have been trying to tackle.

We would like to give more to people, but do we need to borrow it, increase taxes? We have asked our employees to do their share. Somebody said on the NDP side: "What is significant, $200 million?" Of course, they have a printing machine out there. We do not have it.

It is important. It is tough on the employees, but it is their one share. We have taken many other measures at budget time. We have dealt not only with unionized employees, but we have announced that we would cut 10 per cent of our managers. This is a very difficult decision.

We are trying to live within our means, and we feel that Canadians have too much government that they have to pay for. This money comes from thousands and thousands of Canadians who are without jobs. We wanted to set an example. It has been followed by many provinces. It has given the right direction and we can see now that the economy is picking up again. Because interest rates are down, this is helpful to the economy and we can hopefully create better conditions where we can protect the future of our employees. To do otherwise would not be useful.

As for the independent contractors, we have said that we will continue to look for the best possible ways of providing services at the lowest possible cost. This is reasonable. When you are as broke as we are, with a $400 billion debt and a $30 billion deficit, you have to find ways to try to cut your spending. Otherwise it is only down.

We looked at that as one of many options of reorganizing, going to special operating agencies, as we have done with great success and using various means of trying, if we have a limited responsibility which is limited in time, to deal with it without committing ourselves to a forever salary, a forever benefits and so on and so forth. Each department has been asked to look at that, but in the process we said we would protect our employees and the numbers I have given you indicate that we have done so.

We have abolished many positions, thousands of them, cutting money, but we have done it through attrition and we have not done it by firing people. We have been very careful to manage well and I am very proud of our record in that respect.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, you would swear that the government was the saviour of the Canadian economy. I have never heard anything so completely nutty in my whole life.

The debt has more than doubled since this government came to power and it had good economic times. Not only has the debt more than double, but in 1984, when the debt was approximately $180 billion, only 17 per cent was being financed outside Canada. Now it is over $400 billion and 38 per cent is being financed outside the country. We do not even have control over our own economy.

This government has to sell Treasury bonds to keep the country going from week to week or we are out of business. He has to give a high interest rate and that is the reason the Canadian dollar is high. If we did not have the high interest rate you would not sell the bonds and the country would be out of business. It has put us on the rocks economically. It is blaming poor public servants and the inflation rate. I have never heard anything so full of hogwash in my life.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member takes the time to look at the numbers, he will understand that the deficit has not doubled. It is much below what it was with a much larger economy. The debt of course is higher, but all of it is interest on the debt you left. We have cut. We could not even pay the salaries when we came in with the situation you left us with. We had to borrow $16 billion to make the payroll. You had a $38 billion deficit plus a $200 billion debt. We started trimming down, being opposed every step of the way by people across this room. Now we have, this year, a $14 billion surplus and we intend to continue trimming governments for the great protection of our own employees.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): As you know, Mr. Chairman, I am at this point but the first of the three amigos to come in the next 20 minutes.

If I may, I just have to start by calling to the memory of this House a commercial that used to air on television.

An hon. member: Slow down so that the interpreter can follow you.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): That was too fast, my apologies.

Several years ago on television there was an advertisement for a candy called Certs. In it there were two people, one of whom insisted that Certs was one kind of mint and the other insisted it was another kind of mint. I am remind of nothing so much as that tonight, watching the Liberals and the Tories trying to determine precisely which has been the most disastrous for Canadian public finances when of course in fact, as the line in the commercial had it, "stop, you are both right, you have both been entirely disastrous for the Canadian public finances".

Moving from that, I owe the House an apology because when previously I was going through my list of questions dealing with the various clauses of the bill before this committee I omitted two clauses. This is an omission I would like now to make up.

Taking in turn clauses 4 and 3, I would note that clause 4, which of course is that section which binds the Crown, is in some senses unique and would only ask in that regard: how is it that most often the government excludes itself from legislation, for example, pay equity and human rights, in its practice at least but in this case deems itself bound by the legislation? But more substantially with regard to clause 3, which is the section that creates the entire regime of the act in terms of forcing the terms of employment on its employees, I would ask the following questions:

• (2140)

(1) Why is there an inclusion of those not involved in job action?

(2) How many workers are to be affected by this bill?

(3) How much is this bill going to save the government?

(4) How is Treasury Board going to enforce these restraint measures on staffs of MPs?

(5) Does Treasury Board have or will it seek the authority to examine the rates of pay for staff of MPs and senators?

Mr. Loiselle: We will send CSIS.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The minister jocularly says: "We will send CSIS". Yes, they just may. Lord knows there is ample precedent for it.

(6) Is not this bill more than back to work legislation but a back-handed way for the government to introduce restraint measures it does not want to or cannot through separate legislation?

(7) Does the minister not find a touch of irony in the fact that the RCMP and military, the very people expected to control angry workers who are on the picket lines, now find themselves swept up in the same legislation?

(8) Why, given that the government spends in excess of $5 billion a year on contracting out, would the government exclude independent contractors from the restraint measures of the act?

(9) How many individuals are affected by this exclusion and what is the cost of these contracts?

(10) How much does a lawyer on contract to the government earn?

(11) Why would that lawyer be excluded?

(12) How much does and architect on contract to the government earn?

(13) Why would that architect be excluded?

(14) How much does a temporary staff person in a clerical position earn?

(15) If a public sector worker under the PSAC contract is working next to an independent contractor doing the same work, why would the independent be excluded?

(16) Does thee independent contractor earn a different rate of pay?

(17) Why are federally appointed judges excluded from the bill?

(18) Does this bill apply to compensation received by the Governor General?

(19) Does this bill apply to the Bank of Canada?

With those questions on the record, I shall defer now to my hon. colleague, the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is up to the chairman to give the floor. The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Chairman, I believe the member for Portneuf, if I can remember correctly where he was sitting and if he is still in the House, strenuously defended all these people he was enumerating who were laid off in his constituency and those who are unemployed. The opposition, and in particular the NDP, certainly did defend those people.

Do you forget the debate on free trade? Why on earth do you think those people are unemployed? Why do you think they have been laid off from their jobs? Why do you think those people have been laid off? They have been laid off because of the free trade agreement and the companies they have worked for have moved south of the border. That is why they are unemployed. That is why they are losing their jobs.

In any event, this debate is not about fighting the deficit. I submit to you that the deficit is a very fortunate turn of events for this government. It gives it the opportunity to be able to do something. The question was asked and I made the answer. I think I received the answer to that about nine months subsequent to asking the question.

This is not about a large deficit and it is not about wage restraint either. This debate is about wage suppression. What a marvellous opportunity to bring in legislation, and there is no question whatsoever that this government has not bargained in good faith with these people from the moment the budget was brought in, a budget that brought in by law a constraint on the government's employees which guaranteed with the majority the government had that there was no way fair bargaining could possibly take place. Fair bargaining was pre-empted the moment that the finance minister read the budget, and there is just no question about that.

Turning to the deficit itself, I do not know who requested the survey or the study that Statistics Canada did. It is one of the most reputable adjuncts to the government. I do not know. I wonder if employees of Statistics Canada are going to be subject to this legislation as well. Probably they are, unfortunate bunch of people. Anyway, Statistics Canada and the exemplary employees who work for it found that 44 per cent of the debt of this nation was caused by successive Liberal and Conservative, particularly, governments having given away tax breaks to corporations.

Fifty per cent of that debt is directly attributable to high interest rates. That leaves 6 per cent and Statistics Canada did find—and I will readily admit that is what it said—that 6 per cent of that debt is directly attributable to Canadians living beyond their means, which is very roughly and quickly translated as the social programs, the unemployment insurance, medicare, and so on.

If we listen to the finance minister, if we listen to the President of the Treasury Board, if we listen to the Prime Minister, we find that they are blaming the whole 100 per cent on Canadians living beyond their means or, if you will, the social programs of medicare, unemployment insurance, and so on. No more deceitful lie has been perpetrated on the Canadian people in all of Canadian history or for more devious reasons. The only reason that this action is being taken is in order to suppress wages.

I am going to conclude very quickly so that the member for Beaches—Woodbine will be able to get his points in. There are a couple of other interesting sets of figures. Since this government was elected in 1984 inflation has gone up by 29 per cent and corporate taxes have gone up by 17.7 per cent. I am not even going to give you time, Mr. Speaker, to guess how much it is; I am going to tell you. For the individual, taxes have gone up by 103 per cent and they wondering why people are angry. Are they wondering why they are at 15 per cent in the polls?

I would like to point out that in the sixties the disposable income of Canadians went up by about 34 per cent. In the seventies the disposable income of people went up by 22 per cent, and in the eighties, dominated by this free enterprise, free wheeling capitalist government which was going to bring in free trade, this panacea of prosperity, the disposable income of Canadians has risen by .5 per cent. And they are wondering why Canadians are angry. They are wondering why Public Service employees are so angry. There has to be some way for these people to be able to capture some of the wealth that this country is supposed to have offered.

If you started working in 1980, Mr. Chairman, your disposable income has risen by .5 per cent, and they wonder why Canadians are angry.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great care to the discussion that took place in the House today, and particularly the comments by the hon. member for Portneuf.

When that hon. member spoke about the unacceptably high welfare rolls in Montreal and in the Quebec province, I can also point out to him that there is an equally unacceptable level in Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Newfoundland, and the Atlantic provinces, and there is good reason for that.

• (2150)

There is not an economist in this country who would not agree that the recession that Canada is still in is a made-in-Canada recession by this government. Perhaps the Fraser Institute would not agree but every other reasonable economist in this country would agree with that.

I want to say something that is absolutely offensive to me, and I think to most members of this House. Since 1984 this government has never made one initiative without finding a scapegoat for it. Every initiative this government comes forward with is accompanied by a scapegoat. In 1985 it wanted to reduce the deficit. It blamed pensioners and it attacked pensioners and tried to deindex their pensions. Later on, when it wanted to blame the unemployed, it attacked the Unemployment Insurance Program. Again, when it wanted to reduce the deficit, it went after family allowances. Then, again, as recently as last Monday when the Prime Minister announced his constitutional initiatives, who did he blame? He went after housing.

If you combine all these things together, no wonder there is an unacceptable level of people on welfare and unemployment in this country. Today we find the government blaming public servants for the deficit.

I listened to that hon. member who said that he was trying to talk to principles here, and did nothing but try to set the Public Service unions against the unemployed, the Public Service unions against people on welfare. The real question here is this government's role in negotiations with Public Service workers; it is as simple as that.

I have listened to the President of the Treasury Board try to justify the government's actions in these negotiations. There is not one major media outlet in this country that I have seen in the last three or four weeks that has not clearly seen through what this government is trying to do. Look at the editorials if you do not believe the people on the opposition benches and what we have been saying for the last couple of days. The Globe and Mail: "Ottawa should respect the right to negotiate", a whole editorial attacking this government's credibility with its own public servants. In The Globe and Mail again: "Tories do the almost impossible to spark sympathy for public servants". That was written by Jeffrey Simpson.

The Vancouver Sun, hardly a bastion of the left, put this in: "Don't freeze out public servants", and then it goes on to attack this government's credibility in negotiating under law with its own public servants. "Provoking a strike" says the Edmonton Journal, there is another real lefty. The Citizen: "Back to work legislation, there must be a better way."

I heard the President of the Treasury Board today say that the government would not agree to the appointment of a mediator because it will not accept some third party that had nothing to do with the negotiations so far intervening in these negotiations, helping these negotiations, because the third party may very well dictate what a settlement should be. I find that to be the height of ignorance and one that is not acceptable to any right thinking Canadian who believes in the free bargaining process.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words before the debate ends. I wanted to review very briefly the government's mishandling of this case, because if there was ever a situation that cried out for incompetence, this is it. I will have to be brief because of the time. It is a shame I cannot go on at length because it is a disgraceful record and the President of the Treasury Board should be ashamed of the government's record in this regard.

I want to go back to the budget of February 26, 1991 when the Minister of Finance who has since been replaced—he is now the Minister for International Trade—made the following statement concerning the situation of the Public Service in this country.

> The government will continue to bargain with its employees but, as any employer would do, it will at all times be cognizant of its bottom line as dictated by the seriousness of the federal fiscal situation.

It was a federal fiscal situation, I might add, that was seriously exacerbated by seven years of Tory mismanagement.

It then said: "The deteriorating deficit situation dictates that for the next fiscal year available resources simply will not allow the government to increase operating budgets to compensate for wage and salary increases. This means that any wage increases resulting from the collective bargaining process will have to be funded through a corresponding reduction in Public Service employment.

With a Public Service work force of approximately 215,000, each increase of one per cent in pay could lead to a loss of approximately 2,000 jobs." That is what the minister said in this House in his budget speech. He did not actually say these words, but it was printed in the material that he distributed in the House at the time.

He went on: "To contain the loss of Public Service employment, and to ensure continuation of the provision of vital public services to Canadians, the government is not prepared to contemplate wage settlements exceeding three per cent a year over the next three years. Negotiated settlements of three per cent are consistent with this environment of severe restraint and are in line with the government's inflation targets. The alternative to a firm wage bargaining stance would be a much deeper reduction in public sector employment including lay-offs."

In other words, 3 per cent was the figure that was given out and it was understood at the time that if there were negotiated settlements of less than 3 per cent there would be lay-offs to take their place.

Well the government apparently abandoned this scheme and it abandoned it, of all places, at the negotiating table. Imagine, you announce it publicly in the House what your bargaining stance is and then you go into the negotiations and you turn around and say: "Sorry, we were wrong, it is now zero per cent."

Do you know why? It is because the President of the Treasury Board suddenly realized that he could not afford to part with 6,000 public servants.

The government pruned the number of public servants by 15,000 over six years and it boasts about it. Then all of a sudden he is confronted with a situation where he could lose 6,000 more if he ended up with a 3 per cent increase according to the Minister of Finance. So he abandoned that policy at the table and said: "You are getting zero."

Who did he say it to? He said it to all the lowest paid workers. Just before the budget came down on February 26 it gave a big increase to all the higher paid workers who were not negotiating with them in a union. That is what it did.

Now the government suddenly realizes its error and said: "Oh boy, we are going to apply this freeze." In June, the minister had the gall to stand in this House and say he was extending the freeze of zero per cent to everybody because he had realized the blunder he had made in giving the increase in January and February to these people.

Then, having recanted that far, the minister says zero per cent now applies to everybody, except the bonuses. He did not say that, of course, but we drew it to his attention and the unions drew it to his attention. He said: "Oh well, the bonuses are included too, it is all zero now."

That is what he wanted all along, but he did not have the nerve to admit it in the House, in the budget, in February. His predecessor did not. He was the one dictating the terms at the time. He did not have the guts to admit it in the House in June.

It was only when the unions pressed him to come out with a fair policy for everybody that he then said zero is the rule. But what he had done is give a substantial percentage increase to the highest paid ones in a year when the inflation rate was 6 per cent. He then says to the lowest paid: "You get zero this year. You may get three next year, but for the year when inflation is 6, you get zip." The others all get 4.2 or whatever it was that was given.

It was a shocking abuse of power by this government and a total mismanagement of the Canadian government that has cost us and cost us dearly in terms of jobs and that is why we are facing this legislation here today.

I have here some quotations from some experts in the labour field, a quotation from the Kingston Whig–Standard. These people are experts and professors at Queen's University. I will read the story:

> Ottawa has badly bungled its handling of the public service labour dispute, two labour relations scholars say.
>
> Dictating a wage freeze and forcing civil servants back to work is an ugly move that could have been avoided, say professors Pradeep Kumar and Donald Carter of Queen's University.
> The scholars, who teach industrial relations, say the federal government's mistakes as an employer over the past few months could very well:
> Demoralize civil servants.
> Scuttle efforts to make the public service more efficient, flexible, and responsible.
> Promote a more militant public service union with more militant and politicized members.
> While they see some things differently, the two scholars agree that Ottawa has erred by imposing wage restraints under the guise of collective bargaining, a cherished labour principle under which unions and management jointly define employment conditions.

These are experts in their field. They say the minister has bungled this and bungled it badly. I say I agree with them and so does every member on this side of the House, and so does the Canadian public. This government is incompetent and should resign and get out. It is no good. I have got more.

• (2200)

Then, we have the Minister of Supply and Services who represents an Ottawa riding. He says: "Public Servants have nothing to complain about." He represents an Ottawa riding, and he has lots of public servants. Listen to what this man says. This is an unbelievable set of statements.

"They did not get laid off. They simply did not have their wages rolled back," says Dick, supply and services minister and Ottawa area's lone representative in the cabinet. I may say he is the only Tory in the whole Ottawa area, the people of eastern Ontario knew better than to elect this bunch.

He went on: "They did not have their plant shut down. They do not have to work-share. The Tory MP for Lanark—Carleton makes no apologies for the government's freeze on the salary of its employees in spite of the fact that the freeze only applies to the lowest paid".

This government is a disgrace. This government has botched this affair so badly that it amounts to nothing but a national disgrace. I say to the President of the Treasury Board through you, Madam Chairman, that he should get up and withdraw this bill at once. He has no business forcing this kind of legislation on the public without a mediator, without following the usual practices of labour negotiations. He knows that is his responsibility.

I would love to be able to quote more, but I know that my time is running out.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Milliken: I told you they want more. I could continue, Madam Chairman, with the speeches of the Minister of Supply and Services. He refers if you please—he is a minister as I say from the Ottawa area—to fat cats in the Public Service. He, of all people, refers to fat cats in the Public Service.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock p.m.—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. Order, please.

It being ten o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, September 17, 1991, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of Bill C-29 at the committee stage.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: The first clause to study is clause 2.

[Translation]

On clause 2, it is moved—

Order, please.

Mr. Loiselle moves:

That clause 2 of Bill C-29 be amended

(a) by striking out line 2 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"Schedule I to that Act,"

(b) by striking out line 20 on page 2 and substituting the following:

(c) in one lump sum payment that may be made payable; on or after the coming into force of this Act, to or for the benefit of an employee whose rate of pay does not exceed $27,500 and that is in an amount equal to

(i) where the lump sum is payable to or for the benefit of an employee whose rate of pay does not exceed $27,000, $500, or

(ii) where the lump sum is payable to or for the benefit of an employee whose rate of pay exceeds $27,000 but does not exceed $27,500, that portion of $500 that the rate of pay for that employee exceeds $27,000;"

The amendment is admissible. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment carried.

[English]

The Chairman: On clause 2, the second amendment. Mrs. Catterall moved:

That clause 2 be amended at page 3 by deleting the lines 2 through 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"amount of pay".

This amendment is also acceptable. Is it the pleasure of the Committee to accept this amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Amendment (Mrs. Catterall) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2, as amended, carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: On clause 3, Mrs. Catterall moved:

That Bill C-29 be amended in clause 3 by adding immediately following line 31 on page 3 the following:

(e) persons engaged as independent contractors

This amendment is out of order. It is not intelligible, as it would require a subsequent amendment to subclause 4.

We will now move to amendment no. 4. Ms. Langan moved:

(a) That clause 3 be amended by striking lines 13 to 42.

(b) That clause 3 be further amended by striking the word "not" at line 43.

This is out of order. This amendment really attempts to redraft the clause. According to Beauchesne,S 698(9), it cannot be accepted.

Hence, shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 3 agreed to.

The Chairman: On clause 4, Mrs. Catterall moved:

That Bill C-29 be amended by adding immediately after line 2 on page 4 the following:

5(a) Forthwith on the coming into force of this Act.

(i) the Treasury Board shall revise the classification system to incorporate fully into pay scales the compensation now paid to certain employees and groups of employees as equalization payments in respect of pay equity;

(ii) the Treasury Board will cease all actions before the Human Rights Commission in opposition to the Commission's ruling on any matter related to equal pay for work of equal value.

(b) One year after the coming into force of this Act, the Treasury Board shall revise classifications as necessary to implement full pay equity as agreed to between the Treasury Board and bargaining agents for the employees.

(c) For any employee or group of employees for which the Treasury Board and the bargaining agents have not been able to reach agreement pursuant to section 5 (b) on new classifications to implement equitable pay scales, all disputes will be deemed immediately referred to the Human Rights Commission for binding resolution.

This amendment has also been deemed out of order because it is beyond the scope of the bill.

Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 4 agreed to.

The Chairman: On clause 5, Mrs. Catterall moved:

That Bill C-29 be amended by deleting everything after line 2 on page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

5. Forthwith on the coming into force of this Act, the Chair of the Public Service Staff Relations Board shall name a mediator acceptable to both parties who will endeavour to mediate all matters referred to the mediator and to bring about agreement between the parties.

6. The Chair shall refer to the mediator all matters relating to the compensation plan, for any employee or group of employees covered by this Act, which has expired and for which no new compensation plan has been established.

7. The mediator shall report to the Chair on the resolution of all such matters on the date fixed by the Board.

This amendment is also out of order because it brings a new concept to the bill and is irrelevant to the bill as it is presented at this time. Amendment No. 7, moved by Ms. Langan:

That clause 5(1) be amended by the addition at line 11 of "with the exception of a mediated mutually agreed upon settlement having been arrived at before or after the proclamation of this Act".

"5(3) Sections 5(1) and (2) will have no force or effect should a mediated settlement be arrived at".

That section 6 be further amended by the addition of:

"6(1) Section 6 will have no force or effect should a mediated settlement be arrived at".

That Clause 9 be amended by the addition of a new subparagraph (3). "(3) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament but subject to section 11, every compensation plan for employees to whom this Act applies shall be deemed to include a no layoff provision".

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

When shall the bill be read the third time? Pursuant to order made Tuesday, September 17, 1991, at the next sitting of the House.

It being 10.42 p.m., this House stands adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 10.42 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 1, 1991

The House met at 10 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to table two sets of petitions this morning.

The first petition is from residents from the Upsala area in northwestern Ontario who continue to object to the goods and services tax and call on the government to implement real tax fairness in this country.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): The second petition, appropriately processed through the Clerk of Petitions, is signed by residents of Thunder Bay who are concerned about the fallout from events in what used to be the Soviet Union. Your petitioners call upon Parliament to ascertain the specific requirements for medical aid in Lithuania, allocate funds for the acquisition of required medical supplies, and expedite the shipment of these supplies to the Government of Lithuania.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present two petitions to the House. Both concern the government's back to work legislation. The petitions are signed by Canadians resident in the Northwest Territories, the Ottawa area, Moose Factory, Ontario, Baker Lake in the Northwest Territories and in Iqaluit.

These Canadians are appalled at the government's insensitivity to the needs of its public servants and they call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and to reaffirm our support as a Parliament for the collective bargaining process in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I too am honoured and privileged to stand in this House pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to this House a petition certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. The constituents are from Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Burlington and Brantford. This is only one of many petitions that have come the government's way.

Your petitioners state that the Conservative government's high interest rate, high dollar policies and 33 new tax increases since September 1984 are the source of inflationary pressures. They go on to state many other examples and wrap up with a conclusion as follows: Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadians workers.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present petitions in the House of Commons on behalf of people from Indian Head, Saskatchewan, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Quebec, St. Catharines, Deléage, Cap Rouge and many many towns and small villages in the province of Quebec.

• (1010)

These people are also very concerned about the number of taxes and the high interest rates that this government has imposed upon Canadians, taking away their purchasing power. They are concerned that this will only deepen the recession in this country. The petitioners are also very concerned about the wage limits that have been imposed upon public servants within Canada.

They call upon Parliament and pray that we will reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm our support for the free collective bargaining rights.

WORKERS' RIGHT TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to submit some petitions that were signed by residents from the province of Quebec. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and re-affirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

[English]

CANADA POST

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of my constituents in the city of New Westminster, British Columbia.

These petitioners state that their post office in New Westminster on Columbia Street is a vital part of their community. They say that closing this post office and replacing it with a commercial service centre for services to businesses will only establish two classes of Canadians.

This arbitrary decision was made without any consultation with the residents in New Westminister who will be affected by this decision.

Therefore, the petitioners are calling on Parliament to halt the plan to close the New Westminster post office and replace it with a commercial service centre.

The petition has been signed by hundreds of residents of the city of New Westminister.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too have the privilege of presenting petitions on behalf of people objecting to the fact that the government's high interest rate, high dollar policies and new taxes or tax increases—33 since September 1984—are the source of inflationary pressures and not wage demands by workers of Canada.

The petitioners are from Brampton, Ontario; Woodbridge, Weston, Ontario; Etobicoke, Ontario; Toronto, Mississauga and Sydney Mines, Glace Bay and from Thompson, Winnipeg and numerous other smaller communities throughout Manitoba.

On the petitioners' behalf, I present this petition asking Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present three petitions from Canadians in and around the metropolitan Toronto area.

These electors recite the decision of the government to impose wage controls on the federal civil service. There is significant damage perpetrated by the government's policy and the collective bargaining process for our Public Service.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for all Canadian workers.

WORKERS' RIGHT TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to submit today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition which states that the Conservative government's high interest rate and high dollar policies and 33 new tax increases since September, 1984, are the source of inflationary pressures.

Of course, the petition says that wage control in the public sector has indeed a negative impact on all Canadian workers' wages, that no flexibility is possible when you restrict everybody's salaries without distinction, that the federal Conservative government is willing to deprive workers throughout Canada of their right to collective bargaining, to threaten them with lay-offs, especially because of contracting out, to interfere with the conciliation and arbitration process and to legislate employees back to work.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and to reaffirm its support for the free exercise by all Canadian workers of their right to collective bargaining.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order, and then we will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

Mr. Milliken: Point of order Mr. Speaker. My question No. 17 on the Order Paper is still sitting there. It is dated May 13. That does not sound that old although I did ask for a 45 day reply. In fact it is the same question I put on on February 25 in the last session. It is still not answered. This is an outrageous delay.

I know why the government does not want to release the information. It will be humiliated and embarrassed by the result of the release. I submit that it is not proper for this government to sit twiddling its thumbs instead of providing answers to questions in this House which of course it is obliged to do. They are answerable to the people in this House. These questions are put by members of Parliament for good reason and we are entitled to replies.

I request Your Honour to impress upon the government the need for dealing with this in an expeditious way. My question is not the only one from May 13 but it dates from February 25 and this reply has been forthcoming for far too long.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have two points of order, the first of which has to do with the fact that yesterday during Question Period a question was asked by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

I understand that this is the second time in recent weeks that a parliamentary secretary has asked a question.

I am sure you will know, Mr. Speaker, that the asking of questions by parliamentary secretaries is not established or accepted practice in the Canadian House of Commons. It may come to be at some point, but I am sure you are also aware that we are engaged in a process of reviewing the format and the nature of Question Period. A subcommittee of the Standing Committee on House Management has been struck to do this and this work will be ongoing as part of the work of that committee and as part of the intention of the government to review the format and the nature of Question Period.

It seems to me that that work should not be pre-empted or anticipated or in any way affected by ad hoc changes to Question Period such as are constituted by this repetition of permitting a parliamentary secretary to ask a question in the House of Commons.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this is an oversight, a second oversight. I hope that you will be able to tell us that this was so, that we will not have to worry about this again, and that the process of reviewing and reforming Question Period can carry on without the anxiety of thinking there is some kind of process happening extraneous to what the committee is doing.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I want to respond immediately to the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona. He raises a point and he is correct that twice within the last couple of weeks a parliamentary secretary has been recognized.

I want to say first of all to the hon. member and to the House that that was an inadvertence and an oversight on my part for which I apologize if it has caused any anxiety.

I want to make it very clear that the sixth edition of Beauchesne's, citation 413, deals with questions by parliamentary secretaries and I read the section:

> Those such as Parliamentary Secretaries who are clothed with the responsibility of answering for the Government ought not to use the time of the Question Period for the privilege of asking questions of the Government.

It cites Debates, November 5, 1974, pages 1059–64.

That practice has been adhered to and there may have been a slippage out of inadvertence, but that practice has been adhered to and I want to assure the House that I am not unilaterally changing the practice.

The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona on another point.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): On another point of order, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your response to my first point of order.

My next point of order has to do with the language being employed by Journals in the title of notices going out with respect to the special joint committee which is considering the government's constitutional proposals.

In the order setting up the committee, it is referred to as the special joint committee and then there is a rather lengthy description of what the committee will be considering. But in the Journals titling of the notices, we find this special joint committee referred to as the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada.

• (1020)

There has been no decision taken or no process followed by which to arrive at a description of this committee as the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. The purpose of the committee is to consider whether or not these proposals will in fact lead to a renewed Canada and whether the judgment of Canadians will be similar to that of the government, that these proposals will lead to a renewed Canada. It may be unintentional, I am sure it is, but there is an element of presumption, almost of propaganda to put it pejoratively—but I don't mean it quite that way—in the title of the committee. I think this kind of liberty should not be taken by whoever has taken this liberty of describing the committee in this way, and I would hope that more technical and objective and non-loaded ways of titling committees could be formed. Again, this is a new practice, in my experience, that this way of describing committees might be employed.

I would ask you to look into it and perhaps to report back to the House as to what could be done to prevent this sort of thing in the future and to do something about the naming of this specific committee.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that I will look at the matter immediately. If it is appropriate to stay with the more technical name, that will be done; in the meantime, I will consider the situation. I think it should also be clear, of course, that the committee could, if it wished I suppose, and if that was done in the appropriate way within the committee, come up with a name which met the approval of the committee.

However, I accept what the hon. member has said, that that has not yet been done and I will look into it.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): moved that Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

—He said: Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of third reading of Bill C-29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector, I would ask all members of the House to debate this bill as quickly as possible, so that it can be considered and passed by the Senate. Thus Canadians will again be able to receive essential services and everything will go back to normal.

[English]

Picketing by the Public Service Alliance has become more violent and aggressive each day. Services to Canadians are being increasingly disrupted and Canada's international reputation as a reliable supplier of grain to the rest of the world is again being threatened. But Public Service Alliance picket captains and some members continue to disregard a ruling made on September 23 by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to, and I quote:

> —stop from interfering with, impeding or preventing designated employees from reporting to work.

It appears that alliance leaders have very little respect or regard for the law. Having been told to stop illegal strike activity by this agent of Parliament, the alliance has chosen to ignore the ruling and to embark on still more illegal activities.

I wonder if alliance members are really proud that they have been able to shut down of the port of Vancouver. I wonder how many alliance members are proud that the union has been able to prevent nurses from entering the veterans' hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue to care for their patients, many of whom are seniors.

The union leadership does not seem to mind that the livelihood of many of our farm producers is being threatened by their strike activities. I would like to remind hon. members that the plight of these same farmers was described in desperate terms by opposition members during Question Period in this very Chamber only yesterday.

If the welfare of Canadians and the faith of the economic recovery do not concern the PSAC leadership, they concern me greatly. Commuters and ordinary Canadians living in the national capital region had this brought home to them this morning.

PSAC picketing has become disruptive without regard to the law or the rights and livelihood of members of the public to get to and from work on public transit.

[Translation]

The union has increasingly resorted to insults and intimidation, even going so far as to call some of its own members good for nothing. Yesterday, Alliance strikers threw eggs and tomatoes at nursing staff of the Ste. Anne-de-Bellevue hospital, although, Mr. Speaker, these designated employees had to report to work because public safety requires it. They are not even in the same union.

Mr. Speaker, it is most regrettable that many Alliance members who have chosen to continue to work, as is their right, have been harassed and threatened by their own union which, lacking logical means of persuasion, has tried desperately in this way to rally their support for a futile strike.

Many employees, Mr. Speaker, understand the justification of the government's salary policy because they see it in the broader economic context and realize that it is useless to lose several weeks of pay. I am convinced that most Alliance members, who are law-abiding citizens, will want to put these points of view across to their union leaders.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is in the interest of all public servants, including members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, for members of all parties to recognize that this important bill must be passed as soon as possible, if we want to end the strike once and for all.

[English]

I would now like to summarize some of the principal elements of this bill and to briefly go over the rationale as to why this government feels the wage restraint must play its part in securing and enduring economic recovery.

Anyone who has followed this issue over the last several weeks will attest that the government has taken the more difficult path to achieve wage restraint. Expediency has not driven this government. Why is that?

It is because, despite the commentary of some opposition members to the contrary, this government respects the collective bargaining process and respects as well the rights and views of union members.

It would have been so easy to have chosen the simple way and legislated the wage restraint program immediately after it was announced as previous federal and some provincial governments have done.

Needless to say, the government's legal advisers examined jurisprudence in this respect to determine whether the legislative method of securing wage restraint was a viable course to take and could be justified and defended as an approach given.

I am assured that it is and that it can be given the economic conditions that have given rise to the decision.

Before resorting to legislation, I was determined to appeal to the unions to think through and come to understand the government's reasoning in limiting wage increases. I wanted to communicate to them how wage restraint can eliminate the principal fuel of inflation and reduce the incentive for price increases. I wanted an opportunity to demonstrate to union leadership that they and their members were not being singled out for harsh treatment by the government. I told them, I know, that zero and 3 per cent would be hard to accept and was not a true reflection of what their members' contribution to Canada was worth.

Nevertheless, I wanted them to understand that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have paid a far higher price during the recent recession. They had lost their jobs or they had taken big pay cuts and given back benefits in an effort to keep their employer afloat and maintain jobs.

I wanted to persuade union leaders that every sector, every Canadian had a part to play in the economic recovery and every Canadian would benefit because of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since it took power in September 1984, inheriting an enormous debt, the government has adopted more of a private-sector management style. Nevertheless, we note that although the government has greatly improved its efficiency, it is still running a deficit.

Had we granted a pay increase to our employees this year, we would have faced the following choice: either we would have had to eliminate jobs to pay for this increase, which would have reduced services to the public; or we would have had to borrow more, which would have added to the deficit.

[English]

This government chose the best interests of Canada over the immediate financial interests of its employees, but not without giving it a great deal of consideration. If this had been almost any other employer, you can bet that many employees now facing zero and three would have suffered the same fate as their counterparts in industry.

I must remind hon. members that over the entire course of the recent five-year downsizing program, our employees enjoyed a 99.5 per cent rate of job security within the Public Service. Public Service employees enjoy an invaluable job protection package and their total benefits package is comparable to that of good employers in the private sectors

While zero per cent this year and a 3 per cent raise next year may sound harsh to those who now have a job, our employees should remind themselves that there are approximately 40,000 candidates prequalified and interested in being hired for jobs in the federal Public Service. There were 236,000 applications for Pubic Service jobs last year alone, a number equal to the size of the entire Public Service itself.

Clearly, there are a great number of Canadians who would like to have a chance to have a Public Service job, even with no wage increase this year.

They should remind themselves, as well, that Pubic Service managers by losing their performance pay this year, will suffer an actual pay cut rather than just a freeze. This comes at a time when their ranks are already undergoing a 10 per cent cut over two years, proportionately a far more severe downsizing than employees in general went through over the past several years.

[Translation]

I must admit that many of our employees, in particular those who have the legal right to strike, do not earn big salaries. Many of them have significant family responsibilities and have already been sorely tested. Unfortunately, the strike will only cost them more, but I think that the time for reconciliation has come.

I therefore ordered my officials at the bargaining table to make every possible effort to reach a negotiated settlement with the Alliance, one that would strengthen or improve existing benefits while respecting the overall program of salary restrictions.

Mr. Speaker, I think that what we agreed on was in keeping with our ability to pay. Furthermore, we did all we could to follow up their other concerns: pay equity and issues related to job security. We offered a lump-sum payment to employees whose income was less than the average salary in Canada. We increased the number of day care centres in the work place by 50 per cent. We also improved other benefits.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, four other unions have already reached agreements with our negotiators and these agreements comply with the salary policy of 0 and 3 per cent, which clearly shows that a settlement was possible.

Mr. Speaker, in the end, we were unable to reach a negotiated settlement with the leaders of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. They left the bargaining table and broke an agreement I had made with the President of the Alliance whereby members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada would remain at work while negotiations continued. The Alliance leaders rejected the improvements contained in the offer I just described and did not submit it to their members. Instead, they chose to send their members back out on the picket lines, which in many regions has disrupted the access to work of must public servants.

The disruptions caused by the picketing are again threatening the safety of all Canadians. The Alliance's activities are endangering the safety of our own employees on the picket lines—not only Alliance members but also members of other unions, managers, customers and ordinary citizens who are trying to go to work or use government services to which they are entitled.

[English]

It is time these picket lines, disruptive and dangerous as they have become, were ended and our employees came back to work. It is time that Bill C–29 was passed so that the zero and three wage policy can be extended to all of the other groups that it encompasses: to the Prime Minister, the federal cabinet, and all members of this House, to the Senate and the employees of Parliament, to the members of the Canadian Armed Forces and the RCMP, and to heads and employees of other government bodies that are non–commercial and not normally self–financing.

Bill C–29 would extend 0 and 3 to a total of 378,000 federal public sector employees and officials and not only to the 156,000 PSAC members.

It is time that the benefits of Bill C–29 were brought home to all taxpayers and that any uncertainty be put to rest that the government might waiver from the economic recovery plan announced in the budget. That recovery plan is working. Make no mistake about it. That is why I commend this bill to all hon. members for passage.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to comment on the bill one last time and to highlight the fact that this bill does something very serious, not only for the specific employees that it affects but for all Canadians.

It removes a fundamental democratic right to collective bargaining. This is a right that Canada has accepted in international conventions that it has signed. It was implemented for workers across Canada in legislation. It was implemented under the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson for employees of the Public Service in 1967 and that has never been abrogated as it is being abrogated today.

It is not coincidental that objections to this bill have come from unions in other public sectors such as provincial and municipal, from the Federation of Teachers and numerous unions that represent teachers and from private sector unions.

• (1040)

People who have any knowledge about the history of labour relations know it is only the actions of workers that stopped 10–year old children from being sent down to the mines, that allowed people to work a reasonable number of hours a day and still have some time for a personal life and for family, that allowed workers to attain decent, safe, healthy working conditions instead of being required to put their lives at risk just to have a job, and that allowed workers to use their labour in exchange for a decent living which at least allowed them to survive on the money they were earning with their labour.

Collective bargaining rights allow an ordinary worker, who is dependent on somebody else for the very food with which they feed their families and for the money to pay for shelter and buy clothes, some small measure of power to balance off the tremendous economic power that an employer has over the life of that worker and the lives of his or her family.

All Canadians need to be concerned when the government can cavalierly cancel any basic democratic right as it is doing with this bill for a period of two years.

The government did that the night it announced its budget on February 26. It said there will be no collective bargaining. It said this government was not interested even in bringing in a third party mediator, arbitrator or conciliator who might possibly bring some objective evaluation to whether the government is acting responsibly and fairly.

The government rejected, as of February 26, all possibility of a peaceful, reasonable settlement between it and its employees. I want to make clear that the employees have never said they were not willing to live with the economic policies of the government. They have just said that there are other things to be negotiated and they want to be able to sit down at the bargaining table and negotiate those other things.

The minister referred to a number of the effects of the strike. What the minister refuses to do is to take responsibility for that strike. There is not a Canadian who does not understand that this government is lower in the polls than any other government in the history of Canada has ever been. It is desperate to hang on to the shreds of popularity that remain to it and to do whatever it can to build those up. It really does not care who it hurts in the process.

Who it has hurt in the process is not only its own employees but small businesses that are dependent on the delivery of goods and services and people who travel whether on business or to visit family. It has hurt people, as the minister said, our veterans in hospital. It is jeopardizing a large portion of our grain harvest. It is jeopardizing our international trade. It is jeopardizing our reputation as a nation that works co–operatively among the different sectors in society and can be relied on in international markets to deliver what it says it is going to deliver.

This has been the pattern of the government. It has very carefully selected vulnerable targets. It has used the elderly. It has used the unemployed. It has used seniors. It has used aboriginal Canadians. It has selected those people in society who have the least power to defend themselves and has systematically sought to turn the anger of the Canadian public away from the government, against its own fellow citizens.

A government that should be building a nation, that should be solving problems instead of creating them, that should be building co-operation and collaboration for the many challenges we face for the future instead has chosen to pit one Canadian against the other, to persuade Canadians that their prosperity depends on somebody else suffering. That is a cruel, destructive, vicious approach to trying to protect its own political popularity, and fortunately the polls are saying to everybody that it is not working.

I want to address some specific points the minister made. The minister talked about nurses being prevented from entering hospitals. I want to remind the minister of approximately a year and a half ago when again this government forced the lowest paid of its workers on to strike, the hospital services workers who serve those same veterans, who serve aboriginal communities and deliver health prevention programs. Those very same strikers, at their own expense, continued to provide essential services in those hospitals.

This gallery was full during that strike. While this government was forcing those people back to work because it had refused to negotiate a settlement with them, this gallery was full of nurses and dietitians from Ste. Anne de Bellevue, the same hospital the minister just mentioned. The nurses, the dietitians and the doctors who were filling these galleries in support of those workers know that without those people who are earning a miserly $17,000 a year, they cannot do their professional jobs of looking after the sick, the elderly, and those who have suffered and are disabled because they have fought for this country. Those same workers who earn only $17,000 a year, were never treated fairly by this government, but provided those services even while they were legally out on strike.

The government did exactly the same thing to the ships' crew workers. It failed to designate people who go out to sea at risk to their own lives to save others as essential workers, so we had a strike of the ships' crew workers in December 1989. Again the government did not heed the calls from this side of the House for four months to get back to the bargaining table and negotiate a settlement, and the strike happened. It disrupted transportation in the Great Lakes—seaway system at a cost of a million dollars a day. This government ignored every warning that that was exactly what would happen in December if it did not reach a solution before then.

What did the ships' crews workers do? Did they do what the government had planned for them to do: withdraw essential services? No, they did not. At their own cost of half a million dollars and at inconvenience they left their own families. They stayed in hotels to be available should any emergency arise and were able on a couple of occasions during that strike to put out to sea to save lives. In a crisis which this government had created they set aside their own right to be on strike and at their own expense made sure they kept doing their jobs. This government should do the same.

The minister has referred to the disruption in the grain trade right now. This is a very serious situation, and we are well aware of this serious situation. Back in February when the government decided not to negotiate with its employees, one thing it knew with absolute surety was that the grain elevators would be full of wheat in September. Did this government designate those grain workers as essential when it had the opportunity to do so? No, it did not. Did this government deliberately want to create a crisis in the transport of grain in this country and our shipments to the Soviet Union, and create a crisis in the destruction of a crop for our western farmers? That is the only explanation I can think of as to why it did not designate grain workers as essential workers.

This government thrives on creating crises. It has created a crisis in our economy. We are seeing jobs leaving the most prosperous parts of our country. They are jobs that are going and not coming back. It is creating a crisis in employment. One and a half million people, on this very day, are unemployed in this country. The total throughout this year of how many people have been unemployed is going to be many, many million. How many families does that touch, across the country, during the year with crisis?

It has created a crisis in the very continuance of this country. I almost hate to talk about it at this point because it is so fragile. A government that only knows how to create crises is not a government that can build a strong nation ready for the next century.

Because it has created this economic turmoil, it is trying to persuade people that they are lucky to have any job at any salary. That is back to the old days of the robber barons, when if you owned a business, and if you were bigger than the little business beside you, you just put them out of business. You put their employees out of work and you did not care about that.

That is the kind of country this government would like us to go back to where only those who are rich and powerful can hope for a decent life in this country. That is not the Canadian dream. That is not the country that the people who have sat in these seats for generations before us planned for our children and our grandchildren.

The government has created economic turmoil since co-operative relationships between business and labour, management and labour, at all levels are absolutely essential to progress and prosperity for any nation.

The minister has talked about violence. The minister has said: "We are not to blame. It is those poor people out there on the picket lines who earn $20,000 a year. They're to blame." We had the minister again yesterday in the House saying: "We are not guilty of bad faith bargaining," and trying to mislead Canadians about what the Public Service Staff Relations Board actually ruled.

I want to read this because honesty has become a real issue in this whole debate. I want to read what the Public Service Staff Relations Board said, having heard from government lawyers, having heard from union lawyers, having heard all the evidence. We will know who is responsible for what is going on right now. "This board, in general, shares the views expressed in the cases cited above: The obligation provided under the Public Service Staff Relations Act to bargain in good faith, and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement, is not substantially different for this employer than it is for any other employer in any jurisdiction in Canada. The insistence on conditions precedent to negotiating terms and conditions of employment at the bargaining table is incompatible with the requirement to make every reasonable effort to negotiate a collective agreement. Accordingly, the board finds that the employer has acted contrary to section 51 of the act and orders the employer to comply with section 51 of the act."

The minister tried to pretend in this House yesterday that being in violation of section 51 was not a condemnation of bad faith bargaining. Let me read into the record, and let me read for Canadians who would like to know whether they can ever believe the government, what section 51 states: "Where notice to bargain collectively has been given the bargaining agent and the officers designated to represent the employer shall, without delay, but in any case within 20 days after the notice is given, or within such further times as the parties may agree, meet and commence to bargain collectively in good faith and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement." Section 51 is the section of which this government is in violation and has been in violation since last spring. That is the section that imposes a duty on both parties to bargain collectively in good faith. This government has violated that section no matter what the minister stands up and says in this House to try and pretend it has not.

The issue is not who has started the fight. I think the evidence is pretty clear that this government, since February 26, had no intention of reaching a conclusion or settlement with its employees. It was obviously prepared to jeopardize the economy of this country, the transportation system, services to Canadians, anything that Canadians are paying for, to impose its own particular agenda and to find whatever victim, whatever scapegoat, it could find to deflect attention from its many failings.

The issue now is how it can be solved. How can we return services to Canadians, how we can return the employees, who want to be back at work, to their jobs? We should not do it with this legislation. If we send people back to work under this legislation, we send people back in an atmosphere of bitterness and total loss of self respect. We send them back with even more worries about how they are going to pay the rent and how they are going to feed their children because this bill represents a loss of income to people, a serious loss of income. People who are worried, people who lack self respect, people who lack confidence in their employer, people who feel bitterness toward their employer are not productive and efficient workers, no matter how hard they try.

This government has stored up problems for the Public Service of Canada for a long time to come. It is a terrible thing to do to Canadians who pay for services through their taxes and to people who, for a long time, have been proud of serving the people of Canada. These people are defending rights that are important, not only to them, but to all Canadians. A government that can remove rights from one group of Canadians can remove rights from many groups of Canadians.

We have seen it do that already with old age security. People who have saved and worked all their lives are now being told that what they saved and worked for, in true conservative principle, is going to be taken away from them.

The government has done it to the unemployed. There is an unemployment insurance scheme, but the government is going to make sure that a lot of people who most need it, in the areas that most need it, and I think particularly of Atlantic Canada, are not going to be able to qualify for unemployment insurance. They are going to have to pay into it, but they are never going to be able to benefit from it.

This issue has become an issue of honesty. We have seen how the minister, on the floor of this House, denied that the government was guilty of bad faith bargaining, despite a ruling by the Public Service Staff Relations Board whose purpose is to ensure that collective bargaining operates fairly for both sides. We have seen ads placed by this government saying that its budgetary guidelines apply to the Armed Forces and the RCMP. That is simply not true.

The budget of this government did not apply wage restraint to the Armed Forces, did not apply wage restraint to the RCMP. As of the date of publication of that ad, that was an untrue statement. That is an untrue statement today, that will be an untrue statement tomorrow, and it will be an untrue statement until this Parliament passes this savage piece of legislation that the government has put before us.

It has become a question of honesty. Again, the government said that this applies to all members of Parliament. Well, it is really easy this year. When inflation is 6 per cent, we are going to get our nice healthy 3 per cent raise. Next year, when we go into a year where we are going to a get zero increase, we will still have that nice, healthy nearly 4 per cent raise that we got this year.

• (1100)

That is not fair. That is just not fair, and it is not honest to tell Canadians that we are taking the same punishment everybody else is.

That is nonsense. It has become a question of honesty. The ad placed by the government said that other agreements and other unions have accepted 0, 3. What the government forgot to say was that, for much better paid groups of employees, it has reached settlements that are very generous in fact.

It has done them in other ways other than by increasing wage rates. It has improved classifications. It has given people bonuses. It has given them extra premiums for various kinds of things, but it has meant that employees earning say $50,000, $70,000, such as engineers, translators, air traffic controllers, have got in fact substantial increases in income this year.

For this government to pretend that those people are getting nothing, and therefore the lowest paid should be getting nothing, is absolutely incredible.

It will not tell Canadians the truth. It will not even tell this House the truth about those other agreements, and about how much extra income those other people are earning because of special deals made by this government. To not even tell the truth about that at this point in time, when all we are doing is looking for a solution to it, is unconscionable.

It has also become a question of fairness. One message that has got through to the public is that we have a lot of people working for the Public Service who are not earning very much money.

What has also got through to the public is that, disproportionately, a lot of those people are women. Mr. Capello said that 35,000 people would be getting this bonus because they earn under $27,000, and that 25,000 of them are women. That is a record that this government should be ashamed of, the fact that the vast majority of its lowest paid employees are women.

We moved an amendment yesterday to ask the government to make sure that it implemented pay equity rather than treating it as something to be negotiated at the bargaining table. It is the law of Canada, after all and any other employer would have to live with it.

This government refused to consider that amendment. We did not say: "Add more money to employment equity." We just said: "Stop paying these phoney token payments to people, as if they do not deserve them as part of their salary, but make these payments part of the salary so that they fully qualify for other benefits such as pensions".

No wonder most of the elderly poor in this country are women, when they cannot even earn wages that reflect the value of the work they do. This government refuses to implement pay equity.

The Human Rights Commissioner has slammed this government for its refusal to implement pay equity. The minister can stand up all he wants, such as yesterday, and talk about how much money the government is putting into pay equity. He knows that that is one-third of what is needed to give groups of employees in the government, who are primarily women, equal pay for similar work being performed by groups, who are primarily men, and who are much higher paid.

He knows that that should be incorporated into salaries. That is the only thing that is true pay equity, and he has consistently refused to it. He has consistently insisted on fighting the Human Rights Commission when it tries to make a decision that will introduce pay equity into the Public Service.

I challenge the minister to explain why this government wants to talk about pay equity but not implement it.

Bonuses is another issue of fairness. The minister has been waffling all over the place on that in the last week. I want to point out to Canadians that whatever the minister has said in the media, whatever the minister has said in the House, again we have to look at the facts. The facts are that in the legislation before the House today, this government intends to implement bonuses which are specifically exempted from any controls.

An amendment was introduced in the House yesterday to take out that exemption so that bonuses would be included in the freeze on increases. The government did not accept that amendment. This government, despite the minister saying in the House and in the media that there would be no bonuses, has insisted on bringing forward a law that exempts bonuses from any limits.

This government has brought forward a bill that allows it to exempt any employee or any group of employees from any of the provisions of this act, giving it full freedom to play favouritism as it has done up until now, with contracts to those who are doing well already and to bring down the hammer on those who are not.

The government published an ad that said it has offered pay equity. It has offered to incorporate pay equity into salaries. The government is very clever about not telling the truth. What it did not tell people is that it is only a small portion of what those groups of employees are due, and that it does not intend to do it tomorrow, but to do it some time in the future.

If the government is going to be spending my money and the money of the taxpayers of Canada to put out advertisements, those advertisements had better tell the truth, and this one did not.

I challenge the minister or one of the speakers from the government side to say how this government is going to implement, in legislation, the promises the minister has made in the media, that there will be no bonuses. Not that I agree with that. Not that I think it is fair. I do not think this whole piece of legislation is fair. I think everybody should be treated the same. I think that what applies to one should apply to all. The minister cannot simply stand up in this House and say he is going to do something and then go to the media and say he is going to do something and then refuse to put it in this piece of legislation before us.

The minister has talked about economic recovery. This kind of turmoil does more damage to economic recovery than any amount of fair negotiation might do. I want to touch on one more point.

In the last few years the government has insisted on firing people and contracting out a lot of work. The minister said that not many people have been touched by the downsizing lay-off program. He is wrong. He is totally ignoring the tens of thousands of people who have been forced to take early retirement, forced to take reduced pensions because this government wanted to get rid of their jobs and give them to somebody else who could be brought in on a contract at a much higher price to reward friends.

The whole compensation package of the Public Service Alliance of Canada is less than the cost of contracting out by this government—$5 billion minimum in contracting out and that does not count all the little bits and pieces here and there throughout the departments. That is only the tip of the iceberg of contracting.

This government brings in somebody to work beside a government employee, but one is on a contract and one works for the government. Is the one on contract subject to this limit on compensation? No. If you are a friend of the government and you have a nice contract, you can get an increase and there is no limit on it. It is just the whim of how well they want to reward this person.

This government has tried to say it is being fair and that this applies to everybody. That is nonsense. This government specifically rejected an amendment last night that would have included independent contractors in the same compensation package that is being applied to all government employees.

When the price of contractors is $5 billion and the price of the whole Public Service Alliance is $4.7 billion, how can the government pretend its agenda is really fiscal restraint when it is refusing to apply the same limits to its independent contractors that it does to its own employees?

I think Canadians have learned in the last few weeks that the mistrust they have for this government has been demonstrated again in its dealings with this strike. The Public Service is not a group of lazy, over-paid people that the government has every right to want to be rid of and to punish. Public Service workers are just like the factory workers in Ontario who are losing their jobs, just like the farmers who are losing their farms, just like the small businesses that are suffering because of the policies of this government, just like the middle income families who are paying more than their fair share of taxes while those in the upper income brackets are paying less, just like the poor who are being told that the Government of Canada is no longer interested in paying its share of the social safety net in this country, and just like every other segment of society, except the rich and powerful, who have somehow become victims of this government.

People have come to see over the past couple of weeks that this is just one more target for a government that cannot manage and cannot run the economy and we are all suffering from it.

This has been a difficult issue. It is one we should never have had to face and it is one from which we will be feeling the repercussions for many months and perhaps for years to come. You cannot run a country without a good Public Service. This government has systematically undermined the Public Service and made it more difficult for Canadians to get value for the money they pay in taxes. It is an approach that is not helping reduce the debt and the deficit, they keep going up, but it is hurting services to Canadians. Canadians are tired of paying more and getting less. They have been doing it for too long. They do not mind if it is going to solve problems, but it is not.

This bill should never have come before this House. It was unnecessary. The turmoil in the country for the last few weeks has been unnecessary, but it is the kind of thing that this government likes to do. It gets some kind of perverse pleasure out of pitting Canadians against Canadians and causing disruption to their basic services.

Mr. Speaker, we will be voting against this bill, of course, later today. We urge the government to take one last chance to avoid this kind of divisiveness and reach a solution with its employees. That is still possible. It owes that to Canadians.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I want to start today by quoting some words that were written seven years ago: "Economic equality is the vehicle through which women will come to full partnership and participation with men in our society. Parliament has committed the federal jurisdiction to equal pay for work of equal value. My government agrees that this concept is one of the keys to the achievement of economic equality for women."

Mr. Speaker, those words were written in the Conservative government's throne speech, its promise to Canadians in 1984. It is 1991 and we see a government that is legislating people back to work instead of negotiating pay equity.

Lower wages for women developed a long, long time ago. It is based on assumptions, assumptions that women have no dependents, are supported by someone else and are inferior to men.

We know this was never really the reality, let alone today. Yet these are the assumptions that this government is entrenching when it insists on paying women less for work that is just as skilled, for working conditions that are just as hard or just as difficult, for work that requires the same amount of responsibility as that work that is traditionally performed by men.

A study that rated thousands of Public Service jobs found that community health nurses, mostly women, were making far less than pesticide officers, mostly men. They found that chiefs of library services, mostly women, were making $6,000 less than other government managers. It found that processing clerks, again mostly women, were making thousands of dollars less than labourers.

Since 1978, it has been illegal in this country to pay unequal wages for work of equal value. There have been pay equity complaints filed against the federal government with the Canadian Human Rights Commission over the past 10 years. They began under the Liberal administration and they have continued under this Tory administration. It can take years before a complaint is heard.

The Human Rights Commission is not equipped to solve and enforce the vast number of pay equity complaints it receives. It now has some 68,000 pay equity complaints that have been lodged against this federal government, 68,000 to examine.

The Public Service Alliance of Canada is a union which represents many low-wage women, clerks, secretaries, in the Public Service.

In 1985, all 13 Public Service unions agreed to work with management to achieve pay equity. Some 4,300 employees filled out lengthy and detailed questionnaires, but in 1990 the alliance pulled out of the five-year joint union/management study of pay equity because the government refused to budge.

Federal clerks earn between $16,500 a year and $40,000 a year. The majority of them earn between $19,000 and $26,000 a year. These are the people we are talking about. The President of the Treasury Board has said that Public Service employees have to accept no wage increase, even after years of increases that have been lower than other workers in Canada and, in fact, lower than the rates of inflation in the country. He keeps saying we are living beyond our means. I wonder what means he is talking about. Clerks, who are also mostly women, earn $19,000 to $26,000 a year. A federal hospital worker, again a female dominated job ghetto, earns about $18,000 a year.

I wonder if the minister has ever tried to raise a family alone on a gross wage of $18,000 a year. The minister's salaries and benefits have gone up by $15,000 a year since last year. The money he is receiving has increased by almost the entire amount of the salary of some of these female employees whom he says will get no raise at all.

Is that fair? Is that just? Senior public servants, those making $80,000 or $100,000 or $120,000 a year got a 4.2 per cent increase. But a single parent earning $19,000 a year is to get zero per cent. When you factor in inflation, this person is earning less and less and less every year.

I read a media report recently about a Public Service clerk, a single parent, who has to go to the food bank by the end of each month to feed her family.

It seems to be the government and its friends who are living beyond our means, certainly not low wage Public Service sector employees.

Low wage Public Service employees do not have the means with which to live beyond their means, in fact. So why is the government not cutting the salaries of the people at the top, the fat cats, instead of eroding those of low and middle-income workers and their families.

This government's idea of pay equity is very bizarre. Women are being given one-quarter of what they are owed for work they have already performed and were underpaid for in relation to men. Now these women must pay higher taxes on this income than their male counterparts paid years previously. The annual salary equalization adjustments represent only one-third of what these women should receive.

• (1120)

The Canadian Human Rights Commissioner, the chief of equal pay, confirmed that this government's idea of pay equity contributions are half the rate that other major public employers in Canadian and American jurisdictions are granting.

Since 1990 this government has twice attempted to block in the federal courts the Canadian Human Rights Commission from investigating the pay equity situation. Twice it has tried to block it.

Commissioner Max Yalden said last month that the federal government is not playing fair with striking Public Service employees. He found it, and I quote, "very strange that the government is still trying to kill a human rights tribunal set up to resolve the pay equity issue", while at the same time he is telling striking employees that this issue should be dealt with by the tribunal and not at the bargaining table.

Just what is the government playing at and why is it playing with the lives, the health and the incomes of low wage earners and their families?

In early 1990 the Task Force on Barriers to Women in the Public Service, which was chaired by Senator Pat Carney, released a report. Among the documentation that it presented, it showed that 75 per cent of all women in the Public Service are concentrated in four fairly low paying job groups: secretarial, clerical, administrative and program management. It also found that women tend to be compressed at the lower echelon of even these classifications. In other words, they are not even the heads of their own job ghettos.

Job security is a big issue for women in the Public Service. Twenty per cent of all women Public Service employees are in term positions, 60 per cent of all the term positions are held by women. This makes them more vulnerable to lay-offs and less likely to receive benefits.

The data show that the federal government is an extremely poor employer of women. It has taken advantage of women employees over years and years and done very little to advance equality of any kind.

We have seen this government pull stunts like this before. It imposed back to work legislation on female federal hospital workers in 1989 instead of negotiating pay equity with them. This was in spite of a 1987 Canadian Human Rights decision in favour of the female dominated hospital service workers.

I want to return to some other lovely words that were said by the Prime Minister during the 1988 election campaign, during the leaders' debate that was televised across the country and I quote: "We are agreeing on a policy of pay equity for women. We are budgeting for the funds required on an ongoing basis to make sure that they are available so that this money will be given to those women who have been deprived of the degree of equality that we seek. The money is being budgeted so that when the agreement is reached it will be there to close the gap. The commitment is there and the money is there. We are beginning at home. We are getting our own shop in order", he said, "I think that this would be, once it is done, an excellent model for the public sector. I think we have to do it properly ourselves and then see if and how we can work it out with the private sector".

Where is that money now, that money that was budgeted for, that money that was set aside? Where is that commitment now? How many more years will it take before the government gets its own shop in order?

We have seen governments that deal with this issue fairly. The Ontario New Democrat government extended pay equity to groups of women in female job ghettos who were excluded from the previous government's policy. One of the very first actions of the Ontario government was to drop the previous government's pay equity court case against nurses and guarantee pay equity for the nurses. It is meeting its pay equity adjustments for public sector workers. Ontario in fact has the most far-reaching pay equity system in North America.

It does not just cover the cost of the public sector, but the private sector under provincial jurisdiction as well.

This government cannot even handle its own public sector. It refuses to negotiate pay equity with its workers. This government should follow the example that has already been set out for it by the government in Ontario.

Pay equity is an issue that affects every woman in Canada. Every battle that is fought brings the reality of pay equity for work of equal value just a little closer for all women in our society. Equal pay is the law, and it is a law that is being ignored by this government.

One document puts the situation very clearly, and I quote:

> What would your reaction be if you were told that you had just lost thousands of dollars? Anger or shock, sadness that such a thing could happen.
> Well, there are millions of women in Canada who are being robbed of thousands of dollars each and every year. It is a fact that women earn less than men for performing work of the same value. Often women earn much, much less; 10 per cent; 20 per cent and sometimes even 40 per cent.

We have a law that forbids the employer from discriminating between men and women and paying wages for work of equal value. This government is ignoring that law.

There is a binding Public Service Staff Relations Board ruling that the government must negotiate with its workers, not force them to accept a zero per cent increase and no pay equity, without even talking. This government is breaking that as well.

I wonder how the government can expect and hope for Canadians to respect the laws that are passed here in this House of Commons when the government itself ignores them.

The government has shown over and over again that it has no respect for Canadians, especially low income women working for low wages, and that it has no respect for the democratic process.

A strong economy and a stable society cannot be built by undercutting more than 50 per cent of the population of Canada, by undercutting women. This is a terrible kind of role model for other Canadians.

Women and all workers are simply not going to take this any more. I often question the government on issues of concern to women. Many times, over and over again, the Prime Minister or other government ministers stand in this House and talk about equality and about how they have appointed a woman to this board or they have appointed two women to another government function or another government board. They speak with such bravado and such boasting tones about how they have appointed more women to positions in government.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister and the members of cabinet to simply tell us that they have appointed another woman here or there, or that they support the issue of equality for women in our society. This government has an opportunity right now to put its money where its mouth is, to show that it has a firm commitment to equality for women within its own Public Service. We have had enough talk about equality for women. It is not good enough anymore for the government to say equity, they must pay equity.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments on the speech by the member of the New Democratic party. I may remind her that in 1967, it was a Liberal government that introduced collective bargaining in the Public Service and that the present Tory government is destroying our public service by using strategies like today's back-to-work legislation, contracting out and bonuses as incentives for senior, in fact, very senior public servants. I may remind the NDP hon. member that this government has ignored women as far as wages are concerned. Many women in my riding earn very low salaries as a result of this government's policies. These women, in many cases single parents, have to pay taxes, including federal and provincial income tax, municipal taxes and school taxes. Because of this government's economic restraint policy, there has been a flow of fiscal responsibility from the federal government to the provinces and subsequently to municipalities and school boards, which has engulfed low-income earners, most of whom are women responsible for raising a family. I say women, because all too often, women are at the bottom of the wage scale although they have the same responsibilities, the same duties and the same tasks as men.

• (1130)

This government has ruined the relationship between employees and employer, the employer being the present government. How will these employees feel, now that they are being forced back to work? It's almost like seeing a film on slavery. You see the employer taking employees by the scruff of their necks and saying: You are going to work today and tomorrow, otherwise you will be fined $500 per day. And on top of that, your salary increase will be zero per cent. Either you toe the line or you might lose your job. That is the kind of employer we have today.

Mr. Speaker, at the same time these employees have to cope with tax increases at all the levels I just mentioned. I think that with its economic restraint policy, this government is dividing the country into different sectors and pitting those sectors against each other—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester. I would ask him to conclude his remarks or ask a question.

Mr. Bellemare: I would be happy to oblige, Mr. Speaker. If I could, before my time is up, I would like to get some clarification. During this period, are we not entitled to make some remarks or comments and to ask questions? Surely, during this five minute period, hon. members can choose between these three options, right?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am glad the hon. member asked this question. The philosophy behind the question and comment period is to give as many members as possible the opportunity to comment briefly or to ask a question of the previous speaker. This is not a period when you can rise and make a new speech. The objective of the Speaker is to recognize as many members as possible. Therefore, when an hon. member takes ten minutes to make a comment, it goes against this philosophy, as was stated by one of my predecessors in the Chair, Mrs. Jeanne Sauvé.

So, I would ask the hon. member to cooperate and complete his comments or ask a question.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, surely you know I come from a riding where there are between 24,000 and 25,000 civil servants. So, of course, I stand up for them. Consequently, I would like to ask the hon. member from the NDP if she agrees with me that this government is wrecking labour relations between employees and employers?

[English]

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I would agree that labour relations between the government and its own employers have certainly hit a new low, but there have been times under previous Liberal administrations where the relationship has been very testy also, to say the least, and some of the legislation that previous Liberal governments brought to Public Service workers was not well received by the workers either. I think back to the six and five legislation not so many years ago.

It is true that the relationship has hit a new low and new depths with this Conservative government.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech made by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby and I paid particular attention to what she said regarding pay equity in the Public Service. Her remarks suggested that this government did not do anything about pay equity.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that this government's commitment to pay equity goes back to 1984 and that, after the election that year, when we came into office, a study was conducted within the Public Service in order to determine how many employees could be eligible for a pay equity program. That study indicated that 79,400 public servants could be subject to a pay equity program or policy.

I would also like to remind the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that, up until now, this government has paid $317 million to 79,400 Public Service employees to meet its commitments with respect to pay equity.

I would also like to point out to her, Mr. Speaker, that $81 million will be paid during the next fiscal year under the pay equity policy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby if she knows of any businesses in the private sector or any provincial or municipal governments in Canada that have a pay equity policy as generous or should I say as fair as the one that applies to federal Public Service employees.

[English]

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite certainly does not have to remind me of the commitments that were made by members of his government in 1984. In fact, they made up a great deal of the comments that I made today to remind them of the commitments that they made to Canadian women, the commitments that they made to Canadian women in the Public Service, and the commitments that they failed to uphold. He certainly does not need to remind me of that.

My question is: Where is the money that was promised? It is not being paid. Only one-third has been committed to pay equity of what is just and fair. His government continues to fight decisions of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, to fight them in the federal courts of this land, fight in opposition to pay equity trying to stop fair and just settlements on pay equity. That is the Conservative government record.

When he asked me if there had been a jurisdiction, yes, and I pointed it out in my remarks today. The government in Ontario has expanded the pay equity, has dropped the court actions that were started by the previous Liberal administration against public health nurses, and has set a great example for all of North America on the issue of pay equity.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, every time I have spoken in this House since 1988, I did so eagerly, of course, and with the desire to contribute positively to the issue or bill being debated.

• (1140)

Is a parliamentarian's first responsibility not to give his opinion on the subject of the debate, Mr. Speaker? When he takes part in the debate, should he not seek to protect and defend the nation's higher interests, while respecting individual freedoms and society's welfare?

Mr. Speaker, I will try to reconcile these great objectives as I participate in the debate on Bill C-29 today. As the Treasury Board President said, this bill was not tabled with a glad heart and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not be glad to vote for Bill C-29.

Bill C-29 temporarily suspends the legal right to strike for members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, extends the collective agreement for two years and sets salary conditions for the same period. Mr. Speaker, I must regretfully note that this bill, while pursuing objectives in the public interest, temporarily suspends the legal right to strike for employees who belong to the Alliance.

Moreover, the bill, by setting salary conditions for public servants for the next few years, suspends their ability to negotiate pay increases. Mr. Speaker, that is why I had reservations about the bill when it was tabled.

That is also why I always hoped that the government would not have to bring in such a bill. I always believed it was possible for the Alliance to accept the salary conditions proposed in the Government of Canada's most recent budget. An agreement with the Alliance would have made it possible to continue discussions on all working conditions and clauses related to them in the collective agreement, except of course for the salary clauses.

It would have been far better for the two parties to agree and reach a negotiated settlement. Until last week, as I said before and say again, I had serious reservations about the negotiating process. I wondered whether both parties had exhausted every avenue of bargaining as should be done when a collective agreement is renewed. Mr. Speaker, I was under the wrong impression that additional efforts could have been made by both parties to reach a negotiated settlement.

When I became aware of the number of meetings, the number of days and hours Treasury Board negotiators had spent at the table, I realized that a big effort, and major attempt had been made to come to a negotiated settlement. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I had been particularly happy two weeks ago to see the progress that allowed public servants to go back to work and the negotiations to resume.

All last week, like many Canadians and like a very large majority of the people in my riding, I cherished the hope that those discussions would lead to a negotiated settlement that would be in keeping with the budget restrictions of the federal government and at the same time help improve the working conditions of the employees of the federal government and members of the Public Service.

Obviously, it is with great regret and surprise that I saw the union negotiators leave the table last Friday, following the tabling of specific proposals made by the Treasury Board representatives. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to list the offers made last Friday to the union representatives at the negotiating table.

First, the government, through its negotiators, was maintaining its position of zero per cent increase for this year and 3 per cent for the following year.

The government, through its negotiators, offered a $500 lump sum payment for the 35,200 indeterminate employees with salaries under $27,000. It should be noted that a previous proposal calling for a lump sum payment for those earning up to $25,000 would have benefited only 14,000 civil servants. That is to say that there has been a major improvement at that level.

There was a proposal to guarantee employment to those whose jobs would cease as a result of contracting out or privatization, a unique advantage indeed granted to the public servants belonging to PSAC. Such an advantage is nowhere to be found in collective agreements signed in the private sector, Mr. Speaker. It is a definite advantage.

We are also proposing to guarantee reasonable job offers to all other employees affected by a work force adjustment. We proposed improvements to fringe benefits, including the dental plan, health care, disability insurance, annual leave, shift premiums, day care, meal allowances and much more, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada find hard to understand because such advantages are a rarity in the private sector.

Of course, our proposals include provisions for pay equity, as I told my hon. colleague from New-Westminster—Burnaby earlier, amounting to $81 billion. Once these proposals were on the table, the president of PSAC left without even responding to these proposals. Instead, he chose to make his union's response known through the media and to order his members to resume their national strike.

Normally, in the bargaining process, when the employer tables a proposal affecting or improving previous proposals or working conditions, it is only natural, and the right thing to do for the union to consider these offers and to get back to the employer with comments whether all or part of proposals are rejected but, in any event, to pursue the bargaining process.

What is abnormal and regrettable in this case, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the PSAC negotiators left the bargaining table, did not submit the latest offers to their members and decided to go back on strike.

Mr. Speaker, it is essential that this government continue to strive to reduce government spending and the national deficit, because Canadian men and women cannot bear any further tax increases. The wage policy set out in the last budget is an integral part and an important aspect of the objectives identified by the Government of Canada.

The Alliance should have recognized how important it is for our country to attain these objectives. The Government had and still has no other choice but to ask all its partners to join in an effort to reduce the deficit and put the economy back on track. The PSAC obviously refuses to take part in that effort which has already been accepted by many groups of employees from other jurisdictions.

Instead the Alliance has chosen to attack the Government's objectives and of course to resume its strike. Even though it is a legal strike, Mr. Speaker, the Alliance has overstepped its authority in preventing essential services employees from going to work. In so doing, the Alliance has caused severe harm to large groups of citizens by depriving them of services neccesary for their safety and their well-being. It has caused irretrievable damage to vital sectors of our economy.

• (1150)

Mr. Speaker, this strike is not driven by economics, it is political, and this is a direct quote from the President of the Alliance. Just remember what he said in front of the Parliament Buildings a few days ago, and also the speech where he said that this government had to be defeated.

I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that the Alliance was calling for a strike in the interest of its members. It is my opinion that leaders of the union should have listened to their members and should have directed their efforts toward bargaining, with a view to securing better working conditions while waiting until for the government's finances to improve and allow it to grant better pay conditions to its employees.

By so doing, the leaders of the Alliance would have contributed to the improvement of the financial situation of the country. They would have supported the economic recovery efforts by the government and the private sector and they would have, in my opinion, really promoted the long term interest of their members.

The government for its part is proposing a pay policy which will allow keeping the number of positions at its present level for Alliance members. I consider that a very reasonable policy which confirms the government's intention to grant its employees the best working conditions possible under the current financial situation.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that Bill C-29 allows for negotiations between the government and the Alliance on a large number of non-monetary and monetary clauses included in the present contract.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that both parties will take this opportunity to resume talks as soon as possible. Once again, I regret that Bill C-29 removes, even temporarily, the right to strike, but the objectives of this bill are to ensure the continuation of services which the government has the duty to provide, to protect the economic recovery and to further the efforts undertaken by the government to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, the last point I would like to mention is the feeling that there are far too many union negotiators. Not only do we see the Alliance leaders, Mr. Bean and Mrs. Hurens, on television almost every day, but we also see some of our NDP colleagues literally holding hands with them. Is it not normal to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the PSAC works out its negotiation strategy in the offices of NDP members? Moreover, we all heard the member for Mission—Coquitlam say that on Friday Mr. Bean, while in her office, tried to contact the President of the Treasury Board. I would have thought that the President of the PSAC would have an office of his own and facilities provided for him by the Alliance to make his own calls and contacts. Why use the offices of NDP members? Listen, this proves that what we are having here is a political strike.

Mr. Speaker, I regret the inconveniences caused by bill C-29, and I still have the same reservations to make on the principle of such a bill. I believe that in the case of a labour conflict, the balance of power should lead to a negotiated settlement, but I am also convinced that the circumstances surrounding this conflict and the difficulties it is causing to the country truly justify the bill. I hope it will be adopted as fast as possible.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): A very brief question, Mr. Speaker. While the hon. member for Manicouagan deplores the strike but is in favour of the back-to-work legislation, he seems to be suggesting at the beginning of his speech that he believes in salary negotiations. My question to him is this: Is it possible to negotiate salaries when one of the parties, namely the employer, offers a 0 per cent increase or the door?

Mr. Langlois: It is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that a government sets its objectives through the budgetary process.

It is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that a government makes decisions on the compensation of its emplooyees. I remember well to have experimented the adverse effects of a legislation passed by a previous liberal government where we were directed not to exceed some increase percentages within collective agreements that I had negotiated myself for the employer and where the salary increases were cancelled by that legislation, while that legislation also applied to the then employees of the Public Service of Canada. That is when the Liberals were in power.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing unusual in the fact that a government sets its salary policies through the budgetary process in order to make all people concerned aware of its objectives.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, I would like to go back to what the hon. member for Ottawa West stated earlier when she said that a number of groups in the federal government are not covered by the salary policy. She mentioned among others the National Defence and the RCMP. I would like to tell her that under Appendix I of the bill both the National Defence and the Department of the Solicitor General are subject to this legislation.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that this be mentioned and I thank you.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the situation today is really a tragic one for the Public Service Alliance workers.

A group of women workers are at the Status of Women office here in Ottawa right now. They are asking for a meeting with this government on the issue of pay equity. They simply want to discuss the issue. They have asked that the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women meet with them and listen to their concerns. They have been refused that hearing.

I want to ask the government side whether or not they would agree that these women have a right to speak to their minister responsible for the status of women about an issue that is of such critical concern, not simply to these women but to all the women of Canada. I ask the minister to make a commitment on behalf of the government to begin the process of talking about this issue.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, my colleague for New Westminster—Burnaby is forgetting that the pay equity situation has been referred, at the request of the union, to the Human Rights Commission. The government has agreed to that and it is trying to address the situation in a fair and reasonable manner, fulfilling its commitment and at the same time complying with decisions that have been made. The government will keep on doing this.

I talked about the amount of money that has been put into pay equity just a few minutes ago and I can assure my colleague that this government is committed to pay equity and everything will be done to achieve that goal.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, if that is true, can the member opposite please tell me why, in the offer that was made to the Public Service Alliance of Canada, there was a small token toward pay equity and even that small token was not incorporated in this bill? Can the member explain why his government refuses to incorporate pay equity into salary so that it is subject to all the other privileges of money that is earned as salary?

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, does my hon. colleague from Ottawa West consider that $317 million is a token? Does she consider that $81 million budgeted for the coming year for pay equity is a small token? I would like to suggest to her that we are talking about enormous amounts of money and we are just trying to address that situation with the money and the finances available to the federal government.

If we manage to control the deficit, put the economy of the country back on track, this government is committed to do more. I can assure my hon. colleague that what she calls a token for a great majority of Canadian taxpayers is a great amount of money which people in my riding would look at with much envy. My hon. colleague talked about poor people on picket lines earning $20,000 a year. I can talk to her about poor people not on picket lines, minding their home with revenues of $5,000, $6,000, or $7,000 a year. That is what I call a token, not $317 million and not $81 million.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, you sometimes must have patience in this House in awaiting your turn to speak. While the member for Manicouagan is here I would like to comment on the $317 million that he is talking about. It is a significant amount as is the $81 million a year that he is putting into pay equity.

He talks about it being a considerable amount of money. It is absolutely a considerable amount of money. Yet the government has just recently thrown away $267 million to the KAON project in B.C. It has sent the National Energy Board to Calgary when it could have been left here in Ottawa at no cost. It has sent the Farm Credit Corporation to Saskatchewan when it could have been left here in Ottawa at no cost. It has been the multi-million dollar government which Canada has never seen the likes of before.

Of course $81 million is a lot of money, but let us not throw these figures around unless we put them in perspective. From 1984 to 1988 this government made the largest amount of revenue over anticipated revenue that any government in this country has ever produced, and it has never put one cent of it against the debt. It has never put one cent of it toward pay equity. I am a little bit sick and tired of hearing how great this government is with regard to pay equity.

That was not intended to be part of my speech, but I had to throw it in because I really felt that the hon. member was over-stating his case.

Getting back to my speech, I am delighted to stand here and speak to Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, but this bill is just another example of the government's continuing oppressive autocratic style.

The government continues to flip-flop. First it would not negotiate, then it will negotiate, and now it will not negotiate any more. I do not think this government has a clue as to what it is doing.

For a fleeting moment about 10 days ago, I really thought the government had its act together when it announced it would suspend the legislation, which it is now going to implement, and return to the bargaining table. In fact I was so pleased with the minister's acceptance of going back to the bargaining table I even sent him a note thanking him on behalf of the public servants of Canada for being a considerate, kind and warm-hearted minister.

An hon. member: It was a sham.

Mrs. Gaffney: It was a sham. It was a charade. It was the biggest charade. I hope he frames my note.

Two weeks ago during the first strike action I received a copy of a letter which was sent to the President of the Treasury Board by Glen Whalley, a Nepean constituent. He does not mind my giving his name. He sent a copy to me and I really felt that his comments were noteworthy because what he said in that letter I believe effectively described the feelings of the average public servant, not only that but the feelings of the average Canadian.

I am going to quote this letter:

I am a family man, with bills to pay, who takes pride in my job and I am a member of PSAC. You seem to have a misguided view of the labour force that is working for the Government of Canada. I can understand that, what with all the opinions and accusations flying around Parliament Hill, the bargaining tables and the media. So I would like to offer a point of view from one of the common folk.

Your government has been in power for seven years and yet you still try to blame your financial situation on previous governments. It was your government that perpetuated this recent economic disaster with your lack of foresight and sensitivity. It was your government that provided the catalyst for our dilemma by shoving, amongst other things, Free Trade and the GST down our throats.

The cost of our goods are not going down, the cost of living is still going up and we watch our industries moving south. We see our families, friends and neighbours being laid off or losing their businesses to bankruptcy.

Now you come to us and expect us to accept your offer. In fact, you almost act surprised that we do not want to seal our financial future for the next three years and put our faith in your unpredictable budgetary mismanagement. You also want us to blindly agree to this offer before knowing if you will negotiate in good faith on the remainder of our concerns. Let us face it, sir, your track record so far is not very favourable. I ask you as a businessman, would you accept these terms in your employment contract?

In turn, I have a proposition to offer you.

And this gentleman says to the minister:

If you can convince the working people in the private sector of Canada, who receive pay increases this year to donate their new income to help pay off the national debt, that is after paying for increases in utilities, food and clothing, after paying federal and provincial income taxes, federal GST and provincial sales taxes, municipal and property taxes, gas taxes, car taxes, tire taxes, liquor taxes, cigarette taxes, restaurant food taxes and on and on.

If you convince those working Canadians of the private sector still bargaining for wage settlements to donate any future increases this year to help pay off the deficit.

And if you can convince your fellow MPs, Senators and any other senior management staff to give up the tax-free portion of their income and donate the applicable taxes that the rest of us are forced to pay;

If you can do this, then I will try to convince my co-workers that your zero, three and three offer is a good deal.

I will set aside further arguments concerning your party's disregard for past promises for such things as pay equity. Their deceptions about the effectiveness of contracting out. The blunders, the questionable antics and budget expenses of senior management and ministers that cost taxpayers millions of dollars every year. Sneaky manoeuvres, like rushing through pay increases for the elite few at the top just before introducing wage controls on lower level employees. The fact that you have no respect for the collective bargaining process, the conciliators you agreed to work with or your own rules of fair play in negotiations; and finally, your government's obnoxious attitude that it can do whatever it pleases because it has a majority in the House of Commons, even though it is now backed by less than 16 per cent of the population.

Please, people of Canada, don't be angry with us for trying to maintain our standard of living. We did not increase your taxes. We did not break political promises or create an economic environment where farmers and fishermen are unable to support their families and where single parent families are forced on to welfare to survive.

We did not introduce taxes to send truck drivers and small businesses into financial ruin. Most of all, we are not responsible for this government and its policies.

I had to read that letter almost in its entirety, because I do not think that I or anyone else in this House could have said it as well and as sensitively to get the point of the average Canadian and the average public servant across.

I received another phone call this morning from Mr. Barker. He goes on to say that the government is seriously damaging and destroying the Public Service in this country, an institution with a proud history of service and one that he is most proud to have worked with.

He spoke of the hypocrisy of the government involving Canada in larger and larger trading blocks and talking about making Canadians more competitive while at the same time it is treating its own employees in total contradiction to this, through demoralizing, contracting out, cutting back, wage freezes.

Many, many people when they call speak of their anger toward this government and about their despair that public servants have somehow inherited the dubious position of being the government's whipping boy.

I have heard them talk about the government's deception on the effectiveness of contracting out, of the past broken promises of pay equity. I have heard first hand the outrage and cynicism of the average public servant about the patronage which this government dishes out to its own Tory cronies.

• (1210)

The government is running roughshod over members of the Public Service of Canada by again bringing forth this back-to-work legislation just as sure as it has run roughshod over parliamentary tradition and guidelines by bringing back this legislation.

The fact is that although this act will eventually apply to MPs, senators, presidents of Crown corporations and senior managers, this will only occur next year when inflation is expected to be much lower.

Is it any wonder that Canadians are skeptical about politicians? I would like to ask when you were at the bargaining table if consideration was given for PSAC employees to receive the increase this year, the same as I have received my increase this year and the same as all the department heads, 5,000 of them, 5,000 cabinet appointees got bonuses in the past year, some of them as high as 25 per cent of their salaries.

Can you tell me that Ron Lawless, president of the Canadian National Railway and VIA Rail who was already making in the salary range of $365,000, should receive another $30,000 bonus this year? He has already got a $30,000 bonus. That is more than these public servants' total annual salary.

Before the government brought down its measures against the Public Service in its budget, the government revealed that it would not go the route of conciliation or arbitration. It has threatened from the beginning that it would introduce legislation to bypass any settlement that did not accept the wage freeze as a given. Its whole attempt at bargaining right from the outset has been a charade of the worst kind.

My colleague from Ottawa West mentioned this in her speech. The government is in clear contravention of section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Board Act. The government is breaking the law. The government is clearly breaking the law.

Has this government ever made any reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement? No. Has one word of the section of the Public Service Staff Relations Board Act been honoured by this government? No. This government has in no way acted in an honourable fashion with respect to its employees. There has been no collective bargaining, and let us make that clear.

It already has in hand no fewer than five conciliation board reports which have been unable to make any progress toward a solution. Three of these even highlighted the government's responsibility for the lack of collective bargaining.

Who is being hurt by the actions of this government? In the immediate it clearly is the little guy, the lowest paid members of the Public Service. Because the government has forced the public servants out on strike, it clearly then becomes the business community. It is the children. It is the Canadian public generally who is also being hurt, all because the government may not play by the rule book.

Does this government understand anything about the concept of worker productivity? Does it not think about how these people will function when they return to their desks after they have been told their work is worth zero per cent and after they have been bullied back to work?

It is very frustrating for me to stand here in the House to try to represent the public servants and try to get their point across. They do not have thousands of dollars to run these great big ads in the paper, the big ads that are not telling the truth.

An hon. member: Your money and mine that they are using.

Mrs. Gaffney: Your money and mine the government is using to put a point across but it does not tell in this document that it is breaking the law, does it? It does not say that it is in contravention of section 51 of the Public Service Act, does it?

I would hope that this government could get back to the bargaining table, but the only hope that we have is with the appointment of a mediator. I felt last week and I mentioned this earlier, 10 days ago, that the minister was sensitive and that he did care. But I look at the president of the Public Service union and I look at the minister responsible for public servants—and I don't know if this is going to be unparliamentary; you might call me on this one—but I see two blockheads who simply cannot negotiate and cannot arrive at a solution. I think that we have to put a mediator in to negotiate this solution.

Pay equity is also not negotiable. It should not be on the table. It is the right of all that pay equity be in force and that should not even be part of the bargaining tool. It should be there and it should be part of what women should expect in the work force.

This government keeps using the excuse that it has been concerned about the economy and that is why it must do this. Had it truly been concerned as I mentioned earlier, the excess revenue that it received in that period between 1984 and 1988 could probably have wiped out the debt or certainly reduced it tremendously. You know the old saying "Nero fiddled while Rome burned"? Well, I see this government fiddling while the country is being decimated.

The minister said an interesting thing in his speech yesterday. He said he was not here to win a popularity contest. Well, he sure has not won a popularity contest, nor has the government. He has played his rules right there. He is not popular.

I was speaking earlier about the amount of money the government has spent on pay equity and the amount of money the government has spent on other programs. I have never heard figures on the amount of money the House would need to approve even 3 per cent for these public servants. I have never heard that amount of money so I don't know what it is. But you know, we throw away money. Maybe it is not thrown away, maybe it is good for business. A shipbuilding company in I think it was Valleyview, Quebec, was given several hundred million to bail it out, to keep it from going bankrupt. A couple of years ago we sent the Space Agency that was situated here in the nation's capital to St. Hubert, Quebec. It is now, I might add, in the riding of a member of the Bloc Québecois. We give $267 million to a TRIUMF KAEON project at the University of British Columbia when most of the research scientists in this country will tell you that it will be the most drastic drain on the federal treasury—

Mr. Duhamel: Bad management, that is what she is talking about.

Mrs. Gaffney: I am getting to bad management, that is exactly what I am getting to.

Mr. Duhamel: Lack of vision.

Mrs. Gaffney: I don't know how a government can ever hope to get any loyalty from the Public Service again when we throw money away as easily as we do but will not sit down and talk about what is the value of a good employee.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of speaking here in the House on this subject. I hope there is some rationale, that someone comes to their senses.

Mr. Speaker, I move pursuant to Standing Order 26(1):

That the House sit between the hours of 1 and 2 p.m. today for the purpose of considering Bill C-29.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, on the motion put by the hon. member to sit between one and two o'clock today, we would agree to this on the understanding that there are no quorum calls and there are no games played.

If that is agreeable we have no objection to sitting between 1 and 2 p.m. today.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker I think the rules are fairly clear, that members have an opportunity pursuant to section 26.(1) to move the extension of hours between 1 and 2. My hon. colleague has made that particular motion. In terms of the questions raised by the hon. member opposite, the purposes of extending the hours is to give members on this side better opportunities to express themselves on a very important subject.

• (1220)

With regard to quorum calls, I can assure him that on behalf of our party it certainly would not be our intention to raise any of those. However if there are members on his side who may wish to pursue that, he might want to have a chat with them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than fifteen members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion has been adopted and the House will continue to sit indefinitely.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Nepean and to the speeches by the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester. Since the beginning of this debate Mr. Speaker, my impression has been that instead of a Canada Round or a Quebec Round, we have an Ottawa Round, because Liberal members have delegated their members from the Ottawa area where their public servants are—

An hon. member: You have no respect for public servants!

Mr. Pronovost: They say I don't respect public servants, Mr. Speaker. I listened very attentively to what the hon. member of Carleton—Gloucester had to say, and now I would also like to have a chance to express my point of view.

There are many public servants in my riding as well. However, my point is that members of this House do not represent public servants. They have a union to do that. Only a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Nepean said clearly that she felt she spoke for public servants in this House, although she represents all residents of Nepean, and above all, the national interest of this country. And Mr. Speaker, that national interest is now facing a very serious challenge.

I would like to ask her the following question: We have yet to hear a single NDP member condemn these acts of violence and intimidation against men and women who wanted to go to work and were on essential services. Not a single NDP member was willing to condemn this kind of violence.

Earlier, the hon. member for Ottawa West had an opportunity to condemn the violence against nurses at the Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue Hospital, a veterans' hospital in Quebec, and she failed to condemn at least this instance of violence.

Yesterday, however, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, a Liberal member, clearly said that he was against intimidation by strike captains, that he was against violence and against the fact that workers on essential services were being prevented from going to work.

Is there some kind of double standard at work here among Liberal members? The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell condemned these acts in no uncertain terms, and he is to be commended for doing so, and the hon. members for Ottawa West and Nepean could at least have taken the opportunity they had, and they should do so immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate with the hon. member for Nepean, I simply want to explain that the motion we just adopted is for extending the sitting from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m, and not indefinitely, as I said earlier, which may have created some confusion. My apologies.

[English]

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand here and respond to the member across the floor. First of all I would like to say quite clearly and quite unequivocally that I represent national interests in this House of Commons. If I was a member from Atlantic Canada, do you think that I would not be on my feet talking about the fishing industry? They are representing their constituencies when they speak about the fishing industry and what you people have done to it.

I am in a riding which happens to be in the nation's capital.

Do you not think that because I have a high number of public servants that I will not represent these public servants in the House of Commons? Of course I will. That is my responsibility.

An hon. member: I hope so.

Mrs. Gaffney: At the same time, I will support my colleague from the western provinces when I see the wheat farmers. They have a product but there is no money for their wheat. Do you not think that when my colleague speaks in the House of Commons on the plight of these farmers that I will not support him? Of course I will.

He mentioned the violence, some minor skirmishes on the picket lines. I deplore these skirmishes. To the many strikers I have spoken to, I have said "Please, be peaceful. The public will recognize what you are trying to do and what you are trying to achieve but they will understand it more if it is achieved through peaceful means".

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The hon. member from the government side of the bench has mentioned my name and I think he may have inadvertently left a totally wrong impression with the public that may be watching and with the House of Commons about people who have spoken on this debate.

I think if the hon. member looks back over the debate, over the petitions that have been presented, over the Standing Order statements in the House, over the questions and again specifically over the speakers who have spoken and will speak on this debate, he will find among those lists representatives from southern Ontario, northern Ontario, eastern Ontario, all provinces in Atlantic Canada and from western Canada as well. I think it is wrong of him to leave the impression that the 70 per cent of people—

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The member for Saint-Maurice has suggested that he is faulting me for defending the Public Service employees. I think this is a wrongful accusation. I am supporting the Public Service throughout Canada, with a great number of them residing in my riding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Another question or comment?

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member for Nepean, and Nepean is the twin riding for Carleton—Gloucester, for an excellent speech and an excellent presentation. My question is this: I feel embarrassed that I am taken as being part of the employer, the federal government, because I sit in Parliament, and this year I have received a 4.3 per cent increase in my salary while the employees, our employees, are getting or will be getting zero per cent. I would prefer that if the employees, the public servants are going to get zero per cent, then I too should get zero per cent.

Unfortunately, this government is imposing two standards on an uneven playing field. I would like the member's comments.

Mrs. Gaffney: I did mention in my comments the fact that there was no doubt on the government side when it passed legislation giving us an increase for the year 1991. I think it was less than 4 per cent but it does not make any difference how much we got. Now, all of a sudden it is saying that next year we will have a zero increase.

The question I was asking was: has the minister, when sitting down at the bargaining table, said: "Okay guys, will you take your 3 per cent this year and possibly consider a zero per cent next year?" Has that ever been discussed?

I think we are setting two standards here. There seems to be one set of standards for managers, for senators, for members of Parliament, and another set of standards for the members of PSAC. I think they should be looking at that very, very closely. I do not agree with it and I thank you very much for that wonderful question.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate.

I guess the debate really started back in February when the government brought forward its budget document, and that set the policy of the Government of Canada. Somehow there is a perception that this is all a surprise and that this has only come to fruition in the last couple of weeks.

I would like, if I might, to point out some of the items that were in the budget of February, of this year. I will not read them word for word, but they can be found on page nine. That deals with the government management of a number of its affairs. The first item on that list of eight that are here relates to the fact that the ministerial pay of the Prime Minister and cabinet members will be frozen for one year. I realize that does not get a very high profile in the public debate, but that was the number one item that was mentioned.

The second item that was mentioned deals with the wage budgets of departments. In that particular clause it says that there will be no more money available, but if the Public Service wants to negotiate a salary increase that we would certainly consider up to about three per cent, but any increase would be tied directly to attrition within the Public Service. The jobs that would become vacant through attrition, or people retiring, would not be filled.

So there was an opportunity for salary increase if the Public Service would accept that we were going to continue to streamline some government operations.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, we were unable to negotiate that in March, April, May and finally in June. As we are well into the new budget year, we cannot go back and say: "Well we will do that now," but that was part of the management offer that was in the budget.

The next item was, of course, that we would limit the raises in years two and three to 3 per cent.

Beyond that, it talked about the rates of salary increases for the executive members because there is this concern that the management group is being treated differently. You will see that it says here that these various public servants, deputy ministers and heads of Crown corporations will be limited to a level no higher than the average of the negotiated settlements in the Public Service. There it is, very clear and in black and white, that if we can only negotiate, for example, zero per cent with the Public Service, then that is what everybody gets. It says that right here in the document, but somehow that does not seem to be part of the public discussions.

The next item talks about the salaries for members of Parliament. It very clearly says exactly the same thing, that we will get what the Public Service gets, or the lower of inflation minus 1 per cent or what the Public Service gets. So, based on the program now, the Public Service and MPs will both get zero per cent.

What is not given a lot of profile is that in the budget there is a commitment that we were going to reduce the senior managers in the Public Service by 10 per cent this year. We are proceeding with that. So when people talk about the fact that there is really no cutback for anybody, ask those 10 per cent of the senior managers who are losing their jobs whether there is a cutback there.

Finally, there is a restriction on capital spending and it will be frozen at last year's level.

That started the process of this debate. I can tell you that in my almost three years of being a member of Parliament, I have had the privilege of talking to many of the Public Service employees who serve my constituency and look after the needs of my constituents. I would not for a moment debate the fact that they are under a tremendous strain and that in many cases they work hard with resources that are limited. In my constituency in Ontario, they are faced with a unique challenge. Here we have the federal government restricting what we are doing with salaries, yet we see the provincial government increasing its salary or wage bill by 14 per cent while we are holding it to zero per cent. The municipalities are increasing their wage bill. The school boards are increasing their wage bill. The regional government is increasing its wage bill. So here they are working in an environment in southern Ontario where all of the other public servants are getting increases and we are not.

That is an unfortunate circumstance and I understand the difficulty that causes them. There is not a simple answer to that situation. I am certainly aware of it, and I hold extreme sympathy, but I guess I can say the same thing, members of Parliament are not getting a salary increase, so I am tying myself to the same thing. I live in the same constituency that they do, so I am faced with that same thing. That is a sacrifice that is there and we just have to carry on with it. It seems that, somehow, that side of the discussion is not as public. I understand their needs, I understand their pressures, but it seems that from the other side there is a total ignoring of the circumstances that we at the federal level find ourselves in.

We end up coming to the circumstance we are now in. We are obviously at an impasse. The Public Service is out on strike for the second time. Why are they out for the second time?

This morning there was a group of public servants who appeared at my constituency office. They were very polite, very well-behaved. I certainly cannot be negative about the way they visited my office and the points they made. I talked to them on the phone for about 40 minutes.

I come back to some of the original comments I made, that they are under their particular pressures. Then they throw out such comments as: "Well, the government wastes so much money." I get that comment from a lot of my constituents who really cannot do anything about it. I said to these public servants: "If we we waste all this money, if there is waste in government, why are you not doing something about it." Their answer was: "Well, the boss will not listen to us."

I said to them: "Well, if the boss will not listen, I do not recall you calling me as a member of Parliament, pointing out areas where we waste money. I do not recall receiving a brown envelope in the mail telling me where money is wasted".

Coming back to our original proposal about the salary levels being tied to an over-all scale, if the public servants have these suggestions that we waste money and they help us solve those problems, it does make our lives easier in dealing with their particular salaries they would like us to cover.

I come back to the southern Ontario situation. I know the circumstances they find themselves in. It is interesting that a couple of people I spoke to this morning were very clear about their political support and that it certainly was not going to be coming my way the next time. I am not sure it came my way the last time, but that is neither here nor there. It is certainly not going to be coming my way next time. They will probably, at least in one case, be supporting the NDP.

I noticed a recent article in The Globe and Mail on September 26, where their hero, I presume, Mr. Rae, the premier of the province, said: "Everybody has to wake up and smell the coffee. We do not have a printing press in the basement. We would be kidding each other if we did not recognize the fact that we do not have tonnes of money coming in."

Their hero in Ontario, I guess, has woken up and has smelled the coffee. He went on talking about some of the programs, saying: "There are limits to what we can do right now in terms of general increases for the simple reason that the money is not there." He went on further in that article: "I know you are in a bind. What I am saying is, so am I."

If they think that it is just the federal government that has a problem, there is Mr. Rae very publicly indicating that he has a problem and somehow he is going to have to deal with it. It will remain to be seen as to how he is going to deal with it. I will leave that for Mr. Rae and his supporters to comment.

Here we were in the negotiation process. I heard the President of the Treasury Board very clearly indicate that when they went back to the table there was not going to be any more money. They were willing to look at some of the other things, but there would not be an across the board salary increase.

That is in Hansard, so anyone who has any question about that can certainly look that up.

In the negotiation that took place last week, there was in fact a change made. There was a change to the circumstances of individuals. They offered an increase, a lump sum bonus of $500, to about 35,000 employees.

The week before last when they were out on strike, a lot of constituents called my office and said: "Look, I have some concern for low income Canadians, the ones at the lower end of the pay scale in the Public Service, single mothers, single wage families." The government acknowledged that and said: "We understand there is a problem at the bottom end, here is $500 a head that we will put into that package." Mr. Bean, I guess, has decided that he did not want to offer that opportunity of acceptance to his membership. I did manage to speak to a number of public servants in my riding who said: "I wasn't offered the opportunity to accept that $500 proposal".

• (1240)

There was guaranteed employment security for the Public Service offered last weekend in the offer that the President of the Treasury Board made. There were also improved benefits in a number of areas related to the dental plan, health insurance, disability insurance, vacation leave, shift premiums, additional day care facilities and meal allowances.

All of those things were offered last week. Mr. Bean's response was: "We are going out on strike again." I am happy to say that the government has not backed down on these offers. I have some difficulty in that.

I relayed that to some of the people who called my office this morning. Their argument was that they should have these things. I said: "Well, if that is the case, how many of you work in the employment centres in my riding? If you work in the employment centres in my riding, why don't you canvass all those people who are on the other side of the counter and ask them if they would be willing to work at the same job they had last year for the same amount of money. How many of them would be willing to work with less benefits than they had last year?"

I suggested to all of them that they ought to talk to some of those constituents who are using their offices, to discover that things are not peaches and cream out there, that there are people who are having difficulties and they would be happy to have the jobs they had last year, at the salary levels they had last year.

Of course, the response of the public servants who were in my office was: "That is not everybody. That is just a small group", that the rest of my constituency would be happy to give the public servants what they are asking for.

I put a challenge to them. I guess the challenge relates to a group of people who appeared before the finance committee last week, the Professional Institute of Public Servants. They represent about 20,000–odd members. Their association has about that number of members. They appeared before the finance committee and said that really all they were asking for was a 6 per cent increase, and surely the government could afford that.

I said: "All right, if we can afford that, that is what the public servants in my office said that they would like to have, that 6 per cent amounts to about $800 million, give or take a bit". That was the number supplied by the Public Service, when it appeared in front of the finance committee, and it is not that far off what I believe is probably the correct number.

We can use that number reasonably. I said: "If my constituents believe you ought to have that $800 million, I'll support that $800 million on one basis. You go out and get a petition signed by a large number of my constituents to give the $800 million increase and I will support that on the premise that included in the petition is a clear statement that the GST rate be increased from 7 per cent to 7.5 per cent, because it is about a half of one per cent on the GST, which will give us the $800 million. So if my constituents are willing to allow us to give you $800 million, we have to find that some place, so I suggest that we raise the GST rate a half of one per cent in order to find the $800 million. If my constituents are truly supportive of the Public Service, they would naturally sign the petition and allow that to happen".

I am not sure I am going to be taken up on that offer, and I know darn well why I am not going to be taken up on that offer. I am not going to be taken up because my constituents would not support an increase, whether it is the GST, personal income taxes, a reduction in some of the tax credits or tax deductions. My constituents would not support that. I know that for a fact.

I come back to my other comment. They say that we keep wasting money, but when I asked them to give us some examples, they said: "That is not my job. I don't know where they waste it. You guys in Ottawa are supposed to come up with all these ideas".

I guess my comment on that area is that the money is not there. I think the public servants who were in my office recognize that. Certainly my constituents recognize that fairly clearly.

We still come back to a circumstance here where they are out on strike and we have to somehow bring them back to work. I find it unfortunate that we have to go this route. I find it unfortunate that we have to bring in back to work legislation that basically sends them back to work.

On the other hand, my constituents have every right to be served by government services that should be available to them. It is evident that Mr. Bean and some of the other executives of the union are more interested in making this a political strike than they are a strike of service.

There are a lot of ways that the public servants could have delivered the message to MPs. In fact some of them were doing it. Their standard line in some of the offices that serve my riding was: "If you do not like the answer that I have just given you over the last month, why don't you call your member of Parliament?"

My office gets lots of calls. I do not like all the calls, but I respect that that is a fair way of dealing with some of the labour problems. It applies pressure. The impact is not on my constituents. It is not on the person who wants to go to the employment office to find out about a job or to find out where their unemployment insurance cheque is. It did not impact on them. It impacted on me, and that is fine. I understand that is the bargaining process. That is the way it should be. Although I may not like it, I am quite prepared to accept that as one of the tools that is available to them.

Now I am told that when they return to work, as I was told this morning, they are certainly not going to be providing the service they provided in the past. I cannot force them to be efficient in the way they operate, but if they are going to take it out on my constituents, if they believe that they are really accomplishing something by providing less service to my constituents who are coming to them for a particular need, I guess they really do not understand the process and what their job is. If they want to make an impact on me, so be it. If they want to make an impact on my constituents, it will not take long.

I have another problem with this legislation. I am going to vote for this legislation without any hesitation but there are some difficulties with it. We have amended the legislation. We have changed. We have said that, for example, presidents of Crown corporations will get zero per cent this year. Why is it that we excluded postal workers from zero per cent? I have some very great difficulty with that. In fact I thought an appropriate amendment to the legislation would be that if we are going to include various Crown corporation heads in this legislation we therefore should include those people who work for those Crown corporations.

I have some very great difficulty in seeing that Canada Post employees turned down a rather significant salary increase over their labour negotiations. They turned that down and went out on strike. I am sorry that it appears they are going to get at least what they have turned down. It is a pity that they were not included in the 0, 3, 3 business.

The other point that I think is appropriate comes back to the comment of some public servants who said to me that they were not going to perform. In the legislation there are restrictions that say if you do not come back to work you could be subject to $1,000 fine per day, that the union leadership could be fined $50,000 and the union could be fined $100,000.

Do you know what is missing in that? It is the will to work and the will to return to work. It seems to me that if there are some of the Public Service who want to defy this legislation and not return to work, there should have been a further amendment to this legislation that says if they refuse to return to work because of this labour dispute they should be fired.

I am sorry that is not in this legislation because I feel that way. They can take out how they like their various issues, but when it comes down to whether they are going to do the job or not and they refuse to do the job, then they should be fired. I am sorry that that is not in this legislation, but that is how I feel.

When postal workers in my riding went on strike there was a bigger picket line across the road from the postal workers that said: "Fire the strikers, hire the unemployed".

I simply conclude that I am going to support this legislation because my constituents have every right to expect from government service the service they are paying for in their taxes. I believe this legislation will make it possible for them to receive the service they are entitled to.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could elaborate on his statement concerning the freezing of wages.

He said that if the heads of our Crown corporations are going to suffer the zero per cent, the freezing of their wages, then those people who work for that Crown corporation should also have their wages frozen at zero per cent increase.

• (1250)

I wonder if the hon. member could tell the Canadian people why the federal government will not disclose the salaries of the chief executive officers of our Crown corporations.

For example, the head of CN, Mr. Lawless, makes about $360,000 a year; that is his salary. The poor fellow is being frozen at $360,000 a year, poor, poor man, frozen. What is his exact salary? It is secret. The Government of Canada will not release his exact salary. It says that it is a matter of privacy and that it would invade his privacy.

The head of Canada Post, to whom the hon. member just referred, makes about, I would say, anywhere from $260,000 a year to $280,000 a year. The poor fellow is being frozen at one-quarter of a million dollars a year. Does your heart not just go out to that poor fellow? What is he going to do? We should all be very concerned. His bonus is frozen as well, poor man.

There are two questions for the hon. member. For the 35 Crown corporations run by the Government of Canada, it refuses to disclose what the salaries are of the chief executive officers. Is it not a bit ridiculous for the hon. member to be saying that since the government has frozen their wages at about one-quarter of a million dollars each, give or take $150,000, that can be compared to an ordinary worker who has his salary frozen at $25,000 or $22,000 a year?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to respond. Certainly the salary ranges of all of these jobs are very public and are released, but I should add that not only were the salaries of those high paid workers frozen, their bonuses were cancelled. They were not frozen; they were cancelled for the year.

I understand the point the member is making. If you look at the legislation, in the legislation is very clearly the fact that if the Public Service, for example, in the budget had got a 3 per cent salary increase, a member of Parliament such as yourself would get 3 per cent as well.

Are you going back to Newfoundland and saying very publicly: "I want the Public Service to have 3 per cent so that I, as a member of Parliament making $85,000 a year, can get 3 per cent or about $2,400 more"? Are you going back to Newfoundland, to your constituency where I hazard to say the salary income average is not $85,000 and saying: "I do not agree with this; I think my salary ought to be frozen"? Are you saying that very publicly, or are you saying: "Just a minute, only that guy at CN who makes a big salary, and that salary is comparable to what is made in the private sector, should have his salary frozen"? Are you saying it should only be him or are you prepared to say, and I hope you are, "the $2,400 I would get if the Public Service got 3 per cent is not right and I should not get it either"?

I hazard that that is really not part of the discussion. We have taken a broad brush. Whether you are making $20,000, $40,000, $85,000 or $300,000, it does not matter who you are, you are all getting zero. That is the way it should be.

Mr. Baker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is Newfoundland. That is how you pronounce it. Do you understand, Newfoundland?

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I find it ironic that the gentleman from Ontario says that he would like to see in this legislation—and he is sorry that it is not in the legislation—a firing of public servants clause included. I find it ironic and my question on this particular item.

He refers to parliamentary salaries and he asked a question of my colleague from Newfoundland. I would ask him this question: Is it not true that this year members of Parliament are getting 3.7 per cent and of course 0 per cent next year? I turn the question over to him. Does he not think it would be a more even playing field or a fairer situation, if we impose 0 per cent this year on our employees, if we as members of Parliament get a 0 per cent increase also, as I think it should be?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, my apologies to the people of Newfoundland if I did not pronounce it correctly. I guess I have not visited often enough to have the dialect correct.

Let me respond to the comment. The member asked should we members of Parliament be taking 0 per cent as we are asking the Public Service to take? Of course the member knows that in the 1990–91 budget, the period in which the salary increase he is talking about took place, members of Parliament took 3.78 per cent and the Public Service got 4.7 per cent. I believe that is the number. We took 1 per cent less than the Public Service last year. This year we are saying we will take 0, just as we are talking about them taking 0 in the 1991–92 budget. The alternative is that we take 0 which is I believe what the member suggested, go back to last year and roll that back.

As the member knows, we are paid on the basis of 1 per cent less than the rate of inflation. This year's inflation rate is running at about 6 per cent; 1 per cent off that is 5 per cent. You have a choice. You can have 3.78 per cent last year or you can have 5 per cent based on that formula for this year.

I guess my suggestion is that last year's budget was last year: 3.78 per cent is what we got, 1 per cent less than what the Public Service got. I am not afraid to stand up publicly and say that was a fair deal for everybody.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, government members who rise keep talking about fiscal restraint. I am wondering if the member could tell us why that fiscal restraint does not apply to independent contractors working for the government who may be performing the same work and who may already be getting paid more for it, as it applies to the people working for the Public Service.

Is he aware that contracts are costing more than the entire payroll of the Pubic Service Alliance? Why does he not think the same restraint should apply to independent contractors?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what budget the member is looking at. The budget I looked at says that this year the total cost of government operations is being restricted to what it was last year.

Within that, if there are outside contractors who have contracts with the government and want to raise their prices, the contractors had to bid to get the job in the first place, which the Public Service does not have to do. Second, once they have the job and the budget says there is no more money, if they have doubled their price something else within the system of government is going to have to be given up to offset that increase in cost.

I can honestly say that in a public tendering process, at least in the part of Canada I live in, things are very competitive. I can assure him that there are no great increases in individual tenders and individual contracts. That is not to say that some are not going up. It is exactly as we said to the Public Service: if some things go up, other things go down. They wanted a 3 per cent salary increase as we offered in the budget, that meant 3 per cent less employees. The same goes for contracting out. If the contracting out price is doubled, then there are half the contracts to issue. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as the member of Parliament for Willowdale and also as the Liberal industry critic.

There are tremendous problems being caused throughout all of Canada by this strike. We have seen how our wheat farmers are losing about $50 million a week during this strike. The ships are backing up at the ports. There are 42 ships waiting and another 10 coming into the west coast. They cannot deliver our wheat.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has talked to Canadians and to this government about the devastating impact on Canadian manufacturers, manufacturers who depend on imports from the United States but the bridges are being blocked, manufacturers who are dependent on air travel but cannot count on our airlines today.

The president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Tim Reid, said about this strike: "A pox on both your houses. The feedback we have got from our members suggests business people across this country are right out of patience with what is happening".

• (1300)

Mr. John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business states: "It is totally incomprehensible that the government would idly stand by and watch while small firms are being put at risk and in some cases thrown into bankruptcy by a breakdown of our system of government. Small businesses are already operating in poor economic conditions due to the ravages of recession, the burden of the GST, massive tax increases, high interest rates and high unemployment".

It is not just businesses and farmers and all people across Canada who are suffering as a result of this strike. It is the Public Service workers themselves. Most of the workers who are on strike earn between $25,000 and $30,00 a year and are getting only $25 a day in strike pay.

Yesterday I was on the picket line with employees in my riding. Some of them are public servants. Some of them said to me: "Mr. Peterson, this is the first time I have ever been part of a picket line. We cannot afford to be out here, but again we cannot afford not to stand up for our rights". Neither the workers nor Canadian business nor Canadians want this strike.

It is not just a matter of the short term economics. It is a matter of where we are going as a country over the longer term. I want to read into the record some of the statistics dealing with Canada's strike record. These come from the Year Book of Labour Statistics, 1989–90, prepared by the International Labour Organization in Geneva. It shows comparable statistics for various countries in the world. The latest figures are for 1989.

In 1989 Canada lost through strikes and lockouts 2,040,100 person days. Let us compare this with other nations. In Japan the figure was 174,000 person days lost and yet they have a labour force more than four times Canada's. In France the figure was not somewhere around 2 million. It was only 800,000 and they have twice our labour force. In Germany the figure was only 100,000 and they have more than twice our labour force. Switzerland lost 265 person days. They have one–quarter of our work force. The United Kingdom, the traditional bad boy of labour strife had yes, more than Canada did. It had 3.5 million person days lost, but they have more than twice the size of our labour force. In the United States, they had about eight times the number of person days lost through strikes and lockouts but they have over 10 times our labour force.

Other countries such as Austria had only 2,986 person days lost. They have a quarter of our work force. What an enviable record. The Netherlands had only 24,000. They have about half our labour force. Sweden had 409,000. They have one-third of our labour force.

Any way you cut it, Mr. Speaker, our record in Canada for labour management strife, for lockouts, for lost days is the worst in the world. We cannot afford this. It is cutting into our competitiveness, our productivity, our workers suffer from it, our businesses suffer from it and yes, Mr. Speaker, even the government's tax revenues suffer because of it.

What type of message does our strike record, along with this Public Service strike, send out to Canadian investors and to foreign investors. It sends out the message that you cannot count on Canada. They have not yet figured out the way to settle their disputes in an equitable and fair way. They are still bent on early 20th century and 19th century struggles, of confrontation rather than co-operation. We cannot count on Canada to provide the type of harmonious management/labour relationships that are critical to competitiveness in the 20th and 21st century.

I will just give one example. Last night I was in Willowdale. The chief executive officer of a major corporation had to be in Montreal this morning for an 11 a.m. appointment. He could not trust the airlines. He was driving from his house, leaving at 5.30 in the morning in order to ensure that he could keep that commitment.

The automobile is no substitute for secure air travel in Canada. Businesses need the assurance that they will be able to count on our transportation infrastructure.

With all of these problems that we face, why can I and my party not support this government's back to work legislation? First of all, this started out not as an attempt to deal in an equitable or fair way with our public servants. It started out as part of the government's political agenda. They looked back to the Reaganesque approach in the United States when President Reagan became a hero among neo-conservative circles by stamping on the air traffic controllers and firing them. This government felt that we have tough times. It would not admit that they were government induced, but we all know we are facing very tough times. It was part of this government's political agenda to beat up on the public servants so they could appear tough and in the eyes of Canadians who are not public servants, gain that political credit that they thought would be theirs for dealing firmly with our public servants.

When it introduced this back to work legislation, it made the Public Service an offer it had to refuse: 0, 3 and 3. They had to refuse that. What did this government do? It brought in its back to work legislation. But we on this side of the House opposed it and Canadians everywhere did not rally to its support. The public will was not there because people across Canada realized that this government was not being fair. It was not being fair to the one group that it was trying to make the scapegoats for the failure of its economic policies.

There were alternatives. From day one, we said: "Do not deal with back to work legislation. Bring in a mediator who can deal in a fair and an objective way with the issues at stake". The government has refused that. It is still refusing it.

There was another solution it could have brought in. It could have levelled with Canadians. It could have said: "Canada, we are in a terrible economic crisis. We have lost 13 per cent of our manufacturing jobs in 2.5 years since January, 1989. Unemployment is going up, it is not going down, in spite of our consideration that the recession is over".

It could have said that we are facing extremely tough times because our ability to compete is falling. It could have said to all Canadians: "We must all cut back. We must all suffer, equitably and fairly. Every Canadian, from the Prime Minister, through the cabinet, through members of Parliament, through the public service and through the business sector and employees must suffer".

• (1310)

It did not do this. It chose instead to favour certain groups. For example, it had huge bonuses proposed for certain members of the Public Service and agencies such as CN Rail, Atomic Energy of Canada and Canada Mortgage and Housing.

The member for Gander—Grand Falls brought to the attention of the House how they were going to get over $50,000 in bonuses this year. When the member for Gander—Grand Falls brought this to the attention of the House, the minister said that they had just cancelled them.

Where in this legislation is there any mention of the fact that these bonuses cannot be provided? It is not there. If the minister had been sincere in saying that he was going to cut back these bonuses because he was embarrassed, that he was even giving them to certain people in the Public Service and not to the PSAC members, then he would have cut back right in the legislation. They would have been subject to the same type of cutback.

Why, last year just before the budget was brought in which cut back certain public servants, did this government grant 4.2 per cent increases to 50 senior executives of Crown corporations and government agencies, including the governor of the Bank of Canada? Why did it do it then? Why is it not retroactively rolling back those increases?

The evidence is clear. This government thought that it could enhance its own neo-conservative political agenda by bashing our public servants.

Has it called on the private sector in order to become competitive to roll back its salary increases? Many people in the private sector are not getting salary increases, many people. Here is a report from the Toronto Board of Trade which showed that in 1991 the increase in the base salary of executives in the metropolitan Toronto area, which excluded variable or incentive compensation, on a weighted average right across the board, went up 7.7 per cent for 1991.

This government wanted to con all Canadians into bearing the burden of our present dire economic circumstances induced by this government's mismanagement of our economy. It should have called on all people to bear that burden.

What type of management practice is this government calling upon to give credibility to its own policies? I can do no better than quote to you from an article by the journalist, Mr. Geoffrey Stevens, in The Toronto Star of September 15:

> Picture the government as a private corporation. What would happen if the corporation handed out pay increases to its directors and senior managers—then, without negotiation, announced to its office and factory workers that they would get no raise this year and less than the inflation rate for the next two years? There'd be a strike and the public would say the employer had provoked it.

Mr. Speaker, he goes on:

> —an employer who tries to appear tough by deliberately treating his own workers unfairly is an incompetent manager. He's also a malicious fool.

We are facing a new world economic order. Borders are opening up. Corporations can keep plants anywhere in this world they want in order to take advantage of competitive factors.

One of those major competitive factors is whether businesses can count on Public Service being on the job. It relates to our transportation infrastructure, communications infrastructure, air travel, shipping, whether people can get their cheques, whether people who have to deal with the Public Service can get those services on an ongoing basis.

That is one factor. It is critical to our competitiveness. Even more important over the long term in terms of where our economy is going is a new attitude which we have to bring to Canada. It is an attitude which is not novel. All you have to do is look elsewhere in the world.

It is the European and Japanese model of doing business as opposed to the American, U.K. and Mulroney approach to doing business. It is a role where governments, public servants, industry, financiers, educators and labour work in close harmony, partnership and co-operation to set economic goals and to achieve them. Even the minister for industry has recognized in his paper Prosperity for the Year 2000 that we are going to need this type of co-operation.

What does this government do? It deliberately sets out, as the biggest employer in this country and as the manager of its own public servants, to set an example that no private sector company could get away with.

We are not going to have harmony among the sectors, government, business, labour, or between the government as an employer and its own employees. We are not going to have that co-operative effort which is necessary to make us competitive on a global basis.

What if this legislation is allowed to pass this House, what if this government is allowed to persist in bashing its own employees in order to try to appeal over their heads to the other Canadians who are suffering? This is not the way it should be done. This is not the way to create a competitive environment in this world.

We have to end strikes, we have to get rid of them, but we cannot do it in the crass political way that this government is seeking to do it on the backs of Canada's public servants. Let us use this as a lesson. Let us get the mediator in there to settle the strike.

If that mediator was appointed today, those workers would be back on the job within hours. Then we could have a fair resolution to it. I would hope after that this government would resolve to never again try to make cheap politics out of its dedicated public servants.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for his very fine words that are now on the record of this Chamber.

I am particularly impressed with his reference to the state of mind, the demoralization of our public servants today by the Government of Canada.

I was listening to the President of the Treasury Board in this Chamber last night say that regional rates of pay were a good thing. Those were his exact words. That is, paying people different wages for doing the same job depending on where they were working. He made reference to the fact that about 20,000 or 24,000 of our workers in Canada in the general trades and labour end of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the pipe fitters, the plumbers, carpenters and drivers of machinery, are on different wage rates in Canada.

Here in Ontario there is one wage rate if you are working in metropolitan Toronto, and there is another wage rate if you are outside of metropolitan Toronto. If you are doing the same job for the federal government, there is one wage rate if you are working in Vancouver and another wage rate if you are working outside of metropolitan Vancouver. If you are working in Vancouver as a plumber, you get more wages than if you are living outside of Vancouver and working for the federal government as a plumber. But you make less wages if you are working for the federal government in Vancouver as a pipe fitter than you do if you are living outside of Vancouver working as a pipe fitter. The same applies to Toronto.

In other words, for some occupations you receive higher wages if you live in a metropolitan area than if you live outside, and for other occupations you receive more wages if you live outside than if you live inside. This is completely, absolutely ridiculous and does not stand up to reason at all. The minister blamed it on a former government. I have researched this thoroughly and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the way this started back in the sixties was that it actually started with the union. It was the union that negotiated regional rates with the government of the day. It was, and I can prove it, the union and the government of the day.

What has happened since then? We have gone past the age of enlightenment. We are up to 1991. We have laws in this country on wage rates. This government certainly breaks the law. Yet the President of the Treasury Board stands up in the Chamber and says: "No, no, it is all right, it is great".

The hon. member a few moments ago—and perhaps he could comment further on it—referred to the total destruction of service to the people of Canada by the Government of Canada. In every area, from the mail service to when you walk into an office, there is the total destruction of service. We have public servants who are looking over their shoulder wondering when they are going to get laid off or when some manager way up somewhere is going to receive a bonus for getting rid of them.

Mr. Peterson: The member for Gander—Grand Falls, as usual, has raised a couple of issues which are critical to our dealings with our own employees, our own public servants, and to the fabric of what Canada is about.

First of all, if an employee is always looking over his or her shoulder, worrying if the axe going to fall on their neck next, then it is inhuman to think that that person is going to be able to concentrate on the job and on service. It is just not human nature. They are more worried, and become more worried, about office politics, which is very, seldom conducive to solid performance and competitiveness.

There is nothing wrong with giving some people some security so that they can throw themselves into their jobs, so they can feel confident about their own future, so that they can invest in their own upgrading, so that they can become part of something that is going to be there a year from now, so that they can contribute on a long term basis. It is this type of morale and spirit that we see in competitive companies around the world.

Take the Japanese, for example. They know that they have jobs for life and they are going to be trained and people are going to work with them to make them more competitive and make them the most competitive in the world. In those circumstances, they are prepared to give because they are part of something and they have security.

Rather than the fear approach in managing your own people, how about the carrot approach? How about the security approach, that we are all part of something and we can make it bigger? That is what is going to produce the high morale and the high efficiency, be it in the private sector or the public sector.

He raised another issue about differential rates of compensation for people inside and outside various geographic regions in this country. This is one of the great Canadian dilemmas. I don't have an answer to that. For example, we know that people living in the north of Canada have very much higher living costs. This is why a number of years ago we brought a northern benefits provision into our Income Tax Act, recognizing that these people living in a particular region had an unfair burden to bear in order to stay Canadian and live there, the cost of fuels and things like this. So we have, over the years, attempted to recognize that there are inequities in our country caused simply by geography, caused simply by the various costs of living.

I am not saying that we have found ways of dealing with those in an equitable and fair manner for all involved. But it is a struggle that we have to go through, just as we recognize that in the regions in Canada, they may have fewer economic opportunities than in some of the central parts and we have to find ways to give those people security, dignity and meaningful lives.

In conclusion, I think that will be part of the ongoing struggle, through the millennia, of being Canadian. Because we are a sharing people and because we do believe that Canada united is stronger than Canada driven apart, we will make that commitment and that effort to ensure the equity.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls for that question on regional rates. I was most interested that it was a member from Toronto who, in the second part of his answer, gave sort of an answer but did not really come out, perhaps, as fervently for the principle as I was hoping, knowing his interesting background in national and provincial politics. I listened to his speech and have been sitting here all morning in hopes of perhaps contributing a few thoughts to this debate and add another dimension to it.

I was one of the members here when the Public Service Staff Relations Act–1966 was debated in this House of Commons and I am going to refer, if I can catch the Speaker's eye some time during the debate this afternoon, to a few remarks made about what might happen when we embarked on what, at that time, was a pretty brand new blazing precedent in terms of extending this right for public servants.

I have a question for the member who just spoke. I have listened here and have watched on television most of the debate as we have had this on–again, off–again problem, and it is an unfortunate problem. Frankly, as The Citizen said, and almost everyone else outside of Ottawa has said, both parties have tainted fingers on this.

My question is, and I have not heard very many members get into this, does the member sort of equivocate it on regional pay rates? I can understand that, although I am a little disappointed. I would like to ask him what his thought is about the right to strike in the Public Service, as compared to compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Peterson: I don't know what the solution is. I would have to be very honest with you. We cannot afford strikes. We cannot afford strikes in the public sector, we cannot afford strikes in the private sector.

As I put on the record, our record among all those countries I mentioned is abysmal. We are far out of step with international standards in terms of days lost because of strikes and walkouts. Surely we have got to find a way to do it. If the member thinks that by eliminating the right to strike may do it, I am not sure it will.

I think it has to start right at the top, with management. I think it is an attitude. I know when I was an employer in the private sector people could have struck, people could have walked out. If they don't like what you are doing, they just do not perform up to their potential as human beings.

Management has an obligation to provide the conditions under which people can fulfil all of their potential in their work environment. That is not happening, and we have got to find a way to get rid of strikes. To me, it is not a legislative concern as much as it is one of attitude and changing the whole ethos of both the public and private sector in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

• (1330)

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: I have a quick point of order, Mr. Speaker, which is very relevant to the present discussion. I am sorry to interrupt my good friend who made an interesting contribution to this debate in second reading. I am certainly looking forward to his contribution at third reading.

Is it correct that as far as I can tell, yesterday's Hansard is not on our desks now because of the strike, that the truck with Hansard is somehow impeded in a traffic jam or is being prevented from coming to the Hill?

With respect, Mr. Speaker, if you do not know the answer, could you kindly get the answer and find out what the devil is going on here?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I understand the question of the hon. member. I have in my hand the Hansard.

[Translation]

I have a copy here of yesterday's Hansard, but it is not bound. We intend to check whether all members will receive copies of Hansard in its usual form. I want to thank the hon. member for drawing the attention of the House to this matter.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, my hon. friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants can rise at any time on a point of order because he is a good friend, and I don't mind being interrupted, especially since I had not even started.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak today on third reading of the back-to-work legislation aimed at employees who are members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Although I have several reasons for wishing to speak to this bill, there is one important point I would like to make for the benefit of Canadians who are listening. After two and half years in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, I realize that most of the time the House might as well be on another planet, a planet not familiar to Canadians who live on Main Street in Shawinigan, Vancouver, Smiths Falls in Ontario or Gander in Newfoundland.

This place operates on assumptions that have no application in the real world. Earlier, the hon. member for Willowdale made a very interesting speech. He mentioned the fact that we in Canada have the worst record for strikes in the Western world. This hardly enviable record is not necessarily the fault of the Government of Canada but of Canadian society as a whole. Consider that Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, the three provinces with the largest populations, have experienced a number of strikes with a very negative impact on the Canadian economy. These strikes were in the primary sector and, more specifically, in the pulp and paper, aluminum and forestry industries.

Our competitive position on international markets has been seriously undermined by these strikes which also occurred in the steel industry and other sectors. Mr. Speaker, I think that someday, we will have to consider doing what other countries have already done: draw up a new social contract, signed by all three economic partners–governments, unions and business.

Although his speech was most interesting, the hon. member for Willowdale finally put the blame on the Government of Canada. Of course, strikes were a serious matter and hurt the economy, but we should let the strike go on and not pass this legislation, not put an end to the strike immediately, because our competitive position— That was not the way to solve our problems.

The Liberal member talked about the concerns of the business community. The funny thing is, Mr. Speaker, the business community brought this subject up last week, when the Quebec division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made suggestions to the government of Canada for improving exactly what my Liberal colleague from Willowdale just mentioned, i.e. our competitiveness on the international markets. Canadian manufacturers, responsible for creating jobs in Quebec and in Canada, made a number of recommendations to the government. There are three that I would like to quote if I may, Mr. Speaker.

First, that Canadian manufacturers should continue to invest in modern technologies to increase the productivity of the labour force. I am in agreement with that. Their second recommendation—and my hon. colleague from Willowdale should listen to this—was that all levels of government without any exception—federal, provincial, municipal, school boards, Hydro–Québec, Hydro–Ontario, B.C. Hydro—would negotiate lower wage settlements to match the overall productivity growth in Canada."

This year, Mr. Speaker, our productivity growth was not great.

The other recommendation the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made was the following: that the governments should try to eliminate the budget deficit and cut back on other funding requirements so as to reduce borrowing by the public sector on financial markets. What does that mean in layman's terms, Mr. Speaker, for the ordinary people across this country who sometimes get the feeling they have landed on another planet? It means, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian savings and foreign capital in Canada are in fact used mainly to service our national debt instead of financing capital projects needed at the industrial and economic level. This has to be pointed out.

So, manufacturers tell us, and I tend to agree with them, that we have to reduce the deficit and to limit the total payroll in the federal Civil Service, in order to set an example for provinces and businesses. You know what, Mr. Speaker, it works. In four Canadian provinces, our plan for 0, 3, and 3 per cent has been applied, and in a more drastic manner too. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that in the province of Quebec, unions, even the most militant of them, like the CSN with comrade Gérald Larose, and the Quebec civil servants have agreed to 0 per cent for a six–month period? There was no strike. They did not organize a political strike just to please the New Democrats or the Liberals, who want to knock down the government at any cost. Just wait until the next election, then you can do whatever you want to, but for now, Canada has to work.

Even the unions in the province of Quebec said they did not really like 0 per cent, but still, they sat down with the government and signed an agreement, giving Quebec civil servants 0 per cent.

What happened elsewhere? In some provinces, agreements were signed, then torn by the government who came back offering 0 per cent. In many sectors, Mr. Speaker, that is how things are done. Why? It is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. This year, the budget of the Canadian government will reach $192 billion. I think that is more than enough to ask from Canadian taxpayers. That is enough. I do not think we should add one more cent to federal expenses. I believe Canadian citizens consider that with this amount we should be able to manage. The majority of Canadians think like that, except members of the Liberal Party of Canada and members of the New Democratic Party of Canada.

Some people here are going to say: "You are not serious." But I do have proof of what I am saying, Mr. Speaker. Members on this side of the House had the political will—and God knows how much of it was needed over the last two years—to say no, despite the fact that everybody is asking us for something. In our offices we receive dozens and dozens of organizations asking for grants for this, or financial help for that, but once in a while we have to say no. And it's not easy as a member of Parliament to have to say no.

The Liberals when they were in government, at the time of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, said yes to everybody. And the result is the huge deficit that we must bear today and for a long time to come; my children and my grandchildren will continue paying interest on that debt, Mr. Speaker, not to mention paying back the principal.

I was going to say that on this side of the House we decided to put a stop to spending. The time has come to stop throwing money out of the window, but it's not easy to close a wide open system, a system which was spending freely taxpayers' money, and make such a system conform to more reasonable standards. That's what we have been doing for the past seven years, not perfectly, but Liberals were spending 14 per cent more each year, while we were able to limit spending growth to 3.4 per cent per year. You have to say no to thousands and thousands of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, and that is not easy.

And we want to continue on that course. Canadians want us to put a stop to public spending, but here I have, Mr. Speaker, something called the Status of Bills and Motions. For those who don't know what it is, motions are proposals made by members from any party in the House requesting the House to make a decision on a given subject.

In this book, Mr. Speaker, there are hundreds of motions. I was counting them. I think there are 500 or 600. Some are from members of this side of the House, but most come from the New Democratic Party. This is quite strange. I am counting them today, and when I have the final tally, Mr. Speaker, I will bring it to you. It will make good reading for you tonight. I believe that 200 or 300 motions have now been tabled by members of the NDP. About 200 of those motions request new expenses, the creation of new departments as well as new investigating committees, the giving of this for that, the giving of money to so and so, to a group, in short to just about everybody in Canada.

The New Democratic Party is of the opinion that 192 billion dollars a year is not enough. It has found a way to table 200 motions to tell Canadians: Ottawa does not spend enough; it should spend more. Those people have never understood how the economy works and they want to please everybody. Yes, yes, yes. You want such and such a thing: fine, we will give it to you. We, the Government of Canada, are generous. We will empty the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers, but it is no big deal since we are in the opposition.

What is rather surprising, Mr. Speaker, is that the Liberals, who have been in power long enough, are doing the same thing. They are starting to tell us that right now they are concerned with the deficit. You have noticed that. It is the honourable member for Lasalle—Émard, who lost during the leadership convention of his party. I found that what he had to say was interesting. This is a guy who was saying: indeed, may be it is time to start cutting on the government expenditures. The Liberal grassroots rejected him and chose instead the member for Beauséjour as the leader of the party, a person who knows how to spend, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday afternoon, during Oral Questions, the leader of the Opposition, the member for Beauséjour, rose. You should have seen his face.

He was mad. He was tense and he was looking at the President of the Treasury Board and pointing his finger at him saying: is it not an awful thing that this government has tolerated 14 days of a strike that affected the Western grain producers and the transport of grains? As he was saying, and I quote: "We are presently losing 30 million dollars a week with this strike. Why, Mr. President of the Treasury Board, have you not included in the essential services the workers that look after the transport and the handling of grains?" Because, if you listen to him, 30 million dollars is a big loss for the economy. We on this side of the House agree that it is indeed a big loss and that is why we are tabling a special Act, because the interest of Canada comes before the right of anyone in this country to strike and that interest is in serious jeopardy.

But what is even worse, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that yesterday the leader of the Opposition had the audacity to criticize the President of the Treasury Board, to say that after two weeks of strike, the situation is now intolerable and that the Canadian economy in the West, as well as the farmers, will be ruined. It just so happens that in 1975 the leader of the Opposition was the President of the Treasury Board and do you know what happened that year Mr. Speaker? There was a strike in the sector of handling and transport of grains in Western Canada. Look at what the leader of the Opposition did then. It just serves to show that the people across th floor say things but do the opposite. That is the recent history of Canada, the history of recent years. Do you know what he did Mr. Speaker? He tolerated the strike by western grain handlers, who are civil servants, not for a period of 14 days like us who have tabled a bill more than seven days ago, not for a week, two weeks or even three weeks, Mr. Speaker, but for 31 days!

And do you know what he did to solve the problem? He gave an additional one percent raise to the strikers, who were civil servants working in the grain sector, one percent more than what they were asking for. Do you know what these civil servants were asking then? Brace yourself. They wanted, over a period of two years, a 28.4 per cent raise Mr. Speaker. So the President of the Treasury Board said: Listen, you have been on strike for 31 days, you have lost money. It does not make sense; we will give you 29.4 per cent over a period of two years.

And do you know what the then President of the Treasury Board said at the time, that is on March 19 1975? He said, and I quote because I want it to be clear that those are not my words: "In my opinion it is a good agreement. The population will understand, I hope, that it is sometimes necessary to suffer because of a small strike that lasted 31 days." It is the leader of the Opposition who, yesterday, made a tantrum in the House to show that he, and he was talking loud, loved the Rockies and that he wanted to protect the farmers of Western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, how can we give the least bit of credibility to the people across the floor when they make such speeches? They do one thing one year and they preach exactly the opposite. They try to win on both sides.

Mr. Speaker, as is the case for the honourable member for Carleton—Gloucester, there are many civil servants in my riding. I have met them and they are not pleased with the government. They are not pleased and it is understandable. It is understandable that they are not happy given the kind of things they hear in this House and the fact that they do not get the full picture. That is the reason why an ad was published in the weekend newspapers to explain the government offers.

A lump sum of 500 dollars was offered to the lowest paid civil servants. Do you know what Darryl Bean said? He said: "It's a slap in the face". Mr. Speaker, some people in the riding of Saint-Maurice, who live in Saint-Mathieu du Parc, in Saint-Boniface and in Saint-Georges de Champlain, would be quite happy to get slapped in the face by the federal government with a 500 dollar cheque.

Do you see the problem, Mr. Speaker? I agree that the federal civil servants should be well treated, but I think that they should also be made aware of what the reality is. They are entitled to a free dental plan paid almost entirely by the Canadian government. They are entitled to retirement pensions that are fully indexed to the cost of living. I believe those are very important benefits in many other provincial economic sectors. I will end by talking about pay equity.

Pay equity refers, among other things, to the money that was given to women who were earning less than men last year. The NDP members tell us that we do not make any sense. Yet, to ensure fair treatment to the women that are in the public service, last year the federal government took money in the pockets of Canadian taxpayers—it took 317 million dollars—and redistributed that money to ensure pay equity for women. This year, we are adding another 81 million dollars. The people across the floor are still complaining. When are we going to stop, Mr. Speaker?

In my riding, there are people—Revenue Canada employees—who, last year, received 2,000 dollar cheques at Christmas. They got a 2,000 dollar cheque because of pay equity. Yet, those people are still not happy. The NDP members are telling us in their 200 motions:

[English]

The government should spend billions and billions and billions of dollars more money, more taxes for Canadians. The Liberals are saying the same thing.

[Translation]

I will conclude on that note. It is urgent, in the national interest, to stop making great patriotic speeches about the country and to act in the interest of Canada. We must pass this legislation. We must give leadership to Canadians and make sure that the Public Service of Canada is at the service of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in his speech the member spoke about the motions and the fact that there were a number of motions from the New Democratic Party. He said that these are the types of motions that would cost the taxpayers money. However he did not refer to some of the motions that I have put.

One of mine calls for a prohibition of promises during election campaigns. I wonder, if the government is so concerned about saving money, would it stop making promises just prior to Saskatchewan and B.C. elections? I wonder if the member from the province of Quebec who has been in the House for a while now can explain exactly how much his government spent trying to secure the by-election in Lac-Saint-Jean.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the promises made during an election campaign and the reality of a government are not always to our liking. The NDP cannot use that technique since Bob Rae has become the Premier of Ontario. The NDP can no longer tell us what to do.

You talk about the honourable member for Lac-Saint-Jean and that is another matter. The money that was spent in that riding has been increased. That could be re-evaluated.

• (1350)

This could lead to a lengthy debate and I am prepared to get to the bottom of this with my hon. colleague from Churchill. We should also refrain from constant suggestions that something always happens at election time, whether provincial or by-elections.

What is important today is that the Canadian economy as well as the economic recovery are threatened by the federal public service strike now entering its third week. Yesterday, activities in the port of Vancouver were at a standstill. In Dorval, nails were spread over the road causing hundreds of flats. Nurses at the Sainte-Anne-de-Bellevue hospital, a veterans hospital, were prevented— were assaulted. They had tomatoes and I do not know what else thrown at them. Essential services regulations were violated.

I can still hear the member for Shefford talking nonsense. Maybe he should tell us what he really thinks of all this. Last week, one Bloc Quebecois member was for it and another one was against. One day, the member for Shefford—as regards the member for Hull, it is quite another matter—is a member of the Liberal Party of Canada. The next thing you know, he has made an about-turn because the wind has changed. He resigned from that party and turned sovereigntist after losing the leadership race. He actually joined the Bloc Quebecois while still a member of the Liberal Party of Canada. He then joined the Quebec Liberal Party. Tomorrow, he may join the Parti Quebecois. We have no lesson to learn from the worse political flopper in the history of the Canadian Parliament.

This government is responsible and dependable. It is not easy to act under the present circumstances but we wanted to set an example for all the people of Canada. We will continue to do so and to denounce acts of violence occurring on the picket lines. I am sure that what concerns the Canadian people is to have a government that actually takes on its responsibilities. The Canadian people know better than that. They have come to the conclusion that they will pass judgement on this government in due time, but, for the time being, they will let it govern. That is how things work. So, let it be no attempt to overthrow the government like the present one as the members of the NDP are attempting to do.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to this muddled speech, I thought it clearly reflected the state of panic of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice. A few days before the Bloc Quebecois was established in Saint-Maurice, the hon. member panicked. He comes down hard on public servants but earlier criticized the hon. member for Beauséjour for having said this or that a few years ago. At the same time he was proud of the number of public servants he had in his riding. In fact, he failed to give credit where credit is due, and although it is not my intention to defend the hon. member for Beauséjour, I think the hon. member seems to have forgotten why there are so many public servants in his riding in the first place.

My point is that we have no trouble with our position. As individual members, we are free to express our views. We are not stuck with a party like his, where whenever his leader rises to support a measure, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, who has never shown any personal initiative, votes with his government and jumps when he is told to jump. That is what he has done so far.

Mr. Rocheleau: They say jump, and he jumps.

Mr. Lapierre: We in the Bloc Quebecois can make up our own minds and make our own decisions.

Mr. Rocheleau: Enlightened decisions.

Mr. Lapierre: In this instance, I can inform the hon. member that we intend to vote against his bill because it ignores collective bargaining traditions in this country. It is pure provocation, no less. This government is so panicky that, now it is down to 12 per cent in the polls, it is prepared to attack its own public servants to give the impression it is doing its job. Unfortunately, provocation is no way to run a country. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice should be ashamed to be a party to this provocation, just to score a few political points that will have no impact at all.

Today is a sad day for the labour movement. It is a sad day for government responsibility, because this government wanted to use public servants to try and score political points. Unfortunately, Canadians have seen through this ploy, and that is why the government is still down there in the polls.

Mr. Pronovost: As usual, the hon. member for the Bloc Quebecois did not speak to the substance of the matter. They have a one-track mind. They get up in the morning and look at the polls. They do the same when they go to bed at night. They don't do anything else.

Mr. Speaker, we ignore the polls. We run the country. It isn't easy to get along with people like that, but we will manage. What I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that when I rise in this House it is, unlike the hon. member for Shefford, to defend the interests of Quebec and Canada. He can no longer say that. He is trying to defend the federal public servants. What is he doing in this debate? What is he doing in the House of Commons? We can ask ourselves this question. I do know however, Mr. Speaker, that in Quebec the government has imposed a zero per cent raise for 6 months to its public servants and unions accepted it! There was a social consensus. Why don't we have that here? Why are members of the Bloc Quebecois not supporting the government? It's quite simple, Mr. Speaker, it's because these people want trouble for the country, they do everything they can to make things go wrong and this is why, we have to denounce members of the Bloc Quebecois who are totally incapable of assuming their responsibilities in this House. As far as politics are concerned we will meet again in two years, we will meet in Shefford, people in Grandby will have every opportunity to reward the hon. member for Shefford.

I will conclude Mr. Speaker, if you don't mind, by saying that our wage and non-monetary offers to public servants are among the best in this country. What more do they want? They have the best pension plans there are, they have the best dental plan there is. Compare that to what the provinces have, you can't fool people all the time. They know that public servants are not about to starve, that we are not about to flog them! There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that we would like to give more to our civil servants, but there is a fiscal reality. We have $192 billion at our disposal and I don't think we can spend as much as members from the NDP or the Liberal Party of Canada are asking us to do.

It is about time we put an end to the profligacy and we ask opposition members to come back on earth and stop living with their heads in the clouds.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I asked one of the members who spoke previously if he knew how much the government had spent in the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean just prior to the by-election which eventually elected the new leader of the Bloc Quebecois.

I think it is an interesting point because if that money had been offered to the Public Service workers who are on strike right now, there would not be a strike in Canada. All the speeches by government ministers and government members, talking about the need for restraint, ignore their own practices.

If there is a by-election it wants to win for one of the Prime Minister's former friends, then it has the money. If there is a provincial election in Saskatchewan, then it has the money. If there is an impending election in B.C., then it has the money. Prior to the 1988 election, which elected some of those members, the government had all the money it could find and tried to spend it.

If you want to talk about honesty, then give the complete picture. This government has had a terrible history. In 1985 it attacked the pensioners. It said that they were the cause of inflation, that they had to give up some of their pensions. Later it attacked those receiving the family allowance. Now it is attacking government workers.

Yet every time the Prime Minister has somebody he wants to help, some contract, then the money can be found.

We have seen so much government waste, but that is not what we are dealing with here. There are all sorts of topics and areas where there is government waste, but that is not what we are debating.

The entire cost of giving those people who are on strike a wage increase equal to the cost of inflation is about $300 million. This government makes promises of that amount without any tendering process, without any consultation, without any consideration or regional development, without any figuring out of how it affects other companies that are competing in that same field. That money is found and it is found for political reasons.

For members of the Conservative Party to get up now and say that we cannot afford to give our employees an increase equal to the cost of inflation is denying what they do on a daily basis. If the main goal of the government is to attack the deficit, then it should come forward with a package that takes away some of the arbitrary rights to mismanage our future. That is what is costing us money. To say that someone in the city of Brandon, where I was last week, earning $23,000 or $24,000, is causing the inflation in this country, that she is responsible for the debt and the deficit in this country is simply not true.

What these government members in their vehemence have ignored is that the person I am talking about in the city of Brandon was not a militant. She was not someone who said she had to stand up to this government, she was someone forced into that situation. This person listens to Conservative backbenchers and ministers get up in this House and attack her. That is what they do. They do it with vehemence. How can you expect those employees of the federal government to sit back and take it.

All of us reject the use of violence whether it is on the picket line or elsewhere. But one of the things I have noticed in this debate is that there is all sorts of concern about violence that occurs on the picket line—and I share that concern—but there is all sorts of concern about the number of days that are lost during strikes and lockouts. Let me make one point, Mr. Speaker. Those members are not concerned when five times as many people are off work because of sickness and death in the workplace every year as there is because of strikes and lockouts.

I recognize it is two o'clock and if I may, at three o'clock, finish my speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

DORVAL AIRPORT

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise in the House of Commons today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Dorval Airport in my riding.

[Translation]

Who among us, in deed what Canadian has not heard of Dorval airport, a most important national and international centre?

This airport facility makes an invaluable contribution especially for the residents of Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis.

[English]

Mayor Yeomans of Dorval has indicated that the economic contribution of Dorval Airport to the region is second only to the economic impact of the arrival of Jacques Cartier. For 50 years Dorval Airport has provided the Montreal community with an efficient, convenient, and accessible transport centre for all air travellers.

Congratulations, Dorval, and here's to 50 more years of growth and achievement.

CHILDREN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, no tragedy is more serious than the one that affects thousands of children every day throughout the world.

Each day, some 40,000 of them die of hunger and diseases related to adequate nutrition and a lack of hygiene. Thousands more are subjected to slavery, exploitation and prostitution at ridiculously low rates, to operate of markets and systems that can only be termed criminal.

It is a world crisis that is just as unacceptable and urgent as war and the devastation of our environment.

Last year, 71 international leaders met at the World Summit for Children. They made a commitment to cut infant mortality by one third to reduce malnutrition by 50 per cent and to provide access to drinking water for everybody by the year 2000.

Mr. Speaker, these goals are attainable, but the political will must be present. Our political leaders must take their commitments to heart. On this first anniversary of the World Summit for Children, I urge our government to keep to its promises!

HEALTH

Mrs. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, October is breast cancer awareness month in the U.S., but not in Canada. One in 10 women in this country will face breast cancer in her lifetime. Breast cancer is a disease that maims and kills women in huge numbers. Some research has been done through breast screening programs and programs to teach women self-examination, but it is a disease for which funding for preventive research is sadly limited.

Let me give you an example. For each person who dies of AIDS, $365,000 will have been spent on preventive research. For every woman who dies of breast cancer, only $882 will have been spent on preventive research.

This is not meant to suggest that research should not be done on AIDS, but to illustrate how inadequate the funding for breast cancer research really is. Every woman is at risk and Canadian women deserve better.

Declaring October breast cancer awareness month would be one small way for this government to recognize the seriousness of breast cancer and to renew its commitment to breast cancer research.

PENSIONS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, 102,000 British pensioners living in Canada are being discriminated against by the British Parliament to the tune of some 104 million pounds.

Britain indexes pensions owed to its former residents and workers who live in the United States and 31 other countries, but not Canada. This is like a mother disinheriting her own children by giving away the family jewels to the neighbours. Surely Britain, which played such a significant role in Canada's history, should not deny its former residents benefits they have earned.

I urge the government to encourage the British Parliament to have pity on British pensioners living in Canada.

EDUCATION

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations' survey on human development ranks Canada as the second best country in the world in which to live.

I believe we can be number one. Increased prosperity for all our citizens will become a reality as Canada becomes more competitive. Together we must foster a learning culture in Canada. We must encourage and invest in research and development, in science and technology. We must invest in our country and its resources. We must promote a more competitive domestic market by reducing and eliminating provincial trade barriers. We must expand our pursuit of every available trade opportunity.

We have been blessed in this country with many competitive advantages; strategic geography, rich natural resources and natural trade markets. Let us build on these advantages and let us make Canada number one.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the economy is taking a toll on our children. In the past year, there has been a 50 per cent increase in the number of children in this region who are on general welfare. It is estimated that 7,708 children are receiving family benefits. This is an increase of close to 17 per cent over the same period last year.

These numbers do not include the children of the working poor who, while not receiving benefits, are struggling to make ends meet.

The same report indicates that the general welfare caseload rose more than 45 per cent over the pass 12 months. The government continues to ignore the suffering. It has yet to fulfil its commitment to alleviating child poverty by bringing into force the convention on the rights of the child.

The government was quick to place a cap on its Canada Assistance Plan contributions which pay for the above mentioned welfare programs.

I ask this government; when will it finally act to end the suffering of our children?

RECYCLING IN REPENTIGNY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to inform you today of an environmental program that was launched in Repentigny, the largest municipality in my riding.

In announcing its selective garbage collection project, Repentigny set a precedent among Canadian municipalities. Mr. Speaker, under this program, a contribution of 25 cents per week per owner will create a capital fund whereby this city can initiate environmental projects—innovative and rewarding environmental protection initiatives.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to point out the work done by the mayor of Repentigny, Jacques Dupuis, the committee chairman, Florian Chartrand, and all those responsible for this program, namely the residents of Repentigny, who demonstrate in a concrete way their desire to preserve the environment. I call on all Canadian municipalities to follow the example of Repentigny, because, Mr. Speaker, the environment is everyone's business.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, yesterday over 4,000 farmers rallied in Rosetown, Saskatchewan to protest the lack of action by the government in the farm financial crisis.

Last year the government cut support programs for Canadian farmers by $1.3 billion when grain prices were falling to their lowest level in a generation. Last winter the government committed to providing over $1 billion in emergency transitional assistance to the new safety net system. However, none of this money has been paid yet.

The situation is desperate this fall because the government has not provided the cash it promised last winter and still only gives vague promises about help this winter. It is another smoke and mirrors show, just like the Minister of Agriculture's visit to the Rosetown rally yesterday. He slipped in the back door and sneaked out the side door. He did not speak to the farmers and practically no one even knew he was in the arena. Then he announced on television last night that there would be no new help for Canadian farmers, farmers losing their farms, homes and livelihood.

I call on the government to stop this smoke and mirrors show, to stop the stonewalling and to provide the emergency assistance it promised last winter.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my statement is about the House of Commons legislative committee on Bill C-17 concerning gun control. him, want to weaken the proposed legislation. He has hijacked the committee.

PEOPLE OF HAITI

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, on February 7, 1991, the people of Haiti celebrated cheerfully as father Jean-Bertrand Aristide was elected president with 70 per cent of popular votes. With him a duly elected government was finally in place, following a series of dictatorial regimes, which would lead Haiti toward democracy. Seven months have gone by, during which the people of Haiti have had a taste of freedom and social justice. Now, Mr. Speaker, soldiers have broken the constitutional order by instigating a coup to overthrow the first duly elected government of that country since 1804.

As a friend of the Haitian people, I object most strongly to this coup which is likely to throw the country in complete chaos. I congratulate my government for having vigorously condemned from the very beginning this putsch which will bring nothing but tears to this noble and courageous people.

INTERNATIONAL SENIORS DAY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations General Assembly has designated October 1 as the International Seniors Day. It is an opportunity for the people of Canada and other nations all over the world to reflect on the actual and potential contributions of elders to their society. It also creates an awareness of an obvious demographic phenomenon, that is population ageing.

By appointing a Minister of State for Seniors in 1987 and implementing in 1988 a strategy for seniors, this government clearly showed its commitment to the needs and concerns of seniors in Canada.

[English]

I would wish, Mr. Speaker, that all my colleagues in the House would join me in wishing our senior citizens a very happy day.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, last week the Conference Board of Canada forecast unemployment across Canada will remain above 10 per cent for the rest of 1991 and for the next year as well. Jobs are going to be hard to find over the coming year says the board.

In my province of Prince Edward Island, where unemployment is closer to 16 per cent, for some people it is impossible to find a job. Their future is bleak. There are small businesses which cannot make their bank payments. There are farmers who face bankruptcy. In fact, Statistics Canada recently reported a 14 per cent increase in bankruptcies in Atlantic Canada in August. The reason is this government's economic policies. High interest rates, high taxes, a high dollar are combining to make 1991 one of the worst years on record for Islanders.

I call on the government to bring in some economic policies that will produce some much needed prosperity. Atlantic Canadians are waiting.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Vancouver School Board, the B.C. ombudsman has begun an investigation into whether the rights of children, particularly the right to an education, are being denied because they are hungry.

School boards in Vancouver, Victoria, Burnaby and Surrey are being forced to feed hungry children, without the promised assistance from the provincial government of British Columbia.

The request for an investigation cites several articles from the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, including Article 27.1 which states that it is the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development.

The time has long since passed for the federal government to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and to take steps to ensure that no child in Canada is denied an education because of hunger.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval–Est): Mr. Speaker, I intended to make a statement on Canadian unity today, but after what I said in the House last night about the Public Service strike, my riding office was besieged by more than 200 strikers who came to criticize my speech and demand the right to free bargaining and an independent mediator.

The government showed it was willing to reach an agreement last week when it improved its offer to the union. Unfortunately, the union left the bargaining table without bothering to respond. It preferred to respond by going back on strike, by preventing this country's essential services from functioning properly, by blockading bridges like they did this morning, and by preventing workers from going to work. The union is not getting the sympathy of Canadians.

What I have to say to all public servants in my riding in Laval–Est and across the country is this: Let's be realistic; the measures the government announced are not a personal attack on you as union members, because you deserve far better. The purpose of these measures is to ensure that all Canadians take part in a wage restraint program that will bring greater prosperity to this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am against violence, and I will never give in to intimidation and blackmail.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

The governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, turned down the proposal of this government to permit consultation and participation of the regions in setting monetary policies. It is almost unprecedented, Mr. Speaker.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: who speaks for the government? Who speaks for the constitutional proposition that the Minister of Finance is trying to sell to Canadians, that is turned down by the governor of the bank. Who is the boss?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): That conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely false. I invite the hon. member to read the speech made by the governor of the Bank of Canada and he will find that he has said precisely the opposite.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House think the Governor of the Bank of Canada would do well to forget about the Constitution and concentrate on monetary policy.

Today, the Canadian dollar reached its highest level in 13 years, at a time when all economists and all production sectors in Canada want a more competitive dollar to increase our exports and create jobs in this country. When will the Minister of Finance ask the Governor of the Bank of Canada to do what all provincial Premiers, economists, and members of this House want him to do, which is to lower the value of the dollar and lower interest rates so there will be jobs for Canadians today?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, so as to make it absolutely clear let me quote from the governor's speech, which was delivered earlier today:

> As the federal government's proposals make clear, there can only be a single monetary policy for Canada based on the economic picture over–all, that is to say, based on the sum of the regional situations.

We agree with that. The governor of the Bank of Canada obviously agrees with that because it is the only sensible way to proceed.

In so far as his talk about interest rates is concerned, I remind the House that interest rates have come down by 5.5 percentage points. They are continuing to come down and as long as we can contain the pressures of inflation, we have an expectation that they will continue to come down. It is sustainable growth with price stability. That is our goal, that is our objective and it is quite clear that we are on track in terms of achieving both.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, 3,000 farmers, victims of the high dollar policy of this government, were asking for help. The Minister of Agriculture said a flat no, no emergency assistance for them at all at this moment.

Since 1986, the time that the Minister of Finance was Minister of Agriculture, in Saskatchewan alone two families leave the farm for good every day of the week. I want to know from the minister what the government intends to do. These people want to stay on the farm. They want to be productive. They want to contribute to the wealth of the country, and the government does not want to help them this time, this year when they need money.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member that I was in Rosetown yesterday, along with my colleagues from this side of the House and along with colleagues from the other side of the House.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would have been welcomed there. I think what my hon. colleague across the aisle should understand is that since 1984 this government has increased three times the assistance to grains and oilseeds by the administration that he was part of. He knows very well, as do members on the other side, that the problem today is the stupidity of a price war between the European community and the United States. This government has taken steps in the past to protect farmers, to maintain farmers' integrity, and we continue to do that.

There has been no Prime Minister in the country at any time who has paid more attention or contributed more to stability, and this government will continue to do it.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister who does not appear to appreciate the frustration felt by farmers. His stonewalling on this issue of emergency assistance adds to that frustration.

The government's own committee on third line of defence feels frustrated and has urged the government to deal with the shortfall on the last crop year.

When will the government honour its commitment to farmers and provide the emergency assistance they so badly need?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows—and I must say he was missed at Rosetown—this government put forward some $400 million last year, in 1990. It put forward some $650 million additional in the FSAM program this year.

However, I draw to the hon. member's attention that he is talking about the shortfall in 1991. I think if he reads the conclusion put forward by Prairie Pools Incorporated, he will see that this crisis has been caused not by Canadian farmers but by the unfair trading actions of the United States and the European community. The real solution to the problem lies with a GATT agreement, which will restore some order to the international market. That is not going to happen in the short term. We know that, and that is why we have been supporting farmers since 1984 and will continue to do so.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, we missed the minister in Miami and in Brandon as well.

I have a question for the same minister. The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds has suggested that farmers dump their wheat at BMW dealerships in protest against what the Europeans are doing.

By the same token, why do they not do the same thing at Ford dealership or Cadillac dealership? The Americans are perhaps doing even worse to our farmers than what the Europeans have done.

Why is the minister not addressing this particular issue? The Americans are hurting our farmers.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, what I have said in response to farmers expressing frustration and wanting to do something with their wheat or their corn, if they want to put something some place, to dump a load of wheat in front of a Mercedes dealer or a BMW dealer or whatever, the cars sitting in that lot come into Canada at a 9.2 per cent tariff and this week enter the European community, which is also a very high quality product, at tariffs of up to 200 per cent.

That is what we are trying to express. It is just what the Minister of Agriculture said. This is a very vicious trade war.

The Americans are behaving in a very unfriendly way to Canadian farmers and are causing problems as well.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Take them on, Charlie.

Mr. Mayer: We will take them on. We have said some things about the Americans that have been just as confrontational as we have been with the Europeans.

PAY EQUITY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Public Service strike is continuing. The anger and sense of despair at the lack of respect this government has shown its own workers are mounting.

During the 1984 election the Prime Minister made a personal commitment to the women of Canada on pay equity. He reiterated that commitment in 1988. Pay equity has been the law in Canada since 1977.

I want to ask the Prime Minister why he does not show the good faith of his government, keep his commitment to the women of Canada and enact the legislation now on pay equity.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the hon. member because indeed it is this government that has implemented pay equity, the largest pay equity settlement that has ever been made, $370 million.

If we take the example of a secretary, over the past few years as a result of that pay equity settlement she has received an additional $7,000. This year, in addition to her salary, she will receive another $1,289 and, if she still is earning less than $27,000, she will receive another $500.

This government is without comparison in terms of our commitment and our action on pay equity.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. It is clear that the government and the Prime Minister do not respect the commitment made to Canadian women, because the Human Rights Commission has said that the government's action on this problem are inadequate. Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister again: Why does the government not just implement the legislation now?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, let me again say to the hon. member that indeed this government has implemented pay equity legislation.

There are 73,400 government employees who are benefitting from that pay legislation, and $81 million will be paid out this year in pay equity payments, primarily to women in the Public Service.

We will continue to work on pay equity legislation, but to the average employee, the clerk or the secretary who has benefitted from pay equity, I think we have shown that commitment and we will continue to show that commitment.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

The pay equity settlement by the government has been inadequate. The conciliation board has said that. The Human Rights Commission has said that and I am sure the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is truly aware of that as well.

It could take up to a week, since the back-to-work legislation goes to the Senate, before this dispute will be settled. In the interest of the people of Canada, in the interest of showing respect for the workers of this government, I want to say to the Prime Minister that rather than bring in the riot troops, rather than bring in helicopters, rather than bring in newspaper ads, why does the Prime Minister not—

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain very easily why we do not think mediation would lead us anywhere.

I said earlier that we had tried to make offers on Thursday. They had been rejected and in our view the union had acted in bad faith by going to television instead of answering our request.

The hon. member leads us to believe that members of the Public Service are frustrated and therefore react on the spot in a way which is worrying. I will tell her that there is much more to that.

I have in my hand a strategy document of PSAC, directed to the strike and picket captains, which states what happened today: "Delay buses as long as possible. Please note. This is an illegal activity and will provoke police activity. Try to get the drivers' co-operation", and it goes on and on.

• (1430)

She is worried about the lower paid people, the women. It continues: "Use same segregation techniques. Get the names of everybody". Furthermore it says: "non-designated alliance members will not—"

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of External Affairs. Canadians support the government's condemnation of the coup in Haiti, but we are concerned about the violence in the capital. More than 130 people have already died in that country. What measures will the government take to ensure the safety of the thousands of Canadians in that country? Will he ask the international community to intervene in order to restore democracy in Haiti?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Canadian people, the government and all the members of this House were shocked and disappointed for the Haitian people who are once again the victims of a coup. We reacted very firmly. Yesterday, my colleague, the Secretary of State, told our permanent representative at the OAS to consider with the permanent committee the possibility of OAS members taking action to help the people of Haiti. As well, a message was sent to the Secretary General of the United Nations, through our ambassador, asking him to see what measures could be taken by the UN to support the Haitian people.

As for me, this morning I announced, as a strong measure of protest, the cancellation of any bilateral aid plan being discussed with the government of Haiti. However, we are going to continue to support the Haitian people in their search for democracy, taking into account all the obstacles they must face in this regard.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I said, we support the position taken by the government as regards to the coup.

[English]

I have a question for the Prime Minister. In his speech at Stanford he said that the time has come in which the advancement and promotion of human rights must overtake considerations of national sovereignty.

In that case, should Canada now be asking the Security Council of the United Nations or the governing council of the OAS for direct intervention into Haiti to protect human rights and to restore democracy?

We are not asking for just a cancellation today, but direct intervention on the principle that the Prime Minister announced on Sunday.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has just indicated, the illegal and undemocratic action taken in Haiti is one that the government, and I am sure Parliament of Canada, views not only with alarm but with horror. Once again the people of Haiti have been deprived of their fundamental human rights. The minister, in consequence, has announced our intention to sever all relations in terms of aid with Haiti.

Last night I received a call from President Carlos Andrés Perez of Venezuela with whom we were in touch in respect of arranging for the removal of President Aristide from Haiti. We also discussed the possibility of some of the matters raised by my hon. friend.

In this hemisphere where democracy has flourished in a remarkable way particularly over the last 10 or 15 years, it has become completely unacceptable that the island of Haiti remains an island of repression, violence and human degradation.

Canada, working through the OAS and the United Nations, has brought this to the attention of both last night and this morning. We will be asking all members of the House to support the government in an initiative to ensure the liberation of Haiti and the restoration of the duly elected, democratically elected president of the Republic of Haiti.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The minister was quick to do an about-face and promised that the government's well-placed friends who earn hundreds of thousands of dollars a year would not receive an extravagant $80,000 bonus. Since the minister refused to include these bonuses in his wage-freeze bill yesterday, when will he present some document in which he keeps his promises not to give gifts to the government's highly paid friends?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have quite clearly said several times in this House in recent days that the government had made a decision in the Budget that everyone would get no increase for a year: no increase in pay and no bonuses for all those who are entitled to them.

The problem of putting such things in legislation is that we have a whole series of bonuses provided for by law. For example, the bilingual bonus—we do not want to touch that. There are bonuses for officers on ships and shift premiums.

So we preferred to make a solemn commitment and will follow it up with an order in council: no salary increase for employees, managers, the Prime Minister, heads of corporations and others, and no performance bonus is to be given this year.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question on this matter of national interest is addressed to the Prime Minister.

Canadians are proud of our history of settling issues calmly and reasonably, not by confrontation, and today is the last chance for the government to show responsible leadership and settle its disputes with the Public Service the Canadian way.

Will the Prime Minister please explain why even now his government refuses to take the chance that a clear, impartial, mediator can bring a reasonable settlement to this dispute?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if I did not have enough good reasons yesterday, I have very good reasons today.

A little while back I quoted from a document on PSAC's strategy. It said, for example, that non-designated alliance members will not be allowed to cross until police intervene, and by trying to stop non-designated workers they have the opportunity to try to convince them of the wisdom of joining the union picket. What is the reason? To try to motivate politicians to move to mediation while they are still on strike. I will not give in to illegality.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PAY EQUITY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it would be nice to see a mediator brought forward before the government bends rules in contempt of law. Having said that, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women.

Pay equity is an important issue, central to the Public Service Alliance dispute. Today there are 11 women in the office of the minister responsible for the status of women. These women are waiting for the minister because they want to have a discussion with her to explain why pay equity is so important to women in the public sector.

Will the minister meet with these women after Question Period and will she take their concerns to the cabinet?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I was really quite shocked this morning when I heard that my office at the status of women had been forcibly entered and my staff harassed. That is not the way to deal with these issues. When people are on strike they are allowed to picket legally, but not take the actions taken by those women.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the position of the minister is that it is not her job to meet with delegations. It would seem to me that the minister's office is a public place and that these women have gone to seek a meeting.

Does the minister not believe it is her job to meet with women who bring her concerns as serious as pay equity and then in fact carry those concerns to her government?

• (1440)

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I find this quite astonishing. I meet with delegations of women and women's groups across this country day after day. But I will not meet with women who enter my office forcibly, harass my staff and undermine what I think is the appropriate—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Canadian truckers cannot continue to live on empty promises, endless meetings and continued studies as they have for close to two years.

Now that the minister has broken yet another promise, namely to provide an assistance package for truckers by the end of September, when will the government finally provide the necessary federal assistance package for our Canadian industry? Or is the government merely involved in a fruitless public relations exercise again?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have made good on our commitment to the task force members. We have met with them on a number of occasions. They have developed with us an assistance package. We took these initiatives to a meeting a couple of weeks ago with the ministers of transportation from the provinces.

Everyone understands that the major portion of the trucking problems do not rest with the Government of Canada, but rests in the provincial legislatures. The tax on fuel is enormous and the action will have to be taken in the legislatures of the provinces.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Since the federal government deregulated the industry on January 1, 1988, thus giving free licence to the American trucks, over 1,400 Canadian trucking companies have gone bankrupt.

Rather than always casting the blame on the provinces and only looking at the price of fuel, which is only one factor, why will this government not modify and reform its own exclusive federal regulations which impact on trucking and therefore provide a national solution to what clearly is a national industry in need of support?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of transborder activity in the trucking industry is still in the hands of Canadian carriers. In fact, the Canadian transportation industry controls 60 per cent of transborder traffic. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should tell Canadians that introducing the GST has benefitted the trucking industry to the tune of $400 million per year and will continue to do so during the next ten years. I believe the measures we have taken have helped the trucking industry considerably, and we will continue to co-operate with this sector.

DISASTERS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, over six years ago 280 Canadians were murdered in the Air-India disaster. It was the most hideous crime ever in Canadian history.

We on this side of the House have repeatedly called for a full public inquiry into this mass murder. I call on the Solicitor General again to order a full public royal commission of inquiry to investigate all aspects of that particular disaster, including the role of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the RCMP, officials at Transport Canada and ministers of the cabinet?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the government has been making every effort to get to the bottom of this very serious tragedy and all members of the House know that it was a tragedy.

My hon. friend will know that as late as this summer the RCMP contracted with a deep-sea diving vessel in an effort to retrieve materials from the hull of the airplane in an effort to find sufficient evidence to bring people to court. That investigation is ongoing and I do not want to be in a position at any time to disrupt what we are all hopeful will be a successful investigation.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that Canadians are fast losing respect for the criminal justice system?

Reports indicate that on Friday the Security Intelligence Review Committee will announce an internal secret investigation into the Air-India disaster. Why has the minister agreed to an internal investigation by the Security Intelligence Review Committee rather than a full public inquiry so that Canadians can understand what happened exactly? What is he trying to cover up?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, any allegation of a cover up is utterly groundless. My hon. friend knows that the SIRC committee contains representatives of all three political parties, members of the Privy Council who are an overview committee of SIRC. They are bringing down a report this week and I am not in a position to comment on what may or may not be in it. I would just assure my hon. friend that we are taking, as a government, on behalf of the Canadian people, every possible step to bring those people to justice.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, since he holds the purse strings.

The minister will know from his colleagues who were present that the several thousand farmers who met in Rosetown, Saskatchewan yesterday did so to bring to the attention of the Canadian government and the Canadian people that they have a disastrous situation. Their immediate problem is the shortfall of income in 1990-91. It does not help to have the Minister of Agriculture tell them why the shortfall is in place without providing them any relief.

The Ontario government has just announced a $35.5 million assistance package. Will this government keep its promise for third line of defence funding over and above interim NISA and GRIP payments?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member from his constituency and from his activities representing that constituency understands full well that in the summer of 1990 the government put forward over $400 million to assist the grains and oilseeds industry. He knows that the government announced early this spring that the farm support and adjustment measures were almost $650 million.

He also knows, Mr. Speaker, that the third line of defence representing all segments of the industry, which met last month and is meeting again this month, have identified that the support given by this government was equal to the support they would have received had the GRIP and NISA programs been in place. That was a commitment of the government, that we help bridge them from 1990-91 to 1991-92.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Yesterday the farmers were asking for money above those commitments and they need it.

Statistics show that for farm families, off-farm income has been higher than income from the sale of products and from government assistance. Is it this government's policy to make sure that agriculture in the next few years becomes a part-time occupation which requires that kind of off-farm income to survive?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the hon. member gathered his information. I have heard that said before. It is not accurate. It is recognized that there is a difficulty in the agriculture sector, in the grains and oilseeds sector and that producers are seeking other ways of supporting themselves during this difficult time. But it is also—

If the member from the New Democratic Party wants to talk to his colleague he can do it after I have finished. What he can do is join with the government, and the producers in recognizing why this hurt is there; because of the stupidity of an international trade war led by the European community. He can join with us to take action to stop that, join with the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester.

FORESTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

A stable forestry industry and many jobs in Nova Scotia depend on a federal-provincial co-operation agreement which seems to continue to escape us. I wonder if the minister can tell Nova Scotians when the Nova Scotia industry can expect an agreement in place to provide that long-range stability.

• (1450)

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend from Cumberland—Colchester for his valuable counsel and advice. I can tell him that the agreement which was negotiated in two phases is agreed to in principle. It is designed to produce the stability and the sustainability of forest products in the province.

I hope the agreement can be signed within the next couple of weeks or so.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Another 220 jobs will be lost in the Yarmouth area when Rio Algom closes its tin mine. The president of Rio Algom Limited, stated in a letter to me on Friday, that: the closure was due to "the ongoing problems of the international tin market and a strong Canadian dollar".

When will the Minister of Finance abandon this government's high interest rate, high dollar policy to enable our primary industries to export their products and survive?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the high interest policy.

I remind the hon. member that interest rates have come down by 5.5 percentage points and are continuing the trend downward. As long as we can contain inflationary pressures, I think there is a good chance that can occur. There are signs that the economy is recovering. We have had a good period of growth in the second quarter. It is somewhat stable and levelling off in the third and fourth quarters. We have laid the groundwork for what I believe will be a sustainable recovery with price stability. That is our goal and objective and I think we are well on the road to achieving that.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. What is the federal government doing to provide future employment for the 220 skilled workers who are about to be laid off, along with the 330 skilled workers already laid off by the closure of Dominion Textiles, and the fact that our forestry workers are not working, and our fishery is not working. All primary industries in the Yarmouth area are affected by the high Canadian dollar. When is the minister going to do something?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the value of the dollar is established in the marketplace. The hon. member knows that.

The government does not have a target for the value of the dollar, nor does the government have a range for the value of that dollar. Much of it is related to the extensive borrowings being made by the provinces. We should take pride in the fact that Canada is a very safe place in which to invest. Dollars, both from the Asian and the Euro markets are flowing into Canada in an unprecedented way. That is providing upward pressure on the dollar.

At the same time, there are signs that growth is going to be sustained, and as long as we can have sustainable growth with price stability we will have durable jobs.

ARMS CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Considering the substantial reduction in nuclear weapons and missiles announced unilaterally by the President of the United States on Friday, and we congratulate the President for this initiative, will the government now show similar leadership by announcing the cessation of cruise missile testing in Canada. Has the minister discussed this with her allies?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, both the Prime Minister and I have strongly supported President Bush's initiative publicly. I have not discussed cruise missile testing with my colleagues, but we have been discussing, in this government, and publicly, arms control all over the world. Indeed the Prime Minister was the first world leader last February to call for very strong measures concerning arms control, both in terms of nuclear proliferation and conventional weapons. We are pursuing this on a number of fronts and will continue to do so.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, that is not a satisfactory answer. Continued cruise missile testing is out of sync with the new realities in the world.

Considering the breakdown of central authority in the Soviet Union and the fact that their 18,000 nuclear weapons are based in four republics, what is the government doing with its allies to assure that these nuclear weapons do not fall into the wrong hands or are used irresponsibly? What steps are being taken to deal with this very important risk?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has taken a very active role, both with the Group of Seven countries and also through the CSCE, through direct discussions with the prime ministers and the heads of some republics, as well as at the centre. This is clearly a matter of grave concern and interest to the international community and to Canada specifically. We will continue to pursue this through every channel available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, last February, Canadians applauded the inauguration of the democratic government of Jean-Bertrand Aristide. After the violent coup in Haiti, can the Minister for External Affairs give us the assurance that our government will not recognize a government that is responsible for this reign of terror in Haiti, that it will ignore that government at all international forums and will impose economic sanctions against the followers of Duvalier who shoot children and people in the streets?

Will she take a clearcut position against this dictatorship?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, considering the importance of the issues raised by the hon. member, I can inform him that we do indeed intend to take that kind of action.

We have no intention of recognizing a gang of hoodlums who have taken control of Haiti by removing a democratically elected president and government. We will do everything in our power to ensure that democracy is restored in Haiti and President Aristide is reinstated in his democratic functions in Port-au-Prince.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. First of all, I wish to congratulate the minister and his government for having stayed removals of rejected refugees to Haiti, all except one, for about two years. But I understand that very recently that practice was reconsidered and may be slated for discontinuation.

Therefore, in view of the recent coup in Haiti, I wish to ask the minister if he will assure this House that the government will not proceed with removals to Haiti until democracy has been restored there?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that assurance to the House, that the government will not proceed with removal or deportation of anyone to Haiti under the present circumstances.

FISHERIES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. During the past summer the sharing of the Atlantic salmon resource in New Brunswick and elsewhere has caused considerable tension and conflict among all of the users of it; anglers, commercial fishermen and native Indians, particularly in the context of the Sparrow decision from the Supreme Court last year.

Obviously conservation is the first concern. For example, there is a serious call for the elimination of gill netting as a practice under any circumstances.

My question for the minister is this. Your department has initiated a process of consultation and communication among all the user groups to establish a new vision for salmon in New Brunswick. How is that process going? Has a consultative conference been considered? If so, when will that conference be held?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this summer there was considerable tension in the Atlantic salmon fishery in New Brunswick as a result of competition among user groups and as a result of the Sparrow decision concerning native food fishing activities. My officials, including the deputy minister, met with the involved parties and will continue to meet with them to resolve their grievances. I think they have all showed a great interest in pursuing a proper compromise that will look after the rights of all users.

PENSIONS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

At the Progressive Conservative convention in August a resolution was endorsed by 77 per cent of delegates asking the government to attain indexed linked pensions for British pensioners living in Canada. What actions will the minister be taking to ensure that British pensioners living in Canada get justice?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member.

Since 1984 the Government of Canada has tried many times to persuade the United Kingdom government to index pensions for the over 100,000 U.K. pensioners living in Canada. So far the government of the U.K. has said that it is not possible for them to index those pensions.

I can assure the member that we will continue to make all possible efforts to persuade the government of the U.K. because I believe she is right and that the position should be recognized by the Government of the United Kingdom.

AGRICULTURAL ZONING

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Agriculture. In the constitutional offers tabled last Tuesday, the inclusion of the right to property in the Constitution generated a lot of questions in the Quebec farming community, particularly as regards its implication for the agricultural zoning act. Can the minister tell us today if, before praising this offer, he had studies done on the implications of this right to property on agricultural zoning in Quebec and, if so, can he make them public?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, when the government tabled its offers that will be discussed in the coming months by the Castonguay Committee, the federal government never intended, and it still does not intend, to intervene in that sector or to abolish the marketing boards, as some people claimed last week. This was never our intention. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the marketing boards are governed by both federal and provincial legislation, and in the past few years, the provinces have exercised their jurisdiction and rightly so. Mr. Speaker, I must say that in this case, the federal government has absolutely no intention of intervening in marketing boards or agricultural zoning. Those who suggest such things are trying to scare people.

THE LATE JEAN BEETZ

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my regret at the loss of one of Canada's most respected public figures, former Supreme Court of Canada Judge Jean Beetz, who died yesterday.

Born in Montreal in 1927, the Hon. Jean Beetz had a long and distinguished career in both the academic and legal worlds. He was for many years a Professor of Law at the University of Montreal where he became dean of the faculty. His expertise in constitutional law led to his appointment as Special Counsel to the Prime Minister for Constitutional Affairs, a position he held from 1968 to 1971. In this capacity he was a key player in the constitutional negotiations of those years.

[Translation]

His appointment as judge of the Quebec Court of Appeal was soon followed by his appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada in 1974. In the 14 years that followed, he wrote landmark judgments that reflected his profound knowledge and experience of civil and constitutional law.

[English]

He was known and admired not only for the acumen of his judgments, but for his courteous and gentlemanly bearing. Throughout his years on the court he remained accessible and ever-ready to share with his legal and judicial colleagues, young and old, his vast fund of learning. Those who knew him will readily acknowledge his many kindnesses.

His loss will be felt deeply, not only by the legal profession but, indeed, by all Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the Minister of Justice in saying how sad we are to learn that Judge Jean Beetz has left us.

As the Minister was saying, Judge Beetz was a learned person, a university professor of the highest calibre, a superb dean who was able to attract very competent teachers at the Faculty of law of Montreal. When he was appointed at the Cour d'appel du Québec and at the Supreme Court of Canada, he became a judge of very high integrity and very good judgment who always tried to understand not only the law but also the workings of the Canadian society.

As the Hon. Minister said, he was the perfect gentleman. All those who have had the pleasure to meet him know that Judge Jean Beetz was a model for all of us. He was a very courteous and polite man with whom one could discuss without having to raise his voice. He always demonstrated a solid judgment as well as a vast knowledge of the constitutional and judicial issues of the country.

This House extends its deepest sympathies to his family. The legal community, as well as the country as a whole, have lost a great servant.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I also want to pay tribute to this great judge.

Judge Beetz was a man of the future. He always treated the lawyers that pleaded before him with respect and dignity.

[English]

In many respects he was a man ahead of his time. He was very impartial and very fair. He treated the lawyers, as I said, and the people who appeared before him with great respect. He had much time for people.

We would like to extend our condolences to his family.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Judge Beetz was a great Quebecer and a great Canadian.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, all the members of the legal community as well as myself, when I was a law student, have had the opportunity to read the progressive judgments of Judge Beetz. We all know about his profound interest for civil law, as well as his vast knowledge.

I believe that not only the legal community but also the province of Quebec and all of Canada must mourn his passing.

PRIVILEGE

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of all members of Parliament.

Today, October 1, 1991, marks the fifth anniversary of the election of the hon. member for Vancouver South as Speaker of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we cast our memories back to that day. We can recall indeed a very long day. While you were elected during the sitting of September 30, 1986, this election took 13 ballots.

Thirteen is not such an unlucky number after all. In fact you were proclaimed elected at 1.30 in the morning of October 1. That was indeed a remarkable occasion. It is the first time that this House ever elected its Speaker by secret ballot. What was more notable was the meaning of this election to you as an individual.

A little more than a year earlier you had suffered a cruel political setback. You had the courage and strength of character to look misfortune in the eye. As it happened, misfortune blinked.

In the judgment of your peers, you were found to be the one whose integrity and fortitude they considered so impeccable that they chose you as the impartial adjudicator of their proceedings and the prime protector of their rights.

Five years as Speaker is a very long time. Of the 32 Speakers since Confederation you are only the seventh to serve that long. By the end of this coming January you will be the fourth longest serving Speaker of this House.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker, there must have been times in the last five years that you wondered what you were doing in the Chair. It is a tribute, Sir, perhaps to your even-handedness, that from time to time some of the rest of us have wondered the same thing.

That of course, Mr. Speaker, is the whole point. It falls upon you to attempt to moderate a process that by its very nature must at times become extremely immoderate. You are not a judge or a magistrate; you are merely one of our peers. It is from that fact, however, that you derive your authority. You are the one in whom 294 of your colleagues have placed their trust. This is a trust that has to be renewed, not just at the beginning of a Parliament but each and every day.

Today is the 1,827th day on which that trust has been renewed and I hope there will be many more to come. The late Lester B. Pearson, in nominating a former Speaker, described his qualities in the words of Socrates, and I quote: "To hear courteously, to answer wisely, to consider soberly and to decide impartially".

For five years, Mr. Speaker, this House has benefitted from your meeting this criteria. We look forward to many more years.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader will speak on behalf of the government. I just wanted to apologize to you for leaving the House momentarily. I thought the opposition House leader was rising in a tribute to me. Given my modesty, I wanted to be out of the House while he spoke.

As I turn the floor over to the distinguished government House leader for a more appropriate tribute, I just want to add that in the experience of people who have sat in this House much longer than me, the present Speaker of the House will rank with the greatest in the history of Canada. He is a man of uncommon distinction, a man who brings warmth, good nature, and a sense of fairness and decency to the Chair. As one of our peers, I can only say on behalf of I am sure all members of the House, Mr. Speaker, that we are deeply honoured to be in your company.

[Translation]

The House of Commons has been honoured by having you as Speaker and I know that I can say, on behalf of all Canadians, but particularly on behalf of all members of this House, that we have been honoured to serve under the Hon. John Fraser.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to associate myself, and my colleagues, with the remarks of the House leader of the Liberal Party, and of course the remarks of the Prime Minister.

I think people watching on television see the black robes and the dignified costume and assume it is a very easy position to occupy. It looks rather comfortable. One has to appreciate, as John Diefenbaker said, that this is the only insane asylum in the country in control of the inmates. Sort of being the head inmate, it is not always the easiest task.

Mr. Speaker, I think in a month's time you and I will have served the people of Canada as elected members of Parliament for 19 years. I saw a picture of our first class recently and I am not sure which of us has aged more. I wonder if our respective wives knew what they had coming.

In any case, I want again to congratulate you on these five years of outstanding service. The election of the Speaker, that was referred to, was a new outcome of parliamentary reforms introduced by the McGrath commission. It was a reform that I have not heard suggested by anybody that was anything else but outstandingly successful, and to that fact that we view that reform with such success is a tribute to yourself and we wish you many, many more years before we are having to face another election for Speaker in this House.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my NDP colleagues, I would like to join with the others who have called attention to your anniversary and say that we all share the relief, which we are sure you must share, that the fate of Speakers in the past, the fate of beheading, which explains the traditional reluctance Speakers are supposed to show upon election to the Chair, has not befallen you.

An hon. member: Not yet.

Mr. Blaikie: We hope that indeed this is a fate you may continue to escape until you leave the Chair.

We note also that your election to the speakership of the Commons was a great moment in the life of Parliament, because it was the first time that Parliament had elected its own Speaker, a departure from the tradition in which there was a pro forma arrangement by which the government's appointee became the Speaker of the House of Commons. This was as a result of the McGrath reforms and it was a moment that I hope will be seen as a watershed in which the House of Commons began to take more control over its own life, away from cabinet, away from the Prime Minister and away from all the other things that have eroded the power of this Chamber and its ability to be the real decison-making process in this country.

I might also add, Mr. Speaker, before all this flattery goes to your head, that one of the other gifts you have brought to the House is the infrequent but nevertheless regular Burns Night. As one of similar heritage, and we are not in that heritage given to flattery, all I can say is that you have not done so bad.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I will be very short and brief. Since the dean of the House is not here and he likes to stand up and speak, and some of you young people have spoken in honour of the Chair and the present holder of the title, no one spoke on behalf of the 17 or 27 others. I know there were at least 17 who were running against you that night that ended at one o'clock five years ago.

I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, from this role of being the dean of the Independents around here, that thank God this one lost that battle, and I think all the others who lost are glad they lost the battle. The Chair went to you and you have distinguished it, in the words of all, that you neither have eyes nor ears to speak unless directed to the House of Commons by all sides and all members of the House of Commons. Keep it up and forget about the Scots.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: In all modesty, as much as I can muster, I want to thank all hon. members and the Prime Minister for their very kind comments and their very kind applause that met those comments.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond said something about I must look back with some concern over the last five years. I look back with concern over the last five days every day.

My old friend, who is also of the class of 1972, the hon. government House leader, mentioned something about being the head inmate. I only take comfort from the fact that all of the rest of you qualify as inmates.

There has been some talk by my hon. friend from Winnipeg Transcona about the fate of past Speakers and somebody—I do not always hear what is said down there but I heard somebody—vividly said: "Not yet". I take care.

The right hon. Prime Minister was very kind and worked up an excellent reason to come back into the House and be recognized.

I thank the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants for his moving tribute to others who, as he says, may or may not depending on the day have been fortunate not to join me in the chair.

I do come back, though, despite the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who said to forget the Scots—it is a difficult thing for us Scots to do—to my friend from Winnipeg Transcona. I know what my former colleagues on the government side have said, that when Blaikie's up on Scots who are piping, the Speaker let's him go on all day. I know what the criticisms have been. He quoted Burns and perhaps I can remind us all that there is another quote from Burns that we should keep in mind when we are here:

> Oh wad some power the giftie gie us To see oursels as others see us!

• (1520)

Thank you very much.

There are several points of order. I think the member for York—Simcoe was first on the list, the hon. member for Drummond, and then my friend, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today, in response to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and to a couple of other questions, the President of the Treasury Board was quoting from a document. I think it would be proper procedure and certainly in the openness of this place and the spirit of this place for the President of the Treasury Board to table that document with the Clerk.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I am pleased to table the document, Mr. Speaker.

MOTION CONDEMNING THE OVERTHROW OF THE GOVERNMENT IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent to introduce the following motion which is seconded by the hon. members from Winnipeg-South-Centre and Burnaby—Kingsway, and which reads:

> That this House condemn the overthrow of the government that has occured in Haiti and call for the immediate restoration of the legitimate government of Haiti as promptly as possible.

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government would be very pleased to associate itself with the motion of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must also give our consent to this motion. There is a large Haitian community in Montreal. Father Aristide lived there for a while and I think that today we must be solidly behind the Haitian people and demand the return of democracy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It may be unusual but nonetheless the hon. member has moved a motion and asks for the consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ANSWER OF MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, with respect and with some intimidation after the accolades that have been played to you just recently and are so well deserved, I rise to point out that the response by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to my question was not allowed in your wisdom to continue and I did not get the response that he spoke, if he did in fact get to finish his answer.

On his way out of the Chamber, Mr. Speaker, he did tell me that the conference I had asked him about would indeed be proceeding with respect to Atlantic salmon and I am sure you would be very interested in that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I had a premonition that I was going to be rebuked by the time the hon. member got on his feet. I was wondering if the nice things that had been said would have limited him in his capacity to carry out his parliamentary functions but obviously they did not.

I have to do the best I can with time. The hon. member, I am sure, understands that. The hon. member has made his point and I am sure will have no difficulty in making the news public.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-29, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another act in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Churchill has 14 minutes left.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, when I started my speech prior to the noon hour I had talked about the fact that this government has spent millions upon millions of dollars trying to gain political favour with Canadians. This occurs usually just prior to an election, and I gave the example of the member for Lac-Saint-Jean in a by-election where I believe the federal government committed itself to approximately $100 million in that one by-election.

I would like to point out to the people who are listening that the amount that the Prime Minister and this cabinet found in order to try and win that one by-election would have given every person on strike on Canada today a 2 per cent increase in salary.

I also pointed out other examples of how prior to elections, whether it be in Saskatchewan or B.C., or during those elections as well, the federal government has found money. In the six months prior to the 1988 federal election, this government, which was so concerned about restraint that it wanted to cut back the old age pensions and was cutting back other programs that were necessary for post-secondary education and medicare, spent hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars which at that time it could afford.

I reject the argument that is made by this government that it is out here to fight the deficit. It has proven time after time after time that when it comes to its own political advantage it will spend the taxpayers' money. However when it comes to those receiving the old age pension, to those receiving family allowances, to those who need to have a post-secondary education, to those who need medical assistance, this government does not have the same considerations.

I was in my own riding last week in a native community called Lac Brochet, a community for which this federal government has responsibility. The school children in that community have been waiting 19 years to have a permanent school built. They do not even have trailers but have makeshift classrooms in a part of the country where the temperature goes to 40 and 50 degrees below zero. Kids are walking outside, going from one class to the next class. That same community was told that they would have to wait another six years before they got a permanent school—in total almost 26 years before a school will be built. The government does not have money for that, but it certainly has money for its political objectives.

Today when I look at this legislation and realize how little it would cost to give these workers a reasonable pay increase, I know that this government is playing politics with the government employees. It could have paid for that increase with the promises it made in the last federal election. As I pointed out earlier, what it spent to buy one by-election would have given each and every employee a 2 per cent increase. The way it has fought against pay equity, the way it has fought against any system of classification of its employees, the way it has refused to have a mediator come in to try and resolve this dispute, the way it has rejected conciliation boards that have called upon this government to negotiate pay equity, the way it rejected negotiating anything until the Public Service Staff Relations Board's ruling, indicates a government that did not make any serious effort to try and negotiate this settlement.

• (1530)

This was a politically motivated strike and it was motivated by this government.

Earlier in Question Period today, the President of the Treasury Board said that he was not going to appoint a mediator because he was not going to react to the illegal activities of some members of the Public Service Alliance.

The Public Service was asking for a mediator before this strike started. The Public Service was asking for a mediator before the government was found in contempt of its own laws by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

The Public Service Alliance was asking for a mediator once the government was found guilty by its own quasi-judicial board. This is not a new request but the government has refused to respect the laws of this land and to negotiate fairly.

Others got up earlier and said: "There has got to be a better way of resolving disputes." There are other ways of resolving disputes but the government in its throne speech and the President of the Treasury Board in his speeches in the House in May and June indicated that they would not accept those other routes.

They said: "If there is an arbitration board that comes down and gives the workers too much, we are going to rule it back. If they negotiate a settlement which does not give the workers zero per cent, we are going to legislate that back".

They refused a mediator. They refused to listen to the conciliation board. They refused to use arbitration. They forced this strike on Canadians. It may have been done for political purposes, but it was a stupid move by this government. It was an uncaring move.

I have been on the picket lines talking to some of those people, and not just in the Ottawa region. Just last week I was in Brandon, Manitoba talking to fairly young people who had never been on strike before, people who do not earn a large salary. They have heard what government ministers and government members have said in this House of Commons. They know that they are being treated with not only words of contempt, but contempt in the thoughts and minds of those government members.

They know that they are not given any self-respect. They know that this government has been vehement in its attack on the Public Service, individually and collectively.

Mr. Speaker, you cannot have the President of the Treasury Board and the government House leader attacking workers and expect them to sit and respect this government. You cannot have this government saying that the work that these people do is not necessary and expect those people to respect this government. You cannot have, as I heard today in Question Period when somebody was talking about the farmers—the member for Saskatoon-Humboldt was speaking— Conservative members saying: "Tell that to your friends at the alliance."

The point is that our member was talking about the fact that many, many farmers have had to seek jobs outside of farming in order to keep their farms going.

One of the people I ran into in Brandon was in exactly that situation. He said: "The farmers in my area understand why there is a strike. I need a pay increase to keep the farm going." This government has tried to pit farmers against workers just as it has tried to pit the unemployed against the employed. It has tried to pit one group of Canadians against another group of Canadians. It tried to get the pensioners upset with the postal workers in August.

It is ironic that in a time when this government is calling for a renewed federalism, a new Constitution, when people will work together, listen to each other and try to resolve the problems that this country faces, it has taken the exact opposite approach in this House and in this nation as a whole with regard to its own employees. Yesterday in debate I mentioned that this government has known since Friday that there was another offer coming from the Public Service Alliance. Various members of cabinet received calls. People in the Prime Minister's office received calls, and they were told this offer was there.

The government could have sat down and negotiated. It refused to do so. Instead, we have a Public Service strike in this country growing anger and we have to face the fact that when this legislation passes the House and Senate, as it will, that there is going to be a large number of very angry government workers, not because of the zero and three, although that is certainly upsetting to many of them. What they will be upset about is the callous, uncaring way that this government continuously attacked them.

This government was not concerned about its employees. This government was not concerned about fairness. This government was not concerned about trying to resolve some of the issues. This government was concerned with its own political agenda and that is obvious to all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, Surrey is one of the municipalities that is hard hit because of the government's refusal to negotiate. It has one of the largest tax centres outside of Ottawa, with 1,000 permanent employees and approximately another 1,200 temporary employees. It has a large UIC office. It has an immigration office and also contains the Douglas and Pacific border crossings, which employ hundreds of people, both as immigration officers and customs officers.

At the beginning of the strike I had the opportunity walk the picket lines with the strikers in all of those locations. The first thing that struck me was that the overwhelming majority of them were women. I talked to them about why they were there. They said, first of all, their rates of pay were relatively low. They made $20,000, $23,000 or $24,000. They pointed out that their combined family income would not allow them to buy a house in Surrey.

They pointed out that in the last two years in Surrey, rents have increased on an average of 50 per cent, partially because this government has reneged on its promise to develop social and co-op housing. The only housing left is rental and that is at a premium.

They pointed out that their UIC premiums have gone up 25 per cent. That is a straight tax increase, no matter how you cut it.

They pointed out that the GST had been brought in and that the inflation rate in Vancouver was 6 per cent, which means that without a wage increase they had 6 per cent less money in their pocket, if they were in a stable rental accommodation.

If they were not in a stable rental accommodation, but in one where rents had gone up because the Socred government has removed all rent controls in that province, and rents had gone up 25 per cent, 40 per cent, 50 per cent, they asked what they were going to do. "Where are we going to get the money to clothe our children, to ensure that our children have adequate food, to meet the necessities of life."

I am not talking about the big boys earning the $80,000. The dominant number of strikers were women.

• (1540)

I then talked to some of the merchants. I will just ask my friend to comment on the impact on this type of community where retail sales are sagging because a large segment of the community has been denied a cost of living increase. They have had to cut back on basic necessities and the retail industry is suffering.

I wonder if my friend would like to comment on those two things: the domination of the work force by women, and the impact of no increase on retail sales.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I think that is one of the things the government has ignored in this back to work legislation. We think of people with fixed incomes and we have a lot of pity for them in our society with high inflation.

One of the things this government has also ignored is that a lot of people, whether they are renters or farmers with increased costs because of interest rates, who not only have stable costs, are going to have increasing costs in the coming fiscal year. These will be costs that they really have no control over such as costs that have gone up as a result of the goods and services tax and mortgages or leases that will have increased payments over the next couple of years. For people who are earning incomes in the $20,000 or $30,000 range, those increasing costs will not be met with the zero per cent salary increase. Their costs will go up, in some cases tremendously as my colleague pointed out. Yet they have been told that they are going to go home with a pay slip which may have the same amount of money but which will probably have more deductions next year.

They are going to be taking home less money. The cost of living will have gone up. In addition to that, their fixed costs will have gone up.

We are asking those people to survive with less as they try to pay out more. There is no attempt by this government to ever take that into consideration. I find it ironic, Mr. Speaker, that in this legislation they finally offer a number—I think it is 33,000 Public Service employees—a $500 lump sum payment.

If this government had been serious about negotiating, opening position could have been made last February. That could have been the position where the government was saying: "Here is our way of trying to help some of the people at the low end of the scale". No, it did not take that position, it did not take that position until there was a strike. It did not take that position until the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruled against it. Now it refuses to budge from that position.

It knows it can negotiate. It knows there are areas where the Public Service and the government could work out some of the problems that my colleague was talking about. However, This government refuses to sit down and try to resolve those problems.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member from Churchill for his insight into this debate. I would like to pose a question to him, revolving around morale in the Public Service.

I have in my constituency, as a matter of fact in the same building where my constituency office is, the Department of Citizenship. I have across the street a Canada Employment Commission. Not far from our riding we have immigration offices. In the riding we have National Health and Welfare offices. So I have many public servants affected by this strike.

These people are very conscientious. They know they are there to serve and when you serve the people, the public, you help people. You help people, you make them happy and you as a worker are also happy.

What I have noticed lately, Mr. Speaker, is that the morale of these workers has just hit rock bottom. It does not matter which department we call, these people are well-meaning but because this government has so mistreated its workers, the morale is at rock bottom.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Churchill whether he notices the same low morale in the constituency that he represents, in Churchill, or is this unique to our Toronto region?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious to many people in this room and across Canada that morale will be a serious problem. It is not a new problem but I think it is going to be a vastly enhanced problem in the future.

I remember the reaction of government workers after the anti-inflation program in the 1970s, the six and five program in the 1980s and I listened to people out there last week in Brandon, Manitoba. It is obvious that you cannot keep treating people the way this government is and expect them to go back to work after and be happy.

This government has heard various government members ranting at them and just ranting and ranting and ranting at them. They are going to go in, making one-third the salary of some of these Conservative MPs who are ranting at them and be expected to do a job, knowing that the government has absolutely no appreciation whatsoever for them.

I hope that they in no way take it out on the public, but I can expect that this government is going to have a very difficult time in the future getting co-operation from its own employees because of the way it has treated those employees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today concerning Bill C-29, which does not particularly please me, but which is unfortunately necessary. Why is it necessary? Because it seems to me that there are people in this country who take advantage of the powers that were given to them in good faith by the grassroots. I am referring to Mr. Bean, the president of the Public Service Alliance.

The union members have put their faith in him. Those are people with whom I work every day of the week, throughout the year, people with whom I was able to develop, over the last seven years, good working relations, as well as a better understanding of the stakeholders, through the different services that the population has set up for itself. Now, some leaders who want some form of political gain or who want to support certain political parties in Canada are using those services. I personally find this unfortunate and unacceptable.

Sometime ago I was reading an editorial in the newspaper and here is what it said about the perception of people. This editorial reflects exactly the thoughts or reactions that the people in my riding tell me every time I have the opportunity to meet them—and God knows that I see a lot of them these days. It says: "Day after day, the headlines refer to the lay-offs that the businesses in the private sector are compelled to make. In the meantime, the Federal civil servants go back on strike to protect their purchasing power, as though they lived in a glass buble. Job security has become an invaluable benefit in the last ten years, specially in the light of two recessions. Everywhere in the private sector workers deal with the stress associated with the risk of losing their jobs, temporarily or permanently, because they are aware of the problems faced by the companies for which they work. Several unions have had to show a good degree of lucidity and realism and have agreed to defend the solution based on salary freeze and work sharing in order to enable their members to maintain a decent revenue. As for the Public Service Alliance, it does not want to make any compromise."

The editorial adds that "All Canadians have suffered a loss of their purchasing power. The raising of the psychological and financial comfort of the 156,000 civil servants that are on strike would never be an objective for Canadians, quite the contrary. Wall to wall job security. Working conditions strictly monitored by governmental organizations that measure the inclination of chairs or the purety of the air in the buildings where these servants of the State work. Not to mention a pension plan that is better than what exists in the private sector. There are also benefits that, more often than not, make these Canadians, these civil servants, the spoiled children of the society in periods of recession." They say Minister Loiselle and the government should stand firm.

Why editorial writers are saying this? Simply because some union leaders probably failed to listen to the grass roots.

Another point: Mr. Bean refused a wage freeze. France Pilon, in Le Droit of April 25, 1991: "The downside of the convention came with the announcement of spending cuts totalling $1.8 million annually, which will force the union to freeze certain positions. Public servants will also have to pay 83 cents a month into the strike fund which is now at about $15 million. Union dues have been increased as well. Ms. Hurens was not able to say exactly how much, although she said it was less than $4".

In April, Public Service union leaders had already decided there would be a strike. However, they had also decided they could not afford to increase the salaries of PSAC staff. They cut 20 positions so they could give a 3 per cent increase to the remaining staff. They said: It is too bad, but it was the best we could do.

Mr. Speaker, today and yesterday, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has held up debate and held up this legislation while trying to convince us and Canadians across the country that the government is coming down hard on its employees. Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that as far as the average citizen is concerned, I, as the member for Portneuf, am there to serve them. They pay me as they pay other public servants, whether they are federal, provincial or municipal. Why do they pay us? They pay us to provide the services they want, services they are paying for.

Today, Mr. Speaker, Canadians cannot afford to increase the quality or number of those services. Why? Because plants are closing, including one in Matane; 1,000 direct and indirect jobs in the Matane area. There are 100,000 jobs in Montreal or Toronto. But not a word. Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition doesn't mention this because it would jeopardize their strategy, which is to cover for Mr. Bean and urge him to keep his members on the ricket line while not giving them the whole story. Most government employees don't want a strike, and that is what causes all the violence.

Tensions are rising. All day yesterday and again today, they talked about the tension there would be in the workplace the day after the strike for which I was responsible. Mr. Speaker, neither you nor the President of the Treasury Board nor myself ordered government employees, the servants of the Canadian people, to take to the streets and take the people of this country hostage. We, here in this House, did not ask for that to happen. It was the President of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. He knew what he was going to do. He knew he would hijack our airports, harbours, railways, health services and even unemployment services—they must certainly need them at this point. We don't have many unemployed people in Canada these days: 1,200,000! How many tens of thousands of elderly people wait for their old age security pension cheque every month to be able to survive. He knew what he was doing. His purpose was not to defend his members' working conditions, it was not to explain the basis of his demands to his members, no. It was to say, "I, Bean, will challenge the Canadian government's budget because the New Democratic Party does not agree with it and I advise the NDP." But he forgot that he was also taking some fellow workers hostage. Often when I hear Mr. Bean talk about solidarity and how important it is, can he explain to me how much he supports the unionized workers who are now laid off temporarily, waiting for parts to cross the border so that they can go back to work? Does he support them? Does Mr. Bean's behaviour show solidarity with the employees in my riding who have difficulty every day in trying to save their industries? Domtar, Donnacona.

On August 2—that is not a century ago, it is a little over a month back—we lost 135 jobs at the insulating board division of Domtar. Fifty more lay-offs were announced for the period up to January 1, in addition to the 53 that had already been announced and about thirty others were announced in early December last year for the pulp and paper mill next to Domtar.

I met representatives of the employees, I had discussions with employees at that plant, I spoke with the plant managers. They do not know whether the factory will still exist on January 1 or July 1 next year. Can you imagine the stress they are under? You think that their first thought on waking up in the morning is to worry about whether public servants will lose their job security, even though they know that public servants cannot lose their job security since the government cannot go bankrupt.

Public servants are the only ones in the country to have wall-to-wall security, because they work for an organization that cannot go broke. A provincial government cannot go broke. I have not yet seen any cities go broke. But all the rest who make the system work and who pay those salaries do not have that security. They could have a collective agreement a foot thick, but the day the factory is no longer competitive and the business can no longer sell its products, the boss is out of a job and so are the employees. Everyone is out in the street, at the unemployment office. Except that today, the office is closed.

But they paid for those services, Mr. Speaker. Those people paid for them! They agreed to give collective agreements and working conditions and salaries that are much better than those most people have. The proof, Mr. Speaker, is that an average Canadian earns $27,400 a year. An average civil servant in Canada earns $33,500. We said yes, but we provided for essential services. The idea of essential services makes me laugh. Why would a government set up services that were not essential to begin with? We must define what is really essential. Air traffic controllers are essential in a country. What constitutes essential services in air traffic navigation? Can you tell me? What is essential in meat quality control? If we only need ten inspectors to provide essential services, why have hundreds of them then? I would assume that, if there are hundreds of them, it is because they are all needed. I do not think that people are hired in the public service for the sake of it. They are hired because they are needed, to provide services which the people have to tighten their belts to get, if there are any belts left to tighten. I can tell you that where I come from, many people just lost their belts.

• (1600)

Yesterday's edition of Le Soleil reported 609,500 welfare recipients in Quebec. These people are no longer drawing UI benefits; they are down to the last resort. Are these the people to whom we will be asking for money to pay civil servants' wage increases? I am not quite sure they are the ones to ask.

In the same article, we could read that Ontario was headed toward having a million of these people down to the last resort: welfare. They are certainly not the ones we should be turning to for help. Can our 1,200,000 unemployed citizens on UI or waiting for the offices to reopen to be provided with the services they have been paying for all those years who can afford it?

Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition did not raise that point. They talked about how badly treated government employees are, but failed to mention the people who are being highjacked today. And that is not right!

With regard to essential services, all government services are essential, at whatever level of government. In a municipality, when there is a fire department it is because it is essential. The police department exists because it is essential. At the provincial level, hospital services are essential services. Otherwise, there would not be any.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the opposition does not talk about that. It unduly extends the debate not unlike what happened last December. Thanks to the opposition and its tactics to make the debate drag on, this House ended up considering the opportunity to become involved in the Gulf War while the war was on. Thanks to the loyalty of our friends opposite, we were wondering if Canada should do its duty.

Well, today, we have to pass a special bill, an emergency bill, to stop the violence, if I may call it that, spreading on the picket lines. We are in no hurry, of course not, there is no rush. In a little while, we will send it to the other place. I do not know how long it will take—it all depends on the quality of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition over there—but there is no hurry. Some essential services are not being provided right now, because people are prevented from going to work. There is no harm done. It always falls on the poor taxpayer, who pays his taxes in good faith, in order to be able to afford these services! Some members in this House seem to forget they are here to serve the public, they have a duty to people on welfare, to the unemployed waiting for their cheques or waiting in line to fill in some forms so they can get their benefits, the only income they will receive to feed their families. However, they do not care about that, it is not important. What is important is to play petty politics here. On whose back? On the back of those who cannot defend themselves, those who cannot take anybody hostage.

Mr. Speaker, when there is a hostage-taking incident somewhere in Canada, we say that it is illegal. We call the RCMP and say: "Throw that person in jail immediately." However, when Mr. Bean says: "Take the Canadian population hostage", that is okay. It is legal, and the ordinary citizen is supposed to take that without saying a word. That is not true. The government should not listen to those people. It should say: "No, let it go; there is no problem."

The Opposition says: "Appoint a mediator." But are thirty days of mediation not enough? Are sixty days of negotiations not enough? No! My colleague tells me that it is not enough. She wants the government to be irresponsible, just like the party she always— She is nodding. She is saying yes, you should be irresponsible. That is remarkable! Well I am sorry for her, but we are a responsible government. We make decisions in the interest of those people I was talking about earlier, those who have almost nothing left, the unemployed, the people who are losing their jobs in the plants. That is what we do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member should conclude his remarks as soon as possible.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, I would conclude by saying that the loyal opposition of Her Majesty should have shown more solidarity with all Canadians and a greater concern for issues of national interest, so that Canada does not end up bankrupt.

Mr. Speaker, I hope they will express that kind of interest before six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear some of the remarks made by the Tory member opposite. The member speaks very conveniently of attempting to draw money out of the unemployed of Canada. "I cannot ask," he says "these people who do not have a job to boost the pay cheques of public civil servants."

It is a very noble argument in the eyes of those who do not completely understand the issue. I think that most Canadians can see through what is most obviously a very transparent argument being made by the member opposite.

I want to remind the member opposite and those Canadians who are sitting at home who know full well the full arguments around this issue that this party he represents, this current government of the day, had the opportunity, not having to draw money out of those who are unemployed, seven years ago to do something to ensure that we did not get into a made-in-Canada recession as we have found ourselves in.

Maybe the hon. member could pick up a copy of today's Quorum and take a look at an article by The Citizen. Here is a little line in it that says: "What about the burst of fiscal generosity which preceded the 1988 election?" Those who worried about what these promises would do to the deficit were told not to worry, these were not promises but spending commitments, the government said back in the 1988 election, already allowed for in the government's fiscal plan. As soon as the election was over the government told a whole other story; that times were tough, that programs such as a national child care program were no longer spending commitments but were now impossible because of the shortage of cash.

When did the sun dawn on this government, that suddenly there was no money in the public purse, no money to be fair? There was no money to be fair to those individuals who are sitting trying to do an honest day's work as public civil servants in this country, who are paid less than $25,000, the poverty line. How many are making $18,000 and $19,000 a year? The government says: "Oh, we do not have any money."

• (1610)

I want to ask the hon. member opposite if he can really stand in his place today and not be as transparent on the argument to draw sympathy from the public and to say: "I cannot ask these unemployed people for money to pay the public civil servants". It is a transparent argument.

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking me how come there is no more money in the public treasury? He conveniently forgets, Mr. Speaker, that when we took over in 1984, his party didn't leave much in the treasury. In fact, it was empty, Mr. Speaker, when we took over!

Since 1984, we have been trying to come out of this quagmire we have been in for 20 years. If you read what has been said, you will see that all the experts say that we are doing our job. There is a reality that you don't want to face, it is the fact that you left us with an impossible debt; secondly, we are just out of the worst economic crisis that this country has ever known and you are asking us, Sir, to go on spending.

What you are not telling us and what nobody dared say is where you are going to take the money to pay for all the goodies. You know perfectly well, because you are not anymore stupid than the average man, you are sensible people, you are too partisan but you are nevertheless sensible, and you know how to add. However, you do not dare tell us what we should do to give what they are asking us; you do not dare say that we should increase the national debt by 3.5 billion over the next five years. You don't care.

We have already mortgaged, Mr. Speaker, not only our grandchildren, but our great grandchildren. Canadians in general are asking us to live within our means, but you stick to the rhetoric which has been yours for 20 years: "Spend, spend, doesn't matter, pay later". I am sorry, but we are at the point where we have to pay the bill. And everybody pays, not just a fraction of the population.

I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that what is bothering the hon. member is that he is part of the solution. His own salary is going to be frozen and he doesn't like it.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I find the tone of the Conservative member almost offensive. He keeps talking about Liberal mismanagement and the deficit. Why does he not take responsibility for his own problems as a Conservative government? Why does he not listen to what the Auditor General said about the need to look into all the contracting out that this government is involved in? Why has this government refused to look into that very issue?

We know right now that this government is spending approximately $5 billion on contracting out. We know that the legislation before this House is one in which a civil servant, a federal government employee with a salary of $24,000 a year or $22,000 a year, will have his or her salary frozen. The legislation specifically excludes contractors from having their arrangements frozen.

We know that it is strictly up to the government to decide how much these people will be paid. It can double the contract and expect a 50 per cent increase in the work. It could triple the contract and expect no increase in work. These people are the political friends of the government and they should not be made to suffer—$5 billion, no controls.

The Auditor General said it should be investigated. If this member is concerned about the deficit, if this member is concerned about what is happening in this country, he should look in his own back yard. He should look at the friends of the Prime Minister. He should stop the attempt at buying friends, buying votes, and show some concern for Canadians. You have absolutely no credibility when it comes to the deficit. You have no credibility when it comes to fairness. You have not cleaned up your own back yard. Do that first.

[Translation]

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is upset, but if you allow me, I would like to put a few elements back into context. He probably lost his temper and made a few mistakes.

When he says that we are not doing anything for people earning $24,000, I would like to remind him that the offer which has been refused by Mr. Bean contained a lump sum payment of $500 for some 35,000 civil servants earning less than $27,000 a year. That is the first thing. Guaranteed employment for civil servants laid off as a result of contracting out or privatization. Try to find that in the private sector! A guarantee of a reasonable job offer to all other employees affected by workforce adjustments, provided they are mobile and can be retrained. Commitment made for all dental expenses and increase of the ceiling for orthodontic services form $2 000 to $2 500. Increase of the contribution of the employer for disability insurance premiums from 75 to 85 per cent. Increase in the number of daycare facilities in the workplace.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the 10 to 15 daycare facilities will be opened in Donnacona, at home. they are probably for the civil servants, in Ottawa.

From the 1st of April 1992, six weeks of annual leave after 29 years of service. Increase of the shift premiums from $1 to $1,10 per hour, of weekend premiums from 75 cents to $1 per hour and of lunches premiums from $6 to $7, for overtime.

Mr. Speaker, when my friend from the NDP says that we are not making any offer, that we negotiate in bad faith, I am sorry, but after what I have just read I think he put both foot in it and it is not the first time.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in this debate because there is a myth which the government is attempting to sell around the country. I want to play a small role in trying to dispel that myth. That myth is that it is okay to single out, to target, the lowest paid of the public servants of Canada for special regressive treatment. It is okay to say that the lowest paid people who work for the Government of Canada can be frozen, can have their collective bargaining rights taken away, can be held up as an example of how to pick on the weakest among us in any organization. It is okay to do all of that because out in Canada there are a great many unemployed, because out in this great wonderful country called Canada there are people who are poor, and as long as there are people who are poor and people who are unemployed, it is therefore okay to treat your own employees in any way you want.

I come from Newfoundland and Labrador. That is my province. It has the highest unemployment in Canada. It has the highest poverty in Canada. There has never existed in Newfoundland and Labrador even the slightest degree of room for what I call the politics of envy, setting up a straw man or a straw woman, feeding the fuel of that negative emotion called envy and then seeking to destroy that straw man or straw woman.

That is what the national government has done. It is the politics of division. It is the kind of instinct that if we allow it to be appealed to, it will divide the nation. It is exactly the same kind of instinct that divides French and English, the west and the east, north and south, black and white, Protestant and Catholic and Jew and Gentile. It is the same kind of appeal. It is the politics of division.

I hope Canadians who are following this debate and following this issue understand what is happening. Especially if you are unemployed and following this debate, especially if you are poor and following this debate, and especially if your job is uncertain and you are following this debate, understand the negative appeal that the government is making to you. The government is saying: "If you are uncertain, if you are poor, if you are hungry, if you are worried, if you are unhappy, then you have a right to know that some are even more unhappy, more uncertain, more unsure than you are and those people we've selected for you are the civil servants of Canada, and not only the civil servants of Canada but the lowest paid civil servants of Canada".

I am here to tell the government that those kinds of politics, the politics of division, the politics of envy, are not selling in the country this time around.

They are simply not washing. People understand as never before, having been faced with this government since 1984, the concept of fairness and balance in the public affairs of this country.

They expect the government to be fair and to be balanced in its approach to public policy. They expect the government to set an example of fiscal restraint and of being frugal, but most important of being fair. Is there any fairness? Is there one iota of fairness in saying that it is okay to give not a salary, not an increase, but a bonus of $70,000 or $80,000 for the highest paid public servants?

Many Canadians would love to have a salary of $70,000 to $80,000. Many Canadians would love to have an increase, public servants this year for example, of $700. This government gave a bonus that is over and above the $200,000 to $300,000 salary, a bonus of $70,000, $75,000 and $80,000 to the highest paid public servants in the land. It has given zero per cent to the lowest paid public servants in the land.

Whether your circumstance is that you just got a raise in the private sector or you just got laid off in the private sector, it is not hard to understand the concept of fairness as it ought to be when you look at how this government operates from day to day and when you look at the circumstances as they really are: zero per cent for a secretary and a $70,000 bonus for the hand-picked heads of corporations selected by this government.

That is not rhetoric. That is not opinion. That is not comment. That is fact. That is fact, and the same people who stand behind the administration that made that decision stand today and say: "We cannot afford to be fair. We cannot afford to be just. We cannot afford to be decent with public servants because we are really worried. We are bleeding for the unemployed."

There has been an indecent level of unemployment in Newfoundland since this government came to power and it is difficult to believe that only now is it bleeding for the unemployed of Newfoundland.

There has been an indecent level of poverty since this government came to power and suddenly this government wants to be on the side of those who live in poverty, taking on those nasty, terrible civil servants making $18,000 a year.

This bill defies credibility. It is not possible to believe the government is sincere or genuine when it presents this bill.

This is one of those debates in which if a member of the opposition believed merely in political convenience, we would buy the argument that the government puts forward, that the strike is inconvenient and therefore we must slam the public back to work. That would be the easy thing to do, to say: "Yes, somebody in my constituency has been inconvenienced by those civil servants and we are going to slam them back to work."

That would be the selfish thing to do. That would be the quick, easy, convenient and cowardly thing to do. When I stopped my car on the side of the road coming back here on Monday at an airport road in Deer Lake, Newfoundland and talked to half a dozen people with picket signs in their hands, most of them making less than the minimum income of this country, I did not see a bunch of greedy, selfish civil servants. I saw people who could not really afford to be on the picket line.

They were people who could not afford to be on the picket line, whose children had just gone back to school.

They just got them ready for school. They are looking at Christmas and they want to have a few gifts under the tree. They really cannot afford to be there and they do not want to be there. They absolutely despise the fact that they are out there. Mr. Speaker, their principles are not for sale. They are prepared to pay the penalty in lost salary of being on the picket line because they want to make a point. They want the government to know that as it hauls on its jackboots and walks over them that they are not dead, that they are alive.

These public servants want to stand for their rights, Mr. Speaker, in a way they have never done before.

When the government can roll over its own, when the government can walk over the lowest paid of the public servants of Canada and not a sound is heard as it rolls over them, it sets an example for all members of our society to be rolled over by big and powerful organizations and institutions.

Members of Parliament are here not because it is the political thing to do, not because it is the easy thing to do to stand up to Bill C-29 and not because it is convenient, but because it is right to oppose this bill which has wiped out the right of collective bargaining in Canada.

We acknowledge that Canadians have been inconvenienced. Of course they have. I have been inconvenienced. I do not like it and Canadians do not like it. The issue is not whether or not the Public Service strike is inconvenient for the country. Of course it is. The issue is why do we have a Public Service strike? Is it because it is unreasonable for people to seek more than zero per cent salary increases? Or is it because a government that has languished at 12 per cent to 15 per cent in the polls for the last six months finally needs somebody it can stand up and knock down.

I suggest the truth is obvious. This is a government desperate to pick a battle and win a battle, any battle with anybody. It has picked upon public servants. This is a government desperate to ride on the backs of the lowest paid public servants in this country, trying to climb back up the slippery slope of popularity.

I tell you, this government insults not so much the intelligence but the integrity of Canadians if it believes that an appeal to mob rule, an appeal to pack mentality, an appeal as I said earlier to the politics of envy, is going to result in some collective mad rush by the public at large to beat up on the public servants of this country. It will not result in that kind of mob rule.

If this government truly wants an end to the labour disruption in this country, if it truly wants to see the Public Service functioning in an efficient manner, if it is truly interested in the whole notion of pay equity, given the women in our society, equal pay for work of equal value, if this government is interested in justice at all it will back away from this disastrous course.

If the only rationale that those who would promote and who have manipulated this strike can come up with in the smoke-filled dark and dank rooms of the Tory party is the belief that somehow you are going to lift yourself out of your political misery by ganging up on civil servants, the government must know by now that that strategy has failed. That strategy has failed. The public is not buying this obvious and bare-faced and bold and brazen attempt to manipulate public opinion.

How can Canadians believe, as they desperately want to believe, as they desperately need to believe, that their government is dealing with them in a forthright fashion on something that is as fundamental as the Constitution? How can Canadians believe that all matters they need to know have been exposed, that there is no shady back-room dealing in something as fundamental as the Constitution, when the government is so obviously prepared to manipulate, to deal in the back room, to be unfair and to be unjust on something as fundamental as how you treat your own employees?

That is the issue the government ought to cotton on to. This government is in power at a time when Canada is experiencing perhaps its last opportunity to pull the nation back together. This government that is responsible and directly responsible for the current mess we are in now has responsibility to try and bridge the gap and the differences in this country, to get people pulling in one direction and to find a constitutional reconciliation.

How can the minister in charge of the Constitution, Mr. Clark, how can the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, how can his lieutenants, Mr. Bouchard and Mr. Crosbie, be believed in their respective regions and in their respective responsibilities when they say: "Our only interest is Canada. We are being forthright with you. We are being honest with you. All we want is a fair and balanced deal. Trust our intentions, believe in our integrity, follow our course and come build a better Canada with us".

How can we believe that soaring rhetoric when right here in this Parliament today this same government deals with its own employees in the most deceitful and manipulative way possible. That is the issue for this government. This is not a question of batting heads with the union and winning. It is not a question of showing who is the most stubborn and it is not a question of manipulating the weakest among the federal government organization. It is a question of fairness.

Mr. Speaker, I tell you this argument that we are going to take money out of the pockets of the civil servants to feed the hungry in Newfoundland is not washing.

Let me tell you about Newfoundland. Let me tell you about the politics of envy. In 1984, when Ethiopia was suffering the worst famine it has seen to this point, when millions were starving and going to tents, Newfoundland had the highest unemployment rate in Canada, it had the highest poverty rate in Canada and on a per capita basis, it gave more than any other province of Canada to the people of Ethiopia. That is the reality of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. When they were called upon to give they gave on a per capita basis in greater measure than any other people of the country. The poorest of the country responded.

So this politics of envy that is being thrown out now as a rationale for beating up on civil servants does not find a receptive audience in Newfoundland and Labrador. I suspect it does not find a receptive audience among the newly unemployed of southern Ontario, one-quarter of a million people driven out of their jobs by this government. The politics of envy does not find a receptive audience among our native people whose treatment has been shameful in the history of this country. The politics of envy does not find a receptive, resonating core among the urban poor. It does not find a receptive audience among our farmers who are today trying to sell wheat at the lowest price since the 1930s.

The politics of envy and division in Canada do not work any more. People in this country instinctively understand that if the country is to survive, we must be fair to each other. We must care about each other. We must pull together. You cannot accomplish those goals when you accept the temptation to begin to pull apart and to beggar your neighbour and to envy your neighbour and to allow anyone to manipulate you into setting up scapegoats.

There are two political forces at work in Canada today whose success depends upon Canada's failure. The Reform Party believes in a Canada without Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois believes in a Quebec without Canada. This government has borrowed a page from both those parties when they practise the sickening politics of division and envy.

We in the Liberal Party stand opposed to Bill C-29. We do not oppose it because it is the obvious political thing to do. There are not enough civil servants in this member's riding to elect or defeat him, or that member's riding, or that member's riding. There are proportionately only a handful of civil servants in my riding and there are a hell of a lot of unemployed.

The easy thing would be to join the gang-up on those civil servants. The cowardly thing would be to say "yes, we are standing with the unemployed and the poor against those civil servants". But the right thing to do if we are going to begin to heal the wounds that have torn this country asunder, wounds inflicted by that government, is to stand against this bill. We must stand against this brand of politics and say "no" to Bill C-29, stand up for our neighbours, in this case those civil servants who have been manipulated by this government to a picket line.

Some hon. members: Hear,, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to get involved and ask a few questions to my honourable colleague, who started by saying: There is a myth. However, Mr. Speaker, who creates that myth? Is it us, on this side of the House, who are trying to tell the exact truth? What saddens me the most is that he says that the Conservative Party does that on the back of the poor workers in order to get votes and higher ratings in the surveys.

If that is getting higher ratings in the surveys, it is not climbing fast. This morning, 200 public servants from Laval who earn a very good salary came to my office and told me that they would not vote for me anymore, because they did not get a raise. Is that getting votes or being honest? The Liberals have it easy. They say: You have been in office for seven years, what are you doing? Yes, but the damage was so great that it will take twenty years to clear the mess, and the poor public servants and ourselves will suffer because of that.

Behind my honourable colleague, there is the other member who says: The debt was at $180 billion. Now, it is at $400 billion. It is true. It is climbing to $410 billion, perhaps $420 billion.

[English]

He stops there. He gets a heart attack because he does not want to say why. I will tell you why. Interest rates. When you have debts you have to pay your interest as everyone does.

But one thing you never say, that is why there is a myth.

I want to ask my hon. colleague. Today I went to the minister and asked a few personal questions on behalf of my constituents. Why, if your job is so bad, do you not resign? He did not resign and I hope he will never resign because in my area we all love him. I never had so many calls about a minister and the NDP asks me if he will resign. He will not resign because in my area people love him and say "get these people back to work because I have to go to work and I want to work."

I would like to ask a question of my hon. colleague for whom I have a lot of respect. Can he explain this job that is so bad? If we treat these people so bad why do 234,000 people, Canadians, want to get a job, 50,000 of whom are qualified to get that job. They are waiting to get a job.

I am sorry I should not call that a job. At that price I should call it a position.

People love this place. People love to work here. Can he explain to me why if it is so bad, these people—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Della Noce: Why don't you listen once in a while. You may learn something. You didn't know that.

Why do the people want to have such a job, such a position if it is so bad.

• (1640)

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member got to his feet and asked a question. I have just spent 20 minutes talking about that insidious poison, and obviously my words fell on deaf ears, that insidious bit of killing poison the government is squirting into the veins of the nation, called envy. That is the game here. That is the whole game. You are at 15 per cent in the polls. That means that less than two people in 10 think anything of you. You cannot get them to admire you for your virtues so you appeal to pride and prejudice. You set up the politics of envy.

I spent 15 or 20 minutes talking about that poison called envy. "If I cannot get you to like me and respect me, can I get you to rally to me, as together we shall beat up on someone else". What does the member say? What is his question? His question is: "The 234,000 people in Ontario who lost their jobs in the last 16 months, because of the policies of the member and his government, would they not like to have these jobs?"

The answer to the question is obvious. Those people would like to have jobs. Absolutely. If the member cared about getting them jobs, the member and his party would abandon their disastrous trade policies, free trade with the United States and now free trade with Mexico. That is what led to 234,000 jobs being lost in Ontario in the last year.

This government caused 1.5 million people to be unemployed today, 1.5 million whom we know about and probably another 500,000, 600,000 or 700,000 who have given up trying because it knows that those poor, wretched, displaced unemployed souls are out there. It knows they are there. It put them there. In desperation it does not announce a job–creation policy. It does not announce an industrial policy. It does not set up some signs of hope for this economy. What does it do? It says to the unemployed worker: "We are going to put you back to work. We have a plan to put you back to work". What does it do? It sets up the civil servants as scapegoats.

That is not only so transparent as to be childish, what is worse, it is personally cowardly. It is the mark of a coward and I am ashamed to witness it.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I hear the government saying that it cannot afford it. I would like the member to comment on just one thing, the government's handling of high interest rates and what he thinks would happen if it had reduced interest rates by just 1 per cent in this country, one additional per cent. How much would it save on the national debt?

My calculations are that out of a $400 billion debt, if interest rates dropped 1 per cent, the saving would be $4 billion. Do you think that would give the civil servants a reasonable wage increase and leave some money over to help the unemployed in Newfoundland?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I concur with the member. What the unemployed people of Canada want is not their neighbour dragged down to share their misery in unemployment or some comfort in knowing that somebody else was slain by this government or somebody else was unemployed. What the unemployed people of Canada want is a government that, if it cannot come to grips with the reality of unemployment, at least shows some empathy, at least can bleed a little, can indicate that there is some hope and is, at least, prepared to spend its energy creating jobs, not creating confrontation.

The government does not understand that people who are down and out do not spend their days wanting to make everybody else be down and out. What they want is a response. They want some indication that the government is listening. They want some hope.

The fishery in my province failed and failed disastrously this year. I and every other MP from Newfoundland for the last two weeks have almost daily been asking for assistance. I want assistance. I want help for fishing families that are down to their last dollars. It will not help fishing families down to their last dollars if in the process we kneecap the lowest paid civil servants.

I have not heard one fisherman, as desperate as his plight is, say anything to me but "can you help?" Not one fisherman has ever said "it will make me feel better if you kneecap some single mother making $18,000 a year". Fishermen do not believe in the politics of envy; they do not believe in division; they do not believe in dragging down their neighbour. They want a degree of fairness and a degree of justice and that is all they want.

It is an insult to those fishermen who are hurting right now, it is an insult to those farmers who are hurting right now, it is an insult to the 234,000 people this government drove out of work, to say that all of those people collectively do not just want help but they want vengeance, they want revenge, they want blood, they want to beat up on the civil servants. That is the message of this government: not one glimmer of hope, not one glimmer of compassion, not one glimmer of conviction, only the politics of envy and division.

Canada deserves and needs more than that right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, it is the second time I have the privilege of speaking in this House on a matter that deeply concerns me.

I must admit that in the beginning, I was not much in favour of rushing people back to work. I have never seen the use of forcing people to work because I know, having been in business for twenty years, that you cannot do it. I gave a few examples of what I mean yesterday and I will try not to repeat myself, but when I hear the arguments of opposition members, I see how easy it is for a myth to exist, Mr. Speaker.

I am talking about the Official Opposition, but there is also the other one, the Socialists, the New Kids on the Bloc, the Barbecues, you name it! It is a real fairy tale! When I see Daryl Bean——Uncle Bean we should call him. He had the opportunity and the privilege to get this House all together to start to negotiate. I have here a little paper that is very interesting for Mr. Bean from The Ottawa Sun: "Pork and Beans." It is Friday's editorial reaction entitled "Fatting the calf" which got the PSAC president Daryl Bean suddenly believing that the time was opportune to move public sentiment into his union's corner. We hope not. They got in. From our corner there was absolutely no reason for Bean to walk away from the negotiation table, and certainly no reason for him to then run to the media and blame the Treasury Board for breaking off the process, like the NDP just did. "It is the minister's fault. We were negotiating, we were good boys". It quit the table.

[English]

Today there were 200 people in my office, and do you know what they said? "We want to negotiate in dignity. We want to negotiate in dignity." Who quit the table? I do not know if they are informed of what the hell is going on here. I am not sure they know what is going on here. That is what they said and it is signed: "You are going to lose the vote; we won't vote for you."

[Translation]

"In the end, we want to be treated with dignity. We want the right to free negotiation and the nomination of an independent mediator". It is signed—because they will remember at the next election, since this is not the way we will win votes! It is signed—in any case, there is a copy—Yves Perras, 734 Monette Street, Sainte-Thérèse! It is not even in my riding. He certainly will not vote for me any more. He will vote NDP. Let him vote NDP, the miracle party! But these are the same guys who told me: Della Noce, you are a good guy, you are honest and that is why we love you.

• (1650)

But when it does not suit them, they do their usual pussyfooting, one step to the right, one step to the left, one step forward and another backward. No! I was honest before, and I will try to stay honest right now and after.

These are the same people who are telling us:

[English]

"We need an honest man in politics. We want good people in politics, but when you're honest, we will not vote for you". I am going to stay honest. I am going to stay fair and clean.

An hon. member: You will not be elected then.

Mr. Della Noce: I was so happy last week when we had this agreement and I said: "Fine, we don't have to vote and it is okay for the boys". Then what was the offer? The Ottawa Sun, "Pork and beans" says: "He was offered a job security guarantee for every member of his rank and file and what could be more important than job security in this economic climate?" What is better than job security? He was offered a $500 signing bonus for every PSAC employer earning less than $27,000. That is not a big salary, but I know a lot of people in my area who would not mind working for $27,000. That represents 35,200 people when not long ago he was calling the same people scabs because so many of them believed he could not rustle them up a dime.

That was one ball game. This is another. We hear the critics from the other side of the House, the Liberals and the NDPers. They were together, almost kissing and hugging together. It is very dangerous for the people of Canada when they get together because it is not the same party at all. One is socialist and the other one is capitalist and they like to spend money. They did spend a lot and they like taxes. We hope there will be no more tax increases, but that is the way it goes.

The NDPers want the government to haul in a mediator to solve this puzzle. A mediator is not needed here. What is needed is for Bean to get back to the negotiation table he left so quickly. Otherwise, it is an affront to his cause. That is what it is. He wants to do something against the government because the NDP does not want to see us here.

We are doing a good job. We are doing the good job that we should do for the finances of this country. What did Mr. Bean do, big administrator? Mr. Bean did worse than what we are doing. In administration Mr. Bean is not so bad. He not a bad man. He is a good money player. He knows how to count. A lot of people here do not know how to save money.

He did his budget. He has 165 employees. What he did for his union people, his staff, is gave them a 3 per cent increase. Good guy. To give the 3 per cent increase, he cut 20 jobs and he cut his budget for $1.8 million.

[Translation]

I will read it to you, Mr. Speaker. It was in the April 19 edition of the Toronto Star: "The delegates at the PSAC meeting held in spring 1991 voted in favor of the abolition of 20 jobs."

[English]

The union voted to remove 20 jobs. It is unbelievable. They did it.

[Translation]

"Daryl Bean, the president of the union stated that employees have reason to be frustrated. But we are in a difficult situation." The Toronto Star, April 19, 1991. Daryl, poor old Daryl. We are in a difficult situation.

He is right. He did the right thing, but he is a union man. He cuts 20 jobs. We should have cut 6,000 jobs. Why did we not do it, 6,000 jobs to get 3 per cent? We did not cut the 6,000 jobs because 1 per cent equals 2,000 jobs. Anybody can count that. We did not do it, but he did it. We are the bad boys and he is the good boy. Is that true? Where is the myth? I will tell you where the myth is. The NDP is giving false information.

[Translation]

Lies, lies. They are defending the workers.

[English]

Where are they? There is not even one in this House here today, not one. There is not one. They defend the union people, the ones who do not cut the salaries, the ones who do not freeze the salaries. They are the members of the NDP. What a farce. What a joke.

The people in my area believe them. Because I am honest they do not believe me. They want an honest politician. I am going to try to stay honest, because I tell them exactly how it is: you are lucky to have a job, you will go through this hard time, and maybe next year you will get three and the year later you will get more.

The NDP does not defend the poor workers who are losing money. The NDP defends the unions, because they finance almost totally that party. The NDP members do not have businessmen with them. They do not have people who have problems in these days. They do not have these businessmen who create jobs in their party, who have merchandise blocked at the port of Montreal which they need to sell and deliver to customers. They are not here, these guys. They are not with them; they are with me.

They call me and say: "Sir, we have to do something. Tell the minister to move", I will not tell you what because it is unparliamentary what they said to me just a few minutes ago. They have merchandise there which has to be sold, and these are the perfect boys.

I do not know. I do not know where we are going. That is the story. I hope everybody understands that, including the people watching us.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I will now speak for the second time on the subject which is most important to me. This morning, 200 workers who have the right to be on strike and whom I respect invaded my constituency office, where I have two employees working for me, in order to scare them a bit. These employees do not belong to the union, they work for me and do not have the right to speak in my name. These employees are just doing their best. We serve the public. But those people tried to intimidate my employees in my office—it is not their office, but mine. When I have to go to their office, I have to make an appointment, and they are only public servants. How can those 200 people have the right to burst into my constituency office and ask to see me when they know I am here?

But, Mr. Speaker, I will tell these people, like I told them yesterday in my speech, that they are useful, that we need them, and that we worked with them. There are some among those who are hard workers and who give a 110 per cent of their time and of their energy to the government and to Canadians. But there is one thing that I will never tolerate and I say it to all those who are listening, that is intimidation, blackmail and lies. When I worked as a volunteer—and I did that for 20 years—in my riding, and when I coached baseball teams with young kids, I used to say to children and their parents: There are two things: lies and blackmail. Keep those to yourself, because at the rate that we are getting paid, we cannot afford that. It costs too much. With baseball, people accepted that; they understood that. It was volunteer work. "If you don't let my son play, I won't do this, I won't buy gas from you." I heard that line for 20 years. "My son is good." In that mother's opinion he was good, but in my opinion he wasn't. However, we tried to let everyone play.

"I used to tell the lady: "Of course our children are always nicer and better than the others; our children are much nicer and more intelligent, but there are also other ones that are nice and intelligent". That is what parents could not accept. So they would use blackmail on me. When they did that, the little guy would not play ball anymore. I would tell the lady or the gentleman to take their son and let him play in their backyard. It is the same thing in politics. If you don't do this for me, I won't vote for you anymore. Isn't this tiring in the end? Then they say: We want a member of Parliament that is honest, clean-cut, white, pure. Do you realize that we are a reflection of the population? Do you know that we are a reflection of those same people that come and tell us their story? However, we cannot say that. Those things are not in the newspapers. If it is a member of Parliament, it will be in the newspapers; if it is an ordinary citizen, we will not talk about it because it is not interesting. It is not good gossip material! But those are the people who create problems, like Mr. Kealy.

The papers failed to talk about his past, his background. It is not the purest. It is not white as snow. We all do our best. Every one wants to help every one else. But we can go nowhere with blackmail like: "Unless you give me this, I will not do that for you." I can give everything and the moon to my people. I could give them everything they ask for, but they would be the first ones to come and see me to say: "Give us a break. We are overtaxed!" Right they are, but good grief, I have known that for four years now. All I am doing is to avoid taxing them even more. We could give them a golden Christmas tree, but, for the time being they will have to make do with a natural green one. We do not have golden ones yet. I would love to put one in each of their houses. In any case, my constituents, the majority of them, understand that we cannot afford such a luxury.

• (1700)

Mr. Bean does not tell the truth when he says that he has a hard time preventing violence. He was the first one in the gang to try and knock down the front door below the Peace Tower. I saw him on TV. And there was another guy banging on the door. I do not know if he is Bean's right-hand man, with the strange haircut—you saw him on TV—or if he is a federal government employee. In any case, they were all there after the door like a bunch of squirrels after peanut butter. That makes no sense. They profess non-violence, but they are the first ones to bang on the door. That is really a shame!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

ABORIGINAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House the Constitution Act, 1982 should be amended in order to recognize explicitly the right of Canada's aboriginal peoples to self-government, thereby making them partners in Confederation and that this House further urges the governments of Canada, the Provinces and the Territories to acknowledge that self-government requires a viable economic base and calls upon these governments to constitutionally commit themselves to negotiate with the aboriginal peoples an equitable sharing of lands and resources.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion asks the House to entrench in the Constitution the right of aboriginal people to self-government. I would reword that. It asks that we recognize the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government in the Constitution. That is the first thing that it asks.

The second thing it asks is that this House further urges the governments of Canada, the provinces and territories to acknowledge that self-government requires a viable economic base. It goes on to talk about land claims and the need for settling land claims in order to complement aboriginal self-government.

When this motion was scheduled for debate I did not know what sort of constitutional proposals the government would release earlier last week, but now I am quite gratified to tell you, and you probably know it, Mr. Speaker, that the government in its constitutional proposal has accepted the principle that the right of aboriginal peoples to self-government be recognized in the Constitution. There were several provisions in the constitutional proposals of the government that deal with this matter.

The government has said that the proposals as written in its document is not written in stone, that they are subject to consultation and revision, but in any case it has accepted the principle.

Because the government has accepted the principle of the proposal I have in my private member's motion, because this party has agreed for some time to the entrenchment recognizing aboriginal self-government, and so does the New Democratic Party, I was hopeful that before this hour ends the House might agree to this motion since all parties agree to the principles lying behind it and that by doing so this House would give some impetus to the constitutional proposals already put forward by the government.

I think it would be laudatory and helpful if the House of Commons of Canada said as a body that it agreed to the recognition and entrenchment in the Constitution of the right of aboriginal people to self-government. All parties have now said that in principle.

I am hopeful, before this debate ends and when government members rise, that they will leave a few minutes at the end so we could simply accept the motion perhaps unanimously. I do not know if anybody now disagrees with this principle.

I should remind the House that similar principles were accepted and tried in the early 1980s when the government of the day, a Liberal government, agreed to call three federal-provincial conferences to entrench the recognition of aboriginal self-government. Unfortunately the federal government was not able to obtain the agreement of enough provinces to get that matter entrenched in the Constitution. Two of those conferences took place when Mr. Trudeau's government was in power and one of them took place when Mr. Mulroney's government was in power. They all failed to get the seven out of ten provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, so the matter failed.

Now, once again, the Government of Canada has included this in its constitutional proposals, but I would hope that it would have a much greater chance of succeeding this time because a lot of water has gone under the bridge since the early 1980s. It has been about 10 years since those original proposals were made and discussed at a federal-provincial conference. We have had some very sad incidents arising from the fact that we did not recognize the rights of our aboriginal people the way they should have been recognized.

I refer to the incidents which took place at Oka last summer and at Kahnawake on the south shore of Montreal, and there are many other incidents that could be referred to.

I think that the mood today is that there is a greater recognition of the rights of aboriginal peoples. I am hopeful that the proposal that I put forward today and which is included in different words in the government's constitutional proposals will be agreed to and entrenched in the Constitution.

As far as I am concerned all of this started with me personally when I was a member of the special committee on Indian self-government which sat and worked in this country at the very beginning of the 1980s. That committee broke a lot of new ground. It was the first parliamentary committee which included as ad hoc members representatives of the national aboriginal organizations. The Assembly of First Nations appointed a member, Roberta Jamieson, who now holds a high position in the Government of Ontario. There were also representatives from the Native Council of Canada, from the Métis National Council, and from the Native Women's Association of Canada.

These aboriginal representatives appointed by their own organizations sat with our committee, had all the rights and privileges as members of the committee, except that they had no technical voting rights.

• (1710)

They questioned witnesses as members of the committee did. They participated in the discussions leading to the adoption of the report. Mr. Speaker, when the time came to vote on the recommendations of that report dealing with aboriginal self-government, we decided not to adhere to strict technical votes, but to adopt recommendations by consensus which included the consensus developed with the help of those representatives from the aboriginal associations.

That committee, of which I was a member, made very strong recommendations for the recognition of the right to aboriginal self-government in the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, I and others have been promoting this concept for years with, of course, the backing up of the aboriginal associations themselves, which have been first and foremost in this struggle.

Every time the matter is raised, there are members of Parliament or senators—not all—and members of the public and the press, who ask: Well, what does aboriginal self-government mean? Does it mean we are going to have 15 or 20 or 30 separate independent countries within Canada? Are they all going to have the same powers, or different powers?" And so on, and so on.

They have either voted against it or opposed the idea because they said it was not clear enough. Well, let me point this out. Although various aboriginal associations in Canada point out that they have had the right to aboriginal self-government for thousands of years, they want to exercise that right within Canada, within Confederation. I have been at many meetings where their representatives have argued that while some provinces and some groups in Canada are undertaking movements to get out of Canada, they want to be fully included but represented as groups. They want to be part of Confederation, but equally and able to maintain their inherent and historic rights.

We are not talking about, at least for most of the aboriginal groups that I have talked to, of people or associations or First Nations that want to separate totally from Canada and live independently. They want to exercise certain basic powers, often with respect to social policy, economic development, justice, education, health care and other matters that directly touch their people and with which they have been dealing for generations.

In contrast to the concept of the policy of aboriginal self-government, we have the Indian Act, a vestige, I must say, of 19th century imperialism and paternalism. Here we have a very old Act which was passed and which was administered by governments of all stripes at the federal level, and not the NDP, because they have not formed a government, but Conservative and Liberal governments, which in fact was an act which allowed the non-Indian population of Canada, the white population, to run affairs for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for this interruption, but I ask the co-operation of other members because the Chair cannot hear and understand the speech being delivered.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for that intervention. I would hope that the members of the House would give more attention to this important subject which, as I say, is not only discussed very widely with our aboriginal people, but it is also now one of the key proposals of the government's constitutional package.

I was saying that the Indian Act was an act which set up an administration basically of non-Indian people, the so-called white population of Canada, to run the affairs of the Indian people, a clear case of imperialism, of colonialism, of paternalism. It has carried on until 1991.

Now, it is true that for about the last 20 or 30 years there has been a certain devolution. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, of which I was a former minister, has handed over some of those powers, not legally or constitutionally, but administratively, to the bands. So there are many bands that now run their own programs of education, health and social services and so on. They in fact run those matters but their right to do so is not recognized in the Constitution, nor has the Indian Act been basically changed which takes that right away from the federal government to do so.

I think the first thing we have to recognize is that in 1991, as we near the end of the 20th century, the Indian Act is an anomaly. It is totally out of place in a modern world that one group of people should be running the lives of other people. I can account for you the silliest and craziest examples where officials in Ottawa had to approve the widening of a road by two feet on a reserve in Saskatchewan. I mean, how ridiculous. Although passed by a certain band council in Saskatchewan, they had to come all the way to Ottawa for approval. It sat on somebody's desk for months and months before it could be done. One could tell of many, many other silly examples.

In any case, we have to get rid of the Indian Act. We have to continue for the time being transferring programs to the bands as they see fit to take them on, or to tribal councils. In many cases the bands have joined together and formed tribal councils which allow them greater scope because they are bigger, have more resources, more people. They have regional high schools and so on, with respect to these tribal councils.

I also want to mention that certain Indian nations, such as the Sechelt in British Columbia, have already had a special act passed which recognizes their right to self government. I think we should also recognize that now in the Northwest Territories, in the territorial government, the majority of people in the Northwest Territories who are aboriginal people are in control of that government, and that is a good thing as well.

Again, I want to point out that the aboriginal nations of Canada existed in this territory which is now called Canada for thousands of years. I don't know the exact period of time but anthropologists and others say it was for thousands of years. They did that as many nations. There were Cree nations, Mohawk nations, MicMac nations, Montagnais and Blackfoot and so on and so on.

They had their own languages and their own cultures, their own traditions. They had their own laws, their own systems of government, their own economies. When the Europeans came in the 16th and 17th centuries and made contact with these aboriginal nations, in some cases they signed treaties, treaties to govern the relationships between the aboriginal people and themselves. In other cases they didn't sign treaties but they simply pushed them off the land. These people who acted as their friends in many cases, when the Europeans came, were sort of pushed aside after the Europeans, both the English and the French, found their way over here. One could say the same about the Spanish in South America. They simply set them aside and treated them as second-class citizens or not as citizens at all, or not even as human beings in many cases.

The point of the matter is that these aboriginal nations never gave up their right to self government. They never recognized in any treaty that I know of that they were ceding to the British and the French colonial powers the right to govern them. nor did they transfer in most cases their lands. That is the basis of the land claim settlements. In certain treaties there was a recognition of settlement of lands, but in many there was not, and in many parts of Canada there are no treaties whatsoever which deal with these matters.

So, the aboriginal people have retained their right to self government that they always had as nations on this continent. They retain the moral right to those lands that they occupied and now they are saying to us "We want you to recognize those rights in the Constitution". I am in this proposal today saying that we should recognize those rights in the Constitution. I understand that the government is saying the same thing in the constitutional proposals that it put forward a week ago. That is the basis of my argument with respect to the first part of my resolution.

The second part says, as I stated at the beginning of my remarks, that if you are to have self-government you must also have a viable economic basis and consequently, we should commit ourselves in this Parliament to negotiate with aboriginal peoples an equitable sharing of lands and resources, based on the lands and resources that they used and occupied before the Europeans came three or four centuries ago.

Once again, I do not want to take up too much time. As I say, I first put this motion to previous Parliaments years ago, and I have been putting this on the Order Paper year after year. That is why I am gratified to see the movement in the country and the movement among political parties. There seems to be great agreement on these principles today. I would hope that this year will not pass without the entrenchment of aboriginal self-government or the recognition of aboriginal self-government in the Constitution of Canada. I would hope that we would give impetus to that movement for entrenchment by agreeing to this resolution in this House today.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak on this very important matter as Parliamentary Secretary to the Right Hon. Joe Clark, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The question of aboriginal rights, in particular, a right to self-government and how it should be recognized in the Constitution, is not a new one. Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. There have been quite divergent and varied interpretations of the nature and scope of these rights.

This government is serious about constitutional change for aboriginal peoples, including the entrenchment of a justiciable right to self-government. The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, assisted by the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, is devoting much of his time to this important matter.

This summer, at a meeting in Morley, Alberta, Mr. Clark reached agreement with the chiefs of the Assembly of First Nations on what has come to be known as the parallel process for aboriginal constitutional consultations and negotiations. Since then, the minister has met with the leaders of the Native Council of Canada, the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and the Métis National Council who have established similar consultative structures to seek the views of their respective constituencies.

Section 37 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provided for a constitutional conference of first ministers, to which aboriginal representatives would be invited, to identify and define aboriginal rights to be included in the Constitution of Canada.

Two conferences were subsequently held, one in 1983 and another in 1984. By the time of the 1984 conference, the entrenchment of an aboriginal right to self-government had emerged as the primary objective of the aboriginal participants.

For aboriginal peoples, a right to self-government would reflect what is in their view the historical reality, and it would provide a secure foundation upon which a better future could be built—a future that they themselves and their children would shape.

On June 21, 1984, the section 37 process was formally extended through proclamation of the first "made in Canada" amendments under the amending formula set out in the Constitution Act, 1982. Among other things, these amendments provided for two more first ministers' conferences on aboriginal affairs—one before April 17, 1985, and another before April 17, 1987.

[English]

The Prime Minister opened the 1985 First Minister's Conference with the following remarks: "As a Canadian and as Prime Minister, I fully recognize and agree with the emphasis that the aboriginal people place on having their special rights inserted into the highest law of the land and protected from arbitrary legislative action."

Constitutional protection is an over-riding objective because it is the constitutional manifestation of a relationship and unbreakable social contract between aboriginal people and their governments. An unprecedented level of consensus was reached at the 1985 conference.

At one point, agreement appeared to be very close on a federal draft proposal modified by Saskatchewan which became known as the "contingent right approach".

Seven provinces appeared to be ready to support this proposal if the aboriginal association at the table agreed. The Assembly of First Nations and the Inuit Committee on National Issues however felt that they could not support the Saskatchewan proposal.

After that conference, the federal government worked hard to re-establish a positive climate for the discussion and negotiations. It stated that despite the failure to achieve consensus on the self-government amendment, it would proceed with negotiations on practical self-government initiatives within the existing constitutional framework.

It was hoped that the practical examples of self-government developed through these negotiations would help to build consensus in the constitutional forum.

Some provinces had been hesitant to agree to the entrenchment of a right to self-government without first knowing more about what it would involve. Considerable discussion took place between the 1985 First Ministers' Conference and the 1987 conference.

Five multilateral meetings were held at the ministerial level. Seven were held at the official's level and bilateral discussions continued throughout this period.

[Translation]

The draft amendment that the federal government put forward at the 1987 First Ministers' Conference was a progressive proposal. It would have provided explicit recognition of a free-standing right of aboriginal peoples to self-government. The jurisdiction, legislative powers, proprietary rights, and other powers, rights and privileges of bodies or institutions exercising the right to self-government were to be defined through agreements.

This proposal would also have entrenched a commitment by the Government of Canada and provincial governments to negotiate agreements relating to self-government. Such negotiations could relate to any matter respecting self-government, including, where appropriate, jurisdiction, powers, land, resources, funding and preservation and enhancement of native languages and cultures.

The 1987 federal proposal would have provided for the self-government rights set out in agreements to be deemed treaty rights for the purpose of section 35 of the Constitution, where legislatures approved. In other words, these rights would have received constitutional protection.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this proposal, or any other on the table at that time, did not secure sufficient support among provinces and aboriginal leaders to proceed with a constitutional amendment. With that conference, the formal, multilateral aboriginal constitutional negotiations provided for in section 37 of the Constitution ended.

After the 1987 conference, the federal government maintained its interest in aboriginal self-government. It continued to pursue self-government negotiations within current constitutional arrangements. Ministers also met many times with aboriginal leaders to discuss what prospects there might be for further aboriginal constitutional discussions in the future.

The companion constitutional resolution to the Meech Lake Accord would have reinstated an entrenched process of first ministers' conferences on matters of interest to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Had the Meech Lake Accord been ratified by all provinces, the first such conference would have taken place this year.

The government acknowledged that there was an unfinished agenda with respect to aboriginal constitutional reform. Today, Mr. Speaker, we are in a period wherein we face serious challenges as a nation.

We are being called to work toward a Canada that better reflects who we are as a nation, and what we aspire to be. Consideration of Canada's future must include a review of the fundamental place and role of aboriginal peoples. As the Prime Minister stated in his address to the First Nations Congress on April 23, 1991 in Victoria, the views of aboriginal leaders, communities and individuals from across Canada will be fully considered as the government proceeds towards building a stronger Canada. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, it is the wish of the majority of Canadians, aboriginal and non-aboriginal, that this issue be resolved now.

Mr. Speaker, the proposals tabled in this House by the Prime Minister on September 24 demonstrate the commitment of this government to follow through on the extensive work which has recently been done.

The first step, of course, is to assure aboriginal peoples of participation in the current round of constitutional discussions.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for introducing this motion at a very appropriate time.

I regret that the member who just spoke did not indicate that the government would be supporting this motion. I think it would have been helpful because it is basically support for a principle that is already included in the government's constitutional proposals. I believe it would have been helpful for the government and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs to go out to the people of Canada with the endorsement of Parliament against this resolution, to support the constitutional proposals that have been made so that he would have Parliament's sanction for his negotiations with aboriginal people and with provinces and other interests in this country who would like to see some improvement in the relationship between Canada and its aboriginal people.

I would like to congratulate the member who presented the resolution. The key word in the resolution is the recognition of aboriginal rights to self-government. In the view of many constitutional experts aboriginal people have an inherent right, not a right to be granted by this Parliament or by this government, not a right to be delegated by this Parliament or this government to aboriginal people, but they have an inherent right. It is a right that inheres in the fact that they are the aboriginal nations who preceded European contact on this continent.

By the time Europeans arrived here they had already established organized governments based on family, tribal and clan structures. They had the power to make and enforce laws against their own people and to test those laws by whatever methods of adjudicating they had.

In the same way, like any other sovereign nation, they had the right to organize economies and to trade and become involved in trade beyond their own nations. They had the right to prosecute wars and to treat for peace. They did those things in very much the same way that other sovereign nations engage in making peace through the treaty-making system.

Of course, the treaty-making system is a system that is followed to obtain agreements between two sovereign nations. You do not sign a treaty with a group that is internal to this country. You sign a treaty with a nation that has recognized sovereign status.

It is interesting that when the first Europeans came into contact with aboriginal nations in North America, they generally approached them by signing treaties of peace which regularized the form of contact and relationship between the two nations involved.

Unfortunately, as time passed on the North American continent and as the European settlers and settlers from outside North American began to overrun the continent in terms of population, the treaties were forgotten. The aboriginal people were shifted toward the margins of society and became like any other colonized people around the world. They lost their right to be recognized as sovereign countries or, I should say, their right was ignored by the European groups that overran their societies. Those aboriginal people never ever gave up their sense of having that sovereign right and of being independent nations, having the right to enter into treaties with the European societies that overran and established their own governments in the continent of North America.

In fact, after those treaties began to be ignored by the Canadian government, we passed a racially specific Indian Act in order to designate who Indians were and who had a right to be Indians. This gave the federal government the virtual power of life or death over aboriginal people. We entered into a very shameful era of history in terms of the relationship between our nation and aboriginal nations on this continent.

I do not have to go through the recitation of events that happened in terms of the Canadian government's intent to destroy aboriginal culture either through physical extermination or through the cultural extermination of those people. The residential school system is one way where children were taken away from their parents and moved to residential schools where their parents could no longer have an influence on them. Those residential schools attempted, by a process of physical abuse and humiliation, to try to drive the culture out of those children so that they would no longer be Indian children.

When that aboriginal residential school system broke down back in the 1960s, the provincial governments, which had the right to exert child welfare legislation under the Indian Act on Indian reserves, then began to seize aboriginal children from their parents. They felt that only white middle-class parents had the proper standards and the proper norms to bring up aboriginal children in our society.

As a result of those two systems, tremendous damage was done to Indian children. Tremendous damage was done to Indian families. Tremendous damage was done to the self-esteem of aboriginal people and as a result, many of their communities have suffered virtual collapse.

Today another situation is occurring. As my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce indicated, aboriginal people are now beginning to take over control of their own education systems. As a result, those systems are now succeeding. Aboriginal people have now begun to take over their own child welfare systems and as a result those systems are now succeeding.

Aboriginal people have begun to take over control of their own communities and have begun to enforce the law in their own communities and to establish standards of social behaviour in their own communities. As a result, they are beginning to beat the problem of substance abuse, violence and those kinds of things that have affected many aboriginal communities over the years as a result of the impact of our residential school system and the imposition of our child welfare system on aboriginal communities.

So we have two things working here. We have noted that aboriginal people have been extremely successful governing themselves. They can be successful in education, successful in child welfare, successful in running their own communities, successful in economic development, successful in post-secondary education when we do not try to look over their shoulder and tell them how to do it and try to set our model for how they should govern themselves.

But I think the issue here, Mr. Speaker, is the issue of the right to self-government. This is a right that we have to recognize. It is not a right that we can delegate. It is not a right that we can give to people. It is a right that they have had on this continent since time immemorial and was never taken away from them by conquest or by any legal transaction.

I support this motion. I congratulate the member for bringing it forward and I hope that the government will acknowledge that it goes along with the proposals that it has made in the constitutional proposals that came down last week. I hope that this Parliament can unanimously support this resolution so that the government will have our sanction to go out and negotiate with aboriginal people and with the other players in the constitutional debate. We can then achieve something that all Canadians can be proud of in terms of the way that we relate to aboriginal people on this continent.

In winding up I just want to quote the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs: "The failure to recognize the rights of aboriginal people to self-government weakens our whole country. Recognizing that right will make our country stronger". Let us get together in this Parliament to support the statement made by the minister responsible for the Constitution, make our country stronger, and improve our reputation around the world by supporting this motion.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to report on this government's record on aboriginal economic development is really quite timely given the recent constitutional proposals which focus largely on developing a new partnership for prosperity.

Canada has much to gain from improved aboriginal economic activity, not just in better aboriginal social conditions, but in realizing our national goal of partnership for prosperity.

A fully participating aboriginal labour force would produce a dramatic and positive effect on Canada's fiscal position as well as bringing about employment and wage parity between aboriginal and other Canadian workers, a goal which I am sure everyone in this House would support.

Economic self-reliance is an integral part of the foundation for aboriginal self-government. Economic self-reliance and self-government are two sides of the same coin. One cannot work without the other. That is why this government has strengthened the many programs and strategies to help develop strong and diversified economies in aboriginal communities and marketable skills among our aboriginal workers.

We have done this in partnership with aboriginal people by ensuring that they have the tools and decision-making powers over federal economic programs to manage and develop their own economies in accordance with the wishes of their communities.

First and foremost among our success stories is the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, CAEDS. This innovative program was launched just over two years ago and in this short time significant gains have been made: one, with aboriginal businesses and community leaders, a strong aboriginal controlled development capacity has been put in place through community based aboriginal capital corporations; two, more than 780 new aboriginal businesses have been launched, including gas stations, grocery stores, motels, wild rice processing plants, shopping plazas, and an airline; three, 24,000 aboriginal people have participated in federally funded skills training programs; four, significant agreements have been reached with provinces on forestry resource access and with the private sector on employment and contracting through CAEDS assisted resource access negotiations.

My colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, will shortly be tabling a full report to this House on these achievements which are being led by three departments, Indian Affairs and Northern Development; Industry, Science and Technology, Canada; and the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission.

Indian Affairs has the lead in the community economic development and access to the resource component of CAEDS. In addition as part of its statutory responsibilities the department has prepared an inventory of available mineral resources on reserve lands to assist Indian bands in determining the feasibility of further exploration.

Similarly, Indian Oil and Gas Canada was created to optimize the royalty benefits from oil and gas resources on reserves.

It is continuing to work and to improve the services it provides to the Indian bands to help improve the reserves of oil and gas.

Through the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, that department plays the lead in the business development role by providing contributions to businesses for start-up and expansion, and by ensuring $160 million capital base is available to aboriginal capital corporations to provide a source of debt equity to aboriginal businesses.

These native-run loan companies already provide credit and related services to nearly 50 per cent of aboriginal communities. In 1990-91 Employment and Immigration spent more than $139 million as part of its Pathways to Success program to provide training and services to approximately 24,000 aboriginal clients, half of whom have turned that training into jobs.

This year target spending has increased to $200 million. With federal assistance, there are currently more than 92,000 aboriginal people with post-secondary education qualifications and more are coming onstream all the time.

All of these endeavours are providing aboriginal individuals and communities with the means to become economically self-reliant. This is being done by aboriginal people taking control of their own economic development at the grass roots level.

This bottom-up approach through CAEDS empowers aboriginal communities to build the expertise, the organization and manpower needed to solve their own problems. The federal government is also embarking on an aboriginal work force participation initiative to open up more labour market opportunities to what is rapidly becoming a highly skilled, well educated aboriginal work force.

Under this initiative, federal departments will improve the retention and the promotion of native people within the federal Public Service. It will also strengthen entry level programs for aboriginal post-secondary graduates, improve contacts with aboriginal organizations to identify prospective job applicants, and use summer training courses and work experience more extensively with aboriginal students to introduce them into the Public Service.

It has to be clear to my hon. colleague that not only are we delivering on the promises we made one year ago with this program when the Prime Minister did unveil the native agenda, but with our new Partnership for Prosperity initiative, the government is also continuing to take action and will produce even better results to improve the socioeconomic conditions of native people.

Our Partnership for Prosperity urges all levels of government and the private sector to do their part to ensure greater economic harmony with our aboriginal people, and we all can share in that.

We are enjoying co-operation from the government of the Northwest Territories. Last summer my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, signed a $38.5 million economic development co-operation agreement with the territorial Minister of Economic Development and Tourism.

The accord provides funding for initiatives in the areas of cultural industries, community-sponsored development, minerals, agriculture, wildlife harvesting and fisheries. I know this initiative will work toward achieving a self-supporting, economically stable environment for our northern colleagues.

The key to success of all these ventures is that they are based on the advice given by aboriginal people. We consult with the aboriginal people and we will listen. We agree with them on how we can work together and follow their lead.

More skilled and more educated workers are coming onstream. Hundreds of new businesses and hundreds of new business ventures have been launched.

Aboriginal administrators are assuming greater control over their social and economic development in their communities. Here is the proof that partnerships result in real progress. This breakthrough has come about because our government is determined to develop a program. We want to take our policies and through devolution recognize that community leaders who are well versed in the needs and goals of their own members can best design and best deliver programs for their own people in their own communities.

At last count more than 72 per cent of all DIAND program dollars was being administered by Indians and Inuits through various funding arrangements. These agreements give communities the flexibility they need to apply those funds as they see fit to the priorities that they determine and their membership determines.

In the near future, Indian nations will have greater legal authority to assume authority over even more than their own affairs. Working groups of chiefs are currently developing proposals for legislative alternatives to the Indian Act which will deal with the areas of Indian moneys and taxation among other things.

The new powers accorded under this legislation will allow bands to determine their own economic destiny, and so they should.

Bill C-115 was the first Indian-led change to the Indian Act. It clearly established the authority of band councils to tax all interests in reserve lands. The new powers provided under this legislation allow bands to establish a tax base and generate revenues which can be used in pursuit of their own community development.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is working with Indian taxation advisory boards. He is working to effect the results so that growing numbers of bands, such as the Westbank, Kamloops and the Musqueam Indian bands of British Columbia, will all have formal powers.

I must say that my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has put forth a fine motion and it is very timely. I think much more needs to be done. We look forward to the discussions on the proposals over the next few months. The aboriginal people can certainly count on our support.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to thank the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for introducing this motion tonight. It is of utmost importance because aboriginals were the first citizens, or should I say the first inhabitants, of this country. They have been here for thousands and thousands of years. They have never been recognized as such. They also have never been recognized as a founding nation. Instead they were enticed into signing treaties which created ghettos, which we prefer to call reserves.

Aboriginals never gave up their rights to self-govern. This is why the principle today has reached its maturity, but it could not be accomplished unless economic aid comes with it. One must remember that in isolated communities in particular unemployment hovers around 90 per cent. Chances for investment are not really good as most of those First Nations communities are remote and isolated. Training programs could be of some help if some permanent jobs would follow afterward.

It is a great time also because of the prejudice and the racism that exist in our justice system for First Nations communities to administer their own. One thinks readily about the Navajo nation in southwestern United States which does have its own justice system and which works extremely well according to its own values.

Turning to the area of health, it is a shame that upon visiting reserve after reserve the sewer and water systems are so deficient that one would think one was in a Third World country. It is a bloody shame that Canadians do not put up the necessary funds, that this government would not put up the necessary funds to modernize the sewer and water systems in first community nations.

As paradoxical as it may sound, teachers' residences and hospital are connected to the sewer systems but not the residences of the natives. It is not unusual to see on a reserve two or three miles of sewer and water lines all around the village, but no one is connected to it except hospitals and teachers' residences.

In the area of education, the number of dropouts is unacceptable as education is the base for future self-government. The future chiefs need to be educated. They need to be educated in their own culture in their own communities, because the culture shock they face when they are studying in "white high schools" is incredible. This is why the number of dropouts is increasing dramatically, which leads to other social programs of course.

The Indian Act needs a motor job, a total overhaul: that is motor and chassis and everything. It is high time that modern rules and regulations and laws apply to the first inhabitants of our country. This includes the Prime Minister's new proposal where he suggests that Indian self-government should come within 10 years. That is far too much time. All those years of begging and pleading with successive governments for improvements are finished. It is quite understandable that aboriginal peoples all across Canada are crying for help, and it is totally justified if you see some of those reserves.

Therefore, by accepting this motion, the Government of Canada would send out a signal that the first nations are accepted as a full-fledged partner of this Confederation.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I would just like to add a few comments to what has already been said here today, but particularly to commend the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for bringing this motion forward. I think it is a very sensitive and very critical issue at the present time. I think it is something that we as citizens of Canada have recognized. We respect the member's particular views as he has outlined them in this particular motion.

I think it is also recognizable that the government in its proposal has brought these same things forward, and I think that is very important. It is this government that has been dedicated and made a strong effort to resolve as many of these problems as can be resolved in as quick a time as possible. I do not think there is any denying that aboriginal peoples need to have their rights and their reality reflected in the Constitution of this country. No other group of Canadians has had to fight to defend rights that are as intrinsic as their heritage.

One of the most basic principles of democracy, the right and responsibility to control one's affairs, has eluded native people. It is wrong. It is unjust and frankly we must change it.

Common sense dictates that aboriginal people know best how to help themselves. That is the direction we are going to have to go in the future. The powerlessness they feel now leads to their helplessness, and that is not constructive for anyone.

• (1800)

There have been a number of initiatives brought forward by this government. I think it is very important that they have been outlined by different speakers here today. Because I do not have much time left, I would just like to comment on a couple of these things.

In consideration of consultations with regard to the constitutional proposal presently before the Canadian public, it ensures that aboriginal people will participate in the current constitutional deliberations. In fact, as an example, the band administrator in my riding from the Chippewas of Georgina, Mr. William McCue is sitting on my local constituency group studying the constitutional proposals. He is sitting there as a Canadian, as a person who wants to build a better place and a better country. I am very proud of that fact, and I know Bill is very proud of being involved in that process. That is why we want to continue with that kind of co-operative type of development.

There are many examples that the federal government has taken. The approach is very different and we recognize that, but the very real needs of aboriginal people in every corner of this country must be addressed on an individual basis. Each claim settlement is unique. Each must reflect the needs and the aspirations of the unique community that it serves.

It cannot just try to use a blanket statement. That has been tried too often in the past and is not going to work in the future. This government is committed to negotiating settlements that will ensure that land and resources are managed in an orderly manner with the support of all Canada in a way that strengthens the entire nation.

This is what we can and must do. It is essential to complete the circle of Confederation so that all Canadians, whether they be native or non-native, can call this Canadian House their home.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that private members' hour has come to an end, but I think you will find a disposition to deal with two other items that are on the Order Paper under the rubric of Private Members' Business. First, Bill S-3, standing in the name of the hon. member for York Centre, could be dropped to the bottom of the list of precedents by unanimous consent. I would suggest that it remain there until the hon. member is here to proceed with the bill, in which case it will be proceeded with through all stages on the day without taking up an entire private members' hour.

I believe you will also find is unanimous consent in the House now for the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt to proceed with Bill S-4 through all stages.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we should first finish Private Members' Business and the motion of Mr. Allmand, and I will then get back to the point of order.

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

I will now recognize the hon. member for Laval-Est, on a point of order.

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, perhaps the clerks have already brought this to your attention, but I was finishing my speech and I had four minutes left. I would appreciate having those four minutes to finish my speech. I was told I could do so at 6 p.m., and the clerks confirmed this. I don't know whether you were told about this, but I still have four minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will certainly have an opportunity to finish his speech. According to the Chair, he still has five minutes, plus a ten-minute period for questions and comments following his speech. The House is now being asked for unanimous consent to expedite a private bill received from the Senate, which means that all stages of the bill could be passed in a few minutes, provided there is unanimous consent. After that, the hon. member will be able to continue his speech.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, first, I do not know what the devil the bill is. I am prepared to go along with it, as long as it is not going to take time away from the normal debate that would have taken place if this had not come in between. That is what I do not know.

I have been round here long enough not to assume a thing. You may say it is two or three minutes and it may be three or four minutes and all of a sudden it gets to be fifteen or twenty minutes. Already I have taken over half a minute. Therefore I am going to sit down.

On that basis I will agree to give consent. I was not proper this afternoon on a point of order when I said: "Forget the Scots". I meant to say: remember the Scots who are independent, remember the Irish who are independent, but make sure you remember the Independents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It has been asked that Bill S-3 be dropped to the bottom of the list and be presented when the hon. member for York Centre who is not here today returns. We can deal with it after that.

Bill S-4 is standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. This is the one for which I was asking if there was unanimous consent.

Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member's suggestion and to refer the bill to Committee of the Whole?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

UNIVERSITY OF EMMANUEL COLLEGE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved that Bill S-4, an act to amend the act of incorporation of the University of Emmanuel College, be read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Hovdebo moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Hovdebo thereupon moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill is kind of a phoenix bill. It was passed by the Senate in the last session as Bill S-20 but died on the Order Paper in this House. It was passed again by the Senate and has been brought forward at this time. It is a very technical bill, very much of a housekeeping bill.

• (1810)

Emmanuel College was established in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan back in 1879 and chartered by the Parliament of Canada, 1883. The charter has been updated a couple of times since. The senate of the University of Emannuel College wants a further update of it and that is what this bill is about.

It is very interesting that the original charter of Emmanuel College was the University of Saskatchewan, but in 1909 when the University of Saskatchewan was established by the province it forfeited that name and became Emmanuel College. It is the college established by the Anglican Church of Rupertsland.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–29, an Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and to amend another Act in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate on the motion for third reading of Bill C–29. The hon. member for Laval–Est.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, this will be the conclusion of the speech I started earlier today.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I would like to say that, as I said earlier on in my speech, Mr. Bean was a very good administrator. He did what he had to do. As reported in the Toronto Star, he did something he had to do, but it wasn't easy. It meant cutting 20 positions, cutting $1.8 million in his budget, and so forth. All this is good management, but he was unable to save those 20 jobs.

In fact, there is a problem with union democracy, if one can use that term. People come and tell me they want to negotiate. That is all they want. They say they want to negotiate, but they don't know Mr. Bean walked away from the bargaining table. Union members don't seem to be aware of this. We have a problem here. They want to bargain, and they wonder why we aren't bargaining. They say it's all the government's fault. As I said earlier, it is always the government's fault, whatever happens.

If the Olympic stadium in Montreal is falling to pieces, it's Brian Mulroney's fault. That is the easy way out. I say Mr. Bean is not keeping his members informed. I say that Mr. Bean may be a good administrator, but he is not the right person to keep his people informed. People simply don't know what is going on. Maybe Mr. Bean wants us to do in the public service what he did when he cut positions at union headquarters. For all I know, that may be what he wants. If it is, well, 6,000 jobs will be lost, something we as a government cannot tolerate.

Our listeners must realize that Mr. Bean left the bargaining table without responding to our offer. He decided to give his union's response through the media, by going on strike. His members are not getting the whole story. I would like to say to our listeners that the wage freeze also applies to members of Parliament, ministers, the Prime Minister, Deputy Ministers, and senior management in the Public Service. I am sure a lot of people will be glad when they realize the salaries of politicians have been frozen as well.

Madam Speaker, in concluding, it is really too bad when 200 people barge into my office uninvited and take over my office and my staff. I have two employees who do more than is humanly possible. So these people, whose manners leave something to be desired, think they have every right to take over my office. They are on strike, so they can do anything they like. Well, I repeat, I will never give in to intimidation. I will never give in to blackmail or lies, because these are the people who asked me to be strong and honest and work very hard for their sake.

It is not always easy to say yes, and I think that the greatest gift I can give my people is honesty. And I am sorry to see, Madam Speaker, that those of my constituents who think that we are to blame were not informed of the facts by Mr. Bean. I think I have drawn an accurate picture and one as complete as possible. I hope that the people will believe that what I said is the truth and that they will shake that bloody myth of strikes being caused by our giving $80,000 in bonuses. We hear it every day. It is a myth that is being created. That is not the problem. They had bonuses before and there will always be bonuses. Bonuses are not a bad thing, but we have to freeze them. And they will be frozen because there are people earning $300,000 or $400,000— How much does the chairman of Petro–Canada make again? Five or six hundred thousand a year? Yet, he gets an $800 bonus every time he chairs the board. What do you expect! I agree with my colleague that it is too much, but in the private sector, the president of Imperial Oil earns that much and that is the way things go, that's competition. Maybe he too is getting too much!

So, here is what I tell my colleagues, my people and my constituents: we must look at both sides and avoid making the same mistake as the president of the union, Mr. Bean, i.e. cutting jobs to give a 3 per cent raise instead of zero per cent. We must be honest. These things must be said. There is nothing better than dialogue with both sides telling the truth. I was almost intimidated into telling lies today. But I will never give in to blackmail. I will never accept to change my tune just to win a vote.

I would have preferred to do without emergency legislation. I was proud, last week that we had come to an agreement. I even put out a release. It will be remembered. Verba volant, scripta manent, as the proverb goes. Unfortunately, he quickly left the table. We cannot be blamed for that! I told our guys, our employees: "You deserve better, you are working people and you do an excellent job in members' offices. We need you. But the truth of the matter is that we are all in the same boat. There is a zero per cent increase across the board." Our financial needs are increasing. I gave the example of my son at University and others as well.

In closing, Madam Speaker, it is a fact that, whether you are a member of Parliament or a civil servant, if our salaries are frozen, our financial burden gets heavier. Children's education, transportation, fuel, everything costs more. But it might all be for the best, and I tell my people: "Bear with us. You will see that we are doing this not for the short term but for the long term."

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Laval East.

Maybe the constituents of Laval East do not have the full story. I want to tell the member for Laval East that Canadians are not stupid, that Canadians are well informed. They know that this government, with its high interest rates, high dollar policies and 33 new tax increases since September 1984, is the source of inflationary pressures. They know that taking purchasing power away from consumers will only deepen and prolong the recession. They know that the Tory government intends to impose a freeze on federal Public Service wage increases for 1991–92 and an annual 3 per cent limit on federal Public Service wage increases over the next two years. They know the Tory government is encouraging provincial and municipal governments to impose similar wage controls. They know that wage controls in the public sector inevitably limit wage settlements for all Canadian workers. They know that there is no flexibility when a limit on wage increases is imposed on everyone, whether a clerk, a deputy minister or a president of a Crown corporation.

They know in Laval East and everywhere else in this country that the Conservative federal government is prepared to take away the collective bargaining rights of workers across this country, threaten them with job losses and contracting out, interfere with conciliation and arbitration, and legislate employees back to work. They know this government is being unfair.

I want to ask the member for Laval East: Does he think Canadians know these facts?

• (1820)

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, I do not know how to explain to this member more than the others. If they were informed, how come I asked my people to send to me in writing what they would like to have from us?

They said: "We would like to negotiate as normal human beings". I said: "Good, see Mr. Bean but you have a problem. Mr. Bean did not inform you that he quit the table". I do not think they were informed of everything.

When they got the information, because of the fact that they listened a lot to the opposition, they do not get it exactly or the phrase is cut before the end. That is what embarrasses me. I try to be honest and tell them the truth. I have nothing to lose by telling the truth. This is what I want to tell my hon. friend. We did not take away anything. The provinces got the freeze by legislation. He would not negotiate. We are not so bad. We negotiate.

Look what happened in New Brunswick. They promised an increase and after the election they pushed the legislation through and that was it. That is nice.

Canadians are not dumb, but they are not well informed. It depends on who gives them the information. As far as I am concerned on this side, I will give them the right time and I will not change my mind just to win a vote.

This is what is in my mind and heart. I hope people will understand that on election day. If they do not, they will regret that.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I too would like to ask a question of the member for Laval East with regard to his speech.

He seems to have identified Mr. Daryl Bean as being the problem. I want to tell the member for Laval East, as a member of Parliament from British Columbia, that British Columbians know how trade unions operate and how certification of a trade union is developed and carried through.

I want to say to the Conservative members from British Columbia that my constituents from my riding and from British Columbia will recognize that there is a very important point being left out by this government.

First of all, they are a recognized, certified union, that has the right to bargain free and collectively with this government. This government has authorized that. They have a legal strike situation on their hands and they are negotiating a package. However, when negotiations break down, people in my part of the country know that mediation is made available. The situation is taken out of the hands of the two combatants, the government and PSAC, and an independent mediator sits and tries to hear both sides.

This government denies that. It denies that mediation approach that takes it out of the hands of the adversaries, hears both sides of the problem and tries to deal with it. No, the government has decided not to allow that to happen. In other words, it is dictatorial.

For the first time in the history of the House of Commons back to work legislation is going to be invoked on workers without an independent mediation officer hearing what the two sides of these issues are.

I want to ask the member for Laval East if he thinks that is going to enhance labour relations between public servants and the Government of Canada. Mediation is a very important aspect of negotiations. This may be the first time in history that we will ever see government bring in back to work legislation without even an arbitrator at the end to look at it and bring in binding arbitration.

As a trade unionist I saw that process take place when the Liberals were in power. At least that process was followed. This is the first time in history that we have ever seen dictatorial policies of a government. When negotiations break down on either side, if either one is to blame, there is an independent mediator that should be looking at the issue.

I ask the member why we are not following that procedure before we bring about dictatorial policies of the government.

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, I would like to answer immediately, no.

I will not enforce a relation with my people because of something other than the reality, that we do not want to negotiate.

I will ask the member. He can always answer me later. Why did Mr. Bean quit the table? Why did he not take the opportunity, which I thought was gold, last week? Why did Mr. Bean cut 20 people in his staff and give 3 per cent? Why did he not keep the 20 people and keep the zero?

An hon. member: Maybe he is a good administrator.

Mr. Della Noce: Maybe he is a very good administrator. I agree with the member, but he is a very bad communicator. Why does he not say the truth to the people? Why is he not respecting the deal that he signed in the minister's office. The minister is my neighbour next door to me. I saw him going down and saying: "Uncle Minister, we have to do something". We gave him the deal. He spoiled the deal. He ran from the table, not us.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I have listened and I saw him upstairs on television. One of the reasons I came down to the House is because the member for Laval East was his usual very interesting and dynamic personality on TV and I wanted to see him in the flesh.

I would like the hon. member to answer the earlier question without getting back to the table. You know you have got two combatants. My friend has had experience, as he said earlier, the 10 and 20 years he has been in business. That is the whole reason we have conciliation, mediation, procedures, laws, et cetera, admitting that both sides are wrong and/or right and that all the things that were done should have been undone and all the things undone should have been done. The public is fed up to the teeth. No doubt by leaving the table and going back to the picket lines and all the troubles there have not helped the unions or the Public Service or anybody.

I would not like the hon. member for Laval East to get into all the pluses and minuses of who is right and who is wrong. However, what is wrong with the mediation procedures that are there and all the laws of Canada, both provincial and federal?

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member. He knows what I feel and he knows that I always try to stand up for my people. He made a deal with someone and he cannot even respect his own deal, a golden deal which he signed and was happy with. He even called the minister uncle, uncle Tom or uncle Gilles given the opportunity. He did not respect it. Now they want to negotiate it. What do they want next?

It scares me to deal with people who have no respect and do not tell the truth to their members. That is the bad feeling I had today when I saw 200 people breaking into my office. I feel sorry for these people because I like these people. They have nice jobs and they are doing a good job.

Even if the people think that all public servants are lazy, we have the cream of the crop in Laval. We have the best people. Some of them give me 110 per cent of what they can do. When some quit we see the difference immediately. Some quit and we see a difference; we cannot get our dossier through. We give our word when we make a deal and they do not respect it. They want a mediator or an outside man. We know what we have in our pocket. We do not need an outside man to tell us what to do. We have nothing left. It is empty. There is no more, finished, that is all.

Now the outside man will tell us: "Be a nice guy". We have been nice guys. We tried to give all the other things. We went in the back pocket, in the little pocket, in the inside pocket and came up with $500 for the people who make less than $27,000. It is not a big salary and $500 is a slap in the face, but I know in my area without a job they would take two slaps in the face for $500 each. They would take it on both chins.

This is not the deal that we are going to put on the table for our people for them to tell us that they need a negotiator. Then what will they need? He does not want violence or intimidation. Block the bridge, do not let people into work. I have people in my area who want to work. Do you know what they said: "If you go to work, my friend, we will remember your name. We will write it on the wall".

• (1830)

Is that what we want? I do not like violence. I like negotiation. I like the guy who respects his name on the piece of paper. Somebody says: "It is all Mr. Bean's fault". He signed the paper. He was here knocking on the door at eleven o'clock in the morning instead of being at the table to negotiate. Now he wants a mediator. What is he going to ask for next?

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the period for questions and comments has now expired.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to stand in this House today and address the bill before us, Bill C-29.

My colleague from Laval East has just spoken with a great deal of passion and he has accentuated the element of truth in this debate. I just want to remind him of the truth.

[Translation]

Truth is open to interpretation.

[English]

I have every intention to be as truthful as I can be. I ask Canadians who are watching us to decide which of the two sets of truths they feel is the more reliable one. I say this positively, certainly not with any kind of malice in my heart.

There is a pattern here that I think has to be noticed. This government has had a lot of difficulty in managing a number of programs in Canada since it came to power in 1984. It has botched up a lot of things. I do not say that unkindly. Governments do that.

If one looks for example at the F–18 contract which was awarded to a province other than Manitoba, one has to ask what kind of truth there was there. Did truth prevail?

When you look at the closing of the bases and you look at whether those bases were situated in constituencies that had certain members as opposed to others, you have to wonder what kinds of truth prevailed.

When you look at the privatization of Air Canada, you have to ask whether those 3,000 people who are without jobs are better off. Look at VIA Rail; roughly another 3,000 gone. They have no work. What about CN? About 25 per cent less employment since this government has come into power. Ask the workers what they think about that. Look at the CBC cuts. I guess that was really positive as well, was it? Ask Canadians what they think about those CBC cuts.

[Translation]

Ask the people in my community, ask francophones outside Quebec what they think about it. Come and talk to them, and you will see the kind of reception you will get!

[English]

There are a couple of questions here that I think are extremely important, one of which is the whole notion of legality of a strike. This is a legal strike. There are a lot of people out there who are trying to suggest that it is other than legal. This is a legal strike, but it raises certain important questions. Should the Public Service be allowed to strike? Perhaps that is the question that we ought to be debating. Under what circumstances should it be allowed to strike, or should it not be allowed to strike?

It raises another important question. My hon. colleague referred to it before. What are the appropriate strike activities when a union is in a strike position?

[Translation]

I do not condone acts of violence, and I believe I am not alone. I don't like the kind of intimidation that is going on when some workers are told: If you go to work, we will tell everyone. I hate this attitude, and I will do everything I can to stop it. That is a promise. People have called to tell me how upset they were because of the kind of behaviour I just mentioned, and I think this is really too bad.

[English]

All of this raises perhaps the ultimate question. Government is using its power to override a law which contains a fundamental right. The question has to be: Who's next? There is danger obviously if you represent a cause that is not particularly popular politically. We all know that the Public Service, because it is not well known, because people do not understand it and because there are all kinds of myths that exist that are untruths, is a target that is not always a popular one.

The government can do as it pleases more or less, and it has taken advantage of the situation. As parliamentarians we have to ask the basic fundamental question: If it does it to this union, if it does it to collective bargaining, will it do it to someone else, to some other group on some other law next, some right that you and I and other Canadians have? That frightens me.

[Translation]

Frankly, I wonder whether other groups and individuals and, in fact, rights we all have as Canadians might be affected the same way.

[English]

Let us talk about this notion of fat cats. There is no doubt about it that there are some excellent salaries out there within the Public Service.

[Translation]

You really have to take a long, hard look at this question. Look at the facts! There are a lot of people who are not that well paid. Suppose we look at the various pay categories.

[English]

It is rather interesting to note that there are roughly 250 people who earn between $20,000 and $24,999. There are another almost 65,000 people who earn between $25,000 and $29,999. According to my figures, and I believe that they are the most up to date figures available, almost 18,000 earn between $30,000 and $34,999.

Already I have mentioned roughly very close to one–half of the people who are within the Public Service. It is very close to one–half of those people.

Think of this. You are living perhaps in Ottawa or in another major city, and let us remember that in Ottawa and Hull we have the majority of public servants. How would you as a father or a mother with a family be able to make a living if you are earning between $20,000 and $25,000 or between $25,000 and $30,000 in this area? You might have a better chance at it if you were between $30,000 and $35,000, but you would not be labelled a fat cat.

The other question that we have to ask is: Why this strike at this time? My hon. colleague was up on his feet with a great deal of passion and emotion. I believe that he said what he truly felt in his heart. He said: "Our pockets are empty".

I will address that very shortly. Why in the world did the government appoint a mediator in the postal strike when it had that option available here? Why le double standard? Why treat one group one way and another group another way?

I believe that this government wants this strike, that it believes that the public is on its side. What options did it have?

[Translation]

They had several. I asked the Library of Parliament to prepare a study so I could look at the options that were available to the government.

[English]

We talked of mediation. There is no need to define it. I think most people know what it is all about. We talked of conciliation, a very similar process in which there is a third party brought in. We can talk of fact finding: someone comes in, finds out the facts and lays them out.

We can talk about interest arbitration, another method of getting third party input but where the conclusions or the recommendations are binding. We can talk about final offer selection and mediation arbitration.

This study also indicates what kind of success this has had in the past. The government had several options available to it. It chose mediation for the postal strike, but it did not choose it in this particular case. Why, why, why?

Let me share with you what a prominent journalist, Jeffrey Simpson, said in The Globe and Mail on September 17: "Offering public servants a contract with no wage increase in the first year was deliberately provocative and of small consequence in the battle against the deficit".

I do not think he favours one party over the other. He is one of those individuals who tries to be honest and call the shots as he sees them. This is what he says: "Offering public servants a contract with no wage increase in the first year was deliberately provocative and of small consequence in the battle against the deficit".

It was not a Liberal or a member of the New Democratic Party who said that or a member of another party.

• (1840)

It was an independent journalist who said it. There have been a number of provocations. Here is another one. My colleague talks about the bonuses. You know, it is not the notion of the money involved in the bonuses that prevents people from sitting down at the negotiating table. It is the symbol of the bonuses that prevents the dialogue.

When you have 5,000 or more cabinet appointees who got bonuses in the past year that exceed the salaries of a number of civil servants, some of whom are single parents with families, then of course you get people angry. This is the point that bothers me, that people have not understood that this is provocation. This gets people angry. It gets them darned mad, and I have other words that I could use. I have other words that I could use.

Also, the increases to members of Parliament and others, senior bureaucrats, that were given prior to them. I understand what happened. I understand, in the neighbourhood of 4 per cent the day before the salary freeze was imposed. I understand. But if we had set the example, if they had set the example, do you think we would be having this kind of acrimony, this kind of difficulty right now in sitting down and trying to negotiate? I think not.

Let us not forget that an independent agency, which works for government, the Public Service Staff Relations Board said that the Treasury Board had engaged in bad faith bargaining. I did not say that. The New Democratic Party did not say that. Another political party did not say that. It was the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Treasury Board has engaged in bad faith bargaining.

The other thing that has never been said in this Chamber, or I have not heard it today, is that certain employees were granted a back room salary increase. They were moved up one increment in their pay scales. That is provocation. I cite ships' officers and air traffic controllers. I have no difficulty believing that they should have received increases. I believe they probably merited everything they received. But the fact that they did is an act of provocation. It sours the relationship. It prevents us from sitting down and trying to find a solution.

Several people have mentioned that we have no money.

[Translation]

I know that the deficit is exceeding $30 billion and that the debt is exceeding $400 billion, that is, double the one for the 1984–85 fiscal year. I know all that, but why does the government find money for other programs? I will give you some examples. I am delighted to see that it just made some announcements, because it finally transferred some corporations to Western Canada. It is time that we thought about responding to the needs of the West. We have found money to do it, and that is good. But you know, when we were talking, for example, of the 3 per cent raise for the Public Service Alliance members, $144 million, that is a lot of money! It is probably more than what my colleagues have in their bank account today, a lot more!

Also, we must not forget that the government recently made some extraordinary expenses.

[English]

For example, the bailout of the frigates. Maybe that was a good decision, but it was $260–some million. The Gulf War was another $600 million. The GST, $358.4 million to implement the program. Over 4,000 people were hired. Office space this year is at an increase of $100 million, plus another $38.9 million for GST offices. There is over $1 billion there, ladies and gentlemen, in case you are wondering. I could mention another $1 billion if I had the time.

The government talks about people who are breaking the law, and with justification. I indicated before that I do not agree in any way, shape or form, with violence, with the disruption that is being carried on by the union and union members. I am trying to understand it and I have given some reasons as to why I think it is happening. It is unfortunate and I hope that we can come to grips with that as soon as this whole dispute is in fact resolved, as I hope it will be very shortly.

What about pay equity? That is the law. Yet the government is ignoring the law. I know it will say: "but you brought it in and what did you do?" Well, do two wrongs make one right? Of course not.

Why would you be denying those who should be getting this kind of financial response, most of whom are women. In our society today why would you be doing that? Why would you be denying them their just due according to law?

Let me talk about contracting out. I have a very interesting figure to share with this House. When this particular party formed the government in 1984, we were talking about $1.7 billion in contracting out. Where are we now? In excess of $5 billion. Big, big increase. Now why?

I do not want to be unkind, but I do wish that I could determine with precision tonight in this House where that $3.3 billion increase is going. It would be an interesting discovery and I am afraid that it would cause severe fallout.

Let us look at the employees. When the government came to power in 1984–85 in that year there were 257,013 employees; in 1990–91 there are 221,859 employees, a drop of roughly 35,000, give or take a few.

Look at that drop in employees. Look at the increase in contracting out and tell me, tell Canadians, where is the saving? Have you really saved any money for Canadian taxpayers? If so, I would like you to point it out for me.

There was a very powerful statement in an editorial in The Ottawa Citizen dated September 17, 1991, one that I would really like members of government to explain to Canadians. It said: "All the government needed to do at any time to break the costly demoralizing impasse was to offer a token raise, two, two, and two per cent.

I understand, just in case my colleague gets over–excited that two–plus–two–plus–two compounded is more than zero-plus-three-plus-three compounded. I want to get that clear. But it is minimal over all and it could have been offset by reductions in staff if there was actually a finite limit to the funds as they claim. So why not two-plus-two-plus-two, rather than approach it from a zero per cent increase which is deliberately provocative by itself? It would not have been more expensive over time. My colleagues know that. They have never explained that away satisfactorily, and I am sorry they have not because Canadians will know that it could have been done that way.

They will know that they are being deliberately belligerent because they believe they have a cause where their sag in popularity can in fact be raised.

[Translation]

Looking at this situation, one wonders what is happening now. Those who have listened and read know that it is a political issue. They understand this government is not very popular. They understand this government will try to increase its popularity, which is entirely normal when you have the favour of barely 10 per cent of the Canadian people according to the opinion pools. Also, they realize there has been some dishonesty—I don't say that to be nasty—on both sides, some exaggeration. It's a little like when you apply for a job, you put forward your best assets, sometimes a little embellished, a little exaggerated. But both sides have surely exaggerated their positions.

Canadian want workers to go back to work. And workers wants to go back to work. What they want is that the government show that it is willing to negotiate and that a wage increase could very well be possible, even though minimal or barely exceeding zero, for they want to go back to the table without having an iron collar imposed on them before getting there.

• (1850)

If I ask you to come to the table and tell you "This is what we will do within these parameters", this is not negotiating, this is imposing one's will, which is easy when you hold all the power. You don't need much courage. When you are big and powerful and able to crush the other party, this does not require any creativity, any power, any leadership. What requires leadership however is to bring people together, talk with them and try to come to solutions that are both fair and sensible, solutions that respect them.

[English]

The workers want to get back to work. The government should appoint a mediator like it did in the postal strike. It should stop playing games. It should be getting the country back to work and it should do it now.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, I will not be able to answer all these questions, I will leave some for other members, but when my colleague mentioned wages, he forgot to work out the average. It is easy to say some employees are not earning a lot, some are, and then there are those who earn even more.

I want to put it on record and I hope the hon. member can provide us with some answers, because I have a couple of questions for him. An average yearly salary of $33,500 is well over the national average. But that is not all. Civil servants are also entitled to a fully indexed pension, that is interesting, as well as the best job security in Canada and a dental plan totally subsidized by the employer. Do you know how much that costs? I have children who often visit the dentist, Madam Speaker, and I can tell you it costs a bundle, as you well know, since you have had to deal with many dentists. You know how much it costs when you step into a dentist office. That is part of their wages and it is worth a lot.

They have a whole range of job-related benefits, such as a subsidized health plan, a subsidized disability plan, fully-paid sick leaves, fully-paid annual leaves, family responsibility leaves, including maternity leaves. That, of course, has to be added up to their wages.

Our colleague also mentioned—

[English]

People are allowed to strike, yes he is right. People who want to work are allowed to work, too, and that works both ways. But they did not, they were not allowed. They came to my office and said: "Sir, I want to work". They had to provide these essential services in the hospitals, for example, in Montreal. Yes, they are allowed to strike. Some are allowed to work.

Then he spoke about the contract, dropping out, why we didn't give two, two, two. Yes, we saved 6,000 jobs with zero, three and three.

[Translation]

The most important thing that I want to say to my colleague—besides, I explained it in my speech and I would not want to start it over, but I invite him to read it—is that if it is the way that the government has chosen to make itself popular, I find that he gets the opposite result.

Then, my question is this: when you analyze a salary, why dont you analyze also the benefits that my people in Laval would really like to have, the fringe benefits, as they are called. Why did we put a cap of 0–3–3 to save 6,000 which Mr. Bean did not?

[English]

Mr. Duhamel: I said right from the beginning that I deplored violence, that one of the questions we ought to be discussing is when you are in a strike position, what are the activities that are appropriate, and which ones are inappropriate? There are inappropriate activities taking place right now. When you shout out people's names, when you say that you will remember them, when you telephone them, when you harass them, that is wrong, wrong, wrong. I will do everything in my power, with the assistance of my colleagues, to stop that kind of nonsense.

But we also ought to be discussing the whole question as to whether or not there should be additional excluded categories as well.

The question ought to be whether the Public Service should strike or not. If it is going to be able to strike, then let us respect that. We have not respected it, we have made it look as if it was illegal and what have you.

The other question my colleague addressed is the whole question of salary; average salary and benefits. It is an excellent question and I appreciate it. However, he failed to tell us, although he knows, how much more it is than the national average. He knows that by taking the average salary, he can add in all of the part-time jobs, you know, the little service jobs, and make that average salary look a lot bigger. I will let him live with his conscience. Perhaps he can see his priest over the weekend.

Let us talk about benefits. I cannot believe how a colleague would want to try to come to grips with the problems of fellow Canadians by trying to push them down, by saying, for example, "they have dental care". Good. All Canadians should have dental care. They have pensions. Good, all Canadians should have good pensions. They have indexed pensions. Well, let me tell you, I pay a share of my pension. Do you not? Before I came here I paid a share, and if it needs to be more so that it can be indexed, then ask me for more.

But let us not trample on everyone. Let us not push everyone down. Let us try to bring them up. Let us try to define what it is that every Canadian ought to have. Surely the way to go is not to trample upon them, to push them down. The way to go is to look at those who do not have enough; enough salary, enough pension, enough medical care, enough dental care, and to make sure they have it.

Madam Speaker, this is my final point and it will be brief. My colleague should know how much he is saving on dental care because as I understand it, we get a pretty good deal as members. He could have mentioned that figure too.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have a comment I would like to make which will lead to a question of the hon. member. The comment is with respect to the agenda that this government has in introducing this legislation.

I would like to suggest that while the government keeps talking about the need to fight inflation and the deficit through this bill and through the real reduction of wages for its public servants, the reality is that it is doing something quite different. The reality is that the government is seeking, through this legislation, to destroy the rights of collective bargaining of its own public servants and seeks to destroy the union.

The government is not trying to save money. Quite the opposite, it is trying to score a political point. First, let me say on inflation that since 1985, only in one year has the Public Service received anything more than the rate of inflation.

Second, in terms of saving money, the only cost of a 3 per cent increase in one year would be .2 of 1 per cent of the total budget of this government. The government's figures are wrong. Its agenda is hidden and it is now coming clear.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct, there is an agenda here. I indicated that earlier on. I think they are trying to score political points and there is a propaganda war going on. There is no doubt about that.

My colleague failed to mention, for example, that if you look at the recent increases, as my colleague just did, in the private sector and the Public Service during the last few years, the public sector has not had nearly as much as the private sector. The Public Service Alliance of Canada has not. I think we have to recognize that.

The other point I wanted to make is that it is difficult working with figures, my colleague said—you know, he is seething, but I have no problems. He says now they are getting 100 per cent dental care and we are only getting 80 per cent. They would love our pension plan rather than their own, would they not? So if you are going to make some comparisons be fair.

There is a big power play going on. It is government versus the union and the government is trying to take advantage of that. You know it as well as I do. I am disappointed you would not acknowledge it.

• (1900)

I will move a motion at the most appropriate moment which states that the hon. member prefers their working conditions and should get them for himself. I think that would be a noble gesture on my part, in view of the fact that he believes they are better treated than we are.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to advise the House that the first five hours of debate on third reading of this bill have now expired. We will now go to 10 minute speeches without questions or comment.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill and to speak out against it as forcefully and as strongly as I can.

My opposition to the bill springs in part from my experience over about 15 years as a labour lawyer in the province of British Columbia and the perception and perspective that has given me and also as the member of Parliament for Victoria, a community that has expressed its views very forcefully in this dispute and is very strongly in favour of the alliance and its position and of the public servants in that community.

Bill C-29 is at one instance a fairly innocent piece of legislation in the way it reads, until one reads very carefully into the heart of the legislation. The heart of the legislation is found in three sections.

I ask those who are watching to consider what they would do if this applied to their particular collective agreement.

Section 5 simply provides that every compensation plan for employees to whom this act applies shall be extended for a period of 24 months, beginning on the day immediately following the day on which the compensation plan would, but for this section, expire.

It should be understood that this act applies not only to members of the alliance who are now on strike, but to members and officers of the Canadian forces; members and officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the staff of this House of Commons who are without a union and have no voice speaking for them; members of the staff of the ministers of the Crown and members of the Senate and the House of Commons, agencies, boards and hundreds and hundreds and thousands of other employees in this country, many of whom have had no voice and are not party to this particular dispute.

Section 9 then goes on to provide for zero per cent in the first 12 months and a 3 per cent increase in the second 12 months of any compensation plan covered by the act.

Finally, in section 14, the act sets out penalties, up to $500 a day. The penalties not only apply to the unions or the representatives of the unions, but to employees who are required by the act not to do anything in contravention of the act. Included in that, they are not allowed to strike.

The right to collective bargaining is a right which has developed for over 80 years and to which this country has been a proud signator through the international labour conventions. The essence of the right to collective bargaining, which evidently the government members failed to grasp or understand, is that people in a free society have the right to consent to their working conditions and the right to gather together collectively to seek bargaining and working conditions that are suitable to them.

That right of collective bargaining has, over the years, been enshrined in legislation. It has been hard-fought for over the decades. In the 1960s and 1970s it finally came to public servants across this country.

It has been awfully difficult for some people to understand how public servants, police officers and others can have the right of collective bargaining, including the ultimate right to withdraw one's labour if one is not satisfied with the terms and conditions. But a very fine balance developed in the legislation.

Certain employees were excluded from the right to strike, but those whose work was deemed not absolutely essential or critical in the public interest on a day to day basis were given the right which all other Canadians have, the right to band together collectively, to seek certification, to bargain collectively with its employers and only to work after they have reached agreement and working conditions to which they consent.

This Parliament gave that right to its public employees. It called on the Government of Canada over successive years to comply with that law. Over the years, from time to time back to work legislation has been deemed necessary, but this bill, Bill C–29, is a particularly Draconian historic form of back to work legislation.

Most back to work legislation will either provide for a cooling off period while mediation goes to work or will impose arbitration so that the parties go back to work and independent third parties, having heard from both sides, reach a judgment as to what are fair working conditions.

This legislation does no such thing. This legislation rejects the findings of conciliation boards and independent parties who have looked at the situation. Instead, it seeks to impose the government's view as to what are the appropriate working conditions for its employees.

The government, by this legislation, is using and confusing its role as employer and its role as the introducer of legislation into this Parliament. It is taking a power which no other employer in this country has and it is coming to this Parliament and asking it to impose the government's view as to what are the appropriate working conditions for employees of the public sector.

No other legislation coming before this Parliament has ever done such a thing. The Conservative Party, which used to think of itself as a voice for rights of Canadians, is seeking to impose this legislation and to strip away the rights of its own public servants.

Shame on this government. We say this legislation is in conflict with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I defy the government to introduce into this House any legal opinion that suggests that this legislation does not conflict with the charter of rights.

The charter of rights gives to Canadians equality of treatment under the law. Other Canadians have the right of free collective bargaining and, if pushed to the wall, the right to strike. How come the government comes in here and takes that right away?

If it says that in the public interest this dispute must end, then it is obliged first to demonstrate overwhelmingly that the public interest calls for this strike to end and second, and even more important because a wide number of Canadians would probably agree that, at a certain point a strike in the public sector must come to an end.

If it does so, it must only do so after it has bargained in good faith for a significant period of time, it has used all the machinery available to it such as conciliation, mediation and finally, it introduces the most minimalist example of back to work legislation, that is, either a cooling off period or the imposition of arbitration.

There is simply no excuse for legislation which rips away the rights of Canadians in the fashion that this bill does.

This bill is simply bad managerial policy. It is sending thousands of Canadians back to work bitter at the government, bitter at its employers, bitter at its fellow employees across the line. Even internal disputes within the union will arise because of the difficulties that this legislation has imposed on the Public Service Alliance of Canada which fought a tremendous fight and initially won a great victory over this government. This legislation is going to leave a long-standing and bitter legacy. It is legislation which this government and this country will regret for many years.

• (1910)

Let me conclude by saying that out of all bad things some good may come and out of this Draconian legislation is the coming of age of the public servants of this country. I have spoken to them in Ottawa; I have spoken to them in Victoria. The message is coming loud and clear. Finally the public servants of this country have realized that they too have a stake in the kind of government we have. They too have a stake in ensuring that they elect to Parliament people who will fight for their rights and not impose this kind of legislation upon them.

They are speaking for thousands of Canadians who now have a new vision of the kind of Canada we want, a Canada of equity, a Canada of justice, a Canada of rights. I call on this House to defeat this legislation and to launch a new day of labour relations for the public sector in this country.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, being in the ten-minute rule it makes one rather focused. It is rather interesting that I follow the hon. member for Victoria who spoke very eloquently and in a professorial style with respect to the rights of the public in collective bargaining.

If I had had an opportunity to present a question to him before launching into my debate, I would have asked if he felt there was any difference between the rights of collective bargaining and the right to strike in the Public Service as against the right in the private sector. I think I know what his answer may have been.

In the few minutes I have on this very important issue I would like to go back, and I think it might bemuse the member for Victoria, and refer to the bill giving the Public Service the right to strike. In that debate on the Public Service Collective Bargaining Act of 1957, pages 13184 and following, I then, was a young pup member, against the august invincible Grit government of the day with Mr. Benson as President of the Treasury Board. I am not sure if the hon. member's father, as member for Victoria, was in the House then but he and I did serve in this House at the same time.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at the time, the elegant statesman who is at the table, Mr. Knowles, participated very much in this debate.

At that time—unbeknownst to me that some 24 years later I would be able to read Hansard—and in a more naive approach than now I pointed out the concerns I had about extending the right to strike to members of the Public Service.

This has been a very difficult debate. No one has been, I think, happy about the situation. Certainly the public is not happy about the situation. As far as I am concerned as I read the public, there is a plague on both of our houses, the House of Commons and all those involved in it, and also the house of Public Service, the PSAC, with their machinations as they try to get response to their legitimate demands. Or perhaps they have accepted some bait put out there by the government creating this confrontational situation which frankly has not helped anybody.

When this House came back after the summer recess, this bill was introduced. I must say that at that time, long before the Public Service Staff Relations Board, chaired by the former House leader of the NDP, the hon. Mr. Ian Deans, said that the Government of Canada had negotiated in bad faith—which I thought poetic justice—I also thought the Government of Canada had negotiated in bad faith. If the bill had proceeded and come to a vote at that time I must say I was prepared. Although I don't think it would have represented the collective view of my constituency which wanted the strike over, does not have a great body of public servants, and it would be very easy to side myself with the majority of good hard-working people who are my constituents, I think I would have surprised them if I had voted against the government bill and, in effect, for the PSAC. However, I honestly did not believe there had been proper bargaining procedures and that they had been bargaining in good faith. Goodness gracious, Madam Speaker, if, with all the hue and cry, we can appoint a mediator under conciliation procedures and the labour laws of Canada for the postal union and the postal problems, regardless of the physical package that the government is understandably trying to negotiate, we could have at least gone through the motions, to say the least, and might even have gone through more than the motions, to have a mediator.

I was in my window looking out at the 20,000 public servants on that lawn Monday morning and Monday noon. I must say that having seen a few sporadic displays the week before when I was here doing business, I was a little impressed and not swayed by the numbers, knowing that three-quarters of the people out there had never been politicized, radicalized. I knew that we had all had a good summer to get rested and regenerated, to come back for the fall Parliament when national building and the nation's soul searching was going to be the priority.

I was looking out there at these 20,000 servants of yours and mine and the millions across the country. I just could not believe that a government trying to start out with peace and good will to all, as we go through the difficult constitutional process, had either engineered or had stumbled into this situation. I am not casting blame, because as far as I am concerned, there is blame on both their houses. I thought and said to my staff: "Look, the Prime Minister has the pizzazz and the chutzpah and the street smarts, let alone his history of labour negotiation and working with tougher people than Mr. Bean on the longshore front of Montreal and other interesting places, to come out from the House of Commons and go before that crowd. And, if he had been yelled down and not given a voice and an ear, then that would have redounded to his credit". I said to my staff: "This could be the beginning of the turnaround for the low standing in the polls because there obviously has been a lot of politics in this whole business that is facing us this Monday". And I really thought that that might happen.

If it had happened and the Prime Minister of the land had come out, he perhaps did not even have to admit that he had made a mistake. He could have shown a little humility and said: "Perhaps we have made a mistake. Let's go back to the table. I am going to instruct the President of the Treasury Board to come and meet you and let us see if there is anything we can do that will fit within the physical framework. If we have to raise two and two and two then perhaps a hundred or a thousand jobs go out the window". But at least get back in there and go through the motions in a meaningful substantive way.

That did not happen, Madam Speaker. Yet we had the truce. If I had been a Tory backbencher trying to defend the government of the day on Monday and Tuesday, and then knowing that the House leader of the NDP was out being the honest broker to get the parties back to the table after I and others on the government side hypothetically had been defending the government, and knowing that he was the one to get them back to the table, that would have made me a little upset, to say the least. I would have known full well, going back to the table with the conditions they went back to the table on, that most likely there would not have been much of a settlement and we would be faced with another situation, which we are faced with today.

That was the beginning of the week then, Madam Speaker, and my sympathies certainly were with the poor bargaining process, to say the least, in a most conservative way, of what had gone on up to that date. I knew full well that there was blame on both sides. When the bargaining procedures, no matter how sincere or whatever finally dissolved last week, the strike was resumed. There was violence. Television coverage showed public servants grappling with their own and/or the public. I must say I believe with difficulty that it is time this strike with all the problems it has caused and which are going to linger with us is over. I agree with my hon. friend from Victoria that there has not been a bill as Draconian as this Bill C-29 to put people back to work without even a hint of mediation or arbitration. In view of what is happening to the public sector, and I agree that it is getting or is out of control, that this Parliament has to act for all the injured parties, all the third parties.

You are telling me already, Madam Speaker, that my time is up and I have not even got to quote you my pearls of wisdom from 1967 when the first bill to give the strike was debated in this House, when then I said the public servants at the time knew what their perks were, they knew they did not have the right to strike. I say, with all the other rhetoric that has been said in this difficult debate, that we had better start to go back to basics to see that if in the Public Service, let alone the postal service—that is another whole issue, and they cannot have the right to strike if they have got the monopoly on the mail service—but on the right generally for the Public Service, I think we have got to go back to that basic.

In conclusion, and the sadness, Madam Speaker, is just to read a short four sentences from Lament for a Nation written by George Grant, an interesting Canadian philosopher who believed in Canada. Way back in the fifties, 1957 in particular, he felt that the last nationalist on the scene was a fellow called John Diefenbaker. He wrote this Lament for a Nation because everything else was going down the drain and perhaps the state of Canada might be preserved because of the election that man. He said many things, but the interesting thing he said about the Public Service in 1957 was this quote which is very germane to the debate in Canada going on today and one of the problems we have here. He said this on page 18 of Lament for a Nation:

> Diefenbaker's relations with the civil service invite the writing of a picaresque novel. By including these strained relations under his failures, I do not imply that the fault lay all on his side. Too many civil servants had too closely identified themselves with Liberal men and Liberal measures before 1957, and some of these did not show the proper loyalty to the elected government after 1957.

And then he goes on and says this:

> Nevertheless, that Diefenbaker failed to win the respect of the civil service was a disaster. No modern state can be run without great authority in the hands of its non-elected officials. In such an uncertain nation as Canada, the civil service is perhaps the essential instrument by which nationhood is preserved. The power of Ottawa has to be skilfully used by politicians to balance the enormous anti-national forces concentrated in the economic capitals of Toronto and Montreal. If Diefenbaker was to foster nationalism, he needed to win the respect of the civil service.

Madam Speaker, he goes on to say that he did not. I am just so sad that since the present government came to power in 1984, when I shared many of its thoughts and tried to develop some of their polices, that when the history is written along with many other things, it will be that we as a government perhaps did not come to grips with our public service then, let alone what has happened today.

Therefore, this is a very sad day to have this bill before us. It is a sad day that we are going to have to most likely pass it and force back to work those who work for ourselves.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, there certainly can be no question at all that you are perhaps one of the most fair chairpeople that we have had, along with the others that we have in these Chambers, given the leniency that you showed the previous speaker, perhaps no doubt given his tenure in the House of Commons, perhaps given his eloquence. I am not sure what the reason is. Nevertheless, I support what you have done. There was perhaps ample reason.

I would first like to say that this is not an issue about the quality of the work that is performed by Canada's civil service. I, as a 12-year member of Canada's civil service, would like to give a little bit of history so that I am sure I can convince you, the public and members of the House of Commons that I know of what I speak.

The quality of the kind of service that Canada gets from its civil servants is beyond question. Certainly, one can expect that given the numbers of people we are talking about, as in the case of perhaps a large family, large numbers of anything, there is not perfection out there. Nevertheless, I think that Canada's civil servants are a dedicated group of people and believe in Canada. I applaud them for that.

As one who worked for the federal government for some 12 years, I did run into certain circumstances that caused me some puzzlement. I distinctly recall early in my tenure with the federal government wanting to finish a job. It needed about 15 to 30 minutes. However the building I was working in was closed at five o'clock with a lock and key. It had panic hardware on it so that I could leave when my boss told me to leave. I was to get out of the building at five o'clock because the government was not going to give you any time off in lieu of work performed.

I was not looking for any time off. I simply wanted to do the job and, if that was considered to be a contribution to Canada, so be it. I think there are a lot of people out there who feel the same way.

My point is that I do not believe that in this particular case, the president of the union really is in touch with the membership.

In another example, I was transferred into British Columbia and my job was to provide for pipeline profiles for an extremely arid part of Canada. Nevertheless, I found it desirable to get back to good old Saskatchewan as soon as I could. As a result I worked without interruption until 10 or 10.30 every night, not seeking any other form of remuneration, but again making a contribution to my country and to my job. I just considered it part and parcel of having a job, of having employment.

Again, no one asked for my opinion. No one from any union asked me my opinion nor did they direct me, thank goodness, because I was probably outside their reach. Nor did they direct that I could not put in those extra hours.

There are many public servants who give that kind of dedication to the job. I have spoken to PSAC members in Regina, my home community, in the midst of this labour turmoil and I know whereof I speak. I do not believe I should relay the essence of our conversations specifically, but generally they conveyed to me that money was not the issue in this particular case. Knowing full well that 0, 3, and 3 had been proposed to them at budget time which apparently caused the strike, these people in my community, at least those I spoke to and who were sent to me as representatives of the union, indicated that money was not the object.

Now Mr. Bean is saying that he cannot accept this 0, 3 and 3 directive. Members of the opposition are calling this Draconian legislation.

I do not get any pleasure, nor do I suspect any member of the government gets any pleasure in having to legislate people back to work and to circumvent the free collective bargaining process. There are times, however, when members who are providing a service to the public and are paid by the public require that the service be so provided.

I have had members from my constituency say to me: "Perhaps you should determine what services are essential and legislate accordingly. Get those non-essential services done by others".

They are certainly saying to me that perhaps there should be some cut in the number of federal public servants. I am not espousing that. I am simply saying that is what some people are telling me.

I hope that in order to maintain a good relationship with PSAC members or with the federal public servants it will not come to that. It does not have to come to that.

I hope that the day will come when someone, who has the power and ability to review what has happened behind the scenes, will reveal that there are things that occur in those circumstances that are not reflected in media reporting, that do not appear as knowledge to the membership, and that the public does not have a right to know.

I know that things have gone on and I know statements have been made. When those statements are taken in context with what is happening, you have stand back and scratch your head and say: "My good gosh, is this the same issue we are talking about?"

This has become a political issue in one form. I would suggest that perhaps politics come as a result of the organizational struggles contained within PSAC themselves, not contained within this particular political party.

I can point to back to work legislation as being non-political. I distinctly recall that in April 1982 an NDP provincial government from the province of Saskatchewan legislated I believe it was nurses back to work. I am sure they took no delight in that.

I distinctly recall Liberal colleagues opposite being associated with an infamous program called six and five, where they too took the necessary steps to legislate people back to work. We find ourselves in the same ship today, so to speak in the same position. It is not one that we envy.

We look for labour compassion from the party that apparently speaks for labour and is supposed to be compassionate. We all know full well what recently occurred in the province of Ontario, when Premier Rae told the union in charge of the Toronto transit drivers that unless a vote was held on the matters placed before their union they too would be legislated back to work.

No one needs to confuse the public by saying that this is a Conservative sponsored piece of Draconian legislation. It is a matter of fact that exists with all governments, with all political parties that are the government of the day.

It is great to be in opposition because it is easy to throw darts. You are not in a position where you have to make some decisions. I look across the floor with some degree of envy from time to time but not very often. Is it not terrible that we seem to get sounds emanating from behind the curtains. I would think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands would sit in his seat and rebut some of the things I am saying, as little as it may contribute to the debate. Nevertheless I do like to hear his brilliant Scots voice.

He pleasures me with his company and I certainly do welcome him here this evening. There have been questions. A question was raised earlier about why a mediator was not appointed. Usually a mediator is appointed when there seems to be some conflict in terms of whether or not there is any money left on the table.

In this particular case, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, PSAC, has turned its back on negotiation when there are still offers on the table. It is a little premature to appoint a mediator. Further to that, given that there are offers on the table, to have Mr. Bean turn his back on those offers I think is to serve his own political purpose and not to serve the purpose of those PSAC members that I spoke to in my constituency.

There have been other accusations that the government has not negotiated in good faith. The accusation has been made that the government has negotiated in bad faith. I found that decision by this body to be somewhat puzzling in that come budget time there was an indication of the very unfortunate direction the government had to proceed with respect to the zero, three and three.

It would be great to be part of a spending government. We are in the position that we are today because of the actions of a spending government, and now the reins must be pulled in. Yes, everyone must pay and everyone does pay.

In answer to the accusation about the government negotiating in bad faith, I do not believe we have ever negotiated in bad faith. I would like to remind you what the Work Relations Board has stated in the third element of section 51, which talks about reasonable efforts to negotiate, even though we had spent more than 90 days negotiating at that time. I would like to draw your attention as well, Madam Speaker, to the most recent judgment of the Works Relations Board that states that designated essential employees were prevented from reporting to work by union members present on the picket lines. This went against the work relations law.

The ball is in PSAC's court. I ask you who indeed is negotiating in bad faith? Last Friday the president of PSAC himself admitted that Treasury Board dealt with both monetary and non-monetary issues. This time around we did deal with these items. When we hear the president of PSAC himself saying that we did deal with all the issues, I really wonder how anyone can accuse us of bargaining in bad faith.

There was some comment made with respect to why the need for ads in the newspapers. I see I have one minute left and I will be done then as well.

Again, we have ample coverage of all those negative kinds of things that are associated with labour unrest. We felt that it was absolutely necessary to advise the public of the other side of the story, of some of the problems currently placed in the government's hands and what the Government of Canada was proposing to resolve. The people of Canada have a right to know what is happening. They have a right to know of the latest government proposals and have a right to know that this strike could have been avoided if Daryl Bean had not left the bargaining table.

Certainly one has to ask a very pertinent question and that is: Why indeed did he leave the bargaining table when there were matters on the table yet to be negotiated?

I regret very much this decision that we have to take. Canadians are demanding that we take this decision. PSAC members are demanding that we take this decision. All Canadians are demanding that we take this decision.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, we are in a rather unique situation as members of the House of Commons. All too often this government has tried to find scapegoats for its own incompetence and its own inability to manage. It has been unable to manage its budgets, to manage the tax dollars that come in, to manage the very public servants who work so hard to keep the business of this nation going. You listen to the debate that is taking place and the attempt by members opposite to try to cleanse their hands of the dirt that they have on them by forcing federal public servants not just out on strike but to take less than what members of Parliament have had to take, forcing them to take less than some of the senior—

An hon. member: Don't be so stupid.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The hon. member opposite is yelling: "Don't be so stupid". I would like to tell the hon. member that the people who work in my constituency, and there is probably 3,000 or 4,000 of them that are in the federal Public Service, are not stupid people. They are not individuals who want to be out on strike. They are individuals who chose the life of service to the country through the federal Public Service.

The members opposite over like to heckle, particularly that member, and squirrel little things across the aisle. The federal public servants who work in the riding of Dartmouth or the riding of Halifax are people who have devoted most of their working lives to serving the public in this country.

As a Liberal member of Parliament I will stand in this Chamber and, if you do not like it, that is your problem. I will stand in this Chamber whenever I get a chance to defend their rights as Canadians, as people who are employed by the government of this country.

It is pretty obvious that some of the members opposite who are sitting here tonight know that their goose is going to be cooked. This strike will be legislated to an end some time this evening because of this Draconian legislation. They know full well what will happen. If they do not, I will tell you what I hope will happen. I hope that the next time you need that little favour for one of your constituents and you call up the lady or you call up the gentleman at unemployment insurance that perhaps puts a little extra bit—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): What are you talking about blackmail? Who is being blackmailed? I just hope the employees will think twice when they call up and expect that extra little bit of service which perhaps they got that went a little bit beyond the call of duty. That happens to every member of Parliament when somebody stays past 4.30 who works in the Canada Pension Office trying to solve a case or makes the extra three phone calls to try to deliver service to the people. Perhaps the next time they call some of those public servants who have devoted most of their life to serving the public of this country and serving members of Parliament, maybe just may be they are going to think twice before they put out that extra ounce of effort because they know damn well that this government does not appreciate any effort that they put forward for them or for the people of this country.

The government would have you believe that public servants are these high paid, brazen individuals who just want to dig deeper into the federal pocket and cause the deficit to explode.

I have been on my feet in this House and in this Chamber many times. We have seen strike breaking legislation before. We saw this group opposite try to portray the public servants who were ships crews two years ago in the same way. They said: "We cannot give them a fair settlement. We cannot eliminated regional rates of pay because we just do not have the money and perhaps they are overpaid anyway". Those individuals were people who worked on Coast Guard vessels for $19,000 to $21,000 a year. They would go away for 30 days at a time. This government did the same thing when it legislated them back to work after this government refused to bargain in good faith.

But you know, I think the Canadian public is finally catching up to them.

We look at the Post Office and the members opposite like to paint every individual working at Canada Post as an individual who just wants to go in and batter the public purse. I know better. I know that the people who work at Canada Post by and large are individuals who seek to give good service. All they want back is a decent day's pay. We have seen this government opposite force them out on strike. In my own riding of Dartmouth, when the conciliator was sitting down at the table with them, what did they do? Just to show their good faith they went, in my riding of Dartmouth and reallocated and re-drew all of the postal walks which would have eliminated a number of jobs. That is what you call good faith bargaining when you deal with the Tory government opposite here.

We now have another situation down in my area where we have individuals at the government dockyards. They had to do this before, two and half years ago, during the election campaign. They were all designated as essential public servants. They are essential because they are the individuals who refitted the Canadian naval vessels that went across to the Persian Gulf and they did it in record time. They were not looking for bonuses because they are true public servants and they understand what it means to be a public servant.

• (1940)

If this bill goes through, it is going to give them a gigantic slap on the side of the head. When the Prime Minister spoke in this House during the Persian Gulf debate, he commended those men and women at the Canadian naval dockyards in Halifax and Dartmouth for doing a superb job and going beyond the call of duty as public servants. These individuals are going to be thanked by being zapped, frozen right on the spot, a zero per cent increase. Those individuals working down there just want an honest day's pay for an honest day's work. That is all they ask. This government is intent on negotiating in bad faith.

The government would have you believe that just because it is the government today whatever it says has to be right. We had an independent body, the PSSRB, which came in and accused the government of bargaining in bad faith. The government will dismiss that.

These are the individuals who make the laws in this country, and yet a body that was created by a piece of legislation which is supposed to be impartial and ensure that collective bargaining does take place came out and accused the government of bargaining in bad faith. The government said: "Well, that is too bad".

In this case the government is acting as judge, jury and executioner with the Canadian Public Service. When the clock ticks down later tonight it will succeed in doing something that no other government has ever done. It will affect a group of people, hundreds of thousands of individuals who have worked very hard including mothers, fathers, sons, daughters, people who supervise Guides in the evening, people with the Kiwanis, the Kinsmen, people who keep our communities going. They do not have horns. They are like you and they are like me and all they want is a decent day's pay.

This government, by this piece of Draconian legislation, is going to legislate them back to work, force a settlement on them without any mediation. There is no provision for a mediator. Do you know why? If a mediator is brought in, he is going to come back and do the same thing the PSSRB did. He is going to say that the government has bargained in bad faith and these individuals should have an increase greater than zero for the fruits of their labours.

There are two other issues in here. I spoke a few weeks ago about regional rates of pay. I am still waiting to hear something sensible from my colleagues opposite who tried to respond to it. Even they know that discriminatory practice, regional rates of pay, has to go.

Every time a contract has been up for negotiation and has gone to binding arbitration in the last year and half, do you know what happened? In every single case the regional rate of pay was collapsed immediately because it was discriminatory.

The Tories opposite do not know right from wrong or day from night. What they are trying to do here is completely subvert the collective bargaining process which also includes, when you are deadlocked in stalemate, binding arbitration. Put a mediator in there. Get something done. This government knows full well if it does it that the "gig will be up agin 'em".

Recent history has shown clearly that the track this government is on is one that is not supported by anybody in this country, most particularly those who are concerned about fairness and equity.

Speaking of equity, the government and the Parliamentary Secretary who was heckling me a little earlier like to talk about the major strides made by this government in trying to attain pay equity.

There was an article in The Financial Post by Jill Vardy just a few days ago. I believe it was on September 4. It is pretty startling. This is the Parliament of Canada that legislates, governs and codifies rules of behaviour for the nation. It says it wants pay equity and yet there are over 66,000 individuals, women in the Public Service, who have had to fight this government in court to get it to adhere to a Human Rights Commission ruling.

We have a situation in which the public morale in our Public Service is at an all–time low. Tonight when this government forces through by closure one of the most regressive pieces of legislation we have ever seen, the public will be the worse for it. Those public servants we were so proud of in our country have been so demoralized and so turned off they are leaving in record numbers. They no longer feel that Public Service is being recognized by this government.

I have not had very much time to speak. I would like to have a lot more time to speak on this but, in conclusion, the people who live in the Dartmouth area and the people who live in the Halifax area do not want to strike. They do not want to see their public servants out and the public servants do not want to be out.

This is a bad piece of legislation. This is the execution of collective bargaining in Canada and it is being done by those people who are supposed to be protecting those rights, Tories.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to talk about the Public Service and the problems caused by the government's budgetary decisions.

[English]

I guess I am entering this debate on a little different plane than my seat mate from Dartmouth. I am angry about it as well, but I think my principal emotion in this situation is sadness. My community of Ottawa is torn by this strike and there are people in my community who are hurting badly because of it. Some of them are members of the Public Service who are on strike and who have been on the picket lines. Some of them are members of management, designated employees. Some of them are innocent bystanders like the 3,300 people who live on Uplands Base in my riding and who have had their lives entirely disrupted during the strike.

Last Sunday in church, of all places, a man came and spoke to me. He said that he had worked for the federal Public Service for 40 years and he never dreamed in all his life that he would be on strike. He was on the picket line before and he was on the picket line again this week, not with reluctance in the sense that nobody wants to be on strike, but with a convinced belief in the rightness of the cause.

I met a man out on Parliament Hill during one of the demonstrations who told me a similar story. He had worked for the Public Service for 30 years, had never been on strike, never thought that he would be on strike, and there he was carrying a picket sign and shouting for his rights. I thought about my parents who both were federal public servants for most of their working lives. Neither of them is still alive, but I wonder what would have happened had they been in the Public Service today confronting the issue of whether they should go out on picket lines and stand out and demand their rights.

I hear the voices of objection that are coming from across the country on this issue, people criticizing the government, people criticizing the union, people criticizing what is happening on the picket lines. I worry because it strikes me that so many things in this country are just not going right at the moment. It seems like the wagon is going down the hill and the wheels are falling off and perhaps there is no one driving.

We have so many problems and at the same time we cannot even find a little bit of peace in our federal government sector. I guess I find myself wondering what really the issue is here. When you listen to the argument it sometimes is a little hard to believe that there actually is one issue because the two sides seem so entirely polarized on it.

Is the issue the management of the government's financial resources as it seems to be claiming, or is the issue the settlement of a labour relations issue itself, in this case of government employees?

That raises a whole range of issues that deal with Public Service workers. In this case the starting point surely has got to be that we have a regime of law in Canada dealing in the federal public sector with employer–employee relations. It creates a right to bargain collectively. If bargaining does not succeed, it creates a right to strike. That surely is the starting point. I suspect that the government does not disagree with that.

• (1950)

Once you begin at that point, you then surely have to answer the question: Given that Public Service workers have the right to bargain and the right to strike, what happens when the employer, the government, says: "We will bargain with you but before we start you had better know that the wage increase you are going to get in year one is zero,and in the second year it is 3 per cent"?

I suppose in some minds that sounds like the beginning position in a bargaining relationship. The employer goes in and says "zero" and the employees come in and they say "six". The employer says "No way, 2" and the employees say "That is still unreasonable, 4". Maybe at the end of the day, after weeks of negotiation, there is a settlement at 3.

That is not what was ever contemplated in this case. In this case bargaining meant zero, not two, three four or one but zero.

If you had relative fairness in the positions of the parties then you could say: "Let them say zero because the employees have a right to strike and they can take that action and they can bring the employer to its knees". What happens in this case is the government says: "Not only is it going to be zero but your right to strike, we do not care about that. It is terminated".

At this point we have to ask ourselves: Is there some really compelling reason for doing this? In one motion the government, by saying zero, has really picked the only possible number that would ensure public sympathy for public servant workers. The government picked zero. Obviously it is unfair, especially in a year when inflation is running at close to 6 per cent.

Let us look at the issue of the financial implications, the macro–economic implications. Have Public Service workers been experiencing increases in their income that have contributed to inflation? Perhaps that would be an argument. I think the answer to that is clearly no. According to Labour Canada, federal government workers' wage settlements were 5.3 per cent in 1990 compared to 5.9 per cent in the private sector and 5.6 per cent in other public sectors. The answer to that one is no. This is not a case where there have been high salary increases in previous years. It is time to tighten the screws and get things adjusted correctly.

Are they paid a lot more than comparable workers in the private sector? I suggest the evidence is no, they are not. There have been numerous articles published. Some of the conciliation board reports that led to this particular strike demonstrated that according to the Public Service Staff Relations Board federal Public Service workers have been trailing behind private sector workers in most of the types of employment that are at issue here.

What about expenditures? Is it because of the deficit—and I only have two minutes left which surprises me—that this restraint has had to be introduced? I find that hard to believe. Just look at the record of the government in the last few weeks.

On the day the B.C. election was called it managed to find $236 million to finance the TRIUMF KEAON facility in Vancouver. We know from all of the advice given to the government, and that all experts recommended, that if that facility were funded it must not be funded out of existing science and technology funds. Presuming that that advice was accepted, it must have managed to find $236 million in loose cash lying around that could be pumped into Vancouver on the day of the election.

The National Energy Board moved to Calgary. I see the member from Calgary sitting opposite. There was money for that, lots of money for that.

There was money to set up the space agency—$250 million—in St. Hubert, Quebec when existing facilities in the national capital region were proven to be adequate. There is money for things that look like they may buy political advantage, but there is no money to ensure that the government's own employees have adequate wages and are treated fairly on an issue of fair bargaining in the public sector.

I think no other conclusion can be drawn except that in this case the government has moved in order to try to create a strawman it can beat up over an issue which will try to generate some sympathy for an unpopular government at a time when nothing else seems to be working.

I realize my time has expired, but I say that if this is the case, and I am drawn to this conclusion very reluctantly because it is a strong statement, then that surely makes this government unworthy of continuing to hold office in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with this opportunity to take part in this debate—for a number of reasons. First of all, because of the way some members opposite tend to justify their objections to the government's decision, probably because they would rather forget the past mistakes that caused the government's present economic, financial and budgetary problems.

I realize they are trying to shift the burden of guilt, as it were. I also understand the objections of the hon. member for Ottawa South who just mentioned the fact that the government couldn't find money for its employees but was able to find $200 million for the Space Agency in Saint-Hubert. I understand these objections, Mr. Speaker, because the member who just spoke merely wants to justify the needs and expectations of his own public servants, and there are many of those in his riding.

However, I deplore the fact that the objections raised by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition are based on self-serving arguments.

Mr. Speaker, the government I have the good fortune to represent takes a far more comprehensive view, since its objectives include an ongoing concern for protecting the well-being of all Canadians, including public servants, as citizens of this country. That is the difference between the objections voiced by the opposition and the responsible position taken by this government.

Mr. Speaker, I remember, I think it was last October, I was in my riding and I mentioned Canada's budgetary and financial problems, the serious problem of our annual deficit, and especially that sword of Damocles that continues to hover over our heads, and I am referring to the national debt. At a press conference, I told my constituents about the need for restraint throughout the public sector, and of course the need for cutting operating expenditures. At the time I mentioned another concern, something I would like to see happen, and it did, and that was to freeze Public Service salaries for at least one year and restrict increases. Today, the time has come to make a decision I agree is a serious one, a decision justified by the extent of the cumulative deficit of the past 25 years and also by our national debt, also accumulated during that same period.

Mr. Speaker, I can say that the people of Richmond—Wolfe, in Rock Forest, Richmond, Brampton, Windsor, Asbestos and Valcourt, all agree with this legislation.

As a matter of fact, they were quick to react to the stand I took for a wage freeze. I want to stress the fact that this freeze is only for this year and applies not only to civil servants but to members of Parliament, to ministers, to executive assistants and to the Prime Minister, of course, along with the entire public service.

It is a matter of making every Canadian do its share. This bill has a dual purpose. It of course applies to our civil servants under the present circumstances, given they are on strike. Its first purpose is to put an end to the strike, i.e. to legislate them back to work. We cannot do without the quality services, the essential services they provide to the public. There is general consensus on that point.

The members opposite claim that the idea is to get back at them and treat them unfairly. That is not true at all. I can attest personally to the good, competent service most of our civil servants provide in the region. I happen to know that from working with them on a regular basis, like all my colleagues from across the country. The idea, therefore, is to make them go back immediately.

The second purpose of the bill is to freeze the salaries of civil servants, parliamentarians, executive assistants and the entire public service of Canada, including Crown corporations, for one year and to limit wage increases to 3 per cent for each of the next two years.

Is that what the opposition calls scoring political points? I cannot imagine how we could achieve that with such a decision. The proof is that a lot of people among our civil servants are of course disappointed; they feel victimized—and I understand that very well—but, like a good father or a good mother, it seems to me that there comes a time when one must take its responsibilities. Children always want more and it is understandable. The candy is so sweet; the ice cream cone is even better; to go on vacation or to get one more holiday is always fun. But parents must intervene to put an end to these repeated requests.

So this government takes on the responsibility of imposing a salary scale and working conditions that have not been accepted by the other side. That is what we call assuming one's responsibilities. Is that a way of trying to obtain a political gain? Oh no, quite the contrary! Indeed, such a decision could trigger animosity towards the government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I dare say that, in my opinion, the civil servants who feel victimized now will, in a few months, recognize the correctness of that decision. In fact, it seems to me that our civil servants accept the governmental management; they are our front line agents, our first assistants and colleagues. Mr. Speaker, I urge them to reconsider their attitude. At the same time, I recognize and we recognize, of course, their feeling of being victimized.

I ask them to understand that this is how we must assume its responsibilities, and I am tempted to say, Mr. Speaker, that the action they took may have been taken at their expense since, in my opinion, Mr. Bean has not been able to recognize the profound motives of that decision.

Regarding cuts, Mr. Speaker, I could mention several provinces and unions that have experienced the same fate. May I tell you that Nova Scotia has frozen the salary of its civil servants at 0 per cent for two years; Saskatchewan has done the same with 2 per cent and minus 2 in 1992; in Manitoba, it is 0 per cent and minus 2; in Quebec, 0 per cent and up to minus 3 in 1992; and in New Brunswick, it is 0 per cent in 1991. Even provinces presumably faced with administrative problems have freezed wages. Take, for example, Newfoundland, where nurses, 3,400 of them, got zero per cent. Also in Newfoundland, non-medical staff, 4,800 employees, got zero per cent. These provinces are faced with the same problems as New-Brunswick and the province of Quebec, and they made that decision.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that our highly competent civil servants also share this vision of responsibility and decisions to be made. I would invite them to reconsider their action, Mr. Speaker, and to accept in good faith this responsible decision.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill which would legislate the Public Service workers and the Public Service Alliance back to work with a 5 per cent cut in their buying power as compared with the past year.

I am not going to try to summarize in 10 minutes all the arguments that my colleagues have put forward very well, especially the member for Victoria, about the illegality of the government's action.

I simply want to deal with the myth, the tale we are told, the government's claim that this is all done because of the deficit and the debt. That is hogwash. It blames the civil servants' wages as a cause of deficit. Yet the civil service wages are less than what the government has chosen to spend on 13,000 jobs that were contracted out to its friends. It paid more for 13,000 jobs to its friends outside the civil service than it has to 146,000 civil servants.

It also blames social programs. The former Minister of Finance has been preaching that month after month, year after year, that it is the social programs that have broken the bank and put us in this deficit.

Again, that is absolutely false. The report from Statistics Canada has shown that 94 per cent of the debt has arisen not from the social programs, but from the tax breaks to the rich that began in 1975 under a previous administration, and it continues with the extortionate interest rates about 5 per cent above inflation instead of the normal 1 per cent or 2 per cent above inflation.

As to the tax rates, for example, the government increased unemployment insurance premiums by $180 a year for each Canadian worker, but widened the $2.8 billion capital gains exemption which goes mostly to real estate operators, not to poor farmers trying to hang on to a home.

The government cut $340 million in social assistance funding to Canada's poorest but kept the $1 billion subsidy to rich businessmen who invite other rich businessmen to their Christmas parties, their birthday parties, or to watch a ball game.

The government slashed spending on the environment by $600 million, but it extended the interest deductibility provision which allows multinationals to use Canada as a tax haven.

It reduced support for social housing by $32 million, but it kept the $1 billion dividend tax credit for the rich.

It cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy but kept the $1 billion manufacturing and processing tax credit.

Those were the causes of the debt and the ballooning deficit, the tax breaks for the rich and the interest gouging in favour of the rich. It was those people who had not paid their taxes, many of them, who were able to invest that money in the government bonds.

• (2010)

There were others but those were obviously some of the chief ones.

Even the government does not believe the story about the deficit. If it did, why would it increase CSIS, the secret police, by $24 million or more? Was it necessary to have that so that they could spy on labour unions and disrupt them?

Why $800 million for the Gulf War? So that the oil companies could get a share of the oil loot?

Why the tens of millions of dollars sending the army against Oka? Was it to intimidate all of Canada's native peoples and other Canadians?

When it wanted to spend the money, it did. For that matter, what about the many, many millions—it is estimated at $100 million—and the hon. member across the way refused to answer a question about it from the hon. member for Churchill, just to win one by-election in Lac-Saint-Jean? Was that necessary in order to re-establish control over the people of Quebec?

The government's story makes no sense at all. Why attack public servants and the postal workers? Why the FTA, the free trade agreement, that caused 200,000 to 300,000 jobs to be lost in Canada's manufacturing industry, and to give away control of our oil industry.

Why the North American free trade agreement being pushed? Was that to cause more job loss and more loss of control over our natural resources? Why the high interest rate, which hurt Canada's exports to the United States? Was that the under the table deal that we are told it was, as part of the price of the free trade agreement, so that we could not put our goods into the American market when the tariffs went down?

Why the high dollar? Again, to protect the United States from Canadian exports? On top of that now, it starts an attack on the Public Service unions, provoking them and forcing them out to strike.

This is part of a campaign, and we can see it in the Prime Minister's rhetoric and in the other cabinet ministers' rhetoric because they want all large, private corporations to do the same, to destroy their unions and to lead Canadian private corporations in a general union-busting campaign, much more powerful than what the Liberals did in 1982 with their six and five legislation when they encouraged tycoons making half a million dollars to show that they were only taking six and five themselves, more than the average worker gets for his whole wage.

These are all parts of a power grab by the transnational corporations. In Canada they are represented by the Business Council on National Issues, which is a lobby that has the ear of the Prime Minister and it is worth probably about a trillion dollars, give or take a hundred million or so.

The plan is to suppress workers by dividing them. That is why the Public Service workers, who have a large number of women, are being humiliated both by the wage freeze against the price rise and by the manner of doing it. Women, the majority in this country, are beginning to organize in all kinds of ways. Therefore, from the government's point of view, they must be put down, as the government is also trying to put down the native people by cutting their funding for communications, cutting their schooling, cutting their housing.

The government had to divide the working people of Canada, setting some against others, immigrants against Canadians, refugees against others, Latin American racial minorities against others. It wants to divide Canadian workers so that it is easier to force wages down in the interests of the transnational corporations.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to ask this government and the caucus that is their automatic vote to change their minds. Their intention is very clear: They are serving the interests of the transnational corporations solely, and they are willing to wreck Canada by persecuting the working class.

Therefore, I ask those who are listening to this broadcast to consider what it is that the government is really trying to do behind the smokescreen of this deficit, which this government largely created. It is trying to bring about an undeclared war against the Canadian people on behalf of the richest people in North America. I ask all who are listening to give careful thought to that, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure and with great pride that I stand in this Chamber tonight to speak on behalf of the public servants of this country, but most particularly to speak on behalf of the public servants in my riding of Halifax.

I knew, obviously, that I had the third-largest contingent of public servants in this country, Halifax ranking third after Ottawa and Montreal. What I did not know until the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier told me was that in actual fact more public servants live in the riding of Halifax than in any of the other ridings in the country where public servants live.

I do not think the hon. member for South Shore really means that. But we will let it go for the moment.

The public servants in Halifax fall into several groups. One of those groups is the ships' crews, the crews that go out in the North Atlantic when other vessels are in trouble— "They that go down to the sea in ships", as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has said—and rescue ships, boats, fishing vessels and so on, in the teeth of the great North Atlantic storms. These ships' crews, when they were striking over the question of regional rates of pay two years ago, downed pickets whenever a distress call came in, went to their ships, sailed out of Halifax harbour and affected the rescue of many lives.

These workers, Mr. Speaker, are paid less, as we all know, than those ships' crews in other regions of the country. These workers, through a process that the federal government initiated when it ordered them back to work two years ago, through a mediator, had a process whereby these regional rates of pay were going to be eliminated.

The promises of this government for those workers, and I might add for other public servants in Halifax—hospital workers, also suffering under regional pay disparities— the promises of this government are writ on water, they mean nothing. These workers, among the lowest paid, who risked their lives and continue to risk their lives and dropped their pickets while they were on a legal strike to affect these rescues, instead of getting regional rates of pay alleviated as the report of the mediator, the binding report that the mediator promised and that the government agreed to, has been thrown out, are limited to 0, 3 and 3.

Mr. McCreath: The same as everybody else.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, the same as everybody else, the hon. member for the South Shore says. He ought to check on some of the bonuses for some of the government's friends in the higher echelon positions. That is what the hon. member for the South Shore should do.

Mr. McCreath: You are a wealth of misinformation.

Ms. Clancy: But the hon. member for South Shore, who certainly can make a lot of noise, should remember that the public servants in Halifax made their presence felt on November 21, 1988—

Mr. McCreath: Stop interfering with the democratic rights of others and go to work.

Ms. Clancy: Well, no, I think they were voting on November 21, 1988, as I recall. On November 21, 1988 they made their presence felt. They will make their presence felt again because they know now, as they suspected in November 1988, that trusting this government would be a waste of their time.

• (2020)

I have spoken many times in this House on the regional rates of pay and the absolute endemic unfairness of it. The hon. member from the South Shore knows it is unfair and knows that his constituents are among the prime beneficiaries of those underpaid ships' crews that sail out of Halifax harbour.

I have spoken on those many times, as I have spoken about hospital workers who were discriminated against.

I want to get a little specific on numbers. In the Public Service of Canada, 66,000 employees earned $29,000 or less. The poverty line in 1991, for a family of three, was $25,600 and for a family of four was $28,800. Two-thirds of those earning under $30,000 in the Public Service of Canada are—guess what? Women. Is anyone surprised? No, no one is surprised. What is this government doing about pay equity?

An hon. member: Nothing.

Ms. Clancy: Nothing. Not one thing. In reports of conciliators over the years, with relationship to the pay equity question, the following has been said and I quote:

"Apparently the government has a separate funding for pay equity adjustments and they will not come out of departmental budgets. There is room for the government to bargain pay equity adjustments in this round of collective bargaining outside the context of wage restraints".

What is this government doing about pay equity? Well let me tell you.

An hon. member: It is bargaining.

Ms. Clancy: No, no. It is doing a little bit. One of the things that this government is doing about pay equity is fighting the right of the Human Rights Commission to deal with this issue and refusing to negotiate pay equity at the bargaining table. It refused.

An hon. member: Who said that?

An hon. member: I think it was Max Yalden.

Ms. Clancy: Max Yalden has condemned the government's actions on pay equity. The commissioner for human rights has condemned the federal Government of Canada on its actions on pay equity. What a record. What a wonderful way to be. What a great thing to be able to take to the people of the country.

The government has failed to implement pay equity for female dominated groups in the Public Service. That is the truth, that is the issue and it deserves to be condemned. Instead of real pay equity, where classifications are changed to reflect new salary levels, the government gives equalization payments. Equalization payments can be removed at any time and certainly will be removed if any of these groups ceases to be female dominated.

The government is playing around. We already know what the member for Calgary whatever thinks about equalization payments or any kind of gender equity for women. Heaven forfend.

An hon. member: What does she think?

Ms. Clancy: Oh, I could tell you, but we would have to get into the question of violence against women and it is violent enough.

What else does the government do to its Public Service? We know about contracting out. We hear about downsizing. How has this downsizing been achieved? By contacting out or hiring consultants. The cost of contracting out has climbed from $1.7 billion annually to $5 billion annually, an amount greater than the entire federal Public Service payroll. The contracting out to their patronage friends is greater than the entire payroll for the Public Service of Canada.

Mr. McCreath: Prove it.

Ms. Clancy: Prove it, says the hon. member for South Shore. The proof will be in the pudding and the pudding will be eaten in the next election. The public servants of Canada will not, like Oliver Twist, be prepared to go back to the table where they ask for more and be told by this Dickensian government that there is no more.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in the Chamber listening very carefully to some of my colleagues on the other side. I want to begin by asking members to let us move into the 1990s and into the 21st century. Members keep forecasting, predicting; you want more of the same and the same does not work. You had better face facts and call a spade a spade. No more taxes, cuts in programs and services, we are living beyond our means and Canada started that way back when you were in power in 1969 with a surplus of $450 million.

An hon. member: The Liberals want more taxes.

Mrs. Sparrow: You took that $450 million surplus and you turned it into a $38.5 billion debt, by increasing program spending and increasing salaries to the tune of 13.5 per cent and 14 per cent. I tell you that we have to pay the bills. The party is over and no longer can we—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Sparrow: We have to pay the bills and everybody is going to participate.

On February 26, 1991, the Minister of Finance tabled his budget in this Chamber and all government employees, all MPs, cabinet ministers, RCMP officers, are treated exactly the same. Everybody will get zero, three and three over the next three years. You are. I am. Even the hon. House leader sitting up there is. He had his salary frozen as well.

Nobody likes strikes and we are not advocating a strike. There are many people within the Public Service who do not want to go on strike. There are single parents. There are families who need their salaries to feed their children, pay their mortgage, and keep a roof over their heads. But they did not have an opportunity to cast a ballot. No. It happened to be their leader, the union head, Mr. Bean who said: "Thou shalt go on strike". End of report.

Bargaining and negotiations have been taking place and the public servant has job security—do you have job security, Mr. Speaker? Mr. Speaker has job security. They have pension plans, dental plans and benefits that the free enterprise system does not have. People in my riding of Calgary South are not only losing their jobs, they are taking a decrease. People down on the south shore in Nova Scotia are losing their jobs and taking decreases. They are willing to do time sharing in order to hang on to their jobs. This is not just one sector we are zeroing in on, everybody has to help.

It has been mentioned here, and I know Mr. Speaker knows this, that six provinces have frozen the salaries of their public service: Nova Scotia is at zero for two years; Manitoba is at zero for 1990-1991; the province of Quebec has frozen its public service wages; Newfoundland; and New Brunswick has even rolled back a piece of legislation they had passed.

I sat here and listened to my colleague from Ottawa South across the way talk about money going into other enterprises. I will tell you that by moving the National Energy Board to Calgary we are going to save millions of dollars. No longer will the oil companies have to fly back and forth, hire their lawyers, to be at the hearings here in Ottawa. They are going to hold the hearings right where the energy industry is located.

Everyone is going to participate. Everybody is going to help us to cut the budget.

I just want to make a remark about pay equity. It seems to me it was 10 years ago when the government of the day—who was in power 10 years ago?

An hon. member: The Liberals were.

Mrs. Sparrow: —when the government of the day had charges laid against it with regard to pay equity and it was taken to court. Ten years ago. You people never moved. And what government moved?

An hon. member: Wasn't that the Trudeau government?

Mrs. Sparrow: That was the Trudeau government, the Trudeau government on the pay equity, and it has been 10 years in the courts. You know, Mr. Speaker, we awarded $317 million in 1989, $76 million in 1990 and $81 million this year for pay equity. Pay equity applies not only to women, but to visible minorities, aboriginal people and disabled people. You never ever, ever came out to attack that issue.

• (2030)

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Sparrow: I listened to you. Now you, unfortunately, are not moving into the 21st century. One of our gentleman friends from the NDP party was talking about free trade. I will tell you, 75 per cent of our trade is done with our colleagues south of the border.

Some hon. members: Eighty per cent.

Mrs. Sparrow: All right, 80 per cent. How about 85 per cent? Now that we are going, how about 90 per cent? We need the secure market. We have to move into the global markets. We have to increase our efficiency, increase our productivity and our quality too and we have got to market smarter.

Think of the jobs that would have been lost without free trade. You should come on out and see where the petrochemical business has moved up. There are certain industries that have benefited. As we move through the 10 year period—well, Mr. Speaker, you were here during that debate in December 1988. You remember all the people, the pot calling the kettle black.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The Speaker likes spirited debates, but I ask for the co-operation of the two sides of the House. I recognize again the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I will only be one minute. We will not raise taxes. We will not increase the deficit. If hon. members will tell us where to cut we will all participate and we will all work on this together.

It has been a great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to be here in the House and I thank you very much.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, "we will not raise taxes"? Is that beyond the 33 times you have already raised taxes since elected in 1984? Incredible! So it has come down to this, Mr. Speaker.

Constituents in my riding of Hamilton West give me the privilege to stand in the House, rise in debate on Bill C-29, along with my colleagues, in opposition to the government's bill which not only legislates federal civil servants back to work, but imposes on them a wage freeze; 0 per cent.

Like everything else this government does, the legislation before us is the handiwork of the Prime Minister and the Tory cabinet, devised through the use of smoke and mirrors. Make no mistake about it, the government is ramming this bill through the House in the hopes that it will serve them well in the polls. Yes, well in the polls because it has become a political matter.

Is it discouraging potential converts to the Reform Party, is that what it might be about? Disgruntled Tories in all the Tory ranks across this country, it could be a little bit about that. But what is the goal of this bill, Mr. Speaker? It is to convince these groups, like the Reformers, like their Tory backbenchers, like all the Tories across this country, that the government mean business. Cut the pay cheques of federal civil servants all in the name of fiscal restraint.

The smoke and mirror illustration shows that the government is not saving money by freezing these wages and are not convincing Canadians that it is doing the right thing. The government claims to be eliminating full time public sector jobs, but let us remember, they are pushing people out through the front door and all the while contracting people through the back door, hoping Canadians will not catch them in this little charade of theirs. Not only is contracting out costing the government more, but the wage freeze included in the bill does not apply to higher level public servants.

Remember the story last week, Mr. Speaker? Over 5,000 cabinet appointees received bonuses last year, some as high as 25 per cent of their salaries. One Crown corporate executive is said to have received $87,000 in his Christmas stocking, that is on top of his annual salary of $365,000. The government expects Canadians to buy this so-called wage restraint charade.

Contracting out is exempt from any budgetary restraints. How can the government say that it is saving money when its policies are clearly ruinous to the morale of the public sector, are misleading to the public, and will result in an increase in expenditures just because the government wants to take on the Public Service for the benefit of political gamesmanship? That is all it is.

I listened to the President of the Treasury Board speak in this House. He made an ironic comment. Members on this side of the House have rightly pointed out that this government is trying to pull the wool over the eyes of Canadian by contracting out public servants through the back door, capping the wages of those permanent employees and eroding any kind of job security. The President of the Treasury Board replied: "If things are as bad as the opposition claims, why then last year did over 230,000 Canadians try to gain employment in this maligned Public Service?"

The answer is painfully obvious, except to the minister and his Tory colleagues. Some 250,000 Canadians sought employment with the government because they are just a part of the 1.5 million unemployed in this country, 300,000 of whom, by the way, lost their jobs since the free trade deal was signed.

Another aspect of this debate degradates the equality afforded to women in the Public Service. The government has put pay equity on the table as a political tradeoff. It is a cold-hearted move that shows this debate is about far more than back to work legislation and the capping of wages. This government says that it is committed to paying women an equal amount for equal work done on the job but at the same time is prepared to treat the advancement of women in the Public Service as nothing more than a bargaining chip. What this government is trading off, trading away, are its principles.

Let us also remember that the wage freezes are being rigidly applied to the lowest paid employees, thereby ensuring that higher salaried employees will receive lump sum payments, bonuses, reclassifications into higher wage brackets.

The fact is the majority of the lower paid employees are women. It has been said, and it should be repeated before we have to vote on this bill in about an hour and a half time, that two-thirds of those federal employees earning under $30,000 a year are women. That is almost 70 per cent.

One group in the lower classification of the Public Service is almost made up entirely of women, 99 per cent, whose average wage is, get this, $19,396. In 1990, just last year, the poverty line in this country for a family of three was $25,600.

What is the single mom working for the federal government to do when her employer freezes her wage at an already less than equitable level and has two children to provide for? Forget day care, this government has already reneged on that promise. It is turning its back and walking away from pay equity and the Canadian Human Rights Commissioner, Max Yalden, who also condemned this government's action on pay equity.

Let us return to the smoke and mirrors image and this analogy. As I previously mentioned the government is trying to persuade Canadians that these wage restraint measures are for the good of the country. What it is really doing is victimizing public servants and using them as scapegoats hoping to curry favour with a public which has lost confidence in it.

It has already victimized Canadians with over 33 tax increases since it came to office and has let the national debt explode to $420 billion, so there is the smoke and mirrors. The government and the member for South Shore try to blame the past governments for the present state of the deficit which they could have controlled over the past seven years in office. Cutting back on public sector wages should send a signal to the Canadian public that the government is serious about controlling the debt, right?

The other page stolen from the Reform Party by this desperate government is a new fund that will bring the deficit down by almost half by the time of the next election when it rolls around. If this government were serious about the deficit, it would ask the former minister of financial disaster where his projections went wrong.

• (2040)

They went wrong time after time, projection after projection. In the six years since the government began to downsize, eradicate the Public Service, 13,000 positions have been cut and 24,000 people have been affected by downsizing. In the same six years, there are 70,000 fewer in the federal Public Service.

Much of the downsizing that has taken place has been achieved by contracting out or hiring consultants. At the bare minimum contracting out has climbed from $1.7 billion annually to $5 billion every year.

An hon. member: Tory waste.

Mr. Keyes: This is an increase of over $3 billion a year.

An hon. member: They put the money into the hands of the fat cat Tories.

Mr. Keyes: That is what this government has been spending on, contracting jobs to do the jobs formerly done by competent civil servants, by a full time staff. For the record the $5 billion amount the government spends on contracting out is greater than the total amount spent on the payroll for the federal Public Service.

I see I have a minute left and so I will close by saying that is the smoke and mirrors. The government would like big business and disgruntled Tories to believe that it is serious about cutting back the public sector but has spent at the same time huge sums of taxpayers' money on this public relations political exercise which has hurt the morale of the world's greatest public service and has done a disservice to the entire country through this transparency, this falsehood, this charade.

Who do I speak for? I speak for the thousands of public civil servants who work in the riding of Hamilton West, right downtown. I also speak for all those Canadians who have seen through this outrageous, unfair Draconian bill, Bill C-29.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. I must say I really feel it is unfortunate that this debate is taking place. I am not sure whose interest is served by the fact that this debate is taking place.

The government brought down last March what can only be described as a very responsible budget, responding to the economic realities and the fiscal realities of this country. That included recognition of the fact that many people across this country had to participate in dealing with what this government had the courage to take on, and that is to say, the deficit and the national debt. It goes without saying that the government's own employees, including those of us in this Chamber, had to participate in that exercise.

That is unfortunate. Everyone would like a pay raise. I would like a pay raise. I could use a pay raise. I am sure everyone in the Public Service would like a pay raise. Quite frankly, I have to say in all honesty, despite the disparaging remarks that one hears from time to time, I have rarely met public servants who I do not feel give the public value for the service. They are dedicated people who want to serve Canada, just as I am sure all members of this Chamber wish to serve Canada.

The reality is that governments must act responsibly and so we had a budget that set down a wage guideline for everyone in the Public Service, everyone in the employ of the Government of Canada, including the members of Parliament in this room, the Prime Minister, and the members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, along with the members of the five bargaining units that have already settled within the zero and three.

What did we have the night of that budget? We had Mr. Daryl Bean on television saying: "There is going to be a strike". Everyone knows that the Public Service Alliance of Canada has an impeccable reputation for responsibility, a reputation that has been earned over many years of responsible actions, of negotiating in the appropriate way. I guess Mr. Daryl Bean felt that he was not high enough in the pecking order of the trade union movement or the NDP, whichever is which, I am not sure. He had to show that he was as tough as Shirley Carr and Bob White and Richard Cashin and all the other union leaders in Canada and so he announced then that there was going to be a political strike and he was going to close down the Public Service of Canada.

The Government of Canada, for its part, acted in a responsible manner; it went to the bargaining table prepared, as as it remained throughout prepared, given that the zero, three and three was going to be there, to bargain other aspects like job security which when I worked for a union we felt was very important to our members. Mr. Bean does not seem to appreciate the fact that job security has been offered and put on the table by this government, and other benefits like that. He had to have his political strike. I do not know who told him he had to have that strike or whether he made that decision all by himself. Only he could give the answer to that. The months passed, the weeks passed and we got our strike. Mr. Bean got his strike.

Now how did he get his strike? It is interesting. He got his strike, from what I can see, in large measure through intimidation. It is amazing the stories that are coming out of the people who did not want to go on strike but wanted to go to work. They understood the economic reality that the government faces. They were prepared, as good citizens of this country, to take their lumps along with the rest of us and accept what was available and also many of them recognized that in these times of difficulty they were very fortunate to have jobs at their salary levels and their levels of job security.

I have got 120 fish plants in my constituency and I will tell you that there are not many people in those fish plants who make the kind of money that the people my hon. friends opposite say are so hard done by make. A lot of my fish plant workers would love to have a job at which they could make $25,000 a year, because you cannot make that kind of money working in a fish plant.

Mr. Keyes: The politics of envy.

Mr. McCreath: They would love to know they had the long term security that you can have within the Public Service.

Mr. Keyes: Pitting Canadians against Canadians.

Mr. McCreath: It is perhaps not coincidental that in the town of Bridgewater, which is the largest town in my constituency, we have 25 people in the PSAC bargaining unit and when the strike began do you know how many of those 25 went on strike? Twenty-two. PSAC had to bus people in from Halifax in order to man the picket lines because people on the South Shore of Nova Scotia know that when times are tough if you have got a secure job, with a dental plan and with job security and pension benefits, you could have it a heck of lot worse than you have it.

Ms. Catterall: If you don't fire them first.

Mr. McCreath: They made it perfectly clear there was going to be a strike and those who did not go on strike were given the torches of hell. They were physically harassed, they were intimidated. People stayed home because they were afraid to go out of their houses. They were told that if they went to work their name would go on a list and I saw some of the lists posted up. Their democratic right to do what they wanted meant nothing in this union evidently. Their democratic rights meant nothing. Their names were put up and they were all going to be thrown out. I will be interested to see if Mr. Daryl Bean follows through on his promise to throw everybody out of his union who went to work during the strike, because he will be throwing about 60,000 of those people out of his union. I will be interested to see if he delivers on that.

It was interesting, the strike began and we were told this strike was going to go on. We were told that if back to work legislation came in it was going to be ignored. What happens nine days later? Mr. Bean comes in, with his friends I might say from the NDP, saying to the government: "I have got to get out of this situation." He went back to the table. The government made itself perfectly clear; it remained adamant that zero, three and three would be on the table and nothing else, but that it was prepared to negotiate other things.

What has Mr. Bean done? Mr. Bean, a few days later, said "we are going out again". He left the bargaining table. Now he turns around and says the government left the table. There was an unequivocal deal; he broke the deal. He left the bargaining table. What did he leave on the table? He left an average salary of $33,500 a year for public servants in his union, not a bad deal if you are a fish plant worker in Port Mouton, a pension fully indexed to the cost of living, one of the best employment security protection plans in Canada, a dental care plan funded entirely by the employer, and a full range of other employment benefits. Mr. Bean said "No, I am leaving the table and I am leaving that there.".

There was a lot of talk when the strike was on that something needed to be done for the people who were at the lower end of the wage scale of the Public Service and the government was not doing anything. What did the government do? The government responded, the government listened, the government went to the table and offered $500 a person.

An hon. member: An outrage.

Mr. McCreath: I understand the minister is going to make an amendment to this bill to see that they get that. Then what did we hear? For a week all we heard was about the single mothers. It is as if the whole Public Service were single mothers making less than $20,000 a year. The government responded to that. Then we heard: "Oh, that is no good, because there are not very many of them". Which way is it?

• (2050)

I said earlier that it is a political strike. It has obviously been a political strike from the perspective of my hon. friends opposite. We knew where the NDP were going to stand. Everybody knows, solidarity forever, the CLC, the CAW, the NDP. You get one and you get them all. Except then they realized they had a few farmers in their caucus. They had people who had responsibilities to the farmers in western Canada who are possibly having their worst year in history. What were these people doing? They were keeping a strike going that was taking money out of the pockets of the farmers of western Canada. This government is responding.

If you do not watch it, you are going to see the kind of support for farmers coming down from this government that this government under the leadership of this Prime Minister has always provided.

The NDP came in and said: "Please, we have to get out of this situation. We will give you whatever you want". So the hon. House Leader said: "Okay, you said you were going to debate this forever, you give us a House Order that says if they go out again, we will put the bill through the Commons in two days". Boy, the hon. member for Kamloops could not be quicker in saying yes and getting himself out of that little mess.

Then we had my hon. friends from the Liberal party, led by "me too Jean". We did not know what their position was when there was talk of back to work legislation. So we had to wait until the NDP said what they were going to do. Then we heard what the NDP were going to do—oppose the government. God forbid that the Liberal party would find themselves left out in the dark with only the NDP. So, "me too Jean" said: "We are against it too". They came up with a great idea. Their great idea was to get a mediator. That is what we heard form over there. "Let us get a mediator". It does not matter that the leader of the union said: "We have to have a strike". It does not matter that the leader of the union walked away from the table when there were valuable offers on the table for the benefits of his members. No, no, we have to do that.

My time is just about up, but I want to say one thing. The people of Canada do not support this strike. Most people in Canada recognize that public servants are people who serve Canada and deserve the opportunity to go back to work like the rest of us. Most of the people of Canada overwhelmingly, I should suspect, support the action of this government in regrettably having to put through this legislation.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, after the noise we heard from the other side, I am going to try to be a bit more low key.

An hon. member: I am sure you will make a lot more sense too.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): The last words I heard from that member opposite was that the people of Canada do not support this strike. I think it was the only true thing he said. I should not say that. It is probably unparliamentary. But the only thing that rung true with me is that the people of Canada do not support this strike.

In fact, I do not think they support any strike. People of Canada, the same as people on this side of the House, would like to see some way of ending this strike, but in a way that respects the process of collective bargaining and the process of mediation, the process Canadians have come to associate with a democratic system in terms of the regime of labour relations. Yet, this government absolutely refuses to submit this issue to mediation because it knows it is not going to move on that one line that was printed in its budget: zero, three, three. And it will not move. As a result, there is no sensible negotiation going on. There is absolutely no sensible negotiation that goes on at the table as long as the government has imposed that precondition on bargaining.

I have been listening to this debate for quite a while. Actually, the debate does not go back to the time that the budget was printed. I believe the government had in mind when it put that section in the budget in the first place that it was going to precipitate a Public Service strike. In fact, I would not put it past it that it had this legislation written at the time the budget came down.

This debate does not go back to the failure of the negotiations with the Public Service, it goes back much further. In fact, it goes all the way back in this Parliament to 1984 when the Prime Minister said he was going to come to Ottawa and issue pink slips and running shoes to the Public Service of Canada.

That represents an attitude on the part of that Prime Minister and an attitude on the part of the Conservative political party in this House about public servants and about public employment. This is the group that always separates the workers in Canada as to whether they work for the public sector or the private sector. They consider public sector workers as some kind of a lower form of life or a lesser form of citizen because those people have dedicated their lives to public service through employment by the government.

In some way, this party feels that that makes them a second-class standard of citizen, and that bothers me. It brings to my mind the recollection of something that happened in British Columbia back in 1983, and that was the so-called restraint program that was brought in by the William Bennett government. Everybody knows Bill Bennett, the premier before Bill Vander Zalm.

Some people might know that his chief strategist of the time was a man called Dr. Norman Spector. One of the things that Bill Bennett has bequeathed to the people of Canada, through the Prime Minister's office, is Dr. Norman Spector and the way he manages politics within a province, in the case of British Columbia, or within the country in the case of Canada.

Back during what was called the restraints era in British Columbia, the government used the excuse of a world-wide recession, declining revenues, problems with profits in the industrial sector, problems of profits in the private sector, to take the meat axe to government programs.

He especially targeted certain programs that Conservatives do not like. For example, he targeted the Human Rights program in British Columbia and he cut the teeth out of that program. He targeted protection for tenants in British Columbia and he cut the teeth out of that program. He targeted welfare services, and in particular services to families, and he cut the resources out of that program.

He took a look at the fact that the government of the day employed family service workers and he fired those family service workers. He said the reason for this is the restraint program. The cupboard is bare, he said, to use the exact same words that were used by the President of the Treasury Board. The cupboard was bare.

He used that program to take a direct attack on employment in the Public Service in British Columbia, and that during that restraint period was when the government of British Columbia began to contract out employment in that province, began to cut the wages of civil servants in that province. It is interesting, to my memory, when I read the line in the budget that says: zero, three and three. When they get that 3 per cent, for every 3 per cent they get they are going to fire civil servants in order to keep the wage package at the same price. It is exactly the same policy that was brought forward in the government of British Columbia when Bill Bennett was premier and Dr. Norman Spector was his chief strategist. That is where we got the program. That is where this kind of restraint policy has come from. This government has been Bennetized, it has been Social Creditized and that is where the problem has come from. It is exactly the same kind of right-wing Conservative ideology that has prevailed in the province of British Columbia under Social Credit, and now this government is being Social Creditized and that is why we have this attack on the Public Service.

It is strange that the technique, Mr. Speaker, that was used by the government in British Columbia was to divide the sectors of British Columbia society and the various social economic classes in British Columbia against each other.

When I hear these members saying: "Why should the Public Service have average wages of $33,000 a year when people in my riding and people across Canada have an average of $27,000 a year", my answer to that is: "Why are these people not bringing up the level of wages in Canada so that people who are working for a living and working hard, whether they are in the public sector or in the private sector, are not being forced to live below the poverty line, have sufficient wages to make ends meet and to bring up their kids and to send them through school". Why is this government not acting to do that? This government and its members are saying: "We have got thousands of people, we have got 1.5 million people out of work in this country. They would gladly have those jobs that the Public Service Alliance are striking from and staying away from". What is this government doing to make sure that it does not have 1.5 million people out of work? Why is it not developing policies to get those people back to work instead of, as the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said, developing the politics of envy so that people in this country are envying each other's jobs?

We could raise the minimum wage in this country. We could improve the rights to organize and bargain collectively in the private sector so that we would have an increase in wages in those sectors and there would not be the dramatic kind of differences we have in terms of income in this country.

Mr. Speaker, you have given me the signal that I only have a few minutes left. It seems to me that this government is talking about the cupboard being bare. Whenever labour comes to the cupboard, the cupboard is bare. Whenever families come to the cupboard seeking help for child care and for family services, the cupboard is bare. Whenever pensions come to this government seeking an improvement in their pensions so that they could make ends meet, the cupboard is bare. And yet when an election is called in British Columbia and the Social Credit Party needed something to bail them out to improve their chances, suddenly $236 million appears to buy a KAON project in British Columbia.

The same thing happens when the rich are seeking tax concessions and since 1984 the rich have seen their tax burden reduced by 6 per cent in this country. Whenever the rich and the powerful and the wealthy corporations come to this government, the cupboard is never bare. This government is always prepared to serve the people that it feels it represents and the people that it feels it should serve.

This is an ideological bill. This is a political battle. It is the Conservatives trying to destroy the wages and benefits of the Public Service in this country and trying to lower their wages under a general policy of lowering the wages and working conditions and standard of living of all of the people in this country other than the people that they have elected themselves to serve and that is the rich, the wealthy, the powerful and the large corporations who have been released of all of their burdens and obligations in terms of supporting this country.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wished to join the debate earlier in the day when the day when the member for Laval East was speaking because he was making some very good points on the hypocrisy involved in the union leadership here. He made reference to how they handled their own employees, when they faced the situation of having to deal with their own employees with regard to their own contracts, those people who work for the union leaderships themselves.

The member pointed out that in a time of restraint they too had to recognize that times were tough. What did they do, rather than have a fair system that is fair to everyone concerned, as this legislation is and as our budget was which announced the zero, three, three, not only for the Public Service, but for members of Parliament, the Prime Minister and straight across the board, everybody gets zero, three and three? Well, that was not quite the way they handled it in the unions with their own employees. In fact, there were some layoffs and reductions of salaries.

I was looking, as the member for Laval East spoke, at a column in The Sun newspaper by Ron Corbett. The business editor called it the union game. On some other union negotiations he is quoted as saying: "The feel-good phrases about workers' rights and job security seem like hollow come-ons when you look at the contracts unions give to their workers. As for the union leaders themselves, they seem a little more than tin pot ego maniacs; people driven by the hunt and the thrill of victory rather than altruistic concerns for Canadian workers."

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, these union leaders always portray themselves as the altruistic ones. The morally superior ones, which would also make them hypocrites, I guess.

To these union leaders it is a game, a game played by schoolyard bullies who got addicted a long time ago to power and fame, bullies who threaten and intimidate union members and the public to incite violence and to counsel their members to provoke the police and to take part in illegal activities. I think members saw today a memo that was circulating around the Hill to strike and picket captains, Tuesday, October 1, 1991, indicating the targets for today's violence and illegal tactics. The strategy, as outlined in this memo to strike and picket captains, was to delay buses as long as possible. They would be buses used not only by union members trying to go to work but buses used by people going to work in all fields.

Again they were not just union members, but anyone who takes the morning bus: teachers, kids going to school, hospital workers and clerks. These were the people being inconvenienced by this union activity.

The memo goes on and I will quote the strategy: "Please note this is an illegal activity and will provoke police activity". These are union orders. Go out and break the law. This is a position, no doubt supported by the NDP, to go out and break the law. This is the counsel we are getting from the union leadership. These tactics will not gain the respect of Canadians nor will they affect the resolve of this government.

I cannot believe that decent, hard working public servants want to break the law, certainly not to justify the egos of game playing union leaders. I believe our public servants understand the need for restraint. They are prepared to accept the government's offer and they want to work.

The Globe and Mail quotes Jim Chorostecki, the senior Public Service union representative in Toronto:

> There is a real strike fatigue setting in. People want it to be over with and resolved and quite frankly, our members want it to be resolved too.

That was certainly the impression I got this week in my own constituency when I spoke to union members. A young man came to my office and told me that he and his wife had just purchased their first home. They have an 18-month old baby. He is a fellow who wants to get back to work. He feels intimidated by union pressure in his own riding. He told me that he had not had an opportunity to vote for this union leadership. He did not have an opportunity to vote for a strike.

An hon. member: Where was he? Asleep?

Mr. Richardson: I will not answer the member over there. Surely members of the Public Service ought to have a vote on this action right now.

Let us have them take a secret ballot vote. Let us have an unpressured, unintimidated vote without the pressure of union leadership, a secret ballot.

I would suggest that if a vote was held today among rank and file, a broad section of Public Service would want to get back to work. Responsible leaders would vote and members of the Public Service would vote to go back to work.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, last night, when I made a very brief speech on this bill, I indicated to the House that in my opinion the government was doing things badly with regard to public servants.

[English]

Today, I want to elaborate on a couple of the points I started on last night. My main criticism of the government's handling of this affair was that members of the Public Service Alliance were offered a zero per cent increase at the bargaining table earlier this year after having been told they could get up to 3 per cent in the course of negotiations and after a pay increase had been given to senior public servants earlier this year of 4.2 per cent. I think I am correct in that figure.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier indicates that is correct. He is very knowledgeable in this field and I am sure his figures are better than mine.

The government was saying that a raise would do for the well-to-do, but a zero per cent increase was quite satisfactory for the lowest paid in the Public Service. That was the effect of the wage offer that was made earlier this year.

That offer was made at a time when inflation was running at 6 per cent in Canada. This was not a case of a year when zero per cent might not matter. Why was inflation at 6 per cent? It was because of the GST. The GST did more to drive up the rate of inflation in this country than anything else the government could have done. It imposed the tax on January 1 of this year, contrary to all the advice it got from the opposition in this House, contrary to the expressed wishes of millions of Canadians who signed petitions and sent them to this House objecting to the tax. It was contrary to the wishes of millions of Canadians expressed in polls which the government itself conducted I submit and which were conducted by various other agencies and submitted to the government for its approval. That tax was almost unanimously condemned by Canadians. It led to an increase in the inflation rate.

The government said to its lowest paid public servants in the face of that: "You get zero while inflation goes to six". Members can correct me on this, but I believe the Minister of Finance announced that his inflation target for next year was something like 3 or 2 per cent. In fact, I think it was to be 2.5 per cent by the end of this year if I am not mistaken.

If we achieve that target and these people get 3 per cent next year, they will hardly improve their lot in the face of inflationary pressure. Yet this year they get zero and inflation is six. That is like a 6 per cent cut in your wages, if I am not mistaken. You might as well take home less and they will take home less.

I think that is something that Canadians forget. Zero per cent increase for these public servants will mean a substantial reduction in take-home pay. Why? Because of the hidden taxes that this government has imposed on those people. It has increased by one-third the contributions to unemployment insurance in the last budget. It also took off the indexation of personal exemptions in the income tax which will result in a sneaky, hidden tax applied to all these people who get a zero per cent increase.

Other Canadians are not getting a zero per cent increase. Very few are. This government is gouging its lowest paid workers in an unfair way and it knows it.

An hon. member: What about the ones who lost their jobs?

Mr. Milliken: What about the ones who lost their jobs, says the hon. member. His government fired them; 15,000 of them. He should be ashamed of that record. If I were in government and I had laid off 15,000 workers, I would be ashamed and disgraced. It has not brought the deficit down one bit by doing it. It is still over $30 billion. The hon. member should be ashamed of his government's record. He should be repenting in sackcloth and ashes instead of sitting there heckling a sensible speech.

An hon. member: You don't believe it.

Mr. Milliken: I do believe it. I would be ashamed of such a record and so should the hon. member.

How can the government claim that this is fair? In 1983-84, there were 258,000 person years in the Public Service of Canada. In 1990-91, that was down to 221,000, a reduction of 37,000 person years. Hon. members have the gall to applaud this kind of figure but they know that most of these jobs have been just contracted out to other agencies. We know who is pocketing the difference. The fat cat Tories who are contracting for all these jobs through the Department of Supply and Services.

They have set up their employment agencies. They send their persons into work for $5 an hour for the government and pocket the difference because it has not reduced the cost of administering the Government of Canada and the government has never produced a tittle of evidence to show that it has saved money in that respect.

Yet the government says the civil service, having taken all these cuts, must still pay more. It has got to pay by taking zero per cent increase during this financial year and as I say, at the worst possible time and only for the lowest paid. The others take theirs next year when the inflation rate, if the minister is correct—and he usually is not—but if he is right this time the inflation rate will be 3 per cent. They will get 3 per cent which will keep them very comfortable, thank you very much.

We have got the other sad part of this whole equation. For 25 years in this country, the government has enjoyed good labour relations with its public service. Sure, there have been disagreements, sure there has been back to work legislation before. There has never ever been back to work legislation where the workers were sent back with zip. That is what they are being asked to do by this bill.

Always the legislation has provided that an independent arbitrator, mediator, conciliator or whatever, would be appointed to decide what is fair between the government and the public servants. This time this government says: "We know what is fair. Zero is fair for you. That is what you're getting and that is what we are putting in this bill". That is not fair. It is quite inequitable. It is quite unjust.

We in this party oppose this treatment. We oppose it not because we think that the strike is good or because we think that Canadians enjoy having a strike on their hands. We oppose it because we say this is unfair. It is the wrong way to treat your employees. We believe that an employer, whether it be a government or not, has an obligation to act with some degree of fairness. This government is not showing fairness.

We have never had this kind of legislation in Canada before. As soon as we get rid of this government, we will never have it again. I want to say that I agree with the comments that have been made by hon. members opposite in one respect, and that is that this strike is a major inconvenience for Canadians, both for Canadians who are on strike and those who suffer as a result of the withdrawal of services. I recognize it. I think every member of this House would recognize it. All of us through our offices and staffs deal with public servants across the country from time to time. They provide us with advice, information and assistance in dealing with constituents' complaints.

I am very much aware of the fact that the public servants in my riding are out on strike. I miss having them at their jobs. I am sorry they are out on strike and I have told them so. But I do not blame them when I see the shabby way they have been treated by the Government of Canada.

As an employer, I think this government has an obligation to do something to be fair to its employees and this government has abdicated that responsibility wholesale.

I want to talk about another aspect of this, because many years ago there was another bill before this House. I would like to read a quotation.

Madam Speaker, perhaps you could identify the speaker of these words:

> There was a time when public servants and members of the government viewed themselves as trustees of our money and acted accordingly. The example was set by government in that it had an obligation and responsibility to be frugal and efficient in the spending of our money. Frills were to be avoided in the way that they would be avoided by any trustee if he is to have the respect of the individual whose funds he administers. That, however, seems to have gone by the board. Frills and wasteful spending are the norms for this government, and represent one of the root causes of inflation.

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Milliken: Who said that, the hon. member asks. Has he any idea who said it. I will give him a hint. The date was December 1, 1975. Any clues as to who might have said it?

Perhaps hon. members do not recognize the words of the government House leader today. Yes, the hon. member as he then was, for Calgary Centre. Maybe he still is. It may be Calgary something else now. But in any event, he said these words. Yet he is the one who is part of a government that spent $24,000 to study the shrubs at Sussex Drive. This is the way trustees look after their accounts and their money? I do not think so.

Yet he stands up in this House, along with his cabinet colleagues and says the public servants of Canada do not deserve an increase. After all the years of effort they have put in for the Government of Canada, they get zero in a year when the inflation rate is 6 per cent because of the activities of this government.

Madam Speaker, I will have no trouble voting against this bill.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I think I could start by simply saying "here we go again". The Canadian people who are watching this debate must be wondering if we are in the same House. Obviously the message on that side is the same, consistently wrong, trying to hide the reality of the real problem. The problem is simply this. The Canadian government is exercising restraints in all quarters. We expect the Public Service Alliance to do the same thing.

To put the focus of the debate into context, we have to take a look at what the public servants of Canada get today in comparison to the private sector and whether they are or are not better off than those of us who work in the private sector.

This is what they have now. They have an average salary of $33,500 a year, well above the national average. Back in my riding people will work for less than half of that and be happy to get it. In an area where unemployment is 15 and 20 per cent, no one argues with $33,500 a year.

We all know that not every public servant makes that, but that is the average. They have a fully indexed pension, a pension that is indexed to the cost of living. Again, in the private sector, not too many Canadians enjoy that. It is a degree of security that most any Canadian would love to have. They have one of the best employment security protection plans in Canada. Again, not too many public servants have to worry about losing their job. They do not have to worry, as they do in the private sector, about a plant closure or whether the plant has to compete with someone else next door. They do not have to compete. They just do their job. They do not have to worry about a layoff in the normal day to day actions of the government.

They have a full range of employment benefits, including a subsidized health plan, a subsidized disability insurance plan, a fully paid sick leave, generous vacation benefits, family related benefits including subsidized maternity leave.

To me, that is pretty good, Madam Speaker. Let us take a look at what we are offering them. We are offering them a wage consistent with the government's budgetary guidelines, which apply to the Public Service employees, ministers, members of Parliament and senators, as well as their staffs, the Canadian forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Those two receive zero per cent in the first year and they have accepted 3 per cent in the second year.

In my riding, in my constituency office, I was confronted by PSAC demonstrators. It is interesting to note that my small town is a town of less than 5,000 people and that is where I have my constituency office. The rank and file PSAC members in that town did not want to go on strike. So what did they do? They bused them in from a larger centre, from one of the cities of New Brunswick, to demonstrate.

I did not know them and they did not know me, but they wanted to confront me, so I went out to speak to them. I simply told them, and they did run the story in our local newspaper, that most people in our community have absolutely no sympathy for them. The truth is, the people who are doing all of the demonstrating, hollering and screaming are not from my community because most public servants in my constituency want to go to work. They want Daryl Bean to settle.

I have received letters from many of them in my riding who want a settlement. They will accept the zero, three and three because they understand the realities of Canada, the realities of a downturn in the marketplace internationally in the last year. They understand what a recession is. They do not want to be off the job, they want to go to work. But Daryl Bean does not want them to go to work.

Think of some of the absurdities of some of the things that Mr. Bean is preaching and advocating. He is famous for mentioning, or suggesting, that this is not a strike with the Canadian people. He suggests that no, the fight is not with the Canadian people, it is with the government. He would not suggest for a moment that we are going to inconvenience the Canadian people.

Listen to this, and I quote from the Globe and Mail September 17, Mr. Bean: "We are in a fight with the Canadian government but we are not in a fighting position with the Canadian people." But they go on in this same article to point out and point out very clearly that western grain shipments have been stopped. They are stopped, Madam Speaker, to the tune of about $36 million a week. In fact, this week's estimate is $50 million a week.

Can the grain farmers of Canada withstand that kind of torture? I suggest they cannot. With grain prices depressed around the world and the huge treasuries of European countries and the United States treasury subsidizing grain and hurting our Canadian farmers, can they afford to have their grain sitting idly on the rail tracks in western Canada or any part of Canada? They cannot.

Who is he hurting? He is hurting Canadians. Mr. Bean is hurting Canadians and they are doing the same thing with the trucking industry. His intent, Madam Speaker, is to bring the entire economy to a crashing halt because he has no regard for what makes Canada work. He does not want Canada to work. He has not taken the example that he should take from other provinces. We are not the only government in Canada that has to deal with the realities of paying the bills. Four provinces have implemented a zero per cent pay raise for the first 12 months. Included, of course, is my own province of New Brunswick. But it also includes the province of Newfoundland, the province of Nova Scotia and the province of Manitoba.

Of course, Mr. Bean fails to acknowledge that four non-PSAC unions have negotiated settlements with the Government of Canada under the guidelines that I mentioned earlier on.

So Mr. Bean is the man who has perpetrated this. He is the man who has almost demanded that his membership go on strike. I cannot, for a minute, believe that The Ottawa Sun is on the side of the government, but I will read this one because I think it has been very, very fair in this, Madam Speaker. It states: "From our corner there was absolutely no reason for Mr. Bean to walk away from the negotiation table, and certainly no reason for him then to run to the media and blame Treasury Board for breaking off the process."

They have demanded that this thing go public and they have taken it public, but I do not think the Canadian public are in a position to give them much sympathy because they understand the restraint that we are facing, all Canadians from coast to coast, whether you are speaking in Newfoundland or British Columbia. All governments are operating under extreme fiscal restraint, extreme fiscal pressure and Mr. Bean has no regard for that at all. He simply wants to take them through this whole ugly process.

One of the journalist writing in The Ottawa Sun mentioned: "This is not a pretty sight when normally civilized civil servants begin acting like postal workers". They go on to say: "But this is what happens when a supposedly intelligent union like the Public Service Alliance of Canada allows its leadership to inbreed its principles with rogues". It goes on to say: "When PSAC President Daryl Bean said he was not above civil disobedience he was stealing a page straight from the strike training manual of Jean-Claude Parrot, the man who turned the Canadian Union of Postal Workers into a pack of Pavlovian wolves".

That pretty well sums it up, Madam Speaker. That is his intent, to stir them up, agitate them, but with no regard at all for the Canadian public.

The government recognizes the importance of the Public Service and has high regard for its Public Service employees. It is very, very sad when an individual like Mr. Bean can bring about a strike like this that could very well cripple the Canadian economy just at a time when we are on the road to recovery and we cannot afford a strike of this nature.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, it is with a great deal of concern that I rise tonight in this House to speak on Bill C-29.

This is a bill that will see some 160,000 members, including the lowest paid of Public Service employees such as clerks, ships' crews, employment centre workers, hospital service workers, who will be legislated back to work with no possibility of conciliation, mediation or arbitration as we are getting very, very close to ten o'clock.

This bill will create a precedent about the rights of working people in this country, including the government's employees, to free collective bargaining.

The government's absolute refusal since February to negotiate until the union would accept a wage control package even before negotiations even began could only result in the situation that is before us today.

My leader put it so well in the House when he said: "This government does not want to solve the problem. It tries on confrontation all the time. It is not the problem of looking at the deficit figure that is the preoccupation of this government today, it does not look at the figure for the deficit at all, it looks at the Gallup poll deficit where they are dead last".

I honestly believe that this government took another chance and rolled the dice. It probably thought the dice were loaded in their favour. Lo and behold, once again the government was wrong.

The government was certain that the people of Canada would support it in giving it to the Public Service. Unfortunately for the government, the Canadian public became quickly aware of what it was doing to the Public Service. It was stifling those who worked to offer federal government services to the same Canadian public.

Canadians are now realizing that the government was and is attacking the lower level classifications in the Public Service. The day before the former Minister of Finance tabled his budget on February 26, the Tory government gave an increase of 4.5 per cent to the highest paid government workers. Two days after that they had a new policy. They decided on zero for the people at the lower end of the scale. This was a deliberate provocation and now, in an attempt to extinguish the incident, the President of the Treasury Board states: "For managers we have frozen the budget for salaries and bonuses. They are frozen at the same level as last year". This is false.

• (2130)

History will not remember this government as a caring one. The Canadian people are in need now. The government's intention to reduce the deficit at all costs has created an inflation rate of 6 per cent. Of the 6 per cent inflation rate, half of it was created by the government's policy of higher taxes including the GST.

The conciliation board reports have concluded that: "Major stumbling blocks to negotiations is the employer's position on wages for the next three years".

Before bargaining even began the government said it would legislate strikers back to work and impose the zero, three and three solution. The Liberal Party supports collective bargaining including the right to strike. The Leader of the Official Opposition even wrote to the Prime Minister urging the government to return to the bargaining table to reach a fair and equitable settlement and avoid disruption of services to Canadians.

All the government needs to do is appoint a mediator, get back to the bargaining table and show that it is looking for a solution instead of fostering confrontation.

The government has deliberately played politics with the fundamental infrastructure that keeps the economy of Canada running. It has deliberately provoked a strike that has disrupted transportation, the movement of goods and services, the movement of Canadians, and our social programs.

Clearly the government knew when it introduced the budget in February that it had no intention of negotiating. It could have anticipated today's situation, yet it chose to use the power it has to designate the people working in crucial areas of government operations as essential workers.

This is just another indication of the government's intention to create conflict and destruction of services to try and recoup some of its rapidly disappearing support by legislating them back to work.

As my leader said, this legislation is not necessary. There is no need for it. If the President of the Treasury Board and the government had really wanted a settlement, they would have acted in good faith and negotiated.

There is Tory bonus money available for the bureaucratic elite—lots for the fat cats but no funds available for the work horses.

I want to wrap up by saying that our party will vote against this bill. There would be no strike today if it were not for the misjudgement of this government. The hardship that this strike has caused in this country could have been averted if only the government had named a mediator at the right time.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to this legislation not only because it is important as a current issue but also because the wider issue of labour relations in general is now and will in the future become one of the most important and crucial factors in determining Canada's place among her competitors in an increasingly global economic community.

With respect to this specific issue, I would first like to outline the government's program of fiscal restraint and then I would like to discuss some of the aspects of the current strike. I would like to discuss the legislation and the need for it, and then I would like to wrap up with some observations.

The government and country are faced with a physical situation that must be addressed. Wage restraint is one of a series of measures that the government has taken to contain both the deficit and inflationary pressures. The offer that was presented before the union was not inconsistent with other offers to other Public Service unions across the country. Provincial governments in Nova Scotia, for example, offered their civil servants a zero per cent freeze for two years and we did not see a reaction from the Nova Scotia civil servants to the result of having a strike.

In Saskatchewan as well, there has been a restraint program put on. In Manitoba, there is a two-year wage freeze and in Quebec, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, a wage freeze as well. In spite of the offers of all those provincial governments, the civil servants in those provinces did not feel it was necessary to engage in a confrontation with their governments, perhaps because they realized that wage restraint was not unreasonable.

I recognize the necessity for civil servants to ensure that they do not regress in terms of their purchasing power. But it is important to recognize as well, not only in the public sector but also in the private sector, that when wages rise faster than productivity the result is inflation. If you have a 3 per cent increase in your wages and you have a resulting pressure on inflation that results in a 9 per cent inflation rate, the over-all purchasing power is not generally improved.

In addition to provincial wage offers at zero per cent, we see other examples of wage restraint. The Sydney Steel Corporation, for example, in Nova Scotia offered a zero per cent wage freeze and the labour group there accepted it. Generally speaking, there have been accusations about union bashing and there have been accusations that the government has targeted the worker specifically. But if you look at other government initiatives, with regard to fiscal restraint, you wouldn't really call it union bashing. When you look at the 10 per cent cut in government management positions, including middle management and upper management, and when you look at the spending cap imposed on transfer payments you wouldn't really consider that to be union bashing.

Madam Speaker, governments are not the only ones considering their capacity to pay. Certain employers had to reduce their wage bills in light of their financial resources, as was mentioned earlier. Daryl Bean, among others, had to lay off 15 workers not so long ago. These same workers certainly would have been satisfied with a zero, three and three policy.

It is becoming increasingly more apparent that this strike is not a strike for the workers. It is a strike for the union leaders. This strike is not a strike to gain more benefits and to help out the workers. This strike is a strike to gain more power for Daryl Bean.

As a matter of fact, in a recent communication with the Ottawa Sun newspaper, a former union leader —as a matter of fact, he was president of a local with the PSAC union—is quoted as saying "The more I saw, the more convinced I became this wasn't a union for the workers, it was a union for the people at the top."

Madam Speaker, if you look at the results of the union strike vote, you will see that only 24 per cent of the eligible voters voted to support the strike. Only 40 per cent of all eligible members actually voted in the strike vote. Of that 40 per cent, only 60 per cent of the 40 per cent voted in favour of the strike. You do not have to be a mathematician to figure out that less than one-quarter of union members voted to support this strike.

As I mentioned, this is not a strike for the workers. This is a strike to gain more power for the union leaders. We have seen examples of workers being intimidated to follow the union line, union tactics that condone beating people up who want to work. There are even reports of unions bringing in professional agitators and thugs.

This strike is out of control. In Ottawa, there was a report of a mentally disabled contract worker who was roughed up while trying to go to work. She suffered extreme distress, as did her senior mother who was escorting her. As well, a medical doctor was pushed from his bicycle while trying to make it to a hospital to perform surgery. The doctor received a mild concussion. Nurses at veterans hospitals are being prevented from caring for Canada's war veterans. There are reports of handfuls of nails being thrown on airport roads, bridges being blocked, traffic being disrupted.

What is most interesting is the inconsistency that we see in Daryl Bean in that while he insists that his union leaders adhere to the union line, adhere to the union constitution and follow the union rules of going out on strike, even though they may not agree with the strike, he feels that on the other hand, it may be appropriate to disagree with Canadian law. So if the Parliament of Canada passes a law he says union members are justified in continuing the strike and breaking the law. He says it is okay within his own organization. He says union members have to follow the union line and they have to follow the constitution of the union. Well, it cannot be both ways.

This Daryl Bean strike is out of control and Daryl Bean is out of control.

This legislation is necessary. Grain shipments have been blocked. Millions of dollars of grain sales are being lost. Farmers are being hurt. This is not a strike for the workers, it is a strike for the union leaders.

Farm groups are asking for back to work legislation. Border traffic is being disrupted. Vital supplies to businesses are being held up. Business leaders are asking for back to work legislation. Public Service employees are going without pay. Essential service workers are being abused and injured. Nurses are being prevented from caring for Canada's war veterans by Daryl Bean's strikers.

I just want to conclude by saying that the restraint offer by the government is not inconsistent with other government offers. Other government unions did not decide that the strike was in the best interests of their province. The strike is out of control and the legislation is necessary.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that in the last two days I have listened to more blessed codswallop in this place than I thought it would be possible for any one collection of human beings to produce.

Let us take a couple of the highlights in turn. First of all, this concept that Daryl Bean is somehow the demon that is compelling all of these hapless, innocent, sheep-like public servants to suddenly become ravening wolves, clawing at the throats of the Canadian people, is ludicrous, is madness. No one person has the power to effect that kind of response in any large group of people.

All that Daryl Bean is doing is voicing effectively, and I might say with a great deal of restraint, the seething anger of his membership. It is that seething anger that has been produced by this government that is being manifested on picket lines across this country. Nobody likes that. Not even the people engaging in it like it. But to lay the blame for it on Daryl Bean is to completely, wilfully misrepresent the facts of the matter.

The demon in this conflict is not Daryl Bean. The demon in this conflict is the set of policies of a government determined to press down on the people of this country, the ordinary working people in jobs across this country, private sector and public sector, so that their rich friends, their corporate buddies can reap even more of the produce of this country.

The reason the government gives us for the necessity of this bill is basically threefold. Everyone else in the country is getting kicked in the teeth, so why not public servants? Why should they be different? It makes a virtue of the fact that its economic policies are destroying communities across the country and says: " Because that is happening we have got to do it to the Public Service too". That is nuts.

Second, "We have to fight inflation or recession". It changes from speaker to speaker. The fact of the matter is that the public sector wage bill comprises about 3.5 per cent of the total expenditures of this government. To say that somehow by reigning in that 3.5 per cent we are going to bring inflation screeching to a halt in this country, or somehow yank the country out of recession, is madness. It is economic voodoo.

Third, "We have to send a signal that we know how to restrain ourselves and therefore everybody else will too". I have got bad news for the signal is not getting through.

A recent copy of The Financial Post carries a story headlined "Recession doesn't hurt bosses' pay". I have a whole table here of the pay rates of top executives in the Toronto area which shows, for example, in 1991 your average president, CEO or general manager is going to get a raise of 10.2 per cent. Your top finance and administration executive is going to get a raise of 8.3 per cent. This is on top of similar raises in the previous two years.

The signal it says it is sending is not getting through. The signal it is really sending is coming through loud and clear. That signal is: "Hey, you big shots, you top rollers, you just keep rolling high because we are in your corner". The proof of that is its utter refusal to change any of the odious personal and corporate tax provisions that might do something to return a bit of equity to the taxation system, to the rates of pay for top executives and thus to the rates of pay of its own people.

For example, the manufacturing and processing tax credit is $1 billion a year, gone like that. One billion dollars, bye, bye. We could pay for a 3 per cent raise for all Treasury Board employed public sector workers this year with $135 million. In the manufacturing and processing tax credit alone we piss away a billion bucks.

On the lifetime capital gains exemption this year we are going to lose $1.7 billion, more than 20 times what it would take to grant that 3 per cent raise. For every dollar spent auditing corporate tax returns Revenue Canada recovers $17. For an investment of $9 million in audits we could recoup that $9 million we spend and pay for an entire 3 per cent raise. If we wanted to drop $35 million on extra corporate tax audits, we could give every public servant in this country a 5 per cent raise and still have some money left over.

The fact of the matter is that like most of the other economic policies of this government, this bill incorporates a gross inequity and an absolute attack on the people of this country that can least afford it in the interest of the people who least need it.

The proof of that is in the text of the bill itself, and I quote: "This act does not apply to persons engaged as independent contractors", the bill which now already exceeds at $5 billion the total wage bill for Treasury Board employees of $4.8 billion. We are exempting them. We are saying: "Keep rolling high. Keep charging us whatever you want. The sky is the limit. We have the money".

"The Treasury Board may change any terms and conditions of a compensation plan". That is what you get paid in an ordinary person's language. "That is extended under this bill if those terms and conditions are in the opinion of Treasury Board in respect of a conversion or reclassification that is required to implement a new or revised classification standard". In other words, all Treasury Board has to do is wave its magic classification wand and whoever it waves it over is exempted from the provisions of the bill and can get any increase Treasury Board thinks is mighty fine for them.

• (2150)

The nonsense, the prattle or the gibberish we have been treated to at the hands of this government and its backbenches for the last two days is just that. It has nothing to do with the real purpose of the bill. The real purpose of the bill is borne out in the experience of the Canadian people which for the overwhelming majority is tough times and for the privileged few is good times that continue to roll. It is grossly unfair and it ought to be defeated.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Madam Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity in the time available to talk about, if I can, how this strike is affecting a group of people in the country who are under some pretty severe economic conditions themselves, namely the farmers of Canada.

What I want to talk about specifically, if I can, is the Canadian Grain Commission. The Canadian Grain Commission is an institution in this country that is almost 80 years old. It is responsible for the weighing, grading, and setting dockage, which is foreign material in grain, of the grain we consume domestically and of the grain that we trade.

The grain that we trade is very important because when you look at wheat, for instance, 80 per cent of the wheat that we produce is exported. We are very dependent upon exports as far as wheat is concerned. With other grains it is similar. Half the barley we produce is exported. Something like three-quarters of the canola is exported. That market then is very important to us.

The Canadian Grain Commission plays a considerable complementary role in seeing that we export. It has developed a reputation over its life—and as I said it is almost 80 years old—of being one of the best if not the best institution of its kind in the world. When Canada goes to sell we can compete on price. We can compete on reliability of being able to deliver, and I want to say something about that before I conclude.

We can also compete on the quality and the type of product that we sell. There we shine. We do very well. The Canadian Grain Commission, and not a lot of people realize this, is basically funded by producers. It has something like 850 employees. Its head office is in Winnipeg but it operates literally from coast to coast in Sorel, Baie Comeau, Port Cartier, Montreal, Quebec. It also operates out of Thunder Bay and on the west coast and in Churchill.

In short it is in every place that grain goes into or out of a terminal. It operated across the prairies and in certain parts of Ontario. It is right through the country.

It basically is paid for by producers. On a five-year running average over 90 per cent of its operating costs are paid for by producers. It is not the typical public servant in the sense that most public servants have their wages paid by the general taxpayer. In this case the Canadian Grain Commission does a specific job for a specific group of people, namely farmers, and its operating costs, its wages are almost entirely paid for by producers.

There have been suggestions in here that we have rich friends and those who can the least afford it are being attacked. In this case I want to point out what the Public Service Alliance has done for farmers.

I could make the case that the price is as low as it has ever been. Farmers are currently being paid prices that they received for a product 20 years ago. To put it into perspective, all of us would find considerable difficulty running our businesses or running our households with today's expenses on an income that we had 20 years ago. Bear in mind that most of the income that grain producers receive in this country comes from exports.

What we have is a situation in which the people who work for the Canadian Grain Commission really work for farmers. We have a case in which farmers are being very much set upon by some international circumstances beyond their control, and heaped on that is a situation in which the Public Service Alliance has taken its people off the grading and weighing function. This means that we have effectively shut down our exports. We have something like 40 boats either due or waiting for loading in Vancouver. It does not make any sense if what you are concerned about is the Public Service Alliance. As the NDP points out, we should be worried about the people who can least afford it, if in fact the Public Service Alliance does not care themselves about people who are suffering severe economic problems. We talk about people who are earning $20,000 and $25,000. Nobody likes to see people in that circumstance if they need more to live on, but let me tell you what the average income of a grain farmer this year is, by statistics, $6,500.

If in fact the Public Service Alliance had chosen to keep about 200 people working, in my view, they could have kept a lot respect among farmers and they would have had a lot more clout with the general public if they had chosen not to take advantage of the situation that farmers find themselves in. That I find very, very regrettable.

Nobody likes strikes. We all lose in strikes. It is basically a lose, lose situation and nobody wins, but surely to goodness there should have been a way in which the point could have been made without taking advantage of people who are already in an extremely difficult circumstance. I find this rather sad especially when you think that over 90 per cent of the wages of a grain inspector comes from the very farmers that he is there to serve.

One of the reasons that we can continue to sell in international markets and do as well as we do is because of the quality of product that we produce. We have also been very competitive price wise, but there is another reason that we have been able to sell and that is our reputation as a reliable supplier. When we say we are going to deliver and when we schedule boats coming into a harbour to pick up grain the grain is there. This does nothing to help us with our reputation as a reliable supplier to the world of a high quality product.

When you have got 40 boats, either due or waiting at Vancouver, and you have got Thunder Bay shut down and you have got Prince Rupert shut down and you have got Montreal shut down, I fail to see how that helps anybody. It damages farmers. It hurts them at a time when they need every bit of possible sale that they can find, when we have a handful of people who can do this.

If the opposition and the NDP have some clout with the PSAC, it seems to me they could have made a lot of mileage if they could have talked to the Public Service Alliance and got about 200 people, I am told, to stay at work. You would have had grain flowing through ports. It would have made jobs for other people. Admittedly, even at very low prices, $2 a bushel is not a lot of money for a bushel of grain, but at least the grain would have kept moving.

What I simply wanted to point out is that when the opposition gets up and talks about the fat cats and the fact that we are damaging people who can least afford to be damaged, that the Public Service Alliance is doing precisely that. By stopping farmers and keeping people from going to work whose salary is largely paid for by farmers, what useful purpose does that serve?

I am told that in Winnipeg today it was not the people who work for the Canadian Grain Commission that were in front of the building picketing, it was largely people from other federal government operations in Winnipeg. A lot of people there prevented some of the grain commission people from going to work. I find this very unfortunate.

What I am suggesting is that if we want to practice what we preach and to help people keep selling into a market when they are suffering some pretty severe economic problems, I would suggest that no matter how much anyone who works for the Public Service is paid, it would have been much better for everybody to see that these people kept going to work and to take the Public Service Alliance people who are striking, as far as the grain commission, away from the picket lines and let the grain keep moving.

I simply want to point that out again to the opposition that there are ways to make your point as far as the strike is concerned without damaging people that are already being severely damaged by circumstances beyond their control.

• (2200)

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate. I want to say to the former speaker who just finished speaking that the minister should have mediated. If the government was so proud of the things that it has to offer the public servants, go to mediation and let an independent, impartial person listen to those kinds of disputes, not pit farmers against workers and workers against farmers and pensioners against pensioners. It tried to take away the farmers' help that is required. It divides and conquers and brings about that kind of confrontation. It is a matter of trust and no one trusts this government to bring about the kind of policies that are required.

It had to bring about this legislation and say that it wants to do away with the deficit because of it and the very people it is are going to use to try to implement those policies are the very workers that it wants to be able to bring about those changes. It is going to deny them the right to be able to deal with its problems.

Tomorrow, in front of these buildings we are going to see a demonstration. They are already starting to put up the barricades in front of this building and the government says Daryl Bean is to blame.

There were 20,000 protesters out here two weeks ago. Our House leader brought about some kind of conciliatory report to bring you two together, and the government failed. It failed the workers.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the double standard of the government has once again fallen upon us.

This time the government has taken away the fundamental right of collective bargaining for over 110,000 workers by invoking back to work legislation for the Public Service.

With this action the government is ignoring impartial reports of several conciliation boards. It is acknowledging, however, that it is bargaining in bad faith. It is disregarding the laws of the land for its own purpose, all of this from a Prime Minister who said that he wanted civil labour–management relations.

Where is the justice in all this? Where is the justice? A day after the last budget announced the wage freeze, managers got their bonuses and the workers got nothing? Indeed, some managers in departments like John Crow of the Bank of Canada who are supposed to be leading the fight against the deficit have publicly stated that they are not obliged to follow any budgetary measures and that they would only consider them.

This government likes to talk about fairness, competitiveness, and the need to work together and yet does nothing about it. As most other industrialized countries are forging the necessary links for co-operation between government and labour, this government is seeking confrontation.

All of this is in the face of a report that says: "Canada for the second year running is the least competitive G–7 country". Perhaps this is so because we have the least competent government.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, Babcock Industries Canada, a subsidiary of FKI, has announced reorganization plans which include the closure of a cable manufacturing plant in Arkansas and changes in Michigan. At least one product line and 50 jobs will be transferred from the U.S. to the Dominion Controls plant in Stratford.

The decision to place new work in Stratford was heavily influenced by the skilled, efficient work force in that plant. The company expects to be better positioned to supply more efficiently its customers with all product lines.

We have heard much of the negative effects of the free trade agreement and the revised auto pact. I am very pleased that this announcement is still another positive effect joining two others in my area which I can quickly mention: the doubling of space at FAG Bearings in Stratford, and the location of the Hays Dana plant in St. Marys near Stratford.

The free trade agreement is delivering jobs to Canada.

FRASER RIVER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Fraser River in British Columbia continues to be under pressure from pollutants and water diversion projects. This government has the nerve to appeal a court order requiring an environmental assessment of the Kemano Project and would appear to be delaying a comprehensive report on the health of the river.

Earlier reports have resulted in groundfish advisories and native elders have been found with poisoned tissues. The major report studying the state of dioxin contamination of the river from the upper watershed near Prince George down to the estuary is six months late and may not be released until 1992.

The health of the Fraser River is too important to delay. We have to clean up the river now.

COUP IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, just a few months ago, a legitimate government was put in place in Haiti following clean and democratic elections. The coup mounted by General Cedras which forced president Aristide into exile yesterday, is but a savage encroachment on the basic rights of the Haitian people. This coup, Mr. Speaker, must be condemned vigorously. The international community, led by Canada, must spare no effort to restore the democratic government duly elected by the people of Haiti.

Mr. Speaker, all of us in this House are duty bound to support any move or action to enable the Haitian people to get back their president, their democratic system and the freedom they are entitled to.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, since this government came to power seven years ago it has cut almost every program imaginable. It has cut UI and it has cut old age pensions with the clawback, but the worst cuts of all have come in the area of medicare.

The federal government is abandoning its commitment to medicare by shifting billions and billions of dollars in taxes on to the provinces. Smaller provinces like Prince Edward Island simply do not have the population to support the increases in taxation.

The government is forcing the provinces to choose between high taxation or reductions in medical services. The country can no longer tolerate the cuts in medicare.

Last week the Prime Minister said that the opponents to national unity would have criticized the Lord's Prayer. I would suggest that if the Lord's Prayer were health care this government would have cut it in half already.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, a year ago at the World Summit for Children world leaders met and pledged to help children around the globe.

On this first anniversary I would like to invite you to participate in the Keeping the Promise Campaign from September 27 to October 4. The campaign is serving to ensure that the promises made during the summit are kept. Although some progress has been made there is still a long way to go.

Every day 40,000 children die from malnutrition and disease around the world. Many schools and places of worship around the globe have planned events for this campaign from September 27. Events will be taking place in Ottawa to commemorate the week.

I urge everyone to join in the effort to create a better world for future generations.

TRIBUTE TO LOUIS LABERGE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, today is a special day for the Quebec labour movement, a break, a time-out to give everyone a chance to pay tribute to one of the greats of trade unionism in Quebec, in Canada and even in America, as far as I am concerned. I am referring to Louis Laberge.

Mr. Laberge has been a guiding light for all those concerned with the greater welfare of the workers. His contribution to the shaping of the Quebec society has been unquestionably gigantic. I did not always agree with what my friend Louis said, especially during the 1970s, when he had his mind set on bringing down the system. I am sure that all the members of this House will want to join me in thanking Mr. Laberge for his unswerving commitment to the cause of organized labour and wish him all the best in his new career which can only match the stature of the man.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the process of constitutional renewal in Canada will be expressed in many ways and will always require the highest motives of all groups in our society.

One example of that process and those motives was demonstrated in New Brunswick this summer when those who are devoted to the Atlantic salmon resource were challenged with the vital issue of its conservation.

As I mentioned yesterday, conflicts and tensions run deep on this issue and could easily have erupted into confrontation and chaos. Instead a direction of consultation and communication was chosen, involving all concerned in the quest for a new vision for the Atlantic salmon.

The minister advised yesterday that a conference will now be convened to define that vision. I wish to pay sincere tribute and respect to all who are working to resolve this issue successfully: sports anglers, commercial fishermen, native people and governments alike.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the tricks of the government whip, who tried to appoint to the legislative committee on Bill C-17 Conservative MP's that oppose the firearms control were brought through light. Mr. Speaker, these members of Parliament do not reflect the opinion of the majority of Quebecers who demand a more strict gun control. Therefore, why does the government persist with this form of obstruction?

Mr. Speaker, rather than trying to improve the bill on firearms, every effort made by these members is aimed at weakening that legislation. When will the government understand that Canadians want a control on firearms? And when will the Conservative members finally take into account the wishes of the population, who demands such a control?

JUSTICE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, a 19-year old woman from Burlington, Ontario was murdered some weeks ago and her body was found hundreds of kilometres away near the side of Highway 401.

This was a cruel and tragic death, especially because tougher criminal justice laws in Canada could perhaps have prevented it.

I rise in support of a petition supporting the parents of Nina de Villiers, a petition calling for important changes to the justice system and one which has been sent to all our offices.

In part it reads:

> This House should be aware that sentencing in crimes of violence does not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence of violence in order to act as a true deterrent, and to protect the public by removal of the offender from society.

It also indicates that the statutes governing the criminal justice system in Canada must be revised to reflect societal attitudes.

I will sign this petition. For the sake of a life which could have been saved, I implore other hon. members to do the same.

HAITI

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we have to make it absolutely clear to the regressive military junta in Haiti that we will not recognize their ugly coup. We will not work with them. We will not co-operate with them.

After a long struggle, the people of Haiti were able to elect their own president last February and for six months he has been trying to establish democracy and social justice in this unfortunate country.

Only last week he made an impassioned address to the United Nations which set forth his goals for his country and his people. We have to tell the Toutons Macoutes that their day is over. The people of Haiti and the world have had enough of their tyranny and oppression.

COUP IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I wish, on behalf of the members of the Montreal caucus, namely: Mr. Pierre Cadieux, Mr. Gilbert Chartrand, Mr. Jean Corbeil, Mrs. Marie Gibeau, Mr. Pierre Hogue, Mrs. Carole Jacques, Mr. Allan Koury, Mr. Robert Layton, Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin and Mr. Gerry Weiner, to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing us to denounce the intolerable situation that prevails in Haiti. And, while reiterating our support to the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, who adopted a clear position on behalf of the Government of Canada, we want to offer our support and our prayers to all our fellow Canadians of Haitian origin, as well as to the Haitian people as a whole.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the de Villiers family of Burlington, Ontario, whose daughter Nina was abducted and murdered in August, is calling upon this government to amend the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act of 1972, and the Parole Act.

As a result of the tremendous grass root reaction in support of this tightening of the criminal justice system, a petition has been prepared, of which approximately 1,000 copies have already been distributed across the country. This petition has been sent to every member of Parliament for circulation to their constituencies, if they so choose.

This is not a partisan issue. It is a people issue. I urge all members of this House to support the de Villiers family, all victims of violent crime, and all Canadians in their request for a thorough review of the Criminal Code by circulating this petition and showing this government that the status quo is no longer acceptable.

RESPECT FOR RIGHTS OF HAITIAN PEOPLE

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate our government for the position it has taken so that the fundamental rights of the Haitian people are respected, as well as for taking the necessary action to help restore the legitimate government that was elected in a democratic fashion, and its president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

Congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the Minister for External Relations for having suspended our bilateral aid of $15 million.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, according to yesterday's newspapers, the government is planning to start calling upon the smartest minds in Canada to tell it what to do. Thus this government reminds us that it does not have a mind of its own. What is more, it does not know how to mind the shop.

Mindful of that fact, Canadians have had it with this regime, so much so that the mindless Tories have made up their mind to call on the smartest minds of the nation to tell them what to do.

Mind boggling, Mr. Speaker. Mind you, I have a mind of my own about what the government should do and Canadians all join me in the same frame of mind in saying: "Resign. We won't mind".

LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, labour relations is an important factor in determining Canada's competitiveness in the global economic community.

Most fair-minded Canadians will agree that to be competitive, it is important for governments and industry to be effective. Both labour and management are key elements in achieving effectiveness, not only in the public sector but also in the private sector. What is needed is a new relationship in which both labour and management share the accountability as well as the decision making.

Unions cannot have authority without accountability. Management cannot assume accountability without corresponding authority. Unions should invest the millions of dollars in strike funds into company shares. Workers should be encouraged to share in the losses as well as the profits.

Let us work together for better labour relations. Let us all work together for a stronger Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, despite what the last member said and despite the unjust attitude and contempt the Conservative government has shown to federal government employees, the Public Service Alliance held a large peaceful demonstration on Parliament Hill today.

Yet, while demonstrators were singing the government tried to provoke a confrontation. As the hour-long demonstration was coming to an end, riot police were paraded out. Daryl Bean and the alliance leadership asked the members to resist the temptation to react. They listened to their leadership.

The question that must be asked is: Why did the government deliberately try to provoke a confrontation?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In 1986 the government, under pressure by the Americans, imposed a 15 per cent tax on Canadian softwood lumber exports. In spite of the free trade deal, signed more than two years ago, the government took off this tax only a month ago, last month. Now the Americans are threatening to retaliate with a new 15 per cent tax on Canadian lumber.

We understand that the Prime Minister discussed this problem while he was with the President of the United States in Kennebunkport in the month of August. We would like to know from the Prime Minister, if he discussed that with the president, what kind of commitment he received from the President of the United States?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I informed the President of the United States of our intention to terminate the MOU, that all of the requirements had been satisfied, that the Canadian national interest and the requirements of international trade law justified the decision, and that the Government of Canada proposed to implement it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the answen given by the Prime Minister is not satisfactory because, at this time, as the Prime Minister is well aware, they had managed in Quebec to bring the tax down from 15 per cent to 3.5 per cent. Every night on television they show plants being closed in this sector, in the Lac-Saint-Jean area and the Gaspé, in Mauricie, in Abitibi and the Eastern Townships. Can the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that there will be no new 15 per cent tax that would create absolute havoc in the lumber industry in the province of Quebec?

• (1520)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said, we believe that the memorandum of understanding has served its purpose. It provided some relief from a very emotional trade dispute at the time that the MOU came on.

We have seen the provinces during this period put in a number of replacement measures to reduce or, in some cases, eliminate the export tax itself. Now we believe that it is time to get the trade and softwood lumber products back on to the normalized trade relationships, and that is our intention right now.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we would like to know from the government if it has a commitment from the President of the United States when the question was raised with him in August, because under American trade law article 301 requests the approval of the President before acting.

We would like to know from this government if it has discussed that with the President of the United States and if it has received any commitment from the United States that it would not close down the softwood industry in Canada from sea to sea?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said, he did discuss it with the President. I have discussed it on a number of occasions with the U.S. trade representative, with the Secretary of Commerce. It is our best judgement that there will not be a 301 response.

We believe that there could be other responses designed to get the trade and softwood lumber products on to a normal trade basis. There are no guarantees in this business, but our best judgement is that there will not be a 301, and that is the basis on which we moved when we announced our intentions.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Canadian farmers are still looking for straight answers from this government on the crucial issue of emergency assistance. When the Minister of Agriculture was in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, attending a protest rally he said nothing about this issue, but after the rally he told the media that he had no intention of providing emergency aid to farmers. He has never been that blunt on the floor of the House of Commons.

Farmers want the truth and they want it now. It is time that this government showed some integrity on the issue and gave a straight answer. What is it?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we have been meeting with farmers. There is a meeting at the end of the week in Winnipeg, in fact it starts today, the Third Line of Defence Committee, to assess the problem. We are going to wait until that committee comes with its report.

The other question that farmers are asking is that if we want to help farmers keep some income, why did that member's party vote against sending people back to work, which would keep grain flowing in international markets?

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question again is for the Prime Minister. His government likes to talk about what the government has done for farmers, but there is one fact it never mentions and that fact is that last year alone it slashed payments to farmers by more than $1 billion and that was a time when grain was plummeting to new lows.

Farmers are wanting back what has been taken away from them. They want fairness and only a callous government would not understand that.

I want to know what this government is going to do today.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that farmers view this government as being callous when it comes to dealing with farmers. The amount of support that we have provided for farmers has been a record amount and most farmers know that, but we also know as a government and farmers know that there is no amount of money that is going to solve this problem for good. The real solution is going to come if we can get some sanity back into international trade patterns. We are working very hard on that. In the meantime, we are going to do the very best we can, as I have said before, to support our farmers to get to through this very difficult time.

I would suggest that if all of us want to support our farmers, and the indication in the House is that we all want to support them, we should support legislation to put grain handlers back to work so that we can see that our grain continues to flow so that farmers have income.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

The Economic Council today released studies that show that unemployment has been getting worse in Canada, that it has been hurting people for longer periods and that it has been falling harder on poor regions and groups in our country. Yet, yesterday, the Governor the Bank of Canada in Montreal argued that his policies should ignore unemployment and focus exclusively on price stability.

Will the government recognize that unemployment is a problem in this country? Will it recognize that it must tell John Crow to follow the laws of this land that set up the Bank of Canada and help get people back to work.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is an inaccurate and unfortunate interpretation of Mr. Crow's remarks.

In order to have sustainable growth you must have price stability. History will tell you that. The evidence is very clear insofar as the economies of Germany and Japan are concerned. When you have price stability you have sustainable growth, high levels of growth and high levels of job creation. That is a policy we are following and that is a policy that is working.

We have already seen interest rates come down by 5.5 percentage points because we have been able to contain the fires of inflation. The two go hand in hand.

When the hon. member talks about the difficulties, and we share those difficulties, I remind him as was reported today in The Ottawa Citizen: "We note that the world economy is at its worst since 1945. This is the first time, according to the United Nations that since 1945 total production and income of all the countries in the world will decline. Canada is included in that unfortunately, but we are well on the road to recovery and we will have sustainable recovery in 1992".

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. John Crow's high dollar policy has not only created high unemployment, but has artificially reduced the export price of grains and oilseeds.

Will the government admit its responsibility to make certain that farmers have stable incomes instead of a drop of over a billion dollars which it is expecting them to absorb in their net farm income for the crop year just completed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I remind the hon. member, and I am sure he is aware of this, that the average level of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the American dollar has been 92.6 cents average over the last 40 years. To suggest that 88 cents is a high dollar is not necessarily correct in terms of historical averages.

I am sure the hon. member also knows that it is the fiscal problem and the productivity problem that have to be addressed as part of curing the economic ills we face.

As my colleague has indicated, this government has been very generous in support of the agriculture industry. It will continue to be generous during this difficult period of time they are facing, going through a trade war that has been unknown in the history of this country.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): My final supplementary is to the minister of trade. Two separate studies, one in this country and one by economists in the U.K., show that in the subsidy free world that Canada and the U.S. are advocating at the GATT, world prices for grain would, and I quote: "rise up to 12 per cent". On $2 wheat that is 24 cents. Is this the government's final solution. Is this how it thinks it is going to solve the farm problem, with 24 cent wheat?

• (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is very well aware of the position that we have taken in the trade negotiations.

We have been strongly against the substantial export subsidies as well as the lack of access, both of which are problems for our farmers in dealing with the European market.

Our strong belief is that if we can get agreement through the multilateral trade negotiations to reduce those export subsidies, and open up access to the European market, we can do a great deal to address the plight of the farmers to date.

That is the position that we have taken in the negotiations as they relate to export subsidies and market access, and we will continue to fight hard for that.

HAITI

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has said that Canada would not rule out any means, including military intervention, to restore the democratic government in Haiti.

As the Prime Minister well knows when we joined the OAS, Canada especially opted out of the collective security provisions of the OAS charter. In other words, we have exempted ourselves from any military obligations.

What policy is it that Canada intends to follow? Will we meet with the foreign ministers at the OAS today? Is Canada going to be proposing direct intervention, economic sanctions and diplomatic expulsion?

I think Canadians want to know explicitly what it is that Canada is talking about and proposing.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend is so exercised.

Last night on television, he seemed to be saying that he endorsed fully the position that I had taken yesterday, and indicated that the opposition, much to my pleasant surprise, would support if need be armed intervention to restore democracy.

That represented quite a departure from a position taken in this House in different circumstances by the opposition, and it is not one that this government has yet taken.

What we have said, in my conversations with President Aristide last night, the President of Venezuela, the Prime Minister of Jamaica and the President of the United States, is that the Government of Canada will work with our allies at the United Nations and the Organization of American States. What we want is quite simple.

We want the thugs who have usurped power in Haiti out and we want the democratically elected president back in.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, all it shows is that once again the Prime Minister is falling into the trap of selective viewing and seeing only what he wants to see.

The real issue is what means is Canada proposing? What means is Canada going to the OAS Council this afternoon and suggesting be used to restore democracy?

If he was listening carefully yesterday, he would know that my real question is will Parliament have the right to debate and decide any direct intervention by Canada before it takes place.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the last time we consulted my hon. friends in regard to direct intervention around the world, they said no. The first shot and the policy of the Liberal Party was to bring the troops home.

Our friends down there said that it was neutrality all the way. We said that we would stand up and send troops to defend the United Nations. I can tell my hon. friend that we are working for a peaceful solution.

The Minister of External Affairs will be in Washington this afternoon before the OAS and proposing a peaceful solution.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): What is it?

Mr. Speaker: The question has been asked. The right hon. Prime Minister is on his feet, wishing to answer it.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to my hon. friend that the Minister of External Affairs will be in Washington to put forward the Canadian position at five o'clock this afternoon.

I spoke with President Aristide last night who expressed his gratitude for the fact that the Canadian government and the people of Canada were strongly supporting his return to power in Haiti, to which he had been democratically elected.

That is the position that we will pursue with our friends and allies at the OAS and at the United Nations. We hope that that peaceful attitude will prevail.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You are dancing in the wind.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that I am dancing around. When the dance was called the last time, I knew who to dance with and my hon. friend stood on the sideline.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

WAGE EQUITY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The Canadian Human Rights Commission is still hearing wage equity cases against the government, while the same government is challenging the Commission's right to settle these cases.

On the subject of wage equity, the Human Rights Commissioner said not long ago that the government should keep its word, and I quote: "Put your money where your mouth is". When will the minister stop fighting equality for women? When will he establish genuine wage equity?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that since this government came to power, tremendous progress has been made. The Liberal Party talks about wage equity, but one wonders where they have been all these years. It was not the Liberals who voted in 1990 to spend $317,000,000 on wage equity. It was not the Liberals who annually set aside $81 million to assist the catching up process. It was this government that put on the table, in front of Daryl Bean, an opportunity to incorporate these amounts in the basic salary, which would make it possible for women to upgrade both their pensions and future increases.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, with my supplementary question I would like to remind the minister that pay equity is not a gift, it is not a bargaining chip, it is a right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Catterall: Equalization payments can be withdrawn at any time far short of what is required. They do not mean equal pension benefits and equal death benefits. They do not mean equality in many domains and I ask when the government will stop its tokenism and give women salaries to which they have a right.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Well, well, well, Mr. Speaker. I am being enlightened every day. If this is a right, where were you all these years on that side of the House?

If we are seeking clarification in front of the tribunal, it is because we have a fair disagreement on the interpretation of principles adopted by this House that are not, in our view, similar to those that are put in place by the commission. We are seeking clarification, nothing else. Meanwhile the cases are being dealt with diligently.

SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In a secret memo dated September 3, the Prime Minister's Office warned to expect severe criticism of the cabinet decision to give blanket prior consent for U.S. nuclear submarines to transit internal Canadian waters at Dixon Entrance as the only access route to their new underwater Alaska base.

Since the internal assessment of this cabinet decision has now been completed, will the Prime Minister explain why he is approving this U.S. military project in the face of seven illegal seizures of Canadian fishing vessels in the same Canadian waters by the U.S. military over the last three months.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, let me just say that our long-standing position as a government is that the waters of the Dixon Entrance are internal waters of Canada and that position remains unaltered.

The waters are subject to Canadian sovereignty and will continue to be subject to Canadian sovereignty.

There are discussions we have been having with the United States. These discussions are ongoing and at this point it is inappropriate for me to comment any further than that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of the Environment. In a separate secret memo dated September 11—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has the floor. The hon. member for Skeena will put his question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, we know why these guys are at 15 per cent. In a secret memo dated September 11 Justice warns not to make public the use of an Order in Council to avoid a public environmental assessment of the risks of nuclear submarine accidents on the health and property of British Columbians.

Since the minister knows that this abusive cabinet process was found illegal in the Kemano case earlier this year, why has the Minister of the Environment chosen to deny British Columbians the right to publicly assess the nuclear and accident risks of this project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the hon. member found a decoder ring in his cereal box.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister will give his answer.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister for International Trade indicated that there are ongoing discussions on this issue and that is the case. As we deal with it, we will also deal with the environmental considerations depending on how the issue is presented to us as a government.

POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today in Canada more than one million children live in poverty. In relation to the top industrialized nations of the world, Canada is next to the bottom of the list in terms of our child poverty rates. Children are our country's future.

Canada's signature on the UN convention on the rights of the child is important, but what is this government doing today to provide the basic needs of food, shelter and clothing to our one million destitute Canadian children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the statement of my hon. friend is, of course, very misleading. The fact of the matter is—

An hon. member: It is not.

Mr. Mulroney: —very misleading and false, let me add.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: It is. Of the 187 nations at the United Nations, to suggest that Canadian children rank at the bottom of the heap is a misstatement of fact and my hon. friend knows it. In the interest of honesty, I know that she will want to withdraw that statement. It is not the case.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): She is nodding her approval.

Mr. Mulroney: We have made very serious progress on what is a substantial problem ranging from doubling the child care expense deduction for pre-school children, creating a special initiatives fund and a new supplement to the child tax credit. The child tax credit was increased by 50 per cent starting in 1986. It is prepaid for low income families. Tax discounting has been curbed. The GST tax credit includes a benefit for up to $100 per child. The government launched initiatives to counter family violence, help enforce maintenance orders, established a missing children's registry and curbed child sexual abuse.

I think my hon. friend, who is very interested in this very important program, knows that the government and the people of Canada have made substantial progress in this important area. I know with her—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland on a supplementary.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister.

The fact is that there are still more than one million children living in poverty in this country. I will be happy to provide the Prime Minister with the statistics about where we stand in relation to the top industrialized nations.

According to the 1991 UN Development Program report, Canada's international social sector aid directed to the poor is less than 5 per cent of our aid expenditure. After last year's UN summit for children, our credibility is at stake.

Will the Prime Minister tell us today how, since September, 1990, CIDA policy changes demonstrate increased and additional resource commitment to the world's children?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. friend, in the interests of the House being able to take a look at it, to table the data to which she referred. We will take a careful look at it.

It would be very surprising, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the United Nations has just surveyed 160 nations in the world and found that on an objective set of criteria pursuant to the human condition, education, and that involves children, Canada is the second best place in the entire world to live. That repudiates very eloquently those facts and figures.

Mr. Speaker, we have taken a very important lead in regard to the protection of children. We have a long way to go. But in regard to the implementation of the convention of the United Nations, we are asking all of the provinces to make sure that their laws are in keeping with this so that we can ratify it, as I indicated to the United Nations, by the end of 1991.

But I do not think that anyone is helped, least of all the children of Canada to whom we owe so much, by stating misleading information like that.

TRADE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I want to indulge the Prime Minister's need for ensuring that the people of Canada have full and complete information.

In his supplementary question, the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister whether or not the Prime Minister had discussed with the President of the United States a threatened retaliation by the United States to impose a new 15 per cent import tax on Canadian softwood lumber.

The Prime Minister knows that the Canadian export tax is being lifted within a matter of days. He knows that industry and government sources in the U.S. have threatened a new U.S. tax. He knows that that power lies in the hands of the President of the United States through Article 301.

The Prime Minister has spoken to the President. Has he received an assurance that Article 301 will not be invoked and that there will be no new import tax imposed on Canadian softwood lumber going to the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question. Let me try again and maybe the hon. member will take in the answer.

We have had extensive discussions with the United States; the Prime Minister with the President and myself with other members of the administration, as well as officials in the United States government.

We have a range of options on the table which are being pressed by various interests in the United States. My hon. friend is very well aware, I am sure, that the industry and some members of Congress have been pretty exercised by the action we have taken to establish the trade in softwood lumber on a normal basis, not subject to these rules where we have to go to Washington and knock on their door and ask for permission to change.

There are options on the table, some of which include a 301; but it is our best judgment—and as I said in my earlier answer there are no guarantees on this—there will not be a 301 action, that we will deal with this in other forms and ways that will put the trade in softwood lumber back on track.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Prime Minister, we do not want the judgment of the minister; we want to know, Prime Minister, from you—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Tobin: The Prime Minister knows that only the President, not Congress, not the U.S. industry, not interested members of the public, but only the President can invoke Article 301. Has the President assured the Prime Minister that the President will not invoke Article 301 of the U.S. trade act and harm, at a very desperate time, the Canadian softwood lumber industry?

In the interest of all the information that the Prime Minister says he wants, will he tell the House and tell the people of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I heard my hon. friend. I have already indicated to him that I conveyed to the President of the United States our view and our position, that the MOU was going to be terminated because, in our judgment, all of the conditions in regard to it had been fulfilled and it would be unfair and unacceptable for the Canadian industry to further sustain any of these burdens.

• (1450)

That was a decision of the Government of Canada. We executed that decision as we said we would. The President of the United States is responsible for the decisions of his administration and I am sure he will take whatever—

Mr. Harvard: No commitment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members know that we do the best we can during a 45-minute period to get as many members on their feet as possible. It makes it more difficult for the Chair when answers are interrupted by even good-natured heckling because of course it brings about a further response which extends time. I am sure hon. members will keep that in mind.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Yesterday the leader of the Assembly of First Nations said there would be a one-month boycott by his organization of the national unity debate, with a request that the government come back with a proposal that is more acceptable to the assembly on aboriginal issues.

In light of the importance of a resolution of aboriginal concerns to the success of the package on constitutional issues, I want to ask the minister whether or not he is in a position today to announce that, first, there will be a substantive change on aboriginal issues pertaining to self-government, and second, a shortening of the 10-year time limit for the resolution of the aboriginal self-government issue.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada put forward a very serious proposal, going farther than any government has before with regard to self-government for aboriginal people.

I will be very happy to have that proposal discussed before the special joint committee, and improved if possible. The Assembly of First Nations, through its national chief, has a different view, insisting upon the reference to the words "inherent rights." I believe it is in the interests of all of us if the Assembly of First Nations will bring their position to the committee directly, and the national chief come and make his case. My recommendation to him, for what that is worth to him, is that it would be better for him to do that sooner rather than later.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The rejection of an inherent right to self-government resulted in the failure of the first ministers' process on aboriginal self-government four years ago. The refusal to deal with aboriginal issues in the Meech Lake Accord resulted in the rejection of that accord last year.

Is the minister willing to risk another failure in the current round of constitutional proposals by refusing to consider aboriginal self-government as an inherent right?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): I am in a non-partisan mode, Mr. Speaker, so let me simply say that my recollection of events differs from that of my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that proposals should not be changed before they are discussed. We have a proposal before a special joint committee of this House of Commons and the Senate. It is a place where discussion can occur. I would hope that the Assembly of First Nations, along with the Metis National Council, the Inuit Tapirisat, other aboriginal organizations, and all other interested Canadians will come to the committee directly and make their case to the committee and not ask that things be changed before there is discussion.

COUP IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, there was a coup in Haiti against the elected government of President Aristide.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada on the position he has taken in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows and it is directed to the Prime Minister: Is he prepared to repeat to the House, the Haitian community and Canadians across this country, what he has done and what he intends to do to ensure that the situation gets back to normal in Haiti and President Aristide is reinstated as the democratically elected president?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to President Aristide last night. He is more determined than ever to resume the presidential mandate he was given by the people of Haiti. I also discussed the situation in Haiti with President Bush, the President of Venezuela and the Prime Minister of Jamaica. They all share my feelings of outrage at this coup. They are all determined to see the government elected by the Haitian people reinstated. Canada's objective, Mr. Speaker, is quite simple: We want the general, the dictator, to leave and President Aristide to be reinstated as the democratically elected president of Haiti.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Canadian entrepreneurs are encouraged to export in order to survive. Today we see that the dollar has gone up again. We see that there is almost a 5.5 per cent spread between U.S. treasury bills and our treasury bills. Surely to goodness there is enough room to send a signal to the governor of the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates so this country can start exporting again.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is incorrect. There is about a 2.7 per cent spread on three-month bills and that is the one that is followed. The hon. member knows that interest rates have come down and the spreads have narrowed. That should be a good sign.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The spread is still large enough that there is enough room to manoeuvre on those interest rates. Bankruptcies over the last year are up 21 per cent. Canadian companies are fleeing this country. When are you going to announce some kind of a national action plan to allow these exporters to become competitive and stay alive in this country and not leave?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true there have been a rash of bankruptcies, but I remind the hon. member that they have levelled off. Growth is reoccurring in the economy. The United States in the last quarter was still in a recession. As I indicated, this is the worst situation in the world since 1945. Canada cannot be immune from the world. It is a combination of issues that have to be taken into consideration.

We are concentrating on attempting to get the fundamentals right. Fiscal consolidation and control of inflation are the keys to sustainable recovery, sustainable growth and price stability. That will create a buoyant economy with job creation and the kind of economic activity we will seen right across the country from sea to sea to sea.

QUEBEC'S CULTURAL SOVEREIGNTY

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Two areas in which Quebec expected powers to be transferred were culture and communications. The federal proposals ignored these demands although they were confirmed by a number of commissions, including Laurendeau-Dunton, Pepin-Robarts, Macdonald, Bélanger-Campeau and many more. Only yesterday, two of Mr. Bourassa's cabinet ministers, Mrs. Frulla-Hébert and Mr. Cannon, said the federal government's offer was unacceptable, and Mr. Bourassa himself is seeking full cultural sovereignty for Quebec.

My question is as follows: How can the government keep talking about a genuine renewal of federalism, when it ignores Quebec's historical demands as formulated by Jean Lesage and Robert Bourassa?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend a very warm welcome to my hon. friend, after a friendly evening spent with Preston Manning.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1500)

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentions certain problems that some Quebecers have with some provisions, but he should not get all worked up about it. In the field of culture, the main provision that my friend mentioned, one Quebecer yesterday called it a very interesting and rewarding approach—Jacques Parizeau.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We all have friends, Mr. Speaker. Jacques Parizeau is my friend now and I can tell you that Mr. Manning is a very civilized man with whom one can disagree but still respect him.

Now Quebecers, from Robert Bourassa—

An hon. member: I object!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I will wait until order is restored, perhaps.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, now that Quebecers from Robert Bourassa to Jean Campeau and Claude Béland have rejected the federal offer that sought to take over Quebec's important economic levers and the government is preparing to change its proposal, it must nevertheless realize that a real reform necessarily involves the transfer of powers. What is the government waiting for to make the massive transfer of powers demanded by the report of the federalist party in power in Quebec, the Allaire Report?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have seen everything. The hon. member is now defending federalism again!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the Opposition asks me whether he will be an ambassador a second time. No!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Now, I could change my mind, depending on the place. The hon. member seems to be quite impressed by people like Jean Campeau and Claude Béland, who are very nice Quebecers and speak in favour of my friend's new proposal, because he was a great defender of federalism when he was here barely a year and a half ago. Now Mr. Béland and Jean Campeau have become his allies, and rightly so because they are great Quebecers. I could also tell him about Claude Castonguay, Alain Dubuc and Claude Beauchamp.I could also tell him about Roger D. Landry, a great Quebecer and a great Canadian who never changes his thinking as he would change his shirt.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today the European community announced that it was preventing the takeover of de Havilland by the French and Italian governments. For the last six months there has been tremendous uncertainty about the future of de Havilland. De Havilland has—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, I would ask the hon. member to put the question very clearly and very succinctly.

Mr. Peterson: Will the minister tell Canadians and give them the certainty that de Havilland and its 4,300 workers need? Will it commit today to ensuring the future of de Havilland and its workers? Will it commit to ensuring that de Havilland continues as a leading aircraft manufacturer in the world?

Mr. Speaker: The question is put. The minister may wish to reply.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the hon. member knows that that is a question which is impossible to answer today, on a day that the European Commission has said that it will not let A and A go ahead with the acquisition.

My hon. friend has been against this acquisition right from the start, and now he is standing up on his hind legs trying to look like a defender of de Havilland when he has been—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Terrebonne on a single question, a very short one.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in a statement made yesterday evening, the President of the Public Service Alliance clearly stated his intention not to comply with the special legislation and to continue the strike from within. He even said something even more serious, that this strike would only end with the fall or disappearance of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Following these statements, how does he see future labour relations within the federal Public Service, and does he think that the threats made by Mr. Bean are totally unacceptable and will jeopardize the loyalty and efficiency of the federal civil servants to their primary employer, namely the taxpayer?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, when one is lucky enough to live in a democratic country such as ours, that democracy is an based upon the premises that everybody complies with the law and I assume that every civil servant will indeed comply with the legislation.

I regret that Mr. Bean made those statements. He has been fighting an election campaign since the Budget. I can't help it. As for me, rather than wage an election campaign, I travelled to just about every city in this country to meet with civil servants and try to explain our policy to them. I am sorry that Mr. Bean made those statements.

THE LATE FRED WILLIAMS

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, veterans and their families lost a great friend last week with the death of Fred Williams. Mr. Williams was Dominion President of Canada's largest service organization, the Royal Canadian Legion.

[Translation]

I say philanthropic organization because this is undoubtedly what the Legion is, since it serves the veterans and their survivors by helping them obtain disability pensions and other benefits. The Legion serves thousands of communities throughout Canada and its deeds of charity are past counting.

[English]

Comrades such as Fred Williams are the reason the 600,000-member legion continues to be such a force for good in our country. He was generous with his time and generous with his heart. He was a Newfoundlander who served in the Royal Navy from 1940 to 1946. While he served under the British flag in those years during the Second World War, he fought hard for Canada, especially in recent months.

Under the leadership of Fred Williams, the Royal Canadian Legion launched a vigorous and an inspirational campaign for national unity in this country, because legion members have known for many years that this country is worth fighting for. Fred Williams reminded them of that and he leaves them as he leaves us to carry on the fight.

[Translation]

Personally, I will miss his advice, his company and his good humour. He always maintained an optimistic view of life, even though his health had been failing for several months.

[English]

On a personal level, I will miss his helpful advice, his excellent company, and his effervescent good humour. He had an optimistic outlook on life at all times in spite of being in failing health with cancer for many months.

I am sure that as we mourn him all his legion comrades will be consoled by the thought that at the time of his death he had achieved what he always had as a great ambition, that is the leadership of the organization he loved, the Royal Canadian Legion. Fred Williams was a proud Newfoundlander and a great Canadian. He will be missed by all who knew him.

• (1510)

The sympathy of the government, the party on this side of the House and certainly my Department of Veterans Affairs Canada goes out to his wife Elizabeth and the rest of his family at this time.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition I rise today to join in the tribute to the late Fred Williams.

Fred Williams was a man who distinguished himself by a lifetime of service. As a member of the Royal Navy during World War II his contribution, like that of thousands of other Newfoundlanders, meant much to the victory the allies achieved.

After the war, as a Newfoundlander and as a Canadian since 1949 his good work continued. He served for many years as a member and most recently as Dominion Command President of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Fred Williams, through his work over the years, stands as a shining example of the Legion's motto: We Care.

Canada has a proud tradition of caring for its veterans and much of the legislation which has come forward over the years has been at the urging of the Royal Canadian Legion and people like the late Mr. Williams.

Even up to the time of his death Mr. Williams was working on the Canadian Unity Program which may prove to be one of his and the Legion's greatest challenges and greatest legacies.

To the family of the late Fred Williams and to the Royal Canadian Legion, my party and I extend our sincere sympathy. Though he is gone, those things for which he stood and the ideals for which he strove will live on. His living memorial will be the work he did with the Legion, and though he will be sadly missed, he will be long remembered.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister and welcome him back from a very good mission to Sicily and Italy in remembrance of our veterans who are still there. I want to thank him for his tribute to Mr. Fred Williams, the late President of the Royal Canadian Legion whom I did not have the privilege of knowing, but as a Legion member I had many fellow Legion members express to me their high regard for him.

I can say one thing: in my years in this place there have been a few times when we have made a major accomplishment to redress former wrongs. While Mr. Williams was President of the Royal Canadian Legion, he led it into fully supporting the declaring of merchant seamen as full veterans, like any other veteran of any of the Armed Forces. That will be an everlasting momento to Mr. Williams as well as the Legion and disabled vets, all of whom support such a move.

I join with the minister and my colleague from the Official Opposition and on behalf of my party and myself in extending our condolences and best wishes to his wife and family. We know, in its real tradition, the Legion will do its best to find someone to fill his shoes.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few personal words to the statements made by our Minister of Veterans Affairs and representatives of the opposition parties here today, since I knew Fred Williams and his family for many years.

He has an outstanding record in the life of Newfoundland and of Canada and achieved the great eminence of becoming the Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Mr. Williams spent the whole of World War II in naval service, carrying on the great tradition of Newfoundlanders with respect to the sea. I also know well his family and, in particular his daughter, Councillor Wendy Williams, who started a career in public life.

I would like to extend to Mrs. Williams, and members of the family, my condolences and regrets and the gratitude I feel that I knew such a fine character as Fred Williams. I had the pleasure of knowing him and seeing his good work during his many years in working for veterans and veterans affairs.

POINT OF ORDER

REPLIES TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Wednesday, September 18, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands rose on a point of order concerning the answers provided by the government to written questions placed on the Order Paper, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 39, and printed in Debates of Tuesday, September 17.

He brought to the attention of the House the inclusion in those answers of statements of the amount of time required to prepare each answer and the approximate cost of providing the reply. In his presentation the hon. member noted that such material was extraneous to the question and argued that it should not be included in the answer.

[Translation]

At the time, very helpful interventions were made by the Government House Leader and his Parliamentary Secretary, as well as the hon. members for South West Nova and for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

[English]

Standing Order 39 states the procedure for dealing with Questions on the Order Paper. The portion of the

Speaker's Ruling

Standing Order relevant to the present situation reads as follows and I quote:

> —in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

In reviewing the provisions of the Standing Order as well as its history, it is interesting to note that generally the problems with this rule which have arisen in the past have been with the wording and nature of questions, rather than with answers.

[Translation]

This is why the Clerk of the House is charged with the task of examining notices of questions to ensure that they meet the requirements of Standing Order 39(1) before they are placed on the Notice Paper. They are scrutinized as to the correctness of their form and content.

[English]

As noted in the annotated Standing Orders on page 126, the principles guiding the Clerk are that no argument or opinion is to be offered nor any irrelevant fact stated in the question. This is ensured the primary purpose of such questions as stated in the Standing Orders, that is, the seeking of information from the ministry relating to public affairs.

[Translation]

The requirements that questions presented offer no argument or opinion, nor any other facts except as may be necessary, were extended to the replies to questions in 1906. This was done expressly to ensure that the process remained an exchange of information rather than becoming an opportunity for debate.

[English]

Therefore, in the present circumstances, since the type of information referred to by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is not germane to the information requested, I would ask the hon. government House leader and his parliamentary secretary to review carefully the replies provided by the ministry to be published in the Debates to ensure that, in future, all such answers conform to the provisions of Standing Order 39.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

CANADA-JAPAN INTERPARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in 1985 Prime Minister Mulroney of Canada and former Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan, with the good offices of the Speaker of Canada, initiated the Canada-Japan Interparliamentary Association.

I am pleased to report today that the association has flourished and completed exchanges between the Parliament of Canada and the Diet of Japan on an annual basis.

This report which I am tabling today deals with the second annual meeting held in Japan this past June. Canadian delegates brought to the discussion table many important bilateral issues, including the SPF lumber issue, driftnet fishing, as well as agricultural, trade and investment issues.

We will continue to raise these issues. Also, we were pleased to accomplish a cultural exchange between Japan and Canada and we are working to establish a program to exchange young leaders between the Parliament of Canada and the Diet of Japan.

This report details some of these activities and I am very pleased and proud to present it to the House today.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

HOUSE MANAGEMENT—NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding the selection of votable items among Private Members' Business. Pursuant to Standing Order 92(2), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT—TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Committee on House Management.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs on Canada's Merchant Marines.

The Merchant Marines were vital to World War II. More than 70 Canadian ships were sunk at sea and the death rate in the Merchant Marines was nearly 10 per cent compared to 4 per cent in all other forces. They were under military command and discipline. They were frequently attacked and under-protected. Much has been done to advance the plight of the Merchant Marines over the past 15 years.

The Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs believes that if the recommendations of this report are followed that justice will have been significantly advanced and the role of the Merchant Marines in the defence of freedom will finally have been recognized.

We commend our recommendations to the government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ENDANGERED SPECIES AND BIOLOGICAL DIVERSITY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-303, an act respecting endangered species and biological diversity.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill to protect endangered species is a historic occasion for the House of Commons because this is the first time that a major bill of this kind has been introduced.

The bill seeks to call upon the resources of other bills, like those in the United States, but it is based instead not on species specific protection but instead in terms of the protection of the habitat, recognizing that one of better ways to protect endangered species is to enhance or intensify the biological diversity of their habitat.

I believe this bill will receive a good hearing in the House of Commons. I believe that it is in its place a bit early and its concepts are far-reaching, but I am sure that it will find the light of day in the interests of this very important subject to many Canadian naturalists, in fact to the whole chain of life in the globe.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-304, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (Canada Post Corporation).

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to declare Canada Post Corporation an essential service and thereby outlaw any further strikes.

I have great respect for the men and women who work for Canada Post, but Canadians should never again have to endure the anguish and economic hardships which were inflicted on so many people during the recent Canada Post strike. Regardless of Chief Justice Gold's mediation decision, I believe members of this House should pass this bill.

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague Alan Redway of Don Valley East for supporting this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

VICTORIA CROSS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-305, an act respecting the award of the Victoria Cross.

He said: Madam Speaker, since the Crimean War, the Victoria Cross has been the highest military award given in the British Commonwealth. It is the most prestigious military decoration ever given to Canadians.

However, when the former government brought in new Canadian orders of bravery in 1972, the Victoria Cross was omitted, and as a result, can no longer be awarded in Canada. Unfortunately, it did not even establish a suitable award for gallantry in the face of the enemy to replace the Victoria Cross.

This bill would restore the Victoria Cross as the highest Canadian accolade for an act of valour in the face of the enemy. The Victoria Cross would be awarded by the Governor General as the Queen's representative in Canada on the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and it would restore the special place of the Victoria Cross in Canadian gallantry awards.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

> That three members and two recherchers from the Standing Committee on Transport be authorized to travel to Winnipeg on October 9 and 10, 1991 in order to attend the conference on the transport of grain.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I know that this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. What I find difficult to understand is that we had started a practice whereby we had the budgets for these different trips. Now we get a motion like this out of the blue. I am willing to give my approval, but I would like to see the budgets tabled, as was done by other members who requested the same kind of authority to travel. I believe it is useful to see the amount of expenses for such trips.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians from southwestern Ontario, from towns such as Thamesville, Alvinston, Croton, Wallaceburg, Kippen, Londesborough and so on.

They want to join with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture, which unanimously passed a motion on August 29, 1991 calling on the Government of Canada to provide this summer, this year, a third line of defence for cash assistance on an emergency basis so as to provide the same net level of support that would have been provided under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and Net Income Stabilization Account had they been in place for the 1991 crop year.

This being one of the worst years for the agricultural communities both in terms of crop and in terms of cash flow, the petitioners call on the House of Commons and Parliament to encourage this government to provide such assistance as proposed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture last August 29.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour of tabling the following petition of the undersigned residents living right across Ontario.

They present the following grievance: Whereas those eastern Europeans who entered Canada and are currently registered in either the Bill C-84 or the Bill C-55 refugee claims process have been prejudiced by the delay in the processing of their claims, and whereas those refugee claimants who although successfully established in Canada are being refused landing at the pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews, these petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to accept all persons registered in the refugee backlog who are established in Canada for landed immigrant status at their pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, recognizing the report that was just tabled in the House by the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, I have a petition to present from 50 residents of my constituency.

They call on the Parliament of Canada to recognize the critically important contribution made to the defence of Canada and the victory of allied forces by Canada's merchant seamen, that merchant seamen faced grave risks in carrying out their duties, that many lost their lives or were injured, and that these risks were equivalent to those taken by other Canadian forces.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to request that the government designate Canada's merchant seamen as veterans of World War II, extending all benefits accorded to veterans of the regular forces.

NATIONAL STANDARDS IN EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my colleague from York West and I are introducing petitions concerning illiteracy in Canada.

Whereas Canada wishes to remain internationally competitive and keep its status as a first-class country, and whereas Canada wishes to have capable, knowledgeable workers who will be able to maintain Canada's competitiveness, whereas Canada wishes to reduce its rate of functional illiteracy, which is now 38 per cent, so as to better train these workers, for these reasons taxpayers from Quebec and Ontario want Parliament to urge the government to promote and encourage the establishment of national education standards, in consultation with the provincial governments, education professionals, managers and workers, parents, young people, volunteer organizations and ordinary citizens.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a total of 28 petitions with over 1,000 signatures from people all across Canada who humbly pray and petition the House of Commons to take a serious look at the trend the government is setting with respect to collective bargaining.

Considering the fact that this House has had to bring in back to work legislation, and the fact that collective bargaining in this country is now in a very difficult position, these signatures represent those who would like Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining for Canadian workers all across this country.
