ADDENDA VOL. VI.

"MR. CONNELL said that, a few years since, the New Brunswick Railway Company constructed two bridges over the River St. John with provision for draws, which, however, had not been completed. The River St. John was navigable for steamers of 300 tons and upwards a distance of 74 miles above Woodstock. The York and Carlton Steamboat Company had in course of construction a steamer to ply in the river, which would be finished the coming spring. This company claimed that the draws in the bridges were not of sufficient width, and were not in the proper place to enable steamers to pass through with safety, and they wished the Government to see that proper draws were placed in the bridges, so that they would be able to run their steamer the coming spring, which ought to be done before the opening of navigation, or it would have to be postponed till a later period in the season, and this would be a great damage to the company and an inconvenience to the farmers and others along the river."

"MR. CONNELL said the steamer that was in course of construction was smaller than some of those which had formerly run on the river."

IN THE

FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA,
1879, IN THE FORTY-SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE THIRD PARLIAMENT of the Dominion, which had been prorogued from the 10th day of May, 1878, and thence from time to time, was dissolved by Proclamation on the 17th day of August, 1878; and, writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the Despatch of Business, on Thursday, the 13th day of February, 1879, and did accordingly meet on that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 13th Feb., 1879.

On which day, being the first day of the meeting of the first Session of the fourth Parliament, for the despatch of business,—Alfred Patrick, Esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, Donald William Macdonell, Gustavus William Wicksteed, Henry Hartney, John George Bourinot and Jean Philippe Leprohon, Esquires, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the oath to members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty;—Richard Pope, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said Alfred Patrick a book containing a list of the names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

The aforesaid Commissioners did administer the oath to the Members who were present; which being done, and the Members having subscribed the roll containing the oath, they repaired to their seats.

“Gentlemen,

“The Honourable William Johnstone Ritchie, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.”

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

“Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate, and

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

“The Honourable William Johnstone Ritchie, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the causes of summoning this Parliament will be declared.”

And the House being returned;

ELECTION OF A SPEAKER.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, addressing himself to the Clerk, said: Mr. Patrick, I have the honour to move that the Hon. Joseph Godéric Blanchet, the member representing the electoral district of the county of Lévis do take the Chair of this House as Speaker. To those hon. gentlemen who have been in Parliament for some time, it should not be requisite for me to state the peculiar qualifications and fitness of the gentleman whose name I have just proposed for the office of Speaker. I will say generally that Mr. Blanchet, the hon. member for Lévis, has had great parliamentary experience. From 1861 until the Confederation of the Provinces, he was a member of the Parliament of the late Province of Canada, and those who had the privilege of knowing him during that long period can fully appreciate his good qualities. Since Confederation he has had varied experience, not only in the House of Commons of Canada, but in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec. His experience has not been merely a parliamentary one, but for eight years he presided as Speaker over the Legislative Assembly of his native Province, where, I am warranted in saying, his conduct received the approbation and general acceptance from both sides of that body. He has shown, Mr. Patrick, as a member of this House, great aptitude in discussing all questions of constitutional law and parliamentary practice; indeed his experience as a Speaker and a member has enabled him to take a position as an authority in the House of Commons, as well as in the Provincial Legislature, on all such questions. I move that he take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

MR. TILLEY: I have the honour Mr. Patrick, of seconding the nomination of the hon. member for Lévis as Speaker.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Patrick, before indicating the course I propose to take in regard to the Speakership, I desire to express my astonishment at the nomination the hon. gentleman has made. We all, who were in the House in 1873, the House elected in 1872, recollect that the hon. gentleman, in proposing the Speaker of the previous House, gave it as an expression of his opinion that the practice continued in England for many years of electing the previous Speaker until something should withdraw that previous Speaker from public life, by obtaining a peerage or otherwise, should be introduced into this country, and the hon. gentleman, in pursuit of that view which he took, and had a right to take, and which was in itself intelligible enough, proposed Mr. Cockburn, the Speaker of the previous Parliament. I had supposed, as a matter of course, that the hon. gentleman who now leads this House would take the same course now that he had taken in 1873, especially as he himself commended the action of the late Speaker, my hon. friend the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), as being above all suspicion of partizanship. He eulogised that hon. gentleman last year, on the occasion of a somewhat similar motion, as being a very excellent Speaker; one who had discharged the duties which devolved upon him with the greatest impartiality. I expected, therefore, as the natural result of the stand taken by the hon. gentleman, that he would to-day have proposed my hon. friend the member for Gloucester as the Speaker of this Parliament. Hon. gentlemen will see that it is very difficult to understand how the hon. gentleman could have escaped the responsibility of taking this course, and, but for the adroitness which the hon. gentleman exhibits in changing positions with marvellous rapidity in everything political, no doubt we would have had that motion made. As the hon. gentleman has not chosen to do that, under all the circumstances I do not think it will devolve upon me to move any amendment to the motion, and I will only say, therefore, in reference to the motion which the hon. gentleman has made, that it would be difficult for him to name any hon. gentleman on his side of the House who could give greater satisfaction to myself and the members behind me on this side of the House. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who has been proposed as the Speaker will discharge the high and onerous duties devolving upon him with faithfulness and conscientiousness, and that none will have reason to complain of his conduct as presiding officer of the House. It will be my duty, and the duty of those who surround me, to afford him every support consistent, with a due regard for parliamentary privileges, which we can afford him.

Motion agreed to.

MR. PATRICK : I declare Mr. Blanchet duly chosen to occupy the Chair of this honourable House as its Speaker.

Mr. BLANCHET was then conducted from his place to the Chair by Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD and Mr. TILLEY.

Then Mr. SPEAKER ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: I humbly thank the House for the great honour which they have just conferred on me in electing me unanimously to be their Speaker. I shall endeavour to be worthy of so responsible and important a position. In cases where experience and knowledge of parliamentary usage and law will be required, I will ask the advice and assistance of those members of this House who have been trained in parliamentary practice. And, in presiding over the deliberations of this Assembly, I will act with the strictest impartiality, according to the laws of Parliament, and in conformity with the will of this House.

And then the Mace, which before lay under the table, was laid upon the table.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD then said: Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in congratulating you upon your election. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

House adjourned at

Twenty-five minutes after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 14th Feb., 1879.

The House met at Three o' clock.

PRAYERS.

The Speaker Elect having taken the Chair,

“His Excellency the Governor-General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.”

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker Elect, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber;

Then the HONOURABLE JOSEPH GODERIC BLANCHET, SPEAKER Elect, said:

“MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

“The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

“If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all reasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favorable consideration.”

The SPEAKER of the SENATE then said:

“MR. SPEAKER,

“I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor-General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and Government, and, not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

“I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all reasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.”

Then His Excellency the Governor-General was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned,

Mr. SPEAKER reported that the House had been in the Senate Chamber, and that he had, in their names and on their behalf, made the usual claim of privileges, which His Excellency had been pleased to confirm to them.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a judgment, bearing date 7th August, 1878, of the Hon. Mr. Justice Plamondon, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, in the matter of the Election Petition for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska; also a certificate and report from the Hon. Mr. Justice Armour, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, relating to the election for the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Hastings; also a certificate and report from the Hon. Mr. Justice Henri T. Taschereau, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, relating to the election for the Electoral District of Kamouraska.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE BILL.—[Bill No. 1.]

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced a Bill (No. 1) Respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported His Excellency's Speech from the Throne, and read a copy thereof to the House, which is as follows:—

"Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate;

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"In meeting the Parliament of Canada for the first time, I desire to express the gratification I feel at having been selected by Her Majesty for the high and important office I now fill, and to assure you of the great satisfaction with which I now seek your aid and co-operation.

"In acknowledging with profound gratitude the reception which has been accorded to myself, as Her Majesty's representative, I am also commanded by the Queen to convey, through you, to the people of Canada, Her thanks for the loyal, generous and kindly manner in which they have welcomed Her daughter.

"The contribution of Canadian products and manufactures to the great National Exhibition at Paris, last year, attracted much attention, and, it is believed, will have a beneficial effect on the trade of the Dominion with Europe. I congratulate you on the success which must, in no small degree, be attributable to the kind and unceasing exertions of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, as President of the British section. The report of the Canadian Commissioners will be laid before you when received.

MR. SPEAKER.

"I am pleased to inform you that the amount awarded for the Fishery claims, under the Washington Treaty, has been paid by the United States, and that Her Majesty's Government has arranged with Canada and Newfoundland for their respective shares of the award. The papers on the subject shall be submitted to you.

"The important and rapidly increasing trade between Canada and England in live cattle has been seriously threatened by the appearance, in various parts of the United States, of pleuro-pneumonia. In order to prevent the contagion from spreading to Canada, and the consequent interruption of the trade, I have caused an order to be issued under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, 1869, prohibiting the importation or introduction into the Dominion of American cattle, for a short period. It is hoped that the disease will be, ere long, extinguished in the United States, and the necessity for continuing the prohibition removed. Your attention will be invited to an amendment of the Act I have just referred to.

"My Government has commenced negotiations, with Her Majesty's sanction, for the development of the trade of Canada with France and Spain, and with their respective colonies. I hope to be able to lay before you the result of these negotiations during the present Session.

"It is the purpose of my Government to press for the most vigorous prosecution of the Canadian Pacific Railway and to meet the reasonable expectations of British Columbia. In carrying out this intention, due regard must be had to the financial position of the country. Communication by rail has been effected between Manitoba and the United States system of railways by the junction, at St. Vincent, of the Pembina branch of our railway with the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad. That portion of the main line which extends from English River to Keewatin is now being placed under contract, and will be energetically pushed to completion in order to secure, as rapidly as is possible, the connection between Lake Superior and the great North-West.

"A Bill for the amendment and consolidation of the Acts relating to Stamps shall be submitted for your consideration, as well as a measure amending the Act relating to Weights and Measures.

"The decennial census must be taken in 1881. I think it expedient that a measure for the purpose should be passed during the present Session in order to give ample time for the preparation of all the preliminary arrangements and to ensure the census being taken as accurately and inexpensively as possible. In connection with this subject it may be well to consider the propriety of providing some means for the collection and collation of vital, criminal and general statistics.

"A Bill will be laid before you for the re-arrangement of some of the Departments of the Government, and also measures relating to the survey and management of the Dominion Lands, to the Mounted Police, and to the Post Office Department; and also for the amendment, in some particulars, of the laws relating to Indians.

"A measure will also be submitted to you for the vesting in Her Majesty, for the use of the Dominion, of certain ordnance and admiralty lands in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

"The Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you at an early day. They have been prepared with as much regard to economy as is compatible with the efficiency of the public service.

"I regret that the receipts into the Treasury from ordinary sources continue to be inadequate to meet the charges against the Consolidated Revenue. You will, I doubt not, agree with me in the opinion that it is not desirable that our finances should longer remain in this condition. By the application of the strictest economy to the public expenditure, and by the readjustment of the tariff with the view of increasing the revenue, and, at the same time, of developing and encouraging the various industries of Canada, you will, I trust, be enabled to restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, and to aid in removing the commercial and financial depression which unhappily continues to exist. I have directed that the Public Accounts of the past financial year shall be laid before you.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

"Parliament has recognized the importance of providing for the safe deposit of the surplus earnings of the people by arranging for their being placed with the Government at a fair rate of interest. It may be well for you to consider how far it is practicable to give a like security and encouragement to persons who may desire, by an insurance upon their lives, to make provision for those dependent upon them.

"Your best attention will, I doubt not, be given to the important subjects I have alluded to, and to the general interests of the country."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved, of Committees, to be Second Clerk Assistant.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has any one resigned?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am told that Mr. Piché is not here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I desire to ask if you have received the resignation of Mr. Piché.

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Or if you have dismissed Mr. Piché.

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then I desire to say that there was no other authority under which it was competent to act except one or the other.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House, —Account Current of the Accountant of the House of Commons, of the amount disbursed by him for Contingencies from the 1st July, 1877, to the 1st July, 1878; with the Auditor's Report.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the hon. the first Minister if he has not any information to give the House upon the matter of the reporting of the debates. I observe from the newspapers, a report, which is further confirmed by the circulation of certain circulars, that the Government, or some parties, have assumed the giving of a contract for the reporting of the debates. There was no authority that I am aware of delegated to the Government by the last Parliament to do this. There was no such authority vested in the commission of Internal Economy for the House of Commons, and I presume, if anything has been done, if the hon. gentleman has ventured upon this proceeding, it was with a view of obtaining indemnification from the House afterwards; but not one moment should be lost in communicating to the House what has been done, and by what authority it was done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government, believing that it would meet with the approbation of this House, took the responsibility of making a preliminary arrangement for the publication of the debates. They have taken that responsibility, and will throw themselves upon the House for their support. In doing so, we believe we will receive the support of this House. Believing that the country, as well as the House, require an official and impartial report of the debates, we have undertaken this matter upon our own responsibility. Of course, the contract is subject to the approval of the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. BRECKEN: Before attempting, Sir, to discharge the onerous duty that has devolved upon me—a duty, I will frankly state, I feel totally inadequate to perform—I must throw myself on the kind consideration and indulgence of the members of this House. This is the first time I have had the honour of sitting on the floor of this House; but I understand, Sir, that in former Parliaments, to young members occupying the very high position in which I am now placed, the kindness of this House has always been extended. Now, if I did not feel that that indulgence would be extended to me, I should be very diffident in attempting to discharge this duty. His Excellency, in the first paragraph of his Speech, expresses the gratification he feels in having been selected by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen for the high and important office he now fills. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I am but expressing the sincere sentiment, not only of every member of this House, but of the people of the Dominion at large, when I say that we feel profoundly grateful to Her Majesty for having made such a wise and judicious selection. (Hear, hear.) Our illustrious Queen in appointing her noble son-in-law to be Viceroy of the Dominion of Canada, has selected from among the rising statesmen of the Mother Country a very distinguished nobleman. Although, from the age of His Excellency, his political experience has not been of long duration, yet, when we remember the educational advantages that have fallen to his lot, his experience as a member of the British House of Commons, his known ability, his high artistic taste, his knowledge of the world, and appreciation of the institutions of the neighbouring Republic, we must admit that they combine to render his administration beneficial to the country. I have no doubt, Sir, that when it closes we will find that the material interests of this country have been considerably enhanced, and that the prosperity, unity, and I may say, if that is possible, the loyalty of the people will be greatly increased and sustained. Our gracious Queen in sending in our midst one of her illustrious daughters, Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, has reposed a confidence in us that I am sure will be hailed by this honourable House, and the people at large, with feelings of pride and satisfaction. Although the sojourn of the Princess has been of very short duration, yet, from her amiable character, affability and sweetness of disposition and manners, she has already won the affection and esteem of the people of Canada. Her high accomplishments, artistic attainments, and the interest she has taken in the benevolent and charitable institutions of the Mother Country, having for the object the amelioration and education of the poorer classes, are an earnest of the benefits that will accrue from the sojourn of Her Royal Highness in this Dominion, and that, like her estimable predecessor the Countess of Dufferin, she will prove herself to be a true friend to every class of this people irrespective of their social position. I believe that when the administration of His Excellency the Governor General will have been brought to a close, it will have proved so beneficial to the best interests of the Dominion that the people of Canada will be called upon to witness that trying spectacle that was witnessed upon the departure of that eminent statesman and true-hearted friend of Canada the late Governor-General, and that the deep regrets at the loss of such a distinguished Governor-General will be as cordially and warmly repeated when His Excellency and his Royal Consort will be called upon to leave our shores and rejoin their illustrious kinsfolk in the Mother Country.

The next paragraph is one, Sir, that is fraught with interest to the people of this Dominion. It expresses satisfaction that the contributions of Canadian products and manufactures to the great International Exhibition at Paris last year had attracted much attention, and, it is believed, it will have a beneficial effect upon the trade and commerce of this country. Sir, it is almost impossible to estimate the real value that flows from contests of this kind with countries met in the peaceful rivalries of trade and commerce. It must be a source of great satisfaction to this House to reflect that this young country, with its sparse population, and with all its drawbacks, should have been able to attain such a proud position among the older competitors at that world's fair. It is also a matter of very great pleasure to the loyal people of Canada to know that that success has been to a certain extent aided by the kindness, energy, and attention which has been devoted to our interests by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is a gratifying spectacle to witness the heir to the British Crown mingling with the subjects of his Royal Mother, and, by his energy and example, inciting them to emulation in these peaceful contests and occupying among nations a proud position in trade and commerce. I am sure, when we see a member of the royal family so identifying himself with the true interests of the country, that it will tend, in a very great degree, to increase that feeling of loyal affection and attachment that has ever distinguished British subjects towards their Sovereign. I am sure it must be a matter of satisfaction to this House to know that this long-vexed question affecting the Fishery Claims, under the Washington Treaty, have at last been concluded. I am aware, coming from the Maritime Provinces, from my own personal observation and experience, that this question has been of a very heart-burning character, and it is a very great satisfaction to know that this vexed question has been settled peacefully and amicably by the means of arbitration. I am also aware that, when the award was made known, it did not give entire satisfaction to our Republican neighbours, and that they thought the award was excessive. The award, I believe, has been paid under protest. But, from the information I have received, I believe I am correct in saying that the character of the evidence that was adduced before the Commissioners in Halifax fully justified the equitable character of that award. Before I leave that clause of the Address, I think I may fairly tender to the right hon. gentleman the First Minister the congratulations that he deserves for the successful result of the long pending question. I am aware that the right hon. gentleman occupied the distinguished position of a British Commissioner to arrange the terms of the Washington Treaty; and I think I am correct in saying that it is the first instance where Her Gracious Majesty has conferred the distinguished honour upon a colonial politician. I have no doubt that his knowledge of the facts of the case and his long experience as a statesman have, to a considerable extent, contributed to this successful result. Different opinions I know prevailed at one time; different opinions, I believe, have been expressed on the floor of this House; but, to use a vulgar phrase, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. We have got an award that is quite to our satisfaction, and I believe we are quite justified in tendering the First Minister our thanks for the valuable services he has rendered in bringing this question to a favourable termination. The next paragraph in the Speech is also one of considerable importance. It has reference to the rapidly increasing trade between Canada and England in live cattle. It appears, Sir, that, owing to the existence of the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle of the United States, our trade in cattle with England was in danger of being interrupted. If I understand the question aright, cattle from Canada and the United States were admitted to the English markets. Information was collected, and I believe that great credit is due to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, for the very ready action he has taken in this matter. He, in a very prompt manner, ascertained that this disease existed and was spreading in the United States. When that knowledge reached the Imperial Government, I believe an order was issued interdicting the importation of American cattle into the English market. That order, I believe, fortunately did not extend to cattle from Canada. Therefore, Sir, it seems that the only policy that was open to the Government, was to prohibit the importation of cattle from the United States. When we consider the interests at stake, I think great credit is due to the hon. member for the promptness with which he has acted. Promptitude in this case is everything, for the British Government, in self-defence, would have extended the restriction to this country, as well as the United States, had not this step been taken. In the first place, it is a matter of great consequence to prevent the introduction of the disease into this country, and it would be absolutely necessary to pursue this course in order to prevent the British market being shut against us, which would be a state of things most deplorable. Besides, I believe, with the information I have, that this trade in live cattle between Canada and England, is a source of great wealth to the Dominion, and that trade is rapidly increasing. Consequently, both sides of this hon. House will agree with me, in view of the general depression of trade, that it is of great consequence to this country to protect the trade we have. There is another paragraph of the Address of equal importance to this country, affecting that most important question—trade and commerce. It is stated in His Excellency's Speech, that negotiations have been commenced, with Her Majesty's sanction, for the development of the trade of Canada with France and Spain, and their respective colonies. If I understand aright, there is one important branch of trade which, though not here expressly alluded to, must have been prominently in view when this paragraph was framed. When the commercial treaty was entered into between England and France, somewhere about 1860 or 1861, certain concessions were made on both sides, and reductions were made in the duties of certain classes of goods interchanged between those countries. A short time afterwards, I believe, a treaty was entered into between Austria and France, which gave to the former country the privilege of registering her vessels in French ports on payment of a duty of two francs per ton. Under the "favoured nation" clause in the treaty between Great Britain and France granting to Britain the most favourable terms conceded to any other country, English built ships were admitted into the French market upon payment of a duty of a like amount as Austrian vessels. I am aware that this question engaged the attention of the late Administration, and that it used every exertion to effect a reduction of the tax at present paid by Canadian-built ships in France. I may state that, when application was made to the French Government to induce them to admit Canadian-built ships on the same terms as English, the French authorities decided that the treaty only extended to English alone and not to colonial vessels. The consequence was that Canadian-built ships have been subjected to the tax of the general French tariff which, in this article, I believe amounts to 40 francs a ton—a duty I believe still in existence. I also believe that such a duty as that practically amounts to the prohibition of this branch of trade. It would, therefore be very desirable, indeed, and I am sure the Government, would receive the hearty thanks of the country if they could see their way, to open negotiations which should result in reducing the tax on Canadian vessels to a point that would render that line of business profitable to Canadian shipbuilders. It would also be a happy result if those negotiations should open up to Canada the trade of the French and Spanish colonies. I suppose, in asking for those concessions—this diminution of foreign tariffs—this country would be called upon to reciprocate in some way. A new trade with those nations and their colonies would widen the circle of our commerce, and give increased employment to the people of the Dominion, extending the inducements we have to offer to men leaving the Mother Country, in which the competition is too keen to allow them to earn a living. We should have all such inducements to present to them as well as those liberal laws and that wise legislation which is calculated to encourage the emigrant to come and settle in Canada instead of the United States. And, when we remember that this country is larger in extent than the Republic—when we look at her inexhaustible resources—her boundless wealth in agriculture, forests, mines and fisheries, and consider that at present, comparatively speaking, those great inexhaustible sources of wealth are lying dormant for the want of hands to develop them, it will be seen how necessary it is, in the promotion of our interests, for this Administration to lend their best energies, by negotiation and otherwise, to enlarge old and create new industries for the employment of our people and the development of our trade. The next paragraph of the speech has reference to the Pacific Railway. The purpose of the Government is to press for the most vigorous prosecution of this work, to meet the most reasonable expectations of British Columbia. If I understand this question aright, after Confederation, after the various outlying Provinces of the Dominion entered the Union, it was deemed absolutely necessary that some mode of easy communication should be adopted to bind those distant Provinces closer to the older portions of the Dominion. I believe, also, that a work of this kind was advocated and urged by men of all parties. I think, moreover, I recollect seeing, some years ago, in a very influential newspaper, not a supporter of the First Minister of the Crown, an article asking why he delayed the prosecution of that work. I believe differences of opinion exist as to the mode in which this work should be carried on. But one consideration admits of no doubt—that, when British Columbia entered the Confederation it was upon the distinct understanding that a work of this kind should be constructed, and that those outlying Provinces should, as far as possible, enjoy every facility of communication with the east, and easy transportation to the seaboard for the products of those regions. The faith of the Dominion has been pledged to this enterprise, and it is better to be bankrupt in purse than bankrupt in reputation. I understand that, in a short time, 500 miles of this work will be completed, connecting Lake Superior with the great North West. That will be a great advantage, but I believe it is only an instalment of what the inhabitants of British Columbia may sanguinely look forward to. I believe it will be the policy of this and every other Government to prosecute this work consistently with the means at their disposal. It is stated in the Speech that new communication by rail has been effected between Manitoba and the United States system of railways, by the junction at St. Vincent of the Pembina Branch of our railway with the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad. Whether this is to prove an advantage to our people or not, I am not prepared to say. Whether the effect will be to draw off settlers and traffic to the United States, to the detriment of the Dominion, remains to be seen. But I have no doubt that at present the road is beneficial. A great public writer once said that, if he was to go into a country and seek to judge of its condition and progress, instead of looking at its statesmen, educational or scientific institutions, he would regard the mode of communication existing therein — the means afforded people not only to exchange commodities, but to interchange thought and ideas. If this is correct, I believe it would apply to Canada as well as any other country. We have a large country, and what we want is to know more of each other, and to promote emigration to our country. And how can you expect men who have been obliged to tear themselves from all the endearments that bind them to their homes in the old world, in seeking a home in the new, to prefer a land not affording all these facilities and conveniences that in no small degree tend to lessen the difficulties that emigrants have to encounter in fighting the battle of life? When we have such a country as Canada, with its inexhaustible resources, how necessary is it to try to turn them to proper account and keep pace with our neighbours, to do which it is important to obtain every reasonable communication our means can command. We are promised a Bill for the amendment of the Acts relating to stamps as well as a measure amending the Act relating to weights and measures. I have no doubt those amendments contemplated will prove useful reforms and result in rendering more efficient those branches of the Public Service. It is also the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the purpose of preparing for the census to be taken in 1881. I have no doubt that it is absolutely necessary for the accurate performance of this public work that the Government should enter upon the preliminary operations in good time. It is very necessary, as we all know, that the census should be as accurate as possible. There is also an assurance given that the Government will consider the propriety of providing some means for the collection and collation of vital, criminal and general statistics. There can be no doubt that accurate vital statistics would be of great consequence to the country. With such you may be greatly aided in the settlement of questions affecting the rights of property, such as when and where a man was born and the like, often occasioning much difficulty. Accurate statistics in the public register would supply all such important information and prove most useful in legislating on sanitary and criminal questions, and in the amendment or amelioration of our criminal code. We are also informed by His Excellency, in the following paragraph that a Bill will be submitted for the re-arrangement of some of the Departments. It is a matter of public notoriety that it is contemplated to abolish the Department of the Receiver-General. I believe the new measure will and should reduce the labours of the Minister of Public Works. I am sure that the hon. the leader of the Opposition will quite agree with me that the labours entailed on the head of that Department are more than ought to be expected from any man. I believe that the railway policy throughout this Dominion will call for the entire energy and attention of a separate Department, and that, as the office of Receiver-General is to be done away with, the cost of the administration will not be increased while the work will be very efficiently advanced. The Estimates of the ensuing year will no doubt be made with a due regard to the state of the revenue at the present time, while also the efficiency of the Public Service will not be lost sight of. I now come to the clause that is considered the most important in the Speech, dealing with a subject which last year was placed by the late Government fairly before the country, which was discussed throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and on which the people have returned a verdict so unanimous as to leave no doubt of their wishes. Of course, a little patience must be exercised, but in a few days the intentions of the Government will be made known. It has been a matter of regret that for some years past our expenditure has exceeded our revenue, and, while it is necessary that public works should be constructed for the development of the country, it is equally necessary, for the credit of the country, that the Estimates should be so framed and expenditure so regulated, that our revenue will be sufficient to meet the expenditure. What we want is immigration and manufactories. I admit that statesmen cannot of themselves create prosperity and trade. It would be an unfortunate day for the country, if the farmer, the mechanic or the merchant were to lean entirely upon the arm of the statesman, and trust to legislation alone to make the country wealthy; but, while I state, that I believe it is the imperative duty, and comes within the province, of statesmen, by wise legislation, to open up the avenues of trade, and remove causes of depression—not to attempt to apply any cast-iron rule of fiscal policy, but to suit that policy to the condition and the circumstances of the country. Do you treat a young people in the same way as you would treat an old people? Is there no such thing as helping along youth, whether in the social life or as a colony or community? From the experience we have had, it would be well for us to consider how far statesmen can aid the industries of a country. The suggestion is thrown out as to the propriety of empowering the Government to occupy the position of life assurers. When we look around, to the Mother Country and the neighbouring Republic, and note how often the savings banks, which claim to be safe depositories of the earnings of the labouring classes, have collapsed, and, after a man has paid in his hard earned savings, congratulating himself on having protected himself and family against want, he finds himself again face to face with poverty, and obliged to renew the arduous struggle, the wisdom of the Dominion Government in opening up savings banks under its control comes home to us. If this system of savings institutions has proved a benefit, why should not life assurance under the control of the Government also work beneficially? If one is called for, the other is more than necessary; for, in the case of savings banks, a man may obtain notice beforehand of its approaching failure, and be enabled to withdraw his deposit, but with life insurance he must continue the risk, no provision being made to enable him to withdraw the amount of his premiums. It would be wise to provide some guarantee for people who have no other means of providing for the future support of their families than through life insurance, their income being fixed, and the demands more than equal to it. I have gone very imperfectly through the various clauses in this address; this is the first time I have occupied a position of this kind. I understand the duty of the mover of the Address is simply to allude casually to the various subjects treated in it. While the outlook at present is not as bright as we might expect, owing to the great commercial depression now prevailing, still, taking a philosophical view of the matter, things are never as bad as they might be. When we look, I say, at this great country, with its great resources, at the nationalities of which our people are composed, surely we may sanguinely hope for a bright future. We have in our people the energy of the Englishman, the chivalry of old France, the dash and ingenuousness of the Irishman, the indomitable perseverance of the Scotchman, the rose, the shamrock and the thistle entwined with the fleur de lis, and what better combination could we expect to work out a great and glorious future. All we want is that all men who exercise an influence in this Dominion should adopt this great motto: "Country first; party afterwards." I believe I am not very sanguine when I say that this glorious future is not in the remote distance, but will be realised in a reasonable time. It is a great incentive to a public man to forget, as far as possible, the acerbities of political exigencies, and to devote his time and energy to the best interests of the country. We are a fortunate people. We are the dependency of, I may say, the most liberty-giving country in the world, for there is no country that has a freer constitution, more honourable institutions than that over which Queen Victoria reigns. I thank this House for the very patient hearing given me, and I have but very briefly expressed the sentiments which actuate me in moving the adoption of the Address.

MR. TASSE: Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, I am happy to be able to perform that distinguished duty in my native language, the first European language which was spoken upon our country's shores, and the official usage of which is itself an eulogy of the free institutions under which we live. In a speech, as eloquent as it was happily conceived, the hon. member for Queen's has spoken of the importance of the subjects submitted to our consideration by His Excellency, and I am satisfied that there will be but one voice in this House in recognition of the fact that these matters merit our most serious attention, both from the magnitude of the interests which they involve, and from the exceptional circumstances in which they are brought before us. The satisfaction expressed by His Excellency at having been chosen for our Governor cannot certainly exceed the pleasure which we have all felt at his appointment. Belonging to one of the most illustrious families of Great Britain, strong in the experience acquired in the English House of Parliament, he will do honour to the noble name of Argyll in the eminent position to which he has been called. Assuredly, the Imperial authority could not be better represented than by him, who has approached nearer to the British throne than any other subject of our gracious Sovereign. French Canadians hailed his nomination with special rejoicing, and they have not forgotten, nor will they forget, the flattering appreciation which he has shown of the part they have played in the civilization of this continent. "Nowhere," the Marquis of Lorne has said, "is the sentiment of loyalty more real, and more deeply seated, than among the French Canadians, who enjoy the equality of the laws, the justice and the Government of Great Britain." Yes, we saw by this noble language that we were to have a successor of the Bagots, the Elgins and the Dufferins, three names that will be inscribed in our history in letters of gold, and whose memory will remain engraved in all

Canadian hearts. Mr. Speaker, the arrival in our midst of a daughter of our Queen is a social and political event, whose importance can scarcely be estimated. More than once we have had occasion to offer our homage to members of the reigning house, but now, for the first time in our history, Royalty itself, in the person of a Princess of the Blood, allies its destinies to our own. Inheriting, from her august Mother, the virtues and noble qualities that have shed so much lustre on the Crown, deriving also from her noble father his love of the fine arts, and his lively interest in works of intellect and charity, Her Royal Highness will exercise, without doubt, the most beneficent influence upon our people. She will find here neither titles nor distinctions, nor the splendours of a Court; she will find here a social state very different from that of the old world; but will also find loyal subjects of Her Majesty, and spirited sons of toil. Thus is partially realized the dream of those who, at the time of the establishment of Confederation, believed they were laying the foundations of a kingdom, over which, later on, a noble scion of the House of Brunswick should be called to preside. Thus we have one of those happiest strokes of that wise policy which, under the inspiration of a great statesman, Lord Beaconsfield, has succeeded in strengthening the colonial tie, and in testifying, emphatically, that the preservation and development of the possessions beyond the sea are intimately bound up with the present and future of England. Mr. Speaker, if a celebrated warrior could, in this century, distribute crowns to his family by the sole right of the strongest, or of genius, the Queen of Great Britain might with more justice entrust to her children the duty of representing her in those vast regions on which the sun never sets—regions peopled by two hundred millions of subjects of all colours, races and religions, and where are planted and are rapidly taking root those noble institutions which make the English colonies, to use the expression of Lord Grey, "so many free and happy Englands." His Excellency has spoken to us of the warm welcome given the representatives of Her Majesty by all classes of society; these early orations,

MR. BRECKEN.

I am sure, are the forerunners of demonstrations not less cordial which await them wherever they go, from Charlotte-town to Vancouver. Alas, Mr. Speaker, that a sudden and painful bereavement should have plunged the representatives of our Sovereign in affliction so very soon after the brilliant demonstrations which heralded their arrival! Ever cruel, Death spares none, neither rank, youth, nor even goodness itself. The untimely decease of the Princess Alice has produced the most painful emotion among the Canadian subjects of Her Majesty, who had learned to respect her name. They knew how much more that loss would be felt by our gracious Sovereign who, having known great joys in the course of a long and illustrious reign, has also experienced great sorrows. His Excellency, Mr. Speaker, has congratulated us on the successes we obtained at the great International Exposition at Paris; successes which gave other nations a high opinion of our intellectual, industrial, and agricultural advancement. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who acted as President of the English section, showed a most lively interest in us, in facilitating the work of our Commissioners, thus acquiring new claims to the gratitude of the Canadian people. That exhibition, so suitable for making known the importance of our resources, should assist the measures taken by the Government for the establishment of more satisfactory commercial relations with France, Spain, and their respective colonies. France, observing here more than a million of her children, cannot forget that Canada was formerly New-France, and that she has left on our soil impressions and memories which time cannot obliterate. We must open new channels for our commerce and industries, and every step that His Excellency can take in the direction of a result so desirable, will receive from us the most favourable consideration. We have been glad to learn, Mr. Speaker, that our claims against the United States for the use of our fisheries have finally been settled in a satisfactory manner. No one acquainted with the value of our fisheries in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and on our maritime coasts, will pretend for a moment that the sum of five million dollars is excessive compensation for the privileges granted. The measures vigorously taken by the Government to prohibit temporarily the importation of live cattle from the United States, are entitled to the thanks and congratulations of this honourable House. The effect has been to increase the confidence that exists in England, in our determination to protect the country against the introduction of those destructive epidemics which have ravaged the herds of Europe. His Excellency informs us that a law will be introduced relative to the census, and providing for the collection of special statistics, also for the modification of existing laws regulating certain Departments of the Public Administration. I would mention specially the amendment of the Acts respecting stamps, the improvement of the Weights and Measures Act, the creation of a national system of life insurance, changes in the management of the Federal lands, the Mounted Police, and Indian affairs. All these reforms deserve comment, did I not prefer to pay particular attention to other portions of the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Speaker, the House is happy to learn that energetic steps will be taken to push on the work of our transcontinental railway. Already, the Intercolonial is in full operation, and has created an extensive trade between the Maritime Provinces and the rest of the country. It has absorbed many millions, and to-day everybody recognizes the immense advantages which will result therefrom. Only a few days ago the first train of the North Shore Railway traversed the Ottawa region, effecting an entire revolution in the facilities for transport in the Province of Quebec, and constituting an important link in our great national route. The Pacific Railway enterprise, which is to unite all our lines of communication in a vast uninterrupted network, extending from ocean to ocean, cannot be accomplished without enormous expense; but we have reason to hope that the statesmen who contributed to establish Confederation—aided by those who, trained in their school, preserve its tradition—who have constructed the Intercolonial, built the Victoria Bridge—one of the wonders of the world—enlarged our canals, executed almost all our admirable system of public improvements, will be able to conduct to a successful completion the gigantic work without imposing on our population too heavy burdens, "The future is in the west," exclaimed Jefferson in the United States in 1818. That prophecy must have encountered unbelievers, but it has been realised in an astonishing manner. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is my firm conviction that more than one honourable member of this House will probably see the day when Manitoba, Keewatin, British Columbia, and the other Provinces which are to be carved out of the solitary regions of our great West—the famous "uppercountry" of our pioneers—will challenge our preponderance in the Union. Already an important part of our population is setting out to take possession of the fertile prairies of the Red River, and, before long, of the Saskatchewan. We see in operation here the same economic phenomena which in the United States depopulates New England for the benefit of the West. Manitoba has already begun to export her cereals, and her incomparable wheat will be found hereafter in all the markets of the world. The commercial and agricultural progress and growth of our young Province will be considerably hastened by the recent construction of the Pembina Railway, giving a rapid communication with the civilized world. But the Government have understood the necessity of binding at the earliest moment our North-West and Lake Superior, so that that region may directly pour its products into Canadian territory, and the country will learn, with profound satisfaction, that this branch will soon be in full course of construction. The Pacific Railway, Mr. Speaker, will be the best engine of colonisation in these immense solitudes, by drawing in its train, as by magic, thousands of emigrants, and the day is not distant when the hunting grounds of the buffalo and antelopes will become vast cultivated fields supporting innumerable herds of domestic animals. On the shores of our great lakes, real inland seas, will arise great cities rivalling St. Paul, Milwaukee and Chicago; and these watery wastes which have hitherto borne only the frail bark canoe of the Indian, will be furrowed by thousands of vessels freighted with the products of that inexhaustible region.

MR. TASSÉ.

Then, when borne on the wings of steam, the locomotive will climb the Rocky Mountains, and make its powerful voice heard for the first time in the pine forests of British Columbia,—among the distant electors represented by the right honourable the leader of the Government. We shall then be able to congratulate ourselves upon having established Confederation upon a solid basis, secured its commercial independence, and executed the most gigantic work that a people of our numbers ever had the boldness to conceive and still more the good fortune to accomplish. We shall then have completed an enterprise whose effects upon the commerce of the world it is difficult to foresee, for we shall have constructed the shortest route between Europe and Asia; we shall then have realised the dream of Christopher Columbus, of Jacques Cartier, and many other discoverers, and, pursuing their idea, we shall have reached, marching always towards the West, that ancient Orient whose riches, ever coveted by Europeans, constitute so large a portion of the wealth and power of England. Yes, this road has an importance not confined to Canada, but extending to the commercial interests of the Mother Country, who cannot well refuse to aid us in its execution. More than thirty years ago, Lord Bury exclaimed, in the English Parliament: "Our commerce in the Pacific Ocean with China, Japan and India, must eventually pass through our North American Provinces. In any case," he added, "we shall have lost our commercial supremacy the day when we neglect this important consideration; and, if we fail to cultivate the physical advantages which that country offers us, we shall deserve our fate." Mr. Speaker, if, turning our eyes from these encouraging prospects, we come to regard the actual condition of the country, the picture which presents itself to our view is far from satisfactory. The Speech from the Throne, so lately but the echo of our prosperity, announces a considerable deficit in our public revenue. Our commerce is paralysed, our industries are languishing, our labouring classes are without work, property has fallen enormously in value, in fact everybody is suffering from an unexampled depression in intensity and duration. It is important, then, to re-establish the equilibrium in our budget, to practice the most rigid economy consistent with the efficiency of the Public Service, to create a healthier revenue to meet our obligations, and to employ all the means afforded by a wise and judicious legislation and administration to restore, at the earliest moment, the comfort and prosperity of former days. A remodelling of the tariff has become necessary, and His Excellency announces that it will be done in a way to protect our youthful industries. To encourage us in this path we have the example of the advantageous results of the tariff of 1859; we have the example of almost all communities who believe that of all policies the best is that which before all things else protects the national interests; we have the example of Germany adopting the system which saved France after her recent disasters; and we shall soon, perhaps, have the example of England abandoning the application of an economical system by which she has profited, but which appears, even for her, to have had its time. Mr. Speaker, the country expects that this remodelling will be done in a protective sense. Our agricultural and industrial classes, understanding the solidarity of their interests, have pronounced their opinion on this point with an ensemble which has surprised everybody. In short, the solemn verdict of the 17th of September last demands, among other things, a policy truly national, broad and enlightened, which will promote and develop the resources of our great Confederation. However discouraging the present situation may be, Mr. Speaker, there is, nevertheless, no reason to despair. The clouds of adversity will pass away, and the dawn of better days cannot be far off. With the new impulse given to our industry, the construction of our railways, the creation of new markets for our commerce, we shall very soon resume the ascendant march of past years. Being one of the most important countries in the extent of our territory; possessing an imposing merchant marine, possessing the finest natural communications, possessing fisheries unrivalled in the world—whose importance my honourable colleague the member for Gaspé knows so well how to describe,—possessing a fertile soil, covered with magnificent forests, and containing great and varied mineral wealth, we have nothing to envy in those countries most favoured by nature. Let me quote the words upon this subject of an American statesman, Mr. Seward: "I see in British America a region vast enough to contain an empire. Its immense wheat fields in the west, its enormous chains of mountains, its inexhaustible forests—the richest of the North—its precious fisheries, its mineral deposits, still unexplored, all this proves to me the possession of the elements of wealth. I find its inhabitants bold, energetic, and moulded by English liberty." We have also reached a high degree of civilization, and we have only to contemplate the number of our steeples, of our churches, of our educational institutions, and of our asylums for all classes of the unfortunate, to understand that we do not measure real progress by the number of our factories, and that we believe in the intervention of Providence in the affairs of men. We appreciate, in the highest degree, the advantages of education, and our system of instruction is not surpassed by that of any other country. We are descended, Mr. Speaker, from some of the strongest races in the world; we have preserved intact their finest traditions of glory and of virtue; if the same blood does not course in our veins, we are united by the same sentiments of noble emulation for our national advancement; we are growing and multiplying far removed from the wars and tumults which desolate and overturn so many other countries,—ready, however, to defend with our lives the soil of our ancestors; we live under the protection of the mildest and most just of political systems—sacred palladium of our liberties, of which we shall never permit with impunity the slightest violation; and it depends upon us alone to build up on this portion of the continent a vigorous and flourishing nation if we only know how to profit by the advantages which an allwise Providence has abundantly showered upon us. A great responsibility rests upon us, the representatives whom the country has chosen to direct its affairs, and this responsibility derives additional importance from the exceptional circumstances of the present hour. But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the enormous difficulties which beset the situation, I do not doubt that the wisdom and experience of the advisers of His Excellency, and the trustful and enlightened devotion of the leading bodies in the country,—I do not doubt, I say, that this wisdom, this experience, aided by this confidence, will overcome the evils of the present and render the future as prosperous as has been the past.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, apart from all party considerations, gentlemen on both sides of the House ought to be gratified at the accession to the debating talent of the House and, therefore, for this reason, I congratulate the members who moved and seconded the Address. The Address contains comparatively little to invite comment of a controversial character, as, following the usual practice which has prevailed for many years in Canada, and for a long time in England, it appears to be so constructed as not to commit any person to any principle which the Government may desire to have carried into effect by legislation during the Session, and I shall not, therefore, enter upon any controversy regarding any of the subjects which are to be made the objects of legislation during the current Session. With regard to the passage of the Speech on the advent of a new Governor-General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, I cordially agree in the remarks of those gentlemen. I do not however, believe with the mover of the address, that their advent will add to the loyalty and patriotism of the people, because they do not require any stimulant to add to their loyalty and patriotism; but we are glad that Her Majesty has been pleased to have given her personal sanction to such an appointment as has brought amongst us so illustrious a personage as the daughter of the Queen. I am sure that every one in Canada will vie with one another in doing her honour, as well as her illustrious husband the Governor-General, and I am sure that all believe that His Excellency the Governor-General will discharge the high and onerous duties devolving upon him with that perfect impartiality and independence of character which have characterised his family, and which form the proper domain of every Governor-General who rules over this country. I cannot say more than that on this subject, because it is unnecessary to enlarge upon such a topic, where all agree in devotion to the illustrious Queen of the realm, and in anything that confers additional honour upon us, we will be glad to take a part or a share in accomplishing. I was a little amused that the hon. gentleman who moved the Address should have gone a little out of his way—and I think it is the only point in which he went out of his way—to eulogize the hon. the Premier for his part in negotiating the Washington Treaty. Well, I presume that living in Prince Edward Island he was not aware of the actual facts respecting that treaty. I have no doubt that my hon. friend is quite ignorant of the all but universal condemnation which that treaty met with; of the entire neglect of Canadian interests in connection with that treaty, and that if a proper award has been obtained by the efforts of the late Administration, it is not because of the wisdom of the treaty, but in spite of it. However, Sir, I will join with him in congratulation that the subject of the Speech as regards the fisheries, has been closed in a manner satisfactory to the people of Canada; and I may congratulate the late Administration upon their anxiety that these negotiations should be conducted by Canadians, and not by any English diplomat. It is the first occasion, I believe, upon which any great subject of this kind has been dealt with purely by Canadian hands, and the result shows that Canadians are quite equal to any ordinary emergency in diplomacy, as well as any British statesmen themselves could be. I regret, Sir, in common with the hon. gentleman who has moved the Address, the recent difficulty concerning the cattle trade, but I am not able to congratulate unconditionally the Government upon the recent order; but I am willing to have it believed, and to believe myself, that the order for the prohibition of American cattle coming in Canada was issued in the belief that it was the best thing to be done. It was a cause of some difficulty beyond all doubt, but the prohibition acts in several ways. It may prevent disease coming into the country; but it, at the same time, prevents the importation of cattle which our feeders require for the purpose of preparing for a more extensive exportation. It also deprives two of our great lines of railway of a vast amount of freight which they would otherwise carry to Atlantic ports. I have only to express my hope that the Government will earnestly consider whether any alteration or amelioration of that order can be made such as will at once ensure safety for the trade and for the health of the cattle of Canada, and not injure the interest to which I have referred. It is, undoubtedly, as has been stated, one of the most important branches of our commerce at the present time, and anything tending to check the growth of such a great business must have, under the present circumstances especially, a most injurious effect upon the agricultural prosperity of the country. With regard to the measures taken, or proposed to be taken, or both, I believe—for I observe that a commission has been sent to some parts of Europe, and it is, I presume, proposed to take some further measures—to increase the trade with France and Spain, that is a matter which gave the recent Administration a good deal of anxiety, and which they considered with very great care; and I can only say that, if the present Administration can find any method by which the natural trade of those countries can be diverted to Canada, and Canadian trade to these countries, such measures not only have our concurrence, but our most cordial support. It is one of those matters that require the united action of this Legislature, and as such will, of course, receive all the support we can give it. In that connection I am happy to congratulate my hon. friend who moved the Address upon the change of policy which he has announced with regard to himself. I was delighted to hear that for the future he is to put his country first and his party afterwards. That is such a complete right-about-face on his part, that I am glad he mentioned it, because I am very much pleased in having him as a convert to a doctrine which, on this side of the House, we have always believed in. We have a paragraph, Sir, which I am somewhat at a loss to understand, concerning the construction of the Pacific Railway. There are gentlemen on the opposite side, and when I come to discuss that question upon its merits, I shall probably refer to the views of several hon. gentlemen; but I will merely say that there are gentlemen there who denounced the late Government for spending so much money upon this railway; and there are gentlemen there who denounced the late Administration for not proceeding faster with that railway; and now, Sir, it seems that they are taking up exactly the line which the late Administration took. I presume that there is no instance on record where so much work was done in constructing a railroad through an unsettled and unknown country as was done during the last four years. There is no instance, I say, on record where so much was done in prosecuting the initial part of such an enterprise. We constructed that line with the particular view that everything was to be subordinated to the one condition, that it was not to increase the existing rate of taxation in the country, and I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are also to proceed speedily, as they say, but, at the same time, with a due regard to the financial capacities of the country. So far there seems to be no difference of opinion, but we are told here that they shall proceed with the work in such a manner as to meet the reasonable expectations of British Columbia. This is a diplomatic sentence. It may imply that all their expectations are reasonable, or it may mean that, if they are reasonable, their expectations will be realized. Perhaps the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will tell us which is the interpretation to be put on these words. I am bound to say, Sir, we have not found hitherto that the expectations of our friends from British Columbia were of the most moderate character. Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria knows exactly what is the nature of those expectations.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
There are two of us.

MR. MACKENZIE : Of course, the hon. member for Victoria must know precisely what he and his constituents expect—that is, if he is the member, of which there is some reasonable doubt, I believe. He will at all events know what the reasonable expectations are. I have only to say that I shall await with the greatest possible anxiety and expectation, the course which the Government have to propose when their policy is brought down; and I trust that within a very few days, if not to-day, we shall have laid before us the tenders which have been received for the construction, and which, of course, cannot be given out to contract without the sanction of this House, according to law. I would like, also, that the hon. gentleman would tell us why it is necessary to pass a Census Act two years in advance? Under a previous Ministry and a very diligent Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Dunkin, it was thought quite sufficient to pass the Act a year previous. Is it possible that hon. gentlemen opposite mean, by passing the Act two years in advance, to commence operations at once, and have a staff of employes engaged for two years in preparing for what ought to be done in a few months? I cannot imagine that this is the case, and I presume, it is by mistake intended to pass an Act and to commence operations a year earlier than usual. As to obtaining vital statistics in connection with this measure, that is a subject so great in its proportions, and one which has occupied the attention of the House so much on previous occasions, that I shall not venture to discuss it now, except by saying that, if the Finance Minister imagines that in a time of stringent accounts, when money is scarce, and the revenue not coming up to our expectations, he is to impose a vast system of collection of statistics upon the country, it must be at a very heavy expense indeed. We know that the Province of Ontario has already a very complete system for collecting criminal statistics. It may be perfected to a greater extent perhaps, but such as it is, it has been in operation for some time, and I am not aware that it has failed to give satisfaction. It is a measure prepared by the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Blake. With regard to the departmental arrangements promised, I shall not enter into any discussion further than to express a different opinion to the hon. gentlemen who moved the Address as to the Department to be divided. That I shall discuss at length when the measure is fairly before us. I shall say nothing about it now. As to emigration and the hon. gentleman's remarks upon it, I entirely agree with him, and I am glad to ascertain that he has been put up by the present Administration to express himself as he has done. It has always been our view that immigration to this country should be promoted as much as possible, but for the last three years, when there was a surplus of clerical and artizan labour and the lower classes of labour in the cities and towns, the late Government felt they would not be justified in promoting that particular kind of immigration to Canada; and in 1875, Mr. Jenkins, then acting as Agent-General in London, was so instructed, and circulars were issued at that time to the agents in Europe. We were, nevertheless, accused by hon. gentlemen opposite of having brought people into the country at a time when many of our own people were out of employment. We endeavoured to direct the attention of our immigration agents in Europe to the introduction of the agricultural class, those who might fairly be expected to go on the land and till it, and produce something which would sustain themselves and increase the trade of the country. Any measures which have for their immediate object the immigration of that class into the country will, as a matter of course, receive our cordial support. The hon. gentleman made a very true remark indeed in discussing this subject; he referred to the share that immigration had in creating prosperity, and he remarked besides that it was unreasonable to expect any Government to create prosperity in the country. Well, Sir, the contrary view is the very thing that hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends have been circulating as their opinions for the last two years. They declared that the late Government could have created prosperity by legislation, but I am glad to find that they now find they cannot procure prosperity by legislation. The question of life assurance is one which can only be discussed in a very careful manner. In connection with the immediate object, that is, to obtain money for the Government, that is a question that I admit to be one fairly open to discussion, and I am not at all satisfied, at the present moment, of the wisdom of entering into a general policy of this character, and as it is one, as I have said, which is fairly open to discussion, it will be discussed by us, I can say, with perfect impartiality, with a view to accomplish the objects best fitted to promote the prosperity of the country; but I doubt very much that the hon. the Minister of Finance will be able to place any great dependence on this as a means of meeting his obligations by borrowing money. I was somewhat interested to-day, and on the day Parliament met, to know to what extent hon. gentlemen opposite would allude in the Speech to the severe depression which has passed over the country. We were told, during the election, and during the last Session, that all that was wanted to check the tide of adversity which had been sweeping over the country for the last four or five years was a change of Administration, and we were gravely told that if there was a change of Administration, in consequence of the general election, the prices of stocks would immediately rise; and I observed, Sir, in a speech made by the hon. gentlemen at the head of the Government some weeks after the election, he referred to this matter, and called upon his audience, which I suppose must have been a very intelligent one, to mark the great increase in the price of bank stocks and shares which had taken place. The hon. gentleman was apparently ignorant that these stocks had shrunk in value by over 25 per cent.; that the shrinkage, from the date of the election down to the time that the hon. gentleman spoke, had swept away from ten to twelve millions of the banking capital of the country, if it had all been realised upon at that time. This was then the condition of affairs, Sir, and, instead of there being a reaction in this way, producing prosperity, a prosperity that we all could have rejoiced in—because, Sir, the late Administration, adopting the wisest measure which they believed they could adopt, in order to meet the existing circumstances, did not succeed in checking that depression. And if, Sir, the advent of a new Administration, and the proclamation of a new policy was to have produced prosperity, of course we would all have participated and rejoiced in that prosperity. But, instead of that, there has been an actual descent from a great to a still greater depression, and, instead of the hon. gentleman's views announced in a hall in this city being correct, they were most grossly incorrect. For, of course, I must assume, and take it for granted, that the hon. gentleman had never looked at the prices of stocks from the time of the election until that day. I have only further to add now, that I entirely agree with the closing remarks made by the hon. member for Queen's in his expression of opinion that it would be desirable, in conducting our political discussions, to forget all acerbity of feeling and all bitterness of speech. I am delighted to hear the hon. gentleman propound that and several other views to which I have already adverted, and I am sure that he will find an echo amongst his new friends in the west on this his first advent to the Dominion Parliament, in the propagation of several of the views to which he has given utterance to-day. I have only to say, further, Sir, that in discussing all the matters which are referred to in the Speech, we will not have any serious amount of labour. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has, during the last few years, been constantly speaking from the desk which I now occupy, calling the attention of the House to the small bill of fare which was presented. I as frequently stated that my Administration did not propose to make the Queen's Speech, or the Governor-General's Speech, a mere bill to announce what was to be done throughout the Session, but to announce certain measures which should occupy the attention of the House, while most of the business to be done would probably not find a place in the Speech at all. But I must assume that the hon. gentleman thought differently, and I must protect him against himself. He maintained, on this side of the House, that it was necessary that everything should be foreshadowed in the Speech that was intended to be done. He insisted on the full bill of fare, and on having all the articles upon it. And is this all the bill we are to have before us now? A Bill to amend the Stamp Act, a Bill to amend Weights and Measures, a Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act, and another to amend the Mounted Police Act, another Post Office Act, and some amendments concerning the Indians. And these six measures are positively all, these petty amendments to six existing statutes are positively the entire bill of fare that the hon. gentleman has presented. I do not allude to this for the purpose of exposing the paucity of the measures and their comparative insignificance. I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to his unreasonable expectations, and his unreasonable demands on previous occasions. The measures to be submitted, I have no doubt, are not all here, but we had a right to expect from the manner in which they announced their policy, that new measures of more than ordinary consequence would be mentioned in the Speech. I am sure, Sir, that, considering the hon. gentlemen's promises, considering the hon. gentlemen's speeches during the elections, the measures which, above all, are demanded to fulfil the reasonable expectations of his supporters are not contained in this Speech.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I cannot in any way object to the manner in which the hon. the leader of the Opposition—and allow me to congratulate him on his position in this respect—has criticised the Speech. Indeed, I am very much relieved by it. I have heard it said that that hon. gentleman announced that it was his duty for the next five years to make the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as uncomfortable as possible. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that, from his kindness of heart, his speech did not at all render us uncomfortable on this occasion. I can agree with him in the just compliment he made to the mover and seconder of the resolutions to-day. Whether they belong to the one side or the other, as the hon. gentleman truly said, it is of great importance to the country, of great importance to this House, that the representative men in the House should present as much talent as the country can supply. I would agree with the hon. gentleman in that respect that, from the manner in which the mover and seconder addressed themselves to their duties to-day, this House and the country have reason to be satisfied with the substantial parliamentary ability which they have displayed. But, while the hon. gentleman paid a due meed of praise to the mover and seconder of these resolutions, he forgot himself for a moment, and without the usual parliamentary courtesy, he charged the hon. gentleman with ignorance, said that the member for Queen's lived in a far off place, somewhere in Prince Edward Island, and added that he could not possibly know anything about the Washington Treaty. I think if there is a population in the whole Dominion interested in the Washington treaty, it is the people of Prince Edward Island, and I believe that island has gained as much as, if not more than any other part of the Dominion by that much maligned treaty. The hon. gentleman said, with respect to that treaty, that the mover was ignorant of the universal condemnation that the Washington Treaty had received from the country. All that I can say is—that that treaty with all its faults was submitted to the Parliament of Canada and to the representatives of the people of Canada in the year 1872, and that it received the support of the representatives of the people by a very large majority, a majority of sixty-six in this House. And the hon. gentleman will be glad to be reminded that, among those who supported that treaty were some of the most prominent members of the party of which he was the head. I was not prepared for the compliment that was paid to me by my hon. friend as being in some respects connected with the formation of that treaty, but I remember perfectly well that when this speciality of the treaty, the fishery question, was before this House, and when the question was discussed as to what pecuniary compensation the Dominion should receive for the fishing privileges given to the Americans, the hon. gentleman said in this House that he viewed with loathing the idea of accepting money for our rights in these fisheries, the Dominion or territorial rights. We all can remember that. But that hon. gentleman, when he changed his place from being a member of the Opposition to being the head of the Government, he very properly took all possible steps to bring that loathed article of the treaty into successful operation, and he succeeded and the award was made, and he has a right to credit for it. The hon. gentleman is exactly in the position of Vespasian, who levied a base, obscene tax, to which his son Titus objected. "Oh," said Vespasian, "that is nothing; the tax money does not smell; there is nothing wrong about that." The hon. gentleman, although he loathed the very idea of taking money, took every possible step to collect the money, and it has come at a very opportune moment, a moment when, thanks to the financial skill of the gentlemen opposite, the money was very much needed. With respect to the order about cattle, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it operates in some respects disadvantageously. It certainly interferes with the transit trade. But we had the choice of two evils. We were all aware that a panic existed in England, and of the resolve of the Board of Trade in England to put the Animal Contagious Diseases Act into full effect. We were informed of that, and we knew that, if we did not take the step at once, we would have been scheduled—to use a technical expression—as the United States were scheduled; that Canada would have been at once placed side by side with the United States, and all the cattle going from Canada and the United States would be slaughtered at the place of import into England. And, therefore, we would have had to give up that trade, which has grown to be of such importance, even though in its infancy, if we had not taken the steps we did. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is of importance that that prohibition should exist for as short a period as possible. I fancy the panic will soon pass away in England. We know the energy of the American Government in the matter, and I believe their energy is now being displayed in preventing the spread of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia, and in proving that it is limited to a small district of the United States. I believe that the United States Government are taking the most active steps for the purpose of stamping out the disease, and of putting that portion of the country where the disease exists under quarantine, so that ere long the direct trade in live cattle between the United States and England will be revived. So soon as that is done, we will only be too happy, as everyone knows, to repeal the Order in Council, and to restore the transit trade, which is of so much importance to the country. With respect to the clause about the negotiations with Spain and France for the development of our trade with those countries, the hon. gentleman has spoken as any independent statesman ought to speak on that subject. I have no doubt that he and his Government considered that fully during the period when they were charged with the special responsibility of considering such subjects. We, of course, on assuming the reins of power, took up that subject as well. It is of great importance that this country should find large and increasing avenues for our foreign trade, and I am glad to inform you, Sir, that we have not been altogether unsuccessful. I am glad to inform you, in a general way, that the Government of France have received our overtures in the most gracious and kindly spirit, that they are inclined to reciprocate in every possible way, and that they are inclined to admit our ships and many other articles under the "most favoured nation" clause. If that clause is continued in the commercial treaty between England and France, that will involve our ships being transferred in France on paying a duty of two francs per ton instead of forty francs; in other words, it will restore the shipbuilding trade to its wonted prosperity in a very great degree. The French Government have received our propositions very favourably. Of course corresponding concessions on our part must be given in the way of a reduction of the duties on French wines. That matter is to be submitted by the French Government to the Chamber of Deputies in a few days—I believe to-morrow. Of course it is impossible for us to know, and perhaps for the French Government to say, what change will be made; but, at all events, so far as the Government is concerned, they have met us more than half-way. I may say that Spain has also expressed a desire to develop trade between Canada and the Spanish Colonies, Cuba and Porto-Rico principally, and they have asked themselves that the powers of our Commissioners should be enlarged so as to embrace the consideration of trade with the Mother Country, of Spain as well as with her colonies on this side of the Atlantic. Whether this project will eventually be successful or not, it is of course impossible to say now. England has been negotiating for a commercial treaty with Spain for more than a year, and hitherto without much success; but I am glad to learn that, principally in consequence of the Canadian Commissioner going to Madrid and opening up the question of trade with Canada, the discussion between England and Spain has been reopened on the main question of trade between those two countries. The hon. gentleman, in alluding to the speech of my hon. friend who moved the Address, said he was very glad to learn that he had made a complete turn-about face, that he had taken up the principle of country first and party afterwards, as if the hon. gentleman had taken it up for the first time. Now we have always understood that that was the banner of the Liberal Conservative Party—by a party, with a party, and for the people; we have always understood that the principle of the gentlemen opposite was—by a party, with a party, and for a party. But it may be that the hon. gentleman thinks that his party and the people are synonymous. The late election proved that and more than proved that. We all remember the meeting of Englishmen that Canning described so humorously, when three tailors met in a back shop in the east part of London, and commenced an address with, "We, the people of Kingston—no, England."

MR. MACKENZIE: We, the people of Victoria.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman said that his Government had been denounced in former days by some gentlemen in the then Opposition, for not going fast enough with the Pacific Railway, and that others had denounced him for going on too fast. Perhaps it may be found that the policy of the present Government and his policy have not been identical; but we must agree that, after the country had been committed so far as to finish two ends of a railway, we must finish the middle. And that is the extent to which this Speech has committed the present Government to the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite. I forget how many miles there are near Red River, and how many near Thunder Bay, but we all know that there are 185 miles in the middle altogether untouched. Until that is finished, the two ends are not of the slightest value whatever. The money has been expended, and the interest is going on. One part of the road runs into a swamp, and the other part runs into a wilderness, and, until these two portions are connected, we shall not have any line between the lakes and our great North-West. By completing that portion of the road we shall have every requisite means of communication. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) will assist, as he has promised to assist, the Government in every possible way, in completing that link, and in giving us a road through Canada to our great country of the North-West. The hon. gentleman says there is something very dubious and diplomatic in the phrase "satisfy the reasonable expectations of British Columbia." One thing is clear, the hon. gentleman did not satisfy the expectations of British Columbia, whether reasonable or unreasonable. We sought to meet their reasonable expectations when we were in power before. We did not then find them so very unreasonable. Now that we are back in power, I do not think that we shall find them more unreasonable than before. A portion of the people have shown their rationality by electing myself to represent them. It is charged by a very high authority in the Reform press that I was elected simply by means of certain pledges to build this Pacific Railway, to suit my constituents and British Columbia in general. Well, the extent of my communications with British Columbia was the despatch of three telegrams to three friends, saying—"I have been defeated in Kingston, and I wish you to elect me for a constituency in British Columbia." The answer came over the wires, "It shall be done," and it was done. The same hon. gentleman asked if we were serious in introducing a Bill with regard to the census two or three years before the year of enumeration. True, it was only in 1870 we introduced the Census Bill for 1871; but the shortness of the time for preparation, then, entailed a great deal more expense than necessary in connection with the census. There had been a rush of work, which prompted the amendment in 1871 of the Act of 1870, in several very important particulars. We desire, at present, to save all the money possible. I believe the last census cost $500,000. By timely preparations we hope to save a good deal. The Department of Agriculture is charged with this special duty, and will have plenty of opportunity for judicious preparations by means of its own ordinary machinery and with very slight assistance by proceeding smoothly and calmly the coming summer, to make all the requisite provisions for a correct and complete census. It is simply taking time by the forelock, and avoiding the enormous expense caused by the hurry in 1871. Of course the hon. gentleman's remarks respecting the expense of collecting vital statistics deserve every consideration, but, no doubt, the census would be one-sided without general statistics. It is quite true, moreover, that criminal statistics have received a certain degree of attention. Those statistics, under the present law, would, no doubt, prove of very considerable value. It is well to combine all subjects as much as possible in gathering statistical information. With the same machinery we may get information on all branches, without which the circumstances of any country cannot be satisfactorily known. We hope, by certain provisions, to attain these objects inexpensively. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) alluded to the subject of immigration, and to the fact that his Government had warned the people of England against sending out persons and classes not wanted here. That action, perhaps, was well intended, but I think the manner in which the intention was carried out in England was exceedingly unfortunate, because it was so strongly expressed by the renowned Agent-General of Canada at that time. It was stated that Canada was overcrowded, and Australia, New Zealand and the Cape of Good Hope published our Agent's announcements as a means of inducing emigrants to those colonies; they published the fact that Canada had stated she was full to repletion, and wanted no more emigrants, who should, therefore, go to the East and not to the West; yet, at the same time, the expenses of the Emigration Office—of the London establishment—were most considerably increased. The hon. gentleman said that he quite agreed with my hon. friend the mover of the Address that national prosperity could not be produced or restored by a Ministry. Well, I believe the country has shown that it thought prosperity may be restored by a change of Ministry, and has changed the Ministry accordingly. Whether the country possesses good judgment it is not for me to say. I am bound to believe, however, that it exercised a wise discretion in that regard. The hon. the leader of the Opposition says I announced there would be an immediate rise in the price of everything the moment we returned to power. What I did say was that I believed the late Government had lost the confidence of the country, and the very fact of a change of Ministry would restore confidence, and that the first effect would be seen in a rise of bank and other stocks, and they did rise. They rose from two to four per cent. within a week after the 17th September. At present our policy is in the future. It rests on intentions. Now, intentions are very good, but performance is better. We hope to perform our intentions. We intend to perform our pledges. Nobody more agrees with the hon. member for Lambton than myself, in the statement he made on a celebrated occasion, that the man who, in Opposition, makes a promise and propounds a policy, and fails to act upon it when in the Government, is little better than a demagogue. I will accept the name, if we do not carry out, while in office, the pledges and promises we held out to the country, in Opposition. The hon. gentleman observes that the Speech is a very meagre bill of fare. But I think it a very fair bill. When we deal with the Pacific Railway, the depression in the country, the tariff, the re-adjustment, of the fiscal system of the country, when we propound a policy which is to relieve the depression and establish an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure—to encourage our manufactures and all our industries—I believe we cannot justly be accused of a meagre bill of fare. I believe the hon. gentleman will find it a little too strong for his digestion. But even were we liable to the charge of presenting a too meagre bill of fare, it might be considered the object was a due regard to the weakness of his digestion. It was necessary to give milk to babes. We will keep the strong meat for the men on this side of the House. I cannot in any way object to the tone and manner of the criticism of the hon. gentleman opposite. I am glad the Opposition have adopted the English modern system—a very proper one—of passing the Address without amendment; and when all the various subjects alluded to in it are dealt with—when the measures promised are laid before the House, they and their details can be criticised with a full knowledge, and satisfactory explanations with regard to the policy of the Government.

Resolutions agreed to, read the second time and referred to a Committee.

The Committee reported the following Address, founded on the said resolutions, which was read the second time, and agreed to.

“To His Excellency the Honourable Sir JOHN DOUGLAS SUTHERLAND CAMPBELL (commonly called the Marquis of Lorne), Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor-General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same, etc.

“We, Her Majesty’s dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly thank Your Excellency for your gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session.

“We receive with great pleasure Your Excellency’s gracious declaration that in meeting the Parliament of Canada for the first time, you desire to express the gratification you feel at having been selected by Her Majesty for the high and important office Your Excellency now fills, and to assure us of the great satisfaction with which you now seek our aid and co-operation.

“We are proud to know, that in acknowledging with profound gratitude the reception which has been accorded to yourself as Her Majesty’s representative, Your Excellency is also commanded by the Queen to convey, through us, to the people of Canada, Her thanks for the loyal, generous and kindly manner in which they have welcomed Her daughter.

“We learn with great satisfaction that the contribution of Canadian products and manufactures to the great National Exhibition at Paris, last year, attracted much attention, and that it is believed it will have a beneficial effect on the trade of the Dominion with Europe. We thank Your Excellency for congratulating us on the success which, we are well assured, must, in no small degree, be attributable to the kind and unceasing exertions of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, as President of the British section, and for the promise that the report of the Canadian Commissioners will be laid before us when received.

“We are well pleased to be informed that the amount awarded for the Fishery claims, under the Washington Treaty, has been paid by the United States, and that Her Majesty’s Government has arranged with Canada and Newfoundland for their respective shares of the award; and that we shall receive with pleasure the papers on the subject which Your Excellency informs us will be submitted to us.

“We are aware that the important and rapidly increasing trade between Canada and England, in live cattle, has been seriously threatened by the appearance, in various parts of the United States, of pleuro-pneumonia; and that we are glad to know, that in order to prevent the contagion from spreading to Canada and the consequent interruption of the trade, Your Excellency has caused an Order to be issued under “The Animal Contagious Diseases Act, 1869,” prohibiting the importation or introduction into the Dominion of American cattle, for a short period. That we entertain the hope that the disease will be, ere long, extinguished in the United States, and the necessity for continuing the prohibition removed; and that our best attention shall be given to any amendment of the Act just referred to which Your Excellency may cause to be submitted for our consideration.

“We are much gratified by the information that Your Excellency’s Government has commenced negotiations, with Her Majesty’s sanction, for the development of the trade of Canada with France and Spain, and with their respective colonies, and that Your Excellency hopes to be able to lay before us the result of these negotiations during the present Session.

“We thank Your Excellency for the assurance that it is the purpose of your Government to press for the most vigorous prosecution of the Canadian Pacific Railway and to meet the reasonable expectations of British Columbia. That we are sensible that, in carrying out this intention, due regard must be had to the financial position of the country, and that we are happy to know that communication by rail has been effected between Manitoba and the United States system of railways, by the junction, at St. Vincent, of the Pembina Branch of our railway, with the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad, and to learn that the portion of the main line which extends from English River to Keewatin is now being placed under contract, and will be energetically pushed to completion in order to secure, as rapidly as is possible, the connection between Lake Superior and the great North-West.

“Any Bill for the amendment and consolidation of the Acts relating to Stamps which may be submitted for our consideration, as well as any measure amending the Act relating to Weights and Measures, shall receive our best attention.

“We are aware that the decennial census must be taken in 1881, and we agree with Your Excellency in thinking it expedient that a measure for the purpose should be passed during the present Session, in order to give ample time for the preparation of all the preliminary arrangements, and to insure the census being taken as accurately and inexpensively as possible, and that in connection with this subject it may be well to consider the propriety of providing some means for the collection and collation of vital, criminal and general statistics.

“We shall not fail respectfully to consider any Bills which Your Excellency may cause to be laid before us for the re-arrangement of some of the Departments of the Government, and also any measures relating to the survey and management of the Dominion Lands, to the Mounted Police, and to the Post Office Department; for the amendment, in some particulars, of the laws relating to Indians, or for the vesting in Her Majesty, for the use of the Dominion, of certain ordnance and admiralty lands in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

“We thank Your Excellency for the assurance that the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before us at an early day, and that they have been prepared with as much regard to economy as is compatible with the efficiency of the public service.

“We share the regret expressed by Your Excellency that the receipts into the Treasury from ordinary sources continue to be inadequate to meet the charges against the Consolidated Revenue; that we agree with Your Excellency in the opinion that it is not desirable that our finances should longer remain in this condition; and that we trust, with Your Excellency, that by the application of the strictest economy to the public expenditure, and by the readjustment of the tariff with the view of increasing the revenue, and, at the same time, of developing and encouraging the various industries of Canada, we shall be enabled to restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, and to aid in removing the commercial and financial depression which unhappily continues to exist; and that we thank Your Excellency for having directed that the Public Accounts of the past financial year shall be laid before us.

“We agree with Your Excellency in thinking that as Parliament has recognized the importance of providing for the safe deposit of the surplus earnings of the people, by arranging for their being placed with the Government at a fair rate of interest, it may be well for us to consider how far it is practicable to give a like security and encouragement to persons who may desire, by an insurance upon their lives, to make provision for those dependent upon them.

“Your Excellency may rest assured that our best attention will be given to the important subjects which you have been pleased to allude to, and to the general interests of the country.”

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

ROYAL INSTRUCTIONS TO HIS EXCELLENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the Government would lay on the table to-morrow, copies of the new Royal Instructions to, and the Commission of, His Excellency the Governor-General

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps not to-morrow, but immediately.

PACIFIC RAILWAY TENDERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the tenders received for the Pacific Railway called for last summer be laid on the table—I mean the tenders upon which the Government propose to act?

MR. TUPPER: In a short time they will be laid on the table of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: The sanction of the House must be obtained to the awarding of the contracts. Formerly, as to those contracts, a special return was moved in the House. I brought the lowest tenders down, if the hon. gentleman will recollect, and showed them to himself and leader.

MR. TUPPER: I do not think the practice of the hon. gentleman ever was to present tenders before the Government had decided to whom they were to be awarded. As I understand the law, it requires that contracts shall be subject to the approval of the House, the contracts and tenders having been left on the table. That was the practice, I think, of the hon. gentleman, and the course sanctioned by the law.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is strictly correct as to the requirements of the law. In two cases I had to anticipate, by getting the authorization of the House previously, as action was to be taken when it was not in session. But still, if the House be in session, tenders should be laid on the table in the first place. I do not wish to interfere with the awarding of the contracts.

House adjourned at

MONTREAL CUSTOM HOUSE.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. COURSOL moved for a statement giving a complete list of all the permanent, supernumerary and temporary employes appointed to the Custom House of Montreal since the 1st July, 1877, showing, 1st. The name and age of each employé; 2nd. The date of his appointment; 3rd. The salary of each employé; 4th. The nature of his duties; 5th. The changes which have occurred, whether by death, superannuation or dismissal, and the causes of such superannuation and dismissal, and the new appointments made during the period from that date up to the 14th February instant.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

MOTION FOR TENDERS.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex), moved for a return of the notices asking for tenders for reporting and publishing the Official Debates of this House, together with copies of all tenders received, and of all arrangements or contracts entered into for the reporting and publication of said debates.

Motion agreed to.

REMOVAL OF STEEL RAILS FROM VANCOUVER ISLAND TO FRAZER RIVER.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. BUNSTER moved for copies of all letters of instruction, for the removal of steel rails from Nanaimo and Esquimalt to Frazer River, B.C., and a statement showing the cost of such removal. He said he owed it to his constituents and the Dominion at large, to make this motion. The rails were landed in Nanaimo in good faith to build the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, making the terminus at Esquimalt, and if the work had been prosecuted in good faith, the road would now be in good running order. When the surveyors appointed had found the route to be a good practical one, and were within a mile of the completion of their survey, they were ordered away because it was reported the Island was hostile to the late Government; and, in order to punish it, these rails were removed from the Island to the mainland. This report was incorrect. All the Island wanted was to support the Government which would build the road in good faith. How sharp they were in moving those rails on the eve of an election, as if they could not stand a few months longer there, after having been there the whole of the previous year, and now an enormous expenditure would have to be incurred to bring them back. There was no occasion for the removal of these rails. It was not acting in good faith with British Columbia, but trying to get people annoyed and led astray as to where the terminus should be. Esquimalt was the only suitable harbour. It had been recommended by the engineer, and the Admiral, and was the one to which commerce pointed, and hence these rails would have to be brought back, to build the road between Esquimalt and Nanaimo. His motion was a reasonable one, and merited the consideration of the House.

MR. TUPPER said there was no reason why the correspondence asked for should not be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSALS FROM THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) moved for a return showing the names of all persons who have been dismissed or removed from office, or who have been superannuated, and the causes of such dismissal, removal or superannuation, or who have resigned, since the 10th October, 1878; showing the office or position such persons occupied, and whether on the permanent staff or in the temporary employ of the Government or otherwise in the public service, and when such dismissal, removal, superannuation or resignation took place.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he thought the desire the hon. gentleman embodied in these resolutions was a very laudable one; but, at the same time, the interest which the public took in the matter would not, in his opinion, be satisfied without they obtained some further information so as to allow them to draw comparisons between the action of the present occupants of the Treasury benches and those who formerly occupied them. With a desire to get that information, he would move, seconded by Mr. McCarthy, that the following be added to the resolution: "Also for a similar return, showing the names of all persons dismissed, removed, or superannuated, or who resigned between 4th November, 1873, and 1st April, 1874; and, also, the names of all persons appointed to office between the said dates, stating the office to which they were appointed, and the salary attached thereto."

MR. CAMERON said that, when he prepared his motion, his intention was, in the first place, to cover the ground from January 1st, 1878, down to the present period. He would have covered the ground covered by the amendment, but he understood that all the information moved for by the hon. gentleman had already been brought down. He had no objection to the amendment. In common with his hon. friend and others, he had a curiosity, a laudable curiosity, to know the exact state of the public service during the period referred to. The expense the preparation of these returns entailed had deterred him from moving for the information asked for by his hon. friend. However, the hon. gentleman, perhaps, knew better what the views and intentions of the Government were on questions of this kind, and, if they chose to vote for the expense, he had no objection. And, as he understood there were some twenty or thirty sessional clerks who had nothing to do, perhaps it would be just as well to give them the employment which the amendment of his hon. friend would furnish.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) moved for a return showing the names and former residences of all persons who had been appointed to office since the 10th of October, 1878; showing the office to which each such person had been appointed, the date of such appointment, and whether in the Civil Service or otherwise, or elsewhere, or in any other position in the public service, and whether the appointment has been permanent or temporary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD proposed that the motion should be amended so as to read: "Showing the names and former residences of all persons who have been appointed or promoted to office, or whose salaries have been raised since the 17th of September, 1878, showing the office to which each such person has been appointed."

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

MR. CAMERON said he had no objection to that, and, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would also add, "also showing the salary of each person now."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: All right.

MR. CARTWRIGHT suggested that it might be convenient to divide the motion into two clauses. The hon. gentleman of course wanted to get the names of the persons appointed from the 17th September to 10th October. His hon. friend wanted to get the information from the 10th October. If two distinct lists were made it would be a convenience, as they would have to divide it themselves afterwards.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he was surprised, after the hint he had given to the hon. gentleman, that his desire for information was, on these subjects, a little larger than his (Mr. Cameron's), that he did not attempt to gratify that desire by enlarging the scope of his motion. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) had written a few words which he thought would meet the suggestion that had been made by the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. It was not open to the same objection that the hon. member for South Huron had raised to the previous amendment, because he said the returns were already before the House. In this case, the country had not yet had full information as to the number of appointments made in the dying hours of the late Administration. He begged to move that the following words be added to the resolution: "Also for a similar return showing the names of all persons appointed or promoted to any office under the Government of Canada, between the 17th September, 1878, and 11th October, 1878, specifying whether any and what increased pay or emolument was given any person or persons so appointed or promoted."

MR. MACDOUGALL suggested the amendment of the motion of the addition of the words "salary or emolument." He thought it desirable, for the information of the House as well as of the country, that they should see in the same return the amount of the burden laid on the people for those various offices.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that he had no objection to that amendment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer, for a return shewing the names and former residences of all persons who have been appointed or promoted to office, or whose salaries have been raised since the 10th Oct., 1878; shewing the office to which each such person has been appointed, the date of such appointment, and whether in the Civil Service or otherwise, or elsewhere, or in any other position in the Public Service, and whether the appointment has been permanent or temporary; also for a similar return showing the names of all persons appointed, or promoted to any office under the Government of Canada, and the salary or emolument of such office between the 17th day of September, and the 11th day of October, 1878; and specifying whether any and what increased pay or emolument was given to the person or persons so appointed or promoted.

DISMISSAL OF OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. ANGLIN moved that the Clerk do lay on the table of the House copies of all correspondence between the Clerk and the late Speaker of this House respecting appointments to vacancies in the service of the House of Commons since the last Session of Parliament, and copies of any reports respecting such appointments made by any officer of the Department. He said he had felt it his duty to bring the matter involved in this resolution under the consideration of the House of Commons at the earliest possible moment, because he believed that it affected very materially indeed the rights of this Parliament, and its dignity. The Speaker of the House of Commons was elected by this House in theory at all events, if not in fact. He was elected to serve as their Speaker, to perform certain functions, and exercise certain authority in their behalf. He was elected under the present state of things, not merely for the duration of the Parliament over which he presided, but also to act as Speaker during the interim period between the dissolution of one Parliament and the assembling of another, and the election of another Speaker, so that at no time should the Departments of the House of Commons, or the country, be without a Speaker, unless in case of his death or absence from the country. There might be some doubt as to what the precise authority of the Speaker was during the interim. He (Mr. Anglin) had looked carefully into this question before acting as he had done with regard to the appointments. He felt satisfied then, as now, that it was the right of the Speaker, and, under the circumstances, his duty as Speaker, to make those appointments. He would, at the very outset of this matter, disclaim any intention of making party capital thereby. He did not think there was any question of party involved in it. But he did think the House itself ought to take such measures as it might think necessary to vindicate its own rights and maintain its own dignity. He thought, at all events, that even those who differed from him would be satisfied that something should be done to settle this question in a proper manner, so that hereafter there might be no room to doubt what were the rights and duties of the Speaker in this respect. It would be natural to bring forward English precedents in matters of this kind; but he had found it impossible to discover any, for the reason that, so long ago as the 39th and 40th Geo. III, a Statute was passed regulating the mode of appointments in the British House of Commons, in a manner entirely different from that we had followed. Probably some sections of that Statute embodied the practice of the House for many years previous, at all events; while the higher officers of the House were, as with us, appointed by the Crown, the subordinate officers were appointed, in one section, by the Clerk of the House, and in another, by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Under that Act was created, he believed for the first time, a Commission the powers of which were very clearly defined. In England, the authority of the Commissioners was much more clearly defined than in our Act. They were clothed with more extensive powers than the Canadian Commissioners, for, while the Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms made appointments, the Commissioners determined the salary in every case. There was no provision similar to that in the Canadian Act regulating the internal economy of the House. Therefore, he found it exceedingly difficult to obtain any assistance in the determination of this question from anything to be found either in the Statutes or books usually referred to in the settlement of matters of this kind. But in England, as with us, the Commissioners of Internal Economy had no power, no actual existence, they could do nothing, without the presence of the Speaker. So, without the Speaker, except in the case of his death or absence from the country, there could be no sitting of the Commissioners, and they could exercise no authority whatever. The Speaker, on the other hand, continued to exist after the dissolution of Parliament. In 1833 there was a discussion on the subject in the Imperial Parliament at the time of the re-election of Mr. Manners-Sutton as Speaker. The question arose incidentally. Objection was made to his re-election by some gentlemen who alleged that he was then actually a pensioner. He had acquired the right to a pension by length of service, and would become a pensioner after he ceased to be Speaker. The contention on the other side was that he had not ceased to be Speaker, but must continue Speaker for certain purposes until a new Parliament had assembled and a new Speaker had been elected; and one of the facts adduced in proof of this view was that in the case of the demise of the Sovereign before the assembling of a new Parliament, or the day appointed for its assembling, the old Parliament must assemble and, with its Speaker, continue to exist for six months. So it could not be held that the Speaker had ceased to be Speaker, even if no such Act as the Internal Economy Act had ever been passed. In Canada, however, they were compelled to argue from their own Statutes, rules and practice as to what was the duty, and what were the rights of the Speaker ad interim. The Canadian Statute of 1868 was exceedingly fragmentary. It was passed, probably, with a view to some special circumstances of the time, and not for the purpose of laying down any general broad principle or creating any special system for the management of the internal economy of the House for all time. There were no special provisions for the period between the dissolution of one

Parliament and the assembling of a new House, save this:—

“For the purposes of this Act, the person who shall fill the office of Speaker at the time of any dissolution of Parliament, shall be deemed to be the Speaker until a Speaker shall be chosen by the new Parliament; and in the event of the death, or disability, or absence from Canada of the Speaker, during any dissolution or prorogation of Parliament, any three of the Commissioners may execute any of the purposes of this Act.”

The Speaker might continue to act independently of the Commissioners altogether, but the Commissioners, without the presence of the Speaker, had no power to act, in any matter—had no authority whatever. The whole of the purposes of the Act, it was not very easy to discover. One section provided that an accountant might be appointed by the Speaker. Why it was necessary to make such a provision he had failed to discover. Unquestionably, while the House was in existence, under the Canadian rules and practice, the Speaker had the power to appoint all officers necessary to the proper discharge of the duties of his Department. One portion of the 9th section provided that the Speaker, not merely during the interim, but at any time, might suspend or dismiss any of the clerks or officers of the House appointed by the Speaker, and suspend any of the officers appointed by commission. He was merely required in that case to inform the Governor-General that he had suspended such commissioned officer. He did not require to give any reason for the suspension, and no one but the Speaker had the right to cancel such suspension. Looking for a moment at the Statute mentioned, it seemed clear that the right to dismiss must imply the right to appoint. If this were not so, it was evident that very serious injury to the public service might be the consequence. There were officers in the employment of the House of Commons whose duties it was of the highest importance should be properly discharged. If he had occasion, after the dissolution of the House, to dismiss one of these officers, he would ask if it could be supposed that this office must remain vacant—that the public business must be brought to a stand-still, because no one had authority to appoint another officer to do that work. If the Speaker had no right to fill that office, it could not be filled. That could not be the intention of the Act, nor could it have been the wish or understanding of Parliament when the Act was passed. Rule 102 of the House afforded material assistance in the interpretation of the Statute. It could not be objected that that rule was framed before the passage of this Act, and, therefore, that the words "the Speaker" in it must be held to mean only the Speaker while he held the position during the existence of Parliament. The word "Speaker" must refer to the Speaker during the interim of Parliament as well as to the Speaker in full possession of all the powers and privileges conferred by his election. Thus there was not the slightest word to show that the authority, which this rule recognised in the Speaker, did not pertain to him after the dissolution of Parliament, and until the assembling of a new one. The rule referred to said :

"Before filling any vacancy in the service of the House by the Speaker, enquiry shall be made touching the necessity for the continuance of such office; and the amount of salary to be attached to the same shall be fixed by the Speaker, subject to the approval of the House."

That, he thought, plainly referred to the Speaker at all times while he was Speaker. The Commissioners of Internal Economy had not the slightest authority to interfere with these appointments. The authority to make appointments was vested in the Speaker alone, and the Commissioners of Internal Economy under our Statute did not enjoy the power held by the Commissioners under the Imperial Statutes. They were only authorised to guard and protect the funds appropriated by Parliament, and to see that these were properly expended. The money was drawn by them from the Treasury, placed to their credit, and payable to their order, and they saw to its proper expenditure. These were the entire duties they had to discharge—the entire extent of the rights, powers and authority conferred on them by the Statute. He had no doubt that, at times since the passing of this Statute, the Speaker had taken the advice of the members of the Commission, who under the Statute must always be members of the Government, more especially when any change he thought necessary was calculated in any way to add to the public expenditure. During his (Mr. Anglin's) incumbency of the office, he in no one case had added to the public expenditure without consulting the Commissioners. Generally, after each Session, they met for a slight review of the service, and whenever any important change was made it was with their approval and sanction. But he never thought he was required by law to consult those gentlemen in any way. In many instances he acted entirely on his own judgment. He felt that he should not throw upon the Commissioners any responsibility which, under the rules of the House, he was himself expected to bear. To come to the matter which he desired to bring more immediately under the consideration of the House, he would say that, during the recent general elections, two gentlemen in the employment of the House chose to resign their positions, in order, he believed, to become candidates for the representation of some portion of the Dominion in this House. One of those gentlemen was a member of this House, and he thought it must be a matter of pride to the Department to which he belonged, as well as to himself, that that gentleman had already assumed so excellent and distinguished a position in the House. The other gentlemen had failed to gain his election. The resignation of one of these gentlemen, Mr. Tassé, was forwarded to him when he was busy canvassing in his own county. He at once accepted that resignation, as he did not wish to place anything in the way of his (Mr. Tassé's) becoming a candidate. When the elections were over, being in the habit of frequent communication with the Clerk of the House respecting the necessities of the Department, he received from him a communication representing that it was of the very greatest importance to the public service that the places vacated by these gentlemen should be filled. It was the Clerk's opinion, as it was his (Mr. Anglin's) still, that this application was made to the proper authority, and, indeed, the only person competent to make any such appointment. He made further inquiry regarding the matter, and the Clerk forwarded to him, at his request, a report on the whole subject obtained from Mr. Cour-solles, the gentleman who was at the head of the French Translation Department. That report insisted very strongly upon the very great necessity of filling the vacancy in his branch of the Department, as the work done there was very great, and he had frequently to employ one of the best of the sessional clerks as an extra clerk for six or seven months or more of the recess. He had a great many applications—Mr. Speaker had no doubt learned what that meant by this time—for these two offices. He was quite determined that he would fill these offices with men perfectly competent. He, therefore, took some time for consideration, and came up to Ottawa for the purpose of making further enquiry. In making these appointments he endeavoured to the utmost of his ability to provide for the proper discharge of the duties of the Department. A gentleman was recommended to him by one of the old and experienced members of this House, as one perfectly competent to discharge the duties of a translator. This gentleman was represented to him as a man of marked ability indeed. After talking the matter all over, acting on his own judgment, rather than on that of the Clerk, he tried to arrange for the proper performance of the service. He put in place of Mr. David—believing it to be of very great importance that they should have an experienced translator for the translation of the Votes and Proceedings—Mr. Gingras, who was then senior French translator, immediately after Mr. Coursolles. He knew nothing of the politics of Mr. Gingras. He placed in the position rendered vacant by the promotion of Mr. Gingras, Mr. Brossoit, whom he had never seen, and who had been very highly recommended by one of the oldest and most experienced members of Parliament. Then, to the place rendered vacant by the resignation of Mr. Tassé, he promoted a gentleman immediately next in rank—a gentleman of whose politics he knew absolutely nothing. Immediately after him came two young gentlemen, who had not served a very long time. These he did not promote, but he appointed to the position which remained vacant, Mr. Piton, who had been for several years sessional French translator, and had been selected, from year to year, by Mr. Coursolles, to fill the position of extra clerk, and French translator during the recess. He (Mr. Anglin) had reason to believe that Mr. Piton was a person entirely competent to discharge the duties of that position, and he accordingly appointed him. In all that he had done, he believed that he had fairly and properly discharged his duties as Speaker. Of course, it was not of the essence of this question under consideration, whether he had, or had not, so discharged his duties. The essence of the question was whether he had a right to make those appointments. He was satisfied then that he had the proper authority to fill the appointments and the Clerk accepted these appointments, and gave effect to them. The gentlemen were put to work and remained at work two or three days when, as the Clerk subsequently informed him, he (the Clerk) received a message from the Premier directing him not to recognise any appointments made by himself since the dissolution of Parliament, or something to that effect. The Clerk at once dismissed those gentlemen. He (Mr. Anglin) felt that it was his duty then, as Speaker of this House, to take very high and strong grounds, for he thought it was one of the first duties of a Speaker to protect the independence of the House of Commons against all assaults and encroachments, and more especially when these were made by the Crown. Gentlemen who had not much experience in Parliamentary life, and who had not much studied the history of the struggles in which parliamentarians were engaged in former times might not attach much importance to the mode in which an officer of the House was appointed or dismissed, but old parliamentarians who had studied this matter, and knew the vast importance of preserving intact the rights and privileges of Parliament would be satisfied that it was the bounden duty of the Speaker not to suffer the slightest intrusion upon those rights and privileges, without the strongest possible protest on his part. It was true that, under the circumstances, he had no power, but he believed he had the authority, and he was sorry to say that he believed authority and power had been severed of late, and that power, for a time at all events, in appearance triumphed over authority. Believing that it was his duty, as far as possible, to vindicate the privileges of the House and maintain its independence, as far as he could, he immediately wrote to the Clerk of the House a very short letter, in which he said, in substance:—"I write immediately to protest, in the strongest possible manner, against the interference of the Executive, or of any member of the Executive, in the affairs of the Department, of which the Speaker of the House is the head; and I call upon you immediately to undo anything you might have done in obedience to an authority which, as I have learned from your letter, Sir John A. Macdonald has usurped; and I insist that henceforth you receive no instructions regarding the affairs of the Department from any other person than the Speaker of the House." In doing that, he thought he was only discharging his duty. He had no wish to quarrel with Sir John A. Macdonald, but he felt it was a duty that he owed to this House and the country to take the position he did. In a private note, he suggested to the Clerk that probably it would be well to furnish the right hon. gentleman with a copy of his letter, and he believed this was done. Some time afterwards, the Clerk of the House of Commons wrote him again, expressing regret at the embarrassing position in which he had put himself (Mr. Anglin) by asking him to make those appointments, and suggesting that he (the Clerk) should appoint provisionally some persons to discharge the duties of those officers, as it was of great importance that action should be at once taken. He (Mr. Anglin) wrote back immediately, peremptorily forbidding the Clerk to appoint any person whatever to discharge the duties of an office to which he had appointed persons quite competent. Some time afterwards, Mr. Thaddeus Patrick, Clerk of the Private Bills Committee, died. He took no action in this case until the Clerk of the House officially informed him of Mr. Patrick's death. Then he felt it his duty, although he received no requisition on the part of the Clerk—for it was scarcely to be expected then that after what had passed the Clerk would call upon him to make any appointments—to reorganise that branch of the Department. The clerks in that branch were generally busy for some time before the meeting of Parliament, as the rules required that Bills should be deposited there before Parliament met, and it was absolutely necessary in the public interest that, for some weeks, at all events, before the meeting of Parliament, this Department should be properly organised. He did not stop to inquire what the politics of any of the clerks were, but, having heard from time to time very high accounts indeed of the capacity and ability, particularly of Mr. Hartney, the young gentleman who had, for some time past, discharged the onerous duties of Clerk of the Railways, Canals and Telegraphs, and the Banking and Commerce Committees, he (Mr. Anglin) concluded that he would, under the circumstances, be the person, of all others, who should be entrusted with the care of that work, and with the discharge of those duties for which he had already proved himself so entirely competent. Mr. Panet was his immediate superior. He knew that Mr. Panet had been in the office a great many years, and, when he became Speaker, Mr. Panet was an applicant for an increase of salary, on the ground that he had been so long in the public service. He (Mr. Anglin) wrote to the Clerk of the House informing him that he had appointed Mr. Panet permanently to the position of senior clerk of that branch of the Department, giving him rank and precedence, and an increase of salary, from $1,200 to $1,300 per year. To Mr. Hartney he assigned the work of those important committees, and because of the great importance of the work and its very onerous character, he directed that his salary should be increased from $1,200 to $1,400. And then to Mr. Todd, son of the gentleman who was formerly at the head of the Department,—a very estimable young man, he believed,—he gave a slight increase from a junior clerk's salary of $800 to $900. Another young man, whom he had appointed on a former occasion as junior clerk in the room of Capt. Nolan, deceased, he directed to be placed as senior clerk upon the Railway Committee. So it would be seen that, as far as he was concerned personally, he had no object to serve in this matter but the promotion of the public interest. Not taking into account the salary of the junior clerk who, at all events, ought to have been on the staff, he would have effected a saving by that arrangement of $1,400 per year. During his whole time in the Chair, he had directed his attention particularly to reducing the number of permanent officers on the staff, rather than to reducing salaries, many of which were quite small enough. Even deducting the salary of the junior clerk there would have been a net saving of $600, and, in the whole, of $1,400 per year. Such was the course he had pursued in reference to these appointments. He understood that these appointments had not been recognised, and they had heard in the House the extraordinary statement that Mr. Piché, who was formerly first clerk assistant, and who no longer appeared at their table, had not tendered his resignation, and had not been dismissed, and yet that Mr. Speaker had appointed another in his place and room. He thought it necessary now to supplement that statement by another on his own behalf, namely, that he had never received Mr. Piché's resignation, and had never dismissed him. For all he knew, Mr. Piché was today as well qualified as when he was appointed years ago, to discharge all the duties of Assistant Clerk of this House. What had been done with him, and why it had been done, it was for others to say. But neither Mr. Speaker nor himself had either dismissed Mr. Piché or received his resignation, and they had shared between them all the authority there was to exercise, during the last twelve months, to do one or the other. The mode and manner in which Mr. Piché had been got rid of was something demanding an explanation from some quarter. He believed that he had now placed the matter fully and fairly before the House. He had looked into the whole case as thoroughly as he could, both as to the law and the practice. If he had not had the power of appointing then, no one else had. The Commissioners of Internal Economy, apart from the Speaker, had no power whatever; even combined with the Speaker, they had no power as Commissioners either to make or unmake any such appointments as this. He desired to say, further, that, up to the last moment, up to last Thursday at three o'clock, when he ceased to be the Speaker, he had never received, either directly or indirectly, the slightest intimation that the Commissioners of Internal Economy desired to make any new appointments. He did expect, during the long interval that ensued, that information would be conveyed to him, but not the slightest intimation ever was conveyed him in any way. Some money matters required that he should sign some cheques as Speaker, and that these cheques should furthermore be signed by some of the Commissioners. Before coming to Ottawa, he had sent up some of these cheques leaving the dates blank, supposing the Commissioners, whoever they were, would sign them; and he suggested to the Accountant that he should speak to the Premier or Finance Minister and have something done so as to avoid irregularity. When he came here, he found those cheques lying as they were, and he had to tear them up and prepare others. The subject was one with which the House should deal and, when he put the House in possession of all the facts, and of such matters of law and usage as he had been able to make himself acquainted with, he had fully discharged his duty as the one who, up to last Thursday, held the position of Speaker. It was now incumbent on the House, the guardian of its own rights, liberties, privileges and independence, to determine whether anything should be done in this matter. When the papers came down it would be open to any hon. member to move a resolution respecting this affair. It was of the utmost importance that no difficulty of this kind should arise hereafter. If the Premier thought the Executive or any member of the Executive ought to be clothed with authority to regulate these matters in the interval between the dissolution of one House and the meeting of the next, he ought to introduce a Bill to that effect, defining the duties of the Speaker, so that the head of this House, the agent selected by this House, should not find himself in the humiliating position of not knowing exactly what his duties were. Though he (Mr. Anglin) believed he did know his, and that he had done nothing which he had not the right to do, still there should be no room for doubt and no chance of collision between the representative of the House and the head of the Government. Such collisions must have a most deplorable effect, resulting in the lowering of the dignity and the infringement of the rights and privileges of this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the hon. gentleman that there was no question of politics involved in this matter, and that the Commission on Internal Economy had no right to make appointments to offices in this House. The Commission had certain powers respecting expenditure, the right to sign cheques, but the power of making appointments did not rest with them. He did not agree with the hon. gentleman that there was any question of privilege or the dignity of Parliament in the matter. The Crown did not claim the right to appoint officers, and no member of the Government acting for the Crown claimed the right to make these appointments. They rested with the Speaker, and the only question was, not whether the dignity and independence of Parliament had been affected, but simply the question of law, of statutory construction, as to who was the Speaker that had the right to make appointments, whether it was the present Speaker, after his election to the office, or the Speaker of the defunct Parliament. The hon. gentleman said the present Speaker could not get any assistance from English precedent in his course. No question of this kind could arise in Parliament in England. Mr. Manners Sutton, to whose case the hon. gentleman alluded, was declared Speaker on quite a different principle, and for quite different reasons from the present case. They all knew the Parliament in England died with the demise of the Crown, and England was then without a Parliament. In the old days, when there was a danger of disputed succession, owing to claimants in two families, it was thought a matter of danger that England should be without a Parliament at the time of the demise of the Sovereign. It was, therefore, provided that in such a case the old Parliament should continue to exist and assemble, as if it had still a legal existence, for six months after the demise of the Crown, so that at no period should there be any danger arising to the peaceful succession of the Crown from the absence of Parliament. The Speaker was elected to preside over the deliberations of the House of Commons, and as a matter of necessity, when the Parliament died, the Speaker died. There was no Speaker until the 2nd of May, 1868. In case of the dissolution or the natural death of the Parliament, there was no Speaker until this Act passed, and it was only by virtue of this Internal Economy Act that there was a Speaker at all after the termination of Parliament. This Act did not make a Speaker for all purposes. It declared that after the termination of Parliament, the late Speaker should continue for all purposes of the Act to be Speaker, but did not give the Speaker the general powers of Speaker. The purposes of the Act were simply to carry on the expenditure and keep the machinery, as it were, in motion. There was no provision that the Speaker for general purposes or other purposes than those defined in the Act was Speaker at all, and the fact that he had the power of appointment in one case shows that clearly. There was a specific provision that the Speaker, under this Act, had the power of appointing an accountant. The main object of this Act was to take care of the funds, to apply the funds necessary to keep up the machinery of Parliament, and for this purpose to have always an accountant, and thus the Speaker was given the power to appoint him. The hon. gentleman said that, under the 9th clause, the Speaker had the power of dismissal, and that that involved the power of appointment. That principle could not be found laid down in any book in the world, but the converse was, that, where any power to create was given for a specified time, the power of dismissal was necessarily involved in it. The Clerk had the power of dismissal, but not the power of appointment. That rested with the Speaker. The hon. gentleman argued as a matter of law, of statutory construction, that by necessary implication the power of dismissal conferred the power of appointment. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) denied that in toto. If, then, the hon. gentleman had no right to appoint these officers, these appointments were void. The hon. gentleman had no power to make those appointments, and as a matter of expediency he ought not to have that power. He had practically ceased to be responsible for the carrying on of the affairs of this House. A new election had taken place. He knew perfectly well from the complexion of the members returned that it was exceedingly unlikely he would be nominated as the new Speaker, and that the responsibility would fall upon his successor, who would be held accountable for all irregularities and for every farthing of expenditure. It was, therefore, highly inexpedient and unwise in the late Speaker to tie the hands of the new Speaker, to fetter him for five years with those appointments made between October and February, filling up every possible crevice and cranny in order to prevent him from exercising his discretion in the choice of his subordinates. It was a very unwise attempt at usurpation, a very unwise attempt to prevent the Speaker from exercising his discretion in the great responsibility of carrying on the affairs of the House. It was also questionable taste to deprive the present Speaker of the patronage to which he was entitled. The hon. gentleman knew his responsibility had ceased and fallen upon other shoulders. Would it not have been wise, or proper, for the hon. gentleman to have left these matters to the present Speaker; to have left it to him to select his agents, subordinates, and assistants? There could, of course, be no objection to this motion. The matter ought to be settled, as the hon. gentleman said, in a manner that would prevent the question arising again, and he would venture to state that, when the House exercised its discretion upon the point, and settled it for ever, it would not be within the power of a defunct officer to make appointments after all essential responsibility must have ceased. It was quite true, as the hon. gentleman had said, that this Act was inadequate for the purposes for which it was passed. He quite agreed that the Act should be amended, and he desired that, either by the action of the Government or by a Committee of the House—it was a matter more connected with the House itself than the Government,—this subject would be fully considered, and the Act amended so as to secure it beyond all doubt in the future, and prevent any infringement either of the dignity or privilege of Parliament.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he was very glad they had had announced from the head of the Government a distinct acknowledgement of a principle which should obtain in this House at all times, and that was that in the Speaker's hands was vested the sole appointing power of the officers and servants of the House, and that in him rested the sole responsibility to the House. He was very glad this had been acknowledged so clearly and so well, because they had had reason to fear that the rule which they knew to be a sound rule had been evaded. They had felt, from the rumours that had been passing current, that the appointment of officers of the House was in a measure to be taken out of the Speaker's hands, and that there was to be a pressure brought to bear upon that hon. gentleman to which he (Mr. Cockburn), as an independent member of the House, would regret to see the hon. Speaker yield, because he thought as long as they expected thoroughly efficient officers and servants of the House they must hold the Speaker responsible for such appointments, which should in a great measure be non-political. He was of opinion that the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester had been of use in that respect, and he was glad the question had been brought up. Beyond that he (Mr. Cockburn) declined to accompany the hon. member for Gloucester. He believed the interpretation put upon the Statute by the leader of the Government was the correct one. He thought there was no doubt that, when the Speaker ceased to represent the House by which he was nominated, and knew that a new Parliament had been called into existence, that he was functus officii as to the matter of appointments, and that his powers in that respect were unquestionably gone. The Statute was undoubtedly a very vague and defective one. But, if they only looked back at the old cumbersome system that existed years ago, when the Committee on Contingencies managed these matters, and the difficulties it entailed, they would know at once why the Act was passed. It was passed for the purpose of placing in the hands of the Speaker of the day control of the finances of the House, in order to afford a speedy and prompt payment of the officers and servants. That was the great object of the Internal Economy Act. He quite agreed that, when a Speaker knew that a new Parliament had been called into existence, and that he would in the order of things give way to a successor, he should not perform, or for a moment dream of performing, the so-called duty of appointment to vacancies. The member for Gloucester spoke of the Statute as being a law respecting which they had no precedents, to govern them. He begged to tell the hon. gentleman of a precedent which was made in 1874. Just as there was the other day in September last, there was then a Speaker representing a defunct Parliament. He retained office until his successor was appointed, and, during the interregnum between the two Sessions, he held in his hands opportunities of making appointments to offices of very considerable importance in the House. There was an important vacancy which had occurred at that time. He thought, if he recollected aright, the office was that of Accountant to the House.

AN HON. MEMBER : No.

MR. COCKBURN said at any rate a very important vacancy occurred at that time, and the Speaker was warned by two Ministers of the Crown against making the appointment to the vacant office. The answer given was that he had no thought of appointing to that office; that he felt that his functions of appointment under the Statute had ceased, and that he did not dream of making any further appointments. He presented this precedent to Mr. Speaker, as the other one had been referred to, and he trusted that, when that hon. gentleman was in the sear and yellow of his leaf—and he hoped it would be very green for a long time—he would remember the two precedents and make his choice between them.

MR. MACKENZIE said they were all exceedingly obliged to the

hon. member for Gloucester for his calm, temperate, and able statement of the case. The subject would, of course, come up again when the papers were before them. He rose then merely for the purpose of asking the hon. gentleman opposite for information on one or two points which he had forgotten. The hon. member for Gloucester stated, in the course of his speech, that the Clerk had informed him that he had received an order from the Prime Minister, directing him not to recognize any of these appointments. The hon. gentleman himself said he gave the Clerk an opinion. He (Mr. Mackenzie) desired to know whether it was an order, as stated, or simply an opinion of what he believed to be the correct course in the case. Then the hon. gentleman had failed to inform the House concerning Mr. Piché's case. He had asked the Speaker, two days before, if he had received Mr. Piché's resignation, and he said that he had not. He then asked him if he had dismissed Mr. Piché, and he said he had not. He was unable to elicit any information whatever from the Speaker concerning the resignation, removal, or dismissal of one of their chief officers, and to that hour the House had received no information on that point. Hon. gentlemen opposite must give them that information. The House was entitled to the fullest information concerning the disposal of this matter. They found, whether the interpretation they put upon the Act was correct or not, that there would be very considerable inconvenience were the interpretation of the hon. gentleman correct. Under that interpretation, the Act would be exceedingly inadequate for the fulfilment of the object for which it was framed. The 10th section of the Act directed that immediately after the passing of this Act the Clerk of the House of Commons shall take and subscribe before the Speaker the oath of allegiance, and all other officers, clerks and messengers of the House of Commons shall take and subscribe before the Clerk of the House of Commons the oath of allegiance; and every officer, clerk or messenger who shall hereafter be appointed shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe the same oath; and the Clerk of the House of Commons shall keep a register of all such oaths." Now, suppose that a number of vacancies occurred during a long interregnum, by decease or resignation, who would have the power of appointment, and before whom were they to take the oath? All these questions naturally came up in connection with this matter, and it was very clear whether or not it was intended to give the power of appointment of other officers than that of the Accountant, which was provided for in one section, that the other section implied that the power of appointment rested somewhere, and that the duty of taking the oath before the Speaker of the day devolved upon all these officers. The hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) referred to a case that occurred in 1874. He thought he could give an explanation of the hon. gentleman's statement. The late Accountant, Mr. Vaux, was superannuated. He had become utterly unable to discharge his duties, and earnestly requested to be placed on the Superannuation List. There could have been nothing more proper than to do this; but the Government of the day conceived it desirable, in the interests of Parliament, that there should be no appointment to the office of Accountant, and that the Deputy Clerk should discharge the duties of Accountant as well as those of his own office. No Accountant was appointed, but the Deputy Clerk of the House, Mr. Hartney, was asked to undertake the charge of the Accountant's office as well as those of Deputy Clerk, and he had discharged them from that time, the House dispensing altogether with the office and salary of the previous Accountant, and the then Speaker was simply informed of the plan. He (Mr. Mackenzie) thought it was tolerably clear that the House had not received a satisfactory assurance that the Government did not interfere directly in the matter over which neither this Act, nor any other Act, gave them any control. But he would wait, before making any argument, or passing any opinion further on the subject, for the statements the hon. the Premier, might make on those three points. First, with regard to the resignation of Mr. Piché; second, whether an order was sent to Mr. Patrick; and third, where the power of appointment lay.

MR. MACKENZIE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the power of appointment rested with the Speaker. The question was who was Speaker; which he could not answer except by giving his own private opinion.

MR. MACKENZIE: The present Speaker said he was not on the occasion in question; that he made no appointment in the case.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that might be; but, so far as he (Sir John A. Macdonald) knew, Mr. Piché was an officer of the House, and would be until it carried out, what he hoped it would, a proposal to provide for him before dispensing with his services. As the House knew, he had suffered so much in past Sessions that he was obliged to absent himself generally from the House in a way to interrupt the business of the House, and it was known it was considered his duties ended with the Session, and it was considered by himself (Sir John A. Macdonald), and those who acted with him, that they would be improving the efficiency of the staff of the House if his services were dispensed with on the provision of a gratuity to him. Till that was done by the House, he was still an officer.

MR. MACKENZIE asked whether an order was sent to Mr. Patrick to disregard the appointments made by the late Speaker.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he forgot whether the order was verbal or written, but he had expressed his opinion in very strong terms to the effect that the late Speaker had no right to make this appointment, and that the House would not, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would not, recognise the appointment.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was a serious misunderstanding in the matter of Mr. Piché's resignation and the appointment of his successor. The Speaker had informed the House that a vacancy had occurred in the office of Assistant Clerk, and that the Speaker had appointed another person to fill the place. Now they were informed by the leader of the House, that there was no such vacancy, and, if there was not, there could have been no such appointment. He hoped the matter would be corrected, and the contradiction between the statements of that hon. gentleman and those of the hon. the Speaker reconciled.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no contradiction. Mr. Piché received an intimation of what was the intention of the Government and acted upon it, he had no doubt, gladly enough.

MR. ANGLIN said if Mr. Piché was still an officer of the House, as the right hon. the Premier had stated, he was still First Assistant Clerk, he held no other office, and yet his hon. friend the Speaker informed the House that he had appointed Mr. Bourinot First Assistant Clerk; he did not say, however, that it was in place of Mr. Piché, so they had the extraordinary spectacle of two First Assistant Clerks, one drawing his full salary, and the other hoping for some provision which the right hon. gentleman had said would be very satisfactory; but, meanwhile, drawing a salary, or at least entitled to it. He (Mr. Anglin) rose chiefly, however, to reply to one or two very extraordinary remarks of the Premier. He (Mr. Anglin) endeavoured to make his statement as mildly and moderately as the circumstances permitted. The right hon. gentleman did not choose to so regard it, for he spoke a little more warmly than the occasion required; but that would not have been of much importance, if he had not made some very extraordinary statements. He said that his (Mr. Anglin's) exercise of an authority which he believed he possessed up to the 13th of February at three o'clock in the afternoon, conflicted with the authority which the present Speaker did not possess till after that hour; that he (Mr. Anglin) endeavoured to render the Speaker's position difficult; that he exercised patronage which, in modesty and propriety, should have been left to the present Speaker. The right hon. gentleman overlooked a very important statement of his that, in the first place, he acted upon the direct information of the Clerk that it was absolutely necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the House, that the vacant office should be filled; and, furthermore, that the duties could not be performed with the office not filled. He (Mr. Anglin) did not think that, when doing what he believed necessary in the interest of the public, he was interfering with the powers which the present Speaker did not then possess. No conflict of authority could thus be considered possible, nor was it fair to assert that he had meddled improperly or unfairly with the Speaker's authority. It would have been quite competent for the Speaker to remove the persons he (Mr. Anglin) had appointed, although this would have been entirely contrary to usage and custom. Nevertheless, he believed, had they been removed for any good reason, the House would probably have approved the act, and he (Mr. Anglin) would not have raised his voice to condemn it. He, however, believed that he had authority for his course. He thought the right hon. gentleman was mistaken with regard to the connection between the right of dismissal and the right of appointment in certain cases. They might search all the Statutes, and find no other which clothed any official merely with the right of dismissal, as the Canadian Act did, and not, at the same time, with the right of appointment. There might be some cases of a contrary character, as the Premier alleged, and, if he produced authorities to show,—as he promised to do—that, while the right of appointment implied the right of dismissal, the power of dismissal did not include the power of appointment, he would be much surprised. Ex necessitate rei, the power of appointing in this case must be implied in the power of dismissal, else at some period the public interest must greatly suffer. He (Mr. Anglin), however, was willing to submit to any decision of the House, having no personal interest in the matter. Another of the extraordinary statements of the right hon. gentleman was that the Speaker belonged to a party, or was its mouthpiece, mainly, and not the Speaker of the whole House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said nothing about party.

Mr. ANGLIN said the right hon. gentleman had stated that, after the elections, he (Mr. Anglin) and the whole country knew how they had gone, and that, because he was aware of the result of the elections, he should be satisfied that he had no longer authority, and that it would have been but moderate and modest on his part to abstain from making appointments. What did that mean, but that the Speaker was only nominally Speaker of the whole House, and that, in reality, he was merely the creature and slave of a party? He (Mr. Anglin) would be sorry so to regard the present Speaker, and he never so regarded himself. Sad, indeed, would be the day when the Speaker of the House should become the mere slave and tool of any party. What! because the elections took a certain course, was the Speaker to be deprived of all his functions and attributes? The idea was perfectly monstrous. He was sorry to hear it cheered by a large number of members. He was satisfied that, when some who had cheered had had more experience, and had devoted their time to the study of Parliamentary history, and had learned the great importance of maintaining the rights and privileges of the House, they would hesitate to cheer such a statement. The hon. member for Northumberland spoke of the action of a former Speaker in a certain case, but his recollection seemed confused on the point. He (Mr. Anglin) did not recollect that any important office was vacant when he was elected Speaker. The office of the Accountant seemed the one referred to. Mr. Vaux applied for superannuation several weeks after his (Mr. Anglin's) election as Speaker, and the application was made through Mr. Speaker, the proper channel, as he believed, for any communication between the officers of the House and the members of the Executive, or the Treasury Board. On that application he was superannuated. That was an essentially different case, as no vacancy there existed, and none could have been created without the concurrent action of those members of the Government who formed the Treasury Board, as he believed; while, in the latter case, the vacancies existed, and he (Mr. Anglin) was informed by the Clerk that it was necessary that they should be filled.

Mr. ANGLIN.

Mr. MACDOUGALL said he regretted that, in the discussion of a question involving the powers and authority of the presiding officer of this House, on both sides of the House there should have been displayed a feeling which was not quite compatible with the dignity and the position which this House ought to occupy before the people of this Dominion. The question as to whether there had been any undue exercise of authority by the late Speaker was one which, when the papers were brought before them, they would be better able to discuss; but he hoped that, in addition to the information which had been asked for in the motion, that the Government would send down, also, such information as they might have as to the exercise of authority or power by the Internal Commissioners, if any such had been appointed, because he took it that, if the Speaker, by virtue of this Act of Parliament, had only a limited power after the dissolution of Parliament, the authority of the Commissioners of the Crown, or the members of the Privy Council appointed before being sworn in as members of the House of Commons in dealing with the officers of this House, was equally open to exception and objection. He did not quite concur with the First Minister in his interpretation of this Act. It seemed to him that the intention was to continue in office, during the period from the dissolution of Parliament to the election of a new Speaker the person who had exercised authority as Speaker in the government of the House. He thought, moreover, the Speaker had power to remove or dismiss officers of the House at his own discretion. Then he thought it followed, as a necessary consequence, that he had the power to appoint—at all events, until a new Speaker was chosen—others to the place of those whom he had removed. He, (Mr. Macdougall) was disposed to construe the Act in that sense. But it had been stated—he did not know with what truth—that certain offices had been vacated and then filled at the suggestion, or by the authority, of the Executive. If this were true, he thought there had been an undue exercise of power. For, though he came into this House disposed to give support to the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches—believing, as he did, that the policy enunciated by them in the recent election was a good one, or, at all events, that it should have a fair trial—yet, at the same time, he was above all a member of Parliament, and, as such, inclined to oppose at the very outset any attempt on the part of the Government to interfere, or exercise in any degree the powers or authority which they derived from their positions as Commissioners or representatives of the Crown in the management of the internal affairs of this House. Let them, at least, have one place in this country where they should be free to express their opinions and exercise their delegated authority. He took this opportunity to refer to a personal matter. They knew that a number of newspapers had connected his name with the Speakership, and for that reason his attention had been drawn to the position of that officer. But he would say that, neither from the Government, nor any member of the Government, had he received any advances in reference to the Speakership, nor had he sought the position. He confessed that, when he saw a disposition, no matter where, to encroach upon the privileges of Parliament, he was not disposed to assent or acquiesce. It was the duty of every member to resist any improper assumption of authority in this body. It was a question that ought to be discussed with reference to the Statutes and their rules, which, if defective, should be amended. He trusted that would be the result of this discussion. He did not think that the hon. gentleman came up to Ottawa on the eve of the meeting of Parliament to appoint gentlemen to certain positions in this House, against the public interest. He exercised an authority which legally belonged to him, though it might have been an indiscreet exercise of authority. However, all these matters would probably be before them when the papers were sent down, and when probably they would be referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections for consideration.

THE CARILLON DAM.

QUESTION.

MR. CHRISTIE enquired, Whether the Government has accepted the tender of any contractor for completing the Carillon Dam and Works; and, if not, whether it is intended to prosecute the work immediately to completion as originally designed.

MR. TUPPER: I would say, in reply to my hon. friend, that Mr. McNamee, who was the lowest tenderer for that work, was notified that his tender would be accepted. The Government subsequently decided to suspend the immediate prosecution of the work, and Mr. McNamee received information to that effect, and the deposit was returned. The matter is still under the anxious consideration of the Government. As to the time they will be enabled to resume the work, no definite determination has been reached upon that point.

MR. COLBY.

QUESTION.

MR. Fiset enquired, Whether the Government have solicited and recommended the pardon of Mr. Louis Riel. If not, whether they intend doing so, and when.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government cannot well solicit the pardon of Mr. Louis Riel, because I take it the Government has the power of granting it. However, the Government have not solicited, or recommended the pardon of Mr. Louis Riel. In regard to the second part of the question, I may say that they do not propose to make that proposition. If the proposition were made in the House, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would have an opportunity of voting against it again.

THE CHARLEVOIX ELECTION.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that, before the Orders of the Day were called, he would beg to raise a question of privilege. On the 13th instant, in the county of Charlevoix, an election was held. On the following day, the authorised agent reported Mr. Perreault elected by a majority of 179. Within the five days following there was no demand for a recount by the Opposition candidate. The returning officer declared Mr. Perreault duly elected as member for the electoral district of Charlevoix. On account of the distance, the report could not reach Ottawa before Saturday or Sunday, and he (Mr. Mousseau) would suggest that Mr. Perreault be admitted to take his seat upon the floor of the House, upon the telegraphed report just received by Mr. Pope, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and which, with the kind permission of that gentleman, he held in his hand. The telegram was as follows :—

“ I certify that the member elected for the electoral district of Charlevoix, in conformity with the writ issued, having received a majority of the votes legally given, is Joseph Stanislaus Perreault, Esquire, advocate.”

He desired the permission of the House to waive the rules of the House so that the hon. gentleman could be conducted to his seat. It would be a great hardship for him to be deprived of the privilege of taking his seat until the arrival of the return.

MR. MACKENZIE : Who sends the telegraphic certificate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The returning officer.

MR. MACKENZIE : But it must be from the Judge who had the recount.

MR. MOUSSEAU : There was no recount held.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Not demanded.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that at the same time the telegram was received by Mr. Pope, another telegram to the same effect was sent to the member himself.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not suppose any member of the House would desire for a moment to keep any person out of his seat who was legitimately entitled to it; but the question they had to consider was that the time within which a recount could be demanded only expired the day previous, and was it not possible that a recount might have been demanded?

MR. MOUSSEAU : No. If a recount had been demanded the proclamation would not have been made.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was some case wherein they declined to accept a telegraphic certificate. He could not remember for the moment what case it was; probably hon. gentlemen opposite would remember.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : It was in Manitoba.

MR. MACKENZIE said that might be so. He did not remember. He had no personal objection himself whatever to the elected member being introduced into the House, except that they might be going beyond their usual custom of requiring the ordinary certificate of the returning officer. His impression was that, on a former occasion, the hon. gentleman opposite called the attention of the House to the danger of accepting a telegram which might be sent by any one. That was the only difficulty. They had no absolute certificate identifying the sender of the telegram as the proper party to send such a message.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was the difficulty, and he thought he remembered having called the attention of the House to that on the occasion of the election of his hon. friend Mr. Langevin. In this case they would take one step further than they were usually in the habit of doing. Usually they had been in the habit of accepting the return of the returning officer, and entering at the same time upon the journals of the House that it should not be made a precedent. This would be going one step farther, and saying that the return could be sent over the wires as well as in an envelope. The reason why his hon. friend made this application was that the gentleman, of whose election there was no doubt, would be subjected to considerable hardship by being excluded from taking his seat until the certificate could arrive, in the due course of a long winter's journey. He thought the hon. gentleman might be allowed to take his seat, and an entry made upon the journals of the House that it should not be made a precedent.

MR. MILLS said there was another difficulty to be regarded. It was necessary for a new member to preserve a duplicate of the certificate to the Clerk of the House for the purpose of identity, before he could be sworn in. He did not think the Clerk could swear the hon. gentleman until he had produced such certificate. He did not think the House could do anything in the matter. There was a difference between recognising the election of a member known to the House, and the recognition of one who was elected for the first time.

MR. MOUSSEAU said he had made a mistake about the time within which a recount could be demanded. It was not five days, it was four days, so that the period had expired on Monday. As to identity, the hon. member for Quebec knew the hon. gentleman personally, and his identity might be certified to on both sides of the House by personal friends.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend will find it is four days from the date of declaring the election.

MR. MOUSSEAU: No, from the day of voting. It expired on the seventeenth.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought the proposal was an exceedingly dangerous one. He was sure no one would wish to keep the hon. member a moment from his seat; but, if they were to accept a telegram in this case, as sufficient proof of the election of a member of the House, the precedent would be exceedingly dangerous. Telegrams might be sent to any part of the country in anyone's name. The hon. gentleman, by remaining out of his seat, would lose little or nothing. Of course it was a loss that he should be deprived of his seat in the House for a moment longer than was necessary. He thought hon. members would see the great danger of accepting telegrams as conclusive evidence of the return of any one as a member of this House. He, for one, must regard the proposal as objectionable, and he took objection to it, not at all from an hostility to the hon. gentleman, or for any purpose whatever than that of exercising a reasonable amount of discretion on matters of so great importance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought his hon. friend had better not press the matter as far as M. R. Perrault was concerned. He had no doubt it would be found that the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to take his seat, and he was assured the House would, notwithstanding, award him all the privileges to—pecuniary and otherwise—attached his office.

CARILLON DAM AND WORKS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. CHRISTIE moved for a return, showing all tenders received for the completion of the Carillon Dam and Works, and all correspondence between the Government and the Engineer and others, relating to the prosecution of that work.

MR. MOUSSEAU.

He said that the contract for these works was given out by the Macdonald Government in 1873, for $600,000, and should have been completed two or three years ago. The contractor prosecuted the work for several years, and somewhere about $360,000 had been expended upon this work. But during the past eighteen months or two years nothing had been done. During the last summer the late Government took it out of the hands of the contractor, and advertised for tenders for the completion of the work. Tenders were received during the month of August last, and it was fully expected the work would have been pushed to completion. But it appeared, since the present Administration had come into power, nothing further had been done; at all events, the work had not been renewed, and he thought this was a matter very much to be regretted. It was a work of very great importance to the country, and of a special importance to the lumber trade. This was one of the worst parts of the river, and navigation was very seriously impeded there. The slide on the south side of the river was nearly gone, and last year was a cause of great delay and loss in the passing of timber. The slide on the north side has not yet been built, and the result would be, in all probability, most damaging to the lumber trade during the present year. That was not all. It was commonly reported that the work which had been done, and on which so much money had been expended, was now going to ruin, and was in danger of being swept away by the spring floods; the material which had been prepared was deteriorating, the timber was rotting, and would soon become unfit for use. It seemed to him that the present was a favourable time for the prosecution of this work. It was well known there was a great scarcity of employment; wages were lower, farm products were cheaper, and money scarcer than they had been for many years, consequently, the work could be done at a greatly diminished cost, and with a great saving to the country. There could be no doubt, if this work had been prosecuted vigorously, if the money ($240,000) voted by the House during the last Session had been expended as was intended, the work now would have been far advanced towards completion, employment would have been furnished to hundreds now out of work, a market afforded for some of our farm products, and the depression which had been felt in that section of the country, as well as in the other parts of the Dominion, would have been relieved. He thought it was desirable that this House and the country should be put in possession of the information for which he had asked, and he thought they should know why a work of such vital importance, upon which so much money had been expended, and which was lying unproductive, should be suspended or abandoned. The endless and unnecessary delays which had taken place in connection with these works had been a cause of great disappointment to many, and of general and wide-spread dissatisfaction.

MR. JONES moved in amendment, that the said resolution be amended by adding the following words:—"And all papers, letters, correspondence and reports, in any way relating to the Carillon works from their inception in 1873, to the present time, as also Messrs. Shanly and Keefer's report on the work, which was submitted to the Government by the contractors."

MR. TUPPER said there was no objection to the motion. The facts stated by the hon. mover were nearly, if not altogether, accurate. The tenders were sent in in 1873, the work to be completed in 1875, but it was not finished. During the past season, it was taken out of the hands of the contractors by the Government, and tenders invited; and, finding that Mr. McNamee's tender was the lowest, his (Mr. Tupper's) decision was to award it to him. But before the contract was entered into, without his altering his mind, or any change in the opinion of the Government taking place as to the importance of the work, the financial position of the country was found to be such as to render it inadvisable to press on a large public expenditure that would admit of postponement. It was entirely in consequence of that state of affairs that the Government informed Mr. McNamee that at present the work would be suspended. It was suspended, though it was the desire of the Government to proceed with it as soon as they could, consistently with the financial position of the country. He was not able to say whether it would be possible to provide for the prosecution of that work this year; the matter was under consideration, and, when a decision was arrived at, he would inform the hon. gentleman. A large portion of the amendment was unobjectionable, but it was not usual to bring down estimates of the engineers upon which contracts were let. Such papers were considered to be, to a certain extent, confidential, and their production would, he was afraid, establish a bad precedent. If the hon. gentleman struck out the clause on that subject, he (Mr. Tupper) saw no objection to the amendment.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was very glad that the hon. gentleman who had just spoken had decided on the course indicated. It would be extremely inconvenient and prejudicial to the public service if the approximate estimates prepared by the engineers were made public; they should be held as sacred, for the eyes of the Minister alone. It was quite impossible to calculate the injury that might result from their publication.

MR. JONES said he would not oppose the suggestion for amendment made by the Minister of Public Works; but he must say the House should have cognizance of all matters connected with the Public Works of the country—not so much in this matter with regard to what works were now in progress, but with regard to what was past. He did think the House should be informed of all matters connected with the contract for this work, and that the engineers should not be enabled to shield themselves from responsibility for any errors or mistakes they might have made.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he regretted exceedingly to learn from the Minister of Public Works that it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with the prosecution of that work during the ensuing summer. This matter was brought before the attention of the House on former occasions, in 1877 and 1878; during the former year the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) declared that the old slides were damaged considerably the previous season, and that it had become necessary to take decided action for repairs. Again, last year, that hon. gentleman informed the House that it was the intention of the Government to have the matter in such a state that, when the water reached the lowest stage, the Government would be able to prosecute the work with the utmost possible vigour. He was aware that the construction of those improvements at Carillon was necessary in the interests of the navigation—so that boats carrying lumber might be able to pass during the whole summer; and, in the reports of the Minister of Public Works, it was stated that the works previously constructed had already sustained considerable damage, and that, unless the works of the new canal were completed, it would be necessary to reconstruct the locks of the old canal, which were in a state incapable of being sustained much longer, and great inconvenience would be felt. Much work had been done and public money expended; money which, if he was correctly informed, by the exposure of the works in their unfinished state, would be, to a great extent, a loss to the country. It seemed to him the Government ought to make every effort in their power to bring that work to as speedy a completion as possible.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MAINTENANCE OF ROADS AND DESTRUCTION OF WEEDS BILL.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MOUSSEAU moved for copies of all correspondence between the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and the Secretary of State, in 1877, in relation to a Bill intituled: "An Act to provide for the formation of Joint Stock Companies for the maintenance of roads and the destruction of weeds."

districts during the late General Elections; the total number of votes on the voters' lists of each district; the population in such constituency as shewn by the last census; such return to show the returns of special elections, held up to the date of making the return.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN B. SMITH.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. RYKERT moved for a return of all correspondence and papers in connection with the dismissal of John B. Smith from the office of Deputy-Superintendent of the Southern Section of the Welland Canal, as also the report of the Superintendent of the Welland Canal in reference to such dismissal. He said the person mentioned in the resolution was dismissed or suspended on January 16th, 1874, upon a personal charge made against him by the late Minister of Public Works. That gentleman had been employed by the Government, and, from what was known in that neighbourhood, had discharged his duties faithfully, and there was no reason for his dismissal. On the 16th January, a few days before the elections for the House of Commons, Mr. Smith was suspended by an order issued from the Public Works Department, by telegraph, as follows:—"Suspend John B. Smith, because there are serious charges made against him." On the 21st January a very largely signed petition was sent to the Government, signed by leading men of both parties, among whom were his (Mr. Rykert's) late opponent in the local election, and other leading Reformers of that constituency, asking that Mr. Smith be restored to his position, in which it was alleged he gave the greatest satisfaction. On February 3rd that petition was sent to the Public Works Department, and Mr. Page endorsed on it the following words:—"Mr. Smith was, I believe, a foreman in the central part of the Welland Canal, but, having no knowledge of the reason for his suspension, I am unable to say whether or not he should be reinstated." On the 20th February, Mr. Smith wrote, demanding an investigation of those charges. That letter, by some means or other, was not presented to the Department until some time in May. It was sent by Mr. Bodwell, Superintendent of the canal, accompanied by a letter directing the attention of the Department to Mr. Smith's dismissal. On that report and letter of petition, the following words were endorsed:— "Will attend to this when I visit the Canal. Signed, A. M." No doubt those initials referred to the Minister of Public Works. Up to the present, no action had been taken. Immediately after that telegram, a gentleman in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite was appointed to take his place. He had no objection to any Government dismissing a man for proper cause, but objected to any Government dismissing a man for political reasons. He did not believe altogether in the doctrine that to the victor belonged the spoils. No public servant should be dismissed unless for good cause. He believed Mr. Smith was a faithful servant, the best guarantee of which was that a petition had been sent to the Department, signed by the leading gentlemen of his constituency, and the two whom he had defeated the last two years. An investigation was refused Mr. Smith, and he asked the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches to take action to have an investigation made, and, if it were proved that Mr. Smith was dismissed for election purposes, to have him restored to his position.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

CARTWRIGHT moved for a return of the total amount expended up to the 1st day of January, 1879, on the enlargement of the Welland Canal; on the Lachine Canal; on the Pacific Railway and the Survey thereof; on the section of the Pacific Railway extending from Thunder Bay to Selkirk; and also a statement of the sums further required from the first January, 1879, to be expended to complete the Welland Canal, the Lachine Canal, and the section of the Pacific Railway extending from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, as estimated by Department of Public Works.

MR. TUPPER said he had no objection to furnishing the information which would be of convenience to members when the discussion came up.

THE INSOLVENT ACT OF 1875.

MR. GIGAULT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repeal the existing Insolvency Laws, and, in the case of their repeal, to propose one uniform law for the whole of the Dominion having as its object: 1. Affording means for the liquidation of the property of insolvent traders, in a more just, and equitable, and less expensive way than was practised before the Insolvency Act of 1864; 2. To compel the insolvent trader to make an assignment of his property to a public officer entrusted with the duty of making a division among the creditors.

MR. MACDONALD (Pictou): The subject will be considered when the Bill, notice of which has already been given, is introduced. Indeed, the whole subject is under the consideration of the Government at present.

MR. MACKENZIE: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Ministers have given notice of a Bill on the subject?

MR. MACDONALD (Pictou): No; the Bill is introduced by a private member, and stands for a second reading; the whole subject will come up under that measure.

WIDENING THE CHAMBLY CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. BENOIT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to widen the Chambly Canal. If it is their intention to do so, when do they propose to begin the work?

MR. TUPPER: It is not, at present, the intention of the Government to propose widening the Chambly Canal.

SHELburne HARBOUR LIGHT.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether the harbour light at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, is to be rebuilt this year; and if so, whether upon Sand Point, the site of the former light, or at Fort Point, on the western side of the harbour.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): The subject is under the consideration of the Government.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS FUND.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. MCKAY moved for a return in detail of the fund known as the "Intercolonial Railway Employés Insurance Fund," showing,

QUEBEC LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. MOUSSEAU moved for copies of the petition addressed to the Governor in Council, by the Hon. Messrs. Chapleau, Church and Angers, praying, in view of the reasons therein set forth, for the dismissal of His Honour Luc Letellier, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec; of the answer made to the said petition by the said Lieutenant-Governor, and of the reply made by the said Hon. Messrs. Chapleau, Church and Angers to the said answer, and all correspondence and papers relating to the subject.

MR. McCARTHY suggested that the motion should be amended by adding the following words: "And all correspondence and papers relating to the subject."

MR. MACKENZIE: That means, of course, correspondence between the Government and some officials; it would cover no private correspondence?

MR. MOUSSEAU: It means all the papers connected with the memorial, or petition, the answer to the Lieutenant-Governor, and the reply to that answer.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is meant, I presume, is the correspondence relating to this particular memorial.

MR. McCARTHY: Relating to the whole subject.

MR. MACKENZIE: The subject is a very large one. I think the correspondence should be only such as related to the matters mentioned in the papers called for. I have no objection to that, as it is cognate to the subject; but, if the motion is to be made to include the production of everything, whether relating to this memorial or not, it is a very different matter. I do not object to the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), my remarks merely referring to the supplementary part.

MR. MOUSSEAU: My object is to get all the exhibits.

MR. McCARTHY said he wished more than that—any correspondence with regard to this particular motion. Not merely did they wish the memorial, but the correspondence in the early part of last spring.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was brought down by Message last spring. The hon. gentleman will find it in the Votes and Proceedings.

MR. McCARTHY: I do not think any answer of the Executive was brought down.

MR. MACKENZIE: Lieut.-Governor Letellier's answer was brought down.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. MACKENZIE moved for copies of the reports of engineers and others made since the 1st of October last, respecting the route, or construction of any part of the Pacific Railway; the removal of rails from Vancouver Island to Yale; copies of any instructions issued by the Government relating to the same; petitions or letters addressed to the Government, and all correspondence relating thereto. He requested the hon. the Minister of Public Works to bring down the papers as early as possible, with a view to enabling members to acquaint themselves thoroughly with all the facts, previous to discussion.

MR. TUPPER: No time will be lost in complying with the motion.

Motion agreed to.

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. DAWSON moved for copies of all reports of the arbitrators appointed to enquire into the matter of the boundaries between the northernly and westernly limits of Ontario, and the unorganised territories of the Dominion with all documents bearing thereon, whether produced by the Dominion Government, the said Province of Ontario, or otherwise. He said the returns called for by this motion related to a subject of very great importance, not only to the district which he had the honour to represent, not only to Ontario, but to the Dominion at large. The papers, when brought down, would be found to be of deep interest, as showing on what Ontario had based her claims; on what the Dominion claims were founded, and on what grounds the arbitrators had arrived at their award. The question of these western and northern boundaries had long been a disputed one, and he would not enter into it at any great length on the present occasion. By the award, if it should be approved by Parliament, a very large extent of territory would fall to Ontario, and, as the representative of the district chiefly affected, he could not congratulate Ontario very warmly on the acquisition, not that the territory was not valuable in itself, but because he was afraid that Ontario was in no position to deal with it. If this award should be accepted as final, the territories of Ontario would extend on the north to Hudson Bay, cover all of the great lakes within British territory, and reach to the verge of the great prairies of the North-West. He believed, however, that the constitution of the Province was not such as to admit of her dealing with territories so far from her centres of population. She could not establish a territorial Government, and it would be a never-ending source of embarrassment to her to administer the affairs of a country so far distant as the Lake of the Woods. He had always been of opinion that it would be of advantage to Ontario, and to the Dominion at large, that a great portion, if not the whole, of Algoma, including the regions of Rainy River and the Lake of the Woods, should be formed into a separate Province. It was with Ontario that the trade of these regions must chiefly be, under any circumstances, and if, by forming them into a Province they would grow faster, and their great natural resources become sooner developed, it would be to the interest of Ontario that they should be made a separate Province. Of course there was expense attendant on the formation of new Provinces, but Manitoba now paid her way; the Customs revenue from that Province already amounted to about $225,000 annually, and he believed that, if a new Province were formed of the districts he had mentioned, it, also, would soon pay its way. The forests of Rainy River abounded in pine, for which there would be a ready market in the unwooded prairies of the west, and these forests would at once yield a revenue, and there would be a revenue, also, from the sale of lands. He had bestowed some attention on the question of the boundaries, and he could not conceive on what grounds the Commissioners arrived at their award. In all the discussions which ever took place, the boundary chosen by them had never even been suggested as the actual one. He had not seen their instructions; but, if they were left free to establish an arbitrary boundary, of course they did not exceed their powers, if it was within the Constitution to grant them such powers ; but, if, on the other hand, they were instructed to investigate and ascertain where the boundary line between Ontario and the territories of the Dominion really was, they had certainly fallen into error. Ontario had just as good a claim to the plains of the Saskatchewan, as she had to at least a great part of the territory awarded by the arbitrators. They had two very important points to ascertain, and on these two points the whole question hinged. The first was as to the western boundary of the old Province of Quebec, previous to 1783 ; and the next, to say where the southern boundary of the territories of the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay was. The Dominion Government claimed that the Quebec Act, that was, the Imperial Act of 1774 (14 George III), established the western boundary of the old Province of Quebec. By that Act, the boundary was described as running northward from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi, and the Dominion Government held that the word "northward," as there used, meant due north. This was also the view which the Judges of the Quebec Courts took in 1818. But Ontario objected to the word "northward" as being indefinite, and claimed that the proper construction to put on that part of the Act was that "northward" meant north-westward along the Mississippi ; and in the Commission of 1774, to Sir Guy Carleton, then Governor of the Province, the western boundary was described as running northward along the east bank of the Mississippi, to the territories of the Merchant Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson Bay. This clearly brought the territories of the Hudson Bay Company to the Mississippi, or, in other words, to about the 47th parallel of north latitude. But, if the Hudson Bay Company's territories came so far south, Ontario would be cut off from the North-West altogether. The writers on the part of Ontario derided the decision of the Quebec Judges, as to the meaning to be attached to the word "northward" in the Act of 1774 ; but, in the Acts, treaties and commissions of those days, northward and westward were sometimes used to designate true north and due west. In the treaty respecting the Oregon boundary, the expression "westward" along the 49th parallel was used, instead of the words "due west," and in another treaty the words "due western course" were used to designate a due west line. Terms of the same kind occurred in the recent award of the arbitrators, where they used the words, "a true meridional line drawn northerly," so that there did not seem to be anything very unreasonable in construing the word "northward," in the Act of 1774, as meaning due north, more especially in view of other facts bearing on the matter. The writers for Ontario had made good the fact that the Canada of the French extended to the Rocky Mountains, at least ; but they had failed to show that the whole of French Canada was included in the old Province of Quebec as constituted by the Act of 1774 ; and it was reasonable to believe that the western sections were considered rather as dependencies than as parts of the Province. They always referred to a proclamation, issued by General Clark, in 1791, when acting as Governor during Lord Dorchester's absence, in which Upper Canada was described as embracing the whole of the western regions to the utmost extent of the country known as Canada ; but they ignored Governor-General Lord Dorchester's proclamation of a few weeks' previous date, in which the Order in Council, based on the Act of 1791, was cited, and in which Upper Canada was described as extending only to the western limit of the former Province of Quebec. In considering the subject of the western boundaries of Ontario, the Act of 1803 (43 George III) should always be kept in view. It was passed to provide for the maintenance of order in a district which, in the preamble, was described as being in no Province whatever. The disturbed district, for which this Act was specially passed, extended from Fort William and Lake Superior to Lake Winnipeg and Red River. If, therefore, this district was beyond the territories and jurisdiction of Upper Canada in 1803, how could it be within the Province of Ontario now ? The Judges of Quebec, in giving their decision in the De Reinhard case, were, in a great measure, guided by the Act of 1803. The award, he believed, had to be confirmed by Act of Parliament before it could take effect, and it would be a serious question to consider whether it should be confirmed or not. If the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson Bay had ever possessed any territory to which their right was undoubted and unsusceptible of dispute, it was to the country about James's Bay, where they had posts and establishments for two hundred years, where their rights were confirmed by treaties, and acknowledged, after the Treaty of Utrecht, by France as well as England; yet this territory was, by the award, decided never to have been theirs. But this was not all. The western extremity of the tract awarded ran into the region covered by the old colony of Assiniboia — a colony recognised by the Imperial Government, inasmuch as the Imperial troops had, on different occasions, been sent there, while in some other respects it was treated in the same manner as a Crown Colony. At all events, it was a colony which should not now be ignored in considering the question of boundaries in the North-West. The question was a very wide one, and he should not longer detain the House; but he could not conclude without referring to the very great ability and the untiring industry with which the case for Ontario had been made up. Ontario had spared no expense in order to make good her claims; she had employed able men in this country, and her emissaries had been sent to England and France to look into the old records of French Canada. Whatever other result might arise from the labours of the gentlemen employed by Ontario, they had, at least, thrown a great deal of light on the early history of the country, and the volumes they had produced would, for all time to come, be of value to the country. It remained to be seen what the Government of the Dominion had done in the same direction.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he thought the hon. gentleman who had proposed this motion would have served the case better had he abstained from entering into a discussion of the merits of the award, and the law and facts connected with the question itself at this stage. It was, as the hon. member had said, a very large and involved question; one which demanded extensive historical research in order to arrive at a correct understanding of it, and it could hardly be expected that hon. members of this House could at once, upon statements made in Parliament and under the acoustic difficulties which obstructed their hearing in this chamber, grasp the question as presented, even by the hon. gentleman. When the papers came down, no doubt the Government would feel it to be their duty to present their view, and indicate the course they intended to take, and all would be anxious to know what their view and the course to be adopted would be. He (Mr. Macdougall) had given some attention to the subject for some years, and did not entirely agree with the view of his hon. friend, who had also given it a great deal of attention, and was well qualified to form a correct opinion on the facts such as he had presented them. They had had occasion in another place to discuss this same question, and present the reasons pro and con. for the conclusions at which his hon. friend had arrived. He entirely agreed with him that the boundary decided upon by the arbitrators was a boundary which they themselves had made. It was not found in any Statute, Order in Council, proclamation or official document in any quarter. The arbitrators had assumed that the boundary on the east ran to Hudson Bay; that was, that the boundary between Ontario and Quebec should be prolonged to Lake Temiscaming to Hudson Bay. He did not think there was any authority for that. It was convenient, looked well upon a map, and they had found, in some communications between the Imperial Government and their officers in this country, the words "to the boundary of Hudson Bay." He (Mr. Macdougall) had taken occasion, when in England, to look into that point to ascertain how this expression came to be used, and became satisfied that it was a mere clerical error in the copies of the original report of the Attorney-General, when the boundary between Upper and Lower Canada was being defined. No one would use that word "boundary," in describing the shores of a bay. It was upon that slight circumstance the Commissioners assumed they had an authority to run the eastern boundary to Hudson Bay instead of the boundary of the Hudson Bay Territories, and having got there it was necessary to get away from it. They, therefore, proceeded along the shore westward to Albany River, then up the river and across country until they reached the Lake of the Woods, and connected the boundary on the north with the boundary on the west. He thought there was very good law as well as good historical evidence to controvert the view presented by his hon. friend, that the boundary on the west was the line of latitude which cut the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. That really had been the great point in dispute. The difficulty he felt with respect to this arbitration was that it was not a legal arbitration, and bound no one. He trusted the hon. the Minister of Justice would be able to satisfy the House that it was competent for this Parliament and the Local Legislature of any Province, by agreement, to change the original boundaries of that Province. His own impression was, that they had no such authority, that the Imperial Act declared that the Provinces which entered into Confederation had done so according to their legal boundaries at the time of Confederation. He did not think there was any authority in this Parliament, and the Legislature of any of the old Provinces, by agreement or otherwise, to change the boundaries of a Province. He believed the people of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had a legal and constitutional right to preserve the boundaries with which they entered into Confederation. If he were right in his view of the construction of the British North America Act, then they were not capable of delegating their powers to any Board of Arbitration or Commissioners. Their power was legislative by virtue of the authority conveyed by this Imperial Act, and the maxim delegatus non potest delegare would apply. So far as this boundary was concerned, it was probably as convenient as any, but he had merely risen for the purpose of reminding the House and the country that there were difficulties connected with this question, and because his hon. friend's speech, which had been presented to the House with his usual ability, and which, he presumed, would go into the Official Reports, would, perhaps, prepossess the public mind in favour of his view. He would repeat that the question was a difficult one. His hon. friend had long held peculiar views of it, and fixed views in respect to it, but there were other members of the House who did not entirely agree with him.

Mr. MILLS said that, when the matter came up at a subsequent period of the Session, there would, perhaps, be a better opportunity of entering into the discussion of the award made by the arbitrators. He did not think the objection made by the hon. member for Halton would be found to be a valid one. It was quite true this Parliament, under the British North America Act of 1867, could not, by any agreement with any Province alter the boundaries of that Province. He did not know that the arbitrators in this particular matter had undertaken to alter the boundaries. His impression was that in making their award they simply declared where they believed the boundary to be. But, apart from that, if the hon. gentleman would look at the British North America Act of 1871, he would see that the Act expressly provided that the boundaries of any Province might be altered in the manner therein provided; that a Province might be enlarged, or part of its territory might be transferred to the Dominion by arrangement with the Province and the Government of Canada. Consequently, he did not consider that the difficulty suggested existed. He thought, if the hon. gentleman would look at all the correspondence in the reports, and the documents that had been published by the Government of Ontario, he would find that there was a great deal to be said in favour of the boundary that had been established. The hon. member for Halton said there was nothing to show why the boundary between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec should be extended to the Hudson Bay Territory. He (Mr. Mills) was inclined to differ from him on that point. He was of opinion that there was a great deal to be shown in favour of that being done. The hon. gentleman knew right well that in regard to Crown Colonies—

but not as to Proprietary Colonies—it was the prerogative of the Crown to alter or change the boundaries of those colonies as it might see proper. That was decided in reference to the old colonies which now formed a part of the United States. The hon. gentleman would also find that when the Hudson Bay Company was re-vested with its territories, the company was explicitly informed that a portion of these territories, at least, was only transferred to them for the purposes of trade, and not as property. These subjects which were involved in this question of boundary might be very properly discussed when the matter came again before the House, as he had no doubt the Government would find it necessary to bring the matter under the consideration of Parliament.

MR. MACDOUGALL said, with reference to the point as to the British North America Act of 1871, the question was not a new one. That Act never was intended to affect or give authority to alter the boundaries of an old Province. It was intended to apply to the new Provinces they were creating in the North-West. The draft of the Act, the correspondence in respect to it, and the language of the preamble showed it was limited to the new Provinces. It was not explained to the House at the time it was passed that it should apply to the old Provinces. He admitted that, from the loose way in which the Act was drawn, the construction the hon. gentleman contended for was verbally possible, but it certainly was not the intention of Parliament.

JORDAN BAY BREAKWATER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for a return showing all tenders received for the erection of the breakwater at Jordan Bay, in the county of Shelburne; copies of the report of the engineer or inspector, upon the completion of that work; copies of certificates upon which moneys were paid to contractors; return of salary paid inspector, or return of the expenditure of money for the repair of the work in the year 1877 or 1878 by day's labour or otherwise; copies of all reports upon the recent damages to that work, and letters of instruction to the inspector regarding the same. He said his object in asking for this information was to enable him to lay before the House and his constituents the official statement of the actual cost of this important work.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved for a return of the imports and exports into the Dominion of Canada during the six months ending the 1st day of January, 1879, as detailed in the monthly returns to the Department of Customs. He said he was aware that a full return would be of a very voluminous nature, and that, therefore, he wished simply for the information which was supplied to the several Departments.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved for a detailed statement of receipts and expenditure during the seven months ending on the 1st day of February, 1879. He said his reason for asking for this return was that the statement published in the Official Gazette, although sufficiently full for general purposes, was not sufficiently full for a Budget discussion.

THE RUSSIAN PLAGUE—QUARANTINE PRECAUTIONS AGAINST.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS.

MR. CHARLTON moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that, in view of the existence of the plague in Russia, and of its threatened progress westward, and in view also of the probability that emigration will take place from Russia to Canada during the present years to a considerable extent, such quarantine and sanitary regulations against infected countries or districts may be determined upon, and enforced at Canadian seaports and upon the Canadian frontier, as shall furnish, so far as intelligently directed efforts may be able to do so, preventives and safeguards against the introduction and spread of pestilence. He said that probably not a single member of the House was not aware of the fact that at present the Asiatic plague in Russia was spreading rapidly. It was the same terrible disease, which, known as "black death," carried off 25,000,000 of inhabitants of Europe in the fourteenth century. Again, in 1665, it devastated London and various parts of Europe, and, in 1720, carried off one-half of the inhabitants of Marseilles. The existence of this disease in Russia was causing lively apprehensions in Western Europe, and steps were being taken by various nations, and by the United States, to introduce efficient quarantine regulations in order to prevent its spread. The American Government was about to send a medical commission to Russia, to inquire into the nature of the disease, and the proper mode of treating it. It was a disease that was propagated by personal contact, and clothing or articles coming into contact with the parties having the disease. Fortunately, the disease was one which could be controlled by efficient quarantine regulations. He had deemed it proper to bring this subject to the attention of the Government. He was aware they had,

among the Ministers of the Crown at the present time, a very eminent medical man—a gentleman who, he had no doubt, was fully alive to the importance of this matter, and he had no doubt the Government would feel disposed to take such course as was necessary in the public interest.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he did not quite understand the purport or object of his hon. friend's motion ; but he might say that the subject was a very important one, and it was very fortunate for him (Mr. Pope) that he had a gentleman of skill to consult, such as was referred to. The Government were fully alive to the danger of this disease, but they knew, while speaking at this moment, that measures were being taken to prohibit the spread of the disease west of the Sea of Azov or the Black Sea, and therefore we were in no great danger. They knew also that emigrants coming from that section of the country had to pass through Germany, where there was a very strict quarantine, and any individual from whom the slightest danger was apprehended was not permitted to pass. Apart from all that, he would say to his hon. friend that we in this country had very efficient quarantine regulations, and that those regulations were quite sufficient to guard us against diseases of this kind. He presumed that his hon. friend, having brought this matter to the notice of the Government, and there being no papers in particular that bore on the subject, would withdraw his motion.

MR. CASGRAIN said that, at the port of Quebec, the regulations referred to by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture were not so efficiently carried out as he (Mr. Pope) thought, because it was well known that emigrants passed directly up to Quebec without being subject to quarantine at the station at Grosse Isle. The consequence had been that quite lately there had been a case of small-pox brought in one of the vessels to Quebec, and the patient had to be removed to the Marine Hospital, and the vessel reached the port of Montreal with the disease on board, and returned to Quebec with it—whether from that or not, small-pox was prevailing in Quebec since—and that was the very vessel in which His Excellency Lord Dufferin had afterwards returned to Europe, though notified of the occurrence mentioned. He did not see that there would be much danger if the vessels were visited at Grosse Isle before being allowed to pass up to Quebec. It was true there was a medical officer there, but he thought that, in a case like the one referred to in the motion before the House, the Minister of Agriculture took a great responsibility upon himself if he allowed the regulations to remain as they were, in view of the danger of disease coming from the other side of the ocean.

MR. CHARLTON said he could not see why any objection could be raised by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to the passage of the resolution, and he did not feel warranted in assenting to the request to withdraw it. He considered it a matter of very great importance, and was of opinion that prompt measures should be taken with regard to it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the law, as it now existed, clothed the Government with quite sufficient authority to establish an efficient quarantine, so as to prevent the spread of the disease to this country—so far as a most rigid system could effect that object. That being the case—the law being so—the Government felt that there was no necessity for strengthening their hands by a vote of this House. The law said that quarantine could be established, and it was the duty of the Government to carry the law out, more especially in the presence of a threatened danger of this kind. A motion of this kind was simply a request to the Governor-General to ask the Government to perform their duty, and they did not think there was any necessity for any such action. They knew that the law was sufficient for the purpose. Therefore, he thought the hon. gentleman ought to remain satisfied, and must remain satisfied, with calling the attention of the House to this subject. As his hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture had said, the disease must pass through the countries of Europe before it reached here. England was nearer the post of danger than America, yet it had been announced in the British Parliament that England apprehended no danger from the disease invading the shores of the British Isles. It must come still further and cross the Atlantic to arrive here. As his hon friend had pointed out, Germany had established most rigid quarantine between Russia and Russian Poland and her confines, so there was no danger, or as little danger as possible of the disease crossing from Russia and Russian Poland into Germany and through Germany to the ocean. They had, in the first place, all the protection that the quarantine or prohibiting regulations of Germany and the other nations of Europe afforded; they had, in the second place, a vast expansive ocean; and, in the third place, they had their own quarantine laws, which were amply sufficient for the purpose. If the hon. gentleman thought the laws did not give sufficient power to the Government, it was quite within his duty and power to introduce a Bill for the purpose of altering the quarantine regulations. He believed the law was amply sufficient for the purpose. The Government would see that the regulations for the purpose of preventing disease would be carried out to the utmost extent, with the utmost promptness, and with the single object of preventing disease coming into our country. They had also the advantage of the United States taking steps to protect their shores, and the steps so taken to protect the United States were so many steps taken to protect us. Altogether, there was, he believed, little danger of this dreadful disease invading America. But there was a bare possibility of its coming into this country, though he did not think that an Address to the Governor-General was at all required in the matter. He thought, also, that the hon. gentleman ought to rest satisfied with this assurance, and ought not, in continuing this subject, to excite a panic in the country. Some of them were old enough to remember the result of the panic of 1832 and 1834, and that the panic was worse than the disease. When the hon. gentleman knew that they had taken every possible step to prevent the disease coming into this country, he thought he ought rather to accept the assurance than hold out a bug-bear that might affect the people's minds in a most unwholesome manner. His hon. friend from L'Islet spoke about the quarantine regulations not being carried out. It was quite possible that, when an ordinary state of things existed, the regulations were not strictly enforced, and that a single case of small-pox might be brought in, but he did not think there was any great danger from an occasional case of small-pox getting into Quebec.

MR. CHARLTON asked if that would have the effect of re-appointing one of the medical officers at the port of Quebec, whose services had been dispensed with.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said very likely. If there was the slightest danger of the disease coming here, not only would the gentleman be restored, but many others be appointed.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that, with respect to the case referred to, his hon. friend knew very well that steamships passed Grosse Isle without examination. It was only for the Government to declare that they should be examined. In times of health, when passengers were thoroughly examined only ten or fifteen days before the time of their landing, it was thought unnecessary, and it would cause delay in the delivery of our mails.

MR. CHARLTON said that the assurances of the First Minister were satisfactory to him, and that they would, no doubt, be most reassuring to the country. He begged leave to withdraw the resolution.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. FISET moved for copies of all instructions, written or verbal, giving to Collingwood Schreiber, Esq., C.E., since 10th October, 1878, on the subject of enquiries, inspections and examinations made by him or yet to be made by him, against certain persons employed on the northern division of the Intercolonial Railway; also, for copies of all instructions, written or verbal, given to the said C. Schreiber, Esq., since the said date on the subject of resignations and dismissals of persons employed which have taken place or which are to take place on the same division of the railway; also, for copies of all correspondence which has passed between the Government or any member thereof, or any officer of the Government, and any person whatsoever in connection with the said examinations, enquiries and resignations of persons employed; together with copies of all complaints, written or verbal, preferred since the 17th September, 1878, against any person employed on the said division of the railway.

MR. TUPPER said there was no objection to the motion passing. No written instructions had been given to Mr. Schreiber any further than whenever any complaint came into the Department, in reference to any matters such as alluded to, Mr. Schreiber had been instructed to report to the Government. When the reports were received he had no objections to lay them on the table, with a statement of any action the Government might be obliged to take.

Motion withdrawn.

MR. VALLÉE moved, in amendment, that the said resolution be amended, by adding the following words:—"Also a statement shewing the names and places of residence of all employés on the said railway, discharged or dismissed between the year 1873, and the 17th September, 1878."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTION FOR SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BOWELL moved that a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the official reports of the debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Colby, Desjardins, Stephenson, White (Cardwell), McDonald (Cape Breton), Ross (Middlesex), Oliver, Béchard and Charlton. He said he made this motion in accordance with the practice hitherto followed in the House in reference to the reports of debates, and the supervision of those reports by a Special Committee of the House. As explained in the House by the First Minister, when the Address was under consideration, the Government, believing that the principle of official reporting would be approved by the House, took the responsibility of advertising for tenders, and gave the contract for that work to the gentleman who now held it, subject to the approval of Parliament. The contract, together with the tenders which had been moved for, would be laid before the House at the earliest possible moment. In the meantime, it was thought better that this Committee should be appointed at once, in order to organise and begin the supervision of the reporting and publication of the debates and proceedings of the House. The tenders advertised for were to include the reporting, printing, translation, and binding; and, he thought, when the papers were laid before the House, it would be seen that the tender accepted was the best and cheapest, all things being considered. The report of the debates of last Session, and all connected with it, cost upwards of $18,000. The appropriation voted by the last Parliament for the same purpose this year was $15,000. By the contract entered into this Session, the volume was restricted to 1,500 pages, and the expense would amount to a little over $11,000, being between $3,000 and $4,000 less than the sum voted by Parliament for that purpose, and some $7,000 less than the sum expended last year.

MR. MILLS said he thought the hon. gentleman ought not to press the motion at the present time, because it was antipatting the action of the House on the matter of the contract. It would be only right and proper that the House should first see the tenders and the contract, and ratify what the Government had done, if so disposed, before a Committee was appointed for the purpose indicated, otherwise they would be reversing the natural order of proceeding.

MR. BOWELL said this course had already suggested itself to him, but he had thought it just as well to have the Committee appointed at once, seeing that an appropriation for the reports had been made by Parliament. However, he had no objection that the matter should stand, and, in the meantime, would endeavour to see that the contract and tenders were laid on the table to-morrow.

NORTH YORK CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S REPORT.

MR. SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate which he had received from the Hon. Vice-Chancellor Blake, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, in the matter of the election for the electoral district of the North Riding of the County of York.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

RETURN.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that, in obedience to the order of the House of Tuesday last, the Clerk of the House had laid on the table a return of the notices asking for tenders for reporting and publishing the Official Debates of this House; together with copies of all tenders received, and of all arrangements or contracts entered into, for the reporting and publication of said debates.

Mr. ANGLIN said he would like to know how these papers came into the possession of the Clerk. They had never come through his (Mr. Anglin's) hands, nor had he been communicated with in regard to them. If they had come through the Executive, he thought it would be another instance of improper interference on the part of the Executive.

Mr. SPEAKER: The paper came to me to be laid before the House. It was put into my hands by the Clerk.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 4.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

FIRST READING.

Mr. MCCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 4) To make better provision for the trial of controverted elections of members of the House of Commons, by amending and consolidating the Acts now in force on that subject.

ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE TO THE QUEEN.

Order for consideration of Message from the Senate, acquainting this House that their Honours have passed an Address of condolence to Her Most Gracious Majesty on the death of Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse, and transmitting the same, and desiring the concurrence of this House therein, read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am sure that this House will have a melancholy pleasure in joining in this, I may say, most beautifully worded Address sent to us from the Senate, condoling with Her Majesty on her late bereavement. Though that calamity has not been of so very recent a date, and we may therefore hope that the blow is somewhat alleviated, yet it is our duty to take the earliest opportunity of our assembling, to assure Her Majesty that the people of Canada and the representatives of the people in this House heartily sympathise with Her Majesty in her great loss. I feel that I am not called upon to enlarge upon this subject; the Address speaks for itself. It conveys our hearty expression of feeling, and we would fain hope that Her Majesty's loss will be, in some degree, alleviated by the knowledge that her sorrows are our sorrows, her joy and her happiness the source of the greatest gratification and pleasure to us. The feeling in Canada, as in all parts of the Empire, is not lip-loyalty. We owe our duty of loyalty to the Crown, but we also present our respectful and loyal affections to Her Majesty in her personal character. We have personal feelings of affection for the gracious lady who presides over this vast empire. We may hope that such solace as these assurances can give, will have its effect upon Her Majesty. Her grief was intensified by an unhappy coincidence, the death of her beloved child reminding her of the grief of her life, the loss of the Prince Consort. We all know that the Princess Alice deserved all the affection bestowed on her, and the touching circumstances which occasioned her death hanging over the dying body of her child, increases our sorrow at her loss and our knowledge of the gravity and depth of the feeling which must pervade Her Majesty's breast. I shall say no more, but shall move this Address, seconded by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have a melancholy pleasure in seconding the motion made by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. As a portion of the British Empire, it would be our duty on the occasion of any bereavement in the Royal family, to pass such an Address; but towards Her Majesty we entertain feelings of peculiar respect and veneration. She, above all her predecessors, has established a personal claim to the good will and affection of all her subjects in every part of her wide Dominion. On the occasion of her recent bereavement, we all know that she was deprived of one of her principal domestic supports in the person of the lamented Princess Alice. The devotion of that lady to her duty during the occasion of her father's illness was one which elicited a great deal of touching feeling in the country, and the melancholy occasion of her death revealed fresh traits of the excellent and affectionate disposition of her character, which must have commended itself to every one, even if she had no connection with the Royal family. As one of Her Majesty's daughters, she is peculiarly entitled to be thus spoken of in one of the great assemblies of the nation. Canada never was, nor will ever be, wanting at any time, in the respect and veneration due to Her Majesty in her exalted position as our Sovereign, or her personal excellence; but the Canadian people feel a still deeper interest now than formerly, having another of Her Majesty's daughters presiding at the Canadian Government House in the Dominion, and committed to the care of the Canadian people. I, therefore, second this motion, and should be glad if any words of ours, or in the Address of the joint Parliaments of Canada, could have the effect of conveying a single emotional pleasure to Her Majesty in her sad bereavement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. MASSON rose to speak to the resolution in French, but, after uttering a few words, the hon. gentleman was attacked with faintness, and was unable to proceed.

THE BUDGET.

QUESTION.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the hon. the First Minister if he would give them some idea when the Budget speech would be made. He did not presume to ask him when it would be made, but he desired to know whether it would be made on the following Tuesday or not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would have liked the hon. the Minister of Finance to have answered that question. In the hon. gentleman's absence, however, he would say that he did not think there was any reasonable probability of the Budget speech being made on the following Tuesday.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE WALLS OF THE CITY OF QUEBEC.

QUESTION.

MR. VALLÉE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry on vigorously the works connected with the improvement of the walls of the city of Quebec.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In the absence of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who has been called away through the recent illness of my colleague, I would say generally that it is the intention of the Government to carry out vigorously the obligations entered into in this respect by the previous Government.

ABSENCE OF AN OFFICIAL FROM DUTY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. RYKERT moved for a return of the number of days during which one James A. McMahon, a clerk in the Paymaster's office of the Welland Canal, was absent from duty during the years 1877 and 1878, the number of days for which he received pay from the Department of Public Works; also a copy of the letter or letters by which he was authorized to absent himself from duty during those years, either for the purpose of electioneering or for promoting contracts in the interest of certain Government contractors. He said that, as the subject of dismissals was now occupying the attention of the country, he might, perhaps, be pardoned in making a few observations in respect to it. The interest taken in this matter in the county from which he came was not to be wondered at, when it was remembered that, within four years, seven elections had been held in the county of Lincoln, most of which had been brought about by the unwarrantable interference of officials of the late Government. He spoke advisedly upon the matter, because he knew that it was in his county where the missionary was first found abroad elevating the standard of political purity. It was there also that the celebrated Sunday brigade, by their zealous efforts, succeeded in disqualifying the gentleman who opposed him. As he understood the doctrine laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite some years ago, it was that no official should interfere in an election, and he had in his hand a document, an extract from which he thought clearly defined the doctrine of those gentlemen. It was as follows:—

“That it is highly criminal in any Minister or Ministers, or other servants under the Crown, directly or indirectly, to use their powers of office in the election of Representatives to serve in Parliament, and an attempt at such influence will, at all times, be resented by the House as aimed at its own dignity, honour and independence.”

He also recollected well that in the Ontario Parliament the hon. gentleman opposite promulgated the same view in reference to interference in elections, and placed on record a resolution declaring it was inexpedient for officials to take part in elections. In 1873 a discussion took place in this House respecting Mr. Griffin, one of the Post Office Inspectors in western Canada. In the course of that discussion, the hon. the leader of the Opposition moved a resolution clearly defining the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. This was followed by a speech from the hon. gentleman in which he said:

action, and he pointed out that if they did so they were doing what could not but result in the American system.”

He (Mr. Rykert) was entirely opposed to the American system of removing all officials except for just cause. It was the duty of the Government to see that officials kept their places and did not interfere in elections. The facts in the case in point were simply these: Mr. McMahon was imported into the Paymaster's office of the Welland Canal, at a time when, beyond all question, his services were not required. The moment he put his foot in the county of Lincoln, that moment it was discovered the missionary was abroad and at his work. At every parliamentary election his handiwork was to be seen in his interference with the elections; and as he had under his immediate supervision no less than three or four hundred employees, his influence was necessarily very great. The hon. member for Welland, as well as himself, had felt Mr. McMahon's influence, and it was about time this interference was put a stop to. Not only did he interfere in elections, but he ran about the country manipulating contracts. In 1877, when the late member Capt. Norris was contesting the county with Mr. Miller, this Mr. McMahon took a very active part in the election, and appeared on a public platform, and used language exceedingly unbecoming a Government official. He was, however, very gracious not to take his pay during the eight days of the election; but it was found that he was subsequently recouped for his loss in the month of November. Last year he was absent, running about the country at the elections, for two or three months to his (Mr. Rykert's) certain knowledge. He was in Quebec and elsewhere, one place electioneering, in another manipulating contracts. He also understood that that gentleman was interested in a contract on the Welland Canal, by means of which he was drawing a large amount of money, and, at the same time, held his office. He hoped that when those facts were brought to the notice of the Government, they would see the necessity of taking action in this matter, and of preventing Government officials from taking any part in the elections. These gentlemen had a right to exercise their franchise, but the moment they stepped beyond that, that moment the Government was bound to interfere. The people of Canada were desirous of having this matter fully investigated, and of knowing whether this interference at elections met with the concurrence of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said he never heard a word of complaint concerning this officer's conduct, and he never heard until that moment that he was interested in any contract, or he would not occupy a position as clerk. He entirely agreed in the demand for an investigation. That gentleman never had any control given him whatever, good, bad, or indifferent, in connection with any contract, and was never connected in any way with any contract. These contracts were either given out by the Department, or minor ones for supplies, chiefly by Mr. Page, or one of his assistants. Mr. McMahon was simply an extra clerk in that office, until somewhere about a year ago, when he was appointed permanently an officer of the Government. He knew nothing about the leave of absence, and was utterly ignorant of any of the charges, none of which had been made to the late Government by any person.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was only sorry his hon. friend had not made the motion more general, in order that they might have brought before the House, or some committee, many other charges that existed, such as conveying gentlemen on the Intercolonial Railroad for the purpose of voting for certain members of the House. Gentlemen holding important positions in the Government coerced the employés under them to vote for Government candidates, and had, in some instances, voted an open ballot; and he would have been able to show from telegrams and other papers, that a great deal of pressure had been brought to bear by the Government during the last election.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, in the absence of his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, he would merely state that he knew nothing about this matter till he saw it on the paper. Of course there could be no objection, after the statement of the hon. gentleman, to the return being brought down. He did not agree with the hon. member for King's that the resolution should be widened. If any gentleman had a complaint to lay before Parliament, he thought it should be made separately and specifically, so that each case could be judged according to its merits or demerits. He would oppose anything like a roving commission or committee appointed to make inquiries into such matters. Wherever a real wrong had been done, that wrong should be investigated, and the charge should be distinctly and specifically stated with all the certainty which an hon. member making his motion was able to submit to the House.

MR. ROCHESTER said he hoped the motion would be amended and enlarged, as he and a great many others had great reason to complain. He thought he would be able to show that Ministers of the Crown worked and used their influence during the last election.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear; I should think so.

MR. ROCHESTER said he thought he would be able to show that his hon. friend sent for employés of the Government, telling them how to vote, and that a candidate for the county of Carleton, who pretended to be a Conservative, was furnished with money by a Minister of the Crown, and, if elected, was to support the late Government; and further, that the emigrant agent of this city, Mr. Wills, was acting as treasurer, and paid out money during the election.

SURVEYS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE,

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. LANDRY moved for copy of report prepared by a certain party of engineers, on the exploratory survey which they made in Montmagny Basin, and in the River St. Lawrence, off the parishes of St. Thomas, L'Islet, and St. Jean Port Joli. He said that, during the late local election, in the Province of Quebec, the Liberals in his county proclaimed to all who would listen to them, that the Federal Government had promised to deepen the Basin of Montmagny, and that the execution of these works would put considerable money in circulation in that locality. During his election, in September last, the same rumours were set afloat throughout the county. One fine morning his constituents were somewhat surprised to see the Patton property at St. Thomas studded with several white tents. No one said, "The deepening of the basin of St. Thomas is going to begin;" but, with a common accord, every one exclaimed, "The elections are near at hand." And, indeed, a few days later, a ministerial battery put in its appearance, and in front of the engineers' tents, the hon. member for Quebec East, then Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Laurier), might have been seen bringing his cannon into line and preparing his projectiles. This stratagem did not succeed, and the former Government was beaten. What he wanted now was the report of the exploring party upon the deepening of the basin of Montmagny. He wished to know whether the deepening of this basin was possible, and, if it was, he should be one of the first to ask the Government to execute these works, which would be of so great importance to trade in general, and to his county in particular. He wished to know whether the late Administration was sincere in the action which it took, or whether this explanation was merely a lure, a stratagem of war; ministerial dust, in a word, thrown in the eyes of some of the electors of his county.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL EMPLOYÉS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. BERGERON moved for a statement showing the number of persons employed on the Beauharnois Canal, with their salaries or emoluments; the number of employés dismissed or pensioned since the 5th November, 1873; the names of those appointed since that date, and the increase of salaries.

LOANS TO RAILWAYS BEFORE CONFEDERATION.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. VALLÉE moved for a statement showing the sums of money lent or materials lent or given to the several railway companies now existing in the Dominion of Canada, prior to and since Confederation, by the Government of Canada; and also a statement of the sums repaid by any such companies. He said he wished to put this House in a position to study an important question. When the founders of the Confederation established, in 1867, the financial basis upon which was to be erected this great national institution, they took a certain amount of the assets of the united Provinces as security for the liabilities that the Federal Government was willing to assume. Among these assets were certain revenues, certain properties, railways, debentures, and these assets were taken at their face value. They were divided into two classes; a part being considered as security for the federal debt, the remainder as provincial receipts for the surplus of the debt for which the Provinces were still responsible. This was a solid and equitable basis. It was highly important that this equilibrium should not be disturbed. Nevertheless, he believed that the policy followed by former Governments on this subject was calculated to destroy the very basis upon which this great social and political edifice reposed. In the British North America Act he saw that, among the assets credited to the Federal Government, there were certain sums of money granted before 1867 by the Provinces to several railway companies. How was it that the debentures of these railway companies were included among the assets of the Dominion of Canada? By referring to the British North America Act, 1867, section 108, they read: "The public works and properties enumerated in the third schedule of this Act shall be the property of Canada." Now, in looking over this third schedule, he saw, by paragraph 6, that railways and railway stocks, mortgages and other debts due by these companies were among the properties that came under section 108. These mortgages due by the railways were taken at their face value. Thus these assets were credited to the Dominion at par; consequently the Provinces had been relieved of certain debts that had been transferred to the general liabilities of the Dominion. In order to come to and facilitate this arrangement, it was decided to leave to the Province of Ontario and Quebec the surplus of the assets mentioned in schedule 4. The surplus of the assets had in part been divided between Ontario and Quebec after much difficulty, as everyone knew. In the first place, there was an arbitration, from which the Province of Quebec appealed to England, and the Privy Council of Her Majesty had decided in favour of Ontario. His Province had to yield to this decision. On the other hand, the surplus of the debt, over and above sixty-two millions which was to be paid by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, was, in 1873, transferred to the Federal Treasury. He believed that the action of the Government in 1873 and 1875, in remitting a considerable portion of the liabilities of the Western and Northern Railways was not in harmony with the financial basis established in 1867 by the British North America Act. This was what he grounded his opinion upon. The surplus of the debt of the Provinces served to establish what should be the surplus of the assets of which Ontario and Quebec were to retain possession. The greater part of the assets brought by Ontario to the general credit of the Dominion consisted in railway stocks and debentures. Since then these stocks and debentures or mortgages had been declared to be of little or no value, and what was more, in the cases above alluded to, the Government had, in 1873 and 1875, given up its rights. Thus the Province of Ontario had been credited twice with the same amount, which made an error of about three millions of dollars. Consequently the division of the surplus of the assets which had been made between the two Provinces was not fair. The basis of the division of the assets and the liabilities between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, had therefore been changed. He believed it his duty to draw the attention of Parliament to this fact, in order that this error, if error there were, should be rectified, and that justice should be rendered, not only to the Province of Quebec, but to all the Provinces of the Dominion. By enquiring what were the sums of money that had been lent or given to railway companies since and before Confederation, he thought that, with the help of this statement, he should be able to establish what he had just laid down. Later on, when these documents were brought down, he would explain more at length his views on this serious and important question.

MR. CIMON said that the Province of Quebec should be grateful to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) for having brought this all-important question before the House. There was no doubt that the Province of Quebec had been neglected for some years past by the Federal Government. He had often had occasion in this House to offer some remarks on the subject. The best means for the Federal Government to repair the injustice done to the Province of Quebec would be to purchase the North Shore Railway that the Quebec Legislature had undertaken, and which was now nearly completed. This great road that the Quebec Government had built from Quebec to Hull, was undertaken for the benefit of all the Provinces. This House remembered that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when he presented himself for the first time before the country as the leader of the Government, stated in his programme that it was the policy of the Federal Government to aid this great enterprise, the North Shore Railway, as it formed part of the Pacific Railway. Upon this declaration the Quebec Government undertook to build this great railway. The Local Government had made great sacrifices in order to open this road to public traffic, and he held that the Federal Government was bound to purchase this road, for it would be a link in the national highway, the Pacific Railway. By this means the Federal Government would render justice to the Province of Quebec. With the price that the Federal Government would pay to the Quebec Government, the latter, mindful of its duty, would construct in the Province of Quebec other railways that would tend to develop colonisation and enhance the prosperity of Quebec. Seeing the manner in which the public moneys had heretofore been distributed by the Federal Government, always to the sole advantage of the other Provinces, it was certain that Lower Canada would not be satisfied unless the Administration of the Dominion accomplished the act of justice that he had just mentioned.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

REBATE OF DUTIES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. JONES moved for a return of all Orders in Council, Departmental Orders or otherwise, for rebate of duties on merchandise, contractors' plant, or material for contractors use, from the 1st January, 1874, to 1st January, 1879, for each year respectively, with the amount of such rebate or rebates of duties, and the name or names of those to whom such rebates were given. He said he thought it would be found, when the papers were brought down, that a very large amount of material, contractors' plant, and merchandise, had been brought into this country which had not paid any duty. The power of exemption from duty was left in the hands of the Government by Order in Council, but he thought the power ought to be very carefully used. He believed that, during the past five years, many a mechanic and labouring man had lost many a day's work by contractors' materials being brought into this country, which could just as well be supplied in Canada.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES COURTS BILL.

(Mr. Mills.)

FIRST READING.

Mr. MILLS introduced a Bill (No. 5) to declare the rule of decision in the Courts of the North-West Territories. He said that, if the leader of the Government had any intention of taking up the subject, he (Mr. Mills) would not think of introducing the Bill. He had introduced a number of measures last year, and he had not known how far it was the intention of the hon. gentleman to deal with the subjects of those Bills. He should be glad to know if the hon. gentleman had given any attention to the matter proposed to be dealt with, and also to the subject of the registration of titles in the North-West Territories, which he (Mr. Mills), has proposed to deal with last year. During the last Session, the hon. gentleman had stated that any subject to which any hon. member had given special attention might be left in his hands if he intended to deal with it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he understood the hon. gentleman had introduced this Bill last Session. He did not now remember its terms, but of course he should be very glad to consider it. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had no present intention of introducing a measure for the registration of titles in the North-West. Of course, the hon.

gentleman had every right to introduce the Bill, and it would receive every consideration at the hands of the Government.

BRITISH COLUMBIA CHINESE TAX BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. DECOSMOS inquired, Will an Act of the Legislature of British Columbia, intituled: "An Act to provide for the better collection of provincial taxes from Chinese" be disallowed or not?

MR. MACDONALD (Picton): In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the Act providing for the better collection of provincial taxes from Chinese, and other Acts of the Legislature of British Columbia of last Session, are now under the consideration of the Government. My hon. friend is aware that that Act was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of British Columbia, or one of the Judges thereof, and that decision is not appealed from.

QUESTION.

MR. Fiset inquired, Whether the Government intend to grant a pardon to Mr. Louis Riel, and when.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I thought I had answered that question before. It is not the present intention of the Government to interfere in the matter.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—HALIFAX TERMINUS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) inquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for a water-side terminus for the Intercolonial Railway, nearer Halifax, in order to prevent the possibility of ice interfering with winter navigation; and whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for the erection of a grain elevator at Halifax and sufficient storage for other freight until shippers are ready to receive the same.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. TUPPER: That subject is under the consideration of the Government.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) inquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure during the present Session, for the amendment of the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act.

MR. MACDONALD (Picton): It is probable that during the Session a measure amending, in some respects, the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act will be introduced.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACTS AMENDMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) inquired, Whether it is the intention of the Ministry to introduce a measure amending the Acts relating to the Intercolonial Railway, in so far as they have prejudicially affected the private property of citizens of Halifax.

MR. TUPPER: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce an Act for that purpose; but, if the hon. gentleman were to introduce an Act of that nature, it would receive the consideration of the Government.

APPEALS FROM PUBLIC WORKS ARBITRATORS.

QUESTION.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) inquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the granting of appeals from awards made by the full Board of Arbitrators, in cases of compensation and otherwise, arising under the Public Works Act.

MR. TUPPER: I would say, in reply to the question, that the subject is at present engaging the consideration of the Government, and the decision arrived at will be communicated to the House at an early period.

FOG HORN OR BELL AT RACE ROCKS, B. C.
QUESTION.

MR. DEWDNEY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a fog horn or bell on Race Rocks, British Columbia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is the intention of the Government, I understand, to erect a bell on Race Rocks.

COST OF BOUNDARY ARBITRATION WITH ONTARIO.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. STEPHENSON moved for returns showing, in detail, the amount of money paid by the Dominion Government on account of the settlement of the boundary line between the North West Territories and Western Ontario, giving the names of the persons employed, for what time employed, and what amount of money paid to each such person so employed.

COST OF REPAIRING THE QUEBEC WALLS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. VALLÉE moved for a statement showing the sums of money expended for repairing the walls of the city of Quebec, between the 1st of August and the 1st of October, 1878 ; 2. The names and places of residence of the contractors for the said works ; 3. The number of workmen employed between the 1st of August and the 10th of the same month, 1878 ; 4. The number of workmen, contractors, foremen or assistant foremen of works, with the pay allowed them, between the 10th of August and the 25th September, 1878.

Motion agreed to.

REMITTANCE OF STATUTE LABOUR IN RIMOUSKI.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. LANDRY moved for copies of all Orders in Council, and of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and that of the Province of Quebec, or between any of the members of these Governments, respectively, with all papers and documents respecting the adjustment or remittance of certain statute labour (droits de corvée) in the parishes of St. Fabien, St. Simon, St. Mathieu, etc., during the last general elections. He said there were, in the county of Rimouski, certain electors who were at the same time consitaires of seigneurs, to whom they owed statute labour. This statute labour had been done away with by paying to the seigneurs an amount of $16,000. This took place during and after the late general elections, and the whole transaction was worthy of being brought to the knowledge of the public. The money that was thus given constituted part of the general fund to be divided between Ontario and Quebec, and was among the assets of these two Provinces. In order to obtain the payment of this sum to the electors of Rimouski, the consent of both Provinces was absolutely required. The Province of Ontario was willing to comply with this request, provided the Quebec Government likewise gave their consent. During the late local elections, this question excited considerable interest in the county of Rimouski, and was somewhat instrumental in bringing about the tie that closed the election, which was carried by the casting vote of the returning officer. Subsequently, during the Federal election, the question was again brought up, and the electors made application to the Government to have this amount remitted. He believed that the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) took the interest of his constituents to heart, and that he succeeded, even after the verdict of the country was known, and the late Administration had been repudiated, in obtaining the remittance of this sum in payment of the statute labour that was abolished; and this action was but the realisation of the promises that had been made by his agents. When the correspondence exchanged upon this subject was brought down, it would be seen whether certain rumours were well founded, and whether the late Government had really the right to interfere in this matter, and to settle in such a manner so important a question, after the opinion of the country had been so plainly manifested. There was, moreover, a question of right which seemed to have been entirely ignored, in order to assure the success of a then Ministerial candidate, at the expense of public interests.

MR. Fiset said the hon. member for Montagny did not appear to know a single word about the question that he had brought up. He believed it to be his duty, in the interest of those whom he had the honour to represent, to state the facts as they were. In 1859, under the Union of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, the Government, as was well known, settled the important seigniorial question of lots et ventes. It happened that, in the Province of Quebec, the consitaires of the Seigniority called Nicolas Rioux, could not profit by the settlement of this question, and that was how the person appointed to draw up the cadastré, instead of putting the days of statute labour (les journées de corvées) in the column of casual rights, placed them in the column of annual rents. This put upon the consitaires, over and above their annual rents, another annual burden of fifty cents for every lot of an arpent in width. It was true that, during the first two months that followed the drawing up of the cadastré, the consitaires might have had their rights recognised and the error rectified. But, as, at that time, the greater part of them were new settlers, and did not know better, they did not protest, and since then they had paid to the seigneurs, besides their annual rents, this amount of fifty cents for every lot of an arpent in width.

Before Confederation, they took some steps in order to have their rights recognised, but without success. It was only in 1872, or at the beginning of 1873, that, through Mr. Chauveau, they applied for the first time to the Federal Government. He (Mr. Fiset) had then asked the Government whether it was their intention to comply with the request of the consitaires. The Government made answer that the question was under consideration, and a few months afterwards, the then Minister of Justice (Sir John A. Macdonald), without going into the merits of the question, submitted a report, stating that the consitaires, having failed to protest within the appointed time, had lost all their rights. He (Mr. Fiset) did not look upon himself as defeated for all that, and, a change of Government having taken place, he continued to agitate this question so highly important to the consitaires of the Seigniority called Nicolas Rioux. In 1875 and 1876, he asked for the production of the papers, and, after having especially and repeatedly drawn the attention of the hon. the Ministers of Justice, Mr. Fournier and Mr. Blake, to this important question, he obtained at length from Mr. Blake a report which, whilst it recognised the legality of Sir John A. Macdonald's decision, recognised also the error that had been committed to the detriment of the consitaires. The hon. Minister added that, in his opinion, there was but one mode of relieving them: that was, to obtain from the Quebec and Ontario Legislatures permission to add to the debt of the former Province, assumed by the Federal Government, the amount representing the days of statute labour. This report was transmitted to these Legislatures. The Attorney-General for the Province of Ontario soon gave an answer, but the Attorney-General for the Province of Quebec (Mr. Angers) took a long time to digest this report, so long a time indeed that the Department was obliged to write to him twice before receiving an answer. At last the answer came, and, as he (Mr. Fiset) had expected, the hon. gentleman was hostile to the consitaires; he refused to recognise the error committed to their detriment when the cadastré had been drawn up, and from which they had been suffering for more than fifteen years. Happily for the consistants, the De Boucherville was replaced by the Joly Government in the month of March, 1878. Not being satisfied with the decision of the Hon. Mr. Angers, he (Mr. Fiset) applied again to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Laflamme. This hon. gentleman made a new report, the conclusions being about the same as those of the Hon. Mr. Blake's report. The question was once more submitted to the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Ross, in the month of April last, during the formation of the Joly Government. It would be remembered that, during the following month, the provincial elections in Quebec took place, and that, almost immediately afterwards, in the month of June, the Session was opened, and continued until the month of July. It was not, therefore, a matter of surprise that Mr. Ross could not answer the memorandum of Mr. Laflamme before the month of August. Happily, the rights of the consistants were at length recognised. The Joly Government, not wishing to take advantage of the error committed by the person who had drawn up the cadastre, gave their consent to the request that the amount representing the days of statute labour should be added to the debt that the Federal Government had assumed. He had desired to indicate the steps that had been taken to bring about the settlement of this question, and to give dates with the greatest possible exactitude, which he believed would be sufficient to prove to the House that, in the settlement of this important affair, no such act of corruption as the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) pretended to see therein, had occurred. If this motion had been made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée), or the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Grandbois), it would be less surprising; but what astonished him was to see that this motion had been made by the hon. member for Montmagny, who had only spoken of the affair as an act of electoral corruption. In order to speak so, the hon. gentleman must needs be an angel of purity in matters electoral, or at least above all suspicion. He begged to say, for the hon. gentleman's own information, that he (Mr. Fiset) was qualified to sit in this House; that no one had dared to contest his election; and that he was not even disqualified to sit in the Quebec Legislature. He proposed, in order to allow the hon. member for Montmagny to go to the bottom of the question, to add to his motion the following words, to which he believed there could be no objection taken:—"And also the correspondence which has passed since 1872 between the Dominion Government and the Legislatures of Quebec and Ontario, and any person whatsoever, on the subject of the statute labour; together with various reports of the hon. the Minister of Justice upon the question."

PRIVATE BILLS.

EXTENSION OF TIME.

MR. ROBINSON moved that, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, the time for presenting Private Bills be extended for ten days.

Motion agreed to

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 6) To incorporate the Saskatchewan Colonisation Railroad Company.—(Mr. Schultz.)

Bill (No. 7) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 8) To ensure the better qualification of public servants and the greater efficiency and economy of the Public Service.—(Mr. Casey.)

SELKIRK AND SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

(Mr. Rykert.)

FIRST READING.

MR. RYKERT introduced a Bill (No. 9) To incorporate the Selkirk and South Saskatchewan Railway Company, and moved the suspension of Rule 51, in relation to the said Bill, as recommended by the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

MR. SCHULTZ said that he objected to the introduction of the Bill, because the conditions of the 51st Rule had not been complied with, inasmuch as the first notice in the Canada Gazette was given on the 18th January, and in the local papers on the first and seventh of February.

MR. ROBINSON said that it was laid down by Todd, in his work on Private Bills Practice, that the Committee on Standing Orders should be guided rather by the spirit than by the letter of the rule. A public meeting had been held in the county most interested in this railway, and the Committee on Standing Orders, having no doubt that the inhabitants of the section of country through which the road was to pass had been fully informed as to the nature of the Bill, had come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the informality of the notice, it would be proper, under the circumstances, to grant the prayer of the petition.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, if this Bill was of a character which necessarily implied a surprise in regard to some important work which would affect the locality seriously, or would prejudicially affect certain private interests, then the rule should be enforced; but, if it was simply an ordinary Bill to charter certain parties to build a railway under certain conditions, then he thought the Committee were right in recommending the suspension of the rule, because the Bill would afterwards be considered by another Committee. The notice was certainly very short; but, unless the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) could point out some specific objection, he did not think the House would be warranted in rejecting the report of the Committee.

MR. ROBINSON said it was a Bill simply to incorporate this Company.

MR. RYKERT said he was surprised at the course taken by the hon. member for Lisgar, especially as his constituency would be benefited by this railway. If the company asked for a charter over ground already occupied by other persons, he could understand the objection; but everyone west of the Red River was anxious to have a railway service. The notice given by the hon. member for Lisgar showed that he asked the privilege of building a railway from the Red River westward, intending to occupy the whole territory from the boundary line of the United States to the Pacific Railway. The Bill which he (Mr. Rykert) had introduced only asked that the Railway Committee should decide which territory they should have—the north or the south. The country required more than one railway, and now there was none west of the Red River. The matter had been fully discussed in the section affected, as was shown by the reports in the Selkirk Inter-Ocean, which he read. This Bill asked for a charter to build a railway continuously from Selkirk westward. The Bill of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Schultz) proposed to build a road from Winnipeg westward, not in a line to any objective point, but spreading over the whole territory from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains. In his (Mr. Rykert's) Bill, the concession lines were pointed out, so that any one could tell what was required, and whether the country would be served or not. The country was not occupied now by any railways, and the Railway Committee could decide which was best.

MR. MACDOUGALL said that the question they had to consider was not so much the merits of this line of railway—for on that subject the House was not yet sufficiently informed—but whether it was convenient, in this the first Session of a new Parliament, to ignore the rules of the House on the mere recommendation of a Committee. In this case, his hon. friend who had just spoken argued plausibly upon the merits of the case, but he told them that both railways started, the one from Winnipeg, and the other from Selkirk, while the direction of both was westward. It was very evident they were to be rival railways, and it might be a question whether it was in the interest of the public in that country for the House to charter rival railroads, running practically over the same ground, or nearly so. They had had some experience in other Provinces of the Dominion, in Ontario especially, and that experience taught them that the chartering of rival lines running very near together was neither advantageous to the public nor the companies. That question, however, could be very properly decided when the case came before the Railway Committee. The question then was whether sufficient notice had been given of this railway scheme. A public meeting had been held, but a public meeting was not a notice. He was of opinion that it would be highly inexpedient for the House to suspend the rule. If the hon. gentleman waited until the two months required by the rule had expired, he would then have a right to introduce the Bill. If they suspended the rule in this case, he would like to know in what case they could refuse to suspend it.

MR. RYKERT said the notice was published on January 10th for the first time.

MR. SCHULTZ said, according to the Clerk of the Committee, the first notice was given on January 18th.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the rule had generally been as laid down by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). The House generally supported the recommendation of the Committee for the suspension of the rule. His hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall) stated that the hon. gentleman would have a right to introduce the Bill at the expiration of two months. That being so, they might just as well bring it up at once. The right way was for them to concur in the report of the Committee, as the House could not be expected to engage in the discussion of the respective merits of these Bills.

MR. SCHULTZ said that he had no desire to oppose any measure which would benefit any part of Manitoba, but a Bill had already been introduced which covered the same ground, and which provided for the wants of all sections of the Province. The promoters of this Bill had complied with all the conditions imposed by the 51st rule, and the printed Bill was this day received. If it was allowed in this case to accept notice of less than a month, then they could not, in future, refuse to receive any similar defective notices.

Bill read the first time.

NEW MEMBER.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Joseph Stanislas Perrault, Esquire, to represent the Electoral District of Charlevoix.

Pacific Railway Company, to facilitate the transportation of passengers and freight from St. Vincent, Minn., to St. Boniface, Manitoba.

MR. TUPPER: The late Government entered into a contract with parties connected with the St. Paul and Pacific Railway Company, for the purpose of carrying out the objects stated in this question.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of Government to amend the Post Office Regulations so as to enable postmasters to return to the sender letters and papers which have not been called for in ten days from the time of their receipt at the office of their destination, in cases where the senders have endorsed on the envelope their address and their request that the same may be done.

MR. LANGEVIN: The regulation of the Department is as follows: "When letters, passing within the Dominion, are sent in covers or envelopes, having printed thereon a request from the sender, that the letter, if not delivered or called for at the office addressed within a certain time specified in the request, may be returned to his address as printed in the said request, such request will be complied with by the postmaster of the office addressed, whose duty it is, at the expiration of the time named by the sender, to write upon the letter the reason for non-delivery, and forward it to the address given. These instructions apply only to request-letters originating within the Dominion, or within the United States; such requests appearing on letters from other countries cannot be complied with." These regulations apply only to the endorsements that are printed. Written endorsements are not noticed by the postmaster, because other parties than the senders or writers of letters might write the endorsements on the envelope, and have the letters, if returned, sent to them. But, when the endorsement is printed, then the writer is supposed to be willing to have that order printed on the envelope.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

MR. CHRISTIE moved :

"That the interests of public morality and the physical well-being of all classes render it necessary that there should be a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's Day in all the Departments of the Public Service, which are under the control of the Dominion Government; that, in the opinion of this House, the regulations in the Post Office Department should be uniform throughout the whole Dominion, and all postmasters be permitted to close their offices during the whole of the Sabbath day."

He said that, in rising to move the resolution which he held in his hand, to secure the better observance of the Sabbath, it was not his intention to occupy the time of the House at any length. The resolution spoke for itself. It would be remembered by some hon. gentlemen present that he moved a somewhat similar resolution during last Session, but he was then aiming specially at the closing of the canals. And he was happy to state that the pledge then given by the late Government had been fully redeemed. An order was issued on the 27th of May to close the canals from twelve o'clock on Saturday night till twelve o'clock on Sunday night, thus securing a whole Sabbath's rest, which was hailed as a precious boon by all the employés, and even by the residents along the line. It had been productive of the most beneficial results, there being less drunkenness, profanity, and public disturbance than formerly; and, so far as he knew, not one of the evil results which had been predicted to follow the closing had been realised. It was to be hoped that the canals had been closed forever on Sunday. He thought that the good results which had followed closing in this case should encourage the Government to go a step farther in the same direction, and to close the post-offices in the Province of Quebec during the whole of the Sabbath day. He found that a great diversity of regulations and practice existed in the Post Office Department, in different sections of the Dominion. In the Maritime Provinces, with one or two exceptions, the post-offices were closed, closing being imperative. In Ontario, postmasters were at liberty to close their offices to the public on Sunday. In Manitoba and

British Columbia, the post-offices, with few exceptions, were closed. But in the Province of Quebec closing was prohibited, and postmasters were required to keep their offices open at least one hour, either before or after divine worship, as might be most convenient to the public. This was a most anomalous and unsatisfactory state of things. Why should closing be imperative in one Province, permissive in a second, and be prohibited in a third? And why should postmasters in the Province of Quebec be denied the enjoyment of their inherent right to a whole Sabbath's rest, when it was accorded to postmasters in every other Province in the Dominion? Many of the postmasters felt it to be a very great hardship to be compelled to open their offices during any portion of the Sabbath day, and they looked to this House for relief, and hoped to be put on the same footing as others, and to be protected in the full enjoyment of their rights in this matter. He believed there was a wide-spread interest felt in this question throughout the country. Petitions had been presented from time to time, praying that there might be a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's day in all Departments of the Public Service. During the last General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, held a few months ago in the city of Hamilton, this question was considered, and it was unanimously resolved to petition the Dominion Government to close the post-offices in the Province of Quebec during the whole of the Lord's day. The members of that Assembly had approached this House by petition, as Christian patriots impressed with a high sense of the importance of Sabbath observance to secure national prosperity and the general well-being of the Dominion. They had pointed out, in the clearest and most emphatic language, the good results which flowed from Sabbath observance, the inherent right which every man had to the Sabbath's rest, and the duty of the Government to protect all their employés in the full enjoyment of that rest. Now, when they considered the number, the respectability, and the unanimity of that Assembly, and that the evil of which they complained was one of a grave character, they must admit that their representations were well worthy of the consideration of this House.

MR. CHRISTIE.

Although the other religious bodies had not petitioned on the present occasion, he was convinced that most of them were in perfect harmony with the Presbyterian Church on this question. But he regretted to say that, notwithstanding all the petitions which had been presented from time to time, and all the efforts which had been put forth in this House, the evil complained of was still continued. The postmasters were still robbed of that rest which God had given them, and the benign and hallowing influences of the Sabbath were destroyed to a great extent by the opening of the mails, and the scattering of mail matter broadcast over the Province every Sunday. Now it was quite preposterous to suppose that the Sabbath could be observed under such circumstances, so long as the employés of the Government were compelled to open their offices and to break the day, and so long as the cares and anxieties and labour connected with a Sunday mail were thus thrust upon the people. But that was not all. The evil was still increasing. The example of the Dominion Government in the Post Office Department had been followed by the Local Governments in their Railway Departments. Possibly the contractors were responsible; but, ever since the Montreal, Ottawa and Western Railway was built, excursion trains had been run on Sunday during the summer, and all the pleasure-seekers and Sabbath-breakers in the cities had been poured into the country, to the great grief and annoyance of the Sabbath-keeping portion of the community. Even divine worship had been interrupted and disturbed by the passing trains, and by the music and revelry of the excursionists. These glaring acts of Sabbath desecration were under the control of the respective Governments. They were productive of the most disastrous, the most deplorable results, familiarising the public mind with Sunday labour and amusement, destroying all regard and respect for the sacred day, and converting it into a mere holiday for amusement. Many were shocked at these things, and called loudly for reform. He knew that it was urged by some that the present practice in the Post Office Department was necessary, that it was a great convenience to the people to get their papers and letters when they went to church on Sunday, that it was a saving of time and money, and that occasionally business and social requirements rendered it desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that the post-offices should be opened. But he believed that the plea of necessity was sufficiently answered by the fact that the post-offices had been closed in the Maritime Provinces and in Ontario for many years, and no inconvenience had been experienced. Not a single petition had ever been presented to this House asking for a Sunday mail. Now, no business necessities could exist in the Province of Quebec that did not exist in Ontario or the other Provinces, and if the post-offices had been closed there, and even in the great city of London, with a population nearly equal to that of the whole Dominion, and no inconvenience or detriment to business had been felt, it must be quite evident that the plea of necessity was wholly fallacious and inexcusable. He was convinced that no very serious objection would be raised to the proposed change in the rural districts of the Province of Quebec. Possibly in the cities the objection might be stronger; but even there many of their best and most prosperous merchants refused to take their mail matter on Sunday, and were convinced they had never suffered any loss by doing so. He thought a majority of the respectable people would hail with satisfaction any measure calculated to secure the better observance of the Sabbath, and would gladly submit to any slight inconvenience which the proposed change might occasionally involve. He need not speak of the divine obligation which rested upon them to keep the Sabbath, because he hoped that that was fully recognised and admitted by the House. Neither was it necessary to prove that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit and advancement, both in an economic and religious point of view, and was in perfect harmony with the laws of his being. He believed it was generally admitted by the wisest and best men that the man who strictly observed the day would enjoy better health, live to a greater age, and be able to accomplish more labour than he who ignored the sacred day, and either laboured the whole seven days successively, or devoted the Sabbath to a round of amusement often more exhausting than labour. And what was true of individuals was equally true of the State; no nation could long continue to prosper that wilfully and unnecessarily violated the sanctity of the Sabbath. He did not ask for the introduction of any new principle into our legislation; but the extension of one that was now recognized and acted upon. He did not ask that any man should be compelled to keep the Sabbath; but simply that the regulations in the Post Office Department should be made uniform; that the same respect should be paid to the Sabbath by the Post Office Department in the Province of Quebec that was paid to it in all the other Provinces of the Dominion, and that the postmasters in that Province should no longer be compelled to open their offices during any portion of the Lord's day. It would be observed that his (Mr. Christie's) motion was permissive; not imperative. It was quite true that he would prefer to go a little further. He thought the regulations should require postmasters to close their offices, and, if the House would go that length, he would be most happy to have his motion amended in that direction, as it would be more in harmony with his convictions. After enquiry he was convinced it could not be carried in that form. He believed it was a question of very great importance, very closely connected with the well-being and prosperity of the Dominion, and he would most respectfully, and, at the same time, most earnestly, ask the Government and every hon. member in the House to give it their serious consideration and support, and to adopt such measures as would secure a strict and uniform observance of the Sabbath, not only in the Post Office Department, but in all Departments of the Public Service.

MR. CHARLTON, in seconding the motion, said it must be apparent to all who gave attention to the movements of social and intellectual forces in this age that there was a growing disposition to desire the abridgment of those restrictions which Christianity had heretofore considered necessary to be imposed for securing the well-being and the moral and religious good of society. It might not be improper to consider whether those restrictions were arbitrary, and whether they were in accordance with the principles of justice and natural right. The nature of the restraints that might be imposed by a Government, the acts that might be forbidden, the acts and observances that might be required, and the penalties that might be imposed, would necessarily be determined by the principles upon which Government rested. It would not, for instance, be proper for a Mahomedan Government to prohibit polygamy, because it was tolerated in the Koran; perhaps it would not be proper for the United States Government to pass laws requiring the observance of the Sabbath, because that Government had studiously ignored all reference to God in its fundamental law, the Constitution. The Sovereign of this nation was styled the "defender of the faith;" she was said to hold that position "by the grace of God;" and, if, which was unquestionably the case, this was a Christian nation; if, in all its conquests, in all the countries where it had founded colonies and laid the foundations of empires, it had introduced and recognised Christianity, and recognised the law of Christianity, as the higher law, he held it was a Christian nation; if this was the case, then the observance of the Sabbath was a duty which its rulers, so far as was practicable, and their authority extended, were called upon to enforce. The ordinance that one day out of seven should be set apart as a day of rest and religious worship had been recognised throughout all ages of the world. It was the only ordinance, besides marriage, which appeared in the records of the creation. It was a fundamental part of the decalogue. Its binding character had been recognised by the Prophets, and by the Redeemer Himself—the Head of the Christian religion. He (Mr. Charlton) held, further, that that day in seven which had been authoritatively set apart for the day of rest, under the Christian dispensation, was the first day of the week. He did not deem it necessary to go into any discussion of the proof of that assertion, but would content himself with the assertion that the proof was ample and conclusive, and he took it for granted no one would deny that such was the case.

MR. CHARLTON.

By the observance of the Sabbath, God's name was honoured and the visibility of religion was maintained, and any failure to enact laws for its observance fastened the lie upon this or any country which pretended to be a Christian nation. Public recognition of anything whatsoever begat individual respect, and public recognition of the Sabbath, or of any ordinance on the part of the Government, begat individual respect for that ordinance. He did not intend to detain the House by remarks at any length on the subject; but would say that in this age error had assumed most seductive forms. Materialists affirmed that matter existed without a Creator; Pantheists, that matter itself was God; Evolutionists, that that glorious declaration that God made man in His own image was a fable. They referred us to an origin more humble than the tadpole, gravely asserting that our life was evolved from primordial shells which in remotest ages had been vivified by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms, and that, through gradual processes of evolution extending through countless ages, animal life had reached its present stage. By these forms of error, arising from the deductions of science, falsely so called, the truth was sought to be undermined. It was the duty of every Christian nation, people and Government to honour God's laws in all respects; and the motion before the House, calling for a more strict observance of the Sabbath by the employés of the Government, was one which the Government could not disregard, unless they did violence to their professions of being a Christian Government of a Christian nation. Regulations and restrictions, such as laws requiring the observance of the Sabbath, were safeguards which, if maintained, would secure the continuance of civil and religious liberty. It was under them that Britain had attained her greatness, and had placed her impress upon continents, upon races, upon history, and upon time. That same old command: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," given thousands of years ago, was still ringing in their ears, and still binding upon them. They could not claim to be a Christian people if they disregarded it; and he therefore begged to second the resolution of the hon. member for Argenteuil.

MR. HESSON said, before this motion was put, he desired to raise his voice in its favour. It was not necessary to waste the time of this House in a long discussion of the subject. All who felt they were Christians should, so far as their voices and votes went, sustain it. As a new member he would not occupy the time of this House further than to say their vote should be given unanimously, as representatives of a Christian people, in favour of the motion.

MR. LANGEVIN said this was the second time the hon. gentleman had brought this motion before the House; the words, this time, being slightly varied from those of last year, but the motion being substantially the same. The principle of the observance of the Lord's day had been admitted by the whole House last year, and no doubt the same principle would be admitted this year. They all agreed that the Lord's day should be kept as strictly as possible; but the hon. gentleman must be aware that that observance could not be an absolute one. Certain work which could not be avoided had to be done on that day. People had to get up and dress themselves on that day as well as on the others; their meals had to be prepared, and the hon. gentleman did not object that his cook should prepare his meals; that his servants should milk the cows, in order to have milk for his breakfast; that his cattle should be fed and his horses looked after, even on that day. Certain work which could not be avoided had to be done on Sunday. Unless everything stopped—unless life stopped at midnight on Saturday night, and began again exactly twenty-four hours after, certain works must be done on the Lord's day, and therefore the rule which the hon. gentleman wanted to apply could not be applied to other things any more than to the domestic concerns of life. If the hon. gentleman were on his way to Europe, he would not object that on the Sunday the steamer continued her route, that the fireman and the other men worked; but would object decidedly to the steamer being kept twenty-four hours in the midst of the ocean without being allowed to proceed on her course. He had no doubt the hon. gentleman had been on a railway even on a Sunday morning or afternoon, and did not object to the men working on it. It was a work necessary to be done. Last year Mr. Macdougall, of Elgin, moved, seconded by Mr. Ross, in amendment to the hon. gentleman's motion, to this effect: "That all the words after 'that,' to the end of the motion be left out, and the words inserted, 'the interest of public morality and the physical well-being of all sections of the community require that the Lord's day be strictly observed by persons engaged in the public works under the control of the Government, as far as practicable; that there should be a cessation of labour on all the canals, railways, and other public works under the control of the Government, as far as, in the opinion of the Government, it would be practicable to do so.'" This amendment was supported by the then Government, and the whole House agreed to it. The hon. gentleman found that in these words should have been included "post-offices." Therefore, this year, he renewed this discussion. He (Mr. Langevin) did not object to the discussion being renewed. He agreed that, as far as possible, the Lord's day should be observed, but complete cessation of labour on that day was impossible, and, no matter how strong a resolution of this kind might be passed, it would be found impossible to carry it into effect. The hon. gentleman must not suppose that he (Mr. Langevin) did not want to respect the Lord's day. He did wish to see it respected as much as did the hon. gentleman himself. But Sunday was the only day on which the population of the country parts in the Province of Quebec went to the post-offices. They lived far apart; they went to church on the Sunday, and after church they got their letters, and posted those they had written during the week; not only the French Roman Catholic portion of the population, but nearly the entire population. The parish in which the hon. gentleman resided might be an exception. If the population of that parish desired that the post-office should be closed there, he would give orders to that effect. No post-office in the Province of Quebec would be opened on Sunday if the people did not go then for their letters; and, if the hon. gentleman and others did not go for their letters on that day, or send their servants—Roman Catholic servants—or others for them, that post-office would not be used, and the object he desired would be attained. As the hon. gentleman had brought the motion before the House, it would have to be dealt with, unless, after these explanations, he was satisfied to withdraw the motion. Otherwise, he would move that the words after “that” to the end of the question be left out, and the following inserted instead: “The interest of public morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community require that the Lord's day be strictly observed by all persons engaged in the public Departments, under the control of the Canadian Government, as far as practicable to do so; that, in the opinion of this House, there should be a cessation of labour on the Lord's day on all public works, and in all offices under the control of the Government of Canada, as far as it shall be found, in the opinion of the Government, practicable to do so.”

MR. McLENNAN said he had great sympathy with the prayer of the petition to the House, and he thought that the public servants, as well as all others, should have a day of rest; and, because he sympathised so much with this proposition, he undertook to say a few words about it. He was one of seventy-three new members in the House, and he hoped the seventy-three new members desired to perpetuate the rights and liberties of the people. He was not sure whether the Dominion of Canada stood in the position of defender of the faith—perhaps it was not necessary to discuss that point—but he believed that the law that governed us in that respect should be a law of moral suasion, and written not upon our Statute-books, but in the hearts of the people. At the same time, he was aware that whatever was said in this House upon such a question came before the people, and would be discussed in a variety of forms for which this House could not be responsible, and that mistakes might be made in interpreting the sense of the House. For this reason he would prefer that the mover of the resolution would withdraw it, rather than that others in the same position as himself, who desired that the prayer of this petition should be carried out in its spirit and essence, should be compelled to vote upon a resolution of this kind.

MR. BÉCHARD said that, although he had much admiration for the Christian feeling which had led his hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Christie) to make this motion, yet he had no sympathy with the purpose of the motion. His hon. friend knew that this question was viewed by different persons from different standpoints. The religious education of three-fourths of the population of Quebec did not make them consider the act of keeping a post-office open on Sunday a violation of that day. They did not consider the writing of a letter, for instance, on that day, any more than the hiring of a horse and buggy to take a ride on that day, as a violation of the Sabbath. In several parishes of the rural districts there were people who lived five or six miles from a post-office, for whom it would be very inconvenient not to be able to get their letters or papers on Sunday when they went to church, as, if compelled to go on any other day, they would have to lose half a day's work. He hoped that no steps would be taken by this House to put a stop to a practice which was a great convenience to the people in districts such as those he had referred to.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that in the interior of British Columbia a great many people came into the post-towns only on the Sabbath day, and it would be a great inconvenience to them if they could not get their letters and papers. Postmasters, he believed, had the power of closing their offices on the Sabbath, or keeping them open, and he thought it would be going a little too far if the resolution moved by the hon. member for Argenteuil were to be adopted. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. the Postmaster-General, that, while they were willing to preserve the sanctity of the Lord's day to the utmost extent, certain allowances should be made.

MR. SCRIVER said he desired to show that the remarks of the hon. the Postmaster-General were anything but a sufficient reply to what had been said upon the moral aspect of the question, at all events. They were all agreed as to the importance of the Sabbath day to a Christian community, and to the propriety of its proper observance. They were also fully agreed with the hon. the Postmaster-General, that there were certain labours which, as a necessity of our condition, must be done upon that day. But there was another question which followed, and that was, what were the necessary labours which were the results of the necessity of our condition? To the statement that it was necessary that the post-offices should be kept open in certain localities, he thought a sufficient reply would be found in the fact that in some of the Provinces they were not kept open on that day. With reference to the question as it presented itself to the representatives of the Province of Quebec, he would only say, with the hon. member for Iberville, that a large majority of that Province did not believe that Sunday was violated by keeping the post-offices open before or subsequent to the morning service in the churches. He would not like to force his peculiar views—if they were peculiar—upon the majority of the people of that Province, but he knew that in the English-speaking portion of that Province, or the portion inhabited principally by Protestants, this question was viewed differently from what it was in the parishes inhabited by Roman Catholics; and the majority of these were not only a Christian people in the ordinary sense of the term, but they were members of one or other of the religious bodies which considered it a violation of the Sabbath day that Government officials should be required to work on that day. He believed that the weight of public opinion in that portion of the Province of Quebec inhabited mainly by Protestants was strongly in favour of, at least, a permissive regulation, such as that pointed out by the resolution of the hon. member for Argenteuil. This resolution, if passed, would not make it obligatory, but permissive merely, upon the postmasters of the Province of Quebec to close these offices. He felt assured that, in a community where the general public sentiment was in favour of keeping the post-offices open on Sunday, the postmaster would yield to that public sentiment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not see why the hon. gentleman should feel at all embarrassed, or think that he would be in a false position, for he voted for the very same motion last Session. He thought that the expression of the House, as far as they could gather it, laid down the true principle that there was a general feeling in Canada, amongst Catholics as well as Protestants, that the Lord's day should be observed as strictly as possible. The hon. gentleman who now led the other side of the House, and led the House last Session, supported the amendment of his hon. friend, as he felt, under the responsibility of his position, the necessity of avoiding an absolute cessation of all work which would be caused by the motion of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie). His hon. friend who had just spoken (Mr. Scriver) said that this resolution would not make it obligatory on the Government.

MR. SCRIVER: I meant to say obligatory upon postmasters.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be obligatory upon the Government to order postmasters to cease keeping open their post-offices on Sunday. The resolution was so strong that, if it were adopted, any Government would be compelled by it to order all their employés to close their post offices on Sunday, and not to open them for one second. If that resolution were passed, he would be obliged, in obedience to the command of this House, to order all the employés to close their public departments, except when it was unavoidably necessary; and, of course, as the giving of letters on Sunday in Lower Canada was not a necessity, the post-offices there could not be opened on that day any more than in any other Province. He thought, therefore, that the resolution should be withdrawn. He would prefer that the amendment of his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin) should be carried. The last Parliament solemnly affirmed, by the motion in amendment which was moved by Mr. Macdougall, that the Lord's day should be observed in every way practicable, and he thought that this Parliament should affirm the same principle.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he thought his hon. friend had stated the case too strongly regarding the terms in which the motion was drawn. The motion simply said that all postmasters should be permitted to close their offices during the whole of the Sabbath day. As he understood the question, postmasters in the Province of Quebec, under the terms of the resolution, would be allowed to close their offices where they considered it their duty to do so. He did not wish to enter into a discussion of the question which was so ably put by the mover and seconder of the resolution. He could simply say, so far as the question of convenience was concerned, that he was not aware of any part of the Province of Ontario, where all the post-offices were closed, in which any inconvenience was felt, nor in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where a similar usage prevailed. He quite agreed with the sentiment that, in a mixed community like ours, where there were so many creeds, it was desirable to deal carefully in matters of this kind. He concurred in the statement of his hon. friend (Mr. Scriver) that no line was drawn between what was considered a violation of the Sabbath day and what was a work of necessity. It was said last year, when it was proposed to close the canals, that great inconvenience would be caused thereby; but, since its adoption, no complaints had been made and no petitions presented to this House against that measure. It had proved highly satisfactory. He trusted that the House would support all necessary and proper restrictions.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he did not agree with the conclusion that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross) had drawn from the terms of the resolution. It appeared to him (Mr. Macdougall) very obvious that, if this House affirmed this resolution in the terms in which it was expressed—in view of the fact that a similar resolution was proposed in the previous Parliament,—the Government would be, of necessity, compelled as obeying the directions of this House, to issue orders to all the postmasters in the country strictly to observe the Sabbath by closing their offices. It would be impossible to draw the line where the hon. gentleman had suggested it could be drawn, without disobeying an order of this House. He wished to direct the attention of the House to a view of the question which had not yet been presented. Were they here as members of the Dominion Parliament for the purpose of enforcing duties which belong to what legal writers described as the of imperfect obligation? Was that their special function; or were they not, under the Constitution, called upon to deal with a class of questions that did not involve these duties? There were other bodies clothed with the power, and therefore charged with the duty of dealing with the civil rights of the people. It was not the function of this Parliament to regulate educational institutions, religious observances, or matters of police. There were the Local Legislatures and municipal corporations armed with the power of dealing with questions of this character. They represented the people more directly and intimately in all these matters. Consequently, he thought they would be acting wisely, and be keeping within their own jurisdiction, by confining themselves to those matters which had been assigned to them by the Constitutional Act. It was quite true that it was within the power of this House to direct when the post-offices of the Dominion should be kept open and when they should be closed; but, at the same time, he thought it would be an undue exercise of that power if it were put forth on the grounds invoked by the hon. mover and seconder of the resolution. In view of the fact that in this country there were various opinions on this Sabbatarian question, and that a very large religious body, numbering nearly one-half the population, did not regard the keeping of the Sabbath, as it was termed, in the same light, or that it should be done in the same manner as another class of the community, and professing religious opinions of a different kind, would it be fair, and would it result in any good, to impose upon them, by legislation, a strict observance of the Sabbath in a manner which might be repugnant to their habits, and contrary to their convictions? He did not think that our experience in this country, in attempting to legislate upon matters of this kind, had been so satisfactory as to induce us to go any further in the same direction. On another but cognate subject, there had been a great deal of agitation; and Parliament had been called upon to deal with the question of suppressing the use of intoxicating liquors; there had been an attempt to enforce abstinence by legislation in the Province of Ontario, and he thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross) would agree with him that our experiment in that direction had not been very successful, for the people were now undoing and repealing, by overwhelming majorities, the attempt to coerce them by law to perform those moral obligations and duties. He was inclined to take the view that we must leave it to the individual consciences of the people, to their own sense of propriety, as to the mode in which they should observe the Sabbath, or as to whether they should abstain from the use of those things which might prove injurious to them. Experience in our own and other countries had taught that legislation of this kind was sure to be ineffective, would aggravate the particular evil, and would injuriously affect the morals of the people. In some of the countries of Europe, he had seen people going to church in the early part of the day, and after the service was over he had seen them with their families in the public gardens and places of recreation and amusement, where they could breathe the fresh air of heaven and admire the beauties of art and nature; and yet these people were, as far as he could see, as religious as any other class of the community. Perhaps their conduct in frequenting these places would shock the hon. mover of this resolution; but, in his (Mr. Macdougall's) judgment, their observance of the Sabbath was perfectly consistent with their religious belief and their duty. In Lower Canada, a large majority of the people did not agree with the hon. gentleman in his view of the mode of keeping the Sabbath. This Parliament, composed of representatives of all the Provinces of the Dominion, with their divergent opinions, was not the proper body to deal with a question of this kind—there were local bodies and other means by which obligations of this nature could be enforced. The resolution proposed in amendment went as far as it was necessary to go. It went far enough to meet the difficulties of the case. It left it in the discretion of the Government to say that the offices should be closed on the Sabbath in all cases where it could be reasonably and properly done. He would support the amendment, and leave it for the Government to see that its directions were properly carried out wherever public opinion required it.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he thought there was an inconsistency in the terms of the resolution of the hon. gentleman from Argenteuil. The first part declared the necessity for a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's day, and then the second part proposed to leave it to the discretion of postmasters whether to close their offices during the whole of the Sabbath or not. If the word "permit" meant, what his hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) contended it did—individual discretion, how could there be uniformity of practice. Therefore, he thought the true meaning of the resolution was that expressed by the right hon. leader of the Government, who declared that this resolution, more especially in view of the resolution carried last Session, would amount to an injunction upon the Government to insist upon all postmasters closing their offices in every place on the Sabbath day. He would not discuss the question from a Lower Canada point of view, although he entirely endorsed what his hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had just said: that it was improper for this Parliament to impose uniformity in an observance of this kind where there was no uniformity of opinion or sentiment among the people of the different Provinces. As regarded Ontario, he was not prepared to accept the statement of his hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), that everybody was well satisfied with the post-offices being rigorously closed on Sunday, as they were there. As a resident of Toronto, he (Mr. Cameron) was prepared to say that there was great dissatisfaction with the total closing of the post-office on Sunday, and it had often been remarked that the outer door of that office ought to be left open during a portion of the day, and then it could be left to each man's conscience to go in and get his letters or not. That would be true liberty, leaving every man to do as he thought fit. It would not involve any necessity for Sunday labour in the post-office, as each man having a box could open it himself. It frequently happened that men of business had to leave town on Monday morning before the post-office was open, and it was a great inconvenience to them not to be able to get on Sunday those letters which had arrived and had been assorted on Saturday night. Looking at the question from a broad point of view, he did not know that rigid Protestant views on the Sabbath question were more correct than the more liberal views of their Roman Catholic fellow subjects upon that matter. He did not know that rigid Sabbatarianism was always connected with uprightness of character and conduct. As an illustration of this opinion, he would only mention the case of probably the most guilty of the City of Glasgow Bank Directors, who had just been convicted, and who was so extremely religious that he would not read on Monday a newspaper published on that day, because it was printed on the Sunday night.

MR. CHRISTIE said he wished to remind the House that the resolution he moved last Session specially aimed at the closing of the canals, and it was only after the Government had given a positive assurance that the canals would be closed that he accepted the amendment. It would be remembered also, that he was then censured by the right hon. gentleman the leader of the present Government because he accepted the amendment. The right hon. gentleman would remember that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) accused him (Mr. Christie) of inconsistency and of proving recreant to his convictions because he accepted that amendment. Had the Postmaster-General to-day assured him that all the postmasters in the Province of Quebec would be permitted to close their offices, he (Mr. Christie) would have accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. the Postmaster-General. That hon. gentleman had said that he would allow the postmaster in his (Mr. Christie's) own parish to close his office on Sunday; if he would extend that permission to the whole Province, he (Mr. Christie) would be satisfied, otherwise he must adhere to his present position.

Motion agreed to.

CARRIAGE OF GOVERNMENT SUPPORTERS ON THE INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANDRY moved for a statement of moneys due by certain persons, residents of the county of Rimouski, since 1st August, 1878, for the carriage, during the last general elections, on the Intercolonial Railway, of supporters and agents of the candidate in favour of the Administration of the day, together with copies of correspondence on the subject between such persons and the Government, and all orders, receipts and documents relating thereto. He said that, at the risk of being unpleasant to the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset), he believed it to be his duty to ask for an order of the House for the production of the documents mentioned in his motion; at the risk of bringing upon himself once more the anger of the hon. gentleman, he wished the public to be informed as to the doings of a certain party which had always styled itself the "Party of Purity." A few days since, in answer to some remarks that he (Mr. Landry) had made, while speaking to a motion somewhat of the nature of the one now submitted, the hon. member for Rimouski could not conceal his astonishment, and even his indignation, at seeing him striving to know and to make known to the country what took place in the county of Rimouski during the late general elections. He understood the hon. gentleman's surprise, but the House would admit that he (Mr. Landry) was only following the example given him by the hon. member for Rimouski, and that he did not go as far as he did. Since the opening of the Session the hon. gentleman had twice gone into the territory of Manitoba. He (Mr. Landry) went no further than Rimouski. Now, if the astonishment of the hon. member was in proportion to the distance travelled, this House would conceive how much the the hon. member must be surprised at his own excursions in the far off Province of Manitoba. The hon. member had shown some temper in assuring the House that he (Mr. Landry) did not know a single word of the question he had brought up. That might be true, but he wished to know why motions like the one now before the House were made, if it was not to obtain, on certain questions, the information that might be wanting, and over which certain persons might have some reason to throw a veil of mystery and forgetfulness. The question of the conveyance during the late elections, on the Intercolonial, in the county of Rimouski, of a certain number of agents and partisans of the ministerial candidate, at the expense of the public, must have some light thrown upon it. Corruption had been practised in the county of Rimouski on a vast scale. Some days before nomination day, several hundred electors had been called to work on the Intercolonial; contracts had been given out, and all possible influence brought to ar on the electors. When nomination day came, it became necessary to assemble in an imposing body these workmen who were scrupulously earning the people's money and the right to vote for the candidate of the Government that was paying them so well. The Intercolonial was placed at their disposal, and, without paying a single cent, these happy electors were enabled to go to the chef lieu and applaud the words of the ministerial candidate. The Intercolonial was again made use of by them to return to their work, and to go to the polls on voting day. The agents of the railway had, naturally enough, demanded the payment of these fares, but it was an after-thought that came to them when the result of the 17th of September had become known to them, and perhaps, also, to the ministerial candidate. The money, it would seem, had not yet been paid, and delay had been asked for. It was the correspondence exchanged upon this interesting subject that he wanted brought down. This correspondence would make known to the House how the Rimouski election had been carried. The other day the hon. member had endeavoured to be cruel by trying to make the House understand that he was perfectly qualified to set, not only in the House of Commons, but also in the Quebec Parliament. This shaft thrown at him (Mr. Landry) by his hon. friend had been lost on the way, and, before reaching him, had wounded one of the intimate friends of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset). If the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dumont) would only speak, he would admit that he had been the first to feel the allusion of the hon. member for Rimouski. He might add that the latter was no more qualified than any one else to sit in the Quebec Parliament, for the excellent reason that there was no "Quebec Parliament." Let the hon. gentleman refer to the British North America Act, and he would perceive that what they had in Quebec was not a Parliament but a Legislature. When he (Mr. Landry) came forward as a candidate in Montmagny, he had proclaimed principles that he was not disposed to disown after the lapse of a few weeks as the hon. member for Rimouski had done. In 1872, when the hon. member first entered public life, he had made public declarations, and, whilst he was canvassing against his now bosom friend, the Hon. Alex. Chauveau, he wrote against his opponent, against the Intercolonial, against the seigneurs, against all those who exercised against him their baneful influence. He had been defeated in 1872, being thus hindered from sitting in what he was pleased to call "The Parliament of Quebec." But, whilst weeping over his defeat, he had kept on writing, and L'Evenement of the 17th May, 1872, contained the following words from the hon. member's pen:—

"I admit that, if the principles that I profess were not with me sincere convictions, I could find, in the conduct of these journals and of certain persons, more than one cause to turn my back upon the Conservative party. But my principles are not mere fancies or calculations, nor objects of traffic. Being a sincere Conservative, I know how to distinguish between principles and men, as I distinguish between an honest application of these principles and abuses. This sincerity which still binds me to the Conservative party, my opponents had the courage and the skill to turn against me during the struggle."

Further on, the hon. member added:

"I had many opponents who were unjust and dishonest. I can congratulate myself upon having met with many devoted and generous friends. It is a great pleasure for me now to be able to convey to them publicly my heartfelt thanks. I had not gold, nor the hope of employment, nor the expectation of contracts on the Intercolonial wherewith to entice them. They have stood firm against intrigues and pressure, and it gratifies me to bear testimony to the nobleness of their feelings, and to the firmness of their characters."

That was enough to show that the hon. member for Rimouski should not throw stones at his neighbour's house. The production of the papers that were asked for would prove still more. The hon. member for Rimouski, however, had been well warned. His chief, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who was now the leader of the Opposition, had said, in 1874, a few days before the general elections, in an address to his electors, which had been spread all over the country and which was published in L'Evenement of the 12th January, 1874:

"We will endeavour to raise the standard of public morality that our opponents have spared nothing to lower, and to conduct the business of the country according to principles that honest people can approve, and in accordance with practices that can brave the light of day."

And, that none of his friends might plead ignorance as an excuse, he gave them, in conclusion, this paternal advice:

"But we must bear in mind that these laws, as all others, will owe their efficacy to the spirit in which they are accepted and applied by the people in general, and I trust that the friends of the Government will, during this election, give the example of a scrupulous observance of the law, and, at the same time, of a firm repression of its violation by others."

If the House granted his motion, hon. members would be in possession of the proof that, in the county of Rimouski, no heed had been given to this solemn warning, and that, if the hon. member for Rimouski now occupied a seat on this floor, it was because he had been spared the application of the law.

Mr. Fiset said that he did not know what object the hon. member (Mr. Landry) had now in view. Let him state precisely his point; let the hon. gentleman accuse him (Mr. Fiset) formally of a single act of corruption and then he could answer him. When the House saw the papers, it would see whether it was he who had been guilty of corrupt practices during the late elections or another candidate. If he had been guilty of corruption, his election ought to have been contested; but no one had dared undertake this task. When the hon. member (Mr. Landry) stated precisely in what he (Mr. Fiset) had been guilty of corruption, he would be able to answer him; but he had nothing to reply to all that the hon. member had just said.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he did not know whether the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) misunderstood, or had not wished to understand, what his hon. friend the member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) had said; but, to the whole House, the affair was quite incomprehensible. The hon. member for Montmagny had shown very plainly, by the motion that he had made, that he wished to obtain certain papers, and by these papers he claimed to be able to establish that, during the late election, friends of the hon. member for Rimouski had been conveyed over the Intercolonial on nomination day at the expense of the public, and that the accounts incurred by the hon. member for Rimouski and a member of his committee amounted to three hundred and some odd dollars, and that this sum had not been refunded to the Government.

Mr. GEOFFRION said he thought this motion should have been drawn up so as to specify what persons received money and for what purpose it was received.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR ENGINEERS' REPORTS.

Mr. HACKETT moved for copies of engineers' plans, specifications and reports, relating to the improvement of Cascumpec Harbour; together with copies of petitions and all correspondence connected therewith. He said that many propositions had been made for the prosecution of this work, but nothing practical had yet been accomplished. In 1874, a survey was made and a report upon the subject submitted to Parliament, and it was with a view to get these papers that he made this motion. This harbour was of the highest importance to the people in that section of the country. Owing to the want of proper harbour accommodation, many disasters had resulted during the past two years. Many vessels had been wrecked and many lives lost. Twenty or thirty years ago, the depth of water at the bar was about twenty feet; now, in consequence of the sand filling in, it was not more than twelve feet deep at the bar. This was a serious drawback, and he hoped the Government would do what they could to improve the navigation of the harbour.

Mr. YEO, in seconding the motion, said there was no doubt that the improvement of this harbour, the only one on that side of the land, was greatly needed. Last Session they had a promise from the late Government, and he thought the present Government could not very well avoid giving them a grant. A small grant of from $20,000 to $30,000 would be sufficient. Serious losses to shipping and life had resulted on more than one occasion, and a grant by the Government would prove a great boon to that part of the country.

MAIL SERVICE ON VANCOUVER ISLAND.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for copies of all papers relating to a certain mail contract let on the east coast of Vancouver Island, British Columbia, between Comox and Victoria, B. C., once per week, and a service of twice a week between Nanaimo and Victoria, with reasons why the said service was not continued as per contract. He said the performance of this duty devolved upon him, owing to the manner in which this matter was treated by the late Government and the late Postmaster-General. There was a contract entered into for carrying the mails from Nanaimo twice a week. The contract was let to a bogus American contractor who sailed a foreign vessel under our flag at a price that it could not be performed for. The people along the coast, whom he had the honour to represent, suffered from the fraud, as it now took them two weeks to come and get back from Comox to their farms, and cost them more than the price of a cow, which took them years of care to raise. The expense of carrying the mail once a week would only be something like $1,000 a year more than the trick perpetrated on the Government of the day, and they felt very much aggrieved at the way in which the contract was afterwards handled. The people now, in place of having a weekly mail from Comox to Victoria, had only a fortnightly service, which was very inconvenient to the farming community. He regarded it as his bounden duty to call for the papers in connection with this matter, so as to show more plainly to the Government the great injustice that had been done to this part of British Columbia in the way of carrying the mails.

REPLY TO THE ADDRESS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

“Accept my thanks for the loyal Address you have voted in answer to the Speech with which I opened the Session, and I receive with satisfaction your assurance that your earnest and careful attention will be given to the important measures which are to be submitted for your consideration.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, February 28th, 1879.”

MOUNTED POLICE FORCE ACT'S AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced a Bill (No. 13) To amend, and consolidate as amended, the Acts relating to the Mounted Police Force. He said that some of the provisions of the Bill were designed to extend the period of service from three to five years. It had been found, by the experience of the commanding officer, Col. McLeod, that three years was too short, for it took that time for a man to become a thorough cavalry soldier, and two more to make him an efficient policeman. Some offices were to be abolished, including the paymaster's and quartermaster's. There was no reason why they should not leave to the several officers the duty of the payment of their men. The Bill also contained a provision empowering the Government, in cases of pressing exigency, to increase the force to 500 men, which would be done only in consequence of an exceptional state of affairs in the North-West, such as a chance of disturbance among the aborigines, either from the intrusion of a foreign element, or some other element of disturbance. The force could be reduced to the original 300 the moment the exigency was passed; and it was desirable to be able to exercise such power without the calling of Parliament. There were other amendments which experience showed to be necessary in the working of the Bill, one intended to encourage the several detachments to raise their own forage and subsistence from the land, by cultivation, at the different stations. The force was to be kept always full up to 300, and there were to be supernumeraries, not exceeding ten. The experience of the American force showed the importance of a certain number of half-breeds or Indians, accustomed to the ways and manners of the different Indian tribes, acquainted with their language and movements, to act as scouts and deal with the Indians. The Government desired the aid of such a force which, moving among the different tribes, could learn their feelings, prejudices and complaints. A small fire, by being early dealt with, could be easily extinguished. One clause provided for the application of the fund, obtained by fines imposed upon offending members of the force, to the formation of libraries and recreation grounds. There were several other useful clauses in the Bill, which was a consolidation of the two Acts affecting the force.

Bill read the first time.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

MOTION TO RATIFY CONTRACT.

MR. BOWELL moved :

"That this House do approve of the contract for the reporting, printing, binding and translation of the debates of this House during the present Session, which has been laid upon the table of this House."

He said the notice asking for tenders, together with the contract entered into for the reporting, translating, binding and printing of the debates, for the present Session, were laid on the table of the House some days ago; the members, therefore, had had time to thoroughly examine them. It would be remembered that, at the last Session of Parliament, $15,000 was included in the Estimates for this service, and was passed by the House without opposition, thereby affirming the principle of continuing the official report of the debates in Parliament. Believing it to be the wish and desire of the House to continue those reports, the Government had taken upon itself the responsibility of asking for tenders for the work this Session, and entered into a contract, subject to the approval of the House. Tenders were sent in for the whole work, as follows :—

W. Gibbens.....	$11,128 73
J. C. Boyce.....	13,425 00
T. J. Richardson.....	11,841 40
A. & G. C. Holland.....	13,346 40
L. Belanger & Co.....	13,354 40
W. Gibbens.....	13,500 00
Jas. Carruthers.....	14,200 00
T. J. Richardson.....	15,000 00

Mr. Gibbens, before the contract was awarded, withdrew, by letter, his tender, leaving Mr. T. J. Richardson's the next lowest tender for the whole service, namely $11,841, being some $1,500 lower than the next tender. He (Mr. Bowell) might state that, by taking four separate tenders, one for reporting, one for printing, one for translating, and one for binding, respectively, the combined or aggregate amount would have been somewhat lower than that accepted. But, considering the difficulties that arose through having the services performed by three or four different persons, in the past, it was thought best, in the interest of the service and of the House, that the contract should be given to one responsible person, whose tender was much less than the total amount paid for the work during the past Sessions. Under those circumstances the Government decided to award the contract to Mr. Richardson for $11,841.40, exacting from him, in addition to the 20 per cent. retained of the money earned, sureties to the amount of $2,000 for the proper performance of the work.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he thought it was due to the House, before any action was taken for the official reporting of the debates, that it should have been consulted. This matter has always been held to be one of purely domestic economy—one in which the Government, as a Government, would in no case interfere — one beyond the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of Internal Economy, with which the House alone was considered competent to deal. His hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) called attention to the fact that, last Session, a certain appropriation was made for the reporting and publishing of the Official

Debates ; but he forgot to tell the House that, although an appropriation was made, it positively refused to expend one dollar for the purpose for which it was voted ; and, if he wished to find, in the procedure of the House, a precedent to direct the action of the Government in this matter, he could have readily done so. In the Session of 1874, in a report made by Mr. Young, then Chairman of the Select Committee on the reporting of the debates, it was agreed they should, in 1875, begin the publication of the official debates ; but in the report of that Committee it was distinctly stipulated that the Commissioners would be authorised to make engagements, during the recess, with proper reporters, who should, under the control of the House, issue reports of its debates. A contract was made with Mr. Burgess, which, at the close of the Session of 1875, was extended by the authority of the House. But, at the close of the Session of 1876, the House failed to authorise the Committee further to extend the contract. Now, in this case, the money was voted ; yet, the House having failed to ratify the extension of the contract, neither the Government nor the Commissioners thought it within their jurisdiction to extend the contract, or enter into a fresh one. He believed that to be the true course of procedure. He thought the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bowell) had stepped a great way out of his proper jurisdiction in taking into his own hands, or under his own control, a matter of the character that this House always regarded as belonging to its domestic economy. Under the course the Government adopted, tenders were called for in the name of Commissioners that did not exist ; and the plans and specifications were to be approved by them. The House would see, therefore, that the Government violated all law ; that their course was irregular and unprecedented ; otherwise they would not ask the House to approve of it, and condone it or indemnify them for the course adopted. He thought the House in this matter should have been consulted. The acts of the Government were an infringement on the rights of every member. He regarded the reporters on the floor of the House as strangers, not there with authority from the House. The Government had really passed over four lower tenders than that finally accepted. The lowest for the reporting and publishing of the debates was Mr. Bradley's, amounting to $9,658 ; the next was from Mr. Lumsden, at $9,758 ; the next came from Mr. Gibbens, $10,385 ; that from Mr. Boyce, $10,825 ; Mr. Richardson's was $11,095, not including paper.

MR. BOWELL: The others did not include paper.

MR. ROSS: No.

MR. BOWELL: Why did the hon. gentleman not say so before ?

MR. ROSS said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) thought he had made a point as to paper, but he (Mr. Ross) had distinctly mentioned "Not including paper." So there was a difference of $1,400 between the tender accepted and the lowest. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bowell) could not claim that Mr. Bradley's was rejected on the ground of incapacity or incompetence, as he belonged to the Hansard Staff in the last and previous Sessions. The second lowest, from Mr. Lumsden, who was on the official staff four years, was that of a competent man likewise. He (Mr. Ross) was not objecting to the award on the ground of Mr. Richardson's incompetency. All agreed he was a capable and efficient reporter ; but he (Mr. Ross) had yet failed to find any satisfactory reason why four tenders, lower than his, two of them from parties equally well qualified, should have been passed by in favour of Mr. Richardson's. His hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) stated that Mr. Richardson's contract included everything, the others covering only the reporting. Well, according to the documents laid before the House, that statement was correct, and he agreed, to a certain extent, with the remark of that hon. gentleman that it was more convenient to deal with one than a number of contractors. But it was not shown that the acceptance of the lowest tenders in this case would have inconvenienced the House. MacLean, Roger & Co., whose tender for the printing was lowest, had discharged their duties as public printers with efficiency ; and it was known that Mr. Boyce, who was, he thought, a binder, was well qualified for his work, and that all the parties who proposed for any part of the work were known to be efficient, and capable for their respective duties. So he (Mr. Ross) failed to see why his hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) who had assumed to act for the whole House, in a matter which it formerly disposed of itself, should ask them to assent to this contract which exhibited such gross irregularities. Here they had action without the consent of the House, such as was considered grossly wrong when hon. gentlemen opposite sat on the left of the Speaker. But another question existed above and beyond the change of action he had referred to, which this House had not been asked to express an opinion upon, namely, whether they should have any official reports of their debates at all or not. He thought, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works said when discussing this matter last Session, and as was said by the leader of the Government on the same occasion, that it was due to the coming Parliament that it should be consulted in regard to this matter. They were in this matter entailing considerable expense upon the country, and evidently, from the policy of the Government, they were desirous of exercising due economy in the management of the country's affairs. The cost of the official debates in 1875 exceeded $12,000; in 1876, it exceeded $11,000; in 1877, it amounted to $15,356, and in 1878 the cost was $18,963, or, in all, nearly $60,000 had been expended during the past four years on the official reporting of the debates of the House. He thought that, before the Government entered into a contract for reporting the debates, entailing the expenditure of so large an amount of money, the approval of the House should be secured. The matter could have been very easily arranged in precisely the same way as it was disposed of by the late Government in the Session of 1877, and they would not now have to face the irregularities of having their approval of a contract asked after it had been entered into by a new Government acting for a Committee of the House, and of passing over the lowest tender. He merely called the attention of the House to these facts, that they might distinctly understand on what basis the official reports of the House were going to be continued, whether in the event of a discontinuance of the contract, at the close of the Session, the Government was going to assume to continue that contract another Session of their own option, or whether the contracts were to be laid systematically before the House, or the House asked to approve of them after they had been made. These were points upon which they had a right to an expression of opinion, not only from the House, but from the Government. While he was not insisting on a discontinuance of the official reports, he would insist on the matter being regularly proceeded with, on the lowest tender being accepted if the party so tendering was competent, and he must insist on the matter being left, as heretofore, entirely in the hands and in the management of the House.

MR. HOLTON said an important point in respect to this matter was the vote of the House last Session, which in effect declared the expediency of discontinuing the system of official reports altogether. His hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell) had referred to the fact that an appropriation had been made for this purpose. There was no doubt of that. It was brought down by the late Government in their Estimates, and passed by the House before the consideration of the question of the continuance of these reports had been brought formally before the House, as was done in the report of the Committee to supervise the debates. The House objected to that report by a majority of 18—51 to 69,—leaving it to the new House to determine upon the policy of continuing the system of official reports. He thought, therefore, without prejudging the question as to the views of the present House on the subject generally, that they might fairly urge that that question ought to have been submitted to the House before any contracts were entered into, under the authority of the vote of supply which the subsequent action of the House superseded by declaring that, in their opinion, it was inexpedient to continue these reports.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was quite true that this matter was under the control of the House. If they did not desire to have their speeches reported, all hon. members had to do was to say so, and their speeches would not be reported at the public expense. Speaking for himself and for his colleagues, he would say they were a unit on this matter. They believed it in the interest of the country, of the Government, and of the Opposition, that the debates should be fully reported, and that everything that was transacted in Parliament should be open as the day. They were of opinion that the reporting of their debates should not be left to partisan newspapers, to publish such portions of the reports as they thought expedient, in extenso or in part. They knew, looking at the past, what had been the result of leaving this matter to partisan newspapers. Each partisan paper published in full, and in a most flattering way, the speeches of those gentlemen who were of the same political opinions as that particular newspaper, and they slurred over the statements, arguments and debates on the other side of the question. Consequently, people throughout the country, in order to know what actually was proceeding in Parliament, were obliged to take not only papers of the same political stripe as themselves, but to subscribe to, and keep up opposition newspapers. He did not think that was satisfactory to the country. In England, although Hansard there had been started by voluntary subscription, the matter was at present before the British Parliament, and he thought that the result of their action would be that there would be a contribution to keep up the official report of the debates. They knew that the newspapers in England formerly gave the debates in Parliament in extenso, but of late years they had found that it did not pay. They found it was more profitable to give telegraphic and other information rather than Parliamentary reports, and the debates now published in the Times were infinitely more perfunctory, and not so full or so accurate as they were fifty years ago. He thought the people of the country should have an opportunity of reading the debates in full, and it was for the House to say whether they agreed with that opinion or not. If they did not agree, all they had to do was to reject the motion of his hon. friend (Mr.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Bowell). The reason the four members of the Government who assisted the Speaker as a Committee of Internal Management took upon themselves the responsibility of making this provisional contract—and it was not a contract until it was sanctioned by the House—was because, as every one knew, a reporting staff could not be got together in one day. It was a matter that had to be carefully prepared. Had it been left to the House, half the Session would have expired before the necessary arrangements could have been completed, and an efficient staff selected. If the Government had erred, it was for the purpose of enabling this Parliament to have its debates reported without any delay. He believed the House would sanction the course the Government had taken. With respect to the point raised by the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) about the tenders, he would leave that in the hands of the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell), who understood the question much better than he (Sir John A. Macdonald) did, and would be able to give full explanations to the satisfaction of even his hon. friend from West Middlesex.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had not answered the point raised by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), namely, that the last expression of Parliament, ten days before the prorogation, was hostile to this action, and that the hon. gentleman had chosen to invite tenders and make a selection in the face of the parliamentary declaration that it was not advisable that that should be done. Some years ago, a temporary provision was made and submitted to Parliament the very first day it met, in anticipation of the House adopting the report of the Committee. That could have been done this time, and then it would have been left in the hands of Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was told that the vote in question was taken at the end of the Session, in the absence of 85 members of the House. The hon. gentleman said that there was a vote of Parliament. There was an expression of an expiring Parliament, that they did not want the debates of a future Parliament reported, and this he did not think should carry with it any extraordinary degree of weight. The contract had not been made. It was merely a provisional contract, and would not be a contract until it was confirmed by the House. The Government took the responsibility, and, in doing so, he did not think they offered a very great insult to the House, or committed so very violent a breach of the privileges of the House. He supposed the individual members of the Government would pay Mr. Richardson out of their own pockets, or appeal to their faithful friends to aid them in doing so, if Parliament should refuse the vote. It was quite true that, at the fag end of a moribund Parliament—to use the favourite expression of his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton);—there was a vote saying that there should be an exclusion of light for the future; but he thought the country, which had very substantially changed the complexion of Parliament, and had sent other men to represent it who were not afraid of the light, was desirous of having the speeches made in Parliament spread before them, and the conduct of their representatives scrutinised.

Mr. HOLTON said he admitted that the vote of the last House did not bind this House; but what he contended was that the sense of this new House, fresh from the people, should have been taken before the Government took the initiative. The hon. gentlemen, when they entered into this contract, had not become members of the House—they had not made their appearance in the Chamber, nor had they taken the oath of office. They did it in their capacity as members of the Executive Government. He had no doubt that the hon. gentlemen would be supported by the House in this matter, but they were not in a position to assume the initiative.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if there was not a vote of a sum of money for this purpose by the late Government.

Mr. HOLTON: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Supply Bill was adopted and passed after the discussion in the House in reference to the report. The last act of Parliament was the sanction by both Houses of the vote for this purpose, and that after the expression against the continuance of the official reports.

Mr. HOLTON said that the vote against the expediency of continuing these reports was brought up after the vote of supply had been taken. Nobody thought of amending the Supply Bill, and he maintained that, in view of the last expression of opinion on the part of the House, no contract should have been made until the sense of the new House had been taken.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. the leader of the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) had not so high a regard for a moribund Parliament as he had at one time, or as his colleague the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tupper) had on a very recent occasion. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that the acts of a moribund Parliament were not as binding on the Government as the acts of a Parliament newly from the people; but, when he carried through the scheme of Confederation, he took an entirely different view of the subject. The people were not consulted, and care was taken that they should not be left in a position that they could repudiate what had been done by a moribund Legislature. The hon. gentleman attached importance to this principle in inverse ratio to the importance of the subject-matter in the public estimation. He (Mr. Mills) had changed his opinion on this subject. When it was first proposed to Parliament, he supported it, because he considered that the representatives of the people in Parliament ought not to be dependent upon the goodwill of the various newspapers in the country for reports of the debates. He felt then that there was a great deal of force in the views which the hon. gentleman had to-day repeated with regard to newspaper reports, that newspapers friendly to a particular party reported what members of that party said on the subjects which came before this House very fully, while the members of the opposite party were not reported at all, or, if at all, very briefly or inaccurately reported. Further, that the newspapers away from the Capital received their reports mostly by telegraph, for publication the next morning. The later in the evening the discussion took place, the more were the reports abridged, and, as the evening advanced, very important discussions were scarcely reported at all. These were the mischiefs which he had hoped to see overcome. They had had three or four years' trial of parliamentary reporting, and, in his opinion, it had proved very unsatisfactory. Scarcely two pages of the official reports could be examined in which gross mistakes would not be found. He had hoped, when the proposition was first made, that those reports would reach the public at an early date; that, when a debate took place, the official report would appear on the morrow, to be available to the various newspapers in the country. That expectation had not been realised—they were still dependent upon the reports of the metropolitan dailies. The official reports appeared two or three weeks after the debates took place; and so far as being available for newspaper purposes was concerned, they had been an entire failure. The Premier had stated it was necessary to have a report free from partisan bias. He (Mr. Mills) had been told that certain newspapers had made arrangements with the official reporters of the House to be furnished with the official reports of the debates. He asked was it not obvious that the reports, to some extent, would have to be suited to the exigencies of the journals requiring the official reports? Either reports should be furnished indiscriminately to all the newspapers, or to none at all. The official reporters, who were, or were about to become, the paid officers of this House,—the parties who entered into a contract, under the sanction of this House, for the purpose of reporting and publishing the debates,—had no right to enter into a contract for the purpose of selling the fruits of their labours to the various newspapers in the country. That had been done, and it was, therefore, not likely that the official reports would be free from partisan bias. The duties of the reporters to the House and to the newspapers were incompatible. Past experience proved that these reports were not to be relied upon. Sometimes the reporter failed to hear or to correctly apprehend the speaker. Some parties were reported in the first, and some in the third person. In some cases, every extract, whether important or unimportant, appeared in the report; and in other cases the reports were meagre, and a simple reference to extracts or quotations appeared. The hon. gentleman had said that this contract was not binding on the House; that it could be annulled by the House, if it chose. But the Government had made the contract, and had not left it to a Committee of the House. It was quite clear the House must accept the arrangement as made by the Government, or dispense with the reporting of the debates altogether.

Mr. ANGLIN said there was still a point not alluded to which should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. This matter, as well as all cognate matters, should have been brought under the consideration of the House as soon as possible after it met; immediately after the Address had been disposed of, or, possibly, even before the Address was taken into consideration. Nevertheless, a whole fortnight had been allowed to elapse before this House had been asked to pass judgment on the contract. This showed a very great want of respect to the House, though the majority of its members might approve of what the hon. gentleman had done, might affirm that it was proper on the part of the hon. mover of this resolution to allow it to lie on the paper for days, because he chose to attend to a matter in which the Government felt more interest. The Government having chosen to disregard the distinct declaration of the House at the close of last Session that it was not expedient to make any provision for the official reporting of the debates, should, at least, have submitted their action for the approval of the House at the very earliest moment possible. It would have been almost as well to have waited until the end of the Session, and then asked the House to ratify what had been done, as to wait until more than a fortnight had elapsed.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not think the House would come to the conclusion, after this discussion, that there had been any want of respect to the last or the present House of Commons. He did not at all agree with the hon. member for Bothwell, who said that he had been in favour of having the debates reported, but had changed his opinion. He (Mr. Tupper) had come to a very different conclusion. Whatever doubts he might have had as to the advisability of having an official printed report of the debates had certainly been removed by the result of the past. The fact that the Sessions of this Parliament were held in a city where the resources of the press were not so great as in the larger cities of the Dominion rendered it almost indispensable to have an official report of the debates, if the country were to be furnished with a fair and full statement of what took place. The press in the larger cities, in Montreal and Toronto for instance, had to be furnished with reports by telegraph in order that they should be presented promptly to their readers; and it had been found as the result of this, as had been stated by the leader of the Government, that the country had been treated to ex-parte reports of the discussions of the House. In view of this fact, a large majority of the members on both sides had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to have an impartial and official report of the debates. All the efforts made by hon. gentlemen who were opposed to having a full, fair and impartial report of the debates against the Hansard, made in the presence of a full House, during the late Parliament, had failed, and only at the close of the Session, when the House was denuded of a large body of its members, did their efforts succeed. The system was continued down to the last moment. The Government brought down at the last Session of Parliament, a vote of $15,000 to provide for the official reports, and obtained the assent of the House to that vote at the last moment, after the discussions had taken place; after this effort had been made on the part of hon. gentlemen at the close of the Session, when eighty-five members had gone to their homes; to undo, in their absence, the policy the entire House had sustained whenever presented. As far as this Government was concerned, it had evidence that the independent sentiment of the large majority of the whole Parliament of this Dominion was in favour of having an official report of the debates. The question then arose, how was that to be carried out? Every one knew it would be utterly impossible to secure an efficient report if it was left to the House to take up the question, after the gentlemen, whose services might be obtained, were employed elsewhere. The Government, therefore, knowing this system had become a settled policy, made the arrangements to carry it out, in advance. It was not in the interest of any particular political party, but in the interests of the whole country, of all who wished that a sound and healthy sentiment should be brought to bear on the action of this House, that there should be some means taken to which all parties could confidently appeal as showing what had taken place within this Parliament. The question now was whether they should have this official report or not. In the contract made was the condition "subject to the approval of the House." The hon. member for Bothwell had intimated that the reports would be partisan, that the Government had made a contract with parties who were susceptible to political influence, and who had made arrangements to furnish papers with a portion of the debates. The Government had entered into a contract with Mr. Richardson, the gentleman who had been placed at the head of that service by the hon. gentlemen opposite when in power. No other gentleman had ever attempted to impugn the fairness and impartiality with which Mr. Richardson had discharged his duties, and there was no reason to insinuate for a single moment that any attempt had been made to obtain any other than the most fair and impartial report possible. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had done Mr. Richardson the justice to say that he had no reason to doubt the impartiality with which he had discharged his duties, and in saying this had done him but simple justice. He (Mr. Tupper) had never regarded Mr. Richardson as a political friend, but had always considered him as a gentleman who had fulfilled his duties conscientiously and with the utmost courtesy to every member. As to the question of cost, what was the fact? The late Government had brought down an amount of $15,000, and the expenditure during the past year was $18,000; yet hon. gentlemen would appear to complain when the contract laid on the table reduced the expenditure to $11,000, and provided for more efficient and prompt service.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): But the size is limited to 1,500 pages.

MR. TUPPER said a thousand pages could be taken from the last volume without detracting from its value. The statement that there were lower tenders passed over was hardly, he thought, sustained by the fact. The tender accepted was really the lowest one for the whole service, and every person knew—and no one better than the hon. member for Middlesex—the great advantage of having one man responsible instead of two or three; it was better that the House should deal with some person who had the whole work in his hands, and who was responsible to the House, under his contract, for the efficient performance of the duty. He trusted that the contract would receive the support of gentlemen on both sides of the House, as it had always done before. He believed that, whatever difference of opinion might have existed between a large number of gentlemen on both sides of the House, and whatever views might have been entertained on the subject, they all agreed in the importance of their statements in this House being correctly given to the country through the means of an official report of the debates.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that last year he was one of those who thought that there should be some discussion of the question of the continuance of the system of reporting as it existed. He was not quite convinced that a record of the debates of Parliament would be useful to the House. He had come to the conclusion that there were a great many speeches made in the House that might be dispensed with. He had no doubt that it was highly important to Parliament that an intelligent record of the discussion of public affairs should in some way be kept, so that the public should have an opportunity of seeing the motives by which they were influenced; but he did not at all believe in three-hour speeches, and the Hansard had encouraged three-hour speeches. He did not say that the man who spoke for three hours was a great orator, and posterity could get on very well if they were not obliged to read these speeches. Owing to the Hansard, speech after speech which public interest did not require had been delivered at a great tedious, and expensive length. Members should have been permitted to discuss this question freely before a Committee; but the Government had forced the House to support them. Did any one mean to say that this was an open question, or that gentlemen sent here to vote for the Government were permitted to give an independent vote? Lengthy speeches, owing to the Hansard, had become a nuisance, but the Government had deliberately interfered, and brought down a motion which they knew their friends would sustain, whether these hon. gentlemen believed the action of the Government was right or wrong. The House was now compelled to laboriously listen to speeches which would never be delivered were there no Hansard.

MR. CASEY said that he was in favour of official reporting as a general principle. There was need for some official record. The objections raised were not so much to official reporting, as to the manner in which it was conducted. He was prepared to agree that the reporting was in many ways defective, owing, perhaps, in great measure, to the carelessness of the parties interested, who did not take the trouble to revise their speeches. But the question now was not on the desirability of an official report. It had been put most clearly by his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton). It was not a question as to whether official reporting was desirable, or whether the present system was desirable; but whether the Government had the right to let the contract without submitting it to the House. He thought that the reason given by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tupper) for the action of the Government, that it was impossible to take up the question after the House had met, was a very peculiar one. He must remember that a few Sessions ago the House found itself in the same position as it did this year. The House met in a new Session, without any definite arrangements having been previously made. Some preliminary arrangements were made, as his hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated, before the opening of Parliament; but the initiative on that occasion was taken by the hon. gentleman, the then Premier, on the second day of the meeting of the House, by moving for a Committee, and, if he recollects aright, it was only about a week after the opening before the reporting of the debates was in full working order. He believed they had very satisfactory reporting that Session. The hon. the leader of the Government had stated that the Government were anxious to have light, and that the party which had gone out of power were adverse to light. They would imagine, from the zeal he had shown in providing for the diffusion of their light by official reports, that something of immense importance was going to be done as soon as the House met. They would really think that the great National Policy was going to be introduced at once. He thought that they would find, by the experience of the past two weeks, that the country would lose no more by cutting off the reports for the first two weeks of the Session, than by the cutting out of one thousand pages of the Hansard, referred to by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tupper). He believed that official reporting could have been organised at an early period of the Session, even if no previous provision had been made for the reporting of the debates; that even if this had been possible the loss to the public would not have been great, and that, even had it been impossible to have official debates at all this Session, the loss would have been less than that caused by the infringement of the privileges of the House which Ministers had committed.

MR. TUPPER.

Mr. OUIMET said it was very important that the electors should know what their representatives said in the House, so that they might be able to judge whether they fulfilled their engagements contracted after the elections were over. It was therefore important that speeches delivered here should be correctly reported. But if it was important for the public to know what took place in the House, it must also be borne in mind that there were two large portions of the population, who spoke different languages, but who possessed equal rights. It must be borne in mind that the French-speaking public had the same right to know what occurred in this House, to know it immediately and correctly, as the English-speaking public. It must be borne in mind that those members of the House who represented at least a third of the population of the Dominion had a right to receive the Hansard at a proper and convenient time, in order to take cognisance thereof. But, by referring to the past, it would be seen that the French portion of the population had two great and important complaints to make with regard to the Hansard. The first was that the translation of the Hansard had always been badly done; so much so that, when a member came to read what he had said or to read in French a speech delivered in that language, he almost always failed to recognise his own words, and it was impossible to understand what had been said. It must not be forgotten either, that heretofore there had been no French reporter in the House, and that the members who thought fit to speak in French, their mother-tongue, would not be reported otherwise than in English. During the preceding Session, the translation of the Hansard had never been ready until a fortnight or three weeks after the speeches had been printed and distributed in English. He believed that these complaints were well grounded, and, if he thought that the new Committee, which would be appointed to superintend the printing and translation of the Hansard, would not take these complaints into consideration, he would certainly be one of those who would vote against the expenditure of $10,000 or $15,000 for a report that would be useless, or nearly so, for a third of the population of the Dominion and for a third of the members of the House. He hoped that this year neither the members of the House nor the public would have occasion to reiterate these complaints. He might add that, being assured that this wrong would be righted, and that justice would be done to himself and to all the French members, and to the French-speaking public, he was in favour of the official reporting of the debates. As to the other question, he believed that the Government was not so very much to blame for having made provision for a report from the beginning of the Session. He believed, on the contrary, that the Government, in doing so, had given a conclusive answer to those opposition papers that claimed that the present Administration would not fulfil the promises they had given to the electors. It seemed to him that the Government had shown that they had no objection to having all that was said in Parliament by hon. Ministers placed before the public; and the public would see that the members and the friends of the Government had been sincere in the promises they had given to their constituents. The public would be convinced that these members had acted in good faith, and that they were now disposed to allow the public to compare their former professions made before the elections with the professions they might make in this House when called upon to give their support to Sir John A. Macdonald's Administration.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that he entirely agreed with the hon. member who had just sat down, as to the reporting of the debates in French. Certainly during the last Session, and during the whole of the last Parliament, members had to complain bitterly and often of the manner in which the debates were reported in French, and of the delays that always occurred in transmitting the reports to the House. Members were sometimes more than a month waiting for the report of a discussion. Consequently these reports were merely a book of reference for the future, but could be of no utility during the Session, and the French members could only refer to the English reports. For several of them this was no easy matter. He must however state to his hon. friend the member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) that, in the provisional contract that had been entered into, and that the House was called upon to ratify, it had been provided that the French speeches should be reported by French reporters in the language in which they were delivered. Consequently, the French-speaking members would have the same advantages as the English-speaking members. As to the translation, it had also been provided with the contractor that it should be done by special translators, by capable men acquainted with the political questions of the day, and who would not make hon. members say that which they had not said.

Mr. OUMET asked if the translation would be given from day to day.

Mr. OUMET.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that the translation might be delayed a day or two, but the hon. member would himself see that it would not be often behind-hand. Members would certainly have a right to complain if the debates were delayed a fortnight, as they were during the last Session, and he was convinced that the Committee would not fail to see that the contractor was kept strictly to his contract. As to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and some other hon. members who had expressed their opinion as to the necessity of having an official report of the debates of the House, he readily understood that they had changed their mind. They had often had placed before their eyes, during the late election, those two portly volumes that had certainly reduced the number of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and now they would not have this system continued, because it had proved fatal to them. This official report was absolutely necessary, not only in the interest of the people now, but in the interest of future generations. It was well that it should be known what members had said in times gone by. The reports given by the newspapers were neither complete enough nor reliable enough. To-day, when they wished to refer to the debates of former Legislative Assemblies, they had no means of doing so. The utterances of the greatest speakers of that period had not been reported. They had but a shadow, a mere tradition, of what such or such a speaker of former days had said, and one might seek in vain for these speeches in the reports of the newspapers. Nothing was left. By looking into the history of this country, it would be seen that we had but a sample, as it were, of what our great orators had said. The question was not only to know what these men had thought, but also what had been the good and sound reasons for their acting in such or such a manner. With the official report, as they now had it, there was no doubt that they were in a far better position, for the present and for the future; and he would add that the report now published by the contractor seemed to be reliable. He had had occasion, yesterday, to read over some remarks that he had made during the day, and the report had been placed before him about three hours after the remarks had been made. And he admitted that the report was a very good one, considering how reports were generally made here, especially when members spoke without paying any attention to the reporters, and without even knowing whether they were present. Often, in the midst of a debate, members would forget that there was some one taking down their words, and would, therefore, speak too quickly for the reporters. He trusted that the remarks that he had just made would meet the objections raised by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), and that he would not fail to support the motion which had just been submitted by his hon. friend the Minister of Customs.

MR. SPRULE said he believed that, if an expression of opinion on this question was asked for from the young members of this House, a very large majority of them would be inclined to support the motion of the hon. the Minister of Customs. Every young member in this House had felt the benefits accruing from the Hausard reports. Moreover, it was a great advantage to have a reliable and true official report of the debates in this House, since the newspaper reports were too often partial and one-sided. When one considered the contradictions and disputes that arose throughout the country with regard to the course or expression of members in Parliament, the importance of having official reports to fall back upon was very evident. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had said that the experience of the past had not been very satisfactory in respect to the Hausard. But this could only apply to the manner in which the report of the debates had been made, and not to the principle itself. He believed that the principle of having official reports was sound, and needed only to be properly carried into practice. If the hon. gentlemen charged last year with securing official reports had not been able to perform that duty satisfactorily, another committee, more conversant with the matter, might succeed much better.

MR. DESJARDINS said that he had been on the Select Committee appointed to superintend the reporting of the debates during the last Parliament, and, he believed it his duty to say a word in answer to certain remarks made by his friend the member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) upon the French translation of the debates. It would be unjust to allow these remarks to pass without removing the responsibility that would seem to rest upon the French translators of the House for the errors and delays that might have been complained of in the French version. If there had been inaccuracies in the French version, they were due rather to the system itself, which made it necessary for the translators to translate mechanically the English debates that were put into their hands, and deprived them of the means of doing justice to the French version. It would be remembered that French-speaking members of this House had seen their speeches submitted to a short-hand translation, that was to say, their speeches were reported immediately in English, so that the translators had to re-translate from English speeches originally delivered in French. It would be understood that it was impossible for them to do entire justice to speeches reported in such a manner. He could himself bear testimony to the pains these gentlemen had taken in order to do justice to the French-speaking members; and, if delays and inaccuracies had occurred in their work, it was entirely without any fault of theirs. They had done all in their power to do justice to every one. As to the subject which was now occupying the House, it seemed to him to be reduced to a question as to whether the Government had done wrong in adopting the measures they had taken in order to make sure that there should be an official report of the debates of the House from the very opening of the Session. A large majority of the members understood that, having two official languages, it was impossible for a great many members to fully comprehend the discussions which took place in the House, either in English or in French, unless these discussions were reported in the native tongue of each speaker. He looked upon the reporting of the debates in both languages as a mere act of justice to the two nationalities. The French-speaking members had interests that they had every reason to make known to the English-speaking majority; and, on the other hand, those who spoke the English language were interested in making known to the French population their aspirations, their wants, and their opinions. He thought that the publication of the debates in both languages was the only really practicable means they possessed of arriving at this result. The newspapers could not answer this purpose, for the French press had but a very limited number of English readers, and very few French read the English papers, so that it was quite insufficient to leave the reporting in the hands of the press, as had been suggested. The official report of the debates, as they now had it, was exactly what they required in order to arrive at this full understanding, and to acquire this necessary knowledge of the opinions entertained by English and French-speaking members. For these reasons, he believed that the Government was right in having overlooked the petty spites of some of the members of the Opposition, who could not readily forgive the Hansard for what it had done for them during the late elections, and in giving the country the benefit of this official report.

MR. CURRIER said that, now that the contract had been entered into, it must be carried out; but he must say that, if he were at perfect liberty to vote as he liked upon this question, he should be inclined to vote against the expenditure of $15,000 or $16,000 for this purpose. He thought that, if the taxpayers of the country could be consulted on the matter, they would be willing to forego the luxury or pleasure of perusing the Hansard for the next year, and keep the money which it cost in their pockets; and he thought the reporting of debates might be fairly left to the enterprise of the public journals of the country. If there were no Hansard, the newspapers would report the debates at much greater length than they did now. They would put on a larger staff of reporters, and take the trouble to obtain more correct reports.

MR. VALLÉE said he believed it to be his duty to take exception to a remark made by several members of the Opposition who had reproached Conservative members with their want of independence, and had accused the Government of being supported by a servile majority.

MR. DESJARDINS.

Happily the Government was supported by a very large majority in this House, but it was an intelligent majority, composed of members who would be able, when circumstances required it, to express their opinion and cast their vote according to the dictates of their conscience. It was not a majority that would continue to support a Government that was admittedly in the wrong, as the Liberal party had confessed they had done after the late elections. The Conservative party was very strong in the House and in the country; but, if it should unhappily occur that the present Government should fail to recognise just claims, this party would not hesitate to condemn the Government, or oblige them to fulfil their promises. As to the contract entered into for the publication of the debates, he thought that those who had undertaken this task were worthy of confidence, and that the Government had acted wisely.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said there was but one opinion in the House as to the importance of an official record of the debates of Parliament. He thought hon. gentlemen opposite had all admitted that proposition. True, some of them confessed to a change of opinion as to it, but he could not imagine their arguments to justify that change would be accepted by any other hon. members. If, for instance, the reports were unreliable, it was because hon. gentlemen were unwilling to take the trouble to revise them; they had thus only themselves to thank. Every member could correct the reporter's notes of his speech. If members were not to be judged by these official reports, which they all had the opportunity of supervising, they ought not to be called upon to be judged by the reports in the daily press, brief as they necessarily were. He was not a reporter himself; he never had the industry to acquire that wonderful art, but he had, for a quarter of a century, enjoyed very pleasant relations with the gentlemen of the Press Gallery, and could say he believed that, in no department of labour, were there men who worked more conscientiously, more industriously, more perseveringly to perform their whole and simple duty to his House, than the gentlemen engaged in its reporting. But they had great difficulties to labour under in their efforts to please everyone. A complete report of each day's sittings of the House would require about twenty four columns of the daily press. It was quite clear that no newspaper could give such lengthy reports. The average reports of the largest papers were about eight columns, or about one-third of the whole amount of a full report. Under those circumstances, to depend on the enterprise of the daily press would deprive the House of anything like a full report.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Hansard is not to be a full report either.

Mr. WHITE: It would be fuller than the newspaper reports. Then the reporters in the gallery, who worked industriously and conscientiously, were subject to orders from their offices, probably at eight or nine o'clock, to cut down their reports of debates, owing to pressure of other matter. The subjects at the time being discussed might be those in relation to which they might most desire official, reliable reports; but, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the papers, ample reports could not be expected of them. Considering the difficulties of reporters and newspapers at such times, it was not to be wondered at that the almost unanimous sentiment of the House favoured an official report. They were told Government had interfered with the privileges of Parliament, which was not free to act in this matter; but, what were they doing this afternoon, but discussing the question as a free Parliament—whether those gentlemen on the floor of the House should continue reporting their debates? That charge on the Opposition side was extraordinary. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had complained that the official reporter had undertaken to supply reports to the newspapers. Precisely the same thing was done by Mr. Burgess, the former contractor, under the direction of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), chairman of the Committee at that time, who was a full consenting party to that arrangement. The very same newspapers which received those reports then had made the same arrangement, for the same reason, with the present contractor. He hoped the resolution would pass. He thought the Government was entitled to thanks for having made a provisional arrangement, and he hoped that the contractor this year would be able to give the House a report somewhat more promptly than during the past year.

Mr. MACDOUGALL said, as an old member of Parliament, who had been sometimes very badly reported, and occasionally misreported, he was in favour of an official report of the debates of this Parliament. One reason, which he had not heard mentioned, was that he thought it important that, this Parliament representing the different Provinces, in which questions sometimes arose specially interesting to them as Provinces, that the Local Governments, the Local Legislatures and the officials of those Provinces, should have an opportunity of observing what their own representatives, as well as those from other parts of the Dominion, might say thereon. They could not really obtain this advantage through the ordinary newspaper reports; because it happened that the leading Ontario and Quebec newspapers naturally desired to furnish the information most interesting to their readers and, therefore, would not take the same pains to report discussions affecting the remote Provinces as were observed in reference to local topics. In matters of great importance to the outlying districts of the Dominion, the newspapers often gave little or no information whatever. It was, therefore, right to afford hon. gentlemen from the smaller and remote Provinces an official report of such debates. But it seemed to him also that there was an enormous amount of matter which, both for the credit of speakers, and the convenience of readers, should be omitted altogether from the official report. Brief reports or summaries should be the rule in particular questions of little consequence. The annual volume might thus be lessened and made more portable and suitable for reference. Many questions and matters of business came up that were sufficiently reported in the journals of the House; they did not require elaborate speeches in such cases. Moreover, a knowledge of the fact that there would be full reports at certain times was embarrassing, and prevented new members from speaking with the freedom they ought to enjoy. With regard to this class of subjects there should be a means of informing the reporters that their notes need only be written in brief. In the large volumes of past years he saw the most trifling statements—of no concern to anybody outside the House—were spread out in wearisome detail. In this telegraphic age, the bulkiness of such volumes was a great objection to them. Upon the general question, that they should have to preserve an extended official impartial report, he, for one, did not agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He believed the reporters did their duty conscientiously, though they might sometimes unintentionally misrepresent a speaker whom they had not heard distinctly. Some of their difficulties arose from the bad acoustic properties of this building, and some were owing to the indistinctness of speakers themselves. In regard to the question of interference with the privileges of the House by Ministers, he was as determined as hon. gentlemen opposite to preserve their privileges intact against ministerial encroachments. But a certain discretion must be allowed to the Government even in this House,—a certain control in the conduct of business,—which was permitted, under the English parliamentary system. In this matter he could see nothing to censure, so far as they had gone. The agreement for reporting was only conditional; otherwise they would not now be discussing it. He (Mr. Macdougall) expected, and the country expected, hon. gentlemen opposite would have challenged the speech from the Throne, and that they would have had a long discussion upon the programme of the Government, as well as the policy of the Opposition, including the modifications it had received at the hands of the people. Such a debate would have been instructive to new members, and suggestive and advantageous to the Government themselves in the preparation of their measures. But they chose to avoid that discussion, and, therefore, they had been precipitated into the middle of business, probably before it was ready for them. Now, if they had had such a debate, it would have been fortunate that preparation had been made for a full report. The opinion of an expiring Parliament, expressed when many members had left, was not binding on them, and could not be binding upon their successors in a new Parliament. It was presumptuous in the late House, at such a time, to deal with this matter, which they might have left to those who had been elected for this very purpose. He hoped the Committee would be composed of the older members of the House, experienced in the matter, and that they would adopt means to shorten the reports of those useless debates which would occasionally take place in Parliament.

MR. BOWELL said he desired to make one or two remarks in reply to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). He would not further discuss the question of an alleged interference with the rights of Parliament. He remembered distinctly, a few years ago, a point of order having been taken upon the submission of a report of the Reporting Committee by the member for Chateauguay, on which the report was defeated, thus leaving the incoming House the next year in precisely the same position as the action of the House last year left this one.

MR. HOLTON: Not the incoming House, but the same House in a succeeding Session.

MR. BOWELL said that his hon. friend the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) had, two or three Sessions ago, at the close of the Session, taken advantage of a technicality in order to prevent a report made by a Special Committee, whose duty it was to supervise the reporting of the debates from being adopted. The late Government, believing that the official reporting of the debates should be continued, notwithstanding the fact that the House had not affirmed the principle, made a temporary arrangement with reporters who commenced the work at the commencement of the Session, and the House of Commons afterward confirmed what the Government had done, and appointed a committee to which was relegated the supervision and control of the reports and the publication of the debates in precisely the same manner as the Government at present proposed to do, providing the contract was confirmed by the House. It had been said by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), also by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and repeated by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), that the negative vote of the House last year upon the motion to adopt the report of the Special Committee was a disapproval of an official report altogether. Such was not the fact. That report was a very short one, and simply asked the House to give power to the Speaker to make provision for the reporting during the present Session of Parliament. To this proposition the House said no.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : During the opening days of the Session.

MR. BOWELL said that was precisely what the Government had done. The Committee stated that they had not had time to complete a system by which the reporting could be done more perfectly, and asked the House to give the Speaker power to make temporary arrangements until the House could meet, and the House refused to adopt the report. Why they would not place that power in the hands of the Speaker, it was for the House to say, and not him. The argument of the hon. member for Middlesex was, if he might use the expression without being disrespectful, disingenuous. He said Mr. Bradley's tender was for nine thousand odd dollars, and that Mr. Lumsden's was between $9,000 and $10,000. The hon. gentleman, having had the tenders in his hands, knew well that Mr. Bradley and Mr. Lumsden only tendered for the reporting; yet, the hon. gentleman left the impression upon the House that these gentlemen's tenders covered the whole work. The hon. gentleman, having been Chairman of the Committee, and having had full control of the management and reporters for the last two or three years, knew that the difficulties which presented themselves, and which caused so much complaint, particularly on the part of the French-speaking gentlemen of the House, were, from the delays which constantly occurred from the system which had been adopted for the translation of the speeches, contrary to his own (Mr. Bowell's) efforts. The translators of the House were employed to do this work, a system he thought highly objectionable and improper, taking them, as it did, to a greater or lesser extent, from their legitimate work. When members complained, the contractor was questioned, and he referred the Committee to the printers, and the printers laid the fault at the door of the proof-readers or translators. The blame was thrown from one to the other, like a shuttlecock, until it was almost impossible to fasten the blame on anyone. He admitted that, had they divided the tenders and given the work out to four different persons, it might have been done for from five to six hundred dollars less than the tender of Mr. Richardson; but, having in view the difficulties that had presented themselves in the past, he thought every member of the House, and particularly the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), would approve of the action of the Government in this matter. He did not intend to delay the House with a criticism of the position taken by the different gentlemen who had spoken on the subject. He, too, had changed his mind on this subject, like some of the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him. When the question first came before Parliament, he voted against it, but after watching closely and seeing the way in which hon. gentlemen would explain away opinions to which they had given utterance in the House, he came to the conclusion that it was in the interest of the country that they should have an official report. He had no doubt the present Opposition would find it to their advantage—that was, if the Government committed itself in the same way their predecessors had—when the next election came round, just as the late Opposition found it to their advantage to have an official report at the last election. If there was any one thing more than another that tended to enlighten the people on the policy of the late Government, it was the official report of the sayings and doings in the House. He was of opinion official reporting would prove a check in future to all Governments, and, in addition, enable the people to know precisely what their representatives said in Parliament, thereby enabling them to judge of their utterances and acts. The member for Gloucester stated that the question had been delayed for nine days, on account of his (Mr. Bowell's) absence. The gentleman knew that statement was not in accordance with fact, he having been absent from the city but one day upon which the House sat, having left on Saturday and returned on Tuesday. He would not retort as he might do, but simply remind him that his (Mr. Bowell's) work was not altogether fruitless, as he would see in a few days when the hon. member elect for East Hastings was introduced.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

SALMON-HATCHERY ON FRASER RIVER, B.C.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. McINNES moved for copies of all correspondence since May, 1877, relative to establishing a salmon-hatchery on the Fraser River, British Columbia. He said that the salmon-canning business of British Columbia was in its infancy, and that the present was the time to extend that protection and fostering care necessary to make it a permanent industry, and a source of wealth and revenue to the country. Six years ago there was no salmon-canning establishment in the entire Province. Now they had no less than ten, all of which were situated in the district he had the honour to represent. Eight of these were on the Fraser River—six in the city of New Westminster, and two within ten miles of the city. He found, by the Report of the Inspector of Fisheries for British Columbia, last year, that there were 555 fishermen, 1,530 shoremen, besides 18 boat-builders and 16 coopers, making a total of 2,519 men who were engaged in this enterprise during the last fishing season on the Lower Fraser. The combined labours of these showed that the very large amount of 5,051 barrels and 5,048,880 cans of salmon were taken from the Fraser River last year. As he had not the report of the other two canning establishments of the district, which are on the Netx and Skeena Rivers, he was unable to give the precise catch; but, from reliable information, the catch there was equally satisfactory to that on the Fraser. The run of salmon on the Fraser River generally commenced about the first week in July and continued to the middle of September. On the Columbia River in Oregon, U.S., the run set in in the middle of May and continued until the 15th September, thus it would be seen the run of the Columbia River was twice as long as that on the Fraser River. The reason why his constituents—he might say every constituency in British Columbia—were so anxious to have a salmon-hatchery on the Fraser, was not so much for the propagation of their own fish in order to keep up the supply, as for the introduction of the Columbia River salmon, which would give employment to thousands of the labouring classes during four months of the year instead of two as at present. He did not see why British Columbia should not have a salmon-hatchery as well as other Provinces of the Dominion, especially when it was considered the Pacific Province did not participate in the advantages of the fishery clause in the Washington Treaty. He trusted the Government would favourably consider the matter, and make provision for it in the Estimates.

DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY IN RED RIVER REBELLION.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. IVES moved for a return of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and Roderick McKenzie, of the township of Melbourne, county of Richmond, with reference to the destruction of certain property belonging to said Roderick McKenzie, in the Red River Rebellion of 1869-70, together with all vouchers and documents produced in connection with the matter, and all Orders in Council and Departmental Orders bearing upon the subject. He said Mr. McKenzie had moveable property at Fort Garry when the fort was taken by the rebels under Riel. The property remained there when the rebels left, and was taken possession of by the Government troops, either as plunder or in the belief that it was Government property. A correspondence took place between the Government authorities and Mr. McKenzie, and the last letter received by Mr. McKenzie was from the Treasury Board, to the effect that the Government had not power to compensate him for the loss without the authority of Parliament. He hoped the Government would, therefore, act in the matter and take the initiative by bringing down an amount in the Estimates to make the matter right.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there could be no objection to bring down these papers. He would look into the matter.

MR. MACKENZIE said Judge Johnson had been sent to Manitoba to settle all claims against the Dominion, in consequence of the North-West troubles. Claimants were invited by public advertisements to send in their claims, and all claims were understood to have been sent in and adjudged on, and this gentleman's claim should not be admitted until it was established beyond doubt that it was one which should have been dealt with by Mr. Johnson.

PENSIONS TO VETERANS OF 1812-15.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. IVES moved for a return giving the names and residences of all the veterans of the war of 1812-15 who received a pension during the year 1878, the amount received by each, the names of those who had previously received pensions and are now dead since 1st January, 1878, with a supplementary list shewing which of the pensioners were commissioned officers in the war. He said, when the appropriation of $50,000 was made in 1875, it was expected each veteran would receive $100.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. IVES said he had been informed so by members of the House. The amount, it was found, was only sufficient to pay $20 to each last year. The amount was reduced in the Estimates from $50,000 to $35,000. He called the attention of the Government to this matter to see if it was not possible to continue the original grant. Some of those old men were in the most needy circumstances. He had the honour to know one man, Captain Toussaint Goddu, who bore a commission during the war of 1812, who was one of the heroes of Chateauguay, and who was, at present, in extremely indigent circumstances. He would beg the Government to look into the matter, and thought they would be justified in making his an exceptional case.

MR. MASSON said it had been the settled policy of the Government to give $20 to each veteran. As to the case referred to, he would give it his attention.

PRESCOTT CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S REPORT.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Armour, one of the Judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, a certificate and report relating to the election for the Electoral District of Prescott.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 15) To repeal the Insolvency Laws now in force in the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Lechard.)

Bill (No. 16) Relating to the protest of Inland Bills of Exchange.—(Mr. Doull.)

Bill (No. 17) To provide for the defendant's costs in certain actions at the suit of the Crown.—(Mr. MacDonnell.)

Bill (No. 18) To amend the Acts respecting the Isolated Risk and Farmers' Fire Insurance Company of Canada, and to change the name thereof to the Sovereign Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

Bill (No. 20) To amend the Act 41 Victoria, chapter 29, intitled: An Act to revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Scriver.)

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Casey.)

FIRST READING.

MR. CASEY introduced a Bill (No. 19) To amend the Act respecting the election of members of the House of Commons. He said this Bill was intended to meet certain deficiencies in the law, which had come to light under the practical working of the Act. In some cases the Bill amended, in others it explained, the provision of the Election Law. It contained a definition of a candidate, by which any person becoming a candidate, would, from the time he became recognised as such, or from the time the writ was issued, be held responsible as a candidate for his actions in regard to matters referred to in this Act. He would not be allowed to escape the consequence of illegal acts previous to the nomination day, by declaring that until then he was not a candidate. The offence of general treating was so defined as to include cases not covered by the present law. A penalty was imposed on persons who, though disqualified by law, recorded their votes. The last clause provided that no informality or irregularity of a returning officer or other official concerned in taking a poll, could invalidate a ballot cast, and the judge on a recount should accept all ballots cast, unless such informality or irregularity had permitted fraud. He would enter more fully into explanations on the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

(Mr. Schultz.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACKENZIE said this railway, by the provisions of the Bill, would interfere with the Canada Pacific to its detriment, and he did not think the Government should allow it to pass in this manner.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was customary to allow such Bills to go before the Railway Committee, and he did not see any necessity for adopting a different rule in this case. In the Railway Committee, the Bill would be fully discussed. These Bills might promote the construction of the Pacific Railway rather than interfere with it, and he did not consider it necessary to look into the provisions of this one, knowing they would be carefully scanned by those before whom they would come.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was well enough as a general principle. But, by one of the first provisions of this Bill it practically interfered seriously with the Pacific Railway west of Selkirk. It was not a matter which the Government should leave with the Railway Committee. The hon. the Premier should say whether he was prepared to sanction what appeared to be the main provision of the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be the duty of the Government to see that no undue competition with the Canada Pacific was generated by other lines. He had not looked at this measure, but he assured the hon. gentleman that the policy of the Government in this respect would be fully carried out.

MR. SCHULTZ said he was pleased that attention had been called to the matter by the hon. member for Lambton, because it gave him an opportunity of explaining that, while indeed the Saskatchewan Colonisation Railroad proposed to start from Winnipeg, yet, as it proceeded westward, the divergence from the Canada Pacific Railroad was very great indeed, and he (Mr. Schultz) and the promoters of the Bill would be able to show, when the measure came before the Railway Committee, that the railroad in question not only would not injure the Government line, but, in colonising the rich lands west of the Province of Manitoba and providing a means of transporting the grain of existing settlements, it would be found that not only the main line of the Saskatchewan Colonisation Railroad, but all its branches, would prove direct feeders of the national line and its Pembina branch.

Bill read the second time.

CANADA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY
INCORPORATION ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) explained that, according to the original Act of incorporation, the Company had power to divide its profits between the participating policy-holders and the shareholders in the proportion of three-fourths to the policy-holders and one-fourth to the stockholders. This Bill proposed to extend this proportion to not less than ninety per cent. to participating policy-holders, and not to exceed ten per cent. to shareholders. The only persons who could possibly object to this would be the stockholders, and they, at a general meeting called for the purpose, resolved to carry out the suggestion of the directors. The Bill also sought to extend the powers of the directors as to the calling of meetings; to extend the right of voting, so that each shareholder could cast a vote for each share he held for himself or by proxy, instead of limiting the number, as under the present Act, to forty; to declare that all policies, contracts, etc., concerning the company should be signed by the president or vice-president, or in case of the absence or death of both, by a director, and also by the secretary; to extend the present powers of investment; to make the company safe in paying the personal representative appointed in any of the Provinces of the Dominion without putting such representative to the expense of taking out probate in Ontario where the company's contract was made, and where only it could be enforced; in the case of wills, to make it safe for the company to pay the executor of a will, if probate had been granted to him by a Court of competent jurisdiction anywhere; and to provide for a general and gradual decrease in the number of directors by not filling up vacancies.

SELKIRK AND SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.—[BILL 9.]

(Mr. Rykert.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACDOUGALL said this was another application for a railway, very nearly upon the same route as that which occupied the attention of the House a few moments ago. The desire to construct railways in that new country was so great that it was proposed to construct two lines very nearly parallel to the Canada Pacific Railway. He judged from the remarks of the hon. the Premier and of the hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition that it would be the policy of this Government, as it was of the last, to prevent the people of Manitoba from constructing any line of railway, even at their own expense, which might possibly interfere or compete with the Canada Pacific Railway. He thought that some further definition or indication of the limitations within which that policy would be enforced should be given to the House for the guidance of the Railway Committee, at this the first stage of the question. If the Pacific Railway was to be constructed as a Government work, at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, how were they to explain away the fact that the small population inhabiting the North-West felt strong enough, with the aid of outside capitalists, to undertake the construction of two railways almost parallel to the Canada Pacific for several hundred miles. It might be a question for members, and, certainly, would occupy the public attention, whether, in the condition of our finances,—in view of the fact that we were obliged to borrow money abroad to carry on the ordinary affairs of the Government,—it was wise to proceed in the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway as a public work, at the expense of the people of the whole Dominion. Those Bills, however, might be merely speculative, brought into the House as feelers, or as a foundation for asking large public grants for the enterprise in question. On the face of them, no such intention appeared. Therefore, they had the fact that gentlemen, whose names stood well in the financial world, were asking the permission of the House to organise themselves to construct a railway near the line of the Pacific, over hundreds of miles through a new territory, at their own expense, and without public aid. He thought he was justified in calling attention to this fact, in view of the policy to which they were apparently committed. As one of the public men of the country responsible for the acquisition of the North-West Territory, he was gratified to learn that, in the short period since the acquisition, they had succeeded in advancing its development so rapidly, and directing public attention to it so strongly that capitalists were already convinced that great wealth was to be extracted from its soil, and large profits to be made in its development. Their willingness to expend large sums to effect railway improvements was indeed a very good sign. It ought to impress members, and even induce the Government to reconsider the policy with regard to the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway. In the past, the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) and his political supporters took strong ground against the construction of this railway as a public work. It was the policy of the old Liberal party to construct public works of this description by means of grants where required, but to leave them as going concerns in the hands of private parties. It was a cardinal principle with that party that the Government should be free from political entanglements in the execution, and especially the working, of such enterprises. That opinion, he (Mr. Macdougall) believed, prevailed to a large extent in the public mind to-day. He was convinced great doubt existed as to the propriety of placing the construction and management of great public works, such as railways, under the control of the Government.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. MACDOUGALL said that, perhaps, the hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side, representing Upper Canadian constituencies, who dissented from this view, were better informed;

but he spoke of the historical position of parties, and repeated that the opinion of the Liberal party had been strongly expressed and clearly defined in the sense described. He did not know the policy of the present Government in this matter, it had not been indicated; but a very grave question now presented itself, which it would be well for the House to consider—whether that policy was to continue. Indeed, he thought it would be the duty of the Government, when these Bills came before the House, to have their minds made up as to the policy which ought now to be adopted. All would admit that the railway from Thunder Bay to Red River, over an inhospitable and difficult country, must be constructed by public aid; but the railway beyond that point was another matter, unless those Bills were merely speculative. If, indeed, the inherent value of the territory and its resources had so impressed those capitalists that they were prepared to construct a large portion of the railway westward at their own expense, in the expectation of large profits, there was thus raised a material and important question to be considered at this early stage of their deliberations as a new Parliament, untrammelled by the opinions, and with power to amend the mistakes of their predecessors.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think this the time to precipitate a debate on the Pacific Railway question. He did not intend to be drawn into any discussion of it; but he was surprised at the announcement made by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Macdougall) as to his views of public policy, and those that prevailed in former years. He was one of the Ministers who let the contract for the building of the Intercolonial Railway to ordinary contractors as a public work—a road to be afterwards worked by Government. That was the only occasion of any railway having been aided by the Dominion Government. The hon. gentleman had an opportunity of carrying out his policy on that occasion, and failed to do so. But the late Administration desired to assist, as far as possible, certain railways, without owning any. In pursuance of this policy they gave over some railways in their possession to private companies.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

They also invited tenders for the construction and working of the Canadian Pacific Railway consistently with the idea the hon. gentleman opposite now formulated. The present Government had not informed the House of the result of the invitation to tender. This was not, as he said, a new idea, but one always held by himself and former political friends. He (Mr. Mackenzie) entirely agreed with him as to the policy of Governments not owning railways; but would defer the discussion of the Canadian Pacific Railway matter to a more suitable occasion. The hon. gentleman was quite mistaken in fancying that the promoters of such charters designed spending their own money. He (Mr. Mackenzie) rather feared their chief object was the expenditure of other people's funds. Directors and managers of certain railways were generally men of straw, who hoped, by the manipulation of bonds, lands, and other means, to enrich themselves at the expense of English and other money-lenders, and of the Government. The hon. gentleman need not delude himself with the idea that it was the natural richness of the country and the anxiety to expend their great means that accounted for the action of the promoters of this and similar Bills. The motive was different. What the Government had to provide for was what would suit the interests of the entire taxpayers, and not a few speculators.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed with the hon. leader of the Opposition, that this was not the proper time to enter into a general discussion of the Canadian Pacific Railway policy. It was very doubtful, indeed, whether there was any earnest desire on the part of the applicants for those Bills to spend their own money; probably they wished to carry out their enterprises mainly at other people's expense, and without any desire of ruining themselves in the operation. His hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall) said the road from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg must be built by public aid, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) assumed the sections to and through the Rocky Mountains would be also. He did not think the taxpayers expected that all the sections through the unprofitable regions should be built by them, and that those through the inviting regions, which would be thickly settled, and where a railway would be profitable, should be handed over to private individuals for their own benefit. If they could get capitalists to build and work the whole line, it would relieve the Government of the burthen of construction and the inconvenience of management, which would be a great advantage. But, so long as a considerable portion of the work was to remain in the hands of the Government directly, certainly it would be the height of folly to surrender any profitable portion to private speculators.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 12) To authorise the Welland Railway Company to convert their six per cent. Debenture Bonds into five per cent. Debenture Stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Drew.)

RIGHT OF FISHING IN THE SEIGNIORY OF BIC.

QUESTION.

Mr. VALLEE enquired, Whether the right of fishing in the Seignior of Bic, in the county of Rimouski, belongs to the Government or the seigneur, Mr. Campbell.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): There is no express agreement. The fishery rights can only be exercised by the parties occupying the beach. The practice of the Department has been to give the preference to owners of the beaches.

STANDARD RULE FOR MEASURING SAW LOGS.

QUESTION.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Whether the Government has an authorised standard rule for measuring saw-logs in the Dominion, and, if not, do they intend to adopt one, so that there may be uniformity in so important a matter.

MR. BABY: The Government have taken the question under consideration.

QUESTION.

MR. Fiset enquired, What are the reasons which caused the Government to take away from Joseph Danjou, Esquire, the contract for the conveyance of the mails between the railway station and the post-office in the parish of St. Fabien.

MR. LANGEVIN said the contract, when given, was terminable at pleasure. On the 17th of December, Danjou was notified that the contract, for which he was receiving $135, would be discontinued, and it was given to another man for $100, the Government thus effecting an economy of $35. That was the sole reason for the change.

EMIGRANT SHEDS AT EMERSON AND ST. BONIFACE, MANITOBA.

QUESTION.

MR. DUBUC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect emigrant sheds at or near the railway stations at Emerson and St. Boniface, in the Province of Manitoba.

MR. TUPPER: It is the intention of the Government to provide an emigrant shed at the station at Emerson; whether further accommodation will be required at St. Boniface is not yet determined.

THE TORONTO POSTMASTERSHIP.

QUESTION.

MR. HAY enquired, Whether the salary which is being paid to Mr. T. Patteson, as postmaster of the city of Toronto, is larger than that paid to his predecessor, and, if so, how much more; and why it was necessary to increase the salary of that official.

MR. LANGEVIN: The salary of Mr. Lesslie, late postmaster of the city of Toronto, was $3,500. His successor, Mr. Patteson, has a salary of $3,000.

Therefore, there has been a saving of $500 a year.

INCREASED PAYMENT TO POSTMASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. DREW enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to increase the pay of those postmasters who are paid under the 50th section of 31st Victoria, chapter 10, and from what date such increase, if any, will commence.

MR. LANGEVIN: Under the law, the salaries of postmasters are calculated as follows:—Forty per cent. on net revenue derived from postage prepaid by stamps, up to $800, and 25 per cent. on the balance. Postmasters collecting less than $25 are allowed $10 per annum for salary. The salaries are now in course of readjustment, and the increase, if any, will be allowed from 1st July last.

TAMPERING WITH REGISTERED LETTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. LITTLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make such arrangements as will have the tendency of further preventing registered letters being tampered with; and, if loss is sustained by the sender of such a letter, whether compensation will be allowed under certain conditions by the Post Office Department.

MR. LANGEVIN: The Department is not aware that registered letters are being tampered with more than they have been before, and we do not know of any other arrangements than those taken up to now to prevent these letters being tampered with. But, if the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman, make any suggestion in that direction, the Department will be most happy to take the suggestions into consideration, in order to better the service, if possible. In answer to the second part of the question, I have to reply that it cannot be done, because it is entirely at the will of the sender whether he sends bank-notes or a money order. The money-order system is provided by the Department for that purpose; and, therefore, the sender could not do better than send a money order, if there was any risk of loss.

MR. LANGEVIN.

QUESTION.

MR. Fiset enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out, next summer, the improvements in the wharf at Rimouski, recommended by the engineers of the Intercolonial Railway.

MR. LANGEVIN: This matter is under the consideration of the Government.

CAMPS OF MILITARY INSTRUCTION.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause camps of military instruction to be formed this year. If so, when, and of what strength.

MR. MASSON: That question is being considered by the Government. As soon as the Estimates are brought down, I shall be able to give the hon. gentleman a more complete and satisfactory answer.

APPOINTMENTS IN HAMILTON.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for a return of the names of all persons appointed in the Inland Revenue Office (including Inspectors of Weights and Measures), Post Office, Custom House and Emigration Office, in the city of Hamilton, between 4th November, 1873, and 10th October, 1878, the dates of such appointments, the ages of the persons appointed, their salaries when appointed, and whether increased during the above period, and, if so, the amounts of such increase; also, the names of the persons superannuated, and the amounts of said superannuations.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that all the information the hon. gentleman could get under this motion had been ordered by a resolution passed by the House on the 17th ult. If the hon. member wanted to get further information, as he (Mr. Cameron) did, the motion would have to be amended. He would, therefore, suggest that the period be from 1st January, 1873, to 1st March, 1879.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he did not desire the additional information.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENTS TO W. R. CLARK FOR SERVICES TO THE FISHERY COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH moved for copies of all Orders in Council, letters, accounts, petitions and correspondence relating to the payment of $10,000, in accordance with an Order in Council, passed in December last, to W. R. Clark, for alleged services rendered to the Canadian Government in connection with the Halifax Fishery Commission; also, a statement showing the full amount paid to the said W. R. Clark by the Dominion Government, or any Department thereof, in the years 1871, 1872, and 1873, in connection with the same service. He said that he noticed, by a return made by the Government, that the sum of $10,000 had been paid to Mr. Clark, who resided at Boston, for services alleged to have been performed by him in connection with the Fishery Commission at Halifax. He thought there must be some mistake in regard to this matter, and that the Government must have acted under some misapprehension, because he was satisfied that Mr. Clark had no claim to that money. During the whole of his (Sir A. J. Smith's) term of office, he never heard he had any claim for services in that connection, or ever made such a claim. All claims for such services were paid before he left the Department, under his supervision and by his direction. In 1872, he ascertained from an officer of the Department that Mr. Clark, who was, he understood, a friend of Mr. Mitchell, his predecessor, had performed some service in connection with this business. He (Mr. Clark) procured for the Department a number of affidavits of Americans taken in various parts of the United States. These affidavits, however, they could not use with any kind of propriety or decency, and consequently they were not used. No information procured by Mr. Clark was used before the Commission. Mr. Clark received a large sum of money for services he performed in 1872;

several thousand dollars, the precise amount he was not prepared to say. He, on several occasions, complained to the officers of the Department that Mr. Clark had been largely overpaid for any services he performed. He made this motion in order to see whether there was any pretence or excuse which could justify the Government in making this payment.

Motion agreed to.

BOARD OF CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINERS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) moved for a return showing the names of the gentlemen composing the Board of Civil Service Examiners; the amount of the yearly expenses of said Board during the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878; the number of candidates examined during these years; the number of unsuccessful candidates, and the names of the successful candidates; also, the number of candidates who, having successfully passed, have received appointments in the Civil Service of Canada during the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878.

Motion agreed to.

WORK DONE IN THE COUNTY OF RIMOUSKI.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. LANDRY moved for a statement showing the nature of the work done at Matane and at River Blanche, in the county of Rimouski, before, during, and immediately after the last general elections, from the 1st of July to the 10th of October, 1878; by whom such work was done; whether by the day, by contract or statute labour; the names of the superintendents of such works; the names of the persons to whom the money was delivered; and copies of all documents, correspondence and pay-lists relating to the said works.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would suggest to the hon. gentleman to add "Reports of Engineers."

MR. Fiset said that he proposed to add a few words in amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) which would only render this motion more complete. He was convinced that he would have no objection to substituting the words "1st of December," for the words "10th of October," and to adding the following words:—

"Also a statement showing the work yet to be done to the Matane Pier to complete it, together with a copy of the correspondence exchanged with the Department of Public Works, with reference to the delay which occurred in the last payment of the workmen; and also a copy of the reports of the engineers on the subject, and all the correspondence relating thereto."

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not see any objection to the enlargement of the motion as suggested by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and the member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset). He was not aware whether the reports of examinations and estimates that he (Mr. Langevin) asked for last year in reference to this work were to be found in the Department. He had been told that there were no such estimates of works that were to be done at Matane and at the River Blanche. He asked for the reports from the Minister of Public Works, and he thought that all these papers should have been brought down. The present Government had no objection to do so. It would only be a pity if the way in which these works had been conducted could not be seen by these returns. If the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mackenzie) had seen the manner in which these works were conducted, he would have thought that the undertaking of the works by day's labour was a very bad way to conduct public works. That method of doing the work might have suited very well in order to get a large number of electors, selected from one party, to support a candidate on one side or another. He did not think the manner in which these works were conducted reflected credit on the Department headed by the hon. gentleman. He was not aware whether the then Minister of Public Works knew of any of these things. When the papers would be brought down it would be apparent to the House and the country that these works were, to a great extent, conducted for electioneering purposes. He, therefore, had no objection to the motion being carried, by adding, "and all the correspondence relating thereto."

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not aware of anything of the kind stated; he had no reason to believe anything of the kind. The work was undertaken by day's labour on the report of Mr. Kingsford, who recommended that as the best method of doing the work, after a careful examination of the ground. Mr. Kingsford had submitted more expensive plans for the work; but he (Mr. Mackenzie) had not thought fit to adopt them.

MR. Fiset said that the hon. the Postmaster-General claimed that it was only in order to help him (Mr. Fiset) in his election that the Government had built the wharf at Matane by time work, and he had naturally concluded that this was an act of corruption on the part of the Government. He found a decided answer to the hon. gentleman's assertion in the report of the Minister of Public Works for this year. This was what the report said:

"Application was made by the inhabitants of Matane, who had formed themselves into a syndicate, to construct the pier by time work according to the design of the Department, and under its direction. As it was considered that a year's time would be gained, that the cost would be reduced to a minimum and the work efficiently constructed, this request was entertained and the authority has been given for the work so to be carried on."

That was what had been done by the syndicate chosen by the people of Matane, and formed of men of business belonging to both political parties; and the proof that this syndicate had effectively administered the affair was to be found in the fact that, with the sum of $10,000 granted during the last Session for this purpose, they had built a first-class wharf 480 feet long. In order to complete the work, a sum of $300 only was required. Unhappily, the Government had preferred to allow the work to remain unfinished, rather than expend this small amount. Moreover, the syndicate had been formed in June last, when it was not known that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Langevin) was to be a candidate in Rimouski. He knew that the majority he (Mr. Fiset) had obtained at Matane, and in the parishes of the upper part of the county, had cut the hon. gentleman to the quick. If, however, he remembered the election of 1874, he would not be surprised at this fact. In 1874, his (Mr. Fiset's) majority in the whole county had reached 1,475 votes; whilst his majority at the last election had only reached 449 votes. The hon. gentleman might congratulate himself on having obtained such a result. He would add, nevertheless, that it had not been without much labour and great sacrifices on the part of the hon. gentleman and his friends that this result had been brought about. It was certain that, if he (Mr. Langevin) had regretted not to have at his disposal the resources of the Public Works Department, in order to carry on his election, he had, on the other hand, discovered the means of utilising the services of one of those kind-hearted contractors on the Intercolonial Railway whom he had generously recompensed formerly at the expense of the Treasury, when he (Mr. Langevin) was Minister of Public Works. It was through the agency of this same well paid contractor that he had caused a lead mine to be opened in the parish of St. Fabien on the Thursday preceding polling day, and a road to be laid out over the mountains of Bic. At the same time agents were sent into nearly every part of the county, in order to solicit his (Mr. Fiset's) friends to go and work in this mine and on this road, with the hope, no doubt, of keeping them from voting. Their travelling expenses were paid, and they received $1 a day at a time when workmen could be hired at 70c. a day. That was not all. Whilst these works were being inaugurated in the upper part of the county, in the lower part, that was to say below Matane, his (Mr. Fiset's) friends were being hired to go and raise a vessel that a few weeks previously had been wrecked on the coast of the Island of Anticosti. But the electors of the county of Rimouski were not for sale. They had gone to work on these divers undertakings, and, when polling day came, they had generously cast their ballots in favour of the candidate of their choice. Unluckily, this had also been the signal for closing the lead mine, and stopping the works on the famous road over the mountains of Bic, for, the day following the election, these works were brought to a close. And it was after having made use of such means in order to carry this election that his (Mr. Fiset's) opponents wished to make this House believe that, if he had been elected, it was entirely owing to the pressure that the Government had brought to bear upon the electors. He thought that they were going a little too far. He had no objection to the motion being adopted; but he hoped, also, that no objection would be taken to the amendment that he had moved, seeing that it only completed the main motion.

MR. VALLÉE said that the House had not been summoned to investigate the doings of each individual member during the late elections. The question now before the House had reference to certain works that it had been decided to execute during the late local elections. At the beginning of the struggle, last spring, he had gone, in company with the Hon. Mr. Chauveau, to Matane, where this wharf was situated, and there Mr. Chauveau had declared to the electors that, at such a date, the Mackenzie Government would grant a sum of $10,000 for the improvement of the harbour. He stated that, if the Mackenzie Government did not grant this amount within fifteen days, his friends should vote for his opponent. A few days previously, Mr. Chauveau had come up to Ottawa, and had met the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mackenzie), but at first nothing had been done on the part of the Government, seeing that no survey had been made. Under the circumstances it was naturally difficult to obtain from the Government a sum of money to carry on these works. But the election of a Minister of the Local Government was in jeopardy, and all possible means had to be employed to defeat his opponent. It had become necessary to turn over, at one stroke, not less than 400 votes. On the 28th of April, the Sunday before the polling day, he (Mr. Vallée) had met Mr. Chauveau's representative at the door of the church, and he had asked him whether the electors were at liberty to vote for him (Mr. Vallée) as Mr. Chauveau had promised, for it was then the 28th, and not a single cent had been granted for the works. It was admitted that he (Mr. Vallée) was in the right, and that the electors could vote for him. On the Tuesday evening following, it was announced that a despatch had arrived from Ottawa, addressed to the parish priest, stating that a sum of $10,000 had been granted for the improvement of the harbour at Matane. The result of this despatch was that the entire parish, after having pledged itself the Sunday previous to vote for the Conservative candidate, turned against him. He was, therefore, justified in saying that the grant of money for the improvement of the Matane harbour was the most shameful speculation—that was the word—that the Federal Government had ever committed. He had proof of the wrongdoing of the Mackenzie Government in the report that was now in the hands of hon. members. It was stated in this report that it was impossible to make a suitable harbour of refuge at Matane. This had been found out after the money had been granted. But that was not all. The late Administration had always loudly proclaimed in this House that no contract should be given without tenders being asked for. And yet what had been done in this case? The Government, disowning their own professions of faith, had authorized the member for Rimouski to form a sort of syndicate compound of Liberal canvassers, in whose hands this sum of $10,000 had been placed for the execution of the works. That was surely an act of gross corruption. Naturally the Government wished to help the Liberal candidate, and this money had been expended at almost a dead loss, for the work had been executed without any definite plan. The hon. member for Rimouski, in the course of his remarks, had asked the Government to continue these works. He (Mr. Vallée) believed that the citizens and electors of Rimouski wished also that this should be done; but this harbour of refuge should not have been placed at this point. How was it that the late Government had decided to execute these works at Matane, whilst, in the same county, twenty leagues from there, might be found a magnificent harbour, prepared by nature, that would only have required an expenditure of some few hundred dollars? Simply because that parish was Conservative, and they had thought to bring the electors over to the Liberal party by granting $10,000 for these improvements. They had succeeded. With a third of this money expended in the parish of Bic, the Government might have made a very suitable harbour for shipping.

Mr. Fiset said that the hon. member who had just taken his seat had waxed very eloquent in order to prove that this $10,000, put in the Estimates of last year for the wharf at Matane, had been granted solely for the purpose of defeating him (Mr. Vallée), and, like his leader (Mr. Langevin), he drew the conclusion that the Government had been guilty of an act of corruption. In order to convince him that he was in the wrong on this first point, it would be sufficient to tell him that, before there was any question of local elections, that was to say at the beginning of the Session of 1878, it had been decided that a certain sum should be placed in the Estimates for the wharf at Matane, and that he had, at that very time, informed the Mayor of Matane, Dr. Pelletier, of the good intentions of the hon. the Minister of Public Works with regard to this locality. It was true that this sum had not been granted till the close of the Session, when the Province of Quebec was in the midst of an electoral combat; but, for all that, it had been decided before the elections that this sum should be put in the Supplementary Estimates that were not then printed. He presumed that the hon. gentleman would have much preferred to see the electors of Matane deprived of this grant; but the money had been granted and very justifiably employed. The hon. member (Mr. Vallée) had, moreover, accused him of having written to his (Mr. Fiset's) friends at Matane, as soon as the item of $10,000 had been voted. He admitted having done so. He admitted having written or telegraphed to his friends at Matane when this item was passed; and, as he had already stated, he had informed them, before the election, of the intention of the Government to include in the Estimates this sum of $10,000 for the improvement of the harbour of this locality. But in doing so he had only stated the truth, and he did not see what he was to blame for. There was another reason that made him write to Matane that the item had passed. The hon. member had not forgotten that, several days before polling day, the hon. the Postmaster-General, then member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), had written to his friends in the county, not that the item had passed, but that there was nothing in the Estimates for the improvement of the Matane harbour. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) knew better than anyone else what an abuse had been made of this letter; he knew that it was with the support of this document that endeavours had been made to convince the electors of Matane that they had no chance of obtaining a grant that year, and that he (Mr. Fiset) was wittingly deceiving all these honest electors, by giving them to understand that the sum of $10,000 would be granted for the improvement of the harbour. Under these circumstances, he asked whether he had not been justifiable in informing his friends, as soon as the item passed, and in destroying the false impression created by that letter. The hon. member for Portneuf had, moreover, stated that the people of Matane were not satisfied with this wharf, that it was useless; and he added that Matane was not the place for the harbour, but that Bic should have been chosen in preference to Matane. He believed that the hon. member was mistaken in saying that the people of Matane were not satisfied with the work done. If he had said that the few friends he (Mr. Vallée) had at Matane were dissatisfied, he would be nearer the truth. He was surprised to see the hon. member so strongly opposed to the wharf at Matane. He ought to know, however, that nearly every year serious shipwrecks occurred in the neighbourhood of this locality, and that a wharf at this point was of great service to ships in distress. Not longer ago than last autumn, if the schooner of a well known navigator of Matane had escaped being wrecked, it was owing to the wharf that had been built there. He would admit that this wharf was not long enough, that new improvements would be required to render it more serviceable; and it was to be hoped that these improvements would be looked upon as necessary, and as an effectual means of rendering the navigation of this part of the St.

Lawrence more easy and less dangerous. As to the harbour at Bic, he admitted that it was a first-class harbour, and he would be glad if it was improved. That was what he had been working for ever since he had been a member of the House. In 1876, he had obtained a first survey of this harbour; this survey had been concluded last autumn, after the elections. For, if the survey had taken place before the elections, his opponents would not have failed to raise the cry of corruption. But, because there was yet no wharf at Bic, did it follow that the Government should not have begun the works at Matane? He believed that the distance between Bic and Matane was great enough, since it was nearly 73 miles, to admit of the building of wharfs at both places, without warranting the cry of injustice being raised, and he was sure that the improvement of these two harbours would offer real advantages to navigation. He hoped that these works would be executed even by the present Administration.

Mr. LANDRY said that he congratulated himself upon having made the motion that was now before the Chair. It had given rise to a very interesting debate that had entirely brought to light the motives of the late Government, and those of the hon. member (Mr. Fiset), who was now representing the county of Rimouski, thanks to this harbour of refuge at Matane. That worthy member had endeavoured to justify his conduct. His justification had proved as weak as his conduct had been inadmissible, and had in no way weakened the charges brought against him by public opinion, and that he would substantiate when the papers he asked for were brought down. In his weak defence, the hon. member for Rimouski had made statements that he challenged him to maintain. According to the hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Landry) was the mouthpiece of the hon. the Postmaster-General, who had, if not drawn up, at least prompted, the present motion. Could the hon. member prove what he had insinuated? He emphatically denied the fact; he spurned the insinuation. He had never had any understanding with the Postmaster-General upon this subject. When he had drawn up his motion, and laid it upon the table of the House, the hon. Minister was absent from the capital, and had no knowledge of the affair. But this mattered little. His own statement should suffice, and he declared that he had made this motion free from all outside influence, and that he was ready to assume the responsibility of his conduct. Moreover, he had not yet said his last word, and, with the permission of his hon. friend the member for Rimouski, he would have several other motions of a similar nature to bring before the House, for he wished to prove to the House and to the country to what a happy concurrence of circumstances the county of Rimouski owed its present representative. In the case under discussion, $10,000 had been voted by the last Parliament, and expended in deepening a harbour of refuge at Matane. This money had been first granted in spite of an engineer's report, stating that it was impossible to deepen the harbour in question. But that was not all, and if hon. members would glance at the report of Public Works, the last one published under the control of the late Administration, they would admire with him how artfully, how scrupulously it was insinuated in every line that this money should be spent in this manner and not in that, by day-work and not by contract, so as to forward the political and private interests of the hon. member for Rimouski, and not the public interests. The hon. member (Mr. Fiset) should not state to the House that when this money was granted there was no question of the hon. the Postmaster-General being a candidate, for he (Mr. Fiset) knew that his conduct in the House, during the whole of the last Parliament, had been such that the Conservative party, whose ranks he had deserted, would be obliged to bring out an opponent against him. The name of this opponent was of little importance, and he maintained that, when this sum had been granted, the hon. member for Rimouski, whilst he was, perhaps, ignorant of the name of his opponent, knew perfectly well that the Conservative party would bring out a candidate against him, and the events had justified his expectations. But what did this assertion signify, and would it be believed by this House, especially after the explanations given by the hon. member for Fortneuf, that, when every one knew that when this sum was granted, the county of Rimouski was the scene of the hottest of electoral contests? Who had sent to the electors of the county the glad tidings that the Joly Government could find a refuge even in the harbour of Matane? None other than the hon. member for Rimouski himself. Had he disowned his despatch? Could he deny that this despatch had been sent during the late Provincial elections—the very day before the polling took place? He had denied nothing of the kind and he could not do so; and it was with these grave and compromising charges hanging over him that the hon. member stood up before this House and declared that when this money had been voted there was no question of elections. The hon. member would allow him to say that such an assertion was more than hazardous, it was a breach of truth. When the last supplies had been voted in this House, it was well known that the Province of Quebec had just been dumb-founded by the coup d'etat, and that the greatest agitation existed there. The dissolution of the Assembly had taken place, and the Province was over head and ears in the general elections. It was to be supposed that the hon. member for Rimouski was also over head and ears somewhere, since he could not remember what had taken place. But, at the time, he had not forgotten his $10,000, and it was when his county was in the midst of an electoral contest, when the Conservative party was threatening to defeat his friend, Mr. Chauveau, that he sent the glad intelligence announcing to his friend that he could, for $10,000, find a refuge, even in the little harbour of Matane. The hon. member for Rimouski had stated that it was a convenient harbour. There was no question whatever about that, and the immediate result of the elections had shown that it was very convenient indeed for the Liberal candidates in the county of Rimouski; but what he (Mr. Landry) could vouch for was that, though the hon. member for Rimouski had found a refuge in the convenient harbour of Matane, he would look in vain for a refuge in the confidence of this House. If he wished to wander from the question, or, at least, to speak of certain things that were connected therewith, though a little remotely, a curious study might be made of certain intrigues resorted to by the Party of Purity in the county of Rimouski during the late general election. But for the moment he would admire the charming artlessness displayed by the hon. member, who, not satisfied with having squandered the public money for electoral purposes, asked, with the greatest candour, that the Government of the day should furnish him the means of working against them. Were they perchance on the eve of a new general election—at least in the Province of Quebec? The conduct of the hon. member would seem to indicate it. Later, when the papers asked for would be brought down, hon. members might gaze on the beautiful electoral purity that had lighted up the late general elections in the county of Rimouski, and that even within these walls shed its effulgence on the head of the hon. member for Rimouski.

SEIZURE OF AN AMERICAN WRECKING STEAMER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for a return of all reports, evidence, protests, documents and correspondence in reference to the seizure of the steam tug Sarah E. Bryant, of Buffalo, N. Y., by the Customs authorities at Dunnville, in or about the month of November, 1874, for an alleged breach of the Coasting and Revenue Laws, in going to the rescue of the crew and cargo of the wrecked American schooner Augustus Ford, of Oswego, U.S., and statement of the fine imposed, and by whose directions and by what authority the said seizure was made and the said fine inflicted. He said he was induced to make this motion in consequence of the antagonism that had grown up between wrecking companies on the American side, and those on the Canadian side. He understood that, in November, 1874, the schooner mentioned in his motion was wrecked at or near the Grand River. The tug Sarah E. Bryant was telegraphed for and went to her assistance. She found the vessel stranded; the captain, female cook, and two sailors dead, frozen in the ice, on board the vessel. An effort was at once made to take off the bodies, and, after doing that, and after lending some aid to a Canadian lighter, the Customs authorities from Dunnville came out and seized her, and imposed a fine of four hundred dollars, of which, however, he was told there was afterwards some remission, but without explanation why. From the little examination he had been able to make into the papers he found in the Customs Department, he thought it desirable, as a great deal of discussion had been going on in connection with this matter, that the whole of the facts of this transaction should see the light of day. He submitted that his motion was in the interests of humanity. They ought to know whether it was a fact that in this country our laws prevented assistance going to the aid of a distressed or shipwrecked vessel, unless that aid was in the shape of a vessel belonging to our own marine, and that, before even that could take place, such aiding vessel must go into port and report to the Customs authorities.

MR. McCALLUM said, before the motion passed, he would like to make some remarks in reference to the matter. As he lived near the part of the country where the wreck and loss of life took place, he could tell his hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) that he was very much mistaken as to the facts. The schooner Augustus Ford went ashore near the mouth of the Grand River in a storm, late in the season, and some of the crew perished. The survivors of that crew were rescued next morning by the Canadian tug Jessie. But the hon. gentleman, by his remarks, would lead people to believe that they were all savages in that neighbourhood, and rendered no assistance, and that the tug Sarah E. Bryant was seized for going to the wreck to save life, and that she was telegraphed for in the interest of humanity. But that was not the case; she was seized for coasting—towing in and out of the harbour while Canadian tugs were lying idle, and not for attempting to render assistance, as stated by the hon. member. Those that perished on the wreck were out of humanity's reach days before the tug Sarah E. Bryant arrived. It was all very well to say that the American tugs came to Canadian waters in the interest of humanity, but they came for a different purpose, simply to make money. Wreckers seldom saved life—the crews of wrecked vessels were, in a large majority, if not all cases, saved, or lost, before the wreckers got there—saved by the means at their own disposal, or assistance procured from the shore.

MR. DECOSMOS said he believed there ought to be some reciprocal arrangements between the United States and Canada, with a view to protect the lives and property of persons on board vessels wrecked on either shore. If the hon. member for Hamilton added to his motion, to bring down certain papers in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the House would have an opportunity of seeing that proposals had been made to the United States Government, with the object of allowing wrecking tugs on both sides to be used for the relief of wrecked vessels. In his Province they had about one hundred and fifty miles of navigation along the water boundary, and vessels occasionally went ashore on both sides, and it would be an advantage if a reciprocal arrangement could be brought about. He was thoroughly in favour of protecting our own shipping, no matter of what character; but, as the hon. gentleman had referred to this matter as “an act of humanity,” he thought the House should endeavour to get such a measure passed by the two Governments as would secure the earliest relief to vessels in distress. Therefore, he would move, in amendment, that the said resolution be amended, by adding thereto the following words:—“Also, any correspondence, between the United States and Canada, respecting reciprocal legislation with reference to using wrecking-tugs in the waters of the respective countries.”

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he had much pleasure in acceding to the request of the hon. member who had just spoken; but he would say that the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) ought to be the last person to assume to attach a doubt to the motives for his (Mr. Robertson's) action in this matter, and that he ought rather to have thanked him for the motion he had laid before the House. He (Mr. Robertson) had not insinuated that all living on the northern shore were “Turks.” He was induced to make this motion from information given him and from sworn statements he had seen, and from documents and reports in reference to this matter in the Department of Customs. He had no doubt there was a great deal of truth in what the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) said. There were generally two sides to a story; nevertheless, he submitted that in that there was additional reason why this matter should be brought before the House. He believed it was the duty of this Government and of the Government of the United States, to make such reciprocal arrangements as would allow of vessels on one side going to the assistance of distressed vessels on the other side, and vice versa. He was quite willing to have his motion amended in the direction suggested by his hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), believing that it would have the effect of opening the eyes of the people of this country to the state of affairs that had been and were now existing. He had been very much surprised when he saw, among the papers in the Customs Department, the following circular:—

"OTTAWA, March 8th, 1878.

"SIR.—I am now instructed by the Minister of Customs to call your attention to the bearing of the Customs Law upon the treatment of wrecked vessels, or property, in Canadian waters, which provides, in effect, that no vessel, foreign or Canadian, has a legal right to interfere with wrecked vessels, or material, in Canadian waters, unless permitted by the Collector of Customs at the nearest port, after reporting to him; and no foreign vessel should receive such permission, as it is contrary to the Customs Law, and should be placed under detention, in case of violation.

"I have the honour, etc.,

"To Collector of Customs."

What he objected to in this circular was that it implied that, no matter where aid should come from, it should not be given to unfortunate people who were in distress, until the intended aid should first report to the nearest Customs authorities. He believed that the intention really was that aid should only be given by our own wrecking vessels; but this paper did not say so, and it went to the extraordinary length of saying that, under no circumstances, should aid be given, unless under authority, as stated. It seemed to him (Mr. Robertson) that it was a very heartless regulation, and one which called for amelioration immediately.

MR. STEPHENSON said he would rather the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) would allow this resolution to stand for a few days. He believed evidence would be brought before the House on this particular subject that would make it clear to his (Mr. Robertson's) mind that Canadian interests were not being lost sight of. They knew very well, in the western part of the country, that American tug-owners were boasting that they could violate our coast. It was no encouragement to Canadians who had gone to the expense of getting the necessary appliances. The Americans asked us for reciprocal arrangements, but they asked it simply because they considered they would get more than they would give. He was of opinion we should keep what we had got, and not give anything without getting quid pro quo.

MR. ROBERTSON said he had no objection to allowing the motion to stand for a short time.

MR. MILLS said it appeared to him to be an extraordinary way of promoting the public interest and encouraging the commerce of the country to say that a vessel in a perilous position should be obliged to wait twenty-four or forty-eight hours for assistance from a Canadian tug, when it might obtain assistance at once from an American one. Whether a vessel received little injury or became a total wreck, might depend upon its receiving assistance promptly. It would be discreditable in the last degree to the Governments of both countries, if they were to adopt a policy of retaliation. Under the treaty which established the boundary between Canada and the United States, the waters that formed the separating line, so far as navigable waters did form a separating line, were made navigable to both from shore to shore. If it were true that, under the treaty establishing the boundary, each Government had the right to use the water course from shore to shore, irrespective of the imaginary line which might form the boundary, he did not think the Government of the United States could prevent Canadian vessels going to the assistance of other Canadian vessels within those limits. They would be simply exercising those rights secured to them by the treaty. He had no doubt that the two Governments could, without difficulty, come to understanding on this subject, that of preventing tugs of one country from going into the waters of the other. On the lakes, large Canadian vessels were sometimes stranded that no Canadian tugs could take off, and Canadian vessels in distress, had, after efforts had been made to assist them by Canadian tugs, to apply to American tugs to enable them to get into port. If the matter were looked into, it would be found that Canadian vessels had a right to navigate on the coast of the United States, and American vessels had an equal right to our shores.

MR. BOWELL said he had no objection to bring down the papers asked for, but it seemed to him somewhat strange that the hon. member for Bothwell should give utterance to the remarks he had, when, if he had reflected for a moment, he would have seen that the order read to the House had been issued by the Government of which he was a member, on the 8th March, 1878. The subject had given the present Government a great deal of consideration, more particularly as their attention had been drawn to its effect by the Minister at Washington. He hoped an amicable arrangement could be arrived at on this question, but in this, as in all other matters, he feared that those who now asked for reciprocity in tugging and wrecking, desired to have it nearly all on the one side. He did not think this order went to the length stated by the hon. member for Hamilton. There was a difference between vessels in distress and wrecked vessels. The order applied only to the latter, and he believed it was issued to protect the revenue as well as in the interests of Canadian tug-boats, by preventing goods being discharged from wrecked vessels, and landed without the authority and knowledge of the Customs authorities, and carried away without paying duty. In the past, the American authorities had maintained the exclusive right for their own vessels in American waters, to aid vessels, whether in distress or wrecked, whether of American or of British bottoms, and had seized and imposed fines on any British tug which had gone to the assistance of such vessels. That having been brought to the notice of the late Government, that "discreditable" order, as the hon. member for Bothwell had termed it, was issued by his own colleague. He was not prepared to say that the late Minister of Customs was wrong in issuing this order, though it might, perhaps, have been more explicit, by drawing a distinction—although it was not necessary for those engaged in maritime pursuits—between vessels in distress and wrecked vessels. This order did not prevent any foreign tug from going to the assistance of vessels, whether American or Canadian, in distress in Canadian waters; it only applied to wrecked vessels when it was necessary to protect the revenue, and advisable to give the work to Canadian tugs. It was stated, and he thought with some truth, that the American underwriters and the American wrecking or tugging companies were in league, and would pass, though the wrecks occurred on Canadian shores, the ports in which Canadian tugs were lying, and go as far as Buffalo and other American cities; in order to obtain American tugs and bring them into our waters so as to deprive Canadian tug owners of the work which legitimately belonged to them. In cases of wrecks which took place in the western lakes, the Government were desirous of meeting the American tug owners, at least half way, or more than half way, in order that every facility might be given to wrecked vessels. He hoped shortly to be able to lay a report before Parliament which would show the course pursued in the past by both Governments, and the results which had flowed from the order issued by the late Government. In the meantime he would ask the hon. gentleman to allow his motion to stand.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said the tug service of Ontario had given the late Government a great deal of anxiety, as, in almost every instance of dispute, they were called on to act promptly. The American tug service in the lakes was larger, and more scattered, and better able to act impromptu than our Canadian service. They had, in the interests of humanity, as said by the hon. member for Hamilton, and for the saving of property, to put a liberal construction on applications made for immediate permission to use American tugs. The late Government had been frequently telegraphed to that a vessel was in distress and property and life in danger, and that it would be three or four days before a Canadian tug could render assistance. It was difficult in such cases to refuse immediate assistance. In the case referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton's motion, he (Mr. Burpee) could not remember the particulars. The circular referred to by the hon. the Minister of Customs, applied entirely to wrecked vessels and property, and was explicit enough. The late Government used every means in their power, as far as they possibly could, to protect the Canadian tug service from the encroachments of the United States Tug Company on Canadian shores. The question of right, under the treaty, was claimed by some, and a correspondence was going on between the Governments of Canada and the United States on this question, with a view to bring about some satisfactory solution of the difficulty and a reciprocity in this service.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the Congress of the United States had passed a Bill operative on condition of a similar law being passed by the Dominion, for reciprocity in the matter. He had enquired into the matter, and found that a much larger number of wrecks had occurred on our side than on theirs, so that they would have all the advantage. Therefore, while he was pressed, on the one hand, to introduce a similar measure in this House, it was opposed strongly by important interests in Ontario.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had correctly described the position. It had been found that, with a larger capital engaged in the wrecking, all the work was done by Americans. Preference was always given, it was found, by Canadian shipping to American vessels, and Canadian vessels were charged exorbitant prices. In self-defence, a Canadian Tug Company was got up, to give our wreckers a chance in the business, the profits of which would be considerable, as the largest number of wrecks took place on our coast. As soon as the owners of tug boats in the United States found this out, this measure was introduced in Congress. It was a sham reciprocity, which would not have been proposed had it not been for this order by the late Government. The order was quite explicit enough. A wrecked vessel was still afloat, and, by the maritime law, all vessels could go to its rescue and claim salvage, but a vessel once fairly ashore stood in quite a different position. It was especially necessary along our line of water that our Customs should not be interfered with. A vessel might be of small value and have a most valuable cargo, and she could be wrecked, and the goods smuggled into our country. This order was made to prevent anything of that kind. When the papers came down, the matter would be discussed at greater length.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had been informed, by some of the shareholders of the Company, that it had cost $20,000 to get the vessel off, while, had they been permitted to engage a United States steamer, the cost would not have been a quarter of that amount. On Lakes Huron and Superior, where we had a number of large steamers, we had scarcely any tugs powerful enough to render them assistance. As to a vessel being utterly destroyed when she happened to be wrecked, the hon. gentleman was mistaken. Many vessels had gone ashore and been afterwards hauled off. It depended a good deal on whether by the beaching of the vessel she would sustain serious damage or not. They would have to take care, whilst measures were taken in order to do justice to the tug owners, the smaller interest, they did not shipwreck the hopes of shipowners.

MR. MCCALLUM said that the hon. member for Lambton had stated that it would take over $20,000 to take off this steamer. He (Mr. McCallum) knew to the contrary. Two American tugs had been employed, and they went ashore and were wrecked. When they found they could not take her off they sent for the Canadian tug Prince Alfred. Finding her insufficient, another American tug was sent for, while the Canadian tugs were unemployed—that in the face of the law. His hon. friend said there were no boats in Canada. They had, however, as powerful boats as the Americans, and he contended that they could get their tugs from Windsor as conveniently as from Detroit. The schooner M. C. Cameron, at Goderich, went ashore, and there were negotiations with the Canadian Tug Company to take her off. But they found they could get an American tug a few dollars cheaper, and they obtained one from Detroit, contrary to law, while Canadian tugs were lying idle. The hon. member for Hamilton had spoken about humanity, but he (Mr. McCallum) could tell him that a good many of the men spoken of were out of humanity's reach. It was days after the storm was over when the seizure took place, and he did not think the fine imposed in regard to the Sarah E. Bryant was sufficiently heavy.

MR. KIRKPATRICK moved the adjournment of the debate.

ROYAL INSTRUCTIONS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MILLS moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Kingdom upon the subject of the Royal Instructions prior to the 5th of October, 1878. He said there was a wide difference between the Royal Instructions given Lord Dufferin in 1872, and those received by the present Governor-General. Those brought down a few days ago were made to conform to the system of Government established by the British North America Act. It appeared the Colonial Secretary reserved to himself powers the Act did not contemplate. The Commission to Lord Dufferin provided that certain important questions which, by the British North America Act, Parliament was expressly authorised to legislate upon should be reserved by the Governor-General for the consideration of Her Majesty. Since that Act provided for the establishment of a system of Government similar to what existed in the United Kingdom, it was obvious the Governor-General could not be authorised to act in a manner inconsistent with its provisions and with the principles of parliamentary government, by Royal Instructions. The Colonial Secretary, under former Instructions, might have advised Her Majesty to reserve everything, so that not a single measure could become law without the authority of parties not recognised by the Act, nor in any way responsible to the Parliament of Canada for the advice they gave. The principle of the Instructions of 1872 was wholly inconsistent with the Constitution; and, if the spirit of the British North America Act were complied with, the Royal Instructions must be in accordance with its principles, and for the purpose of giving effect to its provisions. They saw those Instructions had been greatly modified, and all those objectionable features removed. In the Royal Instructions to Lord Dufferin, in the exercise of the power of pardon, His Lordship was expressly authorised, if he saw proper, to disregard the counsel of his constitutional advisers. It was perfectly clear the Parliament of Canada was authorised to deal with criminal legislation. It could scarcely be assumed that, although competent to legislate upon the subject of crimes, and to advise the Crown in the appointment of the administrators of the law, they were not competent to advise it as to who were proper subjects of its clemency. The objectionable feature of the former Instructions was this—they assumed that the advisers of Her Majesty in Great Britain were superior to the law passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom as our Charter. Those objectionable features had been removed. There was no special class of subjects which His Excellency the present Governor-General had been instructed to reserve. There was no measure which, if now passed by Parliament, might not become law on the advice of those enjoying the confidence of the majority of the House. All those changes were in the direction of a more intelligent view of our rights and of a larger measure of self-government. Those changes, he believed, had been made in the Royal Instructions through the action of the late Government. When the correspondence between the Canadian and the Colonial Secretaries was brought down, he thought it would be seen that the late Canadian Government were not unmindful of the people's interests in this matter, nor indifferent to the encroachments made in the powers of self-government conferred upon Canadians by the British North America Act.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced a Bill (No. 21) To amend the Do-

The amendments were simply of a technical character, suggested by the Surveyor-General for the purpose of correcting certain errors in the Act. During the present Session, he proposed bringing down another Bill involving questions of policy.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[Bill 13.]

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider certain resolutions respecting the North-West Mounted Police Force.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 13.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 13) To amend and consolidate, as amended, the several enactments respecting the North-West Mounted Police Force.

(In the Committee.)

On Section 5,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the clause contained the following provision :—

“Provided that the Commissioner may appoint supernumerary constables not exceeding in the whole ten men, in order to fill vacancies in the force, and may employ not exceeding in the whole ten men as scouts, at such rates of pay as may be authorised by the Minister charged with the control and management of the Force.”

MR. MACKENZIE : That is practically an addition of twenty men.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he explained, in introducing the Bill, the great service scouts were found to be of in the United States. The late Government had recommended the employment of one scout, and he had been found of such value that Colonel McLeod, the commander of the Mounted Police, asked for liberty to employ seven scouts. It did not, however, follow that the whole number would be wanted, probably not more than two or three.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked if there was any particular necessity for introducing a special clause in the Act. He thought last year a vote was taken for the employment of guides in the ordinary Estimates.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was a special order given last year for the employment of a scout, and he was paid by a special warrant, certainly not out of the ordinary vote. He thought it was better that the Government should know the number of men that could be employed for this useful purpose.

MR. SCHULTZ said that there could be no question as to the advisability of employing these Indian or half-breed scouts. So advantageous had it been found in connection with the United States army that the President had called attention to the advisability of it in his last Message, and the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior both strongly recommended their employment.

MR. MACKENZIE said what he wished to know was, whether the ten supernumeraries were to be employed as scouts?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: This, then, is a practical addition of twenty men?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes; the scouts would not be policemen, but, largely, Indians or half-breeds of different tribes, speaking different languages.

MR. MILLS said the hon. the Premier took power to increase the force to 500 men in case of emergency, which would, probably, mean any complication with the Indians, which would require the police force to act as a military force also, in case of Indian hostilities against the white settlers. He thought it extremely questionable whether this was the best way of meeting the difficulties that might thus arise. In the event of hostilities the Government would, doubtless, be obliged to call in the ordinary military force of the country. He was strongly impressed with the idea that there was danger of difficulties with the aborigines at no very remote period. He believed the supply of buffalo would, at an early day, be exhausted, these buffalo being the principal means of support of the Indians; and, unless something was done, at an early day, to induce them to engage in industrial pursuits, serious complications would arise, when their present means of subsistence failed. He thought the proposed measure would prove a rather expensive way of maintaining peace in that country. The police, doubtless, were sufficient for actual wants, but would be wholly inadequate if difficulties arose with the Indian population. He thought the effect of the Bill would be to induce the officials to rely rather on this measure for the maintenance of order than to take those necessary precautions for the prevention of difficulties.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said no doubt the danger the hon. gentleman mentioned must always be contemplated.

The Government and Parliament must be prepared for an outbreak sometime when the Indians' means of subsistence failed or became scarce. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought there were satisfactory indications that the Indians were beginning, of themselves, in a very imperfect way, certainly, to see the advantage of settling down and becoming agriculturists, so far, at all events, as to raise their own food. There had been annual votes for seed grain, cattle and other things with that object in view. It was to be hoped they would be yearly more able to produce their own food from the soil, instead of trusting altogether to hunting. Still, all those efforts might fail, and the Indians be driven to violent courses by hunger, to fighting among themselves, or with the whites. It would, then, be absolutely necessary that an efficient force should be raised as speedily as possible to protect the whites, and restore peace. They had the nucleus of a well-trained force in the Mounted Police. The service was very popular, there being upwards of 800 applications for a chance of two vacancies in the spring. There would be very little difficulty in getting the best kind of men, who would make a valuable force, that would be easily increased and quickly trained in the event of any outrage in the North-West. The present force would be insufficient in case of war, when the militia would have to be raised to put down any serious rising. It was important, therefore, that, should a serious emergency arise, a sufficient force could be employed without the necessity of calling Parliament together.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had not the slightest intention of opposing the power asked for in this measure, which was reasonable; but he wished to add his voice to that of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to the enormous importance of allowing no means to be neglected for inducing those Indian tribes to maintain themselves by other means than hunting. He had felt, so far back as 1872, there was serious danger in that respect. Nothing could contribute more to the embarrassment of the finances than an Indian war. He urged the necessity of the extremest, the most careful supervision over the Indian agents, and, above all, the direction of the attention of the Indians, at the earliest possible moment, to the raising of a portion of their own supplies, at least. This was a matter in which he took a considerable interest, and he knew Colonel McLeod took a very great interest in it. He (Mr. Cartwright) thought there was reason, from the experience of the Sioux, to believe that, if the Indians were fairly dealt with and encouraged, they would do a great deal towards providing for their own maintenance; and, although he regretted exceedingly the necessity of increasing the grants to the Indian tribes, he felt that was better than being plunged into such troubles as those with which the American Government had been struggling for the last twenty-five years.

MR. MILLS said, in his opinion, their whole Indian system was a failure, and not entitled to the praise of superiority to the American generally, though there had been no difficulty in dealing with the few Indians scattered through the older Provinces of Canada, but, when they looked at that aboriginal population, and the long period they had been under civilisation, they must admit the uselessness of the efforts made to elevate them from barbarism. The Canadian policy had only served to impoverish them, and would, in the North-West, prove a total failure, unless they induced the Indians to remain fixed in the soil, and the tribal system and the influence of the chiefs as early as possible, and gave each individual a right of separate property in the soil, and induced the Indians to engage in agricultural pursuits. No doubt, before the time of the present Parliament expired, serious troubles would be witnessed in the North-West. It was highly important that Government should adopt some vigorous Indian policy, and employ, in the Indian Department, upright, energetic, intelligent men, prepared to run some personal risk, and submit to some personal inconvenience to promote the interests of the Indians. Unless the Government did that, gave personal attention to this subject, and pursued a policy wholly different from the present, there could be no doubt the provisions in this Bill would be wholly inadequate to the maintenance of peace in the North-West.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was extremely pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) in the support he gave the measure. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) quite agreed with the observations of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to the public necessity of, as speedily as possible, and without too strict attention to economy, making a strenuous effort to wean the Indians from their wild habits and make them settled residents. The sooner the tribal system was abandoned, and the Indian induced to settle on his own land, cultivate it, and, if valuable, hold it in perpetuity, the better. He thought the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mills) did not suppose the power of alienation should be given the aborigines, who could be wheedled out of their rights. He was in the Indian Department for some time, and took certain steps with this object, which the present Government would follow up. They would, however, cost money, but he hoped that thereby a great advance would be made in Indian civilisation. Under our system, which was, doubtless, too much vaunted, but which was better than the American, the Indians had felt secure, and could be easily managed. The difference between the American and our management was the greater honesty of ours, though even in the Canadian North-West some frauds were said to have been perpetrated upon the Indians, such as giving them inferior grain and oxen. Whether that were true or not he had not been able to verify, but he agreed with the hon. member that every means had been taken to ensure the strictest honesty in the Government officials. It was, and would be, very difficult to keep a check on Indian agents. He had hoped that, under the system adopted by the late Government, of appointing the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Territory Superintendent of Indians, all the subordinate agents might report to him. The Lieutenant-Governor had written that his position as Governor of the North-West clashed with his position as Superintendent of Indians, and he was obliged to resign the latter. They would have to appoint some person of standing, with rank equivalent in dignity to that of Governor, as a Commissioner of Indians, who would have, on the spot, despotic powers over the various Indian agents, and thus be enabled to rectify at once any wrong practised on the Indians.

On Section 6,

MR. MACDOUGALL said he desired to know what was the liability of the Government in case of members of the force being injured or meeting with accidents which incapacitated them from further service in the force, or from earning a livelihood out of it. A case had come under his notice recently in which a very large claim was made, with apparent justice, against the Government for indemnity, in consequence of injuries received in obeying the orders of the superior officer, by which the soldier was exposed to severe frost, and crippled for life. In the latter part of the Bill, a clause was inserted stating that commissioned officers were entitled to superannuation in the same manner as other civil servants, but nothing was said about constables. Some provision should be made, fixing settlements of indemnity claims at a reasonable amount.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no provision in the Bill providing for compensation to any of these policemen injured, nor was there any in the Militia Act. If a mounted policeman were wounded or injured in the performance of his duty, he would be treated by Parliament as a militiaman would be treated in a similar case. During the Fenian raid, Parliament came readily forward, and provided for certain militiamen who were wounded, and made allowances to the families of those who were slain. If a good case were made out, Parliament would, no doubt, provide ample compensation. It would be infinitely better to leave the matter as it was.

MR. MACKENZIE said he entirely agreed in that opinion. He recollected cases in which claims for compensation were made of a character which would not justify the Government in granting them. The pay was very good, and a reward of 160 acres was given at the end of the term, as a further inducement, and there was no more reason for compensating men who suffered some injury or other while in the police service than any other labouring men. The Government would be willing, no doubt, to make such provision as could be made for men injured in their employment. In his Department, two men who had been injured in the police service were employed as writers. He would be strongly opposed to any permanent provision such as was given to soldiers of the regular army, whose pay was very small and who were exposed to dangers these men were not exposed to, being made. The claims for compensation arising at present were not of a character to demand any serious attention. One person had demanded compensation because a consumptive habit had been developed instead of cured by his service in the force. He ought never to have entered it, and it would have been an imposition on the country to have rewarded him because he spent one or two years in the service and during that time could only have discharged his duties.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was told the claim which the hon. gentleman had spoken of was made by a man who had lost his toe, and he asked $10,000 for it. Very few people would refuse to give up a toe for that amount.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYÉS AND ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. FLEMING moved for a return showing the number of persons employed on the 31st December last on each of the railways in the Dominion (classified according to the nature of the work performed by them); also, a return of all accidents and casualties (whether to life or property) which have occurred on the railways of the Dominion during the year 1878, setting forth: 1st. The causes and natures of such accidents and casualties; 2nd. The points at which they occurred, and whether by night or day; 3rd. The full extent thereof and all the particulars of the same. He simply wished to say that it was desirable to place before the House a full and complete statement of the accidents that had occurred on the railways of the Dominion. The question had frequently been brought before the House, and returns asked for. These, however, with the exception of one brought down last Session, had not been printed, and could only be found by a search among the files in the office of the Clerk of Records. It appeared that in three years over 1,200 accidents of a personal nature had occurred on the railways of the Dominion. A very large proportion of these—between 70 and 75 per cent.—had occurred to railway employes, in the prosecution of their labours. It was desirable to know the number of individuals employed in the different branches of the railway service, so that a comparison might be made between the number engaged in a particular class of work and the number of accidents which occurred in the performance of such work.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the usual annual report upon the railways of the Dominion was yet published, or to be published.

MR. TUPPER: It is intended to be published, and is now in course of completion.

THE TORONTO POSTMASTERSHIP.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

MR. HAY moved for a copy of the Order in Council under and by which the late postmaster of the city of Toronto was superannuated, and all correspondence in connection therewith, and which led up to the superannuation of the said postmaster. He said a good deal of comment had been excited in Toronto on the appointment of Mr. Patteson to the postmastership, and the people desired to know all the facts in relation to the change. He had been much pleased to learn from the hon. the Postmaster-General that the salary had been reduced instead of increased, and it was reported in Toronto—whether correctly or not, he could not say—that a saving had been effected of $1,000 a year. The next question was, how came Mr. Lesslie to be superannuated at all while he was still able and willing to do the work, as he (Mr. Hay) believed? He thought it was a bad beginning to burden the country with new appointments like that, when there was no necessity for it. It was very desirable that the most rigid economy should be observed in the Civil Service. The verdict of the 17th September last demanded it. In these times of severe depression, when thousands of good and honest men were unable to earn their daily bread, they should endeavour to be as economical as possible in all branches of the Civil Service.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if his hon. friend (Mr. Hay) would agree to the following amendment:—"Also, all correspondence and Orders in Council respecting the appointment of Mr. Patteson to the said office."

MR. HAY said he had no objection. Another thing had been done in Toronto by the Post Office Department a few years ago, which was nothing but a gross job. He referred to the case of Mr. Sweetnam, the inspector, whose duties were divided, and a gentleman appointed by the name of Spry to relieve Mr. Sweetnam. And this was done, although Mr. Sweetnam was one of the most efficient officers under the Crown, and quite capable of doing all the work—Mr. Sweetnam had told him so himself. It was not right that the Toronto post-office should thus be burdened with unnecessary officials.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was sorry his hon. friend had chosen to make the remarks he did concerning a public officer in Toronto. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was certain that every inhabitant of Toronto would say that Mr. Spry was quite as respectable a gentleman as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hay) himself. There was not a more respectable man in the city of Toronto than Mr. Spry, and the duties of the office were not performed, and could not be performed, by one inspector. The district was divided, and properly divided, because it was entirely too large for any possible superintendence by one man.

MR. HAY said he was informed by Mr. Sweetnam himself that there was no need of another Inspector. As for Mr.

Spry, he (Mr. Hay) did not know him, but he believed there was nothing against him personally.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, then, you should not describe him.

MR. LANGEVIN said there was no objection to the motion being adopted, nor was there any objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman on the other side. The papers would be brought down as soon as possible, and they would show that the late postmaster at Toronto, Mr. Lesslie, had been an officer of the Government for 30 years; that he was over 65 years of age; that he had contributed to the superannuation Fund for a large number of years, and having arrived at that time of life when a man required some rest, it was only fair, after having been 30 years in the service, that he should be allowed superannuation.

MR. HOLTON: Did he apply for it?

MR. LANGEVIN: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was he asked to apply for it?

MR. LANGEVIN said Mr. Lesslie applied for superannuation. The Government in this case had been as humane as had the hon. gentlemen opposite in the superannuation of Mr. Meredith, Deputy to the Minister of the Interior. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not find fault with themselves for that superannuation. Then there was the superannuation of Mr. Langton, who had also been a long time in the public service. Added to these was the superannuation of the Postmaster of St. John, N. B. Notwithstanding the fact, as all must admit, who knew either Mr. Meredith or Mr. Langton, that these gentlemen had some years of service left in them, they were allowed their superannuation, and it was only fair that they should have a few years' rest before they went to the grave.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that, during the period he occupied the position now occupied by the hon. the Postmaster-General, he never heard of Mr. Lesslie's desire for superannuation, and he desired to congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the early date upon which he found it necessary to superannuate this gentleman. He wished to call attention to the nature of the criticism of hon. gentlemen of superannuations which had gone before, when it was found they had superannuated a man whom they knew did not desire to be superannuated, for the purpose of making a position for a friend. He did not object to the friend. He (Mr. Huntington) believed Mr. Patteson was not only an earnest and consistent friend in office, but a dangerous friend to disoblige. He desired, however, to call attention to the sincerity of the conduct of hon. gentlemen in condemning the policy of superannuation of the late Government, when they superannuated a man who did not wish to be superannuated, and thrust an individual into office whom the general voice of the country would declare had no claims to the position other than those for political services he had rendered.

MR. TUPPER said he thought this subject was of sufficient importance to attract some attention from the House, and that any member who would put on the paper a notice asking for the appointment of a Committee composed of members of both sides of the House, to examine into every case of superannuation that had taken place under the Act, and report to the House, would do a great service to the country. He was a little surprised that the hon. the late Postmaster-General should have feigned indignation at an aged public officer being superannuated after having expressed a desire for superannuation. Did the hon. gentleman never hear of the superannuation of the Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary by the late Government, of which he was a member? Those gentlemen found it convenient to make a vacancy for a member of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, for whom it was necessary to make provision, and he was given the position of Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary.

MR. HUNTINGTON: What did you say about it?

MR. TUPPER said that, when he was on the other side of the House, he characterised the course pursued by the Government as highly discreditable. He stated, at the same time, that the late Government applied to the Inspectors of Penitentiaries to report the Warden, Mr. Donkin, for superannuation, and the answer they received from their own officers was that they were prepared to do so, but they would be obliged to report that he had no superior in his position in the public service. Notwithstanding that, however, they found means to superannuate Mr. Donkin, and placed another gentleman in his position. In this case the late Government brought in a new man with a largely increased salary, and that salary was raised with a view to the new incumbent. In the case of the Toronto postmastership, the vacancy was disposed of by placing an able, competent and energetic man, in the prime of life, to discharge the duties, at a salary of $500 less than that of the previous employé. He (Mr. Tupper) had no doubt that the statements that had been scattered all over the country by the press supporting the hon. gentleman opposite, to the effect that with the installation of Mr. T. C. Patteson, the salary attached to the office had been increased, had done its work. Notwithstanding the explanations that had been made, hon. gentlemen were still dissatisfied. Even when they found Mr. Leslie had been superannuated at his own request, and that there had been a large reduction in the salary, it was still made a subject of animadversion. The Government, however, were prepared to challenge the closest investigation into the exercise of the power of superannuation, from the time of the passage of the Statute until the present time. If a Committee were moved for, as he had suggested, the report would show that the action of the present Government, both when in office before and since they had returned to office, would compare not unfavourably with the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. He wondered if the hon. the late Postmaster-General had any recollection of a very important superannuation he made in his own Department. Had the hon. gentleman entirely forgotten that he had superannuated an able and vigorous public officer to make way for a stranger to the country, who had no claim to consideration at the hands of the Government, who was brought into the Department and placed over the heads of a large number of able and efficient officers? He (Mr. Tupper) trusted this matter would receive the attention it deserved, and that the suggestion he had made for the appointment of a Committee would be acted upon.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the hon. gentleman had been rather unhappy in his illustrations of the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. A few years ago, they passed a Superannuation Act which required that, when an officer of the Government reached the age of 65 years, it was necessary for him to obtain a report from the head of his Department that he was still competent to perform his duties, or he would be superannuated as a matter of course, that age being assumed to imply an inability to discharge efficiently public duties. But, after passing that Act, they appointed to the position of Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary a man who was 66 or 67 years of age, or above the age at which the Postmaster-General said they should give the poor old man, the late Postmaster of Toronto, a few years' rest before he slipped into the grave. The person appointed to the Halifax Penitentiary was utterly incapable of discharging at his age the duties of the position which required a man with strength of body and mind for the proper performance of the duties. He considered that the late Government not only acted rightly, but could not have acted otherwise, in providing for the retirement of a man of that age and appointed when he was too old for service and destitute of experience. There certainly was no analogy in these cases. The hon. gentleman had also mentioned the case of Mr. LeSueur. He presumed the hon. gentleman referred to Mr. LeSueur.

MR. TUPPER : I did.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could only observe that, if Mr. LeSueur desired an investigation of the reason which led to his superannuation, no one on that side of the House would object.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said Mr. LeSueur had written to him saying he wished for an investigation. But he could not understand why Mr. Meredith, a man in the possession of all his physical and mental faculties, as able as ever he was, and, perhaps, more able from experience, to perform his duties, was superannuated. Knowing the wide experience and value of Mr. Meredith, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had asked him to return to the office he held before. He knew that there was not the slightest shadow of an excuse for the superannuation of that gentleman. Then there was Mr. Langton, an old man, but still as vigorous as ever he was in his life, and quite capable of performing his duties when superannuated. He desired to state, further, that he did not think the friends of Mr. Lesslie would thank the hon. member for Shefford for discussing this motion.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said a case of superannuation he desired to bring before the House was certainly not of so much importance as those which had been already referred to. But, when the papers came down, they would show that a certain Mr. Egan, a warm and enthusiastic admirer of the late Government, was as well able to perform his duties as any man could be. He was superannuated and received an allowance of $700 a year. The week following, he entered into an arrangement with an insurance company from which he received a salary of $1,000 a year. Here they had a case of a man receiving $700 a year from the Superannuation Fund, able to perform duties which secured him a salary of $1,000 a year. These things required ventilating, and he did hope the hint thrown out by the hon. the Minister of Public Works would be acted upon.

MR. DOMVILLE said he would like to refer to a case of superannuation in St. John, N.B., where they had superannuated a gentleman perfectly able to do his work, and appointed in his place a political friend and strong partisan of the late Government, at an increase of salary, and he served them, at the present time, by editing a paper in their favour. He (Mr. Domville) thought that illustration should be brought up on this occasion, because when they asked why that gentleman's name appeared in connection with the journal to which he was attached, the late Minister of Customs declared that he had received an assurance from the gentleman in question that he would cease to have any connection with the paper. That hon. gentleman led the House to believe that the appearance of his name in the paper was a mere typographical error; yet his name continued to be freely advertised day after day and month after month. He regarded it as a great injustice that the people should be called upon to pay the superannuation allowance in such a case as this. He had nothing to say against the present Postmaster, as he was a gentleman well fitted for the position in every respect, but only made the illustration to show that the country had been saddled with extra expense for political reasons. Then, in regard to St. John Penitentiary, they appointed one named Ketchem, against whom complaints were made respecting certain moneys he had received in trust, as was usual in such cases, from prisoners. An investigation into the charges was held, with a very damaging result; but, so great a partisan was the Warden, and so faithfully had he worked for the party, that he was not displaced in the face of this investigation, which condemned him in the highest degree. Those papers were in the hands of the Department, and should be brought down. He gave two illustrations from New Brunswick alone, and should like to ask the late Minister of Customs how he could justify his Government in regard to the question of the postmastership.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said the late Postmaster referred to was not superannuated a day too soon in the interest of the public service. He (Mr. Howe) was not fit for the position he held as Postmaster. He had the post-office in difficulties years previous, having been unfit to conduct it properly. He was reported to be more than half of the time absent from the office by indisposition, and was often, in consequence, incapacitated for business when in attendance. With regard to the assertions about the Warden of the Penitentiary, he was very old when superannuated. It was said to be necessary he should be retired, which he (Mr. Burpee) understood was on the recommendation of reliable authorities. As to Mr. Ellis's position, he (Mr. Burpee) would repeat now what he stated last year, that he had been told that he (Mr. Ellis) would disengage himself from his business partnership at the very first opportunity. It was quite well understood his interest in the paper had ceased, beyond the interest in his money remaining in it when he left it. No man in St. John would assert the superannuation of the late Postmaster, Mr. Howe, was not necessary and proper under the circumstances named, and the fact of his having over forty years' service in the Department.

MR. BOULTBEE said he happened to know the gentleman who had been appointed Postmaster in Toronto, and must notice that, while exception was taken to the Minister of Public Works terming him a public official, in fact Mr. Patteson had been an officer under the Government of the late Sandfield Macdonald, and had performed the duties of his office most efficiently, as he (Mr. Boulton) had been told more than once by Mr. Macdonald; and in fact there was no better man for the position. The debate had taken a rather wide range. He did not think the Minister of Public Works should have commented so severely on the conduct of the members for Shefford and Lambton (Messrs. Huntington and Mackenzie), in speaking with a good deal of severity of an appointment like the present, because the gentlemen opposite were Reformers all their lives, and had been asking for economy incessantly, while out of office, and censuring their adversaries for not practising it, in regard to removals of old, and appointments of new, men. Being out of office again, it was quite natural that they should feel in the same economical mood, whether they experienced it in office or not. It might be that while they were in power they were forced to submit to the exigencies of political necessities though against the convictions of a lifetime, which obliged them to infringe somewhat on their principles. They had found it impossible to resist the pressure put on them, as in the case of the late Postmaster, to whom they had behaved most leniently and shown every consideration even far beyond what was right. But he (Mr. Boulton) ventured to say that, seated now in their own proper place, to the Speaker's left, where they would probably remain for sometime, they would be found inspired with as lofty feelings of purity and economy as before; because their minds would naturally return to their ancient grooves. They would find them again criticising every necessary appointment, though not acting upon their professions should they again come into power, the prospect of which was remote, however, at present. In office again, human weakness might once more prevail, and cause them to yield up their great principles, to make appointments like those already condemned, and undergo again the criticism of an intelligent press and the condemnation of the people.

MR. MILLS said hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side had taken a singular way of defending this particular transaction. The Premier stated the late Ministry did very wrong, and he admitted the present had done like their predecessors; that was an extraordinary defence. The hon. gentleman stated that the superannuation of Mr. Meredith, Deputy Minister of the Interior, was highly improper, a transaction similar to that of which complaint was made by the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Hay). There was, it was said, pressure brought to bear by the Postmaster-General upon Mr. Lesslie, to induce him to apply for superannuation. No doubt, the hon. gentleman could tell a great deal more than he had actually revealed; more than the papers would disclose. But Mr. Meredith asked for his superannuation on cogent grounds; and, when the Government looked at his age, the provision of the law, his long service, and repeated applications for superannuation, and his alleged ill-health, they granted it accordingly. The law contemplated superannuation under such circumstances. When a party reached 65 years of age, the law assumed that he was unequal to his work, unless the contrary was shown. The burthen of proof was upon him to show that he was fit to continue in office. The hon. Premier had superannuated parties in many cases, and had promoted the retirement of Judges from the Bench after a very much shorter service than Mr.

Meredith's term. The resignation of the late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who was not older, and had not served longer than that gentleman, was, it appeared, accepted by the right hon. gentleman. He supposed the resignation of the Chief Justice was accepted on the ground of ill-health also, and the Premier would have some reason to complain if the Opposition had charged him with improper conduct. With regard to Mr. Lesslie, the case was different, ill-health and old age not being established in the sense of producing inefficiency; on the contrary, Mr. Lesslie had shown that he was fit. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches admitted they had acted improperly; that Mr. Lesslie was still qualified to perform the duties; but they said to the late Government: "You did the same thing." The late Ministers replied that the cases of Messrs. Meredith and Langton were not on all fours with the Toronto postmastership. The Premier said Mr. Meredith had declined to return to the service. He (Mr. Mills) believed Mr. Lesslie would be perfectly willing to resume his duties. It was rumoured that Mr. Lesslie was informed by the present Postmaster-General that his resignation would be accepted, and that Mr. Lesslie came to Ottawa to show the Postmaster-General that he was in excellent preservation, and that he was still fit for his duties; but the hon. the Postmaster-General insisted upon making him an unwilling object of his disinterested beneficence; they still insisted, much against his will, that he should have a few years of delightful retirement before going to his grave. Mr. Lesslie was very unwilling, but the Government insisted on conferring upon him blessings that he had not, so far, appreciated.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) was not correct in saying he quoted the cases of Messrs. Meredith and Langton as on all fours with Mr. Lesslie's. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was not in the House when the matter came up, but he did say that Messrs. Meredith and Langton were quite capable, physically and mentally, of performing their duty. With regard to Mr. Lesslie, his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin) was no more reticent than he felt it his duty to be, and he had no cause of objection to any inquiry into the matter. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would move for a Committee to enquire into every case of superannuation from the time the Act was passed until the adoption of the resolution, so as to ascertain all the facts as to every superannuation by way of annuity or gratuity. He had known Mr. Lesslie all his life, and had great respect for him, and regretted very much on his account that this discussion had been pressed so far. The only question was whether his hon. friend the Postmaster-General would be justified in recommending the superannuation with a retiring allowance at all. The hon. gentlemen opposite would have the advantage of hearing all the evidence when brought before the Committee.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he regretted very much that the hon. gentleman had seen fit to state that Mr. LeSueur had asked for an investigation, and that the Minister of Public Works saw fit to bring up that matter. He could assure the House that nobody more than Mr. LeSueur must regret the fact, because it was his (Mr. Huntington's) duty now to move for the papers in the case, which he thought it would have been better, in the case of an old public servant like him, not to have done. But he could not leave himself under the imputation of having thrust out an old official and replaced him with a favourite of his own, which had been reiterated here, and, falsely, over and over again, for which there was not a tittle of justification; and he would therefore move for the papers which would show the falsehood of the insinuation made in the newspapers. He should have been glad, if possible, to leave this without taking such a course, but he was constrained to adopt it by the course taken by the hon. gentleman himself.

MR. ROCHESTER said Mr. LeSueur would be perfectly delighted to have the matter examined into.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it would be more convenient to wait until some case had been made out as to the working of the Act before condemning it; but as he had himself been Chairman of the Board, under which most of these superannuations took place, for five years, he desired to make a few remarks on the subject. The late Government were quite prepared to defend their action with respect to any or every superannuation made during that period, and no doubt hon. gentlemen were equally willing to defend their course of action during the considerable period before. This Act was not introduced by the late Government. They found it on the Statute-book, and, if, in its working, hon. gentlemen thought there was danger of unfairness, they were justified in calling public attention to it, and in introducing such amendments as might prevent fraud or political favouritism. With respect to the cases alluded to, although it was rather unfortunate that they should be brought up in that fashion, he might say that, wherever an error might have been committed, that a man was superannuated who was fit to do his work, under a certain age, the Statute expressly provided that the Government might call him back to the service. If the case mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton, of Mr. Egan, fell under that category, it would be the duty of the Government to inform Mr. Egan that he had obtained his superannuation in a way in which he ought not to have obtained it, and that he was now re-established and might return to the public service in a position corresponding to the one he had occupied. Mr. Egan was superannuated on the certificate of respectable medical men that he was unable to discharge his duties or bear the confinement of an office. It might be the case that under medical care he recovered his health, or that the certificates were falsely given. In either case, it was perfectly competent for the hon. gentlemen to restore him to the public service, although, from the number of applications received from other disinterested gentlemen to enter the public service, they would not be very anxious to take that method of rectifying the error.

MR. BOWELL said the late Government had taken care there should be no vacancies to fill.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought hon. gentlemen opposite had found room for a good many persons not as experienced in the public service as Mr. Egan. As regarded other cases, more particularly the case of the superannuation of Mr. Langton, he would observe that he had passed the age of three score and ten before being superannuated. It had been specially provided that, when any man passed 65, the head of the Department must certify that he was fully fit for the duties of the office.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : There is no such provision in the law.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said if it was not stated in the law, the hon. gentleman would find it stated in the Orders in Council passed by the hon. gentleman himself, and which were, by the provisions of this Act, incorporated with the Act, and therefore a part of the law. The hon. gentleman thought, then, that when a man arrived close to 65 years of age, his mental and bodily vigour somewhat failed, but he (Mr. Cartwright) was glad to find that the hon. gentleman's own experience led him to think that, after 65, he might continue to do the public some service ; but, when ten years younger, the hon. gentleman's views were not precisely similar to what they were now. If the hon. gentlemen opposite thought it desirable to alter that provision they had full power to do so. All he had to caution them against was, that great inconvenience would result to the public service if they decided that men were not to be removed from it, except when a Minister preferred special charges against them. Cases continually occurred of men who, after having done good service, had become rusty, and not up to the duties of their office, and that provision was made to meet such cases. With all deference to Mr. Langton, or any man in such a position, he did not believe there was one in ten thousand who was fit, at seventy-one years of age, to discharge the duties of the head of a Department as competently as when fifty or sixty or sixty-five years of age. If the hon. gentleman had any complaint to make as to the conduct of the late Government in the matter of superannuating Mr. Langton, and would move for the papers, he would have no hesitation in defending their conduct, though he might tell hon. gentlemen they might find it a very inconvenient precedent in the future if every exercise of the discretion of a Minister, within the terms of the Statute or Order in Council, was to be called in question in this way. If they thought there was any danger of this Act being abused, nothing was easier than to introduce such amendments as they deemed necessary, or wipe out the Act altogether.

BRITISH COLUMBIA IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return showing the quantities and values of the different articles of merchandise imported into British Columbia from other Provinces of the Dominion in 1878; also, the exports from British Columbia to other Provinces of Canada, up to December 31st, 1878; also, the exports and imports into British Columbia, to and from foreign countries, between June 30th, 1878, and December 31st, 1878, but not including goods of provincial growth or production. He said he would ask the Minister of Customs to look into the archives of his office, in order to discover what those imports amounted to. It would not be difficult to get the information respecting the interprovincial trade between British Columbia and the Eastern Provinces, as it was practically isolated from all the others. The trade was very extensive. It commenced in 1872 with $22,114; in 1873, it amounted to $75,604; in 1874, to $66,104; in 1875, to $117,054; in 1876, to $129,735; in 1877, to $160,314, and for the half-year ending 31st December, 1877, to $57,162. The total imports from the old Provinces amounted in the six and a half years ending 31st Dec., 1877, to $628,688, and he asked the Government to be pleased to send down the imports into British Columbia during 1878. He also asked the hon. the Minister of Customs that, in the annual reports, the amount of imports and exports be shown, so that there might be, in future years, a return showing the interprovincial trade between the Western and the Eastern Provinces; and, if possible, now that the Government had engaged the services of a very accurate statistician, it would be of great advantage to have as much information gathered respecting the interprovincial trade of all the Provinces as possible, and publish it in the annual returns. This would render it unnecessary to call for these returns in future.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACT
AMENDMENT BILL.(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

FIRST READING PROPOSED.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend an Act intituled: "An Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway," passed in the 39th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought this was a copy of a Bill introduced last year by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). It was, in fact, a Bill to establish rights which did not now exist, and he gave his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) notice that he should oppose the Bill. He was surprised that the Government permitted it to be introduced.

MR. TUPPER said he differed very much in opinion from the hon. the leader of the Opposition. He did not consider this Bill proposed to establish rights that did not exist. It was simply a measure to carry out a pledge given by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, when standing where he (Mr. Tupper) now stood, on the occasion of his introducing a Bill to amend the Intercolonial Railway Act. At that time he (Mr. Tupper) had brought under the notice of the House the fact that it was claimed by the Halifax City Railway Company that they had rights under existing legislation which would be prejudicially affected, and the hon. gentleman, then Minister of Public Works, stated that no private rights would be interfered with. He accepted that statement, and the Bill passed the House and went to the other branch of the Legislature, and there the member of the Government in charge of the Bill gave a specific pledge that no private rights as they existed should be interfered with. He (Mr. Tupper) did not say that the Halifax City Railway Company had any rights which would be affected, but that they claimed that they had, and he understood that, subsequently, when they undertook to press their claims before the Supreme Court, this Act was used to estop the consideration of their claims. All that was proposed to be done by this Bill was simply to prevent an Act passed two Sessions ago from operating prejudicially against existing rights, if any did exist. When he sat on the other side of the House, he held that the Government ought not, by legislation, to remove any existing private right which any individual enjoyed. He believed that to be sound constitutional doctrine at the time, and he thought so still.

MR. MACKENZIE said the claim which was set up was that the Government of the Dominion had no right to extend the Intercolonial Railway into Halifax, because it competed with the Street Railway, and the person concerned claimed that the Dominion should compensate him, because the track of the Intercolonial Railway went a certain distance in the direction in which his line extended. The claim was too preposterous to be entertained for a moment. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not aware of what had passed in the Court, but he was almost certain that his Bill could not have been used as an estoppel of the action. He was quite satisfied that that Bill did not affect any private rights, and, if there were any old legislation of the Province of Nova Scotia which could be interpreted so as to prevent the Dominion from continuing a railway of its own in that Province, that legislation was not to be observed by the Dominion Government. He did not believe that was the effect of the legislation, and he did not believe in any Bill being introduced into this House, with the consent of the Administration, which had for its object the creation of a claim against the Government.

MR. TUPPER said the only effect of this Bill, if passed, would be to put the Halifax City Railway Company in the same position they occupied under the law, and under their charter, when the Bill was introduced by the hon. gentleman. If they had any right — and he should be surprised to find that they had any such rights as appeared to have been claimed by them — this Bill would simply place them in the position they occupied before. If they had such rights, they ought not to be overridden by Parliament; if they had none, this measure would give them none.

MR. MACKENZIE said he wished to call the attention of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government to this Bill. In the first place, it would not be introduced unless it were supposed it would give certain rights against the Crown, which its promoters did not possess. Therefore, by their admission, the rights of the Crown were involved in the introduction of this Bill, which, therefore, could not be introduced till the Crown had given its consent.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said the Bill spoke for itself. The explanation of the hon. the Minister of Public Works was perfectly correct. The Bill simply placed the parties interested in the position they occupied previous to the legislation of 1877. During that year, an Act passed this House depriving them of certain legal privileges and rights they possessed as a corporate company under the laws of Nova Scotia; and a pledge was given in this House that that legislation should not have the effect of interfering with those private rights. Notwithstanding, it was found, when litigation took place before the Exchequer Court here, the Company was absolutely deprived of setting up certain privileges and rights conferred upon it by the Legislature of Nova Scotia. The result was that the Dominion Government, inheriting all the rights and powers and privileges of Nova Scotia in respect of her railways, was thus relieved from its obligations, and that in face of the direct assurance of a Minister of the Crown in this House to the contrary. The object of the Bill was to restore those rights. As to the right of the Government to make a railway through the city of Halifax, there was no question at all. The whole question was one of compulsion—the taking away of the property of those parties—and the Bill was designed to restore to them the particular tribunal provided in the local Acts, but not confer any rights which did not previously exist. The Crown was not interested excepting as a mere party to an ordinary suit.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would press his objection. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) admitted he expected to claim compensation for some persons for the removal of property belonging to some railway company which, he said, the Government deprived them of. If compensation was thus to be claimed from the Crown, the Bill could not be introduced without its formal assent.

MR. COCKBURN said he would ask his hon friend the Premier to give the assent of the Crown to the introduction of this Bill. It was promised by hon. gentlemen, then Ministers, now in opposition, that the Bill passed in 1877 should not affect the rights of the Street Railway Company; and the same promise was given by Mr. Letellier in the other branch of the Legislature; and, in the face of that assurance, when the case came before the Courts, the parties were prejudiced by the terms of that Act.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have not the power to grant the assent asked for, without submitting the matter to His Excellency the Governor-General. I have heard the remarks of both hon. gentlemen, and will ask my hon. friend the mover (Mr. Cockburn) to leave the Bill over till to-morrow, when I shall be able to give a positive answer.

JOHN STEWART DEPOSIT BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

FIRST READING PROPOSED.

MR. MCCARTHY moved for leave to introduce a Bill to empower Robert G. Dalton, Clerk of the Court of Queen's Bench, Ontario, to pay to John Stewart, of the City of Kingston, surgeon, one thousand dollars.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would call the attention of his hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), to the fact that this was not, like the Bill of last year, a proposal to amend the Statute, but it was one to deal with moneys which were alleged to be John Stewart's, but which probably were not John Stewart's, and his hon. friend proposed to get an opinion of the Legislature that this $1,000 ought to be paid to John Stewart. He thought the hon. gentleman would have to give notice of this in the Gazette, and get a private Bill introduced by petition in the ordinary way. They could not dispose of other people's thousands and dollars in this way.

MR. MCCARTHY: I am glad to find from the hon. gentleman that he knows that this is not Dr. Stewart's $1,000. If not, perhaps he can tell me whose it is.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I think I could.

MR. MCCARTHY said he understood, at all events, that this money was deposited by Dr. Stewart, in filing a petition in the old Election Court of the Province of Ontario, and the difficulty was that that Election Court had ceased to exist. The money was deposited in the hands of the Clerk of the Court, who said he could not pay it out without an order from the Judges, and the Judges said they could not make the order as the Court did not exist. This was not private legislation, but was simply intended to restore to the Court or the Judges the right to deal with this $1,000. If the Judges were not satisfied that the money belonged to Dr. Stewart, they would, of course, order it to be paid to whomsoever it really did belong.

MR. HOLTON said the Bill ordained that Mr. Dalton should pay the money to Mr. Stewart.

MR. MCCARTHY said of course that was not right, and would be amended. It should be left to the Judges.

MR. HOLTON said the Bill was wrong ab initio. The provision that the money should be paid was the very essence of the Bill. He objected to its introduction.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said the phraseology might be a matter of detail, but he was not clear that the Bill was not open to another objection. This was a matter affecting property and civil rights, and it was a question whether the Local Legislature was not the proper place in which to introduce it.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the Bill, as introduced, interferes with private rights.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said that was a question of law, and not one for the decision of the Chair. It was for the House to decide, as it was not a question of order.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought it was a question of procedure, and that such Bills should be introduced by petition.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 24) To amend the Act incorporating the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company, and to extend the time for the completion of the said railway.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 25) To abolish the use of French Weight in the Province of Quebec.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 26) To authorise the trustees of the Toronto Savings Bank to sell and convey to the Home Savings and Loan Company (Limited).—(Mr. Cameron, North Victoria.)

Bill (No. 27) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Williams.)

COLLECTION OF MONEY DUE BY CIVIL SERVANTS.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON, in the absence of Mr. DOMVILLE, enquired, Whether the Government have taken any steps towards recovering sums of money that may be due from officers of the Public Service; if so, what steps.

MR. TUPPER: The Government have taken steps towards recovering sums that may be due from officers of the Public Service.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. BERGERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to widen and deepen the Beauharnois Canal, as has been done in the case of the Lachine Canal.

MR. TUPPER: It is not the intention of the Government, at present, to widen and deepen that canal.

QUESTION.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government soon to give out the contract for the widening of St. Anne's Lock, in the county of Jacques Cartier, and to proceed with the work in the spring; if not, when the work will probably be commenced?

MR. TUPPER: The Government does not intend, at present, to give out the contract for that service, but will proceed with it as soon as it is in a position to do so.

DISMISSAL OF CAPT. PURDY FROM THE GOVERNMENT STEAMER NEWFIELD.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) moved for copies of all correspondence, reports and instructions referring to the dismissal of Captain Purdy from the command of the Government steamer Newfield. He said it was desirable to ascertain all the reasons given for the dismissal of that officer, who had been in the Government service for ten years. He had had twenty-seven years of seafaring life, and, until the present, had not been known but as an efficient seaman, and good and faithful officer. His dismissal was a matter of great surprise in St. John, where he had many friends. The captain was also a very respectable man, and had been strongly recommended by St. John people.

MR. DECOSMOS said he wished the hon. mover would amend his motion by adding a clause, asking for all the papers connected with the removal of Captain Daniel Morrison from the steamer Sir James Douglas, in British Columbia, and the substitution of Captain Deveaux. In all probability, the cases would be found parallel. Captain Morrison was in the command of the Sir James Douglas when the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) was at the head of the Marine and Fisheries Department. There was no good or just cause for his removal, which was an act of caprice, to which, it might be, some of the members from British Columbia urged the Government; but he (Mr. DeCosmos) questioned whether there was any justification for the act.

MR. MACKENZIE: What the hon. gentleman (Mr. DeCosmos) wishes attached to the motion has no connection with it. Notice of the amendment should have been given independently. This is making a specific proposition in a specific case.

MR. DECOSMOS said he thought there would be no difficulty, if the leader of the Opposition did not object.

MR. BUNSTER said the motion of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) met the case, and deserved consideration, for Captain Morrison was discharged at a moment's notice, and another person placed in command of the Sir James Douglas. If the matter were left to the people of British Columbia, who knew the abilities and character of both men, it would be decided in favour of Captain Morrison. He hoped the amendment would pass.

MR. TUPPER said there could be no question the amendment was not in order, as its subject had no connection with that of the main motion. Such amendments would do away with notices on the paper. He thought, if the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) heard the explanations of the Minister of Marine, he would admit the cases of dismissal were not parallel.

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.) said there could be no possible objection to bringing down the papers asked for by the member for St. John (Mr. Burpee). It was, however, due to himself (Mr. Pope) to make some explanation, as so much had been said about the dismissal of Captain Purdy. When he assumed the charge of the Department, he found that one of the best of the Government steamers, the Lady Head, had been lost through carelessness and neglect. She was run ashore in June last and so seriously damaged that, when got afloat, she had to be sent to Pictou, and an expense of $700 or $800 incurred for repairs. After this, and during the summer, she, through the same carelessness, was nearly being on shore two or three times. No notice was taken of this gross carelessness and neglect, and finally, in August, she was again run on the rocks and became a total loss. He did not hesitate to say that, if the officers in charge had been properly reprimanded or dismissed the service, as they should have been when guilty of the first neglect, and more competent men put in their places, this vessel, valued at $30,000 or $40,000, would have been saved. An investigation took place, and the Commission reported in the strongest possible terms, with regard to the carelessness and incompetency of the officers in charge, and suspended the master; but this did not amount to much, as neither he nor the mate had any certificate of competency, whilst our laws required that all masters of merchant ships should have certificates of competency, and that no Custom-house officer should grant a clearance unless the master was so certified. The Government ships were filled with masters and mates who were not certified. The Newfield, bound for Sable Island to land some coal and other supplies there, was, during the night, when there was no occasion for it, run into the harbour of Whitehead, and stranded on the rocks, and the only wonder was that she was not totally lost. When taken off, she was sent to Halifax for repairs. The whole keel was knocked out of her, and other damage sustained which cost some $3,500 to repair. This, with incidental expenses, would cause a loss of six or seven thousand dollars. If acts of this kind were allowed to go unpunished, they would only be repeated and there would be no security for the safety and protection of the public property, in the interest of which alone he felt it to be his duty to dispense with the services of Captain Purdy. When a former vessel was lost, she was replaced by one purchased by the late Minister of Marine from friends of the hon. member who moved for these papers.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he had no friends that ever had an interest in it.

MR. POPE said this well-known vessel, the Glendon, was purchased from some friends of the hon. gentleman and in her, perhaps, there was one advantage, and that was, that she had not speed or power enough to put her on the rocks so that she could not be hauled off again, he believed, with a five-knot tide in her favour. She could go six miles an hour. She reflected no credit upon the Department, and was thoroughly unfit for work—as a proof of this, after the accident happened, the Newfield and she were undergoing repairs. The agent at Halifax asked that the Napoleon III should besent to Halifax for the purpose of visiting the Sable Islands, it being considered unsafe to send the Glendon out. The Newfield was a valuable ship costing $80,000 or $90,000, and there was no desire to lose her. It was his intention to place no man in charge of her, either as master or mate, unless he had the necessary certificate required by law. There were other reasons why he would have taken the responsibility of dismissing Captain Purdy from the service, viz: for wasteful expenditure in the management of that vessel. The expense of running the Newfield during last year amounted to nearly $35,000. The provisioning of her cost nearly $7,500, or $3,000 more than it should have been. He was quite prepared to take the responsibility of the dismissal of Captain Purdy.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the statement of his hon. friend, that no master was allowed to clear a vessel out of port without his certificate, was incorrect. That law did not apply to coasting vessels, and the Lady Head was a coasting vessel and did not clear out for foreign ports.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I said it was required in the merchant service.

SIR A. J. SMITH said it was not required in the merchant service. The law applied only to vessels going to foreign ports, not to coasting vessels. The hon. gentleman had said that Captain Purdy was dismissed because Captain Lavoie had cast away the Lady Head. Was that the way he was going to rule his Department? So far as the Lady Head was concerned, he (Sir A. J. Smith) was prepared to undergo the strictest enquiry with regard to his administration in connection with her. Because an accident happened, it was not to be attributed to carelessness or want of skill or knowledge of the officers. Navigation was perilous, and accidents happened under the best of masters and officers. His hon. friend was himself a shipowner. Did he discharge a man because an accident happened to his ship, without any enquiry; without giving him a hearing? Circumstances would arise when the most experienced masters could not avoid accidents or wrecks. His hon. friend had stated there was a great deal of extravagance in connection with the commissariat department of this vessel. Did he not know that Captain Purdy had nothing to do with the supplies; that they were under the control of the agency at Halifax, presided over by Mr. Johnson, appointed by the predecessors of the late Government? If there was any extravagance in the supplies, the responsibility lay with Mr. Johnson, and not with Captain Purdy. This vessel had rendezvous at Halifax, and was under the eye of Mr. Johnson, who should be held responsible. The hon. gentleman had said that Captain Purdy had no certificate. Captain Purdy had one, granted in 1852. He had then been in the Government employment for some time. He (Mr. Smith) was not satisfied with his certificate of service, but, before entrusting him with the Newfield, required that he should undergo examination. He was examined by Captain Scott, of Halifax, Chairman of the Board of Masters and Mates, who, the hon. gentleman must acknowledge, was a fit man. Captain Scott certified that Captain Purdy was, in every respect, qualified to take charge of that ship, and he was put in charge. He (Mr. Smith) could bear testimony to the efficiency of Captain Purdy. There was not a more competent man for the work in this country, and, until this accident happened, the ship had never touched ground. Last year, the vessel went to Paris in connection with the exhibition, under command of Captain Purdy. The mate had no certificate, and it was thought desirable to employ a competent person to assist Captain Purdy, and Mr. Tobin was employed. She had a most successful trip across and return trip. He was not going to prejudge the case; but he was not satisfied, nor was the House satisfied, with the explanation given by his hon. friend for the arbitrary exercise of power in dismissing Captain Purdy. The hon. gentleman did not cause an enquiry to be made, but because Captain Lavoie cast away the Lady Head, and the accident happened to the Newfield, he displaced Captain Purdy. He displaced Captain Lavoie from what? The vessel was a wreck, and, therefore, there was no necessity to displace him, there was no employment for him; but Captain Purdy was displaced. There was a rumour that a political complication existed in Halifax, and it was necessary to sacrifice Captain Purdy in order to solve it. The position of shipping-master became vacant, and it was promised to Captain O'Brien. On account of some political difficulty in Halifax, Mr. Bligh had to be provided for, and he was made shipping-master, which led to great dissatisfaction in Halifax, and it was found necessary to find a place for Captain O'Brien. The accident to the Newfield occurred in November, but the displacement of Captain Purdy did not take place until the latter part of January. He did not know whether this rumour was based on fact or not, but he knew that Captain Purdy complained of being badly treated, and had written to him on the subject, as was quite natural, having been so long under his authority.

MR. DOMVILLE said he had lately come from St. John, and there was none of the feeling there of which the hon. member for Westmoreland had spoken. The gentleman whose case had been brought up happened to be a political adherent of the hon. gentlemen opposite, otherwise they would not have taken such an interest in him. Capt. Purdy had been removed, and he was glad to see that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was looking into the working of the Department. The hon. member for Westmoreland had not said a word about the Glendon. If the Glendon had been properly examined before she was bought, this country would have been saved the large sum of money which had been thrown away in her purchase. The argument made for the purchase was that Mr. Smith had recommended it; but Mr. Smith was not a practical steamboat man, he was only an inspector of boilers, and gave a certificate to suit the terms on which the vessel was bought. He remembered seeing her in the harbour of St. John, N.B., where she was found to be useless and laid up. The Government took her up, and, at a very large expense, put her in order and equipped her for the public service. As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had said, with a five-knot tide, she would go six knots an hour. As far as he knew St. John, and he knew a little about it, the people there endorsed any action taken by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries which would give them a proper service, and it was time some action was taken to curtail useless expenditure. He thought the time had arrived when they should drop all political partisanship. He thought, if Captain Purdy was not the proper officer, he should be replaced. There were plenty of gentlemen in Westmoreland capable of taking the position. He regarded it out of place for his hon. friend to make such a difficulty about Captain Purdy. It had been done with a view of obtaining the political influence of Captain Purdy's friends, and he did not think the matter should have been brought before Parliament at all.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said his hon. friend did not practice what he preached. He would not have seen fit, under the circumstances, to have continued Captain Purdy in his employ. He desired to state that, in the matter of the Glendon, he had given three explanations, entirely to the satisfaction of both sides of the House. The Glendon cost, for building, $30,000, and, after she had been running for two years, she was purchased by the Government for $20,000. The purchase was made on the recommendation of Mr. William M. Smith, Steamboat Inspector, an officer appointed by the late Government. He was a man of some experience, and competent in every respect to certify as to the qualities of vessels. So far as the Glendon was concerned, he thought he stood entirely acquitted of blame. They naturally looked to their officers for information in these matters, and, before he closed the bargain, he sent to St. John for the necessary information. He was assured that any investigation into the transactions in his Department would not impeach in any way his integrity and honesty.

MR. DOMVILLE.

MR. TUPPER said, if anything were required to satisfy the House of the entire absence of any case to submit to Parliament in connection with the motion of the hon. member for the city of St. John, that was to be found in the remarks that had fallen from the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. gentleman had said that, because Captain Lavoie was dismissed, Captain Purdy had also to be sacrificed.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I did not say that.

MR. TUPPER: What did the hon. gentleman say?

SIR A. J. SMITH: I said that, because Captain Lavoie had cast away the Lady Head, Captain Purdy had also to be sacrificed.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman knew there was no foundation for that statement. His hon. friend formerly stated that, when he came to administer the Department, he found that Captain Lavoie, after having met with several serious mishaps, finally cast away the Lady Head, by which a great amount of public money had been lost to the country; that he found the Lady Head had been entrusted under the administration of the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the control of incompetent hands, that the parties in charge of her were entirely devoid of those certificates which the law required they should possess, and that this great sacrifice of public money had resulted from neglect on the part of the Minister to see that this valuable public property was not entrusted to the hands of persons competent to take care of it. The hon. gentleman also stated that so great a loss of public property had recently occurred as to enforce upon him the necessity of making an example not only of Captain Lavoie, but of taking such action as would teach those entrusted with the management and control of public property that, if, by their incompetency or negligence, a sacrifice of public property was made, they must take the consequences and leave the service. Then he had stated that Captain Purdy had been relieved of his command on account of his having taken the Newfield on to the rocks on his voyage to Sable Island, and having caused $3,000 or $4,000 damages. His hon. friend the hon. member for King's, he believed, was not correct in the impression that Captain Purdy was an opponent of the Government. However, he was assured that no question of political expediency or necessity actuated the Government in this matter. The first he heard of the removal of Captain Purdy and the appointment of Captain O'Brien was from his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That gentleman stated that he was obliged to remove Captain Purdy on account of the incompetence and negligence he had displayed in the discharge of his duties. Captain O'Brien was a captain in high standing, and regarded as one of the ablest sea captains in the merchant service of the Maritime Provinces. He had been recommended for the vacant office of shipping-master of Halifax, and, no doubt, would have been appointed; but, while that appointment was under consideration, his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated to him (Mr. Tupper) and his colleague the Minister of Justice, that he was obliged to dismiss the captain of the Newfield. Upon that, his hon. colleague and himself told him that, in their judgment, they could not find a person better qualified to fill that position than Captain O'Brien.

MR. ANGLIN: Are we to understand this took place before Mr. Bligh was appointed to the office of shipping-master?

MR. TUPPER said the facts were as he had stated, and he thought the House would fail to discover any question of political necessity or expediency in that appointment. Another person was subsequently appointed to fill the position of shipping-master. His hon. friend the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries advanced a strange doctrine to the House, and one which should not pass without being challenged. He stated that captains of these Government steamers were not responsible for the disbursements of the steamers. He had propounded the extraordinary policy that the agent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in Halifax, whose business was simply to supply the disbursements the captain wished or were necessary, should be held responsible. The hon. gentleman virtually said that, because the agent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was appointed under a Conservative Administration, he, therefore, should be held responsible for the disbursements which the captains of Government steamers might waste. He thought the hon. gentleman was hard driven for some means of relieving Captain Purdy from a wasteful expenditure of public money, which in itself would have rendered his dismissal inevitable. That doctrine, however, was not more remarkable than the statement the hon. member started with, in which he made a charge of ignorance upon his successor in relation to the certificates required for the command of the Newfield. He said that, because that ship was engaged in the coasting service, there was no necessity for her captain to possess a certificate such as was required for the captain of a vessel engaged in foreign service. He wanted to ask his hon. friend whether the Newfield was on coasting service when he sent her to France.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Captain Purdy had the necessary certificate.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman, knowing that Captain Purdy was not able to take the vessel to France, had to employ another who had the proper certificate. He thought, in reference to the charge of ignorance, that his hon. friend would not undertake to say that, in any matters relating to the naval and merchant service of this country, he was able to teach the present Minister anything.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the hon. gentleman had stated distinctly that he had made statements which he never did make, and which the hon. gentleman must know he did not make. It was not true that another captain was put in charge of the vessel when it was sent to France, because Capt. Purdy had not the necessary certificate. Mr. Purdy had the necessary certificate, and that matter he had explained before. They found it necessary that the vessel should go home in the middle of winter, and therefore it was necessary that they should have another person, who had a certificate, and who was competent to navigate the ship.

With reference to the other point, he had not misquoted his hon. friend, his successor. That hon. gentleman had said it was necessary by law that the captains of these vessels should have a certificate. He (Sir A. J. Smith) took issue, and said certificates were only necessary in the case of vessels going to foreign countries. At the time, he held the law did not require it; he referred to the law in confirmation of what he said.

Mr. FORTIN said the letter of the law might be in favour of the gentlemen on the other side, but, certainly, the spirit of the law was not. For it seemed to him that vessels, performing different services, should be commanded by captains having, not only a diploma of service, but of competency as well. If Captain Purdy had only a certificate of service, the Government did well to replace him by a man whose competency could not be doubted, because, having a certificate of competency, he had had to undergo an examination before the Board of Examiners, in order to obtain that certificate; while a certificate of service only meant that the bearer had commanded a vessel during a certain number of years, and that he was, moreover, sober and of a good moral character. No examination was exacted in this case. It appeared to him that, when Government vessels, performed services such as those allotted to the Newfield, and which were likely to be called to cross the Atlantic, the most able and efficient men attainable should be got for the positions of captains, mates, and second mates. But he was sorry to say that, heretofore, it was not the practice in this country. He (Mr. Fortin) had seen Captain Purdy at Gaspé two or three years ago, in command of that beautiful vessel, and he was surprised, knowing that he had no certificate of competency, that the Government had appointed him, cognisant as they were that the vessel was liable to be sent abroad. This was the way in which the late Government had performed their duty to the people of this country as regarded marine matters. He had known the Lady Head, which had been employed during the last four or five years for the protection of the fisheries, and also her commander, who, he might say, was at present politically dead, so to say, though he (Mr. Fortin) had done nothing to bring about that, and, he had believed from the way he was conducting matters, that his own friends would throw him over; and, indeed, it was before a tribunal, composed mainly of his own friends, that his incompetency was proved. He would not speak of the way in which that gentleman, commanded the vessel, as he was not now the commander, as regarded the nautical part of his duties, and what kind of officers he employed. He (Mr. Fortin) would have nothing to say against the sailing master, who had a certificate of competency, and had seen sixteen years of service abroad; but he would say that the chief mate of the Lady Head not only had no certificate of competency or service, but was unable to read and write, and the second mate was not much better. He defied any man in or out of the House to deny the truth of this assertion, and he knew the mate well, and he had served under him (Mr. Fortin) as a sailor, and certainly was utterly unable to fill the position of lieutenant on board of an ocean Government steamer, flying the pennant like a man-of-war, and performing a difficult and important service. He was glad this discussion had been brought on, as it enabled him to state things relating to a Government vessel as they were. He was not satisfied with it, as it proved that we were in the background as regarded the nautical instruction of our mariners, and that in some quarters nautical instruction was not valued at all. He was also glad that he had an opportunity of stating these matters, which ought to open the eyes of the Government and the House on the subject. He had always felt humiliated when he knew that this Government vessel, working with men-of-war, who had to call at many ports, and meet with many vessels, carried two officers entirely incompetent, the first of whom could not read or write, and had to take charge of the vessel in the absence of the master. How could this lieutenant receive people on business. Suppose a letter or document was presented to him to read, he would have to acknowledge he could not read. What a humiliation for us all. This state of things continued for several years. It might be asked why he did not report the matter. He would say it was because he believed it was useless to do so, as he knew no change would take place unless there was a change of Government. He hoped that what he had said, and what every person would say, in the interest of truth in the matter, would open the eyes of the Government to the importance of having on board Government vessels the best officers to be found, no matter to what nationality they might belong. The positions of masters and mates on board of Government vessels ought to be given to those who possessed the best education or the greatest capacity, as an encouragement to the development of nautical education in this country. We possessed a large mercantile navy; we were rated as the fourth or fifth naval power as regarded the merchant ships, but he believed there was exaggeration, and, to keep pace with other nations, we must extend to our mariners the best means of educating them and putting them on a level with the best mariners of other countries, and this could not be done unless educated mariners were held in honour, and the best of them promoted to situations on board of Government vessels whenever vacancies happened. There were also on board of other Government vessels incompetent officers, and he hoped for the honour and good of this country they would be changed, and all Government vessels, either at Halifax or Quebec, would be put under the command of the best qualified captains and mates. He heard some hon. gentlemen refer to the steamer Glendon. He had seen that celebrated vessel at Quebec, when she was being rigged before the Government sent her to protect our fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and she was not fit at all for that service, as she had only been built, as he had heard, to carry deals and logs. The proprietor, not being able to make anything out of her, had had the choice of selling her to the Government, when everybody pronounced her unfit for the service, for about $25,000, while the Government refused to buy a fine iron steamer, built in Glasgow, that would have suited the service well. He opposed the acquisition of the Glendon as much as possible, not on practical grounds, but because, as a Canadian, and as a representative of a country much engaged in the fisheries, he wanted the fisheries to be efficiently protected, and he knew the Glendon could not perform the work allotted to her, but that she could be, as she was, too, the laughing stock of our own, as well as the foreign fishermen. And what better proof did they want that she was worthless, when, at the end of the season, she had to be condemned as unfit for sea service. He felt that the Department of Marine should have known better than to have purchased such a vessel at such a large price, and the employment of such a vessel had made the service of the protection of the fisheries ridiculous in the eyes of English, French and American fishermen. He believed that, since the House had thought proper to pass a Bill to oblige the captains and mates to pass an examination, and make themselves competent to command vessels, the Government should see that the regulations in this respect were carried out. Inducements should be held out in order that the best men could be obtained, to receive command in our navy. If the present Government made any appointments such as those he had referred to, as having been made by the late Government, he would not support them. However, he had a better opinion of the gentlemen who were now at the head of affairs in this country. He had confidence in the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he hoped he would make a clean sweep of all those who were incompetent for the positions they filled.

Mr. DALY said the hon. gentleman who was recently the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, had assumed a position which was scarcely consistent with the dignity, propriety and responsibility which ought to attach to a member of the late Government. He (Sir A. J. Smith) had said that the expenses with which his late Department had been charged in connection with the services of the steamer Newfield, at Halifax, might be justly charged to the agent of that Department there, who, as he (Sir A. J. Smith) was ready to admit, was a most efficient and deserving officer. If he made such a charge, he ought to assume the responsibility of that charge; otherwise he would be refusing to maintain the dignity of the position which he lately occupied. The hon. gentleman, as a Minister of the Crown, was himself responsible for the administration of the affairs of the Department over which he presided, and was bound to see to the proper economical management of that Department. If Mr. Johnson's estimates for the expenditure were excessive, the head of the Department should have interfered and put a stop to that expenditure. He thought the appointment of Captain O'Brien was a judicious one, and his previous knowledge would enable him to render good service to the Government in his new position. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), that it was necessary to secure the services of Captain Tobin in order to enable the officers of the Newfield to navigate that ship from Halifax to Havre, with the exhibits intended for the Paris Exhibition, he would say that the hon. gentleman might try to escape the allegations that Captain Purdy was unfit for the position he held, by saying that it was the second mate whose incompetency it was necessary to fill by the appointment of Captain Tobin; but it would be evident to the House that, had the captain of the vessel been an efficient navigator, the services of Captain Tobin would not have been required. He would also mention another fact, or rather rumour, which had been brought before the House by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith). Now, when that hon. gentleman mentioned rumours in this House, he should have some slight grounds for belief in those rumours before mentioning them. If they were but rumours, and had not been investigated, it was not worth while intruding them upon the time or the attention of the House. The rumour was, said the hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith), that Captain Purdy had been removed in order to suit the convenience of the Government. From his (Mr. Daly's) own knowledge of the facts of the case, the rumour was contradicted by the fact that, long before the vacancy occurred in the shipping-master's office, a large number of applications had been made to the Ministry for the expected vacancy which was to occur in the command of the Newfield. It was even rumoured—since rumours were to be brought to the attention of the House—that Captain Purdy had already been dismissed, and he (Mr. Daly) believed he was safe in saying that the dismissal of Captain Purdy was already determined upon—at least, so he was informed by the Ministry—before the appointment of Mr. Bligh to the office of shipping-master was made. Therefore, he (Mr. Daly) could not congratulate the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side upon their very unsuccessful attempt to raise to a position of political martyrdom, a gentleman of Captain Purdy's incompetency to discharge the duties which he had previously sought to perform. He thought they would have to go further before they could establish any charge against the Government of having improperly discharged that officer from his command.

MR. KILLAM said he had no desire to prolong the discussion, and he did not intend either to attack or defend the Ministry for their course in this matter. But he felt called upon to say a single word in behalf of Captain Purdy, whom he had known for a long time, and whom he had known of for a much longer time. Captain Purdy was a native of the constituency which he (Mr. Killam) had the honour to represent, and belonged to a family who had for many years been known as efficient seafaring men. So far as he had observed Captain Purdy in command of the steamer, he had always found him a most efficient officer, and he was very much surprised when he heard that circumstances had occurred which could be considered as warranting his dismissal from the position he occupied. Having a certificate of service from England, granted as long ago as 1852, Captain Purdy must have seen over 30 years of almost continuous service in command of vessels, and have been considered as a competent man. And, when it was also considered that, as stated by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), he had been examined previous to appointment to the Newfield, he (Mr. Killam) thought they might say that he had not only a certificate of service, but one of competency as well. In fact, his competency certificate was as good as granted, although it did not exist upon paper. Whatever might have been the case, his certificate of service was quite sufficient to enable him to navigate a vessel to any part of the world under English laws, and to enter or clear at any port. As to the manner in which the commissariat was conducted, he (Mr. Killam) knew nothing about that. He concurred in a great deal that had been said by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) with respect to certificates of competency of officers of vessels generally. He (Mr. Killam) was pleased to see that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Daly) took such an interest in shipping, and he hoped both the members for that city would continue to take an interest in it. He could not entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) in reference to the gentlemen on the Treasury benches; but, in any case, whenever they did anything worthy of praise, he (Mr. Killam) should be very happy to give them merited commendation. But, if the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Pope) found that in this matter he had acted, or the Government had acted, upon insufficient information, or upon garbled reports, he (Mr. Killam) hoped that justice would yet be done to Captain Purdy, who had served the public so long and faithfully.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said he thought he was not going too far when he expressed the opinion that he understood quite as much about the working of the Navigation Laws as did the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), and, if called upon to procure a vessel for efficient service, he believed he could make as judicious a purchase as the hon. gentleman did when he purchased the Glendon. What he (Mr. Pope) had said was that the Government required from all masters of merchant vessels certificates of competency, and that on all the Government ships, some of which were 700 or 800 tons, the masters and mates should, in his opinion, have certificates of competency. It was true that for the coasting trade such certificates, under the law, were not required, but his opinion was that the operation of the law should be farther extended in this direction. When the hon. gentleman (Sir Albert J. Smith) spoke of certificates of service, it simply amounted to nothing. At the time the regulations were made, all men who were in charge of a vessel were entitled to receive certificates of service, as a matter of course, without passing any examination. But the hon. gentleman, in speaking of the qualifications of Capt. Purdy, said that he had passed his examination. The fact of Captain Purdy having a certificate of service did not prevent him getting a certificate of competency if he was fit to get it. But, if he had passed his examination before the proper officers appointed by the Government, why, he (Mr. Pope) would like to know, did he not get a certificate of competency? The fact of his not having a certificate of competency was the strongest evidence that he was not fit to pass the necessary examination.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I say that Captain Scott signed his certificate.

MR. POPE: If he passed the examination required for masters, why did he not get a certificate?

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It was not necessary.

MR. POPE said very likely Captain Scott signed a certificate that Captain Purdy was fit to navigate inland waters. If the captain or the officers of that vessel were competent or qualified men, there would have been no necessity of sending to St John to get a qualified master to go with Captain Purdy to take her to France and bring her back. Another point which his hon. friend (Sir Albert J. Smith) had referred to was the waste of money in furnishing the commissariat of that ship, and he had attributed the fault to the agent instead of the captain. Perhaps it was the case, but, if so, the agent received his instructions to purchase from political friends and supporters, and much larger prices were charged than the same supplies could be purchased for in the market. If necessary, he could lay before the House accounts to prove the truthfulness of this statement. He could assure his hon. friend (Sir A. J. Smith) that an end had been put to the system,—every master on board every ship would hereafter be required to send his requisition for what he wanted, and would be held responsible for the expenditure of everything that went on board his ship. Nothing would justify the extravagant waste of provisions which had hitherto taken place.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) had just charged his (Sir Albert J. Smith's) Department with having directed agents to purchase provisions from political friends, and pay large prices for them. He (Sir Albert J. Smith), from his place in Parliament, challenged that hon. gentleman to produce any evidence substantiating the statement he had made. He declared that statement to be absolutely untrue, and challenged the hon. gentleman or the Government to institute an investigation. He would appeal to the officers of the Department to say if he had ever directed them to instruct any agent to purchase goods beyond their value from any political friends. He asked that hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) to inquire of the officers of the Department whether he had not invariably instructed them, and the employés in every Department, to buy goods at the cheapest possible rate.

AN HON. MEMBER: He did not say so.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he did say so, and he now challenged an enquiry. The hon. gentleman must not think that he was going to reflect upon him (Sir Albert J. Smith), or his administration. He was prepared to defend his conduct. He was not perfect any more than other men; but he denied, in the most positive manner, this accusation, and challenged the hon. gentleman to produce any evidence against his integrity. He thought that the hon. gentleman must have had reference to times anterior to his own, and that it was his predecessor that was meant. Let him (Mr. Pope) look over the records of the Department before he (Sir Albert J. Smith) took charge of it. The hon. gentleman must have been mistaken, and have confounded two Administrations together. Let him go to Quebec and to other places, and he would find, perhaps, what he thought he had found here. The charge might be applicable to his (Sir Albert J. Smith's) predecessor, but not to himself.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): Tell us about the Glendon.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he had explained about the Glendon, and the hon. gentleman knew that it was a bonâ fide transaction. It was true that she was not a fit vessel for the service, and he acknowledged from his place in Parliament that it was a mistake, but he did not feel that he was responsible for it. He had appealed to the officers of the Department for information concerning her, and had bought her at the cheapest possible price. She was considered by everybody at the time a cheap vessel, but he did not hesitate to say that her purchase was a mistake.

MR. ANGLIN said the House would be satisfied that it was now incumbent upon the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries either to produce the evidence which he said he had it in his power to produce, and so satisfy this House directly, or through a Committee selected for the purpose, that his charges were true; or, failing this, it was his duty as a Minister of the Crown, as a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and as a gentleman, to withdraw and retract, in the most unequivocal and positive manner, the serious and disgraceful charge that he had made against his predecessor. It was sometimes well to meet a possible charge by a counter-charge, as a matter of policy. The principle of carrying the war into Africa was a very old one, and had, in its time, proved an effectual mode of dealing with some matters. In this case, counter-charges were made; the case of the Glendon was introduced, and the character of the purchase, and the character of the vessel were impugned. On a mere motion for the production of papers relating to the dismissal of Captain Purdy, numberless other transactions had been brought up. In fact, as the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) had justly said, the answer to the charges made or implied against the Government, was this: "You did as bad as we are charged with doing, or perhaps a little worse." The case of Captain Purdy, he thought, could very well stand upon its own merits, and it might be discussed on its merits, without introducing any extraneous matter. The hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) had contradicted the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee), that there was much excitement in that city on this subject. But the hon. member for King's had left St. John three or four days before he (Mr. Anglin) did, to come to Ottawa, and had not been back there since. At the time he (Mr. Anglin) left St. John there was very little or no talk about the dismissal of Captain Purdy, for the simple reason that no one believed he was dismissed or would be dismissed.

MR. DOMVILLE: Before I left St. John, New Brunswick, I was asked to sign a petition to reinstate Captain Purdy, and consequently my premises were correct when I stated that I was conversant with the appointment, and that there was little or no excitement in the city of St. John.

MR. ANGLIN said he accepted, in the fullest possible manner, the statement of the hon. gentleman, and could only say that he (Mr. Domville) possessed an amount of information which he (Mr. Anglin) did not possess, and that he believed very few in the city were possessed of. There was a rumour in the papers some time before either of them left the city that Captain Purdy would be dismissed, and that rumour, he thought, was generally discredited. Now, it was an ugly feature in this case, and a singular coincidence, that a place was wanted for Captain O'Brien just about the time the place was taken away from Captain Purdy. This was a remarkable coincidence, to say the least of it, and he had hoped, when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Daly) rose to reply to some remarks made upon this point, that he would have gone more fully into that part of the case, and would have shown that there was, in reality, no connection whatever between these two circumstances. Now what were the rumours?

That Captain O'Brien had applied for and been recommended to the position of shipping-master in the city of Halifax. That was a statement which, he believed, was beyond all question. Another was that Captain O'Brien, receiving information from some parties—he (Mr. Anglin) believed from one of the members for Halifax—that he was to receive the appointment, left his vessel in the West Indies, and returned to Halifax to obtain and occupy that very position. Rumour said that, when he arrived at Halifax, he found that Mr. Bligh, a gentleman not connected in any way with maritime matters, who had no particular knowledge of vessels, or of the business, had received this particular appointment, and this notwithstanding the recommendation of the members for Halifax that Mr. O'Brien should have the position. Rumour said that there was great discontent in Halifax in consequence of the appointment of Mr. Bligh, and the disappointment of Mr. O'Brien. Rumour said that a great many meetings were held in various places in the city of Halifax, and that there was an extraordinary amount of pressure brought to bear upon the members for Halifax, in order that they might use all the influence they had, and all the power they possessed, with the Dominion Government to have this Mr. Bligh put aside, and to have the position given to Mr. O'Brien. Rumour said in the papers, that an offer was made to O'Brien of this position in the Newfield, and that O'Brien at first refused to be so satisfied, or to accept the office at the expense of a gentleman for whom he had some respect; or, at all events, that he did not wish that any man should be displaced merely for the purpose of giving him a position. Rumour said that those things continued a long time; that the hon. members for Halifax, yielding to the pressure of their friends, to the threats, even, of many of them, made such pressing, urgent representations to the Government, and particularly to those members who had participated in this transaction, that Captain Purdy was displaced, and Mr. O'Brien put into his place. They had had that statement contradicted by the Minister of Public Works, whose statement, if he (Mr. Anglin) understood it rightly, amounted to this: that, about the time it became necessary to fill the office of shipping-master in Halifax, he learned from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for the first time, casually it would seem—because it might be assumed that, as Minister of Public Works, he had no interest whatever in the matter—that it had become necessary to displace Captain Purdy, and that, therefore, it was resolved to offer this as a better position to Captain O'Brien, before the post of shipping-master was either given or offered to Mr. Bligh. That was entirely in opposition to all the statements and rumours that had been afloat for some time past, and to the many statements made, from time to time, in the Halifax newspapers. This was the ugly part of the whole transaction. Another very ugly feature was the attempt to destroy the reputation of Captain Purdy as a ship-master, and to render it impossible for him, hereafter, if the reports of the debates of this House were to have the effect they ought to have, to obtain employment as a ship-master; because it had been stated, by hon. members on the other side, in effect, that, not only had Captain Purdy no certificate of competency, qualifying him to command a vessel of any value, but that he was incapable of obtaining any such certificate. It was asked why, if he was capable, he had not obtained one. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) had explained clearly and satisfactorily that he required Captain Purdy, before entrusting the command of the Newfield to him, to undergo precisely such examination as those underwent who wished to obtain the ordinary certificate, the object being to ascertain whether he was competent for the command; and Captain Scott, after his examination, had reported Captain Purdy competent. Surely, then, he had done all that was necessary, or to be expected. Why should Captain Purdy, therefore, take the trouble of asking for a certificate such as was required by ship-masters seeking employment in the merchant service, when he was already in the employment of the Government, and the certificate required by the Minister had been furnished by the examiner. He (Mr. Anglin) regarded that as a quite satisfactory answer to the assertion that the captain was incompetent, and that the Minister of Marine, in giving him the command of the Newfield, was guilty of a serious impropriety and neglect of duty. Besides, there was nothing to show that the late Minister (Sir A. J. Smith) could possibly have had any motive or reason for neglecting his duty in this matter, or for showing any undue favour to Purdy. That Minister found him in the service, employed by his predecessor, and had reason to assume, under the circumstances, that his political opinions were not such as to entitle him to any favour at his hands. It had not been shown that Purdy was a personal friend of the late Minister, or that he owed Purdy or his friends anything that should induce him to neglect his duty in this matter. He (Mr. Anglin) did think it was cruel in the extreme, not only to deprive Captain Purdy of his position without any trial or opportunity of being heard in self-defence, but afterwards to justify that act by attempting to destroy his reputation and character as a seaman fit to take charge of a vessel. The attempt to cover up the matter by charging the member for Westmoreland with neglect of duty and positive malfeasance in office was quite as bad. It was the duty of the Minister of Marine to bring down the proof, if these charges were well-founded, so that the House could deal with the late Minister as his conduct deserved. If this charge was well-founded, he should be visited with the strongest possible censure; if ill-founded, let it be known that he had been falsely accused of conduct which would utterly disgrace any Minister of the Crown.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said he was sure the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) would not willingly wish to misrepresent his statements. He (Mr. Pope) did not charge the late Minister of Marine with giving the instructions to purchase supplies at extravagant prices. What he did say was this: that, instead of the business having been conducted properly, the captains being required to send in requisitions for what they wanted, and the provisions being bought on the best terms, they were bought by agents, under instructions from political friends, at their own prices, and that these prices were excessive.

MR. ANGLIN : It was done by instructions ?

MR. POPE : Done by instructions, with their political friends. As to the prices they were not instructed, but only to buy from political friends, who charged what they pleased, excessive prices. There was not the slightest foundation for the report as to political prejudice being brought to bear against Captain Purdy on the part of present Ministers. He (Mr. Pope) did not know what his politics were, but understood he was a political friend of some members of the present Government. He was dismissed in consequence of his having got his vessel on the rocks, and causing to the country the loss of a large amount of money, and not on account of any political influence, or to make way for any political or other friend. In his (Mr. Pope's) opinion, this dismissal was necessary in the public interest, and in the protection of public property.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said he understood—

Several Hon. MEMBERS : Order ; spoke.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he must tell hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side that the Opposition might be numerically weak, but they were prepared to vindicate themselves and assert their rights. Hon. gentlemen opposite refused him a hearing in his own defence. Was that the spirit that characterised them? They should not, however, stop his mouth at this, the beginning of the Session. He would say, in reply to accusations against his official conduct, that he had endeavoured to administer the affairs of his Department with honesty and integrity, and he challenged the fullest, strictest and most searching investigation. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had said he withdrew his charges against him now.

MR. POPE : No.

SIR A. J. SMITH : Then let the hon. gentleman repeat it.

MR. McCALLUM : I rise to a point of order. We have had enough of this. The hon. gentleman has spoken about six times on this question.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had no doubt some hon. gentlemen opposite did think they had had enough of the debate with its refutations of their statements ; but he was surprised his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should refuse him a hearing, when such charges were made against him. He thought that hon. gentleman a man of a different spirit, and willing to give the Opposition fair play. What was the charge against him (Sir A. J. Smith)? He understood him to say that the whole of the provisions and stores were furnished those vessels by improper parties, but that he acquitted him (Sir A. J. Smith) of any blame in the matter.

MR. POPE : I did not say I charged you with anything, nor did I acquit you.

SIR A. J. SMITH : What did the hon. gentleman say then? I think every hon. member understood him to say that the supplies were furnished those vessels, but I had no connection with the business.

MR. POPE : What I found fault with was the method of business adopted—that the captains were not asked to send in requisitions ; that the agent was allowed, or, I presume, instructed, to make purchases from political friends and supporters of the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his party.

SIR A. J. SMITH said it was very easy to make charges, but he challenged the hon. gentleman again to prove his complicity with any dishonest transaction in the Department. Let him appeal to its officers whether they would not acquit him (Sir A. J. Smith) of any such accusation. While it might be true that in some cases political friends were patronised, there were no instructions given to deal with a friend at inordinate prices. The officers of that Department could testify as to whether he had instructed any employé or agent to purchase supplies at other than the cheapest possible prices. He challenged enquiry as to whether he had patronised political friends at the public expense in the manner charged. He thought his successor had treated him most unfairly, unmanly, and that his conduct could not be defended. He got up and practically withdrew the charge, and then, when he (Sir A. J. Smith) asked him to withdraw it formally, he declared he had not withdrawn it. He consequently repeated his challenge.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said it had been more convenient to follow the usual course of bringing down the papers before entering upon a discussion of this kind. But he thought that the House, and particularly members on the Ministerial side, might congratulate themselves, and especially his hon. colleague (Mr. Pope) on the result of the debate. The late hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries appeared to feel somewhat warmly the position in which the debate had left him, and he did not wonder at all at the feeling he had exhibited, because certain members of his party, and he, a public officer charged with the administration of an important public Department, were put in an extremely false position before the country—in a position in which he entirely and absolutely failed to justify himself and them. His hon. friend from Westmoreland had challenged the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to make and formulate some charge which he alleged had been made against him. He (Mr. McDonald) would take the liberty of putting before the House and country, as clearly as he could, the facts which he thought the report of the debate would vindicate as correct. What his hon. colleague (Mr. Pope) did say amounted to a charge against the hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith) of having conducted the affairs of his Department, not wilfully or knowingly, in a manner permitting the most gross extravagance in its administration. He (Mr. McDonald) agreed with the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) that, if the hon. Minister of Marine was unable to justify or substantiate the charge, he ought to retract it. But he (Mr. McDonald) undertook to say that it would be a long time before hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side would be able to put his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) in any such position. He was not a man to make rash statements which he could not prove. When he made allegations of such a character, he had the proof of them under his hand. The hon. gentleman opposite had tried to avoid the issue. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had stated that one of the grounds for the dismissal of Captain Purdy was the gross extravagance in the management of the vessel under his care, and he was quite sure none of the hon. gentlemen who, unfortunately for Captain Purdy, adopted his side of the question, would attempt to vindicate that. His hon. friend had stated, what? That the hon. gentleman had asked his political friends in Halifax to sell goods to this vessel at double the ordinary prices? Not at all. But he did say that the goods supplied cost double what they ought to have cost, and that by instructions from the office of the hon. gentleman himself, not through his own hands—there was no such allegation—but from some one instructed from his office, the agent in Halifax was authorised, not to go into the open market, but to buy from the political supporters of the hon. gentleman. That was the charge made, and he undertook to say that, before any Committee the hon. gentleman might choose to ask for, that charge would be sustained. That was not the only case, but he did not intend, nor was he here, to assail any gentleman, or deal with any question, other than the one before the House. He might refer to the case of the Glendon. He did not intend to adopt the law of retaliation, suggested by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), but he might fairly retort upon the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries the admission he made in this House, an admission more damaging to his reputation than even the charge brought home so conclusively by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) admitted that, so imprudent was the staff under his control, in the regard for the interests with which they had to deal, that the Glendon, an utterly worthless old tub, was bought under the eye, and at the wharf almost, of the hon. gentleman himself, from his own political friends, at an enormous price. They had the admission of the hon. gentleman himself given to them to-night that he knew that was the case.

SIR A. J. SMITH : I know nothing of the kind. I know it is not the case.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) said the hon. gentleman had used these words : "I admit it was a mistake, and I would not do it again." He would like to know if the hon. gentleman would deny these words. He would say a word or two with reference to Captain Purdy. He knew not to what side of politics he belonged. He had never seen the gentleman, but he knew he was justly discharged. What did the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries find on entering office? They were only now on what an hon. gentleman behind him described as the threshold of the investigation which the pure Administration of hon. gentleman opposite would furnish with this and probably next Session. He found that, by incompetency admitted proved before a competent tribunal, a valuable ship which had cost enormous sums had been thrown on the rocks and utterly destroyed, while in the charge of a man who had been for years in the service of the hon. gentlemen, and who they must have known was incompetent, who had no certificate either of service or competency. They had the declaration of a man whose authority in matters of this kind was recognised all over this Dominion, the hon. member for Gaspé, who said the two principal officers of the vessel could neither read nor write. Would the hon. member for Westmoreland, or any other man in the country, be suspected of conducting his own private affairs in that way? Would the hon. member send one of the fine ships in his fleet under the command of a captain who had no certificate, a mate that could not read, and a second mate that could not write? The result was that the hon. Minister found ignorance and incapacity controlling this valuable property. A few weeks later, he found the next best ship in charge also of a man who had no certificate, lost for a reason no one could comprehend, on a coast which he had been acquainted with for years, in a locality which he should have known was a dangerous one; and this occasioned great loss to the country. The hon. the Minister, finding this man was not a sailor or a competent sea captain, did right in discharging him. They were told that Captain Scott had said he was competent. If so, why did Captain Scott not give him a certificate?

SIR A. J. SMITH: It was not necessary.

MR. McDONALD said he would ask where was the evidence of that? He would undertake to say that was not Captain Scott's view of the question. When he examined a man and was satisfied of his competency, he gave him a certificate. He would undertake to say that a man having charge of a vessel, desiring to preserve his character and fortify his position, would demand the certificate to which he was entitled. He would like to know why they had not from Captain Purdy a complaint of the tyrannical conduct of his hon. friend? At whose instance was this motion made? If it were at Captain Purdy's instance, he regretted it for Captain Purdy's own sake, for if it were proved that he was not competent to discharge his duties; that, in consequence of his incompetency, great public loss was occasioned, his character would suffer, but the Government were not to blame. It was not trumpeted throughout the country that Captain Purdy was incompetent. The hon. the Minister simply relieved him of his charge, regretted he could not retain him in the service. If he were disgraced, he might thank hon. gentlemen opposite, who sought to make a little political capital by the charge brought against the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He regretted extremely the position in which Captain Purdy had been placed, and could not congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the position in which this debate had left him.

MR. RICHEY said that, after this discussion, he would not venture to say a single word, did he not feel he would do an injustice to his constituents, the Government and the House, if he were to permit it to pass without denial of the elaborate statement, based upon rumours, which had been made. The hon. member for Gloucester had referred to it as a singular coincidence that, when a place was wanted for a gentleman in Halifax, a vacancy was found. Was it not a more striking coincidence that two vacancies were found, either of which that gentleman could fill with credit to himself and advantage to the country? The only foundation for the rumours referred to by the hon. member for Gloucester was that, while Captain O'Brien was recommended for one of the offices, he was placed in the other by the Government, who, doubtless, considered him the most suitable man they could procure. The pretence or the rumour that pressure was brought to bear upon the Government for the appointment of Captain O'Brien to the Newfield by the members for Halifax, and that pressure was brought to bear upon them by their constituents for this purpose, was altogether unfounded. They had recommended Captain O'Brien for the office of shipping-master, and only regretted that the Government deemed it necessary to appoint him to the other office, instead of adopting the specific recommendation which the members for the county had made. That was the only ground upon which any degree of disappointment could exist in the minds of the members for Halifax, and the slight foundation upon which the charges of the hon. member for Gloucester were based. He hoped that that hon. gentleman would now, after this distinct and unequivocal denial on his part, be satisfied that Mr. Purdy's dismissal was in no way owing to causes which, relying upon mere rumours, he had thought fit to allege in this House.

Thursday, 6th March, 1879.

REPORT.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) presented, —Report of the Minister of Justice as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the year ended 30th June, 1878.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

FIRST READING.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) introduced a Bill (No. 25) to amend an Act intitled: "An Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway," passed in the 39th year of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. He said that, when he introduced the Bill yesterday, objection had been taken to its introduction, on the ground that its subject-matter affected the public revenue, and that it required the assent of the Crown. That objection had been looked into, and it was found that it was not entitled to prevail. The hon. the Premier had satisfied himself that the assent of the Crown was not needed. The merits of the Bill would, of course, be discussed before the proper Committee.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, on looking into the Bill, he did not think the assent of the Crown was called for, and it could be introduced without such assent. He did not pledge himself or the Government to sanction it hereafter. The Bill would have to be very carefully scanned before receiving the sanction of the House.

Bill read the first time.

NEW BRUNSWICK ELECTION TRIALS.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether the Government intends to take any steps to have the election petitions tried in New Brunswick, which have been so long delayed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government have no means of taking any steps in the matter. The litigants and the Courts must settle the matter between them.

AID TO COLONISATION ROADS IN MANITOBA.

QUESTION.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a general Bill for assisting, by grants of land, such roads in Manitoba and the North-West as may be necessary for the purposes of colonisation, and which would, if built, act as feeders of the Canada Pacific Road.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This subject was brought before Parliament last Session by the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell, as Minister of the Interior. That Bill, with the matters on which it was founded, is now before the Government, and they have it under serious consideration.

BOUNDARY OF ONTARIO ARBITRATION.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLS enquired, Whether the Government purpose, this Session, to introduce a Bill to confirm the boundary between the Province of Ontario and the Territories of Canada, as declared in the award of the Arbitrators; and if not, why not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: All the papers on this important subject are now in the hands of a member of the Government, and the matter is under serious consideration.

DISMISSAL OF CAPTAIN PURDY FROM THE GOVERNMENT STEAMER
NEWFIELD.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for the House to resume the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Burpee (St. John), for copies of all correspondence, reports and instructions, referring to the dismissal of Captain Purdy from the command of the Government steamer Newfield, read.

MR. WELDON said, in reply to the remark of the hon. member for King's

(N.B.), that this was a case of political partisanship, all he had to say was that he did not personally know Captain Purdy, and had no information as to his character beyond the reputation which Captain Purdy had acquired of being a man of ability and experience, and one who had filled, with credit, the position of shipmaster for upwards of forty years. The hon. the Minister of Justice had stated, yesterday, that bringing the light to bear on this matter would only reflect to the damage of Captain Purdy, and that, for his sake, he regretted it had been brought under discussion. The hon. the Minister of Justice must have forgotten that, through the press which supported the Government, from Toronto down to Halifax, and more particularly in the city of St. John, in the St. John Daily Sun, it was put forward that the dismissal of Captain Purdy was owing to his incompetency and mismanagement, and Captain Purdy smarting under the wrong and indignity heaped upon him, at once wrote an indignant denial of the statements in the article. The charges against him were that he had no certificate of competency; that he was, therefore, incompetent, and, through his incompetency, has caused damage to the Newfield, and that he was guilty of an extravagance which implied dishonesty. With regard to the first charge, they found that, under the Merchants' Marine Act, Captain Purdy held a certificate under the Imperial Act, which entitled him to sail any ship that floated under the British flag, upon any sea; further, as the hon. Minister must have been aware, he had been examined as to his competency by Captain Scott, Chairman of the Board of Examiners appointed by the Government, and was several years after in charge of that vessel. That he was competent must be inferred, because, otherwise, Captain Scott would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty in not having informed the Minister of Marine of his incompetency and failure to pass a satisfactory examination. No better certificate of competency could be given to any man than to be placed in charge of a Government ship, with the full confidence of the Department under which he was employed. So far as his competency was concerned, he (Mr. Weldon) could appeal to every person in St. John acquainted with Captain Purdy, fully confident they would endorse the reputation given him by the hon. member for Yarmouth, more especially with regard to coasting services, for which Captain Purdy was more peculiarly adapted, and for which no certificate of competency of masters was required. The next charge, based upon the fact that he had no certificate of competency, was that he had caused damage to that vessel, and the hon. the Minister of Marine, in the exercise of his discretion, had thought fit to displace him. As a private shipowner, the hon. the Minister could exercise his undoubted right to discharge a man, but, if that man were dismissed improperly, he could appeal to the tribunals of justice for redress. But Captain Purdy stood without means of obtaining redress except before this House, and, in regard to that, he would refer to the practice in the Mother Country, and the manner in which justice was dealt there to masters and other officers of vessels. The captain or commander of any of Her Majesty's ships which, by misfortune, had got into difficulty, became cast ashore or a total wreck, had the right to appeal to a court of enquiry, or even to a court martial, where the case was examined, and if no fault was found with him he was honourably acquitted. In the merchant service, before a man could have his certificate of competency suspended or taken away, the charge was investigated before a legal tribunal, and the utmost fair play shown to him, the expenses of the witnesses for the defence being borne by the country. With regard to the other charge made against him, of extravagance, which, to a certain extent, implied more than mere extravagance, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had stated yesterday that the expenditure during the past year had been something like $35,000. Had the hon. Minister looked into the accounts of his Department submitted in his report, he would have found that during the year the expenses charged to this department were $23,320, not $35,000. Out of the $34,000 charged against that ship, $11,000 was refunded by the Receiver-General for the employment of that ship from the 15th December to the 16th February, for services going to the Paris Exhibition, transporting a valuable cargo across at a season, probably the most dangerous in the year, and bringing the vessel safely back. In the previous year the expenditure was $27,150, or, taking the time the ship had to be employed, a steamer of gross tonnage of nearly 800 tons, manned by 34 men, to be ready at any moment for any emergency, an average rate of nearly $75 per day. It was only fair to the hon. member for Westmoreland, in regard to these matters, to make a contrast of the expenditure, during several years. In 1871-2, the expenditure of the Napoleon III was $23,357; in 1872-3, it was $23,040; while in 1877-8, it was $22,215. The Druid, a small vessel, caused an expenditure, in 1871-2, of $17,456; in 1872-3, $14,000; and in 1877-8, $12,112. He would like his hon. friend, the member for Halifax, if he (Mr. Weldon) was wrong in his statement, to correct him, and he would state that Mr. O'Brien, on the death of Mr. Cumings, was summoned to Halifax, from a port in the United States, for the purpose of succeeding that gentleman. The first thing, however, that Mr. O'Brien knew, the position was given to another man who, so far as he (Mr. Weldon) was informed, was not at all acquainted with shipping, except in so far as supplying groceries to a small schooner was concerned. Captain O'Brien was thus left out in the cold, and when the command of the Newfie'd was offered to him he refused it, preferring to remain without office, rather than turn out another man. This was a matter where a public servant had been unfairly dealt with. If the charges were true, they would prevent him from again exercising his profession. He thought it was a matter which called for the fullest enquiry, in order that justice might be done to Captain Purdy, and in order to show that he had not been discharged for political purposes, but with a due regard to the interests of the country.

MR. OGDEN said that some of the remarks that had fallen from hon. gentlemen were far from correct. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) had read an extract from a St. John paper, written over the signature of Captain

Purdy, stating that the Newfield had never touched bottom while under his command. That statement was false. The steamer did touch bottom under his command in the harbour of Whitehead, not three hundred yards from his (Mr. Ogden's) premises. A great deal had been said condemning the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for doing his duty, but he considered that the hon. gentleman did nothing more than his duty in removing Captain Purdy, who he did not know had any political feelings. He thought he was as good a Conservative as he was a Liberal, and he believed that, in the grounding of the Newfield, Captain Purdy had shown himself to be incompetent, and his negligence justified the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in removing him. He maintained that, before the office of shipping master was rendered vacant, it was proven that it had been resolved to remove Captain Purdy. The hon. member for St. John stated, the other day, that the postmaster was superannuated, because, through incompetency and vacating his office, he got himself and all his friends into scrapes. For this the late Government thought it necessary to give him a large superannuation. In this instance, however, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, finding Captain Purdy incompetent, promptly discharged him and put a better man in his place. He had knowledge of the fact that Captain Purdy had acknowledged the justice of his punishment, and, but for the great row that had been kicked up in the House, he believed Captain Purdy would never have said one word in regard to the matter. He did not originally intend to have spoken on this subject, but, when he heard the erroneous statements which had been made to the House, he regarded it a matter of duty to state that, in his opinion, the hon. gentleman was fully justified in making the change complained of.

Mr. BOWELL said he desired to say a word in reply to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Welton), who had read a letter, signed by Captain Purdy, declaring that the Newfield had never been ashore near Sambro. The gentleman might as well have said she was never ashore before Quebec, Timbuctoo or at Niagara Falls or at many other places, and the reading of the letter would mislead the House and the country as to the charge made by the Minister of Marine against Captain Purdy. The charge against Captain Purdy was that he ran the Newfield ashore at the Whitehead harbour, and he held in his hand the report of Captain Purdy of the whole voyage, in which he said: "After the engine had made six or seven revolutions, she took the bottom forward, it being then about thirty minutes before low water." This settled that point, and any attempt to evade it, by denying that the vessel went ashore at Sambro, was not only puerile, but an attempt to evade the question by denying that of which he was never charged.

MR. ANGLIN: Read all the letter. Let us hear all about it.

Mr. BOWELL said that the hon. gentleman, when he got the papers, could read the whole of the report at his leisure. In the meantime, his only object was to show that Captain Purdy had reported to the Department that the vessel had been on shore.

MR. ANGLIN: But he states it was not by his own fault.

Mr. BOWELL said he was then discussing the question of fact; he was not saying whether he was competent or not; it was not at all likely that Captain Purdy would acknowledge, in a report, that he was to blame. The letter of Captain Purdy was read for the purpose of leading the House to believe that the charge against Captain Purdy, made by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was untrue; this was evident from the manner in which the reading of the letter was cheered, the hon. member for Gloucester cheering as loudly as anybody else.

MR. ANGLIN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me. The statement made by Captain Purdy, in the letter, was not a contradiction of any charge made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He contradicts a specific charge made in the newspaper to which the letter was written, which newspaper charged him that he had put his vessel ashore at Sambro. That charge he denied. He did not enter into a reply to anything that had been said or done by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : That is not a point of order.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman merely rose.

MR. BOWELL : The hon. gentleman had no right to rise.

MR. MACKENZIE : But there was a question of order raised.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : Who by ?

MR. MACKENZIE : If hon. gentlemen are to refuse all courtesy to hon. gentlemen, we had better know it.

MR. BOWELL said he thought it very ungraceful on the part of the hon. gentleman to talk about courtesy, for the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries had been allowed to speak no less than seven times during the debate. The hon. member for Gloucester asked him a question and he sat down to let him explain, but he did not know that, because he gave way to one hon. member, he therefore had to surrender the floor to the hon. member for Lambton.

MR. MACKENZIE : I did not ask it.

MR. BOWELL : No ; you did not ask it, for you took it. He would repeat that the letter referred to had been read for the purpose of leaving upon the House and upon the country the impression that Captain Purdy's vessel had never been ashore. He was quite as well aware as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) of the cause which produced the letter in question. He had a letter from Captain Purdy, dated Jan. 1st, 1879, in which he stated : "The ship took the ground forward, causing her to make water in the fire compartment. I remained there till the 27th November, awaiting a favourable opportunity for landing at Sable Island, but, none offering, I deemed it most prudent to return to Halifax to ascertain the amount of damage." That was all he desired to say to the House, in order that the whole facts might be known.

MR. ANGLIN.

MR. MACKENZIE said he rose before simply to correct the Minister of the Interior (Sir John A. Macdonald), who assumed that his hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) had risen to a point of order, and who rose to upbraid him for making what was not a point of order. The hon. member for Gloucester rose to make an explanation, and, that explanation being made, he sat down. Therefore, the hon. gentleman was entirely wrong, and he was sorry the hon. gentleman had not allowed him to proceed. No one could have listened to this debate without observing the extreme irritability of the gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. It was not enough for the hon. gentleman to reply—as he could have done, temperately and quietly, as his hon. friend did in making his motion—to whatever charge was implied in the motion. His hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Burpee) in a few concise sentences gave his reasons for making the motion. The reply of the Government was not merely a general denial of the alleged facts, which he did not object to, if correct ; but the hon. gentleman, in order to justify what seemed to be taken in advance as a wrong, went on to expatiate on alleged wrongs in the public service, committed by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith). These charges were improperly brought before the House when there were no documents before the House to sustain them, and at a time when no one expected his hon. friend would be charged with a shameful dereliction of duty in his office. Then they had the Minister of Justice gravely assuming that the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries had been clearly and decisively placed in the wrong by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Such language applied to an old and respected member of the House, would carry no weight with the supporters of the Administration in the House. If the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had any serious charges to bring against his hon. friend from Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), he was sure those charges would be made in a proper way, and at a proper time. They ought not to be brought on in the course of a debate like the present, with which they had no real connection. He did not intend to enter upon a technical discussion of the matters in dispute, but one thing was tolerably evident, that for four years this captain navigated his vessel safely. The mere fact that he had not a certificate of competence, as it was called technically, in contradistinction to a certificate of service, was no reason at all for his dismissal, because a certificate of service was admitted to entitle him to sail his vessel from any English port, and must surely, therefore, entitle him to sail a vessel on Canadian coasts. He believed, however, in regard to the matter of competency for managing those vessels, that an intimate knowledge of our own coasts and its charts was of far more importance in navigating a vessel connected with our lighthouse and fishery service than a certificate of competence for the high seas. They had, on the St. Lawrence, excellent pilots, entrusted with the charge of the best steamers that entered our waters, who were not able to read or write, but no one denied their entire competency for their duties; and nearly all the duties of sailing a vessel which the captain of the Newfield was called on to discharge were intimately connected with the pilotage service of the coast, except, indeed, a voyage across the Gulf, towards the Straits of Belle Isle, undertaken once a year. There was nothing that could be called a sea voyage to be met with in the discharge of that officer's duties; and, therefore, such a certificate as was now alleged for the first time to be necessary, evidently alleged in order to justify or cover up an improper dismissal, was not at all necessary. The mere fact that another vessel was lost had no kind of relation to the dismissal of Captain Purdy from his vessel. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would advise the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to be, in future, a little more temperate in his remarks, especially when assailing a gentleman who he (Mr. Mackenzie) knew, and was sure hon. gentlemen opposite believed, had efficiently and conscientiously discharged his duties. It could serve no possible good to detract from the character of an able, virtuous, excellent seaman like Captain Purdy, and deprive him of the means of gaining a livelihood in order to gratify some dislike that might have been taken to him by the present Minister of Marine, and to justify that officer's dismissal. He (Mr. Mackenzie) rose chiefly to complain of the tone and manner of the Minister of Justice in his remarks. They were, in his opinion, exceedingly offensive, and entirely unjustified by anything that took place in the discussion from the Opposition side of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could not agree with the hon. gentleman who had just sat down in regard to the tone and manner of his hon. colleague's (Mr. McDonald's) remarks. For any remarks made of the sort described, the responsibility lay with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), who brought the criticism on his own shoulders. The discussion about the dismissal of of Captain Purdy had taken a rather wide range; but it was not irrelevant in any way, entailing the consideration of his competency, conduct, and the reasons for his dismissal, which reasons had been shown, as also the expediency of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries looking sharply after the vessels employed in his Department, and of seeing to the employment of proper officers. By an easy and proper extension of the discussion, the loss of the Lady Head was introduced. The hon. member for Lambton justified the appointment of a man without a certificate of competency, and who could neither read nor write, against whom there was proof of incompetency, and had argued there was no reason for his dismissal. Such officers had been retained, and what was the consequence? The vessel they had charge of was lost, and, perhaps, if Captain Purdy had been kept, another would have been lost. The hon. member for Westmoreland went further, and boasted of the virtue and ability he had displayed in conducting the Marine and Fisheries Department, and challenged a comparison with his predecessor, whom he attacked. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) ventured to say he would not have made that attack had his predecessor been in this House. The last thing he would have ventured upon, would have been to say a single word against Mr. Peter Mitchell, who had left the Department in a state of efficiency, which would compare favourably with the state in which the late Minister (Sir A. J. Smith) left it. So, if there had been anything personal inroduced into the discussion, anything said unpleasant to that hon. gentleman, he had only himself to blame.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he did not accept the statement of the hon. member for Lambton, that he had used any expressions not directly called for by the occasion, or any unbecoming his office and position in the House. He only regretted, since, that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) had escaped his mind, for he dared say that, in vindication of a man who deserved the respect and confidence of the House as a member and a public officer, he (Mr. McDonald) might have used language that might have better called for the animadversions of the hon. member for Lambton. In the opening of his remarks, he (Mr. McDonald) referred to statements of the hon. member for Westmoreland, which, in his apprehension, then and now, attempted to misconstrue and pervert the meaning of the remarks made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That fact, he thought, was not denied by the hon. member for Westmoreland, and it was with the object of correction he spoke. He did not accept, on this occasion, and might not, perhaps, hereafter, the dictum of the hon. member for Lambton as to the propriety of his conduct in this House.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he rose to ask if the rule against speaking more than once on the same subject was to be maintained or not. He thought it rested with the Chair to maintain order. He thought it would be found conducive to the comfort of the House, and good feeling, if that rule was maintained.

MR. HOLTON said he dissented from the view just expressed. It had been the practice of the House, when a personal discussion arose, or anything in the nature of a personal altercation, to allow the greatest latitude of discussion and explanation to and fro. This practice rather tended to limit discussions than otherwise, by enabling the speakers best acquainted with the facts and matters in dispute, to say all they knew, and fight the matter out among themselves. Great difficulties would arise were such speakers held to the rigour of the rule, and debates would stretch more than at present.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he did not rise to take part in the discussion, which had taken a range calculated to satisfy the country that there was still some partisan feeling with a party that had been so successful. He merely wanted to call the attention of the new members to the circumstances under which they went to the country last fall, and to the feelings that must exist in the minds of those deputations which had been visiting the capital. He wanted to ask the gentlemen sent here for the purpose of dealing with the disasters of the country, how far they believed there would be any sympathy with this partisan spirit they had been occupying the first two or three weeks of the Session in displaying. Let hon. members remember the people's object in sending them to Parliament. Let them throw aside this party feeling which had, perhaps, disgraced or not disgraced the country in the past. Let them listen to descriptions of the deplorable state of the country from the Ministerial side such as heard during the late electoral campaign, and remember the glorious reforms which they were promised; let them pray for the political millenium which was to enable the Government, with a strong hand, to turn the stones of this country into bread, and not have those unseemingly wranglings when the people were crying for food.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he did not think the Ministerial side of the House responsible for the length or personalities of the debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite called attention to matters never before mooted in the House. His hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in discharging Captain Purdy, had done so on his own responsibility, and wisely, when he had found that officer quite incompetent for his work, and without a certificate. He had run his vessel on the rocks, and should not have been continued in his office. The hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith) had trailed his coat-tail before the people to see if any one would tread on it; he said: "I am the man that managed that great Marine Department so well," and went on to attack his predecessor as the author of all the wrong-doing. If there ever was a head of a Department in this country that brought it into a position of which it might feel proud, it was Mr. Peter Mitchell, the attack upon whom came with a bad grace from his next successor. In the fishery arbitration, it was he that did the whole work. It was he who shook the bush while the late Minister picked up the fruit. When the hon. member for Lambton last lectured them, he was on the Ministerial side of the House, and he did not think they should now submit to his dictation, but that they should act on their own judgment, despite his censures. With regard to Captain Purdy, there was a letter here, from the man who actually sailed the vessel to France when it was nominally under charge of Captain Purdy, yet one would suppose, from Opposition eulogies, he (Capt. Purdy) was the best seaman in the world. Nobody had charged the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with having been actuated by political motives in dismissing Captain Purdy, or given any good reason why he should not have been dismissed. He (Mr. Pope) had no doubt that Captain Purdy had proved inefficient, had run his vessel on the rocks, and deserved dismissal. He (Mr. Pope) charged the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries with having neglected his duty, in that he had not before discharged Captain Purdy. Had he done so, much public property would have been saved.

MR. ALLISON said he was not familiar with the circumstances which led to the dismissal of Captain Purdy, or the appointment of Captain O'Brien: all he should say was that the Government were the parties responsible, who ought to know the facts, and must bear the credit or the blame. He was surprised, however, to hear gentlemen opposite affect indignation with anything like political dismissals. He claimed to know something of the political occurrences of the past few years in the county he represented, and would like to call attention to some of the dismissals in Hants. On the 12th September, 1874, Mr. Sandford, of Burlington, was dismissed from a way-office, and on the 19th January, 1875, Mr. Beekman was dismissed from office at Ellershouse, and on the 18th

May, 1875, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Marsters were dismissed from the offices respectively at Nine-Mile River and Upper Rawdon. He (Mr. Allison) had taken some trouble, both in the post-office at Halifax and in this city, to enquire into the causes of these dismissals. The reason assigned in one instance was that the incumbent "had left the place." If he had done so temporarily (which he doubted), his family discharged the duties to the satisfaction of the public, and the Government had unquestionable security. In the three other instances the reasons given were "changed from way-office to post-office." He need not tell any one familiar with the facts that a way-office was neither more nor less than a country post-office, and that anyone capable of discharging the duties of the one could discharge the duties of the other. On the 19th February, the Toronto Globe, which he believed was formerly the organ of the late Government, and was now the organ of the present Opposition, laid down the doctrine that "in the public interest there are but two considerations which can justify the substitution of one official for another, except in cases where the holder of a place has been guilty of misconduct—the new appointee may be better qualified for the situation than the old, or he may be able to save the country a certain sum every year." He need not say that no saving was claimed as a defence, and he would say that, not in one single instance, was the man who was appointed better qualified to discharge the duties of the office than the man who was dismissed; that in two instances the changes made in the location were made to the manifest inconvenience of a majority of those who were interested, that in every instance the changes were made on political and on no other grounds, and, to add to the hardship of the case, in the instance of the office at Burlington, the former incumbent, Mr. Sandford, acting upon the advice of the Post Office Inspector, had gone to considerable expense in repairing and improving his office. The Globe of the 26th inst., in commenting on some recent political changes, unwittingly paid a high compliment to the hon. the Postmaster-General, when it said that "he is not enough of hypocrite to defend his acts on any ground except that he likes to do what pleases him." He would respect that hon. gentleman more if, when making changes, he would make them openly, and take the responsibility, than, if he attempted, as his predecessors had done in the instances he had referred to, to shield himself beneath the screen of an apparent but false and purely nominal reason. The Globe of the same date also said: "When country postmasters are displaced for political reasons, something like a revolution in our public life has occurred. They have hitherto hardly been considered as public servants at all; their salaries are merely nominal, and they have always been held free to take what side they pleased. It has been left for the men who were to introduce a 'broad policy' to satisfy political hate by their sacrifice, and thus to take the first step towards establishing a Tory propaganda with the country postmaster bound to do the work of the party in power." He was happy to state that the very reverse was the case in the county of Hants; that, for political reasons, not a single Dominion official had been dismissed in that county from the era of Confederation till the resignation of the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald. They had to wait till the advent of the late Government, led by the hon. member for Lambton, whose principles were to be above suspicion, and whose practices were to bear the light of day, to see country postmasters dismissed for political reasons, and prevented from being free to take what side they pleased. It was left for the party of Reform to inaugurate the practice of "satisfying political hate by their sacrifice, and taking the first step towards establishing a Tory propaganda, with the country postmasters as agents, bound to do the work of the party in power." It might be said that these offices were comparatively unimportant, and that their emoluments were correspondingly trifling. Then he would ask how magnanimous must have been the spirit that prompted, and how dignified the conduct of the Government that executed, the changes. He spoke not in the spirit of partisanship, but as an independent supporter of a party, and, as such, would be ashamed to criticise or condemn any action of any Government in making official changes that were necessary and judicious; but he thought, after the statements he had made, which were incapable of denial, that every member of the House would agree with him in the opinion that, judged by their own standard, by the rule laid down in their own party organ, the record of the members of the late Government was not clean with regard to the question of dismissals from office, and that their political habitation was too transparent in appearance, and too fragile in the material of its construction, to justify them in throwing stones.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACTS
AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 4.]

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

MR. MCCARTHY said that, in moving the second reading of this Bill, it was proper he should give the House some explanation of the changes which the Bill, if passed, would make with regard to the trial of controverted elections. The provision by which controverted elections were tried by the Judges had not been of very long standing; but he thought, although it had not given all the satisfaction anticipated from it, that public opinion was, to this extent, at all events, agreed that the present system was better than that which prevailed before the law, with regard to the trial of these elections, was placed upon the Statute-book. The change which he proposed was one that would obviate, to some extent, the objections now made against the present system. These objections were not made merely in this country, but in England, where a law similar to the one we had prevailed. It was objected that it gave too much power to one man, although that man might be a Judge, to set aside an election, and to disqualify a gentleman who might have been returned by a majority of the votes polled; and he thought there was a great deal of force in the objection. He believed the Judges themselves felt uncomfortable in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them. It placed them in a very unpleasant and unfortunate position, because either they had not the moral courage to do their duty, or, if they did their duty, they ran the risk, nay almost the certainty, of being denounced by the press of either one party or the other. A case that had only recently been determined in the Ontario Courts was one instance of the action of the public press in such matters. The learned Judge of that Court,—actuated by proper motives, he had no doubt, and his motives had not been assailed,—had been attacked in one of the leading organs of public opinion of the West in his conclusion with regard to the construction which, as a conscientious and eminent lawyer, he felt himself bound to put upon that law. What was the remedy for this evil? If they did not desire to recur to the old procedure—that of having these controverted elections tried by a Committee of this House, and he did not think any member would desire to revert again to that system—they had no alternative than to add to the strength of the judiciary, to increase the number of Judges by whom the election petitions were tried, so that they would be able to discharge their duty with more satisfaction to themselves, and that in the discharge of their duty their decisions would carry more weight with the public. He, therefore, proposed that, instead of election petitions being tried, as they were now, by one Judge, these petitions should be tried by three Judges; that the decision of these three Judges should, on all matters of fact, and on almost all questions of law be final and conclusive, so that whatever that decision might be—whether the petition were dismissed or the prayer of the petition allowed—it would be final and conclusive. There was only one exception to that general rule, and that was that, when the Judges themselves thought proper, they might reserve for the consideration of the Supreme Court any question of law which was of sufficient importance to be thus reserved. The Judges who he proposed should preside at these trials would be three Judges—one to be a member of the Supreme Court, the other two to be chosen from the provincial Judges belonging to the Province in which the petition was to be tried. He was not unaware of the objections which had been made to this proposition. It was contended that it would overtax the judicial strength, and that the Judges had now as much to do as they were able to perform. He supposed the Minister of Justice would have to consider this question—that the Government would have to come to a determination upon it. Speaking as to the Province of Ontario, he did not think it would be found that the Judges of that Province would not be able to discharge the increased duties that this measure would cast upon them. The present Legislature of that Province had already determined that all election petitions should be tried by two Judges. If they were satisfied with a system of that kind, he thought that this House ought not to be satisfied, unless hon. members were willing to admit that the election of members of this House was of less importance than the election of members of the local House. It would obviate, to a great extent, the grievance they laboured under as the law now stood. No matter what the decision of an election Judge might be, there was a simple remedy—by appeal. By the very simple procedure of getting security to a very trifling amount, either of the litigant parties had the right to appeal. The effect of this was to increase the expense, and the possible result was that a member who had been disqualified, might come down here (having given his notice of appeal) and take his seat in the House and vote. For these reasons, he thought the measure would not be thought out of place. He would not enter into the question of procedure, as that was a matter of detail. He would say, however, that he proposed petitions should be verified on oath, without which they could not be placed on the files; and that particulars given in support of those petitions should also be verified on oath. That would prevent, to some extent, the annoyance of having fishing petitions filed against them. He trusted that the change proposed by this Bill would become the law of the land during the present Session of the House.

MR. BAKER said the subject embraced by the Bill now under consideration was one of very grave importance, and affected equally the dignity and position of members on both sides of the House. And the second reading of the Bill afforded a fairly opportune occasion for discussing the wisdom of a measure by which Parliament was shorn of one of its ancient and most honoured privileges, and the power of dealing with election petitions transferred from a Committee of the House to an external and independent tribunal. But he did not propose to enter upon that discussion. The wisdom of the policy had been affirmed, when, after debate and deliberation, the Controverted Election Act of 1874 was passed. And they had now to deal with the practical operation of the law and the amendments suggested by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It was extremely doubtful whether the abolition of the Committee system had been followed by the advantages that were anticipated from the measure which replaced it. It was very certain that, in many instances, the dignity and authority of the Bench had suffered. And he thought he was justified in adding that public confidence in the administration of justice had been rudely shaken by some of the decisions that had been rendered by the Courts. For the Judges, it was to be said that new duties of an onerous kind were suddenly cast upon their shoulders; they were suddenly called upon to interpret and enforce the provisions of a Statute that could be enlarged or restrained, and, for the elucidation of which, no long line of precedents existed to keep them within the narrow boundaries of a beaten path. Sitting singly, and, in many instances, far apart from one another, without the opportunity for consultation and comparison, it was not to be expected that perfect unanimity would prevail. Nevertheless, the profession and the public should be spared the shock of judgments diametrically opposed to each other, founded upon the same clause of the Statute, and based upon evidence precisely similar in every essential feature. And it was not surprising that dissatisfaction had arisen, where it was held in one case that a "thimble-full" of drink, attended by certain circumstances, might vitiate an election, while, in another, it was declared that agents, provided they had a "habit of treating," and that it was consecrated by long usage, might literally flood the country with strong drink, and float the member in upon a perfect sea of beer. Worse than that, it had been held, in one Province, that charity, stimulated to an unwonted growth by the exciting surroundings of an electoral campaign, might find harmless expression in gifts of great munificence; while in another Province the candidate was actually prevented from taking his seat in this House because an elector and a supporter, moved by the sight of painful destitution, had yielded to human impulse, and given a piece of cloth to clothe a shivering child. And again, it had been held repeatedly in England, and in this country, that the employment of paid canvassers was permitted under the Statute, while, in the most recent decision of all, the contrary was affirmed. He mentioned these discrepancies, not because the motives of our Judges were to be questioned or impugned in this House, for he believed, that, as a body, the Judges of the Dominion would compare favourably with those of any other country in the world for ability, for learning, for zeal, and for impartiality; but he mentioned the discrepancies because it was notorious that they existed, and chiefly because, being judgments rendered by a single Judge, no matter how learned and accomplished he might be, they did not carry the same weight and the same force of conviction that they would if rendered by a greater number. In matters of such vital importance, affecting not only the right of a member to occupy his seat in this House, but involving disabilities of the gravest character, it was not in human nature to be satisfied with the conclusions of a single mind, no matter how gifted and accomplished it might be. If a man were accused of a grave assault or a misdemeanour, involving the payment of a fine or a short term of imprisonment, he had a right to be tried by a jury, and yet, in these election trials, where the issues were, in some cases, a thousand times more momentous, questions of fact and of law under the present system, had to be decided by a single Judge, without the intervention of a jury. And the Judges, in many instances, before their elevation to the Bench, having been political partizans, the judgment of a single Judge, however pure and impartial he might be, was apt to be questioned, and distrust and dissatisfaction were the inevitable result. The changes, therefore, proposed by this Bill were of a most useful kind, and would be acceptable to the profession and the public. Except in outlying and remote Provinces—thought by the mover of the Bill, no doubt, too far distant for the reach of salutary legal reform—the trials would be presided over by three Judges instead of one, and he thought the change would unquestionably secure greater confidence and satisfaction in the judgments to be rendered. As stated by the hon. mover of the Bill (Mr. McCarthy), it would prevent the odium that might attach to a decision by a single Judge, and would remove one of the greatest objections to the working of the present law. Coming to the particular framework of the tribunals proposed to be substituted for existing ones, it was to be hoped that the provisions of the Bill would meet with the cordial approval and cooperation of the Judges, from whose ranks the recruits, so to speak, were to be drawn for carrying its provisions into effect. For, although the Judges must undertake any duties which the wisdom or the will of Parliament might impose upon them, it would yet be more satisfactory to know that they approved of the general provisions of a measure which proposed to make such important additions to their official functions.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said he thought a Bill of the kind proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was particularly desirable. Some changes in the Controverted Election Law were manifestly and absolutely necessary. He was glad some member of the House had undertaken to introduce a Bill dealing with this important question. He knew there were some gentlemen in the House who had serious doubts whether the present law was any improvement upon the old law, and that for many reasons. There was too much uncertainty in the present law. In one Province the law was rendered one way, and quite a different way in another Province. One Judge would lay down the law in one way, and another Judge would lay it down in a directly opposite way. And that was not the only difficulty. In 1874, the trial of these controverted elections was taken out of the hands of the House and left to the Courts, in order to lessen the expenses connected with their trial. He thought the experience of the last five years had been such as to remove from the minds of those who had been actively engaged in those trials any belief in the benefits the country was supposed to derive from the law. It appeared to him that the expenses were greater now than they were under the old law, that parties had to wait just about as long to get decisions, and that the law was no better and no more effectively laid down now than it was under the old system. Still, he was not prepared to say that we should go back to the old system altogether. No doubt the present law required very considerable amendments, and when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) gave notice of his Bill, he (Mr. Cameron), imagined that, from his legal abilities, from his large experience before the Election Courts, that hon. gentleman was going to deal with this question in a more extended and broader spirit, and that the difficulties which, from time to time, cropped up in the administration of the present law, would be, to a certain extent, avoided in this Bill. So far as he (Mr. Cameron) was able to judge, from reading over the Bill a couple of times, he could not see that the hon. gentleman proposed to make any substantial change in the law as it now stood, with the one single exception of having all cases tried before three Judges, instead of before one. In fact, when the Bill was compared with the law now on the Statute-book, it was more to be noted for what it did not contain than for what it did contain. There were one or two points that might be an improvement, although he did not think they would amount to very much. For instance, verifying petitions presented before the Court did not appear to him to be much of an improvement, because, if a person was prepared to present a petition before the Courts, there would be very little difficulty in getting that person to make affidavit that, in so far as he was concerned, the several statements in the petition were true. There were one or two other amendments in the Bill besides the one relating to the constitution of the Court. Now, it appeared to him that, in dealing with this question, it was desirable to have the law upon the subject consolidated and embraced in one Bill. The hon. member said that the present law gave too much power to a single Judge, since it gave power to unseat and power to disqualify. The Bill to some extent covered that objection, since three Judges instead of one were to sit on the case. But even on this point the Bill was open to a serious objection. The Bill allowed an appeal from the finding of the three Judges to the Supreme Court, but only upon a question of law. Now, from his own personal experience with election cases tried before Judges, he was not prepared to submit, even upon a question of fact, to the decision of either one or three Judges. If there was to be an appeal at all to the Supreme Court, the appeal should lie upon a question of fact as well as upon a question of law. Judges were human as well as other men, and apt to err as well as other men, and to make mistakes in the rendering of the law, or in the proper construction of a Statute. They all knew, too, that upon questions of fact one Judge would take one view of the evidence, and another Judge would take a diametrically opposite view of it. He was not prepared, therefore, to submit to the finding of two Judges. For instance, in the Court proposed to be created by the Bill, three Judges were to sit, and two might take one view and the third another view. He thought it only fair to the man whose seat was sought to be taken from him, and who might be disqualified and disgraced, that, if there was to be an appeal to a higher tribunal upon the question of law, there should also be one upon a question of fact. He had just now in his mind a case decided not very long ago, in which there was grave and serious ground to question the finding of the Judge, and for appeal, upon a question of fact, apart altogether from the question of law. Now, in his hon. friend's Bill, as he understood it, there was no appeal on questions of fact at all. If the law was to be amended, if there were to be changes of that kind, they ought to make the Bill as perfect as possible, so that no injustice should be done either to the petitioners or to the sitting members. There was another omission which appeared of some importance—the Bill made no provision for an appeal from judgments on preliminary objections taken to the filing of the petition. Objections might properly be taken, for instance, as to the qualification of the petitioner, that he was not a candidate, or an elector, or, in other respects, was disqualified from entering a petition. The hon. member proposed that that point should be tried and settled solely by one of the Judges of the Court created by this Bill. They all knew perfectly well that a preliminary objection might go to the very root of the matter, to the right of the petitioner to petition at all, and, so far as he was concerned, he could not consent to submit to the opinion of a single Judge on a question of that kind. It was perfectly well known that, in all the Provinces, as the result of the last general election, many petitions were filed—that preliminary objections were taken to these petitions, and that some of these points went to the very right of the Courts to try the case, and to the very right of the petitioner to bring his case before the Courts at all. But, according to the Bill, both the respondent and the petitioner were bound to submit to the finding of one Judge instead of having great and important questions like that brought before a full Court. He was satisfied that questions of that kind should go before a full Court. If the hon. member's object was to consolidate the law upon this subject, why had he omitted from his Bill the Act passed in 1876, 39 Victoria, chapter 9, which provided, as one of the duties of the Court trying these election petitions, that, if corrupt practices prevailed, they should be reported by the Judge, with a view of dealing therewith. That provision, it appeared to him, should form part and parcel of this new law. There was another improvement that ought also to be introduced into this Bill. There was a provision in the law of 1878, that, under certain circumstances and in certain cases, a Judge of a County Court should have the power to recount and examine the ballots that had been cast for both parties. It gave, in effect, to a County

Judge, the power of deciding as to the right of a member to sit in this House. He was not going to enquire here whether that was a wise and proper provision or not, but it was practically a very important provision, since it gave the Judge the power of unseating, as it were, the man whom the returning officer declared entitled to the seat. They knew that one Judge in one of the Provinces had thus decided upon the validity of ballots, and that a Judge in another Court had taken an opposite view. They knew that the decision of County Court Judges was conclusive in this respect, and it seemed to him that this Bill was defective in not providing an appeal from such decision. Anyone who had been practising for twenty odd years in the Courts knew quite well that there was a great difference of opinion about the desirability of leaving such an important power as this in the hands of the County Judge. In these respects, the Bill of his hon. friend was practically a reprint only of the law as it formerly stood, with the exception of the constitution of the Court. As he understood the Bill, it provided that, in the Province of Ontario, three Judges of each of the four Courts were, by ballot, to select one of themselves to act as Election Judge, and any two of the Judges so selected, with one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, formed the Court for the trial of these election cases. The hon. gentleman knew quite well that a difficulty had cropped up in every Province as to the right of this Parliament to delegate to the Judges of the local Courts of the Provinces, the right or the power to investigate or to dispose of election petitions. The hon. member, however, as he understood it, proposed to get over the difficulty which had cropped up in the various Provinces, and was not yet settled, by utilising four of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and with that tribunal to dispose of these controverted election cases. He was satisfied the hon. gentleman would not get over the legal difficulty in any such way, because, if he had no right to utilise the Courts of Ontario or Quebec for the trial of controverted elections under the Dominion Act, neither had he the right to take Judges from those Courts, and clearly no right to give those Courts original jurisdiction.

He might take A. B. or C. D., and impose a duty on him, but he had no power to take a Judge of one of those Courts and make him and one of the Judges of the Supreme Court a tribunal for the purpose of trying these controverted election petitions. Besides, if Parliament had the power to do so, he did not agree at all with the hon. member that it was right or proper that they should throw this additional burden upon the Judges of the Courts. He was satisfied now that the Judges of the Courts of Ontario, at all events, had more work to do than they could reasonably perform; that there was no lawyer practising at the bar in Ontario who was more overworked than any one of these Judges, and to throw upon them this additional burthen and duty proposed in this Bill, appeared to him to be exceedingly unreasonable. It was never contemplated by the right hon. gentleman who led the House to vest this new jurisdiction in the local Courts, not only on account of the legal and constitutional difficulty to which he had referred, but from the manifest inconvenience of the thing. He recollected, when a Bill was introduced in 1873 by the present leader of the House, the hon. gentleman took that very ground, that this Parliament had no power to utilise the Courts of the Provinces, and that, had they the power to do so, it would be an unwise and injudicious exercise of that power; that the Judges were then overworked and unable to overtake the work cast upon them by the law of the land. That Bill was only to continue in force, and the power was only given to the local Judges to act, until the Supreme Court was established, when the trial of the controverted elections should be in the hands of the Supreme Court Judges. Not only that: the hon. the leader of the House, who was then also leader of the House, went a step further, and made provision in that Bill that the vesting of this new jurisdiction in the hands of the Judges of the several Provinces should not exist until the Legislature of the Provinces should authorise the Judges to deal with these questions. Whether the hon. the leader of the House was then right or wrong was to some extent beside the question just now. While the matter was pending before the Courts, before the constitutional difficulty was got over, it was not a wise exercise of power to give the local Courts original jurisdiction over these cases, or to create a new Court in the mode in which the hon. member proposed to create it, and leave the unfortunate litigants to fight the matter over again. As the law did not apply to cases now pending, the matter should be allowed to stand, at all events, until they got a judicial decision from the Courts, and the hon. gentleman should do what his leader proposed in 1873, leave the matter in the hands of the Judges of the Supreme Court. He was satisfied the Judges of the Supreme Court were not overworked, and there was nothing to prevent them from taking the trials of these controverted election cases in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. The hon. member's Bill did not propose that the Judges should deal with election cases in Manitoba and British Columbia. There was nothing, then, to prevent the Judges of the Supreme Court from dealing with these questions. They were not overtaxed, overburdened, or overworked. The Court established by the Dominion Parliament to dispose of questions arising under the legislation of the Dominion Parliament was the proper Court to deal with the matter. One Judge of the Supreme Court should try the case, giving the litigants the right of appeal from his judgment upon a question of law or of fact. There were more matters of detail for which the Bill did not provide. If there was one thing more than another which would make this Bill exceedingly unpopular and lead a large number of those experienced in such cases to ask for a repeal of the Act entirely, and a return to the old system, it was the enormous expense it would entail on the unfortunate litigants. A petition was filed against the sitting member; it came up for trial; 150 witnesses were subpoenaed to establish his case; of these 150 witnesses, the evidence of ninety-nine hundredths was wholly immaterial, and yet the unfortunate litigant was saddled with the expense of the whole of them. A grosser outrage did not exist. The Bill should contain a clause to cover a difficulty of that kind. The hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that most of these petitions were filed on speculation, and depended upon evidence which might turn up at the trial, and often succeeded through the testimony of some scaly witness then heard of for the first time, whose evidence might unseat a man. As a matter of precaution and to prevent this fishing for evidence, the Bill should provide that no witness would get a farthing unless the Judge who tried the case certified that his evidence had direct bearing on the case. If the hon. gentleman proposed to consolidate the Election Law, in so far as it related to the trial of controverted elections by this Bill, it should contain every Statute and all the law bearing upon the subject, and it ought to be amended by leaving the trial in the hands of one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, with the power to the litigants to appeal from him on questions of law and fact to a full Court, and it ought to be changed, amended and remodelled in many other respects.

MR. IVES said, before this Bill was read a second time, he thought it very proper that the hon. member who had charge of it should have his attention called to one or two difficulties which would arise through it, particularly in the Province of Quebec. This Bill proposed to impose upon the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the Province of Quebec, the labour of trying these election cases. He thought it well to remind the hon. gentleman that that would cause a very serious injury to the administration of justice in that Court. The Court of Queen's Bench, in the Province of Quebec, was very much overworked, and in arrears of work. They had, on the roll of the Court of Queen's Bench, a list of cases which was at least one year in advance, that was, it would take one year at least, without any new cases whatever being inscribed, for the Court of Queen's Bench to hear the cases at present inscribed. That Court was the most important Court in the Province of Quebec. It seemed to him it would be a serious thing if this Parliament were to impose upon the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench the labour of trying election cases in that Province.

MR. CAMERON.

That would be a very important change from the present law, because the present law provided that Judges of the Superior Court in the Province of Quebec should have jurisdiction in those cases. He was sure that difficulty would be so serious that the Bill would have to be modified, as far as the Province of Quebec was concerned, otherwise the general business there would have to remain in abeyance, or the trial of these cases would never take place in any reasonable time. There was another objection, which might not apply to Ontario, but which certainly did to Quebec. That was the provision that all these records were to be made up either in the cities of Montreal or Quebec. If an election petition was presented relating to an election occurring in the district of Gaspé, the parties must go to Quebec to file the petition; if from the Eastern Townships, they must go to Montreal. He did not see why this should occur. They had, in the district of St. Francis, a Judge who could act, and a clerk who could act as election clerk in the Court. There was no reason whatever why the parties who presented an election petition should be forced to go to Montreal in order to file it, and there to argue the preliminary or other objections that might be taken in the Court of preliminary proceedings, before the case was ready for trial. In that particular the old law was defective. It should provide, as their local Controverted Elections Law did, for the making up of the record within the judicial district where the election which was contested took place. He himself had conducted the prosecution of one of these election petitions under the present law, and had to make as many as half-a-dozen trips to the city of Montreal in order to be present when the papers were filed, and to argue objections, which journeys might as well have been avoided, if the law had permitted the Court of the district of St. Francis to have jurisdiction in those matters. No serious result would occur from the change, because the trial itself had to take place in St. Francis, and why should not the record be made there? Another objection was the question of expense. If they were to adopt the principle of having the trial they held before three Judges, they might do away with the appeal altogether, unless it were upon cases reserved by the Judges, and sent by them to be heard before the Supreme Court. There would be less injury in having a speedy termination to these cases than being subjected to the danger of being drawn before the Supreme Court, and there be put in for an immense bill of costs, the natural result of a trial before that Court. In fact, a poor candidate had better resign his seat than incur the risk of being taken before the Supreme Court, and have to bear the expenses of going there. If they were to have a trial before three Judges, it would be better to have their decisions final, more particularly if a Judge of the Supreme Court was to preside at all trials, for the reason that he could inform his brother Judges of the decisions in the other Provinces, and be guided by them in return, and thus, by degrees, bring uniformity into the rulings of the different Courts, without the expense of an appeal to the Supreme Court. As to the taxation of witnesses whose testimony was irrelevant, the present law was sufficient. It contained the general provision that irrelevant testimony could not be taxed against the opposite party. It was important, however, if there was any doubt on this point, that an amendment of that kind should be introduced, in order to prevent the party defeated in the suit from being taxed with the expenses of witnesses brought merely on speculation. He thought this Bill should be referred to a Committee which should take into consideration the various Election Laws in the different Provinces, with the view of incorporating, in the Dominion Act, all the provisions found in these local Acts, which would improve the law. In Quebec they had a good law, providing for a trial in the judicial district where the election was held, before one Judge; that was, the evidence was taken before one Judge, who transmitted it to the Court of Review, which was presided over by three Judges, and there the decision was rendered. This was a much less expensive way, and it would be well to look into the provisions of the Quebec law, with a view to ascertain whether those provisions would not be better than the mode adopted in the Bill. If they were to have a trial before three Judges, why could they not dispense with the taking of evidence, either in long-hand or by the aid of a stenographer? The expense of taking the evidence would then be done away with, and the Judges might, as in criminal cases, take what notes they saw fit. If this were done, he was satisfied the present expenses of these trials might be reduced to one-third of the present cost.

MR. CASEY said he had no doubt every one would consider the object of the present Bill a most praiseworthy one; but he must agree with hon. gentlemen who had preceded him that there were defects in the proposed amendment of the law. If the decision of the proposed Courts was to be final, there might be some reason for having three Judges, but, if appeal were allowed, he saw no reason for going to the expense of having three Judges, as proposed in the Bill. He did not think the country would be willing to abide by the decision of these Judges as final. The interests involved in an election petition were so very large, so complicated, and so liable to misconception on the first trial, that he thought the House and country would always insist upon an appeal. He therefore agreed with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) that every object proposed to be gained by the Bill would be gained by providing for the trial of these petitions before a single Judge of the Supreme Court coupled with an appeal to the full Court. He also thought that some hon. members' suggestions in reference to the non-payment of witnesses, whose evidence was not material, was deserving of great weight. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) argued that, as the law stood, such witnesses need not be paid; but he (Mr. Casey) was informed by gentlemen who had been concerned in these cases that the Courts had held otherwise. Judges had held that every witness must be paid whether his evidence was relevant or not, and even whether his evidence was called for or not, and he thought a new provision for the regulation of the payment of witnesses would be a wholesome one. He did not find in the Bill any reference to the conduct of elections, in amendment of the law regarding bribery, treating, or the dealings of returning officers and other officials with the ballots. He had been so thoroughly impressed that amendments were needed in this direction that he had introduced a Bill providing for some such amendment, which might render necessary some change in the law for the trial of controverted elections also. The Bill, however, had not yet been printed. He would not go into details now, but he would ask the hon. member to look into the matter as soon as his (Mr. Casey's) Bill was distributed, and see whether any such change were involved, and if so, how far he could accept the amendments he proposed to make. As the laws were to be consolidated, it would be better that the amendments should be put in the same Bill, and that there should be only one Election Law.

MR. CASGRAIN said he objected to the principle of the Bill. The present law was not perfect, but it had worked pretty well. He had been twice subject to the law—once under the old system and once under the present law before the Courts—and in both cases they went off pretty well. The system of one Judge with the right of appeal was sufficient. The Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the Province of Quebec, were already overworked and not sufficiently numerous. If the proposed Bill were adopted, it would take at least eighteen months to complete the trial of the case when a new Parliament was elected. The law should not be changed in a hurry, and he desired to enter his objection to several parts of the Bill—the more so as the Bill would be difficult to put in operation, if not entirely impracticable, in the Province of Quebec.

MR. GUTHRIE said he thought they should have the opinion of the Minister of Justice upon this measure, which was a reconstruction and consolidation of the whole law. He thought there was a great deal of weight to be attached to what had fallen from the hon. gentleman who moved the Bill in regard to the change of tribunal. No doubt a unanimous decision of three Judges would be more satisfactory to all parties concerned, but the Bill left the final decision to a majority of the Judges, and, therefore, practically it would carry no more weight than if one Judge still decided the whole question. If they were to have a decision which would carry weight, particularly in regard to disqualification, it should be at least a decision of three. It had often been said, in discussing the question as to whether the verdicts of juries should be unanimous or not, that the unanimous verdict of twelve men gave general satisfaction; because, if twelve men could be brought to view the matter in one way and give a decision, that decision must be in the right. Now, this argument applied in regard to election trials. Political feeling entered largely into the trial of these cases, and it was felt that they should be removed as far as possible from politicians. As it was proposed to give greater weight to these decisions, they should surely insist that, if the Judges should not agree amongst themselves, the charge should fail. It would be better, he thought, if there was to be no appeal, to have the trial conducted by two Judges and require them to agree, than to have three Judges and leave it to a majority. He also was of opinion that, if they adopted the tribunal of three Judges, a decision of disqualification should be unanimous. There were, however, strong reasons why this Bill should not be proceeded with at the present time. The constitutional question now before the Courts of New Brunswick, and he believed the other Provinces, had not been finally decided, and this Bill did not propose to settle the question in a satisfactory way. If the result of the discussion in the cases now before the Courts should be in favour of the view advanced in 1873 by the present leader of the House, or in favour of the doubt he then expressed—a doubt which had taken the shape of a legal defence in many of the election trials, namely, that this Parliament had no power to employ the local Courts or Judges of those Courts to try election petitions—then this Bill left the matter in the same position. If the question was decided in favour of the view that they had no jurisdiction, they would have to have legislation in the future to put the matter right. The Bill was not intended to apply to any of the elections hitherto held. As there would not, until the next general election, be many cases to which the new law would apply, there was no necessity for the immediate adoption of the measure. There was no doubt that there were some omissions in the Bill as pointed out, and some improvements which could be made by reference to a Special Committee or a Committee of the Whole, if the House were to affirm the principle of the Bill. He held that, under the present circumstances, they should not adopt so radical a change as this Bill proposed. One of the greatest difficulties in carrying out the change proposed would be how to arrange for the meeting of the three Judges, so as to suit the convenience of all. He trusted the measure would be deferred for the present Session.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that, although he had seconded the motion for the second reading of the Bill, he must state it was not his opinion that three Judges should be employed. He thought the number should be two, and he seconded the motion with the understanding that this matter was to be brought up in the Committee to which it was proposed to refer the Bill. There would be a great difficulty in getting three Judges throughout the country. The Judges already complained that too much work was thrown upon them,—and in the Provincial Courts the cry was for more Judges. With a Court of three Judges, only two were required to give effect to a decision. He thought it would be advisable to provide that, if they had two Judges, and they were unanimous, the fact should be regarded as proved; if they differed, the fact would not be proved. If they were unanimous, it would be sufficient that there should be no appeal from their judgment, except in matters of law. For an appeal in matters of law, it would be unnecessary to go to the expense of sending up all the evidence. It would only be necessary to send to the higher Court the case upon which the question of law turned. The appeal then would be simple and inexpensive, and they would not again be troubled with the outcries of hon. members who had the misfortune to go before the Supreme Court. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) spoke of the desirability of allowing appeals to go before the Supreme Court in all cases. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman had had the experience of the hon. the Postmaster-General (Mr. Langevin) in the Charlevoix case, some years ago, where they took several hundred folios of evidence which was printed at his expense and circulated ———

An Hon. MEMBER: Not circulated.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that, to all intents and purposes, it was circulated. The costs the hon. gentleman had to pay were $6,000. This showed it was undesirable to have any appeal, and, if they had two Judges to try the case, who would agree, it would be sufficient.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that, if the two Judges agreed, the case would be settled, or, if they disagreed, it would be passed in the negative. There was no necessity for the third to concur or differ. Two Judges would, under this Bill, give the judgment of the Court, and so they would if but two were appointed to try the case. In all questions of fact they must agree, and any charge of bribery or corruption must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judges. He was of opinion the judgment of Judges on questions of fact should be final, without appeal, but questions of law might go to appeal, because it would be carried on simply and inexpensively, as there would be no evidence to take to the Court of Appeal, but simply the evidence of the witnesses relating to the case in which the appeal was taken up. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would consider this question about the two Judges, and endeavour to appoint only two for the trial of the petition. Election petitions could not be tried while the House was in Session, the reason given being that a member should not be taken away from his duties here to attend to the trial, lest the constituency be left unrepresented; so that the law would sooner have the constituency misrepresented than unrepresented. That did not seem right. If the person returned was not duly elected, the trial ought to go on whether the House was sitting or not, so that the proper representative should be sent to Parliament at the earliest moment. Since the elections, nearly six months ago, very few election trials had taken place—in Ontario some half-dozen, and in New Brunswick not one. This was a most extraordinary state of affairs. They had witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of an hon. gentleman, a legal member, too, of the late Government, questioning the constitutionality of an Act passed by it—he meant the member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith). That opposition from a gentleman who helped to pass the Act was an edifying spectacle indeed.

MR. MACKENZIE: His Act passed in 1873.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: No, in 1874. The old Act was repealed. The original Act constituted the Election Courts, which the Act of 1874 did away with; providing, also, that election petitions should be tried by Provincial Courts. This was just the reason why this constitutional point was raised. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that was the reason why this Act should not be passed now. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) denied that the House had anything to do with the question before the Courts. Let it be taken before the Supreme Court, and, if it declared the Act unconstitutional, it would be repealed, or be inoperative, being ultra vires, and no harm done. Then the Government would be called on to act. Let them not consider it unconstitutional till it was so decided. Ontario Judges, of great ability and learning, had decided that it was constitutional. He thought they should not hesitate to pass this Act in consequence of any doubt on this point having arisen. Let them, at the earliest moment, remedy the defects of any law on the Statute-book—amend, consolidate, and make a perfect law, because they knew not how soon further elections would take place, and further petitions be sent for trial. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time, and that the Committee would reach conclusions creditable to the country and the House, and that they would not have the edifying spectacle of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) taking the earliest opportunity of denying the constitutionality of his own Bill.

MR. SHAW said he was very much pleased that this Bill had been brought before the House. He believed the House would concur in its provisions. A good deal of adverse criticism had been indulged in with regard to this Bill being an imperfect consolidation of the Controverted Elections Act; but this was a consolidation only of the Act respecting the trial of election petitions. It did not pretend to deal with the Act respecting corrupt practices. That Act might be dealt with by a separate Bill; and, in his opinion, that Act should be amended, and some amendments might well be made to the present Bill. He thought it would be well to provide that the particulars of the corrupt practice should be served together with the copy of the petition; this would cheapen the contest very considerably. The respondent was entitled to have the whole case placed before him. The statements should be under oath also, which would prevent some of the practices they had lately witnessed. He had seen lately, in some ridings, collectors, and sometimes postmasters, canvassing their polling divisions, and collecting money to get up a petition against the party possessing the greatest number of votes. Now, if the party filing the petition were compelled to swear to the truth of the charges brought against a member elect, it would, perhaps, prevent parties contributing who had no knowledge of the corrupt practice alleged until the alleged corrupt practices were sworn to. Such conduct was highly improper. It was stated that the Court of Appeal should try election petitions, but the adverse critics of this Bill had not specified how the Court of Appeal was to try the matter. If they desired it should be tried by one Judge, selected from the Court of Appeals—if only one would hear the evidence, there must be an appeal to the full Court in case of difficulty. There was difficulty, generally, respecting the facts, and it would be well if they were tried by more Judges than one. He believed three were not too many; that two would not be enough. Were three Judges appointed, the discussions that would take place would, very likely, lead to a more correct decision. Many cases were decided on very doubtful grounds, the Court having to reach some decision. A third Judge, if dissenting, could give his opinion, also, which would go before the country, and sometimes lead to a favourable consideration of the party defeated. There was the other question of the constitutional ground. This Bill did not require any Provincial Court to try an election petition. It had been objected that this Parliament had not the power to select a Provincial Court to try an election petition; but he thought certainly they had the power to select particular individuals, were they Judges or not, to try them; and, when selected, they could constitute the Court. He did not think, therefore, there was anything in the constitutional objection, which could be well overcome by the provisions of this Bill.

MR. DREW said he agreed with the remark that the trial by two Judges would be much better than by three. He thought there was something in the argument of the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that the judgment of three Judges, one dissenting, was virtually the decision of one; that was simply taking one from two and one would remain. He thought that was the result of his argument. He (Mr. Drew) would certainly prefer the trial by two Judges, and that they should both agree; otherwise, the decision would be in the negative, in favour of the respondent. That would be much better than a trial by three Judges, with one dissenting. But he did not see they would gain much by the Bill, should there be no appeal. With the present right of appeal, a person on trial had a greater protection than were his case before two Judges whose decision was final; and the House should consider the importance of a measure of this sort, when they knew that every candidate might be put on trial for some act or other, and might be subject to a trial by which he might lose his seat and be disqualified. Members must feel that there would be nothing that would affect them so much as a judgment in a Court depriving them of the right of citizenship, and he could hardly agree with the principle of a Bill which deprived them of the right of appeal. He thought the Bill, at any rate, should not be put in operation so soon after a general election, which had been held under the law as it now stood. This was a measure that should not be tinkered at every Session. They should allow sufficient time to elapse in order to have an opportunity of finding out its defects. It had been said by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw), that the time of serving particulars should be at the time of the serving of the petition upon a party. There might be something in that, but his opinion was that the names of witnesses should not be given when the particulars were filed; but that the nature of the charge should be set forth, was nothing but reasonable. He thought it tended to defeat the ends of justice if the names of persons, who were to be called as witnesses, were to be given to the opposite party. It would open the door to these persons to be tampered with and their evidence made away with. He did not think a Bill of this importance should be allowed to pass through the House in the ordinary way, but had no doubt it would be referred to a Select Committee, where it would be fully discussed.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that the Bill introduced by his hon. friend the member for North Simcoe was very important. This Bill contained some amendments which were a great improvement on the existing law. But the manner in which the hon. member proposed to constitute the new Court presented some serious objections for the Province of Quebec especially. With regard to the choice of a Judge of the Supreme Court as President of the Election Court, he believed that Parliament had the right to do so. The Supreme Court, having been created by Parliament, Parliament had the right to confer upon this Court the powers and the jurisdiction required for the trial of election petitions. As to the question whether the House had the right to take two Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, in order to constitute, with a Judge of the Supreme Court an Election Court, he was in some doubt about it. He would like to hear upon that subject the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Justice. He trusted that, at least in Committee, the House would have that opinion, in order to know what to think of the question. But it was, perhaps, well that the voice of the Province of Quebec should be heard upon this matter, and that members from Quebec should make known their views. He believed, in the first place, that the choice of Judges of the Queen's Bench would be the best, if it was in the power of the House to make such a choice regularly and constitutionally. He would much prefer to see the oldest Judges of this Court preside over election trials, for in these suits there was always mixed up so much bitterness, unfriendliness, and even hatred, that it would be well if the trial of these cases was confided to Judges far removed from politics, and who, not having taken part in elections for many years, were not liable to be influenced thereby. He was, therefore, of the opinion that, if it could be done without harm to our constitutional system, it would be very judicious to choose Judges of the Queen's Bench to constitute the Election Court, but in the actual state of things he did not think it could be done. As the hon. members for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) and for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) had observed, the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench had already more work than they could perform. Thus, if election trials in the Province of Quebec were placed in the hands of these Judges, we would fall back to the former system, that was to say, they would have election trials that would never come to an end. In this respect, he believed that the Bill of his hon. friend should be amended. In the second place, if all election trials in the Province of Quebec had to take place either at Quebec or Montreal, this would break up an entire judicial system. There were in the Province nineteen judicial districts, and a principal Court in each district, and, if the members for Gaspé and Bonaventure were obliged to go to Quebec with their witnesses, and the members for Pontiac and Ottawa to Montreal, they would fall under a more costly and defective system than the trial of elections before Select Committees. Witnesses would have to be brought from great distances, and he failed to see what good could come of this change. He believed that the transferring of election trials to the ordinary Courts had been a serious mistake. It was the habit, or rather the manner, in this country, to copy all that was done in England. He remembered what had been said on that subject by the Chief Justice of England, when, in 1868, the Election Bill transferring the trial of controverted elections to the ordinary Courts was brought before the House. The Chief Justice of England then set forth the reasons why these cases should not come before the Courts. Two principal reasons had presented themselves against the transferring of these trials to another tribunal than the Parliament itself. In the first place the eminent Chief Justice contended that Parliament could not alienate its privileges, and one of the most essential of its privileges was the right to pass judgment on the qualification or the disqualification of its members. The other objection raised by the Chief Justice was that, by transferring controverted elections to the ordinary Courts, Parliament would run the risk of lessening the authority and respect due to the Administration of Justice. And, indeed, that was what had happened. Not long since a painful example of this truth had been seen in England, a dreadful proof that what the Chief Justice had said was true. An eminent and remarkable Judge had died a victim, so to speak, of one of these judgments—he referred to Judge Keogh. The same thing would occur here if the trial of controverted elections was left in the hands of Judges appointed either by a Liberal or a Conservative Government. The judgment rendered by one of these Judges, whatever it might be, would not be approved of by the other side. He did not pretend to say that people were right in this, but unfortunately these trials took place immediately after the elections, when partisan spirit was still alive, when political hatreds were still strong. Whatever might be the judgment of the Court, were it a judgment rendered by heaven itself, were it the wisest judgment in the world, it would be found fault with. This was perhaps mere conjecture, and he did not think that his opinion would prevail. To return to the question now before the House, he would say that, if Parliament really wished to transfer the trial of controverted elections to well qualified tribunals, there would have to be a considerable change brought about. There ought to be a Controverted Elections Court, a Court specially created for that purpose, a Court composed of Judges whose sole occupation it should be to try these cases. The Judges could go from one county to another until all the trials were over; they would only have to travel from one district to another in order to meet the wants of the population. He believed that this was the only means that could be adopted, and that would fully meet the requirements of the public. He thought it was possible to form a corps of Judges, an Election Court, whose members should be chosen in such a manner as to offer perfect security to any one, and to all political parties. Whatever might be the Court, the Judges chosen should be those who had the greatest age and the greatest experience, and who were the longest out of politics, or who had never taken part in them; in a word, those Judges who were the farthest removed from political hatred, passion or necessity. Thus they could be looked upon as a truly impartial Court.

MR. DOMVILLE said he had not sufficient knowledge of law to enter deeply into the subject under discussion; but he knew, from the practical working of the present Act in New Brunswick, that it needed some alterations. To-day, when he had asked the question—what steps the Government were about to take in order to have the contested elections in New Brunswick tried, the First Minister of the Crown had informed him that the Government had nothing to do with the matter. Although nearly six months had elapsed since the elections, no cases had been tried, or judgments rendered in any of the cases arising out of that election, excepting in one instance of preliminary objections which had been before Judge Wetmore. He asked what right had gentlemen who knew they were not entitled to a seat in this House, to come here. The grossest corruption had been practised during the last election.

Some Hon. GENTLEMEN : Hear, hear.

MR. DOMVILLE: Hon. gentleman said "Hear, hear." They knew that joint notes had been made for large sums of money for election purposes—and the names on those notes were known, as well as the banks that had discounted them to raise money. The spirit of the law had not been carried out, and he thought that, on enquiry, it would be found that some Senators had unduly used their influence in elections.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the adjournment of the debate.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for the House to resume the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Grandbois, for a statement showing the names, occupation, and salaries of all persons employed in the service of the Intercolonial Railway, except day labourers, on the 13th December, 1875, read.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. DECOSMOS moved :

"That Sessional Paper 42 (not printed), 1877, respecting fisheries of Columbia and the report of the Inspector of Fisheries of Columbia for 1878, with all correspondence in 1878 connected with the fisheries of that Province, be laid before this House."

He said he could not allow the motion to pass silently, as he desired to draw the attention of the House to the importance of taking the very greatest care of the fisheries of this Dominion. About one-tenth of the total exports of this country were derived from the waters of this Dominion, and he believed that out of the $6,853,975 worth of fish that was exported from the Dominion last year, the Province to which he belonged sent $423,840 worth of fish abroad. Of that total amount of fish, Nova Scotia produced $4,322,925; Quebec, $864,499; New Brunswick, $800,445; British Columbia, $423,340; Prince Edward Island—an island that lay in the midst of the fisheries of the country—only sent abroad $349,787. The great Province of Ontario exported,

according to the returns for the year ending June 30th, 1878, $90,622, whilst our inland Province of Manitoba produced $1,857. It was a surprising fact that British Columbia, a Province which was scarcely twenty-one years old, should be the fourth greatest producer of fish in this Dominion. He would call their attention still further to the fact that the figures he had taken were derived from the annual return of Trade and Navigation. From the report of the Inspector of Fisheries for the Province of British Columbia for the year ending 31st December last, it appeared that the total value of fish exported from that Province was nearly $1,000,000—accurately speaking it was $925,766—thus placing the Province of British Columbia the second highest among the Provinces of the Dominion for producing fish that were exported from the country. There were several kinds of fish produced in that Province, but salmon was the chief fish exported. The total quantity of salmon exported from the whole Dominion in 1878 amounted to $770,723; the total value of salmon exported from the Province of New Brunswick was $245,000; from Nova Scotia, $62,625; from Quebec, $85,227; and Ontario, which possessed the mother salmon hatchery of the Dominion, only yielded $919. If the Commissioner of Fisheries were to gather statistics in reference to salmon, some knowledge of the value of hatcheries in the Province of Ontario would be obtained. His hon. friend the member for Westminster had the other day called the attention of the House to the correspondence respecting the hatcheries in the Province of British Columbia. He (Mr. DeCosmos) was one of those who had very grave doubts as to the value of hatcheries. It was quite a new branch of art, and he could not find any statistics as to the actual value of it. The total amount spent in 1878 for hatcheries was $20,088. Ontario spent $7,500, or thereabouts, and the next yield of salmon in the Province of Ontario was only $919. He could not find, in looking over the reports of the Fisheries Department, that there had been any increase in the take of salmon in those Provinces where the salmon hatcheries existed; he therefore desired to draw the special attention of the

hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to this point, and to the necessities of devoting especial attention to the salmon hatcheries, in order to learn whether they were of any practical value or not. Everybody knew, as a matter of amusement, that fish could be hatched from eggs by artificial means, but it was a question whether the salmon hatcheries in any part of this Dominion had been productive of any increase in salmon, and had served to populate our waters with that species of fish. With relation to the fisheries in British Columbia, which had produced last year about a million dollars' worth of fish, he thought they ought to be divided into two districts, one to be the southern portion of Vancouver's Island and mainland, and the other to extend northwards to Alaska. He called the attention of the Government to this matter. Last summer he visited the northern section of the fisheries. One of the difficulties met in taking fish in that section was the claims set up by the Indians. They claimed that they were the owners of certain fisheries, and that no one should be allowed to take salmon at the best fisheries without paying them a tribute. Now he thought it was the duty of the Department of the Interior to despatch one of its officers to the spot, and make such arrangements with the Indians as—while not preventing them from getting their annual supply of food, their store of salmon for the year—should prevent them interfering in any way with the fishing enterprises for canning and pickling salmon. The Department of Marine and Fisheries ought also to have another Inspector in that section, in order to aid the fishing enterprises already in existence, or that hereafter might be started. The two duties might be merged in one person, to the great advantage of the Province, and to that special industry—salmon fishing. With respect to the motion calling for Sessional paper 42, it arose in this way:—It was brought down last year, and sent to the Printing Committee,* but, for economical reasons, it was not printed. He asked, therefore, that it be brought down again and sent to the Printing Committee along with the report of the Inspector of Fisheries for the Province for 1878. He believed the two documents had an important bearing upon the fishing industry, and should be printed in the interest both of British Columbia and the Dominion at large.

MR. DOULL asked if the hon. gentleman (Mr. DeCosmos) would not extend the scope of his motion, so as to embrace all the Provinces of the Dominion. The question was a very important one, and should receive more attention from the Government than it had received heretofore. He had a statement in his hands showing the expenditure for these fishing establishments, and the expense of protecting the fisheries. Now, he contended that these fishing establishments did not give to the country an adequate return for all the money expended on them. Instead of spending so much money on these nurseries, it would be far better to expend it upon the protection of our river fisheries which were now insufficiently protected. If the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were in his place, he (Mr. Doull) would ask him to take this subject into consideration, because it was one in which the Maritime Provinces, as well as the rest of the Dominion, were deeply interested.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) asked that, as the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not in his place, his hon. friend (Mr. Doull) would consent to adjourn the debate until the Minister should be in his place.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DAMAGE TO THE WELLAND CANAL.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. HESSON, in the absence of Mr. MCCALLUM, moved for a statement giving the amount of damage caused by the break on the lower level of the Welland Canal in September, 1878; 1st. The amount required to make good and repair the damage to the Public Works; 2nd. The amount of damages to private property, and claims made for such damages; giving the name of each claimant, amount of such claim paid, and number and amount yet unsettled.

Motion agreed to.

TREATIES WITH INDIANS OF LAKES
HURON AND SUPERIOR.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. DAWSON moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, in reference to the arrears due to the Indians of Lakes Huron and Superior, under the treaties by which they relinquished their territorial rights; together with copies of the said treaties and all reports and documents bearing thereon.

MR. MACKENZIE said the arrears were not so much due to the Indians as to the Dominion Government. The Dominion had paid the Indians, but Ontario had not paid the Dominion.

MR. DAWSON said that his object in making this motion was to bring to the notice of the House and the country that there was a considerable amount due to the Indians, and that it had been withheld from them on account of a dispute between the two Governments as to which should pay it. This would appear when the papers came down. In the meantime, he would explain the position so far as to say that, in the case of the Lake Superior Indians, they had ceded their lands in 1830; that the annuities paid to them at first were small, amounting to but little over one dollar and fifty cents per head of the population, but the treaty contained a clause by which the Government became bound to increase the annuities to four dollars per head as soon as the revenues arising from the lands ceded should amount to a sum sufficient to admit of this being done without loss. The revenues had, for a long time, been considerable, but on Confederation the lands had passed to the Government of Ontario, while the Indians remained under the care of the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government claimed that the payments to the Indians were, in fact, a lien on the land, and that Ontario should hand over the amount. On the other hand, the Government of Ontario insisted that it belonged to the Dominion Government to deal with the Indians, and refused to regard the treaty as forming a lien on the land. Now what he (Mr. Dawson) wished to insist on was that, whatever Government might have eventually to pay the amount, the Indians should not be kept out of what was justly due them. Some nice legal points might be involved in the question between the two Governments, but the Indians had nothing to do with these points. Under any and all circumstances, faith should be kept with these poor people. And he believed that when the papers came down, the correspondence would be found to be so full that the matter would be thoroughly understood.

IMPORT OF BAR IRON INTO NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DOMVILLE moved for a return showing the number of tons of bar iron imported into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for the year 1878; value for duty and names of importers.

MR. BOWELL said it would take a great deal of time to get the names of importers, as reference would have to be made to the invoice. He suggested this should be dropped.

MR. DOMVILLE agreed to the suggestion.

VESSELS.

MOTION FOR PETITIONS.

MR. VALIN moved for copies of the petitions of Messrs. Ross and others, of Quebec and Lévis, proprietors and builders of ships and steamboats, in relation to the registration in Canada of American vessels. He said the petitioners in this case believed they were treated very unjustly. According to the Imperial Act, we were obliged to admit American-built ships to be registered in this country. Could not a measure be introduced, and an Address be drawn up, asking the British Government to rectify this injustice? It was an injustice done, not only to the Province of Quebec, but to the Lower Provinces as well; and it involved the whole Dominion. There was a large number of sea-going vessels and steamers now engaged in our coasting trade which never paid a cent to the revenue of this country, because they were built in the States and registered in Canada, without paying any duty. This was an injustice to our people, to our builders and mechanics, who had to pay a duty on everything employed in the construction of these ships. How many hands would be employed in the manufacture of engines for the different steamers which now were engaged in our waters if the conditions were changed? We paid these steamers a bounty by allowing them to be registered in this country without paying a cent of duty, while we paid from five to seventeen per cent. duty on our Canadian built ships and steamers. In consequence of this, we had no work for our people, and they would have to emigrate. In that case, where could they go, as there was no work for them anywhere else? Thus both they and their families would be reduced to beggary. The St. Lawrence and Ontario Company had been borne down by competition with an American line of steamers which paid no duty to this country, and the shareholders had been ruined in consequence. The petitioners dwelt upon the injustice of requiring them to pay duty upon materials required in shipbuilding. He desired to know why they should not pass an address asking the Imperial Government to remove the injustice done to this country, and trusted that the Government would remember this subject in the preparation of their National Policy, as it was a matter in which members on both sides of the House were deeply interested.

MR. FORTIN said that the House should endorse, by a large majority, the ideas that had been so ably expressed by his hon. friend from Montmorenci (Mr. Valin). His hon. friend was a most practical man, being a shipbuilder and shipowner, and was thereby enabled to appreciate the great injustice under which shipbuilders and shipowners in this country laboured. The thing was very simple. On some of the materials required in shipbuilding, the Canadian builder had to pay $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent duty, and on the principal articles 5 per cent. The money which he had to pay into the Treasury of the Dominion augmented the price of the ship, and he had to earn that much more in order to derive any benefit. The Americans were enabled, under the present British Shipping Act, to build a vessel, and bring her to this country and sell her without paying any duty, whilst the Canadian shipbuilder had to pay, say from \$1,000 to \$1,500 duty on the materials used in the building of a ship. This was a great injustice, affecting both the shipbuilders, shipowners and the labourers, which he trusted would be remedied by the Government in the National Policy.

MR. DECOSMOS said he spoke as one of the representatives of a seaport where ships and steamers had been purchased abroad, American-built, and brought in registered, whilst they had machine shops, shipbuilders, and wood for building in their own country. A few years ago one of their enterprising citizens built of British Columbia wood a tug that cost $120,000. He purchased machinery in Scotland at a cost of $60,000 odd, and on this he had to pay some $5,000 duty. Last summer, an American steamer was purchased in San Francisco for about $100,000, and now she floated under the British flag. No duty was paid on that vessel, and it must strike every one that, if they wished to protect home industries, if they wished to build up their country by providing shipbuilding labour at home, they would have to shut down upon everything in the way of allowing foreign ships to be registered in the Dominion. Unless the United States and other countries admitted our ships to registration, we should prohibit their ships from registration in Canada. The statement of the hon. member for Montmorenci (Mr. Valin), that American vessels repaired abroad had to pay duty on the amount of the repairs on their return to the United States showed how wise the American people were in protecting their own industries by every possible means. He also trusted that this matter would not be forgotten in the preparation of the National Policy.

MR. KILLAM said he was a little surprised that his hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) should have advocated the taxation of ships purchased by citizens of this country from other countries, while, at the same time, he had been using every exertion to get the duty taken off Canadian ships sold to France. He did not believe himself that any great benefit accrued to the people of France in imposing this duty. He thought it operated to their disadvantage. He believed that the prohibition which existed against Canadian-built vessels in the United States operated to the injury of the United States, and he believed that there was very little injurious competition, at all events, between the shipbuilders of Canada and the United States. In the case of vessels purchased in British Columbia, he felt confident they were so purchased on occasions when they were unable to build them themselves, and when they would have to be entirely without if they could not purchase them. He knew, in his own country, when a fishing vessel was wanted, in a case of emergency, a vessel might be bought in an American port, suitable for the business. If this were prohibited, the fisherman would be the sufferer. He never knew this was an injury to shipbuilders of Canada, and he thought the grievance was more imaginary than real. He desired to ask his hon. friend from Victoria why this rule of shutting down, as he called it, upon everything, should not be applied to machinery as well as shipping, and what possible benefit would result if his theory were adopted, that all these things should be taxed, and they should be entirely prevented from buying them from another country. He himself thought that the freer individuals were left to follow their own interest, by buying goods for shipbuilding or ships, in foreign markets, so much the better it would be for the general good, in the long run.

MR. DECOSMOS said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Killam) had referred to the two workshops of Victoria. He assured the House that the city of Victoria, to which he belonged, could produce as fine a machine shop as could the Province of Nova Scotia, and it could turn out engines and boilers of almost any size. Victoria had as good shipwrights as could be found in any country; many came from his own Province, Nova Scotia. So far as machinery was concerned, he was in favour of imposing a heavy duty on machinery, so that our mechanics could find employment at home, and Canada might not be tributary, as to manufactures, to any foreign country.

MR. KILLAM: If that is the case, why cannot machines be built as well in British Columbia, with its advantages of cheap coal and Chinese and other cheap labour?

MR. DECOSMOS: For the simple reason that, in San Francisco, there are a number of ships, making them a drug in the market, and their proprietors find it necessary to sell them below cost, which forces neighbouring cities, like Victoria, wanting them, to buy them. Hence, it is made a slaughter market.

MR. MACKENZIE: In getting goods below cost?

MR. ANGLIN said, no doubt, in the opinion of a great many hon. gentlemen opposite, it was a great misfortune to be able to purchase steamboats at very much less than their original cost—to buy for $100 an article that, were we excluded from places like San Francisco, would cost $150. It was a great misfortune that the whole country should be permitted to buy any articles at reasonable prices. Their whole prosperity was to depend, in future, on the grand doctrine that, the higher prices they paid for the necessaries of life, the more wealthy they should be. He did not rise to discuss prematurely Free-trade and Protection, but to draw attention to the very extraordinary state of things developed on the Ministerial side. What meant those motions and speeches? Were the hon. members alarmed and rushing into insubordination? Were they threatening their leaders? Was the National Policy not to include ships, steamers, and everything else, and to compel the people to pay for all things the highest possible prices? The Opposition were waiting, with all patience and equanimity, for the introduction of that wonderful National Policy,—that white elephant, as it had been called,—which was to do so much for the country. Though they had waited so long, doing so little, the Opposition did not repine; but hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side were showing symptoms of uneasiness. They had better, out of respect for their leaders, wait till they told them what they would deign to do for the country. If the National Policy meant anything, it was the exclusion of cheap ships, cheap cotton goods, cheap woollens and cheap goods of all sorts.

AN HON. MEMBER: And the Chinese.

MR. ANGLIN said he believed they would carry Protection so far as to exclude cheap labour, because the labouring man deserved as much protection as the manufacturer; and no cheap labour, Mongolian, German, Scotch or Irish, should be allowed to enter Canada. He approved of protecting the working men, the masses of the people of Canada. Were the few manufacturers, a good proportion of them wealthy men who had risen from humble positions, to be protected and made richer, and the working-man to receive no protection? The leaders of hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side were devoting their attention to two great objects—one the decapitation of civil servants, who happened to be on the wrong side of politics, and the other the maturing of a great National Policy, which, if it meant anything, would accomplish all that those hon. gentlemen seemed determined to have, but were very much afraid they would not get.

MR. MACMILLAN said he was exceedingly sorry to see the ex-Speaker occupying his present position. They had seen him occupying a very doubtful position, the Chair the hon. the Speaker now occupied. He (Mr. Macmillan) was one who believed the ex-Speaker had no right to his former position, yet he occupied it in the kindest, most generous, hospitable manner so far as he could. The member for Gloucester (Mr.

Anglin) asked hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side what they thought of the decapitation of certain civil servants; but what did he think when five of them went to the Province of Quebec at the last local elections, under his instructions, in relation to which he was not asked a solitary word before? He looked blandly at the departure and efforts of those officials for a party that, perhaps, ought not to occupy their present position to-day. The National Policy was one of those matters that required considerable time for development. He was glad to see such a child-like and bland smile on the countenance of the leader of the Opposition, being the first of the kind that had lighted it this Session, and since he left office. He (Mr. Macmillan) might be able, in a few days, to announce to the member for Gloucester decapitations of a kind that might not appear so pleasant as those he had mentioned. He was not one of those who desired the superannuation of officials not incapacitated by age or other causes.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not understand the hon. gentleman.

MR. MACMILLAN said there was an obtuseness about the party of the hon. gentleman since they went into Opposition. Within a couple of days, he would announce the names of officials who had been placed beyond the pale through their own fault, possibly, or incapacity, which might enable him to explain something in connection with the matter himself. With regard to the National Policy, it would be better to have it properly developed before submitting it, than to present such a hybrid as would come from the Opposition side, and require change from moment to moment thereafter.

MR. FORTIN, in answer to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), said it was simply in the interest of shipowners, not shipbuilders, to buy ships as cheaply as they could. They must consider all the interests of the Dominion alike. If shipowners were to buy only English and American vessels, what would become of our shipbuilders, workmen, lumbermen and others connected with this industry? The shipbuilders, as well as the shipowners, deserved consideration. His idea in supporting the motion of the member for Montmorenci (Mr. Valin) was to obtain reciprocity from the Americans. Both as to navigating our canals and selling vessels in our markets, we allowed them privileges not given to us, and our shipwrights and other artisans were left to starve. His view was to keep our workmen employed and retain them in the country. England did not build up her power and wealth by Free-trade, but adopted it only after, by Protection, she had become supreme as a manufacturing and naval power. If other countries followed her policy, she would be the only great manufacturing power in the world; but they, too, were learning to manufacture for themselves. He would never be hostile to the interests of Great Britain, as it was the Mother Country, and from her we received the blessing of Constitutional Government; but we must look to ourselves, and protect our interests and find employment for our starving people. We saw poverty all over the country. It was the duty of the Government to try to relieve our needy people, and to tax American vessels as they taxed ours, unless they gave us the same rights in their country as they had in our own.

Mr. SPROULE said he was surprised to see the course adopted by hon. gentlemen to defeat a motion which had for its object the giving of information, which ought to be desirable to every member of this House. It was evident that neither the majority of the House, nor of the country that elected it, considered it for the public interest to continue the policy of the past. He was surprised to see the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) following such a line of argument after the popular verdict of September last. Strange that no amount of experience would satisfy some that they were wrong. The popular verdict should suffice as to whether it would be better for Canadians to buy American machinery because cheaper; they should reflect that it meant paying out money our people would never handle again, but which, if spent among them, passing from one trade to another, would help all, represent wealth in the country, and increase the means of employment. Another argument should satisfy the most sceptical—the Americans were practising abroad a system of trade they did not pursue at home—namely, throwing into our markets manufactured goods at lower than the home prices. Why? Because they wanted to kill off Canadian competition. This was notoriously the case with the salt manufacture. When Goderich salt was first introduced to the trade of Canada, American salt was sold here cheaper than in the States, so that they might effectually shut up the salt wells here, and still hold the trade in their own hands; but the Canadian Government rescued our salt trade from destruction by imposing a duty on the American article, thus also building up that interest, and enabling it afterwards to compete with the American trade when the duty against it was removed.

Mr. HESSON said it was not a good argument to say that, because goods could be purchased a little cheaper from manufacturers outside of this country, the workshops of the Dominion should be closed, and our workmen thrown out of employment simply for the benefits that might accrue to the consumer. The question of Free-trade and Protection had been freely discussed during the electioneering period previous to the 17th September, and the result of the elections on that day had proved conclusively that an immense majority of the people was in favour of Protection. He believed it was in the best interests of this country that they should have a system of Protection, and he thought if a proper system were adopted, prosperity would again return to every branch of industry; our workshops and factories would be running, and our mechanics and labourers would find employment. On the 17th September last they had nailed the motto "Protection to Our Canadian Industries" to their mast, and they were determined to stand or fall by it. He would support the motion of the hon. member for Montmorenci (Mr. Valin). He considered it his duty to do so, as it was of great importance to the Dominion that their shipping interests should be protected. He was amused at the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), who seemed to insinuate that members on the Government side of the House were afraid of their leaders. He could tell him they were not afraid of their leaders, and they desired their leaders to understand they had nothing to fear from that side of the House, if they gave the country what its verdict demanded on the 17th of September last.

CANADIAN SHIPS IN UNITED STATES WATERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ROCHESTER, in the absence of Mr. CURRIER, moved for copies of all correspondence with the Colonial Office or with the Government of the United States, subsequent to a return made on the 5th of April, 1876, respecting the action taken by that Government in denying to Canadians the free navigation of the United States or State Canals and the Hudson River, in accordance with the Treaty of Washington, together with all Orders in Council, or other papers connected therewith. He said he supposed the object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currier) who was to make this motion was to bring this matter once more before the House, as it had already been brought up on previous occasions, in order to induce the Government to try and get rid of the difficulties that existed in the carrying trade between the United States and

Canada. A great deal had been said this evening with regard to the shipping interest, and it was one that affected this section of the country, perhaps, more than any other. He would say that the carrying trade of this part of the country with the United States was now done entirely by American vessels. A few years ago, Canadians had something like 250 or 300 barges, and between thirty and forty steamers, engaged in this trade, and employing between 2,000 and 3,000 men. Now, if he said that one steamer and ten barges were employed for that purpose, it would be the extent to which that business was reduced, and the extent of the carrying trade of lumber into the United States by the people of this section of the country, or the people of Canada. The law was such that it was impossible to send our vessels across. The Government at Washington said that Canadian vessels had no right to pass beyond the first collateral district in the United States. That cut off our vessels this side of Albany, so that we could not reach the Hudson River nor go down to New York with our lumber. We had to send it all in American vessels. Now this was a great inconvenience, great loss to the carrying trade of this country, and to the manufacturers of this country. We had to pay frequently one and two dollars a thousand—which in itself would be very fair profit—more than what we should have to pay on our lumber if we could carry it to the United States in our own vessels. We had paid as high as nine dollars a thousand for lumber from here to New York, and the forwarding interests in this country would be glad to contract year in and year out to carry that lumber to New York for four dollars a thousand. This would give the House some idea of what the lumber interest suffered in the carrying trade between here and the markets in the United States. A great deal had been said on this subject in the House on previous occasions, and he did not think it necessary to reiterate it to-night. But he would say this, that he hoped the present Government would take this matter in hand and try to redress this grievous wrong—for it was a grievous wrong that we should be deprived of sending our lumber there while the Americans had free access to every port in the Dominion of Canada. He thought he was correct in stating that an American barge coming into Canadian ports could register for something like two dollars—he supposed a steamer in comparison might range from ten to twelve dollars—while the same class of vessel going into the United States would cost the owner of that vessel from $500 to $600 to register her in a port in the United States.

MR. MACKENZIE: What does the hon. gentleman mean by registration—to make her an American vessel?

MR. ROCHESTER: No, Sir, but I mean that the vessel can go back to that port again during that year—for trade, of course.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is thirty cents per ton.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is a universal tax; it is not a special tax on Canadian vessels. It is the tonnage dues.

MR. ROCHESTER: I am not saying that it is. I do not know that they make any discriminating laws particularly against Canada. I am only stating that there is no comparison between the registry of our vessels and the registry of theirs.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not a registry at all.

MR. ROCHESTER said he thought he could show the hon. gentleman that he was right. There was no comparison between the laws, and the American laws utterly prohibited our people from doing any trade in the United States. As to the coasting trade or anything of that kind, we could not do it. No man could afford to pay $500 or $1,000, for he supposed it would cost $1,000 to register a steamer on the other side. This was an abuse. His hon. friend the leader of the Opposition seemed to be a little nettled. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had once said, on the floor of this House, that negotiations were pending in regard to this same law between the Canadian and the Washington Governments. He (Mr. Rochester) believed the Government at Washington endeavoured, in the first place, to throw this back upon the Government of the State of New York, but the honest truth was that it was the Washington and not the State Government that was to blame in the matter. The New York Government was perfectly satisfied to let no matter how many Canadian bottoms pass through their canals, the more the better. But it was the Washington Government that contended that no Canadian bottoms could pass the first collateral district in the United States, no matter what part of the United States it happened to be. This utterly prohibited Canadians from sending anything into the United States, whilst the American had free access to every port in the Dominion of Canada—not to one port alone. If one of our vessels, although recorded and registered in the United States, touched at an American port she could not touch at a second one, but had to come back to Canada again before she could touch at another. But an American vessel could come into Montreal loaded with coal or anything else, put off a portion in Montreal, a portion in Ottawa, then go on to Kingston and Toronto, unloading at each place. He knew of American boats that did this from time to time, some of them partly loaded here, and some loaded at Perth, twenty or fifty miles from here, and some in Montreal. They loaded anywhere they pleased, and discharged their cargoes in the same way. Had our vessels any such privilege? No, they had not. An instance of this happened a few years ago, when we thought we had everything all right for our trading vessels. We sent one steamer and ten barges through, which went down to New York and unloaded, and came back to Canada loaded with coal. Just before they reached Canada, and just after they had passed Rouse's Point, a telegram came from Washington: "Seize that steamer and ten barges." But, fortunately for the man who owned them, they had just got over the line before the telegram reached there, or else the American Government would have seized and sold them. This was no exaggeration. He was prepared to substantiate what he was stating now. Many of the gentlemen who had not previously been in the House might hardly believe what he was stating now; but it was true, and still this state of things existed. He had been listening to the remarks of some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side this evening, and they were talking about what? About work for the labouring classes. It appeared to him most ridiculous for those hon. gentlemen to talk thus, as the course they had been pursuing for the last five years had done nothing but deprive the labouring classes of work, and shut up the manufactures of all kinds in the Dominion of Canada. He hoped the present Government would have some of these wrongs redressed, which ought to have been redressed long ago.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he wished to correct a mistake which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) had fallen into, and he (Mr. Burpee) believed the hon. the Minister of Customs would agree with him in what he was about to say. A vessel loaded with a cargo in Canada, could go to the States and discharge in twenty ports, if she liked; or a vessel, loaded in Canada, could discharge a part of her cargo in Portland, the second part in Boston, and the last in New York. A vessel loading in New York to come to Canada could do the same thing in Canadian ports. This was provided for in the British Merchant Shipping Act, and had been in existence for years. The same privileges of navigation and coasting extended to vessels in Canada going to the United States as were extended to vessels in the States coming to Canada. But a vessel could not come into Canada from the United States discharge part of the cargo and take another part in a Canadian port; neither could a vessel, going from Canada into the United States, discharge part of a cargo and take another part in, but she could go from one port to another until she got a full discharge. The laws were alike in both cases.

MR. ROCHESTER said what he had stated was, that an American vessel could go with her cargo from one port to another in Canada, until she discharged it all. She could start from here and go to any other port in Canada, and take in one part of her cargo here and another part in Montreal or anywhere else, and so pass on to the United States. A year ago last fall the trade was just in this state. They might have shipped from this section of the country millions and millions of feet of lumber, if they could have got vessels to do it with. The lumber was sold and was to have been delivered last fall, but it could not be delivered because they could not send it in Canadian bottoms.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): I beg your pardon; barges can load in Canada and then go to New York, but one difficulty is that our barges are too large to go through their canals, and another difficulty that the United States compel cargoes of our barges to be entered for Customs at the first port of entry in the United States, after crossing into United States waters, which is a grievance our people justly complain of.

MR. ROCHESTER: The hon. gentleman is wrong.

MR. MACKENZIE: When the papers come down, we can settle all these points.

MR. BURPEE: When I said that the navigation laws of the two countries are alike, I meant that there are no privileges granted to United States vessels, loading and discharging in Canada, that are not granted to Canadian vessels going there.

MR. McCALLUM said there seemed to be some misunderstanding about the matter. The fact he believed to be this: That American boats were allowed to go through Canadian canals, whereas the Americans would not allow our boats to go through their canals. The Americans would not allow our lumbermen to go down there and deliver their lumber whenever they wanted to, whilst our Government allowed American boats to take lumber here whenever they liked. The hon. leader of the Opposition seemed to be perfectly satisfied with the tonnage dues. In fact, he seemed to think it was quite right that we should give every privilege in the world to the Americans. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had said they did not charge our vessels any more than they did vessels of anybody else. How was this tax levied in the first place? The Americans, after the war, laid a tax at a certain percentage on the earnings of their own vessels. But they found by that they could not make Canadian vessels pay any portion of that tax by this arrangement, and they put a tax of thirty cents a ton on all our vessels going into the United States, in order to make our vessels pay, and we had got to pay that yearly. He was satisfied the Canadian Government could not put any such tax on American shipping, without putting the same on Canadians; that matter was subject to a treaty made with Great Britain by the United States. But when we went there to report and clear, they charged us a large amount of money, and that was the way the question stood. Many men in Canada wanted to let the Americans come in here. Yes; and take the bread from our own children by doing all our work. He thought it was time now for the Government of this country to look after the interests of the people, and keep what belonged to us, unless the Americans would give us reciprocity and equal privileges to what they were receiving. It had been arranged, in the Treaty of Washington that the State of New York should give us the use of their canals, but the Government at Washington used their influence so as to prevent our using them, by their Customs legislation. That seemed to be the position of this question, and the position of many other questions. The moment we began to pinch the pockets of the Americans, then we could get reciprocity on equal terms from them, and not before.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. DESJARDINS, in the absence of Mr. DUBUC, moved for a statement showing the number of leases granted by the Government to cut timber on the public land of the Dominion within the settlement belt on the Red River; the dates of said leases and period for which they are granted; the particular lots on which said wood lots are situated, and the area covered by each lease; also, for a copy of the instructions given to the Dominion Land Agent in Winnipeg in reference to the leasing of said wooded lands, and of the form of said lease; and also, a copy of all or any correspondence relating to the same.

Motion agreed to.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Railway Act, and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 30) To amend the Coteau and Province Line Railway and Bridge Act, and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 32) To amend an Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of Members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Ives.)

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

(Mr. Baby.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BABY introduced a Bill (No. 31) To amend and consolidate the Acts respecting duties imposed on bills of exchange and promissory notes. He said the Bill was a mere consolidation of the existing laws, with only one amendment. By the existing laws the use of stamped paper was permissive, but it was said last year, when a Bill was introduced by his predecessor to make the use of stamped paper compulsory, that the country would not view the proposal with satisfaction. He had introduced a small amendment to the present law, providing that, whenever a party employed stamped paper which was not up to the amount of the note itself, the maker would have the right of putting on an additional stamp to fill up the amount due.

Bill read the first time.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved:

"That a Select Committee of fifteen members be appointed to enquire into and consider the questions of Insolvency and Bankruptcy, the working of the Insolvent Laws of Canada, as well as the expediency of continuing, amending, or repealing such Laws; with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report by Bill or otherwise; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. McDonald (Pictou), McCarthy, McLennan, Cartwright, Domville, Brecken, Holton, Cimon, Colby, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Robertson (Hamilton), Weldon, Laurier, Longley, and Sir A. J. Smith."

MR. MILLS said this motion was, in principle, very like a motion made in 1875, which the hon. the leader of the Government characterised as a motion for taking into consideration the financial state of the nation, and the hon. gentleman quoted Hume to show that it was a vote of non-confidence. In this instance, however, he thought the Government practically declared their inability or want of courage to deal with the subject, and sought to transfer the responsibility from the Treasury benches to Parliament. If they looked to the Gazettes which had been published during the last three months, they would see that a considerable part of them had been taken up with the appointments of official assignees. A thriving business had been done in the appointment of assignees by those gentlemen who had promised the country so much prosperity under the National Policy. They seemed to think these assignees were to have a large amount of business to do. He did not believe there was a constituency from the Detroit River to Halifax in which assignees had not been appointed. This did not indicate a confidence by the prophets of the Ministerial benches in their own predictions. He had no doubt that the First Minister would be able to tell the House why this preliminary question, really a question of taking into consideration the state of the nation, had been transferred from the Treasury benches, where the consideration of the question properly belonged, to Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would be most happy to allay the laudable curiosity of his hon. friend from Bothwell. He (Mr. Mills) said the Government had been employed since they had been in power in appointing assignees for the purpose of looking after the insolvents. Whilst they must admit that there were a great many insolvents in the country, candour compelled them to state that they had become insolvent during the retention of power by his hon. friends opposite; and that they had appointed assignees for the purpose of winding up the estates driven to insolvency by the policy of the late Administration. It was much easier to destroy than construct, as no doubt his hon. friend had found out. It was true that the credit of the country had suffered,—under what influence or auspices it would be impolite to cross the floor of the House to say;—still there was no doubt that the work of destruction of the public credit and prosperity of the country had gone on with accelerated vigour for the last five years. They proposed to arrest that progress of destruction, and alleviate the existing state of depression by a careful, not rash, moderate, and yet efficient, protection of the industries of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) had said he was surprised they should move for a Committee to enquire into this matter. From the number of Bills and petitions on the subject presented to the House, he was afraid that the state of the nation was not in the most flourishing condition, and it did not rest with the hon. gentleman to complain, when they asked the assistance of men of experience, amongst whom were late Ministers, to consider this matter, which was, without jest, a matter of the most serious importance. They were merely pursuing the same course they pursued when they were a Government before. This measure was then sent to a Special Committee. The whole subject had been taken up by the then member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). He was a professional gentleman who had practised largely in that branch of professional business. The result of the labours of that Committee was the measure, with some few amendments, which was the law of the land. There was, from one cause or another, from a very general state of depression, or, perhaps, from defects in the machinery in some respects, a general dissatisfaction with the working of the system as it then stood. He was not ashamed to confess, as the leader of the Government, that he desired, on this subject, the assistance of commercial and professional men, before it was dealt with. He thought it was a subject, as it was in 1871 or 1872, that ought to be fairly considered by a Committee of financial, commercial and legal men, in order that they might judge of the various arguments that could be used. It was assumed, by a large portion of the people, that no Insolvency Law could be a satisfactory law, while there were some who were in favour of some Insolvent Law which would relieve the honest but unfortunate trader from his difficulties, believing the law could be amended so as to work well. There were innumerable suggestions from Boards of Trade and Boards of Commerce on that subject. There were also petitions before the House, and several hon. members, he believed, had measures before the House on this important subject. He thought it would be well that all the petitions on the subject, and all the Bills, should be referred to this Committee, that they should have a full opportunity, during the present Session, of studying out and coming to some final conclusion. His hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had stated that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had charged the late Government with giving up their powers by submitting to reference to Committees.

MR. MILLS: No; I referred to the appointment of the Committee on Financial Depression.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this was a financial depression resulting in insolvency, but the hon. member would remember the Cabinet was not a unit on that subject. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), then the leader of the Government, was personally against all insolvency laws, and before he was a Minister he said he would use all the means in his power to repeal the Insolvent Law. Personally, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was very much of the same opinion—but, not being a commercial man, he did not think he should be obstinate in his opinion—that there should be no Insolvent Laws, that the ordinary relations between debtor and creditor should be allowed to continue, that the liabilities for the fulfilment of contracts should be insisted upon as a general rule, and that occasionally, of which only Parliament should judge, when an inevitable crisis came round, there might be introduced an Insolvent Law for a limited period, to relieve the prudent creditor who suffered in the crash with the imprudent. It had always been his opinion, although he had never pressed that opinion authoritatively, as a member of a former Government, that this matter should be left to a Committee. He thought it was the proper course now. There was, beyond doubt, a great feeling of dissatisfaction in the country upon the subject, and a general call for it to be again dealt with. As had been expected, on so important a subject, there was a great diversity of opinion, and the various amendments proposed ought to be carefully considered by a Select Committee, and he thought the committee, as proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, was calculated to discuss the subject ably and fully.

Mr. HOLTON said that, notwithstanding the good natured badinage of his hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), he fancied there would be no serious opposition to the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Justice. He had no hesitation in saying that he thought that was the proper method of dealing with the subject, which could be considered in no sense a party question; nor was it a question on which he felt inclined to maintain his personal consistency. For many years he had been in favour, on the whole, of maintaining an Insolvency Law, but he admitted that opinion, long held, was very much shaken at this moment. He did not see his way clear to pronounce either way. He saw great difficulties in abolishing the law purely and simply, and he saw great difficulties, especially in view of the depressed condition of trade, and the state of opinion in the country in relation to the effects of this Insolvent Law, in maintaining the law as it was. He was clearly of opinion that it would be found inexpedient to abrogate the law purely and simply. The effect of repealing the law would be to superinduce consequences more inconvenient and more disastrous than those already flowing from the law. Therefore, he thought the only rational course had been taken in submitting the whole question to a Committee. It was the course taken in the old Provinces of Canada when the subject was first introduced. It was the course taken after Confederation by his hon. friend the leader of the Government, and it was the course taken at a later period, when his hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was leader of the Government, and he approved of the step taken upon this occasion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he saw that his name was amongst those proposed to form the Committee, and, although he had not had the experience in this kind of work he could wish, he would not decline to act. As to who was responsible for the state of the trade of the country, he proposed to take the opportunity of discussing at some length when the financial statement came down, and he thought the hon. gentleman would confess, after he said what he had to say, that at any rate he and his friends had not altered their views, and that they were fully prepared to justify all they said and did during their term of office. With reference to the appointment of official assignees, he noticed that many of the gentlemen who had been appointed by the present Government had been once or twice through the Bankruptcy Court themselves, and might, therefore, be supposed to know all about bankruptcy matters.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Experientia docet.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman opposite had not stated his position in this matter correctly in saying that he had been opposed to all Insolvency Laws. The ground he had taken was that an occasional law for a specific period might be almost a necessity, and that to have a standing measure on the Statute-book, subject only to repeal in the ordinary process, was not desirable. His impression was now confirmed by experience, that a continuous bankrupt law had a great tendency to demoralise the trade of the country. He also took the ground that he would not object to a Bill being in operation for a short time in order to clear up certain estates which were bankrupt by some inevitable and natural law operating on financial affairs which no person could possibly foresee. There were bankruptcies of a character in which no one doubted that the parties concerned should have relief. Sometimes there was a hardship in preventing them all their lives from obtaining release from obligations which had been incurred in good faith, and which resulted in great disaster to themselves. At the same time, while he held these views formerly in Opposition, he also always bound himself to a certain extent to the opinions of the mercantile and commercial men of the country. He did not think any public man was justified in such a matter as this in adhering too rigidly to the views which ultimately might become more or less injurious to the commercial interests of the country, and, in assuming the leadership of the Government, he felt he should act upon this principle with even more generosity than he was prepared to act with while simply a member of the Opposition. He had, therefore, no hesitation in giving his best energies to the promotion of such a Bill as would, in the most effectual manner, serve the best interests of the country. To this principle he still adhered, and, while he believed his own views had received confirmation from the recent commercial history of the country, he was still prepared to consider what steps would be most advisable under the present disastrous circumstances. It was customary with hon. gentlemen opposite, principally at a time of political excitement, to use the commercial depression of the country as a political engine. He always deprecated that course. He never adopted that course himself when he might have adopted it. He never charged hon. gentlemen opposite who were in charge of the affairs of the country at a former general depression twenty years ago with dereliction of duty, merely because there was a depression in the country. He had always said, and he said it now, that there never was a more dishonest agitation on the part of public men than that which they witnessed during last year in this country. However, he would have an opportunity of dealing with this matter again. He merely made that remark then in pursuance of the exposition of his views which he was then making. He would not pursue the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, of depreciating the matter. But he might, fairly taking, on their own ground, gentlemen who alleged that the Government had it in their power, by legislation, to prevent commercial depression, expect and exact from them the fulfilment of the promises they made, and the equivalent of the boast that, if they had been in charge of the affairs of the country, we should have had no bankruptcies, no commercial depression, no failures of any kind. This was the ground taken by them, and he should be able, at the proper time, to show that hon. gentlemen did not hesitate to resort to such practices in order to obtain temporary possession of the Government of this country. He had no doubt that such political wickedness would bring its own punishment in due time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What as to the present?

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman looked simply at the present. Meantime they had, as a Parliament, to address themselves to the duty of making the best of the present commercial circumstances. He would, therefore, feel bound to render every possible assistance to the gentlemen on the Treasury benches in acquiring such knowledge as might be necessary in perfecting such legislation as the circumstances of the country demanded at present.

MR. MACDOUGALL said there was some convenience in referring a question of this kind to a Select Committee composed of gentlemen who, by previous pursuits, education and experience, might be qualified to deal with the subject, but, at the same time, there was some inconvenience in such a reference. In the present case they were dealing with a question upon which every hon. member must have formed an opinion, and most of them were ready, no doubt, to prescribe a remedy for the grievance or evil existing in the country. He (Mr. Macdougall) felt some apprehension that members would find themselves, to some extent, compromised or precluded from taking the course and expressing the opinions they honestly entertained, by the action of the Committee; because, though the report of the proposed Committee might be unanimous, or nearly so, its members would know very little more of the matter than the other members of the House. The Committee would be authorised to send for persons and papers, and it would be their duty to ascertain, from lawyers and merchants and experts in insolvency, the working of the law, and the results in the cases that came under their notice. The enquiry, if it was to be completed this Session, in time to become a basis for legislation, must be brief. He should be very glad to have the benefit of that enquiry, but it ought to be an exhaustive and complete one. This was not a new question in the Canadian Parliament. He had heard it discussed for many years, and he entirely agreed with the hon. gentleman opposite as to the best mode of dealing with insolvency, and that any law granting a discharge to insolvent debtors ought to be temporary, passed to meet a commercial exigency, and, after due notice, repealed. The normal rule or universal law should be that every man should pay his debts in full. That should be the rule, except during particular periods of distress, and after the special interference of Parliament. That was the true principle on which they ought to base their legislation. He had hoped there would have been a general discussion of this question, with reference to which, he believed, the House was sufficiently informed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no better time for its discussion than now.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he hoped, then, that members who had formed opinions on the subject would express them, because they might be instructive to the Committee, and guide them in their researches. For his own part, as a member of this House, he was not prepared to place his franchise in the hands of any Committee, and should claim, when the Committee reported, the right to agree or disagree with its recommendations.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he agreed with the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it was undesirable that the Government should take its present course. He could not understand that the Minister of Justice could mean that this Committee should prosecute its labours with such diligence as to be able to report to the House so as to enable it to take definite action in the present Session. It was impossible that he should not know that it was, or had been the deliberate intention of the Government that the present Insolvent Law should remain in force. How could they explain otherwise the fact that, during the last three months, 83 additional official assignees were appointed, no less than 23 being required in Montreal alone. First, the Minister of Justice said they were required to clear up cases of bankruptcy that accumulated owing to mismanagement under the late Government. He forgot the fact that, the moment a man became insolvent, his estate went into the hands of the official assignee. The number of assignees was sufficient, and they were dealing with all the cases previous to that hon. gentleman's advent to office. His appointments must have had reference to the parties that were yet to be thrown into insolvency by himself and colleagues. There could be no other logical conclusion. Now, what did they anticipate? Scarcely had they attained power, when they felt conscious that, deep and grave as had been the disasters of the commercial world, they were still to be intensified to a very great degree. On the 14th November they appointed two official assignees, giving an additional one to Montreal, and, one week after, they found the distress under their rule was becoming so much greater, that an additional one had to be named. Then they went on nine days; the country seemed to have recovered a little from the staggering blow they had given it, when they appointed another. Within six days after, they appointed fifteen more, five for Montreal, and thence at various periods of different length, all the rest were gazetted, while nothing was done in the way of mitigating or removing that commercial depression for which the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches boasted they possessed the panacea, which was to perform such marvels for the benefit of the people. He heard the member for Centre Huron say the Opposition were prepared to take a stand and adhere to their principles in the future as in the past. He heard, in a tone of boasting, a taunt thrown to that gentleman, that he was still adhering to his own policy, was still the fly on the wheel—a favourite taunt of the Conservative party during the late electoral campaign. Now there was fast growing an impression in the country that, instead of those hon. gentlemen being merely flies on the wheel, by some means or other the wheel had got on the top of them, the present flies, and crushed them, for they could not even buzz. He would like to know when their grand remedial policy was to come down. The member for Shefford was necessarily severe when he called for an early delivery of the Budget speech. That hon. gentleman knew, or ought to know, that the Ministers and supporters were known as the N. P., or the great National Poultrice Party, pledged to bring in a remedy for all the woes of the country; and he must know it could not be prepared in a short time, and that, while the great medicine man said he was able to prescribe, nevertheless the great father was not willing to prepare it. The prescription was handed over to the great financial apothecary, who was working it up, and, in due time, it would be submitted to the House, which would derive from it all the benefit expected. Seriously, he rather anticipated evil consequences from the motion of the Minister of Justice, for this reason: It would only have one effect so far as the present Session was concerned, namely, leaving the Insolvent Law as it stood. Nevertheless, it was disastrous as regarded the interests of the country that the impression should go abroad that the abolition of the Insolvent Law was seriously meditated. Past experience taught them that, whenever there was serious talk of repealing that law, a frightful crop of failures followed. Business men knew very well that the shaky ones would hasten to take advantage of that law's provisions. He did not oppose the appointment of the Committee, but trusted that, if appointed, its labours would benefit the country. The question had been discussed sufficiently in the House. He agreed with the member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) that business men would not be willing to submit their views to those of any Committee. He thought it was the bounden duty of the Government, instead of merely proposing a discussion of this matter, and the appointment of a Committee, to have submitted a measure to the House; they should either have proposed an amendment to the law or signified their willingness to accept the Bill of some member on the subject. They had not hesitated to confess their fear to assume the responsibility. He hoped the Committee, if appointed, would show they meant business, and report in ample time, and that some definite action would be taken, either in amending or repealing the present law, or making the country understand that the law as it stood was to remain. Let whatever was to be done be done at once.

MR. GUTHRIE said he desired to call attention to one or two points in connection with the question. There seemed to be diversities of opinion which might be divided into two classes. A number of persons favoured the entire repeal of the Act, and the substitution therefor of what might be called the Lower Canada system. Another class thought its repeal would be a grave calamity, so far as Ontario was concerned, to its business men to whom money was due. The entire repeal of the Act would leave us within any law for the equal distribution of debtors' estates, and throw us back into the old system of preferential judgments, enabling also an insolvent to favour his relations. The House might consider whether they could adopt a better system than the present for securing the distribution of the estate equally among the creditors. Now, the Lower Canada system recommended was quite as cumbersome and expensive in its working as that of the existing law. Not only so, but he found the Lower Canada system not so complete or effective. For instance, in respect to book debts, they could not be reached under it, except by separate garnishee proceedings against each debtor. So far as the provisions of the Quebec law were concerned, they were quite as long, if not longer, than the provisions of the Insolvency Act. Under the Code of Civil Procedure of Lower Canada, that part of it that treated of compulsory executions and the distribution of the proceeds of the debtors' property, covered 229 sections. Then that part of the Code relating to privileges, or, as it was called in Ontario, securities held by creditors, covered 32 sections. The total number of sections occupied in dealing with the question of the equal distribution of property, in the Lower Canada Code, amounted to 330 separate sections. He would venture to say the provisions of the Insolvent Act, in that respect, were shorter, more complete, and less expensive, than the Lower Canada system. Moreover, in Ontario and other Provinces, they had the Insolvency Act in operation, and knew how to work it. In Quebec, of course, it might suit professional and mercantile men there better to have their own special laws, but the people in the other Provinces were not familiar with them. They had become familiar, in the course of practice, with the provisions of the Insolvent Act, and these provisions, as far as they related to the equal distribution of debtors' property among the creditors, and the valuation of securities, were perfectly equitable and just, and the working of them was perfectly understood. The one question; therefore, that would come up for serious consideration was the question of the discharge of a debtor from his obligations. He thought the entire repeal of the Act was quite impossible at present, in view of the imperfect state of the local law of Ontario in making no provision for the equal distribution of assets, and they could not have a much better one for that purpose than they had now under the Insolvent Act. There remained the question, therefore, should they continue to grant a debtor his discharge or make any provision for it, except with the unanimous consent of the creditors? He noticed a new Bankruptcy Act had been introduced by the Lord Chancellor of England, and he, in introducing it, had observed that a grave evil had been felt in England as well as here—that arising from the too great facilities which debtors now had for securing private arrangements with their creditors. This was proposed to be met by saying that no such private arrangement or composition should be binding upon non-assenting creditors, unless it provided for the payment of 25 cents in the dollar. It would be worthy of the consideration of the House, whether they should not adopt some such enactment here. As they were aware, under the present law, creditors, by a majority in number, and three-fourths in value, could grant a discharge to a debtor whose estate paid not a single farthing. That was, no doubt, an evil, and he suggested, therefore, that they should endeavour to remove the dissatisfaction which rightly existed in regard to the present system of discharge under the Insolvency Act, by providing some limit, such as the one suggested in England; say twenty-five per cent., and that, if the man's estate did not pay that, no decision of the majority of creditors, granting him a discharge, should be binding upon the minority. He thought, however, that they should not altogether take away the discharging sections of the Insolvent Act. If they had a measure by which they took a debtor's entire property from him, by course of law, and divided it amongst his creditors, there should be some provision for the debtor's discharge. If it was found that the estate, even in the hands of an assignee, paid fifty cents in the dollar, there was every reason to conclude that the debtor had not been guilty of any gross mismanagement or carelessness, for the estate that would pay, in the hands of the assignee, fifty cents in the dollar, clear of all expenses, could not have been a very bad estate. Moreover, it might be said, with regard to discharge by consent, that, if the majority of creditors in number representing three-fourths of the amount of indebtedness, were satisfied to grant a discharge, the minority must be presumed to be acting unreasonably in withholding it. He thought, therefore, the suggestion that an amount should be named, payment of which was necessary, even under deeds of composition, to bind non-assenting creditors, would perhaps be found to be the only material amendment to the Act which the Committee could, with advantage, make, because, he was satisfied, a better general scheme for the distribution of a debtor's property could not be prepared, although, perhaps, some amendments to the present Act might be desirable. Some scheme of distribution they must have, otherwise they would, in Ontario, perhaps in other Provinces, be in the unfortunate position which existed before the Insolvent Act came into force, when the game of grab was the rule, those who came first being first served, and generally, the debtor warning his friends or relatives of his approaching failure, they secured first possession of the estate, were paid in full, and nothing at all was left for outsiders.

MR. BOULTBEE said that, as the leader of the Government had indicated that this was the proper time to discuss this question, and as a great deal of interest was taken in the matter by his constituents, he would give, briefly, his views on the subject. He did not think himself, nor did his constituents think, and they had considered this matter very carefully, that those evils would result from the doing away with the Act which seemed to be apprehended by many of the hon. gentlemen who had discussed it. His constituents thought, and he thought himself, from a long experience in the Courts, that a sound basis for commercial transactions could only be found in commercial honesty. Men could not be made honest by law; and, therefore, the insolvent laws, instead of doing good to any one class of men, in their operation, had been injurious to all classes. They had not promoted honesty, but dishonesty, they had not assisted, but had militated against, the honest trader, who was met on every hand, throughout the length and breadth of the land, by men who forced bankrupt stocks on the market at 30c. to 40c. on the dollar, frequently the result of fraudulent bankruptcies. So far as the evil likely to accrue through not having a proper mode of distributing the assets of insolvents was concerned, he questioned whether there was as much in that as people thought. In fact, at the time we had no Insolvent Act, there was not as much trouble among those engaged in commercial affairs as at present, because honesty was then more looked to. Men could not then get credit unless they had some character for honesty on which to base it. No Insolvent Act, however stringent its provisions, could prevent a man from making a fraudulent bankruptcy. If they did away with the Act, he did not know but that the old principle of "first come first served," was a good one. It worked more satisfactorily than did the present law. Many people said, if you do away with this Act, you must still leave the provision for the discharge of the debtor. Nothing could tend more to sap the foundation of trade and commerce in our country than this very provision to discharge an insolvent debtor. A man, no matter how fraudulent the insolvency, succeeded in having the matter glossed over; the indignation of his creditors, though strongly displayed at the first meeting, gradually wore away; and, after a few months, with the aid of some influential friends and liberal creditors, the bankrupt procured his discharge. The only man who ought to be protected was the honest man, who was obliged to become insolvent through misfortunes in business which he could not prevent. He would leave it to the experience of every professional and mercantile man, every man connected with general business in this House, whether he ever knew an honest man who, through misfortune, had become insolvent, and who was refused a discharge by his creditors. As long as a man could show a proper, fair balance sheet, showing a long career of business in which he used every effort to pay his debts, but was finally dragged into insolvency, the occasion would never occur that he would be unable to procure a discharge. Any man who would consider this question calmly, would see the advantage of not having an enactment by which a man could procure his discharge by law, because then he would conduct his business honestly, so that, if he met with unavoidable losses, he could face his creditors honestly and get a release from them, for creditors were always willing to give it to an honest, if unfortunate man. He did not desire to occupy, at length, the time of the House on this occasion. He did not see that, because this Committee had been moved for by the Minister of Justice, it would interfere with the action of the House; but, on the contrary, it would furnish the House with useful information on which it could deal with the various measures now before it.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said, since an invitation had been given to discuss this question, he felt sufficient interest in it to say a few words now that it was before the House, although, in his opinion, it could be discussed with much more satisfaction and intelligence after the Committee had reported. He was in favour of this Committee being granted. He thought they could collect evidence, and put it in such a shape that this House afterwards could take up the question, and come to a more satisfactory conclusion than they could as the motion now stood. Although he had had considerable experience in the working of the Insolvent Law, yet he was not prepared to say that he had made up his mind as to what would be the very best way to deal with the question, which was one, doubtless, of great importance. He sympathised with the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), but he thought that, after the Committee had heard the evidence and opinions of persons who understood the working of the law from different parts of the country, that Committee would be able to bring to the House such suggestions as would enable hon. members to discuss the question in a practical way, and the House would be able to come to a conclusion which would be satisfactory to all concerned when a discussion on the question was invited by the hon. the leader of the Government. He (Mr. Robertson) certainly did not suppose that hon. members, much less the hon. member for South Brant, would take advantage of the suggestion to travel out of the record, in order to make hostile remarks in reference to the late appointments of official assignees. He thought the hon. member should have considered the position that his party occupied in Ontario, before he launched out in that very eloquent and somewhat amusing style about these appointments. He should have looked a little nearer home, and considered, for instance, whether the appointments of official assignees—in themselves involving no expense to the country—were not something akin to the appointments of coroners in Ontario. If he had done that, he would have found some examples in that Province, and, in charity, he might have thought that there was no more reason to complain of the one than the other. This House must have been gratified, however, to learn that the hon. member for South Brant read another paper besides the Globe. He actually perused the Canada Gazette, and had been enabled, in going through that valuable official paper, week after week, to show this House that a great many appointments of assignees had been made by the present Government. He would like to direct the hon. member's attention to another important official journal, the Ontario Gazette. If he looked at the issue of a certain Saturday, some four years ago, he would find the Government of Ontario had appointed a number of coroners. Not being satisfied with having appointed these (to use the words of the hon. member) in eight days after they appointed a number more, and, again, in another eight days, they appointed several more. If the hon. gentleman pursued the enquiry, he would find that this practice had been continued from week to week, almost without intermission, down to the present; the Ontario Government appointing coroners for the purpose of sitting upon dead bodies, as the present Dominion Government had appointed assignees to sit upon the defunct estates of men who had become insolvent. With reference to the difficulty which the hon. member suggested of every person taking advantage of the law, if it was to be repealed on a day to be named, he (Mr. Robertson) apprehended no inconvenience, because they knew very well that a trader could not go into insolvency now except by the will and action of his creditors. The insolvent could not now, as he could a few years ago, go to his creditors with an assignment in one hand and a few dollars in the other, and say "If you don't choose to take 10c. or 25c. on the dollar on what I owe you, I shall make an assignment, and what I have got will be dissipated in expenses in winding up my estate," thus leaving the creditor at the mercy of the dishonest debtor. With reference to the main question, he thought it was necessary to refer it to a Committee, that this House never could deal properly or sensibly with the question except a proper report was brought before it, which could only be obtained by practical and experienced men in Committee, sitting down and discussing the question from every standpoint, and in all its bearings, and by that means forming the best possible judgment as to what really were the requirements of the country, and bringing down suggestions which could then be considered by the House. In the city of Hamilton there was a great diversity of opinion. Some of his constituents were anxious that the law should be repealed in toto, while others were opposed to a total repeal, but were desirous of amending it in such a way as to make it as perfect as possible. He believed that, when the Act was first placed on the Statute-book, it was intended that it should only remain in force for a certain time. The country had suffered previous to 1864, from the great depression which over ran it at that time, and there were a great many unfortunate but yet many honest debtors, who could not get their discharge because of the want of a proper Insolvency Law, and who were either expatriated or living a life of enforced idleness, because their creditors would not give them relief from the debts which they were unable to pay. There were no assets to distribute, it was true, but these unfortunate men were being kept down, and when they got their discharge they were able to go into business again, for the benefit of themselves and to the great advantage of the country. He regretted to see that there was a great deal of dishonesty practised, and the Act, no doubt, afforded a cloak to the dishonest trader, but that was attributable more to the way in which the creditors carried it out than to the Act itself. While he (Mr. Robertson) sympathised, to some extent, with the remarks of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) in reference to the honest debtor getting his discharge, his (Mr. Robertson's) experience was not of that happy character which his hon. friend's seemed to be. There was no reason under the sun why an honest debtor, who had been brought down to penury on account of circumstances over which he had no control, should not receive his discharge, and such a debtor should be protected against too exacting creditors. He quite agreed with hon. members who had preceded him, that it was a very great misfortune that it should be considered necessary to have such a machine as the Insolvency Law, opening, as it did, the door to fraud and speculation—inducing the people to go into speculations which they would not do if they did not know that they had a chance of getting their discharge from their liabilities in case they were unfortunate. There was no doubt of the general principle—and it ought to be well known in this country—that honesty was the best policy, and that it was only the honest trader who could succeed. He trusted that hon. members considering the subject would not fail to make provision for the relief of the unfortunate debtor when he was placed at the mercy of a grasping, uncompromising creditor. He trusted that the Committee would be granted, and that, when it brought down its report, the House would be put in possession of such information as would enable it to come to a conclusion which would be satisfactory to the country at large.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the last speaker had fallen into an error, which was very prevalent in a discussion of a question of this kind—the idea that Parliament could deal with a debtor, and go deeply into the question of the position of an unfortunate debtor, who had had the misfortune to fall into the hands of a grasping creditor. The first object of the Insolvent Act should be to enable a creditor to get possession of the property of a debtor. The reason why merchants were not in favour of the law was that it gave to the creditor an opportunity for the fair distribution of estates. While gentlemen from cities spoke in this sense—gentlemen whose experience of the Insolvency Law had been chiefly gained by a knowledge of its operation in cities—they must not lose sight of the fact that the Insolvency Law of the country was in operation in the rural districts. He admitted all that had been said by his hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie); also, very much of the reasonableness of what had been said by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Robertson); but he thought the law still offered a considerable opening for dishonesty. He maintained that the bankruptcy laws had the effect of producing insolvents in the vast proportion of cases, where men, if they had known the risk when they were entering a business, would not have entered upon that business at all. Something had been said with regard to the appointment of official assignees. He was sure the House, which knew his opinions very well, would acquit him of any desire to allude to the subject in a party sense. Official assignees had a livelihood to make out of insolvents; and in many instances, he had no doubt, they had induced their friends to fail, by representing to them the advantages which might accrue to both assignee and insolvent. He had seen the case of a man who had failed for $300, who had never been in business at all. This was an instance, among many others to which he might allude, which had made this law very unpopular in the rural districts. He thought some alteration ought to be made, so that, when an estate was in the hands of creditors, a fair distribution should take place. With regard to the statement that the first come was first served, he would say that there were very many creditors who, under the present system, found they could not get served at all. So far as his personal experience went, there were a great many merchants who paid very little attention to the Bankruptcy Laws. Gentlemen who had experience of the law must remember that there was a large part of the community which suffered very materially from the operation of this unequal and unnecessarily unjust law, because every law was unjust which did not force a man to carry out a contract into which he had entered. He thought the hon. the Minister of Justice ought to give the House some very good reasons for the appointment of a Committee of this House. He saw no reason why there should be any necessity for a Committee of enquiry into the subject of insolvency. It was better that the details should be discussed in this House. They were not in want of much information on this subject. They had every branch of industry represented in the House. They were dealing with a law which had been in operation for years, and they understood all the circumstances relating to the pros and cons that might be urged for or against it. Therefore, he could see no reason why this Committee should be appointed. The Government would have done well to have looked carefully into the matter before they brought down the resolution under discussion, and have been prepared to let the country know what their policy on this subject was. It was of immense importance, considering the anxiety and disquietude existing in regard to this subject, that the people should know which course was to be pursued respecting it, and he thought that some immediate steps ought to be taken to allay this disquietude and remedy the evils complained of. He would be glad to know that no delay fatal to legislation on this subject during the present Session was likely to occur.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he was under the impression that this Committee had been moved for the purpose of collecting together the information that was necessary to present to the House, in order that they might form an intelligent opinion on the measure that was proposed to be introduced, and he apprehended that, that being the object of the Committee, the discussion now was premature; but, as it had been entered upon, he had no hesitation in saying that the question, which was very important, and was one of those large subjects that were reserved for the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, in connection with the commercial interests of the country, should not be looked at in the narrow light in which it had been presented to the House, merely as a question between the debtor and creditor. He believed it lay deeper than that. He thought it affected the whole trade interest of the country, and it was not merely a question as to the whitewashing process that this Insolvency Bill contained, and the advisability of continuing that system, or whether it was well to have these measures introduced at rare intervals, and thus have an occasional measure of relief for the insolvent debtor, or that the system should go on for all time. All these were questions which might be fairly considered by the Committee, and he had no doubt the gentlemen named would bring together all the information obtainable, and enable the House to form a just opinion on the subject. He would suggest, however, to the Committee, whether the sales of bankrupt stocks thrown on all sides upon the market did not have the effect of deranging trade to such a great extent that, if there were any advantages derived to individuals from an Insolvency Law, such as that now in operation, those individual benefits were not altogether lost in the general loss and distress that it produced throughout the commercial industries of the country. He thought it an important consideration for them to keep in mind the facility with which credit was given—a fact that was patent to all —had caused trade to be overdone in all its branches in this country. All those effects and consequences from the present system had to be considered. Knowing, as he did, that these insolvent estates paid but trifling dividends, that a creditor derived little or no benefit from the Insolvency Law as it stood, the only advantage derived from the present law was the release of a few unfortunates who had been in business, and were overwhelmed with debt. The disadvantages were so far beyond the advantages, that, in his opinion, they could well afford to repeal the law altogether as to cases that might arise in the future.

MR. DOMVILLE said he regretted to see so few business men taking part in this discussion. In reply to his hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Huntington), he would say that business men were more afraid of lawyers than of insolvents. It was bad enough to have to deal with the insolvents, but worse still with the lawyers who had the estate in hand. His experience in trade in this country was that, when a man got into insolvency, the business men had more difficulty in getting him clear of those who had charge of him, that was, the assignees, than in getting hold of his estate. As had just been said, there was great competition among the lawyers as to who should get the body—not the coroner, but the lawyers. They must approach this difficulty with a great deal of hesitation, for if they did away with the Insolvency Law, and gave no relief to the debtor, what was to become of the honest debtor? They should look to the future of this country, and, if we were to have a happy and prosperous future, it was not by making laws for insolvents, nor by devoting all our energies to tinkering with an Insolvency Act. He had pointed out, two or three years ago, to the late Prime Minister, that the penal clause in this Act would not meet the requirements of the country, because it laid down the principle that thirty per cent. was enough for the insolvent to pay to get his discharge. He pointed out then that, if a man wanted to go through the Insolvent Court, all he had to do was to pay thirty cents on the dollar, and he could do his creditors out of the other seventy cents. His view was, unfortunately, not then regarded, but to-day he was able to say that those crude, but original, ideas of his were forcing themselves on the minds of many individuals. We must have some legislation to protect trade. He saw no argument in the fact of insolvent estates being forced on the market at reduced prices, to compete with the solvent trader, because the proposed law only dealt with the distribution of the estate and not the vital question at issue. It was merely a question of details as to who should have the estate in the event of insolvency, whether the lawyers, the insolvent or the merchants. He, as a merchant, would like to see the merchants get together and discuss this matter, and aid the proposed Committee to bring in a law that would put trade on a better basis. He did not care who got the estate, whether the assignee or the lawyer, but he did want to see the trade of this country placed in a position to prosper. He was not prepared to say that he should vote either for the abolition or the retention of the law, but would wait to hear the Committee's report, after it had taken evidence on the point from the merchants, manufacturers and trading community generally. They should either amend or put aside the existing law. They had too much law already. They were here each year some sixty or seventy days, making a law to-day and amending it to-morrow, and then they went back to their constituents, telling them what they had done, and all the while the trade of the country was being conducted in the same disastrous way. What he wanted to see was the country improving from year to year, and laws so framed, if possible, as to give honest intentions to men. In these days the question was generally one of going to a lawyer to see how he could pull you through scrapes. For his part, he hoped the Committee would be able to bring in a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. He was sorry to see any lawyers on the Committee at all; it would have been far better to have had none of them on it except the hon. the Minister of Justice. It should have on it more merchants, more manufacturers, who would be more likely to bring in a Bill based on common sense. The country ought to send men here who would do the work the country needed to be done, and who would vote for cutting down the pay of the members of the House of Commons. He would be willing to propose such a motion although he did not get a seconder in the House. He had pointed out, on a previous occasion, that, if men were sent here who were not paid, or who received only a nominal sum, the country would then get men who were ready to serve for the honour of the position, and bring practical information in the House. But, at present, when the elections came round, the large indemnity caused many to seek the position who were often neither representative men nor qualified for the position. When he was on his last campaign the other day, he found five lawyers at one end of the string and two doctors at the other. He had not a chance to canvass the county as thoroughly as professional men who made it a business, and could live on the road for a year or two previous to an election for the purpose of securing the $1,000 a year. It would almost appear as if a business man was out of place in the House. They did not seem to want a manufacturer or trader like himself, although this class of people needed more representation in Parliament than almost any other class. If he went to one end of his county he found a lawyer showing what to do with the laws; if he went to the other end, there was a doctor with his pills and his medicine. And so it was: the merchant, the manufacturer, the real bone and sinew of this country, could not afford to leave his business to be on the road all the time like the professional men. This was the reason they had so little practical legislation in the House. The question of amending the law or of repealing it was a secondary consideration; the great question for the moneyed interest, the lender and the borrower, was to have a practical law that would so work as to allow the business of this country to move along properly, in order that the unfortunate debtor, on the one hand, might not be harassed, and that, on the other hand, the creditor who was not disposed to do what was right might be controlled, but, at the same time, to afford every legitimate protection to capital.

MR. RYMAL said that, during some years past, this matter had been relegated to a Committee more than once. It was to be again referred to a Select Committee composed of gentlemen who were supposed to understand commercial transactions, and who could put this Bill into shape. He knew that many attempts at framing an Insolvent Act had been tried, but he did not think they were any nearer getting a proper and satisfactory law than they were the first time the matter was brought before the old Parliament of Canada. The treatment this Bill had received at the hands of Parliament reminded him of a saying attributed to a link boy who was in the habit of lighting people around the city, in England, many years ago. Pope, the poet, who was a very crooked little man, had engaged the boy, and, as he was going home of a dark night, he frequently stumbled, and every time he stumbled he ejaculated: "God mend me!" It attracted the attention of the link boy, who elevated his lantern and, after surveying him, said: "God mend you? why, it would be far easier for him to make half-a-dozen straight men than to mend a crooked man like you!" And so it was with this bankrupt law; the oftener it was doctored, the more crooked, apparently, it became. Last Session, when there was a motion to repeal the Insolvent Act, what was the reason alleged against it? It was said: This is the last Session of this Parliament; we are going home to face our people, we have got to run an election, and during the time we are canvassing, we can learn what the wishes of the people are. Now, they had come here fresh from the people; and, if there was any man here that would say that he did not know what the people desired in this respect, he (Mr. Rymal) would tell him it was a pity he was ever seen here. This was one of the questions that had agitated the people considerably. He knew what his people desired. He would not be bound by the action of the Committee, however influential it might be. If there was a motion made to repeal the law pure and simple, he would vote for it. He had heard it said that it was very desirable some means should be found by which the effects of an insolvent might be equally distributed amongst his creditors. He believed there was a possibility of effecting that object without discharging the men who had madly rushed into business and criminally rushed into insolvency. He believed the Insolvency Law had done more to debauch the moral sense of the commercial community than any and all the laws that had ever been placed on the Statute-book. He believed it was high time now, after twenty years' trial of a law that was conceived in sin, and whose fruits had been iniquity from first to last, that it should be once and for ever disposed of. He did not believe, as some had said, in a periodical Bankruptcy Law. If men were disposed to be dishonest, they would so shape their business that, at a certain time, when there might be depression and a general demand for a Bankruptcy Law, they would be exactly in a position to benefit by it. What a jubilee there would be among the criminal population at that time. They would look forward to it as a millenium. He did not wish that any opportunity should be afforded a man of being absolved from his obligations. What business had this Legislature to say to one man who had security against another: This security shall be confiscated for the benefit of the creditor? It was a species of confiscation. They had heard an anecdote of General Marion, who was the great champion of freedom in Kentucky during the American revolution. After it was over, some one proposed that the property of the Royalists should be confiscated for the benefit of the then infant Republic. At a convivial meeting, after this subject had been discussed, Gen. Marion was asked for a toast, and this was what he proposed, as he rose with the glass to his lips: "Damnation to that Confiscation Act!" And this was the sentiment that he (Mr. Rymal) would echo in reference to the Insolvent Act, the operation of which he had watched for many years.

MR. HESSON said he desired to express his views on this matter before the Committee was appointed. As the last speaker (Mr. Rymal) had said, there was not a member in the House to-day but ought to know the opinion of his constituents on this subject. If he did not know it, he had no right to be here.

It was a question of great importance to the country. He remembered that, when he became a merchant, some twenty-five years ago, he felt a pride in calling himself a commercial man, but that period had long since passed. The Insolvent Act, from the day it was passed, marked a period in this country not creditable to the commercial and business men of our land. The Act in itself was iniquitous and ought to be repealed, and, if it was necessary to go back to the old law, he was ready, for one, to accept it with all its injustice or its inequalities, as being more fair between man and man. Representing, as he did, a rural constituency, he was prepared to say that it was not in the interest of the people of this country that that Act should longer exist on the Statute-book. He would support any Bill for the repeal of that law, and he would state it now for the benefit of the Committee. All the members of the House should state their views in order that the Committee might understand thoroughly the opinion of the House. If the Committee did not bring in a Bill that would have the effect of repealing that law, or if they did not substitute something else better in its place, then he should feel at liberty to vote against it. He held in his hand the report of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, in which he saw that in the Province of Quebec, during the year 1878, there was paid out, as commissions to assignees in insolvency cases, the sum of $33,850; as law expenses, $25,141; and under the head of miscellaneous expenditure, $119,217, or a total of $178,208 in that Province alone. What did they find as the result of this expenditure? They found that something like $696,786 had been secured as the results of the efforts of official assignees to collect six or seven millions of dollars out of estates that had become insolvent. Thus nearly one-third of the money went for their expenses. That state of affairs was not right. Complaints had been made by gentlemen opposite of the appointment of new assignees, and it had been stated that they were appointed because it was found that the office of assignee was a good thing. In Montreal city alone, $23,143 was paid over to the assignees as commission, and the same state of affairs, he believed, existed all over the country. In the Province of Ontario, $182,000 was the amount the assignees had cost insolvent estates during the past year, or about one half as much as they were able to collect in cash. He was altogether opposed to the present Insolvent Act, and, if the Committee did not bring in a better one, he would rather stand by the old Act than the present.

Mr. OLIVER said the policy of the late Government was, when there was a sheriff in a position to discharge the duties of official assignee, to appoint him. It did not matter to which party he belonged, if he was a competent man. The last speaker and the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) had given a sufficient reason why this Committee should not be appointed. Both gentlemen had stated that they would support the repeal of the Act, whatever might be the report of the Committee. Now, if they had all made up their minds to vote for or against the repeal of this Act, there was no necessity for the Committee, nor of their going to the expense which it would necessarily entail. He found himself in the same position as his hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal). In his county, nineteen-twentieths of the people were in favour of the repeal of this Act, and that had been his feeling from the first day he entered the House, and it was his feeling at the present time. One of the reasons mentioned by his hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) why this Bill should not be repealed was that there should be some machinery whereby the assets of an unfortunate trader should be distributed. It had been stated by gentlemen opposite, and particularly by his hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville) that the whole of the assets had gone to the lawyers or the official assignees. They had had that experience in the West. The assets paid to creditors had been so small that they had not paid the creditors for the trouble taken. He held that it was better that one creditor should be paid than none at all, and it was far better that that creditor should be paid than that a staff of assignees, who had been pronounced by gentlemen opposite as robbers, should be upheld. There were good reasons why the Bill should be repealed. One had been given by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Ry-mal), and that was that the Legislature of any country should not step in and destroy the securities that were held by the people of the country. They found, by the returns of last year, that the people of this country had lost $23,900,000 by failures, considerably more than the whole revenue of the Dominion. And those parties who had caused these losses had got a clear receipt for every cent of that money. He did not believe any Legislature should step in and destroy the securities as between the creditor and debtor. Another reason for the repeal of the Act was that it had induced a great many people to go into business who otherwise would not. It had been stated that there were more traders in Canada to the square acre than in any other country in the world. Another argument against the Bill was to be found in the fact that, in consequence of that Bill, wholesale merchants had forced their goods upon the retail traders of the country. They knew that, if they secured the services of a merchant in a rural district for five years, and if he failed at the end of that time, and they got five or ten per cent., they would make money by the operation. Another reason against the continuance of the Bill was that, in consequence of so many failures, there were numerous sales of bankrupt stocks. They had an instance in the city of Ottawa. There was one establishment in the city, he was told, where they were in the habit of buying up all the bankrupt stocks within a certain radius of the city. These stocks they brought to Ottawa, and sold at a lower rate than any other merchant could possibly sell them, who bought his goods in the regular way in the wholesale market. There could be only one result if this trade continued, and that was a general smash-up of all the other merchants in the city. Another objection to the Bill was that no one except traders was allowed to take advantage of the Act. They should avoid class legislation as much as possible, and he maintained that an Act of this kind should extend to all classes.

MR. OLIVER.

He regarded it as his duty, as representing an agricultural constituency, to state to the Committee that his mind was fully made up, and was in accordance with the opinions of his constituents, and that he would vote against the continuance of the Act upon the Statute-book.

MR. METHOT said that, as a representative of a rural district, he could not allow the motion that was before the Chair to pass without adding a few words to what had been said on the subject. The Insolvency Act had been passed in 1875, and everyone had witnessed the effects it had produced, and could appreciate them knowingly. From the very first, this law had shocked public feeling. In the first place, it bore upon its face the stamp of partiality in favour of the mercantile class, and to the detriment of the farmers and of the other classes of society, who were shut out from the privileges of the law. In the second place, this law violated the rights of creditors who had legitimate claims against debtors. Since then, an attempt had been made every year to improve the law; and, every year, the Government had said to those who wished to repeal the law: "Do not repeal; wait for the amendments that we are going to propose this year, in order to perfect it." What had resulted from this? Why, every year, the amendments, instead of improving the law, had made it worse. This law was again before the House. Hon. members were fresh from the people, and, during the late elections, the people had been consulted upon this question; and public opinion upon this matter was well known. During the last five years, many complaints had been heard against the law, and each time endeavours had been made to induce the people to believe that, at last, a good law would be made out of the Insolvency Act. Far from the people being satisfied with this, the general discontent was glaring; the complaints made this year were more numerous than those made heretofore; and, for his part, he had promised, and he intended to faithfully keep his word, that he would do all in his power to have this Insolvency Act repealed. It was now proposed to appoint a Committee to gather new information upon the necessity of repealing this law. For his part he did not need any further information; he had seen the effects of the law, and he was ready to repeal it. Perhaps some hon. members wished for further information, and it was not his intention to prevent them from obtaining what information they chose, but he would never consent to vote for the motion appointing a Committee unless the hon. the Minister of Justice could assure him that the Government would bring down, before the close of the Session, a law that would relieve the uneasiness that existed in commercial circles, and that was, in part, due to the Insolvency Act. It was of the greatest importance to strike this immoral law off our Statute-book. Farmers, who had not the right to go into insolvency, were heard to say: "Why have we laws that permit people to rob us? We send members to the House in order to protect us, and when they once arrive there they pass laws to protect fraud." He believed that this feeling would cease to exist, that the people would regain confidence in their representatives if all these laws, allowing one class to defraud another, were done away with. He would say no more for the moment on this subject. He had only desired to state the position he intended to take upon this question. He would consent to vote for the Committee, but upon the express condition that a Bill should be brought down for the purpose of changing the present state of affairs.

MR. HOUDE said that he did not rise to make an appeal to prejudices, nor to speak against a profession that might be largely represented in this House. Especially with regard to a question of this kind, he thought there should be no such appeal. He had not the honour of belonging to the noble legal profession, but he did not think that lawyers were entirely useless, especially when laws were to be framed for the country. If we were obliged to have recourse to the lawyers to interpret our laws, it was still more necessary to have lawyers to make laws. He believed that it was always dangerous to appeal to prejudices, and especially so in this House, for such appeals would find a vast echo in the country. Certain politicians seemed to believe that they could do without any indemnity for their services, and considered themselves recompensed by the satisfaction they experienced when they devoted themselves to the service of their country. But these model men were so scarce that, if this House was to be composed only of them, there would be a great many less members than there were now. He would not reproach the Government, as some hon. members had done, for having moved for this Committee that was to look into the working of the Insolvency Act. This Committee might be useful in furnishing the House with information, or rather, he thought, that the mission of this Committee was to give body, as it were, to the diverse opinions entertained by members of this House. He believed that these opinions might be divided into two classes: those favourable to the maintenance of the law, and those favourable to its repeal or to amendments so radical that they would be equal to its repeal. The Committee might embody these different ideas, and give to the proposed measure more completeness than it could otherwise acquire. But he wished it well understood that he would not be bound to approve the report that this Committee would make. As a journalist, he had had occasion to study this Insolvency Law, not from the manufacturers standpoint, nor from the standpoint of any particular class, but from the standpoint of the general interests of the country. He thought the House was called upon to make laws not only for one class of the community, but for all classes, and especially for the three classes that composed the social body—the farmers, the mechanics, and the merchants. He believed that, although this law had been passed in order to protect the commercial class, it should not favour this class to the detriment of others. His mind was well made up on that point, and, if it was impossible to amend the law in this way, he would vote for its repeal. But he thought it could be amended so as to render it acceptable, for there was no doubt but that an insolvency law of some kind was required. His opinion was, and he thought that this opinion was entertained by a great number of the inhabitants of this country, that he who owed should pay his debts. But, seeing that the commercial class was exposed to uncertainties and risks that other classes of society were not exposed to, it was but reasonable to pass laws for the protection of those interests. As he understood it, the intent of an insolvency law should be to make regulations respecting the distribution of the debts of a man who was not able to meet his liabilities in an equitable manner for all his creditors, and especially to cut down, as much as possible, the cost of winding up the affairs of an insolvent. He thought that, if it were possible to frame such a law, the country would be better off. Much sympathy had been expressed for unfortunate merchants. It was always painful to see a man in easy circumstances, sometimes opulent, suddenly thrown out of his home and brought down to poverty and want. But merchants were not the only persons subjected to these vicissitudes—to these reverses of fortune. Other classes of society—the majority—the farmers, the workingmen, and professional men were also exposed to these changes, and had to suffer as well as the merchant. Nevertheless, no one had ever thought of passing laws to dispense them from paying their debts. If it was painful for an honest merchant to suddenly lose the means he had of earning his livelihood, was it not just as painful to see an honest workingman lose, by fire or by some other misfortune, the little property he possessed, or to see a farmer lose, in one moment, the fruit of a whole year's labour. That was not all. The law now under discussion was an experiment. He thought it strange that hon. members should blame one particular class, and the Government for having tried this law, or allowed it to be tried. Man was not perfect, and he could create nothing perfect. All laws seemed good when they were passed, but often their effects did not satisfy the expectations of the public. The Insolvency Law belonged to this class. It had answered to their expectations. Now that the country saw that; now that they saw the ruins heaped up and the disastrous effects produced by this law, this House was called upon to change it or to repeal it. If the Committee asked for did not bestir themselves and bring down their report in time to allow the House to pass a law during the present Session, it would be the duty of the House to adopt some measure as required by the circumstances and the interests of the country. But he was sure that the report of the Committee would be brought down early enough to allow the House to take it into consideration and mature it in a suitable manner. As some hon. members had remarked, the Insolvency Law had had a demoralising effect upon the people. The House had had an example of this when an hon. member had stated, this afternoon that a merchant who paid fifty cents on the dollar should be considered as having made a very reasonable payment. That was one of those ideas that this unfortunate law had propagated throughout the country. That was the effect that it had had upon the people, whose moral sense it had blunted. This law had led many people, otherwise honest, to believe that when a man fell into misfortune he was no longer obliged to pay all his debts. Even if this House should pass a law allowing a man to pay only one cent in the dollar, that would not dispense him in conscience and in morality from paying his debts when he was able to do so. He thought that it was always dangerous to create exceptional laws in the interest of one particular class, and this Insolvency Law was certainly such a one, for it had been framed in favour of one class, and to the detriment of all others. This law had drawn into business a large number of incompetent persons who had not the qualifications required to carry on business, and this had been disastrous for honest trade. Formerly, intelligence, capacity, competency, integrity and capital were required to enter on a commercial career. Now, it was quite different. When a man knew that, if, at the end of a year or two, he could not pay his debts, he had always the means of getting out of difficulty, he was tempted to go into trade without having the required capacities. And that was why so many incompetent persons were seen in trade; so many young men, especially, without experience and without capital, who lived upon the earnings of honest and industrious people. Some one had to pay these debts in one way or another, directly or indirectly. If a man engaged in commerce paid only 20c. or 30c. or 50c. in the dollar, the remainder must be paid in the long-run by those who worked. That was what occurred, for the wholesale merchant was obliged to calculate every year the losses he had experienced during the preceding years, and the risks that he was running with the retail merchants. And who was it that paid for the balance? It was the purchaser; it was the consumer; that was to say, the working class, the men who earned their bread by the sweat of their brow. He did not wish to belittle any class of society; but it was well known, and honest merchants would be the first to admit it, the mercantile class often gave painful examples to look upon. He maintained that protection should be extended to honest merchants against the dishonest. He did not wish to say that all those who went into insolvency were dishonest; but the greater number of them were either imprudent or incompetent persons who should never have gone into business, and a great many of whom would not have done so, had not they had the prospect held out to them by this insolvency law, of getting easily out of the difficulties into which they ran so thoughtlessly. He had no idea that this question would have come before the House to-day. When it came up again he would have some additional remarks to make. He would say nothing more for the present, because he thought that the Committee would understand that this House was strongly in favour, if not of the repeal of the law, at least of its amendment in such a manner as to take from it the odious character it now had.

MR. RYKERT said he had no doubt the House would approve of the action of the Government in endeavouring to elicit information by a Committee. He was surprised that his hon. friend from South Brant had attempted to catechise this side of the House on the appointment of a Committee. It would be far better for the hon. gentleman, in view of the opinion expressed by one of his leaders in favour of the Committee, to see that there was some kind of a re-construction of the Opposition. It certainly seemed very odd that his leader, a gentleman well versed in commercial transactions, should approve of the appointment of the Committee, and he take the very opposite view and taunt gentlemen on the Government side of the House. The hon. gentleman charged the Ministry with wishing to shirk their proper responsibility on this question, and throw the onus on a Committee. He knew very well that his own party had heretofore been in the habit of shirking responsibility in these important questions, by appointing Committees of the House. In the Ontario Legislature the hon. gentleman would see that his friends in authority had appointed a Committee on one of the most important questions ever discussed by the people of Ontario, in connection with the Assessment Law—the exemption of property from taxation. The hon. gentlemen, whom he so much admired, had shirked the responsibility of their positions as members of the Government, and that, too, when the Parliament was on the eve of a dissolution. It was a somewhat extraordinary thing that the opposition to the Insolvency Law came entirely from Lower Canada. He was not aware of the cause of this feeling in Lower Canada. In reference to the statement of the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal), he desired to say that he believed the great majority of the people of Ontario were opposed to going back to the old system by repealing the law. He was not aware of any constituency in Ontario where the feeling prevailed, spoken of by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver). He (Mr. Rykert) represented a constituency largely rural, with a large city in its centre, and up to the present hour he had not heard a single person advocate the abrogation of the Act. He felt persuaded that their hon. friends from Lower Canada would not force upon Upper Canada a change of the law simply because it did not work harmoniously in their own country, without providing some remedy to prevent the evil which must follow from a repeal. He was satisfied that it was not in consequence of the dishonest trader that persons were now trying to repeal the Insolvency Act. He knew many honest traders who, after surrendering everything which they possessed, had endeavoured to get their discharge, but were prevented by some creditor who thought he ought to have his account paid in full. In every estate, they would find some person who would oppose a discharge unless he got 100 cents on the dollar. He would venture to say that there were hundreds of instances on record where honest traders had applied for a discharge, but were opposed by exacting creditors who wished to force the payment of their claims in full.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the Debate on the motion of Mr. McDonald (Pictou) for the appointment of a Select Committee respecting Insolvency and Bankruptcy.

MR. RYKERT said, that, when the House adjourned, he was contending they ought to support the motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McDonald.) He thought it desirable they should obtain every information possible to qualify them to deal properly with the Bill, when it came up before the House. A great deal of important information might be gained by the Committee, although members might not be bound by its conclusions. The result of the Committee's proceedings would be to inform the House of the working of the law in the different Provinces, and the probable result of its repeal in each. He could fully understand hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada favouring its repeal in view of its enormous expense; because Quebec had an Act enabling a creditor to hold an Insolvent's property for the benefit of all the creditors. It was not so in Ontario. Repeal the Act there, and they would be placed in the position which they were some years ago, when preferential assignments were the order of the day, and actions in Chancery for frauds against creditors were then of almost daily occurrence. He was not in favour of the absolute repeal of the Act. There might be some remedy by means of which the goods of an insolvent trader should be placed in the hands of a third party for the benefit of all. They knew that, in consequence of the improper working of this Act, and through the extraordinary expense of its operations, the creditor whose claim was not large, saw very little of the proceeds of the estate. No insolvent could voluntarily take the benefit of the Act; an assignment must follow the act of one or more creditors. He was much struck with the remark of the member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) with reference to the late Government's appointment of assignees. They were, he says, solicitors for the appointment of the best men in every county, and in every instance where the sheriff was well qualified they appointed him assignee. But there was an exception in Lincoln, where, instead of appointing the sheriff, who was in every way qualified, they chose a discharged banker from Windsor, imported for the very purpose. If the Insolvent Law were repealed, the effects to Ontario would be disastrous. The unpopularity of the Act was largely due to the results of overtrading. Unqualified parties rushed into all kinds of business, being encouraged by wholesale merchants, who worked off their surplus stocks upon them, the result being frequent insolvencies. One reason for the unpopularity of the Act, was the enormous cost of each proceeding. Another was the absence of proper supervision by the assignees. Were there a Government Inspector to supervise all the acts of the agents, there would be less complaint than at present. Assignees were appointed over large estates, their individual security being only $2,000. In St. Catharines, one appointed by the late Government became indebted in $20,000, which, with proper supervision, would have been impossible. Another reason for the unpopularity of the Act in Ontario, was the permission to creditors to name an assignee outside the Province while there was no power to bring one, who acted dishonestly, to this Province, and make him disgorge; the law did not reach him in Lower Canada. That was one reason why his hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Hesson) and others advocated total repeal of the Act. He (Mr. Rykert) approved of some remedy. If the law be repealed, let them have one like that of Lower Canada, by which one judgment creditor should hold the property for all. If an estate went into the hands of the Sheriff in behalf of one creditor, the only persons to benefit by it would be that officer and the lawyers. He hoped the result of the labours of the Committee would be the placing before the House of information enabling them to ascertain the working of the law in the different Provinces, in which case he believed few in Ontario would ask for repeal. They would go for the old Act, or some other by which every creditor might receive his share of the estate. He was sure no hon. member would desire to see them in the same unfortunate position as a few years ago.

MR. MCCALLUM said he would like to deal with some of the remarks of his hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). He spoke of the appointment of official assignees by the late Government, and predicted that, if the law were repealed in the interim, official assignees would have any amount of business. If so, this was a strong argument for the repeal of the law; for those who would then take advantage of that law, were now putting their houses in order to take advantage of their fellow men, while they had this bad law to assist them in doing so. If there was one thing more than another that would induce him to support a repeal of the law, it had been the argument of the hon. gentleman. His hon. friend from Lincoln had said there was no feeling in the Province of Ontario in favour of the repeal of this law, but he differed from him entirely. He knew there was a strong feeling in Ontario, and in this House, and that if the matter was left to the members of this House, they would make short work of it. He remembered when his hon. friend from Stanstead, a few years ago, brought a Bill into this House to repeal this Insolvent Law, that it passed a second reading by a large majority, and when the hon. member withdrew the Bill he had to pledge himself to the House that he would introduce it at another Session. But there had been a change of Government since that time, and he was satisfied if the Government then had not interfered, the feeling in this House and the country was such that the House would have wiped out that law from the Statute-book. It was a premium for wrong doing and for rascality, one which had cast a cloud on the fair fame of Canada, and we would be doing wrong to allow the sweeping assertion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) to go uncontradicted, for there was a strong feeling in Ontario in favour of the repeal of the law. He (Mr. McCallum) had, on one occasion, an opportunity of doing so; he had voted as a representative of Monck, in favour of its repeal, and he still represented Monck, and would still record his vote against this obnoxious and iniquitous law. They had been favoured with a great deal of sympathy for the unfortunate trader. He contended that if an honest man was unfortunate, and failed in business, and could show that he had lost his money by fair means, none of his creditors would object to give him a discharge. Another argument introduced was, that if we went back to the old system, it would be ruinous, because the first judgment obtained would hold the property. Under the old system one man got his pay; did one man get it now? Nobody got paid. They had raised a class of official assignees who took it all. He did not intend to further occupy the time of the House, but would say to the Government that they very much mistook the feeling of the country if they thought it was not in favour of a repeal. If they left it an open question, to be dealt with by members of the House, they would make short work of the law. He might add that the country pronounced in favour of this repeal on the 17th September. In many counties of Ontario that was spoken of at the elections, particularly in the rural constituencies which looked to this Government to carry out the repeal of this law which they looked upon as class legislation. It was a law introduced in favour of a certain class. A trader got a non-trader to endorse his note, and after a while got into difficulties. He could call his creditors together and could get relief from his creditors, but the non-trader who had endorsed this paper must pay up to the last farthing, and might be ruined by it. The sooner the Government did away with this law, the better for the commercial morality of the country.

MR. HAY said he had had considerable experience in the working of this law, perhaps no member of the House had so much to do with it as he had; still he did not want to see it done away with, but modified and made cheaper in its working. He was quite certain that, if the Committee were composed of men representing all the different interests, something would be arrived at to suit the merchants. It would be madness to do away with the Bill at present, but a Committee properly selected could, no doubt, arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said there was a fitness and an unfitness in the proposition the Government had made in regard to this Insolvent Act. The fitness of the proposition was the desirability at all times that all the information possible should be elicited, and that, from experts, either in the form of official assignees or otherwise, the House, through the Committee, should be put in possession of all the information necessary to clearly understand a question of this kind. Every person accustomed to parliamentary usage would notice there was a gross impropriety in the course the Government proposed to pursue. In 1875, when the House proposed to legislate upon insolvency, the course taken by the Government at that time was different to the one pursued at present. They had a policy; they brought down an Insolvent Act which, after it passed its second reading, was referred to a Committee of the House. In the present case, they had no expression of opinion whatever from the Government, as to whether they believed the Act should be continued or repealed. The House was asked to appoint a Committee, not to give information to the House, but to the Government itself, who should have a settled policy on a measure involving so many interests as were contained in this Act. In watching the discussion which had taken place on the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he noticed a mistaken opinion which seemed to rule as to who was the guilty party in all the trouble which the Insolvent Act was proposed to remedy. Some hon. gentlemen blamed the official assignee as a recipient of the goods which he absorbed in the management of an estate, the unfortunate creditor, as he was often called, receiving nothing out of it. He could not understand how the official assignee was so much to blame. He was regulated in his charges by statutory fees, and, of course, if the estate was a small one, those fees would absorb it, but if the assets were large, he could not exceed a certain limit of fees, and, if there was anything in the estate, it must yield some little return. If the Insolvent Act were repealed, he could not understand how an estate which would then pass into the hands of the Sheriff could yield any greater return than the same estate would at present in the hands of an assignee. Another class of gentlemen who had taken part in the discussion had blamed the Insolvent Act itself for all the evils arising from the depression of business. He thought that those who blamed the Insolvent Act for the difficulties which had arisen from bankrupt estates, blamed the effect, not the cause. The cause of the present trouble, and of the difficulties in connection with bankruptcy, was unlimited credit, the consequence or the effect of which was unlimited bankruptcy. If they could find out who was to blame for the unlimited credit which prevailed in Canada at present, they would solve the whole difficulty. The debtor was not to blame. He was interested in getting credit, in order to engage in business, if he saw any probability of achieving success. Who was the guilty party, if it was not the wholesale dealer, who, in his ardent desire for profit, imported too largely, sent his travellers to every village in the country, who prevailed on the small dealer to order a consignment, and then forced on him a larger consignment than he bargained for. In this way the retailers became overloaded with goods. Insolvency resulted, and the Act was blamed. He did not understand how the repeal of the Insolvency Act could remedy these evils. He believed the present time was very unfavourable for the repeal of this Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite had promised that, if they got possession of the Treasury benches, immediately good times would come. He had no doubt many honest men had been painfully hanging on to a remnant of a declining business, in the expectation that the advent of these gentlemen to power and the introduction of the National Policy would bring back the good times. Were they going to be disappointed? Were the efforts they had put forth to maintain their declining credit going to be blasted by the repeal of the Insolvency Act? Were hon. gentlemen opposite going to tell them that they had no policy in regard to a matter of this importance, to the best interests of the country, than to appoint a Committee to fish for a policy which they were not prepared to enunciate? Under these circumstances, with the roseate prospect which hon. gentlemen opposite said there was, of an advance in all the business interests of the country, they should not rapidly shake the credit of men who had been straining every nerve to maintain themselves against reverses, and place them in a position in which the only resource that would be left to them would be immediate bankruptcy. If it was proposed by this House that this Act should be repealed in a fixed time in the future, the amount of bankrupt goods which would be thrown on the market would have a ruinous effect on legitimate business. He held that any repeal or amendment of this Insolvent Act should contain provision, as had been remarked by several hon. gentlemen, for a discharge of the honest debtor. There was no advantage to be gained in restraining a man from embarking in business, or in not relieving him from the incubus of a debt he was utterly unable to pay. There was a time when a man, unable to meet his obligations, was imprisoned in the city gaol, until he discharged his financial obligations; as if by remaining in prison he could succeed in paying his debts. To repeal the present law would place a man at this disadvantage: the finger of scorn would afterwards be pointed at him, as a man who had been deprived of the full rights of citizenship. He remembered, when there was no insolvency law in existence, that many of our prominent men, who had been dragged into bankruptcy, went to the other side of the line, and there helped to build up the business institutions of that country, instead of building those of their own. The hon. member for Stanstead had on the paper a Bill which proposed to deal with bankrupt estates. Before this House repealed the present Act, it would be well to profit by his experience. We should advance cautiously in regard to a measure of this magnitude, one which interfered with all the business transacted within the extent of this Dominion. He had already said that this was an inopportune moment for the repeal of this Act. It was inopportune for another reason; apart altogether from the political change which has taken place, the present depression of trade would not continue a great while. He noticed by the returns from the American side, that there was evidence of an upward tendency in business there, and our intimate commercial relations with the United States might cause this tendency to be reflected justly on the business of the country. He did not know that we could expect, at a very early date, a return of that business prosperity with which we were favoured a few years ago. But he felt sure that a return to that condition of affairs which existed previous to the passage of the Insolvent Act, would not contribute to that prosperity we were all so anxious to enjoy.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas) said he would not have risen to make any remarks upon the important question had it not been for the fact that whenever there was occasion to do so he had considered it his duty to vote for a repeal of the Insolvency Law. The proposition now before the House was that the question should be referred to a Committee. He did not consider it his duty, because he had always heretofore voted for the repeal of the Insolvent Act, that he should refuse that this important question should be submitted to the consideration of a Committee. He would only be too glad if its labours would result in bringing forth a measure which could be substituted for the one now in force, which would really give relief to that blessed portion of our community called honest traders. If this could be accomplished, it would be a source of gratification to the Dominion. In the meantime he would wait, and reserve to himself the right of accepting or rejecting any measure which might be recommended by the Committee. But if he felt that no action would be taken this Session, he would deem it his duty to oppose the resolution for a Committee. As the law now stood, it was really detrimental to the interest of the country. It opened the door to people to become dishonest. He thought a great mistake had been made by the former Government in appointing so many official assignees, and that the same mistake had been committed by the present Government. He had it from reliable information that there were many of those men who managed by some means to find out the affairs of persons in business, and facilitated their bankruptcy. He thought that a very unwholesome state of things to exist in this country, and some measure should be at once taken to remedy the evil. He hoped the Committee would report on the subject, and that their report would take effect some time not later than the end of September next. They expected more from this Government and greater improvements than from the late Government. There was another question which was of great importance in connection with the trade and commerce of this country—because it has had very damaging influence, and rendered so many persons helpless and deprived of an honest livelihood—that was free trade in money. It had added a great many loaning institutions to our country, which had done more to damage the prosperity and progress of this country than anything else he knew of. He hoped that before another Session passed he would have an opportunity of testing the sense of the House, and ascertain whether some restraints could not be put on that mad creation. He would vote for the Committee, and if they could hit upon a measure which would commend itself to the best sense of the House, he would only be too glad to support it; but if it was not better than the present, he would have to vote against it.

Mr. HOOPER said he thought the Government deserved the thanks of the House for allowing this discussion to take place. Some hon. gentleman had referred to the 17th September, as though this question of the repeal of the Insolvency Law had been the principal question then before the electors. He could assure them that in the constituency he represented, the only question was Protection to our industries, because Protection would give employment to the people. The question to be discussed here was a more important one than the repeal of the Bill. It was what was best to be done in the interests of the trade and commerce of this country. He had no doubt that eminent gentlemen who had been named by the Government to constitute the Committee proposed, will do every thing in their power to bring a Bill into the House that would give every satisfaction. They should consider what was the cause of so much depression and so many cases of bankruptcy in the country. There were two sides to this question. They ought to consider first the wholesale merchants who sold the goods in the first place, and then the retail men who re-sold them. He could speak of this matter from personal knowledge. He knew that, as a rule, the wholesale merchants of this country were very liberal, but, on certain occasions, they might over-import goods; hence there was a great anxiety to sell those goods. It was well known to any man of business, that the system of commercial travellers was often very prejudicial to trade, as they forced goods upon everybody without discrimination. It was also known that there were a great many young men who were fond of leaving their farms and entering into business, on account of the facility with which they could obtain goods from wholesale men. They bought the goods on credit, and after living extravagantly, and the time came for meeting payments, they sold their goods at a sacrifice, and then tried to effect a compromise with their creditors. The very men who should have put down that trade, were the very men who encouraged such proceedings. He would ask what chance honest traders had in competition with such men? If the wholesale merchants would frown down such operations, there would be very few of those sacrifices made, and very few bankrupt stocks thrown upon the market. The Committee should so frame their measures that no man in trade should be allowed to compromise with his creditors unless he could show from his books that he had not willingly allowed his business to become involved. He would ask the House if the insolvent laws created insolvents, or whether the insolvents caused the creation of these laws. His own impression was that if the country was in the state it ought to be in, there would be no need whatever of an insolvent law. He would ask the House and the Government to frame the laws of this country in such a way that they would have the effect of placing traders, commercial men, farmers, labourers and mechanics in such a position that there would be employment for every one, and give such encouragement to the manufacturing industries, that not only would employment be given to every man in the country, but would bring our absent French-Canadians back. When that state of affairs had been arrived at, he was of opinion that the Insolvent Law on the Statute-book, would be little or seldom used.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that before the question was put he would like to make one or two observations in regard to remarks which had been made during the course of the debate. He ought to say, perhaps, that when he moved the resolution he did not anticipate any debate until the results of the consideration to be given to the question by the Committee should have come down; still, after listening to the discussion to-night, he thought it was well that the Committee should have the benefit of the views so ably expressed by members on both sides of the House. He thought the result of the debate had shown the propriety and wisdom of the course pursued, for although he could easily understand the anxiety of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite that the Government should compromise themselves on a question of that character, he thought the House on both sides, as a whole, would appreciate the course that it was thought best to pursue on a question of such universal interest to us, affecting, as the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) had said, the most intimate business relations of every business man in the country. It was better, therefore, in every form in which it should be viewed, and the House would feel that it was well that a Committee, composed of some of the ablest and most experienced men of both sides of the House, should have due deliberation of the subject, and be able to present, for the consideration of the House, a mode of freeing itself from the difficulty which now existed. There was no doubt that a strong feeling existed against the present Act, and he was quite correct in saying that gentlemen on both sides of the House would co-operate in the endeavour to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the question. He had arrived at the conclusion that public feeling was not so much against the Bankruptcy Act or the Insolvent Act as against some of the provisions of the present Act; because, as he understood the debate, scarcely any gentleman who had spoken had declared that he was not willing to assent to the principle upon which this Act was based. He apprehended that the principle on which this Act was based was such as would recommend itself to the mind of every honourable person, and every man who respected the interests of his neighbour, while he was careful of his own. This Bill was based on two principles of a very important character. One was, that when any man who, from fraud on the part of others, misfortune, or accident, shall become insolvent, his estate shall be distributed among his creditors in equal proportions; he shall not be allowed to appropriate to one individual what ought in justice to be distributed amongst the whole. He had been surprised to hear one gentleman say he would sooner one creditor got the whole than that no creditor should get any. He would inform that hon. gentleman that it was not the fault of the Act, but that of its administration; and, therefore, it would be unwise and unstatesman-like to refuse to give relief in a case like this merely because the administration of the Act had ceased to be useful. The second principle upon which he apprehended this Act was based, was the relief of the unfortunate debtor. He could hardly fancy that any member of this House would assert or maintain the contention that a man who, through no fault of his own; a man who, having devoted his whole life to an honest and fair business, and who by accident, fraud or misfortune became an insolvent, that such a man should remain for the rest of his lifetime in jail. That would be the result of the repeal of the Bankruptcy law, unless it were replaced by another having these fundamental principles to rest upon and afford relief in these several cases. He need not give any opinion with reference to this law, because he thought it was in the hands of a body of men who had more experience in a practical business point of view than he had. While he intended, as he stated before, to give no opinion of his own, except to make an observation or two regarding what he apprehended was the difficulty in the working of this law. It was a very curious illustration of the mode in which laws are sometimes carried out. If his idea be correct, the difficulty of this law was that the very men on whom the greatest part of the real administration of this Act was conferred, are the very men who made the worst use of it. He would undertake to say that in every instance the cause of complaint was contained in some clause of the Act in which the creditors were allowed to deal themselves with the affairs of the estate. It would be asked who had a better right to administer the estate than the creditor, the sufferer from the insolvency. It would appear to be an injustice to take away from them the right of administering the estate. Still they found that this administration by the creditors was the cause of the very evils complained of. Who discharged the fraudulent debtor?—the creditors of course;

who executed the composition and discharge for 10 or 15 cents on the dollar?—the creditors; who authorized the sale of the stock at slaughtering prices?—the creditors, not the Court; who appointed the assignees?—the creditors, not the Court. The official assignee was merely the temporary custodian of the property. The man who administered the estate was not an official assignee but the assignee appointed by the creditors themselves. If they looked at the whole administration of the Act they would find wherever there was a fault or wrong, or what some hon. gentleman called rascality, it was while the control of the estate was in the hands of the creditors or the assignees appointed by them. A very serious matter for them to consider would be the mode in which they proposed to remedy the evils of the Act. His humble opinion was that at present no remedy would meet it except by removing the evil complained of by taking the affairs of the estate out of the hands of the creditors if a better tribunal could be found in their place. With regard to the observation of an hon. member in reference to the time when this law should be changed, he quite agreed that legislation ought to take place this Session. It was the desire of the Government, although they did not control it; and he was quite sure it would be the desire of the Committee, which he hoped would be appointed, that their report should come down in time to enable the House to determine the course of action in reference to this matter, during the present Session. He trusted, therefore, that members of the House would appoint a Committee and reserve their official decision until they ascertained from the report, after full consideration, whether means could be ascertained of meeting the admitted wants and just rights of a large section of the community.

MR. HAGGART said it was not his intention to have taken any part in this debate, had it not been for some remarks which fell from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and especially from the hon. the Minister of Justice who, he thought, mistook the sentiment of the country. He (Mr. Haggart) spoke for a constituency largely manufacturing and rural, and he had yet failed to find a single man, no matter on what side of politics, in his constituency, but who was entirely opposed to the Insolvency Act, as at present in force. They had been tinkering at that law continuously for a number of years, and he was of opinion, and he thought it was the opinion of the majority of the House, that no further tinkering would better it. The Act was at present as perfect as it was possible to make it. The feeling in their section of the country, he thought in the whole of Eastern Ontario, was opposed entirely to the Act. He must also differ from the hon. the Minister of Justice, when he said that the foundation of this Act was laid in morality. He (Mr. Haggart) maintained the foundation was not a moral one, that enabled a debtor to deprive a creditor of money honestly due to him. They had the experience of Great Britain and the United States to guide them, and in Great Britain the feeling of leading commercial people was entirely opposed to the Act. The hon. gentleman further said, that the discharge of a fraudulent insolvent debtor depended entirely upon the creditors. The fact was a majority of creditors ruled, in the face of whom one man could not get his money if he wanted it. His opinion was that the country was at present prepared to vote upon that Act. He was aware that the feeling in large cities was in favour of some Insolvency Act. That sentiment was founded on the difficulties which arose in the distribution of estates in country districts and of preventing the making of preferential assignments, or something of that kind. There was no doubt the feeling in the community was opposed to the Act, as one dangerous to the moral sentiment of the community. He would be prepared to vote against any report of the Committee, except one for the equitable distribution of the estate for the relief of the insolvent.

Mr. MACMILLAN said the legal fraternity having entered so strongly into the debate, he was glad his hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) had spoken so determinedly as he had done. As regarded the immorality of this measure, he thought there was no Statute on the Statute-books more degrading to the commercial interests of the country than this Act. It was true that, in the first instance, when it was placed there it was very desirable, because there were a great many in the country utterly unable to get relief from the position in which they had unfortunately been placed through speculation or otherwise. It was then stated that the Act should terminate at a certain time, but, instead of it being terminated, it was re-enacted. Amendments were brought forward, and it had been continued up to the present time. He, for one, was desirous that that Act should be absolutely repealed. If he could not succeed in getting it repealed, he was also desirous of having the Act materially changed. The hon. the Minister of Justice had said that the official assignees were merely the temporary custodians of the assets of the insolvent. He had found it act differently, and that the assignees were the absolute custodians. In many instances, after a dollar got into their fingers, they never gave it up again.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) : That is the fault of the creditors.

Mr. MACMILLAN said it was not necessarily the fault of the creditors. If he remembered the Act aright, the assets were placed in the custody of the assignee, by a writ of attachment. In the late Act, it was true, an amendment had been made, by which the assets could be placed there by the creditors, and that was the state of the law at the present time. He suggested last Session that they should extend the Absconding Debtors' Act and make it applicable to all debtors in this country. They then would have in place of the official assignee, an officer of the Court, whose bills could be taxed, and who had the amount set down which he was to receive in connection with the distribution of the assets that came into his hands. They found so few creditors who cared to look into these matters that they never had the assets distributed properly. He believed that last Session an amendment was brought into the House of an extraordinary character, requiring a debtor to pay so many cents on the dollar before he could get a discharge from his indebtedness, and it seemed to him as absurd an amendment as any put upon the Statute-book of the country. Three-fourths of the people of this country had no right to take advantage of the Act under any circumstances, and this was a gross injustice to those non-traders. An hon. member from the Province of Quebec had brought in a Bill providing that, inasmuch as non-traders were not allowed to take advantage of the Act, therefore they should not be governed by it. This Act was introduced last Session, and he supported it as strongly as he possibly could. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had called their attention to the roseate times they were promised under the present Administration. Roseate times, he thought, had passed away from the hon. gentleman, and he was of opinion that it would be a few years before he got back to the roseate position he once occupied. Hon. gentlemen wondered why benefits had not arisen to the country before they knew what change was going to be made. He was prepared to wait a little time and hear what hon. gentlemen proposed, before he expected a beneficial change. He was prepared to oppose continuously this Insolvency Act. If they were to have it continuously, he wanted it administered justly and fairly to the whole people of the country, instead of the class legislation which at present existed. It must be universal, if they had it at all.

MR. LANDRY said that he had not intended to speak on the question, but the remarks that had just fallen from the lips of the hon. the Minister of Justice had made it his duty to express his opinion. According to the hon. Minister, this House was not opposed to the Insolvency Act, but to certain details in its working. He (Mr. Landry) was under quite a different impression. He had listened attentively to all that had been said on this subject, and, if he could believe his ears and the declarations he had heard, he was forced to the conclusion that the time had arrived to repeal the Insolvency Act. This House, by the voice of several speakers, had strongly protested against the maintenance of such a law, and he would add that the opinion just expressed was but the opinion of the people. During the late elections this question of the Insolvency Act had been tried before the electors. Several important votes had been taken upon the subject, at different times, during the last Parliament, and these votes, he remembered, had given the Conservatives the opportunity of shooting many well-aimed arrows at their opponents. The people had approved of the action of the Conservative party, and he had no doubt that, if hon. members took up the same position as that which had gained general approbation during the contest, they would obtain still greater applause. He did not intend to enter into an examination of this Act; the Committee that was to be appointed would study the question, but what he could do, with all independence, was to answer an observation made by the hon. the Minister of Justice, an observation that he did not believe to be founded in fact. The hon. the Minister of Justice had said that, according to the principle of the Insolvency Act, it was the creditors themselves who had the utmost authority in putting the law into operation, and that they could do as they pleased. It was to them that the debtor made his assignment; it was they who settled the affairs of the estate and who chose the assignee; in short, the law put every thing into their hands, and they had not the right to complain. That might be possible in theory, but practically speaking, what was seen? The creditors were the third on the list, and, in order to fully understand the part they were made to play, it might be well to recall the charming fable of Lafontaine entitled, he believed, "The Oyster and the Litigants." Whilst the creditor and the debtor were disputing over their respective interests, along came the lawyers and the assignees and gobbled up quickly all the dividends, leaving the creditors and the debtors to settle before the courts some point of law. That was what happened. The hon. member for Kings (Mr. Domville) had said, during the afternoon sitting, that lawyers were to be distrusted, and that for one he was afraid of meeting them in the settlement of questions respecting insolvency, and in the Committee that was to examine this question. The hon. gentleman was, to a certain extent right, but he would add that, in this Committee, the House should beware of too many merchants, as this Act had been especially passed to forward their interests alone. And that was the second objection urged against this Insolvency Act. Wherefore this exceptional legislation? Why favour one class in particular, and refuse the same advantages to other classes of society? He represented in this House more particularly the agricultural class. He was himself a farmer, he exercised no liberal profession, and had no direct interest in trade. He could, therefore, in all sincerity, and not in order to strike an attitude before his electors, ask himself, and ask this honourable House, why it was that the agricultural class did not enjoy the same advantages as the commercial class. It had been said that the risks of the commercial man were greater, and it was for that reason this exceptional legislation had been granted to the trade. Was that a sufficient reason? The farmer, like every one else, was subject to the uncertainties of life; storms and hail could, in an instant, destroy his crops, and blast his hopes; disease could carry off his flocks, lightning could lay his dwelling and his firm buildings in ashes. What could the farmer do to ward off misfortune? He would have to borrow, he would have to discount the future, mortgage his property, but when his notes fell due, he would have to pay to the last farthing. If he had no money, his property would be sold at a sacrifice, and he, the unfortunate man, would be cast without help on the public highway. He would not, like the merchant, have the advantage of obtaining from his creditors his discharge after having paid 30, 20 or 10 cents on the dollar. No, no, but the law, merciless for him, would pursue him until he had paid the last farthing of his debt. And, meanwhile, the lucky, but often not over-scrupulous, merchant, would have found the means of growing rich after having gone into insolvency two, three or four times. That was a fatal discrimination that the law sanctioned. Clause 766 and following in the code of Civil Procedure, were much more simple, much more expeditious and especially much less unjust, according to his humble opinion, and they had the great advantage of protecting the unfortunate debtors against the lites or the embrace of the official assignee. Why was not recourse taken to this legislation? As for himself, he would state sincerely, and he wished his statement to be heard by the hon. the Minister of Justice, he was opposed to the Insolvency Act, because this Act was based upon an unsound principle. If nothing better could be found to bring before the House, then, whatever might be the report of the Committee about to be appointed, he would vote—and he had reason to believe several of his colleagues would vote also—for the repeal of the present Insolvency Act.

MR. VALLEE said that the hon. the Minister of Justice had stated, a few moments ago, that he hoped the Committee appointed would go promptly to work, in order to find some means of improving or modifying the present law—which ought, however, to be maintained, or, at least, the principle of the law ought to be preserved. He would admit that he could not agree with him, and he, moreover, thought that this opinion was unadvised. The Committee, as it was now composed, was not a political Committee that could be controlled by the friends of the Administration, but it was composed of members chosen from both sides of the House, of members who were against the repeal of the law, and of those who were anxious to repudiate the principle of the law. He remarked that amongst those who were opposed to the repeal of the law there were a certain number of Conservatives on the Committee, and he believed, indeed, that the majority of the members of this Committee had, in the former Parliament, declared themselves hostile to the repeal of the Insolvency Act. By referring to the votes taken during the last Parliament, it would be seen that the majority of the present Committee had pronounced against Mr. Barthe's Bill asking for the repeal of the law. He did not know whether these gentlemen had changed their minds since the late elections, but he was afraid lest the Committee, composed as it was, should do all that could be done to hinder the repeal of the Insolvency

Act by delaying the report of the Committee until such an advanced stage of the Session that it would be too late to legislate on the matter. He was afraid that the Committee would entertain the same opinions that were entertained last year. He believed that the country asked for the repeal of this law. For his part he had pledged himself to his electors to ask for its repeal. By referring the whole question to a Committee he had been prevented from introducing a Bill asking for the repeal of the law, and he, consequently, found himself unable to do his duty as a member. That was why he considered the opinion expressed by the hon. the Minister of Justice rather hazardous. The hon. Minister had stated that the law did not work well, and he admitted that, under cover of this law, certain persons had gone into business because they were certain that the Insolvency Act would furnish them the means of retiring from business profitably. It was, therefore, a bad principle upon which this law was based, and yet the hon. Minister seemed in favour of maintaining it. This expression of opinion, on the part of the hon. the Minister of Justice, had greatly surprised him, for the Insolvency Law was, certainly based upon an unsound principle. Honesty and morality required that he who owed should pay. The Insolvency Law makes an exception to this principle, for it says that he who owes is not obliged to pay, provided he could find a sufficient number of creditors to grant him his discharge. That was why he said that this law was based upon an entirely immoral principle, for it destroys the very foundation of commerce, and of society itself. If the principle of the law was not immoral, it would not have brought about the results that we now see, and trade would not have fallen into the deplorable state it is now in. If a Committee was appointed to consider this subject, the opinion opposed to this law, so vigorously expressed in this House by a great many members, should be carefully weighed. He supposed that this Committee would collect documents and take evidence. Would they call the official assignees? All the official assignees had declared that the law was excellent. Would the wholesale merchants be called? The majority of these merchants have the means of protecting themselves, and are not well acquainted with the working of the law. They would say to the Committee: "The law is a good one, and we hope that it will be maintained." But there was another class besides the wholesale merchants, the creditors; all those who do business with the merchants: the mechanic, the working man, the professional man, all those who work. Would these persons be called before the Committee to give their opinion upon the justice of the Insolvency Act? He was certain that the Committee would not call these persons. No; the Committee would only call those persons who were supposed to occupy the most important positions in the commercial world; and it was well known beforehand that they would be in favour of the maintenance of the Insolvency Act. And why? Because these persons were generally creditors, who could protect themselves. At a meeting of creditors, one or two of those who held the heaviest claims were appointed inspectors, and they took good care of their own interests. They come to an understanding among themselves, whilst the less fortunate suffer. He believed that the composition of this Committee was dangerous for the interests of those who were opposed to the law; and he believed it his duty to ask that the names of other members, who had pronounced themselves against the law, and who were of opinion that the Act does not render justice to all classes of society, should be added to the Committee. There were certainly members in this House who were perfectly free to act in the interests of the majority, and who had not pronounced themselves in favour of the maintenance of the Insolvency Law. The opinion had been expressed that the Government did not dare to introduce a law upon this matter. He did not believe so, but it would be better that the House should not be controlled by political ambitions, so that the question might be brought up in an independent manner, and in order that party aspirations might cover up the voice of justice. He would, therefore, propose to add to the Committee the names of a few of the new members.

Thirteen members had been appointed; he would suggest the appointment of four others. By adding these names the House would be more certain that the views expressed to-day would be overlooked by the Committee, which, as now composed, seemed to be hostile to the repeal of the law.

Mr. SPROULE heartily endorsed the position taken by the Government on this important question. It was certainly the best plan that could be adopted to refer the matter to a Committee chosen from both sides of the House, and which, after hearing the discussion that had taken place in this House, and gathering such other information as it could from individuals outside the House, ought to be able to devise some satisfactory measure. Consequently, he, for one, desired to see the fullest discussion on this matter at the present time, in order that the Committee might perfectly understand the views of the House. He believed it was the general opinion of those men, and would be of the House, that some kind of Insolvent Act was desirable. They should have one of the right kind, however. The present Act was not held in high esteem in the rural constituencies, because the majority of their inhabitants, the farmers, mechanics and professional men, received no benefit therefrom, while compelled to bear their share of the losses resultant. This injustice should prompt efforts for a better Act. An hon. gentleman stated the experience of the United States taught them the necessity of repealing their Act; but he forgot to say that almost every State had an Act of its own which enabled it to dispense with the general Act. The appointment of a number of assignees, or more than one, for a place had been complained of; but he knew instances of estates being largely reduced by the expenses where they had to trust to but one such official, and the property would have been swallowed up altogether had there been much longer delay in the settlements. He had advised the appointment of a second assignee in one instance. One debtor had offered 40c. or 50c. in the dollar for a settlement, saying, if they delayed a week or two longer, with the expenses, he could not pay more than 25c. It was generally admitted some kind of Insolvency Law was essentially necessary to the well-being of those engaged in trade. He hoped the Committee would also consider the necessity of making the law universal, to suit poor and rich alike. To-day a man in trade owing $20,000 might go free from liability on payment of 20c. or 30c. in the dollar, while the poor man, owing $100 or $200, would be hauled up on a judgment summons, and sent to jail because not able to pay a certain amount every month. No doubt the poor felt keenly such an unjust Statute. It was time for a law that would provide for the same treatment of all, include or exclude all alike.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped his hon friend (Mr. Vallée) would withdraw his amendment. The Committee had been carefully selected, by conference, from both sides of the House; if, on consideration, they found it should be increased, it could be done by conference of both sides.

Amendment, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. BÉCHARD said when the Insolvent Act passed in 1875, they were told the law was called for by the commercial classes, because it provided means for a good and equitable distribution of the insolvent debtor's assets among the creditors, and for the relief of the honest and unfortunate debtor. Our attention was also directed to the example of England, France and the United States, which all had then such a law. Some of us thought that if such a law were passed, it ought to be limited to the case of those who called for it, that the interests of the non-trader should be exempt from its operation. In that view, the hon. member for St. John's (Mr. Bourassa) offered an amendment, providing that, in no case of an insolvent, should he get his discharge from the non-trader till his claim were paid in full. That amendment, however reasonable it appeared, did not meet the favour of the House. The lack of such discrimination between the interests of the traders and non-traders, rendered the Act most unpopular in the rural districts. He did not think this law had responded to the expectations of its promoters. After it had been in operation about a year, it was found necessary to amend it by raising, from 33 cents to 50 cents, the percentage to be paid by the debtor to entitle him to his discharge. He would like to know in how many of the numerous cases of insolvency within the past few years, had 50 cents in the dollar been paid; in how many had 30 cents been given? He believed the average amount from the great proportion of insolvents was much lower. Hence he thought he was right in saying that, in this respect, the Act had not met the expectations of its promoters. In fact, its working was found so expensive that, in most of cases, we found creditors accepting deeds of composition with their debtors in order to get anything at all. Had it afforded relief to the honest debtor? He was ready to admit that, in a few cases, it had, but it had also increased rascality, and proved an instrument, a lever in the hands of rascals for the perpetration of fraud. It had opened the door to insolvency by inducing unqualified, inexperienced men, without sufficient capital, to enter business, whose operations had disturbed the honest, genuine, competent trader. One of his greatest objections to the law was its demoralising effect on our population. It seemed as if the time was far past when men unfortunately falling in insolvency suffered under the stroke of humiliation. It appeared now fashionable to become a bankrupt. Some acted so as to be set up again, styled clever, and receive approbation. If they obtained money by defrauding their creditors, they were considered to have proved their qualification for business, and were styled smart fellows. He had no admiration for a law that made smart fellows of that kind. The sooner it was blotted out of the Statute-book the better for the morality of the people, and the good fame of the country. The United States had repealed their Insolvent Law, and he believed no one was prepared to say business was worse there than before. Hon. members of this Parliament had recently the opportunity of discussing the Canadian Act before the country, and he thought the House was prepared to act in accordance with the will of the people. It was but a few weeks ago that he noticed in the papers that a petition was sent by merchants of Montreal to this Government, praying for its repeal; and during the past few days, petitions to the same effect were pouring into the House from all quarters. In the rural districts, the people were clamorous for its repeal. They could not tolerate a law enacted by their representatives in Parliament in virtue of which a man was allowed to avoid paying all his debts; in which discrimination was made between different classes of society whereby some were allowed to become clear of their indebtedness by paying 30c. to 50c. in the dollar, while other classes were bound to pay 100 cents. They could not support that discrimination, and were willing, and, he thought, rightly willing, that they should return to the good sound principle which bound every man to pay his legitimate debts. He thought the House was prepared for the repeal of that obnoxious law, and was very glad to have had the opportunity of hearing so many hon. members in this House express their views in favour of its repeal. Therefore he hoped that, when the proper time came for the second reading of his Bill, it would meet the approbation of the House.

MR. BUNTER said it was not his intention to take up the time of the House on this question; but as there was no one on that Committee from British Columbia, and as it was a question which seriously concerned British Columbia, he considered it his bounden duty to speak in relation to it. He looked upon the Dominion as being bankrupt to British Columbia, in not having carried out the contract entered into with her. When this Act was introduced last year, he had then said it would be a dead letter. The country had pronounced against it. The farmers got no protection from it. They could not get a discharge under this Act, if they should be unfortunate enough to get into financial difficulties by getting in debt, for their stock, farm and farm implements would be sold. The Act was, therefore, an unjust one; and he, having confidence in the present Government, that they would bring in all measures for the benefit of the country, was in favour of its repeal. If the Minister of Justice had left the Act to be dealt with by this House, and not sent it to a Committee, it would have been better, without having this discussion upon it. However, the discussion had been a very interesting one, and no doubt would facilitate the speedy repeal of the Act.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 13) To amend and consolidate as amended the several Acts relating to the Mounted Police Force.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said clause No. 10, in the Bill, provided that the Governor in Council could make a grant of 160 acres to any member of the force on completion of his five years' term. He moved that this clause be amended, to read that men entering the force after the 1st July next would not be entitled to receive this grant at the expiration of their term. Men could be had easily without this inducement, and experience had proved that those men who had served their term and received the grant, did not settle on the land, but sold their scrip.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) PREVENTION BILL.

(Mr Pope, Compton.)

FIRST READING.

MR. POPE (Compton) introduced a Bill (No. 37) To provide against contagious diseases affecting animals. He said that, under the present Act, the provision only came into operation by proclamation of the Governor in Council. The first six sections of this Bill would be permanent and always in operation. It was provided in these six sections, that if disease was discovered in any part of the country, or if an individual knew that cattle were diseased, he was bound to give notice to the Department. Another provision was similar to that of the English Bill for payment to the owner in case of cattle being slaughtered. In case, however, a party knew that his cattle were diseased, and did not give notice, he would not be entitled to pay. Another section provided that, in the case of cattle coming from a foreign country, if the party himself could not be got hold of, the railway should be liable to a penalty if it did not provide sufficient accommodation, and knew the cattle to be diseased. In almost all other respects the Bill was the same as the present law.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES ACCOMMODATION IN STRATFORD.

QUESTION.

MR. HESSON enquired, Whether there are any grounds for the rumour in Stratford, that in consequence of the large sums now paid for rent by the Government for Post Office, Customs, Inland Revenue, and Weights and Measures Offices, and the very imperfect and inconvenient accommodation now afforded by the same, it is the intention to include an amount in the Estimates for the year 1879, for the purpose of purchasing land and erecting suitable buildings thereon for the use of said offices.

MR. TUPPER : The Government are not able, at present, to proceed with the works referred to in the enquiry.

DREDGING OF THE NORTH RIVER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) moved for copies of all correspondence, reports and all papers, relating to the practice of mackerel seining in the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He said it had been the practice of the American fishermen, for the last three or four years, to fish on the shores of the Lower Provinces with seines, where they formerly used only hooks. The use of seines was well known to be very destructive to the mackerel fishery, and also to other kinds of fish. Scarcely a vessel now entering the Gulf was without those mischievous seines, which were thrown and drawn around, catching not only the coveted mackerel, but large quantities of the smaller sizes, herring, and other fish. Perhaps 300 to 400 barrels would be taken, for from 10 to 50 barrels of serviceable fish; the remainder was cast overboard dead. The result was, not only the loss of this large quantity of fish, but the frightening away of good fish from the usual grounds. If these evils were not stopped, the valuable fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence would, in a few years, be totally destroyed. The dead fish thrown back into the sea had a most injurious effect, as it was generally understood that fish would not frequent places where they found their own dead. They also made feed for other fish, and prevented them from taking the bait furnished by the fishermen in the regular way. He trusted the Government would see its way clearly to the adoption of such measures as would save from ruin one of the most valuable fisheries of the Dominion.

MR. FORTIN said those destructive seines were also used along the north and south shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and to catch not only mackerel but cod. He knew, by his own experience of twenty, and many fishermen's experience of thirty years, that, should the subject not be taken up by the Government promptly, and a stop put to the present destruction of those valuable fish, before many years the American fishermen would, with their seines, some of them 1,500 feet long and 60 in depth, have destroyed completely the mackerel, and, in a great measure, the cod-fisheries of Labrador. He spoke on the authority of hundreds who had seen waters, now deserted, teeming with fish. Not many years ago, mackerel was so abundant in Gaspé Bay that the fishermen could take as much as they liked. Then came the Americans with seines, by which they took whole shoals at a draught, half or three-fourths of which, being fish of all kinds and sizes, were not wanted, and were destroyed. Thus, the mackerel had vastly decreased. He hoped the Government would take this important matter into consideration, as the departure of the fish would compel the people of the Lower St. Lawrence to seek a living elsewhere.

MR. MUTTART said that, just now, while the various industries of the Dominion were seeking protection, it was proper that so large and important an industry as the fisheries should be fully protected. It was a matter of the utmost importance to the people of the Maritime Provinces—especially the people of Prince Edward Island—that the practice of purse-seining should be prevented if possible. For the last few years American fishing crews, with boats and seines, annually visited our coasts for the purpose of destroying fish by hook or by crook. Any one at all acquainted with the practice of purse-seining knew the evil effects of this mode of fishing. In the evidence given before the Halifax Fishery Commission, the witnesses all agreed as to the desirability of putting a stop to seining along the shores. One witness stated, on oath, as follows:—

"Seining destroys the fishing as it breaks up the schools of mackerel. Seiners take all kinds of fish, big and small, and they only save the good mackerel. Herrings, small mackerel and other fish are all killed in the seines and these are thrown away."

Another witness stated :

"After fifteen years of experience in the fishing business, I am convinced that seining is ruinous to fishing. Large quantities of fish are killed in the seine. I have known vessels to take two or three hundred barrels more than could be saved, and these had to be tripped out and went to the bottom."

Another witness stated :

"I have been seine-master of American fishing vessels, both in American and Canadian waters, and I perfectly understand fishing with seines. The American mackerel fishing has been almost destroyed by using these seines, and it will not take long to ruin our fisheries if the Americans are allowed to use them here. It is only within the last two or three years these purse-seines, as they are called, have been used in our waters. Fish are uselessly destroyed and the schools broken up and driven away by this practice."

And so the statements ran through the whole evidence given on oath before the Commission. A few year years ago, a British Fishery Commission was appointed. The Commissioners were Mr. Baird, Mr. LeFevre and Professor Huxley—men of the highest repute. One of the topics which engaged their attention was whether any of the methods of catching fish in use in British fisheries involves a wasteful destruction of fish, and if so whether it was probable that any legislative restriction upon such method of fishing would result in an increase of the supply of fish. In reply to this query, the Commissioners stated that "It may be laid down on a broad principle that the produce of the sea is the property of the people in common, and that methods of fishing are fitting subjects for legislation, so far as such legislation can be shown to be necessary to secure the greatest possible advantage to the whole nation by suppressing wasteful or uselessly destructive modes of fishing." Now, here was a case in point. The practice of mackerel-seining was most wasteful, and uselessly destructive. Legislation with the view of preventing it was loudly called for, and, representing, as he did, a constituency largely interested in the fishing business, he hoped that something would be done during the present Session to remedy the evil complained of. The American fishermen themselves admitted that their own fishing grounds had been almost ruined by seining, and it appeared that they were now determined to ruin ours if possible. He was aware that, under the terms of the Washington Treaty, there was no provision made against seining. He believed, nevertheless, that, if the proper steps were taken by the present Administration, the United States Government might be induced to reciprocate—if not in trade—in this matter of vital importance to both countries, the protection and preservation of the fisheries.

MR. BRECKEN said, before the question was disposed of, he would like to address a few words to the House on the subject now under consideration. The fishery question was one of great importance to the Dominion, and of vital importance to the Lower Provinces. It appeared that under the fishery article of the Treaty of Washington, Article 18, the Americans were admitted within the three-mile boundary, to fish in common with British subjects. Under the Fishery Act, passed 31 Vic., chapter 60, sub-section 7, section 13, drag nets, trap nets and fishponds, were prohibited, except under special license. It would appear that these purse-seines did not come within the category of either drag nets, trap nets or fishponds. His apology for occupying a few moments of the valuable time of the House, was that, since the Washington Treaty, these seine nets had been used by Americans on our coasts. It was looked upon as such a destructive mode of fishing that the fishermen of Prince Edward Island would rather see the fishery award thrown into the sea than that the Americans should be permitted to fish with these purse-seines, within the three-mile limit as the boundary, as this House was well aware, from which the Americans were excluded under the Treaty of 1818, and where lay the most valuable portions of the fisheries. He had under his hand evidence, taken before the Halifax Commission, of American fishermen who acknowledged that this mode of fishing with purse-seines was most destructive. The Americans had almost destroyed, through this means, their own mackerel fisheries. The French had greatly injured their cod-fisheries by the use of these seines, which were thrown around a school of fish, then drawn up, and sometimes there would be hundreds of barrels of fish taken in the nets in one haul, and probably not twenty barrels utilised. One reason, he understood, why these purse-seines were so destructive was that, as they were trawled, the meshes became taut, and there was no escape for the smaller fish. Large and small were alike killed, the small fish were thrown overboard, and, becoming decomposed, they poisoned the waters. He had conversed with men who were engaged in the fisheries, and they had assured him that, unless some steps were taken to prohibit the use of purse-seines, in five or six years these fisheries, now a mine of wealth to us, would be comparatively valueless. Whether, under this treaty which had been entered into, we could legislate or not, it was not for him to say; or whether the proper course would be to open up negotiations with the Washington Government. But this was certain—that it was one of the most important questions that could possibly engage the attention of the House. The export of fish now from the Dominion was to be counted by millions of dollars, and that great source of wealth, properly fostered, would rank foremost among the resources of our Dominion.

Mr. FLYNN said there was no question of greater importance, to the Maritime Provinces especially, than the one introduced by his hon. friend from King's. Ample evidence, a portion of which had been read by that hon. gentleman, had been given before the Fishery Commission to show the destructive character of purse-seines. The Americans had destroyed their own fishing on their own coasts, and if these purse-seines were continued to be used in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, our fisheries would be completely destroyed. Several of the fishing vessels belonging to the eastern portion of Nova Scotia which were in the habit of going into the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the summer months, reported that for miles around the sea was strewn with dead fish, small mackerel and other small fish, thrown out of the purse-seines. These purse-seines were thrown out, not knowing the kinds of fish that would be caught in them, and all the fish not wanted were, on the seine being hauled up, thrown away, thus destroying them by thousands of barrels at a time, and these fish going to the bottom became decomposed, and consequently prevented other fish from going to their usual haunts on these banks. There were other injurious modes of catching fish besides the purse-seines. There were the trawls and trap nets, which, in his opinion, were equally destructive. While it was not within the province of the Government to prevent the use of purse-seines, it was within their province to prevent the use of the two latter. Under the Washington Treaty, the Americans had the right to use purse-seines inside of the three-mile limit, while the injury effected by these nets was as great outside the limit as inside it. The question could be opened by negotiations between the two Governments, and it was probable that the American Government would get their fishermen to abandon the use of purse-seines. If he were to believe all the information he daily received, during the last fishing season, from a large number of his constituents who were engaged in the fisheries, he must come to the conclusion that the continued use of these seines would destroy that branch of our industry. If the Americans were permitted to continue the use of purse-seines, another half a dozen years would not pass over our heads before our fisheries would be a thing of the past. He would urge upon the Government to do all in their power to stop the evil, which could only be done by negotiations between both Governments, and it would be found that the Americans were quite as anxious as ourselves to have this means of destroying fish put an end to.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the importance of this question could hardly be overestimated. His attention had been called to it several years ago, but the Government were not then in a position to take any action in the matter, particularly when the arbitration under the Treaty of Washington was pending between the Governments. The weight of evidence before the Commission abundantly proved that the practice of purse-seine fishing was highly destructive to the fishing interest. Under the Treaty of Washington, we had power to make rules and regulations within the three-mile limit, to which our own fishermen were subject. It could not be contended that Americans would not be amenable to the same regulations within these limits. The great trouble they had felt was this: the Americans had the right to fish outside the three-mile limit, and, if he were not mistaken, purse-seines, though cast outside, yet drew fish from inside the limit. Now that the fishery award was disposed of, the way was open for this Government to negotiate with the Washington Government, and he hoped their efforts would be made in this direction and prove successful. The Americans were interested in the fishing on our coasts as well as on their own, since, by the convention, they had the right to fish within a three-mile limit of our shores.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said he had noticed, during the past summer, a statement in a Cape Breton journal referring to the enormous destruction of fish by Americans in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This statement had been amply corroborated by the hon. gentlemen who had spoken on the subject to-day. As had been said by the hon. member for Queen's, these purse-seines were generally located in the three-mile limit, and the fish destroyed would otherwise belong to our own fishermen. The trawling system was equally injurious, and along the coasts of Nova Scotia, several fisheries that four or five years ago yielded large incomes, had been almost completely destroyed. Before the Government took action in this matter, the proper course would be to institute an enquiry into the different methods of catching fish practised along the shores. A congress of the French, British and American Governments could effectually settle the matter, by uniting in a common legislative action, as the interests of each were deeply involved in preventing the fish from being destroyed.

MR. ROBTAILLE said there was no doubt the use of seines in the Baie des Chaleurs waters was very injurious to our fisheries. The moment the Americans, who came to the Bay in large numbers, commenced to use seines, they found that, not only the mackerel, but also the cod-fish diminished very much in quantity, and our own fishermen suffered in consequence. Thus it was that our fishing grounds were, from year to year, being exhausted and ruined, and he hoped the Government would do everything in its power to prevent the continuation of the use of such destructive instruments.

MR. HACKETT said the use of the purse-seine had been brought about by Americans, and had proved a commercial success. The fishermen themselves, however, were opposed to this mode of fishing. He thought that, in speaking of the value of the fisheries, they need not refer to the intrinsic value of the fish. In the Province of Prince Edward Island, there were 8,000 or 10,000 persons engaged in the fisheries, and somewhere about 30,000 persons were dependent for their support upon this calling. Then, the fisheries of the Gulf must be the means of supplying the people of the Dominion of Canada with fish for a number of years. Having such valuable fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it was the duty of the Government to use every means to preserve them intact, so that they should remain, not only a means of bringing wealth into the country, but also a means of supplying a very important article to our people. He considered it was also the duty of the Government to preserve the means of training our young fishermen for the mercantile marine. The people of Prince Edward Island were opposed to purse-seine fishing which was of a most destructive character, and it had been proved by experienced men that the fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence would be rendered unprofitable if this continued. He trusted, if the Government could not introduce any legislation on the subject, that they would enter into negotiations at once with the Washington Government, with a view to bring about measures that would prevent this mode of fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Other industries were asking for protection, and what the fishermen wanted was a fair field and no favour.

MR. ANGLIN said that, as the representative of a county in which there was a very large number of fishermen, he thought he should add his voice to those of the gentlemen who had already spoken upon the subject. It was important that they, who represented men engaged in the fisheries of the Dominion, should impress upon the Government the necessity of doing anything within their power to put an end to this great and very serious evil. He thought that they might, perhaps, strengthen the hands of the Government, and enable them to approach the subject with a better chance of success. He was not himself prepared to suggest what course would be best to pursue. He believed a great deal of damage had been done by this mode of fishing, but it was a very serious question as to whether they had a right to legislate in regard to fishing, even within the three-mile limit, so as to restrict, even in appearance, the rights conferred on the Americans by treaty. His impression was that they had the right, but he thought that the people of the United States would question it, and that an attempt to enforce our right would lead to just such troublesome complications as they hoped to avoid when the Washington Treaty was made. The question was an exceedingly delicate one, and he rose to join the gentlemen representing counties in which there were large numbers of fishermen in the representations made, and in entreating that the Government would do whatever they found possible for the purpose of remedying this very serious evil.

MR. RICHEY said that this was a subject of the greatest importance. The facts lay within a very small compass, and had been efficiently presented to the consideration of the House. There were two points fully demonstrated by the evidence given before the Commission which sat in Halifax, namely, the exceeding great value of the fisheries around the Canadian coast, and the rapidity with which that value was being reduced, while this mode of gathering fish was permitted to continue. The evil was apparent; the question which remained was the remedy to be applied. They were told that, within the three-mile limit, American fishermen must submit to the local regulations. The difficulty, however, remained that, just immediately beyond that limit, they would continue this mode of gathering fish. He thought that even treaties must be subject to some reasonable interpretation, and the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedus applied to rights thus obtained as well as under municipal law, and, if it was proved that this mode of catching fish was detrimental to the interests of all employed in the trade, a case might be fully and fairly made. For this reason he felt disposed so strongly to support this application, in order that further negotiations might be carried on, through the Imperial Government, with our neighbouring nation, and, if necessary, with the Government of France, to the end that some principle might be arrived at by which, in the future, this mode of destroying the North American Fisheries should be effectually prevented.

MR. MACDONNELL said he rose to endorse all that previous speakers had said, as to the destructiveness to our fisheries, of the contrivances referred to. He came from a portion of the Dominion, the Island of Cape Breton, in which the fisheries were most valuable. He considered that our most important fisheries were those around the two Islands of Cape Breton and Prince Edward. It had been said that, within the last two years, the value of our fisheries had suffered much by the methods of fishing complained of. It was, therefore, a matter of great importance that the Government should give the subject not only their serious, but their immediate attention, in order, if possible, that some preventive measure might be adopted to put an end to the evil during the coming season. The fishermen of the Island of Cape Breton were very outspoken and loud in their complaints as to the injurious and destructive effects of the mode of fishing pursued by the Americans.

MR. GILLMOR said he also represented a very considerable population engaged in fishing, and he could endorse what had been said by hon. gentlemen who had preceded him. In his constituency, 4,000 to 5,000 men were engaged in the fishery, and, although complaints against troll-fishing were numerous, a difference of opinion existed among the fishermen themselves. Those of the fishermen who were as well equipped as the Americans, did not wish to be deprived of this mode of fishing outside of the three-mile limit. Many claimed that this was the most profitable business, and was not injurious to the fisheries. He desired to draw attention to a communication he had just received respecting troll-fishing in the Quoddy River, that was the water between the American shore and Campobello. Here there were a great number of boats fishing with the hand-line, and he thought it would be advisable for the Government to take steps to prevent troll-fishing in that locality, but in outside waters, where American fishermen, in their large vessels were fishing with trolls just outside the three-mile limit, and could not be prevented, it would be unfair to our fishermen to prevent them from trolling just inside the three-mile line. If trolling was to be prevented, it must be general, and apply as well to Americans as to our own people. There was a great difference of opinion about the injury done to fishing by trolls, but a large majority, he thought, were opposed to it; but, as our fisheries were now situated, he thought the Government would find it a difficult matter to adjust satisfactorily. He trusted, however, that they would make the effort.

Mr. Fiset said that, as he had the honour to represent a county where a certain number of persons made fishing their principal occupation, he thought it his duty to say a few words upon the question now before the Chair. What struck him most forcibly was the want of discretion shown by fishermen who made use of seines in catching fish. They paid no attention to the quantity they took, which was sometimes twice or three times more than they could cure; but, like the Indians, they took as great a quantity as possible, at the risk of not being able to keep half, or even quarter, of what they had caught. What was the consequence? It was that these fishermen, after having taken from their nets the best fish, and having loaded their schooners or vessels, left the remainder of the fish, which were dead, and which often exceeded in quantity the amount kept. This quantity of dead fish was, in itself, an enormous loss; but there was another disadvantage, and that was that the dead fish prevented the live fish from frequenting their favourite haunts. It was, no doubt, for this reason that the banks, that were for a number of years regarded as excellent fishing grounds, had now become abandoned and unprofitable. Moreover, it was not only in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence that this destruction was carried on; unfortunately, the same privilege had been granted to fish in the Bay of Seven Islands. In that beautiful bay, where the fish went to spawn in such great quantities, Mr. Cunningham, of the county of Shelburne, had enjoyed last year, the exclusive right of using seines in these waters, and had taken a considerable quantity of fish; whilst the inhabitants of the place, and our own poor Canadian fishermen, were obliged to look on, without being able to obtain from the Fisheries Department the permission to make use of the same kind of seines. That was a grave injustice. It had been stated that it was an experiment. That was true, but it was an experiment that had cost dear to the inhabitants of the locality, for it had deprived them of their only means of earning a living; and it was very probable that, if the experiment was tried again, this bay would become unproductive in a few years. At all events, if the right to use nets was again granted, he trusted it would not be given to a single person, but to all the inhabitants of the place, and to the inhabitants of the county of Rimouski. He, therefore, joined all the hon. members who had spoken before him, in order to urge upon the Government the necessity of taking any steps they might think proper to prevent this destruction of fish by the Americans, which was hurtful to our commerce, and so detrimental to our poor fishermen, who had not the means of procuring these costly apparatus.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he was not aware that there was not any correspondence in the hands of the Government to bring down, but there was plenty of evidence given before the Halifax Commission, to prove the statements made by the gentlemen who had spoken upon the subject, particularly those from the Maritime Provinces. It was, however, a very important subject, and had been, and still was, under the serious consideration of the Government, who appreciated the value of the fisheries, and would do all in its power to protect them. The Commission had established the fact that the practice now prevailing of using the seines would, if persevered in, entirely destroy the fisheries. It was not the quantity of marketable mackerel caught by the Americans that the people complained of so much as the number of fish destroyed by the use of the seines. It was true they were often used in deep water outside the three-mile limit, and over this we could exercise no control; but this did not affect us so seriously, because the fish killed and thrown over would not, to the same extent, poison the water of the inshore fisheries. If the indiscriminate use of these nets were continued, the inshore fisheries would, in a very short time, be entirely destroyed. Some of these nets were 250 fathoms long; with them they surrounded and caught all kinds of fish in large quantities, including the small and coarser fish which usually supplied food to our valuable cod-fishery. Hundreds of barrels of valuable herring were often taken by American schooners, but, not being valued, were thrown over and wasted, together with all the other fish taken in the nets, with the exception of the very small proportion of merchantable mackerel. The evils resulting from this practice could be well understood. To show the great value of these fisheries, he would state that for the last few years the quantity of mackerel annually caught on the coast of Nova Scotia was valued at $1,307,000; on the coast of New Brunswick, $97,000; of Quebec, $87,000; of Prince Edward Island, $291,000, making altogether $1,782,000, and the yield had been about the same for some years past. If these fisheries were destroyed—as they certainly would be if this practice continued—the $5,000,000 would be no compensation for their loss to the Maritime Provinces. In addition to the values just given, the Americans caught from 150,000 to 250,000 barrels of mackerel principally in our waters, making altogether some three or four million dollars per year as the value of the fisheries. Since these seines were being used, particularly along the shores of Prince Edward Island, many fishermen who had a number of boats fitted out for mackerel fishing, were now ruined, and the fisheries themselves were being destroyed. He could only say, in conclusion, that anything the Government could do to put a stop to this waste would be done.

BOUNDARY OF ALASKA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of a memorandum of the circumstances that led to the conclusion of the Convention between Great Britain and Russia, of February, 1825; also, a copy of the Convention, if any, between Great Britain and the United States, of February, 1825, mentioned in Sessional Papers, 1878, 125, pages 27 and 30; also, a copy of the most reliable maps and charts of the Territory of Alaska, that existed in 1825, and that have been made since, including Russian, British and American maps and charts; and also, any reports that may have been made to the Government respecting the Alaskan boundary, that have not yet been published. He said that, as it had been suggested, by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that some reports had been made respecting the Alaskan boundary, it would be as well to include them in the return. He had heard it stated that the United States Government intended to make some provision for the government of Alaska, and to ask our Government to join them in defining the boundary between Alaska and British Columbia. Unfortunately for our country, the Imperial Government had neglected taking care of the interests of the western portions of this Dominion. When the Treaty of Washington was negotiated, in 1871, we were only allowed the right of free navigation in two or three of the rivers flowing from British Columbia through Alaska. Under the Convention of 1825 with Russia, we had the right to navigate all the rivers that ran out of our territory and through Alaska, but by the act of Russia in 1867, in transferring the territory of Alaska to the United States, we lost the right of navigating the rivers. He thought the Joint High Commission at Washington might have included all the rivers the same as the Convention of 1825, although he did not blame the Commission for not having done so, because any nation might abrograte a treaty by its own act, or by a new treaty. But Alaska was now becoming of some importance from its furs and minerals. Several steamers were running between Stikine, British Columbia and Alaska, conveying from 2,000 to 3,000 passengers yearly. Consequently, they ought to have all the information they could get respecting this boundary question. He had found that the maps published with regard to Alaska were very imperfect. Some time ago he had seen a map in the office of the Minister of Public Works, which showed that the River Yukon ran into the Arctic Ocean, whereas it discharged into Behring's Sea, an arm of the Pacific Ocean. He asked, in his motion, that the Russian maps, as well as the British and American, should be brought down. He believed that the Western Union Telegraph Company, when exploring that country for telegraph purposes, had published a map giving a great deal more correct information respecting the geography of the country than the other maps, and he believed that the interior of Northern British Columbia, as well as Alaska, would be found much better laid down by the topographical staff of the Western Union Company than by anybody else. However, he asked that the papers might be brought down, and the information placed before the House in advance of any negotiations that might take place with the United States Government with respect to Alaska.

MR. MILLS said he had no doubt the hon. the Minister of the Interior had looked into this question, and was able to say if it was possible to bring down the maps that had been asked for. He (Mr. Mills) believed it would take a good deal of time, and some expense would be incurred in preparing all that the motion asked for, nor did he think the documents would throw any additional light upon the subject. He supposed the correspondence would include the memorandum of Sir Charles Napier, relating to the Treaty of 1825, between Great Britain and Russia. There was no treaty, he believed, concluded between the United States and Great Britain, at that time. However, there was correspondence between the American Government and that of St. Petersburg, upon this subject, because the Territory upon the Pacific coast at that point was claimed by the three Powers, Great Britain, America and Russia. If the hon. gentleman obtained the correspondence, he would see that negotiations had taken place, in the first instance, between the Governments of St. Petersburg and Great Britain, who failed to arrive at any settlement of the matter; that ultimately the points in dispute between the two Governments were disposed of in the Treaty of 1825, which gave to Russia a narrow strip of territory upon the coast south of Mount St. Elias, extending as far south as Portland Channel, upon the express condition that all the rivers flowing through this Russian territory should be open to navigation by Great Britain, for all purposes whatsoever. It would be seen, by the correspondence, that both Governments claimed the sovereignty of the soil, that Great Britain ceded to Russia the territory which she claimed, but, at the same time, retaining an equal right, or an equal sovereignty, in the rivers flowing through this relinquished territory to the ocean; so that these rivers were not only open to Great Britain for the purposes of ordinary commercial navigation, but were open to the people of Great Britain, and to any persons who might settle in the interior country, subjects of Her Majesty, for any purposes of navigation whatsoever. It was under this treaty that the British Columbian authorities undertook to take Mr. Martin from the northern part of British Columbia down to Stikine River, with the view of imprisoning him at Victoria for the offence for which he had been convicted. The correspondence would also show that the Law Officers of the Crown had, in answer to a communication dated the 16th August last, from the Colonial Secretary, Lord Carnarvon, expressed the opinion that the people of Canada had lost the rights which they possessed under the Treaty of St. Petersburg, by the negotiations which took place at Washington in 1871, and by the treaty by which those negotiations were concluded. The hon. gentleman (Mr. DeCromos) would see that statement given in a communication by the Law Officers of the Crown, and quoted by the then Minister of Justice. They said that, although Great Britain did not withdraw any right, nor could she have lost any right, by any negotiations between Russia and the United States in 1867, because Russia, in conveying the territory of Alaska to the United States, could not convey to the United States any greater interest than she actually possessed, and she could not convey to the United States the interest that the Government or the Crown of Great Britain had in the navigation of these rivers, because they stated that that could not be done without the consent of Great Britain. But they further advised, upon this ground, that, because the Treaty of St. Petersburg had been abrogated by the Treaty of Washington, the Government of Canada should, at the earliest moment, release Mr. Martin. The hon. gentleman would see, therefore, that, if the people on the western coast were now in a worse position than they were before, it was due to the negotiations which took place at Washington, and which were consummated by the celebrated treaty known as the Treaty of Washington.

MR. DECOSMOS said he could not agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) when he said that the people of the Pacific coast were not in as good a position now as formerly; and that it was due to the Treaty of Washington of 1871. The Russian Government, in 1867, by selling the Territory of Alaska to the United States, abrogated the Convention of 1825. So far as the objection raised by the hon. gentleman, even supposing the Convention negotiated in 1825 still existed, it would be a matter of doubt whether it would be within the terms of that treaty to use the Stikine and other rivers except for purposes of commerce. He contended that the negotiators of the Washington Treaty, 1871, neglected their duty.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were two opinions on that subject. Perhaps the best international lawyer in England, Mr. Montague Barnard, a member of the Commission at Washington, and Lord Tenterden, who had taken part in some of the most important treaties that England had negotiated, both were united in the opinion that, by the transfer of Alaska, the effect of the treaty of 1825 was gone. It was also the opinion of Mr. Gladstone's Government, and if that opinion were correct, the fact that the three rivers had been put into the treaty could do no harm. If the papers could be brought down within a reasonable time, they would be brought down.

MR. MILLS said he had observed that it was very strange these opinions were not communicated to the British Ambassador at Washington. He had met Sir Edward Thornton, who, he knew, was not aware of the existence of any such opinions.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could not tell what conversation the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had with Sir Edward Thornton; but it was a matter for him whether he should repeat that conversation or not.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FISET moved for all correspondence since the 10th of October, 1873, between the Post Office Department, or any officer thereof, and any person or persons whatsoever of the parish of St. Fabien, respecting the contract for carrying the mail between the railway station and the post-office of the said parish.

RESERVATION OF LOTS ON RED RIVER, MANITOBA.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. DUBUC moved for a copy of the Order or Orders in Council by which certain lots of land on the Red River, in Manitoba, were reserved for settlement, as it appears by a notice published by the Surveyor-General, and dated the 14th November, 1877. He said that the lands mentioned in this motion were situated along the Red River, in the parishes of St. Agathe and St. Norbert, in the county of Provencher. Before the Province of Manitoba had been annexed to Canada, there existed a custom by which each inhabitant could take up a lot of land in the uninhabited parts, and become the proprietor of the same. By this taking up of the land, the settler was regarded as having acquired certain rights, the right of the first occupier. This custom had been observed by the whole population, and recognised by the Council of Assiniboia, which was at that time the constituted authority. This custom was respected as law. A certain number of settlers, taking advantage of the custom referred to, had taken up lands along the Red River. Later on, several of them settled down there with their families; others sold their right to new settlers who had bought in good faith, paying the ordinary price for land in that locality, and who had settled on these lands. All these settlers had much improved their farms. He knew of some who had spent upon their land all they had, who had built nice houses, and who had now establishments worth from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars. What had not been the surprise of these settlers when they had seen, in the fall of 1877, an official notice, bearing the signature of the Surveyor-General of the Dominion, Lieutenant-Colonel Dennis, and dated November 14th, 1877, stating that a certain number of these lots, designated in the notice, had been reserved and withdrawn from settlement; and that the settlement thereon would not be recognised by the Government. This news spread consternation among them. According to the wording of the notice, they had not even the right to acquire from the Government these lands that they had already bought, paid for, and improved. After having spent all their money and built up fine settlements, at the price of three or four years of hard labour and privations, they saw themselves suddenly threatened with being driven out of their homes and cast upon the highway. This was enough to dishearten them; they did not, however, allow themselves to be cast down, nor did they abandon all hope. They had gone, in the first place, to the offices of the Dominion Lands, at Winnipeg, in order to learn the reasons that had been assigned for this withdrawal from settlement of lots occupied by them. They received answer that these reasons had not been transmitted from Ottawa, and that they were entirely unknown. His aim in asking for these Orders in Council respecting this withdrawal, was to endeavour to ascertain, if it were possible, the motives that had actuated the late Government in making this reserve, and the purposes for which these lands had been so withdrawn. The House would, perhaps, be then able to see what remedy could be applied, and how these settlers could be prevented from being deprived of their property.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there could be no objection to these papers being brought down, but he was not at all sure whether the Order in Council would give the necessary information. If the hon. gentleman would do him the favour of going to his (Sir John's A. Macdonald's) office, he would have an opportunity of examining all the papers, and all the reasons why the Government had passed those Orders in Council referred to in this motion. There could be no objection to the motion passing now.

NEW BRUNSWICK ELECTION PETITIONS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. DOMVILLE moved for returns in reference to election petitions filed in New Brunswick; when they were filed; what progress has been made in reference to the trial of the petitions; in what cases preliminary objections were filed to the petitions; when these objections were argued; before what Judges; what judgments were given, and in what cases.

MR. ANGLIN said that the motion of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), was a repetition in another way of a statement made by that gentleman the other day, and was, he thought, an attack upon the Judiciary of the Province of New Brunswick. It seemed, at least, to suggest that the Judges of that Province had been remiss in their duty. He believed that was not a fact. In a large number of election petitions that had been presented there,—he thought there were ten of them—preliminary objections had been raised. The arguments in those cases had occupied a great deal of time, and the Judges had taken, in some cases, time for consideration before giving their decision. The Judges had had several other matters of public importance to attend to. The Chief Justice, for instance, was occupied in an important murder trial for several weeks, and, of course, could not interrupt that trial to attend to election cases. The hon. gentleman, too, was one of those against whom a petition had been filed. He (Mr. Anglin) had heard it said that the Judge before whom that petition would be heard, had had ample leisure to attend to it, but he had not been moved on the behalf of the hon. member to any action in the matter. It might be that the petitioners had been remiss; they, perhaps, caused some delay in the trial of the case of which he supposed the hon. gentleman was desirous to get rid as soon as possible. He believed it was in his (Mr. Domville's) power, if he chose, to take the necessary steps to force an early trial of that petition. He thought it was absurd for him (Mr. Domville) to ask the interposition of the Dominion Government in the matter at all; nor did he think it necessary to throw any suspicion upon the character and conduct of gentlemen who, he thought, were ornaments to the Bench. He thought that it was not, to any extent, or in any degree, their fault that decisions had not been obtained with regard to these election petitions. The hon. gentleman would wish them to entertain the idea that the petition against him was a great grievance; that the conduct of his election had been perfectly pure; that he stood ready in his seat to hurl defiance at all who brought against him such charges of corrupt practices. It was a high position for him to take, and, if he maintained it, it would be an honourable position, but he would not gain anything by attacking the Judges against whom those charges had been made, as they had always performed their duties fairly.

MR. DOMVILLE said his object in moving for these papers was not to cast any reflection on the Judges of New Brunswick, but to show the public of Canada that, whatever the cause might be, they could not get the election petitions tried in New Brunswick, and, with the exception of Judge Wetmore, who had acted promptly, no decisions had been given, even on the preliminary objections, which was outrageous, as almost six months had elapsed since the elections. His hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) had remarked that they had to try a murder case in Moncton, and had other work to do of equal magnitude. This might be the case, but then it only went to prove what he stated, and there was no guarantee that these trials would take place for another twelve months, unless the Government stepped in and compelled the Judges to try the cause referred to. If those petitions had been tried, and decisions given, it would be found several gentlemen, now in the House would not be entitled to the seats they occupied, and it was defeating the object of the Election Act to allow persons accused of corrupt acts to hold their seats for want of a proper trial as laid down by the law. The country expected the law to be carried out without respect to persons. It must seem manifestly unjust to delay, without necessity, the trial of election petitions. If there was any necessity—if, as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) said, there was no time for the trials, the House should make some regulation that would enable them to be tried. It was on that ground he (Mr. Domville) complained. He cast no suspicion on the Judges. His hon. friend said he stood here above suspicion. He hoped so. But, if he Mr. (Domville) should be unseated, he would not be any worse than many of his fellow-members, but, at any rate, his conduct would not disqualify him, as some of them had been disqualified. His hon. friend (Sir A. J. Smith) had said "hear, hear." Perhaps he (Mr. Domville) had not spent so much money as that hon. gentleman at election time, but money was not as plentiful with him as the hon. gentleman at that time, and therefore he had had a double reason in not breaking the law. The hon. member for Gloucester said he (Mr. Domville) could have brought his trial on. Was it worth his while or necessary for him to ask for the trial of his case? Did he put in any preliminary objection, however? No. When the hon. gentleman's political friends telegraphed from

MR. ANGLIN.

Fredericton that they would withdraw their opposition to him (Mr. Domville), if his friends would do so in their case; his answer was: No; go on. He would not connive at any breach of the law. Consequently he put in no preliminary objection, but said: Try the case out. He did not, then, think that anybody would have expected him to call upon people to try his case, which it was for his accusers to do. If his (Mr. Domville's) party had had any power in the matter, they would have had the petition tried. His object in making his motion was to call attention to the fact that New Brunswick, having returned four or five supporters of the present Government, and a majority on the other, or Opposition side, they could not get tried the cases of the hon. gentlemen against whom there were petitions. That was the plain English of the matter. If his friends said this was because the judges had too much work, let the fact be known. If the hon. gentlemen wished to insinuate that he wanted to throw suspicion on them, it was quite immaterial to him; he had not made such a statement. Unless these cases were tried soon, the people of New Brunswick would begin to view the matter with suspicion.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he trusted that his hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville), having expressed his views on this subject, would withdraw his motion, inasmuch as the papers asked for, were not under the control of the Government, and therefore could not be brought down.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

MR. HAGGART moved for a detailed statement of all moneys and for what paid, on the following Public Works, up to the 1st March, 1879:—Those portions of the Pacific Railway called the Pembina Branch Extension; the part from Fort William to Sunshine Creek; the part from Sunshine Creek to English River; the part from Rat Portage to Cross Lake, and the expenditure at Thunder Bay; and the expenditure on the Fort Frances Canal.

Motion agreed to.

MR. CARON moved for a return of all tenders containing schedules of quantities and prices at the letting of contracts Nos. 13, 14, 15 and 25, Canadian Pacific Railway; contracts made on same; schedule of quantities actually paid for, and estimate of quantities and cost of work to be done on each of these contracts; also, all correspondence or instructions relative to any changes in the character or construction of the said works.

Motion agreed to.

THE "NORTHERN LIGHT."

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. VALIN moved for copies of the tenders received for the building of the steamboat Northern Light; the names of the parties tendering, and the price agreed upon in the contract, and all the papers connected with her construction; the names of the inspectors employed during the construction of that vessel, and the salary paid to such inspectors; the amount expended for repairs effected on this boat since it began to run; and also, the sum paid to keep it running between Pictou and Georgetown up to the 1st January, 1879. He said two years ago, when tenders were called for the building of the Northern Light, he met on board train a party who told him that he had a model for the Public Works Department, upon which the steamer for the ferry service between Pictou and Johnstown was to be built. He found, on enquiry, that no tender had been called for, and that the contract had been let without it. It astonished him (Mr. Valin), a practical shipbuilder, that the Government would accept a vessel of the kind in question for such a trying and difficult service. The Northern Light was every way unsuitable for it. She was too short, her frame was too light, she was not sufficiently raised at the bow and was built of soft wood instead of hard wood; she was not cased as required. She was launched and christened the Northern Light, but, under all the circumstances of her construction, should have been called the Political Light. Tenders should have been called for and the vessel built in a suitable manner. She was unfit for running into, breaking through and clearing away the ice ; being also too high and narrow, and too slim. On one occasion, he was personally aware that her passengers, taken on at Georgetown, were anxious to get off her. The very first year of her service, her builder was compelled to go down and help to push her through the ice.

MR. HOLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

tract ; the time at which each contract stipulated the work should be completed, and the time at which, if finished, it was actually completed ; the gross amount paid each contractor in fulfilment of his contract, and the actual quantities in which such gross sum was computed as compared with the estimated quantities ; specifying the contracts still incomplete, the percentage of each kind of work remaining undone, the percentage or gross sum of contract paid, and the percentage which should have been paid in proportion to the amount of work performed ; the amount paid on each contract unfinished on account of progress estimates, and the amount of deductions remaining on the hands of the Government ; the nature, character, and amount of deposit for security on each contract in the hands of the Government ; the names of any contractors who have failed in fulfilling their contract, and the amount of the deposits and deductions from progress estimates forfeited on account of such failure or non-fulfilment of the contract ; all contracts of the above kind of works awarded without calling for tenders ; all changes made by Order in Council, or otherwise, in any such contracts, whether in prices or in any other manner, relieving the contractor of his obligations, with a full detail of such changes.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said, in the absence of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that a large portion of the information asked for had been already furnished in returns laid on the table of the House, but that whatever remained to be furnished would be sent down.

SOUTH GRENVILLE ELECTION.

MR. MCCARTHY moved :

"That the petition of George C. Longley, and others, praying that an enquiry may be made, as provided by 39 Victoria, chapter 10, Sections 9 and 10, into certain alleged corrupt practices in the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Grenville, be read at the Table of this House."

Motion agreed to, and petition read accordingly.

MR. McCARTHY moved :

"That an Address be voted to His Excellency the Governor General, representing to His Excellency that a petition has, within fourteen days from the opening of Parliament, being the first meeting of Parliament subsequent to the holding of the election hereinafter referred to, been presented to this House, signed by more than twenty-five electors of the Electoral District of the South Riding of Grenville, in the Province of Ontario, in which petition it is alleged that no petition charging the existence of corrupt practices has been presented under the Act for the trial of Controverted Elections against the return of the member elected for the said electoral division to this House, at the election holden on the tenth and seventeenth days of September, 1878, and in which petition it is further alleged that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the said election holden on the said tenth and seventeenth days of September, of a member for this House for the said electoral division; and further, representing to His Excellency that annexed to the said petition is a solemn declaration made under the Statute in that behalf, signed by the petitioners, stating that they are such electors, and that the allegations of the petition are true to the best of their knowledge and belief; and praying that His Excellency the Governor-General do cause enquiry to be made under the Act of Parliament of Canada passed in the thirty-ninth year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intitled: An Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections of members of the House of Commons by one or more of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or by one or more of the Judges competent under the Dominion Controverted Election Act, 1874, to try an election petition for any District of the Province of Ontario, into the alleged existence of such alleged corrupt practices in the electoral district of the South Riding of Grenville, and for that purpose do appoint a Commissioner or Commissioners under the said Act."

He said the object was to have an enquiry made into the alleged existence of corrupt practices in the South Riding of Grenville. His hon friend opposite (Mr. Holton) had suggested, and he (Mr. McCarthy) thought very properly, that this, being the first application of this kind under the Statute, it was but right that they should be careful in their procedure, as they were about to establish a precedent. The matter, he thought, should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As far as he saw, the petition was in proper form. It purported to be signed by twenty-five electors of the electoral division. He supposed it would still be a matter within the discretion of the House whether an Address would or would not be presented, and it was necessary they should proceed carefully in the matter, which was not so much for the purpose of punishing parties as it was for disfranchising a constituency, if it was proved that corrupt practices existed to the extent alleged in the petition.

MR. HOLTON moved, in amendment :

"That the said petition be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to enquire and report as to the sufficiency and regularity thereof; and also to report as to the expediency of passing the Address prayed for, and that the said Committee have power to report an Address, or otherwise, as they may think fit."

He said there were obviously two branches of this subject. The first was the examination of the regularity of the petition, and the verification of its allegations as far as possible, and the obtaining of the report of the Committee on the facts; secondly, to advise the House as to the exercise of its discretion in passing the Address which was prayed for. That was the whole purport of the amendment which remitted the whole subject to the Judicial Committee of the House, in order that any precedent that might be established might be carefully considered. This appeared to him to be the proper mode of dealing with this subject on this occasion. No one proposed to protest against a proper enquiry into the subject by recommending this course. There was no precisely similar case on the books in England, and, therefore, he had concluded to move this amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) asked whether the last clause of the amendment was in form. The Statute said that, on the presentation of the petition, the House should pass the Address.

MR. HOLTON said the Statute provided that it should be lawful for the House to pass the Address. It was a matter within the discretion of the House. The sufficiency and regularity of the petition might be established before the Committee, but before the House proceeded to exercise its discretion in putting a constituency upon its trial, he thought it eminently proper that they should have the deliverance on the point of that Judicial Committee which was composed of the leading lawyers and most experienced parliamentarians.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said it did not strike him that it was within the functions of the Committee to recommend the propriety or non-propriety of passing the Address. It seemed to him to be arrogating to the Committee the power of the whole House.

MR. MILLS said he did not see what other course could be taken, under the circumstances. At present there was no such Statute on the Statute-books of England. Before the adoption of the Controverted Elections Act, similar petitions were left to the Attorney-General to enquire into the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the petition rested, and to advise the House. Now, in this case, they had no evidence before them as to the accuracy of these allegations. They did not even know whether the petitioners themselves were genuine bond fide voters. Beyond the allegation thus made they had no means of judging as to how far they were right, supposing the petition to have been made in good faith and signed by bond fide voters. They had no means of correctly forming opinions as to the applicability of the law to the facts on which the petition was based. In England the Attorney-General made the necessary enquiries and the House ruled on his representations as to whether a commission should issue in compliance with the prayer of the petition or not. Here they had no officer of the Crown to advise them; and he was of opinion that there was nothing else for the House to do than to refer the petition and the motion for an Address to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as recommended in the motion of his hon. friend beside him. That Committee was possessed to some extent of judicial functions, and could perform those duties which, in England, were performed by the Law Officers of the Crown; they could report to this House whether the evidence upon which these petitioners had prayed for a Commission was sufficient to justify the House in complying with the prayer of the petition which had been presented to the House.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he thought his hon. friend was entirely mistaken as to the position in which this petition stood, because the Statute had provided the evidence upon which the House should act. He admitted that the petition properly went before the Committee to enquire into its validity, if necessary, and the sufficiency of the allegation it contained. The only doubt which he entertained was, whether it would be within the functions of the Committee to express any opinion to the House as to the propriety of the course which the House should pursue on finding the petition sufficient. He desired to ask his hon. friend whether—and his acquaintance with the rules of the House would relieve him at once—the Committee was competent to report in favour of an Address, or otherwise, because this being an amendment to his hon. friend's motion, that an Address be passed, it appeared to him a difficulty might occur.

MR. HOLTON: No, I do not think there can be any difficulty in that regard.

MR. McCARTHY said the same difficulty had occurred to him. If the Committee reported in favour of an Address, then it might be urged that the House had disposed of the matter by the amendment.

MR. MILLS said there was a similar motion last Session to expel the Speaker. The amendment carried, but it did not override the motion.

MR. HOLTON said there was no objection to adding to the amendment, "and, if they saw fit, to report an Address."

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Very well.

ST. JOHN PENITENTIARY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. WELDON moved for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Local Government of New Brunswick relating to the claims of the city and county of St. John, and the other counties in that Province, to send prisoners under sentence for less than two years to the St. John Penitentiary, and all other correspondence on the subject; together with any representations and memorials from the Government of New Brunswick and the General Sessions of the city and county of St. John, and any reports made upon the subject; and all minutes in Council relating thereto. He said that in 1838 the city and county of St. John erected a House of Correction for the confinement of prisoners sent from the sessions of the city and county courts. In 1841, the Province, seeing the benefits of the institution, asked that the privilege of confining prisoners therein be extended to the whole Province, and an arrangement was accordingly made with the city and county of St. John by which the Province offered to contribute certain amounts, and from that time prisoners were sent there from all over the Province to the House of Correction, which was thereafter called the Provincial Penitentiary. Certain monies were paid by the Province to reimburse the county; but, by the Act which was passed, transferring it, it was provided that all vagabonds, rogues, and others convicted of minor offences, for a term not exceeding forty days, should be sent to the Penitentiary. There had been some difficulty in finding out what arrangement had been made, as most of the parties who had taken an active part in the matter had departed this life. In the year 1852, the city and county of St. John applied to the Legislature for power to make an assessment for £2,000, which was owing by the city and county, and which had not been provided for by the Province or reimbursed the county. This £2,000 was paid by the city and county of St. John, and, at the same time, it was a part of the contract that this Penitentiary should be made use of as formerly. He found that the same provision was made by chapter 91 of the Revised Statutes, and it existed until the time of the union of the Provinces. By the Act of Union, this Penitentiary came into the possession of the Dominion Government, and, by the same Act, the debts and liabilities of the Province were assumed by the Dominion of Canada. By the Act of 1868, and the subsequent Act of 1869, it was provided that no prisoners should be imprisoned in the Penitentiary for less than two years. Exception, however, was made in regard to the Province of New Brunswick from the operation of the Act, in regard to this class of prisoners up to 1874. In 1874, that time was extended to 1876; and, in 1876, the exception was continued to 1878. During the last Session, an Act was passed by which that was extended to 1879. He presumed the Penitentiary which was being erected at Dorchester, N. B., for the three Maritime Provinces, would soon be finished, and the prisoners transferred to that institution, and then the question would arise as to what course the Government would take regarding the short-term prisoners. Of course, it was contended, on behalf of the city and county, that this was a contract between the Province of New Brunswick and the county, and it was a liability which, in point of equity, the Dominion had a right to assume, and for which the city and county had a right to receive payment. It was a matter which, he believed, ought to be looked into. It was a matter of reciprocity as between the two parties, which might be referred to the Supreme Court, if the Dominion Government should not feel themselves at liberty to act until the legal rights in the case, between the city and county of St. John, could be ascertained. As the time when the present Act expired was fast approaching, he hoped some immediate action would be taken in the matter.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said there could be no objection to bringing down the papers asked for by his hon. friend. He would, however, suggest to him whether, in order to obtain all the papers which might perhaps be necessary to effect his object, he ought not to have amended his motion by adding "reports and minutes of Council," because his apprehension, from the slight knowledge he had of the facts of the case, was that one or more representations of the case had been made by parties representing the city of St. John and by the Dominion Government, and, if he recollected rightly, a minute or minutes of Council respecting the relation of the parties to each other were on file, and, perhaps, it would be better for his hon. friend to amend his motion so as to get all the information. He believed his hon. friend had stated the facts of the case correctly. It had grown out of the fact that at a very early period of the history of St. John, what was now the Penitentiary was the common jail; and, instead of the higher class of long-term criminals only being imprisoned, as in Penitentiaries in the other Provinces, it had been made the receptacle for all classes of prisoners. St. John now claimed that the Dominion should maintain in the Penitentiary, as criminals maintained by the Dominion, those that, in other Provinces, were maintained in jails, as municipal prisoners, by the Provinces themselves, or by the municipalities in which the prisoners were placed. The question had been very fully discussed by the representatives of St. John, and by the Department of Justice, on the part of the Dominion Government. His apprehension was, that, if his hon. friend would amend his motion in the way he (Mr. McDonald) suggested the information would be more explicit than by simply bringing down the correspondence on the subject.

Mr. WELDON said he had no objection to amending the motion as suggested.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. YEO moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Prince Edward Island, and other local Governments in the Dominion, and the Dominion Government, relative to the appropriation and distribution of the fishery award. He said that the Imperial Government had paid Newfoundland nearly a million of dollars of the fishery award; and the people of Prince Edward Island, he contended, had as good a right to a portion of that award as Newfoundland. Their inshore and coast fisheries were quite as good as those of Newfoundland, and, in some respects, better, as the Halifax Commission had ascertained. Their coasts were the best fishing-grounds in the Dominion. The assent of Prince Edward Island was required to the fishery provisions of the Washington Treaty, by Article XXXIII of that Treaty. The Island was, therefore, an independent Province at the time, and a party to the treaty. The Province did assent to it, by an Act of its Legislature, passed in 1872, and was clearly entitled to a proportion of the money awarded as compensation for its fisheries. It would have had its share of the award, if the Commission had adjudicated, as it ought to have done, before the Island entered the Dominion. The people of the Island asked no more than their rights in this matter, rights which they had not given up when they consented to join the Dominion. It had been stated that they would get their share in breakwaters, lighthouses, harbour improvements and public works of this sort. This, the people of the Island were opposed to, for they knew that by the terms of Confederation it was stipulated that all such works should be constructed and maintained by the general Government. It was understood and desired that Prince Edward Island's share of the award should be set apart for the benefit of its inhabitants. The people of the Island had been told by the present Minister of Marine that they never would get justice done them until the Island had a representative in the Cabinet. He was now a member of the Government, and it was to be hoped that he would use his influence and exert himself to have justice done them in this matter of the fishery award with as little delay as possible. With regard to the question of the mode of fishing in the waters of the Maritime Provinces, he agreed with what had been said in the early part of the day on that subject. He considered that the use of seines was ruinous to our fisheries. If not prohibited, the fishermen of Prince Edward Island might as well leave the country. Considering the disadvantages they lay under from their isolated position, being almost cut off from the rest of the world for six months of the year, and the great loss they sustained by the surrender of their fishing interests to the Americans, he hoped that the Government would look favourably on their claims and accord to them their rights.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in seconding the resolution, said that he hoped any correspondence with the other Maritime Provinces on this subject might also be brought down. This was a question of great importance to the people of those Provinces. The Washington Treaty had given away the people's rights to the fisheries along 3,000 miles of coast line, and, in the speeches made here to-day, members had learned the result of that treaty to those fisheries, that the Americans were destroying them wholesale. Those fisheries had already done something for the Dominion. Before the present First Minister arrived from Washington, many hon. members would recollect the opposition that arose to this treaty, and that it had been difficult to pass the fishery clauses through the House; and not until the Imperial Parliament had guaranteed the interest on a loan of two and half millions sterling, were they agreed to. That guarantee saved for the Dominion, calculating the thirty years of the loan, $2,300,000, which had not been expended for the benefit of the fishermen of the Lower Provinces, but for the people of the west, in the enlargement of the canals along the St. Lawrence, and on the Pacific Railroad. Under the treaty, the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces were given away, while the western or inland and British Columbia fisheries still belonged to the Dominion. Now, for the next ten or fifteen years as during the past five, the larger proportion of expenditure for Public Works would be in the west. It seemed the desire of successive Governments to develop the west, from which the eastern Provinces were receiving no benefit, while the money paid over for their fisheries, they were told, was not to be divided among them, while, at the expiration of the treaty, the fisheries would be almost destroyed. They of the Lower Provinces claimed, therefore, that this money should be expended in a general way for the benefit of the fishermen and their resources. This was not a sectional but a national desire, because, if their fisheries were destroyed, one of the most important national industries would be exhausted. As to the mode of expending the award, he did not take the view of the last speaker (Mr. Yeo) in favour of outlays on breakwaters, harbours and so forth. A certain portion should be funded, and the interest kept, in case the Washington Treaty was extended ten years, and the fisheries clauses continued, for the benefit of the fishermen who would be injured by them; this money might be used in the protection of our fish, and the improvement of our river fisheries, a most important interest in Nova Scotia. Along its coast those fisheries were destroyed, particularly in his, the Shelburne, district. A portion of the money spent in the improvement of the river fisheries, would benefit the deep sea fisheries also, which depended largely upon them. He hoped the Government would expend this money for the benefit of the Lower Provinces, which, he had reason to believe, it was the desire of the late Government to do.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) : There is no correspondence between the Local Government of the Lower Provinces and the Dominion Government, with respect to the distribution of this award.

MR. FORTIN said he thought the question was very important, since it meant the disposal of $5,500,000. By the action of the Government on this matter, the people would be able to judge whether the money was justly or unjustly disposed of. He did not entirely agree with the hon. gentlemen who had just spoken as regarded the manner in which the money should be distributed. Before stating his opinion on the question, he would read a few remarks which he had addressed some months ago to a large audience in Quebec, and which were a resumé of his ideas and opinions on the subject. He had said, in speaking of the telegraph system and the semaphore system :—

“With regard to the ways and means, he would say that part of the expense of the scheme could be taken from the fishery award, meaning that portion of it intended to benefit the fisheries. That award, he must say, for the twelve years' lease by the Americans of our fisheries, over an extent of 3,160 miles of coast, represented the dearest interests of the fishery population of the Dominion, and should be applied for the encouragement and development of the fisheries in the manner best suited to supply the pressing needs of those engaged in that important industry, such as an effective system of protection of the fisheries, the building of piers, breakwaters, and other important improvements to benefit the fisheries and the fishermen. He would not recommend the laying out of the capital, but the sum might go into the Treasury as a special fund, and the interest applied to the object above stated. The Americans do not seem very much inclined to renew a lease of our fisheries under the same conditions since they paid under protest, and it might be that no treaty would be hereafter made for granting permission to the Americans to use our fisheries. In that case we would require a number of steamers to protect our fisheries by excluding the Americans from our municipal waters, and a large amount of money would be required for that object. It is, therefore, a wise precaution to have the means in readiness. It must be remembered that it was the giving up to the Americans of Canadian fisheries from 1854 to 1866, that secured their Reciprocity Treaty which was so profitable to the commercial and agricultural portions of the population of the Dominion, while the Canadian fishermen received nothing in return, but the contested advantage of selling their fish in the States.”

He held the same opinions and advanced the same pretensions still. From 1854 to 1866, there was a treaty, which gave permission to the American fishermen to fish in British waters in common with our fishermen. This giving away of the fisheries of Canada secured for the agricultural and commercial population of this country extensive advantages, which already brought into the country a large amount of prosperity, and this prosperity was bought from the Americans at the price, he might say, of the rights and privileges of our fishermen. What had the fishermen received in exchange for this twelve years' prosperity acquired by the other portions of the population at their expense? They got nothing at all but abuse; not a cent to erect a lighthouse, or breakwater, or pier, or to help them in any way; whilst the farmers, the merchants and manufacturers were making large profits. The poor fisherman had to carry on his arduous labours in the midst of danger, without a helping hand to come to his succour. He (Dr. Fortin) knew that very well. He was then protecting the fisheries of Canada, and could speak well of what was taking place. True, there existed a protection to the fisheries, but that was before the Reciprocity Treaty came into force. Along the coast of Gaspé, from Bic to Gaspé Basin, a distance of about 150 miles, there was not a port or harbour; then from Gaspé Basin to Paspébiac, there was not a harbour for the poor fisherman. When the wind blew on shore, he was obliged to draw his heavy boat ashore in the midst of pouring rain on many a stormy night, while the Government, by building breakwaters or piers, could afford him shelter. It was quite true that, during these twelve years, during which the fisheries were given away to the Americans to procure advantage for other portions of the population, the fisheries received nothing in return; but, on the contrary, had to suffer the destruction of their most precious fisheries.

The treaty then became abrogated, and by and by, difficulties arose between England and the United States, and to settle them, this question of fisheries was brought up, and helped very much to arrange the larger matters in dispute. Every one knew that this treaty, even with the award of four and a half millions, could not be of any advantage to the regular fisherman, nor to the advantage of our fisheries at present, much less in the future. If this money were not spent to repair the injury done our fisheries, and to help our fishermen, whose arduous occupation was still more difficult now than formerly, who were obliged to go longer distances, to leave earlier in the spring and later in the fall, the fish being less plentiful than formerly, great injustice would be done. He would not want the capital of this money to be spent, but it might be set apart as a special fund, the interest to be expended yearly for the benefit of the fisheries. They knew that this treaty would be abrogated; the Americans had signified their willingness to abrogate it. What would be the duty of Canada afterwards? It would be to protect the fisheries which had never yet been efficiently protected; and, in order to do so, the Government would have to get a certain number of steamers fitted for that service. It would easily be understood that a large number would be required, when the extent of coast to be protected was taken into consideration, no less than 3,160 miles, greater than from Montreal to Liverpool. Either our fisheries had to be given to the Americans as before 1854, our fishermen ruined and obliged to leave the country, or they must be protected efficiently, and to do so the interest of the whole money would be required. He did not claim that as an absolute right, but was it not equitable and just that men who came to settle on those coasts, believing the surrounding waters were to remain British waters forever, who had built their houses and fishing establishments there, who had put a large capital in the fishing industry, and who sold their rights, he should say their birthrights, to the Americans, who would enjoy the same rights as they did, should be compensated? He would like to know how the people of the Ottawa region would like the Government to give to the Americans the liberty to cut timber in our forests at the same time as British lumbermen here. There would be a rebellion in the Ottawa region if such a thing were attempted; yet the giving up of our fisheries involved exactly the same principle. These waters were supposed to be British, and, if people came and settled by them, bought farms, erected buildings and establishments, and some of those had been erected at a cost of half a million dollars, and then Americans were allowed to compete with them, these people became ruined, and were obliged to go to the States and be the servants of the Americans. He expected our present Government would do them justice, and see that the money which came from the fisheries would return to the fisheries.

MR. BUNSTER said he would not have detained this House a moment, but, hearing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state there had been no correspondence on the subject, he rose to protest against the injustice done to British Columbia. They were informed by the hon. member for Shelburne that the money had been expended in building the Pacific Railway. That was news to him so far as British Columbia was concerned, for, in British Columbia, he might tell the hon. gentleman, not a single sod had yet been turned. Notwithstanding all the promises made, and the talk that British Columbia had received some of her dues, not a single advantage, but rather disadvantages, had resulted to that Province from the treaty. He hoped the Minister of Marine would take the matter into serious consideration, and send them out a gentleman capable of taking care of their fisheries, and not foist on them another man from Ontario, as the late Government did, who knew nothing about fish, the ways of the Indians, or the interests of the Province.

MR. FLYNN said the question involved in the motion made by the hon. member for Prince, was of very great importance to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, whose interests were alone affected by American citizens having the right, under the Washington Treaty, to fish in our inshore waters. Under that treaty, the same rights and privileges were granted to them as our own fishermen enjoyed. It was considered at the time that this arrangement would work unfairly and unequally; that, in giving away our valuable inshore fisheries, we were not getting an equivalent for them; that the free admission of fish and fish-oil into the American market, and the right given to us of fishing in American waters, was not an equivalent. The latter was of no advantage whatever to our population, as it was well known the American inshore fisheries had been for a long time valueless. It was not expected that our fishermen would leave their valuable fisheries to go where fish were very scarce. In that view it was considered that the fishermen of this Dominion were entitled to compensation, and the matter was left to arbitration. The questions came before the Fishery Commission which sat at Halifax last summer twelvemonths, our claim for compensation being $12,000,000, and that of Newfoundland $2,800,000, or a total of $14,800,000. In the discussion before the Commission, the other advantages besides the outshore fishing enjoyed by the Americans, such as getting bait, and other things, were excluded from consideration, and the award was made entirely on the value of giving the right to fish within the three-mile limit. The amount awarded, $5,500,000, proved conclusively the value of our inshore fisheries to Americans, and it also afforded undeniable proof of their importance to our own fishermen. If these fisheries were exclusively our own, the great quantity caught in these waters by American fishermen would not enter into competition with our fish, we would, to a great extent, control the American markets, particularly in the better qualities of mackerel, because a sufficiency of these fish could not be taken in American waters, or outside the three-mile limit, to supply the American people. It was, therefore, quite evident that the equal privileges given by the treaty to American citizens must interfere very materially with our fishermen. Much of our inshore fishery was prosecuted in boats. As a rule, they were not well fitted out, and were quite unable to successfully compete with the superior craft and outfit of the American fishermen. If this award was a just one—and he had not the slightest doubt that it was—then it was given in compensation for loss sustained by the Dominion. The question naturally arose, who was it that sustained this loss? What class, what industry was affected by the rights conceded to American fishermen under the Washington Treaty? Somebody must have sustained loss, and he could not see what class it was, unless it was the fishermen. It was certainly not the farmers, mechanics or manufacturers, or any other class in the Province of Ontario. They had no interest in the fisheries of the Dominion. They had neither capital, men nor vessels engaged in it, and they were not in any way affected by the granting or withholding the privilege the American fishermen now enjoyed. It was, therefore, quite clear to him that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces should get the benefit of this award. It was their industry that suffered by the equal privileges given to American fishermen. He was apprehensive that this privilege would eventually be the means of destroying their valuable inshore fisheries. They had already destroyed an important fishery in the Gulf, between Cape Chatte and Gaspé. The halibut fishery was a profitable one to the inhabitants of that district, but it had been completely destroyed by the American fishermen. Ample evidence was given before the Fishery Commission to prove this fact. The mackerel fishing in the fall was one of our most valuable fisheries, and it had also been injured. These fish left the North Bay early in October, trimming the shores of Cape Breton before going into deep water. But they were kept in the bay by the bait and feed given to them by the American fishermen until it got too late in the season and too rough for their boat fishery. This fishery, owing to this, had been for some years past a failure. From these facts he was sure it could not be doubted who had sustained the loss. It was most certainly the fishermen of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and they were the people who should get the benefit of the award. This proposition appeared to him quite plain and intelligible. This money should not be absorbed into the Dominion Treasury to be used for general purposes; it should be appropriated exclusively for the use and benefit of the fishermen. Newfoundland had secured her share of the award, one million of dollars. Was Nova Scotia to be treated worse because they were in the Confederation? Would their fishermen be made to feel that they were less worthy of consideration than the fishermen of that Colony? He trusted not; he hoped this question would receive from the Government the consideration it deserved. The fishermen had much to contend with in prosecuting their dangerous calling. The whole southern coast of Nova Scotia, from Cape Sable to Cape North, was much exposed to Atlantic storms, affording, with few exceptions, but little shelter to the fishermen, whose occupation was at all times attended with danger, but particularly so in the spring and fall. On many fishing grounds, they were compelled to haul up their boats whenever the wind came from the south or eastward, and very often were unable to launch them, even after the storm was over, until the heavy Atlantic swell, which broke against the rocks on that iron-bound coast, subsided. Having to fish from these exposed situations caused them to lose many days during the fishing season. He did not wish to dictate to the Government the way in which this money should be appropriated for the fishermen's benefit, but he would suggest that a portion of it should be applied to harbour improvements and the building of breakwaters. If it were expended in this manner, much shelter and protection would be given where there was none at present. While other industries in this country had been encouraged and protected both by Provincial and Federal legislation, while large sums had been spent and grants of public money had been given to encourage and promote the agricultural industry of this Dominion, fishermen alone had received no helping hand. The National Policy, which they were now so anxiously looking for, and which they were told would give additional protection to the different industries of this country, could not in any way benefit the fisherman. On the contrary, it would add to the burthens he had already to bear in the increased taxation he would submit to. It would increase the cost of his living, for he would have to pay more for what he consumed in his family, or used in the prosecution of his business. He was told that the coal and milling interests of this Dominion were to be protected by having a duty imposed on coal and flour. Were those industries more important than the fishing interests? Were they operated by a class of men more worthy the consideration of the Government than the poor and toil-worn fishermen of this Dominion? He thought they were not, and he trusted the Government would entertain the same opinion. The exports of fish were very large, being a tenth of our total exports. It was one of our most valuable industries, giving employment to a great many men and vessels engaged in the business. The product of the fishermen's labour brought a large amount of money into the country annually. They were consumers of a large quantity of dutiable goods, and contributed more to the revenue than any other class. The productions of the fisheries added largely to the exports, the trade, and wealth of the Dominion. He knew of none in this country who were more worthy of the consideration of the Government, and he was satisfied there was no other industry more deserving of their fostering care. He trusted the award would be distributed in a manner that would satisfy the fishermen who, in his judgment, were solely entitled to it.

Mr. OGDEN said that, in regard to the discussion that had taken place with respect to the destruction of the fisheries, he could endorse everything that had been said. He desired, however, to state that the Americans were not alone to blame for the destruction of our fish. The fish were greatly destroyed by our own fishermen—not only by the use of purse-seines, but by the use of fish trawls and traps. He desired to state that fishermen under the former reign of Sir John A. Macdonald did receive protection. Before the Washington Treaty, their shores were protected from Americans by armed cruisers. This was done at a large expense, and, if he mistook not, Ontario had contributed as largely to the support of those cruisers as did

Nova Scotia or Quebec. He believed that the same Government which protected their fisheries in former years, was equally able to protect them in the future, and he would not wish to say or do anything that would embarrass the Government, in which he had perfect confidence. He had also perfect confidence in the body of gentlemen who supported them, from the Upper as well as the Lower Provinces, and that they would deal justly and generously with the fishermen. He was satisfied that, when the Estimates were brought down, the Government would show that they were disposed to deal fairly and liberally with the Maritime Provinces. He had stated to the electors of his constituency that, as we had received an award of five and a half million dollars, the fishermen of the coast of Nova Scotia would receive their share. He stated that, either in building breakwaters, or in some other way, the Government would judiciously and wisely expend the money. He stood pledged to this, and, if he found that the Government would not do justice to his constituency, he would no longer support that Government. He felt himself perfectly independent. He believed it was the duty of every man to support a Government in everything that was right, but that he should not support a Government which would neglect the interests of his constituency. The moment the Government sacrificed the interests of the fishermen, he would be compelled to be an opponent of that Government.

Mr. YEO asked if there was any correspondence on the subject between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion Government.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): None.

Mr. YEO said that he had not brought this matter up in a party spirit, and he would support any Government that would do justice to Prince Edward Island, the Maritime Provinces generally, and the fishermen particularly.

Mr. DALY said he felt the subject was one of so much importance, not only to the Dominion at large, but to the constituency which he had the honour to represent, that he could not refrain from offering a few remarks to the House. He held that the fish trade was an industry upon which hinged the prosperity of the whole Province of Nova Scotia. If the fisheries did not succeed, the trade of Nova Scotia was materially injured. The trade of the West Indies was affected by it, the exports being smaller, and the productive resources of the country were thereby materially diminished. The award of five millions and a-half of dollars was peculiarly an award made in repayment to this Dominion of the loss they sustained under the Washington Treaty, by giving the use of their fisheries to American fishermen. It was a direct loss to the fishermen themselves, who now had only a right, in common with their neighbours, to the fisheries in which they formerly enjoyed a monopoly, and, as had been stated, the amount of $5,500,000 did not represent the whole actual loss. They had also been relieved, as a Government, of the charge of protecting their shore fisheries. He thought it was the duty of the Government to give this matter their earliest consideration. It was a part of the policy of the Government to protect the industries of the country, and he was very glad to hear the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) concede the fact that, at all events, the fishing interests of Nova Scotia and the Dominion should receive protection. It was, therefore, with much pleasure that he urged upon the consideration of the Government that they should concede, as far as possible, to the Maritime Provinces, a just share of the benefits to be derived from the sum which had been paid into the Treasury in consequence of the award of the Fishery Commission at Halifax.

Mr. FLYNN said he desired, in explanation to the last speaker, to say that he did not ask for any protection of the fisheries.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): No; because they have it already.

Mr. FLYNN said they had not protection in the light protection was looked upon by hon. gentlemen opposite. What he said was that, when the National Policy was brought down, as it was expected to be brought down, it would further increase the burthen of taxation upon the fishermen. His argument went in the direction of showing that the fishermen, as a class, were entitled to the award.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) said the duty that was imposed by the American Government of two dollars a barrel on mackerel, prior to the Washington Treaty, fell altogether on the fishermen of the Lower Provinces, and the probability was that, when that Treaty ceased to exist, the Americans, in the interests of their own fishermen, would again impose a similar duty, which would fall directly on the fishermen of the Lower Provinces, and would not, in the smallest degree, be felt by the people of Ontario. Therefore, he thought the liberal and large-hearted people of Ontario would see the justice of giving a fair share of the fishery award to the people to whom it rightly belonged, the people of the Lower Provinces. In this way they would, in some small way, compensate them for the infringement by American fishermen upon their rights. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would see its way clear, and he believed it would, to a proper and fair distribution of the award amongst the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. Fiset said that he was pleased to see that the motion, as made by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Yeo), had raised such an interesting discussion, the effect of which would be to prove to this House that the Canadian fishermen in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence were far from being satisfied with the manner in which the Government intended to divide the sum paid over by the United States Government as a compensation for the damages that the fishermen had sustained and were yet sustaining. He had been particularly pleased with the remarks of the hon. member for Gaspé, who, by his long experience, had, as every one knew, acquired a perfect knowledge of all matters respecting the fisheries. In the first place, it was asked what interests had most suffered from the Treaty of Washington. The answer was easily given, and naturally presented itself. The interests of the fishermen had been attacked in the first place, and our fisheries being thereby rendered less productive, our commerce had also suffered. The moment that the Americans were allowed to come and fish within the three-mile limit, our fishermen were incapable to compete with them. Until then, the latter, seeing the abundance of the fish, had been content with the use of lines, and they could then earn a livelihood for themselves and families, and considerably benefit, at the same time, the export trade of the country. After the arrival of the American fishermen in our waters, as they made use of seines and other apparatus too costly for our fishermen, the latter could not compete with them. Moreover, the fish, being destroyed in such great quantities, was becoming continually scarcer. Formerly, for instance, both mackerel and cod were very abundant between Matane and Gaspé. To-day mackerel had almost entirely disappeared from that part of the coast, and cod-fishing was not nearly so productive as formerly. On the north shore, from Betsiamis to Mingan, the same effects had been felt, and were nearly as disastrous. And, instead of protecting this class of our population, who worked so hard, and who were every day exposed to new dangers, the Government had taken from them the privileges of fishing in our principal rivers, which were farmed out to strangers, for the most part, who prosecuted fishing as a pastime. This, he repeated, was greatly to the detriment of the population of these localities, and of all Canadian fishermen. As a first consequence of the privilege granted to the Americans, our fishermen were obliged to take up another calling, and, from fishermen, they became farmers. It might, perhaps, be urged that they had gained thereby. He wished that it was so. Unfortunately, the greater number of them, lacking the means of purchasing good land, were obliged to settle on land near by and at their disposal; and it was known that, in that part of the Province of Quebec, the land along the shores of St. Lawrence was barren, and almost entirely unfit for cultivation, so that our fishermen had, for the most part, remained poor. He believed, therefore, that it would be but doing justice to this class of our population to appropriate the interest of the indemnity paid by the American Government for public improvements in the different Provinces where fishermen had suffered. In the Province of Quebec, for instance, an excellent means of indemnifying the fishermen would be to improve the maritime road between the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, the road being the natural outlet of the county of Gaspé and the lower part of the county of Kimouski. He would say no more, as the discussion on this subject had already been continued at some length.

Mr. FLYNN.

MR. HOUDE said that he regretted to be obliged to differ with several hon. members who had just spoken. He had no doubt but that these hon. members, when they spoke outside of this House or upon other subjects, gave expression to large views. But, when they rose in this House in order to forward local interests, they often gave expression to rather narrow ideas, so much so that one would be led to believe that these ideas were moulded in herrings. Much had been said about the fishermen of the Gulf, and he saw that their interests were well defended in this House. But, in order to advocate the rights of the fishermen, it was not necessary to sin against logic. He thought that these hon. gentlemen had shown more zeal than logic. The premises they had laid down seemed to him false, and, if they were false, the conclusions they drew were equally false. He would beg to ask these hon. gentlemen whether the fisheries were public or private property,—whether they belonged to the whole people or to certain individuals? He was ready to admit that the Washington Treaty had done particular harm to the interests of the people along our sea-board, but, as they suffered from harm done to a public property that they were making use of, and not to a private property, it did not seem to him to necessarily follow that the money paid by the United States, as a compensation for the temporary privilege that we had granted them to fish in common with our fishermen, should be distributed between certain sections of the country instead of going into the Treasury of the Dominion. He had no ill-will against the Maritime Provinces; on the contrary, he would always be ready to second their representatives in all their just and logical claims. But this manner of discussing public interests seemed to him to be of a sectional character, and the less the House had of sectionalism in its debates the better it would be, he thought, for the Dominion. For instance, an hon. member (Mr. Robertson, Shelburne) had complained that more public works were carried on in other Provinces than in his own, and he had endeavoured to draw an argument from that in support of his thesis that the law of compensation required that the Maritime Provinces should be indemnified in their turn, and that this was an excellent opportunity of giving them the benefit of the $5,000,000 remaining from the sum granted by the Halifax International Commission. It should not be supposed that public works were only profitable to that part of the country where they were carried on. It very often happened, on the contrary, that canals or railways were built in one part of the country for the benefit of another. Thus, the hon. members from the Maritime Provinces, who did not, any more than anyone else, live on fish alone, would be very glad, in a near future, to have the canals widened and the Pacific Railway and its branches built, in order to bring to their markets the products of the West, such as cattle, grain, and especially flour; and, in their turn, to be able to send their products to the Western Provinces. Allusion had also been made to the Washington Treaty. If he said a word on that subject, it was because he had remarked, since the beginning of the Session, that hon. members on the other side had often renewed the attack upon this point, and had sought to make a little political capital out of this question. He would not deny that it was the Americans who had most largely profited by it. But, in order to fully appreciate this Treaty, it would be well to revert to the grave circumstances under which it had been concluded, with the participation of the right hon. the leader of the present Government, and approved of by Parliament. At that time there existed a strong feeling of uneasiness between the United States and Great Britain—the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries was strained to the utmost.

There existed in the United States an influential body of public men who were anxious to pick a quarrel with England and to indemnify themselves, as they said, by taking Canada for the damage to their country by the Alabama and other privateers, for whose depredations they held England responsible. In the New England States, there was General B. F. Butler; in the Western States, Mr. Z. Chandler; and at Washington, at the head of the Republican party then in power, Senator Sumner, the President of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and very influential throughout the whole country; all these men were striving to bring about a rupture with England. It was well known that, if war had broken out, Canada would have been the fighting ground. The right hon. leader of the Government believed that it was preferable not to press certain just claims that Canada had, rather than allow this danger to remain longer hanging over our heads, provided that this could be done without sacrificing our national honour. This idea of settling international difficulties by arbitration was a great idea and worthy of occupying the attention of every public man. This idea was not new; a great and good king, Henry IV, had given expression to it, in order to settle amicably, without having recourse to arms, the conflicting claims of France, Spain and Austria, to the north of Italy. This idea, if put in practice, would free humanity from much suffering. Hon. members had urged that it was necessary to protect the fishing interests. He was, undoubtedly, in favour of such a protection, and he thought that, to a certain extent, this protection had been granted when, by the Washington Treaty, the American markets had been opened to our fishermen. There were, moreover, the public works that were carried on each year by the Dominion, for the maintenance and improvement of the fisheries. As to the useless destruction of fish, this could not be exclusively laid to the charge of the Washington Treaty, for an hon. member from the Maritime Provinces had stated this afternoon, in speaking on another question, that the Americans destroyed immense quantities of fish by means of seines and traps outside of the three-mile limit, and that would show that, without the Washington Treaty, this senseless destruction of such a fine source of wealth would have taken place, at least in part. He thought that, instead of indulging in useless recriminations, it would be far more practical and reasonable to draw the attention of the Administration to this matter, and urge upon them the necessity of coming to an understanding with the American Government, in order to devise some means of preventing the destruction of this source of wealth so profitable to both countries, by making and putting in force stringent regulations for this purpose. That would be the best protection that could be afforded to the fishing interests, and under the circumstances the most easily granted.

MR. HACKETT said he was sorry the hon. member for Prince, Prince Edward Island, (Mr. Yeo) had made the statement he had. It appeared he had no better authority than the Governor's speech in Prince Edward Island, and he (Mr. Hackett) regretted this because the people of Prince Edward Island had a right to a part of this award. The island of Prince Edward being a separate Province with a separate form of Government at the time the Washington Treaty was entered into, had become a separate contracting party to that Treaty. They maintained that American fishermen had the right of fishing in their waters for two years previous to the entrance of Prince Edward Island into the Union; and had they no right to compensation for that? Then again, what right had they, simply because they had entered the Confederation, to be deprived of their share of the Washington Treaty award? Their entering into the Dominion of Canada had not prejudiced in the smallest degree their right to a separate portion of the award. What right had Ontario in this matter? These particular clauses in the Washington Treaty were placed in it for the purpose of saying that the Americans would possess certain privileges regarding fishing in the waters of the Bay of St. Lawrence, and their exercising those privileges, coming down to the Bay each year in large numbers to prosecute the fishing, had materially affected the prosperity of our own fishermen who should receive a large portion of the award for the loss thus sustained. It had been said that the fishermen of British Columbia had been neglected in the Washington treaty. He would say that the American fishermen did not want to go there, and it was not necessary for that Province to be included in the Treaty. Around the Maritime Provinces the fish the American fishermen required abounded, and they had been in the habit of fishing there, where they knew they could be caught in large numbers, and now they had been told that the people of these Provinces had no special right to this fish. They had just as good a right in that respect as the people in this Province had to the lumbering interest. They claimed that they were a separate contracting party when their delegates went to confer with the Dominion Government, and, therefore, that their portion of the award should be considered specially. He had every confidence that the present Government would do them justice in the matter.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion, inasmuch as there is no correspondence.

DISMISSAL OF QUEBEC GOVERNMENT BY THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Mr. Speaker, before placing in your hands the motion I gave notice of a few days ago, I desire to offer to the House, and to the country, a few remarks on the step I am taking, and the motives which have led me to take it. And, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, in order to commend myself to the indulgence of the House, I promise to do my very best to keep up to the level of my subject, that is to say, to treat it with becoming dignity and moderation. The subject is most important in itself, and vastly so in its consequences. There is one thing I desire to say distinctly, at once. I would not have it thought that party spirit has been the motive of my resolution. No man shall charge me with having brought on this great question for party purposes. I am a party man; I am a Conservative, it is true; and the question involves the censuring, and probably the dismissal, in consequence of such censure, of a Liberal Lieutenant-Governor appointed in December, 1876, by a Liberal Administration. And all this just at the close of an election, during which party spirit naturally ran high. These three facts, of which I fully understand the bearing, render my position a most difficult one, at all events at a first glance and superficially. But this is not the true way for enlightened and thoughtful persons like the members of this House to view the matter. In the first place, party spirit does not mean blindness, exaggeration, want of patriotism. Such an idea would be the death of our free institutions. The object of political parties is not the personal advancement of their leaders and members. No, they have a nobler destiny, a far higher aim. Their end and object is to inculcate a body of ideas, doctrines and principles, social, economical and political, which they believe to be advantageous to the well-being of the people and the country. No; it is not a party question we are about to discuss. We are to deal with a great political principle, a great national question, which interests every Province in the Dominion. Let us treat it as though we were about to write a page of history to be recorded in the annals of our country for the instruction of our successors and of posterity. Through lack of experience and the necessary knowledge, I shall probably fall far short of the great task I have undertaken. But one thing I believe I perfectly well understand. I can assure this House I have long grasped the bearing of the coup d'état of the 2nd March, 1878, all the dangers, all the tempests it has laid up for us in the future, if this first attempt against our liberties be not firmly repressed, if its author be not severely punished. I naturally regret that this violation of the principle of responsible government should occur in the Province of Quebec, which I am proud to claim for my native Province. I regret that the bad example should originate there; but I must at the same time declare that I do not feel at all humiliated. It was said formerly of a great nation that it was rich enough to pay for its glory. The Province of Quebec, Lord Dufferin tells us—and all who have read our history know that in this his Lordship says but the truth—the Province of Quebec I say was the first of the British North American colonies to ask for responsible government. If one of its sons, unworthy to rank with the men of her glorious past, has sought to wrest that system of government, to attack it or set it aside, the

MR. MOUSSEAU.

Province of Quebec may be forgiven, when we call to mind her heroic struggles in the past. Moreover, Mr. Letellier is the first, and will probably be the last of the race of political violators. He will have no imitators, and party spirit, in its most detestable sense, will never be able to find him panegyrists. Mr. Speaker, I now come to the facts. I shall strive to be as brief and clear as possible. But, in order to have a proper understanding of the subject, we must go further back than the Session of 1878. The Province of Quebec had long wished for a railway on the north side of the St. Lawrence, in order to develop the vast resources of every kind with which its lands and forests and rivers teemed. From 1852 or 1853 to 1867, the question was repeatedly discussed; but for lack of means the agitation was fruitless, and confined to the continuing of Acts of incorporation, and the forming and reforming of companies destitute of capital. As will be remembered, our means were all being absorbed by the Grand Trunk, which was enriching the south side of the St. Lawrence and Upper Canada, while doing but little for the North Shore, where a numerous, robust, industrious population were anxiously awaiting their iron highway. Confederation, by giving to Quebec the exclusive ownership of the public lands, revived the hopes of the supporters of the Grand Trunk of the north. They were eager to participate in the tide of activity, and the great prosperity which the other railways, like arteries of generous life-blood, distributed in their course. In 1868 and 1869, the Quebec Parliament passed several Acts of incorporation for a railway from Quebec to Montreal, another from Montreal to St. Jerome, and a third from Montreal to Aylmer. At first, aid was confined to grants of land, and later in lands and money. When the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was decided upon, a twofold impetus was given to the desire for railways on the North Shore. This was due to the fact that the people of the Province of Quebec understood perfectly well the importance of connecting our railways on the North Shore with the Pacific by extending the road further, along the Ottawa. Having thus the shortest and most direct line, the Province of Quebec hoped to have its share of the profits and prosperity to result from the trade of the west and of Asia. Nevertheless, in the spring of 1875, the attempts to secure loans in England by private companies having utterly failed, other means had to be found to complete the railway already commenced between Montreal and Ottawa, and to build the railway from Quebec to Montreal, which was not yet begun. At that trying moment, the people of Quebec manifested a degree of patriotism and public spirit seldom equalled, and, setting aside political feeling, unanimously asked their Government to assume the position of the private companies, and build the railways with the public funds. There was not a dissenting voice in the matter. Liberals and Conservatives alike, in the press and in public meetings, pressed the matter on the Government. On this point I feel sure no one will contradict me. In June and July, the general elections took place for the Quebec House. The DeBoucherville Government appealed to the people on that question. They were victorious, having a majority of 23 to 25 in a House of 65 members, in support of their policy. About the same time, the Government made arrangements with private companies and corporations which had subscribed or voted bonuses, amongst others Quebec, Montreal and other municipalities. Montreal and Quebec, under certain conditions, accepted by the Government, promised to pay—as to the first, the balance of its million, and the second, the whole of its million. Fortified by these promises and guaranties, the Government went resolutely to work. They built rapidly, in fact very rapidly. When they met the House, on the 17th of January, 1878, they were in this position: They had incurred debt in order to build rapidly and satisfy the eager wishes of the people; the line, between Montreal, St. Jerome and Ottawa, was open to the public, but not quite finished, and was not, under the contracts, to be handed over to them until the 1st August then next; the line between Quebec and Montreal, was also already partly in operation, and the rest was to be finished and handed over in the autumn (1878); the cities of Quebec, Three Rivers and Montreal, and some other municipalities, refused to pay their subscriptions, giving reasons, for the most part futile, and some not bearing the stamp of good faith. Notwithstanding these notable disadvantages, the Government had to meet a deficit of but $81,000. The Government then, without any immediate revenue from its railways, had to meet the deficit mentioned; and these wealthy and powerful municipalities said, in effect: "Now that we have the railway, why should we pay? Let the Government pay." What was the duty of an honest Government under such circumstances? To compel the recalcitrant corporations and municipalities to pay, and levy a tax, at once light and equitably divided, in order to meet the deficit. Strictly speaking, the Treasurer of the Province of Quebec might have done as the Liberals are now doing in Quebec—take the capital set apart for railways to pay the interest of our debt in England. But the Hon. Mr. Church, a gentleman of high integrity and honour, had already been in London to secure a loan for the Province of Quebec. He found, when there, that the credit of the Province stood exceedingly high, and succeeded, without difficulty, in contracting a loan on most advantageous terms, as advantageous as any great nation, enjoying the highest credit in England, could obtain. But Mr. Church understands, as everyone understands, for it is nothing but common sense, that the best means for a nation, as it is for an individual, to maintain its credit, is to pay the interest of its debt with its own revenues, and not by drawing upon its capital and incurring fresh debt in order to pay off the interest of previous indebtedness. On the 29th January, 1878, the resolutions respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway—a name substituted for those of the private companies—were submitted to the Houses. I read from the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec:—

"Mr. Attorney-General Angers informed the House that His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, having taken communication of certain resolutions respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway, has been pleased to recommend them to the favourable consideration of the House."

"Mr. Attorney-General Angers, seconded by Mr. Treasurer Church, moved that this House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider the said resolutions."

I shall not try the patience of the House by going through the details of the Bill founded on those resolutions. I shall only say, briefly, that the Government, by that measure, took a most legitimate means of compelling payment by debtors of most just debts already in part overdue. These debts the Government had considered so good and sure that they set them down as an asset, when, in the fall Session of 1875, they passed the Act to secure the construction of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. That Bill declared in substance that when the Railway should have been completed with all depots, workshops, etc., in accordance with all conditions subscribed to by the Government in the agreements passed between them and the private companies and corporations, competent engineers were to report thereon to the Government. On that report, the Lieutenant Governor in Council was to decide, if he found it correct, that the corporations were to pay. After demand made, and delay granted, if the corporations persisted in their refusal to pay, the sheriff would receive orders to collect the amount in the usual way, just as a municipal council is empowered to do in the case of recalcitrant rate-payers. Was this new, odious and retroactive legislation as has been so broadly stated in certain quarters? Not at all. I have never seen nor read that a law is called odious, which is simply intended to compel an unwilling or dishonest debtor to pay his lawful debts. Here, in the case we are now considering, it is not the law that is odious, but the conduct of the corporations and municipalities encouraged in their obstinacy by Liberals who were ready to do anything to withstand or defeat a Conservative Government. Let it not be forgotten that the DeBoucherville Government had only engaged to build that railway, because it relied upon nearly two millions and a half of good subscriptions, of good promises made by corporations whose previous engagements had ensured the construction of that great trunk line. The Government loyally fulfilled its promises, and, when it has completed the roads and calls for instalments to replenish the impoverished public chest, it finds itself openly laughed at and hears adduced conditions which had been formerly abandoned. Were then all the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, to be subjected to a new tax of two millions and a half to relieve the rich municipalities, who, more than others, reaped the benefit of the railway? Was it a new law which compelled the corporations to abstain from wasting their subscriptions and their bonuses in costly long and ruinous suits? The Municipal Code of the Province of Quebec contains many similar provisions. The Act respecting the Consolidated Municipal Loan Fund contains similar provisions. The Legislature of Ontario, in 1873, passed an Act entitled "An Act respecting the Municipal Loan Fund debts, and respecting certain payments to Municipalities, 36 Vict., Chap. 47." In this Act again we see that the sheriff is substituted for the Courts of Justice, to compel debtors, who are not acting in good faith, to fulfil their engagements. This legislation is based upon an excellent principle, the public interest, which consists in avoiding difficulties, litigation and suits, which, in such cases especially, always enure to the detriment of the people, that is to say, of the greater number who are the least in a position to bear such burdens. It has also been stated that the law was detestable, because it was retroactive in its nature. In the ordinary vocabulary, there are often found certain words which are, in a way, stereotyped. They are booby-traps. The word in question has been greatly misused, as respects the legislation which we are considering. A settler leases a lot of land from the Government, upon the condition of paying thirty dollars a year for five years, and two hundred dollars at the end of six years, whereupon he is to become the absolute proprietor of the lot. At the end of five years he has laboured, he has cleared and improved the land considerably. He is ready to pay his two hundred dollars, and so obtain his final title. Parliament passes an Act compelling him to pay one thousand dollars instead of two hundred dollars. That would be a retroactive law, and an odious one, because it imposes a new burthen, onerous to a degree, and in no way provided for in the original contract. But for how long a time has the term retroactive and odious legislation been applied to a simple law which only compels a debtor to pay a lawful debt, and one which he long since bound himself to discharge? On the 31st January, Mr. Church made his financial statement. In his very exhaustive speech, he announced the political views of the Government with respect to the recalcitrant corporations, as I have just stated them. At the same time, he announced that he proposed to ask the House to impose a stamp duty on certain documents, to raise the funds necessary to meet the deficit. He took special pains to demonstrate the excellent financial position of the Province of Quebec. The tax was to be but a temporary one, lasting but one or two years, at the most; for the Government was certain to receive from its railways, from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand dollars a-year. I say that it was certain, because the best means had been adopted to ascertain the facts of the case. Tenders had been invited for the leasing of the road. Now, experience has been gained. The best business men, the most experienced railway men, know that our North Shore Railway will yield to the Government a net revenue of at least three hundred thousand dollars a-year. It is not until the 19th of February that the famous tax Bill came before the Houses in the shape of resolutions. As with respect to the railway, the proceedings were regular and constitutional. We find on page 149 of the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly, the necessary announcement:

"Mr. Treasurer Church, seconded by Mr. Attorney-General Angers, moves, that this House do resolve itself into Committee to take into consideration certain resolutions for the imposing of a Stamp Duty on certain documents."

"Mr. Treasurer Church then informed the House that His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, having been informed of the subject matter of the said resolutions recommends them to the consideration of the House."

The resolutions were adopted, a Bill was introduced, discussed and passed between the 19th February and the 1st of March. The Bill respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway had been before the House from the 29th January to the 19th February. It was on the latter day that it received its third reading and was adopted by the House of Assembly. Like the Tax Bill, it had been warmly discussed, and had given rise to repeated debates. These two measures, therefore, were equitable and considered necessary by the Government and the Chambers to maintain the credit of the Province of Quebec; they had been announced by the Treasurer in his statement of the 31st January; the Lieutenant-Governor had known all this for a month when he wrote to the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville the strange letter, the incredible document which I shall now read at length, and submit to the consideration of the House:—

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

Quebec, 1st March, 1878.

"To the Honorable C. B. DeBoucherville, Premier, Quebec:—

"The Lieutenant-Governor, taking into consideration the communication made to him verbally (on the 27th February) by the Premier, and also taking into consideration the letter which the Premier then gave to him, is prepared to admit that there had been no intention, on the part of the Premier, to slight the prerogatives of the Crown, and that there was only on his part an error committed in good faith in the interpretation that he gave to words used by the Lieutenant-Governor in the interview which they had on the 19th February instant; words which did not imply the authorisation attributed to them by the Premier.

"With this interpretation and the instructions given in consequence by the Premier to the Hon. Messrs. Angers and Church, these gentlemen did not, willingly, do anything against the duties of their office.

"As to the blank, which the Lieutenant-Governor addressed to him from Rivière Ouelle, the Lieutenant-Governor knew that such blank was to be used for the purpose of submitting the Estimates to the House.

"This act was a token of confidence on his part, as stated by the Premier in his letter of the 27th, but it was confidential.

"The Lieutenant-Governor deems it his duty to observe that in his memorandum of the 25th February last, he in no way expressed the opinion that he thought that the Premier ever had the intention of arrogating to himself the right of having measures passed without his approval, or of slighting the prerogatives of the representative of the Crown.

"But the Premier must not lose sight of the fact that, although he had not so intended, the fact remains, as he was told by the Lieutenant-Governor.

"The fact of having submitted several new and important measures to the Legislature, without having previously, in any manner, consulted the Lieutenant-Governor, although without any intention of slighting his prerogatives, gives rise to one of those false positions which places the representative of the Crown in a difficult and critical situation with reference to both Houses of the Legislature.

"The Lieutenant-Governor cannot admit that the responsibility of this state of things rests upon him.

"So far as concerns a Bill entitled 'An Act respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, the Premier cannot apply to that measure the pretended general authorisation mentioned by him in his letter, for their interview took place on the 19th February, and the Bill had then been before the House for several days, without the Lieutenant-Governor having been in any manner informed of it by his advisers.

"The Lieutenant-Governor then told the Premier how much he regretted such Legislation; he represented to him that he considered it to be contrary to the principles of law and justice. Notwithstanding this, the measure was pushed on until it was adopted by both Houses.

"It is true that the Premier gives in his letter as one of his reasons for so acting, 'that this permission of making use of the name of the representative of the Crown had been, moreover, always allowed him by the predecessor of the present Lieutenant-Governor, the late lamented Mr. Caron.'

"This reason cannot avail with the Lieutenant-Governor, for, by so doing, he would abdicate his position as representative of the Crown—a proceeding which neither the Lieutenant-Governor nor the Premier could reconcile with the duties of the Lieutenant-Governor towards the Crown.

"The Lieutenant-Governor regrets being compelled to state, as he told the Premier, that he has generally not been explicitly informed of the measures adopted by the Cabinet, although the Lieutenant-Governor often gave the Premier opportunities to do so, especially during the course of last year.

"The Lieutenant-Governor, from time to time since the last meeting of the Legislature, drew the attention of the Premier to several matters respecting the interests of the Province of Quebec, amongst others:—

"1. To the enormous expenditure occasioned by very large subsidies to several railways when the Province was burdened with the construction of the grand line of railway from Quebec to Ottawa, which should prevail over all others; and that at a time when our finances compelled us to raise loans disproportionate to our revenues.

"2. On the necessity of reducing the expenses of the Civil Government and those of Legislation, in place of having recourse to new taxes, with a view of avoiding financial embarrassment.

"The Lieutenant-Governor, although with regret, expresses to the Premier the opinion that the Orders in Council, for the increase of the salaries of Civil Service employes, seemed to him inopportune at a time when the Government had effected with the Bank of Montreal a loan at the rate of seven per cent. for half a million with power to increase this loan to one million, and, in fact, to-day even (1st March) the Lieutenant-Governor was obliged to allow an Order in Council to be passed to secure the last half million for the Government, without which the Government would be unable to meet its engagements, as stated to him by the Honorable the Treasurer, by order of the Premier.

"The Premier did not either then or since inform the Lieutenant-Governor that the Government were in so impecunious a condition as to require special legislation to increase the public burdens.

"The Lieutenant-Governor therefore stated and repeated these facts to the Premier, and now deems it his duty to record them here, in order that they may serve as a memorandum for himself and the Premier. It results therefore:—

"1. That although the Lieutenant-Governor had made many representations, in his capacity of representative of the Crown, to the Premier on those various subjects of public interest, his advisers have taken administrative and legislative steps contrary to such representations, and without having previously advised him.

"2. That the Lieutenant-Governor has, without evil motives, but in fact, been placed in a false position, by being exposed to a conflict with the desires of the Legislature, desires which he acknowledges to be paramount, when expressed in a constitutional manner.

"The Lieutenant-Governor has attentively read and examined the memorandum and documents which the Premier was kind enough to bring him yesterday.

"In the record are petitions from several municipal corporations, and from citizens of different localities, addressed to the Lieutenant-Governor, against the resolutions and the Government Bill respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.

"The Lieutenant-Governor was only yesterday in a position to take communication of some of those petitions, inasmuch as they had not been transmitted to him before the record.

"The Lieutenant-Governor, after mature deliberation, cannot accept the advice of the Premier in reference to the sanction to be given to the Railway Bill entitled 'An Act relating to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.'

"For all these reasons, therefore, the Lieutenant-Governor cannot conclude this memorandum without expressing to the Premier the regret which he feels in being no longer able to retain him in his position, contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown.

“(Signed) L. LETELLIER,
Lieut.-Governor.

It is just to say, as an excuse for Mr. Letellier, that he was all ashamed of this first letter; he saw all the injustice, and all the absurdity of it. He understood that a man who calls himself a representative of the Crown, of Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, should not write in that way, should not violate the sacred principle which is the basis, as it is the guarantee, of the constitutional system, for reasons so futile, so devoid of good sense, as those adduced by him in his letter of dismissal. For some days he deliberated and puzzled his brain to find new means, and being a man of resource, he discovered seven or eight, which he collected into a celebrated document which he addressed to Lord Dufferin on the 18th March:—

“QUEBEC, 18th March, 1878.

“Ottawa.

“MY LORD.—I have the honour now to submit for your Lordship's consideration documents and details which I could not lay before the public, but from which it would have been more clearly understood that the dismissal of M. DeBoucherville's Cabinet was forced upon me by circumstances.

“These details are not contained in the correspondence which I authorized M. DeBoucherville to place before the House, and which are hereunto annexed.

“From the day that I was, by Your Excellency, raised to the position I occupy at present, all my private relations with the members of the Cabinet, up to the time of their dismissal from office, were, I must admit, generally of an agreeable nature; but in those of an official character with the Premier, I almost invariably felt that I did not enjoy that entire confidence on his part, which is the chief element of a cordial understanding between the representative of the Crown and his advisers.

“After having studied the general state of the affairs of our Province, after having become convinced that legislative and administrative changes were becoming more and more necessary, I decided upon using, with moderation, and with the greatest possible discretion, the influence attached to my position, in order to obtain the realisation of that which I deemed to be of the greatest advantage to the Province.

“I regret to state to Your Excellency that, although M. DeBoucherville did, on most occasions, take my advice in good part, and generally approved of it, he, nevertheless, almost always acted as though he had never received it. Nevertheless, far from using my authority to obstruct his action in any way, I invariably treated him with great indulgence, as will appear to Your Excellency by the following facts:—

“1st.—During the Session of 1876, a Bill had been read three times in one of the two branches of the Legislature, and only twice in the other.

“This Bill, bearing all the certificates which were necessary to induce me to believe that it had been regularly passed and adopted, was submitted to me by the Premier for my sanction.

“In consequence of being left in ignorance of these facts by my advisers, I sanctioned the Bill.

“Not long afterwards, I was informed of the irregularity, and I immediately spoke of it to the Premier. I made the observation that such an act would entail too serious consequences to allow of its being passed over.

“As a favour to him, however, I passed over this instance of irregular legislation, which was then irreparable.

“2nd.—During the same Session, another Bill was submitted to me for my sanction.

“On examining it, I perceived a blank which had not been filled up, which I pointed out to the Premier, in the following letter:—

“QUEBEC, 27th December, 1876.

“MY DEAR PREMIER.—A Bill (E) which originated in the Council was passed by the Legislative Assembly, without amendment; upon reading it before adding my certificate of sanction, I noticed that a blank had not been filled up in the seventh line of the sixth section.

“You followed the usual practice in not fixing the amount of the penalty in the Legislative Council; but the matter passed unperceived, or the officers, through some mistake, omitted to insert the amount fixed by the House, or it may have been an error in the proof-sheets.

“While on the subject of these mistakes, you will find another in the second section of the same Act, wherein the word amender is in the infinitive mood. I notice this latter inaccuracy, to which I do not attach much importance, only because I discovered another in an Act in which I had to point out to you an omission which I consider fatal.

“Yours very truly,

“The Premier came to me and said that he regretted the omission; he requested me to give my sanction to the Bill in the state in which it was. The conciliatory spirit which I showed in granting my consent seemed to please him.

“3rd.—In March, 1877 (vide Appendix A), my advisers caused me to make an appointment of a Municipal Councillor for the South Ward of the Village of Montmagny, under the pretext that there had been no election, or that if such election had taken place, it was illegal.

"The whole of the circumstances connected with this case, I deem it my duty to explain to Your Excellency, on account of the important principle involved therein.

"After due personal examination of the petitions and other accompanying documents relating to that election, I called on the Premier, at his own office, to beg of him not to hurry the appointment, which he was asked to make, of a Municipal Councillor for that locality, before receiving more ample information.

"I pointed out to him that it appeared that a municipal election had taken place, and that in such case, as a principle, the Executive Council should not interfere.

"I added, that from the moment that a legal, or even an illegal election had taken place, the duty of deciding it rested with the courts, in accordance with the ordinary course of law, of which they are the interpreters.

"I then intimated to M. DeBoucherville that I maintained, on principle, that all matters cognisable by the judiciary should be invariably left to the courts, which from their organization are better fitted than the Executive to enquire into matters of fact and of evidence, and that I would never allow the substitution of the powers of the Executive for those of the courts, when the latter had jurisdiction.

"The Premier admitted that that opinion, and the principle on which I based it, were in conformity with his ideas, and necessary for the proper administration of justice. He asked me if I would consent to see Mr. Angers, the Attorney-General, on the subject.

"I at once consented, and the Attorney-General was immediately sent for; the facts connected with that election difficulty and my views regarding them, were then communicated to him. He promised that before any appointment should be made by the Lieutenant-Governor he would make enquiry.

"Shortly afterwards he reported to me that he had made an enquiry into the facts of the case, and, at his suggestion, I appointed Jules Bélanger to be Councillor.

"In the beginning of March, 1877, difficulties and quarrels arose at Montmagny, in consequence of that election.

"After that appointment, those quarrels broke forth afresh in the municipal council itself, from which the Councillor whom I had thus been caused to appoint, was expelled with violence. That appointment I was recommended to make, notwithstanding the fact that an election had taken place; that it had been held and presided over by the Mayor, that Eugène Fournier had been returned by acclamation, that he had been sworn in according to law, and that at the very time when the appointment of Jules Bélanger was recommended to me, the person thus elected had in fact taken his seat, had been sworn, and had sat at the said Council, as appears by the minutes of the Council.

Mr. MOUSSEAU.

"When I afterwards learned these facts, I communicated them to the Premier, whom I requested to prepare a revocation of the appointment which I had thus been caused to make, contrary to the principles above set forth, and the justice of which he had himself admitted.

"The Premier answered that the matter was of a very delicate nature, as such a proceeding would be contrary to the recommendations of Mr. Angers, his Attorney-General; he concluded by saying that he would get him to prepare a report on the subject.

"I received that report some days later. After having read it, I again intimated to Mr. DeBoucherville, that in the interests of peace, and in conformity with the principle that the executive should not be substituted for judicial power in matters within the province of the latter, I insisted upon the revocation being made.

"After waiting several days for an answer, and not having received any from the Premier, I addressed a letter to him, of which the following is a copy:—

QUEBEC, March 14, 1877.

"Private and Confidential.

"MY DEAR DEBOUCHEVILLE.—I have not received any answer on the subject of the appointment of a Councillor at Montmagny.

"Those who deceived the Government in order to induce me to perform an executive act in connection with a question which they then knew to be within the judicial power, do not, in my opinion, deserve consideration, which cannot but be injurious to the Government and myself.

"The remedy is very simple, rescind the appointment; allow the parties interested to fight it out before the Courts.

"Yours very truly,

(Signed) L. LETELLIER.

"If, my Lord, I insist upon this latter point, it is to show Your Excellency that the Prime Minister was then perfectly aware of my views on that point, and should not, in consequence, have introduced during the last Session of our Legislature, any legislative measure, or performed any administrative act tending to substitute executive for judicial power without notifying me, and especially without advising me on the subject.

"It was easy for the Premier to understand from my remarks and the frequent conversations which I had with him, that I could not consent to see Her Majesty's subjects despoiled of the right guaranteed to them by Magna Charta—that their property should never be interfered with, except in virtue of a judgment rendered by the tribunals of the country.

"4th —On the 19th March, 1877, being on the eve of absenting myself for a few days, I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Chapleau; and in a postscript I said: 'Please oblige me by telling the Premier that if he needs my concurrence, Mr. Gauthier may bring down to me the documents requiring my signature.'

"M. DeBoucherville should have understood from that, that if I was ready to give him my concurrence, it was on condition of having all documents submitted to me before signing them.

"I leave you, my Lord, to judge in what manner my views were interpreted.

"QUEBEC, 6th November, 1877.

"(Private.)

"MY DEAR DEBOUCHERVILLE.—In the last Official Gazette were published, under my signature, two proclamations which I had not signed.

"One was for the summoning of Parliament, which I had reserved in order to confer with you; the other, which I did not even see, appoints a day of thanksgiving.

"These proceedings, the nature of which I shall not characterise, entail, apart from their impropriety, invalidities which you will easily understand.

"Yours very truly,

"(Signed) L. LETELIER.

"THE HON. C. R. DEBOUCHERVILLE,
"Premier."

"The following are the notes which I took of the conversation which I had with M. DeBoucherville on the subject :—

"M. DeBoucherville came on the same day he received the letter, to tell me that he regretted that the thing had occurred, and that it was no fault of his. I accepted the excuse, and then told him that I would not tolerate my name being used, when necessary for any duty of my office, unless the documents requiring my signature had been previously submitted to me, and unless information was afforded to me, which M. DeBoucherville assured me would be the course followed in future.

"(Signed) L. L.

"6th.—But, my Lord, there is another point still more important, which I cannot any longer refrain from mentioning.

"From the conversations which I have held with M. DeBoucherville, there results a fact, which, if it were known, would, of itself, have sufficiently justified me in believing that he did not possess the confidence of the people of this Province.

"On two different occasions, some time after the Session of 1876, I pointed out to him that millions had been voted to aid railways in general, at a time when our finances did not appear to me to be in a condition to warrant, all at once, a lavish expenditure in subsidising these numerous undertakings, particularly as, apart from that, our credit was so heavily pledged towards the building of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.

"He very frankly avowed that these grants, though they were for the development of the Province, had been necessitated by political considerations; that without them, the support of the members whose counties were traversed by those railways would cease to be secured to Government; that there would be no means of having a majority; that those members formed combinations—'Rings'—to control the House.

"M. DeBoucherville is not unaware that I thereupon told him that it was better to save the Province than a Government; and that if his Administration was not strong enough to resist those influences, it would be better for him to form a combination of honest and well-meaning men from both sides of the House, rather than submit to the dictations of those 'Rings' and to the control of those combinations.

"When he made no attempt to escape from that deleterious influence, after his own avowal that the Legislature was controlled by those 'Rings'; when, by his legislation, he sought to favour them anew during the last Session without having previously advised with me, had I not the right, as the representative of my Sovereign, to believe and to be convinced that M. DeBoucherville did not possess a constitutional majority in the Legislative Assembly?

"7th.—In communicating to both Houses my memoranda of the 25th February and 1st March last, the Premier and Mr. Attorney-General Angers, in violation of their duty, overstepped the authorisation which I had given by my letter of the 4th of March last, for that purpose. They added to that communication a report of pretended conversations, the correctness of which I contest and the impropriety of which I maintain.

"I shall point out, my Lord, one fact alone to prove that incorrectness and that impropriety: the Hon. Messrs. DeBoucherville and Angers, in their explanations to the two Houses, lay great stress on the telegram which Mr. DeBoucherville despatched to me at Rivière Ouelle, to ask my permission to introduce resolutions concerning the finances, and on the blank signature that I sent up in answer to it.

"But these gentlemen themselves had that blank signature filled up by my Private Secretary, so as to give to the telegram the meaning which I attributed to it, namely, a request for permission to introduce the supplies. The following is a copy of the message produced with that blank signature.

"The Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec transmits to the Legislative Assembly the Supplementary Estimates for the current year, and for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1879, which, in conformity with the provisions of the 54th section of the British North America Act, 1867, he recommends to the Legislative Assembly.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"Quebec, 30th January, 1878."

"My Ministers never had, by their own admission, any other authorisation from me for the introduction of their railway and taxation resolutions, than the blank signature above-mentioned, in which not a word is said of them. Besides which, it will be noticed that the railway resolutions were introduced on the 29th January, whereas the message is dated the 30th.

"It is for this reason, my Lord, that I bring to your knowledge all the facts and details which are connected with the relations which I have had with M. DeBoucherville and his colleagues.

"Were the controversy with me alone as a private individual, I would abstain from any remonstrance against the injustice of their reflections upon the conduct of the representative of the Crown, which they have made in violation of their duty; but in this matter the maintenance of the constitution is at stake.

"If, without any authority from me, proclamations have been issued which I never signed, is it surprising that messages were communicated in my name to the Houses, respecting which I had never been consulted?

"It is because, as the representative of my Sovereign, I have been unjustly and shamefully dragged before the public, that I make known to you, my Lord, that in the performance of my duty as Her representative, my object has not only been to protect the dignity of my office, but to afford to the people of this Province an opportunity of knowing that, under existing circumstances, the exercise of the Royal Prerogative has not been hostile to their constitutional liberties; but that, on the contrary, it has afforded them the means of freely exercising their judgment.

"These results, my Lord, from what I have now stated:—

"1st.—That, in general, the recommendations which I have made to my Cabinet did not receive the consideration which is due to the representative of the Crown.

"2nd.—That my name has been used by the members of the Government in the signature of documents which I had never seen.

"3rd.—That a Proclamation, summoning the Legislature, was published in the Official Gazette without my being consulted or informed of it, and before my signature had been attached thereto.

"4th.—That a like Proclamation, fixing a day of Thanksgiving, was also published under similar circumstances.

"5th.—That, although I had intimated to the Premier, by my advice and by my letter of the 14th March, 1877, my firm determination to protect the inhabitants of this Province against the arbitrary decisions of the Executive in matters within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Justice, he thought proper, without my participation and without advising me, to propose to both Houses, in legislating for the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, 'to substitute the power of the Executive for that of the Judiciary.'

"6th.—That, without having advised me, and without having received authorisation of any sort whatever from me, the Government of M. DeBoucherville proposed to the Legislature a measure of almost general taxation upon the ordinary contracts and transactions of life, transfers of bank stock, &c., while no message from me had been asked for this object, nor signed by me to authorise its proposition to the Houses.

"7th.—That, after its dismissal, the Government of M. DeBoucherville again failed in its duty by assigning reasons for the adjournment of the House from day to day, different from those agreed on between myself and the Premier, at the risk of prejudicing public opinion against the representative of the Crown.

"8th.—That, at the time of the communication of the causes which rendered necessary the dismissal of the Cabinet, in the explanations which were given by the Premier to the Legislative Council, and by the Attorney-General to the Legislative Assembly, both of them referred to pretended conversations which they had no authority whatever to communicate to the Legislature, since the Premier had, by his answer to the letter of the Lieutenant-Governor of the 4th March last, limited his explanations to the communication to both Houses of my memoranda of the 25th February and 1st March, and the answers of the Premier of the 27th February and of the 2nd and 4th March, instant.

"9th.—That, therefore, the additions and comments made by the Premier before the Legislative Council, and by the Attorney-General before the Legislative Assembly, were contrary to the conditions agreed upon between the Lieutenant-Governor and the Premier.

"10th.—That the Premier and his colleagues, by making use of pretended private conversations to explain the causes of their dismissal, in contravention to their duty to the Crown and to what they had pledged themselves to observe with regard to it, have placed the Lieutenant-Governor under the necessity of bringing under the notice of Your Excellency all the reasons for that dismissal.

"I have the honour to be,

"My Lord,

"Your Excellency's

"Most obedient servant,

"(Signed) L. LETELLIER,
"Lieutenant-Governor."

His Honour Luc Letellier, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, puts out Mr. DeBoucherville because he can no longer "retain him in his position, contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown." He does not say that Mr. DeBoucherville has infringed those rights and prerogatives; nor does he say what those rights and prerogatives of the Crown, represented at Quebec by Mr. Letellier, are. On the contrary, he takes care to proclaim the good faith of Mr. DeBoucherville, and declares that Messrs. Angers and Church did nothing which was not in accordance with the duties of their office. Why then was the DeBoucherville Cabinet dismissed? From appearances and from the letter of the 1st March, it seems that Mr. de Boucherville and his colleagues were driven from power for the following two formidable reasons: "1st. That, although the Lieutenant-Governor has made many recommendations, in his position as Representative of the Crown, to the Premier, on these different subjects of public interest, his advisers have undertaken a course of administrative and legislative Acts, contrary to those recommendations, and without having previously advised with him. 2nd. That the Lieutenant-Governor has been placed, without evil intention, but, in fact, in a false position, by being exposed to a conflict with the will of the Legislature, which he recognises as being, in all cases, supreme, so long as that will is expressed in all constitutional ways." This constitutional jargon is not very intelligible. It certainly proves a difference of opinion between the Lieutenant Governor and his Cabinet, in relation to mere matters of administration, but nothing else. A strong effort of the imagination was requisite, in order to discover that Mr. DeBoucherville had acted "contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown" by not paying very great attention to these mild complaints. For the present, I do not discuss either the intrinsic merits or the truth of the complaints or reproaches; I shall return to them later. I will content myself, for the present, with calmly examining whether these complaints and reproaches, admitting them to be well grounded, are sufficient to authorise a constitutional Lieutenant-Governor to turn out a Government sustained by a majority of twenty-one in a House of sixty-five. These were, on 1st March the only reasons given, the only reasons known, the only reasons that Mr. Letellier allowed his dismissed Ministers to communicate to the Chambers. Mr. Letellier has judged them himself, and condemned himself when he tried to discover better ones. Let us now see what these new reasons are. Mr. Letellier, it is needless to say, was, like the Liberals of Ottawa before the 17th September last, inspired with pure patriotism, with unbounded devotion to his beloved Province of Quebec, and with profound respect for the people's money. "After having," he says, in his letter of the 18th March, "studied the general state of the affairs of our Province; after having become convinced that Legislative and Administrative changes were becoming more and more necessary, I decided upon using with moderation, and with the greatest possible discretion, the influence attached to my position, in order to obtain the realisation of that which I deemed to be of the greatest advantage to the Province." He then complains bitterly to Lord Dufferin that his Ministers had not listened sufficiently to him, and, as a proof of their disobedience, he complacently sets forth his seven grievances, which I read out just now. Let us examine into them a little. 1st. He says, in substance, I was made to sanction a Bill which was not passed. A clerical error. So far we do not see in what respect the rights and prerogatives of the Crown were trodden under foot. Let us seek further. 2nd. (A digression on comedy). The second grievance is more dangerous. Mr. DeBoucherville, too much inclined to undermine the foundations of the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, sends to the Lieutenant-Governor for his sanction, a Bill sullied by two important defects: a blank not filled up and a verb "in the infinitive mood" instead, I suppose, of the past participle. Rarely does history, I admit make mention of so dark a conspiracy for violating the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. Let no one accuse me of endeavouring to cast ridicule upon a State paper. I have quoted literally. Notwithstanding the respect which is due from me to a Representative of the Crown my position as a Representative of the people, gives me the right, and makes it my duty, to examine into and to judge the actions and the writings of an officer of the Federal Government. 3rd. The third new reason is the election, or want of election, of a municipal Councillor in the village of Montmagny. Mr. Letellier complains that the Attorney-General caused him to make an irregular appointment of a municipal Councillor. The Government yielded out of courtesy, and Mr. Letellier did as he liked. He revoked the appointment. It does not yet very clearly appear from this in what respect Mr. DeBoucherville wished to attack the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. 4th. On the 19th March, 1877, in a postscript to a letter to the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, Mr. Letellier instructed him as follows:—"Please oblige me by telling the Premier that, if he needs my concurrence, Mr. Gauthier may bring down to me the documents requiring my signature." Mr. Letellier adds that that was a sufficient notification to place Mr. DeBoucherville upon his guard. With such a postscript, Mr. Letellier thought that the rights and prerogatives of the Crown were safe. These four grievances all date back to 1877. They are of so little importance that the Lieutenant-Governor retained his Ministers afterwards, and did not think proper to mention them in his letter of the 1st of March. 5th. On the 6th November, 1877, Mr. Letellier wrote a severe letter to Mr. DeBoucherville, reproaching him with having published two proclamations which he had neither signed or authorised. He has, himself, destroyed that grievance in his reply to the memorial of Messrs. Chapleau, Church and Angers. 6th. The sixth ground of accusation against Mr. DeBoucherville has not much to do with the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. Sometime after the Session of 1876, Mr. DeBoucherville acknowledged to Mr. Letellier that his Government was controlled by Rings, dishonest combinations among Conservative members, who exercised influence to obtain grants in favour of railways on the South Shore. This is a wholesale accusation against the Conservative party, an accusation intended to serve the Liberal cause, and which did serve that cause admirably in the local elections of the month of April last. I shall, in a few moments, treat with stern justice that unqualifiable accusation. And now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what this matter had to do with the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. What had these famous imaginary combinations of 1876 to do with the dismissal of Mr. DeBoucherville? 7th. The seventh grievance is a repetition of that mentioned in the letter of the 1st March. Mr. Letellier reproaches Mr. DeBoucherville with having misused his telegram from River Ouelle, permitting him to lay before the Houses the resolutions respecting the finances. According to Mr. Letellier, that authorisation could only cover the estimates, and in no way the Tax and the Railway Bills. I must acknowledge that this famous reason is a very poor one. The Lieutenant-Governor, every morning, receives the proceedings of the evening before. He, therefore, knew at the time that his Government had used his name on the 29th January, to submit to the House the resolutions respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, and on the 19th February the resolutions for imposing a stamp duty upon certain documents. He did not protest, he did not remonstrate, he did not ask his Government to suspend or withdraw those measures which appear to afflict and annoy him so much, so great was his love of the people. At the last hour, when a large majority had adopted and sanctioned the political course of the Government he steps into the way and says, what is a correct summary of his letters: "You were wrong, Mr. DeBoucherville, in believing that my telegram from River Ouelle authorised you to present your measures respecting taxes and the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. You and your colleagues have acted in good faith. But you place me in a false position, and I must show you the door, for I cannot continue to retain you in office contrary to the rights and prerogatives of the Crown." I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have given a faithful summary of the reasons adduced by Mr. Letellier for the dismissal of his Ministers. He has no reasons, he has only pretexts. Let us see the force of these pretexts, as compared with the great principles which established the true doctrine of self-government. The foundation, the corner stone, is that the king reigns but does not govern. The Sovereign, the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor, are all subject to the same rule, to have confidence in and to advise the Ministry which is supported by a majority in the House; to be loyal, open and sincere with it, and to give it every necessary support, so long as it is honoured with the confidence of a good majority in the House. Truly, in this country, we know that beautiful and great system. Responsible government, ministerial responsibility, the constitutional system, with all these are we acquainted. We have studied them, we have learned them, we have watered the soil that produced them with our blood. They have been more to us than the Tree of Liberty, they have been the Tree of Salvation. Let us see what this system is; let us see what part is played in it by him who is called upon to superintend the working of the entire mechanism. He is called King, Queen, Viceroy, Governor-General, or simply Lieutenant-Governor. The name does not signify, because the principle is the same. Lord John Russell may be considered a respectable authority. The following is what he says, in a despatch to Lieutenant-Governor Thompson, of Upper Canada, dated 4th October, 1829:—

“The Constitution of England, after long struggles and alternate success, has settled into a form of government in which the prerogative of the Crown is undisputed, but is never exercised without advice. The Crown must only oppose the wishes of the Assembly where the honour of the Crown or the interests of the Empire are deeply concerned.”

Lord Brougham, a great authority on constitutional questions wrote, in 1835, on the subject of the dismissal during the preceding year of Lord Melbourne, by William IV. He says, first, that the King is but the depository of power. In fact all power belongs to Parliament. And he adds:

“No Sovereign of this country has a right by the Constitution. The Sovereign, I say, has no right by the Constitution, it is illegal, it is prohibited to the Crown; it is a wrong, an unlawful, a criminal act to exercise that high function of dismissing his Ministers and choosing others unless on grounds capable of being stated and defended.”

Harrison, in a work published in 1875, states, in relation to this power of the Sovereign:

“The King cannot insert a sentence or a phrase in his own speech. He cannot add a clause to a Bill in Parliament. The very thought would raise a smile; to act on it would cause a revolution.”

Disraeli, explaining in the English Commons, the formalities of the change of Government, says:

“The Sovereign in England, as we repeat with serious pride, has no part in government.”

Bagehot, in his work on the English Constitution, says:

“No monarch should dissolve Parliament against the will and the interest of the Ministry which is in power. No doubt the King can dismiss such a Ministry and replace it by another Administration, whose advice to dissolve Parliament he could take; but, even with this precaution, to act thus towards a Ministry which had a strong majority in Parliament would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself, in spite of the popularity and respect by which she is surrounded, would even have recourse to such a measure. No Englishman can dream even of a catastrophe of this nature, but it, to him, appears to belong to the phenomena of a world altogether different from that which he inhabits. In practice in England the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the Ministry which the House of Commons desires to maintain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse. To strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle by means of an appeal to the country a Ministry sustained by Parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation.”

Bagehot, after having spoken of the dismissal of Lord Melbourne by William IV., concludes by saying:

“The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated Minister a chance of a dissolution any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one and without his consent.”

The same author also says:

“The written law leaves to the Crown the choice of all Ministers and agents, but the unwritten law or the unwritten Constitution makes it practically impossible for the Sovereign to keep a Ministry in office whom the House of Commons does not approve, and it makes it almost equally impossible to remove from office a Minister whom the House of Commons does approve.”

Could anything more appropriate, more powerful, more well-founded, to demonstrate and develop the constitutional principle, and to show how Mr. Letellier violated and slighted it, possibly be found? Let us now hear Lord Dufferin upon the duties of Governors. In his speech at Halifax, in 1873, he spoke as follows:—

“My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. I believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes; and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the Confederate Parliament of Canada may assign to me as my responsible advisers can I give my confidence. Whether they are heads of this party or of that party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General. So long as they are maintained he is bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and to loyally assist them with his counsels."

I again quote Lord Dufferin. On the 22nd February last the English Reform Party gave a dinner at the Reform Club, in honour of our last Governor-General the Earl of Dufferin. The Earl of Granville occupied the chair, and the Marquis of Hartington, the leader of the Whig party, was present. The chairman, proposing Lord Dufferin's health, complimented him highly on the good which he had done for Canada during his term of office. Lord Dufferin, true as ever, to the great principles of responsible government, replied to that part of the Earl of Granville's eulogy in these words:—

"If anything satisfactory to this country has occurred during the course of my administration, it is to be attributed to the patriotism, to the elevated spirit and to the loyalty of the Canadian people themselves [cheers]; and, my lords and gentlemen, I freely confess that I should not consider it a compliment to the head of any self-governing community, if he were credited with the exhibition of any personally invented policy or any independent initiative of his own. [Cheers]."

That is what the English Liberals applauded not three weeks ago. Evidently Mr. Letellier did not draw water from that spring. He is himself a Liberal, but not in the style of great Liberals such as these. Lord Metcalfe, Governor of United Canada from 1843 to 1845, wished, like Mr. Letellier, to institute personal Government. Like him he wished to hand over the power to the minority, and turned out the Lafontaine-Baldwin Cabinet, which was sustained by a large majority of the House. Lord Elgin was charged with the duty of repairing his fault. The instructions given to him by Lord Grey are strikingly applicable at the present time. Among other things, he says to him:—

"The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that any transfer which may take place, of political power from the hands of one party in the Province to those of another, is the result not of an act of yours. To this I attach great importance. I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the government of the Province satisfactorily, and command the confidence of the Legislature."

Bagehot says also :

"To state the matter shortly, the Sovereign has, under a constitutional monarchy such as ours, three rights:—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn; and a King of great sense and sagacity would want no others. He would find that his having no others would enable him to use these with singular effect. He would say to his Minister: 'The responsibility of these measures is upon you. Whatever you think best shall have my full and effectual support, but you will observe that for this reason and that reason what you propose to do is bad; for this reason and that reason what you do not propose is better. I do not oppose, it is my duty not to oppose, but observe that I warn.'"

A little further on Bagehot says :

"The popular theory of the English Constitution involves two errors as to the Sovereign. First, in its oldest form, at least, it considers him an estate of the realm, a separate co-ordinate authority with the House of Lords and with the House of Commons. This, and much else, the Sovereign once was, but he is no longer. That authority could only be exercised by a monarch with a legislative veto. He should be able to reject Bills, if not as the House of Commons rejects them, at least as the House of Peers rejects them. But the Queen has no such veto; she must sign her own death-warrant if the two Houses unanimously sent it up to her. It is a fiction of the past to ascribe to her legislative power. She has long ceased to have any."

This is how the head of the Government sums up and estimates the authority in question :

"And that is the duty of a Sovereign. If any legislation carried on by a Ministry having a majority in Parliament, and of course they cannot carry it on without that, was opposed to the view of the Sovereign, he had the right to send for his First Minister and say: 'I will continue to support you, but I have had experience for years, and I warn you;' and that is substantially the only power he has in matters of legislation."

I have reserved one last quotation, the most important of all. I propose now, Mr. Speaker, to shew you Mr. Letellier of 1873, boxing the ears of Mr. Letellier of 1878.

On the 13th August, 1873, Lord Dufferin, listening to the advice of his Ministers—who, in the Session of the spring of that year, had been sustained by a large majority in the House of Commons—prorogued Parliament. The Opposition of the day, the Liberals and the Grits, were irritated that the minority could not control the action of the Governor-General. After the prorogation, the Liberals met in Committee, and adopted the following motion :

"It was proposed by Mr. Cauchon, seconded by Mr. Mills, and resolved:—That, in the opinion of this meeting, the prorogation of Parliament, by not affording to the House of Commons an opportunity of carrying out the enquiry which they had undertaken, was a revolting violation of the privileges of the Independence of Parliament, and of the rights of citizens."

Inflammatory speeches were made. Mr. Letellier delivered himself of one, — here it is :—

"It is desirable, under the present circumstances, to speak with all the calmness possible, in spite of the popular ebullition, which is a national ebullition. The question to examine is to ascertain whether the Executive can interpose the prerogative of the Crown between itself and Parliament, and in this way hinder the free exercise of the popular will. This prerogative ought not to be employed in overthrowing the freedom belonging to the people (cheers), but should follow the course of events and remain in conformity with the interests of the people. Were it otherwise, Parliament might be dispensed with, and the people would be obliged once more, by means of the rod, to obey the Crown, without regard to other rights. * * The Committee appointed by the House could not be dissolved by any external power without a gross violation of its privileges."

A few minutes before this Mr. Letellier had applauded the following words of the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, used when moving his resolution :—

"If I had been alone, I would have gone further than others have done, and I would have said that neither the Crown nor its representatives have the right to meddle with the privileges of Parliament." (Applause.)

Our Lieutenant-Governor was irritated by the fact that Lord Dufferin did not wish to follow the minority. What would he have done had the Governor-General acted as he did, in opposition to the wishes of the majority? He would evidently have shouldered his musket. The Conservatives in Quebec were not so red-hot. Mr. Letellier put them out of doors, without rhyme or reason; and they only asked for him to be censured, while waiting for his dismissal. I have placed, Mr. Speaker, before the House, a statement of the facts as represented by Mr. Letellier, and the true principles which apply to the case. I am not afraid to state that not a single member of this House, not a single inhabitant of our country, having any ideas respecting the constitutional principles by which we are governed, would have ventured to have defended the conduct of Mr. Letellier. He has committed two grievous mistakes; the first was the putting out of doors a Government sustained by a large majority. In face of the authorities which I have just cited, the reasons which he advances in his letter to Mr. DeBoucherville, of the 1st March, are not worth the paper on which they are written. Even supposing, as I have already said, his motives to have been sincere, that the facts which he adduces were true, at the most it but proves a mere difference of opinion. His opinion ought not to prevail, for he is not appointed adviser by the Constitution. He knew everything, and allowed everything to take its own course. Instead of warning and remonstrating, instead of suggesting a change of policy at the time of the introduction of the two measures of which he complains, he waited until they were passed, and made use of them as a pretext for dismissing his Ministers, at the very moment when he had no longer the right to interfere, because the Houses had decided the question by a large majority. The second fault is a still more serious one. Forgetting his duties as an impartial Governor, he wrote to the Governor-General, in order to excuse himself, a letter, in which he made use of new reasons, and in which he brought against his old Ministers small, absurd and paltry accusations, not one of which can justify his coup d'état of the 2nd March, 1878. I must say, before proceeding further, that this was to us, inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, a sorrowful spectacle. We had for many years made heroic struggles to secure the application to Lower Canada of the great principles of constitutional liberty, which have established the honour, the glory, and the prosperity of England. Confederation had affixed the seal to, and placed the crown upon, our long and glorious struggles, by assuring to us political liberty and our self-government as a nation. These considerations, Mr. Speaker, are an explanation to us of the patriotic indignation of the people of the Province of Quebec, when they learned that the first blow struck at our liberties was given by a French Lieutenant-Governor. The affair was so astonishing that even our adversaries, who were not in Mr. Letellier's secrets, refused to believe that the DeBoucherville Cabinet had been dismissed. The Montreal Herald of the 5th March, 1878, refused to believe in the dismissal. It alleged that Mr. DeBoucherville had resigned because Mr. Letellier wished to reserve for the Governor-General's pleasure the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway Bill. It could not believe, it could not even entertain the idea that Mr. Letellier had dismissed Mr. DeBoucherville for a mere difference of opinion. I think that I have, Mr. Speaker, sufficiently shewn that Mr. Letellier deserves more than censure, even if he is judged by his own allegations. It remains for me to fulfil a painful, delicate and eminently disagreeable task: it is that of shewing to the House and to the country that the grievances he had against the De Boucherville Cabinet, were, to make use of a polite and parliamentary expression, purely imaginary. Not only does Mr. Letellier, in order to justify his coup d'état, set out puerile motives, but these motives even, in fact, have no foundation of truth. For my own satisfaction, and for the satisfaction of the House, I wish on this point to be methodical and categorical. 1st. Mr. Letellier alleges that Mr. DeBoucherville had made an improper use of his telegrams from Rivière Ouelle. On the twenty-eighth of January Mr. DeBoucherville had sent to him at Rivière Ouelle the following telegraphic despatch: "Can you send me authority for the resolutions in the financial matters." The next day, the 29th January, the Lieutenant-Governor replied in English: "Blank mailed to-day. If presence necessary, telegraph; return Friday." Mr. DeBoucherville believed in good faith that this authority covered their three financial measures, the Estimates, the Railway Bill, and the Tax Bill. The first use that was made of it was on the 29th January, the day on which the telegram was received, and after it had been received. I have already stated to this honourable House, that it was on this day that they made use of Mr. Letellier's name for the introduction of the Railway resolutions. Mr. Letellier knew of this by the Votes and Proceedings, and on the third day by the financial statement of Mr. Church. He maintained silence for one month. Did he do so in good faith, or did he wish to set an odious trap for his Ministers? The House and the country have the right to put this question. 2nd. During the Session of 1876, in which they made him sanction a Bill which had not passed—he complained of this, and adds: "A short time afterwards I was informed of this irregularity, and I at once spoke about it to the Premier. I remarked to him that an act of this nature carried with it consequences of too serious a character to be passed over in silence. To oblige him, however, I made no grievance of this act of irregular legislation, which had now become irremediable." I hold in my hands proof to the contrary. The Bill in question related to the formation of companies formed for making roads and destroying noxious weeds in the country. The clerk, by mistake, put the draft of this law in the list of Bills to be sanctioned. The hon. Mr. Angers, Attorney-General at the time, at once discovered the mistake, when the Bills sanctioned were read, and told Mr. Letellier of it, in the room of the Speaker of the Council, on the very day of prorogation. Mr. Angers prepared a report which Mr. Letellier signed, and himself sent to the Secretary of State, to be forwarded to the Minister of Justice;—in this report he requested the latter to disallow this Act. Mr. Blake replied that the Bill was a dead letter, and that it was not necessary to disallow it. This answer passed through the hands of Mr. Letellier. The famous Bill was not even included in the Statutes containing the laws passed in the Session of 1876. This is the big affair with which Mr. Letellier reproaches his Ministers as being an outrage against the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. If there were nothing in this but absurdity, I would say nothing about it. But it has its serious and sad aspect; and that is to see a Lieutenant-Governor writing to the direct representative of Her Majesty, the Earl of Dufferin, things which he himself, better than anyone else, knew were not correct. Why talk of irregular and irreparable proceedings, when he himself knew that irreparable legislation was not even recorded in the Statute-book. 3rd. Let us say a word more about the famous Bill with the little blank not filled up, and an infinitive badly placed. This was in December, 1876. Mr. Letellier tells Lord Dufferin how he had paternally admonished Mr. DeBoucherville. He then adds :—"The Premier came to tell me that he regretted this omission, and asked me to sanction this Bill in the condition it then was. The spirit of conciliation with which I agreed to this seemed very agreeable to him." In his zeal for the rights and privileges of the Crown, so vilely outraged by this infamous Bill, Mr. Letellier forgets that he sanctioned, at the same time as this informal Bill, another Bill, which amended and completed it. This is to be seen in the Statutes of 1876, chapter 19 and chapter 20. But I have never been able to find out what became of the infinitive which horrified his conscientious scruples so much. 4th. We now reach the municipal election of Montmagny. The person named N. Bernatchez, Mayor of his village, is an important personage in the south ward of the village of Montmagny. A devoted liberal, ready to sacrifice everything for his party, he knows his value. and steps over the heads of Ministers to address the Lieutenant-Governor directly, not in Council, but personally. In the official papers submitted to the House at Quebec, in July, 1878, we find a very interesting letter from the aforesaid Bernatchez. The following is that interesting document :—

"To His Excellency

"The Honourable LUC LETELLIER DE ST. JUST,
"Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

"I take the liberty of respectfully informing you that on the 19th day of February last, Eugene Fournier, of the Village of Montmagny, was elected by acclamation Municipal Councillor for the South Ward of the said Village of Montmagny, at a meeting of the municipal electors of said Ward, held in accordance with a judgment rendered by the Magistrate's Court for the county of Montmagny, dated the 31st January, eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, as appears by a copy of the minutes of the said meeting, which I have the honour to enclose herewith.

"That the said Eugene Fournier has been duly sworn in as Municipal Councillor, and that he has already exercised, and still exercises the duties of the said office.

"The Council learns with regret that Your Excellency has been deceived and led into error, and that in consequence of false representations, Your Excellency being under the impression that the said seat was vacant, has appointed Jules Bélanger as the person to fill the place of Municipal Councillor for the said Ward.

"Under the circumstances, we respectfully hope that, in consideration of the facts elsewhere set forth, Your Excellency will be pleased to cancel the appointment of the said Jules Bélanger, so as to avoid the inevitable trouble to which this conflict of authority will give rise.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your Excellency's

"Very humble servant,

"(Signed) N. BERNATCHEZ,
"Mayor."

Mr. Letellier, always jealous of the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, but a little forgetful of the rights and prerogatives of his Ministry, and of Parliament, causes himself to be advised by the Mayor of Montmagny; and, strong in that adviser so distinguished in the south ward of Montmagny, he forces upon his own responsible Ministers the opinion of Mr. Bernatchez, who was himself responsible only to the the south ward of the Village of Montmagny. Attorney-General Angers was of opinion that Mr. Eugene Fournier was not elected; because, in fact, there had been no election. A former election having been contested, and annulled, a new election was ordered by the judgment; our municipal code requires that notice of that election should be given under pain of absolute nullity. The friends of Messrs. Bernatchez and Letellier, wishing to have an election to their taste, I suppose, avoided giving the necessary notice. The election was consequently null, or rather there was none. Mr. Angers, upon these facts, made a report to His Excellency, who appointed Jules Bélanger. But Bernatchez had not spoken. He said his word, and at once Mr. Letellier takes his advice instead of the advice of his Ministers. Mr. Angers has the reputation of being an eminent advocate, but his legal attainments will never equal those of Bernatchez. That was Mr. Letellier's opinion, and because Bernatchez advised him, Mr. DeBoucherville, by that very fact, attacked the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. But we should forgive Mr. Letellier, in view of the greatness of the motive which inspired him. He repudiated the action of his Ministers, because they wished to substitute the intervention of the Executive for judicial action. Last year, Mr. Martel, member for Chambly, in the Local Legislature, had the misfortune to displease Mr. Letellier by his votes. He had been elected a Municipal Councillor and Mayor of Chambly in February or March, 1878. He had forgotten, however, to qualify himself. But he had been Mayor for four or five years and was known to be a man of means. Some weeks subsequent to the Session in July last, Mr. Letellier appointed in place and stead of Mr. Martel, a Councillor to suit himself, on the ground that Mr. Martel had filed his qualification papers a few days too late. Of course Mr. Letellier did that in order to "substitute the action of the judiciary for the intervention of the Executive, and for the better protection of the rights and prerogatives of the Crown." 5. A word only as to Mr. Letellier's complaint about the two proclamations, inserted in the Official Gazette without his knowledge and consent. Messrs. Chapleau, Church and Angers furnish a reply to the charge, which places Mr. Letellier in a most humiliating position. He says that one of the proclamations was for the calling of the Legislature. The official papers laid before the Quebec Assembly in July last, prove that Mr. Letellier is wrong. It was merely the formal calling of the Legislature, not for the despatch of business, which takes place every forty days, and is done by an ordinary clerk. We find, moreover, by those official papers that the Order in Council, in relation to that proclamation and the proclamation itself bears the signature of Mr. Letellier himself. Mr. Letellier also signed the Order in Council and the proclamation relating to Thanksgiving Day. Moreover, it was he himself, acting on a letter from the Dominion Prime Minister, the hon. member for Lambton, who had asked Mr. DeBoucherville to prepare the Order in Council and proclamation respecting the Thanksgiving Day.

MR. MOUSSEAU.

These facts are painful to state; unfortunately they are true. Mr. Letellier must have been badly in want of arguments to justify the dismissal of his Ministers when he has recourse to such inaccuracies. 6. I now come to the most delicate point in my task. Mr. Letellier solemnly asserts that Mr. DeBoucherville admitted to him that his Government could not do any good, because it was controlled by "Rings," that is to say, by odious combinations among Conservative members who wanted to get their hands into the public chest. This serious charge is not founded on fact. But I shall answer it with the respect and dignity characteristic of Mr. DeBoucherville's reply. He might well have said: "Mr. Letellier, you are wrong in making such a charge on the eve of a general election; you know in the first place it is not true, in the next you know what harm such an accusation over your signature will work to the country and to a powerful party. Full of respect for the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, which you have utilized to cover your political nakedness, I respect them too much in your person to qualify your accusation as it rightly deserves." Mr. DeBoucherville refrained from saying that, and he did well. But he respectfully submitted to Mr. Letellier a crushing truth of far greater weight. He said to Mr. Letellier, I could not have made such an admission, the thing is simply impossible, for the best of reasons, namely, that my Government never experienced the pressure of "Rings," for railways on the South Shore, and that since I came into power, in 1874, I have not increased by one single cent the grants to those railways. There has been what was called a doubling up of grants, that is to say, that one railway company which shortened its line, renounced a portion of its grant, in order to apply the remainder to the part of the road already begun or constructed. That legislation was so good and so excellent that a Bill of that nature, which had been introduced by the DeBoucherville Administration, in the winter session of 1878, was carried through, after the dismissal of that Administration, by the Joly Cabinet, with the sanction of Mr. Letellier himself. This is the same Bill that served Mr. Letellier as a pretext for thwarting the DeBoucherville Ministry as to its Bill relating to taxes, and its Bill respecting the Q. M. O. & O. Railway. I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Letellier's conduct will be censured, and that that censure will be followed by practical consequences. Three powerful motives of public interest imperatively demand that solution. It is of vital importance that in the first stage of our history, as a Confederation, we should repudiate, we should repel, we should stigmatise any attempt at personal government. We have based our new system on the British Constitution, the grandest, the most liberal under the sun. Let us maintain it intact, and let punishment proportioned to the heinousness of the offence, be inflicted on the first who dares to violate it. Let us establish at once, in the apt words of the right hon. the leader of the Government, a salutary and lasting precedent, a precedent which may serve as a warning and a lesson to future generations. In the second place, Mr. Letellier has rendered himself unworthy of the high office he holds; his mode of acting towards his Ministers, his treatment of a powerful party in the country, the numerous inaccuracies of which he was voluntarily guilty in his official correspondence on the subject, not only render him unworthy of his position, but must bring discredit on the Royal authority, and thereby inflict an injury on monarchical institutions in this country. But there is another, and a still greater danger. Mr. Letellier, by openly declaring war against a powerful party in the Province of Quebec, by insulting it as he has done in his letter of the 18th of March, to Lord Dufferin, has rendered any administration by him impossible in the Province of Quebec. By identifying himself with a party, as Lord Metcalfe did, he compels the Opposition to strike, not merely at the adverse party, but at the representative of authority. He has, therefore, rendered impossible any co-operation between himself and the majority in the Province of Quebec, in carrying on the public business. And now, what reply is there to all these accusations against Mr. Letellier. I do not pretend to a monopoly of the knowledge and virtue of justice; but what reply is there to this? I ask in what way certain subsequent acts can be adduced in favour of Mr. Letellier? It may, perhaps, be said that, during last Session, we tried Mr. Letellier, and that he was acquitted. Mr. Speaker, there are certain crimes in the case of which neither the plea of already tried nor prescription can ever be advanced. And, in the first place as a matter of fact, he did not undergo his trial; he was not judged. The motion of censure, made last year, was not rejected upon its merits. Despite the docile and powerful majority which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) then had, he did not choose that the debate should be exhausted upon the merits of the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct. On the contrary, he had recourse to a subterfuge. He entered a dilatory plea for the defence. He demanded that the cause should be put off until the time when the judgment of the people should be given. The writs had been issued, the local elections were soon to take place, and it was said: Let us leave it in the hands of the people; let them decide. I did not approve of that judgment; it cannot be revoked now; it was not only one of the rights of the Federal Parliament, but also one of its duties, generally, to superintend all persons employed by the Crown. It has a right to say in such a case, or in such circumstances, an employé has misbehaved himself; that is what we did; we had a right to do it, and, in England, the thing has been done over and over again. I am aware that Mr. Letellier, in answer to Messrs. Chapleau, Church and Angers, says that, after all, he was right, and that his Ministers did not possess the public confidence. He quotes victoriously the case of my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Baker). It is true that the hon. Provincial Secretary for Quebec, for the time (the member for Missisquoi) was defeated, but it was a defeat that does little honour to the party which Mr. Letellier wished to bring into power. Every one knows the enormous infamy, the terrific outrage, by means of which Mr. Baker was defeated. On the eve of the elections, the services of a swindler were secured, who wrote in a newspaper infamous statements against Mr. Baker, absurd and impossible statements, but it was too late to refute them in time to prevent the evil which they were to do during the election. By means of this conspiracy—the foulest and the vilest, perhaps, which has come to light for years and years—they succeeded in crushing a distinguished man, and were able to say that he had been defeated, and consequently that the coup d'état had been ratified by the people. The newspaper which published those infamous statements against my friend, Mr. Baker, was brought before a criminal court, and, some time after, retracted fully, apologised and paid the costs. Many defeats have been occasioned by similar means, and if it is wished to plead such a victory as a justification of Mr. Letellier, I think that the less he boasts of it the better for his honour. In fact, it appears that that Government had a majority at a given period of its existence, but it was not upon the constitutional question on which the elections had been held. It was defeated, it was censured at the opening of the House upon the very vote on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Later, by means of those “human devices,” of which Mr. Letellier has the secret, the Joly Government obtained one vote more, but it was the purchased casting-vote of the Speaker of the House. A law was passed there, but it was only passed by the casting vote of the Speaker. It was reserved for the decision of the Imperial Government, and then it was declared that it must be disapproved and not allowed, because it was passed by the casting vote of the Speaker. By the quotations which I have made, we have seen that that change of Government, that scandal by which the representative of the Sovereign proceeded without authority to bring a minority into power, are always deserving of rebuke, are always blamable. We have always the right to blame the means which he employed to give the power to a minority which had it not, and to drive from power a majority which possessed public confidence, as well as that of the House. It has also been said, and, I suppose, that the same reason will be adduced with great vigour, that Mr. Letellier's course was approved, because the supplies were voted to the Government of his selection. But, Sir, that would be a sad argument. It would be a very severe punishment to inflict on all those devoted, intelligent, and patriotic men who preferred the public interest to their own just resentment. We had, in the Province of Quebec, very important works under way; we had to construct a railway and we required money to pay the contractors, and we had to meet our engagements. The Conservative party might refuse the supplies, it might have thrown the Province into great confusion, and done great injury to its credit, but that party preferred to sacrifice its political rancour, and its just mistrust upon the altar of its country; and now can it be brought forward as a reproach against our Conservative friends who did thereby a great act of devotion, rather than punish those men who so justly deserved it? It only now remains for me to thank the House heartily for the attention with which I have been listened to; with me, the House understands the importance of the subject. If I have gone too far in my allusions to certain actions, I ask pardon. But I think I have done what I proposed to do. I wished to do two things,—to prove, before the House and before the country, that the reasons adduced by Mr. Letellier for having dismissed his Ministers and so eminently respectable a leader of the Government (Mr. DeBoucherville) that these reasons I say were not sufficient, even supposing them to be well founded, to justify his action. I further wished to prove that those reasons were absolutely valueless because they were characterised by very serious errors and incorrectness, if not something worse. The motion which I am about to submit is word for word the same as that brought forward in April last by the right hon. the leader of the Government. Every one will understand why I present the same motion: it is for the purpose of obtaining more easily the punishment reserved for the fault or the crime of Mr. Letellier. The motion is as follows:

Resolved:—That the dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers, on the second day of March, 1878, was under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown since the concession of the principle of responsible government to the British North American Colonies.

MR. McCARTHY: Mr. Speaker, in seconding the motion of my hon. friend, I regret it will be necessary for me to travel, to some extent, at all events, over the ground which my hon. friend has so fully gone over, because, to a great number of members of this House, his speech has not conveyed to us the facts, from our inability to follow him in the language in which he has spoken. I shall not be able to do so in the full, explicit manner in which I have no doubt that hon. gentleman has spoken. I will not attempt to occupy the time of the House to such an extent, because we have had the papers in our hands for several days, and most of us, no doubt, have made up our minds and formed an opinion upon the facts thereby conveyed to us. But I would say that this is one of the most important questions which can come before us this Session—very possibly during this Parliament. It is a question involving the position of a high official of the Dominion; an officer who, to some extent, represents our Sovereign, and who, to some extent, exercises sovereign power; an officer who, for a term of years, unless there is grave fault to be found with him, holds his position independent, as well of Executive, as of Parliamentary control. And I would say to my hon. friend, and this House, that no question that can come before us deserves to be more impartially considered, or to be considered more free from party bias and from party feeling, than the one which is now before the Chair. I trust it will be so considered; I trust we will be able to lay aside our party feelings, and that the more as we are now exercising, probably for the first time, rights somewhat of an Imperial character. This, perhaps, brings more forcibly to us than anything can do the great stride that was made in the Constitution which was given us by the Confederation Act of 1867. Before that period, although the Governor-General of Canada was Governor-General of British North America, the Lieutenant-Governors held their commission direct from the Queen herself, and were not subject to our Parliament, nor their acts to our criticism. Now, for the first time—leaving aside for the moment the same question that came up last year—we have to pronounce an opinion involving Imperial consideration. The high position of the gentleman whose conduct is now under review is another reason, if a reason were wanting, why we should give to this subject our greatest consideration. I trust that, bearing in mind the responsibilities which weigh upon us, bearing in mind the result of this debate, bearing in mind that we are now about to lay down and establish a precedent which may be quoted in generations yet to come, we will be careful to see that we do not pronounce against this high public officer and distinguished official unless his conduct merits our condemnation; and, at the same time, be careful to guard the rights of the people whose representatives we are. If these rights have been invaded, we shall protect them and defend them here in their own House. Now, I would ask, too, that this be not looked upon as a provincial matter. I believe it has been said that we can very easily learn to regard with equanimity the misfortunes of our friends, and I would say to the representatives from other portions of the Dominion that this, although a matter more nearly affecting the Province of Quebec, is one that in principle affects the whole Dominion. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec is charged with having been derelict in his high office, with having trampled upon the rights of the people of that great Province, and, Sir, what was done last year in Quebec may yet be done in Ontario, may yet be done in the other Provinces if the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, calls for condemnation, and passes without censure. Therefore we are not to look upon it as a provincial question, or as a matter affecting merely the rights of the Province of Quebec. We are bound to look upon it as one affecting the interests of the whole Dominion, and as one affecting the interest of every elector in this Dominion, and of every freeman in this country. I trust it will be so considered, and so viewed by the representatives of the other Provinces when they come to express their opinions on this question. Now, what was the accusation which has been made against His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor? He is accused of having usurped the prerogative. He is accused of having trampled the rights of the people under foot. He is accused of having acted without the advice of his Council, and contrary to the advice of his Council; of dismissing the Ministry, having the confidence of the majority of the people's representatives in the House, and were willing to support the then Government of Quebec in an unconstitutional manner. These are grave charges, and charges which, when made, deserve careful consideration. These are charges which call upon us, in passing judgment, or in censuring the acts of that official, to give him the benefit of every doubt, to place upon his conduct the most favourable construction, and to place upon his words the construction which would be consistent with his honour and the duty which he owed to his Sovereign and to the people whom he was placed to govern. Unless we can come to the conclusion that he has violated these principles; unless we can, after giving the matter our most careful consideration, come to that conclusion, we ought, in justice to that official, refuse to pass a vote of censure upon him. That we have power to pass a vote of censure, I do not think there is any doubt. The Lieutenant-Governors are appointed by our own Government here, and they are removable for cause by our Government here, and we have a right, and it is our duty, to investigate and to pass judgment, from time to time, not only on what they have done, but also, we have a right to express an opinion about what they ought to have done, and what they have failed to do. If we have the right, and I am not going to quote the Statute, which we all know so well, the next question in order is, is it expedient we should exercise that right; is it expedient that we should, as it were, sit in judgment upon the doings of the late Government and the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. I will admit that it is only in grave cases that we are justified to sit in judgment, to repeat my words, upon the doings of the Local Governments and the Local Houses. But I think, Sir, when we look at these papers, and find that an angry controversy is being kept up between the Lieutenant-Governor and the distinguished leaders of a great party in the Province of Quebec; when we find that these gentlemen made a formal representation to His Excellency the Governor-General; when we find that they have charged the Lieutenant-Governor with dereliction of duty in his office; with being guilty of conduct subversive of the rights of the people and of responsible government; when they add to that the charge that he has made statements which cannot be reconciled with facts; when these statements have been made not unwittingly, not carelessly, but deliberately; and, as it is charged, under circumstances to which only one word can be applied, and that word I am not going to apply here, then we should not be doing our duty in this House if we failed to take notice of these papers that have been brought down. We should not be doing our duty to the great Province of Quebec if we allowed a controversy of this kind to remain unsettled; if we allowed matters of this kind to create heart-burnings and difficulties, which are sure to follow if it were not finally settled once and for all. I think that these papers and these grave accusations are ample justification for our moving in this matter. Now, Sir, what was the position of affairs in the Province of Quebec when this difficulty arose? Mr. Letellier had been sent to govern that Province by the late Administration. He was, at that time, a member of the late Administration; a warm partisan and hostile to the party which then ruled that Province. It is unfortunate, it is unfortunate, I say, that our Lieutenant-Governors have, from the very necessity of the case, to be selected from warm partisans. It behoves gentlemen thus honoured, and thus placed in control of our different Provinces, to forget, during the time they exercise the rights which they are sent there to exercise, during the time they are, to some extent, representatives of Her Majesty—it behoves them, I say, to be more careful, if possible, than the gentlemen who are sent to preside over the whole Dominion. They should be careful to abstain from any interference or from any show of interference between the two political parties into which all our Provinces are divided. For two years, the Government of Mr. De Boucherville successfully managed the affairs of the Province. During that period they were supported in a House of 65 or 66 members—I forget for the moment the correct number—by a majority of twenty, a very large majority considering the number of members. During that period there was no agitation out of doors; nothing unusual; but the machinery of the Government was running as smoothly as possible, without any difficulties such as occasionally arise under our Constitution. But, Sir, we find this Lieutenant-Governor, this chief executive officer, this head of the Government of Quebec was bound to do as Her Majesty has done during her reign, as the Governors-General who have presided in this country do, I may say, without exception; he was bound to give his advisers his implicit confidence; he was bound to carry on the Government by them, and to place implicit confidence and reliance in them, so long as they had the confidence of the majority of the people's representatives. Well, on the 27th of February last, or the 26th, without any notice, without any warning, without any complaint, the Lieutenant-Governor sent a Message to the Premier, and in this Message demanded several documents, and he winds up by saying:—

“12. A detailed statement of the reasons which induced the Provincial Government not to content themselves with the provisions of the Statute and Common Law, and with those of the Civil Code of this Province, for the recovery of the sums of money which might become due by the said Corporations, but without having in any manner previously consulted with the Lieutenant-Governor, to propose an ex post facto legislation to compel them thereto.

“Another very important measure to provide for the imposition of new taxes was also similarly proposed to the Legislature, without having been previously submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor.

“The Lieutenant-Governor is perfectly aware that measures of secondary importance, which have previously been sufficiently explained to him, may be, as a matter of routine, proposed to both Houses without an express order from himself, but he cannot allow the Executive to communicate to the Legislature on his behalf, any important or new measures without his special order, and without his having been previously fully informed and advised thereof.”

What was the accusation which he made against his Government? And, remember, that, so far as these papers show us, with the exceptions which I will advert to by-and-bye, there had been no difficulties between the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers, and there was no warning given to them that they were bringing down measures to the House without his authority and without his approval. There had been nothing to indicate that there was any difficulty between his advisers and himself, but those referred to almost at the end of the Session. Thus, when the measures, as I will presently show, had been brought to a state of completion; when the Legislature had almost passed upon them, he sent this communication, in which, for the first time, he makes the accusation which is, in substance, that they had brought down measures to the House without his authority, and without having previously consulted him. Well, Sir, what was the answer which was made by the Premier of Quebec? It was prompt, and, I think I may say, satisfactory. He waits upon His Honour before all these documents, which had been called for, could be prepared, so that not one moment should be lost in explaining his action, and showed that the charges which had been made were absolutely baseless. This interview took place on the 28th February. Remember, Sir, that this accusation was conveyed by him on the 27th February. He states that he sent to the Lieutenant-Governor, who was then away from the seat of Government, for authority to introduce the financial measures. He showed that to that communication he received an answer from the Lieutenant-Governor by telegraph that the authority would be sent in blank, and the authority was sent in blank, showing most clearly and most conclusively the position in which the Premier of the Province stood towards the Lieutenant-Governor; showing the terms upon which they were carrying on the business of the country, and proving, as it appears to me, conclusively, that the step that was afterwards taken, that the pretence that was afterwards made, was merely a pretext, and was not bottomed or based upon any substantial grounds or upon any substantial foundation. “Later on, I had the honour,” says the Premier, “of requesting Your Excellency's authorisation to lay money questions before the House, and this

Your Excellency granted, with your usual condescension. I must admit that, with this authorisation and conviction in my mind that Your Excellency had read the Treasurer's Budget speech, in which he announced the taxes afterwards proposed and considered, I had the right to inform my colleagues that I had your permission concerning all questions respecting money. I beg Your Excellency to believe that I never had any intention whatever of arrogating to myself the right of having measures passed without your approval, and that, under existing circumstances, having had occasion to speak to Your Excellency in reference to the law respecting the Provincial Railway, and not having received any order to suspend it, I did not think your Excellency would discover in this measure any intention on my part to slight your prerogatives, which no one is more disposed than I am to respect and uphold." It is for us to say whether that was a satisfactory explanation or not. We have the Lieutenant-Governor's own statement that it was a satisfactory explanation, that he did not believe there had been any attempt on the part of the Premier, Mr. DeBoucherville, or his colleagues, to assail the prerogatives of the Crown, or to slight them. He did not think there was any intention on their part to do that which was unbecoming their position as his advisers. The Lieutenant-Governor said this, and it is stated in the papers which have been submitted to us :

"After some conversation, the Lieutenant-Governor, having heard Mr. DeBoucherville's explanations, admitted that, if there had been any misunderstanding, the latter had acted in good faith in authorising his colleagues to say they were authorised to submit the legislation in reference to money matters."

And so the interview went on ; and it ends in this way :—

"In reply to a question on the subject, he (the Lieutenant-Governor) afterwards told him that the only difficulty remaining was the question of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, and that he would give an answer on the following day, the 26th February."

Thus, all pretence that the advisers of the Executive had done that which was unbecoming their position is, upon meeting the Premier face to face, abandoned. No claim is made upon that ground.

MR. MCCARTHY.

The only question is, whether this Railway Bill, which had been brought down to the House and carried through its second reading, and was about to become law, was to be reserved by the Lieutenant-Governor, or to be sanctioned in the ordinary course. There was nothing in this, I think we must all see, to cause any disruption between the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers. And, on the following day, when the Premier again waits upon His Honour, and asks for an answer, what takes place? On leaving, Mr. DeBoucherville said : "If I understand you rightly, you are hesitating between giving your sanction to the Railway Bill and reserving it." He replied, "That is it." Now, Sir, we have got down to the explanations that were made and submitted to the Provincial Parliament, and I think that, if these explanations are not sufficient, and are not satisfactory, then the Lieutenant-Governor must stand convicted of having been guilty of conduct which, in the language of the resolution, "is subversive of the rights we have under responsible government," because he dismissed his Ministers, with their large majority, for no other cause than the ones we have here mentioned, and in which, after explanation, he was satisfied there was no attempt to slight his prerogative, on the part of his advisers, or to be guilty of disrespectful or insubordinate conduct. All that remained for him to consider was whether he should reserve or sanction this Railway Bill. Upon that question he did not seek their advice, but sent to the Premier, without more ado, a communication to the effect that he could not accept their advice, and forced them to resign ; in other words, he dismissed them. Are we prepared here, for that is the question, to say that the Lieutenant-Governors of our different Provinces are placed in a position higher than that which Her Majesty the Queen occupies in Great Britain ; higher than that which the Governor-General occupies here ? If not, we must come to the conclusion that a Lieutenant-Governor who has refused to follow the advice of his Ministers, who possess the confidence of the representatives of the people, who has violated what all understand to be parliamentary or constitutional government, who has violated the rights we believe we have obtained since the days of Baldwin and Lafontaine, the rights of responsible government, ought not longer to be maintained in the position to which he has been called and in which he has been guilty of such misconduct. Let us see what are these rights, these duties, which belong to the Lieutenant-Governor, and which I, for one, would be the last to say he ought not to possess. I assume, and I fancy there can be no reasonable doubt, that our Lieutenant-Governors, as to their own local Parliaments, possess the same powers and authority as our Governor-General possesses as to this Parliament; and I think we cannot work out our system of constitutional government in our Local Legislatures unless we admit this principle. If so, what is the position of the representative of the Crown? I will quote from a work that has been read before in this House, and which is, I believe, generally accepted by men of all shades of politics, as being, perhaps, the best exposition of responsible government that has yet been written, Mr. Bagehot's work on the English Constitution. I will read one or two extracts as to the duty which the Crown has to perform under our system of Government:

"The popular theory of the English Constitution involves two errors as to the Sovereign:—First, in its oldest form at least, it considers him as an 'Estate of the Realm,' a separate co-ordinate authority with the House of Lords and the House of Commons. This, and much else, the Sovereign once was, but this he is no longer. That authority could only be exercised by a monarch with a legislative veto. He should be able to reject Bills, if not as the House of Commons rejects them, at least, as the House of Peers rejects them. But the Queen has no such veto. She must sign her own death-warrant if the two Houses unanimously send it up to her. It is a fiction of the past to ascribe to her legislative power. She has long ceased to have any."

"To state the matter shortly, the Sovereign has, under a constitutional monarchy, such as ours, three rights: the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn. And a King of great sense and sagacity would want no others. He would find that his having no others would enable him to use these with singular effect. He would say to his Minister: 'The responsibility of these measures is upon you. Whatever you think best must be done. Whatever you think best shall have my full and effectual support. But you will observe that, for this reason and that reason, what you propose to do is bad. For this reason and that reason, what you do not propose is better. I do not oppose, it is my duty not to oppose; but observe that I warn.'"

Now, I suppose that that will not be denied by any hon. member who calls himself a Liberal to be the position which our Lieutenant-Governors occupy with regard to their Executives.

MR. HOLTON: Hear, hear.

MR. MCCARTHY: An hon. gentleman calls "hear, hear", whether in assent or dissent to that proposition, I know not.

MR. HOLTON: Decided dissent.

MR. MCCARTHY: I will be glad to hear, when that hon. gentleman addresses the House, as, no doubt, he will, his reasons for considering the Lieutenant-Governor possesses greater power than that. For my part I am not willing or desirous that our Lieutenant-Governors or our Governors-General should be shorn of one atom of their rightful power. No one could have read the life of the Prince Consort, written by Mr. Martin, and printed under, I might say, the supervision of Her Majesty, without being convinced of this: that great good has resulted in England from the superintendence, the administrative ability which has characterised, not only Her Majesty, but, during his lifetime, the Prince Consort. No person can doubt that; nor can we doubt here when we read the despatches which have been and are submitted, from time to time, to the Imperial Parliament, as to the conduct of our Governors-General, that their assistance has been very great, and that it is not wise that they should be mere automata, figure-heads, ornamental appendages. I maintain, under a constitutional government, the people are, after all, supreme, and that this House, as representing the people, is the supreme, and, in the end, the absolute authority. As to the Lieutenant-Governor's power of dissolving the House, we will hear what the same writer says:

"Principle shows that the power of dismissing a Government with which Parliament is satisfied, and of dissolving that Parliament upon an appeal to the people, is not a power which common hereditary monarchs will, in the long run, be able to beneficially exercise. Accordingly, this power is almost, if not quite, dropped out of the reality of our Constitution. Nothing, perhaps, would more surprise English people than if the Queen, by a coup d'état, and on a sudden, destroyed a Ministry firm in the allegiance, and secure of a majority in Parliament."

This is exactly what was done by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

MR. MCCARTHY:

"That power indisputably, in theory, belongs to her; but it has passed so far away from the minds of men that it would terrify them if she used it, like a volcanic eruption from Primrose Hill."

Do we not feel that is only a correct exposition of the Constitution under which we live? I do not mean to say that, legally speaking, or theoretically speaking, if you like, the power of dissolution is not still one of prerogative, like many other rights of prerogative, but I mean to say that these prerogative powers are now hemmed in by constitutional rules and principles, and that, to quote the words of Mr. Freeman's late work on the subject, "We now have a whole system of political morality, a whole code of precepts for the guidance of public men, which will not be found in any page of either Statute or common law, but which in practice holds hardly less sacred than any principle embodied in the Great Charter, or in the Petition of Rights," and one of these principles is that the authority of the people's representatives in Parliament, and that the men whom the people's representatives in Parliament have confidence in, are to be the advisers of the Sovereign, and it is a breach of the British Constitution and of the unwritten law, when the Executive power attempts to control Parliament by dismissing those who have its confidence, and without advice, dissolves the House. So far, I have spoken merely as to the grounds which were submitted by the Lieutenant-Governor to the Provincial House, for the dismissal of his Cabinet; and, perhaps, it would be only proper, from a constitutional point of view, that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor on that occasion should be judged on those grounds. According to the well-understood principles of the British Constitution, when the Administration either resigns, or is dismissed—probably it is absurd to talk of dismissing a Government; such an act has not been heard of almost in this century, except on this unfortunate occasion—it is customary that all the reasons which led to their resignation shall be stated fully to the people's representatives, and that all the reasons which caused the difference between the Executive and his advisers should be stated. Well, the Lieutenant-Governor, in this case, was not content to rest upon the reasons which were submitted to the Provincial House, because both the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly, by a large majority, voted against the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Administration, and their representations were sent to the House of Commons; but as I understand it, and as those papers show, no complaint on the subject was made by the Government of the hon. member for Lambton. Lord Dufferin did not seem to have been advised to call on him for any explanations, or to have made any representations as to the impropriety of his conduct on his unusual course. But the Lieutenant-Governor himself felt that his conduct, as it stood, appeared in a most unfavourable light; that, according to the papers submitted, and the statements made according to the facts as they appear when all the statements of both sides have been published, his conduct was not to be justified; his own conscience appeared to have forced him to send in his explanatory case, and his bitterest enemy could have desired nothing better. "Would that mine enemy would write a book," is a common saying, and, when we consider that case, it would be found he forgot the moral of the expression in setting forth his reasons for dispensing with the DeBoucherville Government. Let me briefly draw attention to those charges, bearing in mind that his first complaint was that Mr. De Boucherville slighted the prerogative of the Executive; that, upon his interview with that gentleman, he admitted it was not his intention to slight it, notwithstanding which, the Lieutenant-Governor made that the pretext for dismissing the Premier, and that he could not take his advice with regard to the Railway Bill. What do we find, when he comes afterwards to state in detail those other reasons which he did not think proper to give to his advisers; when he told Mr. DeBoucherville that he no longer required his services? The first reason—and they are all pretty much of a character—was that the Bill was not read a third time in both Houses, but in one only, being read a second time in the other; that he was advised by the Government, and that he did give assent to it as the Lieutenant-Governor. Now, Sir, that is rather an extraordinary charge to make. One can hardly see the object which would have induced an Administration commanding a majority of twenty in the House where this Bill was not read a third time, to slight the prerogatives of the Lieutenant-Governor with regard to a Chamber where all know, according to Parliamentary practice and principle, discussion most takes place and all the objections to a Bill are generally met. It is a strange reason to give as justification for his conduct in dismissing his Cabinet, and particularly when we find the supposed offence was committed in 1876, and the dismissal was accomplished only in 1878; we are lost in amazement to think that gentlemen who could have been considered worthy to administer the affairs of the Province of Quebec should have seen the Lieutenant-Governor stoop to advance such a reason as this for their dismissal. But what are the facts? Why, that by an accident, the Clerk of the House certified that the Bill which the Quebec Government intended to oppose had been read the third time, and he supposed was to be assented to in the ordinary course; that upon this matter being discovered by the Attorney-General, attention was drawn to it, and a representation was made to Ottawa for the purpose of having the Bill disallowed. Now, this is the fact which the papers brought down plainly and unmistakably prove—that this Bill, which he complains he was forced to assent to in 1876, was assented to through the accident I spoke of—that his attention was at once drawn to it, not by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, but by his advisers, that they advised him to represent to the Minister of Justice of the day, Mr.

Blake, that, under these circumstances, the Bill ought to be disallowed; and that Minister answered, saying that the Bill, not having been read a third time, in both Houses, was only waste paper, and that there was no necessity for its disallowance. When we consider that this great State paper was sent to the Governor-General as an explanatory case, as a reason for assisting the Lieutenant-Governor out of his difficulties—that he tells us in it what took place in 1876, this mere slight omission, this clerical error, makes him stand self-condemned; because no man who had a better case would present one like that to justify the dismissal of his Ministers. We would hardly send away a footman on a pretence like that; and yet, under responsible government, these rights of the people are to be violated in this manner. Charge No. 2 is, perhaps, even more contemptible than the one to which I have just adverted. The Lieutenant-Governor says that a Bill, during the same Session, was submitted for his assent. He says: "On examining it, I perceived a blank which had not been filled up, which I pointed out to the Premier in a letter." He adds: "The Premier came to me and said that he regretted the omission; requested me to give my sanction to the Bill in the state in which it was. The conciliatory spirit which I showed in granting my consent seemed to please him." Now, what are the facts? I find the Bill, No. 19, of the Statutes of the Province of Quebec for 1876, was introduced in the Legislative Council, where they had no power to impose a money penalty, for which they had to leave a blank. Passing through the Lower House the amount was not inserted, when the Government introduced another Bill, No. 20, to correct that mistake, to both of which Mr. Letellier assented at the same moment, and yet he writes to Mr. De Boucherville, vainly imagining the papers would not be brought to light, saying the Premier came to him, observed he regretted the omission, and requested him to sanction the Bill in the state in which it was. How is it possible to reconcile that statement with what we find in the Statute-book? Yet Mr. Letellier brought that statement forward, two years afterwards, as a grave charge against the Administration, and his reasons for dismissing it. The next charge, No. 3, relates to the appointment of a municipal councillor for the south ward of the village of Montmagny, under the pretext that there had been no election; or, if so, it was illegal. We have a long story on this subject, the gist of it being this: According to the law of Quebec, with which we have nothing to do, and which, I assume, the Lieutenant-Governor was bound to administer, if a difficulty arose in the election of a councillor, instead of settling it, as we do in Ontario, by a resort to the law Courts, they settle it by the Executive. In this particular case the matter was formally brought before the proper officer, the Attorney-General, upon whose report and counsel the Lieutenant-Governor appointed a gentleman to fill the vacancy. So far there does not appear to be anything extraordinary in that proceeding. It may not be in accordance with his notions or the practice in the other Provinces, but I believe that one of the strongest reasons for our Federal Constitution and the separate Provincial Governments is that the people of Quebec desire to govern themselves in their own way; and, therefore, they have their own Code, according to which the Government acted. It appeared afterwards, by some influence which does not clearly appear, that the Lieutenant-Governor prevailed upon his Council, contrary to their own idea of what was right—they wishing to prevent any difficulty—to cancel that appointment. Surely that hardly forms a ground for the dismissal of the Administration two years afterwards. On the contrary, if it shows anything, it is that the De Boucherville Government to some extent yielded their own convictions, when, perhaps, they ought to have stood firm, in order to oblige the Lieutenant-Governor. It is alleged—I do not know with what truth—that this action was at the instance of a gentleman outside the Cabinet, who ought not to have been an adviser of His Honour. Backstair influence was brought to bear not only in this, but in other instances. Now, the fourth charge is hardly one that I can speak of as a definite and distinct allegation of impropriety on the part of the Government. It merely states the fact that, in a letter written to Mr. Chapleau, these words occurred: "Please oblige me by telling the Premier that if he needs my concurrence, Mr. Gauthier may bring down to me the documents requiring my signature." The fifth charge is this:

"QUEBEC, 6th November, 1877.

"(Private.)

"MY DEAR DEBOUCHERVILLE,—In the last Official Gazette were published, under my signature, two proclamations which I had not signed.

"One was for the summoning of Parliament, which I had reserved in order to confer with you; the other, which I did not even see, appoints a day of thanksgiving.

"These proceedings, the nature of which I shall not characterise, entail, apart from their impropriety, invalidities which you will easily understand.

"Yours very truly,

"(Signed) L. LETELLIER.

"The Hon. C. B. DEBOUCHERVILLE,

"Premier."

"The following are the notes which I took of the conversation which I had with M. DeBoucherville on the subject:—

"M. DeBoucherville came on the same day he received the letter, to tell me that he regretted that the thing had occurred, and that it was no fault of his. I accepted the excuse, and I then told him that I would not tolerate my name being used when necessary for any duty of my office unless the documents requiring my signature had been previously submitted to me, and unless information was afforded to me, which M. DeBoucherville assured me would be the course followed in future.

"(Signed) 'L. L.'"

Now, what were those proclamations? It turns out one was a formal proclamation, not for summoning Parliament, as stated here, but for proroguing Parliament. It was a document purely formal in its character, which, as my hon. friend here (Sir John A. Macdonald) says, is never in practice brought before the Governor, and which, in Ontario, Mr. Mowat speaks of as being of so little consequence that it might even be issued before the House could properly be called for the despatch of business. We all understand they are not required to be brought formally before the Executive; and, therefore, I am astonished to find such a charge from one who ought to understand something of responsible government and the working of our institutions. The other proclamation appointed a day of thanksgiving, and it appeared the day had been fixed by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House. He wrote to Mr. Letellier, desiring it should be the same day as fixed in the other parts of the Dominion. Mr. Letellier conveyed that letter to his Council, who, after some demurring, fixed the day desired. Is there a reasonable man in this country who would say that there was any offence in this purely formal document, brought to the notice of the Executive, in order that he might sign his name, directed by Orders in Council assented to by Mr. Letellier? It appears to me, the statement of such grounds for the dismissal of his Administration comes from him with a very bad grace. Perhaps I should characterise it in much harsher and stronger language. Now, we come to complaint No. 6, with regard to the formation of rings. He says that Mr. DeBoucherville admitted they controlled the Legislature in 1876. All I can say with regard to this is that, if the charge is correct, the DeBoucherville Government ought to have been dismissed in 1876. It is needless to discuss whether the rings did or did not control Mr. DeBoucherville, because he distinctly denied any such thing existed, or that such statement was ever made by him, and also, conclusively, reasons that he could not have said so, and that the railway measure introduced by his Government followed the elections. When the question of the building of this line of road had been before the people, the question asked and put to both parties was, whether they were favourable to the construction of these roads, and, if I remember the facts rightly, the policy for constructing these roads met with no opposition in the House. Again, Sir, we have to recollect that a gentleman occupying so high a position should not have forgotten himself so far as to be guilty of the misrepresentation which is conveyed in this charge. We have still another charge; but, I think, it is not necessary we should deal with it here. It relates to the conduct of the Attorney-General in announcing his dismissal from office. That, certainly, could not be any justification for his dismissal. That may have been in accordance with constitutional usage, or it may not. I must confess, Sir, that I do not understand it is within the power either of the Lieutenant-

Governor or of the Ministry to say that the other shall go. On the contrary, I understand, if our Administration either resigned or was dismissed, we would be entitled to the very fullest explanation, and it would be a breach of privilege if any demand was made by the Executive authority to withhold from the House the fullest possible explanation of the cause of disagreement. I have now, Sir, gone over seriatim the different charges which have been made in this explanatory case, and I appeal to every fair-minded man in this House if there is one solitary reason here which commends itself to our sense of justice, in view of our rights under the Parliamentary form of Government. I appeal to every hon. member of this House if the recital of these grounds does not establish, in the clearest possible manner, that the Lieutenant-Governor was casting about for reasons; that he had not, if I may be permitted to say so, honestly dismissed his Administration. He had been seeking for reasons of complaint against them, seeking for grounds of excuse upon which to found these trumped-up charges which appeared in the explanatory case. For my part, I do not think it is right we should go into the merits of this railway measure, or the merits of this Tax Bill. It is sufficient for me to know that the people of the Province of Quebec, by their representatives, passed these measures by large majorities. It is sufficient for me to know that they, having responsible government and constitutional rights, were satisfied that those measures were in their interest. I do not understand that the Lieutenant-Governor had any right to dictate, and say that they were not in their interest. An extract has been read from a speech that Lord Dufferin made at the Reform banquet—a speech which, I think, shows the position in which the Executive stands with the Parliament of the country. He had been complimented at this great banquet—a banquet at which, I believe, the most liberal minds of England, at all events many of the most distinguished, were present—complimented for his wise administration of Canadian affairs. And how does he answer that? Does he take credit to himself for all the results of that administration. No; we have heard what he said. Now, Sir, in the Province of Quebec, Mr. Letellier thought otherwise. When George the Third attempted to make his Administration pliable to his own peculiar wishes, there was not to be found a single public man in England who would do so. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was merely the pivot on which the Constitution worked, and knew that he had only to assist the Administration in carrying on their affairs. Perhaps no hon. gentleman can be found with the hardihood to get up and say that the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Administration is in itself an act to be justified. The hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition, in the debate which took place on this question last Session, did not deny the right of this Parliament to criticise and examine this matter. He did not say one solitary word, if I read his speech correctly, which would show that he had so far forgotten his professions of a lifetime and the tenets of the great party which he leads, to justify the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor; but he thought that the discussion was untimely, and that, during the pendency of the election, that it was unwise for the House to express an opinion, which, in point of fact, would be adopting the policy of either one party or the other that were then engaged in the electoral contest. Perhaps he went so far, though I am not quite sure about that, as to say that the result of the election would be conclusive; that, as he understood responsible government, it would depend upon what the people of the Province of Quebec thought, whether they would sustain Mr. DeBoucherville's successor, who, according to the Constitution, was bound to assume the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor, and all responsibility for them, and had assumed to justify his conduct on that occasion. Well, Sir, we know the election has since taken place; we know that there was a very considerable change in the sentiment of the House that was elected, and it may be claimed that the result of that election was to justify the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor on that occasion. I do not know, Sir, that that ground will be taken, but I have this to say, that that is not, in my humble judgment, a ground that can be successfully maintained. I see my hon. friend laughing; we will, no doubt, have the benefit of his judgment and experience on the subject before long. In the meantime he will allow me to express my humble opinion, be it worth little or much. In the first place, the Lieutenant-Governor is not responsible to the people of the Province of Quebec. That is the first answer I give to that argument, if it should be advanced. He is an officer of the Dominion Government, and is responsible to the Dominion authorities, just as the Governor-General is answerable to the authority of the Colonial Secretary as the Queen's adviser, with regard to such matters, and the Lieutenant-Governor owes no responsibility in any way to the Provincial Parliament in that Province. His advisers—and he must have advisers for everything he does—have to justify their conduct to Parliament, but the maxim that “the King cannot do harm,” holds good here, as it does everywhere, but he has to have advisers, and the advisers are the parties who must bear the responsibility and blame. But, Sir, there is a better reason, perhaps, than that, if a better reason was required; that is, that the people of the Province of Quebec did not sanction this act; the people of that Province refused distinctly to assume it. And, knowing their duty, their responsibility, carefully making out what was their right and their duty, they have agreed that the Government that succeeded Mr. DeBoucherville, should be sustained, that their measures should be adopted, and that they should have what is called a fair trial. They, with equal distinctness, refused to sanction or agree to the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in the dismissal of Mr. DeBoucherville. Now at page 25 we will find a resolution which we know was carried into effect, viz:—

“That this House, while expressing its firm determination to insist on the strictest economy in every branch of the public service, and on the closest supervision over the expenses of the administration, regrets that the present advisers of His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor should have persisted in remaining in power without having been supported by the majority of the Legislative Assembly upon their taking office, and without yet being supported by such majority.”

So that we have the refusal of the newly elected House of the Province of Quebec, elected under the auspices of the Governor that succeeded Mr. DeBoucherville, elected by means which we know were used in order to carry that election, to sanction the wrong that had been done by the dismissal of Mr. DeBoucherville's Government. And, Sir, we have a very grave statement made here by the Lieutenant-Governor in his answer to the complaint and the accusation made against him. He says on page 38 :—

"In support of that allegation, they furnish a copy of a resolution adopted by a majority of one, when the House was not full, concealing the fact that the following resolution was immediately adopted in a full House as an amendment and an addition to the one alluded to by the memorialists :

"That nevertheless under the present circumstances, this House believes it to be its duty to give a general and independent support to the Government, in such a manner that the measures which it proposes, may be submitted to the judgment of this House."

Why, Sir, I think that the statement he then made as to the rights of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, could not be better exemplified, better justified, than by these two resolutions. Their meeting was in the month of June, the supplies had only been voted to the thirtieth of that month; if they refused to vote the supplies, if they refused to allow the new Government time to develop their plans and measures, the whole country would be in confusion, and anarchy would prevail, and they said, we will, under the present circumstances, give them the fullest possible latitude to develop the measures which they propose to submit to the judgment of this Assembly.

Mr. MACKENZIE : That is all any Government wants.

Mr. McCARTHY : No doubt it is all any Government wants. I trust my hon. friend would not be content with a majority of one. I trust my hon. friend would not like to lead this House by the casting vote of the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I have seen the hon. gentleman do it.

Mr. McCARTHY : I trust my hon. friend would not be guilty of the conduct we know obtained the support of that Speaker.

MR. MACKENZIE : I have known him do that too.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : You never knew me to buy a Speaker.

MR. McCARTHY : My hon. friend disdains all practice of corruption, he has never been guilty of dishonest transactions. I am bound to believe all that in a parliamentary sense. I believe, and I am assured that my hon. friend would not be bound to purchase as Speaker a gentleman who had been a supporter of Mr. DeBoucherville, and who, on the day the House of Assembly met, went over to the new Government, receiving, as the price of his shame, the office of Speaker. All I can say is that, if my hon. friend thinks the denouement of the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor, is justifiable, and that responsible government has been satisfied, because the present Administration in the Province of Quebec are able to carry on its affairs by the casting vote of the Speaker, he is welcome to his opinion. And now, Sir, having a vacancy in that House, they have allowed months to go by without taking any particular steps to fill it, because they have reason to believe that this solitary influence which they have would be destroyed. If my hon. friend thinks that this is constitutional government, I do not care to look at the matter through his spectacles. Here is a letter which my hon. friend has just handed me, under date April 2, 1878, from Mr. Turcotte :—

"I have never authorized any one to publish or announce in the journals that I would support the Joly Government, and I have not even dreamed of doing so. I desire and intend to solicit the suffrages of the electors as a Conservative, consequently I will be opposed to the present Government."

Now, can anything be plainer than that the affairs of the Province of Quebec are administered by virtue of the casting vote of this, Mr. Turcotte, who, in violation of the pledges to his constituency—the pledges upon which he obtained his election—has sustained that Government, and has enabled them, up to this time, in defiance of the Constitution—I hesitate not to say so—to carry on and administer the affairs of the Government. There is, perhaps, one other argument which might be used to justify this House in refusing to censure the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. I have heard the argument used, and I will just mention it, not that I think there is any weight to be attached to it, but I will refer to it as the only possible ground which could justify hon. gentlemen, as it appears to me, in voting against this resolution. That argument is, that, during last Session, this matter was passed upon by this House, when it refused to carry a motion similar in purport, if not in language, to the one now in your hands; and that the Lieutenant-Governor is now being tried a second time for the same offence. Well, Sir, we are not trying him at all, nor has he been tried. We are here, as a newly elected Parliament, to correct many grievances, to undo a good deal of what was done last Parliament. We are not going to be bound, I trust, by the last Parliament. When I look upon my hon. friends on the Opposition side of the House, I have a living proof that this House entertains very different opinions on great public questions to those entertained by the House, led by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). Therefore, Sir, this matter being one which has been submitted to the people throughout the whole Dominion, and one which has formed a very pointed issue in the Province of Quebec, we are bound to give effect to the wishes of our constituents, and to pronounce upon this matter, notwithstanding what the other House had done. I hardly can imagine it can be, for one moment, seriously contended that we are not authorised in the fullest manner to deal with it. I should like to have discussed in this speech, the various grounds which induced, or which, according to this paper, appeared to have induced, the Lieutenant-Governor to have summarily dismissed the DeBoucherville Administration. I have not done justice to the subject, and it seems to me extraordinary that we should, in Canada, at this period of the 19th century, be investigating a subject of responsible government; but it is one example more that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and we have constantly to be on our guard against our Lieutenant-Governors, and possibly it might be, some day or other, and I trust it will not be in our day, against Governors-General, in order to protect the rights of the people, which we are sent here to protect; and I trust we will be always proud to claim that we are here possessed of a Constitution that is not inferior to any other. We believe we have got a Constitution in which liberty prevails more generally and more widely than under any Constitution of this globe; and, if it is worth having, it is certainly worth protecting. We know it was not obtained in the country without generations of labour on the part of the public men. We know, in this country, that it was not obtained without noble self-sacrifice and self-denial. And I think, Sir, we are not so degenerate as not to understand the privileges and blessings that we possess. I think, Sir, we will maintain, on this occasion, as on any other occasion when the question has to be presented to us, that the rights of the people are paramount in constitutional government, and that these rights will be held against any use or abuse that may be made of the Royal prerogative.

MR. OUMET: Before I put the motion I now hold in my hand, I may be permitted to say a few words in explanation of it. The question now before this House is, in my opinion, the most important question that may come up for the consideration of this House. Everyone knows that this question was up before the House last year; but, unfortunately, power existed stronger than any Constitution, and caused the question to be left without any solution. The motion as it stands is, word for word, the same motion that was put last year. It is a motion declaratory of a principle which those gentlemen who brought the question before the House desired should be established, without any shifting, without any amendment. In making this motion, I do not desire to preclude any further debate on the subject, but to bring it before the House in its full sense. I beg to move that the question be now put. This motion does not close the debate; on the contrary, the debate may go on as long as it may be deemed necessary. If I may be allowed to cite a precedent, I would cite the precedent which was made in the discussion which took place when certain resolutions were moved in the Legislative Assembly of the old Province of Canada, in Quebec, for the establishment of this Confederation. This motion was put by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, and the debate continued, but no amendment could be proposed. Thus, the real question before the House had to be adhered to, and brought to a straight issue.

MR. MACKENZIE: I regret exceedingly, Sir, that the hon. gentleman opposite and his colleagues have not had the courage to take this matter into their own hands. I regret exceedingly to find one of the Ministers of the Crown gently preparing the way that the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) should be seen first by Mr. Speaker in order to get a motion in, which would preclude the putting in of an amendment. It shows an amount of courage on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that is astonishing. It shows a confidence in their own judgment that ought to commend itself to all the inhabitants of this country. Here, Sir, we have a Government, powerful in their majority, who are endeavouring, by getting members on the back benches to submit a motion condemning the wisdom of the Lieutenant-Governor, to shirk what is their own duty in the premises. If they believed the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec acted unconstitutionally and improperly, it was their duty to dismiss that gentleman and then to submit the reasons to Parliament. But, Sir, as the law provides, what do we find? In the first place we find the hon. gentleman standing where I now stand, as leader of the Opposition, last year, moving a motion exactly similar in terms to the motion now submitted. He was not prepared then to say that the action of the Lieutenant Governor was unconstitutional. He was forced, after devoting weeks of preparation to the motion, hunting up precedents, and making a long speech, a very able speech—though very little of it touched the question at issue—he was forced to come to the conclusion, at last, that he would only say in the motion that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was unwise; and he proposed then, as his followers propose now, to gravely sit in judgment—to use the words of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—upon the actions of the Lieutenant-Governor and the Government of the Dominion, as to whether the course of the former was wise or unwise. They did not then, Sir, venture upon direct condemnation in terms which would justify them in dismissing, or justify any Government in dismissing, that dignitary. Now, Sir, what is the true position of the question at the present time? When this transaction took place, I had the honour of being at the head of the Government, and it would have been my duty, as head of the Government, and it would have been the duty of the Government I led, if we believed that the Quebec Governor had acted unconstitutionally, to have dismissed that Governor and accounted to Parliament for the action, stating the reasons as required by the Constitutional Act. We did not consider that we had any grounds for such dismissal. We knew perfectly well that he did not, as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said, create a prerogative. He exercised a prerogative he had confided to his care. We did not believe he was acting beyond his powers in the course he had adopted. As to whether he was wise or unwise was an individual matter of opinion, and far be it from me, on any occasion, to say that any person, acting in the capacity of King or Governor, should strain to the utmost the legitimate powers which he possesses. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman opposite, who now leads the Government, came forward with his motion, declaring that it was unwise and that his action was subversive of the position of his advisers. Of course it was, for it subverted them from their places. It was a mere truism. But as to whether we should pronounce upon the wisdom or unwisdom of the action, I believed we had no right to pronounce upon it. I believe it was wholly mischievous for this Parliament, then and now, to undertake to try every action of a Governor, whether it was wise or unwise at the moment. I then said, as a reason for the course I took as leader of the Government, in opposing the hon. gentleman's motion, that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's then Ministers became responsible for his action in this matter ; they stood between him and the people. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) wasted a good deal of his time to prove that the Lieutenant-Governor had no business to dissolve the House without the assent of his Ministers. Well, Sir, he was wrong in the assumption that this was done ; he had the power, but the power was not exercised, and it is not necessary to consider to what extent it exists. He dissolved Parliament on the advice of his new Ministers, and the country sustained his Ministers.

Some HON. MEMBERS : No ; no.

MR. MACKENZIE : I listened with the greatest possible attention to my hon. friends who made able speeches in support of their views. It was quite true I was not able to follow the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) as I would like to have done, but I know what arguments have been used, and I propose to deal with them briefly. My hon. friend, I say, assumed that the Lieutenant-Governor dissolved Parliament of his own volition. He did nothing of the kind. He dissolved Parliament under the advice of his constitutional advisers—

Some HON. GENTLEMEN : No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE : That was the question that came up before the electors. It was the subject of dispute at the polls, and the Ministry that assumed that responsibility are at this moment conducting successfully the affairs of the Province of Quebec. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, responsible for the administration of this House, seek to relegate to their supporters on the back benches the responsibility which they did not take in hand themselves, as they ought to do.

MR. OUIMET : These back benches were very handy for you last year.

MR. MACKENZIE : I am quite prepared for any interruption from the hon. member for Laval, but his interruptions will not cause me the slightest uneasiness.

MR. OUIMET : I know that very well.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE : I have the floor at present.

MR. SPEAKER : Order.

MR. MACKENZIE : The Government, I say, relegated the subject to members on the back benches, and relegated to the member for Laval the rather inglorious part he has acted in the discussion ; and he is content, it seems, with the position afforded him. Well, Sir, we must not judge people too harshly ; he knows his own strength. Now, Sir, the Ministry of Governor Letellier, having thus appealed to the country and obtained a majority of the people's representatives to sustain them—

Some HON. MEMBERS : No ; no.

MR. MACKENZIE : Will hon. gentlemen allow me to make my speech ? I never interrupted them. Their interruptions will not affect the question one whit. I am simply stating my view of the matter. My hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) should not be so impatient, and I accept this impatience as a sign of the weakness of their cause. My hon. friend from Bagot will remember that, on a remarkable occasion, recorded in ancient history, the prophets of the true God and the prophets of Baal were assembled on a particular occasion, and it was said the prophets of Baal imagined they would be heard for their much speaking. My hon. friend is playing the same rôle to-night. A good cause does not require so much shouting and so much speaking. We have simply to consider in this case what standing we have as a Legislature in the matter. Are we to understand, by the argument of the hon. gentleman that we are here for the purpose, as he stated, to use his own words, " of sitting in judgment upon the conduct of Lieutenant-Governors, as to whether their actions are wise or unwise ? " Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, if the Ministry who induced him to take up this matter—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No.

MR. MACKENZIE : If they believed that the Lieutenant-Governor acted unconstitutionally and improperly, if he is guilty of the crime of exceeding his powers for partisan objects, as they have asserted, why did they not say so in so many words, and take the vote of the House upon it? Why endeavour, in this manner, for the third time, to place a man in jeopardy for an alleged offence, contrary to all judicial precedent and practice? The hon. gentleman who seconded this motion says this is not the same Court; that the last Parliament was a Court, but did not include the next one that assembled. The hon. gentleman assumed an exceedingly judicial tone when he commenced his remarks. He declared this must be considered free from all party bias; that, if it was found that the Lieutenant-Governor was improperly accused, after this investigation—what was the investigation? My hon. friend's speech; that was the investigation—my hon. friend said that if, after this investigation, he was found to have been improperly accused, then we must vote down this resolution. I have no doubt my hon. friend was considering whether he could vote down this resolution or not, when he uttered these sentences. No doubt he was considering the feasibility, if not the propriety, of so voting down the resolution, or he would not have uttered these words so deliberately, and in a tone of judicial deliberation, for which I credited him at the moment with all possible praise. But he passed on, and, as his speech progressed, so did his anger and indignation increase, until he ended with declaring that this gentleman whom he was to treat free from all party bias, and to deal with in this judicial spirit, had acted with a tyrannical spirit, was guilty of deception, misrepresentation, and that he endeavoured to trump up charges against his Ministry, in order to justify his dismissal of them. Where did the hon. gentleman expect to find this calm deliberation with which he predicated his remarks? Was it in his own speech? Did he expect every man here to make a speech expressing his convictions, beginning in the judicial spirit and ending in a recriminatory condemnation, the criminal to be executed at once? That was worse than a trial by a single Judge. The hon. gentleman constituted himself Judge and jury; and this, we are told, is the proper spirit in which to consider the matter. I have never heard, since I have been in Parliament, stronger language applied to any person charged with an offence, than that used by hon. gentlemen opposite. We know by the language of the Press, by the language of the papers that are before us, from Mr. Letellier's late Ministers, that this spirit pervades the entire discussion on that one side; that there is an entire absence of the judicial spirit. I take the ground that this Parliament has no business in this matter—has no standing-ground upon which to propose this resolution. My hon. friend opposite knows quite well—no man knows better—what his duty in this case is. His duty is what I have already stated. If he believes this Parliament has a right to interfere, as this motion proposes to interfere, then it is his duty to bring down a reason why he has not dismissed the Lieutenant-Governor. He has not dismissed him. He has now been five months in office. He did not allege a year ago that he should be dismissed; that he had acted unconstitutionally; and now he endeavours by a sideward proposition, the very words proposed last year, to secure some kind of a vote against the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, upon which he hopes to base some ulterior action. This is the straightforward course that the hon. member for Simcoe would have us to believe they intended to enter upon in proposing this resolution. There was never anything more dangerous brought into the Federal Legislature than this attempt to interfere with the autonomy of the Provinces. The hon. member for Simcoe said rightly that the true policy for the country to pursue is to allow the people to govern. Well, the people of Quebec have decided this matter. At the time that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier dismissed his Ministers, they were opposed to the Administration that succeeded Mr. DeBoucherville. It is well known that Mr. Joly, as leader of the Opposition, commanded a comparatively small support in the House of Assembly, and it is believed that, if the contest at a general election then, had proceeded exclusively upon the usual old party lines—at least, it was firmly believed by most people—it would be very doubtful, indeed, if Mr. Joly could get a majority; but when the dissolution took place, and the issue was squarely put before the people, as to whether they approved of the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Administration or not, and the accession to power of the Joly Administration, the people of the Province of Quebec, instead of being a large majority in favour of Mr. DeBoucherville and his Administration, gave a majority the other way, and in support—

Several Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen opposite may say "No," and may possibly think no; but here is one broad, undeniable fact, that the Joly Administration still lives; that the Government of Mr. Joly carried all its measures through Parliament. Here is an undeniable fact, that the Opposition to the Joly Administration attempted to stop the supplies, and, when they found they could not stop the supplies, they walked out of the House and the Government got its supplies. The hon. member for Simcoe said the public necessities were great, the time for which money had been voted was about to expire, and, from purely patriotic motives, the majority in that House decided that they would listen to Mr. Joly submitting his measures to the judgment of the House. Not only did they listen to him submitting his measures to the judgment of the House, but the judgment of the House went in favour of his measures, and the majority of the people, as represented in that House, voted for them. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman opposite that it is a thoroughly just constitutional mode of checking any act of any arbitrary power to suspend the Supply Bill. That is a well-known expedient frequently and properly resorted to, and I am quite certain that there is not as much meekness in the whole Ministerial bench opposite as would have induced them to refrain in Quebec from stopping the supplies if they thought they could do so. And I am quite sure of another thing, that no Conservative Ministry ever existed in this country which possessed more vim, more audacious energy, than did Mr. DeBoucherville's Government. I recollect well that so strong was their intense partisan feeling that they committed the impropriety of declining to attend a dinner to the Governor-General, because the then leader of the Federal Government—a political opponent—was invited to be present. These are the sort of men who are supposed to have been so meek, that in order that the public accounts should be paid, they were willing to vote the supplies to a Government in which they had no confidence. Does any one believe that they should do so? I would not pretend to any such patriotism as that. If I were in that House, and believed the Lieutenant-Governor had acted unconstitutionally, arbitrarily, and tyrannically, as the followers of Mr. DeBoucherville say they believed, I certainly would not have, on any consideration, voted for the supplies, or given any vote which would have the effect of keeping that Administration in office. Although all these things were fully considered in the House of Assembly of Quebec, we find that Mr. Joly's Government was sustained; its measures were carried through, and Mr. Joly is, at this moment, a successful administrator of the affairs of his native Province. We are asked in this House, in an insidious, improper, unconstitutional, unparliamentary manner, gravely to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor, his advisers, and the people of the Province of Quebec, all in one batch, by this motion. I say, if we vote to-day, after the Lieutenant-Governor has been on his trial twice, if we had voted, even in the first place—it makes no difference as to that—that a particular action of a particular Governor and his Government is unwise, then where are we to stop? Is there any stopping place? Whenever a majority of this House entertains a belief that the action of a particular Lieutenant-Governor in any one of our Provinces is adverse to the interests of the party in the majority in this House, then a member will only have to bring up a motion here declaring that the action of the Governor in some particular was unwise, and I have confidence enough in the intense party feeling which prevails in this country on occasions of electoral excitement, to say there is a strong probability, under ordinary circumstances, of such a motion obtaining the support of those who believe that such interference as this is proper and constitutional. Our constitutional system of Government is on trial at this moment. One of the most precious principles of this constitutional government is to preserve intact the autonomy of the respective Provinces. It is the only security that the small Provinces have that the rapacity or the selfishness or the improper views of public Government which may be taken by the major or larger Provinces shall not be imposed upon them, and, if there is one Province that more particularly requires the shield of the constitutional authority to be thrown around it, it is the Province of Quebec.

MR. MASSON: Protect us against the Federal Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: It may well require to be protected against the gentlemen who are at present on the Treasury benches. These gentlemen are aiming a blow at the independence of Provincial Governments. It is impossible for the House to interfere continually in the actions of Lieutenant-Governors, without submitting those Governors and their Governments to particular danger, and I am sure my hon. friend for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) must see that and acknowledge it, whatever part he takes in this debate, and, with his usual candour, will be prepared to say that, if carrying the motion or submitting it were to result in such a course as that, it would be a most disastrous one for our system of Government. I am a devotee to our present system of Government. I did my best to assist in its inauguration. I believe its existence is essential to the prosperity of the country, and view with alarm any course which may be taken by this or any of the branches of Parliament in the Dominion to interfere with perfect independence of Provincial action in all our Provinces. I was glad, Sir, to hear a full-bred Tory, like the hon. member for North Simcoe, defend responsible government. It is a good sign of the times, but I am sure that when he thinks over this matter he will come to the conclusion that in his speech to-night he was hostile to responsible government; and, however much we may differ, and I grant that hon. gentlemen opposite may fairly differ in opinion from gentlemen on this side, in this particular case—I quite admit they may fairly have a strong view of the unwisdom of the action of Governor Letellier, and gentlemen on this side may also believe to a greater or less extent in the wisdom of the action of the Governor—it is one thing to believe that that action has been wise or unwise, and another to declare that it deserves and should have the active interference of the Federal Parliament. I do not propose, for one moment, to waste the time of the House or my own time in discussing the merits of the dispute between Governor Letellier and his Ministers. Those who belong to the Province of Quebec may do so if they like. Those who desire to enter into that discussion, as if it formed an element which ought to guide us in our decision, may do so. I do not think that, even if the two hon. gentlemen opposite were to prove all that they asserted, and I am sure they cannot do that, it would affect in the slightest degree the vote I shall give on this matter. I would, all the same, vote against any interference with provincial action, unless, indeed, the Government were prepared, and brought down reasons, to show that the action was unconstitutional, wholly improper, beyond his powers, that his continuance in office was a danger, a public menace to the security of the country. Then I would be disposed quite to consider such a motion as that upon its merits. That, however, is not alleged by any one. I must assume, therefore, that the Government, having been five months in office, fully acquainted with the minutæ of this subject, were not prepared to take such grounds as that as a Government, or, if they were prepared to take such ground as a Government, they deserve the censure of this House for not having taken it promptly. It will not do for them to say that they waited until they could get what the hon. member for Simcoe calls the judgment of this House. The judgment of this House has no existence on the subject which can possibly affect the position of the Government. Suppose this motion were carried to-night, the Government would not dare to dismiss Governor Letellier upon such a motion, because it does not assert what is necessary to be asserted as a pre-requisite for such action as that ; and because the initiative rests with the Government, who have first to remove a Lieutenant-Governor for cause, and then report the fact and reasons therefor to Parliament. I have, therefore, confined myself to the question which I have already discussed, namely, the danger of interfering with Provincial Government, and to declaring my opinion that no case has arisen, by the confession of the Ministers in this House, which would justify us in such an interference as the motion now practically invokes. I feel quite certain that every member of this House, when he considers the position of the Provinces relatively to each other and the Dominion, must come to the conclusion that our federal system is a fraud, if this Parliament is to constantly exercise surveillance over the actions of the Local Legislatures and Local Governors, which are subject to the usual approval or disapproval of the people of such Province. We may as well, at once, revert to our former system of Government, however inconvenient it may be. A Legislative Union, with all its evils, in a country diversified as ours is, in many respects would be infinitely preferable to a federal system which vests all the power in the federal authorities, and where the federal authorities were disposed to use that power tyrannically towards the Provinces. Both the hon. gentlemen who spoke on the subject, the hon. members for Simcoe and Bagot (Messrs. McCarthy and Mousseau) alluded to a former case of this kind in Canada, and to the action taken on it by the Liberal party. I am not aware that the Liberal party, on any occasion, ever invoked Imperial aid or assistance in settling political disputes. I believe they did not. We had strong reason to condemn the conduct of Lord Metcalfe towards his advisers, but we brought it out at the polls ; not one petition or remonstrance was sent to the Imperial authorities concerning it. We believed it was a question wholly for the people to settle. The people did settle it, as the people of Quebec have settled their case already ; and, if the hon. gentleman who moves in the matter here proposes any settlement, it is a settlement to undo what the will of the people has dictated as the proper course to be pursued.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACDOUGALL said it was not his intention to make any observations at this stage of the discussion ; but the motion of his hon. friend (Mr. Ouimet) compelled him to ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. He regretted very much the hon. gentleman had made that motion. He (Mr. Macdougall) saw no occasion for it ; besides, it rather implied a feeling of distrust among the supporters of the main motion as to the strength of their case. The precedent cited to justify it was not parallel. The motion of the right hon. gentleman who led the House was made after many days' debate, when there was a general opinion in the House that the question was ripe for decision.

AN HON. MEMBER : No.

MR. MACDOUGALL : Yes. But on this occasion the motion was made before the question had, in reality, been discussed. They had not heard any views in opposition to those of the hon. gentleman who had submitted the motion, and he (Mr. Macdougall) really felt the case had been prejudged by a motion for the previous question, which would have the effect of preventing a full and free discussion of a most important question. He hoped, therefore, they would not be left in that position ; that his hon. friend would be induced to withdraw his motion. If the main motion was fit to be discussed, if it was in their constitutional right to deal with it, then he thought there should be freedom of discussion, and the right to offer amendments. The motion might not contain exactly the proposition the majority of the House might be disposed to adopt, and they ought to have the privilege of amending it in accordance with their views. But, if he would not withdraw it, he (Mr. Macdougall) would direct the attention of the House to one or two points involved in the resolution. He had no hesitation in expressing his opinion as a private citizen, and as a public man, in condemnation of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in dismissing his Ministry under the circumstances. He thought so at the time ; he had read the statements of the late Ministers and the Lieutenant-Governor, and had since seen nothing to change his view that their dismissal was an improper and, in one sense, an unconstitutional exercise of the prerogative of the Crown. The question was one that had attracted the attention of the people of Quebec and the Dominion generally, and came in regular course and form, he presumed, under the attention of the constitutional authority for dealing with it, namely, the Government of the Dominion. Under our Constitutional Act, the Governors of the Provinces were appointed for five years, certain, and were not removable except for cause; that cause to be assigned and communicated to them by the Federal Executive. That power and duty, as he read the Act, was imposed upon the Government of the Dominion who were to act in the first instance. The Lieutenant-Governors were the appointees of that Government, and accountable to them for misconduct or disobedience of instructions. He had no doubt the Federal Government of the day examined this case with great care, and evidently came to the conclusion there was no cause for removal which they could assign to Parliament as they were bound to do by the Constitutional Act. The question was not disposed of by the refusal of the Government of the day to pass an order for removal. He admitted it was quite open to Parliament to discuss any matter affecting the general interests and welfare of the Dominion, brought under its notice by any hon. member, and, possibly, the general conduct of a Governor or even of a local Executive Council, under certain circumstances. But, in this case, though the general Government refused to entertain the matter publicly, it was brought under the notice of Parliament by the motion of a leading member of the then Opposition, and a very able, exhaustive and highly constitutional speech was made in support of that motion by the leader of the present Government. He (Mr. Macdougall) was not then a member of the House, but, in the gallery, listened to that speech with great attention, instruction and admiration, as one of the most able expositions of constitutional principles he had ever heard in Parliament. But, notwithstanding, the House declined to interfere, and, by a vote of 112 to 70, the motion was defeated. Therefore, the House of Commons pronounced upon that question. After the first and proper constitutional tribunal had declined to interfere, this House found the Governor of Quebec not guilty of the offence charged against him. It remained to be dealt with by another tribunal, the electors of Quebec, to whom an appeal was made. His Honour's conduct being the principal issue of the election; and, although it might be truly said there were some improper practices in the elections, and in dealing with some of the members returned, yet the fact was recorded in the history of the time; the majority of the representatives of the people sustained the Lieutenant-Governor through his Administration.

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

MR. MACDOUGALL said they were there to day. Their laws were upon the Statute-book, and had not been disallowed. Therefore, he held that the electors approved of the Lieutenant-Governor's action by the majority returned, no matter how returned—that not being a question for discussion outside the Province itself, or in this Parliament. Thus, the three constitutional tribunals having cognisance of this question had pronounced upon it, and found the Lieutenant-Governor had not committed an act which warranted his removal. Was it convenient, expedient or competent for this new Parliament to try this question over again? The political majority had changed in the meantime, men of different opinions occupying the Treasury benches. Was a man to be tried twice in his political any more than in his social or physical life? It was against the genius of English law, and therefore he felt great difficulty in supporting a resolution like the present. On another ground, he had a very strong conviction that the motion was not in order. Under our constitutional system there was a distribution of power between two Legislative bodies, and this Parliament had nothing to do with a Provincial question of this kind. The dismissal of a Governor was not one of its enumerated powers. No doubt the Lieutenant-Governor was appointed by and was under the supervision of the Federal Government. The Local Legislature and the people of the Province, through the constitutional means at their command, were competent to redress any evil or mischief of this kind, and therefore the Constitution had not placed it in the hands of this Parliament. If so, they were travelling out of the record in discussing this matter. He felt strongly the conviction that, if the Government of to-day advised their friends, or were prepared to advise this House that it was competent to deal with it, they had rather abnegated their functions, in not dealing with it in the first instance. A question of this kind, taken up by a private member, a question which ought to be dealt with in a judicial spirit, was very likely to be disposed of in a partisan spirit, and, if thus any injury resulted to Confederation, if the Federal system were discredited, as he very much feared, the hon. gentleman, responsible for the conduct of the House, would be justly blamed. He was a Federalist, and believed in preserving the rights of the Dominion Parliament intact, but he was equally convinced that, if they were to preserve the federal system, they must preserve the rights of the Provinces intact also. The peculiar position of Lower Canada had very much to do with the federal form of the Constitution, because the majority of that Province were of a race different from the majority in the others, speaking a different language, possessing different institutions, and professing a faith not that of the majority of the Dominion. The local peculiarities and treaty rights of the Lower Canadians caused very earnest discussion during the deliberations preceding the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and they would have probably had a much more homogeneous system and larger powers in this Federal Parliament if it had not been for the arguments used, and with powerful effect, by the representatives of Lower Canada, in contending for such provisions as would secure their people in all their local institutions and peculiar rights and customs against the English majority of the other Provinces; and he could not but feel, during this discussion, that his friends from Lower Canada, in withdrawing this question from its proper forum, the Legislature of Quebec, and transferring it to this body, where there would always be a majority not entirely in sympathy with them, and sometimes, perhaps, hostile to many of their views, were running a very great risk in creating such a precedent. He warned them, if they wished to maintain their independent position and the control of their own affairs in future, they had better have a care how far they consented to the creation of a precedent of so dangerous a character. It might be to them a matter of importance, to-day, to dismiss an obnoxious Governor, but, by-and-bye, a Governor whom they might desire to retain, because he acted unwisely, in the view of this House, might see a resolution passed expressing that opinion, which would be regarded as a direction to Ministers, as he doubted not this would be, should the motion pass, to dismiss him. This motion was unmeaning and impertinent, unless that result was expected from it. He would, then, repeat his warning to his Lower Canada friends. Let them hesitate before they established a precedent that would place some of their local rights and institutions, which they regarded as peculiarly important, under the control of a House where the majority would, in future, if not to-day, be an English-speaking one, without sympathy with their language, customs, faith, or local interests.

MR. BOULTBEE said that it seemed to him they never could have an occasion upon which it would be more important for a careful deliberation by the estates of this country than at the present moment. The question they had before them was,—whether the power of the people, as expressed through their representatives, should prevail, or the power of one man should be allowed to crush out the whole people. This question had been fought by their ancestors for forty generations; it had been fought for over the whole world, and the battle had not been in any country so successful as in the empire of Great Britain, where they had the great and inestimable boon of responsible government. They hoped to have it here, and they should retain it, and see that it was carried out on occasions like the present. Here in the Dominion they were in a peculiar position. They were a number of scattered Provinces that had been brought together; they were people of different races, speaking, in many instances, different languages; and had a great many different interests. And, therefore, it was all-important that the men to whom power was entrusted, to whom they had confided their guidance, should endeavour to create a national spirit, rather tending towards the highest and noblest feeling, than a debased national sentiment. They should rather endeavour to make their actions bear the impress of statesmanlike thought than the stamp of petty and dishonourable intrigue. They would find that the people generally had a disposition to shape their conduct by the example of those placed in charge over them. It was unfortunate, on an occasion like the present, when this Confederation was only just formed, when the scattered Provinces were scarcely assimilated, when the many diverging interests were only approaching consolidation, that they should have the degrading spectacle of this man, to whom had been confided the honour of the people, who had been specially delegated to preside over the deliberations of Parliament, conspiring against his own advisers, lying in wait for them, trying to take advantage of some inadvertent action on their part to work them harm. It was important that this Parliament should take immediate steps to secure a better state of things; more especially as, at this very moment, they found the Premier of the Province of Ontario—a less daring man, perhaps, than the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, but the equally pliant tool of a faction—prolonging Parliament beyond the legitimate term of its existence, for the mere purpose of party intrigue. They felt it now in Ontario, and could, therefore, sympathise with the people of Quebec. He thought that, if the representatives of the people in this Parliament assembled, if the estates of this realm did not take any cognisance of this question, if they were unwilling to deal with it and to stamp this action with their supreme condemnation, it would be a very unfortunate thing for this country; but he firmly believed that this Parliament would not neglect to set the seal of severe condemnation on actions like this. He had heard his hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall), able and old parliamentarian as he was, say that this man had been tried twice, that the matter had been tried in the Parliament of Quebec, and that, therefore, it should not be tried again. He thought that opinion was not a sound one, for, if no definite action were taken now, they would have no guarantee that there would not be a repetition of such acts in the future, and, besides that, it would enable the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec to escape the penalty which ought to attach to crimes such as this. He had looked carefully into this question and come to the conclusion that the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec on the occasion referred to was illegitimate and improper; that it was a violation of the principles of responsible government; that he had not done what he had been delegated to do. He had been sworn to conserve the liberties of the people. The will of the people had been decidedly in favour of the Ministry then in power; yet he had taken upon himself to dismiss that Ministry and to call in another set of men not possessing the confidence of the country. He had not, perhaps, studied Parliamentary usage or Constitutional Law so much as a great many other hon. gentlemen, but his plain reading of the meaning of responsible government was—and it was a reading, he thought, understood by the people—that the people through their representatives on the floor of Parliament—a majority of those representatives—should prevail. He was satisfied, and he was sure the House was satisfied from the arguments they had heard that the Lieutenant-Governor had not, under the circumstances, the right to dismiss the DeBoucherville Government. The action was a wrong-doing, and that wrong was an infringement on the Constitution, by which the rights of the people had been trampled upon. It was, in his opinion, a great injury done to our young Dominion, striking at the very roots of responsible government. When they came to reflect upon this question, it was less difficult to apprehend the causes than to calculate the consequences which might flow from it. They had, at the time, a Parliament led by the gentlemen now opposite. Those gentlemen came into that Parliament in the strong plenitude of their power, backed up by a large majority, and possessing the confidence of the country; but, when they found that confidence waning and themselves running aground in the country, they resorted to unworthy means, and, when there was an impending general election, they refused to take the action generally desired by a large majority of the people of this country, advancing the traitorous argument—whereby to gain some advantage in the election—that the Lieutenant-Governor should be dealt with and tried by the House at Quebec. It might be that these gentlemen would deny that they entered into any conspiracy with the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, or that they improperly advised him, but they would never purge themselves before the people of this country, unless they gave their support to the resolution which was before the House; because he believed that the Lieutenant-Governor had no personal interest in such a course as that taken by him. He had committed a great crime against the people and against himself, and it would leave upon him and his family, for three or four generations to come, the stamp of ineffaceable shame. Mr. Letellier had nothing to gain in so doing, and the people of this country, whether it were right or wrong, would believe that the gentlemen who now led the Opposition in Parliament instigated the Lieutenant-Governor to take the course he did. That was the belief—this belief had gone over this country. The leader of the Opposition had said that this matter should have been fought out in the Parliament of Quebec, as it was one which affected that Province only. He (Mr. Boulton) thought that any wrong done to that Province was a wrong done to the whole Dominion, and a blow struck at the vital principles of responsible government; and that when they came to consider the value of the institutions they had, and the trouble they had taken to obtain the Constitution they now enjoyed, they should allow as little time as possible to elapse to counteract, as far as was possible, the blow struck at their liberties by the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; and he thought it was imperatively necessary on them to carry this resolution, otherwise there would be a subversion of every principle of popular liberty. The people of Quebec had given their adherence very strongly to the scheme of Confederation. They were a brave, chivalrous people, very sensitive to every emotion of honour, and they were willing to join with the other Provinces to build up this great Confederation, based on the noblest principles of the British Constitution; and how bitter would it be for them, if they found the expectations they had formed of the benefits that would accrue to them destroyed by the heinous blow struck at their liberties. The time had come when the gentleman in the supreme position at Government House here was one of the proudest scions of the noblest aristocracy the world ever saw, versed in the honourable position of English statesman, sent by our Gracious Sovereign to superintend our affairs and guide our destinies. How should we feel if we had instead some miserable trickster; he might come to this House and say, "You are taking some action in regard to the tariff, or otherwise, which seems to me not according to the practice of the Mother Land, or adverse to her interests; if you do not do so and so, I shall dismiss you." Then, even the most prejudiced would see the iniquity of the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He was not surprised that the leader of the Opposition declined to deal with the merits of this question. According to the practices of his past life, according to the utterances made by him on every Ontario platform, he did not deal with it. In Ontario, they had determined as far as they could, and he believed they would not go back on it, that they would not give up the principle of responsible government, as long as they had life left to fight for it. He followed, as carefully as he could, what the leader of the Opposition had said. That hon. gentleman said it was the duty of the Government, if Governor Letellier had done wrong, to have dismissed him. That was a very pretty argument; but they could hardly expect the gentlemen who had counselled the execution of this more on their behalf than on that of the Lieutenant-Governor to turn round and censure him for so doing. The hon. gentleman said that Governor Letellier dissolved Parliament on the advice of his constitutional advisers. This was too grave a matter to be made a joke of, and, in view of the facts, it did seem, viewed in the light of responsible government, to partake of the character of a farce. The hon. gentleman then went on to make some remarks of a Scriptural character in reference to the prophets of Baal. The prophets of Baal, it would be remembered, on the occasion referred to, were called up in a crowd to generally destroy the prophets of the true God. That was a feat which the leader of the Opposition and his friends executed, and in this way carried out the Biblical history as recorded in the destruction of the prophets of Baal. Hon. gentlemen presented themselves before the people of Canada, and they were nearly as effectively destroyed. There was scarcely a remnant of them left. In reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), he (Mr. Boulton) understood the hon. gentleman to say that he condemned the action of Mr. Letellier, but, at the same time, he was going to support it. He (Mr. Boulton) did not understand that: as he understood it, if a man did wrong, and if he was to be condemned, they should condemn him. He would simply close by saying that, because he thought the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was unconstitutional, because he thought it was an act corruptly conceived with a view to subverting the Constitution of this country, because he thought it was conceived in treachery and shaped in fraud, because he thought this House should mark this action with most severe condemnation, he therefore would support the resolution.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell), moved the adjournment of the debate.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN: I would like to enquire whether, since the publication of these documents in reference to Mr. Letellier and his late Government, as it does not appear that the reply contained in them had been communicated to the Lieutenant-Governor, he has had communication of it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not at all aware whether he has or not.

DISMISSAL OF QUEBEC GOVERNMENT
BY THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on Mr. Mousseau's proposed motion, "That it be Resolved, That the dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers on the second day of March, 1878, was, under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown, since the concession of the principle of Responsible Government to the British North American Colonies;" and of the proposed motion of Mr. Ouimet, which was: "That the question be now put."

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said that, whatever difference of opinion might exist in this House as to the conduct of Mr. Letellier de St. Just, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, in dismissing his Ministers, he ventured to think that there would be no difference of opinion as to the importance of the question. He was as much a Federalist as either of the hon. gentlemen who had declared themselves Federalists upon the floor of this House last night. He was as anxious for the maintenance of our present form of Constitution as they could possibly be. He believed the best interests of this country would be served by preserving to our Provincial Legislatures the power to deal with purely local questions, and he would as much regret as they possibly could do any action on the part of this House, or on the part of the people of this country, which would tend to destroy the rights and the privileges of those Local Legislatures. They were here at this moment, however, face to face, for the first time since Confederation, with a difficulty which, when Confederation was under discussion, appeared to a great many of those who took part in that discussion to be likely to prove a serious one in the future working of our government. How far then could we carry on the government of this country under the present Constitution with due regard to the independence of the Local Legislatures under Governors appointed by the Government of the Dominion, was a question which excited at that time grave apprehensions on the part of many of those who took part in the debate. And no hon. gentleman who took part in the debate upon the resolutions on which was founded the British North America Act foresaw graver dangers from this cause than the hon. gentleman who was now at the head of the Government of the Province of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Joly. If Lieutenant-Governors were to be counters in the party politics in this country; if we laid down the doctrine that the Lieutenant-Governors appointed by the Government here, fresh, as they must be, from active participation in the party politics of the country, might become partisans in the administration of the local affairs of their Provinces; might become parties to the political interests of those who appointed them, he ventured to think that the danger to the autonomy of the Province, to their provincial independence, was very much greater than could possibly be the case from the passage of this resolution, or from any consequence that would follow its passage. In the speeches which were made last night by the hon. members for Lambton and Halton, those who believed that the conduct of Mr. Letellier was unwise and subversive of the rights accorded to the advisers of the Crown under responsible government, and was therefore unconstitutional, had this great satisfaction; that neither of those hon. gentlemen ventured to defend the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. He was bound to say that he thought Mr. Letellier had reason to find fault with his friends; that of those who, if they did not induce him to perform the act which he did perform, at least condoned that act to the extent of retaining him in his position, and giving his Government all the benefit of the patronage of the Government then in office in the Dominion to carry the elections; in all the discussions on the floor of Parliament, not one had ventured to defend his act. Surely, if that act was defensible, per se, there ought to have been some gentlemen on the floor of this House, some one of his political friends, or of his old colleagues, who would have the courage to defend him. But last night, as last year, not one single word was uttered in defence of the Lieutenant-Governor. They had, instead, the statement made as an answer to the arraignment of the Lieutenant-Governor, that the House had nothing to do with that question. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) endeavoured somewhat to play upon the terms of the resolution which had been submitted to the House. He told the House last night, as some of his friends had told it before, that the right hon. gentleman who moved in this matter last year did not venture to declare in the resolution that the act of Mr. Letellier de St. Just was unconstitutional, and he attempted to play on the wording of it—an attempt which was unworthy of the position he occupied in this House, and of the gravity of the question—by saying that, no doubt, the act of Mr. Letellier had been subversive of the position of his advisers at that time. But what were the terms of the resolution? They were asked to resolve “that the dismissal, by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, of his Ministers, on the 2nd March, 1878, was, under the circumstances, unwise,”—and no hon. gentleman had ventured to controvert that statement—“and that it was subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown,” not to those particular advisers, but to the advisers of the Crown generally, “since the concession of the principle of responsible government to the British North American Colonies.” Now, the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown since the concession of responsible government to the British North American Colonies was a constitutional right, a constitutional position, and the violation of that position, any interference with that position, was an unconstitutional act. This was as clearly implied as if the word unconstitutional had appeared in this resolution. The leading argument of the member for Lambton was that the Government of the day were guilty of cowardice in this matter; that it was their duty, if they believed Mr. Letellier had acted unconstitutionally, if he had been guilty of conduct subversive of the rights of the advisers of the Crown, under responsible government, to have advised the Governor-General to dismiss Mr. Letellier, and, as a second argument, and these two comprised the whole, that this Parliament had no right to interfere in the matter. He (Mr. White) would take the latter position first, and he ventured to think that there was no hon. gentleman on the floor of this House from whom could come with worse grace an argument of this kind than from the hon. member for Lambton. The 59th clause of the Union Act, which determined the position of the Lieutenant-Governors, was as follows:—“A Lieutenant-Governor shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General, but any Lieutenant-Governor appointed after the commencement of the first Session of the Parliament of Canada shall not be removable within five years from his appointment, except for cause assigned, which shall be communicated to him in writing, within one month after the order for his removal is made, and shall be communicated by Message to the Senate and the House of Commons, within one week thereafter, if the Parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within one week after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament.” Although it was not there said that Parliament might interfere with the position and conduct of a Lieutenant-Governor; although it was clear that the initiative, in a matter of this kind, would, under ordinary circumstances, be taken by the Executive, yet the right of Parliament to discuss the question, to review the act of the Executive, was clearly expressed in the clause of the Confederation Act. The hon. member for Lambton, last year, brought down to this House, not upon an Address from the House, nor by an order of the House—of course, it could not have been upon the latter—but by his own motion, under advice given by him to the Governor-General, by Message, the papers now before the House, at least, those of them which were in existence at that time. Why did he advise the Governor-General to bring down by Message the documents, the petitions of the Legislature of Quebec and the documents which had been submitted to the Legislature of Quebec?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has made a mistake; unwittingly, no doubt. The documents were addressed to the Legislature of the Dominion, and I was obliged to advise Mr. De Boucherville or the Speaker, I think it was, who came here with the papers, that they must go through the ordinary channel; but they were presented by Message of the Governor in the proper way here. It was not upon any other ground than that.

MR. WHITE said that was quite true as to the petition from the Legislature of Quebec; but was the explanatory case addressed to this Parliament? That came down in a subsequent Message from the Governor-General, not with the same documents at all, but in a subsequent Message on the mere motion of the hon. gentleman then at the head of the Government. Were they brought for the purpose of discussion, that this Parliament might, as a free Parliament, discuss the question whether the Lieutenant-Governor had acted wisely or unwisely, or were they brought here in anticipation of the general elections then coming on in the Province of Quebec, and in order that that "explanatory case," which was an arraignment of the late Ministry of the Province of Quebec, and in which every single statement was either entirely incorrect, or grossly perverted, might go to the country, and that the people of the Province of Quebec, influenced by it, might be induced to sustain the Government which had assumed the responsibility for Mr. Letellier's act. If it was intended that this Parliament should discuss it simply for the information of this Parliament, it did not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman to say now that this Parliament could not deal with a question of this kind, in anticipation of Executive action, but only after Executive action had been taken. The other argument was: that this Government had been recreant to their duty, had acted in a cowardly manner, because they had not chosen to act upon their own responsibility and advised the dismissal of Mr. Letellier, but had, on the contrary, as the hon. gentleman, with that courtesy which characterised him, chose to assume, put up gentlemen on the back benches to move in this matter. What were the facts with regard to that? Under our constitutional system and under the best authorities in relation to it, the Cabinet of the day was practically a Committee of Parliament. This question was before Parliament last Session. Parliament then refused to condemn Mr. Letellier. For what reason they were not at this particular branch of the enquiry called upon to say, but Parliament refused to condemn Mr. Letellier. Therefore, until Parliament reversed that decision, if Parliament should reverse it, it was not for the Executive to go in the face of the decision of Parliament at that time, and advise His Excellency to take action on the matter. If the matter had never been discussed by this Parliament, he could understand the argument of the hon. gentleman, and see reason in the charge he made; but, when it had been discussed in Parliament, and when Parliament had refused to condemn,—no matter on what reason that refusal was based,—the Government had no right, until Parliament altered, if it did alter its view, to advise His Excellency in relation to this particular case. That was a fair answer made to the charge against the Ministry that they were cowardly, because they did not advise His Excellency to dismiss Mr. Letellier, instead of having the matter brought up in this manner. New events had occurred since last year. The position of the question was now different from what it was when it was discussed last year. New papers were before the House in the petition of certain members of the late Government of Quebec, the reply of the Lieutenant-Governor to this petition, and the rejoinder of the members of the late Quebec Government. They were, therefore, in a different position now in relation to this question from that of last Session. They were a new Parliament, fresh from the people. Every phase of this matter had been discussed most thoroughly, at least in one of the Provinces, during the last elections. He ventured to say that next, aye, scarcely next in importance in the Province of Quebec, at any rate in the whole of the French-Canadian districts of Quebec, to that greater question which had placed in power the hon. gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches, was the question of the dismissal of his Ministers by Mr. Letellier, and, in sending forty-eight gentlemen from the Province opposed to those who, last year, refused to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor, the people of the Province of Quebec expected that result, and would be deeply disappointed if it did not occur. The condemnation of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was considered by them as necessary to their Provincial independence. The hon. member for Lambton had made one statement which he (Mr. White) confessed had somewhat surprised him. The hon. gentleman, with that peculiar habit which he had of posing himself and his party as much better than their fellows, as made of a different kind of clay altogether from ordinary human mortals, had called their attention to the alleged fact that the Liberal party in this country had never invoked Imperial interference in their quarrels with the Governors in this country. Did the hon. gentleman forget the agitations in connection with Sir Edmund Head, and that these hon. gentlemen, or their friends, at that time, urged strongly the recall, and did all they possibly could, not to secure a condemnation from the people, but the recall of the Governor by the Imperial Government in consequence of the action which he had taken in relation to the Brown-Dorion Government?

MR. HOLTON: Both.

MR. WHITE: Both, said the hon. gentleman who was a participant in the troubles of that day. But it was not both that the hon. member for Lambton had told them last night. His statement was that his party had never, upon any occasion, and he asked the House to take their conduct as an example worthy of being followed, invoiced Imperial interference in any of their quarrels with Governors-General in the country. He had seen that statement made in other places, in some of the Liberal newspapers, and he had taken the trouble this morning to look over the columns of the Globe of 1878 to find what really were the views of the hon. gentlemen at that time. They had started an agitation all over this country; dinners in one place, public meetings in another. He (Mr. White) had good reason to remember them, for he took a somewhat prominent position in connection with one meeting which occurred, and which resulted, he was happy to say, somewhat differently from the intentions of the gentlemen who had called it. Here was the prayer of one of the petitions, the petition at the Welland meeting, the first of importance held at that time. He gave it as an answer to the statement made by the hon. gentleman in his place last night:—

“Therefore, we humbly beseech Your Majesty to exercise Your Royal Prerogative in re-calling His Excellency from the Administration of the affairs of this Province, or otherwise acting in the premises as to Your Majesty may seem meet.”

And yet the hon. member for Lambton had stated last night that his party never invoked Imperial interference in quarrels with the Governors of this country. He had come across a speech, made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), and in view of his remarks that they must be careful not to interfere in Provincial matters of this kind, lest the Provincial autonomy and independence might be affected, he was curious to see what that hon. member had said on that occasion. This was an extract from his speech:—

“It was because the people were loyal to the British Constitution, that they would not see it dragged through the mire, and made a mockery and a by-word. It was only in extreme cases that people should resort to extreme measures; but he was sure that, under present circumstances, the people were fully justified in petitioning for the Governor-General's recall. They would take that step, and after they had done so, it would be acknowledged that in doing so they had been even more loyal to Her Majesty than if they had in silence submitted to their wrongs.” Then it was worth while to see what he said a little further.

MR. MACDOUGALL: What parallel is there between the two cases. This was a petition to Parliament. We did not petition the Imperial Parliament, but the Executive.

MR. WHITE said he would tell the hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, where the parallel lay. But he did not hear the hon. gentleman, when he rose last night, knowing, as he did from his own participation in those events, and following immediately the member for Lambton, say that that hon. member had been wrong in the claim he made for his party, that they, at any rate, never invoked Imperial interference. Then he (Mr. White) thought he would find out what the leader of the Liberal party had said. He took it for granted he would not be far wrong in crediting that hon. gentleman with the sentiments of the paper mentioned. It observed, on the subject of Lord Dufferin's action at the close of the Session of 1873, in its issue of August 31st:—

“On one point His Excellency may rest assured. The people of Upper Canada are intent upon ridding themselves of his official presence. A settled conviction exists that he occupies the position of a partisan—that he is helping a corrupt Government to play a partisan game—that he is no longer qualified to administer the affairs of Government impartially; and a change in the Executive becomes inevitable.”

He (Mr. White) would ask if the same charge of partisanship could not honestly be preferred against Mr. Letellier? The same journal observed, in dealing with the action of the Governor-General:—

“One course, and one alone, is open to Sir Edmund Head. He must make room for a better Governor-General. The change is inevitable. He must retire or submit to be re-called.”

And yet, with that record, which everyone, who knew anything of the politics of the country at that time, was perfectly familiar with, they had the leader of the great Liberal party, whose statements should be so entirely accurate that everyone could accept them without hesitation, claiming that his party had never invoked Imperial interference in their quarrels with the Governor of this country. They then had a speech from the member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). Standing upon that lofty pedestal to which his wanderings had at last brought him,—he, who was at this moment the independent, the impartial, the judicial arbiter between parties in this honourable House, had given them a speech whose exordium was an advice, and whose peroration an admonition and warning. As to the advice, he (Mr. White) dared say that hon. gentleman knew the proverbial fate of those who gave unasked-for advice; and he was very much inclined to fear that, when that hon. member undertook to advise the people of Lower Canada, at any rate in relation to their local affairs, he would find his advice was not likely to be accepted.

MR. MACDOUGALL: The hon. member did not get a seat there.

MR. WHITE said he was glad to hear the hon. gentleman say he condemned the action of Mr. Letellier; but he told them the question had already passed through three tribunals: the late Government and Parliament last Session had refused to censure, and the people of Quebec had sustained the Administration which assumed the responsibility for Mr. Letellier's Act, and that, therefore, Parliament ought not to be called upon to deal with this question. Now, he (Mr. White) did not know whether he was right or wrong in assuming that, if the hon. gentleman had had a seat in Parliament last year, he would have voted for the motion of the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) which was similar to the present; but he inferred from his remarks—and he hoped he did him no injustice in that inference—he would have voted for that motion. If so, then what greater injury was going to befall the Provincial autonomy, and the independence of the Provincial Legislature, when the present motion passed? It was an interference then as much as to-day; his argument now equally applied to the motion of last year. The truth was, they stood to-day in the position of a new Parliament. The people had had this whole matter under view, had sent this Parliament here, and there was no more harm in its taking the action proposed than there could possibly have been last year. It was quite true hon. gentlemen opposite took no proceedings last year—did not condemn Mr. Letellier ; and he was inclined to think they had good reason not to ; that it would have been an act of ingratitude, to say the least, to condemn an act performed in their interest, and whose only object had been, if popular statements were correct, to secure control of the Provincial Government, in order that the patronage of the Government might be used in the Dominion elections last fall. To say that the advisers of the Crown here, who were so deeply interested in those elections, whose continuance in office depended upon their result, did not condemn men who had done what seemed to give them the best possible chance in Quebec of carrying the elections in that Province was, surely, a most remarkable argument to use on the floor of this House. The hon. member for Halton was fortunate enough to obtain last night the applause of hon. gentlemen opposite. Upon that point at any rate he (Mr. White) congratulated him. For years past they had exhausted the whole vocabulary of abuse and invective in order to destroy his personal and political character, and that he had succeeded by a single speech in securing their approbation must undoubtedly have been to him a source of gratification, however much his friends might have doubted the sincerity or value of that applause. He supposed hereafter they should hear no more of that invective, no more references to "that abandoned man," which they were wont to hear on the Liberal platforms in Ontario. If he were able to show he had converted his traducers into his applauders by a single speech, he would have accomplished a great deal for himself. They might, as the result of it, witness again that of which he would be sorry to see another illustration, but of which the record of hon. gentlemen opposite afforded so many illustrations in the past—that they had no standard of right or wrong except that of political opinion—that, with them, political hostility made the sinner and political friendship the saint. He thought that was not a lesson for the advantage of the people of this country, or one that it was well public men should be taught. Now the leading argument and, perhaps, the only very strong argument used by hon. gentlemen opposite against this resolution was that the people of Quebec had had the matter under review, and had sustained those who took the constitutional responsibility for Mr. Letellier's acts. It was strictly true that under the surprise to the Province and other circumstances characterising the election, a large following had been secured for the Government of Mr. Joly. But, if he had obtained a majority, he (Mr. White) did not admit that that, in itself, was a reason why Mr. Letellier's action should be condoned. Success did not necessarily make right. He ventured to say that, if they laid down the principle in this House, or consecrate as true the doctrine that to succeed was to escape all punishment in a matter of this kind, they would simply give carte blanche to the Lieutenant-Governor hereafter, if disposed, to play the partisan, and run the risk of all the consequences. What was the position of Quebec at that time ? There were great practical difficulties surrounding the Government. Immediately after Confederation, the people of Quebec showed an ambition to develop their country by railways in different parts. Beginning with small wooden railways, assisted under the Treasurership of Mr. Dunkin, with $1,000 a mile, they went on to encourage iron roads, and increased to such the subsidies to $2,000, $3,000 and $4,000 a mile. Next, they projected a trunk railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Long ago, the people of Quebec had become deeply interested in the construction of the North Shore Railway. They had given large subsidies to these railways, one from Quebec to Montreal, another from Montreal to Ottawa, and thence to Portage du Fort, to connect with the Pacific Railway ; but, owing to the position of the Province, the intense opposition of rival railway undertakings, and, in some degree, to political influence used against Quebec, the companies building the railway were unable to float their bonds in the English market. The question that presented itself was, whether they would abandon all the money of the public already spent, including that of the municipalities, or by coming forward and taking up the North Shore Railways as a Government work, bring them to completion as they had done since. The railway policy of the Province was not a party policy, but one on which all parties united. The strongest arguments for the promotion of certain railways, and for the increase of the subsidies came from the Liberal Opposition, and the greatest embarrassment the DeBoucherville Government had to contend against was, not their giving money, but their refusing it to enterprises of great value to the Province. This policy was approaching completion; it was necessary for the Provincial Government to collect moneys due by the different municipalities. Nearly two millions of the money subscribed remained unpaid, so they had to collect this money or raise an equivalent in some way, and, in addition, to float the Commissioner's railway bonds to get enough money to complete the roads. All this involved two facts: First, a quarrel with the municipalities, who were most unwilling to pay; and, next, a quarrel with the whole tax-paying community who, finding they had their railways, and that the debts would fall on the Government, wished to evade payment. That was the position of things when Mr. Letellier, last winter, brought about the coup d'état. On the appeal to the country the constitutional question was the strong one for the Conservatives, the bulwark against the more popular Liberal cry of increased taxation and interference with the Judiciary. These cries were not all the Conservatives had to contend against. Just on the eve of the election, they had a fearful charge of corruption made against a member of the late Government, who was now a member of this House, by a person who was a fugitive from justice, and who had almost immediately afterwards to flee the country, in order to escape the penalty of his crimes. This person was employed by the friends of Mr. Letellier and his Government, to formulate a serious charge against a member of the Government, to the effect that his influence as a member of the Cabinet had been sold to him for gain; and it was so formulated as to include other members of the Government as well. The letter containing this charge was printed and distributed in every county in Quebec, from Bonaventure to Pontiac. The people were asked whether they were prepared to return again to power a party which had been thus guilty. Under these influences the hon. gentleman lost his seat by a narrow majority of 16; but he was glad to know that the same constituency took the earliest opportunity afforded it, upon learning how cruelly false this charge was, of returning him by a large majority as a member of this House. That undoubtedly had its effect. In addition to that, the county of Gaspé elections were brought on in such a manner as to disenfranchise the Magdalen Islands, which usually gave from 300 to 400 Conservative majority. There was no use contesting the county of Gaspé with the Magdalen Islands cut off, and thus hon. gentlemen secured another seat. But that county had since returned the gentleman who then lost the seat. Further, they had, in the constituency of St. Hyacinthe, the Provincial Treasurer returned by a majority of 60; and, within two or three weeks afterwards, the Judge of that district, a Liberal himself, struck off 85 Liberal votes from the voters' list, showing that he was in a minority of 25 of the legal votes; and that constituency, under the approved list, had returned to this House a gentleman to support the Government, and who would, he had no doubt, when the vote on this question was taken, record his vote in favour of the motion. What were these men doing to-day in relation to this constituency, and with the approbation of the Lieutenant-Governor, who was so anxious that the rights and liberties of the people should be preserved? It was five months since the Provincial Treasurer died, and during the whole of this period the people had asked that the writs for a new election might issue. Their prayer was disregarded, and, in the meantime, a partisan municipal council had added some 300 votes to the list, in order that, when the time came, they would be able to reverse the vote given on September 17th, and return a supporter of the Local Government. Then there was the influence of the two Governments, and everyone knew what the influence, even the legitimate influence, of Governments meant in general elections. Hon. gentlemen opposite, then occupying seats on the Treasury benches, used their influence in the most open manner, in order that Mr. Letellier might be sustained, and the election of Mr. Joly and his friends secured; and yet, in spite of all this influence, the Province, at the election, returned 34 Conservatives out of 65, giving the Conservatives a majority of three in that House. That was the position of affairs after the elections in the Province, and yet they were told that they were not to discuss the question because the people of Quebec had had it under their consideration, and had sustained Mr. Joly, who had assumed the responsibility of the act of Mr. Letellier. It was quite true that Mr. Joly managed to struggle through the Session of the Legislature. But how did he do it? There were two gentlemen elected, one, Mr. Price, for Chicoutimi, who had to undergo one of the most severe struggles,—or, rather, his friends did for him, as he was elected in his absence,—that took place during the elections. The influence of the Government in that large lumber district was necessarily strong, and yet, in spite of that influence being used against him, Mr. Price was returned. That gentleman was a strong personal friend of Mr. Joly, and, although he could not bring himself to vote approval of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, and absented himself from the House when the vote was taken, he, on personal grounds, supported his friend, and assisted in carrying him through the Session of the Legislature. The other gentleman was Mr. Turcotte, member for Three Rivers. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) the previous evening had read a letter this gentleman had addressed to his constituency. He had been in the previous Legislature, and, upon this question of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor had voted, as the papers brought down would show, with the Conservative party. He went to his constituency as a Conservative, but some rumours obtained that he was not a good Conservative; and, when he found that the Conservatives, in order to make assurance doubly sure, and of obtaining some one that could be fully trusted, were contemplating bringing out an opponent, he wrote a letter than which nothing could be more strong. He said he was a Conservative and did not even dream of supporting Mr. Joly. And he stated that, if elected, he would oppose Mr. Joly and the Government of which he was the leader. Upon that assurance the hon. gentleman was elected. On the day of the opening of the Legislative Assembly, it was still supposed he would support the Conservative party; but about half past 11 o'clock that morning a messenger called for him, and he was taken into the presence of the Lieutenant-Governor. Then arrangements were made by means of which he prostituted his position and sold himself like a sheep in the shambles to the support of the Joly Ministry. Notwithstanding these facts, they were asked to say it was a matter of no consequence how Mr. Joly got his majority, and they were asked to shut their eyes to the fact that this majority was obtained by trafficking in the honour and integrity of the public men of the country. In this way he obtained what he was pleased to call a majority, which was simply half the House with the Speaker's casting vote. In addition to this, the Lieutenant-Governor used all his influence and his personal presence in order to help his friends. He (Mr. White) would ask hon. gentleman on the floor of the House whether, if they were as evenly divided as they were in the Province of Quebec, and the Governor-General came down, and, taking his seat in the Speaker's room, sent for hon. members, and, by the influence of his position and the suggestion of reward, endeavoured to secure their support for his Government, they would for a moment tolerate such a proceeding; and he would ask whether a Lieutenant-Governor who thus acted was entitled to consideration at the hands of men who valued the Constitution under which they lived and the principles of constitutional government which it was their supposed happiness to enjoy. What were the excuses which were made for this act of the Lieutenant-Governor. He did not propose to discuss the question as to whether Lieutenant-Governors under our constitutional system possessed the prerogatives of the Crown or not, whether they were merely officers of this Government, or whether they were really representatives of the Crown in their several Provinces. He did not propose to discuss the question as to whether they had the power to dismiss their Ministers in the way in which Mr. Letellier had dismissed his Ministry. He knew that there were differences of opinion on that subject. He knew that in the city of Montreal a gentleman, whose position at the bar of this country certainly gave to his opinions very great weight, had taken the grounds that the Governor possessed no such powers. Another authority held that the position of Lieutenant-Governor was not the same as that of Her Majesty the Queen, or as that of His Excellency the Governor-General. That authority was no less than Mr. Justice Fournier, whose views as Minister of Justice were supported by the whole Cabinet of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Fournier made a report, when Minister of Justice, approved of by the Privy Council, recommending the disallowance of the Ontario Act relating to escheats and forfeitures. In that report, referring to the powers of Lieutenant-Governors and Provincial Legislatures, Mr. Fournier said :

"Therefore, as the undersigned believes escheats to be a matter of prerogative, and not a question of 'property and civil rights,' there seems no reason to depart from the view expressed in the Order of the Privy Council that no prerogative rights of the Crown are vested in the Lieutenant-Governor of a Province, unless under the Confederation Act, and that unless that Act can be found strictly to confer upon the Lieutenant-Governor or the Legislature of a Province, an express right to deal with any matter of prerogative, such power is not vested in either the one or the other authority."

Then Mr. Fournier gave an extract from a despatch from Lord Carnarvon, sent out, he thought, in connection with the Lepine trial in the Province of Manitoba, which was as follows :—

"The Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces of the Dominion, however important locally their functions may be, are a part of the Colonial administrative staff, and are more immediately responsible to the Governor-General in Council. They do not hold Commissions from the Crown, and neither in power nor privilege resemble those Governors of Colonies to whom, after special consideration of their personal fitness, the Queen, under the Great Seal and her own hand and signet, delegates portions of her prerogatives, and issues her own instructions."

And then Mr. Fournier gave his own views upon the limited powers of Lieutenant-Governors as follows :—

MR. WHITE.

"The only instance in which, to the knowledge of the undersigned, there is an express delegation to a Lieutenant-Governor of privileges of the Crown, is in the commission to the Governor-General, the 6th section of which is thus worded: 'And judge necessary, all powers lawfully belonging to us, in respect of assembling or proroguing the Senate or the House of Commons of our said Dominion, and of dissolving the said House of Commons, and we do hereby give the like authority to the several Lieutenant-Governors for a time being, of the Provinces of our said Dominion, with respect to the Legislative Councils, or the Legislative or General Assemblies of those Provinces respectively.'"

A Lieutenant-Governor had the power of assembling and of proroguing Parliament, but that did not, he took it, include the prerogative of dismissing Ministers. Although he was not disposed to insist upon that particular view of the case, although he thought there was very much to be said for the other view, he was, at the same time, for the purposes of this argument, prepared to admit the Lieutenant-Governor had a right to dismiss his Ministers, subject, of course, to his responsibility to the Government that appointed him. He made reference, a little while previously, to the case of Sir Edmund Head, and to the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to secure the recall of that Governor. He desired to contrast, for a moment, the circumstances of the two cases. What had been the conduct of Sir Edmund Head, which had caused this agitation? A general election had occurred. The Government had been sustained by a large majority. A vote was taken in relation to a grant of money in connection with the seat of government. The Government were beaten, because the local feeling, in relation to the seat of government, was opposed to their policy, and the Government resigned. Mr. Brown was sent for, and they learned, from the documents which were brought down at the time, that it was intimated to him that he could not expect to have a dissolution so soon after a dissolution had already occurred. Mr. Brown declined to listen to this suggestion, and intimated that this was a matter upon which his Ministers would advise him after they were sworn in. He formed his Government and advised a dissolution; the dissolution was refused, and Mr. Brown resigning, the leader of the other party was again sent for and another Government formed. That Government continued in the possession of a large majority; went on for three years, and carried the general elections which followed. So that they had abundant evidence to show that they had the confidence of the people of this country, and that Sir Edmund Head was practically right in the judgment of public sentiment of this country. But because he would not dissolve Parliament, because he would not accept the advice of advisers who were in a helpless minority in relation to it, this demand was made for his recall. How did that compare with the conduct of Mr. Letellier? In the papers which had been brought down to them they had a statement of the reasons—first, as submitted to the Legislature; next as submitted to the Governor-General in the explanatory case—which induced the Lieutenant-Governor to dismiss his Ministry. The first and chief reason—although after all, as he would show presently, it was not the actual reason for the dismissal—the chief pretence was the conduct of the Government of the day in introducing measures in that Legislature without his previous sanction. There was no doubt whatever, in fact they had it from the statement of Mr. Letellier himself, that whatever difficulty arose in relation to that was purely a misunderstanding. The statement of Mr. Letellier entirely acquitted his advisers of any intentional disrespect to the Crown. It would be thought that so serious a punishment of his Ministry as dismissal ought not to follow an unintentional error, as he admitted there was no intentional disrespect to the Crown. It would be admitted that there ought, at least, to be some more serious ground for so serious a penalty. But was Mr. DeBoucherville justified in assuming that he had the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor? Look at the facts:—On the 28th January, according to the papers brought down, there was a Message sent by Mr. DeBoucherville to the Lieutenant-Governor at Rivière Ouelle, to this effect:—

No doubt, that was a very broad request; it might have been an unwisely worded

Message; it might have tended to the misconception of the answer which came on the following day, as follows:—

“Blank mailed to-day. If presence necessary, telegraph. Return Friday.”

Upon that, two measures—the Railway Bill and the Tax Bill—were introduced by the Government. Mr. DeBoucherville was of opinion that his telegram covered both these important measures, and that he had full authority in the reply to introduce those measures. On the 29th, the day the Message was received, the Railway Bill was introduced and some proceedings in relation to it took place every day from the 29th January to the 5th February. Under the rules of the House, copies of the Votes and Proceedings were sent to the Lieutenant-Governor every day for his information. Mr. Letellier, all through his papers, intimated that he took the liveliest personal interest in everything that occurred in connection with the public affairs of that Province. The Lieutenant-Governor, it was stated, was so minute in his examination of all public papers, that he could detect the slightest grammatical error in a Statute, and certainly, it was only reasonable to suppose that he could not but have been cognisant of the proceedings in the Legislature. There was, moreover, printed in these Votes and Proceedings, the statement of the leader of the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Angers, they being introduced with the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor. Was it wise—was it fair of the Lieutenant-Governor, when he got those documents into his hands, when he saw that his telegram was misunderstood, was made to cover a much wider authority than he intended to convey—was it wise or fair of him not to have warned his Ministers of the fact, and thus enabled them to act as they considered proper? He allowed them to go on, he gave no warning of any dissatisfaction on his part until the 19th February, twenty days after the resolutions had been brought up, and during which time they had been discussed in the Legislature and at public meetings throughout the country. Never once during that whole period had the Lieutenant-Governor even suggested to his Ministry that they had assumed authority which he had no idea of giving them. On that day there had been a conversation, during which, however, it had not been alleged that Mr. DeBoucherville had been ordered to suspend these measures. On the contrary, the statement made by Mr. DeBoucherville, and it had not been denied by Mr. Letellier, was that no such order had been given him. A conversation occurred between the Governor and Mr. DeBoucherville, in which it appeared that the former expressed his great regret at the necessity for legislation of that kind. That was perfectly proper if Mr. Letellier held that view. People might regret the necessity for particular legislation, and yet admit that necessity. Nothing further occurred until the 26th February. On that day, an application by the Lieutenant-Governor was addressed to his First Minister, asking for a number of papers in relation to this particular Bill. These papers were furnished, but even then Mr. DeBoucherville was left under the impression that nothing further than the reservation of the Bill was contemplated. They found in Mr. DeBoucherville's statement, and although Mr. Letellier objected to this statement having been made to the Legislature, he had nowhere denied the accuracy of it, and, therefore, they were bound to assume that it was accurate. On the 28th February they had this statement made by Mr. Letellier:—

"On leaving, Mr. DeBoucherville said: 'If I understand you rightly, you are hesitating between giving your sanction to the Railway Bill and reserving.' He replied, 'That is it.'"

From that it was evident he had these documents in his hands. He had taken all the proceedings necessary to enable him to say whether he desired to stop this Bill or not. That was nearly a month after the Bill had been introduced, and it was the first intimation that had been given by the Lieutenant-Governor to his advisers of certain measures in relation to the Bill. Why had all this delay taken place? Why had he allowed his Ministry to conduct the affairs of the country, during that whole month, if he intended ultimately to dismiss them? He (Mr. White) would tell them the reason. Mr. Letellier expected, by leaving Mr. DeBoucherville under the impression that there was no serious difficulty between them in relation to this Railway Bill, that the supplies would be voted, and then he could prorogue the House, and, having supplies for a twelve-month, he could have the elections at his leisure. Whether his Ministers were sustained or not, the patronage would still be in their hands to be used for the benefit of the Dominion Government at the elections to come off during the summer. That was the only reason for the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in allowing a whole month to elapse, during which this Bill had been discussed in the Legislature before he took any serious steps to stop it, and dismiss his Ministry. Then there was another measure, about which there seemed to have been some difference of opinion—that was in relation to the Tax Bill. He (Mr. White) was not going to say whether that Bill was wise or unwise. If there was one thing more than another which was clearly and unmistakably within the functions of Parliament, it was the question of ways and means and supplies. It was for them to determine whether they would raise money in this particular way or any other. They had obligations to meet, the credit of the country to maintain, and they had to find means in some way for the purpose, and if they chose that particular way they had a perfect right to do so. But it was complained that they had not consulted the Lieutenant-Governor before bringing in their Bill. Upon that point they had this statement in the explanations of the Lieutenant-Governor:—

And yet they found the following statement only four paragraphs before it:—

"The Lieutenant-Governor, from time to time, since the last meeting of the Legislature, drew the attention of the Premier to several matters respecting the interests of the Province of Quebec, among others:—

That was the statement made by the Lieutenant-Governor to prove his intense interest in the affairs of his Province, and the fact that he had frequent discussion with his First Minister to urge him not to levy new taxes, and to reduce the expenditure. Yet, in the fourth paragraph after that, he stated that Mr. De Boucherville had never informed him that the country was in so impecunious a position as to require new taxes. There was one feature in this document which he was sure must have struck every hon. member as extraordinary. The relations of the Lieutenant-Governor with his Ministry were necessarily confidential relations, and the Ministry had as much right to expect that, when they conferred with the Lieutenant-Governor, they were conferring with him with the most perfect confidence, as the Governor had a right to feel assured that the Ministry would maintain secrecy and confidence in relation to every communication made to them. Yet, he (Mr. White) would ask any hon. gentleman to read this clause in the Lieutenant-Governor's statement, and then say whether it was the kind of conduct which the Ministry had the right to expect from the Lieutenant-Governor:—

“The Lieutenant-Governor expressed also, but with regret, to the Premier, that the Orders passed in Council to increase the salaries of Civil Service servants seemed to him inopportune, at a time when the Government were negotiating with the Bank of Montreal a loan of half a million, with power to increase that loan to $1,000,000, at a rate of interest of seven per cent.; and indeed, even to-day (1st of March), the Lieutenant-Governor is obliged to allow an Order in Council to be passed to obtain the last half-million for the Government, without which the Government would be unable to meet its obligations, as I was informed by the hon. the Provincial Treasurer, to-day, by order of the Prime Minister.”

It was impossible to exaggerate the ineffable meanness of that statement. Whether wise or unwise, the proceedings referred to had been taken by Order in Council, sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, and could not, therefore, have been an element in the causes which led to the dismissal of Ministers. The increases to the salaries of civil servants might have been wise or unwise, but they were made under an Act of the Legislature, passed without opposition and with the full approbation of the then leader of the Opposition, Mr. Joly. But this confidential conversation, in the privacy of the Council Chamber, was thus wantonly exposed in a public document, simply that it might have influence against his old advisers in the elections. Then they had the “Explanatory Case,” addressed to His Excellency the Governor-General. He did not propose to go over all the statements of that case. They had there the statement that the proclamation for the summoning of the Legislature was published without the Lieutenant-Governor being consulted at all, and he was bound to say that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor in relation to this particular charge was not such as to entitle him to respect at the hands of any one. In the reply which he made to the petition of certain members of the late Executive Council of the Province of Quebec, he used these words:—

“While referring to these proclamations, I may observe that, by introducing words never used by me, viz.:—‘For the despatch of business,’ the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville has endeavoured to convey the idea that I referred to the proclamation summoning Parliament ‘for the despatch of business,’ whereas it was what he terms ‘the mere formal one’ on which I desired to confer with him, before the proclamation was published.”

Now, what was the original statement which is thus said to have been perverted? Here it is:—“One was for the summoning of Parliament, which I had reserved in order to confer with you.” As a matter of fact, the proclamation for the prorogation, from time to time, of Parliament, was not a proclamation for the summoning of Parliament. Even if it were such, it was not of sufficient importance to justify a conference between the Lieutenant-Governor and his Ministers. And yet, by saying that he reserved it in order to confer with the Ministry, he left the impression that the particular proclamation here referred to, was one for the summoning of Parliament for the despatch of business. He allowed that impression to remain for nearly a year, and last year the elections were run upon it, the changes were rung in every constituency upon the enormity of the offence of a Ministry summoning Parliament without consulting the head of the Executive. The Constitution was appealed to to show that this particular act of summoning Parliament was a special prerogative of the Crown, and that therefore the Lieutenant-Governor ought to have been consulted in relation to it. And yet no one made, on behalf of the Lieutenant-Governor, the explanation which was now made, until the untruth was brought out by the late members of the Executive Council. Then they had another charge, that relating to a councillor for the south ward of the village of Montmagny, that was dragged in for the purpose, as Mr. Letellier himself stated, of showing that he had endeavoured to impress upon his Government, long before these difficulties arose, that he was opposed a l'outrance, to any substitution of the authority of the Executive for that of the Judiciary, where the latter could take cognisance of any case. He said in referring to that case: "I added that from the moment a legal or even an illegal election takes place, the duty of deciding it rested with the Courts in accordance with the ordinary course of law, of which they are the interpreters." The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), in his speech last night, had referred to another case to show how utterly uncandid that statement was. That case occurred in the county of Chambly a short time ago. Dr. Martel, who was the member for that county, had been Mayor for the last five years of the municipality. The law required a formal deposit of his qualifications, and if that deposit did not take place it was competent for any ratepayer to bring a suit before the Courts to have him displaced. Yet they found the Lieutenant-Governor, who had been so scrupulous, in the Montmagny case, actually removing Dr. Martel by an Order in Council, and thus substituting the Executive for the Judicial authority, when the latter was quite competent to deal with the matter. Dr. Martel was a gentleman of wealth, who was the member for the county, and who had been Mayor for five years, and there was not the slightest doubt of his qualifications. Here they found the Lieutenant-Governor doing the very thing he had complained of his Ministry doing in the Montmagny case. It was true, however, that the gentleman who was elected in Montmagny was a special friend of Mr. Letellier's party, and the gentleman appointed by his advisers might have been a Conservative; but it was also quite true that Dr. Martel was a member of the Legislature, but in opposition to Mr. Letellier. He (Mr. White) would be sorry to think that there was any connection between the two facts; but it was also true that Dr. Martel was one of those who, in order to carry out the views of economy of Mr. Letellier, had voted to dispense with the residence of Spencer Wood altogether, and house the Lieutenant-Governor in some more economical manner. Thus, they saw the want of candour and the insincerity of these statements made by the Lieutenant-Governor. All through the documents ran this general current—that Mr. Letellier was annoyed, according to his own view, at the expenditures which were taking place in the Province of Quebec. His object, as he put it himself, was to induce the Government to reduce this expenditure. His object in the papers he had presented to the Governor-General, was to convince the people that, if he had done that which was, if not ultra vires, at least an extreme stretch of his authority, he had done it in the interests of an economical administration of affairs. Now, what was the position of the Province of Quebec? He (Mr. White) knew that it was not the business of this House to consider provincial politics or provincial finances; but, when the question of economy was put forward, and when hon. gentlemen opposite were sustaining Mr. Letellier, because, as they said, he had rescued that Province from running into extravagant expenditure, they might very well, for a moment, look at what that expenditure was. The Province of Quebec was peculiarly situated. In the first place its mixed French and English population necessitated the use of the two languages in all official proceedings, and the employment of a double staff of officials in many cases, all of which extra expenditure was not required in the Province of Ontario. He thought he had very good authority in saying that the Province of Ontario, which was pointed to by Mr. Joly and his friends as a Province economically administered, was really much more taxed than the people of Quebec had been, even if the Tax Bill had gone into effect. In the first place they were told that Ontario had a surplus of over four millions, while, unfortunately, Quebec was running into debt. The fact was, however, that Ontario had received from the Dominion Treasury, in ten years, $2,380,000 more than Quebec. Towards the Administration of Justice in Ontario the Province contributed 40 per cent., while the municipalities contributed 60 per cent. In Quebec, the Province contributed 95 per cent., and the municipalities only 5 per cent. Thus it was seen that, if the Province of Quebec had serious financial difficulties, they arose more from the peculiar character of the people, of their local institutions, their municipal machinery and their traditions, than from any other cause. The contributions from municipalities alone in Ontario to the Administration of Justice amounted to nearly $2,500,000 during ten years more than in Quebec, so that, in those two items, the Province of Quebec would have had to-day a surplus of $5,000,000, and would have been quite as well off as the Province of Ontario. He would take, as an authority upon that point, the opinion of a gentleman who would be accepted as an authority on the other side—he referred to a statement made by the hon. member for Lambton, when he was Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, who said :

“We are told that, while before the Union we were complaining of constant deficits, since that time, this Province has waxed rich by the union with it of the other Provinces, and is now able to count its surplus by millions; while the truth is, that, if we devote the revenues accruing to the Government of Ontario from general sources to the same purposes that the general revenues had been devoted to in the other Provinces, we would not only have no surplus, but would be obliged to resort to direct taxation to a considerable extent to meet our expenses.”

That was the comparative position of the two Provinces. He would take a few items of expenditure in the two Provinces, and compare the alleged enormous increase of expenditure by the Conservatives of Quebec with the increase in the same items under the Administration of the friends of the Opposition in Ontario. Civil Government in the Province of Quebec, from 1871 to 1878, had increased 24 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent., while in Ontario, during the same period, it increased 38 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The cost of Legislation in Quebec during that time, under that frightfully extravagant Conservative Administration, had increased 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while in Ontario, under the pure and economical Administration of the friends of the Opposition, it had increased 39 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The Administration of Justice in Quebec had increased by 41 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent., and in Ontario 62 per cent. In the matter of Education the increase was 24 per cent. in Quebec and 55 per cent. in Ontario. He quoted these figures for the purpose of showing how little ground there was for the general charge running all through these papers, that it was necessary, in the interests of an economical administration of affairs in Quebec, that a change of Government should take place; and also to show how little Mr. Letellier was justified in stating as he did, on going to assume the Government of Quebec, that he went with the determination of using the influence of his position in order to bring about a change of Administration and a change of policy in the interests of economy in the Province. In the light of the papers before the House, he (Mr. White) thought they might fairly come to this conclusion, that if Lieutenant-Governors might, under our constitutional system, act as Mr. Letellier had acted in the Province of Quebec, then we had no security for a fair administration of the affairs of the country. Every one who knew anything of public life knew that there were times in the administration of the affairs of a country when Governments were surrounded by great difficulties, and when they required to adopt measures for the public safety or the public weal, which the popular voice outside might for the moment condemn, but which, upon sober second thought, it would sustain. And, if this House refused to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor, if it should admit that Lieutenant-Governors might seize upon such a time as that—and that was exactly the condition of things in the Province of Quebec last Session—to dismiss their Ministers, then there would be an end altogether to anything like Provincial independence or anything like the autonomy of the Provinces being maintained. There was bitterness enough in the politics of the country, and bitterness enough in our political discussions, but, if Lieutenant-Governors were to be made counters in the game of politics, if they were to be used by the Government of the day at Ottawa to betray their advisers in the Local Legislatures, when these advisers did not happen to be in accord with the Government that appointed them, then we might well bid good-bye to the system we now possessed, and try to discover some other and better one. No Ministry would be safe as the advisers of a man who acted as Mr. Letellier had done, for he had confessed in the papers submitted that he had watched his Government, that he had taken notes of private conversations with his Ministers, in order to use them afterwards. He (Mr. White), therefore sincerely hoped that this House would, by its vote to-night, condemn the act, whatever the consequences might be to Mr. Letellier, and thus teach the people of this country that in the future they had in the Parliament of Canada a safeguard against the attempt of Lieutenant-Governors to act as Mr. Letellier had done.

MR. HUNTINGTON: It was not my intention to take any part in this debate—at any rate, at this early hour—because I judged from the length of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the other side that we are to have on this question, as we had last year, a week or fortnight, or three weeks' debate. I am glad to see that the gentlemen opposite have been so delighted with the speech of the young member (Mr. White)—the maiden speech of the young member whose advent to this House they have been praying for for so many years. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman was able to seize this House with that magnetism which he failed to exercise in Lower Canada, when in various constituencies, he sought the opportunity—

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. HUNTINGTON: Let me say to hon. gentlemen that they are in the position of those of whom it is said: "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." Do hon. gentlemen suppose that anybody on this side cares for their jeers and interruptions? We are a band here—not numerous—not able, like the hon. gentlemen themselves, to stifle discussion—but we are strong enough in numbers even to defy the interruptions which the hon. gentlemen seem disposed to make. I would be glad in this first Session of this Parliament, when every member on the other side owes his seat to an appeal to the people to permit him to come here and improve the fiscal conditions of the country—I would have been glad to extend to those gentlemen—though I might have differed with them on the only question on which they made their appeal—I would have been glad to extend the hand of fellowship to them, and to say: For this Session let partisanship be buried; let us try to show the people either that you can do what you have promised, or that the system you have proposed to introduce is a failure. But every day and every night comes that bitter hiss of partisanship from the hon. gentlemen who have been crazed by a success which they have not earned, who are dizzy with the advantages which have resulted to them from deceiving the people of this country. And I stand here one of a little band who have fought battles with hon. gentlemen opposite before, and I repeat now, in this, my exordium, that it is of no use for them to attempt this high style of cheering their friends, and attempting to put down their enemies. I would have been glad to see even this subject which has been discussed here approached in a non-partisan spirit, because I know there are many men in the Province of Quebec who honestly believe that the Lieutenant-Governor has done wrong, and who honestly feel that there should be some remedy; but, when they send here their orators to talk in the style in which gentlemen have talked last night and to-day, when these orators forget that the fight which they are to make, should be made with the sword, like the fight of a soldier, and not with the bludgeon of a hoodlum or the dagger of an assassin, then it is time to rise on this side of the House, and tell them again that, although we are not numerous, we are not afraid, and that we will defend our friends against the unjust assaults which the multitude—the mob I hope they will not become—hurl against them. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House is a new member. That hon. gentleman has been before various constituencies in Lower Canada for the past four or five years, as a young man, and some people who have not known him have called him a promising boy. Sir, we expected when he came here that he would have dealt with some modesty with the question which he took up. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman has not done this ; but there is a rule in this House which supposes that young men must be dealt with gently, and I shall leave him to be dealt with by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) ; but I fear he will find his equal, if the hon. member for Halton is himself equal to what I knew him to be in former years. I can picture to myself the castigation which this young gentleman will get bye-and-bye for the unprovoked and unjust assaults which he made upon the hon. member for Halton, and which, no doubt, was instigated by the very Premier himself, who, dizzy with his own success, allows no opportunity to escape of making it felt. The hon. member for Cardwell is not the man to make an assault of that kind unless in party interest, by party direction. I could not but be reminded by his attack, when I knew the vast intellectual superiority of the one man over the other, and contemplated the punishment which must follow, of the story of the small boy with a jack-knife, about which he felt what the hon. gentleman feels regarding his seat. He undertook to carve his name on one end of a mule. The story runs that, after the lapse of some time, when the Doctor had twisted his lips round from the back of his neck, the boy revived, and said to his father : " Papa, do you think I will die ? " The father replied : " No ; but you will never again look so pretty as you did, but will have a darned sight more sense." So this hon. gentleman who comes here with a flourish, forgetting that the House is full of his equals, at any rate, and who, in his first speech, has hurled defiance, denunciation and misrepresentation of the grossest kind, will soon find his level, and be careful how he attacks hon. gentlemen unfairly, lest he may suffer from the interference, notwithstanding the encouragement, of this highly elated body of gentlemen who like to hear anything traducing their enemies. There has always been in our politics a remarkable circumstance that, after the general elections, it is considered necessary in this Parliament to ventilate the many local questions which have arisen during them. One hon. gentleman after another gets up, and tells us how Mrs. Jones was approached by his opponent, and other like important incidents of his canvass. We have all the local scandals retailed here, among our serious deliberations in the House of Commons, upon the local trifles which attended hon. members' elections, and which resulted in their gaining their seats. The hon. gentleman is not satisfied with choosing scandals relating to ourselves, but we have all the gossip of all the Jean Baptistes and Mrs. Smiths of the people of Lower Canada, who had anything to do with the local elections—a second and not a lesser nuisance—retailed here. He tells us he knows the Lieutenant-Governor was down at the Local House, improperly interfering. How did he know ? He saw his Aide ; and, so, this hon. gentleman, who speaks by the book, only expressing the opinion insinuated by the First Minister last night, rises to tell us that the Speaker of the Province of Quebec has been bribed, and that the Governor unduly interfered by attendance at the House, when the discussions were going on and the votes were being taken. We all recognise the abilities of the hon. gentleman, but, blinded by his partisanship, and servile to the First Minister, he has simply re-echoed the voice of the First Minister last year and last night. I remember, when the First Minister led one side of the House in the old Province of Canada, when, perhaps, a similar scene occurred. The hon. gentleman has gone back to old times, but I will not recite at much length matters with which the House is not entirely cognisant from its personal experience. Sandfield Macdonald had been accused of having said something at a dinner party. I remember how one member after another rose to state what Sandfield Macdonald said at that dinner. What had been said by the hon. member for Cardwell was not so mean as ventilating what took place at a distinguished statesman's dinner ; but it is evident that under the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite, we are returning to that state of things, and, while we remember to be gentlemen, we forget the manners which gentlemen generally display. Let me tell the hon. member for Cardwell, and hon. members opposite, that the Hon. Mr. Letellier has been a man sans reproche during a long public life. He has had the misfortune to differ with the hon. the Postmaster-General, and I have had that misfortune of differing with leading gentlemen opposite, but he has committed the fault or indulged in the misfortune of displeasing hon. gentlemen opposite, and they go for him with their bludgeons and stilettos, because the man who stands in their way must be murdered. They have attacked the hon. gentleman in this sense, they have brought these accusations against him of which they have no proof, and in this House they are only following out the practice which they invariably adopt towards those who stand in their way. If they dismiss Mr. Letellier to-morrow, he will still be enshrined in the hearts of the people of Lower Canada. The member for Cardwell has no right to speak as he did. He sought to get the right to speak to the people of Lower Canada on various occasions, went before various constituencies, and I admit he made a gallant fight, and a great many of his friends thought then that Lower Canada could not do without him, an opinion they have since altered ; but it was only when he went to Cardwell, and evoked the sympathies of Mr. Thomas Ferguson's lambs, that he was enabled to come to this House and stand up for the privileges of the Province of Quebec. I mention this point because I do not believe it comes with seemliness from the hon. gentlemen to speak with such pronounced bias for the Province of Quebec. I do not think his experience in that Province is calculated to make him believe he is par excellence the mouthpiece of that Province. I do not think that the influences he represents in this House could be vastly popular with the people he represents down there. I take issue with the remark he made that the Province of Quebec is here to seek relief. Quebec asks nothing from this Parliament. There are two currents of opinion in the Province of Quebec, which are equally strong ; for every one who asks an investigation, another asks that things should take their own course. The hon. gentleman talked nonsense, when he said the successes against the late Government in Quebec, at the last Federal elections, were due to Mr. Letellier's action. It is true, a gentleman in this House, the hon. member for Mississquoi (Mr. Baker) was assailed by one of his Tory friends, with a story which I never believed. My friends tell me this had nothing whatever to do with the result of that election ; but the hon. gentleman went further, and said that the right hon. gentleman had been placed in power because of the Goff scandal, because Mr. Letellier had dismissed his Ministers. The people had an opportunity to pronounce on the dismissal. The constituency of Stanstead had pronounced by a large majority to sustain Mr. Joly, and to condemn Mr. DeBoucherville. It is a well known fact that Mr. Joly has multitudes of supporters in Lower Canada, who have not yet given up their confidence in gentlemen opposite, and who sustain, even yet, the right hon. Premier. I call the attention of the House to the fact, with reference to these people in the Province of Quebec who supported Mr. Joly in the spring, and Sir John A. Macdonald in the autumn, that the power which they have given their representatives here is to be used to butcher their rights in the Province of Quebec. I believe the right hon. gentleman and his friends will be made to feel, as they ought to feel, that, if they are to thrust the bitterness of party into the local strife in Quebec, to attempt to punish Mr. Letellier and his Ministers for what the people of Quebec have condoned, or justified, there will be a divergence and disintegration which will tend to bring about that change in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite which the country will not be long before being anxious for. It is well enough to recall the high tone in which the right hon. gentleman's resolution was presented last year, starting with the declaration that there was no partisanship in the matter, and we believed he had risen above partisanship ; that, although there were local elections coming in the Province of Quebec, he would not allow himself to be influenced by these elections, but the course he pursued in that election proved his bitter partisanship. I warned hon. members that the motion was a mere election movement, and that the Conservative party in this House would, by all means, seek an opportunity of exercising the influence of the House of Commons in the elections. I claim that the long speech of the hon. the Postmaster-General (Mr. Langevin), made last Session, was intended to be rehearsed at the elections in the Province of Quebec. We saw, when those elections came, that hon. gentlemen rushed for their respective counties where they had influence, to fight that great constitutional battle which the people decided against them. The motion was put to the House last Session and not carried; and now, when they are in the majority, and have here that power which they cannot exercise elsewhere, they come here and say, according to the hon. member for Simcoe, "We have a new Court now; we may reverse this and many other things." Does the hon. gentleman mean to say you change the law because you change the Judges? Is there nothing to be fixed which one party does that the other may not reverse. The hon. gentlemen admitted that Mr. Letellier did not do an unconstitutional act. Are you to declare now that this opinion of Parliament, pronounced last year, must be reversed now because you are in a majority? Last year, when you brought charges against me, I dared you to move for Committees. The hon. the Minister of Public Works stated: "We do not want Committees now, you are in the majority." Is the doctrine of the hon. member for Cardwell to be carried out? Are the Conservatives going to deal with public questions when they are sure they have Committees which they can control? Let us know whether the reason the hon. member for Bagot makes his motion is that he believes he has a majority of the House behind him, or whether the doctrines of the hon. member for Cardwell were those which he expected would fall on the willing ears of his co-Judges? The hon. member for Lambton pointed out that, while the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) began in a judicial style, he fell to abuse long before he got through, and showed that he started with a determination to punish the Lieutenant-Governor, whatever evidence he might be able to adduce, by the passing of this vote. We, on the Opposition, have not much weight, I admit, in this House, but the country looks on, and the people, particularly those in the Province of Quebec, who have begun to feel that they were being liberated from the thralldom under which they have groaned for years, will ask, why does the hon. member for Bagot open this question? Is it a foregone conclusion that, because his friends are in power, he can do what he likes. He may have this question to answer one day, and I recommend him to take the opportunity to discuss the subject well in his own mind now. There are some subjects which should be treated in this House free from partisanship, and this is one; yet we see them maintaining their motions by all the stale literature of the last elections, that this Parliament is called upon to punish a man, because, it is said, he was a friend of those who appointed him. What evidence have you against him which was not submitted to the people of the Province of Quebec when his constitutional advisers submitted themselves to their verdict, and when these advisers were sustained? I admit hon. gentlemen say: "You did not get a majority; it was not large enough." We had a majority that astonished us very much who knew what had been the state of feeling there, and which gave us hope, and the people in the Province hoped, that the old oligarchy was about to be weakened, and that we might expect something better in the time to come, and on which the people approved of the course Mr. Letellier pursued; and, as the member for Cardwell contended, that the people took the first opportunity of punishing Mr. Letellier on account of his alliance with the Federal Government, by putting Sir John Macdonald in office. Two or three hon. members who spoke—though I do not know what their views were on other matters—asserted that gentleman was only the tool of the Federal Government. I was glad to hear several hon. members say "Hear, hear," and will bid again for their applause. The member for Cardwell has again exhibited that bitter partisanship he always displays in dealing with Quebec questions. He could give no proof of his charges, unless the desire he had to fasten on an adversary views of which I hope he is not guilty himself. There is no evidence, actual or implied, to show the Federal Government had anything to do with the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; and yet he, with the solemn declaration of the then Prime Minister of Canada in this House, where only gentlemen should assemble, casts doubts upon that hon. gentleman's statement, when he should at least hold his tongue when he had no adverse proofs to submit. I was rather amused the member for Cardwell should go back to the days of the double shuffle. I should think there were Conservatives in this House who would be glad to forget it. I am not going to tell what happened then, but would recommend those who have an abiding faith in the hon. leader of the Government and his friends, or who are new members and want to know what they were capable of, to read for themselves about that notorious shuffle. They may as well also consider the speech of the leader of the present Government, shortly after the fall of his former Government in 1873. He spoke in Ottawa at a dinner given him by his admirers about that time, when he was in a mood to prophesy his return to power in three months one day, and hint secession to British Columbia the next; and he said, if I remember well and—the right hon. gentleman can correct me if I am wrong—that he knew Sir Edmund Head well and admired him much, that he knew Sir Edmund would not allow George Brown to be his Minister. He admired Lord Dufferin in the same way and recognised in him like traits of character. He went on to say that Lord Dufferin might become as popular as Sir E. Head. I advise him to put that little chapter into the account of the double shuffle. I think the member for Cardwell was unhappy in that reference, but it served to show what he was capable of swallowing when the double shuffle of the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) could be thus tolerated and approved. That was not the last extraordinary act of the same party. I do not know if they are able to swallow the motion of the member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau). But the mouth that could swallow the double shuffle, could easily receive and pass even the member for Bagot himself, if he chose to go with it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 36) To revive and amend the Acts relating to the Union Assurance Company of Canada, and to change the name thereof to the Crown Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kilvert).

DEBATE RESUMED.

Debate on Mr. Mousseau's motion resumed.

MR. HUNTINGTON: Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was calling the attention of the House to the discrepancy which existed between the views of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The hon. member for Cardwell, anticipating what might be the criticisms, or, perhaps, what had been the criticisms of hon. members on this side of the House, explained why it was that the Government was to allow this question to pass sub silentio, while the hon. member for North Simcoe last night told us, in somewhat exhilarated terms, that now, fortunately, they had a new Court and were going to try the old cases over again. I think, Sir, when the hon. gentlemen come to consider the position in which they have placed this question which is now being discussed before you; when they realise that speaker after speaker who has risen to point out the grave question which is now engaging the attention of this House has mentioned it as the most important question which ever came before the Legislature for discussion; when they remember that even the last speaker declared it to be second only to that other great question—I suppose he means the trade policy discussed by the present Government—when they regard the importance of this great question, they will find themselves a little embarrassed to see that the right hon. gentlemen who leads the Government, and hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, have allowed this question of vast proportions and overwhelming magnitude to come before this House without the expression of any opinion of their own. I would like to ask my hon. friends from Terrebonne, Three Rivers, Compton and Joliette (Messrs. Masson, Langevin, Pope and Baby), what is their view with regard to the importance of this great question now under discussion; whether they regard it as of importance to Lower Canada that this terrible problem should be discussed here, and they, especially my rather talkative friend the Postmaster-General, should have nothing to say on it, regarded as it is on the back benches as of such vast and overwhelming consequence? I cannot suppose that a Government, led by a distinguished statesman, who would be an ornament to England, Europe and the world, and that had the advantage of the distinguished Postmaster-General, whose statesmanship in Lower Canada was so well recognised on the Ministerial side, and the advice of his hon. friend from Terrebonne, whose distinguished qualities were recognised on both sides of the House, would allow their innocent followers to take up this question of vast proportions, and deal with it blindly without affording them some aid. I can only understand the reason given by the member for Cardwell, that their mouths are shut by the action of the last Parliament. The Postmaster-General of to-day had enough to say on it last year, when he had no responsibility, in the interval of his journeys to the Quebec polls to help his friends in the local elections; then he told us, with remarkable learning and prescience of the terrible punishment that awaited the Lieutenant-Governor for his sins. I would like to know if my hon. friend from Terrebonne has been told by his leader not to speak, and whether there is any truth in the rumour that the Premier, who has such a regard for constitutional practice and political propriety, does not encourage the assault upon the Lieutenant-Governor. I would like to know whether the right hon. gentleman, as reported, has fulminated orders as an obstruction in the way of the glorious effort for justice now being made by his followers, and which programme was marked down before the Session commenced. When the Conservative party returned to power—not to glorify their double-shuffle or Pacific Scandal—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear; Oh, oh.

MR. HUNTINGTON, I am glad to hear those cheers, and see there is life in the old thing yet. It appears they have a good deal to swallow before they get through this world. When they came back here, forgetting they were sent by a movement of the workmen, asking them to fulfil their promises, by turning the stones of the country into bread, I would like to know if they remembered the cry that arose with regard to this question. The Lower Canada Conservative papers disclosed the terrible things that were to happen when they came into power—the Lieutenant-Governor was to be dismissed at once—there was to be no voice in his favour, but only an overwhelming justification of Conservative doctrine on this question. But, for some reason, that recalcitrant Governor and bad man, whose irregularities had been so eloquently depicted by the Postmaster-General, although the leader of the Government is in power some time, and last year made a motion on the subject, has not yet been disturbed, and the Conservative papers have bellowed in vain. Leading hon. gentlemen opposite have not opened their mouths, even in this the most important discussion to Quebec that has ever taken place. Why this silence? Is it true the Premier put a veto on any speaking by the member for Terrebonne? The Premier, instead of being a Federalist, like, I am glad to see, the member for Cardwell, continues a Legislative Unionist. Does he still desire that legislative union he could not accomplish at Confederation? Is he playing his old game now? He is a man who can afford to wait for the carrying out of his old views, and is, perhaps, taking the first steps towards the destruction of the autonomy of Quebec, in allowing his followers, whom he can silence, to take their present action. I do not know that he can silence the members for Bagot and Laval, or that he is strong enough to repress discontent in another branch; perhaps his hand has lost its old cunning, but he can silence the member for Cardwell, whose speech, it must be assumed, was made at the instigation of the right hon. leader of the Government. The motion signifies an interference with the affairs of Quebec by a Legislature, which, in one sense, at least, is hostile to its views, or, if not hostile at this moment, one that may become so, and a Legislature dreaded by Quebec when she entered Confederation. Any act of this kind sanctions the opinion that she ought to be protected in her views, interests and institutions from the overwhelming majority of this Legislature. Why has the Federal Government not interfered? Why have they set up some gentlemen to act where they dare not themselves move a finger? I fancy, if Sir George Cartier, whom I never supported, but whose memory I honour, were here, he would find the Conservative opinion arrayed against him as against us—a man who was driven by the Lower Canada Conservatives from this House;—what would he say, he who watched over the interests of that Province, whose great, darling project was that of guarding from danger of all kinds the peculiar institutions of Lower Canada, if he saw the project of the Federal Parliament's interference in the manner now proposed? What would he say to the right hon. gentleman who inferentially promoted this movement, whom he knew to be always opposed to the Federal system, and to the Postmaster-General, and the member for Terrebonne? He would say: My friends, do not be carried away by a momentary desire for victory; you may banish Mr. Letellier, but, if you set this example of inviting the intervention of the Federal Parliament, you will invite intervention detrimental to us in future, and which, at Confederation, we strove to erect all possible barriers against. Do not listen to the siren voice of certain men, associated with me and others, sent here with hostile purposes. I have seen the aides of the right hon. gentleman moving here, after a caucus of the whole party, and which we cannot refuse to believe they all approve of. I have seen this motion of one of them sustained by a long and able speech, after which another promising young man, the member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), was undoubtedly put forward to move the previous question. Why, he congratulated the House. We could still debate this question, knowing there was no danger in that to his party in Quebec, where few copies of the debates would circulate. But he saw there would be a great danger in putting the motion on the records showing the Conservative party's assault on the autonomy of Quebec, and that the Opposition submitted a motion setting forth the true doctrine. This fact could be proclaimed at every church door in Lower Canada, and the habitant would understand his friends had voted for a motion asking Upper Canada to interfere with his local affairs, and all the danger of that precedent. Ministers have put forward their young members to prevent the honest habitants from hearing the nature of the motion, and the fact of the Opposition moving to protect the interests of Lower Canada, which, for party purposes, the Conservatives were willing to risk and violate. I can understand, Sir, why these hon. gentlemen will say this will not do much harm, but it is evident the House and the country will understand that they dreaded harm when they put their young men forward to move this motion, for, if this motion amounts to any thing, it is put forward for the purpose of preventing amendment. The hon. gentleman did it last year for the same purpose. He brought his motion on in amendment to the proposal to go into Committee of Supply, where no amendment could be proposed, which would express the Lower Canadian view, and which would warn Lower Canada that they were being protected from this encroachment upon their economy. The hon. leader of the Government does not know anything about the matter, but listens quietly to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr.

White), and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), to see what kind of a case they can make out. Then the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), with his vast experience in these questions, discovered that the moving of the previous question would result as it has resulted. The attempt that was made to stifle an expression of opinion on the subject is only followed up by an attempt this year to express an opinion of which hon. gentlemen are afraid, and which is a disgraceful one. I do not see how this motion can be anything else but a motion of non-confidence in my hon. friends from Lower Canada. Are my hon. friends the Postmaster-General (Mr. Langevin), the hon. member for Terrebonne, (Mr. Masson) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Baby) so neglectful of their duties in the shades and blandishments of office that they have not a word to say in reference to her constitutional rights?

MR. LANGEVIN : Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON : The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but he dare not say anything more. I will sit down if the hon. gentleman has the courage to formulate his views upon the question. I desire to ask the hon. the Postmaster-General a fair question. Having himself declined to take a position on this matter, having left Lower Canada to the young men, as the Indians say of their braves, would he, if this motion passed, resign and let his hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) have his place? I do not know but that the hon. leader of the Government should allow the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) to take his place; but what I do know is this: if these gentlemen who teach us constitutional doctrines are in the right, and if the Government is not in a position to assert itself, if there is any want of confidence among those sitting behind them, the general impression has been heretofore that the representative of Her Majesty would cast his eye upon those who had prescience in interpreting public opinion, and probably the hon. member for Bagot will be brought to the front, and, if the hon. member does come forward, we need not expect any opposition from hon. gentlemen who ought, at least, to be willing to support him.

I think there is no possible excuse for the position which the Government took. Every one knew what the Lieutenant-Governor had done, and that the matter was discussed last Session. Now, Sir, why did not the gentlemen move when they first came into office. The hon. member for Cardwell tells us they ought to wait for the vote of Parliament. Is there any man who doubts that the leader of the Government could indicate to Parliament what its vote should be? Is there any doubt that the Government is leading Parliament in the matter? Knowing that, is there any man who will not regard this motion as a subterfuge unworthy of discussion, and as unworthy of a question of the greatest gravity? We have had a motion presented here, as I have said before, under the shield of cowardice, by a Government which we all know have dictated the terms, but who dare not indulge in an expression of their opinion. Several hon. gentlemen have made a good deal of the statement that no one dare defend Lieutenant-Governor Letellier on this side of the House. I do not think it would require a good deal of courage to defend him. I do not see why we should defend him while we take the ground that you have no right to deal with the question. I do not see why, while we condemn you for interfering, we should enter into the details of the question. That the Lieutenant-Governor's action in relieving the Province of the incubus of the late Ministry was acceptable to the people was exemplified by the elections which took place. I remember standing here last Session, and hearing the hon. gentleman say the Liberals were to be wiped out, and that, under the new régime, the poor would be made rich. The people of the Province of Quebec had been accustomed to believe in the Conservative party, and they have not yet lost their faith in it. It was on account of this that you were sustained in Quebec. In the people's dire calamity, you undertook to make them rich, and, if you do not succeed, you will not continue so hilarious as you are just now. You have undertaken to fulfil promises which I wish it were possible you could fulfil. You have made a promise which, if it were possible for you to fulfil, would make this country, notwithstanding the prevailing depression, prosperous and happy. If you have done this under false pretences, the people of this country will not bring you into Court; but they will deal with you, in the future, as they have done with you in the past. If you are charlatans, they will know it, and they will punish you for it. I would like to ask the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), in view of the admission which has just been made, that the Lieutenant-Governor has the constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, but that it was a question of unwisdom, where we are to draw the line. If the Lieutenant-Governor should not dismiss his Ministers when they brought down measures without his assent, when they undertook to deal with the public interest in an adverse sense, when he thinks they legislate against his views for the purpose of setting aside the Courts, if he could not deal with a Ministry which acknowledged it was under the influence of railway rings, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to tell me whether there is any line which could be drawn, and whether there is any state of things which would justify the Lieutenant-Governor coming to this conclusion. If these things were not justification sufficient, then, in Heaven's name, tell us what would be. It has been relegated, Sir, to hon. gentlemen opposite to abuse the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, but there is no man within the sound of my voice who knows the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, who does not know him to be an amiable and accomplished gentleman. Whatever mistake he has made in public life should be dealt with as a mistake. Foul insinuations have been made against him; but we have always to expect these things when our hon. friends are in power. In spite of these things, I repeat there is no man on that side of the House who does not know that he has not a colleague beside him who is more estimable in private life, or more highly regarded in public life, than this very Lieutenant-Governor. We have seen the efforts of hon. gentlemen before to crush their opponents, and we have seen the result. If Lieutenant-Governor Letellier were dismissed to-morrow, he would not suffer in consequence. I say his name is enshrined in the hearts of those who love liberty in Lower Canada, and who prefer constitutional government to mere fealty to partisans. If this stubborn and blind majority were to secure his dismissal, they would find that there were dozens of counties that would open to him and send him back to this House, of which he would be an ornament, and to that public life of which he has been an ornament so long. Let me say a word regarding the Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec. One would suppose, Sir, if he read Conservative newspapers and followed Conservative orators, that there was some unknown man, some man without experience, holding the reins of Government in the Province of Quebec, that Mr. DeBoucherville and Mr. Angers were most exemplary statesmen. The hon. the Postmaster-General knows that in the Province of Quebec there is not a public man who does not admire the present Prime Minister of Quebec as a man of prudence, a man of ability and culture and of wealth, a man whose patriotism is recognised, and who can very well afford to laugh at the sneers and the jeers of these gentlemen who are the nouveaux riches of the moment, and who forget to pay respect to those who are placed over them. I saw a statement in a newspaper, the other day, that Mr. Joly was a classmate of Mr. Waddington, the present Prime Minister of France. I heard it stated that the tutor of Mr. Waddington, who had also been the tutor of Mr. Joly, was proud of educating two such élèves, and certainly he had just reason for his pride, for his pupils were now Prime Ministers of the two French-speaking countries of the world—one no doubt larger than the other, but each of them having battled for the same principles. Mr. Joly, being a man of intellect, wealth and position, could, if he had wished it, or been ambitious, obtained every mark of distinction possible in his native Province. We know very well that he might have taken, if he had wished to truckle to the Conservative party, and would now hold, the position amongst the French-Canadians now held by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson.) But, instead of that, Sir, he stood firmly to his

Liberal principles, and deserves the sincerest thanks of his party for the able and disinterested manner in which he has maintained the principles that they all hold so closely at heart. That there is a noble reward in store for such a man let us never fear. He might have wielded perhaps greater present power.

He might have been a King,
But that he understood
How meanly worse it was to be Unjustly great than honourably good.

Mr. RYKERT said he was somewhat astonished at the assertion made by the hon. gentlemen on the other side that the members of the Government had obtained possession of their authority by false pretences. It came well from the hon. gentlemen to make that charge, considering the means by which they themselves had, on a former occasion, obtained power. It came well from them to talk of obtaining power by false pretences, when, after a fair trial, the people, by a verdict of the 17th September last, decided that they had been untrue to their pledges, and that they violated every principle upon which their Government was formed. The hon. gentleman talked about young members on the Ministerial side of the House presuming to criticise older and more experienced members. He thought they had a perfect right to do so; they had been sent there to represent their constituencies, and it was not because they were young that they should not assert their rights. If the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was young, his speech was that of a statesman, and, certainly, compared very favourably with that of the old parliamentarian who had just taken his seat, and he trusted that that hon. gentleman would remain young all his lifetime, if the speeches he made were evidence of his youth. The hon. gentleman had taunted the members on that side of the House for daring to express their opinions upon this question, and had dared to tell them that they were not gentlemen. It came well from the hon. gentlemen to teach morality in this House. He would ask the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), to explain to this House why he had not answered the pleas entered in the record in the suits which he had brought against the hon. member for Cardwell, which, if true, would preclude him forever from associating in the company of gentlemen. He would ask him further to explain away the charges made against him in the celebrated judgment of one of the Chancellors of England, in the suit brought against one of the members of the Copper Company, to compel him to discharge a portion of the ill-gotten gains. Until these matters were fully and satisfactorily explained, it did not become the hon. gentleman to lecture that side of the House either on morality or gentlemanly behaviour. The hon. gentleman might have entertained the House in lecturing upon the effects produced by the patent cabinet machine in Jacques Cartier on the morals of the Province. His partner had nobly sustained the reputation of the late Ministry, in elevating the standard of political morality in the Province of Quebec. It was known to every member of this House that a suit, instigated by the hon. gentleman, was pending against the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), which would explain the reason for his venom against that gentleman. It seemed to him that the hon. gentleman might have played a better rôle—especially in view of the part which he had, during the last five years, played in the history of this country. He would briefly give his reasons why he thought he ought to support the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau). It was not the first time that he had had the honour of standing alongside his French friends from Lower Canada, in battling for their rights. He recollected well, when in the old Parliament of Canada, he stood in defence of the rights and privileges of the people of Lower Canada; and for the same reason he felt it his duty now to express his views before recording his vote in favour of the motion before the House. It had been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this question should not be discussed in this Parliament. He thought they had a perfect right to discuss all questions affecting the existence of the Province, as they had an undoubted right, through the Minister of Justice, to pass judgment upon the legislation of the Provinces. They had the right, when a question of such vast importance as that brought about by the action of Mr. Letellier arose, to express their opinion thereon; they had the right to discuss all questions in which the principle of responsible government was involved. Responsible government, as he understood it, meant parliamentary responsibility and parliamentary control—it meant that the Governor should have an Executive Council whose advice he should follow—it meant that the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Parliament, should be supreme, and it meant that a Parliament which controlled the destinies of the nation should have the full confidence of the people. There was no knowing how soon the same question might arise in the Province of Ontario, for they had an unscrupulous Government which, for party purposes, would readily advise the Lieutenant-Governor of that Province to play the same rôle as that of Letellier. That Government was of the same political complexion as that of hon. gentlemen opposite, and might be guided by their wise counsels and advice. This Government had, during their incumbency of office, increased the expenditure of that Province from one million and a-half of dollars, which it was in the time of Sandfield Macdonald, to the enormous amount of two and a-half millions of dollars. They had also a Lieutenant-Governor equally as great a partisan as Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, and who, should the emergency of party arise, might be advised to take a course similar to that taken in Quebec. He was surprised to find the hon. member for Lambton taking them—the Tories as he called them—to task, for daring to defend the principles of responsible government. He (Mr. Rykert) thought it was the duty of the Conservative party to defend those principles when they found they were openly and shamefully abandoned by the Reform party. He held in his hand the platform of the great Reform party in 1860, of which his hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall) was the Secretary, in which the principles of responsible government were fully recognised, and he would call upon that gentleman to say whether those, the so-called Reform party, had not abandoned every one of the platforms of the party, as laid down in that memorable address. The hon. gentleman had taunted them with striking a blow at responsible government. Sir Allan McNab took the same grounds, in 1836, which were now taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, while the Reform party of that day took the same position which the Conservatives had taken in this debate, and the very same position which the Liberal Government of Mr. DeBoucherville took in Quebec, last year. He would read to the House the position taken by Sir Allan McNab upon that occasion, and let them decide whether or not the very same position was taken by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) when he justified the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Government. They had admitted the principle of responsible government as laid down by Baldwin and Lafontaine, and he would ask if the course of these gentlemen, on this question, was in consonance with the views as laid down by Baldwin and Lafontaine. It was true that the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed relieved because the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had not fully endorsed the proposition of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) in this resolution. But every member had a right to express his views on this subject. The hon. member for Halton would not be at all flattered by the compliment they had paid him. He well understood their meaning, and no man in this country had done more than he had, to show up the hypocrisy of these gentlemen. Sir Allan McNab said, in reference to the discussion upon the responsibility of the Executive Council in 1836:

“Was not the Governor sworn to uphold the British Constitution in this Province? and if his Executive Council should take a different view of matters, and give him such advice as would, if followed, lead to the overthrow of British supremacy in this country, was he not bound to dismiss them, whether they were approved of by the majority of the Assembly or not? Was a system, which had been acted upon for fifty years, to be abandoned for the mere opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Baldwin or John Rolph?”

On the other hand, the Reform party laid down quite a different rule and line of action, which, in later years, was recognised by the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, until they found that it would not be safe to apply it to their own Gov-ment in Quebec. The leaders of hon. gentlemen of that day laid down this very wholesome proposition :

"It is, undoubtedly, the prerogative of the Crown, to select the Council; but to receive the blessings of good Government, that Council must possess the confidence of the public. That Governor must be bold, indeed, who dares to despise and reject the voice of the people, and short must be the duration of that Administration that is not upheld by the popular will."

He contended that this was the proper principle to lay down, and certainly was the one which should have been applied by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He might, with advantage, still further quote for the information of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the language of another Reformer used in the same debate, and from which he thought very few would dissent :

"It would be as reasonable for Judges to dispense with juries, whose business it is to inform the conscience of the Court, as for a Governor to rule without responsible and intelligent advisers. It might as well be said that the Parliament is only to legislate on some affairs, as that the Executive Council is only to advise on some affairs. The very term Executive Council implied that it was to give counsel or advice on all Executive matters."

He defied hon. gentlemen opposite to show one single principle they had not openly violated. They talked much about the autonomy of Quebec, and appealed strongly in behalf of their friends in Lower Canada. He would like to know how long since they became enamoured of their new-found friends in that Province? He well recollected when the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and his friends were parading different counties in Ontario, when their cries were about Lower Canada domination, and representation by population. They then raised the cry that Upper Canada was ruled by the priestcraft of Lower Canada. He thought he could remind them of the course they then pursued by making some quotations from the leaders of the party, while in opposition, which would satisfy them, whose interests they are now so anxious to guard, of the friendly care and regard they had in those days for their interests and their religion. He held in his hand an article from the organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which they would, doubtless, not dispute, and he quoted it to show how sincere they were in favour of the Lower Canadians. It was this :—

"A few months may see the issue of a Bull from Rome which, our Government aiding and abetting, may flood the Province with a population likely to be as great a curse to it as the locusts that overran the land of Egypt, and settle the Catholic Irish in masses, so that we shall have a second Connaught, a second district of Quebec, and a second Naples, with no schools, no roads, and no liberties."

Mr. MACDOUGALL : I am inclined to think that the House is under the impression that the hon. gentleman is reading from a resolution adopted by the Reform Convention of that day. I think there is no such passage in that.

Mr. RYKERT : I quite agree with you, there is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Nor anywhere else.

Mr. RYKERT said he was quoting from the Globe newspaper of February 18th, 1856, an authority which even the member for Lambton dare not despise ; he would come to the Convention shortly. He merely wished to show how their zeal for Quebec was new born. He also found in the same article the expression that the "alliance of Radicalism in Upper Canada with Popery in Lower Canada could only be maintained by treachery and deceit ; nothing but evil can result from it." That was what they thought then. Now he would read what the Reform party used to think of the people of Lower Canada, and he alluded to it in order to draw the attention of the House to the anxious manner in which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) interested himself in the affairs of Lower Canada. On page 43, of this celebrated platform, he read the following paragraph in reference to Lower Canada :—

"In his speech on introducing it, Lord John Russell, after declaring that the Assembly of Lower Canada, 'used the weapons of Hampden in support of the principles of Strafford' that they were 'extremely exclusive, extremely hostile to all improvement, to the general extension of British enterprise,' &c., &c., explained the scope and object of the measure in these words : 'For these evils, for this evil spirit—there seems to be no better remedy, no more obvious or safe mode of proceeding in order to put down this system of monopoly and exclusion than to admit the inhabitants of both countries to send members to one Legislature, the French race to be represented by persons of their own opinion, but depriving them of that preponderance of which they have made so ill a use."

That was the opinion these gentlemen then held of their friends in Lower Canada. They desired to have them placed by themselves; they had made such ill use of their rights and privileges that the Reform party thought it would be for the interests of the people of Ontario to curtail the rights and privileges of the people of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) had charged the Government with cowardice in reference to this question. He (Mr. Rykert) was not aware of any exhibition of cowardice on the part of the Government on this question up to the present time. The Government had not yet expressed an opinion upon it, nor had they been required to do so. No doubt they would when the proper time came, and when it suited their convenience, explain their position on the question in the House. It was for the House to say what should be done in this matter, and he trusted the Government would carry out whatever instructions the House might give them. If the House chose to say that Mr. Letellier should be dismissed, he trusted the Government would carry its wishes into effect. The people of Quebec surely had a right to come on to this House, if they wished to demand that justice should be done in a matter where their Lieutenant-Governor had violated and ignored their rights. If the Government would not do them justice in this matter, where could they appeal but to this House from the Government. This House had the right to say whether the Lieutenant-Governor should be dismissed or not. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had said that this question had been tried three times. He (Mr. Rykert), however, denied that it had been tried by the House of Commons last Session. The question was not brought fairly before the House, it having been brought up as an amendment to the Committee on Supply. No wonder the hon. gentlemen opposite complained of the previous question being moved, because it left them no way of escaping from a fair and square vote upon the question. It had also been said that the electors of the Province of Quebec had passed judgment upon this question. He was not prepared to admit that the result of the last Quebec local election was the verdict of the people on the matter, because at that time there was not a fair expression of opinion at the polls, but this question was complicated with many others of great local interest. He contended that they had a right to discuss this question in Parliament, both on constitutional grounds and upon the grounds of expediency, and he was prepared to show that, from a constitutional point of view, Mr. Letellier had acted wrongly, and in utter defiance of constitutional principles. There was no doubt that, at the time he dismissed his Ministers, they had the confidence of the House, and the Lieutenant-Governor was constitutionally bound to be guided by his Ministers under those circumstances. He (Mr. Rykert) would now proceed to prove his position by quotations from learned writers, which would show conclusively that Mr. Letellier had acted improperly and unconstitutionally in dismissing his Ministers, and he should have consulted Parliament, and if he found that Parliament had not confidence in them, then he could have dismissed them and appealed to the people. He found that Mr. Todd, in his valuable work, expressed these views:

"Ministers, before agreeing to assume the responsibility of office, must be free to stipulate for permission to carry out such a policy as they may deem essential for the public good. Security against abuse, in either case, is afforded by the necessity for mutual agreement upon a line of action that will satisfy their own sense of right, and will be likely to obtain the approval of Parliament."

And still further on, this same author defined the position of the Governors in respect to their constitutional advisers—the language was plain and unmistakeable. He said:

"The Sovereign should carefully avoid giving expression to any opinions at variance with those entertained by his responsible advisers, unless, as in 1783, he is prepared to take the consequences of their resignation or dismissal. Moreover the substance of any such conversation should invariably be communicated to the Prime Minister with as little delay as possible in order to prevent any future misunderstanding or inconvenience."

That Lieutenant-Governor Letellier should have recognised his Councillors and been governed by their advice was also clearly proved by the authority of Mr. Hearn, a well-known writer on Constitutional Government. At page 114 of his work the following language was used :

"The foundation on which the doctrine of our modern constitutional system rests is very simple. It consists in the extension to the discretionary power of the Crown of that rule of its official expression which controls the exercise of its legal powers. It supposes that in the former, as well as in the latter case, the King will act officially through and by the advice of some acknowledged servant or councillor."

This again met the present case and afforded abundant proof that the Lieutenant-Governor acted in defiance of constitutional authority. The same position was maintained at page 115 of the same work :

"In every act of State the King is guided by the advice of his councillors; and on their removal, he is guided by the advice of Parliament."

And again at page 167 of the same work they read :

"The proper conduct of parliamentary government implies that the King shall not retain any servants whom Parliament advises him to dismiss; and that he shall, while he retains them, give his recognized servants his full confidence and be exclusively guided by their advice."

But they need not go beyond this country for opinions to guide them upon the question of parliamentary practice and governmental responsibility. The speech of Lord Dufferin at Halifax had already been referred to, but he would refer to it again because he was recognised as a great authority on constitutional law, and his opinions must have great weight, not only in Canada, but in England. Those opinions were strongly in favour of the position taken by the Conservative party in Quebec on this question :

"I believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes, and to those men alone whom the absolute will of the Contederated Parliament of the Dominion may assign to me as my responsible advisers can I give my confidence. Whether they are the heads of this party or that must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General. So long as they are maintained by Parliament in their positions, so long is he bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to deter to their advice, and loyally to assist them with his counsels."

Could there be any clearer definition of the course which the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec should have pursued? Surely his functions were not greater than those of a Governor-General. If this authority would not satisfy hon. gentlemen of the fallacy of their arguments on this question, it was difficult to say what would. He would, in order to render the case clearer, again quote from the same statesman, who lately delivered a speech at the Reform banquet, in England. The language would lead one to believe that the late Governor-General had this very question in view at the time he delivered his speech. He said :

"My Lords and gentlemen, I freely confess that I should not consider it a compliment to the head of any self-governing community if he were credited with the exhibition of any personally-invented policy or any independent initiative of his own. (Cheers) Although it must be admitted that the functions of the head of a Colonial Executive do not entirely coincide with the attributes of the Crown in this country—although it is true that it is occasionally desirable that he should make his influence felt, and even control the current of events—his touch should be so light and so impalpable as to escape general observation, and exempt him from all suspicion of a desire to meddle or tamper with the privileges of a self-governing body. (Loud cheers.)"

If Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had followed that advice, he would not to-day be arraigned before the bar of public opinion. Now, looking at the question from a public point of view, was it wise for him to take the course he did? Had it been shown that the Ministry had violated one single principle of responsible government? The Lieutenant-Governor knew that his Ministers had a majority at their back, and no one could point to a single instance where they had violated the principles of responsible government. The Lieutenant-Governor had not been able to show that they had committed any act whereby the rights and liberties of the people had been invaded. Did he show, in that memorandum, that the people had petitioned against the Government? On the contrary, they had evidence to show that the people, by their verdict, were satisfied with the course of the Ministry. The Lieutenant-Governor alleged six reasons why his Government should be dismissed. The first was in regard to the filling up of a blank. It seemed to him (Mr. Rykert) that, if there was any difficulty about the blank at all, it was the fault of Mr. Letellier, in trusting his Ministers with a blank. He must have trusted them for some object, and it ill-became him to find fault with them for having filled up that blank as they did, especially since he must have known, a short time after, how the blank was filled. He further complained that they submitted important measures to Parliament without his consent. But what right had the Governor of any country to make this requirement of his Ministers, when they were backed up by a majority of the people? It could not be shown by any principle of responsible government that a Ministry was bound to submit its every act to a Governor, so long as that Ministry was in accord with a majority of the people. Mr. Letellier made the flimsy excuse that the Railway Bill was contrary to the principles of law and justice. But what right had the Lieutenant-Governor to talk about law and justice so long as his Ministers were sustained by the House? Another reason given for the dismissal of the Cabinet was that they were enormously increasing the public expenditures. What would become of their friend, Mr. Mowat, in Ontario, if the Lieutenant-Governor of that Province should put into force the same rule that Mr. Letellier had in Quebec? He would have to turn right-about-face at once. The whole excuse of the Lieutenant-Governor was paltry in the extreme. At page 52 of the documents, he admitted that his reasons for their dismissal amounted to nothing; that his Ministry had done nothing improper, but, on the contrary, that, though they had acted in opposition to himself, it was not wilfully, but by error. In his letter of March 1st, the first clause knocked the bottom out of his whole argument, for he said :

"The Lieutenant-Governor, taking into consideration the communication made to him verbally (27th February), by the Premier, and also taking into consideration the letter which the Premier then gave to him, is prepared to admit that there had been no intention on the part of the Premier to slight the prerogatives of the Crown, and that there was only on his part an error, committed in good faith."

He thought this language was so condemnatory of the Lieutenant-Governor himself that this House must see that he had made no case for himself. It had been charged that the Lieutenant-Governor was acting in collusion with the late Government of the Dominion. The members of that Government had not answered this charge, and dared not answer it. This charge had been made both in the press and by the member for East York (Mr. Boulton), and up to this hour not a single man of them had denied the accusation. All the circumstances of the case pointed to the complicity of those gentlemen with the Lieutenant-Governor, and it remained for them to prove their innocence by some other means than those they had adopted so far. If the hon. gentleman had been sincere in dismissing his Ministers, why had he not dismissed his present Ministers? If it was necessary to dismiss them for that trivial offence, why did he not dismiss the Ministry now because they did not summon Parliament? His object was undoubtedly to keep the Province in the hands of the Joly Government. If he had acted towards Mr. Joly as towards Mr. DeBoucherville, his course would have been a simple one, namely, if the Ministers refused to call Parliament together, to send them to the right-about-face. He felt it to be his duty, as representing an Ontario constituency, to offer his protest against the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, and to record his vote in favour of the resolution condemning his conduct, he did not care how strong that resolution might be. Before closing his observations, he would like to quote the language of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, himself, on the 13th August, 1873, before an audience in this city: "The public should come to the support of the majority of Parliament who had been outraged by the arrogant conduct of the Executive. If the Crown has the right to exercise its power as has been done to-day, there is no longer any necessity for a Parliament. We might revert to the system of absolute monarchy. The British flag has been insulted by the Executive to-day." The hon. gentleman thus stood condemned out of his own mouth, and, applying that language to his own conduct, this House was justified in passing as strong a vote of censure as it was possible to prepare. Hon. gentlemen had said the question was not discussed at the late general elections. He said it was discussed. In his own constituency, the question was largely and freely discussed, and the people felt that the Government would be derelict in its duty if it did not support a motion of this kind. Hon. gentlemen had said it was the National Policy that had carried the elections. In his constituency he had discussed not only the National Policy, but the policy of the Administration, and their past record. The people believed they had been guilty of violating their pledges, that their whole record had been a record of false pretences; that their acts would not bear public scrutiny, and that they had openly violated every principle of responsible government.

MR. LAURIER: I do not rise with the view to answer the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln, because I do not see anything in his speech to be answered. When the hon. gentleman first began his speech, I took a blank sheet of paper and a pen to take up any points made against the Opposition in this House; but I had not occasion to use my instrument at all. The first part of his speech was on subjects which had no reference to the motion before the House, and the last part of it, which had reference to the motion before the House, has been answered time and again. I also waited for some time to see if any of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would rise to tell us what would be the policy of the Government on this question. Perhaps the fact that the motion which is now before the House was last year presented by the leader of the Opposition, the present Premier of this Government and is not renewed by him now, may be taken as some evidence by the House that, whatever may be the future conduct of the Government upon this question, if their own feelings had been followed, this matter would not have come a second time before this House. I beg to remind the House of this: that the motion which was made last Session, this identical motion which we have now before us, was negatived by a large majority of this House. I say, at the outset, when this motion was negatived by a large majority of this House, the majority did not then assert that the principle involved in this motion was not true any more than they would assert that it was true; they did not assert that the conduct of Mr. Letellier was wise any more than it was unwise; that it was constitutional any more than it was unconstitutional. The House carefully and distinctly abstained from pronouncing any opinion upon the conduct of Mr. Letellier. The House held, at the time, that there was no occasion for it to interfere in this matter, and that, under the régime under which we now live, the Provinces are free and independent, not only one of the other, but of the central power as well. This House affirmed that, whenever any provincial differences arose, they should be settled by the application of the principles of responsible government, with which every Province is endowed, and decided that this matter, which affected solely the interests of the people of Quebec, should be left to their judgment; and to them alone it appertained to decide whether or not the act of Mr. Letellier was wise and constitutional. At that time, the people of the Province of Quebec had not decided upon it; they had just been seized of the question. The elections had not taken place, but were in progress; they have since taken place, and, whatever may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, the result had been to uphold the action of Mr. Letellier.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. LAURIER: What are you here for, if you say no? If your Government had not been defeated, why should you be before this House? Your very motion is the best evidence of what I say. If your course had been supported by the people, you would not seek, at the hands of this House, the vengeance which you are now seeking. I affirm what I have already said, that the people of the Province of Quebec, who alone are interested in this question, have decided that, in their opinion, whether that be right or wrong, the act of Mr. Letellier was just and constitutional. If such be the case, if this question has already been once before the House, if this House has already declined to interfere in this matter, and decided to leave it entirely in the hands of the people of Quebec, and if the people of the Province of Quebec have decided upon it, is it not but proper that this question should be laid at rest forever before this House? I do not hesitate to say that this matter would have for ever remained at rest before this House had it not been for another event which has since taken place, namely, the Dominion elections. We have had it from the mouths of hon gentlemen opposite. The result of the general elections has been to displace the majority from the Liberal to the Conservative ranks, and now that a new element is brought into the House, a new attempt is made to get the new majority to do what the old majority would not do, to substitute the will of the Dominion for the will of the Province of Quebec. Even without the language that fell from the lips of some hon gentlemen opposite, I would have taken this motion as a slur upon the majority of the former House. The idea conveyed by it, not, it is true, in language, but as clearly as if expressed in words, is that the Liberal majority which sat on the other side of the House last year, deliberately refused to do justice in the premises; that, since the party ousted from power at Quebec happened to be the Conservative party, and the party called to power happened to be the Liberal party, the Liberal majority in this House allowed their better judgment to be biased by their political feelings. As one of that majority which ruled last Session, I do not object that this accusation should be thrown at us, provided that the same standard of measure should be applied this time again. And, if this motion is to be affirmed, if the Conservative majority in this House is to do what the Liberal majority would not do last year, if they are going to ride over the Provinces, if either the majority which insisted last year upon respecting the right of the Provinces to self-government, or the majority which this year may infringe upon these rights; if either majority, I say, are to be branded as being actuated by improper motives, I have no objection to that, and we will cheerfully await the judgment of impartial men, and impartial history. Before going further, let me make one observation. The elections in the Province of Quebec last year took place upon the issue raised by the act of Mr. Letellier, and upon no other issue. At the very outset of the campaign, in a speech delivered in the town of Lévis, by Mr. Chapleau, the present leader of the Opposition in Quebec, he stated that this question of the dismissal of the Ministry by Mr. Letellier was the only question which the people should look at. He used very forcible language. I have not the speech before me, but I kept the exact words in my memory, which has not failed me. He put it, that, whatever might have been their failings as Ministers, even if they had been defaulters and thieves, they had been dismissed improperly and illegally, and it was the duty of the people of Quebec to restore them to the places from which they had been dismissed. On the other hand, Mr. Joly, the present leader of the Government, accepted the issue upon that ground, and that ground alone. He said to the people that he fully endorsed and accepted the responsibility of the act of Mr. Letellier—that it was an extraordinary act, but that it was justified and called for by the circumstances of the case. As I stated, the result was that the act of Mr. Letellier was upheld. I need not remind this House that everyone of us has his seat upon an issue in the consideration of which the question now before the House did not count for anything. I heard the hon. gentleman from Cardwell say that this question had been voted upon, at least in the Province of Quebec, on the 17th September. I take issue with this. This is the first intimation I ever had of it. Whatever may have taken place in the Province of Quebec, I am quite sure it never was discussed in the other Provinces. Let me now ask if hon gentlemen from the sister Provinces; let me appeal to their fairness and justice, even if this House had the authority to interfere in this matter, would it be fair and just to the Province of Quebec for this House to interfere in the matter, since the people of the Province of Quebec are alone affected by this act; since they alone are to suffer from it, if it be unwise; since they alone are to benefit from it, if it be wise; since they have held it, in their estimation, to be wise, would it be just, would it be wise, would it be constitutional for gentlemen of the other Provinces to condemn what those interested in it have approved? I might ask it also of my more immediate countrymen, of those of fellow-origin and fellow-language; I might ask them if their conduct, on this occasion, is patriotic? Is it patriotic in them to ask the aid of the sister Provinces, since their views have not prevailed at the polls, in order, under their united action, to crush the expressed will of their own Province? What they are driving at is to obtain a mere party triumph, and, to do that, they are ready to sacrifice the vested rights of their native Province. In order to obtain a mere party triumph, they ask the aid and co-operation of a foreign power,—because I hold that the Federal power, in purely Provincial matters, is a foreign power—they ask the aid of a foreign power, forgetting that, whenever a party in any country, in order to obtain a triumph over a rival party, calls in the aid and co-operation of a foreign power, the invariable consequence has always been the enslavement of the whole country. I do not apprehend that so fatal a result would follow from the act of hon. gentlemen opposite, but the result would be that a breach would be opened in the principle which we have always looked upon as the bulwark of our Provincial liberties. And just look at the justice which is meted to Mr. Letellier in this case. Last year, when the motion was brought up, and when it was asked that it should be brought in the shape of a substantial motion, so that it might be opened to an amendment, they would not do so, but insisted in bringing on the motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply, so that the true resolution at which the House might have arrived was prevented from going on the Journals of the House. And this time, as soon as the motion is made, my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) stands up and moves the previous question. It is true, in moving the previous question, he was kind enough to say that he did not mean to stifle this question; he was also so strict as to give a precedent to show that the moving of the previous question would not prevent free discussion. What then did he want to prevent? It was that the opinion elicited by this free discussion should not go down upon the Journals of the House. He knew that the motion could be met successfully with an amendment which, perhaps, might have been carried by a majority of the House, and, in order to get a verdict, coûté que coûté, against Mr. Letellier, he prevented the possibility of an amendment being made. No doubt a good many gentlemen from our sister Provinces have given this question but little attention, and the papers brought down a very indifferent perusal, and have derived their knowledge of the case mostly from the indictment of Mr. Letellier drawn yesterday and to-day. Perhaps they think he has perpetrated a great crime, and proved false to the cause of liberty. If they look at those papers, however, they will find there is another side to the picture which has been exhibited to them. They will find that the hon. gentlemen who have dilated at such length on the conduct of Mr. Letellier, might have dilated, at some length also, on the conduct of his advisers; they will find that, if the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was extraordinary, the conduct of his advisers was still more extraordinary; they will find that, if the conduct of Mr. Letellier has but few precedents in British parliamentary history, that of his advisers has none at all. They will find that his advisers systematically trampled down the Royal prerogative, the liberty of the people, and the civil rights of the people; that the Government of Quebec was fast falling into the hands of an oligarchy which completely disregarded the Royal authority, and remembered the people only to put new burdens upon it. They will find that this oligarchy was itself ruled by rings, the greedy appetite of which had to be fed from the Public Treasury; and that the Treasury had to be replenished by the people at the price of their civil liberty; that since the days of King John no such attempt was ever made on the liberty and civil rights of the people in any part of the British empire. Mr. Letellier, to the long array of charges against him, might answer in the language of the old Roman, who, being brought to the forum, to answer an accusation, merely said: "I swear I have saved the country." But the parallel could not go further; the historical character to whom I have just alluded had committed a crime, while Mr. Letellier has committed no crime. He exercised a right he had the abstract power to exercise. It is said the exercise of it was unwise; but, in the estimation of the people of Quebec, that unwise act has saved the country. This opinion is not held simply by a political party, but is shared by the great majority of the people, which no one knows better than the Premier himself. He is aware that thousands who voted for him in the late elections supported Mr. Letellier's views, and his present Ministers, and would do so again. Before I dismiss this branch of the subject, I will call attention to the Blue-book containing the petition of Messrs. Chapeau, Angers and Church, asking for his removal. I call attention to this because it may serve to show the character of Mr. Letellier's advisers, and what justice he must have received from them. They set forth that:

"In his communication to his Excellency the Governor-General, respecting the aforesaid dismissal, Mr. Letellier made statements, unsupported by and in contradiction with the official documents, to which they relate, and that in the opinion of the undersigned, viz.: the petitioners, such erroneous statements could not have been made by mistake or failure of memory."

No more grievous charge could be made against any gentleman brought up under British ideas of honour, according to which a gentleman's word is sacred. Now, what were the facts? These statements were submitted in connection with those of Mr. Letellier in his memorial to Lord Dufferin, to the effect that his authority had always been completely disregarded by his advisers, and, as an illustration of his charge, he instanced two proclamations which had been published without his signature. The petitioners allege that that statement is untrue, as they say Mr. Letellier well knew, and that, in fact, the proclamations, when they were published, bore his signature. What is Mr. Letellier's answer to this charge of wilfully and designedly alleging an untruth? He says his attention was called to the publication of those proclamations by his Private Secretary; that, thereupon, he wrote to Mr. DeBoucherville, who came and acknowledged the error, and that, in his presence, and, in order to set the matter right, he appended his signature to the original proclamations. Here is a complete defence, which, I insist, shows the bad faith of the traducers of Mr. Letellier. If the charge against him had been true, they were bound, in honour, to call the attention of the House and His Excellency to the fact, and to demand the evidence of Mr. DeBoucherville, Mr. Letellier since gave him as having been witness to his appending his signature to the proclamation. If they could not have maintained their charge, they were bound to admit their error. Their rejoinder was unworthy of leaders of a great party; their answer was a mere quibbling of lawyers, such as would not be expected from men of honour. They say, in their reply to his explanations:

"Dealing with that part of the Lieutenant-Governor's answer which bears upon one of the charges contained in the petition, and in which he states, in contradiction to official and authentic documents, that he signed the proclamations referred to 'after their publication,' the undersigned represent that this explanation is of no value, in presence of the facts established by the proclamations bearing his signature, and the dates at which they were signed. It is difficult to understand how the Lieutenant-Governor can bear evidence against his own signature, and expect that his statement upon the point can be credited."

In their rejoinder, they do not reaffirm their accusation, viz., that the proclamations were signed before their publication, but they say that Mr. Letellier could not be admitted to affirm the fact that he had only signed them afterwards. If they had been in earnest in this, they would have called for Mr. DeBoucherville's evidence; and now, when it appears that Mr. Letellier signed the proclamations ex post facto, his enemies attempt to deny him the benefit of the fact, and charge him with an untruth. If the charge made against Mr. Letellier had been true, it would have been of the most damaging character, but, being not true, the charge must rebound with equal force against his traducers. But, whether Mr. Letellier's action was constitutional or not, a far more important question, to my mind now arises :— Has this House authority to enquire into that act and condemn it? If this motion was proposed simply to elicit a purely abstract expression of opinion which would remain barren of result, we might have discussed it to our heart's content, just as we might discuss any other question which any hon. gentleman might choose to bring; just as we might discuss the recent events in France and the causes which led to Marshal MacMahon resigning the Presidency. But, if this motion is intended to be, as indeed it is, a pregnant motion, if it is to be followed up, if passed, by the censure and dismissal of Mr. Letellier, then I submit respectfully and earnestly that this House has no authority to enquire into and condemn his conduct. I affirm that proposition and invite its discussion. Of course I would not go the length of saying that we never could in any case interfere in Provincial matters, and no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will affirm that we would have that right of interfering in every case. Since then, we will agree that this House has the power to interfere in some cases, not in all; where is the landmark to be found, where is the line to be drawn, up to which it must be legitimate for this House to interfere and beyond which it would be criminal for it to do so. I think the answer has been given by the House on several occasions. The Constitutional Act gives the Federal Executive the power of disallowing Provincial laws. This power being given to the Executive, it follows that the exercise of it is brought within the jurisdiction of this House, to which the Executive is responsible. The doctrine is now well settled that this power of disallowing Provincial laws is to be confined to those cases only where Provincial Legislatures may have stepped beyond their jurisdiction into prohibited ground; that this power is to be exercised only for the protection of Imperial or Federal rights which may have been invaded by Provincial Legislatures, but never to afford relief to any section of the community in the Province which may deem itself aggrieved by that legislation. The doctrine is now well settled that, if Provincial Legislatures keep within the jurisdiction which is allotted to them by the Constitution, however odious their laws may be, however despotic and tyrannical, however desirous both the Executive and the Government might be of affording relief against such laws, yet this House will not interfere, because interference in such cases would be a violation of the Federal principle, and, in all such cases, the aggrieved portion of the community must seek, and can find, its relief in the application of the principle of responsible government. The people can agitate and they can vote, and a people who can vote has in its hands the instrument whereby to redress all its grievances, the weapon to avenge all its wrongs; and those who believe, as I do, in the efficacy of responsible government know that these weapons are amply adequate, and that, with them, truth and justice will prevail in the end. If such be the rule for legislative acts, such must the rule be with regard to administration, because administrative acts are, as legislative acts, subject to the judgment of the people, who may pronounce upon them in a regular way. Now, as regards the Lieutenant-Governor, under the Constitution, the law says that he shall be removable for cause; but what can a cause be? I believe that these causes of removal can well be offences of a personal character, but never offences connected with the discharge of duties of an official character. If, for instance, the Lieutenant-Governor, by some grossly dishonourable conduct, brings the dignity of the Crown into contumely, this and similar offences might be causes of removal; but, if he sticks within the circle of his functions, however tyrannical his acts may be, he is not removable, because he is covered by ministerial responsibility. He is amenable to the people, who can set him right, if they believe him wrong, and undo what he has done. If it were otherwise, if the House had power to interfere because the Lieutenant-Governor had erred in the discharge of his official duty, it would be an infringement on the principles of responsible government, and an invasion of Federal rights. It has been stated, ever since this discussion has been commenced, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec acted arbitrarily, without the advice of his constitutional advisers. If such be the opinion of this House, it was not the opinion of the Legislature of Quebec. The Legislature of Quebec on several occasions expressed its opinion that the act of Mr. Letellier was within the exercise of his functions, and covered by ministerial responsibility. The question has been brought several times before the House, and the opinion in each case has been precisely the same. On the 8th March last, a motion was made for a petition against Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, to be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, the Senate and House of Commons. A point of order was raised upon the ground that the petition was injurious to His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor. The Speaker, on that occasion, gave the following ruling :

“ It is an essential principle of monarchical constitutional government that the Crown can commit no wrong. The Lieutenant-Governor represents the Crown in our Legislature. It is therefore necessary, that there should be, near the Sovereign, near the Lieutenant-Governor, advisers, Ministers, who always bear the responsibility which can never be laid on the Crown, and to the continuance of that responsibility there can be no limit. And, although use is made of the term ‘ Lieutenant-Governor ’ in the Addresses, as also in the measures submitted to the House, from the very nature of our Constitution these words are addressed only to the Ministers who are responsible to the Assembly. The person even of the Sovereign, in his representative, is never brought in question. In the present case, the complaints contained in the motion, apply to the advisers of His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor,—and I must, therefore, declare it in order.”

And to this ruling, both sides of the House assented. In the month of June last, the Legislative Council of Quebec—and I may say that there is not a more Conservative body under the sun—declared the same doctrine ; it was moved and agreed to “ That His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor was advised to dismiss his Ministers in March last, at a time when they enjoyed the confidence of both branches of the Legislature.” Now, here we have an opinion of both branches of the Legislature of Quebec that Mr. Letellier was fully covered by ministerial responsibility. I ask, therefore, if the act of Mr. Letellier, so covered by Ministerial responsibility, is an act subject to the censure of this House? Can Mr. Letellier be responsible at once to his Ministers, who are responsible to the House of Assembly, and at the same time to the House of Commons? But it will be said that the responsibility of Mr. Letellier's Ministers is a pure fiction. This fiction however, is the very life of responsible government. If you do not acknowledge it this time, what will prevent you from acknowledging it elsewhere? If you acknowledge this time, you are bound to follow it to its legitimate consequence, which is the judgment of the people, and no other judgment. Now it has been said that Mr. Letellier's act has not been approved by the people. I desire now to say a few words on this question. In approaching that subject, I feel a good deal like a professor of a college, who once said he wanted to prove, by a long disquisition, the light of the sun at noon. One pupil at once said it was sufficient for him to look at the sun. In a like manner, it will perhaps be sufficient for hon. gentlemen to look at what now exists in the Province of Quebec, in order to be satisfied that Mr. Letellier's Government had a majority. When a vote of want of confidence was brought against the Joly Government, upon the Address, it is true that the motion was carried by a vote of 32 to 31. This vote, however, was taken not in a full House, and at that time another motion was immediately brought in, affirming the confidence of the people in the new Government, which motion was affirmed in a full House. But that was not yet the best evidence. The best evidence is this : On the 8th March, Mr. Angers, the ex-Attorney-General, moved the following amendment to the Supply Bill :—

“ That the Bill be not now read ; but that the reading thereof be suspended until such time as justice shall have been rendered to the majority of this House, inasmuch as, when the resolutions upon which the said Bill is based were adopted, the Cabinet charged with the public business enjoyed the confidence of this House and of the country ; whilst the present Administration does not possess that confidence.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was the true constitutional remedy. If an injustice had been done, there was a true legal remedy in the hands of the people of the Province. If the supplies had been refused, Mr. Letellier would have been compelled to take back his old Government or resign his position. But, Sir, when the new House, fresh from the people, elected upon this very issue, met again, the supplies were voted. Is there a man in this House who will say that justice has not been done to the late Government of Quebec, since they themselves have been condemned by the tribunal to which they appealed. I hold, Sir, that this motion, now in your hands, cannot be carried if there is any sense of justice in the House. The premises of the motion do not warrant the conclusion. In the language of the mover and seconder, it is expected this motion is to be a vote of censure on Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, to be promptly followed by dismissal. If Mr. Letellier had committed a crime, what more could you do? He is not charged with having acted arbitrarily, but only with having committed an unwise act. Who will believe that an unwise act deserves such punishment as dismissal? If the motion is carried, it will be the first time a great deliberative body shall have attempted to punish a man for a fact which is given as nothing but an error, and not a wilful crime. The matter in dispute at the present time is simply relating to the exercise of the prerogative. Last year, the hon. the present Premier did not dispute the prerogative, but he merely argued that the exercise of it was, in all cases, unconstitutional. The doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite has never yet been formally recorded in the British Parliament, and all the authorities have been, so far, contrary to it. There are numerous authorities to show that the sovereign, whatever his name be, can dismiss his Ministers for cause, and I would beg upon this subject to cite the opinion of Lord Brougham. He said this :

"If they were torn among themselves by endless dissensions, if they differed from the Sovereign, if their measures were evidently ruinous, if dishonour abroad and disaster at home marked the whole tenour of their government, any of these might be constitutional grounds for their dismissal ; and, above all, if there happened to be a general feeling of distress, and disapprobation throughout the country, that would be a sufficient ground for such a procedure."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I suppose Mr. Letellier had this authority in view when he dismissed his Ministry. I suppose he had in view this, that he could dismiss his Ministry if there happened to be a general feeling of distrust and disapprobation in the country, and that there was a general feeling of distress and disapprobation the result of the appeal to the country has shown ; the fact that the dismissed gentlemen came back from the elections in an actual minority was sufficient evidence of it. If Mr. Letellier acted upon this authority to justify him in what he did, who will dare to censure him? But it is insisted that he was not justified in the exercise of the prerogative. This doctrine, however, has not yet been found recorded in the journals of the House of Commons of England. Therefore, I say, Mr. Letellier has acted in good faith, and he has good authority to do what he did. If he acted in good faith, though he may have acted unwisely and unconstitutionally, will there be found a majority in this House to say this man is to be censured and dismissed because he may have acted unwisely? Again, I appeal to the sense of justice and of fairness of hon. gentlemen from the sister Provinces. It may be that, upon this occasion, I would not be justified in making this appeal, but they have been appealed to in the name of liberty, and it is also in the name of liberty that I appeal to them. It would be a very serious thing for this House to step beyond its jurisdiction. I have cited from Lord Brougham to show that the action of Mr. Letellier was justified. You may say that, though he has followed the opinion of Lord Brougham, he has acted unwisely. So be it. He has appealed to the people, and you may say the people have acted unwisely. I say, So be it, again. But what right have you to substitute your wisdom for the wisdom of the people of Quebec? It may be that our notions of right and wrong may not be equal to the standard of other Provinces, though I am not prepared to admit that. But, whatever may be our standard in this respect, whether low or high, what I ask in the name of the Province to which I belong is that we should be allowed the privilege of being governed according to our own standard—that we should be allowed the privilege of being badly governed, if being governed by ourselves meant bad government; but, at all events, to be governed by ourselves. This I ask in the name of liberty and self-government. There can be no doubt, Sir, of one thing, and that is that, if this motion is carried, it will be an invasion of the principles of Federal government. It is a matter of regret, Sir, that this, the first attack upon Federal government, should have come from the Province of Quebec. We were reminded yesterday, by the hon. member for Halton, that, if we have to-day a Federal form of government, it was owing in a great measure to the peculiar position of the Province of Quebec, which is so different to the other Provinces, on account of its origin. I remember, at the time this system was put in operation, it was extolled to the sky for this very reason, that it gave to the people of Quebec a free, independent and untrammelled Government. I have in my hands now a pamphlet which was issued in 1867, as the campaign sheet of the Conservative party of the Province, for the first general election which took place after Confederation. The very first page of the pamphlet contains this outburst of enthusiasm:—

“ Since the first of July, 1867, Lower Canada is now ruled under a new mode of government; it is no more Lower Canada, it is the Province of Quebec; with this old French name, which has been restored to us, we have been given a French Governor, and all truly patriotic souls have thrilled with joy, and with a noble pride, when the newspapers have told us that the cannon in the old citadel of Quebec had roared its great voice to salute the first French Governor since 1760. We have been severed from Upper Canada; our name is the Province of Quebec; we have a French Canadian Governor, the second since the establishment of the country; we shall have our own Government and our own Parliament, where everything shall be done by and for the French Canadians, and in the French language. One must be a renegade, or, what is the same thing, an annexationist, not to be moved to tears, not to feel the heart beating with an indescribable joy, and with a very legitimate pride, at the thought of those glorious results of the patriotism and the indomitable energy of our statesmen, of our political leaders, who, one hundred years after the conquest of the country by England, have decided the latter, already impressed by our heroism and our loyalty, to restore us to ourselves, to restore to us our complete autonomy, and to confide the sacred trust of our national traditions to a Government chosen amongst us, and composed of our own.”

MR. LAURIER.

Who do you think was the author of these lyrical strains? Why it was no less than my hon. friend the member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) quantum mutatus ab illo. Why the very man who thus rejoiced in 1867 that we had been restored to ourselves; that the sacred trust of our nationality had been confided to a Government of our own; that we had been separated from Upper Canada, that very same man is now asking, not only Upper Canada, but Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the islands of the Atlantic, and the islands of the Pacific, to come to our aid and protect the sacred trust with which we had been entrusted. I remember, Mr. Speaker, the time when our alliance with Upper Canada was looked upon as the bugbear of Lower Canada; it was looked upon as a demoniacal alliance, the source of all our evils. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Bagot was in earnest at that time, when he so rejoiced at being relieved of an alliance with Upper Canada, and if he is in earnest now when he is asking the people of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, and the other Provinces, to take a part in our Provincial affairs, he must feel somewhat like the man of the Scripture, who, having had a devil expelled from his body, had his body re-entered by that same devil, and seven more. Now, Sir, if we, the people of Quebec in whose favour this Confederation has been established, are to be the first to attack it; if we are to be the very first to lay a sacrilegious hand upon the sacred ark of our liberties, how long can we expect that the system will be maintained? If we are to be the first to attack the Federal system, the gun of the citadel at Quebec will have again to roar its great voice, to ring the death-knell of our provincial liberty. Sir, I need not repeat here that the federative union of these Provinces was effected on that principle, on account of our peculiar position in the Province of Quebec; for this we are indebted to our fellow-citizens and to the Mother Country. I have often asserted, and I do so now, that we in Quebec will give way to none in our honour for our Mother Country. There is not, on the face of the British Empire, any class of Her Majesty's subjects more devoted to the British Crown than Her Majesty's subjects of French origin. The attachment we have for the British flag springs from a different cause from that of other British subjects. But, if the cause be different, it is equally powerful. The attachment of our fellow-subjects of English origin springs from nature, while our attachment springs from the heart, from gratitude. We love the British flag, because under it we have found liberty and happiness. At the same time, we are the descendants of France, of that great nation which has placed itself, with England, at the head of modern civilisation; we have derived from our origin peculiarities, characteristics, institutions, which we look upon as a national inheritance, and to which we fondly cling. I am bound to say, Sir, that our national institutions have ever been respected by our fellow-subjects of British origin, and I have no doubt that, if the safeguards which we have in the Federal system were removed, we would not experience from our fellow-citizens any other than the uniformly kind and generous treatment that we have always received. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the circumstances which existed in 1867 still exist in 1878; those circumstances which induced our statesmen in 1867 to give us a Federal form of government and not a legislative form, still exist. Our legislators at that time thought it best to give us a Federal form of government, more cumbersome and more extensive though it be, on account of the superior liberty which it gives to the people; and, so long as the system shall be in operation, it will be the duty of every patriot to see that its principles are maintained in letter and spirit. Looking upon this motion as I do, and as, indeed, it must be looked upon, as an invasion of the fundamental principle of Confederation, I deem it to be the duty, upon this occasion, of every patriot to vote down this motion, which, if carried, would strike a most severe blow at the principle which binds these Provinces together.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House was perfectly right in ending his speech as he has done, by speaking as he has spoken of the flag of England. He was sure that, when he spoke of the flag of England in the way he did, he felt that he was only echoing the common feeling of this House, the common feeling of the whole country, and the common feeling which prevailed among all the races in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman knows well, and the House and the country generally that we all respect that flag; that we all love it. There was a time when that flag was first hoisted on the Citadel at Quebec, that the population of that Province did not love that flag. Then it was not our flag; we had the white flag of France, under which our ancestors had shed their blood, and it was quite natural that that flag should be prized by us. But, Sir, when the fortune of war replaced the flag of France by that of England, the French-Canadians, the Roman Catholics of the Province of Quebec, who formed the whole population of that Province, knew that the latter flag was then their flag, and they felt they should cherish and respect it as much as they had the flag of France. After that flag had been placed on the Citadel of Quebec, the French-Canadians were called upon and fought under it, against even the flag of France, and they fought as good British subjects. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing surprising about our regard for the British ensign, once we knew that under it our rights and liberties would be protected. But the hon. gentleman should have gone further, when he was speaking of the love of the people of the Province of Quebec for that flag; he should have stated that it was not only a question of affection with us, but that we knew that, wherever the flag of England was, there liberty would be found. In 1867, when I had the honour to be in England, with my three friends and other hon. gentleman that are on my right here, to settle the terms of Confederation, I was asked by two members of the British Parliament, "Well, why do you not ask for your independence?" I answered these gentlemen, that the flag of England had been hoisted on the citadel of Quebec by British hands; that we had learned to cherish and defend that flag, and that it was not for the Province of Quebec to haul down that flag; that, if it were to be hauled down, it must be by England herself. But that history taught us that, whenever the flag of England was hoisted in any particular part of the globe, England never brought it down. The system of Confederation was approved by the Queen of England, and it is in the name of the Queen of England, it is in the name of the principles of responsible government, that the Province of Quebec claims that the Lieutenant-Governor of that Province has violated those principles, and should be censured for that offence. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down states that that violation of responsible government should be settled by the people of the Province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should have made distinction in this matter. There are matters that belong to the Province of Quebec and the Legislature of that Province, and others that belong to this Parliament. The hon. gentleman says that the late Government did not censure the Joly Government or dismiss the Lieutenant-Governor, and that, in doing so, they recognised that they were not responsible. He would have us understand that the Lieutenant-Governor was amenable to the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, and responsible to that Legislature only, that he was not an officer of the Federal Government, and that, therefore, we had nothing to do with the Lieutenant-Governor, and he asked what would be said of us here if we, being members of this House, were to bring down a resolution to censure the Governor-General of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman, in thus speaking, had apparently forgotten that the Governor-General is not responsible to this Parliament, that he is responsible only to the Queen of England. But we, the Ministers of the Crown, are the servants of this Parliament, and are responsible to it. I am surprised to see the hon. gentleman, especially this young and talented member of Parliament, the member for Quebec East, he a Liberal, he a man who has been christened the Young Papineau of this period, defending the course of Mr. Letellier, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. What would the great Papineau say if he were to appear in this House—would he recognise that gentleman as one of his followers? He would say: "You are defending tyrannical acts instead of defending the privileges of your Province, the privileges of your people." He would say: "For thirty years I have fought against the enemies of Lower Canada, for thirty years I fought the great battle of the rights of the people, but now you are neglecting the rights of your Province; you are destroying the liberties and the honour of your race." But, Sir, these gentlemen are carried away by their political proclivities when they want to defend their case. They consider that, because the Lieutenant-Governor, has fought by their side in political warfare, his acts, however bad, should not be censured. Mr. Speaker, that is poor statesmanship; they should rise above this humiliating position. This man—this gentleman, has violated his trust, and trampled upon the liberties of the Province of Quebec, and will be censured and condemned. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question for the Province of Quebec alone; it is a question affecting the whole Dominion. To-day it is our people that suffer, and that are trampled upon—it is the liberties of the people of Quebec that Mr. Letellier has destroyed as much as he was able to. But, Mr. Speaker, to-morrow it may be the people of the large Province of Ontario—it may be the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or any other of the Provinces. What affects the rights and privileges of the Province of Quebec affects the rights and privileges of all the Provinces, and, therefore, the appeal that is made to this Parliament is made, not on behalf of the people of Quebec alone, but on behalf of all the people of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) says: "Why do you come to this House?" We come to this House, because it is the only place where this matter can be settled. Since my right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) presented his resolution in the last Session of Parliament, the people themselves settled this question, so far as they were able to do so, at the polls, but their decision has been disregarded, and, therefore, we come again before this House. Since that resolution was presented last year, there has been an appeal to the people by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and that appeal has resulted against him. A clear majority of three was returned against him; but Mr. Letellier and his new advisers—as has been stated in this House, and is, in fact, now a matter of history—bought one of these three members, and another—I cannot believe that he could be bought, he has always been so upright and true a man that I cannot bring myself to believe that he allowed himself to be corrupted—but, at all events, he turned his back upon the electors who had returned him as a Conservative, and, instead of resigning his seat, instead of telling his constituents that he could not fulfil the duty with which they had entrusted him by voting with the Conservatives in the Legislature, he did not fulfil the trust reposed in him, and voted with the Joly Government. The result we have seen, and, by the purchased vote of the Speaker, the Joly Government had a majority of one in the Legislature. But, when the question of the constitutionality of the act of the Lieutenant-Governor was squarely put before the House, Mr. Price did not remain in the House because he could not declare that act constitutional, and, consequently, Mr. Letellier was condemned by a majority of one. But, since the resolution was proposed in this House last Session by the right hon. the leader of the Government, what have we seen? We have seen these same arbitrary and tyrannical acts of Mr. Letellier, for which the resolution proposes to condemn him, continued ever since, and he has been doing all he can to trample upon the constitutional liberties of the people. A few months ago, the Treasurer of the Province died. Though politically opposed to me, he was a gentleman for whom I had the greatest respect. His seat became vacant, and what did Mr. Letellier do? He who proclaimed himself so solicitous for the rights and privileges of the people; he who was so scrupulous in defending the rights of the people, to go before the Courts of Justice instead of being ruled by the Executive Council; did he call upon the electors to choose another representative to replace the Treasurer? No; but for several months that seat has been vacant, because Mr. Letellier knew quite well that the electors would choose a man who would vote against his Government, and therefore give the majority to the other side. We find the Liberals on the other side of this House defending him to-day as the representative of Liberal institutions, as a model Lieutenant-Governor, although he has thus trampled upon the political rights of the people, by keeping them so long unrepresented in the House, in order to retain for his Government a majority of one. I know that it is in accordance with the principles of gentlemen on the other side to defend Mr. Letellier, but I am surprised at seeing the young and promising member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) taking the position he does. But that hon. gentleman has not defended Mr. Letellier; he could not do so; but he does all he can to prevent the passage of this resolution. And what is the argument he uses? He says that, if we pass this resolution, we shall endanger all the institutions of our Province, and that we are calling upon the other Provinces to interfere in the internal affairs of the Province of Quebec. But when should we call upon the Dominion Parliament to interfere? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) cited Lord Brougham as an authority to show that we should only interfere when the Lieutenant-Governor had committed a personal offence, but not when his offence was a political or constitutional one. But could any circumstances arise, when it would be proper for this Parliament to censure him? Suppose he should refuse to sanction all the Bills passed by the Legislature. That is not a personal offence; he has killed no one, he has robbed no one, but he only refuses his assent to the legislation. The hon. gentleman says we cannot touch him, that he is a constitutional Lieutenant-Governor, and no doubt he is one exactly after the hearts of the gentlemen opposite. Still, I do not think this House will be of that opinion. I think it will declare that the Lieutenant-Governor, being a Federal officer, is responsible to Parliament, and therefore the remedy for this abuse must be in this House—and evidently it must, since there is no remedy in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) says there is no precedent for the conduct of the DeBoucherville Government. No, there is no precedent, because no one could ever suppose that a Lieutenant-Governor would so dare to violate his pledges, and trample upon the constitutional rights of his own Province, for the sake of helping his own party into power in the Dominion, because there is no doubt, that if the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had known what he knows to-day—what he knew on the 17th of September—that his friends in this House would not occupy the Treasury benches, but be found in much smaller numbers on the other side of the House, I have no doubt that he would never have done what he has. But he played his rôle, he accomplished the object for which he was sent there, and he did it in such a way that the people of the Province of Quebec have risen,—not in arms, for they are a quiet, law-abiding people,—but they have risen in indignation, and now demand justice and relief at the hands of this House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), in speaking of Mr. Letellier, says the latter can now say with the noble Roman of old, “I have saved the country.” Well, that is a very strange way of saving his country by destroying the liberties of the people. Instead of saving his country, he has written a black and painful page in its history, and I am certain that, if he could re-write that page to day, he would re-write it in a far different manner. The hon. gentleman says this resolution is a first attack on the federative principle. It is exactly the contrary. The resolution has for its object the defence and safety of the Federal principle. We desire to preserve the autonomy of the Province. We want to preserve the rights and privileges of the Local Legislatures, but we desire to teach the Lieutenant-Governors, at the same time, of each Province that they must not go beyond their functions, and try both to reign and govern at once. They must be taught that, while they have certain powers, their advisers have also certain powers under the Constitution. They must be taught, also, that the representatives of the people have certain rights and powers which must be respected, and which no Lieutenant-Governor is at liberty to ignore. When Mr. DeBoucherville and his friends were the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor, they had behind them a majority of eighteen or twenty in a House of sixty-five members. That was a very large majority, comparatively equal to the one the Government here is supposed to have in this House. The people of the Province had not presented a single petition against that Government. There had been no demonstration in the country against the Government; it was supported by the people of every section, and by the people of both nationalities. There was no dissatisfaction with the Government whatever, but Mr. Letellier wished for a change. He wanted to be surrounded by his political friends. We have heard quoted numerous high authorities to show that, under our Constitution, a Lieutenant-Governor should have no politics, but should occupy a neutral position between parties, like the Queen in Great Britain. Therefore, Mr. Letellier had no reason whatever for dismissing his Ministers. I do not intend to go through all the documents that have been laid before the House; they have been very ably reviewed by the hon. mover and seconder of the resolution, and by my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White), whom I compliment most heartily on his maiden speech. I will not enter into those details, but I may say that it is amply proved by those documents that the Lieutenant-Governor had no right, and no reason whatever for dismissing his Ministers. We see by those documents that, when he thought he had a ground of complaint against them, Mr. DeBoucherville came to him and explained the matter, and told him that, if there had been anything wrong, or if there had been any appearance of neglect, there was certainly no intention on their part to disregard the prerogatives of the Crown, and the Lieutenant-Governor fully accepted that explanation and excuse. Nevertheless, he had that little memorandum-book of his, in which he marked down all the little circumstances, saying to himself: That will be a good point against them pretty soon, when I mean to put them out. The Lieutenant-Governor came one day across a little Bill (No. 19) with a blank in it. He sanctioned it, as he did also another Bill (No. 20), which was introduced in order to fill a blank in the first one. But the same thing has occurred in this Parliament, and also in the late Legislative Assembly under the Union, and more than once. Such little errors occur almost unavoidably, but are they reasons for dismissing a Government? But there is another reason given for their dismissal—the grammatical error. Well, that shows that Mr. Letellier ought to have been appointed Superintendent of Education instead of Lieutenant-Governor; but, at all events, I do not think it was a sufficient cause for dismissing a Cabinet. And so on, to the end of the chapter, all the alleged reasons are of the same puerile character. At the last moment, without any warning, he turns his Ministers out of doors, and then he brings forth his little memorandum-book, in which he has entered all the private and confidential communications of his Ministers, and says: I will show this book to the world, and let it see what my Ministers have done in the secrecy of their official position. I need have no fear of contradiction, because their mouths are closed. They cannot divulge what passed between us without my permission, and that permission they shall not have. On the 30th of the month, after the dismissal had taken place, he complains in his explanations that he never authorised the Ministers to make any explanations on their part. Suppose he did not; these were not the causes for dismissal, inasmuch as they occurred after it; and therefore this complaint was an afterthought of the Lieutenant-Governor, who saw that, in common parlance, he had not a leg left to stand upon for his defence. I do not want to occupy the time of the House by going over the ground already gone over by my hon. friends; but the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), the late Postmaster-General, has taken a fancy to me, and of course I thank him very much for his attentions. Probably he takes this interest in me because I happen to have charge of the Department over which he presided, and I can assure him that I conduct that Department to the very best of my ability. But the hon. gentleman says that he finds fault with the hon. member for Cardwell for having gone to Ontario to be elected. Well, he tried to minimise my hon. friend, to show that he was such a young man—a boy, in fact—that it was rather premature on his part to come forward and make a speech on a question of this kind. The speech of my

hon. friend from Cardwell would be a credit to any member of this or any House, even of the House of Commons in England. He knew the subject well, put his points admirably, and made a very good impression on the House. What fault can we find with the hon. gentleman for having gone to Ontario? It shows that he was well known and appreciated, that the people of Ontario were liberal enough not to mind that the hon. gentleman lived in Montreal, or elsewhere out of the Province; but they said, "He is a talented man," and they elected him by a handsome majority; and we are all proud to see him here. Did not the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) also go to Ontario, not to be elected, but to try to mesmerise the electors of Ontario? He did not succeed; his mesmerism was rather weak, and his arguments fell unheeded on the electors. The hon. gentleman also went to Argenteuil. We all remember his famous speech there, which was a new departure, a new programme for the electors of the Province of Quebec. He wanted to do what he said this evening, to destroy tyranny in the Province of Quebec, the oligarchy in the Province of Quebec, and he wanted to destroy the religion of the majority in that Province. That was his object. But, afterwards, he had to come down to this House, and was called to account by both sides; his own friends were so excited and disgusted with it, that he had to rise and try to explain his speech. The explanation was as bad as the speech itself. He had no business to bring these religious questions before the electors or before Parliament, because those questions were not before the country. In the Province of Quebec, we agree perfectly well. The religion of the majority there is the Roman Catholic religion, but we never interfere with those who profess another religion than ours. They adore God as they please. They have their own churches, and there is no more interference by us with them than by them with us. The result was that his speech fell flat on the country, and to-day Quebec sends a majority of thirty-one members to support this Government. The hon. gentleman alluded to my speech last year on this question. It appeared that speech did not meet the views of the hon. gentleman, and he stated it was not for the House, but for the country. My speech was made for the House of Commons. Not one single copy of it was sent to the country until several months after the elections were over. I spoke my sentiments and protested at once against the doctrine of the then Government who wanted to protect Mr. Letellier in this arbitrary and unconstitutional act. The hon. gentleman said: "What evidence have you against the Lieutenant-Governor that was not put before the electors at the last local election?" I say to you that the Lieutenant-Governor has continued to commit his unconstitutional acts since. For example: Why did he not compel his Ministers to do their duty? He was so particular about the De Boucherville Government, that, when any of its members went out of town, he at once telegraphed them that, if they were not back on a certain day, they would have to abide by the consequences. But the Joly Government may do as they please, leave any number of constituencies without being represented; that suits him perfectly well, because it maintains Mr. Joly with a majority in a Parliament which is not complete. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) said it was true there was a majority of one against Mr. Letellier, 32 against 31, but the House was not full. No; Mr. Price stayed away in order not to vote. But will it be said that, because one member was absent, the vote given was not the vote of Parliament, or that it would not have been its vote, even if more hon. members had been absent. It is almost impossible to have a full House; there never was one here during the last Session. In the British House of Commons there never has been a single instance, during the past two hundred years, when the whole of the members of the House were present. The hon. member for Shefford asked what were my views on the question. They are the same as expressed last year. I am of opinion that the act of Mr. Letellier, if left without censure by the House of Commons, will be a precedent of great danger, not only to Quebec, but to the Provinces of the whole Dominion; that the great respect which the people have always had for responsible government would be shaken; that, if the act be not censured, the Confederation Act is a sham. I am not afraid of the verdict which would have been given by the Parliament of England if this question had come before it. They know too well how to respect their institutions to allow it to pass uncensured, and I know that in England they respect our constitutional charter, and that we would have had justice. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) speaking of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) asked, Why has he turned coward? I have no doubt, Sir, you did not hear that remark. He would not have used such a word outside Parliament. Neither the hon. member for Terrebonne nor any of his colleagues on this side, nor, I believe, any member of this House, ever turned coward—that is the view we should all take as gentlemen. The hon. member for Shefford knows my hon. friend for Terrebonne made a speech last year on the subject, to be found in the Hansard, condemning the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, and, this year, he has not changed his principles. We on this side continue in the same mind as last year on this subject. I do not believe the word coward should have been applied by even that hon. gentleman to any hon. member of this House. He also asked, if Sir. George Cartier were alive what would he say to-day of his followers? That hon. gentleman knows too well what my late lamented friend would say; it would be this: "I find my friends, whom I left in 1873 in the path of honour, as always, defending the great principles of constitutional government for which I fought with all my friends before the Constitution of 1840 was granted; you are defending the principles I fought for and the liberties of Quebec defined in that great Confederation Charter that I signed with my name,—and, I doubt not, the hon. Baronet signed with his blood; for, I have no doubt but the great mental labour it cost him injured his health and hastened his death, and brought him to an early grave. That was the answer he would give the hon. member for Shefford. He, as well as the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has made an appeal to the other Provinces on the subject of this motion, not to interfere in the business of Quebec. The hon. member for Shefford has gone so far as to threaten us with the future, and also about the tariff in this connection. He says we were elected to carry the tariff measure, and he ridicules our position; he tried to show we are delaying it, afraid to bring it down. The hon. gentleman has become a lamb, but only within a few days. He has fought against us all his life, and since the elections and from the beginning of the Session has been hostile; but let him not try to make the House believe that, if this motion had not been brought forward, he would have helped us to pass our tariff. He has forgotten his past—he would have fought us to the knife. No doubt he would have found fault with our tariff, but the House will pass it, for the country wants it. The appeal made to this House by the friends of the motion is not for interference in the internal affairs of Quebec, but is in favour of the great principles of constitutional liberty and government in this country. If the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had been done by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba or Prince Edward Island, I would have fought their battle in the same way. We are all in danger; our liberties are in peril. To-morrow we may have an election in Ontario that I hope will give a majority to the party that in this House possesses it. The Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario is a Liberal; suppose he took his Government from the minority, and ordered new elections, taking the same means to carry them as in Quebec were used—what would the great Province of Ontario do? What would the people say? I know their answer. I think we, French, English, Irish and Scotch in Quebec, would be more lenient and moderate than our friends in Ontario, who would not remain tolerant as long as we have been. I think they would find ready ways and means of bringing their Lieutenant-Governor back to his proper place and duty. Our people have set a great example of moderation and respect for the laws; they have applied to this House, and I hope, I am sure it will respond to their confidence by passing this resolution, which is now under consideration.

MR. GEOFFRION said it was not his intention to address the House on this question, nor would he had it not been for some expressions from the last speaker (Mr. Langevin). He had no doubt used them without premeditation. He said that members of the Quebec Legislature had been bought, which accounted for their changing sides. If that was an evidence of purchase, would it not apply to many of his colleagues and supporters who had been Liberals in other days? Had they been bought by the Tories? The Ministers of Finance and Agriculture were once proud to be called Liberals; so was his hon. friend the member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue) who had been a candidate against the late Sir George Cartier. Did their change of politics mean their purchase? He was sure, in reflecting upon these facts, that the hon. the Postmaster-General would not, had he thought over his offensive remark, have made it on the present occasion. If all the members of his own party, formerly Liberals, were counted out, the Opposition would have a majority of the House. The Quebec members who had changed sides and given support to Mr. Joly's Government, had assigned good reasons therefor. Whether their reasons were good or bad, was a question only for their constituencies. The hon. the Postmaster-General denied this was purely a Quebec question; he said it was not a question of privilege. He (Mr. Geoffrion) asserted it was a question of great importance, and denied the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec should be impeached for his action, or dismissed. They had a precedent. He remembered that some of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches had to take the responsibility for a similar course—that Mr. Cartier, before his constituents assumed the responsibility for the dismissal of the Brown-Dorion Administration. From first to last the old Provinces of Canada supported that. It was true his hon. friend from Richelieu (Mr. Massue) was then a friend of the Brown-Dorion Administration—at that time opposed to Sir George E. Cartier. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) said that Mr. Letellier had condemned himself by giving his reasons to the Governor-General. This was a strange way of saying a man condemned himself. He

(Mr. Geoffrion) did not believe anybody would condemn the Lieutenant-Governor for thus submitting his reasons and giving to the Governor-General an opportunity of approving of his conduct. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) also said that, if the Government had not made the proclamation in which the name of the Lieutenant-Governor was used, it would have been all right, because it was a very small thing and of no importance. He would like to know what would be the result if a man forged a note for the small sum of $50; would it not be forgery? The hon. gentleman also said that they ought to oppose this action, as a blow at the constitution of Confederation; and that they ought not to permit any such act of despotism. He (Mr. Geoffrion) looked at the question from a different point of view. He was in favour of local legislation on the part of the different Provinces, and in this matter the people of Quebec had endorsed the action of the Lieutenant Governor, as much as they could judge by the expression of opinion on the floor of the House. As a representative of the Province of Quebec, he condemned such interference. He could understand why the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, who, at the time of Confederation, was for legislative union, should favor the motion. He could quite understand why that hon. gentleman brought such a death-blow to Confederation, as a political organisation. But he would ask hon. members who had rights and interests to protect to pause before they gave such a vote as they were asked to give on this occasion. If such a vote were to be carried, it would, in effect, destroy the independence of Local Legislatures and of Local Governments. It had been said by one of the previous speakers, that they ought to give a death-blow to despotism. That was what he intended to do by voting against the move sought to be made by this motion. There was no greater act of despotism than the interference by the people of the Dominion with the affairs of the Province of Quebec, and he would ask the representatives of the smaller Provinces how they could excuse themselves if they took advantage of this pretext to destroy the principle of local self-government. He called the attention of hon. gentlemen to the consequences which would follow if that motion were adopted by this Parliament. Believing that the greatest evils would result from such an interference, he had decided to oppose the motion for bringing local affairs before this Parliament, and the interference on the part of this Parliament with local affairs.

MR. LANDRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

DISMISSAL OF QUEBEC GOVERNMENT
BY THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Mousseau's proposed motion, that it be Resolved, That the dismissal by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec of his Ministers on the second day of March, 1878, was, under the circumstances, unwise and subversive of the position accorded to the advisers of the Crown, since the concession of the principle of responsible government to the British North American Colonies; and of the proposed motion of Mr. Ouimet, and which motion was: That the question be now put.

MR. LANDRY said that this question was not a new one; it had occupied public attention during the last eleven months, it had been discussed under different circumstances, and at short intervals, in the Quebec Legislature, it had been brought before this House, and the people, especially the people of the Province of Quebec had, during the general elections in May and September last, heard pleaded before them this great and important question, which was so intimately connected with the political future of their Province and the very existence of their liberties. In this solemn hour of the history of the country, it was the whole people of the Dominion that came to vindicate by the voice of the people of Quebec, their most sacred rights. That people had no need of indulgence, or of favours. What they asked for was justice and justice alone, and who could refuse this justice? No one; none, at least, of those who had fought for our constitutional liberties, none of those who cherished the institutions under which we lived, none of those who clung to responsible government, none of those, in short, who placed the interests of a people above the wretched plottings of a handful of intriguers. And what was indeed this great trial that was being prosecuted before the nation's representatives, if it was not an open contest between intrigue and those popular rights which it was hoped would obtain a brilliant and decisive triumph? He declared that the action which had been taken had not been dictated either by hatred, or by partisan or personal interest. What was the issue? It was the public condemnation by this House of an act that had struck a blow at popular rights. To obtain this justice it was not necessary to have recourse to party spirit in order to raise the tempest that was to swallow up the man whom party spirit had made guilty. Success, obtained at such a price, would be shameful. The movers in this matter were acting upon a principle the force of which all hon. members on the other side would have to admit. Those gentlemen, at least those from the Province of Quebec, had, at one time, for leader a man whose mighty voice cried out: "Let the country perish rather than a principle." Continuator of his work and enthusiastic admirers of his acts and principles, his political children of the hour were, in their turn, crying out: "Let the country perish rather than our friend, Mr. Luc Letellier de St. Just." But the Conservatives, the political descendants of the Lafontaines and the Baldwins, the children of Cartier, the supporters of his illustrious friend and former colleague, their much respected leader to-day, answered with one accord: "Rather let a man perish and let the country be saved." The name of this man mattered little. He had no name for the people of Quebec, the moment he stood up as an enemy of their institutions and as a contemner of their rights. Let him disappear and the Province of Quebec would be saved, and the Constitution avenged. He would borrow the very words of the Hon. Mr. Letellier, and say to this House:—

"It is desirable, under the present circumstances, to speak with all possible calm, notwithstanding the popular excitement, which is a national excitement. The question to be examined is to know whether the Executive Council can interpose the Royal prerogative between them and the Parliament, and thus prevent the free exercise of the popular will. This prerogative ought not to be made use of in order to overthrow popular liberties, but should follow the course of events conformably to the interest of the people."

By these words, pronounced in 1873 before a Liberal caucus, immediately after the prorogation of Parliament on the 13th August, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, then Mr. Senator Letellier, had, six years beforehand, prepared the ground upon which this debate was engaged. For one, he thanked him for having furnished them with this arm that he was then wielding with an almost ferocious joy, and that he now saw, with deep despair, turned against himself. His words of yesterday were his own condemnation of to-day, and if this House adopted the motion, as he had no doubt it would, they would have established that which Mr. Letellier desired so much to know in 1873, and the people would learn with joy that :

“The Royal prerogative of the Crown should not be made use of to overthrow popular liberties, but should follow the course of events conformably to the interests of the people.”

The House and the country knew very well that the charter, or written Constitution of Canada, had been granted by England herself, in 1867, when Confederation was established. What did the British North America Act say, for that was the first document to be consulted. In the very preamble he found that the Canadian Constitution was to repose on exactly the same principles as that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. England had given us a Constitution, and she wished that henceforth Canada should be a Dominion having a separate existence. She had said : “This is your Constitution,” and she had added : “This Constitution reposes upon the same principles as my own kingdom. I give you the fruit of my own existence. My Constitution is the work of centuries, the result of the deep study of my great men. The Constitution I give you is a faithful counterpart of it ; it reposes on the same principles.” This should make Canadians rejoice. “We are,” to quote the very words of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), “a happy and free people ; and we are happy and free, thanks to the liberal institutions that govern us, institutions that we owe to the struggles of our fathers and to the wisdom of the Mother Country.” Under the Constitution, Canada, divided in the first place into four Provinces, now counted seven, without counting the vast territories of the North-West to which the Parliament of Canada had given, a few years previously, a separate organisation. Canada had its Constitution, and each of the Provinces entering the Union had also the benefit of a special Constitution. These Constitutions should be compared together in order to fully understand the questions now before the House and the difference that existed between the working of the Federal Constitution and that of the Provincial Constitutions. It would be seen from the British North America Act that it was to the Queen herself that were attributed the Government and the Executive power of Canada, and that the Queen moreover formed part of the Parliament of Canada. She had the entire Executive power and had an essential part in the Legislative power. But our gracious Sovereign could not come here in person to govern her loyal Canadian subjects, nor to exercise, in common with the Senate and the House of Commons, her legislative attributions. The 10th section of the Imperial Act made provision for this by delegating this power to the Governor-General, who was the representative of our august Sovereign, the personification of Royal Authority. What was the first duty of the Governor ? He was to summon Privy Councillors who were to be his advisers. The King reigned but did not govern : such was the rôle of the Governor. A man who had been Governor of Canada, the noble Earl of Dufferin, had himself marked out, in unequivocal terms, this first and imperative duty. He had said :

“My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. In fact, I suppose I am the only person in the Dominion whose faith in the wisdom and the infallibility of Parliament is never shaken. Each of you, gentlemen, only believe in Parliament so long as Parliament acts according to your wishes and convictions. I, gentlemen, believe in Parliament no matter which way it votes—and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the confederated Parliament of the Dominion may assign to me as my responsible advisers can. I give my confidence. Whether they are the heads of this party or of that party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General. So long as they are maintained by Parliament in their position, so long is he bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and loyally to assist them with his counsels. Whenever, in the vicissitudes of party warfare, they are replaced by others, he welcomes their successors with an equally open and loyal regard. Such private friendships as he may have formed he may have a right to retain. As a reasonable being he cannot help having convictions upon the merits of different policies, but these considerations are abstract, speculative and devoid of practical effect in his official relations. As the head of a constitutional State, as engaged in the administration of parliamentary government, he has no political friends; still less need he have political enemies. The possession, or even to be suspected of possessing either, destroys his usefulness."

He quoted the 12th section of the British North America Act, which enumerated the powers that the Governor possessed, whether he acted under the advice of his Council, or on his own responsibility, and pointed out that there was nothing plainer than this section, which pointed out clearly the very sources whence were derived the diverse powers granted to the Governors of Canada, and which were not mentioned in the British North America Act. The first source of power that was found in looking over the past, was the very Act that the British North America Act had replaced in 1867. He spoke of the Union Act, passed in 1840, by the British Parliament, which provided that all powers, authorities and functions, which were previously vested in the respective Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent of the Executive Council of such Provinces respectively, or in conjunction with such Executive Council, or with any number of the members thereof, or by the said Governors or Lieutenant-Governors individually and alone, should, in so far as the same were not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the provision of that Act, be vested in the Governor of the Province of Canada, with the advice, or with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction, as the case might require, with such Executive Council, or any members thereof, or by himself, individually and alone, in cases where the advice, consent, or concurrence of the Executive Council was not required. This section was completed by the following one, which indicated, in express terms, the manner in which the Governor was to act on his own responsibility, in case the advice of his Ministers should not be required, and provided that all the power and authority vested in him, should be exercised in conformity with, and subject to, such orders, instructions and directions as Her Majesty might, from time to time, see fit to make or issue. The 45th section of the Union Act referred to a former Act passed under George the Third, in the thirty-first year of his reign. This Act of 1791 was none other than the Constitutional Act that was granted to Canada by England, twenty-eight years after the Treaty of Versailles. He had read it attentively, and he had failed to discover therein aught that gave to the Governors of Canada other powers than those already specified by the Union Act of 1840, and the British North America Act of 1867. On the contrary, he found that in those days the powers of the Governors were much more restrained than they were now. The Governor could do nothing without having a special authorisation from the reigning Sovereign, who granted it under his own hand. The appointment of Legislative Councillors, the summoning and prorogation of the Houses, could not take place without an authorisation given under the Sovereign's own hand. That was the nature of the Constitutional Act of 1791, and it would convince all those who were acquainted with the present working of responsible government how greatly the powers and initiative of the Governor were at that time limited. He was speaking from the standpoint of the Statute. But there was another Act to be consulted. By going back to the fourteenth year of the reign of George III, it would be found that during the seventh Session of the thirteenth Parliament of Great Britain, in 1774, an Act had been passed, the 83rd of the Statutes at that time, which was entitled: "An Act for making more effectual provision for the Government of the Province of Quebec in North America." But in this Act, as in the one that replaced it, nothing was found that gave to the Governors other powers than those already mentioned. The Act of 1867, by which a Constitution was granted to Canada, defined the powers of the Governors, and referred to the Act of 1840. The Act of 1840 referred, in its turn, to the Act of 1791, and the Act of 1791 to that of 1774. These three latter Acts did not confer on the Governors of Canada any other powers than those he now possessed under the Act of 1867 ; this Act, on the contrary, going further, in this respect, than the preceding ones. The Act of 1867, the British North America Act, was the veritable charter of Canadian liberties ; it was the fruitful source from which flowed the rights and powers of the Canadian people, and those whom the Royal authority sent to preside over the destinies of one of the most beautiful of her colonies were obliged to draw from this source the spirit of their duties, and the Royal Instructions, showed in the most conclusive manner, that the source of the Governor's power was the British North America Act. He was still speaking from the standpoint of the Statute, but it was time to distinguish between two things that were not to be confounded, and to study, in the distribution of the Governor's functions and in the exercise of his duties, what he would define as the double character and the double action of a Governor. According to his idea, there were two persons in a Governor. There was the representative, the delegate of our beloved Queen, what he would call the personification of Royal authority ; there was also the public servant, appointed by the British Crown to protect and defend, in a far-off land, the interests and the glorious prestige of this Crown, whence his authority was derived. King and servant,—King in the colonies, servant of the Mother Country,—not responsible to this House for any of his acts, whatever they might be, but responsible to the British Parliament. The most competent writers on constitutional law confirmed this doctrine. In his work upon Responsible Government, Lord Grey said :—

“ But there was this most important difference between a Colonial Governor and an English Sovereign of the Houses of Plantagenet or Tudor, that the former was responsible to a distant and, generally, an impartial authority, to which the colonists could always appeal to relieve them from a Governor who abused his power.”

Hearn said :—

“ Although he is the first subject in the colony over which he presides, and is entitled to all the consideration which the great confidence reposed in him by his Sovereign demands, he is in strict law merely an agent of the Queen, exercising in her name and on her behalf under certain strict instructions some of the Royal prerogatives. His authority is derived and is strictly limited. He, like every other agent, has, from the very nature of the case, a double relation, one to his principal, another to the party with whom he transacts the affairs of his principal.”

Grey, he thought, summarised the question :—

“ The Governor is the King's servant. His commission came from him and he has only to execute the powers conferred upon him by this commission, to wit, to execute the laws of Minora, subject to the instructions of the King in Council.

He believed that by these extracts he had shown, in a manner not to be refuted, that the powers of a Governor were limited, and that, in present cases, the Governor had no other authority than that conferred on him by the British North America Act, or that which he held under the commission of the Queen herself. This principle being admitted—and no one could deny it—it remained to be shown that a Lieutenant-Governor had no other authority than that conferred upon him by the same British North America Act, or that he might receive from the Governor-General who granted him his commission. For him, as for the Governor-General, there were two sources whence he derived his authority, the law and his commission. By the British North America Act, all powers, authorities and functions which, under any Imperial or Canadian Act, were, before or at the Union, vested in or exercisable by the respective Governors, or Lieutenant-Governors, of the Provinces were, so far as the same were capable of being exercised after the Union, in relation to the Government of Ontario and Quebec respectively, rested in the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec respectively, with the advice, or with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction with the respective Executive Councils, or any members thereof, or by the Lieutenant-Governor individually, as the case required. The British North America Act did not, in any way, confer upon the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec the power of dismissing his Ministers. This power had not been given to him by the Act of 1840, nor by that of 1791, nor by that of 1774 ; nor did he hold this power under his commission, or under the Royal instructions given to the Governor-General, in which mention was made of the Lieutenant-Governor. It must then be concluded the Lieutenant-Governor had not the legal right of dismissing his Ministers. But, if he had not the legal right, had he at least the constitutional right, for the law and the Constitution were two things entirely distinct. This distinction had been perfectly established by the hon. leader of the Government about a year ago, when discussing the motion he had drawn up, and which the representatives that the people had recently chosen were again called upon to seriously meditate. The question, therefore, was this: Had a Lieutenant-Governor the constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, and, if so, had Lieutenant-Governor Letellier constitutionally exercised this right in dismissing the De-Bouchervillé Cabinet? He would suppose that a Lieutenant-Governor had unquestionably the right to dismiss his Cabinet—it was a mere supposition, and he did not pretend to decide the question; moreover, it mattered little, for the purposes of this debate, whether the supposition was well founded or not. He would maintain, as a principle, that a Lieutenant-Governor was a Federal officer, who could not have more constitutional rights than those of his superior the Governor-General. Therefore, the Lieutenant-Governor could not do that which the Governor-General would not have the constitutional right to do. But the Governor-General was himself an officer of the British Crown, and he had proved, in beginning his remarks, that his powers were limited. And even supposing that he, who represented the Royal authority in Canada, even supposing that Lieutenant-Governors possessed all the rights appertaining to the British Crown, neither the one nor the other could, in this case, go beyond the limit marked out by constitutional law, and that the British Sovereign herself could not overstep, if she wished to remain a constitutional Sovereign. And what was this boundary line, this wall raised up to protect popular liberties? The most reliable authors in constitutional law, the most eminent statesmen of the British Empire, spoke of it. By consulting their works and their opinions, it would be found that they were all agreed upon this important constitutional question of the forming and dismissal of a Ministry. Todd, in his "Parliamentary Government in England," said:

"For the Sovereign can always dismiss a Ministry and summon another to his Councils, provided he does so not for mere personal considerations, but for reasons of State policy which the incoming Administration can explain and justify to the satisfaction of Parliament."

He also cited, at length, from May's Constitutional History of England, vol. I., pp. 126 and 138, and from Bagehot's English Constitution, p. 283. When Lord Grey was Secretary of the Colonies, in the days of Lord Elgin, these were the instructions that he gave to Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. They were to be found in his work, entitled "The Colonial Policy and Lord John Russell's Administration," p. 209 of the first volume:

"It had appeared from Sir John Harvey's report on the state of affairs in Nova Scotia, on his assumption of the Government, that the Executive Council was incomplete, that there was reason to doubt its being able to continue to conduct the affairs of the Province with advantage, and that he had been urged by the members of the Opposition, with whom he had been in communication, to dissolve the existing Assembly, in the belief that by so doing a new Assembly would be elected, in which they would have a majority, showing public opinion to be in their favour. With reference to this state of things, I transmitted to Sir John Harvey the following instructions, which, it will be observed, involve principles of general application to all colonies having a similar form of Government:—'I am of opinion that under all the circumstances of the case, the best course for you to adopt is to call upon the members of your present Executive Council to propose to you the names of the gentlemen whom they would recommend to supply the vacancies which I understand to exist in the present Board. If they should be successful in submitting to you an arrangement to which no valid objection arises, you will, of course, continue to carry on the Government through them, so long as it may be possible to do so satisfactorily, and as they possess the necessary support from the Legislature. Should the present Council fail in proposing to you an arrangement which it would be proper for you to accept, it would then be your natural course, in conformity with the practice in analogous cases in this country, to apply to the opposite party; and should you be able, through their assistance, to form a satisfactory Council, there would be no impropriety in dissolving the Assembly upon their advice; such a measure, under those circumstances, being the only mode of escaping from the difficulty which would otherwise exist, of carrying on the Government of the Province upon the principles of the Constitution. The object with which I recommend to you this course, is that of making it apparent that any transfer that may take place of political power from the hands of one party in the Province to those of another, is the result, not of an act of yours, but of the wishes of the people themselves, as shown by the difficulty experienced by the retiring party in carrying on the Government of the Province according to the forms of the Constitution. To this I attach great importance; I have therefore to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the Government of the Province satisfactorily, and command the confidence of the Legislature. Of whatever party your Council may be composed, it will be your duty to act strictly upon the principle you have yourself laid down, in the memorandum delivered to the gentlemen with whom you have communicated—that, namely, of not identifying yourself with any one party, but instead of this, making yourself both a mediator and a moderator between the influential of all parties.”

Instructions had been given us from time to time by the Mother Country. This was what Lord John Russell had written in 1839, to the Right Hon. C. Poulet Thompson:—

“It is necessary that the representatives of Her Majesty in the Provinces should not commit any act of bad conduct, and that no private interest should come in competition with the public welfare. If the Governor should oppose all the legitimate propositions of the Assembly, and if the Assembly should constantly have recourse to its power of refusing the supplies, everything would suffer. The Governor should not oppose the views of the Assembly except when the honour of the Crown and the interest of the Empire are deeply affected.”

“I have the honour to be, &c.,

“J. RUSSELL.”

In 1856, the Governor of New Zealand, wishing to know exactly what line of conduct to adopt with respect to his Cabinet, submitted to the British Parliament his views upon the matter. Here was an extract from this precious document:—

“April 15th, 1856.

“1st. In all matters under the control of the Assembly, the Governor will be guided by the advice of the gentlemen who are responsible to that body, whether in accordance with his own opinion or not.

MR LANDRY.

“2nd. In matters pertaining to the prerogatives of the Crown and Imperial interest, he will be happy to receive their advice; but if he differs in opinion from them, he will submit his opinions to the Secretary for the Colonies, &c.

“DOWNING STREET, 1856.

“After mature consideration, Her Majesty’s Government approve the principles upon which you intend to act; which principles are clearly expressed in our issue of the 15th April.

“(Signed) “H. LABOUCHERE.”

But there was no need of quoting so many and such high authorities. This doctrine was known and accepted in Canada. It had been clearly stated, and by whom? Precisely by one who might have feared to see his liberty restrained by the exercise of popular liberty, but who, appointed by Royal authority, had come to build around this great constitutional tree which sheltered our rights a protecting wall, against which, in 1873, the noisy anger of a whole political party spent itself in vain. What was the answer that Lord Dufferin gave to these men who were hungering after power, and who were mere puppets in the hands of American capitalists? What did the noble Lord say to the deputation that came, on the 13th August, 1873, to ask him not to follow the advice of his responsible Ministers? Here were his words, that they found in the official documents of the House:

“You then proceed to urge me, on grounds which are very fairly and forcibly stated, to decline the advice which has been unanimously tendered to me by my responsible Ministers, and to refuse to prorogue Parliament; in other words, you require me to dismiss them from my counsels; for, gentlemen, you must be aware that this would be the necessary result of my assenting to your recommendation.

“Gentlemen, the situation we have been discussing is one of great anxiety and embarrassment, but I cannot but hope that, on a calm retrospect of the various considerations to be kept in view, you will come to the conclusion that, in determining to be guided by the advice of my Ministers, on the present occasion—in other words, in declining to act as though the charges which have been advanced against them were already proven, and in adhering to arrangements upon the faith of which many of your colleagues are absent from their places, I have adopted the course most in accordance with the maxims of constitutional government, and with what is due to those whom the Parliament of Canada has recommended to my confidence."

He would now give the clearest and most succinct recapitulation possible of this great question, to wit, the line of conduct the Crown ought to follow with regard to those whom popular confidence had designated as the advisers and responsible Ministers of the Sovereign. Here, again, he would borrow the words of Lord Dufferin, who had set forth this constitutional principle before an attentive and intelligent audience that had enthusiastically manifested its approval :

"My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men, is the Parliament of Canada. I, gentlemen, believe in Parliament, no matter which way it votes, and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the confederated Parliament of the Dominion may assign to me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence."

This doctrine had been sanctioned by high authority for the British Government by the pen of the Earl of Kimberley, had given their solemn approbation to the conduct of Lord Dufferin, and in order that nothing might be wanting in this unanimous concert, he would quote this last strain brought by a far-off echo ; it was in L'Événement of the 12th of September, 1874, that it was to be found :—

"What are they (the Lieutenant-Governors) to do when they are without a Cabinet, as Lord Dufferin after the resignation of Sir John, and Mr. Caron after that of Mr. Ouimet? They must then, without paying any attention to the opinions or ideas of the Government they represent, call upon the leader of the party who has unquestionably the majority of Parliament to form a new Ministry."

Did the House know who was the author of this profession of constitutional faith? It was none other than one of the present responsible advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, and who, before the treason of the 2nd March, 1878, was one of his irresponsible advisers. He was then called Mr. François Langelier, advocate. He now styled himself the Hon. Mr. Langelier. The treason of the 2nd March and the political whirlwind that followed had made of him a Commissioner of Crown Lands, and now that Liberal extravagance had emptied the Treasury of the Province, and that the office of Treasurer had become a sinecure, public rumour had it that the author of the lines just quoted had been put at the head of the Finance Department. He thought that he had established to the satisfaction of the House the true constitutional doctrine. By the foregoing study the following principles were made evident :—1st. The Governor-General was the Queen's delegate, but he did not represent here all the powers of the Sovereign ; 2nd. A Lieutenant-Governor was a public officer, to whom the Queen, on one hand, and the Governor-General on the other, granted certain powers defined in his commission ; 3rd. Outside of their commission, the Governor-General and the Lieutenant-Governors had no powers except those conferred upon them by statutory and constitutional law ; 4th. From the double standpoint of statutory and constitutional law, the Queen had more power than the Governor-General, and a Lieutenant-Governor had less than the Governor-General ; 5th. The Sovereign, he whose powers were the greatest, was obliged, in his dealings with his Ministry, to respect the will of the people clearly manifested through Parliament. The Governor, having a double duty to perform, a duty to the Sovereign and a duty to those whom he governed on behalf of the Queen, should so govern the colonies as to respect the popular will as clearly expressed by Parliament, without compromising in any way the interests of the British Crown. The same principle should guide the Lieutenant-Governors. That was what had been demonstrated by the Royal Commissions, by the Statutes and by competent writers on constitutional laws. What remained to be shown? Hardly twenty months ago, on the 26th of June, 1877, in the Music Hall at Quebec, a numerous audience was gathered together in order to listen "to the recognised leader of the Lower Canadian Liberals," to use the words of the author of the introduction to the "Speech on Canada's Political Liberalism." What did this leader say then?—

"We French-Canadians are a conquered race. It is a sorrowful truth to tell, but it is the truth. But, if we are a conquered race, we have also made a conquest, the conquest of liberty. We are a free people; we are in a minority, but all our rights, all our privileges, are preserved. Now, what is the cause of this liberty? It is the Constitution which has been obtained for us by our fathers, and which we enjoy to-day. We have a Constitution which places the government of the country in the hands of the people; we have a Constitution that has been granted us for our own protection. We have not more rights, nor more privileges, but we have as many rights, and as many privileges as the other races that form with us the Canadian community."

He would congratulate the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) on having spoken in this strain, and for having publicly proclaimed on this memorable occasion that "We have a Constitution that places the Government in the hands of the people, a Constitution that has been granted us for our own protection." He regretted, however, that this expression of opinion of the recognised leader of Lower Canadian Liberals had not penetrated as far as Spencer Wood, and struck the attention of the Jove who there sat in state, and wished that at each motion of his terrible brows the Province of Quebec should be seized with fear and trembling. He regretted that these sound notions of constitutional law had not been known, or had been forgotten, or held in contempt, by the man whose odious conduct no one could defend. And what had been this conduct? for that was the subject next to be examined. Since 1867, when Confederation was established, the Province of Quebec, left to herself, had found in her own strength and in her own resources, the elements required for her development, her prosperity, and her well-being. Her sons were living happily, conducted, as they were, by prudent legislators and honest Lieutenant-Governors, protected by wise institutions, learning to love the sweet tranquility of a new political life, they, who lately had known all the tempests and rigours of politics, were growing attached, by bonds of noble affection, to the Mother Country, that gave them liberty, hailing with respect the Royal Standard that protected them, and ready to defend, at the price of their blood, the traditions of a glorious past, and the inestimable advantages of the present situation. How long did this happiness last? Three times, in 1867, in 1871, and in 1875, the people were called to the polls, and three times during this first decade of the Confederation, or, rather, of the self-government of the Provinces, the people of the Province of Quebec had to choose their legislators. They exercised their electoral rights under the eye of the law, and in accordance with constitutional principles, and three times the people had to congratulate themselves upon the wisdom of their choice. On the one hand, the Federal Government had sent to the Province of Quebec, as Lieutenant-Governors, men of the greatest capacity, men whose names did not raise the anger of the people, whose antecedents were a warrant of the wisdom and the loyalty that were to be expected and required from them. He had known these men who the Canadians of the Province of Quebec, without any distinction of origin, would always remember. They were two. One of them had gone down to the grave, wept by the people; the other still lived, respected by all. They were two; and the people of the Province of Quebec pronounced with pride the names of Sir Narcisse Fortunat Belleau, and of the lamented René Edouard Caron. Who had succeeded to him whom death had taken so soon from his people? In the month of December, 1876, there arrived in Quebec, coming from this very city, the delegate of the Mackenzie Administration. He had come with the undeniable mission of governing the Province of Quebec according to the views of the Federal Government; he had come with the solemn warning that, if he did not conform himself to the views of the Federal Executive, he would expose himself to dismissal, the only punishment worthy of such a grave offence.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. LANDRY asked what signified these recriminations, what was the meaning of these denials? Had he stated something that he was not able to prove; had he not expressed the opinion of Mr. Letellier's friends? He would make one quotation. He regretted, for the sake of the hon. gentlemen who had contradicted him, to be obliged to take from their own hands the shaft that he was going to shoot at them. This was what the Hon. Mr. Langelier, now one of the responsible Ministers of the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, had said in L'Événement of the 7th September, 1874 :—

“The Lieutenant-Governor is the officer, the representative of the Federal Executive in the Local Government. He is there to govern the Province on behalf of the Federal Government. He should therefore govern it according to the views of this Government.”

And Mr. Langelier added, further on in this same correspondence, still speaking of the Lieutenant-Governor, the following :—

“He must endeavour, in his conduct, to conform himself to the views of the Federal Executive, whose officer he is. If he does not do so, he will be negligent of his first duty as a public officer, that is, fidelity to his legitimate superiors, and he will expose himself to dismissal, which is the only punishment worthy of so grave an offence.”

And still further on, in the same correspondence, entitled “The position of Lieutenant-Governors,” Mr. Langelier added these words that were so full of meaning, and explained so well the subsequent action of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, that he would draw the particular attention of the House to this audacious and singular interpretation of constitutional law :—

“We believe that he (Lieutenant-Governor Caron) will bear in mind that at this moment (in 1874) he is not the representative in the Government of the Province of Quebec, of the Conservative party, but the officer of a Liberal Government. He must, in forming his Cabinet, endeavour, as much as he can, to make the views of the Federal Ministry prevail, whilst summoning Ministers that will command the confidence of the Province. It is evident that he would be guilty of a grave dereliction of duty were he to do what the Conservative wire-pullers desire; he would be guilty of such a serious breach of faith towards his superiors that he would be unworthy of the position he occupies, and would render his immediate dismissal a duty for the Federal Government.”

In a subsequent correspondence, published in L'Événement of the 12th of September, 1874, five days later, consequently, Mr. Langelier came back to the charge, and said, speaking of this famous doctrine that he had just enunciated :—

“Well, this doctrine, far from repudiating it, we find it so unquestionable that we do not understand how it can be seriously discussed. If any fault can be found with it, it is because it does not go far enough in the enumeration of the duties of the Lieutenant-Governor towards the Federal Executive.”

Those were the opinions entertained in 1874 by the very men who, in 1876, were to become the illegal advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, and whom a violation of constitutional government had made the present advisers of the same Lieutenant-Governor. He was right then in saying that the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Letellier, had come to Quebec with the solemn warning that he was to govern the Province according to the views of the Federal Executive as an officer of a Liberal Government. That was what he had done. His whole conduct was there to prove what he said. From the very day that he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, until the day when, trampling under foot the Constitution and the rights of the people, he dismissed a Ministry that the votes of the people had put in power, he had secretly worked in the interests of his party, and he had been constantly waging a disloyal war upon his Ministers. The documents submitted to the House gave the official history of this shameful proceeding. He would not make any comments thereon, he would not enter into the details of this internal struggle wherein the man who pretended to be invested with the prerogatives of the Crown, cravenly entrenched behind an inviolability that he thought would never end, struck under shelter at those whom the popular will had given him as his responsible advisers. There was a fact, however, that he could not pass over, for it alone pictured the man who had been imposed upon the Province and brought to light all the turpitude of his conduct. He alluded to the well known fact, known in the official documents under the name of the Montmagny affair. He owed to the electors of this beautiful county the great honour of representing them in this House, and he thought he would be believed when he said that he knew, in all its details, this question that the Lieutenant-Governor, were it only out of respect to himself, should never have mentioned in the hearing of intelligent people. These were the facts. On the 8th of January, 1877, an election took place in the south ward of the village of Montmagny. There were two candidates, Mr. Jules Belanger, and Eugène Fournier. A ballot was asked for and granted, and the president of the meeting began the registration of the votes. The election was illegally closed by the president, and Mr. Eugène Fournier was proclaimed elected councillor. This election was contested. The councillor, Eugène Fournier, came before the Court and declared that he did not maintain the validity of his election. The Court forthwith rendered judgment, ordering a new election, but after notice given, as required by law. What was this notice? It was only necessary to consult the Municipal Code of the Province of Quebec. The law required that the notice given should be a public notice, failing which there could be no meeting. But how was public notice given? The law thus indicated it:—

“Every notice given under the provisions of this code, or for the orders of a municipal council, or for municipal purposes, must be drawn up and published or served in accordance with the formalities prescribed in this chapter.

“Every public notice convening any public meeting or for any object whatever, must be given and published seven clear days before the day appointed for such meeting or other proceeding, except in cases otherwise provided for.”

Such was the law. Now what were the facts? The election ordered by the Court was to take place on the 19th of February. The public notice required by law ought to have been given and posted up on the eleventh of the month at the latest. This notice was not given until the 17th, in the evening, that was to say that between the day of the publication of the notice, the 17th, and the day of the holding of the meeting, the 19th, there was wanting, not only the delay required for public notices, but there was not even the delay required for the serving of a special notice. Therefore, according to law, there had been no public notice given, and, as a consequence, the meeting could not be held on the 19th, and it was not held. On the morning of the 19th February, before the hour appointed by the Court for the holding of the meeting, Mr. Eugène Hamond, whom the Court itself had appointed president of the said election, received the document which he read:—[Vide Return 19, House of Commons, p. 104.] In the face of such a document the president of the election could not plead ignorance. The law was there with its formal and imperative provisions, and the president was told to do his duty. Captain Hamond had done his duty. After having ascertained, to his entire satisfaction, that the public notice, as required by the 362nd clause of the municipal code, had not been given, he refused to hold or to preside at a meeting that the same clause of the law declared could not take place. In such an event, it was the duty of the presiding officer at such election, or of the secretary or treasurer of the Corporation, to inform the Lieutenant-Governor of such fact or facts by a letter addressed to the Provincial Secretary, within fifteen days after the time fixed for such election. And here again he remarked, with pleasure, that Captain Hamond had done his duty, as was shown by a document which he read:—[Vide Return 19, p. 104.] The law then provided that the Lieutenant-Governor, as soon as such information was communicated to him, should appoint from among the qualified persons in the municipality, an equal number of councillors to the number required to be elected, or a sufficient number to complete the number of councillors required. Invested with the powers granted him by the law, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was preparing to appoint a councillor, and to fill, by an executive act, the place that the meeting of the electors might have filled, had it been legally convened. But the Liberals of Montmagny were in a flutter, and they gave themselves an immense amount of trouble, and this House would be not a little surprised to learn all the details of this charming intrigue, which had procured the county of Montmagny an unexpected visit from the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. On the 19th of February, the very day appointed by the Court for the meeting that was to elect a municipal councillor, after the statement made by Captain Hamond that he could not legally hold any such meeting or preside over it, a few jokers of the village met together in a room, allowed one Bernatchez to proclaim himself president, ex officio it would seem, and there unceremoniously, and with closed doors, unanimously declare that Mr. Eugène Fourrier should be municipal councillor. In testimony whereof he referred to a report:—[Vide Return 19, p. 106.] This singular document was sent to the Lieutenant-Governor. Here began the working of two distinct influences, opposed one to the other, and originating in two different directions, the one having its source in a sound interpretation of responsible government; the other of parasitic growth, springing up in the foulest depths of society. Which of these two influences was the Lieutenant-Governor to submit to. The sequel would show. He (Mr. Landry) lived in the county he had the honour of representing, and he took enough interest in local and municipal affairs to know, from day to day, any event that might affect his electoral division. Now, in those days, it was said in the county: "We will have for municipal councillor the one appointed by the Government." And the Liberals made answer: "Beg your pardon, gentlemen; if you have the Government on your side, we have the Lieutenant-Governor on ours. Mr. Letellier is our man, and he will never consent to sign the Order in Council." Not only was the Lieutenant-Governor thus spoken of, but he was confidentially written to. Persons from the county went up to Quebec, and knocked at the door of Spencer Wood, and they were admitted into the gilded parlours, into the inmost secrets, into those little plottings, that were but the prelude to that deeper plot that was to end in the coup d'état of the 2nd March, 1878. That was what had been said and done in his county, and he was ashamed to confess that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec was the leading spirit in these petty intrigues. It was stated in Mr. Letellier's factum that, on the 3rd of March, Attorney-General Angers recommended the appointment of Jules Belanger, who was accordingly appointed on the 7th of the same month. What took place with respect to this appointment, between the 3rd, the day on which the recommendation had been made, and the 7th, the day upon which the appointment was made? The Lieutenant-Governor himself had told the House, and he would quote his own words:—[Vide Return 19, p. 13.] The responsible advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor had got the best of it over his secret advisers. But the latter renewed the attack, and, headed by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, who animated them, they made another attempt. Mr. Bernatchez, ex officio magistrate that had already been referred to, wrote, not to the Provincial Secretary, but to the Lieutenant-Governor himself, a letter, which bore the date of the 10th of March, 1877; but he thought that it was a little after midnight, and that it was on the morning of the 11th when Mr. Bernatchez signed it. [Vide Return 19, p. 110.] And it must not be thought that this letter was mailed and sent to the seat of government. Oh, no. But Mr. Bernatchez took his letter, read it over attentively, compared it with a rough copy that a grey-headed lawyer held in his hand—for this had taken place at Montmagny, on the 10th of March, in the middle of the night, in the dwelling of a peaceable advocate—the letter read, the lawyer took it and gave it to one of his relations, who was in the waiting-room. Now, if the House would like to know who this relation was, he would state that it was, in the first place, the lawyer's cousin, and, in the second place, the cousin of all the cousins, the Lieutenant-Governor himself, Mr. Luc Letellier de St. Just, who had gone down on the 10th of March, 1877, one Saturday evening, to the county of Montmagny, there to work, under cover of darkness, against his own Ministers, being aided in this shameful action by the Mayor of Montmagny and several other individuals whose names, out of respect for this House, he would not mention. The Lieutenant-Governor spent the whole of the following Sunday at Montmagny; he was waiting to leave as he had come, during the night. Mr. Bernatchez's letter did not arrive at Quebec until the 13th, and, in order to get it to the Provincial Secretary's office, it had to be sent for at Spencer Wood. It would be remarked that this letter merely informed the Lieutenant-Governor that Eugène

Fournier had been sworn, and had taken his seat as councillor. This assertion, however, did not prevent the Lieutenant-Governor from knowing a great many things, and of being well acquainted with what was going on at Montmagny, at least if his factum was to be believed, for a statement was therein made which he would read :—[Vide Return 19, p. 14.] He would have occasion to revert, in a moment, to this inordinate love of the Lieutenant-Governor for his great principle of non-intervention of the Executive in matters appertaining to the Courts. But he would not now go outside the Montmagny affair. This letter of the 10th of March, written under the dictation of the Lieutenant-Governor himself, was submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, and their report was brought to the knowledge of the Lieutenant-Governor :—[Vide Return 19, p. 107.] Mr. Bernatchez received a reply in accordance with this opinion. But the secret advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor redoubled their efforts, and finally triumphed by having the appointment of Jules Belanger set aside. Such was the whole history of this Montmagny affair. And now he maintained that, on that occasion, the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was unconstitutional, and a culpable intervention in the exercise of the judicial power, and that, further, that conduct was abnegated by the subsequent action of the Lieutenant-Governor himself. It was unconstitutional, because it granted to certain individuals an influence which belonged only to the advisers of the Crown. That was an opinion which was upheld by all writers of any weight on the subject of constitutional law. He could not quote them all, but would read what Todd said on the subject, at page 50 of the first volume of his work :

“ They (the King's friends) formed a distinct party, but their principles and positions were inconsistent with constitutional government. Their services to the King were not even confined to counsel or political intrigue, but were made use of so as to influence the deliberations of Parliament. By their means the King cabalised against his Ministers, thwarted their measures in Parliament, and, on more than one occasion, effected their overthrow. By the encouragement which he afforded to these irregular practices, it is undeniable that George III violated a foundation principle of the Constitution, and hindered the progress of parliamentary government, which, when faithfully carried out, should foster and promote reciprocal confidence between the Sovereign and his responsible advisers.”

And May added :

“ As he governs by responsible Ministers, he must recognise their responsibilities. They are not only his Ministers, but also the public servants of a free country.” [May's Constitutional History of England. Vol. I, p. 25.]

Not only was the action of the Lieutenant-Governor unconstitutional, in that it gave to irresponsible advisers a degree of influence which was not, but should have been, possessed by the only advisers whom the people gave to the Crown, but it was also culpable intervention, in that it arrested the action of the judicial power. And yet, in his memorandum, Mr. Letellier said and maintained in every line that his invariable principle was that the executive power should never be substituted for the judicial power. What took place in the Montmagny affair? The effect of executive intervention was precisely to arrest, or rather to prevent, the exercise of the judicial power, as was proved by Articles 346 and 350 of the Municipal Code. What were the facts? The pretended election of Fournier took place on the 19th February, 1877; to contest it, the petition, or at least a copy of the petition, would have to be presented within thirty days specified by the law, that was to say, between the 19th February and the 21st March. But they had no cause to contest it, because the Government, not recognising it, had proceeded, by the appointment of Belanger on the 7th March, to fill up the vacancy which existed in the council of the village of Montmagny. But on the 27th March the revocation of the appointment of Belanger came upon them. The delay for contesting the election of his opponent had expired on the 21st. Consequently that intervention of the executive authority deprived them of the power of contesting, and causing to be annulled the pretended election of Fournier. The action of the Lieutenant-Governor was therefore an act of culpable intervention, as it prevented the exercise of judicial authority. But there was more yet; and the very principle on which the Lieutenant-Governor pretended to rely, in March, 1877, had since been trodden beneath His Honour's feet. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) proved that to the House when he related the history of the Chambly affair. He (Mr. Landry) could give a further proof of the assertion. In 1875, he solicited the votes of the electors of the county of Montmagny; a majority sent him to the Local House of the Province of Quebec. His election was contested and annulled, and the Court, not unanimously, but by a majority of those composing it, found him personally guilty of corrupt practices. For the present, he should say nothing of the composition of the Court, nor of the singular judgment rendered by it. He knew how to wait, and the future would indubitably point out his line of action. Suffice it to say, for the moment, that he never accepted that judgment. He had to submit, that was all. By the provincial law, a person found guilty of corrupt practices by an Election Court could not, for the next seven years, hold any office in the gift of the Crown. When he was found guilty of corrupt practices, he was a Justice of the Peace. Serious doubts were raised as to the penalty prescribed by the law. He resolved to have these settled by appealing to the Courts for a decision on the subject. He acted as a Justice of the Peace, and at once caused that official act to be contested. A suit was instituted, and the following question came before the Court: Is a law which renders a man incapable of holding an office under the Crown, when passed by a Provincial Legislature, within the legislative power of that Provincial Legislature? That case was still pending before the Courts. What was the action of Mr. Letellier, who had declared that his unalterable principle was non-intervention of the executive power in all matters within the province of the judicial authority. The following document condemned and branded him:—

“ SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
“ QUEBEC, Aug. 5, 1878.

“ SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that by Order in Council approved on the 2nd inst., His Excellency has been pleased to cancel your appointment as a member of the Council of Agriculture, as you have become incapable of filling that office in consequence of the judgment rendered in May, 1876, in the matter of the controverted election for the Electoral District of Montmagny.

“ I have the honour to be, Sir,

“ PH. J. JOLICOEUR,

“ A. C. P. R. Landry, Esq., “ St. Pierre, Rivière du Sud, “ County of Montmagny.”

If this was not intervention by the executive power of the most direct nature in a matter not only within the purview of the judicial power, but also which had been brought before the Courts, where it was still pending; if this was not an abnegation by his own action of that persistent declaration of principle which he unceasingly paraded, then he (Mr. Landry) was willing to admit that Mr. Letellier was the most logical of men. He referred this singular proceeding of the Lieutenant-Governor to the enlightened judgment of this House and of the country to decide upon its real value, and to classify it according to its deserts. His conduct throughout the whole of this Montmagny affair, stamped as it was with unconstitutionality, contempt of his advisers, and culpable intervention of the executive authority, would, in his opinion, suffice to obtain from this House the condemnation of Mr. Letellier de St. Just. That was not the only grievance. Several members of this House had discussed, with great force and perspicuity, the other questions resulting from the documents now before them. To review them again would be to trespass upon the patience of the House. There was a fact, however, on which he felt bound to lay stress. When Mr. Letellier turned out a Ministry sustained by a majority of twenty-two in a House of sixty-five members, the representatives of the people, before the formation of the new July Administration, availing themselves of a right which the Constitution conferred upon them, communicated to Mr. Letellier the opinion of the Legislature of Quebec. It had been maintained—Mr. Letellier himself had written it in so many words—that the Lieutenant-Governor might choose any Prime Minister he pleased since Mr.

De Boucherville had declined to advise him on the subject. But Mr. Letellier had forgotten, or rather he wilfully ignored, under those serious circumstances, the following, which he would quote from Bowyer in his work on Constitutional Law, page 137 :—

“ It follows that the two Houses of Parliament have a right to advise the Crown on all matters of State, including the unfitness of particular persons to be Ministers of State. The two Houses of Parliament cannot point out to the Crown what persons shall be placed in office, any more than they can appoint Ministers and other public functionaries, because that would degrade the dignity as well as destroy the independence of the Sovereign and the balance of the Constitution ; but they are bound to advise the Crown to dismiss evil or incompetent councillors ; and of their doing so, either expressly or by implication, there are many instances in one history.”

In accordance with these principles, both Houses of the Quebec Legislature, the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council, passed a resolution by a large majority of both those Houses, advising the Lieutenant-Governor not to select his Ministry from among the ranks of the minority. Did Mr. Letellier listen to that constitutional admonition ? No, he was deaf, and forfeited the right to cite, in his favour, Mr. DeBoucherville's silence. Who in this House would venture to believe that Mr. Letellier would have listened to the advice of his ex-Prime Minister, when he refused to hear the voice of a whole people regularly expressed through that of its representatives ? Here, again, Mr. Letellier had broken through our Constitution, and had entirely misunderstood the principles which should prevail in the formation of a Ministry, especially in a country enjoying a Constitution which vested the Government, as had been written by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in the free suffrages of the people. He thought the House was now fully in possession of the facts, and had laid before it a complete statement of the case. He thought the only conclusion that could be arrived at was that Mr. Letellier was guilty, and that the motion of censure that had been placed in the Speaker's hands by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) should be adopted. Nobody in this House had yet dared to venture upon a justification of Mr. Letellier's conduct,—nobody had yet said that he did right. He was not surprised at that prudent reserve, and he thoroughly understood why Mr. Letellier's defenders did not defend him at all. Instead of meeting the question straight in the face, instead of coming boldly forward and declaring that their man acted constitutionally, instead, in short, of defending Mr. Letellier's great political action, that great coup d'état which substituted an individual for responsible government, what did they find the Liberals saying ? That Mr. Letellier acted right ? Not at all. They told them they could not try this man, and, in support of their assertion, they adduced the four reasons following :—1st. Because the people of the Province of Quebec had already given a decision on the question ; 2nd. Because the Legislature of Quebec had likewise decided ; 3rd. Because the Federal Parliament itself, last year, gave a decision on the subject ; and lastly, because the interests of the Province of Quebec, its autonomy, precluded the intervention of the Federal power in Provincial questions. He should reply to these objections. As to the first, it was true that they had received the verdict of the people at the general elections in the month of May and the month of September last. But that verdict was in favour of the Conservatives in both instances. To be thoroughly convinced of this, it was only necessary to examine into the general and special characteristics, and the result of those two elections. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) yesterday evening maintained, and he added every possible emphasis to his assertion, that the general elections in May last were upon the basis alone of the constitutional question, that what the people of the Province of Quebec had to do was only to decide upon the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, and that upon that constitutional basis the action of the Lieutenant-Governor had received the approval of the people. He (Mr. Landry) did not share that opinion, and he regretted that he had thought proper to attempt to deceive this House by that assertion, which could not stand for a single instant before the documents which he was about to produce. In a manifesto signed by Mr. Joly himself, published in L'Événement ment, of the 28th March, 1878, and scattered broadcast throughout every county in the Province of Quebec, Mr. Joly said :

"The new Cabinet declares that it abandons the Bill for the imposition of new taxes; it proposes to meet the engagements of the Province, and to carry out the undertakings to the execution of which the public faith is pledged by a system of economy and retrenchment which will relieve the people from the imposition of fresh burdens."

And, over his own signature, Mr. Joly concluded with these significant words :—

"Our opponents saw but one method of repairing the faults which they had committed during their prolonged administration—direct taxation; we see another means, which we have decided to adopt—economy. The Province must decide between the two."

Thus the new Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec himself decided the grounds of the struggle in the month of May last. "Behold taxation," he said, "and behold economy; the Province must decide between the two." And now let the hon. member for Quebec East venture to repeat in this House that the struggle took place exclusively on the constitutional question. Would he give his chief the lie? Would he give the whole "Reform Association of the District of Quebec" the lie? There was an association bearing that name at Quebec, and he did not think he was mistaken when he asserted that the president of that association (Mr. Larue) was now a member of this House. On the day following that on which Mr. Joly published his manifesto, the Reform Association likewise published, on the 29th March, a long election manifesto, and that curious document concluded with the following paragraph, which showed with what pains it was endeavoured to hoist the paternal Mr. Letellier upon his pedestal of glory and affection for the people :—

"His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor thought that an increase of taxation might be avoided. The Crown believed that the majority of the people were opposed to measures which were brought forward without its sanction; the Lieutenant-Governor felt that it was impossible to sustain the action of his Ministers; * * * the Legislature was then prorogued, to be immediately dissolved, and now the sole and only question which the electors of the Province of Quebec have to decide is this:—Do they desire a system of enormous extravagance or a system of wise economy, with an entire abandonment of Mr. De Boucherville's taxation policy?"

And in the face of these two documents, one signed by the Premier of the new Administration, and the other by the President and members of the Reform Association of the district of Quebec, the speakers on the Liberal side, one after another, assured them that the contest was upon the constitutional question. To make assertions of this description, something more than audacity was requisite, and he quite failed to understand how a man who had any regard for his reputation for veracity could, as the hon. member for Quebec East had done, bring forward an assertion which was contradicted by facts, and by the very signatures of his leaders and political friends. The May contest, therefore, was not upon the constitutional question, but upon the taxation question, a most unpopular one, as all would admit. In spite of this, the Joly Government was defeated before the people, who refused that Government a majority. And yet what influence was there not brought to bear? Since the commencement of this Session, it had fallen to him to make motions in this House for the production of certain documents. In this connection they had had some explanations, and he did not think he was making too strong a statement when he declared that he should be in a position to prove before a Committee that the most barefaced corruption was practised in the county of Rimouski, and that the Joly Government succeeded in carrying that county only by means of public moneys blindly expended. Notwithstanding enormous corruption, notwithstanding numerous promises of remission of statute labour, and of the impossible deepening of certain harbours, such as that of Matane for instance, notwithstanding the prospect of having a wharf at every point, notwithstanding the whole influence of two Governments, anything but scrupulous in the means which they employed, nothing less than the casting vote of the Returning Officer was requisite to decide the victory. That casting vote was that of a Conservative, but it was given in favour of the Liberal candidate, and this proved that there were more than the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly who could vote against their opinions and the dictates of their consciences. In the county of Portneuf another member of the Joly Administration was elected, but his election was contested in consequence of most outrageous corruption, which the enquiry now going on was bringing to light in a manner which was most humiliating to Mr. Joly. And what was not done in the county of Gaspé? A man from the county of Megantic was selected as returning officer, and sent two hundred leagues from his home with special instructions. And what were those instructions? The seven or eight hundred electors of the Magdalen Islands were by the returning officer relieved from voting, and, thanks to this little retrenchment which took off 600 votes from the Conservative candidate, the county of Gaspé went Liberal. At St. Hyacinthe, the late Mr. Bachand got himself elected by a majority of 60 votes, and, some days later, un-pitying justice removed from that borrowed diadem 83 Liberal pearls. Mr. Bachand had been dead for five months, and the Liberal Government of Quebec had not yet ventured to call upon that electoral district to send another representative in place of the one removed by death. And in his own county of Montmagny, promises of every possible description, each more fallacious than the last, were flashed before the eyes of the electors, and he himself heard the Liberal leaders declare that, if the candidate of the Joly Government should succeed in carrying the county, three months would not pass away without gigantic works being commenced to deepen the harbour of Montmagny, and draw thither all the trade of England—to say nothing of that of China. The three months had passed away, and the trade of England had not been turned from its former channel. In all the counties of the Province, the law was disgracefully trampled under foot by this Government, which pretended to be its guardian, and, in spite of all, in spite of the hostile influence of two Governments, in spite of the most outrageous corruption, in spite of intimidation and violence reduced to a system, Mr. DeBoucherville's party, the Conservative party, came out of that desperate struggle with a contingent of 34 votes; that was to say, the victory was theirs, and the people of Quebec energetically condemned the conduct of their Lieutenant-Governor by that majority of three votes, which was theirs when nightfall closed the first day of May. The people were a second time consulted in September last, and in that new struggle between the Conservative party and the Liberal party, they, in the Province of Quebec, at least, saw the question of the coup d'état again brought before the people. They discussed it afresh at the same time that they were labouring with heart and soul to secure the triumph of the National Policy. They had succeeded on both these points, and the people had sent them here on a two-fold mission, to labour for their welfare and to secure from this Parliament the punishment of the man who had trampled upon the rights and liberties of the people. Could it now be asserted that the people of the Province of Quebec had so pronounced themselves upon the question before this House, as to preclude any action on its part? Certainly not; and, if the people of Quebec had given a verdict at all, every one must admit that the sense of that verdict was to compel them to grant them the measure of justice they claimed, and which they had pledged themselves to, at every public meeting. The Legislature of Quebec had also dealt with this matter, and it was claimed that this House was thereby precluded from dealing with it to-day. When the Quebec Legislature met, after the general elections, in the month of May last, the first question the Legislative Assembly had to decide was the choice of its Speaker. The people had condemned the act of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, by electing 34 Conservatives to 31 Liberals. The Joly Government were therefore beaten in advance. In order to parry the blow, the Lieutenant-Governor himself threw open the doors of Spencer Wood to admit two members, Messrs. Price and Turcotte. These two gentlemen had presented themselves as Conservatives and were elected by Conservative counties. Mr. Price, it was true, was in Europe when the county of Chicoutimi selected him as its representative, but everybody knew that his brother presented him to the people as the candidate of the Conservative party. Their friends went into the county and carried on, against the speakers and candidates of the Liberal party, one of the most hotly-fought contests ever witnessed in the united counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay. The Conservatives were victorious with the people. As to Mr. Turcotte, the Province of Quebec understood the matter perfectly well, and, if any member of the House had the slightest doubt as to the politics, at that time, of the member for Three Rivers, the letter he would now read must make the matter perfectly clear :

“MR. EDITOR,—I have never given authority to any person whomsoever to publish or announce through the press that I would support the Joly-Bachand Government. I never even thought of it. I intend to canvass the electors as a Conservative, consequently I shall be opposed to the Joly Government.

This frank declaration earned for Mr. Turcotte the honour of an election by acclamation in that good city of Three Rivers, which seldom refused to extend that advantage to those who boldly affirmed their principles. Well, Messrs. Price and Turcotte were invited to Spencer Wood, and the Lieutenant-Governor himself, throwing aside all dignity and sense of honour, purchased with the money of the Province at least one of those members, and induced them both to vote for his new Government. And yet Mr. Turcotte had then just written another letter which must be his eternal condemnation, and which stamped the brow of that traitor with shame and dishonour :

“THREE RIVERS, 30th May, 1878.

“MY DEAR FRIEND,—You know me to be a Conservative and that I mean to remain a Conservative. I have accepted the candidature of the Joly Government because I know it has the majority, but if only my vote were wanting to cause me to be elected I would vote against myself.

“Yours truly,

The opening of the Houses took place on the fourth of June.

“The Conservative members,” said the papers of the day, “met at ten o'clock in the Committee room at Quebec. Messrs.

Price and Turcotte were absent from the meeting. Some one assured the meeting that Mr. Price would not vote in the election of a Speaker, and at half-past eleven Mr. Turcotte wrote, in presence of a Conservative member, to Mr. Joly, that he refused the Speakership. The cause was, therefore, safe, the defeat of the Ministry certain.

“On receipt of Mr. Turcotte's letter, Mr. Joly announced to his friends his determination to resign. A correspondent of the Witness published the fact, and was not contradicted.

“The sitting of the House began at three o'clock. An immense crowd filled to overflowing the galleries, the lobbies, and the neighbourhood of the House of Assembly. Mr. Price was in his seat, and Mr. Turcotte occupied a seat behind Mr. Irvine.

“At two o'clock, Mr. Chapleau and some of the leading members of the Conservative party were informed that Mr. Turcotte had given in—that he had withdrawn his letter of refusal, and that Mr. Price supported him for the Speakership.

“Mr. Joly nominated Mr. Turcotte, and made a few remarks, which revealed his embarrassment and sense of shame. Mr. Chapleau replied, and, in a crushing speech, gibbeted the Judas who will carry to his latest hour the brand of his dishonour and his treason.

“The vote was taken. The House divided equally : 32 to 32. Mr. Turcotte voted for himself, and took possession of the Speaker's Chair, in the name of the Joly Government—the Government which, in order to secure his election, he had bound himself to oppose.

“What had occurred after Mr. Turcotte's letter informing Mr. Joly of his refusal? No one can say precisely, but one thing is certain : Mr. Turcotte was taken at noon to the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor, and, when he left that plotting place, his mind was made up to betray his promises, his friends, his pledges.”

Since they were considering this sad page of their annals, he could not refrain from quoting the strong expressions used by Mr. Fabre, now a member of the Liberal party, on the 14th October, 1863, in stigmatising the conduct of another traitor, less guilty than Mr. Turcotte rendered himself on the 4th June last. If the names were substituted one for the other, that of Turcotte for that of O'Halloran, and that of the Joly Government for the Government of that day, nothing could be more appropriate :

“We ask all who put country before party, we ask all honest men, of whatsoever party they may be : is there one page of our history they would more gladly blot out than that which shall tell the story of these two months of Session and these few months of power ; was there ever a Session in which intrigue and corruption so openly triumphed over principle and honour, where the country was so openly sold to Judases by political Jews? Show me the man of honour, the Canadian, outside the corrupt sphere of the present Government, who has not felt a pang of shame, as a citizen of Canada, at the fall of Mr. Sicotte, and the conspiracy hatched against the reputation of our public men by the present Ministry, and who would not, at any price, were it even the sacrifice of his every political aspiration, have averted the shame, the indelible blot on our race, our country, our history?

"After such a crime it seemed impossible for the Ministry to fall any lower; but they surpassed themselves in the purchasing of O'Halloran. This is the first time in a constitutional country that such a bargain, which its authors have barely disavowed, for form sake, before the public, has determined the fate of a Ministry.

"Thanks to God, such crimes cannot be accomplished with impunity in a country such as ours. Mr. O'Halloran is paying the penalty of his treason. Degraded as he is, he was unable to bear the contempt of his colleagues, and left Quebec the day after his vote; but everywhere he goes he will find himself an object of public contempt. He will be repudiated by his constituents; he has lost any position he ever held amongst his fellow-citizens, and that he is not already out of the House is simply because there is no law for the punishment of such an act of treason as his, but he is beyond the pale of society. This is the proper way to deal with traitors in a free country whose only safeguard is public opinion."

Those words needed no comment. After the first vote which divided the House of Assembly into two parties of equal strength—32 to 32,—came the debate on the Address. The Conservative party moved a vote of censure against the Joly Government; the motion was adopted, and the Joly Government condemned, because it had been formed out of the ranks of the minority, and was still supported only by a minority of the representation. But it must not be forgotten that there were two Houses in the Quebec Legislature—the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. The formation of the Joly Government was condemned in both Houses; in the Assembly by a majority of the members, and in the other House by an all but unanimous vote. And, in the face of all this, were they to be told that they could not deal with the motion now before the House? Those who said so did not quite know the position they took. Did they mean, perchance, that they must not intervene to-day, because the Legislature of Quebec had pronounced in favour of Mr. Joly's Government, since the latter was still at the head of affairs? The answer to that was, that it was in spite of that condemnation, that Mr. Joly was clinging to office, and that a moment's success did not, in any way whatever, justify the crime which had been committed. Did they, on the contrary, maintain that they must not intervene because the Quebec Legislature had deemed it sufficient to condemn the formation of the Government, without destroying its existence, and that that course taken by the Provincial Legislature would be itself condemned, if this House undertook, to-day, to censure the act of the Lieutenant-Governor. In that case, it would be easy to answer that they had a right which the Provincial Legislature in no way possessed,—that they could censure the Lieutenant-Governor, inasmuch as he was an officer of the Dominion, while the House of Assembly of the Province of Quebec had not even the right to pronounce irreverently the name of the Lieutenant-Governor, who was, so far as that House was concerned, nothing less than the personification of the Crown. The position taken by the Quebec Legislature could not, then, in any way impede the course of action of this House. On the contrary, its twofold condemnation of the Joly Government on the ground that he had formed it from the ranks of the minority, could not but urge on the performance of the duty which devolved upon this House to-day, of punishing the man who was the instigator and the perpetrator of that culpable violation of the Constitution. Their opponents had a third objection, but a most feeble one. "You should not," they said, "adopt the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) because the House has already, in April of last year, dealt with a precisely similar motion." In other words, the case has been decided and cannot be taken up again. As a matter of fact, he maintained that Parliament had not pronounced. Was Parliament a Parliament if they took away the Senate? Now, if the House of Commons did not consent last year to condemn the unconstitutional act of Mr. Letellier, the Senate did not hesitate to do so. Could it be said, in the face of conflicting decisions, the one by the Senate and the other by the House of Commons, that Parliament had pronounced. And, if they maintained, in view of the resolution of the House of Commons, that Parliament had decided in the negative, why could he not maintain that Parliament had pronounced in the affirmative, and offer as his proof the decision of the Senate? Parliament then had not pronounced. But, taking for a moment the decision of the House of Commons, leaving aside that of the Senate, he maintained, further, that the House of Commons itself, by its vote of last year, did not pronounce itself on the merits of the question now before it. The young members of this House had read the speeches delivered last year, and they were heard by all who then sat within these walls. What did those speeches tell them, from first to last—and he now referred only to speeches made by those who undertook to defend Mr. Letellier? They alleged that it was inopportune for them to give an opinion upon the merits of the motion then submitted to the House. The people of Quebec were in the midst of an electoral contest, and it was not by any means proper to express an opinion which might bias that of the people, either to one side or the other. Was their doing so passing judgment on the merits of the question, declaring the guilt or innocence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec? He was correct, therefore, when he stated that the Federal Parliament had never pronounced an opinion upon the question now submitted for them to deliberate upon; but, had it done so, had it condemned or absolved the Lieutenant-Governor, he maintained, in turn, that they had always the right of asking from this Parliament that it should turn its attention to the redressing of their grievances. Todd said:

“The two Houses of Parliament collectively represent the whole community, and are the Great Council of the nation, whilst Ministers are merely the Council of the Prince. They are, therefore, entitled to approach the Sovereign with advice or remonstrance upon all affairs of state, and, in regard to every grievance under which any subjects of the realm may be suffering, it (Parliament) may investigate the conduct of public officers.”

Now, the Lieutenant-Governor was a Federal officer, as was clearly shown by section 58 of the British North America Act. They had, therefore, and always had, the undeniable right to examine into, and pass judgment on, his conduct, and this was what they were doing to-day. And, as for those who opposed them to-day, and hindered them in the exercise of this right, what had they done, Session after Session, in the Quebec Assembly? They asked for the abolition of dual representation. Session after Session, in this House, they asked for the adoption of the system of voting by ballot. Were they disheartened because, once, twice, or five times even, the House here, and the Assembly at Quebec, had rejected their request? No; but, constant in their hope, they returned to the charge, and nobody denied their right to do so. The meanest elector in the country might require his representative to introduce a Private Bill into this House, and, if this Private Bill did not pass this year, he could come back again next year, and every subsequent year, so long as it remained unpassed, and nobody here could complain of his exercising this right. But, because the people of an entire Province were suffering from an infringement of their rights and privileges, their voices were not to be heard; they did not wish to grant to them, collectively, what they would not dare to refuse to the humblest of their members individually. He could not bring himself to believe in such a denial of justice, and, if there was among the members of this House a single man who could support such a line of conduct, let him rise from his seat, in order that the people might learn who he was, and never send him back to these precincts again. He came now to the last objection, which their opponents had formulated almost in these words:—“The interests of the Province of Quebec are concerned in preserving her autonomy, and will not permit of Federal intervention in Local affairs.” This was the most specious of objections, and could not stand a moment. No one advocated more strongly than he did the policy of non-intervention in Local affairs by the Federal power, but was it common sense to describe in such terms the vote of censure which they were shortly going to pass? What was the position of a Lieutenant-Governor? He had already defined it, when he stated that a Governor had a double rôle to play,—one character in presence of his principal, the other when dealing with those with whom he transacted business in the name of his principal. He was irresponsible to the Province. Since we had responsible Ministers, it was the latter who answered to the people for all the acts of the Administrative. But it was none the less true that he was a Federal officer, and, consequently, responsible to the power that appointed him,—that was the Dominion Government. But it was the duty of this Government to watch attentively the actions of all those on whom they had bestowed any place or office, whatsoever, in the government of the State. Why should a Lieutenant-Governor, alone, escape this surveillance and this responsibility?—was it because he had more important duties to fulfil, and that the least negligence in performing them would entail the most serious consequences?—was it because he received a higher salary, that he ought to go unpunished, when he failed in his duty? But what did the law say on this subject? Mr. François Langelier would himself answer, and he took his reply from L'Événement of the 7th September, 1874 :

“According to section 59 of the Union Act of 1867,” said the Honourable the Commissioner of Crown Lands, if he is not yet the Treasurer of the Province, “according to section 59, the Lieutenant-Governors appointed after the first Session of the Parliament of Canada” (and they are all to-day in that position), “cannot be dismissed before they have served five years in office, except for reasons which must be communicated to them in writing within the month following their dismissal.

“The law does not enumerate these reasons, and in strictness the dismissal of a Lieutenant-Governor would be legal, whatever the cause assigned might be. But, still, the responsible advisers of the Governor-General should render an account of the dismissal to the Senate and to the House of Commons, and cause them to be satisfied with the reason given, since the law requires that the Governor-General should communicate it to them as soon as possible.”

This simple extract proved indubitably that the Liberals themselves recognised as belonging to the Dominion authorities this right of interference, which the law gave them. If the Dominion authorities possesses the right of interference, who could hinder them, when they wished to exercise this right? It was perfectly ridiculous to speak in this place of the dangers with which their autonomy was threatened, when the question was simply the punishment of a prevaricating official. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec had violated the Constitution, and there were some who wished this attempt to go unpunished. But it was in the name of their autonomy, which he wished to ruin, that he (Mr. Landry) asked the House to adopt the motion now before it. To let the act go unpunished would be to nourish a continual threat, and the maintenance of the Lieutenant-Governor in a position of which he was unworthy would be a constant source of danger to their autonomy. The leader of the last Administration knew perfectly well what sort of a man he was giving the Province, when he sent them Mr. Lac Letellier to be Governor over the Province of Quebec. The reputation of this public man was perfectly known to all, and, if the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had forgotten it, he might have referred to what his friend the Hon. Mr. Fabre said about Mr. Letellier, when he wrote on the 14th October, 1863, the following lines :—

“Mr. Letellier excites every day the admiration of his friends, and the Upper Canadian members do not hesitate to place him immediately below Mr. Sandfield Macdonald as an intriguer. This virtuous democrat, this railer at all past Governments, has revealed himself, during this Session, as being a master in the art which he for so long made light of because it was of no advantage to himself. His admirers never cease praising the fertility of his resources, his breaking loose from all scruples, and his absolute contempt for laws and political probity. Mr. Dufresne (of Ibergville) who has great skill in intrigues, and whom it is not easy to astonish, is occasionally in extasies over his assurance. Mr. Letellier thinks that everything can be bought, he judges of all public men by his own feelings.”

This was the man they gave the Province of Quebec as a Lieutenant-Governor, with the solemn warning to govern the Province of Quebec according to the views of the Dominion Government, and with the positive assurance that he would be dismissed if he did not do so. He had been faithful to his mission, and had consequently kept the interests of the Province subordinate to those of the Mackenzie Administration, and to day, in order to rescue him from the ruin which awaited him, they dragged in the autonomy of the Province. What mockery! Still one more quotation and it would be the last. It would establish that the coup d'état of the 2nd of March, by the avowal even of the only authorised organ of the Liberal party in the district of Quebec, was carried out with the sole object of serving the interests of the Liberal party at Ottawa, in order to give it peaceable possession of power for five years to come. L'Événement, thank goodness, did not justify the attempt, and the Liberals did not secure from the coup d'état all that they had reason to expect from it. This was what the Hon. Mr. Fabre said in his L'Événement of the 30th October, 1878:—

“In order to remain masters of the field in our Province, it would have been necessary for the Liberals to have reckoned upon, under all circumstances, a coöperation which they never found in Ontario. The Liberals of Ontario understand politics in a different manner to what they do. They abandoned them, for the first time in 1864, at the time of the coalition which resulted in confederation; they never coincided completely with their views, they never understood their peculiar situation. This time, with giving them up, they left them to fight it out as they best could, without putting them in a position to utilise the resources which power possesses in order to entrench a position always threatened by the Conservative influences which are so strong in Lower Canada. So completely is cohesion wanting that the very attempt of the 2nd March found Mr. Mackenzie almost hostile, and obtained from him only an insufficient coöperation.”

It was not those who had worked without ceasing against the autonomy of their Province who ought to invoke, to-day, this reason for allowing to go unpunished an act outraging their liberties and their interests to such a degree. And, besides, who asked to-day for the intervention of the Federal authority, if it was not the Province of Quebec herself? Out of 65 members, sent by her to this House, 48 were united, 48 had agreed to claim this act of justice, which they asked for to-day, and which this House would assist them in obtaining. With what right could the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) speak in the name of the Province, when the Province had repuated almost all the candidates from his party, and he himself had seen die upon the field of battle, all the friends whom he went to succour during the last general elections. They had more right than he had to speak in the name of the Province of Quebec, seeing that they formed a large majority in this House, and it was in her name that they asked for justice. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had attempted, but in vain, to deliver a eulogium on Mr. Letellier, and nobody would believe him when he said that the name of Mr. Letellier was cherished in the memory of the people, and that, if he was dismissed, he would find many counties ready to open their arms to him, in order to send him at once to this House, of which he would be the ornament. The hon. member might have completed his information, and have told the House whether it would be as a movable or an immovable—an epithet which had been already applied to him and some of his colleagues. They had not the same fear or hope as the hon. member for Shefford. The past was there with its unimpeachable lesson and testimony. Many a time had Mr. Letellier asked from popular confidence a place among the representatives of the nation. He offered himself in Kamouraska, and Kamouraska had invariably choked him off each time that he offered himself as a candidate. He tried his fortune in L'Islet, and L'Islet betrayed his hopes. He now preferred appointments by the Crown to elections by the people. If he desired, as the hon. member for Shefford insinuated, to try the latter, let him then descend into the arena. They were ready to meet him, and to conquer him. The people would know what to do, and one of their greatest delights would be to contribute directly towards sending back into private life this man, who was never formed to understand obligations and honour in public life. When closing his address yesterday, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) said that it was necessary to respect the holy ark of our liberties. He (Mr. Landry) was completely of this opinion; but what the hon. member ought not to forget was the punishment which those deserved who raised a sacrilegious hand against this sacred ark. In the time of David, at least so they learned from the Holy Scriptures, they went one day to look for the sacred ark in the house of Abinadab. During the journey the ark swayed. One of the sons of Abinadab, Oza, laid his hand upon the ark. And the indignation of the Lord was aroused against Oza, said the Scriptures, and He smote him on account of his rashness, and he died there before the ark of God. The hon. member for Quebec East would allow him to complete the comparison which he had himself begun, and to tell him that in the Province of Quebec one man had been found who had laid his hand on the sacred ark of their liberties, not to prevent its falling, but in order himself to cast it down and to trample it under his feet. Like Oza, Mr. Letellier deserved to die, politically speaking, and he was confident that in the interests of the Province he would receive this punishment, which he deserved, for having substituted personal government for responsible government. This was why the Lower Canadian members in this House asked for the carrying of the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau). Let but the House grant them this act of justice, and the whole Province of Quebec, far from complaining of Federal interference, would have nothing but blessings to bestow upon an honest Parliament, a just Parliament which, rising above party interests, would have come to her assistance, and saved her Constitution so shamefully trampled under foot.

MR. RINFRET said that he could not allow the motion of the hon. member for Bagot to pass without making a few remarks. Many speeches had been made upon the subject, the newspapers had discussed at length this question of the Lieutenant-Governor, and he did not claim to come with new ideas, or new arguments. If he rose to address the House, it was because the county he represented was more directly interested in the debate than many others, for it had the honour of being represented in the Local Legislature by the First Minister of the Province of Québec. He would not conceal the fact that he was glad to speak after the distinguished speakers who had interested the House on this motion, for the really difficult part of the debate, that relating to the legal and constitutional questions, had been discussed on both sides with so much clearness that it was now easy to form an opinion upon the subject. Indeed, it seemed to be admitted on all hands, and, moreover, it had been admitted in 1878, by the hon. leader of the Government, that, in dismissing his Ministers, the Lieutenant-Governor had not overstepped the bounds of legality. He would not speak of the apropos of exercising the Royal prerogative. He believed, as a general rule, that this Parliament should not interfere in this matter since the Lieutenant-Governor had not exceeded the bounds of legality. He could only be judged by the Province of Quebec, of which he was the head; he was only responsible to public opinion of which he was the personification. There was only one way of being judged by the Province of Quebec, and that was to appeal to the people through responsible Ministers. It was known that the Joly Administration had come victorious out of this appeal to the people. The people had approved by their verdict the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, and he thought that this Parliament had not the right to oppose their sovereign will. But he would suppose, for a moment, that this appeal to the people had been unfavourable to the Joly Cabinet. Did it follow that the Federal Parliament should interfere? He thought not. The only consequence of this disapproval would have been the resignation of the Administration and the submission of the Lieutenant-Governor to the will of the majority. In case the Lieutenant-Governor had refused to submit, the Legislature would still have had the means of settling the question, and that was to refuse the supplies. He had thus shown that, by the act of the 2nd March, the Lieutenant-Governor had not rendered necessary the intervention of the Federal Government on the political affairs of the Province of Quebec. If the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec had not respected the popular verdict, or if he had brought about a state of affairs as difficult as the one now existing without an appeal to the people, he would heartily approve of his dismissal, for he would then have virtually gone beyond the limits of legality, and because he could not have proved to any one that, in doing as he had done, he had acted on behalf of the people, and according to the will of the people. He would explain himself. The Lieutenant-Governor had really one reason for existing, and this reason, this only end of his existence, was the sanctioning of the acts of both Houses, as well as the sanctioning of popular decisions. In these two acts the Lieutenant-Governor represented the people of his Province. That was to say that in the first case he accepted, on behalf of the people, the decisions of Parliament, and in the second he accepted the resignation of Ministers. In both cases he was supposed to act on behalf of the majority, and any intervention on his part, whether sanction or refusal to sanction, which was not supported by a real majority, would be arbitrary and tyrannical. But every one knew that, after the dismissal of the DeBoucherville Cabinet, the Lieutenant-Governor had appealed to the people, and that the people had sustained him; events had shown that he had been really the personification of the popular will. As long as the acts of a Lieutenant-Governor were the personification of the popular will; as long as his sanction, or, what was the same thing, his refusal to sanction, was the faithful echo of the people's will, it seemed obvious to him that any interference with the Lieutenant-Governor would be interference with the majority of the Province of which he was the head, and with the constitutional rights of this Province. That was what had been recognised by the House during the last Session, and it was in accordance with this principle that they had thought fit not to interfere. There was another reason, upon which he would dwell a moment. This reason interested in a special manner the population of the Province of Quebec, which had a different origin than the population of the rest of the Dominion. The only end of Confederation, the only reason for its existence, was the preservation of the autonomy of the Provinces. The Dominion was composed of several Provinces, each having an absolute control over its own institutions. These Provinces were united together for the better protection of their commercial interests. It was evident that the preservation of their autonomy was especially important for the French-Canadians, whose origin, language, and religion were different from those of the majority of the Dominion. He did not wish by this to insinuate anything against his fellow-citizens of another origin; indeed, they had always treated the French-Canadians with that liberality and that absence of narrow-mindedness that characterised the British nation. He was, moreover, ready to admit that, in the efforts Sir George Cartier had made to maintain the autonomy of his Province, he had shown himself to be a true French-Canadian and a patriot. He had no need to recal what had been said upon this subject in honour of the memory of the late leader of the Conservative party. He wished only to show that the aim of Sir George Cartier was to maintain the Province of Quebec entirely independent of the Federal Parliament; otherwise it would have been more logical to establish the Legislative Union, which was a system of Government less complicated and much less costly. This independence of the Province of Quebec would be secured only inasmuch as every act of the Executive power could not be controlled by the Federal Parliament. It seemed to him obvious that the head of a Province could not be dismissed for acting on behalf and in the name of the Province, and whose acts had been approved of by a vote of the people of this Province, without injuring the institutions of this Province. He thought that, in the case now before the House, the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor would strike a fatal blow at the autonomy of the Province of Quebec; for it would be sanctioning the principle that the Federal Parliament had the right to interfere in the affairs of the Provincial Legislatures. Sir George Cartier and his followers had, in order to make Confederation acceptable to the people, represented it as a system that was to secure to the Province of Quebec her autonomy and the absolute control of her particular institutions. It had been always maintained that such was the aim, and that such would be the result of Confederation; and he was astonished to-day to see those who called themselves the followers of Sir George

Cartier, to see those who had professed, until this moment, his principles upon the question of the autonomy of the Provinces, striving to demolish what he had built up, and willing to put into the hands of the Federal Parliament, those rights and privileges that their leader had told the Province of Quebec had been guarded at the price of many efforts and much struggling. Therefore, he thought that all those of the Province of Quebec who, like him, had faith in their institutions, and were ready to oppose anything that might jeopardise these institutions, should resist such a step, as it would authorise the majority of this House to interfere in the political affairs of the Provinces. The result of this interference would be the ruin of Provincial autonomy, and would lead them directly to Legislative Union.

MR. MILLS said he would begin his observations by taking some notice of what had been said last night by the Postmaster-General. He commenced the discussion of the history of England, and repeated some chapters that were quite new to him (Mr. Mills)—some facts that English historians had failed to record. He, thereupon, asked that hon. gentleman, as quietly and courteously as possible, when did the events he mentioned transpire? The Postmaster-General, in a brawling passion, invited the hon. Speaker, with great vehemence, to call him to order. The hon. gentleman had for some days been nursing his wrath, and it had broken forth with unusual violence. If he understood the rules of this House, he had not violated them. If any hon. gentleman wished to put a question to the member having the floor, with the view of gaining information, it might be to shorten the discussion, with the consent of the member, the question might be properly put. It might be done either by asking the hon. gentleman who had the floor, whether he would allow the question, or, if the question was more concise, he might simply put it. It was then open to the hon. member to answer or not; but there could be no irregularity if the question was courteously put. They could not look at a page of the reports of the debates here, or in the English House of Commons, without observing that it was constantly done. He (Mr. Mills) alluded to this matter because he knew the Postmaster-General had acted similarly before. He had made an indignant attack upon him for putting a question politely, looking all the time to his friends in the House in order to elicit a demonstration or protest against the assumed offence offered him. He could not help admiring the dignity and grace with which the hon. gentleman manifested his indignation on that occasion. It might be he did not intend what was said to be taken as sober history. It might be they were the preliminary preparations for a lofty flight, but the pinions of the Postmaster-General were not formed for flight. He had said a great deal in his speech about the flags of England and France and other matters equally irrelevant. He had discussed a great many subjects that had no bearing on the question in hand. His incivility towards himself (Mr. Mills) was the only thing that called for his special notice. He would not say one word at this moment as to the manner of putting this question, nor would he say whether it was the proper one to discuss here, but he invited the attention of the House to the manner in which it was supported. Was the conduct of Mr. Letellier a matter that should have been brought before Parliament in the way done, and was it proper that Parliament should take the initiative in directly reviewing and censuring his conduct, was suggested by the discussion. He (Mr. Mills) thought that a fair answer to this suggestion would present itself by looking at the character of the arguments made in defence of the motion. It was defended by efforts to defame the members of the Local Legislature and the Local Administration of Quebec—by representing the Legislature as venal—its members as men elected to support one party, but who had given their support for a corrupt consideration to the opposite party. What was the evidence of this? Granted that it was true, why was it introduced here at all? Why, in discussing the conduct of Mr. Letellier in the discharge of his official duties, was the conduct and character of the members of the Local Legislature dragged into the discussion? Because hon. gentlemen opposite obviously felt that the fate of the

Lieutenant-Governor was indissolubly united with that of his Administration. In their appeal to the country, they felt that it was necessary to show that the new Administration, who had assumed the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor's acts, on appealing to the people had not been sustained. Why was it necessary to do that, or bring up in this House the conduct of the Local Legislature? Was it not improper to force upon them that discussion? The gentlemen who had brought it up felt it was impossible to conduct it to its legitimate conclusion without reviewing the acts of the Local Administration, and sitting in judgment upon the Legislature it led. He could tell hon. gentlemen that they had taken a dangerous road. What was done in order to take that line with a hope of success? It was said the Speaker of the Quebec Legislative Assembly had been elected a Conservative and turned Liberal, and must, therefore, have been bought. He (Mr. Mills) remembered when the hon. Speaker of this House (Mr. Blanchet), before Confederation, sat on the Liberal side, which he had seen proper to quit. He had occupied his present dignified and distinguished position by the common suffrage and consent of hon. gentlemen on both sides, but the gentlemen on the Liberal side were not going to charge that hon. gentleman with mercenary motives in becoming a Conservative. He would ask, had the Liberals charged him with acting corruptly, traduced his character, maligned him before the people, and tried to destroy his standing and respectability on that account? No, they had not descended to that depth yet, and he hoped it would be a long time before they would undertake to defend an indefensible motion to censure an action which, whether, in itself, it was proper or improper, was improperly brought here, and resort to that kind of argument for the purpose of upholding the motion that degraded Parliament. That kind of attack on Mr. Letellier and his friends had been found necessary by every hon. member who had spoken on the Ministerial side. The hon. Premier, when the hon. leader of the Opposition was speaking, rose, and, in a very excited and indignant manner, like Macbeth's at the appearance of Banquo's ghost said: "Do not look at me, Sir—I did not purchase a Speaker." Indeed, he (Mr. Mills) asked whether it was really true. The hon. Premier's memory was not always so retentive as they could desire. It was to be regretted that it was not more retentive. It was, too, very important that every hon. gentleman on that side should remember the political events of former years. He (Mr. Mills) had no doubt the right hon. gentleman was so much taken up with the bustle and excitement of the hour that what transpired a short time ago faded from his mind like a cloud from the horizon, leaving no trace behind. But there were persons less occupied, who had given some attention to the events of the past, and who did not forget everything that had happened in the Parliamentary history of Canada. What was the evidence of Mr. Turcotte's having been purchased? Hon. gentlemen said that he was elected a Conservative and was now a Reformer. Did every man who changed sides do so from mercenary motives? He said this was a new rule of evidence. Here, today, was one of the present Speaker's predecessors in the Chair, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn). He remembered when that hon. gentleman was an active and zealous, though not, perhaps, always prudent or discreet supporter of the Liberal party. He claimed to be a Liberal and was elected as such, but the leader of the present Government fixed his fascinating eyes upon him and he became strangely influenced. He was mentally transformed. He saw things afterwards in a different light. He began to distrust the wisdom of those with whom he had acted, and the policy he was elected to support, and left their ranks and became an office-holder on the other side. But did any hon. gentleman on the Liberal side say he was purchased, and changed his views on account of mercenary considerations? Was this new rule of evidence to be applied to him? The Postmaster-General himself had at one time left the ranks of his friends, and for a time exhibited himself in all the panoply of war on the other side. He returned to his friends, and took office for the first time. Was he, too, influenced by corrupt considerations? The Liberal party did not so charge him. The opposite position was the one hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side had taken, and, if their inference was correct,—that it followed from a change of views, that the member who changed had tacted through mercenary motives,—what was the conclusion in the case of the member for Northumberland, or the Postmaster-General? He would say nothing as to the present Minister of Finance. He was a fitting illustration for another part of that subject. Upon the main question, he occupied a peculiar and somewhat embarrassing position, but he would call the attention of hon. gentlemen, who remembered events before Confederation, to the state of things then existing. The Sandfield Macdonald Government, in 1864, had a majority of one, besides the Speaker, who had been elected to support the Reform party. By that party he had been placed in the Chair. That Government retired from office, and Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier were called on to form a new Cabinet, which they did; and Speaker Wallbridge, who had been so ardent a Liberal before, became as ardent a supporter of the opposite side, without going back to his constituents. He (Mr. Mills) would like to know, when the hon. Premier, a few evenings ago, said: "I never bought a Speaker," if he had Mr. Wallbridge in his view, and whether he had, through corrupt influence, been taken from the Reform party? He (Mr. Mills) did not say he was, but it inevitably followed, from the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Wallbridge was elected as a Reformer.

MR. BOWELL: He was not—I know from personal experience.

MR. MILLS said he was most assuredly elected as a supporter of Sandfield Macdonald's Government, and, as such, was made Speaker. He had given these illustrations from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, to impress them with the value of their proof in the case before the House. This was the new rule by which Mr. Turcotte and the members of the Quebec Government were vilified, slandered and traduced here. Were they officers of this Federal Government? Were they under the control of this Legislature? If not, why had their conduct been discussed here, and serious charges made against them? There was no better evidence of the indefensible character of this motion than this—that its advocacy required the vilification of men occupying a distinguished position, who had no opportunity of defending themselves in this House. Why was it that the conduct of Mr. Letellier, when called in question, involved such a scandalous procedure as that adopted in support of this motion? It was utterly impossible for the supporters of this motion to escape from the position in which they had placed themselves. It was obvious from this discussion that the fate of the attack upon the Lieutenant-Governor depended upon their ability to assail his Ministers and the Local Legislature with apparently some reason. When hon. gentlemen opposite were told in reply that the Joly Government had 33 supporters in a House of 65, they replied it was not so—they were only 31. Why was this question discussed here at all? Did the fate of the Lieutenant-Governor depend on the numbers 31 or 33? Was that the reason hon. gentlemen opposite contended so fiercely for the smaller number? The official life of the Lieutenant-Governor hung in the Executive balance here, and hon. gentlemen were earnestly striving to show that it had been lost by a majority of two. Was that the contention? Did they admit that, if he dismissed his Ministers, called in a new Government, and appealed to the country, his conduct would be proper or improper as his Ministers succeeded or failed? He (Mr. Mills) would like to know their views on that subject? Would they say Mr. Letellier took his political life in his hand, and that, if he succeeded, his offence was condoned, but that, if he failed, he was still open to condemnation and dismissal?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: No.

MR. MILLS said he did not hear hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches say no, or gentlemen from the Province of Quebec who had brought up that question say no. If they meant no, why did they undertake to show that the Reform party had not been sustained in Quebec? and why argue that the Joly Government had to buy two members to obtain the present number, 33; and why did they labour so much to show that those two members ought not to be counted with the Liberals? Why was the result of the elections made a matter for discussion by this House, unless they felt that, if the Lieutenant-Governor's Administration was supported, there was no ground on which to attack Mr. Letellier himself? The whole line of argument that had been followed in the House, so far, rested this motion upon the result of the elections. If they were prepared to take the ground that, successful or unsuccessful, the Lieutenant-Governor had no right to dismiss his Ministers, then the other grounds should have been left out. The members of the Local Legislature and of the Provincial Government ought not to have been charged here with corruption. But, when hon. gentlemen took the other ground, they showed, as clearly as possible, that they admitted Mr. Letellier had the right to do what he did if he were sustained in that act by a majority of the electors of Quebec. He would ask, what was the use of discussing here the number of Mr. Joly's supporters, whether they were many, or whether they were few, if the conduct of the Governor was not involved in the result? The great change in the condition of public opinion was sufficient to justify the Lieutenant-Governor in doing what he did, if it were proper for him to do it at all. He would like to know whether hon. gentlemen were prepared to lay down the doctrine absolutely that under no circumstances had the Lieutenant-Governor the right to dismiss his advisers, so long as they were sustained by a majority of the Legislature? If that were their view, they had but little support among English statesmen and writers upon the Constitution as it was. Hon. gentlemen confounded the practice under the Constitution with the powers authorised by the Constitution. He desired to call the attention of the House to the views expressed by the leading organs of public opinion, and by gentlemen occupying high positions in the Government of the country. In the Edinburgh Review for July, 1878, there was an article reviewing the use of the prerogative and the doctrines put forward in the London Quarterly, and calling in question the constitutional principles there laid down. The Edinburgh Review said :

"He (the King) cannot, indeed, impose a policy upon his Minister or his Parliament; he can dismiss his Minister, and he can appeal to the country against the judgment of Parliament."

Did hon. gentlemen deny that doctrine, or deny that it correctly interpreted the Constitution as it was? Were they prepared to dismiss any Government who acted on the principles there laid down? The article continued :

"George III was strictly within his rights when [in 1804 and again in 1807] he dismissed the coalition, and dissolved the Parliament which supported the coalition. William IV was equally within his rights, when he dismissed Lord Melbourne, and appealed to the country. In these several cases a great question of policy was raised and determined by competent authority. In the [first two cases] the action of the King was confirmed by the nation; in the other it was reversed. Everything was done constitutionally and in order."

Upon the dismissal of the Granville Administration in 1807, Lord Howick said that he was enabled to inform the House that, although he had not received His Majesty's command to deliver up the seals of office, His Majesty had thought proper to send for persons not employed as his servants, and was engaged with them in forming arrangements for a new Administration. The men who were called in made a successful appeal to the country, and it was not in the power of Lord Howick and his friends to argue successfully that they ought to be in when the public verdict was that they should be out. George IV was not so successful, and the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel were not sustained by the country, and were obliged to retire. The old Government of Lord Melbourne was again called to office. There was no doubt that there were two theories of the Constitution in this matter, one which denied altogether the power of the Crown to dismiss Ministers, and looked upon the prerogative of dismissal as wholly obsolete, whilst the other admitted the doctrine. This writer in the Edinburgh Review contended that the power was one which still belonged to the Crown. He thought this prerogative still existed. It was no doubt greatly weakened. Its exercise involved great responsibility, justified now only to avert some public calamity. Looking to England, they found there was very little difference, practically, in the ultimate result whichever view they took. If the Queen dismissed her Ministers and a new Administration was formed, unless they were sustained by a majority, the old Ministry would be recalled by the Queen. But, if the new Ministry were sustained, they would continue to carry on the Government, but they did so only by the approval of the nation. In the other view, precisely the same thing was done, and, in the end, the Ministers held office only by popular sanction. He did not, however, pretend to say he subscribed to the older doctrine as it was once understood. If the power of dismissal was now exercised as it once was in England, he had no doubt but that it would soon lead to revolutionary changes in the Constitution. He preferred to hold that, in the ordinary condition of parties and of the country, this power could not be used. He thought it a very grave act, involving great responsibility, for a Governor or chief magistrate to dismiss his Ministers, in our day; but, if he obtained an Administration that was supported by a majority of Parliament, that act was in practice condoned, and there was no power—looking at the separate community alone—that could legally or constitutionally call his act in question. This was still the recognised doctrine in England, in proof of which statement he would read an extract from Mr. Gladstone in an article entitled “Our Queen beyond the Sea.” There could be no doubt whatever that Mr. Gladstone was an excellent parliamentarian, and that there was no man living, in England or elsewhere, more thoroughly conversant with all the features of the Constitution. He was an able man, a scholarly man, and a profound thinker, and he had given special attention to this subject. Whatever he said upon this, or on any subject, was well worthy of attention, and especially was it worthy of attention upon a subject which had, as they all knew, occupied so large a part of his life. He said:

“There is, indeed, one great and critical act, the responsibility for which falls momentarily or provisionally on the Sovereign; it is the dismissal of an existing Ministry, and the appointment of a new one. This act is usually performed with the aid drawn from authentic manifestations of public opinion, mostly such as are obtained through the votes or conduct of the House of Commons. Since the reign of George the Third, there has been but one change of Ministry, in which the Monarch acted without the support of these indications. It was when William IV, in 1834, dismissed the Government of Lord Melbourne, when he was known to be supported after a luke-warm fashion by a large majority of the existing House of Commons. But the Royal responsibility was, according to the doctrine of our Constitution, completely taken over ex post facto by Sir Robert Peel, as the person who consented, on the call of the King, to take Lord Melbourne's office. Thus, though the action was rash and hard to justify, the doctrine of personal immunity was in no way endangered. And here we may notice that, in theory, an absolute personal immunity implies a correlative limitation of power greater than is always found in practice. It can hardly be said that the King's initiative left to Sir Robert Peel a freedom perfectly unimpaird. And most certainly it was a very real exercise of personal power. The power did not suffice for its end, which was to overset the Liberal predominance; but it very nearly sufficed. Unconditionally entitled to dismiss the Ministers, the Sovereign can, of course, choose his own opportunity. He may defy the Parliament if he can count upon the people. William IV, in the year 1834, had neither Parliament nor people with him. His act was within the limits of the Constitution, for it was covered by the responsibility of the acceding Ministry, but it reduced the Liberal majority from a number, certainly beyond three hundred, to about thirty; and it constituted an exceptional but very real and large action on the politics of the country, by the direct will of the King. I speak of the immediate effects. Its eventual result may have been different; for it converted a large disjointed mass into a smaller but organised and sufficient force, which held the fortress of power for the six years, 1835-41. If the Royal intervention anticipated and averted decay from natural causes, then, with all its immediate success, it defeated its own real aim.

“But this power of dismissing a Ministry at will, large as it may be under given circumstances, is neither the safest nor the only power which, in the ordinary course of things, falls constitutionally to the personal share of the wearer of the Crown. He is entitled, on all subjects coming before the Ministry, to knowledge and opportunities of discussion, unlimited save by the iron necessities of business. Though decisions must ultimately conform to the sense of those who are to be responsible for them, yet their business is to inform and persuade the Sovereign not to overrule them. Were it possible for him, within the limits of human time and strength, to enter actively into all public transactions, he would be justly entitled to do so. What is actually submitted is supposed to be the most fruitful and important part—the cream of affairs. In the discussion of them the Monarch has more than one advantage over his advisers. He is permanent—they are fugitive; he speaks from the vantage-ground of a station unapproachably higher; he takes a calm and leisurely survey, while they are worried with the preparatory stages, and the force is often impaired by the pressure of countless detail. He may be, therefore, a weighty factor in all deliberations of state. Every discovery of a blot that the studies of the Sovereign in the domain of business enable him to make strengthens his hands, and enhances his authority. It is plain, then, that there is abundant scope for mental activity to be at work under the gorgeous robes of Royalty." These were Mr. Gladstone's views. No one would pretend to say that Mr. Gladstone was not a Liberal, or that the opinions that he had expressed were not entitled to the very highest consideration. He would ask the attention of the House to the views of Earl Grey, who was for many years Colonial Secretary under the Administration of Lord John Russell. In his work on Parliamentary Government, pages 4 and 5, after pointing out that the theory that the Executive power belongs wholly to the Crown, while the power of legislation is vested jointly in the Sovereign and the two Houses of Parliament, has ceased to be correct unless it is understood as applying only to the legal and technical distribution of power; after pointing out that the power belonging to the Crown is always exercised through responsible Ministers, and that in them the Executive and Legislative power are virtually united in the same bonds, he said:

"The exercise of this high authority is also placed under the check of a strict responsibility and control, and its possession made to depend on the confidence placed by the representatives of the people in the Ministers to whom it is committed. There is a further safeguard against abuse, in its being requisite that the Ministers of the Crown should obtain its direct sanction for all their most important measures."

Now the complaint was that the Government of Mr. Letellier had not consulted him, that they had treated him as if he were of no account. He (Mr. Mills) did not pretend to say how far these representations were well founded. He had no reason to doubt the accuracy of what Governor Letellier said. He did not think it the business of this House to establish itself a Court of Enquiry to ascertain whether Governor Letellier or his late advisers were the most to be relied upon in this matter. He thought the very fact that such an enquiry would be necessary to vote upon the merits of the question showed how very improper it was that it should be brought here in this form. If they looked at the papers in this case, they would find that Governor Letellier did depart from what might be called the modern view of Executive authority; that he did draw from the scabbard a sword that had rusted there for twenty years in this country and for forty-four years in England. Hon. gentlemen would not deny that this prerogative existed. The sword had not been drawn in England during the reign of Her Majesty. It might be because Her Majesty had seen no reason to use this prerogative. There were other prerogatives that had not been used in England for 170 years. The prerogative of vetoing a Bill had not been used since 1707, in the reign of Queen Anne, and yet that prerogative had been used in the Colonies in very recent times. It had been used in regard to measures carried through the Canadian Parliament. Would they undertake to say that, because a prerogative had not been used for 44 years in Great Britain and for 20 years in Canada, it was no longer in existence; that, if Governor Letellier vetoed a Bill, he used a prerogative that no longer existed because it had lain dormant so long? No; hon. gentlemen would not say this of the prerogative to disallow the measures of the Government, for they said this was what he should have done. If the prerogative of dismissal was to be considered obsolete because it had not been used for 44 years, much more must the prerogative of disallowance be considered obsolete because it had not been used for 172 years. He wished to call attention to the position in which the Minister of Finance stood upon this question. The hon. gentleman was at one time a member of an Administration under Sir Manners-Sutton. That Administration were compelled to resign, because the Governor dissolved Parliament without their sanction. He appealed to the country; the retiring Administration were beaten. Not long afterwards, a second Parliament was elected, and the men whom he had compelled to retire again had a majority; but he was not aware that, when they were again called to power, a petition was presented to the Imperial Parliament protesting against that action, and demanding the recal of the Governor. He was not aware that anyone in the House of Commons at Westminster moved a resolution such as they had before them. He was not aware that there was practically any difficulty found in the working of responsible government merely because Mr. Manners-Sutton adopted this extreme measure. The principles of responsible government were too strong, and no enduring mischief resulted ultimately from his course. At a later period, under the régime of Governor Gordon, Mr. Tilley and his friends went to the country on the question of Confederation, and were beaten by a majority of thirty-two to nine members out of a House of forty-one. A new Administration was formed, of which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) was at the head. The Legislative Council, which did not depend on the popular vote, supported the policy of Confederation after the new Administration was formed. They at once carried an Address recommending its adoption. The subject was still under discussion in the House of Assembly, and it was the business of the Ministry to present the Address of both Houses to the Governor. This they refused to do until the final action of the Legislative Assembly was ascertained. The Legislative Council waited on the Governor, and he accepted their Address. He expressed himself strongly in favour of Confederation, complimented the Legislative Council, and took a line of action wholly at variance with the policy of his advisers, which forced them out of office. Whom did he call to form a new Administration? The Hon. Mr. Wilmot, now Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Peter Mitchell, and Mr. Tilley, the latter of whom was not then in the Legislature, having been defeated at the previous elections. They assumed the responsibility of the Governor's act, just as Mr. Joly did that of Mr. Letellier. How could the Minister of Finance, who then assumed the responsibility of the act of Governor Gordon, be prepared to say that the act of Mr. Letellier was unconstitutional and highly improper? He went to the country upon a question upon which the country had already pronounced; upon which it was obvious, from what transpired, that they were afraid of defeat; for a raid, it seemed, had been got up upon the border, to alarm the people, and to give them a chance of success.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that Governor Gordon dismissed his Ministers?

MR. MILLS said he would like to know what difference there was between dismissing a Ministry, and, contrary to the advice of his Ministers, accepting an Address of the Legislative Council pronouncing against their policy, and approving of the policy set forth in it?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I think there is a vast difference between them.

MR. MILLS: Would any hon. gentleman, as a constitutional lawyer, or as a public man acquainted with constitutional principles, stake his reputation on the correctness of the theory—that to call in other men, or to listen to them, to commend their advice, and to act upon it, did not imply dismissal, or was, in any respect, different from dismissing a Ministry. To say to a Ministry “You must go,” and say to them: “I will not sanction the Act which you recommend to me for my consideration, because I prefer to act upon the advice of others,” meant the same thing. It was a well known constitutional principle at this day, that a Ministry could not retain office unless their advice was followed. This question of the power of dismissal was one upon which, as he had said before, two views existed: the extreme modern view and the ancient view, which in the books was put forward as the constitutional rule. Mr. Freeman, in his able work on the growth of the English Constitution, discussed this, and pointed out that there were always in English constitutional government a number of unsettled questions, because the Constitution was never very long in practice the same; new practices were introduced by new necessities which arose, and by the silent, though perceptible changes in society—a wider diffusion of knowledge, a higher standard of general intelligence, the growth of new forces, the increased, and ever-increasing power of public opinion. The hon. member for Cardwell declared it was absolutely necessary that the House should interfere and condemn the conduct of Mr. Letellier, which he argued was dangerous to constitutional government. He (Mr. Mills) maintained that, in any case in which a Governor dismissed his Ministers, he assumed for the moment a grave responsibility; but, with regard to such action, this question of prerogative was a dangerous one to define. If he were a member of the Quebec Legislature, he would express his opinion in justification or in condemnation of the act of Mr. Letellier; but, not occupying that position, he would not express an opinion upon the propriety of that act. He would say that he hoped the principle of responsible government would prove itself stronger than the arbitrary will of any Governor, and that it could not be subverted by the dismissal of an Administration. He hoped, when a Governor entered upon ground so little frequented in our day, and new Ministers were found to assume the responsibility, that the public over whom that Ministry were called to rule, would use their power to deal with those whom the law and the theory of the Constitution placed within their reach, because it must, while the system endured, remain true that no Ministry could stand, no advisers could be retained, no advice could be followed, contrary to the popular judgment constitutionally expressed. The principle of responsible government, if preserved thus, re-asserted its supremacy. There were other influences which were more dangerous to the principles of responsible government than the arbitrary or partisan conduct of any Governor, and one was the improper interference of a higher authority, deriving its strength and power from popular support and sanction. However imprudent might have been the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec in dismissing his Ministers, it would be still more imprudent, unwise and dangerous to the principles of responsible government for a more powerful Legislature, such as this, to undertake to control the action of the Governor's advisers. It was the right of the Legislature of Quebec, and not that of the House of Commons, to complain. They had not done so. That this conduct would not reach the Lieutenant-Governor alone, but must strike those who assumed the responsibility of his course, and the Legislature which sustained them, was perfectly obvious. Hon. gentlemen opposite instinctively felt this, and charged the Legislature with vernal conduct, and its members with being purchasable. In fact, they declared that the Speaker held his position by the purchase of the Administration. The hon. member for Cardwell said the act of Mr. Letellier was unwise. It might be so. They had committed many acts of un wisdom here. Many hon. members believed that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches had committed unwise acts, acts that might be regarded as unconstitutional acts; but they did not believe in passing a vote of censure, at Quebec or at Westminster, on them for those acts. This House would deem it an impertinence if the Local Legislature of Quebec were to sit in judgment on their conduct, and say that this Government was not entitled to the support of the country, that they had foully won. Because this House was a more powerful or a more important body, could not remove the impropriety. It was a question, not of dignity or strength, but of jurisdiction, of responsibility. He was somewhat amused at the manner in which the hon. member for Cardwell undertook to establish the proposition that this House had a right to deal with this question. He referred to Section 59 of the British North America Act. Section 58 provided that the Governor-General should appoint the Lieutenant-Governor, and Section 59 that the Governor-General might remove the Lieutenant-Governor for cause shown, but it did not provide that he might be removed in any other way. It provided, also, that the Lieutenant-Governors might choose whom they saw fit, as their advisers, recognising, in this particular, the ancient law that the Crown appointed its advisers, leaving the modern practice to maintain itself according to modern methods. Was the act of Mr. Letellier one which justified his removal? If so, why did not the Administration act? He could only be removed through the Crown, upon the advice of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Why, then, did not the hon. member for Cardwell adopt a constitutional method, and express his regret that the Governor had not advised the Governor-General to take this course? Why did not the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution censure the Administration for not having removed Mr. Letellier? The hon. member for Cardwell went on to state that the Lieutenant-Governor had no such powers as were possessed by Her Majesty or Her Majesty's representatives here in Canada. Our Constitution provided for the appointment of the Lieutenant-Governor in each Province, and authorised him to choose his advisers; of course he must act in the same manner as Her Majesty appointed her advisers, or else he possessed an unlimited and unrestrained power. If the hon. member was right, the Lieutenant-Governors had greater power over their advisers than Her Majesty possessed. The Act said he should appoint whom he thought fit. If this power was not limited by being made similar in principle to the power of the Crown, it was absolute. If Mr. Letellier had dismissed his Ministers after the Session was over and after the supplies had been voted, and had called in new administrators known to be supported by a minority in Parliament, and not known to be supported by the country, and if he had allowed them to keep office without an appeal to the country, the hon. gentleman might have had a right to complain. But the moment the new Administration was formed, they appealed to the country and were retained in power by the support of the country to this day. They asked this House not to look at the votes recorded in the Journals of the House of Assembly at Quebec, but to accept the statements on ipse dixit of hon. gentlemen supporting this motion, in order to learn the strength of the Local Government. That was what was done by the other side. He, for one, declined to go behind the Journals of the House. He had no hesitation in saying that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier assumed great responsibility when he dismissed his old Ministry and formed a new one; but, when the elections had taken place, and when the new Ministry had been sustained, he was not prepared to censure them for the responsibility they had assumed. Whether the act was wise or unwise, just or unjust, was for another body to decide. It was not in this forum that that question should be tried. According to the view of the hon. member for Cardwell, Mr. Joly was guilty of a grave offence in undertaking to form a Government. That might be so. But that was referred to the electors in May last. Had he not been supported by a majority? Was not the conduct of the Governor, or rather those who took the responsibility of his act, regarded as inseparably connected with the result of the elections? Those gentlemen proposed to interfere, or to invite the House to interfere, in the interests of responsible government; in the interests of the independence of the Local Legislatures. What could any Governor, however arbitrarily he acted, do to interfere with the independence of the Local Legislatures? He was no special source of strength or influence. Unless he could get a majority of the Legislature to support him, the supplies would not be voted, and he would be compelled to change his friends and take back those whom he had wronged. There could be no doubt of that. The hon. gentleman opposite would not pretend that the Queen would be forced to abdicate, if, after dismissing her Ministry, the new Ministry failed to get the support of Parliament; much less would her position be endangered if her new advisers were supported by a majority of Parliament. He said, again, that it was most undesirable to use. But this House, under the circumstances, could not well call the act in question. They could not now strike the Governor without striking his advisers, for what he did was supported by a majority of the Legislature. What would be the effect if this motion were carried? He did not say that they should have Lieutenant-Governors at all. Whether they ought to be dispensed with or not could not now be conveniently discussed. He did not know but it would be a wise course to adopt, to put an end to the office altogether, and to allow the Local Legislatures to elect their own Premier. This, he held, was certain: that if the hon. gentleman's extreme view was correct, there was a very great deal to be said in favour of that policy. There could be little room for doubt on that point. If cases arose from which the Governor discovered that his advisers were men of infamous character, or that they had been guilty of infamous conduct, it would be hard to deny that the Governor would be justified in dismissing his Ministers—then a Lieutenant-Governor might be useful. If, on the other hand, he was in all cases bound to retain his Ministers so long as they had a majority in the Parliament for the time being to support them, he (Mr. Mills) would like to know of what use there was in a Lieutenant-Governor? The Legislature could choose its own Prime Minister directly, as well as mark out, as it now did, for him the same course for the Lieutenant-Governor, which he was practically bound to follow. He has, upon any theory, to do according to the hon. gentleman's view of his functions. The Lieutenant-Governor would have nothing whatever to do. He would simply be keeping a boarding-house, if he (Mr. Mills) might use the expression, at which gentlemen might be entertained. He had no doubt the tendency of the age was in this direction. Beyond the hospitable duty of entertaining the public men of his capital, he would have no particular functions to discharge. That might be the right view. He had no doubt the current flowed in that direction; but it had not quite come to that. It was perfectly clear, from the views put forward by Mr. Gladstone, to which he had referred, that was not the view generally entertained upon this particular question. He would like to call the attention of the House to the position in which they would place every Lieutenant-Governor in the country. At present, the Lieutenant-Governor was a precautionary force against lawless ambition,—a regulating force; where there was prudence, that could never cause any friction. Go at once to the end, and make the modern tendency a reality, and how would he be left? They would leave him without any authority, without any power to secure respect; a man who might be advised by his Ministers, or might be disregarded by them, without any power to call their acts in question, or to exercise any authority over them. He would be simply reduced to the position of a cypher, and nothing more. He did not see that he had the merest shadow of authority; but the authority, which was supposed to be vested in him, and which the law recognised as vested in him, and which the operation of the Constitution was gradually taking away, was an authority which, though vague and shadowy, served some purpose. By this motion, they denied his authority altogether, they declared that it had no existence. Governors were public men, chosen from the party making the appointment. Did they propose that he should, when a change took place, be a helpless object of contempt and insult, when his opponents in politics were, at the same time, his advisers and his masters here? He had no doubt whatever that, under their constitutional system, Lieutenant-Governors would occasionally make mistakes. But he hoped they would occur so seldom that the power of the Constitution in each Province possessed sufficient safeguards in itself to set those matters right, and there would be less danger from allowing them to be adjusted by public opinion within the Province, than by undertaking to make this Parliament a regulating body for the Provinces; to make it a censorious body to exercise supervision over the acts of Lieutenant-Governors, and to undertake to determine what was right and what was not right in the administration of the public affairs of the Provinces. He had no doubt that the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and repeated by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), that, if this measure were carried, it would largely tend to destroy the independence of the Local Legislature, was correct. He believed their proper course here was to leave these matters alone, to keep their hands off, to manage their own affairs, and, if an extreme case arose, in which abuse had been committed by the Governor, the Legislature had the power to appeal to this Government for redress, and they could sit then in judgment on the conduct of the Government here on the matter. It was not their business to take matters in their own hand, and to undertake to say to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, or any other Province, what he was to do in the discharge of his proper duties.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that, having voted last year in favour of a similar resolution to that now before the House, and which was then introduced by the right hon. the leader of the Government, he felt that he would not, as a representative from the Province of Ontario, be justified in giving a silent vote upon it on the present occasion, more especially as the subject was of immense importance, not only to the Province of Quebec, but to the whole Dominion of Canada, and every Province in it, and above all to the Province of Ontario, in which the principles of responsible government had originated, and in which they had been fostered, and were still so dearly cherished; so much so that he was surprised that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), should have endorsed the improper exercise of power in drawing the sword from its scabbard for the purpose of destroying the very groundwork of responsible government. The importance of the subject arose from the fact that our constitutional system rested on precedents as much as upon written law, so that, if the act of Mr. Letellier was allowed to pass unrebuked and uncensured by this House, it would result in this: that, hereafter, even the Lieutenant-Governor might point to this as an authority and precedent, and say, "I have a right to dismiss my Ministers, although they have the confidence of an overwhelming majority of both Houses, of my own motion, irrespective of the opinions of the representatives of the people." Such a result would have the effect of introducing, instead of responsible government by representatives of the people, government by one man. In fact, they would have sanctioned an arbitrary despotism in Canada, and seated on the throne Luc the First. His idea of responsible government was government by the representatives of the people, and not by one-man power. He was surprised to hear his hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) declare that the Province of Quebec was alone interested in this question. He (Mr. Cameron) thought that the question was one which affected the principles upon which our whole Confederation rested. No person could deny that the voice of the people was the only one that could legitimately rule, and the Lieutenant-Governor could not be exalted to a position of supreme control of the affairs of the Province, which the framers of the Constitution never contemplated. To show the opinion of the Reform party upon this question, he would refer to a quotation that he found this morning in the leading organ of the gentlemen opposite, and which appeared at a time when the evidence in the matter was fresh. It was as follows:—

"But a thing done may be constitutional and yet wrong in itself. Lieutenant-Governor Letellier may have had a clear right to dismiss his Ministers, and yet his doing so might have been utterly unjustifiable. No doubt; and it seems to us this is the vital issue of the controversy. The dismissal of a Ministry commanding a large majority in both Chambers by a Lieutenant-Governor is an act of surpassing gravity. Public interests of the highest and most urgent moment could alone justify such an act. No such appeal to the people against the conduct of their representatives should be ventured upon unless the Chief Magistrate feels convinced not only that he is right, but so manifestly right that the case has but to be stated to meet the popular approval and unmistakable support. Has Governor Letellier such a justification for what he has done?"

He would ask if the views expressed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, during the discussion on this subject last Session, were not, to a large extent, opposed to the opinion advanced by them during this debate. He would read from Hunsard to show what the late Premier, now the leader of the Opposition, had said on this question last year.

MR. MACKENZIE: Read the whole of my speech.

MR. CAMERON said the hon. gentleman spoke as follows:—

"I do not deny at all the premises that the hon. gentleman laid down as to the right of this House to criticise the action of the Lieutenant-Governors appointed by this Government. * * * I stated precisely, in so many words, that I recognised the full right of this full Parliament to discuss it."

His (Mr. Cameron's) hon. friend had stated, in precisely so many words: "I recognise fully the right of this Parliament to do this."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I say that now.

Mr. CAMERON said his hon. friend said he did so. When his hon. friend was speaking, he (Mr. Cameron) took down his words, in which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had said this House had no right to pronounce on the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, then or now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is quite consistent.

Mr. CAMERON said he was going to ask his hon. friend if he could reconcile his statements. He thought the quotation he had read showed the position that gentleman took last Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The position is exactly the same, both times.

Mr. CAMERON said he did not know how it was; but, whenever he got up to make any remarks about his hon. friend opposite, he seemed to chafe under it, more particularly when he quoted from Hansard. He did not know whether he trod upon his corns when he compared his (Mr. Mackenzie's) position now with the position taken by him last Session. Last Session they had been told that, because the elections were coming on in the Province of Quebec, it was an inopportune time to discuss this question; and now when the elections were over, they were told they had not the right to discuss it, because the Quebec elections were over. The time had, however, arrived when hon. members did discuss it, and, unless, in the words of the leading organ of the Liberal party, the most urgent circumstances could be shown to justify the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct, it was their duty to pass a verdict upon it. His hon. friend who had just sat down (Mr. Mills) had contended that they would be condemning the Government of Quebec if they passed this resolution. He would have expected better logic from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills.) That could not be good parliamentary reasoning. They could condemn Mr. Letellier without condemning his executive officers. The questions on which the Quebec elections had turned were three:—The Constitutional Question, the Railway Bill, and the Stamp

Tax Bill, and in many parts of the Province the two latter questions had a far more material influence on the elections than the question as to the right of Mr. Letellier to dismiss his Ministry. The plea based on the verdict of the people at the polls on May 1st was also false reasoning, and rested on false premises. The influences which affected that election were widely different from, and much more extensive than, the simple question as to whether Mr. Letellier was justified in his action or not. He was not here to justify the Administration of Mr. DeBoucherville, or to condemn the Government of Mr. Joly, but, when the Administration of Mr. Joly went to the country, they were supported because it was thought that the affairs of the country would be more ably administered by them, and not because they supported the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. He did not pretend to say that, because the Lieutenant-Governor was deserving of censure, therefore Mr. Joly's Government was deserving of censure also. They were not the servants of this House; they had independent rights, functions and powers; but the Lieutenant-Governor was the servant of this Parliament. Then, again, it was said the Joly Government was sustained by a majority, and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had asked why had they argued that question in this House unless they felt that the result of the Quebec elections settled it. The reason was this: It had been said that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor had been purged by the result of those elections, and the Conservatives replied it had not. But, even were that test a true one the result of the Quebec elections showed Mr. Letellier was condemned. The hon. member for Bothwell said he did not choose to take the accusations, the ipse dixit of any member, as evidence; that he went to the Journals of the Local Legislature to see whether the Lieutenant-Governor, his Ministers and the Speaker were liable to condemnation. Let him look again at those journals and see whether the Lieutenant-Governor had been sustained by a verdict in favour of Mr. Joly's Cabinet or not. At the 95th page of the pamphlet containing the papers laid on the table of the House, he would see that the verdict of the representatives of the people was—whether they sustained or condemned the Lieutenant-Governor :

What was the result of that motion expressing directly want of confidence in that Administration, proposed in reply to the Address from the Throne? That the Joly Government was defeated by a majority of one. How, then, could it be said that the result of the elections purged the Lieutenant-Governor or justified that Cabinet, when, on the broad, square issue of confidence or no confidence, the motion of non-confidence was carried. Did not that show that the Lieutenant-Governor and the Joly Government were not sustained on that occasion. The hon. member for Lambton argued that the Joly Government carried the Supply Bill and was, therefore, sustained. He (Mr. Cameron) thought that the less said about the way they carried the Supply Bill, and carried on the affairs of the Government, the better. His hon. friend from Bothwell had said that Mr. Speaker Turcotte should not have been attacked in the manner heard—that it was ungenerous and improper to charge him with having been bought. But had any hon. member on the opposite side of the House ventured, or would any one venture to assert the charges against Mr. Turcotte were not true? It was all very well for the hon. member to say he wanted no man's ipse dixit, and appeal to the Journals of Parliament, but those charges had been made in the public press ever since the Legislature met in Quebec and, if he mistook not, on the floor of the Legislative Assembly, and had been talked of till the present. Had they ever been denied? Had the substantial foundation of the charges been removed? Had Mr. Turcotte shown the courage to stand up and say he had not been bought? The facts were so overwhelming that it would be in vain for him to attempt to do so. If so, how had Mr. Joly obtained the supplies and managed to carry on the Government? By the forbearance of the people's representatives, the state of the pecuniary affairs of the Province being such as made it absolutely requisite, unless its representatives were prepared seriously to embarrass the public affairs, that the supplies should be granted. No doubt the Joly Government could have been thrown out by its opponents, but they had too high a regard for the substantial interests of their Province to adopt such a course. But how had Mr. Joly managed to maintain himself in power? By the casting vote of this purchased Speaker. Could the Ministry, whose sole support and prop was the casting vote of such a Speaker, exclaim: “Oh, we are immaculate and purged of all offence, no matter what may be said against us—the great mass of the electors have justified us.” Was it not a fact that, in addition to what the hon. member for Cardwell stated in reference to Mr. Turcotte, that an absolute majority of his electors signed a written request that he should not support the Joly Government, to oppose which he had been elected, and that he put the paper in his pocket, and went straightway and voted for that Government? Surely hon. gentlemen opposite need not say, then, much about the Joly Government being sustained by a majority of the House. But they had heard of the purchase of a Speaker by the Reform party before now. They knew of a gentleman in Ontario being seduced from his party, and, as his reward, taken from the Speaker's Chair and into the Government, by the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Reform party were familiar with the practice of buying Speakers. His hon. friends from Lambton and Shefford (Messrs. Mackenzie and Huntington) had objected to the tone of this debate, and, while they, themselves, were rather remarkable for the use of strong and vituperative language, they charged hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side with a similar offence. He confessed he had not heard anything of the kind, further than a broad and plain statement of the facts, with regard to Mr. Turcotte's conduct, stated without vituperative epithets, and which had not been contradicted. Though his friend from Lambton had said he had never heard stronger language, he (Mr. Cameron) had heard ten times stronger from his own lips; but they had never seen a question in Parliament calling for the use of stronger language than the one they were now discussing. But he must forget the kind of language used by the Reform party in and out of Parliament in 1858 and in 1873, and also by their recognised organs, with reference to far higher and more dignified individuals than Speaker Turcotte or Mr. Letellier. For instance, in 1858, the leading organ of the Reform party used not very mild language in charges against the Governor-General, which would be very appropriate against the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. It said:—

“With a Governor-General of this sort, of what use is Parliament? Of what avail are Ministers? Both are nullities if the occupant of the Government House has the right or the power to command the enactment of this Act or that. If he can order the enactment, he can with equal propriety order the repeal of laws; and what then becomes of law or freedom? If interference like this is to be submitted to, we may as well allow Sir Edmund Head to be Dictator de jure, as he already claims to be de facto. Members of Parliament may be dispensed with as an incumbrance; Cabinet Ministers may be abolished as unnecessary; and the Governor-General shall issue orders, bearing his precious sign-manual, which the people of Canada shall obey most humbly.

“So that his Excellency, not satisfied with dictating laws and playing the trickster to his Ministers—not content with claiming the control of the Statute-book, must needs go further than any British King has dared to go since the days of the Stuarts.”

The extract from the same organ, in 1873, read as follows:—

“We regret to say that the Governor-General has placed himself in a false position, and the sooner he prepares for his departure from the Dominion (which he will find too hot for him after his most unparalleled attack on the privileges of the House of Commons) the better.

“By accepting the advice of his Ministers, in opposition to the best established rights of the House of Commons, His Excellency has made himself accessory to all the crimes with which his Ministers stand charged.

“Words fail to express the heinousness of the outrage committed by Earl Dufferin. God help this poor country when the name of freedom can be so prostituted and outraged. Who could blame the poor outraged people if they should, en masse, proceed to the capital and make the guilty criminals flee for their lives? Her Majesty should be petitioned to recall Lord Dufferin, whose name will henceforth be held in utter execration by every honest man in Canada.

“This is the last straw which breaks the camel's back, and now it is opportune to enquire whether our loyalty has at last yielded under the strain put upon it. * * * * * The Governor-General has forced many to think whether Canadian independence is not desirable.”

He thought his hon. friends on the Opposition side had better not lecture hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side for violent language, when they found such language applied to far higher personages than Messrs. Letellier and Turcotte, but which, by their conduct, one would be justified in applying to them. Then his hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Huntington) made use of a choice vocabulary of mild language in lecturing gentlemen upon this side of the House for the manner in which they had discussed this subject. The hon. gentleman made use of a few expressions which might be regarded as the sparkling gems of the brilliant eloquence with which he furnished them. Amongst the expressions were to be found the words “bludgeons,” “stiletos,” “daggers,” “cowardice,” “base calumnies,” “hurling defiance and denunciation,” “misrepresentation,”—these were a few of the choice words he employed while lecturing them as to the language they should use, and the use of such violent language would lead to them to believe that he had been recently associating with copper-coloured savages. His hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had said that the people had spoken upon this subject, and that House should not interfere, and that the Provincial institutions were sufficient to work out the constitutional remedies. He (Mr. Cameron) had already maintained that the people, after being appealed to, had condemned Mr. Letellier. But, even if it were otherwise, it was still the duty of the House of Commons to express an opinion as to whether he did right or wrong. Then they were told that they should not bring the subject up again, because it was discussed last Session. He, however, had shown that it was not discussed on its merits, but that it was postponed on a dilatory plea put in by members of the Government at that time. That plea, however, no longer held good, and they contended that they had a perfect right to pronounce upon the question now. Another argument which he had heard advanced elsewhere, but not during this debate, was that they were not competent, as a House of Commons, to express an opinion on this subject until the Government had dismissed the Lieutenant-Governor if he did wrong. In view of the phraseology of the 59th section of the British North America Act, there could be no foundation for such an argument as that. They might suppose a case in which the Lieutenant-Governor was manifestly wrong, and in which the Governor-General in Council refused to dismiss the Lieutenant-Governor, or to censure him; what would be the remedy? Had the House then no power to express an opinion on it? He maintained that the common-sense consideration was that they were entitled to express an opinion on this important subject. His hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall), as well as his hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), had both contended that it was the duty of the Federal Government to recall or censure the Lieutenant-Governor, and that, unless they did exercise that power, this House ought not to interfere. It seemed to him (Mr. Cameron) that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was of a nature that rendered it a duty of the House of Commons to express an opinion. It had been said that this motion, if adopted, would be a vote of censure on his hon. friends on the Treasury benches, because it would amount to an assent that they had not done their duty in dismissing the Lieutenant-Governor. He was of a different opinion; as his hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was in office at the time this offence was committed, he was responsible for the advice which should have been given at that time to the Governor-General, and, if Mr. Letellier's conduct was deserving of condemnation, it was his duty to inflict the punishment. The motion, therefore, if a vote of censure, was a censure upon the late Government, and not upon the present occupants of the Treasury benches. He could well understand that the gentlemen now occupying that position might reasonably and properly say that they found that last Session vote of censure was proposed upon Lieutenant-Governor Letellier; that they found that censure was not carried by the House of Commons—although he believed that the vote was carried by the Senate; that they found the Government of the day, which remained in power for some eight or nine months after this took place, had not thought fit to pronounce any opinion upon the subject, or take any action upon it, and that they (the present Government) had thought it more consistent with their duty and proper functions, to abstain from action until after the House of Commons had pronounced upon the matter. What the consequences of this resolution might be they had not now to consider. That rested with higher authority than theirs. It was for them to give their verdict, but the sentence and punishment lay in other hands. He did not purpose at this late hour to discuss the question at length, at present he would not say more than that, inasmuch as last Session he felt it his duty, as a humble member of the House, having considered the matter carefully, to vote in favour of the motion of the then right hon. member for Kingston, and having read the correspondence and documents which had since been laid before Parliament, he could come to no other conclusion than that, in accordance with the best interests of his constituents, the people of Ontario, as well as the people of the whole Dominion, he must vote for the motion. He had no fear, as was suggested by the hon. member for Quebec East, that the autonomy or liberty of any one Province would be interfered with. He thought the vote was likely to sustain the liberty of the people, and their right to speak through their lawfully elected representatives, instead of maintaining and upholding the arbitrary exercise of one-man power.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said he had paid particular attention to the speeches which had been delivered on this subject, and particularly to the speeches of the hon. members for Cardwell and North Victoria, who were looked upon among the people outside of Parliament as the shining and brilliant lights of the Conservative party. He had expected to hear from them a distinct elucidation of the constitutional doctrine of the power of a Lieutenant-Governor to dismiss his Ministers. He had listened in vain for any clear, concise and reasonable exposition of that doctrine. He was a little surprised and somewhat amused to hear the hon. member who had just taken his seat state that the adoption of this resolution would be a vote of censure upon the late occupants of the Treasury benches. The hon. gentleman knew that, if this resolution passed, the censure could only apply to the existing Government. The Administration had been six months in power, and had not yet had the manliness or courage to deal with the question. They came to it now by resolution, and there was only one result that could logically follow the adoption of this resolution,—namely, the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor. If they dismissed him, he was much mistaken in the temper of the times and the sound common sense—and that he had always an abiding faith in—of the people of the country, if they did not hear of it at the next general election in the Dominion, if not in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman had also denounced the strong and vigorous language used by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). He (Mr. Cameron), if his memory served him well, recollected hearing from the other side such words as “bribery,” “corruption,” “betrayal,” “outrageous conduct,” “villainous conduct,” etc. These epithets had been used in denouncing gentlemen behind their backs, while the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had made his charge face to face with hon. gentlemen. These gentlemen had, in a genuine spirit of Tory impertinence, charged men, not present to defend themselves, with bribery and corruption. This exhibited an amount of bravery and courage that did credit to hon. gentlemen. He proceeded to state that the late Government held that they had the right of discussing the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. What they contended was that they had no right to pass a judgment upon that hon. gentleman which would inevitably result in his removal. An hon. member had taken the ground that no one had yet attempted to justify the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. The reason they had not justified him was not because they did not think there was any fair or reasonable grounds for justification. The ground they had taken was that they were not here for the purpose of passing judgment, and, therefore, it was unnecessary to enter into the merits of the case, and that by the action of the people at the polls, and by the action of Parliament last year, the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was justified, and, therefore, it was unwise and indiscreet to pronounce any verdict upon his conduct. In reference to the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor, he believed the powers and prerogatives vested in him were precisely the same within his own sphere, as those of the Queen of England within her sphere, and of the Governor-General within his sphere. The doctrine of the exercise of prerogative, enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite, was clearly opposed to the ablest of English constitutional writers. His hon. friend from Bothwell had quoted several authorities to show that the Sovereign had the right to dismiss her Ministers if they were not conducting the affairs of the country in harmony with her will, or in the interests of the people. He would refer to an authority which had not been quoted, to show that, under these circumstances, the Sovereign had this power, even though the Ministry had the confidence of the majority in Parliament. Hearn, on the Government of England, says :

“All measures are introduced into Parliament by the servants of the Crown, acting with the knowledge and concurrence of the King. If a Ministry adhere to a measure towards which the King cannot overcome his dislike, that Ministry cannot remain in office. If, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Ministry, a Bill to which the King was known to object, was likely to be carried by Parliament, the course of the measure would be interrupted by a dissolution, and the decision of the new Parliament would be accepted as final. In effect, this course is sometimes taken, but under different forms. It is disguised under the character of a change of Ministry. It is a sufficient inducement to the King to change his Ministers, if his existing servants be unable or unwilling to conduct, to his satisfaction, his relations with Parliament.”

The law upon the subject was perfectly clear. It was laid down by Todd, by Lewis in his work entitled, "The Administration of Great Britain," by Freeman, in the last edition of his work, by the hon. gentleman who now led the Government, in his speech last Session, which was the ablest, most logical, the clearest and the most concise delivered on the occasion. It entered fully into the constitutional question, and so far as he (Mr. Cameron) made out its purport, it appeared to deal with it, though not in the spirit in which, according to his judgment, it ought to be dealt with, in a very able manner. He (Mr. Cameron) quoted from Charles Knight the following passage:—

"The Sovereign has a constitutional right to dismiss his Ministers, but it must be on grounds morally capable of justification in Parliament, and not on the simple exercise of his personal will."

He also quoted from Bagehot, one of the authorities quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite, but they only quoted isolated passages. If they had taken the trouble to read his work from beginning to end, they would not find this doctrine laid down there in absolute terms. Hon. gentlemen opposite had challenged a justification of Mr. Letellier's action, on the merits of the case. This House was not called upon to do this. The fact was sufficient that the people of Quebec had pronounced upon it at the polls, and his action was sustained by the Local Parliament. The justification of Mr. Letellier, however, could be easily established. The hon. gentlemen who supported this resolution were those who had, all their lives, been opposed to the principles of responsible government, though they now pretended to be such sticklers for the liberty of the subject. One of them had invoked the shades of Baldwin and Lafontaine, asking what these great men would say if they rose from the dead and found the Liberal party now pleading in behalf of this prerogative of the Crown. It was just as essential to the liberty of the subject that we should maintain one estate of the realm, as that we should maintain the other. According to the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite, we had only the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and the representatives of the Sovereign, whether in the Dominion or the Provinces, were mere figure-heads. It was our duty to maintain the three estates of the realm, but hon. gentlemen, in order to have a slap at Mr. Letellier, and at the Liberal party in Quebec, were prepared to sacrifice the Constitution, and leave us in a worse position than even before Confederation. The line of argument taken by these hon. gentlemen reminded him of the statement made by Sir Boyle Roche in the old Irish Parliament, when a constitutional question was under discussion. He said: "I am prepared to surrender the half, nay, the whole of the Constitution, in order to preserve the remainder." So the hon. gentlemen were prepared to sacrifice the constitutional rights of the Province of Quebec, if they could only get a slap at Mr. Letellier. They were told that the tyranny of Mr. Letellier should be put down, but they knew that in the Mother Country, and in the history of the Mother Country, there were times when the tyranny of Parliament and of the representatives of the people became as dangerous and obnoxious as the tyranny of the Sovereign. The Irish Parliament, in its last years, did not represent the sentiments of the people; and, through influences brought to bear on them, they did what they should not have done. Would it have been an arbitrary act if they had been dealt with as the De Boucherville Ministry had been dealt with. No wrong, in that case, could have been done to them. The subject ought to be protected from the tyranny of Parliament, as well as from the tyranny of the Lieutenant-Governor, if tyranny had been committed by him. They were told there was not a single fact to justify Mr. Letellier's action. He had listened to and read the arguments of the hon. members for Cardwell and Simcoe (Messrs. White and McCarthy), and found that none of them were new, but that they had all been taken from the speech of the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) last Session. Under the facts and circumstances, it was the bounden duty of Mr. Letellier to dismiss his Government. Hon. gentlemen would find, in the papers submitted to Parliament, at page 12, one of the first circumstances which Mr. Letellier set forth as a ground for the dismissal of his Government. He stated that, during the Session of 1876, a Bill was read three times in one branch of the Legislature and only twice in the other. That matter, isolated, would not justify the dismissal of his Ministers, but it showed their carelessness and utter incompetency. What would be thought of the hon. the leader of the Government if he allowed a Bill to pass this Parliament, and asked the Governor-General to sanction it, when it had only received two readings. He would not retain long his character as an able statesman. The second charge was that a Bill was passed through both Houses with an important blank in it. It was practically a nullity, and yet the advisers of the Crown allowed it to pass. It might be said this was a clerical error, but it showed how utterly incompetent the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor were. The third ground taken by Mr. Letellier was that his Ministers substituted the Executive for the judicial power, by using the Lieutenant-Governor's name to appoint a municipal councillor in the village of Montmagny, instead of leaving it in the hands of the people—thus interfering with their liberty. The fourth ground was the passing of Acts without his sanction—the Tax Bill, and the Bill relating to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. If there ever was a Bill which would justify the people in rising in open rebellion against the Government which introduced it, it was this. If there were any circumstances which would justify the Lieutenant-Governor in dismissing his Ministry, it appeared to him that this one circumstance was enough to justify him in that course. The fifth charge was that two proclamations had been issued without the signature of the Lieutenant-Governor having been obtained thereto. That charge would be found on page 15 of the Blue-book, and on page 32 there was the reply sent in by the late Administration. What was the charge; what was the answer; and what was the reply thereto? The charge was that those gentlemen issued two proclamations without the signature of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the question was whether they were authorised to do so. The Lieutenant-Governor said they had not received his sanction. The answer given to that by his late advisers was that is not true. Four days after the proclamations were issued without his sanction, the Lieutenant-Governor put his name to them. The members of the DeBoucher-ville Government had defended their conduct in this matter by saying that they considered they had a general authority to do so from the usual practice which had previously prevailed. Their defence was worthy of practitioners in an Upper Canada Division Court. The Lieutenant-Governor justified his course in dismissing his sworn advisers, by saying that the Legislature was admitted to be controlled by rings. He was not going to enter upon that branch of the defence. The seven grounds upon which Mr. Letellier justified his conduct were established, and showed a persistent ignoring of the Lieutenant-Governor; they showed an amount of tyranny that could hardly have been expected, in the nineteenth century, from gentlemen who were the sworn advisers of the Crown; they showed an utter disregard for the functions, powers and prerogatives, of the Lieutenant-Governor. He was not surprised, therefore, that Mr. Letellier found it his duty to dismiss these men. They knew that, in the early history of Upper Canada, there were cases in which the Lieutenant-Governor exercised his judgment by opposing, as unwise and unconstitutional, a similar course to that opposed by Mr. Letellier, and refused his sanction to Bills regarded as oppressive and unconstitutional, upon which the Ministry resigned. The Tories had sustained that view, and now, when the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had used almost identical words in refusing to sanction the legislative acts of his advisers, upon the ground that the legislation was unwise, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House talked about the liberty of the subject being invaded, and the rights of the people not being protected. He believed thoroughly that the justification of the Lieutenant-Governor had been made out clear, distinct, and beyond doubt. There was another ground that already had been spoken of. Parliament was dissolved by the Lieutenant-Governor, at the instance and by the advice of his sworn advisers. They advised him to dissolve Parliament. He appealed to the people of the Province and they sustained him. They were told, by the seconder of this resolution, that Parliament did not sustain him, that he only retained his position by the purchased vote of the Speaker, and by that of another member who had also sold himself to Mr. Joly, and that that was the only reason why he was not out of power, and the Lieutenant-Governor at the mercy of the people of the Province of Quebec. He would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite that the gentleman at the head of the Government had only sustained himself in power for twenty years by the spoils taken from his political opponents.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : My hon. friend would call that petty larceny.

MR. CAMERON : Yes, I charge the hon. gentleman with larceny in the first degree. He would advise the hon. the Minister of Justice to introduce a Bill into Parliament that would make the right hon. gentleman guilty of the crime of larceny for just such offences. He would also like him to introduce a Bill that would make it a criminal offence for hon. gentlemen to obtain their seats by false pretences, as the hon. gentlemen had done. The hon. gentleman talked about the Speaker and another gentleman being influenced by the Government. Why, the hon. gentleman had bribed two Postmasters-General, one Receiver-General, one Minister of Agriculture, and others too numerous to mention. The Postmaster-General, whom he always listened to with attention and respect, asked the House what the people of Ontario would do under similar circumstances. He would tell that hon. gentleman what the people of that Province would do. They would mind their own business, and would not appeal to this Parliament to rectify a local grievance. The people of Quebec had pronounced on the subject, the late Parliament had pronounced on the subject, and both tribunals had acquitted the Lieutenant-Governor, and there the matter should rest. Hon. gentlemen would recollect that one of the charges against the DeBoucherville Government was that they were controlled by railway rings. What did the Premier of the Province answer to that charge? His answer was that the people at the polls had pronounced upon that question, and that, therefore, that charge had passed beyond the region of discussion. His answer would be found at page 22 of the papers submitted to Parliament. If that argument was sound in the one case, it was equally so in the other. The people of Quebec had acquitted the Lieutenant-Governor. Parliament had voted down this resolution, and now they were asked to deal with it a third time. There is no clearer principle of British law than that a man shall not be tried twice for the same offence. The rule that applies to the criminal, charged with the pettiest crime, in England, the Governor of a British Province should clearly have the benefit of. He had the highest respect for the French-Canadian people. They are noted for their chivalrous and gallant conduct. Let them not, therefore, persist in trying a man the third time for the same offence. Above all, let them not correct him without evidence, and behind his back. The course the majority might take was of no consequence to the Lieutenant-Governor, as the Government had not the courage to dismiss him, even though fortified by a vote of this House. If the Government did act on this vote, and did dismiss the Lieutenant-Governor, hon. gentlemen might depend on it that the people at the polls would condemn the conduct of the Government, at the first opportunity, as unwise, and subversive of the constitutional rights of the Provinces.

MR. McLENNAN said, when the gentleman who had just sat down began to speak, he hoped that they were going to reach a higher platform, a loftier tone. But he must say that he had not been struck with the cogency of his argument, or with the eloquence of his language. If he (Mr. McLennan) understood this question at all, they had not to do with the Administration of the Province of Quebec, but only with the Lieutenant-Governor. The question was not whether his Administration acted wisely in some of their acts, but whether the Lieutenant-Governor acted wisely or unwisely in dismissing a Ministry that represented a majority of the people of the country. And it was because this question might some day affect the great Province of Ontario, that he ventured to say a few words in relation to it. He had had the pleasure last evening of listening to a very eloquent address by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and he certainly admired the manner in which he used the English language, in extolling the beauties of free government. Unfortunately he (Mr. McLennan) could not admire the substance of his speech so much as its form. He (Mr. Laurier) admitted that this House had some control over the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, but that it would be far better that any acts of that officer, of a despotic or tyrannical nature that were covered by ministerial responsibility should be left to take their course and not be interfered with by this Government. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), while mastering the English language, had extended his observations, he would also have observed that, where the spirit of the people using that language was predominant, tyranny and despotism were impossible. He would have known that any Governor under the control in any measure of this House could never, by any chance, be permitted to exercise tyranny and despotism. The hon. member for Lambton stated, in the course of his very ingenious defence of the situation, that Federal Government was a fraud, if this House could exercise a supervising surveillance over Provincial Government. But there were other things far more dangerous to Governments, which consisted in sapping and undermining them. He ventured to say that this question affected very closely the system of government which was now upon trial, and it behoved us to be very watchful against everything that could retard its development. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) had asked how gentlemen would like to see Mr. Mowat referring the decision of political questions to a star chamber. He (Mr. McLennan) did not think the gentlemen from Ontario would allow Mr. Mowat to decide political questions for them in a star chamber; and it was because there was a possibility that such a question might come up at some day that the matter was of so much interest for the Province of Ontario. He had the honour to represent here a county which had given a Lieutenant-Governor to Ontario. Last year the hon. member for Lambton, accompanied by the Premier of Ontario, made a visit into his (Mr. McLennan's) county. Whether there was any connection between the fact of this visit and the fact of his candidature for that county, he (Mr. McLennan) could not tell, but the circumstance was one which brought up the whole question of the influence of Lieutenant-Governors. They were told, among other things, that the lesser Premier of Ontario accompanied the greater Premier of the Dominion into his (Mr. McLennan's) county as a private gentleman. It was in the recollection of this House that that gentleman descended from the Bench, that he doffed the ermine to go into the arena of Provincial politics. There might be no descent from that position to that of a private gentleman, but he strongly suspected that Mr. Mowat must have accompanied the Premier of the Dominion in somewhat the same character that Ministers of a peculiar sort accompanied Kings in a previous age, that was, to remind them of their mortality and of their infirmities. They were asked by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), of what use were Lieutenant-Governors. He (Mr. McLennan) believed that, in the opinion of this country, Lieutenant-Governors were not useful as party politicians. There was a higher rôle for them, and one that was very clearly laid down in the Constitution, illustrious examples of which had been afforded, from time to time, by the noble men who had occupied the position of Governors-General of this country. They should exist as the impartial arbiters of all Governments and of all parties, but they should not plunge into the arena of politics to find excuses for any course. This question of the functions of a Lieutenant-Governor was one that should now be settled for all future times. A higher rôle was appointed for them than that of serving, as his hon. friend the member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated correctly last night, as counters to political parties. Such a course was entirely unworthy of their office. He had in his mind, at the moment, the case of a Lieutenant-Governor appointed by the late Ministry to the far-off Province of British Columbia, and, when the question came up, some time last year, as to his position towards political parties, he declared that political parties were nothing to him; that his office was to hold an even balance between them, and neither to justify one nor decry the other. This was the only safe ground for Lieutenant-Governors to take under the Constitution of our country. Some very vigorous language had been used in this House respecting the possibilities that might follow the adoption of this motion. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) had challenged Ministers to show their pluck by dismissing the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He (Mr. McLennan) was not afraid to vote for this resolution on account of any consequences, or from any fear that the Government would do too much or too little. He was quite content to leave the matter in their hands. If he could trust them on their great Canadian policy, which he conceived to be of paramount importance to this country, which he had done implicitly, he believed he could entrust them with his vote on a motion as to the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He believed it was quite competent, and very proper, for this House to record its opinion upon a point of so much interest for the present and all time as the conduct of Lieutenant-Governors under all circumstances.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he would like to make a few remarks before the close of the debate, and to first notice the observations of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) in which he held the House could not discuss this question, speaking thus in opposition to the hon. member for Lambton, who, last year, stated the House had a right to discuss the actions of Lieutenant-Governors appointed by themselves. But the member for South Huron stated they had no right to pass an opinion or vote of censure with regard to it. How could they discuss it, unless there was a resolution in the Speaker's hands affecting the matter, which must either be condemnatory or laudatory. The hon. member for Lambton admitted, last year, that they had a right, if they thought fit, to take up and pass such a resolution as the present, whether they approved or disapproved of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. Could it be held that they had not as much right to discuss his conduct as that of a postmaster in the country, or any other Federal officer? This right must be admitted. The only question for discussion was whether they should pass this motion of censure or not. They all remembered that, last year, when the discussion in this House took place, by none was any defence of Mr. Letellier made; they heard only a dilatory plea put in, a request to wait till the people of Quebec had passed their judgment upon the action of Mr. Joly. The member for South Huron, feeling the taunt cast at the leader of the Opposition, thought it necessary to rush in and attempt a defence. His hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had done the same, going back 40 years to draw forth some of the old forgotten prerogatives of the Crown, and even as far as the time of Charles I. The member for South Huron tried to defend the conduct of Mr. Letellier, showing too well the truth of the old adage, that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." When he discussed clause by clause Mr. Letellier's case for the dismissal of his Ministers, he admitted that each charge in itself was nothing. He passed over accusations as only showing little faults as clerical errors, not of the Ministers themselves, but of some of their officers. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) would like to call the attention of the hon. members from Quebec to the strange position taken by the hon. member for Shefford. He had appealed to them to preserve the autonomy of their Province, their peculiar institutions, laws and language, from the interference of the majority of this Parliament. How well did that appeal come from a gentleman, with the hon. member for Chateauguay beside him, who, no doubt, remembered well his speech at Argenteuil, in which he attempted to stir up strife, and set race against race and creed against creed. It ill-became him to talk about preserving the rights and autonomy of Quebec, after that famous deliverance. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was sure that if the hon. member for Chateauguay would express his honest sentiments, he would say that the hon. member for Shesford was the last one who should attempt to set himself up as the defender of the rights of that Province. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) told them that he would not defend the conduct of Mr. Letellier, which was indefensible, but that he did not think they had a right to pass upon an offence he had been three times tried for by the people of Quebec, in the elections of May last, by the Local Legislature in June, and by the Parliament of Canada last Session; yet he said that this Parliament had not the right to try him. That brought up the whole question. When Parliament tried it last year they acted legally, which was an admission that they had a right to try him then, and surely, if so, they had a right to try him now. Was the hon. gentleman right in contending that Mr. Letellier had been tried by the Province of Quebec? There lay the whole issue of this question. They had, he thought, two questions in this matter which must be kept entirely distinct; they had the action of the Ministers and of the Lieutenant-Governor himself. The local Ministers were responsible for the advice they gave. The responsibility of the Ministers was tried by the local elections, and by the Local Legislature, but not so (Mr. Letellier's liability. What would be the result if the character of his conduct was to be judged by the outcome of the elections? They would have the unedifying spectacle of a Lieutenant-Governor, the representative of the Sovereign, passed upon by the people at the polls. If one side succeeded, he was right; if the other, he was wrong. The representative of the Sovereign would have to leave his elevated position, take part in the elections, and throw the whole weight of his office into the scale for one side or the other; his trial and sentence of guilty or acquittal being involved in this struggle. Nothing could be more destructive of the dignity and influence of the Crown than such interference, and it would never be thought of in England. The Lieutenant-Governor was responsible to this House and Government, and it was by the result of the elections in Quebec, for representatives in this House, that he was to be tried. It was objected, it would not do for members from other parts of Canada to censure the Governors of particular Provinces. They were told that, some day, in this way, some of the smaller Provinces would be over-ridden. But they were not now acting in opposition to the wishes of the people of Quebec. It was on the 17th September last that Mr. Letellier was actually tried by the people, the question being distinctly put to the vote in every constituency, as to whether he was right or wrong; the result had been unmistakably shown by the return of 48 members to condemn him, and only 17 to support him. They knew also, for it was no secret, that the opinion of a high authority, no longer connected with this country, was that the constitutional question would be lost sight of at the polls in May last, there being so many questions exciting the people, who were smarting under the idea of a probable increase of taxation, and animosity to the Government of Mr. DeBoucherville for proposing new taxes, to prevent the Province running into debt, as the present Government was reported to be allowing it. The people (for the sake of argument, let it be said that they supported Mr. Joly) did not approve of Mr. Letellier's dismissal of his former Ministry. Now, if the Lieutenant-Governor was an officer of this House, he was responsible to it as much as any Governor was to the House of Commons in England for his administration of a Colony. In the records of the British House of Commons, they might find frequent reports of the discussions of the conduct of such officers. The conduct of Governor Eyre was discussed and adverted to in Parliament very strongly. Sir Charles Darling and Mr. Pope Hennessey had their conduct discussed in the House of Commons of England. Why, then, should not this House discuss the conduct of their Lieutenant-Governor?

MR. HUNTINGTON: It is not exactly the same thing.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said it was precisely the same thing. Lieutenant-Governors occupied the same position, as representatives of the Government, as the Colonial representatives did in respect to the Crown. Lieutenant-Governors were responsible to this House, and it was only in this House that their conduct could be discussed. Otherwise, there was no tribunal to which they were responsible. It was true the Governor-General in Council had power to remove; but they had the right to pass their opinion, if the Government did not see fit to act. The power of the Governor in Council to remove the Lieutenant-Governors did not debar them from discussing independently the action of Lieutenant-Governors. He desired to call attention to one thing that had been omitted in this discussion, and that was that the Lieutenant-Governor had placed himself in such a position by his conduct as to destroy his usefulness. He had rendered it impossible for him to govern properly and efficiently the people over whom he had been placed. He had placed himself in direct antagonism to a large section of the people of that Province. He had placed himself in personal antagonism with the very people whom, in the event of a change of Ministry, it would be necessary to call to his Council. He would refer to an extract which would show clearly what position a Governor occupied with regard to a Colonial Government. He would quote for a moment from a despatch written by the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell to Governor Sir Chas. Darling, in 1866, in which he declared the duty of a Governor. He said:

“It is one of the first duties of the Queen's Representative to keep himself, as far as possible, aloof from, and above, all personal conflicts. He should always so conduct himself as not to be precluded from acting freely with those whom the course of Parliamentary proceedings might present to him as his confidential advisers. While, on the one hand, it is his duty to afford to his actual advisers all fair and just support, consistently with the observance of the law; he ought, on the other hand, to be perfectly free to give the same support to any other Ministers whom it may be necessary for him at any future time to call to his Councils. The colony is entitled to know that the Governor gives this support to his Ministers for the time being, and that he is able and willing, if the occasion shall arise, to give the same support to others. I regret to say that in the present instance you have rendered this impossible. It must be evident to yourself that you occupy a position of personal antagonism towards almost all those whose antecedents point them out as most likely to be available to you in the event of any change of Ministry. This has resulted, as I think, entirely from your own acts, your adoption of a course of conduct which cannot be justified in law, and your strong denunciation, in which I am wholly unable to concur, of those who have objected to that course. It is impossible, I much regret to say, that, after this, you can, with advantage, continue to conduct the Government of the colony.

“Looking to your long services, and sincerely desirous to make every allowance for the difficulties of your position, I have been most reluctant to arrive at the decision which, nevertheless, I have been obliged to adopt. I am compelled to advise Her Majesty that you should be relieved of your duties, and the Government of the colony be placed in other hands.”

That was the despatch from the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell to Governor Darling in 1866.

MR. HUNTINGTON: That is not a case in point.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said why was it not? Had they not in the papers that had been laid upon the table of this House, conclusive evidence that Governor Letellier had placed himself in personal antagonism to the leaders of a great party in the Province of Quebec—the leaders of that party which, in the event of a change of Ministry, he would have found it necessary to call to his Council? They knew that, throughout the length and breadth of that Province, there was a feeling which knew no bounds, which had destroyed Mr. Letellier's usefulness, and which, in the words of the despatch, would have compelled a Colonial Minister to advise Her Majesty to recall him, had he been an officer representing the Imperial Government. If that was the case, the same duty was incumbent upon the Government here, and upon this House, to pass its opinion on that conduct. And he thought that, if a member of the House believed that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's conduct was unjustifiable or indefensible, then the plain course for him to pursue was to vote for this resolution. It seemed, to his mind, quite clear that they had a right to discuss it. They discussed these questions in the Imperial House of Commons, and, if they could discuss his conduct, they could discuss that resolution, and that resolution must approve or condemn—

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no.

MR. KIRKPATRICK, said that every person who condemned that course ought to vote for this resolution, and so express his opinion upon it.

MR. CASGRAIN said that he would not have spoken at that late hour and after the exhaustive discussion that had taken place, if it were not to protest against the assertion of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and especially to protest solemnly against the partisan spirit that had run through this debate, and against the means made use of to prevent all amendments to the main motion. It deprived the members of their right to register in the Journals of the House the expression of their opinions, and forced upon them a vote that did not make known all their views upon the question. At the same time that the leader of the Opposition had risen, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), rose, too, with a little motion drawn up beforehand, and, by one of these happy and unforeseen accidents, he had succeeded in catching the Speaker's eye just at the right moment. And what had been his aim? To choke off discussion, prevent any amendment, and to oblige the House to vote upon a motion that did not give expression to the real feeling of all the members upon the point at issue. This was not the true constitutional manner of proceeding, although parliamentary subtleties had invented it; it was not a frank or loyal manner, it was not an honest way of discussing the question from a judicial stand-point, as it was now submitted to the House. He did not think that the country would be satisfied, neither would they be the real judge, the judge in last resort, the people; for, after all, it was the people, especially the people of the Province of Quebec, that were to judge this question in an impartial manner and without any partisan spirit. They had an amendment to offer that might have met the views of a good number of members, but they could not now propose it. During the course of the debate he did not believe that there had been any change of convictions on either side. He thought that the members of the Right had come here with their minds made up to ask for Mr. Letellier's head at any price, exactly as it had been seen in an illustrated paper that represented the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) as serving up the head of the Lieutenant-Governor, and offering it to Messrs. Chapleau, Angers and Church. With such a disposition of mind, was it right to have recourse to a subterfuge in order to obtain an expression of opinion from the House? He recognised there the meanness that characterised the Conservative party and that delayed the supplies until now. For his part, he disapproved of the manner in which the discussion was carried on. He would not enter into the merits of the question, it had been settled long ago by Mr. Joly and his Ministers, who had made themselves responsible for this act of the Lieutenant-Governor, and, if there was, in the country, a man capable, by his honour, ability, and his talents, of defending the Lieutenant-Governor, it was Mr. Joly. He did not wish it to be believed that the vote to be given would represent the opinion of the country, or of the Province of Quebec. There had already been a vote given last year. The whole British Empire took an interest, in theory, in the question now raised by the Conservative party. It was on the other side of the Atlantic that it would be finally settled who was right and who was wrong, from a constitutional point of view. They were creating a precedent, and hereafter there would be a precedent that would establish that, when there was a question affecting the public good, the advantages or the fortune of the country, the prerogatives of the Crown might, and should be, made use of to protect these interests. There were upon this subject two extreme opinions—one that reduced the Crown to nothing, and made of it a mere ornament of a true republic, whilst, on the other hand, the Commons of England would be like the Roman Senate in the days of its power; the other opinion would bring back the ancient prerogatives of the Crown still written in the Constitution. For his part, he saw a protecting shield in the Crown. Under grave and difficult circumstances, when the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor was at stake, when he had well-grounded doubts as to the integrity of representatives, when his Ministers had lost his confidence through incapacity or otherwise, it was then that the Lieutenant-Governor was to make use of the Royal prerogative. He maintained that the true constitutional question should be stated in this manner, that this power conferred on the Lieutenant-Governor should remain in a latent state, but that, in grave and solemn cases, he should make use of it as a remedy for the good of the country. In England, it was public opinion that finally settled constitutional questions. Precedents were there appreciated on their merits; it was so, and it should be so in this country. The conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was before the people, the people had judged it, and it was the people who would finally pronounce upon it as a precedent for the future. Mr. Joly and his Ministers were there, they had assumed the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor's act, and they would be either condemned or sustained upon this question. The Postmaster-General (Mr. Langevin), who always had upon his lips a word about religion, had profited by this occasion to remind the House that the Catholic religion was the religion of the majority in the Province of Quebec. He might have dispensed with this remark, and not have drawn attention to a fact that every one was aware of. For he did not hesitate to say that, under a deceitful veil, he had endeavoured, on account of Mr. Joly's religion, to excite religious and national prejudices against him and against the Liberal Government of Quebec.

MR. MOUSSEAU enquired where the member for L'Islet had seen that.

MR. CASGRAIN said that enough of it had been seen in the elections, and that he hoped there would be no more of it in the future. It was true that the Postmaster-General might be converted by his association with the Grand Master of Customs (Mr. Bowell) they were both cut out of the same piece of cloth, a chip off the same block. Being on board the same vessel, they would arrive together either at Rome or at Babylon. At all events, he regretted to be obliged to protest against the Postmaster-General's words, but he did so strongly and fearlessly. He was now ready to vote against the motion as drawn up. He would have preferred an amendment, but, as the other side had seen fit to prevent all amendments, he would have to take things as they were, and protest as he had already protested.

MR. CIMON said that the speech just delivered by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) took him back in spirit to the birth of Rome. This was not surprising, for the hon. member was fond of ransacking by-gone centuries, his origin dated back so far. In the heroic days, the Romans had the habit, on the eve of great events, to consult their oracles. Thus, at eventide, when the sun was sinking in the west, and the shadows of night began to creep over the earth, they turned their eyes heavenwards, in order to see whether they could not there descry vultures or condors, so that they might predict, by the flight of these birds, what was to happen. It was fortunate for the hon. members of the House that they had this evening an oracle that they could consult. The hon. member for L'Islet had predicted what would be the result of the motion now before the House. He had stated that the vote of this House would be without effect, that the question now under discussion would be referred to the Imperial authorities, and that the latter would maintain His Honour Luc Letellier as Lieutenant-Governor. He regretted not being able to repose any confidence in the prophecy of the hon. member, for he could not help believing that the Lieutenant-Governor was an officer of the Federal Government, under the control of this House, and charged with the working of the Constitution in the Province of Quebec, in accordance with true principles, with honesty and honour, and that, when he was recreant to his duty, he was responsible to the authority from which he held his office. He wished to know in what century we were living, and if the representatives of a country that was to become one of the great countries of the world could not watch over their own interests; if they could not say that Mr. Letellier was unworthy to govern the Province of Quebec; if they could not declare that this officer, whom they had appointed and for whose grave conduct they were responsible, had been recreant to his duty, or if they wished he should leave Spencer Wood and go back to his fireside gods. He hoped that they were not tied down to the will of the Imperial Parliament, when it was merely a question of the removal of an officer appointed by the Executive of Canada, and he trusted that the hon. member for L'Islet was not justified in saying that whatever the House might decide to-night would have no consequence. There was one thing that was not to be forgotten, in spite of what the members of the Opposition might say to the contrary, and that was that there was a feeling of great uneasiness in the Province of Quebec. This Province was, to-day, in a very critical position, all public affairs were suspended, and the electors had no confidence in the present Lieutenant-Governor. That man had violated the Constitution, and, what was still worse, he was teaching the people to despise authority. He was a demoralising example for the young generation, with respect to sovereign authority in this country. That was why they wanted to sanction, as a principle, that in this country no one could take the name of Her Majesty in vain. What was now seen at Spencer Wood, the dwelling-place of the Governors of the Province, who had heretofore governed according to the principles of the British Constitution, and who had taught the people to love the British Empire, and to cherish England's Sovereign? They saw there a place of meeting, where the men of the Liberal party organised elections; it was a mere Liberal club. It was from Spencer Wood that came the Liberal organisation, during a late Federal election. Could such a state of things be continued much longer in the Province of Quebec? Several hon. members on the other side of the House had said that they intended to appeal to prejudice among the Catholic and French Canadian population of the Province of Quebec. They had told the House that a dangerous precedent was going to be made, because the interference of the Federal Parliament in Provincial matters was asked for. But he would like to know whether it was a bad precedent to ask for justice; and whether doing justice constituted a threat or a danger? There was no need to fear. The population of the Province of Quebec knew what to think upon this matter,—they would always be happy to learn that the Federal Government had done them justice, even though in doing so there had been interference in Provincial affairs. When enemies of the Province of Quebec—and the worst enemies of this Province were the Liberals of this country—when they unjustly endeavoured to interfere in the local matters of this Province, through the agency of the Federal authority, who had sent a Lieutenant-Governor to Quebec with the special mission of ousting the DeBoucherville Cabinet, it was then that the Liberals, the enemies of popular rights, had made a bad precedent. And it was against this bad precedent that the Conservatives protested now. They wanted to wipe out this dangerous precedent by another that should be in accordance with justice and the Constitution. They now asked for the interference of the Federal authority, but in a constitutional manner and for the protection of the rights of the people. There was no need to fear this precedent, that they wanted to establish as an antidote against the one created previously by the Liberals. What they wanted the House to declare to-night was that the Federal authority should never interfere, even constitutionally, with Provincial affairs, not even through a Lieutenant-Governor. There was no danger for the Province in such a precedent, for it would sanction a principle of justice and constitutional law,—a principle that might be invoked in the future, and it would be a good lesson for all Lieutenant-Governors who might wish to forget their duties.

Mr. CASEY said the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) discussed the question of whether this House had a right to consider such a motion as this, and whether it had a right to discuss it under the present circumstances. His (Mr. Casey's) own opinion was that their right to discuss it at any time, and under any circumstances was extremely doubtful, although he was aware that in this he differed from many gentlemen on his own side of the House. They were all aware that the initiative, in regard to the dismissal of a Lieutenant-Governor, was given by the Constitution to the Cabinet of the day, and that action in the premises should be taken by the Cabinet of the day. Consequently, any discussion in this House, unless with the object of directing the Cabinet to dismiss a Lieutenant-Governor, or of censuring the Cabinet for not dismissing him, was, to say the least of it, of very doubtful constitutionality. He thought that a resolution of censure should not come up in the manner this had. The motion of censure was one most injurious to public interests, and of a kind which the framers of the Constitution intended to prevent. As they had heard from one of the leading gentlemen who framed that Constitution (Mr. Macdougall), it was the intention of the framers of the British North America Act to prevent political discussion of the acts of Lieutenant-Governors, except in the manner indicated by the Act, the initiative being taken by the responsible leaders of the House. Against that, it was argued that Lieutenant-Governors stood in exactly the same relation to this House as Colonial Governors did to the English House of Commons. The parallel was not exact. The English House of Commons was a sovereign body, not bound by any written Constitution; and it had nothing in its own Constitution to prevent either the Cabinet or the Legislative body from taking the initiative in an action of this kind. But under our written Constitution our powers did not exceed those actually given to us, and the Cabinet alone could take the initiative in an action of this kind. But, even granting that the House had a right to discuss this motion, it had no right to discuss it now. The question had been finally settled last year. Mr. Letellier had now undergone, not only three trials, as already pointed out, but four. The present Government, as well as the late one, had considered his case and declined to act, although strongly pressed to do so by their Quebec supporters. The last Parliament considered it and declined to act; the people of Quebec had weighed his act, and had given their verdict in approval of it, by supporting the Cabinet which had assumed the responsibility of it. The motion now before the House was a direct vote of censure on the Government, moved by one of its own supporters.

Why did the Government allow this? To get information? No, for they had that in full already. To have a judicial decision? No, for it was their own duty to make such a decision, and they had evidently decided, since they refused to take action. It could only be to find out how far the bulk of their supporters from the other Provinces were willing to agree to the action demanded by their friends from Quebec, that they might shelter themselves behind the apparent sanction which their party, as a whole, might give, if they afterwards granted those demands. As to this question having had any influence in the elections, they all knew that it was most assuredly not the main issue, or an important point even, in Ontario or the Maritime Provinces. What carried the elections was the National Policy promised by the Conservatives; and now the Government intended to use the majority so gained to pander to the vengeance and personal ends of their Quebec supporters. This would form a precedent of a most unwholesome and dangerous nature. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon) had charged members of the Opposition with trying to raise prejudices against the French-Catholic population of Quebec. No accusation was more unfounded. The Opposition had argued against the course of Quebec Conservatives, which was a very different thing. The latter would necessarily raise prejudices against themselves by their course. He warned the Conservatives of Ontario of the consequences of voting for this motion. If these gentlemen, returned to some extent by those who usually voted Reform, to support a Protection policy, prostituted their power for the purpose of assisting this petty persecution, they would have to look to a severe reckoning at the next general elections. It had been held by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) that, if they had a right to try the case last year, they had so now. This was fallacious. If they had that right then, their decision at that time was final, since their functions in this matter were judicial and not legislative. If they had it not then, they could not try it now. Gentlemen opposite might take either horn of the dilemma, and find that whichever they took would prove their inability to censure Mr. Letellier. He protested, too, against the attempt to choke off amendments by moving the previous question. The same thing was effected last Session by moving in amendment to Committee of Supply. Freedom of amendment was the only way of securing the real opinion of the House. Gentlemen opposite were now, as last year, afraid of that opinion, but without the same excuse, as they now had an overwhelming majority.

MR. BRECKEN said he thought that nearly everything that could be said on this subject had already been urged. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who had just sat down, had talked about gentlemen on this side of the House being drilled. He (Mr. Brecken) had not seen anything of the drill-sergeant since he came into the House; but he thought that, if supporting a cause without advancing an argument in its favour was an evidence of being drilled, the hon. gentleman, who had just taken his seat, must have been very recently in the company of the drill-sergeant. He had listened, with a great deal of pleasure, to the speech which was delivered by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier); he had more than pleased him, he had charmed, but not convinced him; and, while he (Mr. Brecken) was listening to him, he had almost forgotten that the hon. gentleman was opposed to him. He (Mr. Laurier) had thrown out a warning to this House to deal carefully with this case. He (Mr. Brecken) could hardly understand from the speeches delivered by hon. members on the other side of the House whether in their opinion they had or had not the right to discuss this question. It appeared that, under the 59th clause of the British North America Act, a Lieutenant-Governor might be removed by the Governor-General in Council for cause assigned. He could hardly imagine that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was in earnest when he stated that the cause to be assigned could only be applied to a personal offence and not to a political one, and that this House was not free to act with regard to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He (Mr. Brecken) had lived in a country which, in former days, had tyrannical Governors, and the representatives of the people had had a little experience in opening and carrying on negotiations with the Colonial Office. They had occasion, more than once, to send delegates to England at considerable expense and great trouble, to have their grievances redressed; and, much as they deferred to and respected the Mother Country and British statesmanship, they had always looked forward to the time when they would have such a tribunal as that now afforded them in the body of men in the House of Commons, representing the whole of British North America, to which to refer such cases. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was appointed by the Cabinet of the Dominion, which was only a Committee of this House. If this House had not the power of discussing such cases as that now before them, and where the facts of the case justified them in coming to a resolution censuring the Lieutenant-Governor, they were not entitled, were not qualified, were not educated up to the point, to fit them to enjoy responsible government, an admission he felt sure hon. members on the Opposition side were not prepared to make. The members of the Government were the servants of the people, who, through the electorate of the Dominion of Canada, appointed them to office. The Government of Quebec were also responsible directly to the people, but the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was the servant of this Parliament, and hon. members on the other side of the House, who called themselves Liberals, could say that this House had no right to decide whether or not the conduct of Mr. Letellier, their servant, was constitutional or not. His hon. friend from Quebec East, when he stated the term "Cause" applied to personal charges, and not to political, did not sufficiently consider the charges made against the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. He (Mr. Brecken) did not agree in that opinion, and that was the only kind of argument put forward by hon. members on the other side of the House. One point, and to his (Mr. Brecken's) mind, one which had not been raised by previous speakers, was that Mr. Letellier had placed himself in a position of personal antagonism to the views of a large and influential portion of the people of Quebec, led by a party of very distinguished statesmen in that Province. An election might be held there in six months hence, and, judging from present appearances, it was not at all improbable, and the men whom the Lieutenant-Governor of that Province had, as he (Mr. Brecken) contended, unconstitutionally dismissed, might be returned as the constitutional advisers of His Honour, and he would be bound to accept them. Governor Letellier had, by the course he had pursued, greatly impaired, if not altogether destroyed, his usefulness as the head of the Executive of the Province of Quebec. If there was any advice which the Colonial Office had always impressed on Governors, it was that they should neither know friends nor enemies among the public men with whom they had to deal. What would be the position of Mr. Letellier when he found himself in such open hostility to men who were not at all unlikely to be again called upon to advise him? He would quote an extract from the speech of Mr. Cardwell, as reported in English Hansard, Vol. 182, page 621, in the case of Sir Charles Darling, Governor of Victoria, in reply to an hon. member of the British House of Commons, asking that certain papers be brought down, relative to a dispute between the two Houses of the Legislature in the Colony of Victoria, concerning the Appropriation Bill, 1865. Mr. Cardwell said:—

“It appeared to him that the proposal he (Sir Charles Darling) conveyed to him, that the members of the former Executive Council should be deprived of the distinction they enjoyed, because they presented a petition to their Sovereign praying for redress of grievances, which he (Mr. Cardwell) thought they were justly entitled to do, was couched in terms which rendered it impossible that the Governor who employed that language and adopted that course should be a safe guide to the colony, or an impartial arbitrator of differences in the circumstances in which the colony was placed.”

He desired, for one moment, to apply that principle to the case of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. Could Mr. Letellier, in the future political contests in Quebec, act as an impartial arbitrator between the contending parties? No. He might safely assert that every charge that had been made by Governor Letellier had been satisfactorily answered by Mr.

MR. BRECKEN.

DeBoucherville, ex-Premier of Quebec. He had no feeling in the matter, and it appeared to him that those ex post facto reasons which had been advanced had vanished into thin air. He had an advantage over many hon. members of approaching this matter as an entire stranger and without prejudice, and it struck him that Governor Letellier was a partisan, and as soon as he became a partisan he ran counter to the advice that had always emanated from the Colonial Office, that a Provincial Governor must have no friend and no opponent, and he must so act as to be in a position to associate on the most friendly and cordial terms with the statesmen of the Province over which he was placed, and by whom the people surrounded him. Had the Lieutenant-Governor acted up to this? He did not exactly understand the hon. member who had preceded him, and who had stated that under the 59th clause the right of dismissal was given to the Executive, while it was not given to the House, and, therefore, it was irregular for them to discuss it. He held that Lieutenant-Governors were servants of the House, and that the Cabinet occupied the same position to the House as the House did to the people. As far as he himself was concerned, he could see no difference between discussing the question now and discussing it after the Government had taken action upon it. Some hon. member had said, “Are you going to strip Governors of all their functions and duties; are they to be mere figure-heads?” That question had been answered by the hon. member for Frontenac, who pointed out what were the legitimate duties and functions of Lieutenant-Governors, but he (Mr. Brecken) would say, better, far better, that Lieutenant-Governors should be figure heads, than that they should be allowed to undermine the principles of self-government, principles that they all prized, and that they would struggle to maintain, as did the people of Quebec to secure. The hon. member for South Huron, though he attempted to lecture the Ministerial side of the House, had offered no arguments for his views. He made a number of straggling remarks, but no single point. In voting for the motion, he believed he would be aiding the people of Quebec to obtain a tribunal whose voice was the voice of power, and which should be enabled to put the offending Lieutenant-Governor in his proper place. He should not have identified himself with one party or the other, but have held the scales of justice impartially, and kept the mirror so bright and free from the dust of partisanship, as to reflect truly the voices of the majority of the people, and have them clearly and distinctly made manifest.

MR. ANGLIN said they had sat three afternoons and evenings discussing this important question, and yet, for such of them as did not enjoy the confidence of the Government, it was exceedingly difficult to know what they were called on to do. The resolution was so vague and indefinite in its terms that they were compelled, in order to ascertain the meaning of this whole movement, to rely upon the observations made for some days past. A formal complaint had been lodged against Mr. Letellier—not by the people of Quebec, or any considerable portion of them, but by three gentlemen whom he had turned out of office, and who naturally wanted to get back. A long statement of what they alleged to be facts they concluded by declaring as follows:—

“Wherefore, the violation of the principles of responsible government committed by the Lieutenant-Governor, and his actions as above represented, are of a nature to imperil the peace and prosperity of the Dominion of Canada, and to bring into disrespect the dignity of the Crown, and should be dealt with under the authority granted the hon. the Privy Council of Canada, by the 59th Section of the British North America Act, 1867.

“And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

This was followed, in the papers submitted to the House, by Mr. Letellier's answer, to which the original petitioners replied in December last. Three months had since passed. The House had not been told, authoritatively, whether the Government had ever acted in this matter or not. It was to be presumed they made no decision upon it up to the day the papers were brought down. It would have been quite competent for them to have come to some decision since. He did not think they were treating this House with proper respect when, during three days' debate, they sat in profound silence, and never deigned to inform the House what their views or intentions were, or what action they would take should that resolution be passed. It was due to the House that some statement of their views and policy should be made before the vote. The Postmaster-General alone broke the profound silence, but, though he had talked much of the British flag, and of other irrelevant matters, he uttered not a word that would indicate the policy of the Government on this important question. Not only had Ministers maintained silence, but they had stifled debate, placing shackles upon it by means of an amendment moved by one of their followers, which was known as the previous question. They had in this proceeding departed from the usage of the British House of Commons where the previous question was employed, not to hamper members or impede the action of the House, but to avoid voting on a question in which it was not prepared to vote on. The hon. gentlemen opposite, who caused this amendment to be proposed, must understand its nature, and, therefore, some might suppose that they intended by it to get rid of this question altogether. Rumour had said, for many days, that they were very anxious to get rid of it. The hon. mover of the amendment, who had told them it was not calculated to prevent discussion, should know it would prevent any member moving an amendment expressing the sense of the House as to the subject under consideration, and at the division he would find himself voting against his own motion. The object sought by those who caused this amendment to be moved was to prevent other amendments from either side of the House. Curiously, the main motion was precisely the same as that moved by the hon. Premier last year. Why did the mover resort to the very extraordinary course of submitting such a motion? He (Mr. Anglin), at first, suspected that it was to coerce the leader of the Government into supporting it, and he hoped to have voted with the Government against this motion. With regard to the personalities introduced into this debate, the hon. member for Cardwell

(Mr. White) was the first to introduce them in an attack upon the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) which was not called for. The hon. member for Shefford then warned him that he was treading on rather dangerous ground in attacking so able a man, and questioned his right to speak for Quebec, where he had never been able to find a constituency. That could scarcely be called a personal attack, and could not be held to justify the extraordinary series of attacks since made on the member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). The member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and other hon. members on that side resorted to those attacks, it would seem, with the object of diverting attention from the real question into side channels, and, by personal and sectional appeals, influencing the vote. Those gentlemen also charged that the religion of the majority of the people of Quebec had been insulted by the members on the Liberal side. He (Mr. Anglin) had not heard a word offensive to the religious feelings of any hon. member on either side uttered by the member for Shefford; but he did hear attempts on the Ministerial side to revive old animosities and provoke sectarian hostilities. The member for Lincoln, in his attack on the member for Halton, was the first to make an attempt of this kind, recalling something he was reported to have said twenty-five years ago, when he had, no doubt, less experience than he had to-day, and was not, perhaps, so liberal and fair. There was much to provoke some observations of that character, as they had the extraordinary spectacle presented by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), from the Province of Quebec, moving this resolution, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), said to be an Orangeman, who represented an Orange constituency, seconding it. If any attempt had been made to stir up sectional feelings, it had been made by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The Opposition had been charged, over and over again, by the other side of the House, especially by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), with not having dared to defend the conduct of Mr. Letellier. He (Mr. White), invited the House to enquire into the whole Quebec elections, in order that it might be able to judge how Mr. Letellier's dismissal of his Ministry should be regarded, and find out how each individual constituency was manipulated, and ascertain by what means the Joly Government had succeeded in obtaining a majority; to enquire into the position of every hon. gentleman elected at that time, and to discover whether he was elected as a Conservative or a Liberal, and he sought to persuade the House that the most foul practices had been resorted to on the part of Mr. Joly and his friends. To enter upon enquiries of that kind would not only be foreign to this subject, and essentially improper, but would involve this House in endless labour. They had only to take the results of the whole election, to judge of the decision of the Province of Quebec as expressed at the polls in that election. It had been asserted, by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that hon. members on the Opposition benches refused to say a word in defence of Mr. Letellier. They considered that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, they had no right to interfere, in any way, between the Lieutenant-Governor, acting through the Joly Government, and the people of Quebec. The action of the Lieutenant-Governor had been characterised as tyranny, but an appeal to the judgment of the people at the polls could not be properly called an act of tyranny. The member for Queen's, P. E. I., (Mr. Brecken) said that the documents submitted to the House proved the charges made against the Lieutenant-Governor, but he (Mr. Anglin) thought that the charges were not so proved. Mr. Letellier denied that he had signed the proclamations that had been issued by the gentleman making these charges, and, although that alone was, perhaps, not a sufficient ground for his action in dismissing his Ministry, yet it was unquestionably a serious offence. Although Mr. Letellier had been charged with falsehood, there was absolutely nothing in the documents which had been produced to sustain that statement. The hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I., (Mr. Brecken) asked what would happen if another election took place in the Province of Quebec, and the people decided that the late advisers of the

MR. ANGLIN.

Lieutenant-Governor should be again the advisers of Mr. Letellier, and said it would be for him a most unpleasant circumstance. If those gentlemen were restored to office, they would scarcely treat the Lieutenant-Governor with greater disrespect than they had repeatedly shown him while they were members of his Cabinet. If they got along at all together, it was because of the kindness and forbearance of the Lieutenant-Governor. It was a matter of notoriety that the Lieutenant-Governor invited one of those gentlemen to dine with him, and he refused on political and partisan grounds, and that, when the city of Quebec gave a dinner to Lord Dufferin, they refused to attend the banquet, because, forsooth, "The Dominion Government" was to be among the toasts, and they published their reasons, so that the world should know what thorough-going partisans they were. The hon. the Postmaster-General said that the Lieutenant-Governor, from time to time, took memoranda of everything that passed between him and his Government. It was clear that he felt that he was on dangerous ground, and that it was necessary to take the greatest precautions to protect himself from misrepresentation of what he said and did at those interviews. The Postmaster-General complained that the Lieutenant-Governor sought thus to accumulate evidence against his advisers, when he should have taken objection at once to anything of which he did not approve. But it was easy to understand that the Lieutenant Governor was unwilling to come to a rupture with his Ministry when he could possibly avoid it, and, if they looked at the letter Her Majesty wrote at the time of the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, they would find that Her Majesty acted in a very similar manner. She complained, in that letter, of the various acts of which she had so often and so long had reason to complain. Now, the insults offered to the Lieutenant-Governor appeared to have been very numerous, and offered day after day, as if his Ministers took a pleasure in proving to the Lieutenant-Governor that they had no respect for him. An attempt had been made by the hon. member for Cardwell to prove, what a great many others had asserted, that, with regard to the railroad measure, the Lieutenant - Governor authorised the introduction of that measure, because, forsooth, when the Ministers applied for authority to introduce financial measures, he sent such authorisation. It would be absurd to hold that, by the telegram so sent, he had authorised the introduction of this very extraordinary measure, which would have enabled them to set aside the Judiciary of the Province altogether, and deprive the people of the protection of the Judiciary secured to them from the days of Magna Charta, and enable the Executive of the Province to take these municipalities by the throat, as one of the Ministers said, and force them to pay money which they believed they were not bound in equity or in law to pay. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, in the exercise of his discretion, when he found that this measure was likely to become law, came to the conclusion that it was his duty, for the protection of the people of Quebec and their rights, to exercise the prerogative with which he believed himself to be invested, and to dismiss these Ministers, form another Ministry, and appeal to the people of Quebec, in order that they might say for themselves whether they were willing that such laws should be passed. This was called tyranny. It was a strange kind of tyranny. The whole thing had been fairly and properly submitted to the people. It was quite true the people did not directly pass judgment upon the Lieutenant-Governor; but they did directly pass judgment upon the Joly Government, who had constitutionally assumed the whole responsibility for the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor, and had asked the people to judge whether they should be sustained or not. They put their case freely and fairly before the people. They thought the Governor did perfectly right in not permitting these laws to be passed in not permitting the DeBoucherville Government to seize the municipalities by the throat. They came thus before the people of Quebec and asked them, the only constitutional judges, the ultimate court of appeal in the case, to determine whether in this they were right or wrong, in having thus assumed the responsibility of the act of the Lieutenant-Governor.

They all knew that the Province of Quebec had been, for many years past, owing to a number of unfortunate circumstances, almost thoroughly Conservative. In the first Parliament of Canada, the Liberal party could muster only fifteen members from the Province of Quebec. Five years afterwards, they managed to increase the number to eighteen. In 1874, under the influences of the Scandal, to which it was not necessary now to refer more particularly, the number increased to thirty-two; but the number fell off again. Those influences having grown weak in that, as in other Provinces, and other causes coming into operation, the number of Liberal members declined to seventeen. In the Local Parliament, a similar state of things existed. In 1867, the whole of the Opposition numbered only twelve; five years later, it numbered only seventeen. In 1875, it only numbered twenty. But, in 1878, when Mr. Joly accepted the responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor's act, thirty-three, or, as the Postmaster-General asserted, thirty-one of the sixty-five members were elected to support him; and if the result was further analysed, it would be found that, in a great many constituencies, the majorities of the Conservative party were very small indeed; so that very much more than half the voters of the whole Province of Quebec pronounced in favour of the Joly Government, and acquitted them of that responsibility which they had assumed on entering office. The people of Quebec were the ultimate court of appeal in all matters affecting their own Province only. Hon. gentlemen opposite said: Oh, no; Mr. Letellier's conduct was lost sight of altogether in that election last May, but, on the 17th of September, the people returned to their senses, and then they elected some forty-eight members to this House to pass judgment on Mr. Letellier. Did hon. members opposite really expect people to believe that this act of Mr. Letellier was the motive-power, the great influence that swayed the people of Quebec on the 17th of September last? Were they not all aware that in that Province the policy of Protection had taken deepest root, and that to this alone was the Conservative victory there attributable? and hon. gentlemen had no right, because they were in majority, to speak for the Province of Quebec in this matter. Quebec had settled that in her own way, and had not sent her representatives here to re-open it, but to assist in framing a protective policy. He was not one of those who contended that this Parliament had no right, under any circumstances, to meddle in the affairs of the Provinces. He, some years ago, had claimed the protection of Parliament for the Catholic minority in his Province, and he would, to-morrow, join with the Protestant minority in Quebec in calling for the interference of this House, should such interference be necessary to protect their rights. He was not one of those who contended that they should not, under any circumstances, take into consideration the conduct of Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces. It should, however, always be borne in mind, that, as the prerogative of dismissing a Ministry and dissolving a Parliament should only be exercised in an extreme case, so their interference with the Provincial Legislatures or Lieutenant-Governors should take place only in extreme emergencies. Had such emergency arisen in this case? It was only a year since these elections were held. The Joly Government had since held the general elections, met the Legislature, obtained supplies, and passed the laws they thought necessary. They had continued to manage the affairs of the Province to the great satisfaction of the great majority of the people. What had occurred within the year to justify this extraordinary action now proposed? The charge against Mr. Letellier had been submitted to the Governor-General in Council; and, in matters of this kind, the Executive was always one; and, whether it was Tory or Liberal, the action of the Executive in matters of this kind should be final. This matter was also submitted to Parliament, and Parliament decided that it ought not to interfere when the people of Quebec had the means of settling this question for themselves. Hon. members opposite contended that, because the House said "No" to the resolution proposed last Session, it was not to be held as having passed upon this question at all. He did not believe that the right hon. the Premier would venture to propound so extraordinary a doctrine.

He had not intimated to the House what his views on this question were, or that it was with his approval this resolution was introduced. It was much to be regretted that he had not taken the House into his confidence, and let them know what his policy was. The Government could not avoid the responsibility of this motion. While it was true that this House had a right to discuss the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, yet there were modes of proceeding which ought to be observed. This was a very improper mode of proceeding. The British North America Act distinctly imposed on the Executive the duty of dealing with Lieutenant-Governors who committed any offences. It was for them, in the first instance, to judge of the nature and gravity of such offences, and to dismiss the offenders if they thought proper, and then come down to this House and state the reasons why they had dismissed them. When that report was presented to the House, it would be open to any member to take action on it. The resolution ought distinctly to affirm something more than it did, so that the House might know exactly what its effect would be. He had endeavoured to ascertain what were the intentions of the Government, from the speech of the hon. the Postmaster-General. The hon. gentleman spoke repeatedly of the necessity of passing a vote of censure on the Lieutenant-Governor, but did not go beyond that. Would that censure involve dismissal? Of course, the hon. gentleman would not answer. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) defended the conduct of the Government, and said that they were pursuing a strictly constitutional course in maintaining profound silence, in leaving the matter entirely to the House, and then he intimated that, if this resolution passed, it would be for the Government to inflict punishment. The only punishment that could be inflicted was the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor. Would it not have been fair and manly on the part of the Government to have declared their intentions? The resolution should declare—to be complete—that the Lieutenant-Governor was guilty of conduct which, in the opinion of this House, required that he should be immediately dismissed. Had it not occurred to hon.

gentlemen that there was a parallel between the conduct of those 48 hon. members from the Province of Quebec who, they were told, were sent here to insist upon the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the conduct of another set of men in France. Marshal MacMahon believed that his Government did not represent the feeling of the country, and having had occasion to disapprove of their conduct, because they had deliberately deceived him, as he alleged, he dismissed them and called in another Government. Then, proceeding in a perfectly constitutional manner, as did Mr. Letellier, Marshal MacMahon, having received the assent of the Senate, as the Constitution required, dissolved the House of Representatives, and went to the country. The DeBroglie Ministry resorted to all the means usually employed at elections in France to obtain a majority. Their opponents asserted that this action of Marshal MacMahon was a revolutionary movement, that he desired to put men in power who were inimical to the Republic. That Ministry was defeated, and resigned, and the Republicans came into power. They knew how the Left grew so strong both in the Upper and Lower Houses that they were able to force upon Marshal MacMahon a Ministry very obnoxious to him, and there came a time when he would not assent to the measures they proposed, and he resigned. The extreme Republican party, not content with driving him out of office, were now endeavouring to have the DeBroglie Ministry impeached, and the chances seemed to be that they would succeed. Did the members for Quebec, and especially the younger members, ever stop to think that there was a wonderful similitude between the conduct of the Left in France and their own conduct in attempting to obtain the removal of Mr. Letellier? He was sure that they looked with strong disapproval upon the conduct of the Left in France. Perhaps they were strong Monarchists, and would like to see the success of any attempt to secure the downfall of the Republic, but they found them here to-day pursuing with as bitter a hatred, a man whose only fault was that of differing with their party as to the proper course to be pursued in the Government of their Province, and who thought fit to change his Ministry, and appeal to the people as MacMahon appealed to the people of France. It was said, moreover, that Gambetta, the leader of the French Left, was very much opposed to this attempt at impeachment, and was doing all he could to discourage it. Was there no similarity between his conduct, in that matter, and that of the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government? It had been said that the right hon. gentleman was opposed to this attack on Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, and that he would have very much preferred that it had not been made. But he yielded, as Gambetta had yielded. Perhaps this comparison might be very offensive to hon. gentlemen opposite—although he certainly did not intend it to be such—and it was, doubtless, painful to their feelings to be compared to the followers of Gambetta. Those hon. gentlemen were sometimes called Ultramontanes. As that word had come to be synonymous with Catholic, he hoped they were—and they, doubtless, considered it a very gross insult to be compared with the followers of Gambetta, and to have their course compared with that of the extreme men in the Chamber of Deputies—the Communists, the Socialists, the enemies of religion. He made this comparison simply to place, in as strong a light as possible, the true character and tendency of their conduct. They were now flushed with victory, and were full of the idea that it was their duty to their Province, or, at all events, their duty to their party, to get rid of this Mr. Letellier, at any cost. They would run all risks in order to punish him, in order to teach him a lesson, and all future Lieutenant-Governors a lesson—a salutary lesson, it might be; but he still thought the course they were taking was fraught with great danger to themselves. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), in a very able and powerful speech, had warned the members from the Province of Quebec of the danger they would incur, of the peril in which they were placing their cherished institutions, by the course they were now taking. The hon. member for Cardwell sneered at that warning, and said that the exordium of his speech was an advice, and the peroration a warning. Both advice and warning were wholesome and salutary; and, if he (Mr. Anglin) might be allowed, in his turn, to advise the members from the Province of Quebec, he would join heartily in both the exordium and the peroration. He believed the course they were taking was fraught with the greatest possible danger to the autonomy of their Province, and to the autonomy of all the smaller Provinces. If this resolution passed, the Lieutenant-Governors, instead of being independent heads of the Provincial Governments, acting on their own judgment and discretion, would be henceforth mere satraps and subordinates of the party who happened to be in power in the Dominion. The Conservative party were in power to-day, the Liberal party would be in power to-morrow. He believed that the liberties of the people of Quebec, under the Constitution, their autonomy and their peculiar institutions, would be perfectly safe in the hands of the Liberal party. But anybody who knew the country well must know that there was an increasing danger that a party would arise in it, neither Liberal nor Conservative, which would pay very little regard indeed to the desires of the Province of Quebec. Let him say to his friends of that Province that he knew there was in the Maritime Provinces a widespread and growing feeling in favour of Legislative Union. He judged, from what his hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had said, that there was reason to apprehend that a similar feeling was growing in Ontario. All the English Provinces were growing very rapidly in population, and the strength of the people in the Province of Quebec was becoming proportionately less. Could they not see for themselves how great a danger they ran when they did anything whatever to affect in the slightest degree the independence of their local Government, either in the person of their Lieutenant-Governor or of his Council, or of their Legislature? While he was of a different race from the people of Quebec, he was not, as others had said of themselves, of a different religion, and he sympathised entirely with them in their struggles for the maintenance of their peculiar institutions. The whole Catholic population of this country looked to the Province of Quebec as the great centre around which they might gather, and to which they might look for aid in the maintenance of their rights and liberties, if, at any time, these were in danger. He admired their institutions almost as much as they did themselves, and, for that reason, he spoke to them thus plainly on this subject. If this motion were carried, it would strike a deadly blow at the independence of the Province of Quebec, and he implored them to give this matter further, calmer, and more deliberate consideration. He was afraid that they disregarded their dearest interests in order to gratify a very natural feeling of partisanship. Let them not invoke such an attack as this which, if successful, would make of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province a mere slave and tool of the Federal Government. He knew he was one of those who invoked the interference of this House in another matter. He did so under a strong conviction of duty, because he believed the minority in his own Province was oppressed. That application, however, was essentially different from the present, because in that case the Federal Government had imposed upon it by the British North America Act the duty of guaranteeing those very rights and privileges which he asked it to guard. But, in the present case, there was simply a question as to the mode of determining what the liabilities of some municipalities were, upon which the Lieutenant-Governor differed with his advisers. He was satisfied that, in the ordinary political struggles of party against party in a Province, if the interference of the Dominion Parliament was to be invoked by one party or the other, and Parliament was to respond to that appeal and a Lieutenant-Governor was to be disgraced because he differed with the predominant party, such action would strike a fatal blow at the independence of the Province.

MR. COSTIGAN said he did not intend to enter on the constitutional question. The speeches of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in English, and of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), in French, had sufficiently established their case. He

(Mr. Costigan) wished to turn from the serious aspect of the question to an aspect of it that was of an amusing nature. He congratulated the House that the seal of silence had at last been removed from the lips of the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat (Mr. Anglin), and that he had been able to deliver himself of the very singular speech they had just heard. It was well that, in an assembly like this, there should be a gentleman of his ability to guard this House against the dangers that sometimes arose in mixed communities. They saw how well he could guard them, though some might think that there was a little feeling in the manner in which he had mentioned the name of the hon. member for Simcoe, when he believed that he had found in that gentleman an Orangeman, the burst of indignation that came from his lips when he made that mistake—for he (Mr. Costigan) was not aware that the hon. gentleman from Simcoe belonged to that society; but, if he did, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) lead this House to believe that it was something to excite his horror? If members of the House would look into the newspaper of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin), they would find that he expressed opinions but little more prudent than those in his speeches. In his paper he made it a crime for him (Mr. Costigan), because he supported Mr. John White. Would anyone believe that the gentleman who made this a crime for him (Mr. Costigan) was first returned to Parliament by the aid of the votes of the Orangemen of his county? Would the House believe that he (Mr. Costigan) had been held up to ridicule in his native Province by the Freeman, for the support he had given Mr. White in East Hastings, when the hon. gentleman from Gloucester himself could not have been elected in the county of St. John without the aid of the vote that he got from the Orangemen? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) who owed his position to the aid of Orangemen, whom he now held up to ridicule, when he could no longer make use of them, might well leave him (Mr. Costigan) in the enjoyment of his liberty to vote for or against a man, were he Protestant, or Orangeman, or Catholic. It was true he had gone into a constituency to work in favour of the hon. gentleman (Mr. White), in whose liberality he had confidence. Did the hon. gentleman from Gloucester ever go that far? He thought he did. When it was necessary for him to seek the Orange vote in the county of St. John to secure his election, he went down to the Orange Lodge at Piserinco and stood upon the platform, under the Orange banner and King William, and asked them to give him their votes. Who was his friend and associate at that time? In order to make his ticket a strong one, Mr. Coran, known there as King Coran, leader of the Orangemen, was taken on to the ticket as representing the Orange body, while the hon. gentleman himself represented the Irish Catholic element in the county of St. John. The Irish Catholics warmly supported the hon. gentleman, and voted for his Orange friend, and the result of the coalition was that the ticket was elected, and harmony established between the Orangemen and Catholics of St. John. In the face of these facts, he (Mr. Anglin) should not complain of any member of this House, or of any man in the country, using his rights as a British subject to speak or vote for any man he pleased. Coming to the discussion of the question at issue, he would not advise a stranger to take his opinion of constitutional laws from the hon. gentlemen opposite, because they had a habit of always interpreting constitutional law to their own exclusive advantage. Take the New Brunswick School question as a test of their constitutional opinion. When the question was first moved here, those hon. gentlemen warned Quebec, and they warned all the Provinces, of the danger of asking the Federal Parliament to interfere in local Provincial affairs. What did they do in 1872? He had always voted the same way, but hon. gentlemen opposite had not. In that year, the prominent gentlemen on that side advised his Excellency to disallow the New Brunswick School Law—that was pretty well for gentlemen who argued now that this Parliament should not interfere in this Quebec question. The amendment was moved by Mr. Dorion, expressing regret that His Excellency had not been advised to disallow that law. He (Mr. Costigan) voted for that motion, and was consistent to-day in supporting the present one (Mr. Mousseau's). In 1873 a motion, involving the same principle of disallowance, was proposed, and he did not know that there was a Liberal in this House who did not support it with his vote. He had decided to support this motion, to do what the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) in opposing it professed to desire—maintain the rights of Quebec and protect them against interference from this Parliament. The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was wrong and deserved censure. In censuring him, would they be condemning a single act performed by him in his Provincial capacity? They were discussing his conduct as a Federal officer not responsible to the Legislature of Quebec, and a question having nothing to do with it. How did this motion touch the Government of Quebec, to excite sympathy for which, the late Postmaster-General made one of his characteristic appeals, or injure any political party? It only reached the Lieutenant-Governor. If the motion passed, would it hurt or affect the Joly Government?

MR. HUNTINGTON: Not a bit.

MR. COSTIGAN said he believed it would not. Amiable and personally popular as Mr. Joly had been, if he could not govern the Province of Quebec without the aid of a partisan Governor, then he should not govern at all. The cry that this motion would endanger the institutions of Quebec was the old one, which he had always opposed. It was used when the school question was before this House. The rights and privileges of the people of Quebec were protected by something stronger than the Constitution itself. That people were so well qualified to win and retain the esteem of the other peoples of this country that their rights would always be safe with the majority. They were told the representatives of Quebec had no right to discuss this question; but it was discussed and voted upon last year. They would notice this remarkable fact, in looking at the Journals of last year, that every gentleman who voted to sustain Mr. Letellier last year, with only a few exceptions, was now staying at home, and that those who stood up for constitutional government and the rights of Quebec were sent to Parliament again. They were told, also, there was no use in the hon. gentlemen from Quebec claiming that they were elected to condemn the coup d'état. Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side approved of the course taken by Mr. Letellier. Now, he would ask, as a matter of fair play and common sense, if forty-eight gentlemen, representing independent constituencies in the Province of Quebec came here to this Parliament, they had not as good a right to carry out the views of their constituents as the seventeen or eighteen elected on the other side, in support of the other side of the question. They might be excused if they paid a little attention to the views expressed by the majority of that Province. He found a great many public men changed their views. It was very singular how these changes occurred, and there must be something which caused this particular change of position. In the Province of New Brunswick, when he was a very young member, during the first few years he was in Parliament there, they tried the very question they were trying now. It was true the Governor of that country did not commit the crime, constitutionally speaking, that had been charged against the Governor of Quebec. Thirteen years ago he raised his voice and gave his vote with the hon. gentleman opposite him, the member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), and the hon. gentleman who so ably represented the county of Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). Thirteen years ago they voted together on this principle—

SIR A. J. SMITH: And lost.

MR. COSTIGAN said that did not change the principle. The principle was one worth fighting for. The hon. gentleman was Premier of that Government, and, if they had heard him appeal to the House and the country at that time, they would have expected a stronger appeal to-night. The hon. gentleman was removed from that honourable position. He would not refer to the cause of his removal. He would not do the hon. gentleman the injustice of saying that he was particularly affected by losing his position. No, he believed the hon. gentleman cared as little about the position as most public gentlemen at that time in their Province did. It affected his self-esteem, perhaps. However, from whatever cause, it affected him pretty seriously, and he made a strong appeal to the House on the ground that the Governor had no right to force the Ministry to resign while they had a majority at their back. In making this comparison, he did not make it in justification of Governor Gordon, nor with a view of finding fault with hon. gentlemen who stood with him (Mr. Costigan) on this question. In that case, His Excellency Governor Gordon at that time, governed New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith) was Premier of that Government, which he (Mr. Costigan) supported. The Governor received an Address from the Legislative Council, which fact showed that the Legislative Council was with the Governor, a very different case from the Government of Governor Letellier in Quebec. One branch presented him with an Address on the question of Confederation. He received that Address without consulting his advisers. They complained of this, and he gave as his reason, that an accident prevented him. Hon. gentlemen pleaded that Governor Letellier could only be guilty of having committed a mistake. In Governor Gordon's case, the hon. member for Westmoreland declared it was not right to talk about mistakes while the rights of the people were being trampled upon.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Governor Gordon was not dismissed.

MR. COSTIGAN said they would consider, first, how far he deserved dismissal. The hon. gentleman knew exactly how much the people had to do with the question at that time. In this case, they had the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick acting in concert with the Legislative Council. The Governor was acting apparently consistently, because the papers connected with Confederation were promised to the House. The hon. gentleman would remember that some of his own supporters found fault on that account. They claimed that the Governor should be dismissed because he acted against the advice of his constitutional advisers while they had a majority of the House, although they had not a majority of the Legislative Council. Besides that, Governor Gordon could do what Governor Letellier could not do. Governor Gordon could say that he was looking beyond and above Provincial politics, that he was carrying out an Imperial policy, and that, as an Imperial officer, he was studying the interests of the nation. Was there anything like this that could be urged in defence of the Governor of Quebec? There was no cause in his case unless it was a political cause, to wrest the power from the majority and place it in the hands of a minority. When the consequences of that act were canvassed in Ottawa, they said: "Oh! it's all right, he was sent there to do a work, and he did it well." They were warned, in the next place, of the great danger of establishing a precedent. Gentlemen opposite said they should not establish a precedent. He, however, maintained that they must establish one. The only question they had to decide was which of two they would establish. Would they take the precedent hon. gentlemen wished to establish, that, knowing the policy of the party governing that Province was antagonistic or inconvenient to the Federal power, all they had to do was to send a partisan Governor to take charge of that Province and wrest the power from the people? This was the precedent hon. gentlemen opposite wished to establish, and it was one, as stated before, that might be found very convenient in other Provinces besides that of Quebec. There might be a change in the Province of Ontario in the election about to take place. Suppose a change took place in Ontario, and supposing that this precedent was established, could they, even in Ontario, have any confidence in the Governor of that Province? If the Conservatives of Ontario succeeded in returning to their Parliament a Conservative majority, was there any guarantee that, with this precedent before them, any Governor, sympathising with those gentlemen as the Governor of Quebec sympathised with the Rouge party there, was there any guarantee that a coup d'état might not be brought about? Besides these constitutional arguments, they had had other kinds of arguments. He did not see the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his place, who had brought a very strange argument into this debate. He (Mr. Cameron) had tried to make a parallel case between the present constitutional question and the losing of the Parliament in Ireland. He (Mr. Costigan) supposed it was sympathy that that hon. gentleman felt toward the people who lost their Parliament at that time. He did not know that the hon. gentleman was an Irishman, or of Irish descent; he rather thought he was a Scotchman from Ireland. His impression was that the cause of Ireland losing her Parliament was that there was a Letellier somewhere. So long as they had the benefit of the able arguments of gentlemen who were well known to possess the knowledge and ability to discuss constitutional law, it was well they should have the benefit of their constitutional opinions. And, if the hon. gentlemen opposite had on their side the benefit of the constitutional, learned and intelligent member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), who had just addressed them, he (Mr. Costigan) would give them the opinions of the representative from St. John County, that he had spoken of some time ago, who edited the Morning Freeman at that time, and perhaps they would come to the conclusion that the gentleman who then edited the St. John Freeman, and represented St. John in the Assembly of New Brunswick, was the same hon. gentleman who now ably represented Gloucester, in this Parliament, and made so earnest a defence of Governor Letellier. To give them an idea of the way that this question was put in New Brunswick, he would read an article in that paper headed: "BY SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO THE MORNING FREEMAN. EXTRAORDINARY CONDUCT OF THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR. THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR BOUND TO RESIGN. THE LIBERTIES OF THE PEOPLE AT STAKE. RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT OVERTHROWN." He would now let them have some constitutional law,—he did it in all due respect to the hon. gentleman. He believed the opinions were sound, and all he regretted was that he (Mr. Anglin) did not seem to express the same views now. In an editorial in the Freeman of 10th April,

"This is most insolent, but it is not as bad as the conduct of the Governor—who it now appears must have been in collusion all through with the chief conspirators—although the people have rejected the scheme; although the Government chose to prevent the adoption of the scheme, had still a majority of seven in the Assembly; although at least 27 of the members still openly avowed themselves opposed to that scheme, the Governor—without consulting his constitutional advisers, acting under the guidance of the intriguers, and contrary, it is said, to the views of the Attorney-General, whom alone he summoned to see his reply, a few minutes before he read it to the Legislative Council, who were in waiting, even while Mr. Smith was remonstrating against so gross a violation of the principles of responsible government; so gross an insult and injury to the people of this Province—made this reply, which if the people of this Province have not lost every spark of manly, independent spirit—if they are not indeed, only fit to be the slaves of Canada, must excite the deepest feelings of indignation and resentment from the Restigouche to the Saint Croix."

Also in an editorial in the same paper, dated 12th April, 1866, he said :

"It was, at all events, an act of gross despotism,—of arbitrary tyrannical power,—to which no people who love, and who deserve freedom, can possibly submit. At one blow, responsible government was overthrown, the liberties of the people were destroyed, the independence of the Province was shattered,—unless, indeed, in the spirit and manliness of the people themselves, there is, as we believe and trust there is, sufficient vitality and earnestness to repel the blow, and make this terrible outrage rebound on the heads of its authors, crushing them, as they wish and strive to crush the liberties of the people."

The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) also had his own opinions. The following, taken from the same paper of April 17th, 1866, expressed the opinion of that hon. member :—

"The question now was whether this Province was to be ruled arbitrarily by a nominee of Downing Street, or by the people themselves, for their own welfare. He would endeavour to speak of the Governor with the respect to which his position entitled him; but it was not high position, nor a cocked hat and feathers, nor gold lace, that make the man, and he must speak plainly in this case, for not only his own character, but the interests and independence of the Province were assailed."

SIR A. J. SMITH : Hear, hear.

MR. COSTIGAN : The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." When this question was up last year, the hon. member for Westmoreland declared that he still entertained the same strong opinions against Governor Gordon's act. He would now quote the St. John Freeman again, in order that the House might have the benefit of its able editor's opinion regarding the powers of Lieutenant-Governors, and the proper exercise of those powers. On May 8th, 1866, the hon. gentleman said :

"The Governor maintains, because he has the constitutional right to dismiss a Ministry and dissolve the Legislature, he was guilty of no violation of the Constitution, and did not ignore the principles of responsible government by his extraordinary conduct. A man may as well plead the right of carrying arms and of self-defence as a justification for shooting down anyone he supposed to be his enemy. The right, or, to convey a more correct impression, let us say the power, to dismiss a Ministry is vested in him by the Constitution; that the abuse of that power, gross, wanton and wholly unjustifiable as the abuse was in the present case, is surely one of the very worst offences against the Constitution of which the ruler could be guilty. That power or prerogative is not intrusted to him to be used for the gratification of his whims or his caprices, or in the service of a party, or even for the purpose of coercing the people at the will of the Colonial Secretary; but for the good of the people themselves. It is worse than an error to employ it rashly, even with the best intentions, or for the best of purposes; to use it in order to give power to a faction who seek to destroy the liberties of the people, and to do this without the shadow of justification, is, indeed, a flagrant crime against the Constitution of the country."

He believed in the principles advocated on that occasion by the hon. members now representing Westmoreland, Gloucester and Charlotte. A majority of the people's representatives, of whom he was one, insisted upon the recall of Governor Gordon, but he was sorry to find that, of the four members now present, who so loudly condemned Governor Gordon, he stood alone in condemning Governor Letellier for a far more palpable violation of the people's rights. There were few men in this country whose attention was directed to that question who could arrive at any other conclusion than that the coup d'état in Quebec had taken place because there was a Liberal Government in power at

Ottawa. They had been told, with apparent seriousness, that the action of the Government was so unjustifiable that there was a feeling of relief experienced in Quebec, and that a feeling of patriotic emotion went up from the people, when the Lieutenant-Governor committed this act. Where was this enthusiasm in the Province, that it did not enable the Government to fill the vacancy which had occurred? It was in the imagination of the hon. gentleman, and one of the most important positions in the Government was left unfilled. They had been taunted on their side of the House with all sorts of crimes, with being inconsistent, and, the best of the joke was, they had been threatened by hon. gentlemen, who could talk loudly last year, apparently with some show of reason, but who, having gone to the people, had received a severe drubbing at their hands, and these were the men who threatened the Government with the consequences of the passing of this motion. He was sure it was well they could all be satisfied in this way. The members on the Government side were satisfied with what they had got; the Opposition were satisfied with what they expected. There was, therefore, every prospect of this being a very pleasant Parliament. One of the accusations of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec against his Government was that a Bill had passed the Legislature providing for the destruction of thistles, or something of that kind, and imposing a penalty; that His Excellency had been obliged to give his assent to that Bill, although the amount of the penalty was not named; and the Governor, stated, in this case, that the Premier asked him, as a particular favour, not to be too particular with regard to this little error, but to allow it to pass, and that, to oblige the Premier and give evidence of his good will, he allowed it to pass. It was a small matter, but showed which way the wind blew, and the truth was as necessary in that little matter as in any other. The Premier himself, finding the blank had not been filled, introduced an amendment fixing the amount of the penalty, and in the Statutes of Quebec the Act complained of was upon the very same page as the Act amending it, and the two were sanctioned by His Honour at the same moment and on the same day. Would it not be difficult to give a reason why the Premier should go to the Governor to ask him to let it pass in its imperfect form when there was no irregularity in the Statute? That was one of the crimes for which the Ministry was dismissed, and it was about as serious and substantial a charge as any that had been made from beginning to end. He (Mr. Costigan) need not descant upon the point made that the Quebec Government was condemned on account of their Railway Bill. It was made one of the grievous charges against them, that the Lieutenant-Governor refused to sanction that Act. But the moment his friends came in he sanctioned this Bill. They might all have our political leanings, and few men were without them, but there should be a limit to them. There was a sentiment of fair play and honesty, and principle and practice, amongst them, which must, under all circumstances, appeal to their better sense and judgment. Unless they came to the conclusion that they were to be mere slaves, they must feel that there was a limit to their political leanings, and when a case like this came before Parliament, it was their duty to say by their votes, that, as the representatives of the people of this country, as having a right to deal with questions in every Province of the Dominion, under the control of this Parliament, they had a right to deal with Quebec, and intended to deal fearlessly and in such a manner with the question that in no other Province should such a fatal mistake, calculated to disturb the peace and prosperity of the country, be again made, and that all Governors must know that they were to preside rather than to rule over Legislatures, and that this Parliament, whatever might be the political feelings or divisions between parties in this country, representing the true feeling and sentiment of the people, would not sustain or justify a one-man power in any one of the Provinces of this Dominion.

MR. ALLISON said that, at the commencement of the debate, it was not his intention to trouble the House, but, when he heard the reply of the hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Huntington) to the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), if anything had been wanting to satisfy him of the weakness of the cause of the Opposition, it was that reply. The hon. member for Shefford had taunted the member for Cardwell with previous defeats at the polls. The latter gentleman had the satisfaction, however, of seeing his party steadily gaining ground, and, finally, triumphantly sustained; while the former, with all the patronage of Government, neither scrupulously nor stintingly made use of, ignominiously defeated. He thought, without personal acquaintance, or invidious comparisons, that the hon. member for Cardwell had contributed as much, by his tongue and pen, by his intelligence and energy, as any man outside of Parliament to such results. Gentlemen opposite claimed that the result of the appeal to the people of Quebec justified Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's action. On that principle, Lord Dufferin would have been justified in dismissing his advisers three years ago, as there was no room to doubt that at that early day of their political existence they had lost the confidence of the country, as manifested by the result of the special elections from time to time. Gentlemen opposite also claimed that the results of the Dominion election in Quebec were not affected by the Letellier matter, but were carried upon the promise of a fallacious protective tariff. He had no hesitation in saying, that, as far as Nova Scotia was concerned, it was not the promises of the present Government, but the failure to fulfil their promises on the part of the gentlemen opposite, that led to their defeat. It was not the promises of the National Policy, so much as their utter disregard of Provincial interests. It was because they were conducting the Intercolonial Railway on "commercial principles," and pursuing a fiscal policy which was paralysing every industry; it was because the practice of the Government was diametrically opposed to the preaching of their press, and the speeches of their leaders; Dominion and Local Governments "hunting in couples," and rivalling each other in united corruption; it was homilies on political purity, and "big push" letters from the same hand; it was these causes, and such as these, that had defeated their party. He denied that the

Joly Government had been sustained by the people. To the shame of one or two of them, be it spoken, it was sustained by the representatives. The hon. members for Bothwell and Verchères had asked if, because Mr. Turcotte was denounced, every public man who had changed sides had "sold" himself. Not at all. The man who changed his political relations on principle should be commended rather than condemned; but, if their friends in Quebec would exercise a little patience, their Speaker would soon add another to the list of illustrations of the fact that the man who betrayed the party that elected him, either from motives of ambition, or for purposes of greed, merited the condemnation, and forfeited the respect, not only of the party which was weakened in numbers by his desertion, but also of the party which his treachery sustained. His Honour the Speaker of this House had been charged in good nature with having changed sides some years since. He (Mr. Allison) congratulated the country on the change. But, if his conversion had been like that of the Speaker at Quebec, if he had been elected to Parliament by the opposite party at the last election, if his somersault had occurred since that election, and if his purchased support were keeping the present Government in power by a casting vote, would not gentlemen opposite proclaim, and justly so, that the exalted eminence of the Speakership, instead of being a post of honour, as a position of shame? He asked his Honour's pardon for even supposing such a case by way of illustration. One gentleman supporting the Government had said that Governor Letellier had a work to do, and had done it. He doubted this. He believed that the work given him to do by his masters was to make arrangements to carry the late Dominion elections in Quebec, and in this he had failed. But, admitting for a moment that his action in dismissing his Ministers was right, the elections having resulted as they did with a real but very small majority, if the wish and voice of the people had been expressed in action, then he took the ground that, in continuing to retain his present advisers, he was doing the Liberal-Conservative party a favour.

"He served them better than he thought, and kinder than he knew." His observation might have been limited, but it had been this: that, whenever any party clung to power contrary to public sentiment, sustaining itself by questionable means, such as an alteration of the franchise, the readjustment of constituencies, or the purchase of opponents, its doom was sealed. It was on the downward grade, the sympathy of the people being invariably with the wronged, either politically or otherwise, and any temporary suspension would only accelerate its speed to the bottom. If they could, by any means, dam the current of the St. Lawrence to-day, the seething waters would only rush more impetuously tomorrow. He therefore asked his friends to continue to be moderate, as men could afford to be who stood on tenable and constitutional ground. He asked them to continue, as they had done, to give an instance, to the Dominion and to the world, of freemen conducting themselves with patience, confidently waiting for the constitutional reparation of their wrongs. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) had predicted that serious consequences might result to the Province of Quebec from the passage of the resolution before the House. He had drawn upon his imagination for the existence, at no distant day, in the Lower Province, of some mysterious political combination, which might overrule the Provincial affairs of that Province. Political crises might arise in the future, as they had in the past, and all the politics he (Mr. Allison) knew, consisted in each individual taking what he considered to be a consistent course in each, as it occurred, and taking the consequences. In the present crisis he considered it the duty of the House to speak in behalf of those whose voices had been silenced in the councils of their Province by the tyrannical action of a partisan. He was prepared to do so, hoping and believing that if ever the rights of Nova Scotians were similarly trampled upon, the representatives of other Provinces would hasten to their relief. If, as gentlemen opposite maintained, Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had the right to dismiss his Ministry, largely sustained in Parliament, he was thankful that this House had the right to call his conduct in question, and he hoped sufficient appreciation of its baseness to stamp it with contempt. He would not further detain the House at that hour. He would only, in conclusion, express the opinion that, by some means, he knew not what, at no distant period—and express the hope that, from that period forward—the people of the sister Province should have, occupying the high position of Lieutenant-Governor of their Province and First Commoner of their Legislature

"Such men as will the people's rights maintain,

Unawed by influence, and unbribed by gain;
And patriot truth, her glorious precepts draw—Pledged to untrammelled liberty and law."

MR. LONGLEY said it had been stated that the question before the House mainly concerned a single Province, and that, therefore, the smaller Provinces especially could feel but little interest in it, but he thought it must be conceded that, where vital principles were involved, all must feel alike interested. This was a constitutional issue. It should not be forgotten that the DeBoucherville Government, when it was struck down by Governor Letellier, commanded a majority of twenty in a House of sixty-five, equal to a majority of sixty-three in this Parliament. This was not equal to the majority which the present Federal Government commanded, but it was considerably larger than that which their predecessors could boast of during the last year or two of their tenure of office. In view of this fact, it seemed to him that it would not have been so monstrous an act for Lord Dufferin to have dismissed his late Ministers as it was for Governor Letellier to dismiss his late advisers, when they were relatively stronger in the confidence of the people of Quebec than were the MacKenzie Government in the confidence of the people of the Dominion. But he might go further, and call the attention of the House to the fact that the Joly Government was voted down, as soon as it was formed, on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, by the same majority which should have kept the DeBoucherville Government in power. Three times in one day was the Joly Government, the arbitrary creation of Governor Letellier, thus voted down. But the new Government went to the people, and, when they came back, they were still in a minority, as was clearly apparent from the correspondence submitted to Parliament. The first question upon which the Assembly divided, after the election of Speaker, was embraced by the following amendment to a motion made by a supporter of the Government:—

No one could deny that this was a direct vote of want of confidence in the new Government, the vote standing 32 for and 31 against. The constitutional issue should then have been considered settled; but the Governor, who could strike down a popular Government sustained by a majority of twenty, could sustain in power a Government in a minority of one. He would not dwell upon the discreditable means since employed to sustain the Government thus defeated, as the facts were too well known already for the reputation of those more immediately concerned. The worst of it all was, however, that the credit of the country had greatly suffered, and a sore blow had been dealt to the very foundation of our political institutions. He should like to know upon what principle of constitutional rule the new Administration was screened from the effects of an adverse vote of the Assembly? Surely they would search their annals in vain for a precedent, since the introduction of responsible government. Indeed, it would seem scarcely necessary to urge any further arguments on this point, since it had already been admitted here by one of the apostles of Reform that no parallel to the action of Governor Letellier could be found in English history, without going back forty years. He might, perhaps, have said one hundred and forty years. Though the air was thick with rumours of corruption and mismanagement on the part of the DeBoucherville Government at the time of its dismissal, no proof in support of these allegations had ever been furnished, nor could any be furnished, probably. The Joly Government were under the most urgent necessity to do so, and doubtless would not have failed in that regard, had they been able. The Lieutenant-Governor affected to believe that the DeBoucherville Government had lost the confidence of the country, but he (Mr. Longley) wondered upon what he founded his belief. Anyway, the accuracy of his judgment, or the sincerity of his belief, might have been tested without changing his advisers. That he did not take this course gave rise to the suspicion that he was swayed by other influences and other motives than those relating merely to the politics of Quebec. The only offence of the DeBoucherville Government, so far as he could discover, was that they sought, with honest purpose, and in the discharge of public duty, to make the municipalities meet certain pecuniary obligations voluntarily assumed, in the first place, but from which they naturally, and he was afraid he must say dishonourably, shrank, when the hour of payment came, and they saw a chance of throwing the burden back upon the Government. Taxation loomed up before the people, and they were in a mood to favour any party promising, even by implication, to give them relief therefrom—hence the loss, to some extent, of the DeBoucherville party, and the gain, to some extent, of the Joly party, the constitutional question being temporarily largely lost sight of. No men ever acted with more moderation than the members of the DeBoucherville Administration under the same provocation. All the charges of the Lieutenant-Governor against the dismissed Government amounted to nothing; he himself being Judge, as clearly appeared by his own admission “that there was no intention on the part of the Premier to disregard the prerogatives of the Crown, and that there had been on his part only an error committed in good faith,” etc. This was putting the matter in the most favourable light for the Lieutenant-Governor. Taking the whole correspondence, and grouping all the facts together, not the semblance of provocation seemed to have been given for the charge of disrespect to himself or disregard for the prerogatives of the Crown. No proper defence had been set up on behalf of Governor Letellier on the part of his defenders here, simply because none could be set up. The ground taken had been this: That it was inexpedient and unnecessary for the Parliament to deal with the question, and that the Government should deal directly with it. Well, he supposed this was the best objection that could be taken to the resolution before the House, but, in the estimation of the Government and their supporters, and in the opinion of all disinterested people, the course adopted was quite constitutional, and, in the end, would probably be found quite effectual for the accomplishment of the end in view, namely, the vindication of the principle of constitutional government, as forming the basis of the people's rights and liberties. He should have great pleasure in supporting the resolution.

MR. ANGLIN said that, as this was the only opportunity he would have of replying to statements that had been made, he would beg leave to occupy the attention of the House a few moments. He had shortened his speech because of the lateness of the hour, and, in doing so, he became much embarrassed, and left out much that he, perhaps, should have said. He must protest against the allegation that he had attacked Orangemen, or any Orangeman, or anyone having a title to the name, in any way whatever, or that he said anything calculated to give offence to Orangemen. He had no intention of doing so, and he was satisfied that he had not done so. In the remarks that he did make he had not the slightest idea of offending the member for North Simcoe in the slightest degree. The attack of the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan), was entirely unwarranted by any fact or circumstance. He spoke of his (Mr. Anglin) having owed his election to Orangemen in the city of St. John. He never denied that he had canvassed the Orange vote. He would always be very glad to receive the Orange vote on fair and honest grounds, involving no sacrifice of his own feelings or principles. When the Constitution of his Province was in danger, he felt it his duty to appeal to the Orangemen of the Province as to all others, and persuade them, if he could, to unite for its defence. It was well known that, on one occasion, he went into an Orange Lodge and spoke with the King William banner over his head and an assembly of Orangemen in front of him—every man in the meeting being an Orangeman. In addressing them, he admitted that he found himself in a position he thought it never would have been his fortune to occupy; he talked to them fairly and reasonably on the great subject that occupied the attention of the people. He said nothing there to compromise his position as a Catholic, or their position as Orangemen. He said nothing there he would be ashamed to repeat in any place in the world. He was not ashamed to say that they received him kindly and respectfully, and he succeeded in persuading a large number of them that they ought to vote as he was about to vote. He had intended to show that the act of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, which the majority now proposed to condemn, was strictly constitutional, whatever might be thought of its wisdom. He had intended to quote a number of Provincial cases, where such a course was taken by the Lieutenant-Governors of various Provinces, and in which that course was approved of by the Imperial Government, upon being appealed to. He had always maintained that Lieutenant-Governors had the prerogative right of dismissing their Ministers and dissolving Parliament. The case of Mr. Gordon was not the only case they had in their Province. There was the case of Lieutenant-Governor Manners-Sutton. When their Legislature passed a prohibitory liquor law, which was disapproved of by the people, and he found that the operation of this law threw the whole country into a state of confusion and disorder, he suggested to his Council that they must do something. He required that they should enforce law and maintain peace or assemble Parliament and ask for a repeal of the law. They declined to do one or the other, and Mr. Manners-Sutton very properly dismissed them. He did all he could to sustain him (Mr. Sutton), and he was glad to say that 39 of the 41 members of the House of Assembly were elected, pledged to vote for the repeal of the prohibitory liquor law, and thereby pledged to approve of the course taken by Mr. Manners-Sutton. The hon. gentleman who formed the Government of that day never thought of appealing either to Her Majesty the Queen or the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of seeking redress for what they thought to be a wrong. An appeal was made to the people, and the question was discussed on its merits. There was no doubt as to the will of the people, and to the will of the people they submitted. In Mr. Gordon's case he denied that that gentleman was justified in exercising that power, under the circumstances. Those two cases were not parallel. In the latter case, the question of Confederation was fairly submitted to the people at the polls, and the people had pronounced on the subject. The House was now asked to declare that the conduct of Mr. Letellier was unwise, without knowing the effect that the passing of such a decision might have.

MR. ANGLIN : I see the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has voted in the affirmative. According to the British practice, the mover of the previous question should vote in the negative.

MR. SPEAKER : In the British Parliament that practice prevails, but in, the Parliament of Canada, both before and since Confederation, the previous question has been viewed differently. Sometimes, of course, when it is moved with the same object that it is moved in the British Parliament, the mover and seconder generally vote in the negative—that is, against their own motion. But, in this country, gentlemen vote according to their own views, and there are numerous instances in which this practice has prevailed. It was done in 1870 and also in 1865 when the resolutions of Confederation were moved. Then the mover and seconder voted for their motion. In 1870, the previous question was moved by Mr. Holton, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, upon the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means; and both gentlemen voted for their own motion—that is, in the affirmative. I find among the gentlemen who voted with the mover was Mr. Anglin.

MR. HOLTON : I do not rise to challenge your opinion, or to call it in question, but I desire to make one remark. I think we are bound by the British practice here, unless the case be provided for specifically by our own rules. If we have gone astray on a former occasion, it is no reason why we should go against the rules, if the rule be still in effect when attention is called thereto.

MR. MILLS : I do not understand that you have given any ruling as yet. What I wish to specially call your attention to is that, in the English House of Commons, this motion is put in the affirmative precisely as it is here, and that, in the United States Assemblies and in Congress, as you will see by looking at May, it is put in the negative, so that the mover and seconder may vote for the motion. But, in the English practice, it is precisely as it is here, and the motion is put in the affirmative, and the mover and seconder of the motion must vote in the negative, and are generally appointed as tellers for the nays. If you will look at May, you will see that I am right.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is quite true that the previous question, as a general rule, is moved and seconded by gentlemen who desire that the main question should not be put, and, therefore, they vote against their own resolution. But there is no law or decision in England any more than there is here, that such a practice is obligatory. I deny that most expressly. That was looked into most studiously in 1865, at the time that I moved the previous question in order to get a vote on the Quebec resolutions. Every member of the House who was in favour of Confederation, including the mover and seconder, voted that the main question be put, and the point was raised, and it was there solemnly decided that there was no rule in the world to prevent the mover of the previous question voting that the main question be put, and the seconder as well. My hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) was quite satisfied with that authority. He moved it himself on another occasion, and voted for his own motion.

MR. OUIMET : I would state that May only says that the mover and seconder of the motion for the previous question, when they want to vote upon the question, generally vote against it. The word "generally" does not make the rule, and May never says anywhere that it is a rule that the mover and seconder of the main question are pledged to vote against it. But, Mr. Speaker, if it would afford any satisfaction to these gentlemen, I would not be opposed to voting against the motion.

MR. SPEAKER : According to the practice of the British Parliament, as I stated a few moments ago, the mover and seconder of the previous question vote against their own motion. According to the practice of the Canadian Parliament, they generally vote for their own motion. This has been done on different occasions, notably in 1865 and 1870, and I think we ought to follow the practice of the Canadian Parliament. According to my opinion, the mover and seconder are free to vote as they like.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 49) To repeal so much of the Act 33 Vict., chap. 46, as relates to the collection of dues and tolls upon logs, timber, cedar, pine, and railway ties passing down the Moira River through the port of Belleville.—(Mr. McCuig.)

Bill (No. 51) To amend the Penitentiaries Act, 1875.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TILLEY: Mr. Chairman, it is only recently, Sir, that I have fully realised the great changes that have taken place throughout the Dominion of Canada since I last had the honour of a seat in Parliament, and, to-day, I fully realise the great change that has taken place, and the increased difficulties devolving upon me, as Finance Minister, compared with the position of affairs when I submitted my financial statement in 1873. Then, Sir, my work was a very easy one indeed. Hon. members on the opposite benches were pleased, on that occasion, to compliment me on that statement, but I felt that I had earned no compliment; that if that speech was acceptable to the House at that time, it was because of the satisfactory statements I was able to make with reference to the condition of the Dominion and of the finances of the Dominion. Then, Sir, I was able to point to steady and increasing surpluses and revenue, and that in the face of a steady reduction of taxation. Then, Sir, I was able to point, with some degree of confidence, to the prospective expenditures of the Dominion, extending over ten years. To-day I cannot speak of it with the same confidence. Then the construction of the Pacific Railway was under regulations that confined and limited the liabilities of the Dominion to $30,000,000. To-day I am not in a position to say what expenditure or responsibilities we may have to incur with reference to that great undertaking. There has been a change in the policy, but it will become the duty of the Government and of Parliament to consider, while we have not the limit to our liabilities that we had—our money liability being then $30,000,000, with 50,000,000 acres of land—whether we cannot, by some means, construct that great work largely out of the 200,000,000 acres of land lying within the wheat area of that magnificent country. Then, Sir, I could point with pride, and with satisfaction, to the increased capital of our banks and the large dividend they paid. To-day I regret to say that we must point to depreciated values, and to small dividends. Then I could point to the general prosperity of the country. To-day we must all admit that it is greatly depressed. Then I could point with satisfaction to the various manufacturing industries that were in operation throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, remunerative to the men who had invested their capital in them, and giving employment to tens of thousands. To-day many of the furnaces are cold, and the machinery in many cases is idle, and those establishments that are in operation are only employed half time, and are scarcely paying the interest on the money invested. Then, Sir, we could point to the agricultural interest as most prosperous, with a satisfactory home market and satisfactory prices abroad. To-day they have a limited market, with low prices, and anything but a satisfactory market abroad. Then, Sir, we could point to a very valuable and extensive West India trade; to-day it does not exist. Then, Sir, we could point to a profitable and direct tea trade, that has been demoralised and destroyed. Then everything appeared to be prosperous; to-day, though it looks gloomy, I hope there is a silver lining to the cloud, that we may yet see illuminating the whole of the Dominion, and changing our present position to one of happiness and prosperity. Mr. Chairman, there has been, and very naturally so, a good deal of interest and anxiety manifested on the part of the friends of the National Policy, as it is called, in regard to its early introduction. I can quite understand that, because believing as they do, and as a majority of this House do, that that policy is calculated to bring prosperity to the country, it was but natural that they should be anxious for its introduction, and that not a day should be lost. And it is satisfactory to know that, great and difficult as is the responsibility which rests upon me here, I trust that the proposition I am about to submit will be sustained, not only by a majority of this House, but by an overwhelming majority in the country. It was natural, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the friends of this policy should be anxious for its introduction, and it was pleasing and satisfactory to see that even the Opposition vied with the friends of the Government in their anxiety for its introduction. It is most encouraging to me, because, of course, all Oppositions are patriotic, and certainly a patriotic Opposition, anxious for the introduction of this measure could not have desired that a bad measure, and one not calculated to benefit the country should be forced hastily upon it. Therefore, I take it for granted that, in addition to the support from the gentlemen behind me, we will have the support of gentlemen opposite to our policy and the propositions we are about to submit. But, perhaps, it will not be out of place for me to offer a few remarks in justification of the apparent delay that has taken place. It will be remembered that the Government was only formed on the 19th October. Some delay took place in awaiting the arrival in Canada of an hon. member, who, I am satisfied, is one whom, whatever the political opinions of gentlemen of this House may be, all would have been anxious to see consulted before the Government was formed—I mean the Minister of Militia. The Government, therefore, was not completed till the 19th October. The members of the Government had to return for re-election, and those elections, though they were hastened with all possible rapidity, because we felt there was a great deal of work to be done, were not over until the early part of November, when we returned to the city of Ottawa. And what did we find? As Minister of Finance, I cannot say I found the finances in the most satisfactory condition. I found, Sir, that we had maturing in London, between the early part of November and the 1st of January, an indebtedness of $15,500,000 with nothing to meet it but the prospective payment of the Fishery Award. On this side of the Atlantic we had in the various banks of the Dominion something like $5,000,000, and between that date and the 1st of January, with the subsidy of the Provinces and payments to contractors who were constructing public works, something like $3,000,000 had to be paid; and then, considering the position the banks were in all over the Dominion, the uncertainty as to what might transpire, it was just possible that a reduction in the reserves might take place, and that meant a demand on the Dominion Treasury. Every dollar we found it necessary to take from the banks at the time was embarrassing, and was reluctantly withdrawn. But it was inevitable that the Finance Minister should proceed to London, with the least possible delay, that arrangements might be made to sustain the credit and the honour of the Dominion. Well, Sir, in order to avoid that, feeling the importance of every member of the Government being at his post in order to prepare measures for the meeting of Parliament, a cable message was sent to our agents on the other side to ask if the visit of the Finance Minister to London could not be avoided. The answer was “No; his presence here is absolutely necessary.” Under these circumstances, I proceeded to London, and I placed a loan of £3,000,000 sterling upon the market there. While referring to that, it might not be out of place to offer a few observations in reference to that loan, as it has been criticised. That loan, as the prospectus shows, was offered to the highest bidder, and tenders were asked up to 3 o'clock, on the 6th December. At that hour, owing to a variety of circumstances, and among them I may name the suspension, on that day, of the West of England Bank, and the anticipated suspension of that bank for several days previous, which led to the demand from the country banks on the banks in London, for gold to strengthen their position, placed several of the London institutions in such a position that they could not tender, although they had intended to do so at an earlier period—about £1,700,000 were tendered for, on that day, out of the £3,000,000, and it was then stated that the loan would be kept open till the following Monday, at 3 o'clock. On that day, it was announced that the balance of the loan had been taken, and I was in a position to make my arrangements to leave on the 12th, having made provision to meet our maturing indebtedness, and on the 13th of that month the first instalment on that loan was paid into the hands of our agents. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there should be any further criticism in this House, or elsewhere, with reference to my absence from this country; if it should be said by any hon. gentleman in this House that the time selected for placing that loan on the market was an unfavourable one; if it should be said that it was the most unfavourable time, looking at the condition of the London money market, in which any of the Dominion loans had been floated; if it is said that that loan should have been floated in May or June, when money was bringing but two per cent. instead of six per cent. and seven per cent. when it was negotiated; if such should be said, or any reflections be made with reference to my absence in England, I will ask my hon. friend—my predecessor—to make my defence. Then, Sir, after my return to Canada, it became necessary that we should consider the whole question of the tariff. It is not a question that can be settled in a day. It is not a question that can be settled intelligently in weeks, indeed it would have been well if we could have had more time to consider it than we have had, considering the magnitude and importance of the work. I can appeal to other Finance Ministers, and especially to my predecessor, who, in 1874, made several changes in the tariff of that day, to speak of the difficulties there are in making even as few changes as were then made. But if we undertake, as the present Government have undertaken, to readjust and reorganize, and, I may say, make an entirely new tariff, having for its object not only the realisation of $2,000,000 more revenue than will be collected this year, but, in addition, to providing for that deficiency, to adjust that policy, or that tariff with a view of making what has been, and is to-day, declared the policy of the majority of this House—I mean the protection of the industries of the country—the magnitude of the undertaking will be the better appreciated. Sir, we have invited gentlemen from all parts of the Dominion, and representing all interests in the Dominion, to assist us in the readjustment of the tariff, because we did not feel, though perhaps we possess an average intelligence in ordinary Government matters, we did not feel that we knew everything. We did not feel that we were prepared, without advice and assistance from men of experience with reference to these matters, to readjust and make a judicious tariff. We, therefore, invited those who were interested in the general interests of the country, or interested in any special interests. Gentlemen who took an opposite view, met us and discussed these questions, and I may say that, down to as late a period as yesterday, though the propositions are submitted to-day, we were favoured with the co-operation and opinion of gentlemen who represent their particular or general views with reference to the great questions we have under consideration. We have laboured zealously and arduously, and I trust it will be found successfully, and we are now about to submit our views for the consideration of this House. I think we may appeal with some degree of confidence to gentlemen in opposition, in approval of the early period at which this tariff is being introduced, when I call to the minds of those hon. gentlemen that their Government was formed on the 7th of

November, 1873; ours on the 19th of October; that my hon. predecessor did not submit his tariff and Budget speech until the 14th April, this being the 14th March. When we submit to this House the result of our deliberations, you will all understand the nature and extent of the consideration that must necessarily have been given to them. I trust that this House and the country will feel that we have presented our views at as early a period as possible, taking all these facts into consideration. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House in the first place to the Estimates. I will not occupy your attention with the expenditure for the years 1877-78. That is before you in the Public Accounts. But I desire to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to a few facts with reference to the expenditures for this year. It will be borne in mind, Sir, that in the Estimates submitted by our predecessors last year of the income and expenditure of the present year, the Estimated income exceeded slightly the estimated expenditure. The estimated expenditure in round numbers was $23,600,000. It will be found the expenditure of this year will exceed $24,000,000. The Supplementary Estimates that I will submit to the House in a few days will be for Dominion Lands, $7,000; Post Office Department, $20,000; Public Works, revenue, that is railroad, $186,000 in excess of the estimates, notwithstanding the efforts that have been made, and are being made, and will continue to be made, by the hon. the Minister of Public Works to reduce that expenditure. For Customs, in addition to the estimates of last year, a subsequent estimate of $17,740 will be required for the expenses of collecting revenue; Mounted Police, $40,000; Indians under treaty arrangement, $44,674; Ocean and River Service, $19,770; Public Works and Buildings, $116,386; Militia (special), $20,261. This is in connection with the troubles that occurred in Montreal. The Paris Exhibition, $25,000; Charges of Management, which were omitted in the Estimates of last year, $75,000, and which was in connection with the redemption of the debt of $7,500,000; Election expenses, in addition to the vote that was made, $60,000; Penitentiaries, $12,500; Sundry Minor Expenses, $10,000, making altogether, $554,424; less Public Works revote, carried over to be expended next year, $163,000; on other services, $75,000, making a total of $238,000, and leaving the supplementary estimated expenditure, over and above the estimates of last year, $416,424. This, added to the estimates, makes the total estimated expenditure of $24,085,424. Estimated revenue for the present year, taking the first six months as our guide, and it is a very fair guide, under ordinary circumstances, will be $21,620,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will appear from the returns that will be laid on the table of the House, that in the last three or four weeks a very large sum has been collected on Customs and Excise. This arises from the anticipated changes in the tariff. But, taking, previously stated, the first six months as a criterion, the estimated revenue will be $21,620,000, leaving a deficiency of $2,400,000. This is not very encouraging for the present year. Last year, as you see by the Public Accounts, the deficiency was between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000. Notwithstanding all the efforts that have been made, the saving that will be made in the Agricultural Department, the saving that will be made by the Minister of Public Works in connection with the railways, and the savings that have been made by the removal and dismissal of supernumerary employes in the different Departments; notwithstanding all this, there will still be a deficiency of $2,400,000. Now, I will call the attention of the House for a few moments to the Estimates of next year. As these are before the House, I can deal more intelligently with them and call attention to the increase and decrease under these estimates. In the interest on the public debt, you will find that there is a very considerable increase. The increased interest is payable in England, in consequence of the last loan. The estimated amount for the new loan placed in last year's Estimates was $504,000. Charges of Management, paid in England $60,000, less savings in service $6,500; total increase in the Charges of Management, $53,000. There is an amount under this head that is payable in connection with the redemption of the debt of $6,000,000, on the 1st January next, and this corresponded with the item omitted last year, in connection with the redemption of $7,500,000 in January last.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am very sorry to disconcert the hon. gentleman, unless with his permission. If my memory serves me, it may interest the House to know exactly how these two heavy charges on the debt which he paid, and is about to pay, have accrued. I would just suggest that he should mention that to the House.

MR. TILLEY continuing, went into an elaborate statement of the estimated expenditure for 1879-80, shewing a net decrease of \$241,191. He also went into the obligations to be met, and proved that a deficiency of \$1,600,000 would have to be met, even should the \$850,000 estimated as properly belonging to next year's revenue, be placed to the credit of the current year. He continued: In my opening remarks, I referred to the difficulty with which we have to grapple. We must, if we meet the expenditure of next year, our interest, the charges upon our revenue, and the necessary expenditure which the country has a right to expect, ask from this House the authority to receive a revenue from the customs of \$2,000,000 more than received this year. We have also, in arranging for the levying of that duty, to consider how it can best be imposed to encourage the industries of the country. It would be well, before I enter upon the consideration of this point of the question to ask ourselves what are the circumstances that have led to the reduction of revenue and to the present depressed condition of the country? With reference to the reduction of the revenue, I have heard it remarked that it is strange that the production of the revenues of late years has been so great. Perhaps there is as much prosperity here as in many other parts of the world; then why was there such a falling off in our revenue compared with the revenues of the United States and Great Britain? When we examine the case, we ascertain the fact that nearly all the revenue collected in England and a large portion of the revenue of the United States is from specific duties, and, therefore, the decrease in the value of imports does not, in those countries, materially affect the revenue, whereas in the Dominion the duties are principally ad valorem, and, therefore, largely affected by the decrease in the value of goods imported. It is established by comparative statements that the goods imported into the Dominion have decreased in value to the extent of 33½ to 40 per cent., and the duties on those imports being levied largely on the ad valorem principle, there has been a falling off in the revenues of Dominion in a corresponding proportion. In the proposition I am about to make, it will be shown—and I state this fact in order that the House may perfectly understand the nature and extent of those propositions—that on many articles on which we propose an increase of duty, 25 per cent., levied on the value, will not bring more per yard than we received on a 15 per cent. tariff in 1873. We will, by way of illustration, take 100 yards of cloth, valued in 1873 at \$1 a yard; the duty collected on it would have been \$15. The same cloth is worth now but 60c. per yard, and it would require a tariff of 25 per cent. to produce the amount of revenue received from the same quantity in 1873. It is important to bear this fact in mind, because, while it may be thought on the other side of the Atlantic, and by our neighbours, that we are increasing largely our taxation, and imposing increased duties on the products of other countries, it is well to make it understood that, if our duties had been specified, we would have been receiving the same amount of revenue as in 1873. There are other difficulties: the volume of imports has not much diminished. Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. I look upon the large imports, ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against it, as one of the causes of the troubles with which we have to contend—one of the difficulties that it is our duty, if possible, to remedy. They have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought still to be further diminished. I know there are hon. gentlemen here, and elsewhere, who entertain the opinion that the balance between the imports and exports is not a correct mode of judging of the condition of a country. I know that opinion is entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite. But let us, just for a few moments, turn our attention to the condition which England occupies to-day, as compared with the United States. From 1867 to 1873, the balance of trade against England amounted, in the average, to £50,000,000 sterling. It is quite true that difference was met by interest, the returns from her vessels, and in various ways, to an extent largely counterbalancing it, or leaving a balance in favour of England. By the last return I have, which covers the year 1877, the balance of trade against her is shown to be £140,000,000 sterling, or \$700,000,000 per year. The balance of trade against the United States in 1872 was \$116,000,000; in 1873 it was reduced to \$66,000,000; but last calendar year showed that balance in favour of the United States had reached \$300,000,000 a year. I think, then, without entering into a discussion here of Free Trade and Protection, so far as it affects England and the United States, we may fairly conclude that the prosperity of the one country, at this moment, is caused in a great measure by the large surplus in its favour, and the depression in the other by the large deficiency. Under these circumstances, it appears to me we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world. Let me refer to some circumstances that led to the present depression in the revenue. During and after the war in the United States, it is well understood that the country lost a large portion of its export trade, and its manufacturing industries had been to a certain extent paralyzed, and it was only about 1872 or 1873 that they really commenced to restore their manufacturing industries, and endeavoured to find an extended market elsewhere for the manufactures of their country. Lying as we do alongside that great country, we were looked upon as a desirable market for their surplus products, and our American neighbours, always competent to judge of their own interests and act wisely in regard to them, put forth every effort to obtain access to our market. It is well known by the term slaughter-market what they have been doing for the last four or five years in Canada; that in order to find an outlet for their surplus manufactures, they have been willing to send them into this country at any price that would be a little below that of the Canadian manufacturer. It is well known also that they have had their agents in every part of the Dominion seeking purchasers for their surplus, and that those agents have been enabled, under our existing laws, to enter those goods at a price much lower than they ought to have paid, which was their value in the place of purchase. It is well known, moreover, that the United States Government, in order to encourage special interests in the country, granted a bounty upon certain manufactures, and gave to them the exclusive market of the Dominion, and, under those circumstances, we have lost a very important trade, possessed previous to 1873, in addition to the loss of the West India trade, and by the repeal of the 10 per cent. duty on tea, we lost the direct tea trade, and all the advantages resulting from it, by its transfer from the Dominion to New York and Boston. Under all those circumstances, and with the high duty imposed by the United States on the agricultural products of the Dominion, by which we are, to a great extent, excluded from them, while the manufactures of that country are forced into our market, we could not expect prosperity or success in the Dominion, so long as that state of things continued. These are some of the difficulties which have led to our present state of affairs. Now, after having made these few remarks on that head, I desire to call the attention of the House to the remedy. I know this is a difficult question—that it is the opinion of some hon. members, that no matter what proposition you may make, or what legislation you introduce, it cannot improve or increase the prosperity of the country. The Government entertain a different opinion. I may say, at the outset, it would have been much more agreeable if we could have met the House without the necessity of increased taxation. But in the imposition of the duties we are now about to ask the House to impose, it may be said we will receive from the imports from foreign countries a larger portion of the \$2,000,000 we require than we will receive from the Mother Country. I believe such will be the effect, but I think that in making such a statement to this House, belonging, as we do to, and forming a part of that great country—a country that receives our natural products without any taxation, everything we have to send to her—apart from our national feelings, I think this House will not object if, in the propositions before me, they touch more heavily the imports from foreign countries than from our Fatherland. I have this to say to our American friends: In 1865 they abrogated the Reciprocity Treaty, and from that day to the present a large portion of the imports from that country into the Dominion have been admitted free. We have hoped, but hoped in vain, that by the adoption of that policy we would lead our American friends to treat us in a more liberal spirit with regard to the same articles. Well, after having waited twelve years for the consideration of this subject, the Government requiring more revenue, have determined to ask this House to impose upon the products of the United States that have been free, such a duty as may seem consistent with our position. But the Government couple with the proposal, in order to shew that we approach this question with no unfriendly spirit, a resolution that will be laid on the table containing a proposition to this effect: That, as to articles named, which are the natural products of the country, including lumber, if the United States take off the duties in part or in whole, we are prepared to meet them with equal concessions. The Government believe in a reciprocity tariff, yet may discuss Free-trade or Protection, but the question of to-day is—Shall we have a reciprocity tariff, or a one-sided tariff? The Government propose to do more. We had not been long the advisers of His Excellency before we decided that it was of the utmost importance to extend our trade with the British and foreign West India Islands, and, if possible, with South America, and that we should secure, if possible, the admission of our ships into France at the same rate of duty as is charged upon British-built ships. Turning their attention to this subject, they advised His Excellency to appoint Sir Alexander Galt, one of the ablest statesmen in the Dominion—a gentleman whose experience in connection with the finances of this country, and whose knowledge of its trade and commerce cannot be surpassed by any, as a delegate to confer with the Government of Spain, and with the authorities in the British West India Islands, and associated with him Colonel Bernard, as assistant companion. I think that this House will sustain the action of the Government in this matter. These gentlemen went to Madrid, with the approval of the British authorities, to make arrangements with the Spanish Government to open up a trade with the Spanish West Indies. The papers on this subject we would gladly lay before the House, but at this time it would not be expedient to do so. In visiting England, my colleagues authorised me to communicate with the Imperial Government and ascertain if some arrangements might not be made, through their Minister in Paris, for the admission of our ships at two francs per ton, the same as paid by the British Government. Finding my time was limited and that it was necessary to return immediately, I stated to the Secretary of State for the Colonies the nature of the duties imposed upon me by the Government. I asked His Lordship's permission to charge Sir Alexander Galt with this duty also. It was agreed to, and he has made some progress in these negotiations. I trust before long to be able to submit the whole correspondence with reference to this matter for the information of the House. But, Sir, desiring not only to extend our trade with these countries, we felt that it was necessary to protect ourselves in other directions. We found, Sir, as I stated before, that it was important to encourage the exportation of our manufactures to foreign countries, and we are prepared now to say that the policy of the Government is to give every manufacturer in the Dominion of Canada a drawback on the duties they may pay upon goods used in the manufactures of the Dominion exported. We found also, Sir, that under the bounty system of some foreign countries, our sugar-refining trade, and other interests, were materially affected. Well, Sir, the Government have decided to ask this House to impose countervailing duties under such circumstances. I trust that this proposition will receive the support of both sides of the House, because some six months since, when the deputation of sugar refiners in London waited upon Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote, both of them being gentlemen representing Free-trade views, they declared, in the most emphatic terms, that when Government came in and interfered with the legitimate trade of the country they were prepared to impose countervailing duties. To make this matter plain, and place it beyond dispute, the Government propose to ask the House for authority to collect on all such articles an ad valorem duty on their value, irrespective of drawbacks. My colleagues say explain it. For instance, a cent and a quarter drawback per pound is granted on cut nails exported to the Dominion of Canada; the duty will be calculated on the value of the nails, irrespective of that drawback. Now a bounty is given on sugar in excess of that which is paid by the sugar refiners; the Government will exact an ad valorem duty on the value of that sugar, irrespective of the drawback. I may also state, Mr. Chairman, that another reason why I think our American neighbours should not object to the imposition of the duties we propose is this: It is a fact, though not generally known, that the average percentage of revenue that is imposed on all imports into the Dominion of Canada, at the present time, taking the returns for last year as our criterion is $13\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. The amount of duty collected on the imports from Great Britain is a fraction under $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; while the amount of duty collected on the imports from the United States is a fraction under 10 per cent. If our friends across the border will not give us the Reciprocity Treaty again, they cannot find anything to object to in the imposition of these duties, if it bears a little more heavily on the articles imported from that country than they desire. When I state that the imports entered for consumption from Great Britain amounted in 1878 to \$37,431,000, and in 1873 to \$63,000,976, or nearly double; the imports in 1877-8 from the United States were \$48,631,739, and for 187-34 \$54,283,072, there has been a slight falling-off; while, from England, it has been about one-half, under the operation of the present tariff. But, Sir, the House is more interested in the nature of the proposals we are about to submit than in the statements I have just made. Before I come to that, Sir, it is the first opportunity that has been afforded me of saying a few words to my hon. friend my predecessor. I know this subject is not of such importance as to justify me, at this time, in occupying much of the time of the House, but I must take this opportunity of thanking my hon. friend the member for Cumberland, who, in my absence, so eloquently defended my policy of 1873, who so ably met the statements made by my hon. predecessor. I recollect that, on a similar occasion, perhaps the first in which he had addressed the House as Finance Minister, he regretted that there had not been on the floor of the House a gentleman who had been a Finance Minister belonging to the other side. I felt, Sir, after reading the speech of my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), that if it had been in the power of my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) to have translated my hon. friend to Fredericton, and brought me back, he would have willingly made the exchange. I think so. But what did my hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) do when he visited my constituents last summer? He, no doubt, desired to enlighten them. But I may be pardoned in saying I judged that one of the objects was to secure the defeat of some of the candidates, myself amongst the number. I recollect that he referred to the fact that I—and he spoke of it as my crowning offence—as Finance Minister, in 1873, had brought down Supplementary Estimates \$800,000 or \$900,000 in excess of the estimated receipts. I recollect the manner in which he dwelt upon this; the strong way in which he endeavoured to impress on the mind of my constituency what a great offender I had been, and that this was my crowning offence. Sir, he might have told that immense gathering that I, at the time, stated that the Estimates were then, as they were on previous years, largely in excess of the sum that was expended. He might have told them that it was probable the receipts would be ample to cover the expenditure, and that I stated that should not such be the case, the \$800,000, the anticipated surplus of the then current year, would be amply sufficient to meet the deficiency. He might have said that. He might, Sir, have gone on and told them, though Mr. Tilley has been such a blunderer, I, the Minister of Finance, have, for four years in succession, had a large deficiency. I have made no provision for it. He might have pointed to the fact that, when the late Government were in power, they had a surplus of \$10,000,000, which the deficiencies under the present Government during the last four years had reduced to \$3,000,000, their deficiency being seven millions during the last four years. Taking the whole six years about \$5,000,000. But, I will say this, because I do not want to decry the credit or the standing of the Dominion: that we are in a position to state that, taking the whole twelve years into account since the organization of this Dominion; taking our surplus of twelve years; taking the amount of \$500,000, which had been charged improperly to income, that ought to have been charged to railways, and adding the \$4,500,000 received from the fishery award, and deducting the deficiency, it will be shown there was a surplus over and above the expenditure amounting to \$10,000,000, or nearly so, which shows, despite what has occurred during the last three or four years, that this Dominion has life and vitality if its affairs are properly administered. I will go, if my hon. friend will permit me, in imagination with him to his constituency on the 17th September. I will meet him there, on his return from Kingston, where he was engaged in a work, to him, no doubt, a labour of love.

Some Hon. GENTLEMEN: Successful labour.

MR. TILLEY: Where he found that, for the first time in his public life, the constituency that had stood by him—no matter what side of politics he was on—had deserted him, and I can see him as he receives his telegrams later on, finding that one friend after another has fallen, and that the Government is in a terrible minority—I can imagine, Sir, that I can see him pacing the floor, greatly agitated, and saying: "Well, this is terrible; this is hard." I can see him a little after with his countenance somewhat more placid and resigned. I can hear him exclaiming, as he has been thinking over the deficiencies for the last four years, and the condition of the finances. I can hear him say aloud: "Well, terrible, terrible has been the judgment. Looking at it in the light in which I judged my political opponents, however, the verdict is just." Now, Sir, we may have some other opportunities of considering the past, but the country is looking to the future; is looking for something more than badinage or recrimination between the two sides of the House, and asking: What are you going to give us as a remedy for all the evils existing? The anxiety of the Opposition for this remedy appears so great. The leading organ cries: "Let us have it now!" and it is echoed from hill-top to valley. They wanted it now; they could not wait a day for it; they were so anxious to get it, I hope it will be pleasing to them and to the whole country. I may say, at the outset that, in considering this question of the tariff and protection to our industries, the Government considered how they could best discharge their duty to the Dominion; how they could best accomplish the object the country desired to see accomplished. We might obtain two million dollars by the imposition of duties upon certain articles, and appear to give protection, but in reality give none whatever. We might obtain a revenue from the increased duties, but not place it in such a position as to give real encouragement and protection to the industries they desire to protect. And, therefore, Sir, in arriving at the conclusions at which we have arrived, and which are to be submitted to the House, we submit them with the full conviction that they will be effective in their character, and give ample protection to all who are seeking it, and who have a right to expect it. I fear that I may weary the patience of the House, but really the importance of the subject is such that, if I am tedious, you will pardon me, for I desire to be as clear as possible. The tariff is in a somewhat voluminous form, and I can only give extracts from it in order to show the general changes we have made. Still, I have classed them under different heads in order the more intelligently to explain it to the House, and I expect that to-morrow morning hon. members will have the resolutions in printed form.

Mr. MACKENZIE : We shall keep very quiet.

Mr. TILLEY : I hope you will. I propose to deal first with cotton goods, and I may say here, before reading the schedule I have before me, that the principle the Government has adopted with respect to many of these articles, is this : That where there are certain grades or descriptions of manufactures, the policy of the Government is this : To select for a higher rate of duty those that are manufactured, or can be manufactured, in the country, and to leave those that are not made in the country, or likely to be made in the country,—such as printed cottons,—at a lower rate of duty. It is difficult, in some descriptions of goods, to draw the line and make distinction ; with reference to cotton goods we have but little difficulty in doing it. There are certain portions made here, and certain portions that are not made here, and a line can be clearly and distinctly drawn. The proposition of the Government with reference to these goods, is as follows :—Cotton wool, cotton waste, free ; and I may state, for the information of hon. members, they must not suppose that the free goods named here are all that are in the list ; but, in order to bring it intelligently under the particular class of which I am speaking, where a portion is free and a portion paying duty, I introduce the free goods with that list, but it is separate and distinct by itself. Bleached or unbleached cottons, sheetings, drills, ticks, cotton and Canton flannels, not stained or painted, one per cent. per square yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem. Now upon the question of under-valuation I may say a few words. One of the great difficulties that was pointed out to the Government by every delegation was the under-valuation of goods, and I may state here that the Government will ask you for a vote of money to enable them to overcome this difficulty, and they will also ask you for power and authority, such as the United States has, and exercises to-day, to fix out, through their officers, the value of the goods in the country from whence they are imported. The great difficulty I have pointed out is stated on all hands ; it makes but little difference what the rate of duty you impose, unless you prevent the under valuation. Now, we propose appointing additional officers, whose special business it will be to ascertain, in the different countries, what the value of the goods are in that country or that city from whence they are imported, and to impose the duty on those values, and to collect them. But, notwithstanding that there will be a difficulty, and to obviate that difficulty, and to reach certain special classes of goods, it has been considered desirable, with these particular industries, to make a specific and ad valorem duty. Under these circumstances, we have decided that, in respect to this class of goods, 1c. per yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem should be imposed. On all cotton sheeting, drillings, bed-tickings, plaids, cotton and Canton flannels, tickings and drills, dyed or coloured, pantaloon stuff and goods of that description, 2c. per square yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem. These are articles, the value of which is well known in the trade, and we impose specific and ad valorem duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Can the hon. gentleman give us the values of those two classes ?

Mr. TILLEY : I have the rates here when we go into that question. I have the rates here, and shall be able to inform the House when we come to them. On all cotton batting warps, carpetings, knitting cotton, and other cotton yarns, under No. 40, not bleached, dyed or coloured, 2c. per yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem ; on the same, if bleached, dyed or coloured, 3c. per pound, and 15 per cent. ad valorem ; on cotton warp, on denims, 1c. per yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem ; on cotton smalls and bags, 2c. per pound, and 15 per cent. ad valorem ; on cotton shirts and drawers, woven or made with cotton, 30 per cent. ad valorem ; cotton sewing threads, 12½ per cent. ; on spools, 20 per cent. ; on all clothing made with cotton, or of which cotton is a component part, 30 per cent. ; on all manufactures of cotton, not elsewhere specified, and which comes mainly from England, and which we do not make in this country, 20 per cent. I may state here, at the outset, that it is the intention of the Government to increase the 17½ per cent. list, as a whole, to 20 per cent., being goods that will yield, notwithstanding the articles that are taken out of the list, an increase of, perhaps, \$750,000 out of the \$2,000,000 required. We now come to silks: Silks, raw, or, if reeled from the cocoon, not manufactured, silk cottons and silk yarns, 15 per cent. ad valorem; sewing silk and silk twist, 25 per cent.; on silk velvets and manufactures, of which silk is a component part, not elsewhere specified, 30 per cent. ad valorem. Next in the list are leather manufactures: On sole leather, tanned or rough and undressed, and on morocco, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on sole and belting leather, tanned, and on all upper leather, not otherwise specified, 15 per cent. ad valorem; on the same dressed and harness, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on patent and enamelled leather, 20 per cent.; on all other leather and skins, tanned, not otherwise herein provided for, and on leather belting boots and shoes, and on other manufactures not otherwise provided for, now 17½ per cent., will be 25 per cent.; gloves of leather, 25 per cent.; leather board, 3 cents per pound. Marble in stone, or marble in block, rough on two sides, when not specially shaped, containing 15 cubic feet, or upwards, 10 per cent.; slabs, sawn on not more than two sides, 15 per cent.; planks and slabs, sawn on more than two sides, 20 per cent.; on finished marble, mantels of marble, and imitation marble, not elsewhere specified, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on stone, rough, freestone, sandstone and other stones, excepting marble, per ton of 13 cubic feet, \$1; or curb stone, in the rough, \$1.50 per ton; on water limestone, \$1 per ton; on dressed freestone, building stone and all manufactures of stone, 20 per cent. ad valorem; slate for roofing or slate-slabs, square and not specially stated, 20 per cent. ad valorem; school and writing slates, 25 per cent.; slate mantels, 30 per cent.; bricks for building, 20 per cent.; fire bricks or tiles for stoves and furnaces, 20 per cent.; hydraulic or water lime, ground, including barrels, 40 cents per barrel; Roman cement, 20 per cent. ad valorem; drain pipes, 20 per cent., ad valorem. Now I come to another item that is, in some respects, in the same position as cotton goods, that is, earthenware and stoneware, brown and coloured, and Rockingham ware. That is an article made extensively in the Dominion of Canada. It is a coarse ware, but is manufactured extensively in this country, and all we require can be produced in the Dominion. It is proposed to select those articles that we can produce, and to impose a duty of 25 per cent. on earthenware and stoneware, and on C.C.-ware, an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent., while all other china and porcelain, and imports of that kind, come under the category of enumerated articles at 20 per cent. Gypsum, unground, free; gypsum, or plaster of Paris, ground, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Now I come to coal and coke. We propose that anthracite coal should pay a duty of 50c. per ton; bituminous coal, 50c. per ton; and coke, 50c. per ton—meaning a short ton of 2,000 pounds. In dealing with this matter, the Government had to consider what, in their judgment, would give barely the market of the Dominion to the coal deposits of Nova Scotia, because they are principally there. We know that, upon this subject, there has been some conflict of opinion; but the judgment of the Government is that, while the average import of coal into the Dominion of Canada during the last few years has been from 800,000 to 900,000 tons, and while the anthracite coal will continue to be largely imported, the Nova Scotia coal will take the place of a part of it. In the estimates of the Government, out of the 800,000 or 900,000 tons now imported, probably there will still be 350,000 tons of anthracite, and perhaps 150,000 tons of bituminous still imported, giving to the Nova Scotia coal the balance of 400,000 tons, with, of course, an additional supply, if, as we expect, our policy is successful, in consequence of an increased demand for coal to supply the growing manufactures of the country. The next class of articles proposed to be dealt with is books, papers and manufactures of paper. We experienced some difficulty in dealing with this item, and we called to our assistance gentlemen who know the trade thoroughly, who are acquainted with the interests on both sides, and understand the matter from their own business point of view, and after conferring with them, the Government decided upon the following propositions:—Books, printed periodicals, pamphlets, bound or in sheets, not being foreign reprints of British copyrighted works, nor blank account books, copy books, Bibles, prayer books, psalm books or hymn books, six cents per pound. The Government adopted this principle, which is in operation in every country, I believe, except the United States, that the higher class and better class of books which cost a higher price than the objectionable and inferior books, where intellect has made the book valuable, a duty should not be placed upon the intellect, but the duty should be collected simply upon the value of the labour and the paper. Upon British copyrighted books 6c. per pound and $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. ad valorem. On bibles, prayer-books, &c., 5 per cent., as at present. On books and pamphlets imported through the post-office, for every two ounces in weight and fraction thereof, 1c. A great many books are sent through the post-office from the United States and elsewhere into the Dominion of Canada, and the Customs authorities have experienced great difficulty in regard to them, but under this proposition it is not necessary to know the value, but simply the weight. Newspapers imported through the post-office free, blank books, through the post-office, 20 per cent. ad valorem; printed bill heads, cheques, receipts, drafts, posters, labels, advertising matter, &c., 30 per cent. ad valorem; advertising pamphlets, \$1 per hundred; printed music, bound, or in sheet, 6c. per pound; playing cards, 30 per cent.; engravings, prints, &c., 20 per cent.; maps and charts, 20 per cent.; articles not specified, 20 per cent.; on pulps for paper makers, 10 per cent.; mill and straw board, 10 per cent.; envelopes, &c., 25 per cent.; paper hangings and wall paper, 25 per cent.; printing materials and presses, 15 per cent.; printing type, 20 per cent.; type metal, 10 per cent.; type, old, and fit only to be re-manufactured, free; engraved plates, 30 per cent.; electrotypes, &c., 10 per cent. I now submit the proposition with reference to carriages, furniture and wooden ware:—Railway carriages, cars, waggons, sleighs, wheelbarrows and like vehicles, 25 per cent. ad valorem; household or cabinet furniture of all kinds, not otherwise named, 35 per cent. Some hon. members may ask why the rate of duty on this description of manufacture is 5 per cent. higher than that in some others? Marble slabs and cabinet-maker's hardware pay a high duty, and the same may be said of other articles used by the manufacturers, such as varnish. On clocks the Government propose a like duty. On examination it was found that clocks are manufactured, and extensively too, in the Dominion, as the duty which enters into the manufacture of these clocks has been increased, the Government felt it right to ask the House to agree to this proposition. I was under the impression that clocks was an article on which it would not be wise to impose a duty, as with any protection we might give them, we could not compete successfully with our American neighbours. But I found in that busy city of Hamilton, which is represented by nearly every article in the schedule before me, there is a clock-making industry successfully established, and producing a very nice article, in a birds-eye maple frame, for seventy cents, and they have orders from England for 6,000 or 7,000 of these clocks. Picture frames, mouldings, &c., 25 per cent.; billiard tables with pockets, $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet by 9 feet,—and with reference to these articles and the smaller class of organs and pianos, I may say that the Government have decided, after careful consideration, to impose a specific duty and an ad valorem duty,—billiard tables with pockets, 5 feet by 10 feet, \$25; $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet by 11 feet, \$35; 6 feet by 12 feet, \$40; in addition to an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. Musical instruments, organs with not over two sets of reeds, a specific duty of \$10; with more than two sets and not more than four, \$15; with more than four and not more than six sets, \$20; all having over six sets of reeds, \$30, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem on the fair market value; square pianofortes, having not over seven octaves, \$25; upright pianofortes, \$30; concert or grand pianofortes, \$50, in addition to ten per cent. ad valorem on the fair market value. Agricultural implements, not otherwise specified, 25 per cent.; woodenware pails, tubs, churns, brooms, brushes, &c., not otherwise specified, 25 per cent.; corks, and manufacture of corkwood, 20 per cent.; corkwood and bark, unmanufactured, free. We now come to glass manufactures, and here the same principle is intended to apply as that which I pointed out in reference to cotton and earthenware. We have selected for a higher rate of duty the description of glassware that can be made in the Dominion. On pressed glass bottles, vials of every description, 30 per cent.; carboys and demijohns, 30 per cent.; telegraph and lightning-rod insulators, 30 per cent.; lamps, globes, etc., 30 per cent.; ornamental, stained, and tinted glass, and glass windows, 30 per cent.; common and colourless window glass, and glass painted, enamelled and engraved, 20 per cent.; and all other glass, not otherwise specified, the non-enumerated rate of 20 per cent. The next class of articles is metal. The first item is pig iron. In dealing with this question, the Government had to take into consideration the important iron interest of the Dominion. It is quite true that a very large deposit of iron is found in the Province of Nova Scotia. Adjacent to it are immense beds of coal, inexhaustible, and no doubt for the Province of Nova Scotia this interest is a very important one, but it is not confined to Nova Scotia. We find, on examining the geological reports and the reports of the officials who have been charged with the enquiring into the extent of our iron deposits show us that in every Province of the Dominion there are large deposits of iron. From the west we have had specimens of iron submitted to us of the most valuable character, made by the application of heat from petroleum, which appears to remove some of the difficulties that have been experienced in producing good iron before, inasmuch as it removes the phosphorus and sulphur which rendered to a great extent that iron valueless. If this be so, we may reasonably expect that in the western part of our Dominion, in Nova Scotia, in the valley of the Ottawa, in the Provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, we may, by giving some encouragement to this manufacture, or its production, have these interests springing up all over the Dominion and producing the most beneficial results. We find in every country, no matter what country it is—take England for instance, take France or any other country that has risen to any position of wealth and commercial greatness—and you will find the iron interest is one of the most important interests of that country. I would also instance the United States. It may safely be said that it is the basis of every other industry. It is true we have not developed it to a great extent yet. We have one establishment at present in operation in Nova Scotia, but it will only produce one fourth of our present consumption. There is no reason why we should not supply the whole of the trade in time. There is a great diversity of opinion as to how this protection is to be afforded. It is now proposed to place a duty of \$2 per ton on pig iron; old and scrap, in blooms, slabs, hoops or billets, 12½ per cent. ad valorem; in bars, rolled or hammered, including flats, rounds and squares, band and hoop, sheet, smoothed or polished, coated or galvanized, and common or black, boiler and other plate, Canada plates or squares, nail and spike rods, and all other iron not otherwise herein provided for, 17½ per cent. ad valorem; on rolled round wire rods in coil, under half-inch in diameter, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on iron rails or railway bars for railways or tramways, 15 per cent. ad valorem; on railway fish plates, frogs, frog points, chairs and finger bars, 17½ per cent. ad valorem; on iron and steel wire, not over No. 18 wire gauge, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on tin plates, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on castings in the rough, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on stoves and other finished castings, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on car wheels, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on mill irons and mill cranks, and on wrought forgings for mills and locomotives, or parts thereof, weighing 25 pounds or more, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on locomotive engines, and on stationary or other steam engines and boilers, and on other machinery composed of iron, or of which iron is the component part of chief value, 25 per cent. ad valorem; locomotive tyres of steel, or Bessemer in the rough, 10 per cent. ad valorem; seamless boiler tubing, drawn, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on bedsteads and other iron furniture, and ornamental iron work, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on hollow ware tinned, glazed or enamelled, of cast or wrought iron, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on hardware, viz.: builders', cabinet-makers', upholsterers', carriage-makers', saddlers' and undertakers', 30 per cent. ad valorem; bolts, nuts, washers and rivets, 30 per cent. ad valorem; tacks, brads and sprigs, 30 per cent. ad valorem; horse-shoes and horse-shoe nails, iron wire nails, called "Point de Paris," 30 per cent. ad valorem; iron and steel screws, commonly called "wood-screws," 35 per cent. ad valorem; scales, balances and weighing beams, 30 per cent. ad valorem; chain cables, over $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in diameter, shackled or swivelled, or otherwise, 5 per cent. ad valorem; anchors, iron masts and wire rigging, when used for ships or other vessels, free; nails and spikes, cut, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound und 10 per cent. ad valorem; nails and spikes, wrought and pressed, whether galvanised or not, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per pound, and 10 per cent. ad valorem; composition nails and spikes and sheathing nails, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on sewing machines, whole, and on "heads," or parts of heads of sewing machines, \$2 each; and in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on machinery for cotton and worsted mills, not made in the country, free; steel, in ingots, bars, coils, sheets and steel wire, 10 per cent. ad valorem; edged tools of all kinds, including axes, scythes and saws; carpenters' cooper's cabinet-makers', and all other mechanics' tools, shovels spades, hoes, hay, manure, and potato forks, rakes and rake teeth, and steel skates, 30 per cent. ad valorem; on cutlery, and on other manufacturers of steel, and of iron and steel, not otherwise herein provided for, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on knife blades, in the rough, or blades unhandled, and for use by makers of plated ware, 10 per cent. ad valorem; copper, old and scrap, and in ingots, pigs, plates, bars, rods, bolts, wire, and in sheets not planished or coated, and for sheathing, 10 per cent. ad valorem; seamless tubing, drawn, 10 per cent. ad valorem; rivets and burrs, 30 per cent. ad valorem; on all manufactures of copper, not otherwise herein provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem; wire of brass or copper, 10 per cent. ad valorem;

wire cloth, of brass or copper, 20 per cent. ad valorem; brass, old and scrap, and in bars, bolts and sheets, round or flat wire, seamless drawn tubing, and tubing plain and fancy, unfinished, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on manufactures of brass, not otherwise herein provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem; church bells, free; yellow metal, in bolts, bars and for sheathing, free; phosphor-bronze, in blocks, bars, sheets and wire, 10 per cent. ad valorem; lead, old and scrap, in pigs, blocks, bars and sheets, 10 per cent. ad valorem; lead pipe, 20 per cent. ad valorem; lead shot, 20 per cent. ad valorem; all other manufactures of lead, not otherwise herein provided, 25 per cent. ad valorem; tin, in blocks, pigs and bars, and in plates and sheets, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on tinware and japanned ware, and on stamped ware, 25 per cent. ad valorem; zinc, in pigs, blocks and sheets, and on seamless-drawn tubing, 10 per cent. ad valorem; on manufactures of not elsewhere specified, 25 per cent. ad valorem; silver and gilt electro-plated ware, 30 per cent. ad valorem; German silver in sheets, 10 per cent. ad valorem; jewelry, watches, and manufactures of gold and silver, 20 per cent. ad valorem; Jewelry is considered, like silk, a luxury, and had it not been for the circumstances affecting this article, it would have been subject to increased taxation. It appears that, even at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., we only imported last year about \$240,000 worth, and the inducement is so great to smuggle, that the Government propose to leave these articles in the unenumerated list of 20 per cent. We now come to wool and woolen goods. In this case, Mr. Chairman, we have so arranged our proposition for the consideration of this House, that the duty is to be imposed so as to encourage the manufacture of the coarser description of woolsens and blankets in the Dominion. We have, at the present time, a large product of wool shut out practically of the American market, and sold there at a very low price on account of the high duty imposed. The Government felt if they could secure a ready and good home market for this important product, they were bound to do it, and they ask the House to sustain them in this proposition. Wool, unmanufactured, hair of the alpaca, goat and other like animals, and wool waste, free; on manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, viz:—Shawls, blankets and flannels of every description; cloths, doeskins, cassimeres, tweeds, coatings, overcoatings, cloakings, felt cloth of every description, horse-collar cloth, yarn, knitting-yarn, fingering-yarn, worsted-yarn, under number 30; knitted goods, viz:—Shirts, drawers, and hosiery of every description, $7\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound, and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel of every description, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, made up or manufactured, wholly or in part, by the tailor, seamstress or manufacturer, except knit goods, 10c. per pound, and, in addition thereto, 25 per cent. ad valorem; on all manufactures composed, wholly or in part, of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals, not herein otherwise provided for, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on treble ingrain, three-ply and two-ply carpets, composed wholly of wool, 10c. per square yard, and, in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem; on two-ply and three-ply ingrain carpets, of which the warp is composed wholly of cotton, 5c. per square yard, and in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem; oil cloth for floors, stamped, painted or printed, 25 per cent. ad valorem; jute, unmanufactured, and jute balls, jute, manufactures of 20 per cent. ad valorem; flax, fibre, scutched, 1c. per pound; flax, fibre, hackled, 2c. per pound; flax tow, scutched or green, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound; bread-stuffs and barley, 15c. per barrel; buckwheat, 10c. per barrel; Indian corn, $7\frac{1}{2}$ c. per bushel; oats, 10c. per bushel; rye, 10c. per bushel; wheat, 15c. per bushel; peas, 10c. per bushel; beans, 15c. per bushel; buckwheat, meal and flour, $\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound; Indian meal, 40c. per barrel; oat meal, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound; rye flour, 50c. per barrel; wheat flour, 50c. per barrel; rice, 1c. per pound; rice and sago flour, 2c. per pound; barley malt, 2c. per pound. Dairy produce—Butter, 4c. per pound; cheese, 3c. per pound; flax seed, 10c. per bushel. It is proposed to impose 40c. per barrel on apples; they now pay 10 per cent. On cranberries, prunes and quinces, 30c.

per bushel; peaches, 40c. per bushel; cherries and currents, 1c. per quart; gooseberries, filberts, raspberries and strawberries, 2c. per quart; grapes, 1c. per pound; hops, 6c. per pound, instead of 5c.; honey, 3c. per pound; meats—fresh or salted, on the actual weight as received in Canada, 1c. per pound. At present the duty is collected on 185 pounds to the barrel in the United States, which, when it reaches here, by the effect of the salting, weighs up to 200 pounds. The duty now, therefore, according to the old tariff weight, will be 1c. per pound; bacon and hams, 2c. per pound; meats not elsewhere specified, 2c. per pound. On lard, which is now charged at one cent, it is proposed to make the duty $1\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound; fried lard, 2c. instead of 1c.; trees, shrubs, 20 per cent; seeds for field and garden, 15 per cent. Seed in small paper parcels, there is a large quantity brought from the United States put up in small papers at vast labour, the paper for which we tax 20 per cent, and printing in same proportion, it is proposed to place them under a tariff of 25 per cent; potatoes, 10c. per bushel; tomatoes, 30c. per bushel. All other vegetables now 10 per cent., 20 per cent. ad valorem. Manures, of all kinds, free. We now come to the proposition in regard to spirits and wines. Spirits and strong waters not having been sweetened or mixed with any article, so that the degree of strength thereof cannot be ascertained by Sykes' hydrometer, and so on in proportion for any greater or less strength than proof, and for every greater or less quantity than a gallon, viz:—Alcohol, rum, whiskey, Geneva gin and unenumerated articles of that kind, \$1.32 $\frac{1}{2}$ per Imperial gallon, instead of \$1.20. Objection was taken to the proposition made by my hon. predecessor, to make the increase on brandy per gallon the same as on gin and whisky, it is now proposed that brandy shall be increased 25c., or \$1.45 per gallon; and that old Tom gin be charged \$1.32 $\frac{1}{2}$ per gallon. I may here state that the proposition which the Government will submit with reference to the excise, is an increase of 10c. per gallon on excise spirits, leaving tobacco where it is at present, except the Canada twist, made from Canadian leaf, which will be reduced from 10c. to 4c. per pound. It was suggested to the Government that this might be met in another way, by imposing a small duty on the imported leaf, in addition to the excise duty; but in the United States they have reduced the excise duty on tobacco to 16c. If we propose to increase ours beyond 20c. it would encourage smuggling, and we would lose legitimate business and revenue. It was decided not to impose an additional duty upon the imported tobacco leaf, but to meet it in this way, reducing the tobacco manufacture from the leaf of our own growth to 4c. per pound. A resolution will be submitted to reduce the duty on malt from 2c. to 1c. per pound. It is estimated that the increased 10c. a gallon on spirits will give over and above what we lose on malt, \$100,000 additional excise duty. The Government considered that it would be wise to encourage, if stimulants are to be used at all, the use of malt liquors in preference to spirits. Spirits and strong waters sweetened or mixed, so that the degree of strength cannot be ascertained, namely, rum, shrub, cordials, &c., \$1.90 per gallon; spirits or strong waters, imported in Canada, mixed with any ingredients, and, although coming under the denomination of proprietary medicines, tinctures, essences, extracts, or any other denomination, are, nevertheless, deemed spirits and strong waters, and subject to duty as such, \$1.90 per gallon; cologne water and perfumed spirits, in bottles or flasks, not weighing over four ounces each, 40 per cent. Wines and fermented liquors. I may state, at this stage of the proceedings, the reasons that have influenced the Government to submit the proposed sale of duty on wines; one of the proposals, submitted to the Government of France, through Sir A. T. Galt, was that we would place a duty on French wines, at the same rate precisely as that charged in England, namely, 25c. per gallon, or 1s. sterling. These negotiations, though not closed, we may hope, at no distant day, will be successfully arranged. There has been a difficulty between Spain and England with reference to rates of duties imposed by each country on wines. The proposition I am now about to make will, if we arrange with Spain and France, meet the circumstances of the case by the withdrawal of the 30 per cent. ad valorem duty imposed, leaving it 25c. per gallon, 26 degrees of proof, and increased in proportion to strength, the same as in England. On champagne, the Government asked the House to impose an additional duty. The duty, as it now stands, is lower than that exacted on many of the necessaries of life, and lower than that imposed on the cheaper kinds of wines; and, in order to equalise the rate of duty collected on wines, there is no reason why champagne or sparkling wines should be exempted from a fair contribution to the revenue of the Dominion. Champagne and all sparkling wines in bottles containing each not more than a quart, \$3 per dozen bottles; on bottles containing not more than one pint, \$1.50 per dozen; containing a half pint each or less, 75c. per dozen, and to it is added a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem. Bottles containing over a quart each, will be charged in addition, \$3 per dozen. Liquors imported under the name of wine, containing more than 40 per cent. strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer shall be rated for duty, as non-enumerated spirits. Wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, including ginger, oranges, lemons, strawberries, raspberries, elder, and current wines, containing 26 per cent. or less of spirits of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, imported in wood or in bottles, six quart and twelve pint bottles to be held to contain an Imperial gallon, 25c. per Imperial gallon, and 30 per cent. ad valorem. When containing over 26 per cent. and not over 31 per cent. 40c. per Imperial gallon; when containing over 31 and not over 36 per cent., 55c. per Imperial gallon; when containing over 36 and not over 40 per cent., 70c. per Imperial gallon, and in addition to the above specific duty, 30 per cent. per Imperial gallon. Malt liquors, when imported in bottles, six quarts and twelve pint bottles to constitute an Imperial gallon, will be charged 18c. per gallon. When imported in casks or otherwise than in bottles, 10c. per Imperial gallon. Oils, lard, 20 per cent. ad valorem; linseed or flaxseed, 25 per cent.; neatfoot, 20 per cent.; tallow, per pound, one cent.

After Recess.

MR. TILLEY resumed his remarks, saying: At six o'clock I was proceeding to explain the propositions which the Government propose to submit to the consideration of the House. I take up the subject where I left off. The next articles are gunpowder and other explosives, gun, rifle and sporting powder in kegs, half or quarter kegs and small packages, 5c. per pound; on cannon and musket powder, in kegs and barrels, 4c.; on canister powder in pound and half-pound packages and tins, 15c.; blasting and running powder, 3c.; on giant powder, dynamite and other explosives, with nitro-glycerine as a constituent, 5c. per pound, and, in addition 20 per cent. ad valorem; nitro-glycerine 10c. per lb., and 20 per cent. ad valorem; salt, except imported from the United Kingdom or any British possession, or for the use of the sea and gulf fisheries which shall be free, in bulk, 8c. per 100 pounds; on barrels, bags and other packages, 12c. per 100 pounds; chemicals, medicines, paints and oils, acid, sulphuric, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. as at present; acetic, per Imperial gallon, 12 cents; muriatic and nitric, ad valorem, 20 per cent.; oxalic, free; saltpetre, 20 per cent., ad valorem; essential oils for manufacturing, 20 per cent.; essences of apple, pear, pineapple, raspberry, strawberry, vanilla, and other fruits, \$1.80 per gallon, and ad valorem of 20 per cent. This is to cover the spirit duty. Coal tar and coal pitch, 10 per cent. ad valorem; varnish, bright and black, for shipbuilders' use, free; all other not elsewhere specified, 20 cents per Imperial gallon, and 20 per cent. ad valorem. Colours—bichromate of potash, blue, black, scarlet, and marone, in pulp, Paris green, Prussian blue, satin and fine-washed white, ultramarine and umber raw, free; added to this class, that were formerly dutiable, are Prussian blue, and one or two other colours; paints not elsewhere specified, 20 per cent., ad valorem; putty, 25 per cent.; ochres, dry or unground, washed or unwashed, not calcined, 10 per cent.; spirits of turpentine, not enumerated, 20 per cent., ad valorem. Coal oils and their products remain as they are; cod liver, medicated, 20 per cent., ad valorem; sperm oil, 20 per cent.; neatsfoot, olive or salad, sesame seed, 20 per cent. ad valorem; sulphate of quinine, 20 per cent. ad valorem; opium crude, 20 per cent. ad valorem; prepared for smoking, and all preparations of, \$5 per pound, the cost being about \$11. The representative of British Columbia will be interested in this duty. Perfumery, including preparations for the toilet, hair oils, powder, pomatum, and other perfumery preparations for the hair, mouth or skin, 30 per cent.; pomades, French or flower odours, preserved in fat oil for conserving the odours of flowers which do not bear the heat of distillation, imported in tins of not less than 10 pounds each, ad valorem, 15 per cent.; medicines, or any medicine preparations of which the recipe is kept a secret, or the ingredients a secret, recommended by a bill or label, for the relief or cure of any disorder, in liquid form 50 per cent.; and all others, 25 per cent., as at present. These medicines are at present often the cover for spirits, introduced under their name—(the duty was formerly 25 per cent.); artificial flowers, 30 per cent. ad valorem; feathers, ostrich and vulture, undressed, 15 per cent.; dressed, 25 per cent.; furs, hatters', not in the skin, free; skins of all kinds, not dressed, free; dressed, 15 per cent. ad valorem; furs, viz., caps, hats, muffs, tippets, capes, coats, as manufactured in cloaks, &c., 25 per cent.; candles, tallow, 2c. per pound; paraffine, wax, 4 per cent.; all others, ad valorem, 20 per cent.; India rubber and gutta percha, unmanufactured, free; boots, shoes and other manufactures of India rubber and gutta percha, 25 per cent. ad valorem; soap, common, brown, not perfumed, per pound, 1 cent; yellow, castile, and white, perfumed or toilet, 25 per cent. ad valorem; starch, including farina corn starch or flour, and all preparations of, 2 c. per pound, as at present; cordage for ships, 10 per cent.; for all other purposes, 20 per cent. I may here state, that, at the opening of my remarks, I referred to a proposition of the Government to treat all articles manufactured in the Dominion, and exported from it, in this way: there shall be a drawback on the materials used in manufactures, equal to the duty paid, on the evidence of their exportation. The proposition is to treat new vessels of every description as an export, duty paid on cordage to be the exception. For, if we allow a drawback on it, we shall close up the establishments maintained now by the supply for ships. It is proposed to increase the duty on cordage to 10 per cent., which duty ships would have to pay ; but iron in pig, bolts and blooms, on paying duty and being used in vessels, would have the duty paid back. So, practically, ships will be regarded like all other articles exported, all duties being returned to the builder.

An HON. MEMBER: What size of ships?

MR. TILLEY: All sizes and descriptions. We propose 10 per cent. duty on all foreign vessels seeking registration in the Dominion. This extends to all parts of the Dominion. As regards the proposed duty on sugar and molasses, if I occupy the attention of the House for a few moments, I am sure you will pardon me, for it is one of the most difficult questions with which any Government can possibly have to deal. We know there has been great dissatisfaction in the United States as to the mode of levying the duty there; it has been purely specific, levied upon Dutch standard, two and five for all below seven, till it reaches a duty of five cents per pound specific. Dissatisfaction arising from that system has been apparent in that country. Notwithstanding that, several commissions have been appointed to treat this question, and that Mr. Wells, one of the ablest men in the United States, has been asked by the sugar refiners and importers to report on it, and that a very able and elaborate report was submitted; notwithstanding that a proposition has been recently before Congress with reference to this question, no change in the mode of levying the duty has been made. There seems no probability of their arriving at any other conclusion than a specific duty. I will say, for the information of hon. members who may not have studied this question, that the rate of duty imposed in the United States is under the Dutch standard. From No. 7 down they pay the lowest duty. It has been found the very best. Almost pure sugar, amounting to 96 per cent., or even above that, had been admitted at a low rate of duty. Under these circumstances the refiner would receive a drawback of three dollars per 100 lbs. on which he had paid but $2.15. This principle of specific duty is found to work injuriously in many respects, but still Congress has not repealed or changed it. There have been very strong arguments used in that country in favour of ad valorem duty, and in the Dominion as well. I do not hesitate to say that many of the arguments are most cogent in many respects. Mr. Wells takes the line that the ad valorem principle is the proper one. I may say that, after investigating this matter, if you adopt the ad valorem duty at all, it can best be done in the manner which we propose to do in this case. There is a mode in which you can test certain classes of sugar by means of an instrument, the polariscope. It is used satisfactorily for the purpose of testing all the classes of sugar below number 9, or in fact below number 13, especially the low class of sugar, but fails when applied to the yellow refined sugars largely mixed with glucose. Gentlemen who were interested in the importing of that class of sugar were in favour of ad valorem duties. I might say if they applied ad valorem duties solely they would find that the West India sugar of a bright good character, would be met by this yellow refined adulterated article, in appearance better than the West India sugars. Under these circumstances, seeing the difficulty on both sides, the difficulty in imposing a specific duty, and the difficulty in applying the ad valorem principle, the latter having, I admit, some advantages; still, feeling that that article came in and competed successfully with our importation of good grocer's sugar, the Government have fallen back on the proposition submitted in 1868, viz: a mixed duty, specific and ad valorem, there has been naturally a difference of opinion between the importers of sugar and refiners, in reference to the point at which additional duty should take place. At the present time the higher rate of duty took place at or above No. 13. The refiners were anxious to continue it at No. 13, whilst the importers desired it at a little higher. We have made a compromise and put it at No. 14. On all sugar above No. 14, Dutch standard in colour, 1c. per pound, and 35 per cent. ad valorem. That covered all refined sugar. On sugar equal to No. 9, and not above No. 14, three-quarters of a cent. per pound, and 30 per cent. ad valorem. I call attention to the fact that the difference to the refiners is 5 per cent., that all below No. 14 have an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent., giving to the refiners 5 per cent. On sugar below No. 9, half a cent. per pound, and 30 per cent ad valorem, provided that the ad valorem duty shall be levied and collected on sugar and melado, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, upon the fair market value thereof, at the place of purchase, without any addition for the cost of hogsheads, or other packages or charges, not including export duty, and expenses prior to shipment; anything contained in section 34 of the Act 46th Vic., chap. 10, to the contrary notwithstanding. It means this, that all sugar imported direct from the West Indies to the Dominion shall pay no duty upon packages and ordinary charges. We have added five per cent. to the present duty of 35 per cent. Sugar, not imported direct, will pay a duty on the packages, giving additional encouragement to our direct West India trade. Syrups, cane juice, refined syrup, sugar-house syrup, syrup of sugar, syrup of molasses or sorghum, five-eighths of 1c. per pound ad valorem. Melado, concentrated melado, concentrated cane juice, concentrated molasses, concentrated beet-root juice, and concrete, three-eighths of 1c. per pound, and 30 per cent. ad valorem. It is estimated, taking the sugar that was imported last year, as shown in the returns made, that this altering of the duties will yield $200,000 less than under the existing tariff, through having no duty on packages remitted. Molasses, if used for refining, clarifying or rectifying purposes, or for the manufacture of sugar, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, 25 per cent. ad valorem. Molasses for the same purposes, when not imported direct from the country of growth and production, 30 per cent. This is to encourage the importation of molasses direct. I cannot see why there was such an extraordinary discrepancy in the value of molasses imported into the different Provinces, 1878. It was, perhaps, owing, to some extent, to the fact that the very blackest and most inferior description of molasses, the refuse which New York and Boston refiners, sent into this country, and it was to prevent, as much as possible, the importation of such molasses that a distinction is made. Molasses, if not so used when imported direct from the country of growth and production, 15 per cent. The same, when not imported direct from the country of growth and production, 20 per cent. This will be a loss to the revenue of something like $90,000 or $100,000; but we will be able to make that up, and more, from additional taxation imposed on other articles. Sugar candy, brown or white, and confectionery, 1c. per pound, and 35 per cent. ad valorem. Glucose, or grape sugar, to be classed and rated for duty as sugar, according to grade, by Dutch standard, in colour. Glucose syrup 35 per cent. ad valorem. We now come, Mr. Chairman, to the article of tea. The House will probably be prepared, from the statements I made in the early part of the day, to hear that the Government propose to ask Parliament to reimpose a duty of 10 per cent. on tea coming from the United States. I may be pardoned for saying that I think it was a great mistake on the part of my predecessor in standing so firmly and refusing to reimpose this additional duty on tea, and I believe that this House is prepared for a reversal of that decision. It is our intention to ask Parliament to reimpose a specific and ad valorem duty, instead of the 5c. per pound now collected. A specific duty of 2c. per pound on black, and 3c. on green and Japan, and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The result of our policy in that direction will be to decrease, to some extent, the revenue, say $100,000, as the cost of the tea, when imported direct, is less than if bought in New York. Coffee, green, 2c. per pound; roasted or ground, and all imitations of and substitutes for, 3c. per pound. Cocoa paste and chocolate, not sweetened, 20 per cent. ad valorem; cocoa paste, chocolate, and other preparations of cocoa, when containing sugar, 1c. per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up every article on which we propose to change the rate of duty, and, in order that the House and the country may not be led astray, I shall read the free list, because, unless I do so, it may be supposed that all the articles that I have not mentioned are in the free list. Animals for the improvement of stock; ancer; antimony; ashes, pot, pearl and soda; apparel, wearing and other apparel;

of household effects, not merchandise ; arsenic ; articles for the use of the Governor-General, foreign consuls, army and navy, army clothing, musical instruments, military stores, etc. ; bamboo reeds, no further manufactured than cut into suitable lengths for walking-sticks ; canes, in sticks for umbrellas, parasols and sunshades ; bamboo, unmanufactured ; barrels for Canadian manufactures, exported and filled with domestic petroleum and returned ; bells for churches, bismuth, bone ash for the manufacture of manure, bromide, bullion, gold and silver ; bichromate of potash, carriages laden with merchandise, cabinets of coins and models, canvass for the manufacture of floorcloth, gutta percha, cat-gut strings for musical instruments, citrons and rinds for candy ; clothing, being donations for charitable purposes ; coins, gold and silver, except United States silver coin ; communion plate, cotton waste and cotton wool ; diamonds unset, including black diamonds ; dyeing or tinting articles in a crude state ; earths, grass and pulp for the manufacture of paper, vegetable fibre for manufacturing purposes, fish-bait, fish-hooks, lines, fishing tackle, ginseng root, gold beaters' moulds, grease and grease scraps, for manufacturing purposes ; gravels, guano and other animal or vegetable manures, gums, gum arabic, hemlock bark, hemp undressed, hides raw, horse hair, india rubber, indigo, isinglass, glue, ivory, iron masts for ships or barges, iron cables and chains over one-half inch in length, shackled or unshackled ; jute, liquorice, roots, lemons and rinds of lemons for candying ; logs round, and unmanufactured timber not otherwise provided for ; lumber, plank and boards sawn, or box wood, pitch pine ; Spanish cedar, oak, hickory and white wood not shaped, planed or otherwise manufactured ; locomotives, passengers' baggage passing from one country into another, vanilla grass, mica, mineral specimens, models of invention and other improvements in the arts ; Iceland moss, horses, cattle, carriages, harness, under regulations to be provided by the Minister of Customs ; machinery for worsted and cotton mills of kinds that are not manufactured in Canada. I have not touched upon all the changes we propose to make, and they will be carefully read, no doubt, from the Chair, but I have dealt with the larger and more important ones. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Government have endeavoured, and I think the House will agree with me—whether successfully or not—to carry out the policy that we were pledged to inaugurate. We have endeavoured to meet every possible interest—the mining, the manufacturing, and the agricultural interests. We have endeavoured to assist our shipping and ship-building interest, which is in a very depressed condition. We have endeavoured not to injure the lumber interest, because they now have a very important article used by their people at about the same rate of duty they had it before—I refer to pork. They have tea at a cheaper price than before ; they have molasses cheaper. These articles enter largely into consumption with them. They have, as have every other class of exporters in the Dominion, many advantages under the propositions that we are about to submit that they did not enjoy before, in the interest of lumbermen and of commerce generally. The present Government, as well as our predecessors, have expended large sums of money for the improvement of the navigation of our rivers and of our coast, by the erection of lighthouses, and in their maintenance. This, of course, is an advantage to the shipping interests as well. A proposition is to be submitted to the House, which you will find in the Estimates, of extending a telegraph down the St. Lawrence. This proposition was submitted to the people of the Dominion by that able and experienced gentleman, a member of this House. I need not name him, because the interest he has taken is well known. This proposition is in the interest of commerce, and of our shipping, and of humanity. It is in the interest of every industry that exports any article from this country to the old world, because an expenditure of this kind will reduce the rate of charges in the shape of insurance and other charges on the shipping, and that is more absolutely in the interest of the exporter than in the interest of the owner of the ship. But while we have been looking around to see what new modes of taxation might be used in raising additional revenue—and you will observe, Sir, that, by these propositions, we are resorting to no new mode of taxation—it was suggested that the shipping interest might fairly contribute towards the maintenance of the lights. In olden times they did contribute. In some of the Provinces, before the Union, we obtained a sufficient amount from the shipping to maintain these lights, and the hospitals for sick and disabled seamen; but we thought it desirable to give the owners of shipping and the exporters, and, indeed, the importers, and the commerce of the country, the advantage of free lights. In our policy, as just propounded, we have dealt with the agricultural interest, the mining interest, the shipping interest, indirectly with the lumbering interest, and with very many interests, without touching heavily at all upon any other interest; and it does appear to me, Sir, that we have now arrived at the time when it becomes necessary for this country, for this Parliament to decide whether we are to remain in the position we now occupy, with a certainty that, within two years, with the existing laws upon our Statue-book, almost every manufacturing industry in the country will be closed up, and the money invested in them lost. The time has arrived, I think, when it will become our duty to decide whether the thousands of men throughout the length and breadth of this country who are unemployed, shall seek employment in another country, or shall find it in this Dominion; the time has arrived when we are to decide whether we will be simply hewers of wood and drawers of water; whether we will be simply agriculturists raising wheat, and lumbermen producing more lumber than we can use, or Great Britain and the United States will take from us at remunerative prices; whether we will confine our attention to the fisheries and certain other small industries, and cease to be what we have been, and not rise to be what I believe we are destined to be under wise and judicious legislation, or whether we will inaugurate a policy that will, by its provisions, say to the industries of the country, we will give you sufficient protection; we will give you a market for what you can produce; we will say that while our neighbours build up a Chinese wall, we will impose a reasonable duty on their products coming into this country; at all events, we will maintain for our agricultural and other productions, largely, the market of our own Dominion. The time has certainly arrived when we must consider whether we will allow matters to remain as they are, with the result of being an unimportant and uninteresting portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, or will rise to the position, which, I believe Providence has destined us to occupy, by means which, I believe, though I may be over sanguine, which my colleagues believe, though they may be over sanguine, which the country believes are calculated to bring prosperity and happiness to the people, to give employment to the thousands who are unoccupied, and to make this a great and prosperous country, as we all desire and hope it will be.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman give us an estimate of the revenue of the coming year? We have heard nothing of that.

MR. TILLEY: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend. I was not aware that I had passed it over. I have

Mr. MACKENZIE: What I desire was rather an estimate of the products expected under the proposed fiscal changes.

Mr. TILLEY: I thought that would be better explained as we came to the items. I may state, however, that we estimate an increase from the operation of this new tariff of $2,200,000. The Government have been exceedingly anxious, heavy as the imposition of some of the taxes are, that in the future we shall have no deficits. The credit of the country requires, and we believe the country will justify us in collecting such a revenue as will meet the requirements of the country.

MR. TILLEY.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Before you put those resolutions, Sir, I desire to make a few remarks upon the statement we have just heard, and also upon the general policy which is now, for the first time, propounded to a Canadian Legislature. It will not surprise you, Mr. Chairman, or those of my hon. friends who, in former days, were members of the House of Commons of 1873, if I venture to hint to this House that, if we are to judge of the present by the past, we may very well doubt, though we have got the Budget speech, whether we have got the Budget itself after all. Sir, I very well recollect the circumstances attendant on the delivery of the Budget speech of 1873; and, if ever there was an occasion when a Canadian Minister of Finance ought to have made a full and frank statement to the House of Commons, it was at the moment when we were committing ourselves to a huge host of enterprises which every man who knew anything whatever of the real state of Canada knew must tax our resources to the very uttermost. How did the hon. gentleman fulfil his trust on that occasion? He told the House to-day, and truly enough, that he was complimented by gentlemen on this side of the House on the mode in which he fulfilled his task; but he failed to tell the House that he obtained their commendations under false pretences; that, had the true statement which was ultimately submitted to the House been made then; had the facts as they appeared in the closing days of that Session been known at that time, never would a Budget have been so determinedly fought on the floor of the House of Commons as the Budget which the hon. gentleman then submitted. Fortunately for that hon. gentleman circumstances of a very peculiar character wholly diverted public attention from the Budget he then submitted; and his subsequent retirement from public life makes this practically the first public occasion on which he can be taken to task for the mode in which he then performed his duty. Sir, that hon. gentleman, in 1873, made a Budget speech, in which he informed us that the total expenditure in that year would amount to $20,941,183, against estimated receipts of $21,740,000, leaving an apparent sur plus of $800,000, on the fact of the existence of which surplus that hon. gentleman based his refusal to make any alteration in the tariff, or to make, at that time, any further provision for the huge mass of public works to which he was then committing the country. Now, to-day, we heard the hon. gentleman say, and say rightly enough, that it is extremely inexpedient—and I agree with him—to introduce, if it can possibly be avoided, any considerable number of Supplementary Estimates. Unhappily, in this, as, I fear, in a great many other cases, the hon. gentleman's practice lagged greatly behind his precepts. In that same Session, this gentleman, who now objects to the introduction of supplementary estimates, introduced, first of all, in addition to his original estimates, a supplementary estimate for $368,340; then a second supplementary estimate for $57,000; then a third supplementary estimate for $100,000; then, by 36 Victoria, chapters 30 and 41, he added to our permanent liabilities by the assumption of the provincial debts, and by the subsidy to the Province of New Brunswick, $819,349 more. By a provision of chapters 31 and 36 Victoria, he added $300,550 to the annual permanent expenditure of Canada, for salaries and indemnities to members; and, by another Act, he added $418,000 to our annual expenditure by the terms of the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union; and, by a further Act for the organization of the mounted police, he added $200,000 more. So that, by the time we come to add to his estimates the balances which were covered over under Order in Council, we find his estimate of $20,941,000 swollen to $23,689,000. And the surplus of $800,000, on the existence of which the hon. gentleman based his right to avoid imposing increased taxation, was altered, even if he had received every farthing which he estimated for without making any provision for a deficit of $1,684,000, or for various other heavy expenses, which he left behind to be defrayed by his successors. Sir, no speech could well be more instructive than the speech which the hon. gentleman delivered in 1873, and I hope every member of the House, without distinction of party, will make a point of acquainting himself with it, from the first page to the last. The speech we have listened to to-day is the fit supplement of that speech. Then, Sir, from first to last, there was an almost unvaried tone of over-confidence, in spite of every warning. Although the hon. gentleman was shown as clearly as figures could show him; although it was pointed out to him that the very facts on which he relied proved that those large importations, which we were told were to furnish us with an easy means of meeting our future liabilities, were rather a proof of extravagance than of real progress, our cautions were in vain. All through, he showed a complete lack of apprehension of the real state of the case. In some very important particulars, he suppressed important facts, with which he ought to have been acquainted, or with which he was acquainted, and which most assuredly ought to have been brought to the knowledge of the people of this country. To-day we see the reverse of the medal. Here the hon. gentleman is face to face with the results of his own folly. We have to-day an evasion of the responsibility which that hon. gentleman had incurred, and all through his speech there is running a kind of complaint, in a minor key, and, like the royal Dane, he exclaims:

That ever I was born to set it right!”

He tells us the situation has its difficulties. Sir, I do not, for one moment, dispute that. Probably there are few men in this country who are in a better position than I myself to know what the difficulties of that situation are. But, Sir, the difficulties of that situation are not peculiar to this Government. They are in no respect peculiar to this country, nor to the hon. gentleman himself. I doubt whether, all over this continent, he could find one single bank manager, one single head of a great railroad, one single merchant carrying on an important business, or, for that matter, one single man connected with any large industrial establishment, who would not have the same story to tell of difficulties brought about, either by their own act, or by unavoidable misfortunes. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman might, perhaps, deserve our pity, were it not for two considerations, and, first of all, for the course he has taken to-night. Had he come forward and told us, as he might, perhaps, fairly have done, that if, in time past, he had erred, if he had miscalculated the resources of the country; if he had made statements which have not, in the slightest degree, been borne out by the results; that, after all, at that time, he had only reflected the errors of a considerable majority of his countrymen, as, I fear, he must admit he has faithfully reflected a considerable majority of them now—that he regretted his mistake, and desired to let by-gones be by-gones. Had he done so, he might have been entitled to our consideration. The second reason why I cannot admit that the hon. gentleman has any just cause to claim our sympathy is this: that, if there ever was an hon. gentleman who was suffering the direct consequences of his own imprudence, of his own folly, of his own wilful negligence of the commonest precautions which he ought to have used, it is that hon. gentleman himself. Sir, there are two totally different subjects which this House will require to consider on the present occasion. We are called upon to consider what are the causes of the present commercial difficulties with which a considerable portion of the people of this country are now contending, and we are also called upon to consider what are the causes of the financial embarrassments of the Dominion of Canada. Now, as respects the first of these, I have always admitted freely that they were attributable, in part, no doubt, to the fault of our people themselves, and, in part, to unavoidable misfortunes. The other, I have no hesitation in saying, was entirely due to causes of our own creating, notably to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and more especially to that of the present Minister of Finance. Sir, I do not wish unnecessarily to revive old discussions, but I do say this: that our present financial difficulties are due, more than any other cause, to the deliberate wrong-doing of men who sought, by a profligate expenditure of the public funds, to purchase immunity for the betrayal of a great public trust. Let us consider, for one moment, how our immediate financial difficulties, of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, were

were brought about. I will put aside, in dealing with this matter, for the present, the whole question of the scheme for constructing the Pacific Railway, because for that the hon. gentleman, although jointly responsible with his colleagues, is certainly not wholly responsible. At the time that was undertaken he was but a subordinate member of the Cabinet, and I should be loath to hold him completely responsible for the Pacific Railway, knowing, as I do, that he was unable even to control the route of that part of the Intercolonial road which traversed his own Province. What was our condition in 1873? Beyond all question, very considerable dangers awaited us, if the project to which we had been committed, before that hon. gentleman brought down his Budget, had been carried out. But, Sir, till that time, they were far from being irrecoverable. His fault was that he had so complicated matters in 1873 as to render it almost impossible, without great sacrifices on the part of the people, for the man who succeeded to the position of Finance Minister, to prevent our being placed in the position we find ourselves in to-night. What I chiefly blamed the hon. gentleman for was this: I blamed him for allowing himself to be induced, under the then circumstances, to assume the provincial debts, as he then did, to admit Prince Edward Island on the terms he did, and to consent to a large increase of salaries. Now, Sir, the House knows very well, from the hon. gentleman's statement, that we really require, at this moment, to raise barely the sum of $2,000,000 per annum. If they will add together the three sums I have named, $819,000 for the Provincial debts; $400,000, which we paid over annually to Prince Edward Island, and $300,000, the increase of salaries, they will see that an unnecessary expenditure of $1,520,000 a year has been going on for the past six years. They will also see that I am exact in saying that this entire sum of $2,000,000 a year, is justly due, if they add the interest on the nine millions thus uselessly spent to the original $1,520,000, to those acts of that hon. gentleman of which he gave us no sort of notice when he brought down his original Budget in the early part of 1873.

And let me tell my hon. friend that the $2,000,000 a year would cover every deficit which has ever occurred since, and a great deal more than that. It would provide, at this moment, for everything which is really needed to enable us to carry on the affairs of Government; and I say further, that these expenditures, if not absolutely worse than useless, were, at least, mischievous to a very great degree. Moreover, if the hon. gentleman had computed accurately what the additional public works thus proposed involved, he would have found that, for interest alone, the annual addition to the expenditure would be something like $5,000,000. The most just complaint against the hon. gentleman was: that, in the very last days of the Session of 1873, when, to my personal knowledge, at least one third of the members had left Ottawa for good, and when, as he knows right well (and perhaps, that was the reason he delayed his proposal so long), it was utterly impossible to obtain an adequate or proper discussion of measures of that magnitude. Now, Sir, but one word more before I proceed to the more immediate business of this discussion. How were all these things to be paid for? How did the hon. gentleman then propose to meet this enormous expenditure which he confessed he was about to impose upon the people of Canada? Did he talk, then, of diminishing our imports and fostering our national industries? Was the hon. gentleman then dismayed at the balance of trade against us? Why, Sir, in the very closing passage of his speech, he declares that it could not be imagined, for one moment, but that our importations would go on increasing, and that the profits of these increased importations and the revenue so derived would enable us to meet our expenditure, while as for the adverse balance of trade, he hardly thought it worth while to expend more than a few sentences on the fact. What was the adverse balance of trade at that moment? The hon. gentleman has called attention to the fact that there has been for many years a serious adverse balance of trade against the Dominion of Canada. What was that balance in 1873? In that year, we imported $128,000,000 worth of goods, against an export of $89,000,000, so that there was, under the administration of this hon. gentleman himself, an adverse balance of trade (if that be a matter of grave moment,) of $38,221,259. If this question of the balance of trade be the question which is to measure the rule of merit of the two Governments, if it be, as he says, a matter of great moment to readjust this adverse balance of trade, I find that in the last year, during which I had the honour to be Finance Minister, our total importations were £93,000,000 as against $79,323,000 exports, so that our adverse balance of trade then $13,658,000, compared with $38,221,000 in 1873. I do not pretend to say that that adverse balance by any means represents real loss to the country. I have never taken the ground that, on adverse balance of trade could be per se said to represent either the loss or the profit the country made in the transaction. It may show that we are driving a profitable trade, or that we are straining our resources to the utmost, and that our people are blindly pursuing a course of extravagance which threatens grave mischief to the whole country. But I call attention to the fact that, at that very moment, when the balance of trade was heavier against Canada than ever before, the hon. gentleman could tell us that we need not distress ourselves about this, and could look forward to a means of meeting those large engagements in the large increased volume of trade which he declared must eventually take place. I forbear to speak at present of the utterly unprovided-for engagements which that hon. gentleman left behind. Suffice to say now that, the very first step which I took when becoming Finance Minister was to ascertain what were the engagements which Canada would require to defray, in order to do all that the hon. gentleman had pledged to do, and without charging more than the $30,000,000 which he, himself, assumed to be the total cost of the Pacific Railway; I found that, instead of $60,000,000 being required to meet our engagements, we would require to provide $96,000,000. With these facts staring us in the face, with the knowledge how inaccurately the hon. gentleman's calculations came out, I ask this House and I ask the country what grounds have we for believing that the hon. gentleman will be more accurate in his calculations now than in 1873. What grounds have we for blindly trusting ourselves under his guidance to such a leap in the dark as was never before proposed to any people. The hon. gentleman has rather insinuated than actually made divers charges against myself and the Government of which I was a member. I will defer until such time as I can deal with the various items of the Estimates the discussion of some of the points he has brought up. But, at the same time, I will point out certain broad facts which appear in the public records, and in that very volume of accounts which he brought down the other day. I will leave it to all fair-minded, intelligent men in this House or out of it, to say on what ground he can fairly charge the late Government with extravagance or mismanagement, so far, at any rate, as the financial side of the question is concerned. Why, to listen to the hon. gentleman and his friends, we are compelled to assume that, whereas it was an act of great wisdom on their part to add $9,700,000 per annum to the annual expenditure of Canada in seven years (throwing off the difference for Sinking Fund), and an act of still greater wisdom to go out of office leaving engagements wholly unprovided for, involving an addition to our national debt of $96,000,000, and without having provided for six or seven millions of dollars per annum, to meet the interest on that debt, and divers other expenditures which could not be avoided. That, moreover, whereas they had so timed their arrangements that it would be necessary to negotiate great loans for the carrying out these great public works at the precise moment when large sums of existing indebtedness were about to mature in the English market, we are to be deemed guilty of extravagance, because, at the expiration of four years, during which a vast number of new charges had been thrown upon us, and during which the population had increased considerably, we have only been able to reduce the gross expenditure of Canada, allowing for the additional Sinking Fund, by about $250,000, as anyone will see who will compare the expenditure of 1873 for $23,316,000, with the expenditure of the last year, according to the Public Accounts, and simply deduct, as I have a right to ask them to do, the difference of the funds paid on account of the Sinking Fund for these four years; while, if they refer to the ordinary expenditure, they will find that we were able to show a reduction of $1,600,000, and that the $96,000,000 of liabilities which they left behind them have, for all practical purposes, been reduced to $16,000,000, while, in place of a huge mass of liabilities, ranging from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000 per annum, the total amount which needs to be added during the next five years to our annual expenditure should not exceed half a million dollars, irrespective of the sums to be added for the Sinking Fund. The hon. gentleman did not exactly charge the late Government with having been the cause of the depression which unfortunately exists, but he more than insinuated that we were blameworthy because we did not succeed in removing that depression. When he looks abroad and considers the unfortunate position of other countries; when he considers the unfortunate position of England, the country of all countries, which possesses at this moment the greatest amount of accumulated wealth, the most unrivalled advantages of commercial position; which draws, as he himself said, tribute from almost every nation of the earth; if he would look at the position of the United States, which is not, as he gave the House to understand, by any means in a prosperous condition—I wish it were, because I believe that the return of prosperity to the United States would be the best guarantee for the return of prosperity to Canada, but, I am sorry to say, that, in spite of the United States having shaken loose from particular errors and blunders which they committed under the pressure of their civil war, and though they have got rid of that mischievous delusion, their paper currency, and there are signs of a return to prosperity, no man who is in a position to judge of the state of affairs will say that the United States at this moment can, by any stretch of rhetoric, be described as being in a prosperous condition—he would find a better explanation of the true reasons of the depression in this country. Sir, I might ask the hon. gentleman to point to any civilised nation, at this moment, which can be said to be, in a [commercial sense, in a prosperous condition, and the only point on which I can, perhaps, agree with the hon. gentleman was his admission that he believed that the people of Canada had really suffered less than any other country. Now, when we are charged with being responsible for the depression in this country, I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to what that charge really involves. If we are responsible for the depression that exists in Canada, it necessarily follows that we are responsible for the depression in the United States, which has been so great a factor in annihilating a very large branch of our trade and grievously crippling the rest. It would follow that we are responsible for the low rates of freight all over the world, which have resulted in great injury to the shipping trade and great loss, not only to shipowners, but to the large number of seamen employed by them. It would follow that we are responsible for the shrinkage in values to which the hon. gentleman very correctly called the attention of the House; that we are responsible for the universal fall of wages, not only on this continent but over the world, and, by consequence, for the rise in the value of gold. And this is a point to which I would call the hon. gentleman's attention, because, as I shall show him, it bears to a very great extent on the correctness of his argument in favour of substituting a specific for an ad valorem duty. Gold, which was a few years ago falling in value, has begun of late considerably to rise in value. To those whose indebtedness is not large, any alteration in the standard of value is a matter of small importance; but, to a people in the position in which Canada finds itself, with two-thirds of the total income practically pledged to the payment of interest on debts, subsidies, and such obligations as our treaty engagements with the Indians, a rise or fall in the value of gold is a consideration of the first importance—one to be seriously considered by the hon. gentleman and by all who desire to comprehend, with some degree of distinctness and accuracy, what are the conditions of the problem with which he has undertaken to deal. I desire to correct one or two errors which the hon. gentleman has committed, as to the position in which this country now stands. I admit that it requires the exercise of energy and caution, but I do not admit that it is one which would justify any man in adopting a desponding tone with respect to the ability of Canada to discharge every legitimate engagement, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that the late Government were fully prepared to deal with that question, although, in raising the requisite amount of revenue, we undoubtedly would have advocated a policy of so obtaining that revenue as not, in any respect, to add unnecessarily to the burthens of the people; not to take one penny more out of their pockets than was absolutely necessary to fill the Treasury of the Dominion. But, I may add, we were not prepared to injure any part of the community by the imposition of unjust taxes, and, moreover, we had laid it down as a cardinal maxim of policy that it was our duty, under existing circumstances, not to impose any taxes but such as could easily be removed and removed with the minimum of disturbance to all those numerous interests which are, of necessity, affected by any change of a material character in the tariff of the country. Sir, what we declined to do was this: to falsely arrogate to ourselves the power which Omnipotence may possess, but which Omnipotence, at any rate, has never chosen to exercise—the power, by artificial legislation, of relieving men from the consequence of their own blunders and their own folly. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman called our attention to the Estimates he has brought down. I desire to say a few words with regard to them before proceeding to the consideration of some other questions; and I warn the hon. gentleman, speaking from my own experience, that he will find it a vast deal easier to cut down those Estimates than to limit the expenditure under them. It may be possible, apparently, to reduce your Estimates, for a certain time, by allowing important public works to run into disrepair, and by ceasing to provide efficiently for the maintenance of certain services; but, almost invariably, wherever that is done, you find it necessary, at no distant day, to increase three or four-fold the expenditure for the purpose of making good such imaginary saving. Looking at the statement which the hon. gentleman has submitted to us, I perceive that he brings down a total estimate of $23,427,000. Now, Sir, I would be ready to say that the hon. gentleman has prepared those estimates with reasonable economy, did I know—what I am afraid we shall not know till this House is about to be prorogued—what Supplementary Estimates the hon. gentleman will find necessary to bring down for the service of 1879-80. I observe that the Estimates he has brought down are $23,427,000, as against $23,440,000, which were the original Estimates brought down by myself in the Session of the preceding year. It may be that he will be more fortunate than I was—that he may be able to resist the demands of his numerous friends for various little additions to the Estimates in various places. I promise him before hand that I will give him my best assistance in any endeavour to defeat all such attempts to add to the Estimates, more particularly if they are made by the gentlemen from Halifax, who gave me so much trouble last year, and who succeeded, greatly to my disgust, in compelling me to insert one or two items like the service from Halifax to Cork, which considerably increased the total, and I congratulate the hon. the Finance Minister on having had the courage to eliminate them from the existing Estimates. But, Sir, at present I desire to deal more particularly with the considerable Supplementary Estimates, which the hon. gentleman says it will be his duty to bring down for the current year, and will, which he says, swell the Estimates to the sum of $24,000,000. With regard to the comparatively small estimates for the Dominion Lands and Post-Office, I have nothing to say at present; doubtless, when we come to discuss these, full information will be given as to his reasons for such additions. But fully one-half of the total amount is demanded by the Minister of Public Works, who asks $187,000 to be added to the sum required for collections on the Public Works during the current year. Now, Sir, I am not in a position to say how far this may be a just demand. It may be possible that new traffic has been developed, as was the case last year, which renders it fair that this sum should be asked for. But, if what has come to our ears be true, as to the failure of discipline on that road, in consequence of the dismissal of the very able man in charge of it a few months ago, I am afraid we must put down a great part of this $187,000, as the price the country has to pay for the loss of Mr. Bridges as Superintendent of that road; and I am afraid, from my knowledge of the great ability of that gentleman, that this sum is only an instalment of the price that will have to be paid for gratifying the malice of his political opponents. The item of $116,000 for Public Works is, as the hon. gentleman admitted, more than neutralised by the saving of $163,000, for which he proposes to take re-votes. If my memory is correct, the entire sum of $75,000, charged for redemption of debt, is due to a certain arrangement, made either by New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, with the Messrs. Baring, when they originally contracted the debt. Now, although I have no particular objection to the hon. gentleman making this a charge against the ordinary expenses of management, I would suggest to him that it might be worth his while to consider whether, as this was, to all intents and purposes, part of the original commission paid for the contraction of that debt, he would not be justified, in the case of last and the present year, in placing that as a charge on capital account. Of course, it was an engagement with which I had nothing to do, and which I suppose the hon. gentleman has satisfied himself, must be carried out under the terms of the agreement, or originally made with the agents. But it is, notwithstanding, one of those rather dubious items, which, in my own opinion, might not unfairly be charged to capital account. With regard to the saving the hon. gentleman has made, it appears to me that it does not require any great administrative ability on the part of the Minister of Public Works, to save $200,000 in the annual expenditure, from the simple fact, that we have completed the replacement of iron by steel rails on the Intercolonial Railway, and this saving on the Public Works appears to arise simply from the fact that these renewals are closed. Nor is it evidence of great administrative ability that we are not to have a general election this year, which is, perhaps, all the better after the tariff we have heard read to-night. Surely, the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that, because the railway is completed, because we have no general election and no expenses for the Paris Exhibition to provide for, the saving so effected show that they are entitled to any particular credit. I see no evidence of administrative ability in regard to any of the items, and, although I perceive in some cases, as in the contingent expenses of the Departments, he has made an attempt, which I hope will be successful, to keep the expenditures within just limits; yet, if the information we have had of the doings within this very Chamber, be correct, I am afraid the good acts of the hon. gentleman are likely to come very far short of his intentions. Then, there are divers matters in the background to which the hon. the Finance Minister has not alluded, which may materially affect the real position of this country as regards our expenditure for 1879 and 1880. But the other day the hon. the First Minister took through the House a Bill which enables him to add 200 men to the Mounted Police, by which a possible expenditure of from $150,000 to $200,000 a year may be inflicted on the country. We know, also, that negotiations are going on for the acquisition by hon. gentlemen opposite of the River du Loup branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, of which we heard nothing in the hon. gentleman's speech, but which, if carried out, may involve a great addition to our expenditure. Those Supplementary Estimates we are, of course, not entitled to attack till they are brought down; but there is one remarkable item to which the hon. gentleman made no allusion—that is the item of $10,000,000 for new public works chargeable to capital. I see no provision in the Estimates for the contraction of a new loan, and I think it more than probable, unless he is determined to suspend all our great public works, that a very considerable addition will have to be made to the taxes to meet the interest on the new loan which he may find himself obliged to contract in London, or elsewhere, in the course of a few months. And, Sir, this brings me to the loan which the hon. Finance Minister lately contracted in England. Now, I am bound to say that he did not, as his partisans have done, claim that that loan was a good one. He did not venture to tell the House that he had been successful in the operation. He expressly left it to me to defend his loan, a responsibility which I am not inclined to accept unreservedly or without very considerable explanations on my part. Unfortunately there can be no doubt, whatever, that the loan cost the people of Canada very considerably more than any of the three previous loans contracted by myself. I am quite prepared to admit that hon. gentleman went to London at a time when it was not very easy to float any ordinary loan on favourable terms; but I am not at all prepared to admit that the hon. gentleman took the best means of floating his loan; on the contrary, I say that the hon. gentleman, when he went to London, found himself most grievously hampered, in consequence of the very injudicious policy he had adopted, following in the wake of his colleagues with regard to the financial agents of the Dominion, and with regard to the best means of floating loans on the London market. Now, Sir, before I go further, I desire to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to a return which was lately laid on the table of the House. In that return it is stated that the Department of Finance have no information as to whether the agents of the Dominion or the Bank of Montreal took any portion of the loan which was negotiated in London on the 9th of December last; and I ask the Minister of Finance whether he is prepared to state here, in his place, whether the agents bought or took any portion of that loan.

MR. TILLEY: In answer to the inquiry of the hon. gentleman, I may say that I heard, from a director of the Bank of Montreal, that they had taken a portion. I do not know whether the agents took any.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Then, I must say, that the hon. gentleman ought to have known; and I may remind the House that I have never refused information as to whether any part of the loans floated in London were taken by the financial agents, though I was not able to give the names of ordinary subscribers. With respect to the rate which was obtained for this loan, I have a few words to say. The hon. gentleman offered a loan of three millions in London, one-half on the Imperial guarantee, and one-half in our own credit, which he succeeded in disposing of at £96 11s. From that sum were to be deducted allowances to a very considerable amount, leaving the net proceeds of that loan about 95½. Therefore, that hon. gentleman received, in round numbers, £2,860,000. From that should be deducted the sum of £1,537,500—being, at 1.04½, the amount which was received for the Imperial four per cent. guaranteed loan. The result, therefore, of this operation is that we have netted for £1,500,000 of our Canadian four per cent. bonds, the magnificent sum of £1,290,000, or about £86—between three and four per cent. less than the rate obtained in previous transactions. Now, Sir, I am not going to compare that loan with the loan effected by his predecessor, Sir John Rose. The latter obtained for Imperial four per cents., 110, and for our 5 per cents., 90 being the highest retail quotation. But, Sir, what I would call attention to is this: When, under circumstances of a somewhat difficult character, I effected a loan at the nominal price of 91—really at about 90—I very well recollect I was severely criticised by the hon. gentlemen opposite, because I failed to obtain the highest rate of retail quotations then rating in the London market. My action on that occasion was compared with the action of the agents of the Australian Colonies, and great indignation was expressed because we did not obtain as high a price for our securities as several Australian Colonies did for theirs. Well, Sir, about the 1st December last the Australian Colonies were selling their four per cents. actual business done, at something like 99¾.

MR. TILLEY: What were they quoted at in January?

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am quoting from the Economist of the 30th November and 7th December, and if the hon. gentleman desires, as I happen to have the Economist here, I will be happy to allow him to inspect the quotation. I will give actual business done. I find, Sir, that on the 30th November the New South Wales four per cents. were sold, last business done, at 99¾, and I find that on the same day our Canadian four per cents. were sold, last business done, at 92¼ ex-dividend. Now, I am not disposed to deal very hardly with the hon. gentleman in this matter. I admit that he is perfectly correct in saying that he went to London at a time which was unfavourable for the loan, but what I desire to call attention to—and I do not do this so much with a view to censure him, as with the view, if possible, of inducing him to emancipate himself from the trammels cast about him by the action of his colleagues—the danger of confining himself to any particular mode of floating a loan. I must say that the hon. gentleman, or his advisers, committed a grave error of judgment in attempting to float a loan at a time when the market was unfavourable for such operations in the manner he did. He ought to have taken every precaution to secure success, and if he had done so, Canada would not have been subject to the humiliation of seeing half of her loan, and that, too, a loan of which bore the important guarantee, fail to be subscribed for on the London Stock Exchange. I may take another occasion for discussing this question in some detail, but the hon. gentleman more than insinuated that I was responsible for the fact that he was not able to introduce this loan at an earlier date. As the charge has been made against me on several occasions, I take this opportunity of asking him to point out to this House when he would have desired to make that loan? Does he pretend to say that I was bound, in May or June, just six months before the money was required, to go to London and effect a loan? Why, Sir, if I had done so, and had a part of that money been brought to Canada and distributed among Canadian financial institutions, just prior to a general election, every hon. gentleman knows that every hustings would have rung with accusations of the foulest corruption against the Minister of Finance. It would have been alleged, from one end of Canada to the other, that we were about to bribe the electors, and I would have been censured then, as indeed I was censured before, for borrowing money far in advance of my real wants, and that, too, when, as these worthy gentlemen would not have failed to point out, I had not only the fishery award, but $11,000,000 of guaranteed loan to fall back on in any event. Or, if the hon. gentleman gives up the idea of making a loan in June, would he have wished me to have effected a loan after the 17th September? Would he not have declared, and justly too, that I had no right, especially after the opinions the hon. gentleman's colleagues had expressed on the floor of this House, to interfere further in the matter? I am aware, Sir, it is the unfortunate necessity of our political system—it is one of those things which necessarily occur when any violent interruption takes place in the political world; that many delicate negotiations like those, at that time in progress, for a new loan, must be interrupted, and, I may add that I regretted at the time that it was not in my power, as I would gladly have done, if circumstances had allowed it, to carry out those negotiations; but every one who remembers the line of criticism adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to the steps taken by me in floating former loans, will at once perceive that they had made it utterly impossible either for me to offer my services, or for themselves to accept any proposal of the kind. There is one point to which I desire to call the particular attention of the hon. gentleman. I do not know whether he was aware, although, if my memory serves me, I had communicated my intention to their agents and to Sir John Rose, that I was determined to make the most strenuous efforts to get rid of the necessity of increasing the sinking fund. I am not going to attack the hon. gentleman, under the circumstances, for not having done so, but I would call his attention to the fact that, at the present moment, the sinking fund of the Dominion of Canada is by far the largest which any nation possesses. Our sinking fund is, or will very soon be, $1,200,000 per annum, or something like five per cent. on the average income that the hon. gentleman expects to receive. That is out of all proportion too large. It is clear to everybody that a sinking fund of $1,200,000, increasing at the rate of $50,000 or $60,000 a year, is one altogether larger than Canada, or any other country in its position, can really require. When next the hon. gentleman has occasion to go to London, I trust he will take the opportunity of releasing us from the necessity of paying any additional sinking fund on new loans. The necessity, or, at any rate, the extreme desirability of this is obvious. $1,200,000, if continued for thirty-five years, would enable us to redeem $118,000,000 of our existing liabilities. Under these circumstances, if properly explained to English capitalists, I think he would have no difficulty in getting rid of the necessity of paying any more sinking fund. Before leaving the matter, I must add that, though I do not at all desire to underrate the difficulty which must always exist in floating a loan in London at such a time as that referred to, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that loans bearing Imperial guarantees are always most eagerly sought after in the London market at the moment when ordinary securities are most in disfavour, and that, by a judicious use of that circumstance, the hon. gentleman might have done much better than he did. Sir, at the very moment when the hon. gentleman was effecting his loan, I find that Imperial three per cents. stood at 96, and I venture to say that, when they stood at 96, there ought to be no difficulty whatever in obtaining 105, or thereabouts, for Imperial 4 per cent. guaranteed loans. And now to come to a question of vastly more importance, as involving the whole future of the Dominion of Canada, than any question of a few per cent. more or less, in the floating of a Canadian loan. Sir, we have had, to-night, expounded to us the long sought for National Policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite; and when I heard that policy, I felt that in one respect, at any rate, the hon. gentleman had fully explained the cause of his delay. I can well understand that as the thing grew on his vision from time to time—as he began to realise the full enormity and iniquity of the project—I can very well understand that the hon. gentleman, like Frankenstein, was appalled at the spectre he had invoked. I doubt if there was ever brought down in any civilised country—unless in the United States, where, as is known, they dispense with any responsible parent for a scheme of the kind—I doubt if there was ever brought down a scheme so complicated, so intricate, a scheme which the hon. gentleman will find it so difficult to work out practically, and of the actual results of which he, himself, admits he is quite unable, at this moment, to make any accurate estimate. My objection to this scheme goes deep. I object to it, not merely on the ground of the increase of taxes it involves, or of its complicated details, but on a much higher ground than that. I deny entirely the justice of the course which the majority of the House appear, I fear, determined to follow. I admit their power, but I deny their right. I say that the principle which I have heard enunciated by the hon. the Minister of Finance—the principle that it is the duty of the Government to enable certain sections of the community to tax the rest of the people for their private gain—is of all others the principle which a free people should least submit themselves to. I say that it is the very essence of all injustice. I say that they could not be fair in the application of such a principle no matter how earnestly they might try. And I tell the hon. gentleman that when he says that, by any readjustment of the tariff, it is possible for him, or for any Government, that ever existed, to protect, by additional taxes, men who find the market for their productions in other countries, he commits himself to a palpable absurdity. I tell him that, if he wishes to protect the great interests of the country, if he desires to protect the lumbermen in the extreme prostration of their business, if he desires to do justice to the fishermen, to the shipping interests, to the great carrying interests of the country, or even to the agriculturists, to whom he has given a sham protection in this tariff, if he does honestly desire this, there is but one expedient for him to take, and that is the old and well-known expedient—not of giving a miserable drawback on manufactured articles, but of giving a direct bounty on the articles produced by these classes. If you desire to be honest, if you desire to do justice to the classes I have named, there is but this way of doing it, and, if you plead that this is an impossibility, that nothing you can do will enable you really to recoup to these men what you are now taking out of their pockets by your present tariff,—then, I say, that that statement may be true enough, but that had you made the attempt we could at least have admitted that, great as was your folly, you were, at any rate, honest in your folly, and not guilty of deliberately deceiving those who placed you where you are. These are the classes whom, of all others, a statesman should desire to protect, and I repeat, there is but one way for you to do it. Estimate if you can—I admit it will be a task of a great deal of difficulty—how much you are going to enhance the cost of production of these men's products, by this tariff you have brought down, and then pay these men a proportionate bounty on the articles they produce. This special legislation, such as we have now got to deal with, is inconceivably bad. It is the very thing which every free country has always fought against. I say that you are committing a gross retrogression, you are going back for centuries, although I admit that the hon. gentlemen opposite—some of them—are the very men for their work, and that it will be nothing strange for them to convert their dupes into their serfs. But, when the people come to understand what is now being proposed, the chances of my hon. friend ever succeeding in regaining his place in this House is, if I know anything of the temper of his constituents, problematical to the last degree.

AN HON. MEMBER: What about your own constituency?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am afraid I paid too much attention to other people's constituencies. I fear there is no doubt that if I had devoted myself to my own old constituency for three or four weeks immediately preceding the election, I would not have had the honour of representing the noble riding which I now represent, but which, I may say, for the information of the hon. gentleman, I entered an utter stranger, hardly knowing a single soul therein, on the 14th October, and left it in eighteen days their representative, by a majority of four hundred votes. I tell the hon. gentleman that this policy of his, dangerous under any circumstances, is likely to be most peculiarly dangerous in our case. Were we an isolated community, like Australia, were we separated by five or six thousand miles of sea from any neighbouring country, then I could understand that such an experiment might be safely played out without risk of violent interference. But what is our position? Every man here knows that Canada is a country which we have found great difficulty in consolidating. Every man knows that, from one end of Canada to the other, there are many discordant elements; that we comprise within our borders large classes who differ in race, differ in religion, differ in language, differ in almost every way in which civilised men can differ from each other. You know that there are numerous conflicting interests, that there are great geographical difficulties to be overcome, that our Eastern Provinces are separated from our central ones by a large track of uninhabitable country, and that, when you go westward again, you have a very long stretch of similar country, which, for many years, cannot be bridged over by a railway, and that we are dependent for the means of keeping up communication with the North-West, at least for one half of the year, on the privilege of passing through a foreign country. And, under all these circumstances, knowing full well that our political position is, at the present moment, of a most precarious character, you are entering on a policy which seems purposely contrived to exasperate all these difficulties, and to split our new Confederation into a thousand pieces. Do not let any man imagine that only mere pecuniary results are involved in this tariff. These may be affected to a great degree, but I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that vastly more important results are involved here. If this country has come to that pass that it requires to be governed by a system of paternal rule, then, I say,—and if I could get at the real sentiments of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, they would agree with me in that,—then, I say, that this country is not fit for a Federal system. I say that our whole system is on trial, if you choose to put this tariff into force. I know that, in time past, a great deal of the clamour which arose against the late Government arose really from ignorance; arose from the people not having been trained—yes, from ignorance in the House and out of the House. I say, a great deal of it arose from this fact, that our people were untrained, unaccustomed to a Federal system; that they did not know how to separate responsibilities attaching to the Local Governments and to municipalities from those attaching to the Dominion of Canada. And, I say, it was largely from overlooking these facts, that a great deal of unjust clamour arose against us because we were unable to produce prosperity which, for our own sakes, if for no higher considerations, we must have been most earnestly desirous to secure. I must remind the hon. gentleman of the manner in which he and his colleagues obtained power. I am willing to admit that, though they have certainly not redeemed all their pledges, although they could not, by any possibility, redeem them all, I am willing to admit that they have gone great lengths in particular directions. But all who paid any attention to or took any part in the political discussions of the last few months, will remember the magnificent professions that were made on the part of the hon. gentlemen and their followers. We were told that, if they could get back to power immediate confidence would be restored, the price of stocks would go up, the price of grain would rise, factories were to be established in every village, the United States were to be terrified into submission, and, failing that, we were to have reciprocity of trade or reciprocity of tariffs. Sometimes a presumptuous mortal dared to ask how all these good things were to be paid for, and suggestions were made that if, as the hon. gentleman proposed to do, you put prohibitive tariffs on all goods which could be manufactured in Canada, and did not increase the tax on the goods that cannot be manufactured here, there would be serious difficulties in the matter of the revenue. Why, I think the hon. the First Minister suggested that, under the prosperity he was to introduce, every working man would have as much brandy as he pleased, and every working man's wife would have as many silk dresses as she liked, and in that way the funds would be provided for carrying on the Government of the country; that I suppose being the hon. gentleman's reading of the good old Roman maxim for the government of the multitude, "Panem et circenses." These, we were told, would be the visible fruits, the first results of the change of Government and of the introduction of the National Policy. I need not tell the House that stocks, so far from going up, have gone on shrinking until they are now something like 30 or 40 below what they were on the 17th of September. The prices of grain have fallen, our cattle are threatened with pleuro-pneumonia, and the United States obstinately decline to be frightened at any price. It is true we have had one gain, we have realised a plenteous crop of official assignees, being perhaps the only act of the hon. gentleman which indicates a realising sense of the probable ultimate fruits of this policy. What are the demands of the country? Their demands, as I understand them, are two-fold. First, the people require, as they have a right to require, that the hon. gentlemen shall provide the ways and means for discharging those engagements into which they formerly entangled the country, contrary to our protest, contrary to our warning, contrary to all experience, and contrary to every indication which they ought to have gathered from the signs of the times. The second is, that the Government must give us the prosperity which they promised, and which they pledged themselves should be restored to us as soon as they got back to power. How do these hon. gentlemen propose to do it? As I understand the case, before you can expect to remove a disease it is necessary, to some extent, to understand the causes which produced the malady of which you complain. Now, so far as I can judge, the chief economic blunders which Canada is suffering from may be briefly summed up as these: Unfortunately, in Canada, in common with almost every English-speaking country, our people have been guilty (there is no use in denying it) of much extravagant speculation and of the folly of locking up a great amount of capital they could very ill spare in unproductive works of all kinds, both public and private. Any man who chooses to look at the Returns of Trade and Navigation for the last few years, and particularly for the years from 1870-74, during which we had an adverse balance of $108,000,000 against us, will see that there assuredly was extravagant speculation, that there was a great deal of undue importation on the part of the people of this country. That, Sir, was one cause, and a very material cause, of the distress of which the hon. gentleman complains. There is another cause, springing no doubt, in part, from honourable motives, but which has had a very material effect in injuring the prosperity of the people of Canada, and that is the unfortunate aversion of many of our people to the honourable employment of agriculture, or, indeed, to manual labour of any sort. We know that all through North America, in Canada as well as in the United States, a vast number of men who might be usefully employed as farmers have crowded into our towns and cities much to their own injury, and to the injury of their competitors in business, and thereby they have induced, to a considerable extent, an overgrowth of our towns, which has resulted disastrously to the best interests of our country. As to the first point, I do not believe that there is a single manager of a large bank, or wholesale house in Canada, who would not admit candidly, if any hon. gentleman chose to put the question, that for many years together there was both an excessive over importation, and an excessive stimulus to all kinds of unproductive expenditure going on in this country. It is a matter of common notoriety that it has been for a long time a rare thing to find a business man in Canada who would content himself with attending to his own legitimate occupation, and who was not more or less engaged in speculations alien thereto. There are very few localities, at any rate, in my own Province, where there has not been a great amount of unproductive expenditure, a great desire to plunge into enterprises from which no return could reasonably be expected in a very long period. While, as to the notorious aversion of many of our people to manual labour, if any one looks at the Census Returns for 1871, he will see this remarkable fact staring him in the face: that, out of 700,000 able-bodied men there were at that time about 75,000, or more than 10 per cent., apparently engaged in wholly unproductive occupations, such as those of lawyers and doctors—if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) will allow me to include them in that class—or put down as engaged in commercial occupations, or as tradesmen of various classes, and that precisely the same thing has occurred in the United States. I know that many hon. gentlemen have chosen to deliberately pervert my words as to the overgrowth of towns and cities, and I beg expressly to declare that no man is or can be more anxious to promote the legitimate increase of our towns than myself; but I say, that when you consider that the census of 1871 shows that out of a population of about 3,400,000, about 800,000 were collected in towns and cities in the Dominion of Canada, you will see that we possessed our full proportion of urban population. We know that that population has increased to a considerable extent in the years which have elapsed since then; and the hon. gentleman can do this country no greater disservice than to adopt a policy which would prevent our people from engaging in agriculture, and would encourage them to betake themselves in the future, as well as in the past, to towns and cities. If hon. gentlemen must legislate, if hon. gentlemen are determined to interfere in every trade, business and avocation of life, if they will go back to the middle ages for a policy, I advise them, at least, to be consistent. If our forefathers, in their wisdom or unwisdom, determined to shut out foreign competition, they, likewise, determined to regulate domestic competition; and I recommend the Minister of Finance, if the Government are determined to keep the people prosperous in despite of themselves, to take a leaf from that early legislation. I advise him to regulate the domestic competition, from which many of our people suffer so much. I do not think it would do much more harm if he were to regulate the number of those legal worthies who are licensed to set Her Majesty's subjects by the ears, or who are licensed to kill them secundum artem, or of tradesmen to adulterate cheap goods. There is not one whit more mischief, or one whit more tyrannical interference, in such a step than in the present policy of the Government, and, for the matter of that, I rather think that the Minister of Public Works used to preside over a body of gentlemen who had strong views as to confining the right of killing Her Majesty's subjects to duly licensed practitioners. Sir, when I consider the magnitude of the issues involved, and the general scope of the policy which the Minister of Finance now proposes, which is, practically, a revolution, I must say that I think the hon. gentleman fails altogether to recognise the great gravity of the situation. Has he thought out at all the effects likely to be produced by this interference with every class of business in Canada. Has he considered the effect that will be produced on our revenue. Has he considered the stimulus which he will undoubtedly give to smuggling?—of which our custom officials could give too many proofs, if they confessed all they knew of our own dealings with the United States in times past? Has he considered how it will affect the great interests I have indicated? How it will affect our political relations—a matter that will require his most careful consideration and that of his colleagues in the Government. How it will affect and alter the whole distribution of wealth in this country. If he has really thought out all this, I must repeat he gave very little evidence in his address that he had fairly considered how vast an alteration, how great a revolution, and how tremendous a change he proposed thus suddenly to introduce in the whole business relations of the country. As for the tariff itself, though I paid all the attention to it I possibly could, I can only now speak in very general terms. I regret that the hon. gentleman did not find it convenient to have it printed and placed in our hands, although, I suppose, if as he says, changes were being made in it from time to time, even up to the very last hour, he may have considered it inexpedient to trust it in the hands of the printers too long in advance. Sir, in times gone by, in the early part of the present century, the Government of the United States saw fit to introduce a tariff somewhat similar to this. That tariff is familiar to students of American history, as the "tariff of abominations;" and it has been admitted by competent judges to have been one of the main causes which alienated the North from the South, and to have been largely instrumental in producing the great civil war from which that country suffered so much. I do not know that this rises to the dignity of the American tariff I have named, but the Canadian student may, perhaps, fairly describe it as a "tariff of corners." There is scarcely one single proposal in which men accustomed to deal with such questions, will fail to see concessions to some particular clique, to some particular interest, to some prominent political partisan, or to some particular class whom it is desirable, for political reasons, to conciliate. How or in what manner that tariff has been evolved from the mind of the presiding genius, it might be impertinent in me to speculate. You have admissions here, concessions there, and injustice everywhere. The hon. gentleman appears, in framing the tariff, according to his own confession, to have adopted a plan somewhat similar, to what Carlyle declares to be the impossible problem, namely, out of the united action of a community of dishonest men to evolve an honest policy. I should say that the principle predominant in the mind of the hon. gentleman has been: Get political influence—revenue if you can, but political influence anyhow." The hon. gentleman talks of his good intentions. He tells us, and I do not doubt it, that he is sincerely desirous of promoting the welfare of his country by the proposals he has made. Well, Sir, I am here to judge of his acts not of his motives. The hon. gentleman's intentions may be good; they may be as excellent, indeed, as if he had taken a contract to pave the whole of the broad path, which, I am afraid, will lead to our political and financial perdition at his sole charge; but that will not relieve us from the consequences. This tariff, so far as we know it—and he says we only know a part of it yet—appears to me to be the most extraordinary conglomeration ever put together. I think the hon. gentleman will find it a matter of the extremest difficulty to provide himself with the experts, who alone can put this tariff into operation; and I fear that the additional sum demanded for Customs will be all too small to enable him to carry his intentions into effect. It reminds me of nothing so much as the contents of the witches' cauldron in Macbeth:—

"Eye of newt, and toe of frog,
Wool of bat, and toe of dog,
Adder's fork, and blind worm's stung,
Lizard's leg, and owlet's wing:—
For a charm of powerful trouble,
Like a hell-broth, boil and bubble,"

with the hon. gentleman as the first witch, to keep the cauldron stirring, and the father of all unjust tariffs looking on, well pleased, in the not remote background. If there is any class of our community who may expect to derive benefit from this tariff, doubtless it is the manufacturers of Canada. Now, of what do they complain? What is the cause of this depression? Why is it they assert that they are unprosperous at present, and find a difficulty in making both ends meet? That alleged cause, as he well knows, is the unfair competition to which, they assert, they are exposed, and against which, they say, an average tariff of seventeen and a half per cent. is no adequate protection. I tell these gentlemen that this tariff is going to afflict them with competition to a far worse degree than anything they have now; that they will find that this kind of tariff, as it has done in the United States, will infallibly produce the most vehement domestic competition, and a competition as much worse in its results for them as a civil war is sure to be worse than a foreign war. If they knew their true interest—and here I would observe that I am speaking of those only who propose to go on manufacturing—because there are two classes of manufacturers concerned. There are first, the sagacious men, who know that, being on the ground, and having secured a good start, they can, under just such a tariff, retire after a very short time, with a fortune, and with these I have little to do. There is also a class of men who desire to make a living by manufacturing, and who are likely to go on manufacturing, whom we do not sufficiently consider. Those men, whether they know it or not, are signing their death warrant when they consent to a tariff which must assuredly create here, as it did in the United States, a most intense home competition, in place of a very moderate foreign competition. Now, Sir, practically speaking, what you do by this tariff, is to discourage by law, in the case of manufacturers, self-reliance, ability, invention and superior industry. You encourage them to think that the one thing needful to secure in a manufacturing business, is to secure, rightly or wrongly, political influence. I know, to their honour be it said, that there are many manufacturers throughout Canada, who acted honestly and honourably throughout the late election, and who, though they may have believed that their own individual interests would be served by deserting their party principles, still held fast to these principles through good report and evil report. But I know, also, there were many other manufacturers who offered themselves for sale as shamelessly as it was possible for men to do. They were as frankly cynical about the matter as the Norman chief, who told the French Archbishop who proposed to convert him to the true faith.

Are those which give him most.”

So these gentlemen's politics were, as they openly declared: “The politics which would give most,” and no doubt they did exercise a most powerful influence in displacing my hon. friend, and of enabling hon. gentlemen opposite to return to power. Sir, it may seem a paradox, but I think it can be said most truly, that, since the days of Confederation, there, probably, never was a contest in Canada in which less hard cash was spent in direct bribes to the electors, or in which more corrupt and debasing influences have been used against us than in the late struggle. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman what is to be the cost of all this. I doubt much if the hon. gentleman has ever taken into serious consideration what is the amount which Canada has to pay, even under the present moderate tariff of 17½ per cent. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us, not many hours since, that were this tariff not adopted, every manufactory in Canada would be closed in two years. Sir, I had the curiosity, not very long ago, to enquire from a gentleman, himself a very large shareholder in a very important cotton manufactory, what was the real condition of this manufactory under the existing 17½ per cent. tariff. As a practical illustration will convey to the House a correct knowledge of the working of the old tariff far better than a theoretical discussion, I call the attention of hon. members to the facts which that gentleman was kind enough to supply me with. He told me that the total capital employed in that factory amounted to $300,000. The business done in 1878 was $430,000, and the net profits (not the gross) amounted, under the 17½ per cent. tariff, to the miserable figures of $76,000, a paltry 25 per cent. for an industry which then employed 270 hands. These, doubtless, are the kind of industries that were to be extinguished within two years under the 17½ per cent. tariff, and this tariff will give them an additional bounty of 12½ per cent., if I correctly took down the figures of that hon. gentleman. Sir, I believe the real state of the case is this, that of all classes in Canada, excepting the agricultural classes, those who suffered least from the hard times were those manufacturers who were conducting their business prudently and properly. They got their materials cheaper and their labour cheaper. The rate of interest was not raised against them, and they had a fair opportunity of carrying on their business, no matter what foreign competition might be brought against them. The lumber interest, the shipping interest, and the commercial interest, have especially suffered in the immediate past, and I ask by what possible process the hon. gentleman purposes to help and protect these three classes. If his tariff has an effect at all for good, that effect will be to aid those who least require it. It has given another illustration to the scriptural doctrines: “To him that hath shall be given, and to him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath.” And I would say this to my manufacturing friends: Surely they have already uncertainties enough in the ordinary course of trade, and if they will voluntarily and deliberately add to the uncertainties of which they already complain, still further uncertainties, by mixing up their affairs with the oscillations of political parties, they have only themselves to thank for the great and serious disasters which will surely result from such a course. This tariff assuredly cannot stand. Manufacturers will obtain no permanent relief from it. For one, two or three years they may succeed in making considerable profit out of the operations of the tariff, but in the end they will find that it was the greatest misfortune to encourage the undue home competition which will inevitably take the place of the foreign competition of which they complain. Nor can they, with any degree of justice, raise the plea of vested interests, which has been often used to prevent alterations of the tariff as it stood. Where men have created a business under the operation of the tariff framed for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the whole people, I admit a great deal may be said against any violent alteration or interference with what has been the settled policy of the country. But when men deliberately sell themselves to this or that political party for the avowed purpose of taxing the rest of the community, for their private benefit, there are no vested rights in such case, though there may be vested wrongs enough for the people, when they come to their senses, to redress. Sir, let us consider some of the propositions which this hon. gentleman has submitted. First of all, let me say a few words on the very difficult and very debated question of the sugar duties. Now, I have always taken the position that sugar ought to be dealt with mainly from a revenue standpoint. Although not, perhaps, an absolute necessary of life, it is precisely one of those things which enter largely into the general consumption of every family. Our only justification for taxing sugar as heavily as we do, is, that we raise $3,000,000 from it, which amount is nearly one-fourth of the whole customs duty; and, therefore, you cannot, by any possibility, afford, just now, to deprive yourselves of any considerable portion of that sum. There is, I admit, a very considerable difficulty in ascertaining exactly how much revenue will accrue from the propositions the hon. gentleman has made, and I, therefore, speak under correction, because, when I have the hon. gentleman's proposals in my hands, in print, it may come to be seen that there are some points which I have omitted, which may possibly modify the conclusions I have arrived at. But, first, I would ask the hon. the Minister of Finance whether his object is simply to encourage the West Indian trade, or whether he expects that any considerable amount of sugar is to be refined in this country?

MR. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: He does. Well, has the hon. gentleman the least idea of what the probable cost to the people of the country is going to be? I take his own statement. He proposes to tax sugar, below No. 14, at $\frac{3}{4}$ c. specific duty, and 30 per cent. ad valorem. Well, assuming that No. 10 would be laid down at something like \$3.30 per 100 lbs., though, of course, its price varies from time to time, it is quite clear, that 100,000,000 pounds, plus about 10 per cent., which fairly represents the waste which occurs in the process of manufacture,—and I may tell the hon. gentleman that that 10 per cent., according to statements made to me by some most eminent refiners in Canada, would be a very liberal allowance, indeed,—you find the total sum paid into the Treasury for 100,000,000 lbs., would be some \$1,980,000, as against \$2,920,000, which we would receive under the proposed tariff, if we continued to import the same qualities of sugar we now consume. In other words, if his scheme be successful, if we refine our sugar in Canada, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that for the pleasure of washing our own sugar, we shall have to pay something like \$1,000,000 per annum,—whether it be taken out of the pockets of the people, or whether it be taken out of the public treasury,—for the gratification of half-a-dozen influential gentlemen engaged in sugar refining in Halifax, Montreal, or elsewhere. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the article of tea. Here also, from the beginning, I took the position that beyond and above all other considerations, revenue considerations should be paramount; and I say it is most unjust to the whole people of Canada, that for the benefit of a few importers, the people of Canada should be compelled to pay 10 per cent. more than the true value of a large part of the tea that they consume. I say that the fiction of a direct trade with China has been exploded long ago. Not one of the numerous deputations that waited upon me on that subject ever pretended that there was the least likelihood of now establishing a trade with China viâ the St. Lawrence. For years I believe one ship per annum was the utmost limit of the direct trade with China that came to Canada viâ the St. Lawrence, and I do not think there would be found one merchant to-day who would say that this trade would ever be permanently revived. No, Sir; if that direct trade comes, it will come in American bottoms viâ San Francisco or New York. The practical result of the hon. gentleman's proposal in this respect will be that a few large houses will import large quantities of tea through those channels, and many hundreds of small importers will be deprived of their natural market, and of the privilege of purchasing tea where they can purchase it cheapest and best, and all this for the purpose of gratifying a few political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. It may be, however, that the mischief which would have accrued a few years ago is not likely to accrue now, if, as I am informed, considerable alterations have taken place in the course of the tea trade, and consequently the hon. gentleman may not be able to effect all the mischief that he intends and expects to effect by the reimposition of a differential duty that never brought into the Treasury more than a fraction of the cost which it added to the price of the tea consumed by a large part of the people of Canada. With regard to the tax on iron, all I can say is this: hitherto it was supposed that iron should be free as forming the raw material of an immense number of industries which he professes a desire to encourage, and I tell the hon. gentleman that when the real effect of what he proposes to do comes to be known, it will be useless for the hon. gentleman to delude himself into the idea that he is going to escape from the deputations who are likely to wait upon him, in regard to the injustice of this and a good many other taxes he now proposes. And I beg to call his attention to this fact, that, as far as the Customs returns show, this tax on iron is directly levelled against Great Britain. A great proportion of our manufactured iron is brought from Great Britain to this country. In this case, at any rate, there is not the paltry excuse of the reciprocity of tariffs, because we put a tax on a chief product of almost the only country in the world that admits our products free. As for the tax on salt, does not the hon. gentleman know, that vastly the greatest proportion of the salt brought into this country comes in British bottoms? Even in other cases, how is the Customs officer to tell how much of it is intended for the fisheries, and how much for other purposes? I am afraid, although as I represent a constituency which takes an interest in this question, I ought, perhaps, to consider this as a polite concession to them and myself, that, when the operation of the tax comes to be tested, the hon. gentleman will get extremely few thanks from those interested. As it is, we can beat the Americans in their own market; at this moment Canadian salt manufacturers command the country as far down as Kingston; and the hon. gentleman knows full well that, under the policy he proposes, all the salt brought into Canada is certain to continue to be brought in. In respect to the article of coal, the hon. gentleman proposes to put a tax of 50c. per ton on every kind and description. What can have induced the hon. gentleman to inflict such a tax I cannot imagine, unless it be the overpowering influence of the redoubtable Minister of Public Works. I am sure, as an inhabitant of St. John, he must know that, when he imposed that duty, he was working against the best interests of his own constituents. Now, if there be a principle of political economy clearer than another, it is the principle that the worst tax which can be imposed is a tax on a necessary of life, like coal. Moreover, it is a tax exceedingly partial and unjust in its operation. It will fall on the poorest classes of the community, in the depth of the Canadian winter. It is absolutely sectional, pressing heavily on the people of Ontario, and not at all on the great mass of the people through the other Provinces. It will form a standing grievance; it will cause agitation in a great number of places. When he considers the subject, and the special effect it will have on railways, he will see that, if he wished to impair our standing in England, he could hit on nothing more likely to do so than to impose this special tax on coal, by which something like \$100,000 a year will have to be paid by one railway, \$60,000 to \$70,000 by one or two others, which are already in a condition of extreme embarrassment. The effect will be to deprive that small number of English bondholders who derive interest on their investments in Canadian railways of any chance of receiving further dividends. It is a most doubtful benefit to Nova Scotia, and I doubt if there is any reasonable chance of one hundred thousand tons more being sold under this duty. I had occasion to look into this matter in detail; and I question if it will be possible to place even the small amount I have indicated in the market under existing circumstances. As to the duty on flour and other articles, I must, perforce, omit comment on those until we have more full details. If they are to have any effect beyond pure waste, it must be to enhance the cost of necessities of life to the poorest classes of the community. When he comes to woollen goods, I find that, on a certain class where the hon. gentleman proposes to impose 10 cents per square yard.—

MR. TILLEY: Seven and a half cents.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: In that case, on certain classes of woollen goods worn by the poorer classes of the population, the tax would amount to about 30 per cent., and on goods of a higher class it would amount to about six per cent. He found by this judicious taxation, that the worst clothed people paid rates ranging from 25 to 26 per cent., and those able to afford expensive raiment paid from 8 per cent. to 12 per cent. Surely this is one of the most curious ways I have ever heard of, of promoting the greatest happiness of the greatest number. I do not propose at present to go through all the tremendously elaborate details which he was kind enough to read to us to-night. That discussion will keep us in work for several weeks yet, but there is one point deserving of special notice. He has furnished us, by this general increase all along the line which he proposes, with a most admirable illustration of the mode in which this benevolent scheme of his is going to alter the distribution of wealth throughout the country. It is a matter of great difficulty to ascertain what is the actual quantity of goods held in stock, including those which have been imported during the four long weeks which this tariff has been in suspense. But I am inclined to believe that very nearly forty million dollars worth of goods are in stock in this country, which will be largely affected by the increased duties proposed. Who will be benefited by this? Here is an average of ten to fifteen per cent. added by one stroke of the hon. gentleman's pen to the value of stocks held by individual merchants and wholesale houses throughout the country. These men toiled not, neither did they spin. They only over-imported, and, as far as they possibly could, assisted, in too many cases, to bring about that extravagance which has gone so far in producing the present depression, and, as a practical reward, a beneficent legislator proposed to pay them four or five million dollars, in the shape of a bonus on the stock of goods they now possess. I had occasion to make some enquiries as to how this was going to affect certain individual parties engaged in trade, and I obtained from a gentleman of very high standing the following estimates of the quantities of goods, which were held by certain individual houses (as nearly as he could ascertain), in anticipation of the existing tariff. Some considerable time ago, according to this gentleman, eight important houses in the dry goods trade, held about $1,635,000 of dry goods, wholly exclusive of American goods, and the probability is that these eight houses now hold about $3,000,000 worth collectively, and, consequently, among these eight houses, about $360,000 will be distributed by this tariff, and taken from the pockets of the people. I found that, in one case, the bonus would reach the trifle of $65,000, in another $30,000, another $25,000, and so on, until the last unfortunate gentleman was obliged to put up with the miserable pittance of $15,000. That is only one example of the result of these violent alterations of the tariff, and shows how difficult and dangerous it is to exercise any such discrimination as that which the hon. gentleman has chosen to attempt. Now I know very well you cannot alter a tariff under an existing system, without allowing certain men to make unreasonable profits of this kind at the expense of the people at large. And in an ordinary case I might pass this over as a necessary evil, but there is one thing I desire to ask the hon. gentleman. It has been stated to me on good authority, which I cannot disregard, although I can hardly bring myself to believe it, that, wholly apart from the natural effect of the long and unfortunate delay in bringing down the tariff, which has disturbed commerce in no ordinary degree, the Minister of Finance has actually encouraged this fraud—shall I call it?—that he has made agreements with the various banks in the country by which they were encouraged and aided, in affording facilities to their customers, in anticipating the tariff, and in obtaining, at the expense of the public, a large augmentation on the value of their stocks in hand. And I desire now to ask the hon. gentleman if I have been correctly informed.

MR. TILLEY: Persons who desired to obtain discounts to pay duties, met with difficulties, because, under the arrangements, the money deposited was to be paid to the Bank of Montreal, and instructions were given that cheques received by the Customs Department should be paid into the banks holding those cheques.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am informed the money was to be left there for a certain period.

MR. TILLEY: No; the arrangement was subject to the call of the Government at any moment.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: We all know what that means, and I say that the hon. gentleman is very much in the position of a merchant who has been assisting to rob his own till. By his own confession, he has connived at a system designed to aid a great number of merchants in anicipating his own tariff, and in making out of the imposition of these duties, which are brought down to-night, a profit which ought never to have gone into the pockets of individuals, but into the Treasury of the Dominion. Such a confession never yet was made by any Finance Minister in any civilised country in the world. I do not wish to say to the hon. gentleman what, under other circumstances, I might feel justified in saying, that this was a most immoral transaction, because I think he has gone into it blindly. But he should have known that every Finance Minister, when considering a change in the tariff, has always felt the extreme inexpediency of allowing individuals thus to make a profit at the public expense. It was his duty to be most careful in giving the slightest intimation of the details of the measure he was about to bring down.

MR. TILLEY: I gave no intimation. I say it was his duty to be most careful in giving the slightest hint of the measure he was about to bring down.

MR. TILLEY: I gave no information.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am sorry to say that a great many of those proposals that I heard to-night, were quite familiar to my ear. If he was discreet, a good many of the parties he took into his confidence were hardly equally so. Although it has been laid down by writers on the subject that, if it were possible, a tariff should be brought in, with a retrospective clause, for the purpose of preventing individuals from profiting, in any way, by the imposition of new duties, the practical inconvenience is so great that hardly any Government has ventured to adopt that plan. But I do blame the hon. gentleman for having, according to his own confession, connived with certain parties and allowed them to make, out of the pockets of the people, sums varying from $50,000 to $60,000 a piece. The hon. gentleman entered into elaborate explanations of the cause of his delay in bringing down the tariff. He is not blameworthy for not having brought it down before the 14th of March, but for allowing Parliament to be summoned before he was prepared to bring it down at all; and the country has suffered very serious loss in consequence of the extreme delay. What that has involved, may be easily estimated. I was very severely censured by the present Minister of Public Works, in 1874, because there was a total anticipation of Customs to the extent of $645,000. I was told that I had been guilty of great wrong by disturbing the whole valuation of trade and commerce throughout the country, What has been the case in February, 1879? The receipts were $2,036,253. as against $908,937 in the same of the preceding year, showing, therefore, the revenue has been anticipated to the extent, not of $645,000, but of $1,127,416, a great part of which represented goods on which an additional duty might have been obtained, had the hon. gentleman decided not to call Parliament till ready to bring down his tariff. He made it an excuse, that, although he had only entered office on the 19th October, and I on the 7th November, yet he had managed to bring down his tariff on the 14th March, ours only coming down on the 14th April. But he forgot to tell the House that the very first thing I was subjected to after I accepted office was a sharp contested election in my own county; and that immediately thereafter the general elections followed, extending into February, so that there was no fair comparison between the delay then and now. And now, Mr. Chairman, having obtained some sort of conception of the lofty moral principle which has inspired the tariff, and having got some slight idea of the great wisdom with which the details are being worked out, let me call the attention of this House to its probable results in the future. One caution here. I would advise my hon. friends beside me to remember that however clear the tendency of any particular line of policy may be, necessarily a considerable length of time is required to work them out. We can form a tolerably clear idea of what may be the ultimate result of the policy proposed, but we cannot possibly fix the exact date at which these results will become manifest. That is almost always true in every important transaction, but especially true as regards the operation of a new policy in Canada. Canada is a small state, largely indebted, and however rich we may be in potential resources, we do not possess that accumulated wealth which would enable us to give prompt and immediate effect to even a tariff like this. Then there are a great many possible counteracting agents which may, for a time, interfere with the effects that will flow from the adoption of this policy, just as was the case in the United States. The Americans did enjoy a great apparent prosperity from 1866 to 1873, though thoughtful men all along perceived it would result in great ultimate disaster; and just in the same way it is possible, though I am afraid unlikely, that we may appear to succeed for a brief space. No doubt in dealing with the future of Canada a great deal will, of necessity, depend on the policy the United States may adopt. They may laugh at the hon. gentleman's attempts to frighten them; or they may allow wiser counsels to prevail as regards their own fiscal system, or they may possibly take it into their heads to retaliate upon Canada sharply; and I warn hon. gentlemen that if they do our position may easily become intolerable. Or they may choose to bide their time till the policy has worked its way, and then, as they have done before, strike us hard and sharply at the moment when there is most danger of the whole fabric being shattered to pieces. Much will depend upon whether the shrinkage of value continues; much on European complications; much may depend upon the development of our North-West territory, which may prove a greater source of prosperity to us than all the tariffs ever laid upon the table. Possibly there may be a revival of the great lumbering and shipping interests so greatly depressed, all matters with which hon. gentlemen opposite have very little to do. In regard to all this, Ministers can exercise no authority, though any one of them may very materially effect the whole future trade and commerce of the country. But for the policy itself, I repeat, the policy now submitted is radically bad. It is bad socially, financially and politically, bad in every way you can regard it. The longer it lasts, the harder it will be to cure and the worse the rebound. Looked at in its financial aspect, it means this: For every dollar you put into the National Treasury, you are going to take four from the pockets of the people, possibly even more. You are going to divert labour and capital from fields where it can be profitably employed and turn them into channels where they will only injure those other industries, but too few, unfortunately, that were being profitably conducted heretofore. Socially, I do not conceive it possible to imagine a policy which is likely to do more to corrupt the people of Canada, than that brought down to-night. We have two dangerous classes to deal with; there is, at the base of society, always a class of shiftless and idle men, not having sufficient self-reliance to maintain themselves, and only too glad of any excuse to thrust the burden of maintenance on other persons, and you absolutely tell them then that it is the duty of the Government to make the country prosperous and provide employment for them all. Every one who knows anything of European affairs, is aware that one of the greatest dangers with which European statesmen have to contend, is the spirit of Socialism and Socialistic ideas among a large class of the population, and, Sir, you are here deliberately introducing a system which recognises the leading ideas of Socialism, which, indeed, practically justifies the leading tenet of Socialism, that property is theft, for assuredly property acquired in this way, under a tariff such as this, is very little better than downright legalised robbery. Then there are able and unscrupulous men who know that under such a system the short cut to wealth is best obtained by securing political influence enough to get the tariff fixed to suit their own ends. You offer a premium to these men in every possible way to corrupt the Legislature, and if the example of the United States can be relied on, you may rest assured that your labours will not be in vain. Politically, Sir, I fear the matter is likely to be even worse. I say that, if this expedient fails, if this mode of restoring prosperity prove, as I verily believe it will, a sham, a delusion, and a snare; if, after you have locked up many millions in profitless investments, and crowded men by the thousands into the towns and cities; if this system breaks down in Canada as completely as it is known to have broken down in the United States—I say you will be confronted with the cry for larger markets at any cost. Up to the present time there have been two barriers which have assisted in maintaining our political independence, and in keeping us separated from the United States. One of these the belief which, rightly or wrongly, obtained among us that, after all said and done, our political system was better, and that the purity of our politicians was greater than those of the United States. This may have been only a bit of national self-conceit, but, if there ever did exist any belief in such superiority, that belief has been removed for evermore. No intelligent Canadian, no matter how patriotic he may be, can dare to say, with the spectacle now before us, that the politicians of Canada are one whit better or purer than the politicians of the United States. The other was that we possessed a superior fiscal system to the people of the United States. If you sweep this away—I put this question not only to the House but to the people of Canada—what will then remain to keep us apart from the great nation on our border? We know the direction in which our material interests are likely to draw us, and I tell those gentlemen that, if they desire to maintain our independence, they are taking the surest means to render our separate political existence impossible. Sir, if further proof was wanted we might find it in the open exultation of the foes of England when these hon. gentlemen acceded to power, and when it was known what sort of proposals they were likely to bring down. We have had renegade Englishmen supporting the policy of the right hon. gentlemen opposite, not because, as they avowed, they thought it wise or good, but because they believed it would speedily render the position of the people of Canada intolerable, so that we should soon be forced to seek refuge from the position we had brought ourselves into in annexation to the United States. But a few weeks have passed since both sides of this House were uniting in expressing their gratitude to Her Majesty for having confided her child to our care. If that illustrious lady should return to England I am afraid she will be obliged to tell her Royal Mother that the practical outcome of all this loud lip-loyalty was a policy directly antagonistic to the interests of Great Britain—a policy which, whatever may be the intentions of the hon. the Finance Minister and his colleagues, seems, in its practical results, especially designed to injure British interests and hamper British trade. Sir, there are other contingencies which are likely to flow from this policy in the not very distant future. If it works as I believe it will, I fear that we shall be speedily confronted with the problem of a demand for an irredeemable currency like that of the United States. All history teaches that an irredeemable currency is the twin sister of Protection, and we have already seen evidence of the likelihood of that system following in the line of the hon. gentleman's policy. When you find men sufficiently deluded to believe that increased taxation is going to make a people prosperous, it is natural enough they should be also foolish enough to suppose that they can be made rich by printing paper-promises to pay. Hon. gentlemen must remember that, so sure as we find ourselves unable to raise the large sums of money we require to carry on the Government of this country without inconvenience, so sure will the attempt be made to bring about the abolition of our system of local government. No doubt plausible reasons enough may be urged in favour of that course. These Local Governments have made mistakes, and have been expensive in many ways, and when the cry of false economy goes up, there may be men found indiscreet enough to abolish our Federal system, and to re-introduce the legislative system, a system to which I for one would be extremely opposed, and which every man who has the slightest interest in the well-being of his country would bitterly deplore to see inaugurated. But I fancy that will be an exceedingly likely consequence of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I acquit the Minister of Finance to a great extent of doing these things designedly. I do not believe he or the majority of his colleagues have seriously considered the effect of the proposals he is now bringing before the House. But there are some among them who, in so doing, are deliberately sinning against light and knowledge; who know that they are doing what is likely to bring all or many of those evils I speak of upon their country, and to these men I say that, great as was their guilt in the transaction for which the country originally banished them from power, that guilt is nothing to the guilt they incur in thus empoisoning the springs of our national existence for a few short years of dishonourable power. Sir, let me, in conclusion, say a few words as to the general bearing of this whole policy. The hon. gentleman told us that this country is in financial straits, and the hon. gentleman proposes to relieve this country from its financial difficulties and to aid our people—how? By trebling or quadrupling, unnecessarily as he himself admits, the present taxation of the people. We are to become rich by being subjected to a taxation three or four times as great as would otherwise be required. Being in power at a time when, of all others, the soundest judgment is needed—when it is the especial duty of every man having any pretensions to the character of a statesman not to yield to every plausible popular delusion, but rather to do his utmost, as far as in him lies, to disabuse the minds of the people of their mistakes—we find him apparently ready to pander to every error. If any folly has been committed, we find him prepared to perpetuate that folly. If any danger is clearly manifest, he seems determined to take such action as must inevitably bring us into collision with it, all warning to the contrary notwithstanding. Knowing as the hon. gentleman cannot fail to know, because he is a man of experience, a man who has been conversant for many years with the affairs of this country—knowing that one of our most besetting national sins is a passion for extravagant speculation and for locking up money in utterly unproductive enterprises—we find him deliberately legislating so as to increase that tendency. Knowing, as he cannot fail to do, that the uncertainty of trade and abuse of credit are most crying evils in the mercantile community, we find him introducing a system of legislation which will deliberately force the most intelligent of our people to turn business into gambling, and will render it impossible for any man to calculate from year to year, or almost from month to month, what changes, what alterations, may be made in the laws under which his business must necessarily be conducted. Knowing, as he cannot help knowing, that there is no one thing statesmen should more resolutely discourage than a disposition on the part of any class in the community to rely on the Government for aid or support, we find him deliberately proclaiming that it is the duty of the Government to make all classes prosperous. Knowing, as he cannot help knowing that, at this present moment, there is no problem harder to solve than the proper distribution of wealth in any country, that, if there is one thing which threatens our civilisation more than another, it is the existence of monstrous fortunes at one end of the social scale and masses of paupers at the other; knowing, as he must do, that, if there is one thing more than another which the American tariff has succeeded in producing, it has been great profits for a few successful manufacturers, and great misery to great masses of men collected together in their cities we find the hon. gentleman deliberately legislating so as violently to alter and disturb the distribution of wealth in this community. Knowing, Sir, that there are, say what he will, always great mischiefs arising everywhere from the tendency to crowd together in large cities; knowing that this is a special evil in North America, from causes which I cannot now properly discuss and analyse, we find the hon. gentleman fostering and encouraging that evil. Knowing, in a country like this, the imminent danger of encouraging sectional feeling, and showing one part of the country that your legislation is framed so as to serve another part of the country at its expense, we find him bringing down a tariff which will furnish every man in several Provinces with a ready mode of agitation and a ready standing grievance, which, by reason of the enormous excess of duty it imposes as compared with the taxation which existed in the hon. gentleman's own Province prior to Confederation, cannot fail to produce a deep-rooted and deep-seated discontent with the working of Confederation. Knowing, as I have said, the grave physical difficulties in the way of achieving our independence, we find him legislating so as to put our whole fiscal policy at the mercy of the United States. Knowing that there is much trouble always experienced in collecting sufficient revenue, in a time of depression like this, to meet the ordinary wants of the country, and that, along an extensive frontier like ours, it is a matter of the extremest difficulty to avoid extensive smuggling, we find him introducing a tariff which gives every possible inducement for hundreds of miles, to men to engage most actively in the business and occupation of smuggling. Knowing, as we do, from dearly bought experience, how grievously this Legislature, and our Provincial Legislature have suffered in times gone by, from improper influences brought to bear upon them by wealthy and powerful corporations, or even by wealthy and powerful individuals, we find him deliberately making it the interest of the wealthiest and most active classes of the community to obtain anyhow, and by any means whatsoever, power over the Legislature of the country. I cannot stop to analyse how much of this may fairly be attributed to folly and incapacity, how much to a reckless desire to obtain power at all hazards, how much to ignorance of the very elemental principles of political economy; how much to deliberate evil design. That I cannot tell, but I do know that, although it may be true that the people of Canada must reap as they have sown, although they have yet to learn that the nation which forfeits its own self-respect, has gone far towards forfeiting the right to its own political existence, and although time will have to be taken in order that they may understand the full extent of the mischief done to them; the time is coming, and coming fast, when they will wake up from their short-lived delusion to find themselves wiser and poorer, by many and many a million, than they are to-night; and I warn the hon. gentleman that then he will find that, for the sake of obtaining a temporary party triumph, he, and those who support him, will, in the long result, prove to have utterly and hopelessly wrecked, not only their own fortunes, and the fortunes of their party, but, I very much fear, the fortunes of the country that have been, most unfortunately, committed to their charge.

MR. TUPPER: I confess that I am very much surprised at the forcible, though fallacious, address to which we have all listened for the last two or three hours. I did suppose, Sir, that, brought face to face, as the people of this country have been under the administration of public affairs by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, with a condition of things that is calculated to arrest the attention of every patriotic man in Canada—I did suppose that that hon. gentleman would feel that it was a duty he owed to this House, that he owed to this country, not to indulge in such animadversions as he has indulged in in reference to the proposals that have just been made to the House, but to lend to the Ministry of the day, and to my hon. friend, the Finance Minister of Canada, all the aid and all the assistance that he could, in order that some measures might be adopted to retrieve that position of affairs into which that hon. gentleman has largely contributed to bring this country. The hon. gentleman talks of incapacity, talks of recklessness, talks of ignorance. I ask the members of this House who have listened to him for the last five years, whether in the whole of this country can be found a more striking monument of all those excellencies than the hon. gentleman himself? Five years ago, when I ventured some modest criticisms of the policy that he propounded to the House, he expressed his regret that no Finance Minister of the then late Administration had a seat in the House. That regret was not confined to himself. No man felt it more than I did. No one felt it more than the gentlemen who were associated with me, and I am glad to know that that feeling became widespread throughout the country; that every year the experience that the people of Canada had of the administration of its fiscal and financial affairs by the hon. gentleman, induced a deeper, wider and stronger feeling as to the absolute necessity of bringing back to the aid and assistance of this country the gentleman under whose financial management it had prospered before. The hon. gentleman himself has heard the plaudits given to-night to the Budget speech delivered by my hon. friend, coming, I was going to say, from the whole House, so small was the number of those who did not join in applauding the able effort of my hon. friend, that it seemed to come, not from a section of this House, but from the entire Chamber. I congratulate the House, I congratulate the country, that my hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) is back in the position he occupied in 1873—back in the position he occupied when the late Government handed over to their successors in office, the conduct of the affairs of the country, which was then in the highest condition of prosperity of any country on the face of the globe—back to the position he occupied when the hon. gentleman, instead of inheriting years of accumulated deficits, inherited years of accumulated surpluses,—back, I say, to a condition of things that would compare favourably with the administration of public affairs in any country in the world. The hon. gentleman says that he is glad to have an opportunity, at last, face to face with my hon. friend, of criticising his policy. He has, year after year, done all that he could, in the absence of my hon. friend, to denounce his policy, to assault his policy, to assault it in unfair and unwarrantable terms; but at last he has, he says, the opportunity of meeting him here and of challenging that policy. What is the policy that he challenged? Why, he brings against him three prominent charges in relation to his policy—the readjustment of the debt, the bringing of Prince Edward Island into the Union on the terms on which she came, and the increased salaries of ministers and indemnities to members of this House. Now, let me try the hon. gentleman by his own reasons, which he has submitted to the House as his ground for assaulting the financial reputation of my hon. friend. Why, will the House believe it—they would hardly believe it—that the hon. gentleman's memory should be so short! They will hardly believe that, when he was concentrating his point of attack—when he was himself bringing down his declamatory assaults upon my hon. friend, that he was assaulting, at that moment, nine Cabinet Ministers that have sat side by side with him in the Cabinet. Will it be believed that, when he was denouncing my hon. friend as having been utterly ignorant of the financial position of this country, in his having been utterly reckless in his wilful and extravagant waste of the public funds, by that false, and injurious, and ruinous policy of the readjustment of the debt of this country—will it be believed that nine of the gentlemen who have been selected by the late Premier to govern Canada, were men who supported and sustained that policy in this House? Not only is that the case, but instead of this having been done at the close of a Session when the members had departed to their homes, if he will turn to the 420th page of the journals of 1873, he will find that that motion was carried by 110 members, including no less than 35 friends of the late Administration, and including nine gentlemen, who, as I have already stated, were members of the Cabinet along with himself. That is the fact, and I place it before the young members of this House who have not, like myself, been accustomed to listen to the fallacies, the delusive fallacies, that the hon. gentleman is wont to indulge in when he addresses the House in relation to these questions. What about Prince Edward Island and the ruinous terms upon which she was brought into the Union? Did he make any objection on that occasion? If he did let him point to the speech, let him open the journals and show the vote that he gave in opposition to the terms of that union. Let him search the records of the press and he will find that only five years ago, when it was insinuated that those gentlemen were not as friendly to the terms, and did not support those terms as heartily as we did, it was met with an indignant denial, and the press was pointed to as evidence that not a word was uttered in opposition to those terms. What are we to say of the salaries? We raised the salaries and we increased the indemnities to members of Parliament to the position that they occupy now. But what was the case? Why the fact was that at that time we were rolling up surplus revenue, after all our liberality in the expenditures which we devoted to the improvement of the public services of this country. We were rolling up surpluses to the extent of two million dollars per year. We were at the same time reducing the taxes to the extent of two million dollars per year. And yet, under those circumstances, if we did increase the salaries of Ministers and indemnities of members, I want to know why the hon. gentleman who stands in the Opposition to assault that policy in the presence of this House and of the country—why, when he and his friends had an overwhelming majority at their backs, he continued to pocket those increased salaries yearly, not when he had millions of surplus at the end of the year, but when the credit of the country was sinking beneath his feet? And yet down to the last hour, without the money, without the means of paying these salaries, the hon. gentleman took advantage of the privilege they had and continued to take the increased salaries until they are again in the cold shades of opposition. These are the three great points, the three great questions upon which he undertook to assault the policy of my hon. friend. One would have supposed that the recollection of the last five years, the contrast, the startling contrast, between the condition of the country five years ago and its condition now, would have closed his mouth, and that he would have been the last man to raise a discussion here or any where in relation to the manner in which the public affairs of this country have been dealt with. He has talked about the credit of the country. What did he find? He found the credit of Canada raised to the very highest pitch by the accumulated surpluses, year by year, amounting to something like thirteen millions of dollars during the period that this Government was in power before. The hon. gentleman succeeded to a heritage of prosperity and of financial credit for the country, such as he ought to have been doubly grateful for instead of spending, as he had spent, the last five years in vain and impotent denunciations of the policy of the men under whom Canada attained a pitch of prosperity such as she has never since had the pleasure of witnessing. The hon. gentleman says that there was a lack of comprehension on the part of my hon. friend, that he was unable to forecast the future needs of the country, to gauge its trade, and that he vainly supposed that the condition of prosperity which the country enjoyed at that time was likely to continue. Did the hon. gentleman himself exhibit no lack of comprehension? Did the hon. gentleman himself exhibit no lack of ability to gauge the future of the country? I can point to his Budget speech in which he declared that he anticipated the trade and business revenue of this country were going to remain at the point which they had reached. And yet the hon. gentleman's eyes were not opened when he found that, having asked for three millions additional taxes to be imposed upon the people of this country at the end of the second year, he was obliged to come down to Parliament with the humiliating confession that he had a deficit of two millions, notwithstanding all the additional taxes, to receive which he had pledged his reputation to Parliament as a public man, that if they would give him that amount he would not only not come back for any more, but he was going to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman knows that his colleague, Mr. Blake, went to his constituents and declared that, although they had asked for three millions of taxes it was not for any necessity that existed, but for the purpose of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman knows that in the very speech in which he asked Parliament to give him that three millions of money, he declared that if they would give him the money they would not see him back upon the beggar's errand again. But after these three millions were gone, at the end of two years, he had to come back and ask for additional taxes to meet his two millions of deficit. And yet, Sir, year after year this wonderful financier, this heaven-born financier, this man who now stands up and would lead the people of Canada to believe, and would lead the new members—he cannot deceive the old ones in this House—to believe that his wonderful sagacity, his marvellous prescience alone can save Canada, came back with these steadily accumulating deficits, until, at the end of his five years of office, he found himself, notwithstanding his three millions of additional taxation for which he asked Parliament, and the tariff which he gave to the House, face to face with a deficiency, during the last four years, of no less than seven millions of dollars.

This year, without what the hon. gentleman calls this disturbance of the trade of the country, without this accumulation of money in the Treasury, caused by the expectation in the change in the tariff, he knows that we would have had to encounter, on the 1st of July, another deficit of $2,400,000; and yet he adopts a style that would lead people to imagine that he possessed the accumulative wisdom of all the financiers of the world. I say, Sir, that it ill-becomes the hon. gentleman, as everyone will see who contrasts his management of the finances of this Dominion with that of his predecessors, to adopt the tone he does here to-night. He did the last Parliament the credit to say that there was a great deal of ignorance in the House, and he paid the people of Canada the compliment to say that there was a great deal of ignorance outside of the House. He reminds me of a story I have heard of a lunatic, who thought he was the only sane man in the world. When he was asked how he came to be shut up in his cell in a lunatic asylum, he said that all the people were mad, and he was sane, but they unfortunately differed from him in opinion, and they being the stronger had locked him up. The hon. gentleman believes he has all the information, all the financial knowledge of the country locked up in his own person, and so he paid the House that compliment to which I have referred, and I am afraid he paid the same bad compliment to this House, seeing, as he did, the manner in which the overwhelming majority of its members receive the financial speech of my hon. friend to-day. But it appears that the hon. gentleman was in a minority, and, like the lunatic that was locked up, his wings were clipped, his hands were deprived of the power of manipulating or mismanaging the public affairs of Canada, which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance comes back at the end of five years to endeavor to remedy, and which, I believe, he will remedy, and which this House and the people of this country believe he will remedy, by the adoption of a policy other than that of helpless paralysis in the face of great national disaster. Why, Sir, where was the hon. gentleman when he found that, year after year, the credit of the country was sinking beneath the accumulated deficits? What did he attempt to propose? He has spent two or three hours in criticising the attempt of my hon. friend to lift our common country out of the slough into which we found it sinking in his hands: and in that condition of things I say that the hon. gentleman was bound to adopt a different tone, and at all events, to confess to the House that he must question with some little diffidence a policy propounded to change a state of things which he found himself powerless to change. Mr. Chairman, either the hon. gentleman knew the remedy and refused to use it; knew what Canada required and refused to apply that remedy, or he was ignorant of what the necessities of this country required in order to change the existing condition of affairs. Was the hon. gentleman not aware of the disaster he was bringing on the country? In his first Budget speech when he brought down a proposition to add three millions of taxes to the people of Canada, what did he say? Did he tell them that a deficit had occurred? No, Sir, but, with his wonderful prescience, he told them that he was afraid one would occur; and although it has been proved to a demonstration, and stands so proved on the pages of Hansard placed beyond controversy, that the year would have closed with a surplus if the country had never heard of the hon. gentleman as Minister of Finance, still he said that so imminent was the case, though no deficit had occurred, but one might occur, and the very possibility of one would be so disastrous to Canada in its then condition that he proposed to take measures to avoid such a possibility. He said that if a deficit occurred we would find the credit of Canada ruined. We would find her bonds down at a ruinous discount in the market, as they were many years ago; and he implored the House to grant the means to arrest the catastrophe of a single deficit upon the people of Canada. I recall that to his attention and to the attention of the House to prove that he was not ignorant of the serious consequences that must result to a country like Canada, from having to go into the market to borrow money for public purposes. Knowing that, how did he show his fitness for the high position which he occupied? Why, by presenting an appearance of helpless paralysis to the House and the country, by admitting that all his powers were exhausted, and that he knew of no means by which he or his colleagues could come to the rescue of a country whose credit was going, and whose prosperity was rapidly passing away. Sir, the hon. gentleman has criticised my hon. friend's Budget speech; but he has not told the House what he would do if he occupied the position of my hon. friend to-day. He has left us nothing but the record of the past helpless incapacity in the face of national disaster and the admission by the course that he pursued before, and the declaration he made on the floor of the House, that he knew of no means by which Canada could be prevented from sinking down day by day, until, at the close of four years, instead of possessing a surplus of $13,000,000, she was loaded down with a deficit with something like $7,000,000. I say that the hon. gentleman admitted that in terms—not only by his attitude, not only by declaring the impossibility, not only of himself, but his colleagues, doing nothing to avert the disaster that had overtaken the country, but in terms. Read his last Budget speech, and you will find the only remedy left to the hon. gentleman stated in distinct terms. He said he had exhausted the sources of taxation in the vain effort to save the credit of the country, and the only solution he could offer to the House was that, if he had the means of collecting it, he would propose an income tax; and, at a later period when a motion was made in this House in reference to home-grown tobacco, he said it would take away half a million of revenue from him, and, if he were stripped of that half a million dollars of revenue, he knew of no means by which he could replace it, except by direct taxation. I ask this House, and I ask the people of Canada, if that is the solution they prefer in contradistinction to a policy which, in other countries, has been found successful—I will not say in other countries—my eye lights at this moment upon the face of one of the most distinguished men who have ever adorned the Parliament of Canada, I mean Sir Alex. Galt, and I say that in 1858, by just such a policy, he lifted this country out of just such an emergency, and accomplished the desired object; and I say that this policy will be now as sufficient for the object as then, and more so, because, by the extension of our boundaries, by the extent of country we cover, by the enormous addition to the producing power of Old Canada, by the means we possess of bringing industries into life, which were scarcely applicable to Old Canada, but which exist under the Confederation of British North America, we have far wider means of bringing it into force than they had then, when it proved to be eminently successful. The hon. gentleman knows, I suppose, that direct taxation is not a particularly popular thing, that it does not commend itself very cordially to the sympathies of the masses of the people in this country; and I suppose that was the reason why, notwithstanding he admitted necessities of the country, he was not in a position to indicate what he would do were he in the position of my hon. friend. It is proverbial that it is easier to tear down than to build up. It requires much humbler intellectual power to tear down a splendid edifice than to build one up, until you have crowned it with its top stone. The hon. gentleman, while prepared to destroy, has given to the House and the country no hint, no suggestion, by which this country was to be released from the condition of things that he and every intelligent man in the country is obliged to admit it occupies in relation to this question to-day. The hon. gentleman said that the country was suffering in consequence of my hon. friend's imprudence. Why, Sir, what had his imprudence to do with it? Has his imprudence expended all the people's money in this depressed condition of things, in this our hour of need, in this condition of our poverty, when year by year we are suffering from large annually increasing deficits? Was it the expenditure of my hon. friend that continued to swell the expenditure of this country? Was it the policy of my hon. friend, I say, that placed $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 increased expenditure upon the shoulders of the people of Canada? I undertake to say that no gentleman has ever been able to challenge the accuracy of my statement, that in the comparative statements of receipts and expenditures, as shown in the Public Accounts, $1,021,000 must be taken out of the expenditures of 1873-4, and which is charged against us by the hon. gentleman. I showed how, by doing the greatest violence that could be done to the Public Accounts—and when the hon. gentleman did it, it was not a mistake, one of the oldest financial officers in his service told him what he was doing, and yet he did it,—for the purpose of deceiving the country the hon. gentleman took half a million of dollars of money voted by Parliament for capital expenditure, and expended, and charged it to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I say I am prepared to go before the Public Accounts Committee and bring his own officer, and prove that he did it with his eyes open. And so Sir, I say, making this statement a fair and honest statement, it will show we are charged with over a million of dollars that cannot rightfully be brought into the comparative statement made.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No.

MR. TUPPER. Yes, I will establish it anywhere, as I have now established it beyond the power of hon. gentlemen to controvert it. Then take his own statement of his own expenditure, and you will find that he closes his five years with an increased expenditure of seven millions. This poverty-stricken Government, this Government that had no surplus, this Government that was destroying the country with a series of fearful deficits, expended public money which they did not possess, and this expenditure, but for the much-absurd Washington Treaty, would have formed an increased public debt on the people of this country about $7,000,000 over and above our annual expenditure. And yet these hon. gentlemen tax my hon. friend with suffering in consequence of his imprudence. Was it his imprudence that, in the face of interests of Canada, that in the face of the absence of the money with which to pay the claims, added year by year thus enormously to the expenditure over and above the expenditure of their predecessors, at a time when they had two millions a year of an annual surplus, and were able to reduce the taxation of the people two millions a year. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the ignorance of this House and the ignorance of this country, as he is pleased to term it. I believe he is sincere in his contemptuous estimate of the intelligence of this House and of this country. I believe he is perfectly sincere in this, or he would never have ventured to utter the criticisms he has uttered upon my hon. friend's policy. What is this frightful disaster that is to be brought upon this country? In the hon. gentleman's contention there were two postulates which were irreconcilable. His final postulate is that out of the hard earnings of the people we are going to build up private fortunes. His second postulate is that you are going to bring about a ruinous competition that will destroy the manufacturers. Now, Sir, will the hon. gentleman reconcile these two statements?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

MR. TUPPER: I have no doubt his estimate of the intelligence of this House and of the country is such that he thinks he can make statements so utterly irreconcilable, and in direct contradiction to each other. The hon. gentleman says, if you foster these industries, you create monopolies, and these monopolies increase the prices of the articles, and that the increased cost has to be paid by the people. The hon. gentleman has answered the only argument in which there is a shadow of a possibility of doubt, connected with the policy of my hon. friend, and that is that the effect of the industries being protected from unfair and injurious competition from without is to bring capital into the country, furnish labour for the masses of the people, create industries, and protect the people, at the same time, from oppressive and injurious prices by the competition thus engendered among manufacturers. The hon. gentleman has answered himself, and overthrown the only semblance of an argument which can be brought against this policy. But, Sir, what is he obliged to confess, while he says, the policy is disastrous in the highest degree, and will result in the destruction of the country.
