House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable Marcel Lambert

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY FIFTH PARLIAMENT

The twenty fourth parliament having been dissolved by proclamation on Thursday, April 19, and writs having been issued and returned, a new parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Thursday, September 27, 1962, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Thursday, September 27, 1962

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General for the dispatch of business, and the members of the house being assembled:

Léon J. Raymond, Esquire, O.B.E., the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the secretary to the Governor General informing him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber to open the first session of the twenty fifth parliament of Canada on Thursday, the twenty seventh day of September, at eleven o'clock.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Members of the House of Commons:
> The Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of honourable members in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

> Honourable Members of the Senate,
> and Members of the House of Commons:
> I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

MR. MARCEL LAMBERT, MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF EDMONTON WEST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Raymond, I know all hon. members are awaiting the speech from the throne. However, until a Speaker is elected there is no one to speak for or communicate with Her Majesty's representatives. We have been advised by the Honourable the deputy Governor General that we cannot be informed of the reasons for convening parliament until a Speaker has been chosen. Indeed, the House of Commons does not come into existence until a Speaker has been chosen.

The office of Speaker is a position of high dignity, one of the great inheritances of British tradition and institutions. In the early days the Speaker had to face the King. That is one of the reasons that today we continue more or less to force him to take his position as Speaker when he is chosen. His office requires courage, tact and great wisdom. Indeed, the records of history are replete with the names of great commoners who took their stand on behalf of freedom and its implementation by the House of Commons. The Speaker continues to be the custodian of the privileges and the honour of parliament. His ancient title, of course, is based on the fact that he was chosen by his fellow members to speak for them either to the sovereign or generally. His fidelity to parliament and the things it stands for must be unquestioned, and in the dispatch of his duties his impartiality unquestionable. He must be one who understands human frailties, wise and above all he must be patient, and have high intellectual qualities.

Last evening I picked up two volumes by Lord Ullswater, for many years Speaker of the British House of Commons. I think in his concluding paragraph he has summarized the position of the Speaker. I will quote those words:

> Upon the maintenance of order and decorum in any assembly the free expression of opinions depends. In a democratic assembly, where every kind of view is represented, it is essential that the most extreme views, whether revolutionary or reactionary, heretical or orthodox, novel or commonplace, popular or unpopular, should be given an opportunity of making themselves heard. To allow clamour and disturbance to drown free expression of sentiment is to nullify the whole purpose of a deliberative assembly. Whatever the sentiments of the majority may be, the right of a minority, however small, to state its case and put forward its arguments, is undeniable. The House of Commons is not a public meeting, a conference or a convention, where opposition can be stifled by disturbance or silenced by shouting. History records many instances of the failure of representative assemblies to listen to the voice of reason and to be overborne by concerted, prearranged or even spontaneous, noise and violence. This is a danger from which our great assembly—

He is referring to Westminster.

—is not wholly free and it must be carefully guarded against as time goes on. Upon the Speaker of the House of Commons, this most important duty is specifically placed and in his hands, to that extent, rests the future destiny and usefulness of the oldest and greatest deliberative assembly of the world.

I apply those words to this house.

Now, sir, in the ordinary course of events the British system differs from ours in that there it is the custom that the same Speaker continues as long as he retains his seat in the house. I have not conducted any extensive research in this regard but as far back as 1922 the prime minister of that day, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, spoke of the possibility of there being a permanent Speaker. I think that has been a subject that has been discussed in successive parliaments. There has been some widespread support given to it. Had the last speaker, Hon. Roland Michener, been re-elected then the house might have felt the opportunity should have been given it to express itself in regard to this subject. However, in the light of the electoral results any suggestion of that kind becomes theoretical.

So far as the Speaker is concerned, his functions are to preside over this house, to be zealous in the maintenance of the privileges of parliament, and to ensure that the rights of minorities and individual members are preserved. The discharge of these functions requires fairness and tact, firmness and impartiality, and it will not be lost sight of that we do have a number of minorities in this parliament. The Speaker must maintain order amid the clashing sabres of debate. The Speaker must preserve inviolate the traditions of parliamentary government in principle as well as in spirit, for this is the traditional heritage of freedom.

A recital such as this has been made at the opening of all parliaments, and would almost lead one to believe that a paragon of all the perfections would have to be chosen. However, we try to secure unanimity of agreement in the choice of a Speaker, in the choice of an hon. member who represents in his person these purposes and objectives.

It is traditional in our system to choose a Speaker of one parliament who is of English origin, alternating with a Speaker of French origin. Many descendants of the French race have gone to various parts of Canada where they made valuable contributions in local spheres. The man whose name I present for the consideration of the house is among these and also goes back in his roots to the province of Quebec. His father went west many years ago and, should the house accept this nomination, it will be the first time such recognition will have been given to one of French origin representing a constituency outside Quebec.

To meet these qualifications I propose that the House of Commons give consideration to accepting Marcel Joseph Aime Lambert as Speaker. He possesses qualifications similar to those held by the Speaker of the last parliament. He was born in the province of Alberta. He is a Rhodes scholar and a barrister at law. He was first elected to parliament in 1957 and has since taken a prominent part in the deliberations of this house. I should also mention that he is a distinguished veteran of the second world war, who participated in the glory and grandeur of Dieppe where he was taken prisoner, and if he is chosen he will be the first of the veterans of the second world war to have attained so exalted a position.

Therefore, Mr. Raymond, I ask the house to accept the nomination of Mr. Marcel Lambert as an able and proper person to be Speaker of this twenty fifth parliament.

I move, seconded by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer):

That Marcel Joseph Aime Lambert, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Edmonton West, do take the chair of this house as Speaker.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Raymond, it gives me great pleasure to second the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). In my opinion, Mr. Lambert is totally qualified to fulfil the important duties of Speaker of this house, in which he will be called upon to serve his country once again, if this house concurs in the Prime Minister's motion.

I am convinced, as every right-minded person in this place is, that, in this function, he will be a credit to the people of Edmonton West and to the French speaking Canadians, especially those living outside the province of Quebec.

In nominating Mr. Lambert, the Prime Minister is asking the house to maintain a tradition of the utmost importance to the full development of national unity in this country, that of having in turn an English speaking and a French speaking member as Speaker of this house.

The Prime Minister's idea of proposing the appointment of a French speaking member from a province other than Quebec is indeed an excellent one, to which I, as a French speaking member from Quebec, am happy to subscribe. By electing Mr. Lambert, the house will give conclusive evidence that in Canada, whatever his language or religion, a Canadian is at home in all ten provinces and can aim at the highest offices.

Mr. Lambert is a capable parliamentarian and a well-known lawyer. His high sense of duty and the respect he bears to the constitutional function of this House of Commons in the life of the nation have brought unto him a reputation of high honour.

For all those reasons, it gives me pleasure to second the Prime Minister's motion.

(Text):

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Raymond, we on this side support with pleasure the nomination that has been made to the house by the Prime Minister, seconded by the Minister of Transport, of Mr. Lambert, the member for Edmonton West, as the Speaker of our house.

We do so for more than one reason. One is that when it is possible—and it has nearly always been possible throughout our history—the nomination of the Speaker should be supported by all hon. members of the house. The Prime Minister has mentioned the desirability, in certain circumstances in the future, of arranging for permanency in the office of Speaker. I agree that if we could make arrangements in future which would provide for continuity in the holding of this very important office, having regard to our tradition that it should be held alternately by French speaking and English speaking Canadians, it might be a desirable thing to do.

We on this side support this nomination of one who has served his country with gallantry in war and distinction in peace, who has now had some years of experience in the house and who has the great advantage of being perfectly familiar with both of Canada's official languages.

The office of Speaker, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, is the foundation of our parliamentary institutions. He is the protector of our rights and our traditions; a protection which as we know, and as has already been mentioned this morning, was in the early days against a king, but in modern days it is protection against any effort, if effort is ever made, to violate our rules, our privileges and our rights; protection especially of the rights of the minority in this house—and in the circumstances of today, that includes all parties.

The office requires, to the highest possible degree, as the Prime Minister has emphasized, qualities of wisdom and patience, of firmness and tact, with an unswerving regard for complete fairness and a total impartiality in presiding over the deliberations of this house. It is the duty of every hon. member of the house to support the Speaker as he displays these qualities in the discharge of his duties.

It gives me, as one member of this house, the greatest possible pleasure to join the Prime Minister in the tribute he has paid to the speaker of the last parliament who has shown these qualities to an exceptional degree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: He displayed these qualities while he was speaker in a way which gained our support, our respect and indeed our affection. He has deserved well of his party, of this house, and indeed of his country. We hope and believe that the hon. member of the house who has been nominated to succeed him will display those qualities in the same way and receive, as he will deserve, the support of all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Robert Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Raymond, on behalf of the Social Credit members and myself, it is my pleasure to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in the support of Mr. Marcel Lambert as Speaker of this twenty fifth parliament. While Mr. Lambert is not a personal acquaintance of long standing, I feel confident that he will uphold the traditions of this most important office in a manner befitting the dignity and responsibility which the position offers to him.

Mr. Lambert follows in the footsteps of a man who, through the very high standard with which he carried out his duties in the last parliament, gained the respect and admiration of every hon. member. I say this with a certain amount of pride because the former speaker is a native of my own city and we are proud of the record of achievement in public service that has been established by him and by his father before him.

I am confident that as an Albertan Mr. Lambert will prove his ability and good judgment and fairness. Mr. Lambert's military record, his academic achievements and his parliamentary experience have given him a background which fits him well into these new responsibilities.

While election campaigns often bring expressions and statements which may not be compatible with the position of neutrality which a Speaker must hold if he is to maintain the confidence of all hon. members of this house, I am sure that each one of us understands that it is our responsibility as members of this parliament and as Canadians to put aside all such things in an effort to face up to the job which is before us.

I was interested in the remarks made by the Prime Minister and also by the Leader of the Opposition in regard to a permanent speaker. We trust that during this parliament we might give attention to the necessary action which would provide for this house a permanent speaker, and thus not only add to the respect of the office but also assist the holder of that office in the performance of his duties. Remembering that rules are made to be obeyed, we will to a man give Mr. Lambert our full support.

I am sure no one knows better than Mr. Lambert himself that the fulfilling of this office will not be easy in this house of minorities, but I assure him of the co-operation and support of all the members of our group.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Raymond, according to long established custom, we join with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and the leader of the official opposition in supporting the nomination of a Speaker for this parliament.

On this solemn but, I am sure it is correct to say, happy occasion I feel that the environs of this house are surrounded by the draperies of history and with recollections of what that history means to us all. This ritual without rule, this ceremony without catalogue, represents our witness to a thousand years of history that forged our parliamentary and democratic institutions. Throughout the centuries these have been threatened on numerous occasions, the last time by those exponents of despotic rule, Hitler and Mussolini. Fortunately for us and future generations, millions gave their lives in defence of these institutions. We express our gratitude and honour their memory in our allegiance to parliamentary institutions, practice and procedure. Election to the office of Speaker is the greatest honour and privilege within the gift of this house; a unique office, with a distinctive tradition.

At this point, Mr. Raymond, I wish to associate the occupants of this most important corner of the house with the tribute paid by the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition to the former speaker. I am sure he had the respect and affection of all of us, and we will long remember our association with him in this house. We trust that in the future we will see some improvement in the procedure with respect to the election of the Speaker of this house. I have often thought, Mr. Raymond, that it was most inhuman to expect a person to practice impartiality in this house and then thrust him on the hustings to fight an election on a partisan basis. I hope we will become more mature and accept the British practice in a form acceptable to our Canadian procedures in this respect.

Election to the office of Speaker is a great honour and privilege. Today there is a house very different from those in which I have had the privilege of sitting since my election in 1945. Here we have a minority government, and I was very interested to hear the leader of the official opposition recognize the fact that there were a number of minority parties. Consequently our Speaker is presented with a situation that will require him to tax his wisdom and tether his impatience.

It is the responsibility and duty of the Speaker to protect the individual rights of each member of this house and the rights of all groups that are in a minority position. I think it is quite correct to say that this parliament represents a particular challenge to our Speaker and all the members of this house. However, we believe that in Mr. Lambert, the hon. member for Edmonton West, we have a Speaker who will endeavour to carry out his responsibilities with complete impartiality as the champion of this legislature, which is his prime function.

In conclusion, I join with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and the leader of the official opposition in supporting the election of Mr. Lambert, the member for Edmonton West, as Speaker of this parliament, and extend to him the co-operation of this group in the practice of those parliamentary principles to which we all subscribe. We sincerely wish him every success, and trust that his term of office as Speaker will add lustre to the office and to our parliamentary history and Canadian traditions.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Raymond, the Liberal opposition has no objection to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) being elected as Speaker of the House of Commons.

The Speaker's position is most important, as the Prime Minister just indicated, due to the nature of the function he has to fulfil in this house, because parliament itself may not operate without a Speaker. Indeed, that position is even more important than that of Prime Minister, because, if he thinks that the Prime Minister is infringing the rules of the house, the Speaker can and should call him to order.

There is also another point which should be brought to the attention of the house. The Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition said earlier today, has to be endowed with particular qualities of justice and fairness; he should know the rules of the house; he must use discretion and tact, and above all be able to interpret not only the letter but the spirit of the law. To this end it is essential to remember the rules of the house.

As was stated by those who spoke before me, the hon. member who holds the office of Speaker of the house must also be an able and experienced member of parliament.

We on this side remember how the predecessor of the hon. member for Edmonton West acted when we were but some fifty-odd Liberal members here. We seldom had to complain about the rulings made by the Hon. Mr. Michener, a calm, cool and competent man. The former speaker had never shown any partisanship before his election to that office; he had participated in several debates but he was never guilty of partisanship. Consequently, once he was in the chair he never had any trouble in upholding the rules of the house, and he was always tactful when making a ruling.

The member for Edmonton West has sometimes shown political partisanship in this house. As far as we are concerned it is a thing of the past, we have forgotten it and, as of now, we want to turn a new leaf in the history of our proceedings. I am convinced, therefore, that if the hon. member for Edmonton West will follow in his predecessor's footsteps, he will not only enjoy the admiration and respect of his colleagues in the house but will also discharge his duties to everyone's satisfaction.

I would be remiss in not congratulating warmly the hon. member on his nomination and offering him my best wishes in his new duties.

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Raymond, in agreement with the leader of our party, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), we readily support the appointment of Mr. Lambert as Speaker of the house.

I do not have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Lambert personally. However, after hearing everyone speak so well of him, I believe he will prove to be an impartial Speaker who will safeguard the rights of minorities and of every member of this house and who will probably protect also this august assembly against the infiltration of subversive ideologies, such as state socialism, for instance, and communism.

At all events, I can assure the house that we shall fully support the Speaker. We shall co-operate with him as much as possible so that this parliament may bring to the people the results they expect from every member elected by them.

(Text):

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Marcel Joseph Aime Lambert, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Edmonton West, duly elected to the chair of the house.

Mr. Lambert was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker and Hon. Leon Balcer.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members of the House of Commons, may I first beg the house to kindly accept my humble thanks for the great honour conferred upon me in electing me as Speaker. As a token of sincere appreciation, may I simply say thank you for your courtesy and your generosity.

I feel embarrassed by the excessive praise bestowed upon me, not only by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), but also by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and by the members for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

I assure you that you will not be disappointed and I do hope that our deliberations will achieve worth-while results, in keeping with the responsibilities imposed upon each and every member of the House of Commons and Canadian parliament by the people of Canada. If it can be said that a newly-elected Speaker takes a pledge, then I feel that I could do no better, to convey its meaning, than to repeat the words expressed by my renowned predecessor when he himself was elected Speaker on May 12, 1958, and I quote:

> It will be my aim and my duty as the servant of the house, and with your approval, to uphold these principles and traditions, securing to each hon. member the right to express his opinions within the limits necessary to preserve decorum; protecting the recognized privileges of hon. members, of minorities and of the house itself; facilitating the transaction of public business in an orderly manner and with due economy of time and, above all, seeking to be fair and impartial in such decisions as you entrust to me.
> If these are also your objectives, as I think they are, I ask for your patience and co-operation in approaching them.

Hon. members of the House of Commons, I thank you.

(Text):

Hon. members of the House of Commons, I beg to return my humble acknowledgements for the great honour you have been pleased to confer upon me in electing me as your Speaker. These are almost hallowed and traditional words directed to his colleagues by a member of the house when he is newly elected to this position. After listening to the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and those gentlemen who followed them speak with regard to the awesome requirements of this position, and having heard those things which have been said about me—or which I gather were being said about me, for I fail to see them—I wish to thank you one and all for this public expression of your confidence in me. May I simply say that I hope I merit this confidence. I wish to thank all those who privately have wished me well and have said so many nice things about me. I also wish to thank my family for having supported me in my career to date. I feel that this house has conferred a special honour upon my province, upon my city and upon my constituency in naming me the presiding officer of the House of Commons. On their behalf I wish to thank you.

If there can be said to be an undertaking or an engagement by a newly elected Speaker, I feel that I can do no better than to quote the words of my illustrious predecessor, who I am pleased to see in this house today, on the occasion of his re-election as speaker on May 12, 1958:

> It will be my aim and my duty as the servant of the house, and with your approval, to uphold these principles and traditions, securing to each hon. member the right to express his opinions within the limits necessary to preserve decorum; protecting the recognized privileges of hon. members, of minorities and of the house itself; facilitating the transaction of public business in an orderly manner and with due economy of time and, above all, seeking to be fair and impartial in such decisions as you entrust to me.

I realize that the composition of this house has changed although, as may be recalled, in 1957 when I first entered it the general balance of members was not dissimilar. I am sure there may be some rather rapid exchanges and that the cross-fire may become rather acute at times but, of course, all within the rules. In these exchanges as, perhaps haltingly at times, I will deal with the business of the house, I would hope that you not make me your primary target and that if you have any sharpshooting to do you either pick on somebody else or, as the duck shooting season is now open, you practice your marksmanship outside the confines of this house.

I hope we shall have productive days ahead of us within the rules of the house, which I would commend to all hon. members, particularly those who have been elected for the first time, and I trust that we shall conduct the business of the house with dispatch and efficiency but with free and unfettered discussion.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Again I wish to thank you all for the honour which you have conferred upon me.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to address you for the first time in your new capacity in the high position to which you have been called, and to suggest that this sitting be now suspended, to resume at three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the suggestion of the Prime Minister that this sitting be suspended until three o'clock this day. Is it the pleasure of the house to concur in this suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the sitting suspended until the ringing of the bells at 3 p.m. this day.

At 12.10 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at three o'clock.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable house attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber. Then Hon. Marcel Lambert, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

Then Hon. Marcel Lambert, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

May it please Your Excellency:

> The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.
> If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to report that, the house having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I welcome you to this first session of the twenty fifth parliament of Canada.

I know I speak for all Canadians when I say how pleased we were to have Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother with us again. Her warmth and charm have added to the loyalty and affection for the crown and our Queen.

This spring His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh spent several weeks here in connection with his second study conference on the human consequences of the changing industrial environment in the commonwealth and empire. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, during her stay in Canada last June, carried out her program of engagements with simplicity and grace.

Canada has been honoured in the last few days by a visit from the President of Pakistan, His Excellency Ayub Khan, who accompanied my Prime Minister on his return from the commonwealth conference. We were happy to greet this distinguished leader of a great commonwealth nation and to discuss with him matters of mutual interest.

Since we last met in this chamber my wife and I have visited many parts of Canada and have received at Government House a great number of societies and organizations, including representatives of student groups and youth movements. We have been deeply impressed with the expressions of loyalty to the crown by people in all walks of life.

The meeting of commonwealth prime ministers just concluded has again provided an opportunity for frank discussions at the highest level and a demonstration of the close relationship which distinguishes this unique association of free nations. Canada joined in welcoming four new self governing members of the commonwealth—Sierra Leone, Tanganyika, Jamaica, and Trinidad and Tobago.

The commonwealth conference discussed Britain's negotiations with the European economic community and the economic and political implications for the commonwealth and its members of possible British accession to the community. Canada has a vital concern in these issues and the government will spare no effort to safeguard the interests of Canada while preserving the unity and strength of the commonwealth as a whole.

Far reaching changes are taking place in the trading relationships between nations and groups of nations. New opportunities are opening up for fruitful negotiations to reduce the barriers to trade on a general, non-discriminatory basis. My government believes and has proposed that these important subjects should receive comprehensive consideration at a conference of representatives of like minded nations.

Canada has continued to play an increasingly effective role in international affairs. The division of Germany and the position of Berlin remain a source of friction despite continuing efforts to find a basis for a negotiated settlement. So long as the communist powers continue actions that bring tension and distrust, Canada's defensive capability must be maintained both at home and on the frontiers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Europe and in the Atlantic.

The threat of war can be eliminated only by reaching effective international agreement on disarmament verified by means that inspire confidence. Canada will persist in its efforts to achieve this end.

Canadians have noted with satisfaction the establishment by the United Nations and the food and agriculture organization, of a world food program based on a proposal put forward by my ministers. You will be asked to authorize a Canadian contribution to this program.

My government will ask you, as a significant step in rounding out the concept of confederation, to consider a resolution to provide for the "repatriation" of the constitution of Canada and to invite the concurrence of the provinces to this end.

As another means of making manifest the Canadian identity, my government will invite the provinces to a conference for consultation regarding the choice of a national flag and other national symbols.

Measures will be placed before you to provide for the division of the Northwest Territories into two territories, and to provide more self government for the residents of that area as a step toward the ultimate creation of new provinces in Canada's great north.

You will be requested to enact measures to give effect, with modifications, to certain of the recommendations of the royal commission on publications.

Speech from the Throne

Legislation respecting the Senate will be introduced.

To ensure that the redistribution of electoral districts is made objectively and impartially, you will be asked to approve a bill to establish an independent commission to recommend redistribution.

A measure will be placed before you to establish an Indian claims commission to investigate claims on the part of various tribes and bands that certain of their rights have been restricted or abrogated, and to make recommendations for the equitable and final settlement of such claims.

Economic activity in Canada has moved ahead sharply. This strong advance has resulted in more than 200,000 new jobs during the past twelve months. The objective of my government is to accelerate this pace of advance. This would mean the creation over the next five years of more than 1 million new jobs and a corresponding growth in gross national product and in production for both the export and domestic market, already at record levels.

Such high levels of activity have not prevented the emergence of foreign exchange difficulties similar to those which confronted Canada in crisis proportions in 1947, and to those which have affected other major trading nations more recently. In June my government found it necessary to put into immediate effect a comprehensive program to strengthen the country's exchange reserves. Since that time Canada's exchange reserves have increased substantially. It is my government's firm intention to remove the import surcharges included in this program as soon as circumstances permit.

My government will continue to take positive, constructive measures to strengthen Canada's balance of international payments. The recently stabilized exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has greatly helped Canadian producers in all parts of Canada both in the domestic and export markets. The new exchange rate is contributing as well to a large expansion in the Canadian tourist industry, which has also been aided by joint efforts of the federal and provincial governments.

Canada's development will continue to require imports of capital, and to this end my government will maintain a climate in Canada hospitable to foreign investment.

As one of my government's measures to develop the Canadian economy, maintain a high level of employment and strengthen the balance of payments, you will be asked to approve legislation establishing a national economic development board. This board would be broadly representative and would review and report upon the state of the economy and upon economic policies. It would also have the duty of recommending to the government particular projects or measures which it considers would be in the interest of national development, including projects which may require direct governmental participation by way of financial aid or otherwise.

The objective of my ministers is a balanced budget. This will require the exercise of restraint in respect of controllable spending and an increased concentration of available resources on essential national projects designed to ensure the expansion of the Canadian economy. Steps will be taken to improve further the efficiency of government operations. The report of the royal commission on government organization will be helpful in achieving this improvement of administration while maintaining the high status of the Canadian public service. A program of economies in government expenditures will be reflected in the revised estimates to be placed before you.

A royal commission has been established to review the whole field of federal taxation and its impact on the Canadian economy, and to recommend reforms and improvements.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The purposes of the fiscal measures to be placed before you at this session will be the creation of better employment opportunities for the Canadian people, the promotion of a high rate of economic growth, the strengthening of Canada's balance of international payments and the maintenance of stability in prices. New budget measures will be introduced to provide further solutions to long term problems.

My ministers will reintroduce the resolutions submitted in the last budget which had as its central purpose the encouragement of economic growth. This will include the production incentive provided to manufacturing and processing companies by cancelling one half of the tax on the first $50,000 of taxable income arising from increased sales and one quarter of the increased tax on any additional income arising from increased sales. It will also include the measure to grant to individuals and companies the right to charge petroleum drilling and exploration expenses against income from oil and gas production, and to permit certain expenditures made to acquire oil and gas rights to be deductible for tax purposes. The measure to allow a special tax credit in respect of provincial logging taxes will also be reintroduced in order to remove discrimination in the taxation of logging operations. Iron mining companies will be added to the list of companies which are exempt from the special tax on income earned in Canada by branches of non-resident corporations. The measure will also be reintroduced to increase by $50 per year the income tax deductions allowed for children.

My government intends to press forward in co-operation with Canadian industry to secure a greater and more rapid application of science to industrial production. You will be asked to approve the new tax incentive announced in the last budget for corporations undertaking increased expenditures on scientific research in Canada. Dramatic evidence of successful co-operation between Canadian science and industry has been given this week in the opening of Canada's first nuclear power generating station.

Canada's prosperity and growth must ultimately rest in large measure upon its exports. To achieve adequate export levels it will be necessary to increase further Canada's capacity to produce competitively and its ability to sell in export markets. The government's industrial programs are directed toward these ends. Its commercial policy negotiations have the objective of opening additional markets to Canadian producers in fair exchange for opportunities for others to sell in Canada. The vigorous campaign of export trade promotion will be expanded to enlarge the sales of Canadian products in foreign markets. You will be asked to provide the funds necessary for this increasing trade promotion work. Amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act will also be placed before you, to double the insurance liability which the corporation may assume and to improve the arrangements for long term financing.

You will be asked to authorize the establishment of an Atlantic development board to advise on measures and projects that will promote the economic development of the Atlantic region of Canada.

Amendments will be requested in the Industrial Development Bank Act to enlarge still further this bank's important role in national development.

The prosperity of agriculture remains essential to the well-being of the entire Canadian economy. Canada is blessed this year with very large crops of good quality, and export markets for Canadian agricultural products have been greatly enlarged.

My ministers recognize that livestock is occupying a position of increasing importance in Canadian agriculture. They propose that a program be instituted to ensure the availability of storage facilities and continuity of supplies of feed grain to match the expanding requirements for livestock production, particularly in the areas of British Columbia and eastern Canada where supplies of feed grain are normally deficient.

The program of rehabilitation and development of agricultural lands is proceeding actively and you will be asked to provide funds for it.

Legislation will be proposed to enlarge the funds of the Farm Credit Corporation, and allow greater flexibility in their use.

The need for training in agriculture and the present facilities have also been under review and as a sequel to these studies, a national conference on agricultural training is to be convened this fall.

The development and use of Canada's resources of energy must be a central feature of the program for national economic growth. The twenty fourth parliament has laid the groundwork for this in the National Energy Board Act and in other measures.

It is hoped that arrangements will soon be completed that will make it possible to submit for your approval the Columbia river treaty and the legislation required in parliament to implement it.

The national oil policy introduced by the government two years ago has brought about a gratifying increase in the production and sale of Canadian oil.

Studies will be continued, in co-operation with the provinces, in relation to the long distance high voltage transmission of electrical power and the development of potential sources of hydroelectric power with a view to the ultimate establishment of a national power grid, which will facilitate the orderly utilization of the hydroelectric potential of Canada in the interests of expanding Canadian development and progress. Discussions are in progress with the government of Manitoba in respect to studies of the Nelson river system.

My ministers have come to the conclusion that large scale, long term contracts for the export of power surplus to Canada's needs, present and potential, should now be encouraged in order to expedite the development of major power projects in Canada which are too large to be supported by the domestic market. Such exports can also strengthen our balance of payments.

In recognition of the important role of transportation in the Canadian economy, you will be asked to approve measures to give effect to recommendations of the royal commission on transportation which has now completed its comprehensive analysis of the Canadian railway problem. These changes are intended to remove the need for general horizontal freight rate increases which have borne so heavily in the past upon certain areas and groups of producers. You will also be asked to provide for an extension of the Freight Rates Reduction Act and the other interim railway subsidies provided by appropriation.

Amendments will be proposed to the Canada Shipping Act to preserve for Canadian vessels the coasting trade in the St. Lawrence and great lakes area. Funds will be requested to implement the program of shipbuilding subsidies announced some months ago.

You will be asked to provide for the continuation of the winter works program to assist municipalities in meeting seasonal unemployment.

Far reaching changes are taking place in manpower requirements in Canadian industries as a result of automation, other technological developments and world competitive pressures. A measure will be placed before you designed to assist employers, workers and their organizations in meeting the impact of industrial change.

My government will also place before you legislation to provide safeguards against accidents and hazards in works and undertakings within the federal fields of jurisdiction.

The committee inquiring into matters relating to the unemployment insurance fund is expected to submit its report this autumn. Following consideration of this report, appropriate measures will be placed before you.

In order to permit the introduction of a national system of contributory old age pensions with disability and survivor benefits, an amendment to the British North America Act is required. The governments of all provinces except Quebec and Newfoundland have concurred in such an amendment. My government is prepared to recommend to you the approval of an address to Her Majesty requesting the amendment when the concurrence of these remaining provinces has been received.

As pension plans have become ever more widely extended in Canadian business, it has been increasingly recognized that measures are essential to protect the interests of those affected and in particular to ensure that the benefits earned are portable when workers move from job to job. Provincial legislation would be required for this purpose in most cases, and several provinces are considering proposals of this nature. My government will be prepared to place before you complementary legislation to deal with industries under federal jurisdiction when adequate progress has been made by provinces.

A measure will be placed before you to authorize the establishment of a national council of welfare to make more fully effective the action of both federal and provincial governments in this field.

You will be asked to approve amendments to the Food and Drugs Act to provide for more effective control of the distribution and sale of drugs in the interests of the public health.

You will be asked to enact legislation to provide for the establishment of a national medical research council.

Legislation will be reintroduced to authorize the payment by federal crown corporations of certain provincial commodity taxes and fees.

Legislation will be proposed on university grants which will include authorization of payment of the higher grants announced some months ago and will provide alternative arrangements where supplementary provincial grants are made in lieu of federal grants.

A bill will be introduced to authorize a revision and codification of all federal statutes.

Bills will be introduced to amend the Judges Act, the Aeronautics Act, the Bankruptcy Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act, and other statutes.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and payments approved by parliament.

You will be asked to abolish closure and to re-establish the special committee on procedure of the house.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the Commons:

I pray that God in His wisdom may enlighten you in the discharge of your duty toward our country.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the house.

Motion agreed to.

House of Commons

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an Order in Council appointing the Hon. Leon Balcer, Minister of Transport, the Hon. Gordon Churchill, Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Hon. George Clyde Nowlan, Minister of Finance, and the Hon. Ellen Louks Fairclough, Postmaster General, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 143 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, intituled: An Act respecting the House of Commons.

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should now like to place before the house the nomination for the chairmanship of the committee of the whole house. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Churchill, that Mr. Gordon Campbell Chown, member for the electoral district of Winnipeg South be appointed chairman of committees of the whole house.

Mr. Chown, a young man of 40 years of age, educated at the University of Manitoba and at Queen's University, is a lawyer by profession. In the last world war he enlisted in the army as a private and rose to the rank of captain. Before coming to the House of Commons he served in a civic capacity as an alderman of the city of Winnipeg for a period of three years. He has been a member of the House of Commons for a number of years during which time he discharged responsibilities akin to those which he would now assume if his nomination were accepted by the house. It can be said that in the discharge of those duties he showed those characteristics of fairness and impartiality needed and requisite of anyone occupying the important position of chairman of committees.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I rise in order to express our entire approval of the nomination made by the Prime Minister. In the last parliament the hon. member for Winnipeg South served as chairman of committees. In that capacity he showed tact, fairness and complete impartiality. We are sure that in his more responsible position in this parliament he will show those same qualities, and we should like to support his nomination.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On this occasion we can agree with the leader of the official opposition. There is no need for me to repeat what he has so well said. What he has said we support.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should like now to nominate a deputy chairman of the committees of the whole. I place before hon. members of this house the name of Mr. Remi Paul, the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere.

Elected first in the general election of March, 1958, he has been an outstanding member of the house. He is a member of the bar, well acquainted with the rules of parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

That Remi Paul, member for the electoral district of Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere, be appointed deputy chairman of the committees of the whole house.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal opposition is pleased to accept the Prime Minister's suggestion concerning this appointment, which is a very important one and in which we rejoice. May I only offer our best wishes to the new incumbent in the fulfilment of his new duties.

(Text):

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think that concludes the business for today and I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Churchill:

That the house do stand adjourned until tomorrow at 2.30 p.m. notwithstanding the provisions of standing order No. 2 subsection 1.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.02 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 28, 1962

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Before calling orders of the day I think it would be helpful both to the Chair and to hon. members if I were to refer to Beauchesne and also the standing orders of the house, which I understand all hon. members have in their possession, and merely draw attention, particularly for the benefit of new members, to standing order No. 39 and to citation 171 on page 147 of Beauchesne and those citations which follow on the subsequent pages, dealing with questions. I think a careful study of the standing order and of the commentaries would help both the Chair and hon. members in the proper conduct of the business of this house.

TRADE

CUBA—RUSSIAN CARGOES CARRIED IN CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on press reports that a number of vessels owned by Canadian companies but registered in the United Kingdom have been carrying material from the Soviet union to Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has investigated reports which were alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition, that eight Canadian owned ships are involved in carrying cargo between the U.S.S.R. and Cuba. I would point out that all ships referred to in the press report, although apparently Canadian owned, are under the British flag and are operated and managed by British companies. Five of the ships have always been under British registry since they were built during the war. The other three were transferred to British registry under an arrangement worked out in 1950.

As the hon. gentleman knows, under maritime law and general international practice, ships are subject to the laws of the country under whose flag they operate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having regard to the fact that these vessels to which the Prime Minister has referred are considered by the government as a contribution to any allied shipping arrangements in case of emergency, and notwithstanding what has just been said, does the minister feel that this kind of trade is in conformity with that policy?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as a former minister of transport, should have asked a much more sensible question than that. He knows very well that the answer given by the Prime Minister was the correct one. These ships, under the law, are British ships under British registry and not under Canadian registry. They were put there while the hon. member for Laurier was minister of transport.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister, who did not take the trouble to answer my first question.

Mr. Green: Because it was a foolish question.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me add this. Having regard to the fact that these ships, notwithstanding that they are under British registry, pay income tax to the government of Canada, does the minister consider under these circumstances that this policy is in accordance with the policy of the government?

Mr. Green: Well, I have never heard of ships paying income tax.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF SALARY REVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious unrest amongst federal civil servants, will the Prime Minister assure the house that he will give immediate consideration to a request by the civil service association for an immediate implementation of salary revisions for classes in group B of the cyclical salary review program—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member, who while he is a new member at this time has had previous experience in this house, the fact that the question he is posing at the moment would be more appropriate for the order paper.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that there is serious unrest amongst civil servants in Canada. This is a question which is of great importance at this time.

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest respect to the hon. member, I am of the opinion that questions should seek information and not proffer it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I with great respect suggest that the question was a proper one. The hon. gentleman was seeking to ascertain what was government policy with regard to the kind of negotiations, or instrument for negotiation, through which the civil service wished to carry on talks with the government. Surely that is a proper question. I think the hon. gentleman, under our rules and traditions, should not be denied the opportunity of putting that question.

Mr. Speaker: In reply to the hon. member for Essex East I feel that although the intentions of the hon. member for Kootenay East may have been legitimate, they did not appear to be so in the form in which the question was asked.

[Later:]

Mr. Byrne: May I put my question in somewhat different form to the Prime Minister in the hope that he may see fit to answer it. Would the Prime Minister inform the house what consideration is being given to the civil service request that group B be considered for increases, and will all increases be made retroactive to October 1?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really do not see any difference between the earlier question and the present one.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THALIDOMIDE—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the many in the country who are concerned about the matter, will the government consider setting up a committee of the house to examine into the circumstances surrounding the sale and distribution of thalidomide, to consider what is being done to aid the victims, and to take steps to prevent a recurrence of such a tragedy?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As hon. members have read in the speech from the throne, steps are being taken by way of amendment to the Food and Drugs Act, and when they are introduced I am sure every opportunity will be given to all hon. members to discuss the subject.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister cannot answer my question then I shall put a supplementary one. After the amending bill has been given second reading will it be referred to a committee of the house?

Mr. Monteith: No, I cannot say that.

[Later:]

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister advise whether immediate consideration is being given to the separation of the food and drug directorate in his department, which will result in better inspection service?

Mr. Monteith: No, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REFERENCE OF TREATY TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him whether the commitment he made during the 24th parliament that the Columbia river treaty would be referred to the external affairs committee will be honoured.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If I remember the commitment correctly, it was that the treaty would be referred to the external affairs committee before ratification.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF TERRITORIAL WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister in a position to make any announcement with regard to the negotiations to extend the present fishing limits, which are so important to our fishing industry?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since the end of the second conference on the law of the sea we have carried on exploratory talks with a number of countries concerning the possibility of working out a broad agreement on a number of questions left unsettled by the two conferences. As yet I am not able to report any definite conclusions as a result of the conversations.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN OIL COMPANY—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF TAKEOVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the indication in the throne speech that legislation will be introduced to establish a national economic development board whose duties would include reporting upon economic policies and recommending projects which may require direct governmental participation, will the Prime Minister consider asking the directors of Canadian Oil Company to defer final acceptance of Shell Oil Company's takeover bid until this important matter could be examined by the proposed national economic development board to see whether it is in the best interests of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In respect to that question, I have some difficulty in seeing in what way a matter of policy should be announced, and how this particular question would not be the responsibility of the ministry.

TRANSPORT

NANAIMO-VANCOUVER—REQUEST THAT STEAMSHIP SERVICE BE CONTINUED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister join all of Vancouver island north of the Malahat in urging the C.P.R. not to withdraw on October 1 its passenger steamship service between Nanaimo and Vancouver, at least until some suitable alternative method of transportation has been provided?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this situation was brought to my notice earlier, with the request that the federal government intervene to preserve the service. On looking into the matter then it was my conclusion that there were no grounds for federal intervention. The facts seem to be that the Canadian Pacific action has been occasioned, at least in part, by the very active competition of the provincially operated ferry system. Within the last few years the province has organized a very efficient ferry service connecting Vancouver and Victoria, and has more recently acquired the Vancouver-Nanaimo service of Blackball Ferries. I would think that any question of extending the Canadian Pacific services to be cancelled would be a matter to be taken up directly with the provincial government.

[Later:]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, supplementary to the question I asked a little earlier about the C.P.R. steamship services in British Columbia. In view of his statement that the government of Canada has no jurisdiction over the continued operation of such services, will he consider introducing an amendment to the Transport Act to bring coastal steamer services under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED ANNOUNCEMENT OF REDUCTION IN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, and I apologize for not giving him notice. Is the minister aware that Canadian National Railways have announced their intention of reducing the cross-province service to three trains per week, which would bring us back to what we had about 50 years ago? Has the minister received representations from the chamber of commerce and other interested parties about this matter?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—CANADIAN MEMBERS OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to reveal the names of the three Canadian representatives who will sit on the joint international commission to consider the deepening of the Richelieu river? That commission is supposed to meet in early October.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I am in a position to reveal those names, I shall be pleased to impart that information to the house.

(Text):

PUBLIC WORKS

SAN JUAN BAY, VANCOUVER ISLAND—REQUEST FOR BREAKWATER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister give the house an up to date report with respect to the urgent need for a breakwater in San Juan bay on Vancouver island?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I perhaps should have referred the hon. member a little earlier to standing order 39 and the references thereto. The question and all questions of this type should be placed on the order paper.

COMBINES

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF MERGER SECTIONS OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. My question is based upon the three recent reports of the restrictive trade practices commission regarding the paper box and related products industries, with respect to which the commission feels the merger sections of the Combines Investigation Act are too weak to have any effect.

Is it the intention of the government to introduce any amendments to these merger sections of the Combines Investigation Act during this session in order to overcome this difficulty?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as has already been announced publicly, the recommendations of the restrictive trades practices commission are under study.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it the intention of the government to introduce any legislation this session based on the recommendations of Dr. Sinclair with respect to licence limitations?

Hon. J. A. Maclean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for New Westminster for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. No decision has been taken by the government to introduce legislation on this subject.

CHALEUR BAY, N.B.—ILLEGAL FISHING BY FOREIGN TRAWLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Could the minister inform the house whether he has received complaints against fishing trawlers of foreign origin, and particularly of Spanish registry, operating in the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence and at the entrance of Chaleur bay with nets below minimum standards of mesh size requirements? If so, what action has been taken to protect Canadian fishermen against such operations?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): More than one report of activities by foreign fishing vessels in this general area has been made to the department. Investigations have been carried out on each occasion and the appropriate action has been taken by my department where any action was indicated. I should be glad to report further to the hon. gentleman at a later time.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the government's intention to substitute a program of real Canadian prosperity for the austerity program?

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SONS OF FREEDOM, B.C.—POLICY RESPECTING PENITENTIARY SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice; I apologize for not having given him notice this morning. May I ask the Minister of Justice whether, in the light of the responsibilities and jurisdiction of his department and in the interests of the maintenance of law, order, peace and good government, there are any plans of which he could advise this house to resolve the serious situation now facing the province of British Columbia as a result of the actions and policies of the Sons of Freedom?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated there would be a question or questions on this subject and, if I may, I should like to make a statement in relation to the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the minister has unanimous consent to make a statement in reply to this question, we must revert to motions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is not a statement on the orders of the day, but it will amplify the answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The attorney general of British Columbia, Hon. R. W. Bonner, has informed me by letter that on September 20 last he made a public statement asking the government of Canada to change its prison policy in relation to the Sons of Freedom Doukhobors who had been sentenced to penitentiary terms of imprisonment. His request was, in effect, that these prisoners should be dispersed among other federal institutions across Canada.

In February of this year the government of Canada was faced with the problem of arranging for the custody of large numbers of members of the Sons of Freedom sect of Doukhobors who it was expected at that time would be sentenced to penitentiary terms for acts of terrorism.

On the basis of experience gained over 30 years of dealing with Freedomites as penitentiary prisoners, it was well known to the government that they would be unlike ordinary prisoners. In the past they have failed to co-operate in any way in carrying on the normal routine of the penitentiary. They have never been prepared to take part in any work program for inmates. They have set fire to institutional buildings and equipment. They have frequently upset the prison routine by staging demonstrations and by going on hunger strikes.

In determining the course to be followed to provide custody for convicted Freedomites, the government gave full consideration to the proposal that they should be divided in groups among existing federal institutions across Canada. Because they were required to be kept under conditions of maximum security custody it was impossible to transfer them to the four medium and 12 minimum security institutions operated by the penitentiary service. There remained for consideration, therefore, only the question whether they might be divided among the six maximum security institutions operating at New Westminster, B.C., Prince Albert, Sask., Stony Mountain, Man., Kingston, Ont., St. Vincent de Paul, P.Q., and Dorchester, N.B.

These institutions now hold a total of more than 4,000 inmates. The inmate population increases day by day by reason of committals from the courts. Conditions of serious overcrowding exist in every one of these penitentiaries and will continue to exist until 1964 when construction of four new major institutions will be completed.

It was the view of the government of Canada that to introduce large numbers of Freedomite inmates into these institutions would serve no useful purpose as far as the solution of the over-all problem of Freedomites in British Columbia is concerned. Moreover, to do so would be calculated, in the government's view, to create situations in those institutions leading to explosive trouble. If such trouble did develop the result could conceivably be danger to life and the destruction of millions of dollars worth of government property. At the least it would mean the complete disruption of the inmate training program which is being continuously developed in those institutions at substantial public expense.

Sixty-eight Freedomites are now in federal custody and more than 100 others are awaiting trial. Those who are in custody have already engaged in activities such as attempted arson, refusal to eat and refusal to conform with the routines of the institutions in which they have been confined.

The position of the federal government is clear. Until such time as new construction permits the transfer of Freedomite prisoners to other maximum security institutions where they can be safely held, they will continue to be confined in Mountain prison. This is a maximum security, fireproof institution in which the Freedomites can be kept in custody at the least expense and with the least possible danger to the Canadian public.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, could I ask a supplementary on this subject. Has the government given consideration to offering its co-operation to the government of British Columbia with a view to implementing the long term, jointly sponsored program required in order to remedy this unfortunate situation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the word "co-operation" was used in the statement issued by the attorney general of British Columbia to which I have referred. I think the federal government has extended full co-operation in this matter, and that course which I have outlined now is one which will be appreciated by the hon. member as the only proper course for the federal government to follow under existing circumstances.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

HONG KONG—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN QUOTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the quota of 100 refugees from communism from Hong Kong been reached, and has his department made any directions to increase this number of refugees from China and Hong Kong coming to Canada?

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as of today 71 persons have actually arrived in Canada. That number consists of 35 individuals or family units. There are 48 additional applications involving 107 persons who have been approved for admission but have been held temporarily in Hong Kong pending completion of medical treatment for a condition which must be cleared up before the persons in question can come forward to Canada. Most, if not all, of these will be over here by the end of October. It is expected that by the middle or the end of November the 100 family units will have been completed, and at that time consideration will be given to a possible extension of the program.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—REPORTED UNSATISFACTORY SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and preface it by offering him my congratulations on obtaining his new position in the cabinet. My question is based on an article in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday, Thursday, September 27, to the effect that guards at the federal maximum security prison in Dorchester, New Brunswick, claim that conditions among the inmates there have for some time been past the breaking point. There is further reference to the need for additional security officers. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on that.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his congratulations. I have not seen the article in question, but I shall be glad to do so and investigate its contents.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTED REDUCTION IN SHIPMENTS TO LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the drastic reduction in wheat exports to the lakehead during the present navigational season, and I would like to ask him whether we can expect an increase in exports during the balance of the season.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see that the hon. member for Assiniboia retains his interest in the marketing of grain. I will be glad to deal with this subject on the proper occasion if the opportunity should come up.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house at this time whether there is likely to be in the near future a lifting of the ban on the shipment of high grade wheat to the lakehead? This is an urgent question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent question. At the present time we are giving preference to the movement of low grade wheat to the lakehead to meet the requirements of the domestic market of eastern Canada.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. On what date, if we are still here, would the minister propose to introduce the budget resolutions referred to in the speech from the throne?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, so I cannot say.

AGRICULTURE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED DUMPING OF U.S. PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether any action is now contemplated to stop the flood of U.S. agricultural produce into British Columbia, which is a dumping process, three weeks before the Kootenays come into production.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been for the last five years or he would know what this government has done about the stopping of any dumping.

Mr. Winch: May I say that my hon. friend knows where I have been. I have just returned from the Okanagan and the Kootenays, where this problem exists.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. GORDON CHAPLIN AND SECONDED BY MR. CLEMENT VINCENT

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Gordon Chaplin (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I would at this time like to extend to you my very warm congratulations on your appointment to high office. I believe that anyone who was in this house yesterday and saw you will agree that you will serve with great distinction, and I hope that in this capacity you may serve for many, many years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I am conscious of the very great honour that has been given me here today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in asking me to move the adoption of the speech from the throne. I feel very diffident, as I am sure any new member would when one considers the number of great Canadians who over the years have taken their place in this chamber. It also gives me a great sense of pride when I recall that my late father spent many years in this house as the then member for Lincoln. In those days it would never have occurred to me that I would have either the honour or the opportunity of representing in this assembly another great and historic constituency. It gives me a very warm and personal pleasure to see here in his place today the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). He served in this house with my father, and to the best of my knowledge he is the only remaining link with that generation.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem appropriate that, with many new members in the house, I should perhaps give some description of the constituency that I have the honour to represent. Waterloo South, which with its counterpart of Waterloo North makes up the whole of Waterloo county, is situated in the middle of southwestern Ontario, and comprises rich agricultural lands, a great dairy industry, the raising of beef and cattle, grain, vegetables, fruits and extensive mixed farming. Coupled with this is a great industrial complex. In the north, in Kitchener and Waterloo, there are great rubber and tire plants, furniture factories, distilleries, television and appliance factories, an electronics industry and many others. Besides, it is a centre for great insurance and financial institutions.

Again, in Waterloo South, in the centres of Galt, Preston, and Hespeler, there is a great variety of industry ranging from heavy steel fabrication through textiles, plastics, furniture, electrical devices and so on. I merely mention this, Mr. Speaker, in order to illustrate the fact that we have a great and progressive farming community and a great and expanding industrial area which employ and provide a livelihood for thousands of our population. We have what I would call a well balanced economy. We enjoy these advantages. We are, of course aware of the problems that beset both agriculture and industry.

As to the origin of the people in this area, in the north they are largely German or Pennsylvania Dutch, and in the south around Galt and Ayr they are predominantly Scottish.

To those members here of Scottish ancestry I might say that only recently a very charming young lady from Galt, in the person of Miss Ann Gall, won the championship at the Scottish dancing festival in Edinburgh. I am told that this is the first time that anyone outside of Scotland has won such an honour. You can see, Mr. Speaker, that we have a very progressive community and one that still treasures its history and traditions.

The legislation that has been proposed in the speech from the throne must be considered in relation to what this government has already accomplished, the record this government has established, and the implementation of its undertakings to the people of this country. At this time I should like to deal with agriculture, not only because of its major importance to the country and to my community, but because one of the great problems of certain phases of agriculture has been the generation of huge surpluses. The taxpayer of this country is very conscious of this situation, particularly if he is called upon to support these surpluses by huge subsidies.

One of the long term plans of the Department of Agriculture contemplates encouraging some of the farmers, particularly dairy farmers, to change to the production of beef cattle. In this country today there is a great demand for beef cattle. In the next 12 years we shall have to increase our beef cattle population by seven million head. This is a profitable business, but it presents certain problems, particularly to those engaged in dairy farming. The dairy farmer has been accustomed to selling his milk daily and getting returns on a weekly basis or some regular one. A difficulty of financing is presented when he gets a return only once a year at a time when he sells his beef cattle.

This whole problem ties in with the long term objectives of A.R.D.A., the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, and contemplates making better use of marginal lands so that the farmer will get a better return. Among other things this use could include permanent pasture and, when desirable, it could be a community or co-operative pasture. By such use it is hoped that good arable land will be released from pasture and be available for the raising of feed grain in eastern Canada. It is also expected that the expansion of beef cattle production in western Canada will provide an increasing market for western feed grains. This, to me, is a sound program designed to guide farmers and to encourage them into long term profitable production so as to reduce and to try to eliminate certain dairy products surpluses and to get these subsidies off the backs of our taxpayers.

I am glad to note in the speech from the throne that there will be certain changes in the Farm Credit Act which I believe will be helpful in this regard. Also, I feel it would be desirable to have some further degree of liberalization in the Farm Improvement Loans Act. As the situation is now, the time of repayment of a loan is related to the size of the loan itself. In other words, a farmer borrowing say $7,500 must repay the loan in five years while a farmer borrowing $1,000 to $2,000 has only a year or a year and a half in which to repay it. I would think this requirement could work a hardship on a small farmer trying to establish a basic herd of beef cattle. I should think that the time of repayment of the loan should be related to the purpose of the loan. I hope the government will be able to give some consideration to this matter.

There is another aspect of the department which I think is of great interest and importance, namely the extent and the effectiveness of their research. In an attempt to widen the domestic and export market for Canadian foodstuffs great progress has been made in the development of certain processed foods. A good example of this progress is with regard to instant mashed potatoes. These processes are now being extended to other products such as turnips and to combinations of potatoes and meat, potatoes and fish, potatoes and cheese, and potatoes and eggs. The minister has reasoned that if these foods could be prepared in such a way that they could be stored in the hot tropical countries without refrigeration, could be made palatable and nutritious, could be packaged perhaps as a single meal and could be sold at a low price, this accomplishment would be a novel and at the same time realistic and distinctly Canadian approach to the problem of extending our markets and perhaps also in some cases to the problems of surpluses and subsidies. This is exactly what they appear to have accomplished. I say "appear to have accomplished" because I have been a manufacturer long enough to know that many items which have bright promise in the development field do not always materialize. In this case, however, matters have advanced to a point where the Canadian food industry, the processors and suppliers have been brought into the picture and an export organization has been set up in order to develop and promote these and other Canadian foodstuffs in the export markets of the world. To me this is a most exciting concept. I think it is perhaps one of the most exciting things happening in agriculture today. This is enterprise, and I believe in enterprise regardless of where it originates. If ultimately this effort is successful, it will expand our markets and will help to keep surpluses down in many of our agricultural products. It is conceivable that it will even help us in meeting our obligations to the emerging nations of Africa and to the old nations of Asia which have always been endemic with starvation and famine.

Mr. Speaker, we have a minister who knows his job thoroughly. He is a man of imagination and he has the ability to turn that imagination to practical purposes. Perhaps, above all, however, this demonstrates the necessity of co-operation between government, suppliers and processors and it points out to us the way of co-operation which we must have in this country if we are to survive under the economic conditions that face us today.

I am glad to note that the speech from the throne gives recognition to the problem of automation in industry, and I should like to make a few remarks concerning the Department of Labour. When one thinks of labour one also thinks in terms of employment. Whereas our employment situation has been bettered very substantially over the last few months, and I believe is now at an all time peak, nevertheless we have in this country a residue of unemployed that is cause for concern to anybody who understands or appreciates the tragedy of a jobless person.

There are three main causes of unemployment in Canada. One of them, of course, is our climate which makes certain types of work difficult in the wintertime and contributes to unemployment on a seasonal basis. Important steps have been taken in this direction and the municipal winter works incentive program for the coming winter has been announced. It seems evident that many municipalities are taking advantage of this program, and the program itself will likely be expanded this year.

That this particular program has been most effective and useful I think goes without saying. The minister is to be congratulated for his vigour and foresight in pursuing this program. I believe it has made a great contribution in levelling out unemployment and minimizing the winter peaks that we have had in the past. There are two other major contributing factors to unemployment in this country and one of them is related to our trade policies. We must stimulate industry in this country. We must try to create conditions that will encourage Canadian industry to manufacture here many of the things that we are importing into this country.

I intend to come back again to the question of trade but there is another factor relating to unemployment and that is the question of automation. Automation means many things to many persons. However, it is generally recognized that it contemplates the use of improved and usually automatic machinery and improved techniques to reduce the unit cost of a given article. In a general way it also means that those employed require higher skills and training, and the ones that usually suffer in any contraction of employment are the unskilled.

This situation, coupled with the expanding school population and the added thousands of young people who are now starting to join our work force, is presenting the department and the government with a very real problem. However, the vocational training program which was inaugurated by the government in conjunction and co-operation with the provinces is now beginning to demonstrate its great possibilities. There are those who have suggested that this has been done altogether too quickly and that buildings alone will not answer the problem. This is undoubtedly true to a degree and the need for such a program should perhaps have been foreseen many years ago. It should have been foreseen and acted upon by the previous administration. Nevertheless great progress is being made and I am convinced that over the years this will benefit those coming out of our schools and will give an opportunity to increase and upgrade the skills of those who are at present in our labour force and face the possibility of unemployment.

To mention again the problems arising out of automation, the settlement which was recently made between the unions and the railways in this country caught my eye. I do not propose to make any comment on the economic aspects of this settlement, but I do suggest that the provisions that have been made for taking care of employees who are likely to be released because of improved efficiency in operation and the retraining of employees where this is possible could well recommend themselves to other industries under similar conditions.

Although the minister did not enter directly into this matter, nevertheless I feel that these particular terms with respect to this settlement would express his views, his feelings and, I believe, his philosophy. Those who know the minister know that he is one with an innate sense of fairness, one who inspires confidence and one who gives leadership toward co-operation.

One of the most persistent problems that has plagued this country over the years, Mr. Speaker, has been our huge and chronic adverse balance of payments with the United States, of which our imbalance of trade makes up a major portion. This problem is directly related to and is a major contributing factor in our foreign exchange crisis that was precipitated and triggered last June. The huge amount of excessive imports into this country, made up largely of fully manufactured consumer goods, has been paid for by the importation or bringing in of foreign capital.

I do not want to be misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. I am not opposed to foreign capital investing in this country, in fact quite the opposite; but it is surely one thing to employ foreign capital to provide capital goods and productive machinery which will earn their keep by future production and quite another thing to obtain foreign capital to enable this country to use up imported consumer goods when this capital has to be paid for from some other source at some future time.

In my view our position in this country can readily be likened to that of an improvident farmer who sells the bottom five acres of his land to take a trip to California or Florida. This is exactly what we have been doing in this country. This is the way we have been living. We have been squandering and dissipating our assets to take care of our current living.

In 1961 our importation of consumer goods was close to $2 billion. A very substantial portion of this was fully manufactured goods that could be made in this country. Does this not surely suggest something to us? Surely it suggests that we must make every effort to encourage the further industrialization of our country because, important as primary industry is, important as our great wealth of raw materials will remain, we simply cannot look to that source in the future for the expansion that must take place.

Canada and other free nations contribute and must continue to contribute assistance to underdeveloped countries. This assistance is in the form of technical aid, money to provide modern equipment and the tools of industry, training, etc. When these measures of assistance are given, the one opportunity for their utilization in underdeveloped countries lies, first, in the field of development of their own primary products. This results in increasing world competition in the field of raw materials and today this is seriously affecting Canada's position as a world supplier.

There are those theorists, Mr. Speaker, who say that we should specialize in the manufacture of those things in which we are most competent. Just what that embraces I do not know. But I do know that there are many, many materials today that can be reproduced synthetically. With proper equipment and training, plastic plants could operate in any country in the world. Here is another area where new products and new materials can and do compete with traditional materials. As I see it, one important raw material that we must provide in the future is managerial excellence in the form of chemists, engineers, technicians and skilled personnel, along with the development of new and modern techniques.

It is only through a sound, strong and prosperous secondary industry that we are going to be able to do this. If we do not do so, we will fall far and we will fall fast before the onslaught of European and Asiatic competition, along with that of the United States which we have with us always.

What has the government done to encourage the growth and expansion of industry in this country? There has been, of course, the devaluation of the dollar and the very beneficial effects from this action are now becoming very apparent. But I want to speak at this time more specifically of the activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The minister of this department has done an outstanding job. He has given imaginative leadership to the department. Their morale is high and they are probably the finest foreign service of this kind in the world today. This is attested to by every businessman who has had anything to do with them.

There has been nothing static about this department, and that the many new and novel approaches that have been taken to promote the sale of Canadian products have been sound and realistic can also be attested to by some 5,600 businessmen and manufacturers who have attended the various trade conferences held by the minister throughout the country.

Now, the department is proposing to bring buyers from foreign countries to see what Canada has to offer. This has created some editorial comment and some criticism. Admittedly, this approach might not appear orthodox in relation to the action and the function of this department in the past, but I do not look upon this as socialism or undue bureaucratic interference with business any more than I look upon the establishment of trade fairs as being socialistic or bureaucratic. Actually, Mr. Speaker, I can see a great advantage to bringing potential customers to this country to see the manufacturing facilities we possess. It is not anticipated that the Department of Trade and Commerce is going to take over foreign sales by Canadian businessmen. Manufacturers, of course, still have to go out and sell their individual products. I look upon this as intelligent co-operation on the part of the department with manufacturers to try to strengthen and preserve our trading position in world markets which is being challenged by every other aggressive country in the world today.

Manufacturers in this country generally have responded enthusiastically to the leadership that has been given by the minister. In passing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I sometimes get a little tired of listening to the pontificating of certain editorial writers who reiterate again and again that Canadian manufacturers are lazy, unimaginative, inefficient and lack sales initiative. In my experience, this just is not a fact. There may, of course, be inefficient businesses. I suppose that there are. But by and large, Canadian industry has had to be efficient to live. In my own experience, I have had the heads of large United States manufacturing companies visit our plant, and they have been amazed at the versatility and ingenuity we have had to use in Canada to meet competition.

There are many other facets of this department with which I have not time to deal today, but I do want to mention one in the domestic field. Along with the Department of Labour, they were instrumental in setting up the productivity council. This, I feel, was one of the most important things we have attempted in this country. I was greatly distressed when one of the very prominent labour leaders in this country today saw fit to resign. One of the significant features of the recovery of European countries after the war was the determination of all elements of the population to again get on their feet. It was the determined co-operation of government, labour and industry that primarily led to the spectacular recovery of these countries even prior to the advent of the common market. We have a lot to learn from this because it is these people with whom we are going to have to compete.

We in this country must increase our productivity and we must reduce our costs. With some fear of over-simplification, Mr. Speaker, I would say that a manufacturer's cost is largely made up of raw materials which he buys, of the cost of labour to convert those raw materials into whatever his product may be and, in this day and age, it also includes the tremendous burden of taxation that has been placed upon industry by all levels of government. I say we must increase our productivity; but if the fruits of increased productivity go only to one source, if they go only to labour, then our competitive position will be no better than it is now. If they go only to management or if governments increase their taxation of industry, then our position will be just the same or even worse. We could all benefit from increased productivity but the one who should benefit most is seldom mentioned. I refer to the consumer. A major objective of increased productivity should be not only to get our costs down but to get our prices down. If we can do that at home and abroad, we can also free our minds from these lingering, malignant fears of foreign competition. However, I can only see this being accomplished as a national objective.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that there are many people who seem to feel that the results of this last election were disastrous inasmuch as no party was given a majority. I do not feel this is necessarily the case. However, I do feel this presents a great challenge to every individual member. This will cause members of this house to think most soberly of national interest, of Canadian interest. I believe that the people of this country are going to expect from their members of parliament the same discipline, the same spirit of co-operation that Canadians generally are going to be called upon to exercise in ensuing years. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that is the challenge that faces every member here today.

I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Major General George P. Vanier, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Military Cross and the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Clement Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable emotion and pride that I utter my first words in this illustrious assembly—an assembly composed of men and women whose mission is to represent the legitimate aspirations of the Canadian people.

The right hon. Prime Minister having done me the honour of asking me to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne, read by His Excellency the Governor General, the representative of our Gracious Majesty, obliges me to tell you that it is rather the worthy people of my county who deserve this token of esteem on the part of the Prime Minister. It is not the first time he has honoured our fine people. We note with pride that, in 1957, he invited one of our citizens to join his cabinet and, later, recommended his appointment as Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec. I take pleasure in paying tribute to my illustrious predecessor, the Hon. Paul Comtois, who is a credit to the agricultural population of the entire province and of the county in particular, by being the first farmer to accede to this high position in my province.

Now, please allow me to salute the men and women of my beautiful county of Nicolet-Yamaska and to state publicly that as long as they have faith in me I shall endeavour to serve them to the best of my ability with the humble talents Divine Providence was kind enough to bestow on me. Is there any need to reaffirm before this house the freedom of expression I have always enjoyed and which I propose to retain in the ranks of this great party which, thanks to its present leader, gave the Canadian people the bill of rights.

I now quote the words spoken by the right hon. Prime Minister during the debates in the House of Commons on July 1, 1961:

I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way; free to uphold what I believe is right, free to oppose what I believe is wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Those words, as I said, prompted me to serve in federal politics, my country, Canada, my province, Quebec, and my county of Nicolet-Yamaska.

(Text):

I now have the opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin) on his remarkable speech. All of us are certain that the experience he had in the Ontario legislature, and in public affairs generally, will give him a great advantage in serving the country in the way his father did when an hon. member of this house and a former minister of trade and commerce. The men and women in his constituency must be proud of him today.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, when you were chosen as the Speaker of this house, the choice was unanimously accepted. Those of us who are from Quebec feel honoured that one of our own people—who is now a citizen of western Canada—should accede to this eminent position. We know your talents and personal qualifications will make you a Speaker who will be listened to and admired by all.

Perhaps I should not dwell too long on congratulations. Our best wishes accompany all those who have accepted a new office either as deputy speaker of the house, chairman of committees, members of the cabinet, parliamentary secretaries. I will just mention two of them. First, the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) who, as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, has assumed the duties previously carried out by my predecessor for Nicolet-Yamaska. And second, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), a native of my county of Nicolet-Yamaska, who is doing such good work as parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister and government whip.

I hope that the new members who, like myself, sit in this house for the first time, will retain their initial enthusiasm and obtain every success in the issues they shall uphold.

(Text):

As I have just said in French I extend congratulations to the new hon. members and, indeed, to all hon. members who were elected on June 18. I hope to have the opportunity of meeting each of them during the session. Canada is a large country, but although we live far away from each other and do not have the same language and religion we do share the same faith in the greatness of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to speak about my electoral district of Nicolet-Yamaska. The county and town of Nicolet and the Nicolet river are named after the explorer and companion of Champlain, Jean Nicolet. The name of Yamaska county comes from an Indian word, Ouamaska or Hiamaska, which means: "The place with grass under water". Those who have the advantage of visiting this area in the heart of Quebec will find 45,192 inhabitants who live on the south bank of the St. Lawrence river, in the finest countryside of the province. This population lives principally on agriculture. We also have industries scattered across the county and they are a source of pride to us; and we foresee considerable development in the future. We can observe a deep attachment to the finest French-Canadian traditions among the people. Their generosity makes for unity in sharing the simple joys as well as the worst trials of life.

In my county, we also find institutions of learning of which we are proud. How many men and women have received the higher education that our institutions can provide: the seminary of Nicolet with its secondary and college education, our school of agriculture, our colleges and our schools directed by priests, nuns and laymen.

Since 1957, that is since the coming into power of this government, we are proud to be able to say that the county has benefited from legislation and measures adopted. It suffices to mention that the budget earmarked by this government for agriculture has almost doubled from 1957 to 1961, compared with 1953 to 1957. During the latter period, $363 million were spent on agriculture in Canada and from 1957 to 1961 we spent $706 million.

Mr. Speaker, the county of Nicolet-Yamaska relies considerably on income from dairy farming. This government has voted in measures directed at helping this industry. Here are some of these measures:

A.—The subsidized price of butter was raised from 58 to 64 cents. If we bear in mind that the yearly butter production averages between 360 to 365 million pounds, we find that our farmers get from $21 to $22 million of extra money per year.

B.—The subsidized price of cheese is 32½ cents per pound. For us in Quebec, this figure which last year was 31½ cents, was brought up to 32½ cents a pound in Montreal and represents a very considerable gain for our farmers.

C.—Subsidy of 25 cents per hundred pounds of milk granted to those who supply processing plants. Since the 1st of May 1959, this has contributed toward raising producers' income by about $12 million per year.

D.—Early this year, the government voted a subsidy of 12 cents per pound on butter, in order to allow consumers to pay less for butter and producers to receive the same price. This measure will cost the government, for this year alone, from $40 to $42 million.

Before the government granted this subsidy, consumption of butter fell off badly. Last year consumption was 290 million pounds; this year, consumption is expected to reach approximately 330 to 340 million pounds, an increase of about 20 per cent. Farmers are happy about this increase. It is important for the dairy industry that the government carry on in this direction. In addition, I believe that governments, agricultural associations, and farmers ought all to unite in intensifying promotion of our dairy products, so that the increasing consumer market for these products may be maintained to the advantage of our farming industry.

Mr. Speaker, another act adopted by this government which greatly encourages the establishment of economically productive farm units is the act incorporating the farm credit corporation which lends to farmers against the security of the land up to $20,000 and, under part III of the act, up to $27,500. As a former member of the advisory committee of that corporation, I am very pleased to pay a well deserved tribute to all the officials who administer the act. I am convinced that the farmers of Canada will always receive from these officials the most favourable consideration. I have received many letters of a complimentary nature about that piece of legislation and I make it a point to thank very sincerely the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) on behalf of those farmers.

The government which I have the honour to support has also considered that it was necessary to increase the loans granted under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The maximum was raised from $5,000 to $7,500, an increase of 50 per cent. These loans are guaranteed by the goverment through the banks.

The government has also increased the compensations granted for the animals slaughtered under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The increases vary from 40 per cent to 75 per cent.

Moreover, the farmers of the province of Quebec received last year from the federal government the sum of $2,150,000 as the share of that government, i.e., 60 per cent of the grants for the purchase and transportation of lime.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, we were very pleased to hear the Prime Minister announce the appointment of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. This proves once more the spirit of national unity shown by the party in office, and the farmers of Quebec are happy to see for the first time a Quebec member occupy that position.

Last Monday, when reading the report of the important speech delivered in Joliette by the Minister of Agriculture, French Canadians were all delighted to hear that the minister intends to entrust his parliamentary secretary with important duties. Such an understanding attitude is a valuable contribution towards national unity and an undertaking that the farmers of my province will enjoy the services of a devoted and competent spokesman.

Another news item which is apt to please our rural population is the creation of a feed grain board for eastern Canada and the appointment of its members. I hope that in the near future a resident of eastern Canada will be appointed as a member of the Canadian wheat board. That would be a recognition of our common desire for co-operation between the grain growers of western Canada and the consumers of eastern Canada, a co-operation which shall certainly be beneficial to all concerned.

For the development of our agriculture, much still remains to be done. Mr. Speaker, I place great hope on the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act commonly called the A.R.D.A. program. That act will enable the federal government to undertake, in conjunction with the provincial governments and various organizations, the following tasks. (1) Find new uses for marginal lands. (2) Increase the level of employment and individual revenue in rural areas. (3) Save and develop the water and soil resources of Canada.

I have studied that act very carefully and I think it will revolutionize Canadian agriculture. All farmers are directly interested in that legislation. Activities which have thus far been neglected, particularly in eastern Canada, shall take a new importance. The plan has not yet produced enough concrete results to elaborate at great length on its merits. Suffice it to say that our government has already appropriated for that purpose an amount of $50 million.

Another measure, Mr. Speaker, which helped the people of my constituency and province and, in fact, the people of the whole country, is the increase of social security payments and the establishment of an hospital insurance program. As soon as circumstances permit, I shall draw the attention of the government to the necessity of substantially increasing family allowances. I shall ask for that increase because the large families in my electoral district and in my province and, for that matter, in the whole country, need that additional assistance in order to balance their budgets.

As a citizen of the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, and as a Canadian of French origin, I am pleased to draw your attention to what has been performed by the present administration in favour of bilingualism and the progress of national unity. Our eager desire to pursue the task which has been undertaken entitles me to predict that, in such a climate of mutual understanding, other steps shall be taken to secure, not the assimilation, but the co-operation of our two cultures, which must remain distinct but united.

I am a new member. I am proud of my language and my province. It was surprising to me on my arrival in Ottawa to meet so many English Canadians who want to learn French and who are trying to speak it. How wonderful it would be to see in this country, from British Columbia to Newfoundland, people who in addition to speaking their mother tongue could also make themselves understood in the other official language of this country. What a wonderful asset this would be to the social and cultural strength of Canada.

As a newcomer to this house may I be permitted the candour of stating that I feel quite impressed by being surrounded by outstanding parliamentarians, men of great wisdom and experience, who are most numerous on this side of the chamber, of course—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Vincent: —but who are also found on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, permit me to say a word about the commonwealth conference which has just taken place in London. Despite some slanted dispatches carried in a few newspapers, it can truly be said that our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made out a perfect case there for the necessity of safeguarding the economic interests of the commonwealth as a whole, if and when Great Britain enters the common market. This is the sound opinion of impartial observers. The Canadian people know that he had the courage to follow a Canada-first policy.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you, in the name of the people of Canada: who else could speak for the agriculture industry of this country? Who else could speak, or would speak for its dairy and cheese industry, for the great wheat producing Canadian west? Who else could speak—would speak—for our lumber industry, our pulp and paper industry, our mines and all our various secondary industries? Every Canadian, every member of every party in this house, knows that our Prime Minister spoke for Canada in his own great capacity, defending the greatness of Canada's industrial economy.

(Translation):

As a newly elected member of parliament, Mr. Speaker, I would now like to pay tribute to my party for the efforts it has made since June 21, 1957, for restoring the fiscal structure of Canada according to the truest spirit of the 1867 pact.

When the Conservatives came to power more than five years ago, the federal-provincial fiscal relations were in pretty bad shape.

The conference of the 11 governments, held in July 1956, created a distressing impression, even on the Liberal premiers.

Following the meeting, the prime minister of Manitoba, Mr. Campbell, made this statement on behalf of his province:

[Mr. Vincent.]

> Manitoba has been disappointed to see that so very little attention had been paid to the real financial needs which the provinces will face in the next few years.

Another Liberal premier, Mr. Matheson of Prince Edward Island, had also complained of his own party's doings in Ottawa. On the day following the July conference, he stated:

> The new distribution of funds collected takes no account of the fiscal needs of the provinces or their fiscal possibilities.

Mr. Manning, Social Credit premier of Alberta, expressed his feelings with as much bitterness as his Liberal colleagues from the other provinces. He said:

> The Liberal government kept for itself the largest and the most profitable areas of the tax fields. It has not recognized the financial needs of neither the provinces nor the municipalities.

The right hon. Prime Minister lost no time in correcting the errors admitted by the Liberals themselves. In November 1957, he called the first of a series of federal-provincial conferences to examine fully the claims of the provinces. Early in 1958 the government moved the adoption of two important pieces of legislation: One involved raising from 10 per cent to 13 per cent the share in income tax revenues going to the provinces, the other concerned adjustment grants to the Atlantic provinces. The generosity of the Conservative government meant, for the provinces as a whole, an additional revenue of $90 million a year.

And so, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) was able to say in the house at the beginning of last year:

> The policy of equalization under which the federal government assists provinces faced with special needs has been applied more widely by this government than at any time in the past.

Figures show this most emphatically. Within five years, from 1956 to 1961, the federal treasury doubled its payments to the provinces. The provinces received less than $690 million in 1956; last year they received at least $1⅓ billion.

The right hon. Prime Minister, however, felt that the provinces should get more. So, he obtained that the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, 1956, be radically changed. And it is under his guidance that the new act, which today governs the fiscal arrangements between Ottawa and the provinces, came into being on April 1 of this year.

In order to be fair to the interested parties, he called half a dozen preliminary meetings. Apart from the sittings of the standing committee of officials, two conferences of finance ministers and, in 1960, two general meetings of the premiers with the Prime Minister of Canada have been held.

At those various stages, the Conservative government was primarily concerned with the sovereignty and the autonomy of the provinces, as well as with the responsibility they assume under the constitution.

The second general meeting postponed on October 28, 1960 resumed its deliberations February 23, 1961.

It gave a final form to a tax sharing arrangement formula which shapes up into a sort of triangle made up by the equalization principle, the stabilization principle and that of the growth factor. The letter sent by the Prime Minister of Canada to the premiers of the provinces on January 30, 1961, foretold of such an agreement.

The Conservative government thus repudiated the infamous tax rental system which resulted in centralization. Under that system, the provinces were mere vassals receiving annually a meagre allowance from their lord in Ottawa.

(Text):

In this connection may I quote a speech by the former minister of finance now Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) to the chamber of commerce of Rosthern, Saskatchewan, on November 7, 1961. He said on that occasion:

> It became increasingly evident that the tax rental system was unsound. It placed on the federal government the whole responsibility for levying the additional taxes to support large increases in provincial expenditures. The provincial governments assumed no responsibility, politically or fiscally, for imposing the rental taxes on which they depended for revenues nor had they the freedom to amend the rates of these taxes in line with their current needs. Such a system was clearly destructive of provincial responsibility and initiative, and incompatible with the constitution which grants equal access by the federal and provincial governments to the direct tax fields.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time is up.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to complete his speech?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Vincent: Under the new act adopted by parliament last year, at the instance of the Conservative government, taxation revenue is divided in such a way as to place Canadians of all provinces on an equal footing.

The situation is now the following:

(1) The provinces collect their own personal taxes and corporation income taxes. (2) The rate of the federal tax on the income of individuals is gradually reduced in order that, little by little, this field may be left to the provinces.

The rate concerning the tax on the income of individuals is set at 16 per cent the first year the act comes into force. It will increase by 1 per cent in each of the four following years. By 1966, the federal government will thus have given up 20 per cent of that field. (3) The rate of the federal tax on the income of corporations has been reduced by 9 per cent.

(4) In the case of estate taxes, Ottawa pays 50 per cent of the revenue derived from this source in those provinces that do not levy succession duties and continues to reduce the federal tax by 50 per cent in the provinces that levy their own succession duties.

Not only did the Conservative government restore to the provinces their power to levy their own taxes, it also extended the application of the equalization principle, by a twofold amendment.

First, the equalization formula includes not only the product of the three current taxes determined by the extent of federal withdrawal, but includes also half the mobile triennial average of gross natural resources revenues.

Second, the equalization formula makes use of the national per capita average of the standard tax revenue and half the natural resources revenue instead of the per capita average for the two wealthiest provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the whole Canadian people have noted with satisfaction that most of the 35 measures outlined in the speech from the throne are directed to step up the development of our economy: establishment of a national economic development board, creation of one million new jobs over the next five years, tax incentive for corporations undertaking increased expenditures on scientific research, increase of export credits, establishment of an Atlantic development board, installation of storage facilities for feed grain, enlargement of the funds of the Farm Credit Corporation, establishment of a national power grid. There we have, Mr. Speaker, an already lengthy but very incomplete list of the measures the present government intends to introduce so that each class of our people may share to a larger extent in the national prosperity.

For us, in Quebec, the decidedly nationalistic aspect of the speech from the throne, underlined by statements concerning the repatriation of the constitution, the selection of a national flag and other national symbols, indicates to those observers who are fair-minded that the Conservative administration is realistically endeavouring to give our country outward signs of its political maturity, the creation of such signs or symbols having been avoided from 1935 to 1957.

Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons and many others, it is with a feeling of pride that I second the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 1, 1962

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DEFENCE RESEARCH

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUCCESSFUL LAUNCHING OF CANADIAN SATELLITE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Friday night at 11.04 p.m. Pacific daylight time the satellite Alouette, developed by the defence research board here in Ottawa, was successfully launched into orbit from Vandenberg air force base in California atop a Thor Agena rocket provided by the United States national aeronautics and space administration. This culminated three years of effort to combine applied science and technical skill by scientists here in Canada, and marks the first occasion for a space craft to be completely designed and built by a nation other than the United States or the Soviet union.

Signals from the satellite are now being received by tracking stations around the world including eight operated by NASA and two by the British, while here in Canada three defence research board stations are already receiving important data. The satellite passed over Ottawa for the first time shortly after noon on Saturday, and on subsequent passes tracking and the reception of information has been very satisfactory.

The Alouette is being called upon to carry out four experiments, three designed by the defence research board and the fourth by the national research council. One will seek the electron density distribution within a specific layer of the ionosphere; a second will determine changes in the ionosphere directly below the orbiting satellite; a third will measure cosmic radio noise, and the fourth, designed by national research council, will measure primary cosmic ray particles which are related to auroral effects and the leakage of particles in the upper atmosphere. If these experiments are completely successful, and at the moment we have every reason to believe that they will be, they will have valuable practical application to the technology of long range telecommunications both for civil and defence purposes.

Our collaboration with NASA, which includes the launching of a similar satellite in the near future, will result in a pooling of scientific data that will add much to what we already know.

The government and industrial scientists and engineers who have contributed to this project have acquired new experience, knowledge and skills which will improve Canada's international stature and industrial competitive position in an expanding technological field. Valuable experience has also been gained by Canadian firms which have participated in this project, in particular the de Havilland Aircraft Company in Toronto which developed the unique antenna system for the satellite and which has already received large United States orders for similar antennae and expects more orders to come. Another Canadian contractor, R.C.A. Victor Company Limited of Montreal, has a firm prospect for United States orders for telemetry transmitters of the type developed for the satellite.

This has been an outstanding Canadian achievement which could not have been successful without the close co-operation and support of officials in the United States, industry here in Canada and, in particular, without the earnest endeavours of all who participated in this project within the defence research board.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house would like to join with the government in congratulating all those who have participated in the successful launching of the Alouette satellite. It is indeed an outstanding achievement. It is a demonstration of the high quality of Canadian scientists and of their capabilities and endeavours in this collective achievement. It is also an indication of the successful teamwork on the part of government scientists working closely with those of private industry.

We also appreciate the excellent co-operation of our American neighbours, and particularly of the United States air force, in putting the satellite in orbit. We congratulate all those who participated in any way in the project on their magnificent achievement.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we in the Social Credit party would like to join in extending our sincere congratulations to those whose efforts have led to the accomplishment to which we are now referring. It is an example to the world of international co-operation in the peaceful development of modern science, and shows the progress which can be made and to what extent we can go forward in this field.

Proposed Legislation

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we join with the other members of the house in expressing our pride and satisfaction in these achievements of Canadian scientists. We are very glad to note that this program was initiated in the interests of peace, and members of this party sincerely hope it will remain so. We extend our sincere congratulations to all those who have worked toward this end on their successful achievement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It provides for the retirement of senators at the age of 75 years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-9, with respect to the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Postmaster General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-5, to amend the Post Office Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

NEWFOUNDLAND SAVINGS BANK ACT

REPEAL OF LEGISLATION AND TRANSFER OF ASSETS

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-6, to repeal the Newfoundland Savings Bank Act, 1939.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. Nowlan: The Newfoundland savings bank has been sold to the Bank of Canada, and part of the agreement in connection with that sale was that the government should seek to repeal the act and that all the assets vesting in the bank should vest in the receiver general for the government to collect.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister not mean the Bank of Montreal, not the Bank of Canada?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that all the subsequent bills are non-government bills. As they will be appearing before me for the first time I am not sure of either their bulk or their content, and I do not know whether or not they meet the requirements of the rules of the house in so far as their essentials are concerned. I must therefore enter a caveat by pointing out that between now and the time they come up for second reading such bills will be scrutinized, and if there is any essential defect the house will be acquainted with that fact when the particular measure appears before us for second reading.

I realize that at the present time the house itself is not in a position to judge whether a bill is acceptable or not, because it is seeing it for the first time. An order for first reading is merely a direction that a bill be printed so that hon. members may see it. This motion will be by unanimous consent of the house. Are hon. members agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING WAGE EARNERS' ASSIGNMENTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (for Mr. Orlikow) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-7, to amend the Bankruptcy Act (wage earners' assignments).

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of this bill is to adjust the procedure of the Bankruptcy Act so as to cover the case of a wage earner who, though deeply in debt, could yet under budgetary supervision and with a time extension reimburse his creditors in full. It makes provision for this to be done without the wage earner being saddled with unconscionable rates of interest sometimes charged by money lenders.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO INCLUDE DIVORCE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-8, respecting the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Explain.

Mr. Peters: The purpose of this bill is to transfer the jurisdiction now exercised by this house and the other place in the matter of divorce proceedings arising in the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec to the exchequer court, so that the court could handle that problem.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE MAXIMUM INTEREST RATE

On the order:

Introduction of bills—Mr. Orlikow—Bill intituled: An act to amend the Small Loans Act.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Knowles requests unanimous consent to move, for Mr. Orlikow, for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Small Loans Act. Do the same conditions apply in respect to this bill as applied to the previous one?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): No, Mr. Speaker, there is not unanimous consent to proceed with this bill at this time.

Mr. Knowles: I trust that note will be taken of who is objecting.

Mr. Argue: It is requested that note be taken of whose bill it is.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous approval for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the bill must stand.

AMENDMENT REQUIRING STATEMENT OF TRUE INTEREST RATE CHARGED

On the order:

Introduction of bills—Mr. Orlikow—Bill intituled: An act to amend the Small Loans Act.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks unanimous consent of the house to introduce this bill on behalf of the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Proposed Legislation

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-15, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: As the title of the bill makes clear, the purpose of this proposed legislation is to provide that all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall enjoy at least eight statutory holidays a year and shall receive their regular pay for those eight statutory holidays without having to work for them. It also provides for additional pay if they are required to work. But as I have indicated, the main purpose is to provide eight statutory holidays a year with pay.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENTS REVISING MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION PROCESSES, ETC.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-23, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: This bill is designed simply to establish a new and different system of negotiation and conciliation under the act, and thus speed up the negotiation processes between union and management to allow a greater opportunity for settlement of industrial disputes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT ADDITIONAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-11, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act (Canada highways).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: This bill is designed to permit the federal government to enter into agreement with the provinces for the purpose of contributing funds toward the building of highways other than a single trans-Canada highway; in effect, to build a second trans-Canada highway or other types of highways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

DIVORCE

MEASURE TO MODERNIZE DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-12, to provide in Canada for the dissolution and the annulment of marriage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION FOR PARLIAMENTARY PROCTOR AND TAXATION OF COSTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-30, to establish the office of parliamentary proctor and to regulate taxation of costs.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION FOR DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may have your attention and ask the permission of the house to have this motion withdrawn and the bill not proceeded with, because the substance of it has already been covered.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to give us some information on that matter.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the request of the hon. member to withdraw his bill. Is it agreed that this bill may be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, it is the third time today that the matter of divorce is being raised in the house, and I should like to have some explanations.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has fully understood the statement made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), who wishes to withdraw his bill. Since the bill is being withdrawn I feel we have no need for any explanation.

(Text):

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

SOLICITOR GENERAL ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL LEGISLATION

Mr. Speaker: In connection with this bill, which is entitled "An act to repeal the Solicitor General Act", the title on the bill reads "An act respecting the Solicitor General Act". This is merely a clerical error, and I trust that the house will approve the necessary change in title. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-13, to repeal the Solicitor General Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: If it needs explanation, Mr. Speaker, the position of solicitor general has become increasingly less significant and less important over the years. As the title says, the bill is designed to repeal the Solicitor General Act so that this officer will no longer be a part of the cabinet of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

On the order:

Introduction of bills—Mr. Orlikow—Bill intituled: An act to amend the Interest Act.

Mr. Knowles: I will try again.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asks for unanimous consent to present this bill on behalf of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Has he unanimous approval?

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker.

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

He said: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Interest Act so as to place a ceiling of 12 per cent per annum on all interest rates in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSOLIDATION OF ACT AND PROVISION FOR REVIEW BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-14, respecting Indians.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: This bill, Mr. Speaker, has the purpose of consolidating the Indian Act and its various amendments into one statute so that it will be more compact and more easily readable by those interested in these matters. An ancillary effect upon its introduction and first reading will be that the Minister of Justice will be required by the bill of rights to review this particular bill to see whether it is inconsistent with the bill of rights and to report any such inconsistencies to the house, in which event such amendments as are necessary can be made in the committee stage.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member to assure the house that this is not merely the re-enactment of an existing statute as reported in the press?

Mr. Howard: My explanation, I thought, was lucid.

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I rise on a point of order which I think is of some importance, and perhaps Your Honour might be disposed to reserve it. From what the hon. member has said it is clear that this purpose is not to legislate but to secure a legal opinion. In other words, he attempts to secure by indirection that which he cannot do directly.

In my respectful submission that would be an abuse of the procedures and practices of the house, and if I am right I suggest that the Speaker has the duty and obligation at this stage of the proceedings so to rule. May I put it to Your Honour that if this procedure is permissible it would lead us to the ridiculous position that some member of the house could take the five or six volumes of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1950 into the Journals branch and the twelve or fourteen volumes since that time and place all the legislation therein on the order paper in the form of bills, which would mean they would all have to be reprinted and would all have to be re-enacted based upon an opinion that might be secured from the Minister of Justice.

I make these statements to you, sir, conscious of the fact that amendments to the Indian Act will be advanced in the near future based upon the report of the special committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Indian Act. I think the principle involved here is far greater and goes far beyond that which is related to the particular bill, and I submit to Your Honour that this is a matter of such importance that Your Honour would perhaps like to reserve it for consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Having heard the remarks with respect to this bill may I say that I appreciate what the minister has said; but he, as well as other members of the house, is aware of the bulkiness of this act. There are certain explanatory notes about which I think it would be quite improper for me to give a snap judgment. I have indicated with respect to all the bills now before us for consideration that they will be studied and prior to their introduction for second reading a ruling will be given by the Chair in respect of the said bills. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Proposed Legislation

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): May I point out with respect that the point raised by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would perhaps warrant your reserving this particular bill, because my recollection is that the obligation to give a legal opinion arises as soon as a bill is introduced in the house. In case, therefore, the point of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration be correct, that the purpose of the bill is to secure a legal opinion rather than to have legislative effect, may I suggest with respect that perhaps you should reserve this particular bill until you can have a look at it and decide what are its primary purpose and effect and whether it should be introduced.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may say a word on the point just raised by the ex-minister of justice, I suggest to Your Honour that a similar point came up last year in connection with a purported amendment to the Income Tax Act, that it does appear from what Your Honour has already said that the bill is not in the possession of the house, and that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the former minister of justice are making assumptions about it. Since we are all equal here, I suggest that the whole house is entitled to look at the bill, as Your Honour quite properly suggested at the beginning, before any judgments about it are made by anyone, and that it is not for ministers to seek to abridge the rights of members of this house.

Mr. Fulton: We are seeking to uphold the rights of the Speaker, who has certain authority.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate all that has been said. I feel that in all fairness to the house on all sides the line of conduct which I have proposed is that which I would follow. However, in saying so I must point out that there may be room here for an abuse of the legislative process and, in the light of the bulk of this bill, if it should be found to be an improper bill the house will, of course, be out the quite considerable expense of printing it. These are factors that I have to weigh. While hon. members were speaking I had some chance to peruse the nature of the bill, the title and the explanatory notes, and a very definite and considered opinion will have to be taken about its validity. Therefore I propose to consider the bill and render my decision at a future date. In order that the hon. member's position with respect to his bill might not be prejudiced, I feel I must now ask the house whether it is prepared to give first reading.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): This bill has been before the house in numerous forms before, and has a two-fold objective. The first is to provide a legal outlet for those Canadians who wish to participate in a national lottery. The second is to assure that the funds resulting from this lottery will be redirected for the benefit of Canadians and not for promoters abroad. It is introduced at this time as a result of the growing demand by Canadians who wish to see such legislation introduced.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INTERNAL ECONOMY AUTONOMY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-18, to amend the House of Commons Act (internal economy autonomy).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the commissioners of internal economy are now set up in such a way that the cabinet, particularly the treasury benches, has virtual control over the internal affairs and expenditures as well as the estimates of the House of Commons. It is the purpose of this bill to repeal those sections in the House of Commons Act in order that the house can become autonomous in this regard and run its own affairs without interference from the treasury benches.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not believe we can allow the remarks of the hon. member to pass without challenge. The suggestion—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order; there is no debate on this.

Mr. Churchill: The suggestion that the house is not autonomous in this regard is incorrect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING USE OF TRADING STAMPS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-20, to amend the Criminal Code (trading stamps).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: The Criminal Code now prohibits the issuance and use of what are commonly called trading stamps, but provides a few loopholes so that trading stamps can be issued under certain circumstances. The design behind this bill is to plug those loopholes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-27, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, by the introduction of this bill I am following in the footsteps of the Prime Minister. The bill is identical to one introduced by him in 1955 when he was a member of the opposition. The purpose of the bill is to make it an offence for owners of industrial plants and oil refineries, and other persons, to discharge noxious matter into interprovincial waters, thus endangering the lives, safety, health and comfort of the public. I look forward to receiving the Prime Minister's support in this my fourth attempt to have the code amended in this respect.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

COPYRIGHT

PROVISION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF COPYRIGHT IN CANADA

On the order:

Miss LaMarsh: Before placing this bill before the house and asking unanimous consent for its first reading I wish to point out that there is a clerical error in it. The bill was introduced twice previously, and at the close of the last parliament the second part of it was implemented in the acceptance by the house of the universal copyright convention. I would ask the unanimous consent of the house to delete from the title, as has already been deleted from the bill, the provisions with respect to the implementing of this convention.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked for leave to amend the title to the bill, but the copy I have has not had the second portion deleted therefrom. Is the house in unanimous agreement with regard to the alteration of the title of the bill as indicated by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I might add that this bill was introduced during the last parliament by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, Mr. Allard.

As a Canadian, I take pleasure in moving again for leave to introduce this legislation.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to reactivate the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act of 1938. It provides in particular that the 1961 census data be used for the purposes of this bill, instead of the census data of 1931. It also provides that a clause providing for the suspension of the act by the governor in council be repealed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF AGE

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-43, to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act (age discrimination).

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Mather: The purpose of this bill is to add age discrimination to the list of prohibited employment practices unless the age requirement is a bona fide occupational qualification. At the present time many workers suffer from discrimination in this respect, particularly where pension plans rather than work skills determine who is hired.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR APPEAL TO COURTS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-47, to amend the Pension Act (judicial appeal).

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. McIntosh: At the present time there is no appeal from the decision of the Canadian pension commission. The decision of that commission is final. I feel that this commission is not qualified to deal with the legal interpretations of the act. In British justice or British law there is provision for recourse to the courts by the citizens in such circumstances, and I believe the same rights should be given to our citizens in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FARM CREDIT ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASE IN LENDING CAPACITY

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the next resolution, through clerical error the order paper lists this resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance, whereas it should have been posted in the name of the Minister of Agriculture. If the house will give unanimous consent to the correction of this error, I will put the motion in the name of the Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

FINANCE

LOANS TO FOREIGN CORPORATIONS TO ACQUIRE CANADIAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, and in doing so to congratulate him on his appointment. Has the government or the Bank of Canada taken any steps to stop or to discourage the chartered banks from making loans to foreign corporations or to their Canadian subsidiaries for the purpose of acquiring control of Canadian owned or controlled companies?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his congratulations. I think this question is more properly one for the order paper, because it deals with the policy of takeovers, which have prevailed in Canada for a decade or more, as the hon. member well knows—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: —his firm having been associated with banks and banking throughout.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: There is no power in the Bank Act or any legislation of the parliament of Canada since the repeal of the Foreign Exchange Control Act whereby such authority can be exercised.

Mr. Gordon: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister believe that loans made for such purposes are desirable in the public interest at any time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gordon: —and especially in times when the amount of credit available for all purposes, including ordinary commercial purposes, is limited?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should reiterate my caution of last Friday with respect to the asking of questions.

REQUIREMENTS RESPECTING LOANS TO HELP EXCHANGE RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Did the international monetary fund, the export-import bank, the federal reserve bank and the Bank of England require that the government pursue particular monetary and budgetary policies at the time they agreed to guarantee or lend to Canada $1,000 million to replenish our exchange reserves?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is not a question for orders of the day. What took place was done several months ago. There will be every opportunity for the hon. gentleman to secure the information he requires, either during the progress of this debate or through a question placed on the order paper.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I rise on a question of privilege affecting every hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: Why don't you give your leader an opportunity to speak?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Churchill: Let him start the debate; he is sitting there.

Mr. Pearson: I have all day.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege affecting every hon. member. The Prime Minister has just given an answer denying information about the austerity program which was undertaken in contempt of parliament, and the first occasion upon which a question is asked about it, the Prime Minister says it is a matter of no importance, that the question can be put on the order paper. I suggest, sir, that this is a shocking breach of the privileges of the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order; in the light of the remarks just made, I find that there has been no question of privilege. We will not, therefore, embark on a sterile controversy in regard to those remarks.

PUBLIC SERVICE

A. S. WHITELEY—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. As he is not in his seat, may I address my question to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary. Has Mr. A. S. Whiteley, a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, whose term ends shortly, been given notice that when his term expires, it will not be renewed, and, if so, will the government reconsider its decision in this regard?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was going to suggest that this is perhaps a question for the order paper, but I will mention it to the minister on his return.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will wait for the answer, but with great respect this matter merits answer now.

Mr. Speaker: May I draw to the attention of the hon. member for York South that the nature of the answer is not subject to comment.

REQUEST OF SERVICE ORGANIZATIONS FOR NEGOTIATION PROCEDURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will there be government legislation during this session amending the Civil Service Act, to meet the request of the various civil service organizations for negotiating procedures?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is too good a parliamentarian to believe that that question is proper on the orders of the day.

PENSIONS

NOVA SCOTIA—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the dire need for employment opportunities in the industrial Cape Breton area, is the federal government presently making a direct financial contribution to the government of the province of Nova Scotia with a view to assisting in providing special pensions to miners 60 years of age and over, thereby removing them from the labour market and opening up new employment opportunities for younger persons?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING PRAIRIE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house when he expects the report and recommendations of the air transport board regarding the prairie milk run air service?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, before November 1. In the meantime Trans-Canada Air Lines is carrying the service as before.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED REDUCTION IN TRANSCONTINENTAL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has given any consideration to the urgent requests that I know he and other members have received regarding the cancellation for the winter months by the Canadian National Railways of its transcontinental trains Nos. 3 and 4.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, curtailment of service, short of abandonment of a line, can be decided upon by the railways themselves without applying to the board of transport commissioners; but if anyone feels that his rights have been infringed or that the interests of the public are at stake he can always apply to the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. Will the minister consider following the practice adopted by his predecessor in office in 1960 of making representations to the railways that led at that time to the ending of this curtailment idea?

Mr. Balcer: I have not received any representations yet but as soon as I receive any I will study the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REDUCTION OF R.C.A.F. COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to pose a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the government's announced decision to reduce from 12 to 8 squadrons the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas commitment to NATO been rescinded or changed in any way?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the number of aircraft to be supplied to NATO was decided some year and a half to two years ago and we are following the policy which was announced at that time.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Is the government going to maintain 12 squadrons in Europe for more than the next year, or is it its intention to reduce that number to 8?

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. gentleman had not been asleep in the house for the last two years—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Harkness: —he would be aware of the fact that there have been plans for some considerable time to reduce the number of squadrons from 12 to 8.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Does the minister feel that the international situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —has improved sufficiently—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is embarking on a quite separate tack. He is entitled to ask a supplementary question to clarify the previous answer. I would again urge hon. members to read standing order 39 and the citations with respect thereto. I think we will have a little more efficiency, shall I say, in the house if they do. The hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; this supplementary question is directly relevant to the government's plans for the Canadian commitment to NATO and I respectfully submit I should be allowed to pose it at this time.

Mr. Speaker: At the moment I recognize the hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, sir—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West on a point of order.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa-West): Mr. Speaker, twice today and once last week you have had occasion to refer members to the rules having to do with questions and have directed their attention to them when hon. members rose to put questions. Twice today the answers given to questions have breached the rules in a rather obvious way. If hon. members putting questions are to be called to order, then surely the rules must be drawn to the attention of the ministers in making answers and those answers must be made properly.

Mr. Speaker: Without at all engaging in a controversy with the hon. member, may I say that my remarks with respect to questions were addressed to all members of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HIGHWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF ARTERIAL ROADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister tell us if the government has any plans to build a system of arterial highways in Canada on a co-operative plan with the provinces, similar to that used in the building of the trans-Canada highway?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will cast his mind back not too many years ago I think he will recall that is the kind of question seeking information as to government policy which is not appropriate to answer on the orders of the day especially, as could be quite well assumed, as the matter of highways is under study.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POLYMER CORPORATION—ALLEGED STRIKEBREAKING ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Defence Production which I have been asked to raise in the house as an urgent matter. In view of a telegram I have received from Mr. Neil Reimer, Canadian director of the oil, chemical and atomic workers union, Edmonton, stating that the Polymer Corporation is indulging in strikebreaking tactics against the international brotherhood of electrical workers, would the minister undertake to investigate this situation?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the investigation asked by the hon. member has already been made. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke to me about this matter on Friday afternoon. I got in touch with Polymer then and again this morning. The information I have received from the Polymer Corporation is as follows: Catolytic was given the general contract for the construction of the new plant in Sarnia and a strike was declared in the second week of August by the electrical workers. Since that time Catolytic has finished its work and is off the job. The local electrical contractors are continuing negotiations with the electrical union.

In the meantime the union chairman of our employees at Polymer, who belong to the oil, chemical and atomic workers union, has agreed that his electrical workers perform some urgent work before the cold weather sets in. I wish to state also at this time that it is impossible for these people to do all the work and the new plant will have to remain idle until such time as the electrical workers and contractors in Sarnia come to an agreement, which I hope will be soon. The department of labour of the province of Ontario had a mediator on the site last week for two days and I understand he is coming back again this week.

CAPE BRETON, N.S.—SPEED UP OF PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Again, in view of the dire unemployment situation in the industrial Cape Breton area, is it the plan of the federal government to speed up their program or schedule of public works in this area in order to provide needed and urgent employment opportunities?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the government and the Department of Public Works is aware of its responsibilities and are taking every step to discharge those responsibilities to the fullest extent.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO ACT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister say if the government has any plans to revise the Indian Act at this session of parliament?

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a thorough revision of the Indian Act based upon the report of the select committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is under active drafting. The complexity and importance of the act are such that I am advised it will likely be early in the new year before the drafting can be completed. At that stage the bill would be introduced for first reading, not with the intention of proceeding at this session of parliament but at a subsequent session. In the interim it would be my intention to meet on a provincial basis with representatives of the Indians in every province to discuss the important provisions which are proposed.

MANITOBA—ALLEGED DENIAL OF TRAINING IN SKILLED OCCUPATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister looked into the complaint of 80 Manitoba Indians at Thompson, Manitoba that they have been refused training in skilled occupations as reported in the Times of London of September 22 last?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This matter has not been brought to my attention. In any event, the actual training is undertaken by the provincial government.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SONS OF FREEDOM, B.C.—REPORTED STATEMENT BY B.C. ATTORNEY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the Freedomite sect in the province of British Columbia. I would have addressed it to the Minister of Justice, but in his absence I will address it to the former minister of justice. Has his attention been drawn to the statement of the attorney general of the province of British Columbia that this problem is beyond solving by the provincial government and they have been cut adrift by the national government? May I also ask as a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. One question at a time. Again, supplementaries are only permitted to clarify an answer that has been given, not to put an entirely new premise on a question.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the intention of the hon. member to ask this question was referred to me as Acting Minister of Justice and I made inquiries. While the particular statement quoted had not previously been drawn to my attention, I have since checked with the office of the minister and I find that at least within the last ten days no request for assistance has been made to the minister or his department.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like the Minister of Labour to say what steps the government has been taking to replenish the unemployment insurance fund.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): At the moment there is no need to replenish the unemployment insurance fund.

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. According to the report of the advisory committee the unemployment insurance fund is nearing bankruptcy and will likely be exhausted during the winter of 1962-63 unless measures to restore its revenue are taken. Will the Prime Minister advise the house what action he intends to take to remedy this critical situation?

Mr. Speaker: A similar type of question was put to the Minister of Labour and I feel the answer was quite as clear as any that might be given to this question. I call now on the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the question which was asked by the hon. gentleman is not, with great respect, the question which was asked a few moments ago from another section of the house. I believe that in view of the serious condition of the fund the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —ought to have from the Prime Minister not only an answer to the question but also some indication as to when we may expect a report from the commission which was set up a long time ago to deal with a problem the solution of which was promised by this government a long time ago.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Why don't you let Mike speak, Paul.

Mr. Speaker: I felt the questions were the same and unless the right hon. gentleman cares, or is willing, to make an answer then I think we shall leave it at that point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Maybe he does.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour simply to ask him when he may expect a report from the Gill committee that was established to investigate into all aspects of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Starr: My most accurate information is that it will be some time this fall.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR FINANCING OF EXISTING HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government giving any active consideration to amending the National Housing Act to permit the financing and sale of existing houses as is now done in respect of new house construction?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Any consideration with regard to legislation would involve a matter of government policy to be announced in due course.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING ILLEGAL CHINESE IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and offer him publicly, as I did privately, an expression of my pleasure at seeing him in his present position. Can the minister inform the house if there has been any change in government policy toward people of Chinese origin, who allegedly entered Canada illegally, as that policy was announced by the former minister on June 9, 1960?

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I should like to thank the hon. member for his pleasant words. If there is any announcement to be made concerning the matter to which he referred, it will be made in the house.

Mr. Howard: May I ask a supplementary question? Would the minister have answered the question asked earlier in respect of the Indian Act, if that question had been posed by a member of the government?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I answer all questions to the best of my ability.

Mr. Speaker: I feel that this matter of "bootleg" supplementaries should receive the particular attention of the members of the house, especially those who have had more experience in the house. I now recognize the hon. member for Fort William.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO WORLD FAIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. This question arises out of a report in the Financial Post of September 22, to the effect that the federal government has promised the city of Montreal $20 million to help that city obtain the world fair in 1967. Can the minister inform the house if this $20 million comes from the $100 million already set aside by parliament to celebrate Canada's one hundredth birthday?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he agrees with a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) rebuking certain members on this side of the house when he said it was unpatriotic to criticize the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire Lapointe: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does he intend to remedy the discrepancy which now exists in Canada between production and purchasing power?

And I should like to ask him a supplementary question: is he aware that there is now a discrepancy between production and purchasing power?

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that there cannot be any supplementary question until an answer has been given.

(Text):

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DAWSON, Y.T.—FURTHER FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO FESTIVAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles M. Drury (St. Antoine-Westmount): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of recent press reports of the intention to continue next year the Dawson festival, has the government given any undertaking to provide further financial assistance for this event?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): As the hon. member is aware I am sure, the festival to which he has referred was sponsored by a group of public spirited Canadians. I am not acquainted with the current activities of the festival foundation but I do understand that, as a result of the substantial economic impact and benefit of the festival, it is the intention of the foundation to continue the festival.

Mr. Drury: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member a real supplementary?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, you have given a ruling that if there has been no answer to a question, there can be no supplementary. Unfortunately, the minister declined to answer my question.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the hon. member ber is not in a position to comment upon the nature of the reply. The hon. member for York South.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While it may be true that the hon. member has not the right to comment, may I say to you respectfully that a moment ago you stated that if the hon. member had a true question, then he may ask it. I say to you, with the greatest respect, it is not up to the Speaker to say whether or not a member has a true question, unless he has heard that question.

Mr. Speaker: I may have been precipitate in that, but in the light of the remarks with which the hon. member was preceding his supplementary, I came to a certain conclusion. However, I am quite prepared to hear the hon. member put his supplementary.

Mr. Drury: I should like to ask the minister whether or not it is the intention of the government to underwrite in any way the renewal, in the current year, of the Dawson festival?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, no commitment has been made in that regard.

TELEVISION

ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. Secretary of State tell the house why the government persists in refusing to allow the C.B.C. to establish a French T.V. station in the city of Quebec, in accordance with the clearly expressed wish of the people of that city?

(Text):

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): There has been no decision handed down on that as yet.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION OF ONTARIO-QUEBEC BOUNDARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Lamoureux (Stormont): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of impending legal proceedings resulting from the fact that the Ontario-Quebec border east of Cornwall is still indefinite, would the minister advise whether early action is contemplated, in conjunction with provincial authorities, to fix this border?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Martineau (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question was only brought to my attention when I came in the house. I shall take it as a notice and answer it as soon as possible.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

THREATENED SLOW DOWN OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General?

(Text):

Before I do so may I congratulate the government for the addition of charm to the post office department by the appointment of the present Postmaster General.

Has the Postmaster General been informed that the London postmen of the confederated association of letter carriers have recently decided upon strike action to support their pay claims and that about a week ago, for the same reason, the Canadian postal employees association decided to adopt a work to rule attitude which would have the effect of slowing down operations?

If the answer is yes, will the minister tell the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the latter portion of his question the hon. member clearly indicated that it was one that should go on the order paper. In any event questions should deal with matters of urgency and the matters which the hon. gentleman has raised have been before the public for some ten days or two weeks. I would again appeal to hon. members to be discriminatory in their questions.

Mr. Denis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the confederated association of letter carriers represents some 7,200 people and that there are 10,500 people involved in the Canadian postal employees association. They are to vote on strike action and I consider this an urgent matter. I want to know what steps will be taken in order to solve the situation.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT OF PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister which has reference to something that happened this afternoon. In view of the declaration the other day that a request for an amendment to the British North America Act regarding contributory pensions would be recommended to the house when all the provinces had agreed thereto, does the fact that this resolution was on the order paper today and has been transferred to government orders mean that all the provinces have now agreed? If not, could the Prime Minister state what stage has been reached in the negotiations or conversations with Quebec and Newfoundland?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, most of the questions this afternoon have been put for a purpose, and many of them have been very clear and indicative of a desire to hold off the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This one is not in that category. As a matter of fact, I communicated with both the premier of Newfoundland, the guardian of free speech in that province, and with the premier of Quebec. I have not had a reply from the former but I did have a reply from the premier of Quebec advising me that this was a matter which would have to be dealt with by the provincial legislature. Apparently there has been a dissolution of the legislature in that province, so that is the present position of the question.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question may I ask the Prime Minister whether this order will be proceeded with during this session, or is it intended to wait until the government has had an affirmative reply from both these provinces?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is on the order paper and, as is stated in the speech from the throne, when these two provinces have given consideration to the matter it will then be brought before the house. I do not know when the expiry of the writs takes place in Quebec but I hope that when it does we shall have co-operation from the province of Quebec, and I would also ask the assistance of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who controls to such a degree the premier of Newfoundland.

(Translation):

CROP INSURANCE

EXTENSION TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry I did not give him notice of it.

Is it the intention of the government to extend to eastern farmers the benefits of crop insurance?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I think the hon. member should be aware that the Crop Insurance Act was passed in 1959.

PUBLICATIONS

FORT WILLIAM—SALE OF NEWSPAPER TO THOMSON ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice, notice of which was sent to the minister's office. The question arises from the announcement on Saturday by the Roy Thomson newspaper organization that they have bought the Fort William Times Journal, an independently owned paper. My question is, could the minister tell us whether the combines investigation branch is studying this purchase, which makes the lakehead a one publisher community?

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have already told the hon. member privately that I feel this question is one for the order paper, but I will refer it to the Minister of Justice on his return.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED DAMAGE TO CANADIAN BOATS BY RUSSIAN NETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister received reports that Canadian scallop boats have been damaged as a result of running afoul poorly marked drift nets placed by Russian ships on Georges banks?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, no such report has come to my attention. However, I am having an investigation made in case such a report may have been made recently to officers of the department in the field. If this proves to be the case, I will inform the hon. member later.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HAGERSVILLE, ONT.—LAY-OFFS OF CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

[Mr. Drouin.]

My question is, having regard to the fact that 99 civil servants were discharged at the Hagersville army camp as of August 31, 1962, does the minister anticipate that there will be further lay-offs at the camp during the remainder of the year?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. No further reductions in staff are contemplated at Hagersville before the end of this year.

THE SENATE

REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister with reference to the bill with respect to the Senate. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether this bill will be referred to a standing committee of the house?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that question can be answered when the bill is before the house.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—IMPORTATIONS FROM POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. L. Clunis (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government given any commitment which would involve the importation into Canada of additional quantities of eggs or egg concentrates from Poland?

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest deference to the hon. member, we are here definitely embarking upon a type of question which would more properly be on the order paper. These are matters of not the greatest urgency. They may be of importance; I grant that every question that may be asked may be important. The hon. member is not seeking information on an urgent matter, and let us limit ourselves at this time in the house to consideration of questions of urgency.

NATIONAL PARKS

ALBERTA—REPORTED MALADMINISTRATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, notice of which was sent to him earlier today. Arising from a front page story in the Calgary Albertan concerning some very serious charges of insubordination, would the minister care to comment with regard to these alleged charges of insubordination and distortion of government policy by a senior official in administering the national parks policy?

Mr. Speaker: There again, I think the hon. member is adverting to an event which happened several weeks ago. Undoubtedly the fullest information will be furnished to the house. I am of the opinion that this is not a question which should come forward on orders of the day.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—EFFECT OF CONSTRUCTION OF U.S. ATOMIC PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the decision of the United States government to construct immediately a very large atomic power plant in the state of Washington affect in any way plans for the joint development of the Columbia river?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question and I do not believe I can answer it.

Mr. Hellyer: It is not a hypothetical question. I am sorry that the minister's department does not keep him briefed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: Is this move on the part of the Americans in retaliation for the blundering indecision of the Canadian government?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

FURNISHING OF COURTESY CREWS ON RUSSIAN FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles M. Drury (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to, I am not sure whether it is the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Transport.

In view of current press reports of the informal arrangement whereby Royal Canadian Air Force courtesy crews are assisting in the navigation of aircraft from iron curtain countries to Cuba, what steps or what action, if any, is being taken to ensure that the cargoes of such aircraft do not include articles which are on the list as being prohibited for export from Canada to Cuba, namely contraband?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, an examination of the cargoes on airplanes of this sort is no part of the responsibility of the R.C.A.F. courtesy crews. The courtesy crews have been put on Soviet aircraft for any flights over Canada for quite a number of years now because the soviets have not signed the international air agreement. These courtesy crews are put on these airplanes as a protection to Canadian air traffic, to ensure that landings are made properly and that signals sent out are correctly interpreted, and so forth. They are there for that purpose entirely.

There have been of course, only a very limited number of flights of this kind during the past two years. I think there were three all told in 1961, and I believe there have been five so far this year.

Mr. Hellyer: Would your policy apply if they were carrying bombs?

AIRPORTS

MONCTON, N.B.—EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. Rideout (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house whether the government has any plans for the extension of runways at the Trans-Canada Air Lines airport at Moncton to accommodate modern types of aircraft?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at the present time T.C.A. is flying modern aircraft into Moncton. No request has been received by the government from T.C.A. for the building of any extension to the present runways.

(Translation):

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Cook (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. I am sorry that I did not have time to advise him beforehand. Could he tell me, all the same, if he intends to make some changes in the administration of the C.B.C.? We know that at the present time and for some time now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wish to remind the hon. member that he may ask questions but he must refrain from giving personal opinions or conclusions.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OTTAWA—REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL TRAIN ANNOUNCEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechase): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether, in Ottawa, the beautiful capital of Canada, the official in charge of train schedules who calls the times of arrival and departure in English only could not also do it in French, the other official language?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I am a member of a government which has accomplished so much for the cause of bilingualism, I shall be pleased to forward the request of the hon. member for Bellechasse to the authorities of the Canadian National Railways.

(Text):

POSTAL SERVICE

NOVA SCOTIA—RESULTS OF CHANGES IN RAILWAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. In view of representations from the railway mail clerks association in the province of Nova Scotia that changes are proposed in the railway and postal service of that province, I should like to ask the minister if she would assure the house that these changes would not result in inferior service in relation to the recently inaugurated rail liner mail service. Secondly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I draw to the attention of the hon. member my previous warning or advice in regard to questions. While this question may be important, it is not of the type which urgently requires information on the orders of the day.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

CONTINUATION OF GRANTS IN 1963

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. F. Stenson (Peterborough): May I address a question to the Minister of Labour. It is in regard to vocational and technical schools. Will the grants to those schools be extended after March 31, 1963?

Mr. Speaker: May I address the same injunction to the hon. member.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, September 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I desire first of all to observe the traditional and worthy custom—at some times easier to follow than at others—of congratulating the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply. Today the task is an easy one because both hon. members performed their task in a way which was creditable to themselves and to their party. They must, I think, have made an impression on all members of the house because of the constructive nature of their contributions.

I may perhaps be pardoned for saying an additional word about the mover because of the fact that his father was so long associated in such an honourable and important way with our deliberations as a member of the house. As I have ventured to tell the hon. member already, I think his father would have been very proud and happy if he had been here last Friday.

The first business of this parliament once the formalities have been completed—and it has taken a little time to complete these formalities this afternoon—must be to decide in accordance with our constitutional and democratic rights whether the minority government now in office has the confidence of this House of Commons. In the present circumstances—and I emphasize "in the present circumstances"—such a motion takes precedence over other business, as it has done in the past in similar circumstances. For this purpose it is the duty and the privilege of the official opposition to move a motion which will make that decision possible. That duty is obvious. Indeed, it is inescapable when nearly 63 per cent of the voters in this country have declared in a recent election that they have no confidence in this government, in its policies and in its leadership.

If there were to be any surprise expressed, it would be not that we are following the course I have indicated but that we did not intend to follow it having regard to the repudiation of the government on June 18 and the stand taken by this party in the recent election campaign. A motion of no confidence having been moved, it becomes the duty of every member of this newly elected house to vote for or against it. If the decision results in the defeat of the government then there will be a dissolution and a general election at which time the people will make a final decision—one that they almost made last June 18. On June 18 they made their negative decision. Next time they will make their positive decision. Since when has a move to give the House of Commons an opportunity—and an obligation—to declare its position in regard to confidence in a minority government been wrong, or playing politics? Since when has a declared willingness to accept an appeal to the people, which a decision against the government would produce, become something to be condemned? Since when has it become responsible to declare confidence in a government in which you have many times before, during an election campaign and afterwards, declared you have no confidence? I may say that contrary to some allegations made in forceful terms, there will be none of our members removed from the house when the vote is taken. We do not aspire to hold the record for absentee membership in this house.

If the house should reject our motion of non-confidence—and I hope it will not—then the government has a mandate at least to introduce its legislative and other proposals—a mandate which it has not got now—and each of those proposals will be considered by this party on its merits in exactly the same way as if the government had a clear majority in this house.

That is our position. It is in this spirit that in due course we shall support this position of non-confidence by moving an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Whatever decision any other party in this house may have reached, we have no confidence in this government, nor has the country any confidence in this government. Its record over the past five years, together with its record over the recent election campaign and since, has been condemned, and not only by us. That record surely abundantly justifies and even demands the stand we are taking. Nor is there anything in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, which would warrant a change in our views. Quite the contrary, as the other two opposition parties themselves admit.

The leader of the Social Credit party is reported in the press to have said in Ottawa on September 26 that, to move a vote of non-confidence in the government—and remember, this is a government which was opposed in an election by nearly 63 per cent of the voters—is political and parliamentary irresponsibility.

I hear comment on the other side, but such comments are not made in the same volume as they were in the old days, when hon. members opposite erupted like volcanoes; and it is noticeable that some of the chief erupters are no longer with us.

Here is what the co-leader of the Social Credit party said a few weeks earlier than his leader's statement, as reported in the press. On August 8, at Timmins, he said:

> I have fought against Diefenbaker outside parliament. I will not fight for him inside it. The country needs a stable government. I would like to see one too. The quicker we have another election, the quicker we will have such a government.

Those are true words, Mr. Speaker. That kind of statement, therefore, makes us on this side just a little sceptical about the subsequent reasons for criticizing us for bringing forward a motion of no confidence which, if the house votes for it, will bring that stable government about.

Mr. Speaker, a vital requirement for national progress and stability in a democracy is confidence in the government of the day. The people showed last June that they did not have such confidence in this government. The government record, both before and since, shows that it does not deserve such confidence. Will it help Canada if, by voting confidence in this minority government, we reject this verdict of the people, ignore the records, and deny the validity of positions previously taken, and declared by those who took them to be in the national interest? There can be no stability in government when over any substantial period the party in power cannot ordinarily command a majority in the House of Commons. Smaller parties or groups may like it this way on occasion, because it might give them an influence they would not otherwise have. But the principle remains valid surely, that a party, either by itself or by arrangement for continuing support from some other party, should be able to count on the support of a majority of the members of this house. Otherwise a government would have to tailor all its legislation and all its proposals to the requirements and to the support of any smaller group on which its life depends. Now, the Prime Minister—and it is always nice to quote the Prime Minister in these situations, and I must say that he lends himself to quotation—

Mr. O'Hurley: What about yourself?

Mr. Pearson: I know the Prime Minister has been looking through my speeches too. I have no doubt of that, and he has a great quantity of helpers working on this subject. But I did not need any help to look for some of his quotations. The Prime Minister has recognized in the past the instability of minority government, indeed the impossibility of minority government. He did that, of course, when his fortunes were in the ascendant. On January 25, 1958, at a press conference in Winnipeg, he referred to the impossibility of his government carrying on in its minority position—and this, remember, shortly after a time when he had been successful at the polls and had been assured of the co-operation of the official opposition, which I confess with sorrow had been defeated in that election. And yet even in these favourable circumstances for the Prime Minister, he is reported by the press of that day as having said:

> This condition of affairs—

That is, government by a minority.

> —cannot continue if Canada is to have that effective parliamentary government it needs.

Then he added that his government "lacks the freedom to act", but presumably he has found that freedom now. He also said that that minority government, in those favourable circumstances, was forced into "the predicament of day-to-day planning, instead of the long term planning" that the realm required. Then he added these words, which I quote again from the report:

> The experience of the past few months has proved to me that it is impossible for a government to operate efficiently in a minority position.

Well, the Prime Minister seems to feel very differently now. In a much more difficult minority position, and after a defeat at the polls, not a victory, the Prime Minister now asks for the right to carry on inefficiently. Some of us also remember those words of the Prime Minister uttered in this house on that day, February 1, 1958, when with histrionics, and dramatics he dissolved parliament; and for him it was a very fortunate dissolution indeed, more fortunate than the one last spring. On page 4200 of Hansard for that day he is reported as saying:

> The present government is supported by 113 members out of a total of 265. Its position as a minority government has become intolerable. No other party or group in this house can possibly form a government; ... The only way in which the present situation can be effectively resolved is by the course I am about to announce.

That course was dissolution, followed by a general election, before he was ever defeated in the house on any issue.

Then the Prime Minister continued in this house in the following words:

> No hon. member will suggest that a situation in which a government can depend upon the support of only a minority of the members of this house is a satisfactory situation, or one that could be expected to continue long.

Well, we will give the Prime Minister the chance and help him realize now that expectation, that this is not a situation which should be allowed to continue long. It has already continued since June 18.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the composition of this house as a result of the election of June 18 certainly shows that we have a government possessing the confidence only of a minority of this house, and of a minority of the country as well. This new parliament, I do not need to tell you, is very different from the old; though from what we have heard this afternoon from the ministerial benches the government already seems to have forgotten that fact. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had this to say on the very eve of the last election, and this has a bearing on the changed composition of the house. I quote from the broadcast he made on June 14, I think it was. He will remember it.

> As I travel about and meet people, I find this. They know how to separate wheat from chaff.

Then he went on:

> And the chaff of five years is being spread asunder.

That is very true indeed, because in the recent separation of wheat from chaff the Conservative government lost more members, 86, than any party has lost in any election in our history—

Mr. Ricard: We had more to lose.

Mr. Pearson: —and that after less than five years in office.

An hon. Member: We had more to start with.

Mr. Pearson: On the other hand, this party over here, I am proud, happy and comforted to say, has doubled its membership from 50 to 100 with the largest percentage of the popular vote. I call that fact to the attention of the Prime Minister who has been stating otherwise. I know this cannot be very comforting for my hon. friends opposite to listen to and I know their minds are going back to the old days when they had 204 or 205 shouting supporters to howl us down whenever we made statements of this kind in the house. But those days are ended.

Mr. O'Hurley: You will never shout us down.

Mr. Pearson: The Conservative defeat was catastrophic but I would be the first to admit that it was indecisive because they are still in office. They are still in office, Mr. Speaker, after losing 86 members, but they will not be in office much longer. This defeat must, I think, have been all the more surprising, indeed, perhaps shocking to them, in view of certain factors during the election. I am going to mention some of them and one or two I am going to go into in considerable detail. There is their success, for instance, in concealing the financial crisis from the electors and the really desperate effort they made and the tactics they followed in which the bill of rights became a Conservative campaign document—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It certainly was not a Liberal one.

Mr. Pearson: —in which communism was put on our side to help their side—

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By the former minister of finance too.

Mr. Pearson: —by ministers who should have known better. Let us look at my statement about concealment of the financial situation from the electors, which was a very important factor in the election itself. Within a few hours after the election of June 18 this minority government had to deal with a financial and exchange crisis which had been concealed from the electors by what can only be termed a major political fraud, fraud by concealment and misrepresentation of the situation. Let us look at the evidence, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) figures largely in the evidence.

Mr. Hamilton: The farmers certainly knew where the "fraud" was.

Mr. Pearson: The evidence on this very important point provides one of the strongest reasons for voting no confidence in this government. Who deceived whom?

Mr. Hamilton: That is the question.

Mr. Pearson: That is the question all right and I will answer the question.

Mr. Hamilton: You will be sorry.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Agriculture seems a little nervous this afternoon, a little agitated, shall we say.

Mr. Hamilton: The farmers certainly threshed you.

Mr. Pearson: I beg him to be calm. The Prime Minister in his television broadcast on June 14 had this to say, and I quote from the text of that broadcast as it was circulated:

> We have given you the facts.

This was June 14.

> We have given you the facts. We have bared the record. We have concealed nothing and shaded nothing.

What was the version of the facts, Mr. Speaker, which on this occasion the Prime Minister said they had given to the people of Canada, concealing nothing and shading nothing? What was their version of the facts with respect to the developing crisis? The minister of finance of that day, who is Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) now—I do not know whether there is any particular significance to be attached to that kind of transition from finance to justice—boasted in his budget speech on April 10 and right through the election campaign that the nation's finances were in wonderful shape. He scorned the very idea of devaluing and pegging the dollar before May 2. We had the minister's jeers and the even more violent reaction of the Prime Minister when we in the Liberal opposition talked about pressure on the dollar, the depreciation of our reserves, the foreign help that had to be secured and the financial dangers that were certainly ahead. Yet the Prime Minister in that broadcast of June 14 assured the country that all was well and that we, who said otherwise and unfortunately proved to be right—that was our crime—were besmirching the good name of Canada for political reasons.

Mr. Winkler: You have been doing it for five years.

Mr. Pearson: Let us see who was besmirching whom. Then we have the Minister of Agriculture. On June 20, after the election was over, everybody but the minister apparently knew what the situation was. Even his colleagues knew because it was possible for them to talk candidly about what had happened; but not the Minister of Agriculture. On June 20 after the election and four days before the emergency austerity program was announced he made the incredible statement that "there is no crisis that anyone can point a finger at".

Mr. Hamilton: Every indicator was moving up.

Mr. Pearson: One of the reasons for the acceleration of this crisis, not the cause of it but the acceleration of it, was the minister's own incredible gaff when he calmly announced during the election in Vancouver that he did not like the 92.5 cent dollar of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the minister of finance at that time were so proud. They had been telling the Canadian people what a master stroke of policy that was. Then, the Minister of Agriculture gets up some ten days before the election and says he does not like it. Talk about cabinet secrets and the inviolability of cabinet discussion. What would have happened to a British cabinet minister in Westminster if he had made this kind of public gaff? The Minister of Agriculture said that some of his colleagues had wanted a 90-cent dollar, while others had wanted a 95-cent dollar. There was a compromise reached, Mr. Speaker. I suppose the compromise may have been reached by tossing a coin.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, the only implication to be drawn by the financial community and others from this incredible indiscretion of the minister was that at least part of the cabinet would be arguing for further devaluation. Did anyone ever offer such an invitation to speculate or invite such pressure upon our dollar as the Minister of Agriculture did, with that kind of statement? There was already a run on the dollar by people who doubted that this government could maintain the value of the dollar at the figure at which they had put it, even if they wanted to do so. Then, along comes this member of the cabinet who provides information to the effect that some ministers did not want to maintain it at that figure. He might as well have got up and shouted, "Do not have confidence in us; take out your dollars while you can get 92. If you wait, you will get less."

An hon. Member: That is what you said.

Mr. Pearson: I was not a minister in the cabinet at that time, betraying cabinet secrets.

An hon. Member: No responsibility.

Mr. Pearson: It will never be possible, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain the damage done to our reserves at that time by that incredible statement by the Minister of Agriculture.

After the voting was over, there was an effort to tell the facts. Indeed, it was essential to tell the facts or we would have been broke in a couple of weeks, perhaps. Then, came the admission that there was indeed a financial crisis; that our reserves had gone down to just over one billion one hundred million dollars, in spite of the various devices to keep the figure up to the maximum possible amount. This crisis, which had been discovered only a few days after the election, now required an emergency program, and austerity. The people of this country who had just been told that all was clear sailing, that all was well, were now told to tighten their belts. It might have been better if they had been told to tighten their seat belts, in view of the kind of government that would follow.

I remember very well the reaction of the Prime Minister to a statement I made a few days before this in the election campaign to the effect that foreign sources had been supporting our dollar, and it seemed we needed to borrow from outside of Canada for that purpose; it seemed we needed to borrow from foreign banks. I was accused of falsehood and every other kind of slander because I said that. Now, three or four days after the election, we were told that they were about to borrow or had borrowed from the United States, the United Kingdom and the international monetary fund, more than a billion dollars to stop the run on the dollar. Was that deceiving the electors? In any event, we were told to cool off and forget about it.

But, Mr. Speaker, an explanation for this crisis has now been discovered by the Prime Minister. Presumably, it has been given to his followers amidst great cheers. It was a very sudden crisis. It just blew up, though at other times we are told that this balance of payment crisis goes away back to the Liberal administration 22 years before. However, that is when that argument is required. On this occasion, the argument is required that the crisis was very sudden and blew up very suddenly, and that I caused it by my speeches in the campaign which had destroyed confidence in Canada abroad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad to listen to hon. members opposite say, "Hear, hear" because I will have something to say about this. No doubt the Prime Minister will produce statistics, figures and charts to try to support the thesis that every time I made a speech pointing out the dangers, attacking the policy of the government, hundreds of millions of dollars fled the country. Well, it is not very difficult to deal with that kind of argument. There were a great many people in this country and abroad, not interested in politics, not even interested in the Canadian election, who had pointed out and emphasized the same dangers and called attention to the same results that would happen if something were not done about it.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, why should everyone in the world outside, in the financial community outside, be so greatly impressed by my words? Why should they have ignored the reassuring statements of the Prime Minister? This was a very great tribute to me indeed. I had no idea that I had the power to influence national and international financial interests. It is very flattering indeed.

The Prime Minister's thesis, about which we are going to hear later on, I suppose, is also affected and made slightly ridiculous by the fact that a large percentage of the loss, as we know now, was due to Canadians moving their money out of Canada. The Minister of Agriculture, particularly, may have had something to do with this. In fact, he probably had a lot to do with it. He was a privy councillor who had taken the oath of secrecy, and he talked about the division of opinion inside the cabinet. How can you square the Prime Minister's thesis with the fact that the movement out accelerated alarmingly after the election, when it became clear that the voting had not displaced the government or put us in.

The fact that our exchange difficulties were so greatly increased after the election, during those two or three days before action was taken, is the most damning indictment of the policy of the government and its reputation in this field that any government could receive. Had there been a different result to the election there would not have been that flight from the Canadian dollar after June 18. The government's explanation of the nature, cause and timing of the dollar crisis in June is false to the point of being nonsensical but, as we shall probably be given it again by the Prime Minister and his colleagues during the course of this debate, it is necessary for me to put the facts on the record and show how we got into this position. That I propose to do in very considerable detail.

We on this side of the house in the previous parliament repeatedly pointed out that a financial crisis was developing and that it was mainly—although we never attempted to say it was solely—due to government mismanagement. Perhaps I may be permitted to quote what I said in the budget debate on April 17, 1962, which may be the last budget for which this government will be responsible. I said, as recorded in Hansard of that date at page 3073:

> The situation now is that instead of buying United States dollars in order to get our reserves up and get our dollars down he is selling United States dollars in order not to depress but to support the Canadian dollar, to stop it from going down too far.
> It is going down and it may go down too far because of loss of confidence in that dollar. One reason for that loss of confidence, in addition to certain ambiguous statements by the minister, was the shameless Coyne affair and the effects it had abroad.
> This operation of the minister which was to bolster our reserves, has cost our reserves about $350 million in the first three months of this year. I can only describe that, Mr. Chairman, as muddled manipulation of our dollar.

That was done by a government which, only a short time before, had refused in this house to accept any responsibility for monetary policy.

During the election campaign we repeated our warnings and said the country was already facing a dollar crisis. The Prime Minister and his colleagues denied the existence of this crisis and they accused us of falsifying the facts. They claimed that the devaluation announced in May was a deliberate, planned attempt by the government to promote expansion. We said such a decision had been imposed upon the government by necessity and was another undeniable sign of the crisis.

Anyone who knew anything about the subject, and that must have included some members of the government but certainly not the Minister of Agriculture, must have known what was happening and why it was happening. The reason for this situation into which we got ourselves unnecessarily goes back through the whole period of the last parliament when this government was in office.

The stagnation experienced since 1957, and our chronic trade deficits, were bound to weaken the external value of the Canadian dollar; but until fairly recently that underlying weakness was met by a net inflow of capital, so that the Canadian dollar remained at a relatively high premium with respect to the United States dollar while our official holdings of gold and United States dollars also remained at a fairly constant level. That was true until the end of 1960; but in December, 1960, the value of the Canadian dollar began to decline slowly until June 1961 when it was about par with the American dollar.

What happened to produce that trend? It was due to three steps in particular taken by this government. First, the non-resident withholding taxes were sharply increased in the so-called "baby budget" in December, 1960, which contributed to discouraging capital coming in from abroad.

Second, the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada at that time strongly advised the provinces, the municipalities and other potential Canadian borrowers not to borrow in the United States.

Third, as we learned only in June, 1961, from the former governor of the bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance, in December, 1960, began to manipulate in secret the exchange rate and to buy United States dollars.

Those three factors, for which the government is responsible—and nobody else—fully account for the slow decline in the value of the Canadian dollar which occurred between November, 1960, and June, 1961. Then in July, 1961, the Canadian dollar suddenly dropped by about three cents to 96½ cents in terms of the U.S. dollar. This was the beginning of the rot; and two factors, directly connected with the government, account for that sudden change for which it must take full responsibility.

I have mentioned one already. It is impossible to overestimate the Coyne affair, that sorry and shameful episode which caused a great deal of concern not only in our own country but abroad. It did more than any other single thing to destroy financial confidence in our country. Indeed it has been called devaluation by slander.

The second factor was that the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of June, 1961, finally decided to admit publicly that he was manipulating the exchange rate in order to bring about "a significant discount", although he refused to tell us what he meant by "significant". That manipulation would mear that the government would buy U.S. dollars and increase its reserves in order to depreciate the Canadian dollar.

But this new policy of manipulation, announced by the minister at that time, was applied only once. Before and after October, 1961, our holdings of U.S. dollars declined each month and that meant of course, contrary to what the minister had said, that the government was not buying but selling U.S. dollars in order to support the value of the Canadian dollar. It was the exact opposite of what the minister of finance had said a short time before that he was going to do. It was another flip-flop. That new policy and the minister's refusal to say what he meant by a "significant discount" were bound to cause uncertainty and a further loss of confidence on the financial market.

Then there was the huge budgetary deficit announced by the minister at that time, which was another contributing factor. It meant that all the main elements of a dollar crisis were now at work, and the government was responsible for all of them.

The minister does not have to make notes. He is Minister of Justice now.

Mr. Churchill: You are afraid of his reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not taking dictation from you.

Mr. Pearson: After October, 1961, the exchange fund was used systematically to support the Canadian dollar and to prevent further devaluation. Therefore between the end of October, 1961 and the end of April, 1962, our holdings of gold and U.S. dollars declined by $516 million, or nearly 25 per cent. Were my speeches responsible for that?

It was quite evident to everyone who wanted to see, who wanted to find out, that our reserves were being rapidly depleted, as we pointed out in the house, and that they were near a dangerously low level, as we also pointed out in the house. Yet, in spite of these substantial injections the value of the Canadian dollar continued to decline between October, 1951 until May, 1962, until we came to the devaluation announcement during the middle of the election campaign on May 2, 1962.

Devaluation had at that time become inevitable. But even that dramatic decision did not stop the run on the dollar. Between the end of April and the end of May our exchange fund lost a further $102 million, and on June 24, when the Prime Minister announced the austerity program, our reserves, as I have said already, stood at $1.1 billion, which meant another loss of nearly $300 million between the end of May and June 24, a period of about three weeks.

From all this, Mr. Speaker, two conclusions are inescapable. Our currency difficulties had reached the proportion of a crisis long before the Prime Minister's announcement of June 24. The main reasons for the crisis were the government's financial mismanagement, the government's policies regarding foreign capital, and especially the government's mishandling of the Coyne affair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Leader of the Opposition allow a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, of course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the reason for the same situation in 1947?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was a different picture altogether.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the situation in 1961 and 1962 could not have been more different from the situation in 1947, and I will be very glad indeed to go into that. If the Prime Minister, with his vast knowledge of financial and monetary matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister tries to tell me that there is any parallel between the situation in 1947 in this field, and that in 1961 and 1962, he really does not know very much about either matter. If he will read the debates of 1947, the speeches made on this side of the house when he was in opposition, he will receive a good lesson in finance from some of his own supporters who did understand the position at that time. Also, Mr. Speaker, when the minister of finance at that time put forward the financial difficulties of the government arising out of the post-war situation, when we had loaned $2 billion to Great Britain and hundreds of millions of dollars to other devastated countries in Europe so that they could buy our goods on credit, the minister of finance rose in the house and told all the facts, and told parliament what he was going to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Not only were the facts different, not only was the remedy adopted to deal with the facts different, but there was no concealment or deceit on that occasion. So the government on this occasion must accept full responsibility—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nineteen forty seven budget by radio.

Mr. Pearson: —not only for the crisis but for the concealment of that crisis from the Canadian people even during an election campaign.

The Prime Minister is trying to tell us, and he tried to tell the people of Canada, that it all blew up as suddenly as his knowledge of it.

Mr. Robichaud: Where was he?

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister did not know anything about this developing dollar crisis before his last campaign telecast of June 14, what a manifestation of incompetence that is. But, Mr. Speaker, I think he should be exempted from that criticism, because I think he must have known about it. After all, he is Prime Minister. There are several reasons to justify my thinking that he must have known about it, apart from the fact that he is Prime Minister and used to sit beside the minister of finance in the House of Commons, and he still does.

Mr. Benidickson: Good friends.

Mr. Pearson: These are the reasons he must have known about it much earlier in 1962. The governor of the Bank of Canada, the new governor, at a meeting in Toronto was advising investment dealers to borrow on the United States markets. That was quite a reversal of the official attitude in this respect—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member saying "advising"?

Mr. Pearson: I said "advising", yes. That was quite a reversal of the government's attitude, which proved, if the minister of finance knew what the governor of the Bank of Canada was doing—and I am sure he did—that people in Ottawa in the government were already aware that something was wrong. That new attitude, as a matter of fact, was confirmed in this house by the minister of finance shortly after that, and I presume he told the Prime Minister about it.

Then there are reports to the effect that, immediately after prorogation, the minister of finance issued a directive to cut current expenditures by $50 million—that was after prorogation. If those reports are true, that fact, though hidden from the public, clearly means that the government was aware in April of the critical situation and that austerity had begun before the election campaign.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? He referred to what he calls reports, and then went on to make statements or charges based on them. Is the Leader of the Opposition prepared in this house to take responsibility for the accuracy of his statement about these reports, or the accuracy of the reports he is alleging were made?

Mr. Pearson: I am prepared, Mr. Speaker, to give the minister an opportunity to deny these reports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —take responsibility for the accuracy of the reports?

An hon. Member: Deny it.

Mr. Benidickson: You are taking notes.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House of Commons I have stated that there were reports that the minister of finance issued a directive to cut current expenses by $50 million immediately after prorogation. Does the minister deny that there was any such directive, any such step taken, any such action taken, any such advice given?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I will be more than pleased to answer that question, but in the meantime perhaps—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —would answer the question that I asked him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps he will answer my question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: He cannot deny it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have a crossfire of questions going on at the moment, which I think can be answered in the ordinary course of debate as and when the opportunity arises, at the proper time.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that is the best way to do it. I asked the minister the question because he raised the matter and I wanted to give him the chance to clear himself and his government at once if he so desired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: There are other points—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Still running away from questions.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, you ran away from finance.

Mr. Pearson: When the government decided to devalue at the beginning of May, the Prime Minister must surely have known that such an exceptional step was taken by necessity, as an attempt to stop the run on our reserves. He must have known that devaluation had become inevitable on that ground. But there was an election going on and the Canadian public was led to believe by the Prime Minister himself that this exceptional decision was merely part of a deliberate and planned policy to increase exports and to encourage domestic industries.

There is another factor which bears on this question. When the level of our reserves at the end of May became known and showed a further substantial decline, the Prime Minister must at that time, surely, have become convinced that devaluation had failed to stop the dollar crisis and that something else had to be done.

The government's advisers in Ottawa were certainly aware of the existence of the dollar crisis, and I am certain they discharged that responsibility of keeping the Prime Minister and the minister of finance informed of the situation even during an election campaign. When action was taken after the election, the Prime Minister and his colleagues had only four days in which to prepare an austerity program including the determination of the new tariff schedules and the negotiation of the various loans in the United States and in Great Britain. It is surely unbelievable that the austerity program could have been thought of, initiated and implemented in a period of only four days. The Prime Minister must have known before the election that such a program was being developed in order to be ready for implementation immediately after the election. For all these reasons any impartial observer must come to the only possible conclusion, namely that our dollar crisis, our financial crisis, was developing over the months and that the Prime Minister was fully aware of it long before his telecast of June 14. In that perspective, and because of the other reasons I have given, surely the statement made in that telecast was both improper and misleading.

Then came the morning after the election, after our celebration and the hon. gentleman's desolation, and the amazing about-face of the Prime Minister and his government on this issue which had been put before the electors in such optimistic and concealing ways. We suddenly realized in this country that we were facing a crisis of confidence—a real emergency. We realized we were facing difficulties which would go beyond the emergency itself—that we were facing a need for long range programs which would get to the root of the difficulties. Above all we were facing a need for a restoration of confidence. In addition, we were facing a conference of commonwealth prime ministers.

In the light of all this, what did the government do after the election? Mr. Speaker, they told us to cool off and forget it. I can understand why they gave this advice to cool off, forget what had been said and what had been happening. The government told us, somewhat unctuously, to tighten our belts and get ready for austerity after the election. They took emergency action leading up to austerity and, of course, they shuffled what was left of the cabinet deck, adding a second senator to it. I think this is the first time since the early thirties, in Mr. Bennett's day, that we have had two senators in the cabinet. Maybe I am wrong about this, but I think I am right. It is, perhaps, a step in the reform of the Senate, but it has other implications.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Who are the two?

Mr. Pearson: I took it for granted that this great Conservative party would put the leader of the government in the Senate into the cabinet, but perhaps they do not do that. Should that not be the case I have made a mistake and I apologize. In Mr. Bennett's day they used to do that. There is an inaccuracy which I correct; there is only one cabinet minister in the Senate. However, this appointment had one very interesting consequence and I must say it is a pleasant one as far as I am concerned. It will be recalled that the hon. gentleman in question who served his country during the war in Ottawa with distinction and devotion, was one of Mr. C. D. Howe's wartime bureaucrats. He was one of those men who were trampling the liberties of the people under foot.

Mr. Pickersgill: Said to have been.

Mr. Pearson: I wish I could remember what the Prime Minister used to say about them during the election campaigns, but his adjectives are a little beyond me. However, he poured scorn on these people and particularly he poured personal scorn on Liberal candidates who, he claimed, were bureaucrats in those days despite the fact that one or two whom he attacked personally had not spent their wartime years in Ottawa but were fighting overseas. However, this particular appointment has purified some of my colleagues and I am grateful for that.

The Prime Minister's reaction was an understandably happy one when the appointment was announced. He drew a parallel which, I confess, surprised me a little. He said: President Kennedy has his McNamara; I have my McCutcheon. When the Prime Minister said that, I thought we were at least going to get a defence policy. If I am not wrong, I believe Mr. McNamara is secretary of defence in the United States government. The Prime Minister's exhilaration over this appointment was badly timed because at the time he was reported to have made that remark the house armed services committee in Washington accused Mr. McNamara on August 13 of accumulating power in a way which could lead to the disastrous erosion of military effectiveness.

We all remember that while these steps were being taken by the government, and indeed, weeks afterwards, no economic program was put forward; no parliament was called to deal with what we were told was a grave national crisis. What have they done? They should have called parliament together at the first date possible under our constitution. Imagine a man who talks so much and with such emotion about the responsibilities of parliament and the privileges of the House of Commons refusing to call parliament together at a time which he claims to have been one of national emergency after an election. They should have done what was done in 1925 and 1926 which was the only time previously when we had a minority government in a comparable situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not comparable in any way.

Mr. Pearson: Comparable. The year which the Prime Minister put forward as a precedent was not a precedent at all in relation either to the situation now or in 1925 and certainly 1957 did not provide a comparable situation. True, in 1957 there was a minority government but, as I have already said, the Liberals had, in effect, been defeated in that election even though no party had a majority in the house. Mr. St. Laurent recognized that by resigning, and indicated that the party which had been the most successful in the election should have a chance to implement its proposals which had, on the whole been supported by the electorate. That is the stand he took in 1957. The Prime Minister should be careful not to try to relate the circumstances in 1957 to those of 1962 to justify the course of action he has taken, because the comparison would prove embarrassing to himself and to his colleagues. The truth is that on this occasion in 1962 responsible government was mocked by the Prime Minister's refusal to summon parliament at the earliest possible moment to deal with the position in which the government found itself at a time of emergency on the eve of a prime ministers' commonwealth conference called to discuss matters of the most far reaching importance. Responsible government means, if it means anything at all, that the Queen's ministers are responsible to the elected members of the House of Commons, and must therefore have the support and the confidence of the majority of the House of Commons before they take action.

Between sessions of any one parliament the government with a clear majority can normally, of course, count on that support; but with a minority government, that is not the case. The first such parliament elected in this situation was elected on October 29, 1925. It consisted of 117 Conservatives, 101 Liberals, 24 Progressives, and 3 Labour and Independent members. This minority government of 1925 decided to submit its fate to parliament, which was summoned at the earliest possible date after the last writ was returned on January 6. What a contrast with the course followed by this minority government, which held up parliament to the last possible minute.

There is another and very glaring contrast indeed. Mr. Mackenzie King, though not in the house, was head of a minority government, and he announced—and his government acted on the announcement—that his minority government would make no appointments, and would take no action which was not required for the routine business of government, until parliament had met and decided the question of confidence. What a contrast between that position and the one taken this summer by these paragons of parliamentary rights and parliamentary responsibilities.

Mr. Churchill: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Churchill: Will the Leader of the Opposition state to the house that Mr. Mackenzie King had been defeated in his own constituency in 1925 and was not a member of the house?

Mr. Pearson: I mentioned that, Mr. Speaker. He had been defeated. His government had 101 members in the house. He decided that they would do nothing in this minority position, nothing of any kind, until parliament had had a chance to meet. He called parliament and put his fate to that parliament at the first possible opportunity; and in order to make sure that parliament would be given the opportunity to decide whether or not they had confidence in his government, the government itself put forward a motion of confidence. Read the debates of that time.

Mr. Churchill: I did, and it was just a trick.

Mr. Pearson: Look at the contrast between what happened then and what has happened now.

Mr. Churchill: The motion was declared out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was not.

Mr. Pearson: It was amended by Mr. Meighen. The vote was on Mr. Meighen's amendment. Both parties felt that this was the right course to take; the vote was taken at once, and Mr. King's government got a vote of confidence. That precedent, Mr. Speaker, I had in mind when I said in a statement I made immediately after the election of June 20:

> No government has the right to remain in office unless it can command the support of the majority of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister, therefore, should have parliament called into session at the earliest possible date and seek a vote of confidence.

That would have been the right course for the government to take even if there had been no exceptional circumstances and no financial crisis. But in the circumstances disclosed immediately after the election, there was an additional and compelling reason for the government to take that course. Instead the government chose to take action on its own to delay to the last possible date the meeting of parliament, and to carry on in the meantime as though it had the confidence and support of parliament, making appointments to the public service, to the judiciary, to the Senate, which appointments should never have been made by the government until it had been assured that it had the support of the elected House of Commons. If the proper course had been followed, the course which would have recognized the rights of parliament, the course which was advocated so strongly by Mr. Meighen in 1926 and followed at that time by Mr. King, there would have been a debate at the earliest possible moment on the speech from the throne, when consideration could have been given to the government's austerity program, to any long range proposals which were brought in, to the situation regarding the financial crisis, as we were told it was, and to the forthcoming commonwealth meeting of prime ministers. In the midst of this situation of emergency and crisis, the question could have been decided on the vote in the light of what was required by the country in a time of emergency. But that course was rejected by the government, even though it was advocated at that time both by the Social Credit and N.D.P. parties. The government merely said: Let us cool off and forget the election. By that attitude and the attitude they have taken since, they now deny the existence of a crisis, either financial or economic. They deny that there was any emergency that justified the calling together of parliament, and they face this parliament according to their own protestations in a very different national situation, and I will have something to say about that at eight o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, at the six o'clock adjournment I was discussing what I thought was the proper course for the government to have followed during the summer in respect of the summoning of parliament. Before I go on with that I should like to correct an inaccuracy in one of my statements this afternoon when I said there had only been two cabinet ministers in the Senate in this government and in a government in the early 1930's. It has been brought to my attention that a former minister of trade and commerce, Mr. MacKinnon, for many years a member of the House of Commons as minister of that department, was transferred to the other place and served in that other place as minister without portfolio along with the leader of the government in the Senate; so that in that sense I was inaccurate.

I feel strongly, Mr. Speaker, and I tried to express that feeling this afternoon, that parliament should have been called at the earliest possible moment this summer when we were told that we were in the midst of a financial and exchange crisis. If at that time a crisis of that kind had required special consideration by parliament and if the government had needed special support to deal with the crisis, that could have been made clear in the speech from the throne and parliament could have taken whatever action was thought desirable to meet this critical emergency. That course of calling parliament was rejected by the government.

It was said that we were merely to cool off. By that attitude, by what they have said since and by what they have included in the speech from the throne they have denied that there is any longer a situation of emergency or crisis, financial or otherwise. Certainly they have denied, by not calling parliament, that there was a situation which justified taking that action, and in doing that they have confirmed that the situation today is very different indeed now.

We meet today, Mr. Speaker, in that changed situation. We are told that the emergency program of the government has worked so successfully that the immediate crisis has been removed. When that emergency program was put into effect, when the austerity program was initiated, we on this side of the house endeavoured in the national interest to co-operate and endeavoured not to oppose it. We did not exploit it for any partisan advantage even though parliament was not to be called. No matter what we may have thought of the government's responsibility in getting us into that crisis, or of its deceit in concealing it, or of certain details in the program as such, such as import surcharges and the 6 per cent bank rate, we said no word and took no action which would interfere with the effectiveness of these emergency measures in order to give them a chance.

The newly elected Liberal members of the House of Commons met in Ottawa in caucus on June 27 and they issued this statement:

> The Liberal party will co-operate in effective measures to protect the soundness of the currency. Defensive emergency measures are now essential, but they must not last beyond the emergency.

Of course, the speech from the throne tells us that the emergency is over.

> In addition to meeting the financial emergency, there must be effective and constructive measures to get Canada's economy moving forward again; to restore full employment and to bring about the freest possible trade. All these things must and can be done without the sacrifice of financial stability. The necessities of an emergency program should not take our minds off this ultimate objective of an expanding economy with social progress and strong national purpose.

I myself, Mr. Speaker, as leader of the party, had said on the previous day, June 26, in a statement which I issued:

> All Canadians will agree that the country needs farsighted leadership and united action to prevent further devaluation of our dollar.

That was in the light of the crisis as it had been declared. Then I went on:

> Emergency measures have now been taken to this end. Everyone, including the Liberal party, will support whatever these measures can do to restore confidence in the value of our currency. Our party will judge them solely by what is best for the country.

The Prime Minister showed his appreciation of that attitude, or his lack of appreciation, by deciding not to call parliament until September 27 and in the meantime to carry on as if nothing had happened on June 18. Is it to be wondered, Mr. Speaker, that we have no confidence in this government? Apart from its record over five years of ineffectiveness, confusion and indecision, are we to vote confidence in these same men, or those of them who are left, who have been so wrong so often and whose administration of the nation's business has been so bad?

Meanwhile the government's emergency measures remain in force, according to the speech from the throne, until circumstances make their removal possible. So we cannot any longer call them emergency measures. They are now government policy. But the Liberal party has not accepted, does not accept and cannot accept these Tory measures, put forward after the election as part of an emergency program, as policy of any value for the solution of our long range economic problems. In the emergency of June after the election there was no alternative, I know, because of the mess we had got into, but to borrow from abroad, though the Prime Minister said during the election that was not his policy. There was also no choice but to take some direct action to cut our spending abroad.

The Liberal party rejects as economic policies emergency measures which will not solve our problems but may indeed make them more difficult. The tariff surcharges, for instance, reduce trade and they must go. Cuts made in public works could reduce construction and employment where it is most needed. Tight money will make it harder for Canadian industry to get Canadian capital for expansion, and that has an effect on our balance of payments position. It will make it harder for provinces and municipalities to finance necessary investments in economic and social progress.

The short term inflow of capital due to high interest rates must be replaced by foreign investment for development, not hot money, and by a sensible trade policy. Austerity measures are only of emergency value in repairing the mess created in the last five years. A return to expansion and to growth will require very different measures indeed from these emergency measures. These emergency measures, Mr. Speaker, must be temporary, especially since they are on the whole restrictionist in character and their success as emergency measures will depend on the speed with which the government can get rid of them. In an economic sense austerity, whatever moral values it may have, makes no sense with unemployment and excess unused capacity. We need, above all, stability and confidence in our future, in our destiny, in our growth. We need new jobs that can only come from growth.

Now, of course, one of the most important sources of these new jobs, an important source of employment, is trade. This brings me to a matter which is mentioned in the speech from the throne, and which has been mentioned a great deal by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his colleagues, the commonwealth economic conference in London and the prospects arising out of that conference for increasing our trade and therefore increasing employment in Canada. I know that I have been told we have no right to criticize the Prime Minister's actions at a commonwealth economic conference. I know also that he has claimed that his objective at the conference was to protect Canadian interests, Canadian jobs, Canadian income.

Well, Mr. Speaker, of course what other purpose would the Prime Minister of Canada have in going to an international conference? Of course, we accept without question the fact that was his intention, that was his objective, that was his desire. The question, Mr. Speaker, is how did he act in order to achieve that essential and desirable objective? By what methods did he protect Canadian interests, with what understanding of the situation?

There are two ways, as I see it, and this may be an oversimplification, by which this could have been done. He could have tried to protect Canadian interests by getting the best possible terms for Canada. I am now talking about United Kingdom entry into the European common market. He could have achieved this by exerting a strong but friendly influence on the United Kingdom to that end, while accepting the creative importance of United Kingdom entry into the European common market. Alternatively, he could have protected Canadian interests—and this is what I think he tried to do—by insisting on terms that would have kept the United Kingdom out, something which in itself might have been considered to be desirable. I suggest that his tactics, his policies, were based on that latter attitude.

Mr. McPhillips: Are you saying this for Washington?

Mr. Pearson: That is a very intelligent remark, and it is an especially intelligent observation from the member of a government which has at last discovered the wisdom of President Kennedy's trade policy.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the making of the British entry difficult, perhaps to the point of impossibility, was also the avowed policy of certain other members of the commonwealth. They, however, with far more at stake than Canada in terms of immediate damage to their trade, played their cards far more cleverly and secured a much better reception for their position than Canada did.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Pearson: Someone on the other side says, "How do you know?" I quote a very good authority, the secretary of state for commonwealth relations in the United Kingdom, who ought to know. He is quoted in a newspaper which is of unimpeachable accuracy and integrity, the Toronto Telegram. The reporter for the Toronto Telegram in London quotes the secretary of state for commonwealth relations on September 17, 1962, as follows:

> That where Australia and New Zealand were constructive and helpful in trying to find ways of improving commonwealth market terms, Canadians were intransigent.

Our Prime Minister, instead of talking softly in public and negotiating strongly in private, took from the very moment of his arrival in the United Kingdom, shaky though his position was at home, an aggressive position that was not likely to be effective in securing his own asserted objective of protecting Canadian jobs and income. Immediately on arrival he made two public suggestions, one of which was certainly bound to cause a lot of controversial excitement and give great comfort to the discordant British elements of the extreme right and extreme left who for different reasons were opposing British entry into the common market. They were bound to seize on any statement of this kind that was made by the Prime Minister of Canada and use it for their own purposes.

One of these two suggestions was to the effect that there must be a second prime ministers conference before Great Britain entered the European common market. This is not reflected in the communique, although continuing consultation is reflected. The other, and far more important suggestion made by our Prime Minister on his arrival in England, concerned an alternative plan to British membership in the European common market. Once that statement was made, the Prime Minister at once became the leader of the commonwealth opposition to the United Kingdom on this issue, a position which he, most of all of those attending, should have been careful to avoid. At first, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was a little vague and coy about his alternative plan, about which apparently no one in Ottawa knew anything. He would give it only if he were asked to give it or if the United Kingdom decided not to press for entry into the common market.

Finally, at the end of the conference, the great alternative plan was produced. Well, it proved to be neither a plan nor an alternative. However, it certainly indicated the Prime Minister had lost his faith, more than once reiterated in earlier statements, in Prime Minister Macmillan's declared promise to safeguard commonwealth interests, and that included Canadian interests, in the common market negotiations. The plan, since that time, has been politely ignored. We are now being told—I think the Prime Minister has said it himself—that the British minister in charge of common market negotiations, the Right Hon. Edward Heath, has endorsed it. When I read that statement I was interested in the kind of endorsation Mr. Heath would give to this kind of plan, so I looked up the London Times to see exactly what he said at his press conference. This is what he said, according to the London Times. This is the great endorsation of the plan:

> Although Mr. Diefenbaker's suggestion for an international conference had not been discussed, it could be read into a part of the communique . . . as could the United Nations proposal for a world conference or indeed any similar initiative.

The president of Pakistan, who was a very welcome guest of the Canadian government a few days ago, did have some very friendly things to say about the Prime Minister's plan; but the finance minister of India, speaking in Ottawa a few days later, and he was here on business, merely remarked about the Prime Minister's proposal for a world trade conference of like-minded nations that a similar proposal had been made at the United Nations and that he could see no point in "duplicating, triplicating or complicating" that earlier proposal.

The fact is, of course, that this proposal of the Prime Minister's was a last minute attempt to divert attention from the failure of his tactics in London and from the very bad reception that they had in the United Kingdom and in Canada.

In view of what happened in London perhaps it is well to remember that in diplomatic negotiations with friendly governments you make your case most effectively and strongly when you do not invite misunderstanding or create ill will. It is also perhaps well to remember the old Chinese proverb, which seems to have been forgotten: "The wise man does not use a hatchet to kill a fly on the forehead of his friend." You must also know very clearly what you are seeking, not only for the short run but for the long run. In this sense the ideals and objectives of the Prime Minister may have been beyond reproach, but his diplomacy and negotiation at London for the realization of those objectives, for the protection of Canada's real interests, were both ineffective and unsuccessful. As so often before, this government exhibited its peculiar genius for getting into quite unnecessary difficulty with its friends.

On this occasion it has followed the normal course, when these things happen, of blaming others for its own difficulties, and in particular the press which, as usual, has been inaccurate and unfair. The British press, and that is not a Canadian Liberal press, was shameful, according to some reports from government sources, and the Canadian correspondents were misguided largely, we are asked to believe, because the Canadian delegates followed the press rules of the conference after others had broken them. Mr. Speaker, are our representatives really so naïve as that? All this was merely a convulsive reaction of a confused and ineffective administration when things go wrong for it, as they so often do.

So far as the Prime Minister's tactics at London were concerned, they have been condemned by a good many journalistic supporters of his own government; yet the Prime Minister now tells us he really accomplished everything he wanted to in London.

Mr. Winkler: He did not sell Canada short.

Mr. Pearson: He did not sell Canada at all.

Mr. Winkler: That is your policy.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister now says everything went very well at the conference and that the atmosphere, to use his words, was "friendly and fair." His words were quoted by Mr. Richard Jackson in the Ottawa Journal, and Mr. Jackson was very close to the Prime Minister at the conference. He also said:

> At no time were there bitter words as reported by clandestine sources to some newspapers. The communique showed this.

However the same Mr. Richard Jackson in his very interesting report—as his reports always are—in the Ottawa Journal of September 20, which lauded the Prime Minister's position at the conference and accepted without question, indeed with ecstatic endorsation the above statements, himself added, perhaps a little carelessly at the end of the same article, these words:

> Both sides in the communique gave out with the old con—the ten days of talks had all been buddy, buddy. This—

said Mr. Jackson

> —was eyewash. Blood had been spilled.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it was not as bad as that but all who support the commonwealth of nations, this essential association of men and nations representing all races, all creeds and all continents, could not help but be disturbed by some of the implications as reported from the London meeting.

A very careful and experienced observer, Mr. Robert Duffy, reporting in the Toronto Globe and Mail on September 20 expressed this worry, and I am sure it is one which must trouble a lot of people. He wrote:

> Despite the genial communique on Wednesday and benign comments on it by various prime ministers, it must be obvious to everyone that the past ten days at Marlborough House have done the commonwealth no good at all.

He went on:

> The commonwealth concept (or is it a myth?)—

These were his words, and I am sure it is not a myth:

> —has in fact been perceptibly damaged—just how badly, and with what prospects of repair, only the future can tell.

We must hope that this is not so and that that report is too pessimistic. But certainly it is a fact, and the London conference underlines this fact, that the nature and character of the commonwealth of nations has now changed as its composition has changed and as its membership has increased. Perhaps the old informal clubbish atmosphere of pre-world war II, and immediately after that war, when a few prime ministers sat around a table in Downing street has gone forever, and this involves problems and creates new challenges for the new commonwealth.

The case against the government's tactics and policy at the London conference takes us back to the months before that conference, to the government's general attitude to the development of the European economic community, and to Britain's possible membership in that community with all that that might mean for the commonwealth and the world. That attitude on the other side of the house has shown, from the very beginning, an amazing unawareness of the historic significance of what was taking place on the continent of Europe, a significance which is as political as it is economic.

When the possibility of Great Britain joining the common market first arose a few years ago, and when that possibility was brought to the attention of the government by the opposition in this house—and the record of Hansard is clear on that point—it was shrugged off by the government as unlikely, if not impossible, or at least not worth talking about. When that reaction was shown by events to be wrong, then the next reaction was one of carping and negative criticism, expressed at times in terms that were not very friendly to the possibility of this change taking place.

Then we have the recent London conference, where the Canadian representatives adopted an attitude that ill became a government with the record of this government in respect of trade with the United Kingdom. The whole record of its trade relations with the United Kingdom was such as would have made it only decent that we should have been at least careful regarding how we would take our stand in London to protect Canadian trading interests.

That record is a revealing one of fine words. Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a record of many fine words which, as one British member of parliament put it, "buttered no parsnips". The house knows that record and I am not going to go into it in any detail this evening. We know it from August, 1957, the fiasco of the 15 per cent diversion offer. It did not fool us on this side, but it apparently fooled the British for a short time, because in response to this 15 per cent diversion offer they made, through Mr. Thornycroft, who was then chancellor of the exchequer, an offer on behalf of the United Kingdom to help bring about the promised diversion in the only way it could be brought about, by eliminating all British tariffs on Canadian goods if Canada would reciprocate. We know what happened to that. It was ignored; it was rejected by being ignored.

We know what followed that—an increase of duties against certain British imports. We know during 1960 about the warnings of the minister of finance of that day, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) uttered as to the dangers that would come from Great Britain joining the European common market, referred to by the Minister of Agriculture in Vancouver as merely "a rich man's club". That was his interpretation of this historic European development.

We remember in August, 1960 how the minister of finance in Ste. Adele, Quebec, could hardly disguise his threats of retaliation if the United Kingdom should join ECM, and we remember—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is just rubbish, and you know it.

Mr. Pearson: I have read the minister's speech and I will draw my own conclusions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a gross perversion of the truth.

Mr. Pearson: And we remember how the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Paris, just a few weeks after that, said that unless the European common market, which was lowering its tariffs at that time, actually reduced its announced new tariff changes affecting Canada, we would retaliate by increasing our tariffs against ECM. That is, unless they were reduced even further.

Also, we will never forget what happened at Accra in the autumn of 1960—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have not learned the truth yet, apparently.

Mr. Pearson: —when the United Kingdom was told that if they considered going into the European common market, that was the beginning of the "slippery slope". Important members of this government have tried to make it slippery ever since then.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was slippery before then.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in the face of this record the government of Canada saw fit to adopt the tactics that it adopted at this recent conference. Oh, Mr. Speaker, they do not seem to be aware of how much is at stake, not only for Canada but for the commonwealth and for the world in these changes that are taking place.

I would like to read what The Economist, which is a highly regarded and most respected business weekly, had to say about this. The Economist of London, England, in an editorial of September 8, 1962 entitled "Facing the Commonwealth" said, and I quote one paragraph from that magazine:

> What the British entry into the common market ought in the long run to offer the commonwealth is a firm link with the new Europe that is now being shaped.

And, thank God, it is being shaped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Those words are mine.

An hon. Member: They sound like it.

Mr. Pearson: Then the article goes on to say:

> The vision of this great adventure—

An hon. Member: The great "I am".

Mr. Pearson: It goes on to say:

> The vision of this great adventure—for that is what it is—is only too easily lost from sight among the wrangling about immediate and particular interests. But the question that leaders of opinion in commonwealth countries should really be asking themselves is: do we want a key to the European door, or do we not? If the answer were to prove a negative one—

An hon. Member: Back and front.

Mr. Pearson: As I was saying:

> If the answer were to prove a negative one, that would—tragically—suggest that the commonwealth has exhausted its vein of dextrous adaptability to change in the world.

Then a week later, on September 22, after the commonwealth conference was over, The Economist has this to say:

> What one has missed in the last ten days, from the commonwealth leaders is an understanding of the plain fact that the uniting of Europe brings a new force into the world—and that Britain's participation is the best guarantee that the force will be steered in the right direction.

If our Prime Minister had shown some understanding, some awareness of the concept of what is happening in Europe and had expressed himself along those lines in London, what he had to say about protecting Canadian trading interests might have been understood; but what he did, of course, was quite the opposite. He publicly dissociated himself from that part of the communique in which was put the reasons for joining and the beneficial results which might be achieved by everyone in that event.

Instead he told the press, as reported by the Canadian Press correspondent in London, in a report which has not been denied, that British entry into the common market must raise the question of whether the effect would be to make North America feel less obliged to share in Europe's defence.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: And the story went on to say that his reference to a possible reduction in North America's interest under NATO was a new talking point.

Mr. Speaker, that report has not been denied, and it has appeared in all newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was denied. That is one thing you did not read.

Mr. Pearson: That report Mr. Speaker, was not denied. No denial of that report appeared at the time it was made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, it did.

Mr. Pearson: A subsequent denial, I think, was issued by the Prime Minister after he got back to Canada many, many days later. I ask the Prime Minister what mandate he feels he has to speak for North America.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What right did you have to speak about Suez in the way you did?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I will be very glad indeed to speak about Suez at any time, as I have in the past, and I will be very glad to remind the Prime Minister of his attitude at that time, which would have destroyed the formation of the first United Nation's permanent force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there are those who say, of course, that we in the opposition have no right to criticize the tactics followed by our Prime Minister while he was in London. This government which refused to call parliament before the conference; which refused to give any information, publicly or confidentially, to anyone outside cabinet about the policies it proposed to follow in this critical international matter; this minority government was to be immune from criticism and public opinion was to conclude from our silence that we approved of what was going on.

Mr. Churchill: Why did you not wait until he was here in Canada before you made your statement?

Mr. Pearson: Why did not the Prime Minister call parliament before he left for London? What a frightened and undemocratic position to take.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You should talk.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Gaitskell, the leader of the Labour party in England could criticize, and strongly, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan of England, but I must not criticize the Prime Minister of Canada.

The limits of misrepresentation of the criticism we did make were reached by the local Conservative newspaper which claims that we Liberals are taking the position, in our criticism, that Canada's trade policy should be determined by Whitehall and by some bureaucrats in Brussels without any Canadian voice at all.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear. That is your position.

Mr. Pearson: "Hear, hear", says the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton). Well, that criticism is false to the point of absurdity. What matters is the kind of Canadian voice; what it says, and how it says it. There was a Canadian voice at Accra—but none at Brussels—shrill in its criticism of the United Kingdom, talking about this being the end of the commonwealth, the slippery slope. There was a Canadian ministerial voice publicly and unfairly berating the British government for not supplying a report of meetings with ECM negotiators, although the information had already been provided in a full precis of the report. There was a Canadian ministerial voice belittling the great move toward European unity as the formation of a rich man's club. There was a Canadian voice shouting about a 15 per cent diversion of our imports from the United States to the United Kingdom while rejecting British initiative as to how this could be done in the interests of both our countries.

That is the kind of Canadian voice we have been hearing. It is the kind of Canadian voice we want to hear no more. One result of the tactics adopted by the Prime Minister and some others in London is that they have tried to force the British government into a position where it would have to make a choice between the commonwealth and the common market.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is completely false.

Mr. Pearson: There is no other deduction to be drawn from the stand taken which was that Britain must make a choice between the commonwealth and the common market.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rubbish.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Pearson: It was the same at Accra.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pearson: That is my statement and I stand by it.

An hon. Member: You'll fall by it.

Mr. Pearson: In these tactics they may have isolated the commonwealth from the ideal of European unity with Britain and from the idea of an Atlantic regional economic bloc which could be expanded by the operation of the most favoured nation clause to include all other free countries. Of course, it is the duty of the Canadian government to seek the best terms it can as the United Kingdom seeks to join the European common market. But by the great doubt thrown on the whole idea of Britain joining the ECM a heavy, unwise and unnecessary responsibility has been taken which may have harmful and unhappy results for us all.

If the United Kingdom does not join the common market, will that be in the best interests of Canada? Is it to our interest to see a European common market with the United Kingdom outside, dividing free and western Europe into two groups? Would it help us if the common market is deprived of British experience, British wisdom and British pressure to follow non-discriminatory and expansionist trade relations with the rest of the world? Will it help us if we hinder the development of a strong Great Britain as a market for our goods by insisting that the price for entry into the common market must be the entire preservation of a system of commonwealth preferences already greatly eroded since 1932? If the British do not succeed in entering the common market, has this government any plan to deal with the resulting situation except its world conference proposal? If the United Kingdom government proposes a commonwealth common market arrangement, should they not be able to get into Europe, what would be the attitude of our government to that?

An hon. Member: What is yours?

Mr. Pearson: For a few short weeks you are still the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are still as negative as ever.

Mr. Pearson: If the United Kingdom repeats its proposal for the elimination of duties between our two countries, will the government again exclude that?

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the fact that the rules provide that the hon. member who has the floor has the right to speak, perhaps some of the side remarks could be contained for other occasions, not in this house.

Mr. Pearson: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Hees: I have not been saying a thing.

Mr. Pearson: True, the minister has not said a word and I have not said he has, but I am saying that if he and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton), and other ministers, wish to ascertain a sensible attitude to this question, let them read the statement made by the hon. gentleman's deputy in Vancouver. There is no doubt that Britain's entry into the ECM will confront us with problems in this country. Britain's rejection by the ECM would confront us with greater problems, so the urgent task at the commonwealth meetings in London was not to patch up the old system, not to try to make this choice between the common market and the commonwealth, but to begin a new structure of commonwealth trade within the pattern of a new trading world. Britain can gain political and economic strength by full partnership in Europe while remaining the heart and centre of the commonwealth, but a declining Britain will never mean a stronger commonwealth. There have been few greater challenges to statesmanship than the relationship we should all adopt to these European developments. If that challenge was not met in London, that was due in large part to the negative and shortsighted attitude taken by the Canadian government which over recent years has had nothing constructive to propose and no leadership to give.

Hon. members ask: What would you do? We have put this on the record in the House of Commons ever since 1959. We would have accepted as a desirable objective Great Britain's accession to the European common market and we would have gone to work at once to see how we could have associated ourselves with that move. That could have been done by showing some understanding and sympathy for the United States freer trade initiative and by trying to work with the United States and with the European common market and the United Kingdom so that the benefits of any agreements, through the most favoured nation clause might apply to all our friends as well. We should not be dragging hopefully behind the Kennedy program, which the Prime Minister has now discovered, or throwing road blocks in the way of the United Kingdom's desire to move across the channel.

There is, of course, a very important connection between trade and jobs, and the most important need of the Canadian people at the present time is jobs. The most important task before any parliament is to find employment for the Canadian people. We have heard a great deal of complacent talk from this government about employment. This complacency reached its peak, of course, just before June 18. On June 14 the Prime Minister claimed in that famous television broadcast:

> Full employment is now about to take place.

This was in June.

> In this month of June we may well reach that long-looked-for goal of virtual full employment. It will certainly be achieved, as I see it, in July or August.

Mr. Speaker, we now have the figures to set beside the Prime Minister's vision. Unemployment in June: 301,000. That is not bad, and I am glad to say that it was an improvement over the previous June. It was not as bad as the previous June, because it was then 370,000. But, Mr. Speaker, 301,000 people were out of work even in June. Is that what the Prime Minister means by full employment? Is that his "long-looked-for goal"? Will he tell the Canadian people that his idea of full employment is to have two or almost three times as many people looking for jobs as there used to be before his day? Will he admit that? He had better look up the figures, because he will have to admit it.

An hon. Member: How many were there?

Mr. Pearson: I will put the figures on record, seeing that they are being challenged now across the aisle. Will the Prime Minister admit, when he told the electorate in June that the unemployment problem was "licked", and that we will certainly have full employment in July or August, that he was wrong again in that prediction? In June, Mr. Speaker, it was inconceivable that we would have full employment this year. But this was before the election. Economists can argue about the details, but certainly we do not have full employment when in the summer 4 per cent of our workers do not have jobs. That has been the situation this summer, and according to the government's own statistics it is equivalent to an unemployment level of 6 per cent on the average through the year. In the Liberal years from 1946 to 1957 the average was 3 per cent; and in the summer months it was generally below 2 per cent.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this wonderful year, this year the Tories are so proud of, except in an electoral sense, is twice as bad for unemployment as an average Liberal year. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was then no shred of evidence for saying, when the Prime Minister spoke in June, that we would have full employment in any true sense this summer. That statement was inconceivable to any responsible person. I invite the Prime Minister when he speaks to give us one of the only two possible explanations. Either he was wrong and he knew that he was wrong; or what he means by full employment is not what the Canadian people mean. It is what anyone else would call a serious level of unemployment. In June, 1957, let me remind the Prime Minister, there were 177,000 unemployed men and women in Canada. Five years later he said that he had reached the "long-looked-for goal", and we have 301,000 unemployed. Perhaps that is progress and achievement. But that was the June figure. In fairness to the Prime Minister, I must add, and I have repeated these words, that he only "thought" we would get full employment in June; but two months later he was sure there would be full employment. And so he told the Canadian public, again on television during this speech made, I think, at Brantford on June 13, and he was a little more personal about it. He got a little more personal towards the end of the election. These were his words:

> Pearson and Martin will find out that in July and August we will have the lowest unemployment total in five years.

That is not much of a standard, Mr. Speaker. The five years are Tory years, and the standards are pretty low; but even so, when July and August came, Pearson and Martin did not find out what the Prime Minister told the electors we would find out. In August 280,000 people were without jobs. Even in the Tory years, the five years, there were ten previous months when unemployment had not been as bad as that.

For the month of July the Prime Minister was even further from the mark, because the unemployment figure of 308,000 was more than it had been at twelve earlier Tory dates. But of course, Mr. Speaker, the comparison to be made is not between one Tory month and another, inaccurate though that comparison has been. The comparison is between the situation in these last five years and what it was before this government came into office. The Prime Minister talks now about full employment, that he has "licked" unemployment. He said that we would have full employment in July and August, when it is more than twice as bad, nearly three times as bad, as it was in the summer of 1956.

Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to members of all parties of this house, and I ask them to consider it in their hearts and in their consciences when they come to vote on this amendment: How can we in Canada prosper with a government that thinks that 300,000 unemployed in midsummer is something to boast about? How can we meet the needs of the Canadian people with a government that says that we have full employment, when 300,000 men and women are looking for work in summer? How can we have confidence in a government which seems to think that a summer unemployment figure of 300,000 is good enough for the Canadian people?

Mr. Fulton: I thought you admitted that it was 280,000?

Mr. Pearson: The minister is obviously a little disturbed and a little agitated about it.

Mr. Fulton: I was just trying to be accurate.

Mr. Pearson: Not knowing what these figures are, you now contradict what the Prime Minister of this country said during the election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The speech from the throne talks in glowing terms about 200,000 new jobs that have been created; 200,000 are to be created every year. Well, Mr. Speaker, the annual increase in the labour force during the last year was just about 200,000. Is that the objective that we are to achieve? Is that our goal? Is that our target—to create enough new jobs to take care of people coming on to the labour force, but to do nothing about chronic unemployment? With only 200,000 new jobs a year, that is exactly what must happen. Our real need is not a million new jobs in five years; it is a million jobs, as I have said more than once in this house, in four years. That is what we will have to find in order to get back to full employment; not to full employment as some theoretical abstraction, but to the level of employment which was reached under Liberal administration when we did have full employment.

Mr. Speaker, the most urgent problem before us at the present time is the creation of enough jobs to take care of the men and women coming on to the labour force, and to liquidate this problem of chronic unemployment. For that purpose we need action. We need a positive program of constructive policies, instead of the Tory leftovers in the speech from the throne.

At this time I can give only some part of the program that we are going to put forward, and I will leave other parts to be filled in by my colleagues during this debate, if indeed the debate goes on.

Mr. Fulton: It has not started yet.

Mr. Pearson: What we need first and foremost is action for employment. How can we in Canada create the jobs that will give the unemployed a fresh start? How can we provide for the growing number of young people who are leaving our schools and colleges? How can we provide for them the opportunities they ought to have and deserve? How do we get more jobs, better jobs, secure jobs?

For these purposes there are three main steps that a Liberal government will take. We put these forward before, but in those days with the massive majority opposite no attention whatever was paid to them. They were not even debated. They were howled down when they were not ignored. First, we must have more construction, and this has some bearing on tight money. This means, of course, that our construction industry must not be strangled by the present tight money. We must provide Canadian capital for the work that needs to be done, and the biggest area of construction that is being starved today falls within the responsibility of the municipal governments. They cannot borrow at reasonable interest rates and the burden of the municipal taxes is already very heavy indeed. In other words, municipalities cannot pay for the great amount of construction and development work that needs to be done, and it surely makes every kind of economic sense to do the work rather than to have people unemployed, not producing and having to be supported without earning.

New streets, new bridges, new sidewalks, storm sewers and sewage systems, expanded water supplies, new housing, urban redevelopment—all these things need to be done and must be done. They call for an intensive effort by all Canadians and with every level of government in Canada cooperating. The contribution of the Liberal party in a Liberal program to meet this challenge is a national plan for municipal development. It will be carried out, of course, by agreement and in co-operation with the provinces, with the three levels of government working together to promote sound development where it is needed, where Canadians live and where they need jobs.

For that purpose, Mr. Speaker, we will set up, in consultation and agreement with the provinces and municipalities, a municipal loan fund. A municipality will be able to come to the fund for projects which it cannot finance at reasonable rates in today's tight money market. This is nothing new on our side. We have been putting this forward for five years and perhaps now the people on the other side will pay some attention. Of course, it will have to be done in co-operation with the provinces and the approval of the provinces will be required, but provided it does have that approval this is something that can be done and should be done. I appeal to the Prime Minister and the government to forget their past ignoring of this particular problem and to do something to co-operate in putting this kind of thing into effect. It seems to me it is more important to put men to work in the municipalities in construction jobs with federal help—and I state this to the Prime Minister—than it is to rake up the old coals of Suez.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: That will help a lot, Mr. Speaker, but it will not do everything. I know hon. gentlemen opposite are having a hard time taking all this in.

Mr. Winkler: A hard time taking it seriously.

Mr. Pearson: Here is another measure that perhaps may appeal to them, although they seem to jeer at these proposals to put people to work. Having made such a colossal failure of their own proposals in the past they do not take easily to proposals made by anybody else that might succeed if everybody would co-operate to make them succeed.

Through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation we would provide capital grants with an extension of the federal share of expenditures for slum clearance and urban renewal. For important development projects, especially in areas particularly needing new development, we will supplement municipal loans with federal grants.

Mr. Sevigny: Where have you been all these years?

Mr. Pearson: I have been watching this government for the last few years do none of these things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: You were sleeping.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Rip van Winkle.

Mr. Pearson: The best proof of that fact, Mr. Speaker, is the figures I gave recently about unemployment. If they were so successful in these projects, why is it we have all this unemployment?

Mr. Ricard: Seven hundred more people working now than in your time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: Seven hundred thousand more people working now than in your time.

Mr. Pearson: If they jeer at these proposals now because they have been so successful in creating opportunities to work, I wonder if they noticed in the press this morning a report of experts in Washington on unemployment statistics in the seven leading western industrial countries. Who was at the top of the list in terms of unemployment? Canada.

An hon. Member: Don't gloat over it.

Mr. Pearson: That is the record of this government.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: That was in 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question?

Mr. Ricard: He is afraid of questions.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would appreciate the co-operation of hon. members in taking their seats when I am on my feet, so that I can say what I have to say. I have been having some trouble hearing the debate in the last few moments. Unless the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition is prepared to yield the floor to the Minister of Justice then the Minister of Justice should not pursue his attempt to make an interrogation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I assure you I would not have pursued it if the Leader of the Opposition had not indicated—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that he was prepared to allow me to ask a question. Hon. members opposite were making such a howling noise that you could not hear the Leader of the Opposition indicate that he would accept a question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If there have been interjections that have not been too acceptable on either side, it has been very difficult for the Chair to hear them even with the use of a hearing aid. Accordingly I give the floor to the Leader of the Opposition and he can yield it to the Minister of Justice if he so desires.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister has a question I will be very glad indeed to hear it.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the Leader of the Opposition indicate what period these statistics to which he referred cover, because I happen to know they were not recent ones?

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to do that. The report was for the year 1960, a year during which this government was in power.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Two years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the year of the great recovery.

Mr. Pearson: That was the year of the minister's great recovery. That was the year when unemployment was going to go with the snow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Give us up to date figures now.

Mr. Pearson: The figures to which I have referred covered Canada and other countries and the Canadian figure was 7 per cent. The next highest, the United States, was 5.6 per cent. That was 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will you give us 1962 now?

Mr. Pearson: The minister will correct me if I am wrong but I believe the 1961 unemployment figure in Canada was higher than 7 per cent. I think it was 7.2 per cent, so perhaps the minister had better stick to 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will you give us up to date figures? Give us 1962.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Justice says, what about 1962? We are still in 1962 and by the end of 1962 the minister probably will not be around to ask for them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More evasion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, these are the important measures which, if put into effect, could do something to cure this economic evil of unemployment. What it adds up to is this: We will make it possible for the municipalities to have a massive increase in construction. We know this is going to cost money but, Mr. Speaker, it will be an investment expenditure by the government, an investment which will more than pay for itself in increased employment and incomes for Canadians. Half a billion dollars of construction means the equivalent of a year's work, I am informed, for 100,000 men, and their employment in turn would mean stimulation for a great deal of other businesses.

Well, that is part of our plan for more jobs, for better places for Canadians to live and work. Our point No. 2 is the promotion of new industries. Now, the government has talked a lot about that in the last five years, what they were going to do to promote new industries. However, they have talked more than they have acted. We need new industries, especially in the depressed areas, and to achieve that purpose we will have to use, to a greater extent than we have before, the industrial development bank to provide special credit facilities for those areas. I know, Mr. Speaker, that this is in the speech from the throne. However, this kind of thing has been in the speech from the throne for the last four years. The government puts it in the speech, then they do not do anything about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is untrue.

Mr. Pearson: We have to work with industry on a co-operative basis. The government has to gain knowledge of the conditions of each industry in order to work out arrangements to achieve this objective. One instance, and perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) will be interested in this, is the automobile industry. Last year we imported $300 million worth of automobile parts into this country. This represents the equivalent of between 40,000 and 50,000 jobs. Is it really impossible, Mr. Speaker, to produce more thoroughly Canadian cars? Can we afford to allow this situation to continue? Can we not do what other countries have done?

An hon. Member: Raise tariffs.

Mr. Pearson: It is not a question of raising tariffs at all; that is the only thing that occurs to my friends.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read your own report.

Mr. Pearson: Sweden, which is smaller than we are, has a successful automobile industry, and has an industry which is exporting automobiles to this country. Is that due to Swedish tariffs? Even the French and German industries have a domestic market which is not larger than ours. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in this country we have enough initiative and intelligence, enough co-operative effort with industry left to bring about that kind of situation in Canada. By going through our whole economy, industry by industry, we can get more things made in Canada without becoming a protectionist country. If the government wants to know how this can be done in Canada perhaps, let them not only read the Bladen report, let them do something about the Bladen report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Three years old.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, it is about three years old.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the shelf, dusty.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Liberals have come out for a big increase in tariffs tonight.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) says it can only be done by increasing tariffs, and that shows how reactionary and backward-looking he is. He is living in the nineteenth century. He thinks that these things can only be done in a protectionist economy, but that is not the way it has to be done; that is the not the way it would be done under a Liberal government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How would it be done?

Mr. Pearson: It could be done by tax incentives; it could be done by a sensible financial policy; it could be done by a sound fiscal policy; it could be done by a government making capital available in a co-operative enterprise with industry; it could be done in a dozen ways without raising tariffs. If the minister does not know anything about that—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You do not.

Mr. Pearson: —perhaps that is why he was moved into the ministry of justice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the third point—we have talked about jobs, about industry, about municipal development—is training. Before I say anything about this, and my hon. friends opposite are going to be surprised by this, I want to pay my tribute to what has been done by the government in the field of technical training. However, a great deal more needs to be done than has been done. The thing modern industry increasingly requires is skilled workers. I am sure the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) knows this; that is where the jobs are. It is, even more, where the jobs will be. For this purpose we have to invest more money in human resources. I cannot think of any other way by which we can get a better return from our investment. This means more and better vocational training. I have already paid my tribute to what has been done by the government in this field, and I do not think I need to repeat it. It means better vocational training for young people beginning work and also for the unemployed who need a fresh start, new skills. Perhaps most important of all, we need training for people who are now doing jobs that will decline in the changing years ahead. There should be a retraining program for these workers before, not after, unemployment.

We in the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, are determined to establish a vigorous agency for job training which will work with industry and with the provinces, which will provide Canadians of all ages with the opportunity to obtain skills for better jobs. While this is important, it has to be backed up by improvement in the opportunities for basic education that the rising generation of Canadians deserve and can achieve. I know this remains a function of the provinces. No federal government would desire to do anything which would interfere with that responsibility. However, helping the individual to take advantage of education is the concern of all Canadians. Far too many of our boys and girls are leaving school at 16 and drifting into aimless occupations, and many of them should remain at school to go on to university.

Mr. Monteith: We did something about it.

Mr. Pearson: You have not done nearly enough about it. I will tell you something more you can do about it, but you won't be given a chance. Family allowances should be extended from age 16 to age 21 for all of those boys and girls who are continuing their education. Our program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I know my hon. friends opposite object to this. They show it by their attitude. They will have no part of it. They do not believe in family allowances for this purpose, obviously, or they would not take this attitude. At one time they did not believe in family allowances at all.

We have already provided, Mr. Speaker, for a system of university scholarships and university loans which will enable every boy and girl in this country to get a university education if he or she can qualify for it, irrespective of his or her financial position. Well, that is one aspect and only one aspect of the Liberal program for growth, for jobs, for progress and for development.

Mr. Fulton: You are advocating bigger deficits or higher taxes.

Mr. Pearson: As I have said, this program will cost money but it will be an investment expenditure which it will be desirable to make. When this kind of expenditure is made and our economy is moving forward, then we can take further steps in the direction of social progress. There are two things specifically we can do under conditions of expanding economy, and which a Liberal government will do. The first is health care and the problems of old age, health care which has been so ignored by the government opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the best laugh yet.

Mr. Winkler: That is a good one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If I could have the floor for just a moment, and although I know the Leader of the Opposition is fully capable of looking after himself, I wish to point out that there is a murmur of conversation coming to me from around the chamber and this makes it impossible to hear the interjections. I would ask hon. members for their co-operation in allowing the Leader of the Opposition to conclude.

Mr. Fulton: It is a very boring speech, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: If you do not hear them, Mr. Speaker, I do, and they indicate quite an agitation in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have just said that in the field of health care they have done practically nothing in the past five years. They have referred this very important matter of health care to a royal commission, and this is what they always do when they are up against any problem.

In health care we have a clear objective. We know what we are going to do, and what we will be able to do before very long. We must make sure that every Canadian family can get good health care when it is needed, without fear of crippling bills. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they take exception to that plan.

Mr. Monteith: Not at all.

Mr. Pearson: Then why did you not do something? Of course, Mr. Speaker, the minister of health well realizes—

Mr. Monteith: The price tag.

Mr. Pearson: I think he is realizing things very acutely tonight.

Mr. Starr: Why did you not implement it since 1919?

Mr. Pearson: I know that the obstacles to such government action are very serious. The obstacles to doing it efficiently, responsibly and fairly, are serious. After the experience of Saskatchewan no one can underestimate the importance of the obstacles, but we have surely advanced to the point where these difficulties must be faced and solved. In the next Liberal government that will be done, and the question will not be referred to another royal commission.

Our plan will provide medical services without charge to children, to old people and to the unemployed. It will make sure that other people, people who are working, can get any medical care they need at a cost they can afford. This, Mr. Speaker, is a responsible, step-by-step plan that must be worked out in co-operation with the provinces and the medical profession. As I said before, for health care the present government offers nothing. It has tried to bury the problem, like so many others, by submitting it to a royal commission.

There is also the progress that should be made in the field of social security, arising out of an expanding and growing economy, and that is towards portable contributory pensions covering everybody.

An hon. Member: That is in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Pearson: There is something in the speech from the throne on it and, as could be expected, there is a reference to discussing it at a provincial conference. The government says it will talk about it with the provinces before discharging its responsibility as a federal government; but a pension plan, as such, does not require any further constitutional amendment. It can be drafted by this parliament if any government would take the responsibility for doing it. There is doubt, of course, about widows and orphans benefits, but that need not hold up the main plan, if the government had one. We could go ahead with what we can do and then work out these other points later.

If the government is really determined that existing private pensions should be made portable, it can effectively secure that result by changes in the income tax administration.

I am sure the time has come when we in this country can, and should have, a national pension plan making an adequate and fully portable pension available, on a contributory basis, to every Canadian. That is the Liberal plan which we have worked out in detail and which a new Liberal government will be ready to carry out.

Those, as I see them and as my party sees them, are the five main lines of action we need in Canada today: construction, new industry, training, health, contributory pensions. Those are the main points of a program for Canada, a program which we have put forward and which we will put forward again, and those are the standards by which a party will be judged in the days and weeks ahead. Those are the standards by which this government stands condemned. It offers now, as it provided before, bumbling indecision instead of a plan; palliatives instead of resolute action; restriction instead of expansion, confusion instead of progress.

There is only one very unimportant reference to international affairs in the speech from the throne. There is no indication of any kind regarding the real seriousness of the international situation. There is a reference to Berlin, and that is about all. There is no indication of how things are really going in the world. True, there is some mention of disarmament, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs keeps working away at disarmament, going up to New York and to Geneva, and then back again. We wish him well and applaud his efforts and his sincerity, but in the speech from the throne there is practically no indication of what is going on in the world and of the dangers in which we live. There is, of course, a reference to our own position, and it is:

> Canada has continued to play an increasingly effective role in international affairs.

If that means that Canada is a country held in high regard for the achievements of its people in peace and war, for its promise of great progress under good government, for what it has done in the past and what it is going to do in the future, then that is good, but, Mr. Speaker, do not confuse it as a reference to the Canadian government. If the government tries to tell us that it has continued to play an increasingly effective role in international affairs, then I would ask it to present the evidence in support of that.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: There is nothing in the speech from the throne about defence policy, but one would expect that from a government which has no defence policy, and which is spending millions of dollars in ways that really do not add to our defence at all. What we should have had years ago, and what we fought for in this house, is a defence committee on policy where we could try to find out the principles upon which the government is acting in defence matters. We have never been able to do that, but when a Liberal government takes over that will be done. The defence policy will be examined by a committee in the House of Commons in the way it should be examined, in a way it has not been examined since this government took office.

There are other things required for a program of national advancement but, before we can put programs of the kind I have indicated into effect, there must be a re-awareness on the part of government of the needs of the people and the necessity of relating policies to those needs and those feelings. There must be an end to financial mismanagement and a beginning of efficient public administration of our affairs. I do not know if that can begin in the Senate. There must be a tightening of our belts, we are told, but it must be a tightening of the belt by the best method, which is an expansion of the body economic. The purpose of the Liberal policy is to provide for that expansion with increased production and incomes. Government social measures which are necessary can be paid for out of that expansion. That is the only way in which these payments can safely be made.

I know that government intervention these days is increasingly necessary in our huge and complicated society of concentrations of bigness and power; I know that government must intervene more and more in order to protect the individual. But the object of that intervention must always be protection against those forces which would limit the freedom of the individual and would not itself limit that freedom.

Government should not be a prop. Government should provide the conditions where a man does not need a prop, but can stand on his own feet. Government cannot do everything, and the feeling that it can, and that it should, is one of the greatest threats to our freedom today. That feeling can weaken; it can even destroy our self-reliance, individual and national, by obscuring the necessity for individual and national effort, individual and national service, individual and national sacrifice. If that necessity is not accepted and met by the individual and by the nation, then we are not going to be able to solve our problems as a democracy, however good the programs we may put forward as a government.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this effort, service and sacrifice must be directed to maintaining and strengthening moral values in our society as well as in seeking material progress. If that is not the case, then no government policies, however wise in themselves or however wisely administered, will save us. The challenge in a democracy is ultimately and always to the people, because it is they who have the power and the responsibility, including the choice of those to whom, in parliament and in government, they delegate so much of that power and responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been encouraging to have found in the speech from the throne some expression of these basic problems; some understanding of these new, deep-seated and massive problems that confront us individually, nationally and internationally. But there was nothing of that in this speech. There was nothing about the real state of the nation; nothing about the test that it now faces within its boundaries and within the world; nothing of the necessity of the right responses to the challenges that are ahead. Instead, Mr. Speaker, this speech gave all the indications of a last minute and scrambling search for anything that might be lying around anywhere to stuff the Christmas stocking. Stuffing the Christmas stocking is not good enough for 1962.

In short, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this speech or in the conduct of the government since June 18 that gives us any reason to hope or think that the dreary or confused record of the last five years would be improved if this minority government continued in office.

We have heard a good deal in recent weeks—a good deal more in recent days—of the necessity of putting the national interest above the playing of politics. That talk does not come very convincingly, to me at least, from those whose concern to avoid an appeal to the people could preserve a state of political weakness and uncertainty such as we have in this parliament today.

I do not believe we will get progressive action and efficient administration, wise, forward-looking, sound policies from a weak and discredited minority government which in the throne speech has shown, as its record has proven, how little it could do to meet the real needs of the Canadian people, the real needs which it does not even understand.

The alternative, Mr. Speaker, is a government with a plan of action of the kind I have indicated and which will be filled in later by my colleagues; a plan which is based upon the principles I have mentioned.

Some people in this house have been building up hopes of a change of heart in the present government. The third and fourth parties seem to be looking for some justification for supporting this minority government, for voting for the ministers and the policies that a few months ago they were very strongly condemning—quite as strongly as we were. I feel that in this respect the throne speech has let them down badly. It is not little, but it is certainly limping and late.

It is going to be very difficult, surely, to find any evidence of real change in the dish of Tory leftovers that the throne speech provides; a change that will mean policies that will put the unemployed to work. This is a speech which includes so much of last year's budget speech of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming); which includes so much of the last election campaign pronouncements of the government, which were repudiated by the people on June 18; which has added two or three new boards and commissions, including a national economic committee on development. That is a proposal we put forward first in this house in 1958 and subsequently, and it was rejected by the government. It was torn to pieces by the minister of labour in one speech, when he argued that this kind of thing was no good.

Mr. Benidickson: Socialist.

Mr. Pearson: He said it was socialist. Of course, I admit that is new; it is new to the government, but not to us. We have been pleading for this for four years.

Also, in the throne speech there is a paragraph that represents one of the most amazing conversions in modern political history, which provides for the arrangements for the export of power from British Columbia to the United States. That, I admit also, is new. But apart from a few things like this and a board or commission here or there, this speech is a rehash of last year's budget and the last election campaign statements. I do not know how anyone can get any hope of a change in the heart and mind of the government from that kind of speech from the throne.

Early this year the government produced another throne speech. Hon. members ought to read it. They will find a lot of this one in it. In those days, Mr. Speaker, this government had a very massive majority in this house, but they got very little done before they dissolved parliament.

An hon. Member: You were the reason.

Mr. Pearson: The reason they gave for not getting very much done was that they had been obstructed by a minority.

Mr. Chevrier: Forty nine people.

Mr. Pearson: They had 204 and I think we had 49 or 50; but we prevented them doing the things they meant to do. Now they have 116 and the combined opposition is 140 or 150; but they feel sure they can do the things now that they could not do with that great majority. They say, "It is easy now we are in a minority". Obstruction will not matter now. It does not matter that they can be outvoted. They did not do very much to implement the last throne speech, and I do not think we can have very much confidence in the present one.

The third and fourth parties said: we must wait and see; we must wait and see what the government has to propose in the speech from the throne. It may be, they said, it will have some promise of action in it such as would entitle us to declare confidence in this government. Well, they have waited and they have seen, and they have seen what I believed they would see and what I suspect they knew themselves they would see. They have seen a government which is incapable of important new initiative—a government incapable of undertaking new projects; a government pressed by so many conflicting interests that it takes refuge in indecision. Oh, it will do a bit more of some things and a bit less of others, set up councils and repeat the same old stuff. But what is there in this program, in the speech from the throne, which answers the criticisms made by all the opposition parties of this government, criticisms which were on June 18 supported by 63 per cent of the electorate? This program, I repeat, is made up of Tory leftovers from the last parliament.

If you had no confidence in the government in the last parliament, how can you have any confidence in this government now? Is this a parliamentary situation to make you change your minds? Is this a program to make you change your minds? I do not envy any member of the opposition who has to go to the country to explain why he has now decided that this government which he so recently criticized so strongly has suddenly become a government which should be kept in office. Surely, no one who understands our national problems could vote confidence in this government. The financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, an unimpeachable authority, wrote on August 29—this was after the election:

> The government's credits of domestic and international good will are alike just exhausted. It will have to be very convincing in both the scope of its programs and in its determination to see them through to retain its mandate.

I suggest that this government has been convincing in neither the scope of its programs nor in its determination to see anything through, and I hope I have given enough evidence to show why we on this side have no confidence in this administration and why we feel it is not only our duty but our privilege to move a vote of no confidence so that this house may decide whether it wishes the government to carry on or whether it wishes the people to be given a chance to put into office a government which will know how to carry on.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) that the following be added to the address:

> We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers do not possess the confidence of this house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally at ten minutes to ten it will be difficult to answer the many issues that were covered in that wide ranging speech. Indeed, there were times during the progress of it when I felt that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was in the position of Wellington at Waterloo: "Give me night, give me Blucher". As he watched the clock one could only conclude that his purpose, as was the case this afternoon—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —was to make sure that there would be no opportunity for any answer to be given. And out of that volume of words and that wide range of discussion it is of interest to note that the only reference he made to agriculture was a number of passing allusions to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) in a derogatory way. I saw the Leader of the Opposition on election night, Mr. Speaker, when he believed he was going to be occupying this seat. That is before the western farmer came in. I can well understand his reason for not mentioning agriculture at any time. That is the best evidence that could possibly be given of the fact that under this government the farmers of Canada have at long last received reasonable consideration. I am sure everybody waited in anticipation for the revelation of a program. I have not the time to deal with the various items tonight, but I must say as I read this program that I wonder what he means when he says that there should be a government in office that knows how to carry on.

And what plans did he offer? These are the projects that are to be made by the opposition, the major points. Construction: a national plan to help municipalities undertake a massive increase in useful projects. That, surprisingly enough for him, has been in effect under the winter works program during the last few years. New industry: a series of measures industry by industry to develop new production in Canada. There is not a word as to how. Many of the measures which will come before parliament, those already revealed in the speech from the throne and those which will come later in their proper order in the budget, will be a continuation in regard to such development. In particular, he mentions the manufacture of automobile parts to ensure a thoroughly Canadian automobile industry. I think that there was the voice of Esau. What did the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) do—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Defeated the Tory party, that is what he did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —when he was a minister to achieve this on behalf of the automobile industry? Then there was a major program to help Canadians take full advantage of educational opportunities. In that connection I shall quote the government of the province of Quebec to the effect that such a plan has been in existence in that province which has provided 3,000 jobs. Skills: the only thing in the whole plan to meet the present situation is an increase of family allowances from 16 to 21. Health: how he touched upon this. He has had the experience of Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, that policy as enunciated today by him in this house represents the antithesis of the stand taken by the Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan. I point this out, Mr. Speaker, in the best of good spirits: the promise that in 1919, if they ever got back here, they were going to bring that in.

I have read in advance in the press that a broadside would be launched by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). Do you know what it reminded me of? It reminded me of the boy with a number of firecrackers who joined each one together in a number of packages because they took longer to explode and did not do very much harm. I am going to deal, when the opportunity comes, with some of the statements made by him outside of parliament. There was far greater exhibition of vituperation and virulent abuse outside the house than here in parliament, and I will deal with them at length. With the exception of one or two of those matters, his speech seemed to me to be a warmed over election speech, generated in large measure by frustration. This speech reveals the annoyance which must come to those who have almost had the cup in hand, yet find it dashed to the wayside.

I expected a different speech. But I did find one thing. I did find the tremendous interest which he now takes in third parties. He keeps referring to us as a minority government. I think of the references he made to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) only three or four weeks ago. Possibly he will recall those things. He speaks of us as being a minority, because he says that 63 per cent of the people voted other than for us. For whom did the others vote who did not vote for the Liberal party? Is there a paradox in existence, that if you vote for a third party you are voting against the government but for his opposition?

He talks about minority governments. Here is the record. He says that having 37 per cent of the population for us denies us the right to be the government. Here is the record year by year. In 1921 the Liberal party had 41.5 per cent of the vote. It ruled in this country—and that is the proper expression in the case of that government—for a period of four years. Then he spoke of how Mr. King came before parliament in 1925. He had 40.1 per cent of the vote, and the Conservatives had 46.5 per cent. He said that it was a wonderful thing that they had a fewer number of members in the house than did the Conservative party, by some 11 or 12. And they hung on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FRENCH PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before formally opening this morning's sitting I would ask the house leave to mention the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a delegation of four members of the national assembly of the French Republic.

This delegation, headed by Mr. Bosson, includes Mr. Thorailler, Mr. Douzans and Mr. Collet, secretary of the delegation.

These honourable gentlemen are on a tour of Canada. They have visited industrial plants in Quebec and Ontario. They have visited some of our universities in Quebec. They are also to tour Ottawa.

In addition, being parliamentarians, they are most interested in the proceedings of our own House of Commons. Therefore, I do not think I would be indiscreet if I revealed that I think I noticed them as spectators in various parts of the galleries yesterday.

I am sure I express the general feeling of this assembly in extending to them a most sincere welcome, the more so since the weather in Ottawa is so wonderful at this time of the year. Once again, I wish them a most happy stay in Canada.

(Text):

I would crave the indulgence of the house to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a delegation of four members of the French national assembly. They are members of the foreign affairs commission and have come over on the initiative of the French government to look at Canada, to look at some of our industrial and commercial installations, in fact to look into Canada and, in particular, of course, as parliamentarians they are interested in what goes on in our House of Commons.

I am sure that I speak for all hon. members in wishing them well and extending to them a very cordial welcome.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

GATT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LONG TERM COTTON TEXTILES ARRANGEMENT

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the house that the secretariat of the general agreement on trade and tariffs announced yesterday that a new long term arrangement on cotton textiles has come into force. Besides Canada, countries that have so far agreed to participate are the United States and the United Kingdom, on behalf of Hong Kong as well as itself; the six members of the European economic community; Japan, India, Pakistan, Portugal, Israel and the United Arab Republic. Several other countries are expected to agree to join in the near future.

The long term arrangement, which has five years to run, replaces the short term arrangement under GATT that expired September 30. There are two chief aims: to expand export opportunities for less developed countries that are engaged to a large extent in cotton textile production; to prevent disruptions in the domestic markets of importing countries.

Canada's position as both an important producer and importer of cotton textiles is a special one. This position is recognized in the arrangement. As a result, Canada is not committed to increase its imports of cotton textiles from low cost countries over the next five years. This does not mean that there will be no increases. In a letter to the executive secretary of GATT dated August 25, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) said:

> It is the intention of the government to continue to pursue a policy which, while avoiding disruption of the Canadian market for sensitive textile items, would permit an orderly expansion of the trade in cotton textiles on fair and reasonable terms when warranted by market conditions in Canada.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICE SUPPORT PROGRAM

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to support the price of eggs by a deficiency payment program for the twelve month period from October 1, 1962 to September 30, 1963 at a national average price of 34 cents per dozen to producers for grade A large size eggs. The support price is the same as last year's and is approximately 90.7 per cent of the ten year average.

Payments on claims by any one producer during the support year will be limited to 4,000 dozen grade A extra large size, grade A large size, and grade A medium size eggs. Producers must be registered with the board and have marketed their eggs through registered grading stations, or have sold their eggs to retail outlets as producer-graders to be eligible to claim for any deficiency payment which may be made.

Final returns are not yet available for the 1961-62 support year, but it is estimated that the national weighted average market price for the full twelve months will be approximately 33 cents per dozen, or 1 cent less than the support price. I expect to be able to announce the exact amount of the deficiency payment to producers very shortly.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask new members of the house to familiarize themselves with the stabilization act so that the producers of eggs in their areas may be made aware of this support price for the coming year.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is another one of those routine announcements that in actual practice may not mean very much. There have been very few instances when a deficiency payment has been made on eggs, even though the price of eggs in many parts of Canada has been below the stated support price and has been most unsatisfactory.

There are two things that need to be done in order to make this policy effective. The first is to declare that deficiency payments will be made on a quarterly basis so that the accounting will be done every three months. Second, they should be made on a regional basis in order that the producers across this country might have some real support, which is not provided in the announcement which has just been made.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to hear clearly at this end of the house; in fact we are most uncomfortable on occasions. Nevertheless I am always interested in hearing the Minister of Agriculture make a routine announcement sound like a blessing from the government in power.

I can speak from experience when I say that poultry producers in the southeastern portion of British Columbia, the only ones with whose situation I am familiar, have been very concerned about falling prices in recent months. I hope this announcement will mean some improvement in their situation, but I am sure it does not meet the needs of those who are looking to the government for stronger action than this.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

INTERPRETATION ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION, WITH CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-48, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Explain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this bill, which is lengthy, is to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act. It will be the first general revision and consolidation of this act to be undertaken since confederation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-49, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Mr. McIlraith: Explain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this short bill is to extend for another year a measure which has been introduced in previous sessions respecting fishing agreements.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN NOVA SCOTIA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide for salaries for two additional judges of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, including one chief justice, and for one additional judge of the court of appeal for British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

ADMIRALTY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT PAYMENTS TO JUDGE AND REGISTRAR

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to amend the Admiralty Act to permit the governor in council to authorize the payment of a salary not exceeding four hundred dollars per annum to a surrogate judge and not exceeding three hundred dollars per annum to a registrar.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

AUSTERITY PROGRAM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister how he can reconcile the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Justice in Toronto that "Canadians should not expect an early end of the emergency austerity measures adopted on June 24" with the earlier announcement that the austerity program was only of a very temporary character.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the words in question; therefore there is no reconciliation involved.

[Later:]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think I should, on a question of privilege, make reference to the question asked earlier today by the Leader of the Opposition based on a remark attributed to me in a speech in Toronto yesterday. The expressions he used in his alleged reference, Mr. Speaker, do not bear any resemblance to the language that I used in this speech yesterday. In that speech I did use this sentence—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the minister indicate his point of privilege so that I can judge whether privilege is involved at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is because the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, purported to base a question to the Prime Minister on a statement attributed to me in a speech in Toronto yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As reported in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As reported—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the Globe and Mail, your favourite newspaper.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition did not specify what he was quoting from or where the report was contained. The point of privilege is that the report as he has given it to the house includes terms that I have not used. They do not bear any resemblance to what I said yesterday.

Mr. Chevrier: Another misquotation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My speech is a matter of record—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is one speaker at the moment. If the minister is making a correction to words attributed to him, it is my view that he can do so succinctly and simply, and to the point—and this is purely hypothetical—for instance by pointing out that words attributed to him were not said by him. We must then accept what the minister says. Beyond that I think we should not go, because we should not get ourselves into an interminable wrangle on fine points in this regard.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I respectfully rise on the point of order raised by Your Honour as to whether there was a question of privilege. This point should be settled before the minister is allowed to proceed.

It is a well known rule of this house that a question of privilege must be raised immediately the point arises and not after the minister has had an hour for reflection. I suggest that the same rule should be applied to the minister as I trust Your Honour intends to apply from now on to all hon. members. A question of privilege is either taken up immediately or not at all.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that in the circumstances the point is well taken. The minister has indicated the general nature of his position, and I think we will leave the point at that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has said—

Mr. Speaker: I think I have indicated quite clearly what my ruling would be on this question. I heard the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The minister had indicated that he did not agree with the words attributed to him. I do not believe it would lead to any clarification, or improve the business of this house, if we were to begin a miniature debate now on the orders of the day.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question? Has he seen the report of his speech in the Montreal Gazette and does he say it is an inaccurate report, especially as contained in the first paragraph?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I have not seen it.

Mr. Speaker: The question seemed to be directed to the wrong minister but I think it would be to the same end, the danger of which I have pointed out. It would merely encourage a debate on orders of the day. We are now in a full-fledged debate. If there are matters to which the hon. member wishes to advert, no doubt he will be addressing the house in the near future and I think that would be the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question should have been addressed to the Minister of Justice and I suggest, with great respect, if Your Honour would listen to me—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will draw this matter to a conclusion.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister in order to clear up some confusion which exists among members as a result of some exchanges across the floor yesterday. If we want to ask questions about finance with respect to the former parliament, do we now ask the Minister of Finance the questions or the Minister of Justice?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLES IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister authorized the articles on defence by the chief of the staff secretariat, Department of National Defence, now appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the articles referred to are by a Dr. Sutherland, who is actually an employee of the defence research board and was incorrectly reported as being the chief of the secretariat of the chiefs of staff committee. I believe it was something along that line.

These articles which are appearing in the Globe and Mail are summaries of a long article written by Dr. Sutherland for, I think, the foreign affairs society's quarterly, or something along that line.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. How does the minister justify the policy of having departmental employees write articles of this nature when he does not give the department authority to prepare a white paper for consideration by the people's elected representatives?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Trinity the true nature of supplementary questions.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. A. Brewin (Greenwood): May I address a question to the Prime Minister. Does the answer which he gave to a question on March 5 last, that there was then no intention of entering into discussions, referred to by the United States secretary of state, for the joint control of nuclear weapons for Canadian armed forces still stand, or have there been any such discussions to date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think at the appropriate time the whole question regarding nuclear weapons, and the discussions concerned in connection therewith can be taken up. It is impossible to answer a question such as that on orders of the day.

BOMARC BASES—INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONAL DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. M. Drury (St. Antoine-Westmount): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The government has recently announced completion of the construction of the Bomarc bases north of here. Would the minister say when these bases, on which construction is now completed, will become operational?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The base at La Macaza, as a matter of fact, will be taken over by the R.C.A.F. some time later this month. Some time after it has been taken over it will then be in the same state of operational readiness as the station at North Bay.

Mr. Drury: I have a supplementary question. The minister stated that the base at La Macaza will be in the same state of operational readiness as that at North Bay. Does "operational readiness," the term used by the minister, mean that these bases will be in a position to fight?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think this is the time to go into the various states of operational readiness.

ST. JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—ENLARGEMENT OF COURSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Can he tell us if, this year, the St. Jean Military College will give a full course to the cadet officers?

Mr. Speaker: Once again, may I ask the hon. members to show some co-operation and to have such questions put on the order paper?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I submit that my question is an urgent one in view of the fact that the course given at the St. Jean Military College is scheduled to begin this month, and if I am not informed of the situation now, it will be too late tomorrow to seek information.

Mr. Pigeon: Why was such a course not set up when you were in office?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there have been no changes made in the course given at St. Jean Military College. However, that course is under constant revision because we wish to give the cadets the best possible education.

Mr. Dupuis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the house whether such a complete course will be set before the impending fall of this government?

Mr. Balcer: Twenty five years from now.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to draw the hon. member's attention to the remarks I made concerning relevant supplementary questions.

TRADE

LUMBER—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I want to ask him whether he and his department are rendering any assistance to the forest industry of British Columbia in its representations before the United States tariff commission in respect of the import of Canadian lumber into the United States.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Let me assure the members of the house that my department co-operates fully at all times with all sectors of Canadian industry whose interests may be affected by hearings undertaken by the United States tariff commission.

As you will be aware, the hearings on lumber open today in Washington. Specifically they are with respect to the effect of softwood lumber imports into the United States on the United States domestic softwood lumber industry. These hearings provide an opportunity for private Canadian industry to make their views and interests known to the United States administration. We have in this connection been in close contact with and extended all the facilities of my department both in Ottawa and in Washington to assist the British Columbia forest industries in the preparation of their submission. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am much impressed by the case of the British Columbia forest industries and the manner in which they have gone about preparing it.

Finally, I think the house will be interested to learn that this government has left the United States government in no doubt as to the importance we attach to the maintenance of Canadian softwood lumber exports to the United States, which are currently running at the rate of approximately $250 million a year.

RUSSIA-CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Having regard to the dispatch of Mr. Robert Moon of the Regina Leader Post, who has spent three weeks in Russia, and the reports that in Russia they are considering a renewal of the Canada-Soviet trade treaty, what information can the minister give the house?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the report to which the hon. member refers. I would like to examine it, and I shall give an answer tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CEMENT—IMPORT OF CARGO FROM CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. As today's Montreal Gazette has reported that a cargo of cement, imported from Cuba, is now tied up in the port of Montreal waiting for a clearance, could the minister advise the house whether this importation has been authorized due to a shortage of cement in this country?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take the question as notice.

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FURTHER SALE TO POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, may I have the permission of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has asked for unanimous consent to revert to motions. Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton: I express my thanks to the house, because this helps me out in a business way.

I am pleased to announce the conclusion of a further contract between the Canadian wheat board and the Polish foreign trade company, Rolimpex, covering the sale of 80,000 tons or 2.9 million bushels of wheat for delivery from St. Lawrence or lakehead ports before the close of navigation. This is in addition to the recent sales contract with Poland for 300,000 tons of wheat—11 million bushels—which I announced on August 30, and it forms a part of the optional arrangement made at that time for the purchase and sale of a further 200,000 tons of wheat.

The new sale was facilitated by the credit insurance facilities arranged last month by the Canadian government, providing for terms of 10 per cent cash and one third of the balance after 24, 30 and 36 months respectively.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Any success which may attend the efforts of the Canadian wheat board and/or the government to increase the sale of wheat is very much in order at this time in view of the bumper crop. However, along with the announcement the minister has made this morning I would hope he intends to go forward on the lines of the statement he made some weeks ago, when he said he intended to visit Poland, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia with the object of increasing sales of Canadian wheat in those countries to a much greater extent, and also over a much longer period of time.

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION OF ONTARIO—QUEBEC BOUNDARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I should like to give an answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Stormont.

A definition of the Ontario-Quebec boundary on lake St. Francis can be found in the statutes and, as every one knows, that demarcation comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces concerned.

I understand that negotiations have been going on for some time between the two provinces concerned and that no definite agreement has been reached as yet, although both parties have expressed their wish to settle the matter as soon as possible.

My predecessor, the Hon. Paul Comtois, contacted both parties on several occasions, offering them the services of the department I am now heading to define that boundary as soon as an agreement is reached.

I can assure my hon. friend that my department continues to offer its co-operation in that respect.

[Later:]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

At what university did the minister learn the good plain French in which he answered the questions addressed to him in English by the member for Stormont even though the latter represents a constituency where 68 per cent of the people are French-speaking?

Some hon. Members: Order, Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: That is the mark of a small mind.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that comments on the manner and the language in which replies are given are not allowed in this house.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I believe my question should be directed to the Prime Minister, and it is this. Can the government at this time indicate when a Canadian centennial commission and commissioner will be established so as to provide the leadership required in the organization of our national celebration?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member the consideration whether the question he wishes to ask is urgent in that is it necessary to have the information immediately. There will be opportunity to get it at a later date and, as a matter of fact, I suggest that the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister. It deals with the matter of our centenary activities. I wonder whether the attention of the Prime Minister has been drawn to an article in this morning's Globe and Mail reiterating statements by a Mr. Robbins L. Elliott, chairman of the program research committee of the Canadian centenary council, to the effect that it is not possible to proceed with its plans until the necessary machinery has been established by government, and making the accusation that the federal government is lagging on its plans for our celebration. If so, would the Prime Minister care to comment on that matter?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the observation I made with regard to the previous question on this general subject would apply also to this question.

Mr. Howard: That I put the question on the order paper?

An hon. Member: That is right.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL COUNSELLOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Are we to conclude that the withdrawal of the Canadian commercial counsellor in Cuba means a change at least in some aspects of our relationships with Cuba? In that event, would this situation be due to representations made by the United States to Canada and her NATO partners?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the government's policy toward Cuba. In recent months there has been a great falling off in the amount of goods purchased from Canada by Cuba presumably because of the difficulty in obtaining foreign exchange. It was felt that there is no longer any necessity to have this particular official stationed in Havana.

AIRPORTS

LAKEHEAD—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED EXPANSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry that I did not furnish him with notice. Can the minister indicate to the house whether a start on the proposed expansion of the lakehead airport will be made this fall?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be obliged to check with the department.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PERMISSIBLE EARNINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. Antoine Belanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he tell us if the government is considering improving the Unemployment Insurance Act in such a way as to increase the income which those who are entitled to the benefits may earn?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker. We are awaiting the report of the Gill commission. When that report is in the hands of the government careful study will have to be given to it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Minister of Labour tell us if it is not a fact that the chairman has indicated he hopes to have a report in time to permit the government to give consideration to this matter before Christmas?

Mr. Starr: I think I answered a question directed to me a few days ago about when we expect to receive a report.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NEWFOUNDLAND-LABRADOR—EDUCATION OF INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the government any plans to give the same measure of financial support to the education and welfare of the Indians and Eskimos of Newfoundland-Labrador that is given in other parts of Canada?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In view of the fact that this question involves the Department of Citizenship and Immigration as well as my department, I think the hon. member would get a more helpful answer if he were to place the question on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the minister to allow the house to examine the annual report of the Canadian National Railways before the house proceeds with motion No. 8 on the order paper under government business, which introduces a resolution relating to Canadian National Railways and its financing?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the order of business has been announced for the next eight days and this particular motion cannot come before the house before the expiry of that time, I do not think there is any urgency with regard to the information sought by the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: There are a number of organizations including pensioners of Canadian National Railways, who wish to know well ahead of time if the annual report is up for review because, like last year, they want to have witnesses at the hearing. For that reason I should like to pin down, if possible, some kind of date for the appearance of the president of Canadian National Railways in Ottawa.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to have a committee on the Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines sit at this session. So far as the date of the sitting is concerned, it is too early for me to tell. In so far as the motion is concerned, the date upon which we will proceed with that will be announced by the house leader at the proper time.

FINANCE

ISSUE OF BILINGUAL CHEQUES TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could he explain his department's delay in issuing bilingual cheques to members of this house?

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question under consideration and give an answer in due course.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POLIOMYELITIS—CONTINUATION OF USE OF SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether, in view of the disappointment and confusion caused by the minister's directive to postpone the free mass immunization against poliomyelitis with oral Sabin vaccine, he has any intention of giving a directive for the continuation of the free mass immunization against poliomyelitis with Salk vaccine at the earliest possible moment?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite misleading to suggest that the Canadian people lack the utmost protection against polio that we can provide. As I indicated when the Sabin vaccine program was temporarily deferred last month, the incidence of this disease is extremely low at the moment. My advisory committee in this field recommended that the Salk vaccine program continue, and felt that Sabin vaccine could well be used if the need arose through any local outbreaks of polio. This approach was felt by the committee to be the soundest one to follow under present circumstances.

REPORTED APPROVAL OF UNSAFE LIFE JACKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been informed of the coroner's jury's statement of last month in Toronto, that the federal Department of Transport approves life jackets which are not safe?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member knows that his question is not of the type asked on orders of the day.

VANCOUVER—SUSPECTED CASE OF SMALLPOX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I apologize for not having communicated this question to him; however, I have just received this information from the west coast.

In view of the fact that a Colombo plan student has just arrived in Vancouver to attend university and is now a suspected carrier of smallpox, what measures will the department take in order to trace the other pasengers aboard the Canadian Pacific Airlines airplane in this case in order to protect the rest of the Canadian community from the spread of this dreaded disease?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a Colombo plan student at the University of British Columbia, aged 26 years, reported to the dermatological clinic in Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, yesterday morning, October 1, and was diagnosed as a suspected case of smallpox. He had come to Canada from Bangkok by way of Hong Kong and Tokyo on a Canadian Pacific Airlines flight which arrived in Vancouver on September 21, 1962. While language difficulties have presented a considerable barrier, it is understood that he has not felt ill but complained only of a few skin lesions for which he sought treatment. Specimens from the patient are now on their way to the laboratory of hygiene here in Ottawa, where it will take several days to obtain a result. The patient is presently isolated and under treatment.

Reports indicate that he possessed a valid certificate of revaccination dated in Bangkok August 26, 1962. Also there was evidence of previous primary vaccination reported to have been carried out during childhood. Modified smallpox must, however, be considered as a possibility.

Over 700 students at the University of British Columbia have already been vaccinated and efforts are being made to trace passengers who arrived on the same flight. All passengers and crew members are reported to have had valid certificates of vaccination, but a recheck will be made in all cases which can be traced. Passengers are reported to have been destined to widespread areas of Canada and the United States.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, could I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How about letting the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Davis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am informed, perhaps wrongly, that it is possible to purchase vaccination certificates for as little as $1.50 from air line crews and United States troops in the Orient. Is this true?

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a supplementary question. If the hon. member for Essex East has a supplementary question I will give him the floor.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a somewhat supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What steps is the minister's department taking to protect Canadian women who have been sent to Ceylon under the Colombo plan?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally I was very disturbed to read these reports. Our high commissioner in Ceylon will do everything he can to help these young ladies.

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister when the government expects to receive the report of the commission on medical health services appointed about two years ago.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a recent report on that matter. I will secure the information for the hon. gentleman.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY REVIEW FOR CERTAIN CLASSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Lamoureux (Stormont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the cyclical pay reviews for civil servants approved earlier this year by the then minister of finance provided for consideration on October 1, 1962, of the customs, immigration and postal classes, will the minister inform the house whether the proposed review will now be undertaken in spite of the austerity program?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Stormont—

Mr. Byrne: And the member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Knowles: —and I hope the hon. member for Kootenay East will not spoil my chances of getting an answer. Will there be an early statement by the government on its conversations or correspondence with the civil service organizations regarding the whole question of the pay increases that were deferred in June?

Mr. Nowlan: As the hon. member knows, there have been some conversations carried on between representatives of the various civil service organizations and a committee of my colleagues chaired by myself. I had further discussions with the civil service representatives the other morning but some of them had to depart because of annual meetings they had to attend. We shall be conducting further talks when they return.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC CITY—ELIMINATION OF LEVEL CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Beaule (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell us if negotiations have been entered upon in regard to the elimination of railway crossings in Quebec city, particularly those of the C.P.R.?

Mr. Speaker: I regret to intervene again, but I hope the hon. member did understand the remarks I addressed to him the other day in regard to questions of this nature. His question is certainly one that should be put on the order paper.

(Text):

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SONS OF FREEDOM, B.C.—STEPS TO MAINTAIN LAW AND ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. In view of press reports that 1,200 Sons of Freedom are again on the move in British Columbia and are now within 35 miles of the Agassiz prison, are any special federal actions being taken for the maintenance of law and order and the protection of law abiding citizens against the dangers of arson and dynamiting by this irresponsible group?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): The maintenance of law and order in this situation is the responsibility of the provincial authorities. I have no reason to think that they will not carry out their duty in this regard.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and at the same time may I wish him success in a portfolio which is so important to the coal miners in Nova Scotia. Will the minister advise the house whether he intends at an early date to make a statement of general policy relating to the Nova Scotia coal industry, a statement which his immediate predecessor promised before the dissolution of parliament last April?

Hon. Paul Martineau (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I thank the hon. member for his good wishes, and wish to inform him that a statement of policy will be made in due course, in conformity with the usual practice in this house.

HIGHWAYS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—ALTERNATE ROUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Does the government intend to designate some present highways as alternates to the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should know that this is not the type of question we ask on orders of the day.

PUBLICATIONS

FORT WILLIAM—SALE OF NEWSPAPER TO THOMSON ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether any government action is under consideration to determine if the very recent purchase by the Thomson newspaper organization of the Fort William Times Journal is contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): The director of research investigation under the act informs me that he is aware of this matter and is looking into it.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF U.S. PLANE—POSSIBLE FAULTY FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister seen the report from Antwerp to the effect that one possible cause of the tragic ditching of the United States air liner in mid-Atlantic last week might have been faulty gasoline? If so, is an investigation under way to determine whether or not any part of the trouble is attributable to fuel supplied in Canada?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The accident in question is at present being investigated by the civil aeronautics board of the United States of America, with the full co-operation of the Department of Transport regional staff at Moncton and Gander. Fuel samples have been taken for analysis as a part of the current investigation, but no results of the analysis are yet known. So far as the report from Antwerp is concerned, it has not been seen by myself or anybody in my department.

CANADAIR—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PRODUCTION TO OFFSET LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production.

In view of the seriousness and urgency of the situation caused by mass lay-offs at Canadair, would the minister consider taking the necessary steps without delay so that Canadair production of CL-44s or of any other aircraft required by the air force may be stepped up.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I am very much interested in increasing the CL-44 production and I can assure you that it will be done as soon as we find a market for this aircraft.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

For the same reasons I gave the Minister of Defence Production, could the Minister of Transport get in touch with the management of Trans-Canada Air Lines in order that this company, which is spending our money, may buy its aircraft not from the United States or from England but in Canada, and more particularly from Canadair?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am constantly in touch with the management of Trans-Canada Air Lines. You may rest assured that the government's representations to Trans-Canada Air Lines are to the effect that this company should proceed to the most thorough and detailed study of the situation in order to buy in Canada all aircraft parts or products it can find here.

As for the final decision as to the technical possibilities of one aircraft compared with another, such a decision must be taken by technicians. The reason why Trans-Canada Air Lines has purchased aircraft in the United States or in England was based entirely on technical requirements. That decision was taken by technicians, but the government has always urged Trans-Canada Air Lines to consider the possibility of purchasing Canadian products before making any decision.

QUEBEC ARSENALS—REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Defence Production inform the house of the reasons for dismissing many employees of the Quebec arsenal in the last few weeks, and tell us how long this policy of dismissal—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I trust that the hon. member will recognize that his question is entirely out of order, and should instead be placed on the order paper.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The question put by the hon. member for Quebec South is identical in every respect to the one put to the Minister of Defence Production, because it concerns people who were dismissed just a few weeks ago. Under the circumstances it seems to me that the question is quite in order, and I would ask you to allow it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Maybe I gave myself too much leeway in interpreting the first question. However I think it appropriate to put an end to such questions and I hope there will be no more needless delay and that those questions, from now on, will be put on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDIZATION POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister be good enough to inform the house whether the government is continuing subsidizing farmers in the production of butter.

Mr. Speaker: This question is definitely out of order at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask him when we might have before us a report of the restrictive trade practices commission regarding the activities of certain pharmaceutical houses.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will amplify to me the reference he has made, I will be glad to deal further with his inquiry.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister when the government expects to receive—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member's question a true supplementary?

Mr. Howard: Yes, indeed; not a bootlegged one. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is a reply to the question posed to me by the Minister of Justice, to identify the report. It is the report of the restrictive trade practices commission into the pricing policies—and I use their words—of certain pharmaceutical houses with respect to, notably antibiotics and tranquilizers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the restrictive trade practices commission has made considerable progress toward completion of its complicated task in this case, but I have as yet received no indication as to when the report will be made. The hon. member will realize, of course, that this work has necessarily been pursued concurrently with that in other inquiries, including for example those with respect to which four reports were tabled at the beginning of this session.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER, N.B.—REPORTED UNSATISFACTORY SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to a question the hon. member for Skeena asked last Friday, September 28, concerning the Dorchester penitentiary.

My response to his question, which is found at page 18 of Hansard, is that inspections of this institution in recent months by the commissioner of penitentiaries and other members of the staff of the penitentiaries service have not indicated any inmate unrest of a serious nature. A very recent report from the warden confirms that the general situation at Dorchester penitentiary is satisfactory. That statement, of course, must be interpreted having regard to a general condition of overcrowding that obtains in all the maximum security institutions.

Concerning the need for additional security officers, I may say that four new appointments to the staff were authorized on September 28, bringing the total custodial establishment to 110.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—REDUCTION OF SERVICE DURING WINTER MONTHS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): On Friday last the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked a question concerning train service in Newfoundland. In reply to his inquiry, I have checked my files and find that up to now no representations have been received in my office in this connection from chambers of commerce or other groups.

In the meantime I have been in touch with the management of the Canadian National Railways and am advised that the reduction during the winter months is simply an adjustment designed to bring the service provided in line with the demand for it during that period, and is similar to action being taken in various parts of the country.

NATURAL RESOURCES

LAND AND WATER USE PROGRAM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would care to comment on a story by Walter Gray in today's Globe and Mail that much to his chagrin the government's legislative program did not include a national land and water use program.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is surely aware that the orders of the day are not a period during which members may demonstrate that they are up on their daily newspapers. In addition, I doubt whether this actually comes within the ministerial responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fisher: When a minister has expressed himself to a newspaper reporter—the words are "much to the chagrin of agriculture minister Alvin Hamilton"—I should like to put a proposition to you in terms of relevancy, Mr. Speaker. If a minister has, within the last few days, expressed to a reporter chagrin at the government's legislative program, what are we to do but ask him a question about it?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I rise on a question of privilege. I have never expressed chagrin to any person, now or in the past, on this subject.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, October 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Last evening at the time of the adjournment I was dealing with the question of minority governments on which the Leader of the Opposition placed so much emphasis. So that the record might be a true one I thought it proper that I place on Hansard the various occasions when in Canada, under a Liberal government, there was a minority vote of the people of Canada. In 1921, as I said, the Liberal party had 41.5 per cent; in 1925, 40.1 per cent; in 1935, 43.9 per cent; in 1945, 41.4 per cent. In 1957 we had a minority vote of 39 per cent and in the same year the Liberal party had 42.3 per cent.

In 1958 the Liberal party fell to 33.7 per cent, the lowest percentage in all its history over a period of 90 years. When the hon. gentleman talks about the resurgence of Liberalism in Canada, may I point out that in this election the Liberal party went above that level by approximately 3.6 per cent, and outside of 1958 had the lowest percentage in the history of the Liberal party since 1887. That to me is an answer to the resurgence of which he speaks; the record has also to speak.

I was very much interested in what he had to say regarding the making of appointments on the part of a minority government. I point out that in 1957 there was no complaint in that connection. He referred to what the late prime minister of Canada, Mr. King, did in 1925. It is well to recollect that in 1925 the Liberal party was a minority of minorities. It was in this position; it fell in membership from 118 to 101, the Conservatives more than doubled their membership from 50 to 116, and 24 Progressives were elected. According to my understanding of history—that is, until it was revised by one who at the moment is going to remain unidentified—Mr. King went to Lord Byng and said that he wanted to stay in office until parliament met, even though he had a minority, with 15 seats less than the Conservatives. Lord Byng said he would allow him to stay provided that he made no appointments. That was the difference in the situation then and now, and in no way does that occasion and what took place then assist the official opposition in the argument that they have advanced.

I am not going into the incidents of 1925.

Mr. Pickersgill: For obvious reasons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Eugene Forsey did that. Also, if the hon. gentleman wants to look at the record, I would suggest that he read the letters of the late Senator Murphy, a former member of Mr. King's administration, in which he dealt with that period and the circumstances connected with Mr. King's dissertation to his government.

Mr. Speaker, I started off last evening without performing a function that is part and parcel of the application of the amenities of parliament. It is one thing about which I am able to agree with the Leader of the Opposition, and that is the expression of congratulations to the hon. member for Waterloo South and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. I doubt whether there is a more trying, but at the same time more thrilling, experience than to be either the mover or the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It has always been the same through the years. Everyone making his maiden speech in parliament goes through an experience that is almost beyond description.

Both these hon. members, however, spoke in a manner befitting the honour that was directed to them and their constituencies. The mover, as the Leader of the Opposition said so well, has a great tradition of service before him. In the succession from father to son, we have the example of a highly respected businessman accepting responsibility and sacrifice for service in public affairs. Yet another example of that is in an appointment to the cabinet; one of the leading businessmen in this country who, in order to serve, has had to make tremendous sacrifices. These things represent the epitome of good citizenship. I congratulate the mover.

As far as the seconder is concerned, I need only say to him that he spoke with power and capacity and with an unusual ability in both languages. I heard both these hon. gentlemen speaking during the recent elections, and I can say to them that as the result of their presentations and the ability they displayed, they were honoured in this way.

I want also to say to many of the new members—things did not turn out just exactly as I had hoped; apparently the Leader of the Opposition and I are in agreement there—that the greatness of parliament depends on bringing into this institution men and women of capacity and ability. While we have been here for only a couple of days, I must say that those new members in all parts of the house who have come here have shown a capacity and ability that I know will provide a great sense of dignity and capacity in carrying out the responsibilities that will rest upon this parliament.

In lighter vein, may I say that while the Leader of the Opposition moved a vote of non-confidence, his near seatmate, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), displayed this morning his views as to the outcome when he said that the Gill report will be available to this government for implementation shortly before Christmas.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am a very bad prophet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That, Mr. Speaker, is the finest admission he has ever made. He has been a bad prophet all the way along. This time, however, he speaks from the heart.

Now, sir, I was tremendously interested too in the appeal to the members of third parties in the house and in the fine solicitude which was displayed by the Leader of the Opposition. I would point out, as I pointed out last evening, the references made to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) by the Leader of the Opposition a few weeks ago. I would also refer to a speech that the Leader of the Opposition made at Sorel, Quebec, when he showed that he intends not only to run his own party but that he wants to direct and run other opposition parties. This is what he said. I am reading from a translation, at page 4, of his speech at Sorel. It is an extremely interesting statement which he made:

> An opposition member, therefore, cannot vote confidence in the present government without being a traitor to the mandate.

That was one of the statements he made. I simply point out that contempt of parliament has had few equals to that statement. He then goes on to say many things to which I will refer. Then he states what happens to the third parties for which he has such great solicitude if he succeeds in a vote of non-confidence. This is found at page 5.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister what he is reading from?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from a document issued by the cabinet du chef de l'opposition. In that document he states.

> What will this new election be like?

Mr. Pearson: I was asking the Prime Minister what he was reading from when he said he was reading from a French translation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from the French translation, yes; I have the French here and I am able to translate it with a great deal more effectiveness and correctness than is the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister has just said he was reading from a French translation made in my office. That is not true. He is reading from his own translation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has been carrying on a very interesting campaign—and I am happy that he has done so—in this cooling off period, as he has made more statements that have been beneficial to the government than any member of the government has been able to make. To continue the quotation:

> What will this new election be like? It will be as those others which have preceded it, a fight especially between the Liberal party and the Conservative party.

For the New Democratic party he has these welcome words:

> In the last election the N.D.P. was definitely chased out of Saskatchewan and has only temporarily supplanted Social Credit in British Columbia. As for the Social Credit upswing, this did not spread beyond the frontiers of Quebec.

Then he goes on to say this:

> In this decisive battle between the Liberal party and the Conservative party, we do not fear the verdict.

Then he goes on to say it will be a battle between the Liberal and Conservative parties. I simply point out that the powers of prophecy are not restricted to the hon. member for Essex East.

During the election campaign the Leader of the Opposition made many statements. I do not intend to go into those statements. I do not intend to refight the election. However, I am going to point out that the expenditures he promised would amount to over $1 billion per annum additional to those already provided for—

Mr. Pearson: Rubbish.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —$1,300 million in other odds and ends—

Mr. Pearson: Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —without considering that the latter would have increased income taxes in Canada by 40 per cent to 50 per cent.

Mr. Pearson: That is another untrue statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yesterday he came along and added a further group of promised expenditures. The promises he made last evening would add to the annual expenditure of Canada by well on to a billion dollars. Then he speaks about the financial difficulties of Canada and what would be done by the Liberal party to meet them. Included in those undertakings he entered into last evening was the bringing in of health insurance at a cost of approximately $400 million per annum.

These things indicate that there is no sense of responsibility on the part of the official opposition. In addition to the health scheme he says he intends to provide the municipalities with all they want, in effect, aside from the fact that the municipalities are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. To comply with the requests of the municipalities would add to the expenditure one half billion dollars per year. I ask this question. Is it responsible or is it what one would expect from the Leader of the Opposition for him to be endeavouring to bring about expenditures at this time, to cramp the economy instead of doing everything possible to put that economy in higher and higher gear?

He objects to parliament having been called on September 27. Let me say this. One of the statements he made during the election campaign was this, and I have his exact words:

I want to tell you that if we are successful at the polls there will be an autumn session of parliament.

We have accommodated him in that connection.

Mr. Pearson: You were successful; that is the difference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I sat and listened with amusement yesterday. If the hon. member has any observations to make, let him put them in the form of questions. Before parliament opened he announced that he was going to vote against us no matter what our program would be. Is that the attitude of a responsible opposition? It is interesting to note that five or six of the ideas advanced by the Liberal party and discussed by the Liberal party during the years are in the speech from the throne. We do not mind. They give us ideas. That is parliament. However, when we bring them out, when we bring them into being, then those who brought them before parliament—and that is the purpose of parliament —are going to vote against us. Here is their program announced in London, Ontario, on May 20:

Domestic production of many goods now imported to reduce adverse trade balances.

In the speech from the throne there is action on that matter.

Elimination of inefficient production in Canadian industry . . . through possibly tax incentive.

We have provided for that as we did in the previous budget but the legislation was not passed.

Canadian industry should be offered tax incentives for increasing export sales.

We did that in the budget last spring. This enunciation of what the Liberal party stood for, I should point out, was made after these various matters were brought out in the budget.

Reduction of and eventual elimination of budgetary deficits.

We have made our declaration in that connection. We have taken a forward step in reducing controllable expenditure. Now, when we do this, they are going to vote against us. In addition to that, they are going to have a larger budgetary deficit in the event they are able to carry into effect the policies which were enunciated yesterday.

Finally there is the revision of the tax system. We set up a royal commission in that connection, which has been requested for years, to investigate the whole situation, the ramifications of taxation, in order to ascertain to what degree there can be amelioration and, where anomalies exist, to attempt to remove them. They speak of royal commissions. I think the person who should secure the highest degree of appreciation for his conviction in this regard is the hon. member for Essex East. He spoke of the number of royal commissions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Government by royal commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad he said that because the government of which he was a member from 1951 to 1957 appointed one more royal commission than we have.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The point struck home; that is apparent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am simply pointing out these facts in order to deal with the whole problem that is before us, and also in order to deal with some of the statements that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition in the last few months. I am going to say to him at once that I am not going to put these statements on Hansard, these personal attacks. I could answer them, but I am not going to get down in the gutter with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: That is where you have been for years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say to the Leader of the Opposition that it has been a concerted effort on the part of the Liberal party and was declared to be such by one of them. It was stated that everything would be done in order to personally attack me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They know it is a fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give the hon. gentleman the information. I think he is the one, himself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the right hon. gentleman know of anyone—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the right hon. gentleman know of anyone who was more personally abused—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —than the way the minister of finance abused the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member for Essex East should proceed with a question unless the Prime Minister yields the floor. He knows this is the rule of the house, and I did not see the Prime Minister yield the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to state this, that criticism is essential in the democratic process, but the organized deluge of defamation and adjectival abuse that has been heaped upon the government of this country and myself as leader has never been equalled in the history of Canada. I am going to place the record here. Yesterday, as I listened to the Leader of the Opposition, I had to compliment him for his restraint in not saying inside the house, when he is face to face, what he said outside when all that he faced was Liberal supporters. I want to compliment him on that. Never before has there been the equal in vehemence and virulence displayed in public affairs in this country. I realize that in the heat of debate we often say things about one another we wish we had not said. But, sir, when speeches are prepared in advance and handed out by the Leader of the Opposition in Toronto and also in Sorel, I say to him—

Mr. Pearson: Put them on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to spoil the record with that.

Mr. Pearson: What a phony attitude. Repeat them; put them on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that I have touched a tender spot. They show a disregard for the accepted amenities of political controversy. I point out also, and I am just doing it so there will be no misunderstanding, that in 1921 when Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was abroad at a conference equivalent to the prime ministers' conference, Mr. King disagreed with the stand that was being taken. However, he had that appreciation of the amenities that he said nothing until Mr. Meighen returned. Mr. Meighen followed the same course during an occasion when Mr. King was abroad; for after all the prime minister represents the people of Canada. If there is disagreement with that policy one expects criticism, but one does not expect a continuation of the kind of policy that the Leader of the Opposition and those associated with him have followed, of personally attacking.

As a matter of fact I should thank him, because I have had lots of correspondence from people who have said, "I cannot understand Mr. Pearson; I never knew he would engage in the kind of thing in which he has engaged since the last election."

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition on a point of order.

Mr. Pearson: The point of order is that the Prime Minister has accused me of making a personal statement of criticism and vilification; and using other adjectives, in connection with these statements made outside the house. I ask the Prime Minister to substantiate that allegation by putting this statement on the record inside the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am too old for that. When defamation takes place, do you repeat the defamation against yourself?

Mr. Pearson: Put up or shut up.

Mr. Harkness: That is in character.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am suggesting the Leader of the Opposition apparently secured his idea of free speech from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and indirectly from the premier of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, since the Prime Minister has chosen to draw me into this matter. My question of privilege is that I take no exception at all to the personal attack the Prime Minister has just made on me and my reputation.

Mr. Bell (St. John-Albert): What reputation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If you only knew how funny you are.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it was a personal attack.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and I do it now because, in accordance with our rules, I must raise it at the earliest possible time after the event in question. That is why I am doing it now because now I have the documents in my hand, and I could not raise it before that.

The Prime Minister, a few moments ago, said that in a speech at Sorel I made the statement that anyone in the other parties who voted against a no confidence motion would be a traitor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not.

Mr. Pearson: These are the words the Prime Minister used.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Traitor to the mandate; that is what I said.

Mr. Chevrier: You stopped at the word "traitor".

Mr. Fulton: He said "traitor to the mandate".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think we should hear the Leader of the Opposition out on the point of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister used this word "traitor" and he stopped there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said "traitor to the mandate".

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear the Prime Minister's comment on the point of privilege, if he wishes.

Mr. Pearson: I am making my point of privilege at this time since I had not got the text before. I have now got it in French and English. The Prime Minister used the word "traitor" without anything after it. I noted it and now I have the right to the floor; and especially in view of what the Prime Minister is saying about being careful and fair and accurate, I should now put on the record the text in French and English, in our translation, to show exactly what I said at that time. That is my question of privilege and I have the right to do that. Here is what I said, to remove the charge that I said that any members of other parties who voted against our no confidence motion were traitors.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not know whether the Leader of the Opposition was yielding the floor or not, but I noted at the time that I saw the Prime Minister rising and I presumed he was rising to comment on the point of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Exactly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: I can only say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can only hear one speaker at a time. If the Prime Minister is speaking to the point of privilege before the comments or corrections are put on the record by the Leader of the Opposition, I shall hear him.

Mr. Chevrier: The Leader of the Opposition has not completed his point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no question whatever about what I said. The opposition members will have—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been unable to hear sufficiently what the Prime Minister is about to say in order to give the floor to the hon. member for Essex East on a point of order. Now, if he will permit me to hear the Prime Minister, just to a point where I can make a decision as to whether or not the floor should be allowed to him, I shall be happy to do so. I presume the Prime Minister is speaking to the point of privilege, and I think I should hear him sufficiently to come to a satisfactory and fair judgment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, with great respect—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was simply going to point out—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the opposition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am going to hear the Prime Minister. As I pointed out to the hon. member for Essex East, I shall be very happy to give him the floor if he rises on a point of order as the Prime Minister proceeds.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the words I used are these; these are the words and the translation:

Opposition members therefore cannot vote confidence in the present government without being traitors—

Mr. Pearson: Traitors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —"to the mandate".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all. You stopped there.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Benidickson: Absolute deceit. They want to change Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point at issue, I think, will be determined when the blue sheet of Hansard come to the members.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I heard it clearly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If I may finish my sentence—when they come before the house and later, of course, in the publication that is issued tomorrow. In the meantime is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pearson: I am quite willing to let this matter be determined by the blue sheets of Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And I heard him use the words, plainly heard him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I want to give the floor now, if I may, to the Prime Minister so that he can resume his address.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I repeat that I said "a traitor to the mandate," and the record will speak. If hon. gentlemen did not hear it—

Mr. Benidickson: We will trust Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I intended during the course of my remarks to nail down and throw back in the face of the Leader of the Opposition his unprincipled suggestion that I withheld facts regarding Canada's problems. When I said that Canada was in an economic upsurge I take it that his stand is that a foreign exchange emergency cannot arise in the midst of an economic upsurge. I also intend to prove that I not only did not conceal facts from the Canadian people but I placed before them the facts as they were.

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You did, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You concealed the facts from the people of Canada.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a false statement, utterly false.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I must be irritating some parts of the anatomy of the opposition. I want to say that all of this is part of a deliberate policy, to use the Leader of the Opposition's own words in one speech—

Mr. Pickersgill: What speech?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall produce the speech; there are so many of them—that we need no longer discredit him. I do not mind criticism but, sir, all through the campaign there was ridicule poured on the fact that I have not an Anglo Saxon name. Their advertising used the first two syllables of my name in ridicule, and I finally found where they got my dog, Happy, into it. That was about the last touch.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely you are not in the class of Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Harkness: Try and restrain yourself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And Roosevelt was a great president.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to tell the hon. gentleman opposite that I am not going to classify him because he would be awfully mad if I did.

Now then, I shall first therefore deal in part with the economic situation as it was and as it has developed since the election. Then I am going to refer to the experience of Canada in 1947, when we had an exchange crisis, and the explanation that was given at that time. Then I shall place before the house in general the economic plan that we have for the next five years. Some of it has been set out in the speech from the throne. Parts of it cannot be dealt with or referred to until a budget has been brought in.

In passing, may I say that this policy of ridiculing Canada or the leadership in Canada did not prevent the Leader of the Opposition yesterday from casting scorn upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding Canada's position internationally. I do not know why he would do that. Wherever I go there is no jealousy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is regarded as one who has given leadership all over the world on behalf of that one thing we are all striving for, without regard to party considerations, namely disarmament and an ending of this arms race that can only lead to catastrophe unless it is stopped.

The Leader of the Opposition did not speak at any length in regard to external affairs. I am just going to outline generally our views and particularly answer those allegations that were made respecting any action on my part to delude the Canadian people. I welcome the opportunity of meeting those allegations.

I also intend to cover one or two other matters and I will leave it to my colleagues to deal particularly with subjects other than those to which I refer during the course of this debate.

In the last two or three years all of us have had the experience of the attitude of the opposition ridiculing Canada's economy and downgrading Canada; in preaching ruin. So often I have pointed out that if continued long enough that type of criticism can only result in loss of national confidence with a corresponding loss to the national economy.

I am now going to refer to some of the changes that have taken place. When I hear the Leader of the Opposition speaking of how terrible conditions are in Canada and how economically we have fallen behind, I pick up a few recent issues of newspapers and magazines. Mr. D. L. Morrell of the chamber of commerce says in his annual report that business in Canada has "moved out of the mild recession of 1960-61 and now is well along in the subsequent period of recovery."

I see an article in the Toronto Star which says:

> The small guy's bank keeps growing.

That is dealing with the expansion of the industrial development bank. In the September 29 issue of the Montreal Gazette, in connection with employment:

> Employment should improve during the fourth quarter, according to the results of the 20th quarterly survey of Manpower Services Ltd.
> Of 630 firms polled, 15 per cent said they would be adding staff. Of 500 firms polled last September, only four per cent said they would be adding staff.
> The employment prospect appeared to be brightest in Vancouver, one of the ten cities in which the survey was conducted.

So it goes on. Then we have Maclean's magazine. It is not regarded as one of our major friends, particularly since the editorial of June 27, 1957 which pointed out that the St. Laurent government had been returned. This is what Maclean's magazine says:

> Forecast: Fine for Canada.
> Pulp and paper contributes more to the economy than any other industry... Prosperity and the standard of living in Canada largely depend on the well-being of this one industry.

Then there is the Toronto Globe and Mail of September 27, 1962, where Fraser Robertson writes:

> Thaw taking place in the winter of discontent. It is just one man's opinion, but it does seem to me that the winter of discontent is beginning to lift from the Canadian industrial scene. And again it is only one man's opinion, but it also seems to me that if Canadian industrialists today are indeed beginning to pay more attention to opportunities than to difficulties, much of the credit should go to trade minister George Hees.

Then he says:

> These remarks are based upon a growing number of speeches delivered at meetings of businessmen, and observation of a growing number of examples of Canadian success in penetrating foreign markets. A capsule example may be seen in the recent speeches of the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Carl A. Pollock...
> As president of the C.M.A., Mr. Pollock is duty bound to enunciate its basic policies in his public speeches and this involves, to be sure, advocacy of a degree of protection as well as relief from high taxation—

We have equitable taxation under this government.

The Windsor daily Star of September 8, 1962 says:

> Canada car output up.

While the Leader of the Opposition speaks of measures to assist the car industry, I find that shipments increased by 32.1 per cent. This article says:

> Factory shipments of Canadian made motor vehicles jumped 32.1 per cent in the January-July period this year—

And so on. The Ottawa Citizen of September 13, 1962—which newspaper has never been noted as one of our friends—refers to "A brighter unemployment picture". The Montreal Star and Herald of September 10, 1962, had this to say:

> Wholesale sales favourable.
> Wholesale trade in Canada this year has given a very encouraging performance. In June (latest figures reported) there was an increase of $55 million in dollar volume of sales of Canadian wholesalers to $880 million from $825 million in the like month of last year, a rise of 6.6 per cent.

Then the Montreal Gazette of September 17, 1962 says:

> Canadian firms' dividends at record for nine months.
> Dividend payments by Canadian companies are at an all-time high.

The Toronto Globe and Mail of September 14, 1962, in an article written by Leslie Wilson, says:

> The statistics show good performance in trade and industrial production. Some of the figures are open to conflicting interpretations, but a number of economists argue that they show the Canadian economy is rolling along, and that our net performance is better than that of the United States, and will continue to be so.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. This morning in his statement the Prime Minister quoted from what he claimed to be an English translation issued from my office of a speech which I made in French in Sorel. Quoting from that translation he used certain words; the exact words will appear in Hansard. The word "traitor" appeared, whether followed by other words or not. But the Prime Minister said he was quoting from a translation issued by my office. Mr. Speaker, there was no translation issued from my office of this speech which I made in French, and to make this matter clear I put on record what I said on this question in the French speech which was the only text issued of the speech I made.

(Translation):

So a member of the opposition could not give a vote of confidence to the present government without being a traitor to the mandate he has just received from the people.

(Text):

The Prime Minister also said this morning that out of jealousy I made a personal attack on the Secretary of State for External Affairs last evening. My only reference to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—and I am quoting from Hansard—was:

—the Secretary of State for External Affairs keeps working away at disarmament, going up to New York and to Geneva and then back again. We wish him well and applaud his efforts and his sincerity.

This is presumably the idea of a personal attack held by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course, those were not questions of privilege at all. As far as the latter quotation is concerned, it does not cover the statement which was made regarding Canada's position, and in so far as the earlier question is concerned, the blues reveal that the words used included the word "mandate".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They did not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the blues say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not what you said.

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is what he said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nobody in the gallery of the House of Commons, but if there were, in the press gallery, there would be members of the press gallery who had the exact words, including "mandate" after I spoke.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And I heard the words plainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the first time I have ever heard the blues challenged when they included a word. Sometimes there is a word excluded because it is not heard, but this time hon. gentlemen opposite are really sore put, and I can fully understand their feelings in this regard. They have my deepest sympathy.

I was dealing at the time of the adjournment with the argument being advanced so generally that Canada is dying politically and economically, that we ought to get the economy rolling. I was referring to some articles which have appeared in the last few days. I referred to an article which appeared in the Toronto daily Star on September 17. The heading is "Its Opponents Sniping but 'Small Guys' Bank Keeps Growing". This is what it says:

The industrial development bank, long one of the least noticed of government agencies, is heading for another record year—and a lot of attention.

The I.D.B. had an 84 per cent increase in loans last year. This year there probably will be another increase of about 50 per cent jumping the total from 740 loans in 1960 to 2,000 in 1962.

The article goes on to say that there has been a "snowball effect". The I.D.B. has expanded its offices and, by act of parliament, has had its area of operations expanded enormously.

Then, when they are speaking about how bad things are in Canada, hon. gentlemen opposite might do well to bear in mind an article written by Aaron Einfrank under a United Nations dateline. This is dated September 17, and appeared in the Toronto Telegram.

The international monetary fund has given Canada a clean, glowing bill of economic health in the fund's annual report on the state of the world's economy.

But as the IMF annual meeting opened in Washington today, managing director Per Jacobsson cautioned that additional permanent measures will be needed for Canadian economic stability in the future.

"I hope Canada's emergency program is not too successful" Jacobsson smilingly told Canadians after a press conference, "or they will think a long term program is not needed."

Then on September 14 the following appeared in the Globe and Mail. The heading reads "Bank's Review Notes Upsurge in Production".

Upward forces in the Canadian economy have moderated, the Bank of Nova Scotia says in its monthly review. There are also uncertainties in major export markets, it says.

However—

During the past 18 months business activity in Canada improved markedly following the 1960-61 recession. Figures so far available suggest that the total volume of production at mid-1962 was running about 9 per cent above the low of the recession and about 6 per cent above the previous peak reached in 1960.

Then the Vancouver Province said:

Economy is booming in B.C., says Bonner. Prosperity pointers up. B.C. has all the makings of a boom year, trade minister Bonner said Friday. If we can maintain the trend in the face of a national tendency the other way, then our economy has come of age.

Then it is of interest that Business Week, which has no political connections whatsoever, comes to this conclusion:

> Canada flouts the diagnosis. This has been a year of indignity for the Canadian economy.

I will not make any observation as to who placed the position of indignity on the economy.

> American, European and even Canadian pundits have unrolled even the most dolorous phrases . . . In the first half of the year industrial production rose almost 4½ per cent, a gain that matches that in the U.S. And because the 1960-61 recession was even less severe in Canada than in the U.S., Canada's economic performance over the past 2½ years has been slightly better than the U.S.

It goes on to say:

> At the start of the year Canadian economists were predicting that this country's gross national product would rise 7 per cent in 1962. The current generally accepted forecast is for a GNP of $39.2 billion, up 6 per cent from last year. It therefore looks as though Canada's economic performance will come much closer to matching early year expectations than will that of the U.S.

And I could go on. I do not want to clutter the record, but I think I should mention, in support of a suggestion made earlier today, that the attitude taken by the opposition, more particularly accentuated during the election, was not beneficial to Canadian confidence. In that connection I would read from the Northern Miner of July 26, 1962. It says:

> The late political campaign produced a fine crop of destructively untrue and unjustified allegations designed to swing votes against the government.

I need not indicate the area of the house from which those statements emerged.

> As a matter of fact, it looks as though this smear campaign startled U.S. and European investors in Canada to the point of pulling a lot of money out of this country, creating the sudden exchange crisis. Politically it was effective. There is no doubt that the scare, as interpreted by the general public, has cost the Diefenbaker government a lot of votes and probably a number of seats.

I am not going to go into a lengthy summary of an economic review, but on other occasions it has been stated that when I spoke I had not given any general indication of the economic situation. I am going to leave this to one of my ministers, but I would like to make some general observations in connection therewith.

The Canadian economy has continued to expand throughout 1962, with the advance taking place on a broad front. The Minister of Justice, formerly the minister of finance, dealt with this at some length yesterday and will be dealing with it again. However, I would point out to the house that the six indicators of recovery which were used by President Kennedy in his T.V.-radio address of August 13 are of interest. In connection therewith he compared current levels with those of some one year earlier, and I take those six indicators and place before the house the comparison with Canada. I mentioned the gross national product. It says in Canada the gross national product in the second quarter of 1962 is running at a record level. In real terms it is also in the same position. The seasonally-adjusted index of industrial production reached a record level of 186.8, based on comparison with 1949, with 100 as the basis. In July, 1962 it was 7.7 per cent above the level of one year earlier.

Now in connection with production, steel ingots 10.8 per cent above the level of the first eight months of 1961. Pig iron production up 14.4 per cent over January-August 1961. Lumber was at an all-time high record; the output was 10.8 per cent above the comparable January-July 1961 level.

Mr. Fulton: That was helped by devaluation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is true. I will come to that. I am glad to have that observation, and I will mention devaluation in a moment. A number of important minerals in the first half of the year compared with one year earlier. Iron ore was up 84.8 per cent, nickel 10 per cent, and zinc production up 13.9 per cent; crude petroleum output up 16.2 per cent. With regard to motor vehicles, the number of units produced in the first eight months of 1962 surpassed the total for 1961 by 29.8 per cent. Personal disposable income has risen to a new all-time high this year. Wages and salaries, including military pay and allowances, were running at a record rate, 6.9 per cent over one year ago. Corporation profits before taxes and before dividends paid to non-residents reached a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $3,868 million in the second quarter of the year. This is the highest level ever attained, and exceeded the total for the second quarter of 1961 by 15 per cent.

Let us compare those figures with the United States, because after all we are always told how far behind economically we are, that we should get Canada going, and there is all the doom and gloom. Comparing the gross national product with that of the United States, the seasonally adjusted annual rate was 0.7 percentage points higher. Industrial production was slightly below that of the United States. Canadian unemployment rates showed a drop of 62 per cent between January 1961 and August 1962, almost double the 31.2 per cent decline in the United States. Personal disposable income was 11.1 per cent higher in the second quarter of 1962 than in the first quarter of 1961. The United States increase was 7.8 per cent. With salaries and wages we were slightly behind the United States. With regard to corporate profits, Canadian corporation profits before taxes and after dividends to non-residents were very considerably higher, some 16.5 percentage points higher, than in the United States.

Therefore, sir, I summarize by saying that, measured by the six indicators of recovery, Canada has made greater economic progress since early 1961 than has the United States.

I could go on and read further details in that connection. I should mention the question of trade. I think what has been done by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in that regard has been phenomenal. So far as exports and imports are concerned, total Canadian commodity trade for the first six months of this year was the largest in any year in Canada's history and exceeds the comparable 1961 figure by 13 per cent. Today the export figures are available with regard to July. To bring the matter right up to date:

> Exports again show an encouraging rise to $547 million in July this year against $518 million in 1961. Most significantly perhaps the sharpest increases are occurring in our shipments to the United States which are being maintained at a level of 20 per cent above last year.

A moment ago mention was made of devaluation. In the light of experience since that policy came into effect, I am sure everyone must agree that the course taken by this government in connection with devaluation has been a tremendous boom to our exporters and at the same time has provided basic help to Canadian industry within Canada to produce those things which are needed in Canada and which otherwise would not be produced.

I now come to a subject which was not dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition. I refer to the subject of agriculture. The mid-September forecast of the 1962 production of Canada's principal field crops is highly encouraging. Prices have increased to such an extent that in every part of Canada farmers are receiving more for their production than they could have hoped for a matter of a few years ago. There are some who would say, "Oh, carry me back to 1957". I know what the answer of the farmers would be to that suggestion, as farm cash income from farm operations reached an all time high, namely $2,958½ million, 6.4 per cent above the level of 1960 and $385 million above that of 1957, an increase of 15 per cent.

Mr. Teillet: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mention some farm prices, those of grain, as compared with 1957. For no. 1 northern wheat there is a gain of 35½ cents per bushel, a 21.7 per cent increase; rye, 44¾ cents per bushel; oats, 25¾ cents per bushel; barley, 38⅛ cents per bushel. Prices of cattle and calves have increased approximately 26 per cent during that period of time. Dairy products including milk show a gain of 27 cents per hundredweight or 6.1 per cent, and the price of creamery butterfat is up 11.3 per cent.

Mr. Teillet: Will the Prime Minister now answer a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I finish my sentence the hon. member may ask a question. This is the picture. This is the reason that with studied disregard to one of the major elements in Canada's economy for many hundreds of thousands of people, last evening and yesterday in that marathon effort not one word was said about this subject by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Teillet: Will the Prime Minister define fully for the house what he means by cash income?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say is that I think it defines itself for most hon. members.

I now come to another matter in connection with agriculture. As the house knows, for several years I have advocated a food bank. When I brought this matter before the NATO heads of state in December 1957—I refer to the matter of setting up a NATO food bank—because over the years it has been impossible to secure an international one, I remember that I did not receive much support although a section was incorporated in the communique. Now, largely as a result of Canadian initiative, the matter has come before the general assembly of the United Nations, which has unanimously endorsed the plan. This constitutes an attempt to ease human hunger, and is tangible evidence of the necessary advance that must be made among all nations. Those of us who have must endeavour to raise standards among those who have not, for everywhere in the world communism marches on empty stomachs.

I am glad to see that this action has taken place. In many international forums we advocated this step. On September 5 in New York about 30 other nations joined Canada in pledging 86 per cent of the necessary objective for the experimental period. Canada will provide one third of her pledge to the program in cash. These pledges were made in cash, commodities and transport services.

When I think of the tremendous volume of wheat that was on hand when we came into office and the equally tremendous competition among producing nations to dispose of their wheat, I believe that everywhere across this country people are deeply indebted to the Minister of Agriculture for the effort he has made. It has been an effort in which the government as a whole has co-operated. It has been built on aggressive trade-seeking principles, coupled with the necessary credit being given to prospective debtors who in the past have shown a higher regard for their liabilities.

I still think of the volume of ridicule that was heaped on the government at the time of the announcement of the transaction with mainland China. Opponents said there was nothing to it, that it was ephemeral or nebulous. Well, in consequence of that deal Canada has secured not only a market for a large amount of wheat but a great increase in employment in our port and transportation facilities.

Now, I am not going to deal with the subject of trade in general except to say, as I have already pointed out, that action taken by the Department of Trade and Commerce has been as unique as it has been effective. It has been assisted by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, which is a vital part of Canada's trade promotion program. The corporation operates in two fields, that of export credits insurance and that of long term export financing. The facility of export credits insurance, offered by the corporation, protects Canadian exporters against non-payment by foreign buyers. This insurance is provided on a break-even basis at no cost to the Canadian taxpayer. It would not be available through private enterprise.

During the past 12 months the corporation has insured more than $110 million on a wide range of Canadian produced goods which have been shipped to more than 90 foreign countries. Commitments have been given to Canadian exporters covering a further $100 million. It is hoped that a substantial portion of this business will be finalized during the next few months.

In addition to its insurance business, the corporation administers the government's long term export financing program which was authorized a little more than a year ago under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act. Although the actual financing program has been operating for such a short time, a number of transactions involving heavy capital equipment produced in Canada have been satisfactorily concluded. These orders totalled more than $50 million. Commitments have been given as well to Canadian exporters for substantial additional financing to cover heavy capital equipment exports totalling $75 million. There is a very good possibility that the bulk of this business will come to Canada.

I point this out because in the speech from the throne there are still further measures, which I do not intend to particularize now to expand trade. It is of interest to note that the problem of securing trade and markets is not quite as simple as some of the opposition members would have us believe. I took it upon myself to look back and see what happened during those golden days that are looked back upon without respect. I find that in 1954 Mitchell Sharp, who was a Liberal candidate in Toronto and at that time was associate deputy minister of trade and commerce, spoke on the puzzles of policy when he addressed the Canadian Chamber of Commerce at its annual meeting in Halifax in that year. What did he say? We have been able to get into these markets; we have been able to expand, and we have been able to bring people to Ottawa. We have done these things in order to encourage the expansion of trade. We have not sat down and done nothing. What did he say at that time?

> "Canada is far from getting a fair chance to compete in world markets, and particularly in the United States," he said. "In many respects the cards are stacked against us and we must exert every effort to get a better break, not only for our raw materials and food producers but also for our manufacturers, many of whom could, I am convinced, compete effectively if they were not restricted by foreign tariffs to production for the Canadian market alone.
> "I am frank to admit that I do not know of any sure and certain method for bringing about this much to be desired improvement in commercial relations. If you have an answer which does not involve reductions in markets for our efficient export industries, I shall be glad to hear it and carry it back to Ottawa."

Well, at that time he was a deputy minister. In the cabinet of that day there were some outstanding men, and I look upon the faces of two or three of them now. They did not have the answer then. As a result of the efforts of this government we are able to come before you—I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce will do so in detail—and set forth what we have done. We are asking for a vote of confidence on the measures mentioned in the speech from the throne alone which, if implemented, will bring about a still further expansion in trade.

Now, sir, having merely touched the rim of the subject, leaving it to the minister to particularize, I now come to a matter that received a great deal of attention yesterday from the Leader of the Opposition and which also received quite a bit of attention during the intervening weeks when pronunciamentos were issued from time to time in regard to this problem of our foreign exchange situation. I noticed that he referred to what had been done by us in June as austerity. I have never called it that, but he and those associated with him have referred to it in that term. It is interesting to note that the Victoria daily Times gives the answer to the Leader of the Opposition in this connection. I understand that the head of this paper is a great Liberal protagonist. He says this of austerity:

> Whoever introduced the word "austerity" to Canada did a good service for the crackpots—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

> —a bad disservice for the nation.
> In the first place, the word is quite inaccurate as applied to the policies of the Diefenbaker government. No such thing as "austerity" has been imposed on the Canadian people—yet.
> More important, by calling the government's policies "austerity" the crackpots can make them sound evil, cruel and unnatural.

Bruce Hutchison has spoken well on many occasions.

> Even the great majority of Canadians who are highly prosperous can be made to suspect that they are suffering serious hardships if they are told so often enough.

Those are the first two paragraphs and I recommend them to the edification of the gloomsters sitting opposite. Such words were used yesterday as "catastrophic," and indeed the book of antonyms and synonyms was combed in search of adjectival exaggeration.

I now intend to deal with the question of our exchange position, a position which followed some ten years of development within our country. Deficits in international trade and in other elements have amounted to over $9 billion in that period of time. When I hear the opposition talking about how terrible the conduct of the government was in this connection, and that nothing like it had ever taken place previously in Canada, I wonder whether they expect that the minds of those who sat in this house in 1947 have eradicated the memory of that year.

I recall the speech delivered, I believe from London, by the then prime minister of Canada in which he stated "all is well; multilateral trade has been achieved." He had hardly left the airwaves when Mr. Abbott, the then minister of finance, in effect said "Not yet," and imposed by order in council, for which there was no legal authority, the most drastic measures that had ever been used in connection with the economy of the country. It was the only time a law was ever made in this country by radio. It was in the month of November that these measures were imposed, and the collections continued until March, 1948 before parliament passed the retroactive legislation to legalize them.

They speak to me about respect for parliament. Is it something new? I am sure that nobody who has listened to Mr. Barkway will say that he is completely impressed by this government. On June 30, in the Ottawa Citizen he wrote an article headed Financial Crisis, a Familiar Story:

> Canada is facing one of those financial crises which are only too familiar to the rest of the world, including all the sterling area countries.
> Britain has been through them several times since the war. Once it was driven into a drastic devaluation, and once it averted devaluation only by the most dramatic increase in bank rate that any of us have seen. Australia has been through them. Indeed, the majority of one which Mr. Menzies now commands in the House of Representatives resulted—in common belief—from his government's determination before the election to maintain external stability by restricting domestic expansion.

Then he goes on to deal with the problem, and he points out that it has happened over and over again. Much has been said in that connection, and I think I ought to place on record a list of the countries which have had to adopt remedial measures to deal with balance of payment problems in recent years. It includes the United Kingdom, to which I have already referred, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Israel, Union of South Africa, Peru, Pakistan, Spain, Turkey, United Arab Republic, Yugoslavia, and in 1947, Canada.

I shall not fill the record by what was done by these various countries, but simply point out that this action is not abnormal. The action that we took was within the statutory right of the government to take, and we were not in the position of the government in 1947 when it imposed those drastic measures without any authorization by parliament, or any power to do so.

What about 1947? Have the opposition forgotten the severe depletion of Canada's foreign exchange reserves that made it necessary for the Canadian government to adopt special measures to bolster up foreign exchange and provide for the replacement of official reserves? Since the reserves fell so drastically in both cases, at present and in 1947, it is well to go back and see what happened in 1947 and ascertain from that the position today.

The early post-war period was characterized both by abnormalities in the international background and by the size and strength of Canadian import demands during a period of unprecedented prosperity. In saying that I am accepting at the moment the view of the official opposition in that they always speak of a period of unprecedented prosperity. The international background weakened the Canadian balance of payments position, and we found ourselves getting more and more into the red in our foreign exchange.

A feature of Canada's balance of payments position was a steady decrease in imports from the United States due to a high level of activity in Canada. During the whole period from 1946 to 1948 Canada ran a surplus with the world as a whole, both on merchandise trade and current account. However, the growing trade surplus with the United Kingdom and other overseas countries was mostly financed by loans and did not result in current income in convertible currency which could be used to strengthen the country's trade and reduce the deficit with the United States.

Let us look at the figures at that time. In 1947, according to Mr. King, matters suddenly became serious, when the merchandise trade deficit with the United States rose from $430 million to $890 million in 1947, and the current account deficit from $607 million to $1,134 million. The result was that Canada's reserves of foreign exchange were severely depleted. Have the members of the opposition forgotten about that? Those were the days that they speak of prosperity. Today they would have you believe that when a country is prosperous it cannot have a detrimental balance of payments situation, yet that was not so in 1947. Just remember how suddenly this came about.

On December 31, 1946 our official reserves totalled $1,245 million but by November, 1947, they had fallen to $480 million. In 1962 they fell to $1,100 million but in 1947 they had fallen, as I say, to $480 million. Then, following the introduction of the exchange conservation program, the reserves climbed to $502 million at the end of 1947 and to $998 million by the end of 1948.

They would have the people of Canada believe that I placed before the people of Canada what was not true. They say, "How can it be that a country that you say is prosperous—having employment difficulties, however—and expanding, could at the same time have an international exchange situation arise such as arose in 1962?" The same situation prevailed in 1947 in that regard. In announcing the program the minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, emphasized—and I want to re-emphasize this—that Canada's position was essentially very strong. The immediate need was only to conserve the use of U.S. dollars by limiting spending on U.S. goods, services and pleasure travel until such time as overseas trading partners became strong enough to earn convertible currencies to pay for Canadian exports, the proceeds of which we could use in settlement with the United States.

What was the nature of the program in 1947? It was restrictions on imports. They were of a non-discriminatory nature. They prohibited imports of a variety of consumer goods such as radios, washing machines, furniture; goods already being produced in Canada. They reduced the volume of imports of a variety of other commodities, including some foodstuffs which were placed under quota. The quota system had the effect of reducing imports from the group of countries not known to be short of United States dollars while permitting increases in imports of the same commodities under quota from the dollar scarce countries. Another measure was the application of a special 25 per cent excise tax on a wide range of consumer goods in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this was in 1947. They would have us believe, as they have gone across this country and said since the election, that this government deceived by saying conditions were good, the domestic situation was improving, the economy was on the upsurge. They said it could not have been so, otherwise this foreign exchange position would not have arisen. I give them, as the answer, what took place in 1947. Restrictions upon pleasure travel in United States dollar countries were reimposed. I see how shocked they are because we did in 1962, legally, what they did illegally in 1947. At the same time they provided assistance for Canadian gold producers. Oh, Mr. Speaker, how shocked they are that we had to get loans. This is terrible; this has never happened before. As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition during one of his bedtime story broadcasts, I wondered where he was in 1947.

Arrangements were concluded with the export-import bank in Washington for a line of credit to be available in 1948 in the amount of $300 million U.S., of which in the first half of 1948 Canada utilized $140 million. As a result of the exchange conservation program, imports from the United States declined in 1948 by $154 million from the 1947 total, while exports to the United States increased by $447 million. That is what happened then.

As a result of the action taken, the pressure on Canadian foreign exchange reserves abated; official holdings rose by $496 million between the end of 1947 and 1948 and it was possible in 1948 to begin to relax the import restrictions. That process was continued in 1949. Now when they tell you that is so unusual, I want to point out this fact, that in a period of 12 months from 1947 there was a loss of almost a billion dollars in Canada's reserves of United States currency and gold. A crisis took place. Did they know the crisis was coming? Well, they did not tell us. Mr. King said we were prepared to meet it for a period of several months, but nobody was told anything about it.

What did the 1947 Liberal program mean to business? I remember those days so well, Mr. Speaker. It gave to ministers of the crown and their officials extensive control over most industry of importance in Canada. It gave the government of Canada a life and death power over industry. Businessmen, if there are any who think that the present situation is difficult, should think back to those days; for then the businessman had to show the government that a project was, according to the government's view, in the interests of the national economy, otherwise import permits could not be issued.

What did Mr. Howe say? He said:

> Since our supply of U.S. dollars is limited, it must in effect be rationed.

The situation before the 1947 program was that official holdings of gold and United States dollars was going down, he said, at an alarming rate. We can look at the legislation that was enacted. Certain imports were prohibited, 171 separate tariff items. Schedule II quotas were established for fruits, vegetables, textiles, leather products, soap, cutlery, watches and even coffee, 146 separate items. Then a permit system under the minister of trade and commerce was instituted which provided for capital goods such as machinery, heavy building materials, machine parts and the like, totalling 89 items.

There is the situation in 1947. Yet we are told how unusual is what has taken place recently. Mr. Speaker, as I listen to the Leader of the Opposition spinning his tales of woe I wonder sometimes whether these are gloomy comparisons of a disturbed imagination. Why not face up to the situation? Why endeavour to lead the people of Canada to believe that because we stated during the election campaign that the economy was on the up and up—and it is, and it has continued since the election—these things therefore could not take place? Was it mismanagement—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: You bet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in 1947?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In 1962 it was mismanagement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who created the mess in 1947?

Mr. Hees: The Liberals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let your conscience be your guide, I say to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Pearson: Full employment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman asked me a question I will be glad to give him an answer.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You asked me a question. You do not want an answer.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Churchill: You could not give one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are affected by what happens outside our country. We are affected by the international situation. We are affected by economic conditions in other countries. We brought into effect the pegging of the dollar.

I intend to deal with that for a moment. We fixed the dollar at 92.5 cents U.S.. What we did in that connection has been of substantial help to Canadian exporters and to Canadian producers competing for the home market, as well as to the Canadian tourist industry. I do not intend to quote from anybody's book today, but I am sure the hon. member concerned will know whose book I am thinking of when I point out that he described similar action in this regard and said it would be helpful. The pegging of the dollar brought added stability to the international exchange situation, and the decision to fix it was warmly welcomed by the international monetary fund whose membership comprises representatives of the free world.

Our action in pegging the dollar—oh, how it was ridiculed during the campaign as a means whereby they could describe the kind of dollar—meant that the highest records could be set in exports. That is what we said. That is what turned out to be the case. We said that at the time Canadian exports had reached all time peaks.

I mentioned tourism a moment ago. Let me give the house the figures which resulted from the pegging of the dollar. Hon. members opposite ridiculed it, of course. They said prices would rise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They did rise.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give figures showing how they did rise, not just Essex East statistics.

Here is what Alan Field, the director of the Canadian travel bureau, said in a speech in Montreal:

> I believe that with all the factors presently at work . . . that this year . . . for the first time since 1951, Americans will have spent more in Canada than Canadians have been spending on travel to the United States, and that this Canadian travel industry which last year earned for the Canadian economy more than any other export except newsprint and wheat, will show the surplus on the international balance of payments.

This is what hon. members opposite ridiculed. This is what they said would destroy Canada. They went around and threw out those myriads of documents which they did not dare stand behind; they did not dare place the name on them as having been printed by the Liberal association. They distributed them all over Canada showing how prices were going to rise. I simply point out these facts so that the record may become reasonably clear.

Do I have to say anything more as to the benefits which came as a result of our action in this respect? I could quote various newspapers across Canada. Of course, the farmers benefited—

Mr. Pearson: Before the Prime Minister leaves this interesting part of his speech, will he answer a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pearson: Will the Prime Minister answer the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a point of order or a question of privilege to raise he may do so, or he may seek to ask a question, but I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that it is not permitted for him to gratuitously take the floor. I am sorry I did not hear his first words. If he seeks to ask a question it is up to the speaker who has the floor to decide whether he will answer at the time or not and it is not subject to comment whether the answer is given then or subsequently.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, how can I ask for permission to ask a question without taking the floor?

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the Leader of the Opposition, that he may rise and seek permission to ask a question.

Mr. Pearson: That is what I did.

Mr. Speaker: That is not all that the Leader of the Opposition was saying. I think if he wishes to ask a question and the Prime Minister wishes to answer him, that is perfectly in order.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, the only words I used were "May I ask the Prime Minister a question before he leaves this part of his speech". That was all I said. Surely I am entitled to get on my feet and ask that.

Mr. Speaker: I fully agree with the Leader of the Opposition, but there was quite a bit of side comment.

Mr. Pearson: There certainly was. It was over there.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that one should point to only one side of the floor. It comes from both sides. Again, I would ask the indulgence of the house in giving the floor to those speakers who have the floor. Everybody will have a chance. This is a long debate, and I think we could get along a lot better if we kept the extraneous comments for other occasions.

Mr. Pearson: May I now ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of what he has just been saying?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. I shall be back on that subject and the hon. gentleman will have another occasion. When I have finished dealing with this the hon. gentleman will be asking himself some questions.

I mentioned the benefits which came from our action, and I refrain from quoting anybody because I do not want to make anyone feel unduly embarrassed. I was about to refer to what the farmers thought of this—they, the forgotten people in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. When we brought this in Mr. Gleave, the president of the Saskatchewan farmers' union, and Mr. T. G. Bobier of the Saskatchewan wheat pool said they were "particularly pleased with the method employed and with the further widening of the spread in the exchange rate between the Canadian and American dollar. A report in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix continued:

> In addition, the further discount of 2¾ cents on the Canadian dollar would place the exporter of wheat and other grains, livestock and dairy products in a more advantageous position to compete in outside markets. The wheat farmer particularly would receive a price increase from the further 2¾ cents discount or about five cents per bushel.
> The two farm leaders said the wheat farmer was sure to get a price increase on exports because the prices under the international wheat agreement were set in United States funds.

And all across this country various industries dependent on export markets, including the forest industry, the clothing industry and the industrial chemical industry felt the benefit of the action which we had taken—an action which was reviled throughout the campaign.

Now I want to bring this up to date. The Globe and Mail of October 2 has this to say in an article by John A. Gibson. Last evening the Leader of the Opposition spoke of something being done to bring about the making of automobile parts in Canada—a solicitude which the hon. gentleman and his party did not evince during the days they were in office when they imposed such a high excise tax on automobiles. Where was the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) then? He was a member of the cabinet during those days. What does he say about this sudden solicitude for the automobile dealer? Let me read from the Globe and Mail of this morning this article by John A. Gibson.

He says:

Canadian truck makers are scrambling to build more of their products in Canada. They are responding to the cost pressure brought on by dollar devaluation and surcharge on imports. Domestic competition has priced some imports almost off the market. Ford Motor Co. of Canada Ltd. will build in Oakville its 850 and 950 heavy-duty tandem series of trucks, as well as heavy conventional trucks using V-6 Cummins diesel engines.

"This is a direct reflection of the surcharge situation", a spokesman said yesterday. "Ford Motor Co. added the vehicles to its line, and rather than import, we decided to build here".

Ford of Canada has also added a long-wheelbase 66-passenger school bus to the variety of venicles it produces.

General Motors of Canada Limited will build heavy-duty diesel truck models in Canada for the first time, starting with the 1963 model year. These units were previously imported.

They put these things into a speech. We bring them to reality.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is more unemployment now than at any time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are you crazy? Thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad. Poor old Paul.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the hon. member knew something about automobiles and trucks, but apparently he has not kept up to date either. Let me read on.

The company said its decision to build here was made last winter and stemmed from market studies. Devaluation of the dollar and the surcharge on imports reinforced the decision, a spokesman said.

GM of Canada says 10 new series incorporating 35 different types in the highway tractor and truck category will be made in Canada for the first time—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Better get a doctor, Paul.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The article continues:

The company, which assembled 32,000 1962 trucks expects to make as many or more in the 1963 year . . .

Howard Dewsbury, general manager of Mack Trucks of Canada Ltd., said: "There is no doubt that Mack will be manufacturing in Canada by early 1963. We intend to build engines, transmissions and rear axles here."

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Go and ask the workers in the automobile plants what they think of this government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I listen to my hon. friend, I think of those words in the scriptures:

Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

The article continues:

Mr. Dewsbury said dollar devaluation and import surcharges were factors in the decision, as well as the desire by the company to make in Canada a great deal of the product it sells here.

He said production of heavy-duty models should start within six months. About four sites are being considered. White Motor Co. of Canada Ltd. should drive the first units of its 1500 and 4000 series away from its Brantford production facilities in December—

And I could go on. These are the things which have been brought about as a result of action by this government.

I ask, why are we criticized in this way? Because I read from a book called "Troubled Canada". It says:

The high exchange rate for the Canadian dollar made it easier for imported goods to compete successfully with goods produced in Canada; they could be sold at lower prices in Canadian dollars than would have been possible if the Canadian dollar had been at par or at a discount. It meant also that Canadian exporters received lower prices for their sales in other countries when converted into Canadian dollars than they would otherwise have done. Thus the premium on the Canadian dollar worked to the disadvantage of both our export industires and our domestic manufacturers...

There is, of course, one tangible disadvantage that accrues from the reduction in the exchange rate which should clearly be stated. A substantial reduction in the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar would be bound to have some effect—

This is the considered view of one who wrote a book—

—although not necessarily any great effect on the cost of living.

Then there is this concluding paragraph:

It is probably true to say, however, that the increased costs or losses of this nature would be far outweighed by the economic and psychological gains to be derived from increased activity in Canadian industry and a reduction in the number of people unemployed.

Mr. Pearson: They had to wait for an election campaign to do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says "wait till the election campaign". I am bringing forward the answers to the kind of false propaganda which has been spread. Some of them criticized and spoke of this dollar and used my name in that way. What did Mitchell Sharp say on December 26, 1961? He said:

The recent change in the exchange rate was all to the good and the results are already being reflected in the statistics—a slowing down in the rate of increase in imports and a further increase in exports, both of which encourage employment within Canada. Full advantage of the long delayed shift cannot be expected, however, until there is a greater degree of confidence that something like the present rate will be maintained. An investor in new manufacturing facilities has to take a long view of competitive factors at home and abroad. The government could help him by deciding and setting the exchange rate they intend to maintain.

Now, that is exactly what we did, and the authorities in the Liberal party, the economists, said that was the proper course to follow. Then when we followed it they said it was not to the benefit of Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like now to point out something. It has been said on a number of occasions that if Canada was as prosperous as we said it was, that if the upsurge of prosperity was increasing—I will put it that way—then how could this arise? I will go back to 1947 and read what Mr. Abbott said in his broadcast of that day. He said:

Let us keep our difficulties in their right perspectives. In comparison with most of the rest of the world, we are a very fortunate people. Our trouble arises from the misfortunes of other countries, not from any basic weakness in our own economy. Our basic position is sound.

Then he states:

Our level of employment is at a maximum.

Mr. Pickersgill: So it was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And you had an exchange crisis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I continue with the quotation:

We are producing at a high level and at a relatively low cost. This country of ours has had a notable record of achievement during and after the war—a record which has given us self-confidence and raised Canada's stature in the eyes of the world. Let us keep up that record in surmounting the present emergency, conscious of our responsibilities and confident of our great future.

That is what he said in that year. It has been said that I deluded the people of Canada by saying that the economy was on the upsurge and then immediately after the election announced that there was a crisis in international exchange.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Something which the Prime Minister had denied during the election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, and I will deal with that matter in a moment and with great detail and it will be more than the hon. member wishes to hear. I would remind you also, Mr. Speaker, of this fact. I have not before me at the moment the quotation from Mr. Mackenzie King dealing with this matter when he said that there was no relationship between prosperity and such a matter arising suddenly. He went on to point out that it was something that had taken place in other parts of the world and that action had to be taken without delay because of the rapid depletion of the exchange reserves. With that background and also with the quotation from Mr. King I shall deal with the matter. In what Mr. King said there is no talk of mismanagement or wasted years or about getting the economy moving or about bold and imaginative this or that. This is what Mr. King said:

Matters have come up in connection with the depletion of our reserve of United States dollars. This is a very urgent matter and is to be taken up at this stage of the session as well...

No country in the world is as much dependent as Canada is upon foreign markets, and the development of this nation, as my hon. friend knows very well, lies in our having the largest possible measure of opportunity to trade with other countries of the world. The Geneva agreement is something that has not been equalled at any time in negotiations between nations... It is a great triumph; and it is right that the people of Canada, when they are discussing these emergency measures which are unpleasant, which are the last thing in the world that this government would wish to bring down at this time, should fully realize that they are temporary measures.

Then we find these words. They pin the appearance of falsehood on those who said I endeavoured to mislead Canada by saying the economy was on the upsurge. What did Mr. King say? He said this:

It is out of the prosperity that we have had in this country that this situation has arisen. If our people had not been making and spending the money they have they would not have been purchasing to the extent they have in the United States, particularly great quantities of luxuries. I will not go into that question tonight, but the government wants the people of Canada to understand that these emergency measures are temporary in character. The people must not be blind to the larger opportunities that are going to come out of the Geneva agreements as a consequence of the agreement that was reached there.

Then he says this:

As my hon. friend well knows, we had to put the emergency measures into force at the moment we did and not wait any longer because of the fact that otherwise as, in the case of the budget resolutions, all kinds of advantage would have been taken by those who wished to profiteer and those who wished to benefit from changes that were to come about. This is not an emergency session. We carefully considered that very point. The government might have had an emergency session to deal with these questions only, but we felt that the people of Canada and hon. members themselves would much prefer to begin the regular session now... This is the regular session of parliament for the balance of the present year...

Then what did Mr. Abbott say about it? He spoke of the existing prosperity and he said that there was no unemployment. This was two years after the war, when Japan and Germany had been crushed and when there was a tremendous demand in other parts of the world for our Canadian needs and requirements. There was no difficulty whatsoever to secure markets. He said this:

I have repeatedly said that I regret the necessity of placing this highly protectionist measure upon the statute books; but I think it would be folly to fail to recognize that this is an emergency. It is not a situation which has been created by Canada.

I hope once and for all that will answer the argument that you do not have foreign exchange difficulties at a time of increasing economic strength.

The Leader of the Opposition wished to ask a question at that stage.

Mr. Churchill: He has forgotten it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the point I was raising has long since been passed by the Prime Minister, but perhaps he will allow me to ask it now although he refused to do so previously. He was telling us about the advantages of our foreign trade from the steps which had been taken under pressure during the election campaign. Will he explain the figures with regard to our international balance of payments for the first six months of this year?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad the Leader of the Opposition asked that question. I expected he would do so as he had those figures before him when he met Governor Rasminsky.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister obviously did not understand my question. I asked him what are the figures for our international balance of payments for the first six months of this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to give them. I am going to give the applicable ones. I say that the Leader of the Opposition, having this information, did not interpret it except in an unfair manner. That is what I say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Pearson: May I repeat my question to the Prime Minister. Obviously he did not catch it.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the hon. gentleman may address a question to an hon. member who has the floor and who may accept it, the matter of the nature of the answer to the question is still with the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He asked for it.

Mr. Speaker: If it does not meet the wishes of the questioner, that does not raise a point of order nor does it call for a repeated question. It may call for subsequent comment.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister refuses to answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I intend to answer the question in more detail than the hon. gentleman will wish to hear. This is one part I intend to follow somewhat carefully in my manuscript.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Are you scared?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should not think hon. members would laugh about anybody following a manuscript after the exhibition we had yesterday in that respect.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Three hours of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1949—and I start there—the question was frequently asked in the house whether or not the Canadian dollar was going to be depreciated in value and the answer was consistently that such was not necessary and indeed would be dangerous. Finally, in 1950, it became clear that the then par value of the Canadian dollar which was equal to 90 and 10/11 cents could not be maintained because of the large inflow of United States capital. It was decided not to establish a new par value but to permit market forces to determine the rate from day to day. There was to be no intervention by the use of the exchange fund other than what was necessary to maintain orderly market conditions from day to day. The decision was taken at the time, with the acquiescence of the international monetary fund, which was a body established for this purpose by the Bretton Woods agreement to which Canada adhered in 1946. This action by the fund was taken in recognition of Canada's unique circumstances. It was anticipated at the time that Canada would eventually return to a fixed exchange rate when the circumstances were right. In fact, this flexible exchange system lasted for almost 12 years, and for most of the period the Canadian dollar was at a premium over the U.S. dollar owing to the large inflow of foreign capital into Canada.

During the early 1950's there was an exceptional demand in the world for Canadian basic materials, and there was heavy investment in Canada's resource industries giving rise to inflationary pressure. The large inflows of capital and the matching import of goods and services from abroad were a reflection of these demands and helped to keep inflationary pressures within reasonable bounds.

In subsequent years, Mr. Speaker, the world economic environment changed; western Europe and Japan were reconstructed and shortages disappeared. World demand for Canadian resources exports grew less rapidly; the rate of capital investment in these industries declined and unemployment, both of men and capital equipment increased. Under these circumstances one would normally have expected the exchange rate to have declined and Canada's deficit on current international transactions, that is on the export and import of goods and services, to have shrunk, thereby encouraging a fuller utilization of Canadian production capacity. In fact, there were countervailing pressures due to the continuing large flow of capital into Canada which tended to maintain the premium on the Canadian dollar.

As a result, in 1960 and 1961 an important part of the government's expansionary economic program was to reduce the large deficit in current international transactions by a series of steps designed to facilitate an orderly movement of the exchange rate to a level more appropriate to the basic economic situation. These steps included measures to ensure a larger supply of Canadian capital and reasonable rates of interest to Canadian borrowers. As this was achieved, the economic decisions of private individuals and businesses based upon the market would bring about an increase in Canadian production and employment.

These measures to facilitate an orderly movement of the exchange rate hinged on efforts to improve the availability of Canadian capital at reasonable interest rates and to reduce the incentive for Canadians to seek capital abroad. None of these measures interfered with the free movement of capital over which no controls were exercised.

In the budget of June 1961 it was pointed out that since these measures might take some time to have their full effect, the resources of the exchange fund would be used if necessary to offset unwarranted upward pressures on the exchange rate. As it turned out, such use of the exchange fund was not necessary and the operations of the fund continued to be directed towards moderating market movements in the rate, not towards producing such movements.

The achievement of a better exchange rate was only part of the government's policy of economic expansion and recovery in 1960 and 1961. It was our view then, as it is now, that the key to Canadian success in the world economy must lie in improving the productivity and competitiveness of the Canadian economy. We undertook programs to increase productivity, to encourage research, to expand and improve technical training, to encourage investment and to stimulate exports. We continue to pursue these programs and purposes.

Our efforts to achieve a more satisfactory rate of exchange were successful and during 1961 substantial progress was made in reducing our deficit on current international payments. That year it declined to $982 million, the first time for six years that it was below a billion, and we achieved our first surplus of commodity exports over commodity imports for nine years. I should like to emphasize that. This surplus amounted to $173 million.

It is against this background that the exchange markets must be viewed. From June 1961 at the time of the budget until April 1962, the market was engaged in a process of testing the exchange rate. This was a new situation for those carrying on exchange transactions, either directly or in connection with trade or investments. For the first time in almost ten years the foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar was below that of the United States dollar, and for a considerable period the market was trying to make judgments as to where the rate was likely to settle.

The day after the June 1961 budget, the Canadian dollar opened in some European markets at a 4 or 5 per cent discount on the United States dollar. Almost immediately it moved to about a 3 per cent discount, where it remained until October. Throughout those three months the level of exchange reserves also remained relatively stable, somewhere around $1,900 million which was about half way between the levels of $1,800 million and $2,000 million which had prevailed over most of the preceding decade.

In October the market appeared to take the view that the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar would likely settle about equal to the U.S. dollar, perhaps on the old but mistaken notion that two currencies with the same name ought to have the same price. This market view was backed up by those engaged in international trade, who delayed the payment of bills or opened up the cashing of receipts in accordance with this expectation. As a result the exchange fund accumulated $186 million, U.S., and at the end of October the total holdings amounted to $2,111 million which was above the top end of the range over which the reserve had moved during the preceding decade. During November and December 1961 and the early months of 1962, the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar moved downward and it reached a 5 per cent discount on the U.S. dollar in February. During this period the authorities continued to maintain orderly markets and exchange reserves declined moderately by $32 million in November, by $23 million in December and then, increasingly, by $134 million in January and $175 million in February as the market lags and leads in the timing of trade settlements undertaken in the preceding October were reversed. In other words, those who had anticipated a par rate in October and bought or sold their exchange to offset future trade transactions on the basis of this expectation, had now to recognize that the market view was that the Canadian dollar would remain below par and they readjusted their positions in a manner that reduced our reserves.

At the end of February our exchange holdings totalled $1,747 million, not significantly below the range of amounts that had been in the exchange reserves over the preceding decade. During the month of March the exchange market was steady. The rate remained at about a 5 per cent discount on the U.S. dollar and the operations of the exchange fund resulted in only a small decline in the reserves.

This account I have given you indicates that the government's objective of helping to bring about an orderly downward movement in the exchange rate had largely been achieved by March and that the rate itself was responding to market forces. We were, in other words, getting close to a realistic rate.

In April, and this was about the time the election campaign started, some uncertainty developed in the exchange market, and the attacks of the opposition had effected this. There was evidence of speculation and some doubts about where the exchange rate was likely to settle down. This caused the government to consider, at the end of April, whether or not a return to a par value would be desirable. It had been pointed out in the budget on April 10, and I quote:

> It is extremely difficult to devise and pursue an exchange rate policy that can be regarded as completely satisfactory from every point of view.

It must be recognized, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's international economic transactions are more complicated and extensive than those of almost any other country in the world in proportion to its size. The nature and extent of our foreign trade and of the movements of capital to and from Canada, and Canada's proximity to New York, the world's largest capital market, creates special problems in maintaining a suitable exchange rate.

The 1950 decision to let the rate be determined by market forces had been a departure from the standard practice of other countries. We knew that a return to a fixed rate would be warmly welcomed by many people in Canada, and by other countries and other financial markets. In these circumstances, and to clear up uncertainties which had developed during April, the government decided at the beginning of May that the time had come to establish a legal par value for the Canadian dollar and give Canadians engaged in international trade the security of a fixed rate of exchange. The decision, taken and announced on May 2, was concurred in under the Bretton Woods agreement by the international monetary fund which welcomed it as a realistic rate.

Now, I have referred at that point to the effects of undermining faith and confidence by criticism, in particular criticism that was not justified.

I also point out that during the months of January, February, March, April and May stock values fell by more than $100 billion on the United States exchanges, and there was also a very serious fall in the middle of June. At that time, according to what I learned from those who are acquainted with these things, many people were in a position of having to dispose of their Canadian assets in order to meet the situation that came to them in consequence of that tremendous fall in the value of security stocks in New York. A great change took place again with renewed force in the month of June.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Of course not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just wait until I sit down.

Mr. Byrne: The question is, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: He said no question.

Mr. Pearson: Let him read his brief.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I quote now an extract from Canadian Business Service Limited which is recognized as a publication that is careful in its contents. It deals with the exchange position in its issue of June 29, and states:

> The action taken will, in our opinion, correct the run on the Canadian dollar. It has always been a strong currency and the critical situation which developed so suddenly was precipitated by the violence of the pre-election debate about the economic, fiscal and monetary policy of Canada. While the present and preceding regimes have done many things of which most of us disapprove, many constructive steps have also been taken and nothing has been done that has impaired the strength of Canada. Latest reports show our gross national product to be running 8.6 per cent ahead of last year—certainly not an indication of impending doom—with an over-all increase of 7 per cent indicated for 1962.
> Criticism of the Conservative regime was justified but much of this went far beyond the bounds of reason and helped to add fuel to the flames. A run on a country's currency is much like a run on a bank. It feeds on rumours and if unchecked even the soundest currency—or bank—can be seriously embarrassed.
> We would expect that exchange reserve figures will show a considerable improvement fairly quickly. This, however, is something that is a matter of conjecture. Once foreign investors are satisfied with the future policy of the Canadian government we may see an upward push on the Canadian dollar that will be quite as embarrassing as the recent downward pressure. This, however, is a matter of pure conjecture—except that we continue of the opinion that the Canadian dollar is a strong currency.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who wrote that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mention that simply because it is from an objective source, and it is in keeping with what we so often said during the course of the campaign—criticize fairly but for goodness sake do not base your criticism in such a way that you ruin the credit of Canada. The attitude of the opposition is that "we shall rule or, if we do not succeed, we care not for the consequences."

The establishment of the new par value resulted in a noticeable firming on the exchange market during most of May, at a time when, on every platform across the country, Canada was being downgraded, faith was being undermined and confidence lessened.

The then minister of finance, now Minister of Justice, made an announcement on June 1 which showed the extent of the situation.

He said that in the late days of May there was a period of uncertainty in world financial markets. That was at a time when stock prices fell sharply on the New York exchange, and this had repercussions in the financial markets all over the world. Fortunately these disturbances were not prolonged but the effect on Canada was to cause uncertainty and instability in our financial markets, including the exchange market, and as a result we encountered an unsettled exchange market which was having to be supported by sales from our reserves.

I shall now give a summary of some figures in that connection. This is not to be a precedent in any way, but in view of the nature of the attack on the integrity of the government, and the need of placing the position in general before the Canadian people, I intend to go into some detail. During the first week of June the weakness in the exchange market continued. I consulted the then minister of finance on the matter and on June 10 he issued an official statement making it very clear that the government could and would maintain the Canadian dollar at the 92½ cents exchange rate. The situation was carefully watched during the next few days, and up to the middle of the week preceding the election the minister of finance expected, and I expected, that once the campaign was over, with all its controversy about the state of the Canadian economy, the exchange situation would settle down.

What are the facts in regard to this matter? I made a statement to the Canadian people on June 24, which I started off this way:

> There has been developing an increasing degree of uncertainty and instability in the financial markets which has intenstified in the last few days to a point requiring immediate emergent action.

I underline those words. I continue:

> Dealings in the exchange markets have been exceptionally large.
> These developments have been such that a comprehensive program has become necessary to relieve the pressure on the Canadian dollar in the exchange field, to bring about greater stability in our international transactions and to strengthen our exchange reserves.

What was the situation in this regard? It has been said that we concealed the facts, but I answer those who say that by pointing out that the total amount of exchange—again I emphasize this is not going to be a precedent or a procedure—that the total amount of exchange delivered to the market from the sales of foreign exchange, from June 1 to June 14, was $128 million.

At that time the attacks became more overwhelming in their nature and more irresponsible in their denunciation. I can recall one of the big industrialists of Canada, the Hon. Mr. Winters, when he spoke at Truro on June 8 saying "Canada is at the brink of bankruptcy." That was the kind of statements which were coming from one not directly in politics.

Mr. Fulton: Who is the traitor now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The position he took had a terrible effect. People began to say, "I wonder whether what is being said is well founded". Fear begets fear; confidence is undermined.

It is only a few days ago that I met with Sir Winston Churchill. The one message that he had as we talked together was, "The greatest thing we have to fear is fear".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was Mr. Roosevelt who said that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: You are 20 years out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The ribald laughter indicates that they desire to create fear. It was within a few days of the election that things started to worsen. I mentioned what the figures were between June 1 and 14. The election was on the 18th. The 15th was a Friday. Then there was an acceleration. The amount of such deliveries which reduced our exchange reserves from the 15th to the 22nd was $270 million. When I told the people of Canada that it had worsened in the last few days, that statement was true. Between the 25th and the 29th there was a further amount of $115 million including deliveries on contract made before the 25th.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the broadcast of June 14?

Mr. Pearson: Not a word then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to point out this fact, that with my knowledge the governor of the Bank of Canada discussed this matter fully—I have a memorandum of what took place—

Mr. Pearson: So have I.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —with the Leader of the Opposition, who had the facts in consequence of that interview.

Mr. Pearson: After the election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Since that date we brought about this change. As I said in these words in my television speech, "It has intensified in the last few days". The intensification started in earnest on the 15th. The 16th was a Saturday; the 17th a Sunday. These figures tell their story and answer once and for all the allegation that we had anything to conceal during the month of June that we did not place before the Canadian people.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: The Liberal party is disgraced.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If the situation was as described by the Prime Minister, why did he not mention any aspect of it in his broadcast to the Canadian people on June 14?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because, as I have pointed out, the situation was not serious then.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members opposite say oh, oh, and I throw back to the Leader of the Opposition this, that as a result of the attitude of the opposition during the days of an election, an opposition which did not care what the consequences were in undermining Canada, these things were accelerated.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, how cheap can you get. You cannot get lower than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the hon. gentleman say?

An hon. Member: Why don't you tell us the truth?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said, "You cannot get lower than that".

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to enter into any argument with regard to altitude with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: I wouldn't.

An hon. Member: Pearson said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I am glad to hear where it came from, because that is indicative of the kind of thing he has been indulging in all through the summer—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —vilifying and ridiculing. I thank him again, because people across Canada are beginning to wonder, "Where is that man we used to know?" What has happened since? There were other transactions during these periods which affected the fund. I cite these figures to illustrate the magnitude of the sales that were made in the market to sustain our exchange rate. During July the reserves increased by $306 million, $60 million of which resulted from the advance payment by the government of France on post-war credits extended by Canada to that country. During August the increase in our reserves amounted to $216 million.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have covered the situation in particular, and I summarize it briefly as follows. The action taken has now been placed before the house and the country. Those figures, as I say, would under ordinary circumstances not be revealed; they are revealed in the totals at the end of the month. But under the circumstances, so the Canadian people can understand fully who was telling the truth, those figures have been placed before the House of Commons and the people as a whole.

I have mentioned that progress has been satisfactory and encouraging since the program was announced. Our primary task now is to restore confidence. This is being achieved. Reserves have improved steadily since the measures were taken. As another mark of returning confidence, the Minister of Finance was able to announce on September 13 that negotiations had been completed for the sale of a $250 million long term, government of Canada bond issue in the United States to private investors at 5 per cent. The proceeds of this issue, which will come in over the next several months, will be used to reinforce Canada's official exchange reserves. It is our view that with Canada's growing volume of trade, the very large volume of investment and the fixed exchange rate, it is essential to increase our holdings of foreign exchange reserves at levels higher than the last decade. The placing of this government bond issue in New York makes clear to Canadians and foreign investors alike that Canada welcomes the participation of outside capital in our economic development. We intend to continue to make Canada hospitable to investment even though we intend to press forward to encourage Canadians to invest more and more in the ownership of their own industries and resources. The success in obtaining this long term loan from private investors is a solid demonstration of Canada's ability to attract capital, and clear evidence of our high credit standing abroad.

In view of the long term loan, the Minister of Finance has announced that $250 million out of $400 million stand-by credit obtained in June from the export-import bank of Washington had been terminated at the request of the Canadian government. Since June there have been improvements in our balance of payments, production and employment.

I place before the house the general financial picture, which has improved since June.

Stock market prices have increased, bond markets have strengthened and the general public has increased substantially its holdings of long term, government of Canada bonds. There have been the domestic issues of government securities, one for $200 million and one $150 million, in July and September respectively. There have been some declines in interest rates, particularly in the short term market. In recognition of the decline in short term market interest rates and the rise in the exchange reserves, the bank rate was reduced on September 7 from 6 per cent to 5½ per cent. We have, I think, good reason to be pleased with the results achieved so far. There is every expectation that the improvement in our external financial position will continue. At the same time we are pressing ahead to find solutions to our longer terms problems in order to be less dependent in future on securing large imports of capital to make up for the deficit in our current international account. Canada's success in dealing with this problem over the years will also improve the production and employment situation.

I intended to deal as well with the common market because that subject was dealt with at great length by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I dislike speaking at this length, but having to follow the hon. gentleman I think I should defer making a statement on the common market.

The stand that I took in London—and I summarize—was a stand in keeping with the tradition of the leaders of this nation in the past. Recognizing the need of preserving the commonwealth and strengthening it, we were called together to give our views as to the political and economic effects of Britain's entry into the common market. Those views were given calmly, quietly, and, as was stated by Mr. Menzies, without rancour in any way. We said to Britain: This commonwealth means much to us because, after all, it was a concept —and the Conservative party knows this—of Macdonald in 1864. He saw the picture of the development of the commonwealth. He foresaw the day when Canada and Australia would be joined with what was then the motherland on behalf of the things of freedom which have characterized this commonwealth throughout the years.

I went there. I presented Canada's viewpoint. I presented it on behalf of all Canada. We were asked to give our opinions as to what effect this move would have, what changes would be made, what safeguards should Britain obtain. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said: I want your opinions; I want to know; it is not a question of choosing between the commonwealth and the common market; we want to know what effect all this will have; we believe we shall be able to bring about a new concept in Europe but at the same time we have given an assurance, and we stand by it, that in entering Europe we shall safeguard the necessary interests of the commonwealth; we shall not weaken its fabric; we shall not do anything which in any way will lessen its significance.

I presented Canada's viewpoint and I shall have an opportunity very soon to go into that question in detail since, after all, it was this party, the Conservative party, which during the years has taken its stand believing in the strength of the commonwealth. Speaking before that group of prime ministers I mentioned Canada's essential needs, making it clear at all times that there was no veto, will be no veto and dare be no veto under the commonwealth system. Was I alone? There were 13 others with me who took the same viewpoint. All of them expressed that viewpoint and all were in agreement in the communique which indicates the degree to which this family of nations has learned to bring together the various colours and religions of man and, through discussion and consultation, arrive at conclusions beneficial to all.

I make it clear that I shall be dealing with this subject at greater length at a very early opportunity, I hope, should the house vote confidence in this government.

What is our plan for the future? We have set forth in general our plan in the speech from the throne. The objective is development, expansion, growth, the encouragement of trade, the production of jobs, the acceleration of industry, the maintenance of agriculture, the giving to the people of Canada a degree of assurance such as no other government ever did in the same period. Moreover, we shall continue to maintain the Canadian nationality—to maintain Canada—not forgetting the least of the people of this country in social security measures, the increase of which in five years has more than doubled anything which has ever taken place before. I hear the opposition saying that they are coming out in favour of health insurance. They are in favour of it. Well, they have held that view for almost a generation.

Mr. Fulton: Longer than that.

An hon. Member: Since 1919.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We believe we should wait until the economic situation permits us to go further forward and in any event until a report is received from the royal commission on this subject so as to avoid the pitfalls which the members of the opposition found in the application of a hastily constructed health plan within my own province.

We believe the expansion of social security can only come out of production. We believe our duty now is to increase production, raise more and more our export aims, aspirations and achievements and build for a Canada stronger economically than ever before.

The official opposition intends to vote against us, they say. Well, we say we are going to bring in an economic board. They have asked for that. Now, when we bring it in, they announce they are going to vote against it. Again, the proposed Atlantic development board will advise on production and promote the development of the Atlantic region where the geographical situation requires measures which are not needed elsewhere. The board will deal with such matters as capital construction, including a survey of the tidal power of the eastern end of the bay of Fundy. The opposition has advocated this kind of thing for the maritimes. The position, now, is that they are going to vote against it. These are the things of which politics is made.

I cannot now go into detail about what we have done in northern development. I could deal with the tremendous expansion of the north today, with the discoveries of mineral ores, including 20 million tons of iron ore, the greatest mine in the world, or with the opening up of northern areas which previously were never expected to be accessible to development. I could speak of the assistance which has been given across this country in projects such as the Red River scheme, the Saskatchewan dam, and, yes, the Chignecto causeway—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is the Canso causeway and the Chignecto canal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It does not take very much to cause frivolity. I was speaking of the Prince Edward Island causeway and inadvertently mentioned another, but they can still jeer if they want to. We brought about an oil policy that has expanded the oil exports of Canada as never before. We are now providing for the export of power as a policy, which in the days ahead will do much to bring about a fair and reasonable equalization in our international payments situation. All of these things we have done. We face great economic problems and Canada always will. I say to the members of this house, why does the opposition now say that they are going to vote no confidence? Are we going to stop the progress that is taking place, the expansion and the development, by having an election now? I do not mind elections.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, let us have one right now.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am so glad reference was made to that, because if I had not had a helper or an interlocutor I would have forgotten it. I think there has been a big change in four years. Let us recall how at the end of January 1958 they came in and said: "Now we want an election". Then they produced that supernatural amendment setting out all our shortcomings, which ended up by saying: "Please give us back our jobs". There has been a big change in four years. Whenever the election comes we will be dealing with it. In the meantime, I suggest that this house has a responsibility. We were elected to make progress. Let us unite together in faith and in determination to place Canada above the rank of petty politics. Let the national interest be the guide of the conscience of those who vote on this question. I have tried to place the picture before you as I see it. We intend to place our measures as rapidly as it is possible to do so before the house. We intend to delay in no way in meeting the exigencies of the occasion. We intend to pursue the course that we pursued in 1957, bringing before the house those things which we believe are right, and asking for the support of the house.

Now, sir, I do not mind those who want to put on their election paint, but I think our responsibility at the moment is to do our part to have the legislative program passed. Let us have an opportunity of bringing in a budget. Let us keep Canada moving as it is moving, and as all the documents say it is. That is my message to this house today.

Mr. Robert N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to extend my congratulations to you on your election to the high office which you now hold in our midst. I know full well that, as you have already started, you will continue to carry on the traditions of the office of Speaker in our house. I wish also to extend my congratulations to the mover of the throne speech, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin), and to the seconder, the hon member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent). In giving their maiden speeches in the house they spoke well, and I sincerely commend them for their efforts. It is my impression that I heard considerably more common sense from these gentlemen than I have heard in the speeches since then. The people of Canada are getting tired of the continual "yak-yak" of politicians who are more concerned with perpetuating an outworn political machine than they are in caring for the affairs of this nation and its people in a businesslike and efficient manner.

As a new member, I do want to express my appreciation for the friendly attitude shown and reception that has been given by different members old and new from all corners of the house. This does not apply to the members themselves alone; it also applies to their wives and the parliamentary staff. Certainly they have made us all feel at home in our capital city and on capital hill. Again, I am much more impressed by the friendliness and the hospitalities of the members than I am by some of their political tactics and jargons, as we have watched them for the last several days. It has reminded me of a neighbour farmer of mine who one day last year, when the fields were very parched, stood with me and looked out across these parched fields, and then up at the stormy clouds above, and said: "Lots of thunder and wind, no rain". There has been a deluge of words but a desert of ideas.

Most people are interested in debates and fights in their proper place, but surely the people of this country will resent to know that any portion of the tremendous sum of money which is required to maintain parliament is being used as a personal tilting ground for a couple of their fellow citizens. Personally, speaking for some colleagues and myself, we are here to do business, to come to grips with the internal problems of Canada so that she can be a strong voice in a troubled world. We are not here to waste time on trivialities. So much of what has been said in the last two days smacks of the beating of party drums and all the while the world crumbles around our feet. Mr. Speaker, we have had before us a spectacle of a couple of household watchdogs fighting about who is going to protect the house, when all the while the house is in flames. Action is what is needed.

Before I move an amendment to the amendment of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson), may I congratulate the government on the speech from the throne, for its literary content, for its vagueness and for its generality. In fact, it was a masterful piece of window dressing designed to cover over its inadequacies and omissions. It is an admission of failure. Much of it is merely a rehash of the 1957 and 1958 election platforms, plus every speech from the throne since. If the government had carried out its previous election promises plus the promises and assurances contained in speeches from the throne since 1957, 80 per cent of this speech from the throne could have been left out. It would have been redundant. It is an admission by the government that it expects to be eliminated before it gets an opportunity to formulate another speech from the throne.

Yes, it is all too obvious also that the leader of the official opposition is determined to cut the life of this parliament as short as possible. He has stated that it is his first duty to this parliament to oppose the government. I disagree with the hon. member. I was elected and I believe it is my duty to represent the citizens of my constituency and at the same time, as a Canadian, to preserve the best interests of my country. However, I must congratulate the leader of the official opposition and the Prime Minister as well for a most eloquent delivery. In fact, I do not think I have ever heard either of them in better oratorical form. However, I must say that I am unimpressed with what has been said. It is, in fact, depressing.

I am glad that the people of Canada did not have the opportunity to listen to this debate on the speech from the throne by television. If they had, they might have thought they had tuned in Havana by mistake where they are accustomed to listening to tirades of three hours and four hours in length. It might be a good idea for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Flemming) to explore the possibility of getting a sponsor for the television production of the proceedings in parliament. This is a great show. It is a frightful charge that this should be so in this democratic institution whose purpose is supposed to be to grapple with the problems that could spell life or death for this country. If I really could have confidence in the words of the leader of the official opposition, it might be easier to sympathize with him. To the public he shouts "We must have an election now". To his own party members he says something else. At least he is quoted in La Femme Liberale, Vol. XVI, No. 3, September, 1962 as follows, and I quote a transliteration from the French:

> When we meet in Quebec city—
> That is for the national congress.
> —parliament will then be in session for one month. What will then be the situation? We will probably have a more enlightening perspective of the future.

It is no wonder that the people of Canada are confused. That is why I am convinced that, if we were to turn the two old line parties loose in another election at this time, it would only add chaos to confusion. Given a few more months for the people of this nation to listen to more of what we have heard yesterday and so far today, perhaps it would not take too long for the Canadian public to understand that they have no hope whatsoever in either of the old line parties. I think it might be a good thing if they added the word "Columbus" to their names. At least this honourable gentleman of centuries past would give some dignity to the names they now carry. He is defined as the man who started out without knowing where he was going and who, when he got there, did not know where he had arrived; and he did it all on borrowed money.

According to the press of last Friday the leader of the official opposition, when referring to my own remarks in regard to a vote on non-confidence in the government, is reported to have said this, "I find it very hard to keep up with Social Credit". He found it very difficult to keep up in Quebec in the last election; and in another election he is going to find it even harder to keep up with Social Credit not only in Quebec but across the whole of the country.

I am reminded of an incident that happened a number of years ago when I was keeping a speaking engagement down in the southern states. Having flown to one of the larger cities, I was obliged to get a car in order to go on to the smaller town in which I had my speaking engagement. The hour was getting late and as I was driving along the road I was not sure just where I was. I therefore stopped and spoke with a little coloured fellow. Most of the people down in that state are coloured folk. Not thinking too much I said to him, "Sonny, can you tell me where I am?". The little fellow looked at me quizzically and finally he put a little black finger up at me and he said, "There you is, mister". I was chagrined at my display of ignorance in the form of the question. I went on further and this time I met a coloured man. Carefully I asked him how I could get from where I was to where I was going. He said, "That is easy. All you have got to do is go down the road about a mile, then you turn to the right. Oh, that road is closed. You can't go there. Then you got to go back a mile and turn to the left." Then he stopped and said, "You can't go by that road either". Then he looked at me with that same quizzical look the little fellow had a few moments previously and he said, "I don't think you can get to where you is going from where you is".

I think that is exactly the position that faces our dear old political parties. Canada desperately needs leadership and not the kind of cock and bull stuff that we have had in this sacred chamber yesterday and today. Let us get down to facing the facts. Let us remember that democracy means not only representative government but also responsible government. If there was ever a time in the history of our nation when this house needed to show responsibility, it is now. Our party is determined to face up to the needs of Canada and Canadians above political opportunism.

Canada potentially stands in a unique and enviable position. Her material resources are vast and diversified, and their development is still in the stages of infancy. Few, if any, other nations have a material development potential equal to ours. If what we have heard today about the wonderful state of our economy is true, then I guess all is well. This is not what the people of Canada understand today. This is what they did not understand when they came to vote on June 18. Otherwise the election results would have been different from what they were. I should like to say that surely there is no question about the quality and character of our human resources. This is true both at home and abroad. Through my many years of experience overseas I have come to see first hand the fact that Canadians have set an example of friendly confidence all over the world. Our Canadian people have established an enviable reputation for their enterprise, integrity and friendliness. With the rich heritage and cultures we have from our two mother nations across the sea, plus the addition of the many other nations and peoples down through the years that we have had in the new Canadians, we have set a record of confident and efficient achievement which speaks for itself. There are few parallels in this turbulent world of ours. This combination of material and human resources can make possible a higher standard of living and a greater degree of economic stability and progress than we have ever had previously.

This is the challenge which we face today. Let us face up to it and come to grips with these things which are important. This is the challenge before our generation, namely to prove that democracy can meet the needs and solve the problems of people collectively and individually. This is important not only at home but as an example abroad. I refer to a way of life which will provide for all the opportunity to meet the challenge and help to build for mankind a peaceful way of life that will give some assurance of its continuation in an age when it is possible to destroy everything, including ourselves.

It is the record of progress and also a fact of history that a majority has not always been right, and that if it had not been for the determination and the conviction of minority groups struggling for the survival of those things they believed were right, we would never have made the progress we have today.

I would also remind you, Mr. Speaker, that all such progress has been made in the face of determined opposition and even bitter prejudice as tradition has tried to hang on to the things of the past. That is not to say that all in the past is wrong, but that too often we support outworn ideas and institutions even when they fail to meet the need which justified their coming into existence originally. I would also remind you that if the two old parties were satisfactorily meeting our needs today, there would be no need for the minority parties which are in this house now. The fact that in the last election more than one quarter of the Canadian electorate expressed their dissatisfaction with the old line political approach is ample evidence of this. Politically Canada, since confederation, has been governed alternatively by one or other of the two old line parties. They must, therefore, accept full responsibility for the problems that we do face today and which, I am convinced, are still with us, otherwise we could get rid of this word "austerity" and have prosperity. These social, economic and financial problems could and should have been prevented by effective action on the part of the parties responsible for the government of the country.

In the grim days of the great depression of the late twenties, the Canadian people elected a Conservative government after the Liberals had proven themselves unable to cope with the issues of the day. The Conservatives, and I remember this very well as a youngster, maintained that they had the answers to the problem of poverty in the midst of plenty. Within five years that Conservative government failed miserably and, as a result, in 1935 they were swept out of office and a Liberal government was given the opportunity to prove that it could succeed where the Conservatives had failed.

I was a young school teacher at this time and vitally interested in what was taking place, not only because my own welfare was involved but because many of my buddies, who had not had the opportunity of getting the little education I had, stood in the soup kitchens and in the bread lines or rode the freight cars across the country seeking an opportunity to work and earn an honest living. It soon became evident to us, however, that while the party in power had changed, everything else continued as before. The administration of the late prime minister Mackenzie King was no better than the administration of the late prime minister R. B. Bennett when it came to facing the need for providing the necessary reforms which would correct the obvious defects and strengthen the economy which gave us the bitter depression that we were experiencing in the midst of potential abundance.

Then came world war II. Domestic issues were forced aside. I never cease to marvel at the fact that we could meet our needs and provide the positive administration necessary in times of war which we could not do to meet our needs in times of peace. Nothing was too good for us young men who were needed to fight the battle against the forces of dictatorship which threatened to engulf the world. It was a different story from the one we knew when we had cried for the opportunity to fight against the enemies of unemployment, hunger and privation.

Following the war the Canadian economy experienced a period of great buoyancy and advancement due to, on the one hand, a large amount of accumulated wartime savings which had not been matched with available consumer goods and, on the other hand, to the large scale industrial capital expansion which had been of necessity, neglected during the war years. By the middle of the fifties the lag in industrial output had been caught up with and had become greater than the consumer buying power. Thus, the post-war boom began to wear out. Once again the cycle of industrial retrenchment and tight money came into effect and with them the old problems of the thirties. Inventories built up and the wheels of industry slowed down, in spite of excessive credit buying by the Canadian public which became the order of the day. It became apparent to the Canadian people that the Liberals had no effective program to prevent another cycle of recession.

Meanwhile, the Conservatives, now from the benches of the opposition, many of the same gentlemen who are here today, loudly proclaimed their criticisms of the government in their failure to deal effectively with the nation's economic ills. They acclaimed from the house tops that they had the answers and, if given the opportunity to form a government, could without any shadow of a doubt solve these problems. Thus, in 1957 the people of Canada decided to give them another chance, first as a minority government; then in 1958 they were given the greatest majority any party ever had in Canada's history.

What has happened in the five intervening years since 1958 constitutes one of the most dismal failures of a public administration in Canadian history in connection with its obligations and responsibilities for solving the major economic and social problems that Canada faced in 1957. Is it not strange that while on the benches of the opposition the Conservatives had all the answers to the problem of unemployment? It will be recalled that before their election they claimed to have all the answers to the deficits of international trade. In matters of external dealings alone in these five years our deficits have gone up approximately $7 billion, while the total increase in debt of government at all levels, including consumer debt and mortgage debt, has increased by nearly $19 billion. The total supply of all the money in the country is $4 billion short of being able to match the increase in our debt in the last five years at all levels.

This total debt of Canadians stands at approximately $34 billion, on which we pay more than $2.5 million of interest every day of our lives. Even more alarming is the rapidly increasing cost of government at all levels, which tells us that under present policies this debt load will continue to increase, regardless of which of the two old-line parties governs the country. In fact, it will increase faster if we go back to a Liberal government because of the promises we heard about, the implementation of which would add up, as we have been told, to more than a billion dollars in extra spending.

What causes the concern today, gentlemen, is this: If you add up all the money Canadians earn and add up all the money that governments in Canada spend, approximately 45 cents out of every dollar is paid by the people who earn those dollars back to the governments which render them their governmental services. The record of history and economics tells us that no empire or nation in the past has survived as a free society when more than half of the income of its people is required to meet the cost of its government. Facts and common sense tell us we cannot continue as we are going if we are to maintain the free way of life. It is impossible and futile to believe that the perpetuation of the policies which created and promoted the growth of this malignancy will cure the condition. It was the Greek philosopher Demosthenes who asked: "Are you so unintelligent, men of Athens, as to hope that the same policy that has brought our state from success to failure will raise us from failure to success?"

This debt system is today destroying the very basis of our democratic institution and the initiative and enterprise of our people. Most definitely it has weakened the confidence of Canadians in their own economy to the extent that we are today content to invest our savings in the debt of our deficit financing rather than in the development of the resources which we have in our country. More than half of all the money in Canada is tied up in such "dead" investments as savings accounts in our banks or trust companies and debt investments in Canada.

If we had the confidence that we should have as Canadians in our own Canadian economy, then our savings would be put to work developing our country and its resources in order that we might have a higher standard of living. Money is the only medium to which our production can be distributed, that is money including currency and credit.

As our economy grows, there is need for a corresponding increase in the amount of money. However, the tight money policies of this present austerity program, along with the unreasonably high interest rates which we are paying on everything on which we have to pay interest, will only perpetuate an ever-worsening situation. The pre-requisite of a balanced economy is the supply of purchasing power sufficient to distribute production. This we do not have. As a result, our economy is depressed and progress prohibited.

I realize that this house has many hon. members with long years of political experience. There are likewise those with great academic achievements in the field of economics. I make no claim to either of these qualifications. However, perhaps as a continuing student in the graduate college of practical economics and sound business, I am able to give some practical advice. One of the first lessons I myself learned in the hard cold facts of this school I am talking about can be summed up in this way—if your outgo is more than your income then your upkeep will be your downfall. How can you ever eliminate debt through the incurrence of more debt?

I commend the government for saying the budget must be balanced. It was the chief criticism of the speech from the throne by the aspiring member to the vacant chair across the house, who criticized the government for aiming towards a balanced budget. If prosperity depends upon plunging this country into further debt, if a continued load of debt is our only destiny, then it would be better to throw in the towel now to the proponents of statesmen and let each individual become a bondservant of the government, rather than prolong the agony of a slow death. However, I am convinced that this need not and shall not be our destiny.

There is a way of progress and we must adopt it ere it is too late a way which will let every man have security without debt and still have the guarantee of his personal liberty and freedom. This way is social credit. When we talk about a balanced budget I wonder what right the government has to state this as its objective when, during the last five years, it has created greater deficits than were created in any similar period in the history of our country. The debt increase in Canada from the period January 1, 1957 to June 30, 1962 totals $18,990 million. Our overseas debt is $6,988 million. Federal government direct and guaranteed securities add up to $3,060 million. Provincial direct and indirect debt amounts to $2,402 million. Municipal direct and indirect debt stands at $2,348 million. Consumer debt, and this includes personal loans by banks and credit unions, is $2,702 million. That makes a total of almost $19 billion in just five years.

It is useless to pretend that the Liberal party has any better record than the Conservatives when it comes to incurring debt. Under a succession of Liberal administrations Canada's national debt increased between January 1, 1939 and December 31, 1956, a total of no less than $10,898 million.

An hon. Member: There was the war.

Mr. Thompson: You say it was the war. That is true; but most of that debt was incurred during those years. You say it is permissible to go into debt during a war, but some say that after the war the debt was reduced. I deny that statement.

At the commencement of the last war members of this party protested most vehemently against the adoption of a method of war finance which would plunge the country into debt. They pointed out that a government which had power to issue a bond also had power to issue dollar bills and credit. Had it not been for the inflation that this method of war finance entailed, it would not have been possible for the Liberal administrations to carry on as well as they did in the years after the war.

As it is, we must place fairly and squarely upon the Liberal administration the responsibility for the greater part, although by no means the whole, of the crushing burden of this country's national debt. As an example we can look at the Liberal administration in Quebec. In two years it has increased the debt of the province of Quebec by more than it was increased during the previous 93 years history of that province.

How can private enterprise be established and strengthened by robbing incentive and initiative, by tight money, high interest rates and by reinforcing the hand of vested interests and monopolies? The Prime Minister has said that the issue prior to the last election was private enterprise versus socialism, but this is not the issue if private enterprise is expected to live under present trends when those who claim to be the champions of private enterprise become the apologists for socialism.

An outstanding example is the equalization of taxation on private and public utilities which, at the present moment, is an issue in the province of Quebec under a Liberal administration. If users of electricity, who buy their electricity from private companies, can be expected to pay the increased cost of their electricity, and those who buy their electricity from public companies do not have to pay the tax placed on private companies, how can you expect free enterprise to survive? Why should the users of private electricity be subject to the payment of a tax which the users of public electricity do not have to pay? Not only is tax equality urgently required but it would also create a great incentive towards more development.

We now have a royal commission on taxation, but we in this party maintain that we cannot wait for tax reform upon the findings of a royal commission, which may not be produced for two years or more.

I am pleased to note that it has finally been decided to go ahead with the development of the Columbia river project. The recommendations which the government of British Columbia has been pressing are nothing more than a practical business approach. To refuse to export power which is a continuing energy resource, as long as the rains fall and the rivers run, is completely incompatible with the policy which permits the export of expendable resources such as oil and gas. However, it is interesting to note that the export of power in this case concerns power which is not even generated in Canada. Rather, it is extra power generated in the United States at the Libby dam and returned to Canada on a share basis.

It is hoped that the government will also see fit to play its part in immediately going ahead with a two river project. This is vitally needed by Canada if our industries are to expand and if there is to be any hope of increasing employment. I would also remind the government at this time that any hope for a useful national energy grid will depend largely upon the immediate development of both the Peace and the Columbia rivers.

I was pleased to note that the Prime Minister has given the house an assurance that legislation will be introduced in accordance with the practical recommendations of the O'Leary report as it relates to the magazine publishing industry in Canada.

The speech from the throne states that Canada's prosperity and growth must ultimately rest in large measure upon its exports. May I ask how we can increase our exports while at the same time we build up higher tariff walls? The only true basis of international trade must be the exchange of goods. Canada's prosperity and development depend on our ability to grow and on the ability of the Canadian people to use that which they are able to produce. We must expand if we are going to live. Social Credit regards continuing progress as being dependent upon new development and growth, and it is a basic law of divine creation that our trade and economic functions must be directed to this end.

Therefore we say that the prosperity and development of Canada depends on a trade balance, on Canadian consumers with money purchasing that which they are able to produce. Second, it depends upon a general decrease in the cost of living, which will mean cessation of the present inflationary trends. This means lower taxation as well.

Amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act will be welcome, but it is necessary that we follow up on our settlement problem as well.

It might be well to note here that the financial proposals for the commonwealth, made by the United Kingdom's Chancellor Maudling recently, are worthy of consideration. In the same way that we were in difficulty in the thirties internally with the gold standard so we are in trouble externally with the gold standard today.

The freest possible exchange of goods and services is an essential ingredient of a buoyant economy. Likewise the old pattern of high tariffs and economic isolation must be replaced with new and freer trade patterns. The commonwealth weakens about us and its influence diminishes simply because we do not have the courage or vision to launch out into the obvious. Prime Minister Diefenbaker missed a great opportunity for leadership at the recent London conference simply because he could not free himself from the old rationalizing indecision which has been characteristic of his administration. Today's freer trade requirements are not limited to the commonwealth; they must also apply to the United States, to the American hemisphere and to other friendly nations. But they must begin some place.

We must understand not only the truth of this, but the urgency of it. What better place could we find to begin such a policy than our next door neighbour? Talk of a world conference to this end sounds all too hollow in light of the increased tariff walls we build, even though we give them such high sounding names as "surcharges".

I must commend the Prime Minister for his first mention, as given in the throne speech, of the political implications of the European economic community as it relates to the treaty of Rome. It is well that the leader of the official opposition should remember that the strength of our nation and our way of life does not merely depend upon economic laws. There are laws, yes; immutable laws which extend far higher than this. One of the great heritages that we have in the commonwealth of nations is the parliamentary system of government which puts the democratic authority and responsibility back to the people rather than being vested in the constitution.

May I say here that the treaty of Rome, while good in its economic aspects, and while its benefits have been and will continue to be of much benefit to the continent of Europe itself, is outweighed by the political implications it contains. I would suggest that every hon. member of this house study this document before making any final decision as to whether or not he thinks Britain should be joining this political, economic setup at this time.

If only we could understand that Britain's need is not merely preferential treatment for commonwealth countries, not merely industrial competition from Europe, but simply that of raw materials and markets which can be far better obtained within the commonwealth itself, then we would immediately demand a commonwealth trade conference with full preparation and study. Thus we come to many of the problems that we have been hearing about today and yesterday.

At this particular time I think we should remind ourselves very carefully, each one of us as members of this house, that we have a responsibility to Canada, to our electors, to each other and to parliament. Therefore we maintain that we must face up to the legislative needs of Canada at this time. Canada desperately needs legislation; she desperately needs to have the confidence of her people restored in the processes of democracy and in those who have the authority for government.

Therefore at this time—I will at a later time finish the remarks I have to make—I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), that the amendment which was proposed last evening by the leader of the official opposition be amended by inserting after the word "advisers" and before the word "do" the following:

—having failed to pursue economic and financial policies based on Social Credit principles—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Printing money.

Mr. Thompson: Nobody said anything about printing money. I noticed that some of the proposals of the leader of the official opposition had been copied right out of our last election platform. Hon. members should stop laughing, before they go too far. To continue:

—having failed to pursue economic and financial policies based on Social Credit principles, designed to establish a balanced economy and relieve the burden of public debt and public debt charges, thus assuring Canadians a standard of life compatible with this nation's capacity to produce—

The amendment as amended would then read:

We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers, having failed to pursue economic and financial policies based on Social Credit principles, designed to establish a balanced economy and relieve the burden of public debt and public debt charges, thus assuring Canadians a standard of life compatible with this nation's capacity to produce, do not possess the confidence of this house.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would continue with my remarks. I think I still have a few moments left. The objectives for a world trade conference are commendable and good, but may I remind the government that you must start some place, and what better place to start than the commonwealth itself?

It is interesting to note that the Prime Minister has endeavoured to build confidence in Canada for foreign capital. Why is not something done about building confidence in Canada for Canadian capital? How can we expect Canadian owners of Canadian capital to invest their money in the development of their own country when they can receive more profit with less risk by investing in the debt of a deficit financing policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: However, if the house grants unanimous approval, the hon. member may continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this point it is well for us to understand, in general terms at least, the different capitals with which we have to work. Adam Smith understood this when he realized that labour and land were not sufficient; that in a mechanized world capital is necessary. Today, as automation takes over, how much more necessary is it for us to understand the basic purpose of capital if we are to survive at all as a free way of life.

We have tax capital. Tax capital is the money which the tax collector takes from your pockets, my pockets and the pockets of all Canadians to pay for the services which government renders. Governments have no source of capital except as they take it from us, the taxpayers, or as they use our credit to borrow money to make up deficits. I think the sooner we understand, the better. I suggest to hon. members of the house on this side that the sooner we remember that the only money governments have to spend is tax money, the better off it is going to be for our economy. You cannot get something for nothing when it comes to paying the cost of services of government.

Second, there is commercial capital, which has better been called production capital. This is the capital which comes from our savings and which is rightfully used for the development of our resources and the carrying on of our commerce. This is the kind of capital that earns a profit. There is nothing wrong with profit. Some of our hon. friends would make "profit" a dirty word. Profit is nothing more or less than the earnings of the invested capital as it produces our needs.

The trouble in our country today is that our production capital lies idle when it should be at work developing our country. If 25 per cent of this type capital today that lies idle were put to work, there would be no shortage of capital and we would not have to be crying for capital from outside the country.

I should here like to mention a third type of capital which is most important to us right now. This is public capital. Public capital is capital which is used to construct and make possible our public projects which do not earn a profit. I am thinking of schools, hospitals, highways, bridges and canals. This is the type of capital we must have to finance the capital development of our public or social needs.

We in this corner of the house maintain that this capital should not come from the commercial market. It should come from a municipal development bank as an integral part of the Bank of Canada. May we remember here that such capital does not earn a profit. Do we earn a profit on schools, highways, hospitals or canals? No. Instead, it facilitates a service. Public capital under the present system is drawn off the commercial market at high rates of interest. As a result, the cost to the taxpayer of all public developments in this country is more than double the cost of the actual construction itself. As an example, board sidewalks costing $100,000 in 1912 cost the Vancouver taxpayer $345,000 by the time the final payment was made in 1962. The paradox of this is that those sidewalks never earned a cent of profit and they rotted away more than 30 years ago.

The real purpose of a municipal development bank and not that of a municipal fund, which just takes more money to redistribute to the others, is to supply the credit which is necessary for the construction of our public capital works and this is one of the most urgent needs at this moment in our economy because unless this type of expansion can go forward this winter we shall be facing one of the grimmest winters we have experienced for many a year. While I do not claim to be a prophet nor a son of a prophet, I am sure that by next spring we shall have 20 per cent of our work force unemployed, together with a cost of living higher than it has ever been. This is something we shall have to face in this house in this parliamentary week. Canada stands at a crossroads in her history and the crisis centres right here in this house. It is essential that we should face up to it and meet the responsibility which is before us. What does this involve? On the part of the government—and I think this is very important—it must be remembered that this is a house of minorities. They must acknowledge that they do not have the trust and confidence of the Canadian people generally; they form a government only because they have the largest minority group. The government and its supporters must recognize that the policies and program which they have followed in the last five years are responsible for the loss of public support and therefore they must be willing to give heed to some of the recommendations from the other parties whose combined public support represents nearly two thirds of the electorate.

The Liberals, as the official opposition, must recognize that the situation in Canada today is not a normal set of circumstances but a national emergency. Statesmanship requires that they should forego their traditional political procedures and give precedence to a position dictated by the national interest.

We in this corner are not responsible for the government's decisions. We will use this opportunity to give leadership and a practical demonstration of statesmanship as against the jockeying for partisan advantages which the prevailing situation invites and which is so characteristic of both the larger parties.

What is our practical approach? To be practical it is essential that we look at the facts. The confused situation facing parliament obviates clear thinking and brings into focus two specific issues. First, with regard to external affairs, a realistic program is needed to solve the balance of payments problem. Obviously, temporary emergency measures cannot solve anything. We cannot expect to return to normal conditions and progress if we maintain these emergency measures. It is essential that external credits be granted, using the Bank of Canada to increase exports for the good of all the people. To increase exports is a more logical approach than the curtailing of imports except when domestic production will not increase consumer costs.

Internally, there is an urgent need to create circumstances which will assure a buoyant and confident internal economy. We need: adequate capital for industrial expansion; adequate consumer purchasing power, and adequate social measures for large-scale municipal growth and improvements.

Thus, I think we must rise above those things which divide us politically, to the level of the statesmanship which the nation needs at this time. Let us have a few months at least free from partisan considerations. Let us keep Canada first. Our party recognizes and acknowledges the facts with respect to its own position in parliament. No one has the confidence of a majority. Collectively, we all represent the public will. In this regard there is a particular responsibility resting on the government party, since they form the government. Social Credit is determined to follow the role of statesmanship. This is the only approach. I appeal to each party, to each individual member of this house, to consider their responsibility. If this responsibility is rejected, the only outcome would be a national crisis.

In five short years we shall be celebrating the hundredth anniversary of our nationhood. Before this historic milestone is reached, the people of this land will have to reach a decision. They will have to decide whether they will continue to blunder along the path of confusion and indecision. This decision may well be as vital as was the decision which first united the foundling provinces of this great nation. Shall we continue down the road we have been travelling to the inevitable economic and financial crisis to which our debt system has been taking us? Shall we continue to believe in a system which says we never had it so good and then, the next week, have to tell the people that the country is going broke? Shall we have confidence in a system which told us in 1957 and again in 1962 that we were in the midst of a period of economic expansion only to wake up to find tight money and high interest rates holding us back?

Would it be better to turn to the left and sacrifice the remaining vestige of freedom and dependence, first to the false hope of socialism and later to communism which is the socialist's ultimate destiny? True, it would be an alternative to the old way admitted even by those who profess free enterprise but who, in their expediency, have become the apologists of the very philosophies which they preach.

Or shall we turn to what is right and set our feet on a new path which will lead this nation into an era of prosperity and freedom with opportunity for all? This is the problem to which hon. members must find an answer as we face our joint responsibilities in parliament toward the needs of our nation at this time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I take advantage of this first opportunity to congratulate the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the motion. Their thoughtful presentations bore testimony to their concern about the problems which face Canadians at this time.

No doubt hon. members have noticed with interest that there is an unoccupied seat to my left. I must explain to them that there are many people in the constituency of Burnaby-Coquitlam and all across Canada who are doing all they can to see that Mr. T. C. Douglas graces that seat after October 22.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the aggregation opposite us mentioned the word "statesmanship" on half a dozen occasions and then ended up by placing his group in the same position as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) attempted to place the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Hellyer: Explain.

Mr. Herridge: I think my hon. friend opposite understands what I mean. I do not like using the word the Prime Minister used. The limited time at my disposal does not permit me the luxury of gnawing on the bone of partisan trivialities. Therefore, I intend to take the time at my disposal to present a synopsis of our program to the house. Other members of this group will deal in more detail with particular aspects of the throne speech and our program, will give a thoughtful analysis of the economic situation as we see it and of our proposals, and make certain criticisms, comments and observations on the speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), and my hon. friend opposite.

However, before proceeding I must say this. I think a good many members will agree with me that a considerable portion of this very important debate has been considerably below par. I think we have a definite responsibility to the institution of parliament and to the Canadian people. So far as this group is concerned, it accepts its responsibility. It will continue to do all it can to maintain the dignity of parliament, promote respect for parliament, and make it function more efficiently for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the members of this party have tried their best to receive the speech from the throne with a broad mind and in as charitable a fashion as possible. It has been very hard. We have listened carefully for any hint or suggestion of protective measures to deal with the many serious problems which face Canadians today. I must admit, however, that looking for positive measures in this throne speech requires a degree of optimism equal to that of the man who looks for eggs in a cuckoo clock. Government promises in the throne speech remind me of the huckleberry crop in British Columbia this year. In April the huckleberry bushes were replete with blossom; blossom was on the huckleberries everywhere in profusion. Then we had a few chilly days in May, and we have not had any huckleberries in September. I think that illustrates very well the government's promises and the indications of what the government intend to do so far as this speech is concerned. I think it is quite safe to say that the majority of Canadians generally now realize that the government's performance has fallen far short of its promises since 1957. Anyone who has read the record throughout the years will fairly agree with that, I think. Government ineptitude, lack of purpose and lack of direction have been repeatedly demonstrated. My time does not permit me to go into numerous illustrations, but seeing that the subject has been mentioned this evening, I want to bring one illustration to the house which I think shows this perfectly. Time will permit me only to give this one illustration of the government's lack of purpose, policy and program, namely, the tragic desertion of principle and capitulation to the premier of British Columbia in the matter of the Columbia river treaty. I wish to point that out. It is a most unusual circumstance. Never before in Canadian history have we had cabinet ministers telling the public a few months before that such a course of action would betray the interests of the Canadian people, who then turned around later and did just that.

Now, two paragraphs in the speech from the throne concern us. They are that:

> It is hoped that arrangements will soon be completed that will make it possible to submit for your approval the Columbia river treaty and the legislation required in parliament to implement it.

The second paragraph is:

> My ministers have come to the conclusion that large scale, long term contracts for the export of power surplus to Canada's needs, present and potential, should now be encouraged in order to expedite the development of major power projects in Canada which are too large to be supported by the domestic market. Such exports can also strengthen our balance of payments.

There is a reason for this about-face. This government is hungry for dollars, and is willing to sell this country out to get some quick dollars through the signing of the treaty, and surrender to Premier Bennett. This is a different course of action to the former course and it has been taken by members of this government from the Prime Minister down.

I would like to quote the Prime Minister on February 11, 1957, as reported on page 1158 of Hansard. He said:

> Also in connection with power development which is so necessary we believe that Canada's right to the potential hydroelectric power latent in international rivers in Canada should not be parted with under any circumstances, and that the benefits of such hydroelectric power should be preserved for the ultimate use of the people of Canada.

Can we square that statement with the government's present policy? I will not go into the details of this—there will be opportunity later—but I do want to emphasize and to demonstrate this complete reversal of policy, which indicates the instability of the policy of this government. On September 16, 1961 there was an address by the Hon. W. A. C. Bennett, premier of British Columbia, to the associated boards of trade of central British Columbia, at Prince George. During this address Mr. Bennett spoke in critical vein of the treaty, repeatedly quoting Mr. Stewart L. Udall, secretary of the interior of the United States, to indicate what a good treaty this was for the United States. At one point Mr. Bennett said:

This is the deal which the zealous—and in my opinion, extremely naive—chief Canadian negotiator, the Honourable E. Davie Fulton, wants British Columbia to buy.

Then later the "Hon. Davie Fulton" went to Prince George to reply to Mr. Bennett, and I have a copy of his manuscript in my office. The minister spoke on November 28, 1961. Mind you, this is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton) in this administration speaking. He said:

The Americans haven't been offered such a windfall since the purchase of Manhattan Island, unless, of course, it was the Bennett-Kaiser deal the federal government stopped in 1954. Now the pattern is repeating itself and the sellout will have to be prevented again.

Then again, here is another quotation from the same speech:

Of course American government and other officials are hoping that Ottawa will adopt this policy. Of course Mr. Bennett is using this as a squeeze play, but Canadian government policy is still made in Ottawa not in Washington and Victoria as Mr. Bennett would like to see it. Canadian government policy will continue to serve Canada's best interests, not those of the United States.

Then Mr. Fulton went on to say:

Why did the Bennett government and the federal government set the treaty up on the basis that we should get back 50 per cent of the power generated in the United States?

Because we knew that this was the cheapest power British Columbia will ever get anywhere.

Because we knew that this meant better chances of British Columbia competing in Canadian and world markets.

Because we knew that this improved our chances of getting new industries—creating more permanent jobs—not temporary construction jobs, but permanent industrial jobs—

The Bennett plan makes sure that the transmission lines go just one way—south—

Canada is opposed to the sellout of the power we are entitled to under the treaty. Canada is opposed to long term contracts tying up Columbia downstream benefits. This would confer an enormous benefit on the Americans, but we are not prepared to permit that at the expense of British Columbia. The Bennett-United States squeeze play won't work. The power sellout has to be resisted—

To exchange it—

That is, the present Columbia treaty.

—for a penny-wise and pound-foolish agreement under which this country would dispose of a great resource in its entirety would be sheer madness.

It would be an act of such reckless and improvident philanthropy that would make this country the laughing stock of the world.

The Minister of Public Works made these statements when he was minister of justice and when he was chairman of the negotiating committee. This will take some explaining to the people of British Columbia, and I can tell you already that there are telegrams from trade unions and other groups in British Columbia coming to our office. This is going to be an issue in British Columbia. Let me say this: the debate on this treaty, when it comes before the house, will rival the pipeline debate. There is going to be a really good debate on this great issue. I note that the government's final promise in the speech from the throne reads as follows. I say "promise" because I am always a little bit leery.

You will be asked to abolish closure and to re-establish the special committee on procedure of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit me to ask him a question at this time?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman noticed that this is not the third session but the third parliament to which that promise has been made?

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I am fully aware of that fact. That is why I qualified my statement when I said that it was the government's final promise. I look upon it only as a promise, yet. However, I am appealing to the Prime Minister's sense of sportsmanship in view of what he had to say in the pipe line debate. We all remember the Prime Minister's strong opposition to the application of closure during the pipe line debate and his promise that a Conservative government would abolish it. There are many hon. members who will recall his rousing remarks on that occasion, this champion of the Canadian Bill of Rights and of that sort in this house. We trust he will stand by his principles, his assurance and his promise by making certain that the house will have the opportunity to deal with the abolition of closure prior to the introduction of the Columbia river treaty. I think that is a very fair suggestion. I could go on for hours on this subject. My office is full of material. Let me also say this. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are not fully aware of this situation. They live in eastern Canada and they do not understand what it means to thousands of people in British Columbia. However, I am speaking for thousands of people in British Columbia when I mention this matter with respect to the Columbia river treaty.

In the main the throne speech concerns itself with economic affairs. Once again we find the Conservative government can look at exactly the same evidence as everybody else and yet come up with an observation all their own. It is very clever of them. The rest of us look at the dominion bureau of statistics figures which show that average annual unemployment in Canada has hovered around 7 per cent of the labour force during the last four years and that last year the per capita real gross national product was less than it was in 1956, and we arrive at the conclusion that this is a very shoddy performance.

For example, a recent report by President Kennedy's committee on unemployment revealed that the United States has the highest unemployment of any non-Communist industrial country, with the exception of Canada. I noted that the leader of the official opposition mentioned that matter in his speech. Canadians are noticing it. On this matter I am getting letters cut out of papers and underlined. The facts are being impressed on a good many Canadians. The government, however, interprets exactly the same set of data to mean that the economy has moved ahead sharply. This seems very odd to me and to the other members of our party, but doubtless these are mysteries which mere mortals like myself cannot hope to comprehend.

It came as no surprise to most of us that the government is determined to continue the austerity program. What I think staggers the imagination of anyone who thinks seriously about these things is this. The government thinks it can provide a million new jobs over the next five years and keep the austerity program at the same time. Tight money and reduced government spending are bound to increase unemployment and further restrict economic growth. These are, from our point of view, exactly the wrong policies to adopt in our present economic circumstances. All across the country the cry has been taken up that the time has come for Canadians to tighten their belts. In an economy such as ours we believe this is dangerous and misleading nonsense. Belt tightening policies might be called for if we already had full employment, were producing at full capacity, and were in danger of inflation. But to tighten our belts now can only prolong and aggravate the high unemployment and sluggish economic growth which have been this country's shame for the past six years.

I just want to deal with this aspect of the matter. Let us consider the tight money policy for example. With interest rates of 5 per cent and 6 per cent the provinces and municipalities will be unable to borrow the funds they need for essential social capital investments. Everyone knows that all across Canada there is a tremendous need for social capital of all kinds for schools, houses, hospitals, roads, bridges, public power, slum clearance, urban renewal, parks, recreation centres and the like. The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities has brought these matters before the government on more than one occasion and I have discussed this matter with officials of the federation. Not only are these projects desperately needed by our society now; they are also capable of creating thousands of jobs for unemployed Canadians and for those thousands more who will enter the labour force over the next few years. There are thousands coming into our labour force every year. Many of these projects are the responsibility of the provincial and municipal governments. On behalf of this group I wish to emphasize that in order to carry out investments of this magnitude they must borrow money. But when interest rates are as high as they are now under the tight money policy, we find this situation.

I wish my hon. friend the leader of the aggregation opposite me had been in this house when their former leader, Mr. Low, used to talk about the tight money policy. The hon. gentleman sang a very different tune from that sung by his predecessor in the years gone by. At any rate, when interest rates are as high as they are now under the tight money policy, the provincial and municipal governments will be unable to borrow and will have to abandon their plans for social capital and public works construction. When these things are abandoned, thousands upon thousands of potential jobs will be lost to the Canadian economy. There is no question about that matter. Tight money also restricts the investment plans of small businesses. Small business is noticing this throughout the country and small business is beginning to turn towards this party of social progress to come to its rescue. More and more people are beginning to realize that we are the ones who believe in the mixed economy, public ownership, co-operative ownership and legitimate free enterprise, particularly small business.

Mr. Thompson: It will eliminate it.

Mr. Herridge: Moreover, it strikes the home builder and compels him to abandon his plans for building that new house until he can borrow money on easier terms, with the result that the construction industry sags and more jobs are lost. All this adds up to one thing namely greater unemployment, both directly and indirectly, now and in the future.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when I was enjoying my dinner and noticing the large number of people who were enjoying their dinner in comfort, I could not help thinking of the millions in the world who go to bed hungry every night, and of the task we have to set things right both at home and abroad, a task that will tax our humanity, integrity, intelligence and industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we rose at six o'clock I was questioning the statement that the government's policy would create a million jobs in five years. I said I would like to know how. I may say that equally disastrous is the government's determination to make large cutbacks in government expenditures. From our point of view it will be particularly harmful if those cutbacks take place in public works and social capital. This is precisely the sector of our economy where a much higher level of investment is needed and which has the greatest potential for creating new employment. This is a self-liquidating investment which returns something to our society throughout the years. A cutback in expenditures here will depress employment directly.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, it is not only this government's projects that will cause a loss of jobs. It must be remembered that each employee on these projects will be spending part of his wages and salary on the goods produced by private industry, thus expanding employment and production in that sector of the economy as well. Therefore, the members of this party say that when the government makes giant cutbacks in government expenditures it costs jobs both in public and private industry. We fail to see how we are going to get economic growth, rising employment and production as promised in the throne speech on this basis.

The austerity program is diametrically opposed to economic expansion. When the government talks about using austerity to promote prosperity, I am reminded of those governments in Canada and the United States, as well as Britain, during the thirties, that thought the way to solve the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty was to get rid of the plenty. Surely, Mr. Speaker, a great many members in this house can remember the policies of former president Hoover, of Britain going off the gold standard, and the consequent unemployment in Great Britain and then in Canada. We remember exactly the same austerity program under former prime minister Bennett which created great hardship when the stability of money was of more concern than the welfare of human beings.

We in the New Democratic party are convinced that you can only get full employment and economic expansion through a system of democratic planning. Now, you know, planning has become very popular. I recall some years ago the leader of the group opposite rising in this house and saying—and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) remembers the occasion, and you will find it in the record—that anybody who suggests economic planning in Canada is suggesting reducing the Canadian people to slavery. Well, we have had an impact on thinking people in Canada. Planning has become quite respectable. Even the heads of big corporations realize there has to be a measure of planning, and so does this Conservative government realize it. But our point is that this economic planning must be under the direction of this house which is responsible to the people of Canada, and not the directors of big corporations.

We note, Mr. Speaker, that the throne speech makes special mention of a national economic development board, but as usual the wording used by this government in throne speeches is very vague in relation to the jurisdiction and powers that this board will have. I must say that from past experience we are very suspicious of the exact meaning of this wording. We are waiting with interest for some elaboration of the proposal, some details of what is actually meant. Will it be a serious effort at economic planning in Canada on the part of this government, in co-operation with provincial governments and other levels of government, or will it turn out to be a second cousin to that mammoth hoax the productivity council? This is the question we are asking.

The New Democratic party has made clear its policy on economic planning. We have also made it clear what we do not regard as planning. For example, planning does not mean mere economic forecasting. It does not mean just a review of what is already happening in the economy. It does not mean a mere announcement of economic goals. It does not mean the mere lumping together of the separate programs of government departments. Finally, it does not mean simply the exchange of information and advice between the government and a board of advisers. It goes far beyond that.

Democratic economic planning, Mr. Speaker, as understood in this party and by an increasing number of Canadians at this time consists of four things. In the first place, it is an account of the possibilities in Canada. It is an estimate of what the economy can do, of what it might do this year and next year and in all the years of the foreseeable future. The range of choice is enormous when one applies his thoughts to this question. How much education are we prepared to provide today? We in this group believe that every Canadian child, regardless of where it lives or the economic circumstances of its parents, is entitled to all the education of which it is capable of taking advantage at the expense of us all. How much northern development should there be? Now, our northern development would extend beyond that unconventional project of the government's last year in the Yukon, but which had a great deal of news value. I am all for preserving these historical sites, but we have to set our "sights" much higher than that. I mean that in several senses.

What kind of industrial investment is required in this country? What combinations of all these things are possible? Now, Mr. Speaker, we have the mechanisms, we have the services in federal government. They have them in the provincial governments. You would be surprised at the number of persons in private industry and in local organizations who would be willing to co-operate with the government if it had a purpose, a plan which was prepared and in which they were asked to co-operate. We simply fail to take advantage of the reservoir of goodwill that exists amongst the Canadian people. I am one of those who believe that we have to provide the morale equivalent to that prevailing in wartime; we have to stir the people to believe that they are proud of this country. I am a Canadian and proud of it. We have got to get them thinking of national problems and get their co-operation in national projects and objectives.

I think all of us realize that in an unplanned economy there is a feeling of inevitability about what happens. Indeed, I meet people today who ask "What is the use"? because they realize they are capable of starting this going and getting it in motion, and that sort of thing, but this inevitability is taken as an excuse for poor economic performance by governments, and by private industry in some cases, but a planned economy shows how wide and rich the possibilities are from which we can choose. This will be democracy in action. Here we will have people applying themselves to the maintenance of political freedom and working at the same time towards the extension of our economic freedom.

I suppose I should interject at this point that we would set up a planning board, consisting of economists, engineers and other experts whose job it would be constantly to conduct studies of the Canadian economy, draw up goals and priorities and the means for implementing them, and report regularly to the government.

In the second place a democratic economic plan is the discovery of what people actually want. It is not just making them want a lot of the tinselled, useless things peddled to them today which create standards for false values. We would find out what the people should want, and do want in the majority of cases. I represent a constituency of good solid Canadians, 50 per cent rural and 50 per cent industrial, but I find that the great majority of people do not understand what are the sound values in life, what are the things worth looking for and what are the things worth acquiring. We should find out what they want. We should give them a chance to express themselves instead of flooding them with the tinsel things on which they are asked to spend their money today.

In the New Democratic program we call for the establishment of an economic advisory council, representing business, labour, farmers and consumers. We say that a part of the function of this council would be to keep the government informed about how the people want their economy to perform and what they want it to produce. Of course the first things are the necessities of life for everybody.

Then, once the possibilities have been assessed and the choices of the people understood, the officials on the planning board—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that his normal period has expired.

Some hon. Members: Let him continue.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I want to express my sincere appreciation of this courtesy extended to me by the house. It is obvious that I am making converts wholesale.

Mr. Monteith: Don't be misled.

Mr. Herridge: Once the possibilities have been assessed and the choices of the people understood, the planners on the planning board should draw up goals for the economy based on the people's choices and within the limits described by the possibilities. This plan would be submitted to the cabinet and to parliament for debate in this house, and then for approval or otherwise.

Finally, democratic economic planning is the deliberate determined use of intervention and direction to attain the goals of the plan. We believe it is time that those responsible to the people determined the direction of investment, the rate of investment and the development of our natural resources. This is where our concept of planning departs significantly from planning as it is understood by the other political parties. The leader of the Liberal party, for example, bases his party's belief only in advisory planning. It was rather disappointing to hear this as I thought we had influenced him more than that during the last parliament.

Unless the government is prepared to intervene in economic affairs to ensure that the people's choices are translated into achievement, then any planning institutions the government set up would be next to useless. Democratic choice is denied in the unplanned, so-called free market economy. People do not choose unemployment and declining per capita production, but these things have happened just because of our unplanned system. The people want more social capital, more roads, more schools and hospitals, but there is no way in which they can express their demand for such goods in the private market, in the way that they can express their demand for an automobile or an electric toaster.

In the private market economy there is a wide range of choice denied to consumers. Unless planning institutions are created, and unless the government is prepared to intervene in the economy to ensure that the recommended and planned goals are achieved, then the government is not engaged in economic planning at all. Without planning, the performance of our economy will grow worse and social and economic democracy will be denied to the majority of Canadians.

Some may ask whether economic planning of the kind this party believes in has any relevance to Canada's present economic problems. We are convinced that it has. A New Democratic government would use its planning institutions to promote economic growth, full employment and a higher standard of living, and may I say that we look upon a higher standard of living as a development towards a higher social and spiritual life, because with a higher standard of living insecurity will have been removed.

This would lead us to policies which are diametrically opposed to the policies of the government as outlined in the speech from the throne. In particular it would lead us to reject tight money and any cut-back in government expenditure on public works. We would replace high interest rates by low, long term interest rates to encourage investment by the provinces and municipalities, and by small businessmen and home builders. An easy money policy of this kind would provide new employment and give our sluggish economic growth a shot in the arm. It is the wrong policy to reduce government spending at this time.

This party is not afraid of budget deficits when these are part of a plan to promote full employment and economic growth. The reason the very large deficits of the present government have not been successful in this regard is that these deficits have arisen as the result of mistake, and not as the result of planning. They have arisen largely as a result of our sluggish economy failing to yield the expected tax revenues, but properly and deliberately planned deficit spending is necessary to promote full employment at the present time. If people do not believe this then I would refer them to the economies of countries in western Europe.

Instead of reducing government expenditures, we would launch a massive program of public spending on social capital, on roads, hospital, public housing, transportation, education, natural resource development, urban renewal, slum clearance and so on. Not only would this fill a serious gap in the range of goods and services available to the Canadian economy but it would generate new incomes and thousands upon thousands of jobs, both in the public and private sectors of the economy.

In the days to come other members of this group will deal with our proposals in greater detail. We intend to put our proposals logically before the house. They are the result of considerable discussion and co-operation with economists, engineers, research people and other authorities, and we are putting them forward realizing that they are the result of the application of intelligence to the problems that face us today.

In addition to the measures I have already mentioned, other members will explain why the New Democratic party favours abandoning the pegged exchange rate of the Canadian dollar and returning to a free-floating rate, in order to meet our balance of payments difficulties without sacrificing employment and growth in the process, which a fixed rate inevitably does. They will present other suggestions for improving Canada's long-run balance of payments, and will comment on the trade and tariff policy of the present government in some detail.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I have, in general terms, presented the alternative program to the government's program, proposed by members of this party, and I sincerely and seriously urge hon. members of the house to give it their serious consideration.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my first words are of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. The mover is carrying on in this house a tradition established by his father, and his speech indicates that a long and fruitful parliamentary career lies before him.

As for the seconder, he spoke with eloquence, clearness and precision. He has shown himself worthy of the high reputation of distinction established in this house by his distinguished predecessor, His Excellency the lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Paul Comtois, to whom I present my respects.

Allow me also, Mr. Speaker, to tell you how happy we are to see you fulfil the position entrusted to you, being convinced that you will carry out your duties with competence and distinction.

I also congratulate the Deputy Speaker of the House (Mr. Chown) as well as the deputy chairman of committees (Mr. Paul).

Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign, the speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and his Liberal supporters were of course followed with great interest.

A few days before the election, the Leader of the Opposition stated in Montreal that in spite of the fact that he had no absolute confidence in Gallup polls, he was nonetheless under the impression that it would be impossible for the Conservative party to form a government on election night, June 18, and he was speaking in such a tone that he seemed sure that he and his Liberal supporters would be called upon to sit on the government side. The wonder, Mr. Speaker, is that ever since that memorable election, the Leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants keep on talking as if they were sitting on the treasury benches, without realizing that in fact Canadians across the country have denied them the vote of absolute confidence which they had asked, and without realizing that they are now—the hon. gentlemen must recognize that—

An hon. Member: Were you granted it?

Mr. Sevigny: —in the very same situation in which they were when the last parliament was dissolved.

An hon. Member: Oh no, I do not think so.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, since June 18, we have heard the Leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants make all kinds of statements which could lead the people of Canada to believe that at the opening of this parliament we would hear from them sensational statements and learn of a dynamic, progressive and constructive program which would brighten the future of the Canadian nation.

That is the reason why all of us yesterday listened during four hours with religious attention—

An hon. Member: What religion?

Mr. Sevigny: —to the marathon speech of the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: What religion?

Mr. Sevigny: While minutes and hours ticked off, we all wondered where was that dynamic program? Where were those extraordinary revelations?

An hon. Member: Not in the Conservative party.

Mr. Sevigny: In fact, after four hours, we realized that all the words he had uttered ever since June 18 were hollow and that far from being enhanced, the prestige of the Liberal party had definitely crumbled under the futility of the speech we have heard.

It is a difficult thing, Mr. Speaker, to summarize in 30 minutes a speech which lasted four hours, but this is perhaps made easier for me by the tedious wordiness we heard and the paucity of arguments contained therein.

We heard, for instance, the Leader of the Opposition vigorously criticize decisions taken by the Conservative government on the morrow of the election, decisions which were necessary because of prevailing conditions in the field of fiscal relations and had been approved by the Leader of the Opposition before they were officially made known.

We realize why the Leader of the Opposition and the members of his party had to approve the government's decision. They had to approve that decision because any other decision would have countered the best interests of the Canadian people. The immediate and vigorous action of the Conservative government was not ony called for, but absolutely needed.

The Leader of the Opposition and his lieutenants try to criticize the Conservative government's decisions on all the nation's hustings. Therefore, we might have expected the Leader of the Opposition to offer some solution in his speech. But you will have noticed that he was completely silent on that point.

The Leader of the Opposition and the other members of his party have, indeed, since the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) returned from the London conference, been trying to criticize and blame his stand at that vital conference for the Canadian nation. We hear on the radio, we see and hear on the television, and we see and hear in this house violent criticism of the Prime Minister's stand in London. Yet, what did the Prime Minister do in London? Can we blame this man for having gone there to defend the best interests of the Canadian nation? Can we blame him for having tried to strengthen the links which hold the commonwealth together, and which are so important for the economic security of this country and of the other nations who are partners in that magnificent enterprise? Can we blame the Prime Minister for having asked Great Britain to look after the interest of its partners of the commonwealth before embarking in a risky adventure with the common market countries, which might turn out to be harmful and detrimental to this Canadian nation?

Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and I ask all members of this house, whether it was not the Canadian Prime Minister's duty to go to London in order to defend the interests of the Canadian nation? Who, in this house, can blame him for having taken such action to safeguard the interests of our economy, and the interests of our fellow citizens?

(Text):

Over in London, the Prime Minister drew the attention of the commonwealth conference to President Kennedy's plan for the expansion of trade in the free world and to the similar, almost unanimous desire of commonwealth prime ministers. He therefore proposed that the conference should declare its intention to extend an invitation to all member nations of the commonwealth, of the EEC, the EFTA, the United States, Japan and other like-minded nations indicating a desire to meet at the earliest practicable date to consider how to deal with trading problems in a way which would be to their mutual advantage.

This proposal was greeted with enthusiasm in many private and top business circles in Britain which were looking for just such a lead from a commonwealth statesman as offering a possible third alternative to the choice between commonwealth and common market. Some of the British press gave this proposal the acclaim it deserved, notably the Daily Telegraph which called it the conference's only show of genuine inventiveness and originality.

After all, what would the Liberals have done if they had been over there in London? What would the Leader of the Opposition have done? How can the Leader of the Opposition speak of a North Atlantic market which would be in its scope way beyond the present common market structure while refusing to realize that there is merit in the suggestion that the leading nations of the world should meet in order to discuss their trading problems and in order to build a structure which would lead to prosperity and progress?

I am proud, as are all sane-thinking Canadians, of the attitude taken by our Prime Minister during the London conference. I believe that I represent the thinking of the majority of the citizens of this nation when I say that the attacks which are continually being made on our Prime Minister are based only on a desire by the attackers to acquire political power at any price.

May I suggest to hon. members opposite that they read an editorial which appeared in the Orillia Packet last September 27. This newspaper has a reputation for being of Liberal tendencies and has certainly never shown any indication of being particularly friendly to our Conservative cause. I quote from this editorial which reads as follows:

> History will show Mr. Diefenbaker to have been one of this young nation's ablest leaders. He took office at a time when the Liberals openly admitted they were pleased to get out from under at a time of apparent economic crisis. His government has introduced a host of measures which have improved the condition of most Canadians, and when the economy was again threatened he did not hesitate to adopt measures which are proving themselves completely successful.
> On his record he merits the respect of Canadians of all political persuasions. The bitter and unwarranted campaign of hatred and ridicule to which he is currently being subjected does not reflect credit on many of Canada's political commentators.

This is the opinion of one newspaper and the opinion today of the majority of Canadians. The only advantage which is being gained from this unwarranted criticism is that the majority of Canadian citizens are quickly becoming disgusted at the way in which hon. members opposite and their fanatical friends are talking about the Prime Minister and the quicker this happens the better it is for Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I said in my opening remarks, and I repeat it now, that we were all anxious to hear the dynamic, constructive and revolutionary program which had been promised us for such a long time by the Leader of the Opposition and his chief supporters, a program which was to launch our Canadian economy on its way to new summits, an imaginative and original policy which was to open up the minds to more and more new concepts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sevigny: Imagine our surprise, therefore, when we heard yesterday each point of that program. The Leader of the Opposition spoke first about a new expansion of the building industry. There I asked him: "Where have you been for the past five years?" Because, certainly, if there is something we can be proud of, it is the upswing we gave to the building industry by lending billions of dollars to the builders of this country through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which made it possible to build more than 500,000 homes across Canada. Compare those figures with the situation that prevailed in the days when the members of the Liberal opposition were sitting on the treasury benches. Then, only about $100 million were being loaned to the builders of the nation who were told: "If we lend you as much money, we will create an inflationary trend disastrous for the country." However, the present government has loaned 20 times more to this industry, and the financial experts of the country recognize that the buying power of the Canadian dollar in 1962 is not much different from what it was in 1957.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Liberal party now wants to try and offer vocational training to our young people, our older people and our unemployed. But where were our hon. friends during the last four years? Do they ignore that this policy of assistance to vocational and technical training is an accomplishment of the Conservative party? Do they ignore—and I have before me figures from the labour department to support this statement—that 435 new projects have been or are currently being carried out from April 1961 to the end of August 1962, for a total cost of $417,794,283, and that the federal contribution to these projects amounts to $267,133,355?

When our hon. friends talk of assistance to the municipalities, they apparently want to ignore the benefits accrued to the Canadian nation from our winter works program, which the members of the opposition are trying to ridicule. In fact, this winter works program is such a good thing that upon coming to office—where it will fortunately not remain for long—the premier of the province of Quebec hastened to adopt this dynamic and original program which has contributed to secure employment for thousands of Canadians during these last four years. The federal government has wholeheartedly and generously contributed $100 million to this program.

Mr. Deschatelets: Two months a year.

An hon. Member: You did not have it in your time.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the tender concern of the Leader of the Opposition for his distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), when he talks of improving the lot of the automobile industry in Canada. We share the view of the Leader of the Opposition that we should assist that industry. However, we Conservatives believe that we should not only think of that particular industry but of all the industries of the country, and that is exactly why we have gone out to conquer new foreign markets so as to obtain the orders which will not only make it possible for our industry to increase its production, but also to employ a maximum number of people in its factories.

Mr. Speaker, thanks to the various manifestoes put out by the Liberal party, we now know what the program of that party is. If ever that program were implemented, the Canadian nation would have a deficit of over $1 billion each year. How fantastic, careless, and thoughtless these gentlemen are. No wonder, in view of what they desire, that in another province, where another Liberal administration has been in power for two years, thanks to the utter insignificance of its leaders, and I repeat thanks to the utter insignificance of its leaders, that administration should now be obliged, after having been in power for 27 months, to skulk behind a curtain of excuse in order to hide its bad management and the failure of its province.

Mr. Deschatelets: Do you mean the Salvas commission?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, let us compare the futility of the program outlined by the Leader of the Opposition with what has been achieved by this government in the last five years. Let us compare the vacuousness of that program with the dynamic, progressive and creative measures outlined in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne outlines progress, advancement and hope for all Canadians. It announces the setting up of a national economic development board, which will allow Canadian experts to direct this country's business towards the achievement of new economic records.

Realizing the necessity of revising our whole taxation system, we have set up a commission to that effect. It will get to work in the very near future, and we believe that its recommendations will help strengthen the financial structure of our country.

This government is proposing measures which apply to agriculture as well as industry; it also proposes measures to help workers and farmers, and it creates for each Canadian family an increased purchasing power, in granting an additional tax rebate of $50 per child.

In the economic sphere or in any other field, the speech from the throne outlines a program which is to the advantage of the whole Canadian nation, a program which we are proud to propose to the hon. members of this house, and which we will always be proud to discuss with all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt you will have noted that we wanted, on the eve of the centennial of confederation, to create that atmosphere of unity which is so essential to the sovereignty of our magnificent country. No doubt you will have noted that instead of talking about sovereignty, of humility, our words were followed by deeds. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we will repatriate the constitution to adjust it progressively to our present needs. Because we, Conservatives, believe in unity, we will consult the provinces and we will choose together those symbols of our national sovereignty which Canadians have been demanding for so long but which have been refused constantly by the Liberal opposition of today and the Liberal government of the past, in spite of the fact that, during every electoral campaign, they promised to the province of Quebec the fulfilment of this long-cherished dream.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is untrue and you know it.

Mr. Sevigny: A great Liberal for whom I have deep respect and whom the hon. members of the opposition should take as their model, said once that a national flag should be a symbol of unity not disunity.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Firmly convinced of the truth of those words of a great man, the Conservative party has decided to create unity under that symbol. It is thanks to the efforts of the Conservative government that, in the near future, Canada will proudly raise its distinctive national flag over all buildings across the land.

When we get together in 1967 to celebrate the centenary of confederation and meet in Montreal, in the heart of Canada's metropolis, at the world fair which will attract tens of millions of visitors from all countries, we shall then be able to give those millions of people, who will bring this country a financial as well as a cultural contribution, the spectacle of a nation that has forged ahead, developed and expanded tremendously in five years' time and will keep on developing in the years to come through the efforts of our Conservative group of ministers and members.

In 1967, the Conservatives will be glad to welcome visitors from all parts of the world who will find Canada on the road to renewed recovery and prosperity, thanks to the sound administration of the Conservative government, which since 1957 has been correcting the mistakes of the previous administration, an administration which over 22 long years was instrumental in bringing on the economic recession we have known.

Members of the opposition would like to see a motion of non confidence adopted by members who do not share Liberal fanaticism. They should know however that it is with the present Conservative government that Canada can go ahead. This is why this motion, like the others, will be defeated as it deserves.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister allow me me a question?

Mr. Sevigny: Certainly.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is true that the leader of the opposition proposed exactly what the Conservative government has done in the last five years, why did the Prime Minister say this afternoon that it would cost more than $1 billion to carry out the program put forward by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, the measures that the hon. members of the opposition are trying to present as their own were implemented by the present government in keeping with accounting and financing rules.

An hon. Member: With continued deficit.

Mr. Sevigny: The difference between us and members of the opposition is that we have respect for figures, whereas the Liberal opposition is always rushing towards utter bankruptcy, whether here, at the federal level, if they ever come to power or at the provincial level, in Quebec, where they have been in power far too long.

(Text):

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my first words, of course, must be to extend to you my warmest congratulations upon your having been elevated to this high office and of course to extend the compliments of myself and our group to the able mover and seconder of this address. It was not an easy assignment which they took on in this 25th parliament. They certainly did it admirably and to the credit of themselves and their party. For this we commend them, respect them and wish them well.

May I at the outset speak for a moment with regard to the subamendment to my leader's amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). In doing so I am authorized to speak for my party and to say that we welcome this evidence of his willingness to support the amendment of our leader. He has indicated that willingness by offering an amendment which leaves intact and unchanged the expression of lack of confidence in the government. If the hon. member would agree to delete just five words from his subamendment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Matheson: —we would be prepared to accept it. Those five words are the words—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In recent seconds it has been impossible for the Chair to hear what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. Matheson: Those five words are the words "based on Social Credit principles". Leaving them out would surely not change the objectives of the hon. member's amendment and would demonstrate the sincerity of his profession in this his maiden speech in the Commons, namely that he wishes to put statesmanship ahead of petty politics. Leaving those words there can only be regarded as a political device to ensure the defeat of a motion which, if sincerely put forward, the hon. gentleman must want the house to accept. If he will agree to the removal of these five political words, every Liberal member in this house will support it. I commend to the hon. member for Red Deer the few lines from the writings of Roy Campbell:

> I will go stark, and let my meanings show,
> Clear as a milk-white feather in a crow
> Or a black stallion on a field of snow.

May I as a lawyer—

An hon. Member: You sound like one.

Mr. Matheson: —make a reference to a statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon which we cannot allow to pass in silence. The Prime Minister asserted that the emergency exchange program of 1947 was brought into force by order in council for which there was no statutory authority. The Prime Minister must know that the orders in question were passed under the Foreign Exchange Control Act, and that they could have no possible legal effect without statutory foundation. If I may, I should like now to touch on something that was discussed at some length today by the Prime Minister and by the Associate Minister of Defence (Mr. Sevigny). I am referring to those words in the speech from the throne which refer to the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers. Part of the speech states as follows:

> The commonwealth conference discussed Britain's negotiations with the European economic community and the economic and political implications for the commonwealth and its members of possible British accession to the community.

The speech then goes on to say this:

> Canada has a vital concern in these issues and the government will spare no effort to safeguard the interests of Canada while preserving the unity and strength of the commonwealth as a whole.

I should like to speak for a moment on this matter that is so important to everybody I am sure in Canada. In doing so, I think back to the time years ago when I was a small boy and had a younger neighbour who at times was irritating. Occasionally I was tempted to use my slightly greater size and administer a little bit of punishment. Whenever I got him on the ground he used to say, "Now John, remember you are British". That is the challenge we put to the Prime Minister tonight on this matter. We should like him to think of this matter in the sense that he is British. Barbara Ward, in her interesting little book written recently says this:

> I suppose we are all aware of the fact that we live in the most catastrophically revolutionary age that men have ever faced.

In 1936 H.A.L. Fisher wrote from the English point of view a book entitled "A History of Europe". It was an excellent book. The preface to that book is cynical because in it he said this:

> One intellectual excitement has been denied me. Men wiser and more learned than I have discerned in history a plot, a rhythm, a predetermined pattern. These harmonies are concealed from me. I can see only one emergency following upon another as wave follows upon wave.

All he could see was the play of the contingent and the unforeseen. I think the tragedy of our time in Canada is the kind of leadership we have now. Since 1936 great things have happened and there are patterns and harmonies that can be seen by those who have eyes and wish to see. When we look at this British subject today, I think we must look at it with a bit of depth.

May I refer to some of the problems of just a few years ago in world war I which we so quickly pass over and forget. I ask this house to recall that in the battle of the Marne in August 1914, France lost approximately 300,000 men. In that great battle, which some members of this house will remember, and which is spoken of as the miracle of the Marne, France actually held the situation together in Europe. The war memorial of St. Cyr to the class of 1914 is to the class as a whole. At Verdun we had practically the massacre of the French nation in the spring of 1916. The battle of Verdun extended over seven months. Those of us who are British in our background and our traditions remember the appalling butchery at Verdun. There are many Englishmen who think of France in terms of Verdun and the heroism of Verdun. Following that you will recall there were four months of the great battle of the Somme. Germany lost 500,000 men at that battle, the British 410,000 men and the French 190,000 more men. Some people in this house have some knowledge of the events of 1917: Ypres, Passchendaele. Two of the best men in my family remain there because of those battles. Then there was Cambrai and the battles that followed.

When we look at this great British problem facing us today I ask hon. members to think of it in terms of depth of this tragic history of war. France lost one out of 28 of the population. One out of every 28 was destroyed in death in world war I. Germany lost one out of 32 and England lost one out of 57. That is one of the reasons that Wilson approached this whole situation of Europe from the standpoint of an idealist and an outsider, a man who had been a keen student of the international scene, although he was in every sense an American. He put forward 14 points which became something of a vision to the rest of the world. You remember that these 14 points included open covenants of peace; freedom of navigation, removal of economic trade barriers and a great association of nations. Wilson summed up his ideas, you will recall, at the end of world war I by saying that what we are striving for is a new international order based upon the broad and universal principles of right and justice. Historians have described Wilson as forthright and stiff. Tiger Clemenceau—they say his belief in France was noble and sincere, but she was the only thing in which he believed. The French had suffered very grievously and they were cynics. Lloyd George was hampered by the ferocious demands of the British public. Their cry was, "Hang the Kaiser".

As we look back on that terrible time in history we can see that the spirit of the league of nations and the spirit of the treaty of Versailles were utterly incompatible. You recall, Mr. Speaker, that T. E. Lawrence, who gained his experience in the desert said that when we fought together we were thinking in terms of a new heaven and a new earth. Then he said that when we won the war and came home we found the old men came out, brought out all their old ideas and the victory escaped us. This is the situation we believe could develop today. We do not want old ideas. We do not want any old views. This is a time for new wine in new bottles. We want British vigour, British idealism and British traditions put to work in the modern world which has greater possibilities than any time in the history of mankind.

Christopher Dawson is an Oxford man who tells us that actually there has been more accomplished in the last 200 years from a standpoint of human progress, in spite of the butcheries and brutalities of recent years, than in all of recorded history before that time. Are we prepared to adjust to new situations or not?

I was mentioning, too, to this house, sir, something of the disappointment the people suffered in respect of the conclusion of world war I. Let me refer to an economist. I know some of the gentlemen on the treasury benches do not think very much of economists, but this is a man about whom we have had to think pretty seriously because he has had a great influence on events in Britain and indeed in this country, in the United States and in academic circles all over the world. I refer to J. M. Keynes. Lord Keynes was perhaps best known in early days for his book, The Economic Consequences of the Peace. You will recall that it was written at Cambridge in 1919. Let me refer this house to a few passages in this important historic book with respect to Europe, England and France.

He says that before 1870 different parts of the small continent of Europe had specialized in their own products; but, taken as a whole, it was substantially self-subsistent. He says that Europe, if she is to survive her troubles, will need so much magnanimity from America that she must herself practise it. It is useless for the allies, hot from stripping Germany and one another, to turn for help to the United States to put the states of Europe, including Germany, on to their feet again.

If the general election of December, 1918, had been fought on lines of prudent generosity instead of imbecile greed, how much better the financial prospect of Europe might now be.

Then, he goes on in this important book, which is actually one of pessimism, and he tells us that Europe consists of one of the densest aggregations of population in the history of the world. This population is accustomed to a relatively high standard of life in which, even now, some sections of it anticipate improvement rather than deterioration. He says that to succeed they must work together; they cannot possibly survive alone; that it was dangerous and destructive, for example, to take iron and steel and separate them, to put a boundary between them. He says that peace has been declared at Paris, but winter approaches. Men will have nothing to look forward to or to nourish hopes on. Who can say how much is endurable or in which direction men will seek to escape from their misfortune?

Then, he tells us that the opportunity was missed at Paris during the six months which followed the Armistice and that they will never be able to recover. He says that by a moderation of the clauses of the Versailles treaty, particularly related to coal and the exchange of iron ore there could have been a continuance of Germany's industrial life with great advantage to the production of the whole group and that a free trade union comprising the whole of central, eastern and southeastern Europe, Siberia, Turkey and the United Kingdom, Egypt and India might do a great deal for the peace and prosperity of the world.

If we read that book carefully, sir, we see actually many conclusions in it that are very similar to the conclusions that we find in Mein Kampf. The only thing is that he is looking at it from the point of view of a scholarly, broadminded Britisher, and Hitler was looking at it from the standpoint of a defeated person with a perverse psychiatric disorder. These two people looked at the same problem and actually what was predicted by Lord Keynes in 1919 came to pass. There was not the same destructive effect in Europe in world war II to armed forces but when we consider the destruction of civilians, the millions and millions of Jewish people, the many emigres of one kind and another, we must surely feel that this new thing that is happening in Europe today is something we must prayerfully consider.

I am going to ask you, perhaps, to leave that subject for a moment and look at England itself. Churchill tells us that England was at one time part of the continent. A wide plain joined England and Holland, in which the Thames and the Rhine met together and poured northward. A tremor caused the plain to sink a few hundred feet. Eventually another tremor occurred which separated the coast of Dover from Cape Gris Nez, and then tides did the rest. Actually, 55 years before our Lord the legions of Caesar were able to go to Britain and recognize very interesting similarities between people who had the same Celtic characteristics, in spite of their insular background.

What is the background, then, with respect to this British nation? I do not want to be facetious, but again going back to Churchill as an authority, he says that William, the illegitimate son of Robert, Duke of Normandy, and Arlette, a pretty tanner's daughter whom he saw washing by a stream, did not have a future in France. William's social position would not commend the respect he needed, and therefore he conquered England and established a new aristocracy. We can easily recognize that amongst the Scots there is a strong German strain, the same appeal of blood and kinship; among many British Druids and Gauls there is a very close relationship. There is an affinity between the Irish and the Spanish. In other words, the fact of the matter is that England has never been really separated from Europe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I hear a fairly substantial buzz of conversation in the chamber, which I think is rather unfair. I would ask for the co-operation of all to give the hon. member a reasonable hearing. Perhaps this conversation could be continued after ten o'clock.

Mr. Matheson: Sir, I have very little time left so I shall go on as rapidly as I can. We all recall the offer of the British cabinet on June 16, 1940 to France when General de Gaulle was authorized to offer Mr. Renaud an Anglo-French union. The offer was to the effect that the two governments declare that France and Great Britain no longer be two nations, but one Franco-British union; that every citizen of France will enjoy immediately citizenship of Great Britain and every British subject will become a citizen of France.

Just within the last few days I read something by Russell J. Clark, principal of the economic intelligence department of the Westminster Bank, London who said:

> Britain could become the political leader of Europe by joining the common market.

This is true because Italy and the Benelux countries are not happy with the idea of France or Germany becoming dominant.

France and Germany would both like to take the lead, but each would defer to Britain rather than to the other, not because of Britain's powerful industrial resources but because Britain has been able to show something to the world about statecraft and the development of principles of constitutional authority and democratic strength.

Surely we are the heirs of that great tradition, we the oldest member, a member for some 100 years, of this great and glorious family. Surely these times present new opportunities for us.

Barbara Ward, now Lady Jackson, an editorial writer of the Economist tells us that the most important thing about Britain's entry into Europe at this time is that Europe will then have a new outlooking attitude. It must not become the rich man's club. It will be England that will eventually join up North America and Europe.

We know this is the plan that Winston Churchill had for many years. He attended a meeting at The Hague in 1948, at which Leon Blum represented France, and said that the time had come for the European nations to co-operate and each give up some portion of its sovereign rights. I say that this point of view is completely incompatible with the kind of words we heard from the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), who is taking the narrow, nationalist attitude at a time when most countries in the world could benefit by the larger approach, this international approach, and particularly by the marriage between these two nations which have been the foundation of Canada—France and Great Britain.

I am not talking only about peace, although 20 years ago all we asked was the chance to come back to Canada to live and get by without further war. That has been granted us and the mistakes of Versailles have not been made this time. In large measure this was due to the Marshall plan and I only wish I had time to develop my remarks with regard to it. However, the leadership came not from Canada, not from us who are the heirs of the British tradition, but from the United States. The Marshall plan gave the world a new start and now there are great possibilities ahead for us if Britain implements its forward looking, brave policy of joining Europe.

We should look at some of the literature coming out of Germany. Ludwig Erhard has said:

> Our economic task—the employment of over 12 million more people than before the war—cannot be carried through but must founder in a cul de sac unless we create more air.

Britain needs more air too. The real situation is that Britain must survive. She must be strong and must be great. In the councils of Europe and the councils of the world mother Britain can give a leadership that she has not given in recent years. This challenge now comes to Canada but we are faced with the fact, even in the speech from the throne, that Canada is not prepared to accept the challenge.

Emerson says that genius is not knowing more than another person, not being more knowledgeable, but rather the characteristic of acclimatizing oneself to the particular challenges and opportunities of the moment, and with common sense and wisdom taking advantage of these events and moments.

"Sterile" was the word originally used by the London Times to describe the negative attitude of the Prime Minister of Canada, and of his government throughout, with respect to developments far reaching in their consequences not only to Canada but to every human being in the world. Britain's entry into Europe can provide a depolarization of the world from the perilous situation where two great powers, Russia and United States might again lead us into a world war.

We believe in the north Atlantic community. It is a challenge and we believe that it will come to pass. We must face up to the opportunities it presents, and shape our economy to meet them. The Prime Minister was trying to draw an analogy between the exchange crisis so recently experienced by his government and the so-called crisis in 1947. I would remind the house that the crisis in 1947 arose because Canada, having poured out her material resources during the long years of the second world war, was then pouring out even more for the assistance of England, and thank God she did. Now the situation is that if Canada withdraws her strength and her power from Europe, from NATO and even from Britain she will obstruct England in her fight for survival.

Mr. McIntosh: That is nonsense.

(Translation):

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my first words will certainly be to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Chaplin and Mr. Vincent), who performed their tasks exceptionally well and said very interesting things.

Since the opening of this parliament, I have been given the opportunity of making a few observations and also a few comparisons with the time I was sitting in this house, that is from 1946 to 1949.

One often hears it said that years come and go but are not the same. I have found, since yesterday, that years do come and go and that they are often the same. While I was here, in 1946, 1947 and 1948, things in this house were the other way around. The Liberals were sitting on the other side and the Conservatives, on this side.

When they were in opposition, the Conservatives spoke exactly like the Leader of the Opposition did for four hours without saying anything. The Conservatives who were then in opposition are now in power and they sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, and curiously enough, they are saying at this time exactly what the Liberal leaders were telling us in 1947, 1948 and 1949.

We are presented with a speech from the throne which should bring improvements to the lot of the Canadian people. Well, in that speech from the throne we see some projects outlined but no precision. Let us maintain austerity in a country as rich as Canada.

When have you ever seen, in Canada, a worm in a big apple starve to death because the apple was too big? When have you ever heard that, in a tropical country, a monkey on a banana tree starved to death because there were too many bananas on the tree?

And yet, here in Canada, where everything is plentiful—not one member in this house can say otherwise—there are 500,000 unemployed, and it is expected that their number will increase during the coming winter. We are told of misery in the midst of plenty.

When the Social Creditors ask for legislation that, instead of attacking private industry, instead of attacking the individual, would attack the financial system that does not take into account any of our country's physical possibilities, what do we hear? Statements of the kind we heard this afternoon: "Let us print more money. Let us print more money, without giving it any thought."

The matter was discussed not long after the elections on June 18, because after June 18 the Liberals and the Conservatives in Quebec held meetings to ask themselves: What is that Social Credit upsurge in the province of Quebec? Twenty six members here; 30 in all of Canada, but 26 from Quebec.

As I was saying, consideration was given to the upsurge of Social Credit. How could one account for the election of 26 Social Crediters?

I would gladly have suggested to both the Conservatives and the Liberals that they study the Social Credit doctrine itself instead of racking their brains. They would have seen what this is all about.

At this time, I should like to thank most sincerely the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) who has kindly relinquished his time tonight because I must be in Montreal tomorrow. A thousand thanks to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker, our country is undoubtedly extremely wealthy and yet, the Canadian people are constantly given the impression that it is absolutely impossible to develop our natural resources without foreign investments.

Now, there is nothing more stupid in my opinion than for our government to go around New York or Boston or elsewhere in the wide world, begging for leave to finance the development of our natural resources.

We have our wealth of natural resources, we have engineers, qualified personnel, labour force, we have men of good will, we have a Canadian society made up of all social classes, all prepared to undertake the development of our natural resources and increase our gross national product.

We have all that, but because we lack financial authority to put everything into operation, we allow bankruptcies to occur increasingly in Canada, we allow thousands of unemployed to live in near squalor and we can find no solution to such a situation and when the Social Crediters submit their solutions we hear such comments as those made by a member of the opposition a moment ago: "Strike out the words Social Credit from your amendment to the amendment and we will be prepared to support it".

It is quite clear, if Social credit was taken out of the program, we would be sitting with the Liberals or the Conservatives. That is precisely why my friends and myself are sitting here, but after the next election—which will come too soon for the Leader of the Opposition—at the very first opportunity we shall sit across the aisle instead of this side.

The inconsiderate printing of money has never been part of the Social Credit platform, and hon. members in this house know it.

What we of the Social Credit party advocate is that there be as much money as products and services for consumers, that is all. To the extent that Canadians promote production, let the Bank of Canada print the necessary money to enable production to meet the needs of the people. That is common sense regardless of political allegiance.

The emphasis is on ever-increasing productivity, while we talk about greater productivity. At the same time, we notice that a feeling of insecurity is growing everywhere in Canada. More and more, unemployment is plaguing our country. Everywhere, we hear the opposition, we hear the government, we hear our socialist friends preaching full employment: "A job for every Canadian". The more full employment is being talked about, the more automation and unemployment face us at home today.

What is the solution of the political parties, of the politicians and of the economists of Canada to the problem of automation now existing in our country and which will be called upon to play an increasingly important part in the next few years?

We are being told that it is a mathematical impossibility, a physical impossibility to create new jobs in the circumstances. Inasmuch as scientific progress replaces men in Canada, there is only one way to ensure the expansion of our industry: it is to give to the Canadian men, women and children a purchasing power which will allow them to buy the products of science, of machine, and of our industry. We shall therefore respect the human person, private property, private organizations, and private industries. At the same time we shall give to all Canadian citizens prosperity, security and freedom.

The problem of unemployment is not a problem of production or sentiment for Canadians, but a financial problem which is in the hands of consumers. When the consumers themselves will be able to finance an adequate national production, then we shall have security with greater freedom for each individual in Canada.

There is tight money in spite of unsuspected wealth; that is the result of the present system. Nobody dares attack the monetary system—yet it is that system which is defective. It is rather the individual who is attacked by debasing his personality. The human being is to be depersonalized.

There is more and more talk of economic planning. But when speaking of economic planning, many people—mostly those who are called ignorant—never have understood the country's economy. Those people believe in planning. It is my firm belief and deep conviction that it is not planning that we need in Canada, but rather money to allow us to do our own planning ourselves.

Let's take my own case. When I have money, I don't need the federal nor the provincial government to tell me what to do or not to do. I am free to do what I please. Others are not more stupid than I am. The government is substituting itself to human personality and subjecting it to shackles and plans. It is precisely against such shackles and plans that we are fighting everywhere in Canada at present.

Not so long ago, a little boy told me after the election: "Mr. Caouette, come and see my new-born pups." So I went to that little boy's place and in a two by two box I saw seven puppies.

An hon. Member: That's an old one.

Mr. Caouette: As old as my friend, it amounts to practically the same thing.

In the corner, are the seven puppies with their eyes closed (like my friend of the Liberal party who has just interrupted me), because puppies do not open their eyes before nine or ten days. Those puppies, through instinct alone, could find their mother in the far corner of the box even with their eyes closed. Deprived of intelligence, they could nevertheless reach the source of abundance.

We are intelligent, our eyes are open, but we are unable to see the abundance in Canada. How can such a thing happen.

Mr. Speaker, I could have set up a government for the seven puppies, with a system of shackles and plans, and told the yellow puppy: "You shall not go to your mother immediately" or told the black puppy: "You shall go at such or such a time". I could have prevented them from ever reaching their mother in the other corner of the box. I could even have starved them to death. This is exactly what the Liberals gave us for 22 years and what the Conservatives are giving now.

Mr. Ryan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Sure.

Mr. Ryan: Do these puppies need money?

Mr. Caouette: They use their instinct, while the hon. member has neither one nor the other.

(Translation):

And yet it was the Liberal leader, in 1935 the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, who said, and I quote:

(Text):

Once a nation has deprived itself of the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the law. When in control, usury will wreck any nation.

(Translation):

However, he never acted upon this solemn affirmation or declaration made in August, 1935, and it is for all these years that Social Credit, not only in Quebec but everywhere in Canada, has been asking for the return to parliament of this sovereignty, concerning money and credit in Canada, and insists on the issuance of orders to the Bank of Canada to the effect that what is physically feasible and desirable for Canada should be made financially possible. When we have the opportunity and the physical capacity to do something, to develop our natural resources, let the question of money be subordinated to these possibilities and money itself be put to their use, instead of seeing them nullified or left untapped owing to the lack of funds and credit.

One often hears those who oppose Social Credit say that there is no lack of money in the country. They say no, there is enough money but it is not circulating fast enough. In fact, it is somewhat like a rabbit caught in a hollow log 16 feet long. The rabbit will run from one end of the log to the other and when he sees you at one end, he will run to the other end; if he sees someone there, he runs back to the other end. Then, you ask yourself this question: At what time or at what speed must the rabbit run inside the log so that he can be seen at both ends at the same time. That is the speed of circulation of money in Canada.

It is said that there is no shortage of money in Canada, but how is it possible that 85 per cent of the Canadian people borrow from finance companies on two, three, four and even five year terms?

In the field of housing, mortgages are granted for periods up to 35 years. If these people had enough cash, they would not have to borrow from finance companies at interest rates as high as 20, 25 and even 30 per cent or to mortgage their salaries for the next three years to buy this year's production.

In two or three years, we will still have to face another more serious problem, just because the problem of money and credit will not have been solved. We are of the opinion that many reforms are needed in Canada, but none of them will be possible as long as a monetary reform has not become a fact, as long as we have not succeeded in putting the Bank of Canada at the service of the Canadian people instead of having the Canadian people at the service of a money dictatorship.

Mr. Speaker, we feel that the only way to reform the money system in Canada, at the social, economic or political level, is to think mostly of the consumer not the producer. Goods are being produced but as I say, the problem is that the consumer does not have the money to purchase the goods and services which are offered to him.

Why not tackle that problem and solve it once and for all? Afterwards, we could embark upon the necessary reforms at the economic and political levels, if you wish, and even at the social level, but the key to the problem remains the reform of the money system.

Some say that money is unimportant. No, money is not important for members of parliament and for big industries, but it still has some importance for most people. In a sense, money plays the role of a key in a door lock. If you wish to get inside a castle, the castle assuredly is more important than the key to it; however, if you do not have the key and the door is locked, you will simply be left standing outside. But on the other hand, if you hold the key with which to unlock the door, you will have access inside, and to the beauties of the castle, since the key will have done its job. Money should play exactly the same role in a well-organized and well-balanced economy.

Mr. Speaker, we hear people telling us of budget balance and balanced budgets. What does a balanced budget mean? What lies behind that? It is that the government decides not to spend more money than it has levied in taxes upon the people it governs and not to spend more than the total amount of tax collected at all levels. The economic activity of the country is thereby restricted, and instead of increasing the purchasing power up to the level of production, an effort is made to slow down production to the level of the buying power. By whom was this decision taken? By the majority of Canadian financiers who have exerted a great deal of influence. Everyone says that 75 to 80 per cent of the Canadian economy is in the hands of Americans, and yet we claim that we are a sovereign country in the free world.

We must regain possession of our rights and means of production through the agency of the Bank of Canada, a financial institution which belongs to the Canadian people. Let the Bank of Canada create credit at the same rate as the Canadian people produce goods and services.

We have recommended increased purchasing power not only during the electoral campaign but for the past 25 years in Quebec and for 30 years in the rest of the country. We have suggested various means of achieving this end. For example, the Leader of the Opposition repeated yesterday a suggestion already put forward by Social Crediters since 1945, that is to grant family allowances to all children who continue their studies until they are 21 years old. The Liberals have at least learned from Social Credit.

Then, we request the establishment through the Bank of Canada, of a new kind of credit based on the surplus of production over our total national revenue. Creation of that new source of credit through the Bank of Canada, would permit an increase of the old age security rates and its payment to those 65 or over, without means test and to those between 60 and 65, following a means test. This would permit a substantial increase of the old age pension which would allow our senior citizens to make a decent living in such a wealthy country as ours.

We also suggest an increase of family allowances proportionate to the cost of living.

Everybody knows that the cost of living has more than doubled since 1945 and that in 1956, family allowances were increased by the fabulous amount of $1 per child by the Liberals.

Mr. Speaker, we also suggest that no income tax be levied on any income of less than $5,000 a year. We, as members of the house, enjoy an almost identical exemption and we are quite happy about it. If that tax exemption is justified for members of parliament, it should also be justified for the voters who elected them last June 18.

Mr. Speaker, before closing, I wish to say to all members that we are in this parliament not only for one year but for several sessions. I am convinced that as soon as possible the whole of Canada will elect a Social Credit government which will put money to man's service. This is the wish I express before taking my seat.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

I recognize the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It now being ten o'clock this house stands adjourned until two thirty o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

It being thirteen minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 3, 1962

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

MEASURE TO REPLACE AND EXTEND PRESENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-50, respecting the expropriation of land.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a comprehensive measure relating to government expropriation. It will replace the present Expropriation Act. It is more than a mere codification or consolidation; it will introduce new provisions as well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE MAXIMUM INTEREST RATE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-51 to amend the Small Loans Act.

Mr. Speaker: Since we are now about to deal with private bills I think I should repeat the caveat I made the other day when so many were moved for the first time.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I rise on a point of order, and ask that you apply that caveat to government bills as well, because they could equally be out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I regret I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. Howard: My point is that the other day, and again just now, Your Honour entered a caveat with respect to bills standing in the names of private members. It is my suggestion that you should apply it also to bills standing in the names of members of the government, because they could also be at variance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Speaker: That may be so, but it is my opinion that bills introduced on behalf of the government have already received the scrutiny of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Howard: And that is infallible?

Mr. Speaker: I might point out that as far as bills which now appear before us for the first time are concerned, it is conceivable that one could be taken from a file on an hon. member's desk in typewritten form and presented to the Speaker, and I must therefore insist on the caveat which I voiced the other day.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT REQUIRING STATEMENT OF TRUE INTEREST RATE CHARGED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-52, to amend the Small Loans Act (advertising).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-53, to amend the Interest Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORT OF SPECIAL MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the announcement yesterday of the findings of the special mission to Europe of the national productivity council, to the effect that there were serious gaps in management-labour-government arrangements on economic and social problems in Canada, will the minister say whether he will take immediate steps to bring together responsible representatives of government, labour and management to study the report of the special mission, and to explore measures to be undertaken to deal with these problems?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have been studying these matters for quite some time. We have had several conferences between senior representatives of management and labour, one in Ottawa a year and a half ago and another last spring at Queen's University, both very extensive conferences. My department and the productivity council are working continuously with labour and management to try to bring about the same degree of labour-management-government co-operation—which has proved so effective in the countries of western Europe.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. In view of his reply may I ask the minister, who obviously has not read the special report announced yesterday, what steps the government is taking to meet the requests made by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Jodoin, with regard to his membership on the productivity council?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress chose of his own free will and accord, and for reasons of his own and of his congress, to resign his membership on the productivity council. The productivity council was sorry to learn of his decision to resign, and we hope it will not be long before perhaps he will reconsider and be back again as a member of the council.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether the government has asked the national productivity council to give consideration to putting labour's members on the council on a representation basis, as asked for by Mr. Jodoin?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as Mr. Jodoin announced when he told members of the press of his resignation, he mentioned a letter I had written to him outlining the government's wish that, at such time as the membership of the productivity council should be increased —and we hope that at some time in the future it will be—then the wishes he has put forward as to representation of labour on that council will be considered.

[Later:]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government that its proposed national economic development council, if it were established, should take over the productivity council?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a proper question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Later:]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the minister consider the resignation from the national productivity council of Claude Jodoin an indication of a lack of confidence of all organized labour in this body, or does he contemplate the appointment of an alternative labour representative?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the main purport of the question has already been answered by the minister in a reply to a question earlier this afternoon regarding the participation of Mr. Jodoin in the work of the productivity council.

Mr. Byrne: I have a supplementary question. Does the minister care to say whether he is considering the appointment of an alternative representative on this council, not necessarily from labour?

Mr. Hees: Not at the present moment, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. J. R. Nicholson (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wish to ask the minister if in the light of contemplated changes, necessary changes in the set up of the national productivity council by reason of resignation, consideration has been given to the appointment to the national productivity council of representatives of the universities.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, we have not gone into that much detail as to the specific people who might be asked at some future time, when the membership of the productivity council might be increased.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce make it clear that as the productivity council is now organized, nobody on it represents anything.

Mr. Benidickson: Just the Tory party.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very obvious to all hon. members of the house that the information the hon. member desires to be given to the house is pure nonsense.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST OF CIVIL SERVICE ASSOCIATION FOR SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the press report in the Globe and Mail of October 3, 1962, that the civil service association of Canada yesterday sent a telegram to the Prime Minister demanding that the federal government immediately rescind its freeze on salary increases to 50,000 civil servants, will the Prime Minister tell the house what consideration he is giving to this request?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): All I can say is that the information being sought is along the lines of that requested on several occasions. When the government is in a position to make a declaration in this regard it will be made.

Mr. Scott: Will the Prime Minister tell us what we are to say to these 50,000 people when we cannot get any response in this house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the answer is self evident.

A. S. WHITELEY—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I asked a question of the Minister of Justice in his absence. It was probably drawn to his attention by his parliamentary secretary, and I should like to ask it again, with your permission. Has Mr. A. S. Whiteley, a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, been given notice that on the expiration of his term in a very short while he will not be reappointed and, if so, will the government reconsider its decision?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the terms of office of two of the members of the restrictive trade practices commission, Mr. Whiteley being one of them, expire on October 31, and they have been informed as a matter of courtesy that it is not the government's intention to appoint them for new terms.

(Translation):

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATIONS OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house if his government will soon grant to civil service employees the increase recommended by the commission in its October, 1961, report.

Mr. Speaker: I believe replies were given on this matter yesterday, the day before yesterday or last Friday. The question was similarly put. Therefore, I do not think we are speeding things up by again asking questions which have already been answered.

INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while I have been nipped in the bud once, I blossom forth again on this subject in view of the urgency of the question and of representations made to me. In view of representations I have just received urging me to ask again about the government's attitude to the bid by Shell Oil to take over the Canadian Oil Company, would the Prime Minister assure the house that he will urge the directors of the Canadian Oil Company to put Canada first?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the government has no authority in this regard. It is beyond the jurisdiction of the government to act in his behalf, however desirous all Canadians are that ownership and management of our resources be in Canadian hands. Any action suggested by the hon. gentleman would be gratuitous on the part of the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THANKSGIVING DAY ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether, if this parliament is still in session, it is the intention of the government to have the house sit on Monday next, which is Thanksgiving day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not know about the preliminary portion of the question, or whether if it was not still in session that would be a reason for thanksgiving on the part of the opposition. If it is the general feeling of the house, as I believe it will be, that we ought not to sit on Thanksgiving day, I should be happy to make an informal motion in that regard if I were allowed to revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the Prime Minister may have unanimous consent to revert to motions with regard to this particular subject?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without formality I therefore suggest that a motion be placed before the house that we do not sit on Monday next, Thanksgiving day.

Mr. Speaker: Whether or not the Speaker came with his music today, I do not know; but in any event by unanimous consent Mr. Diefenbaker, seconded by Mr. Churchill, moves:

That when this house adjourns at 6 p.m. on Friday next it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 9, 1962, at 11 o'clock a.m. and that the provisions of standing orders 2 and 6 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

REPAYMENT COMMITMENTS UNDER CURRENCY EXCHANGE ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has Canada met her repayment commitments to the federal reserve system of the United States, the Bank of England and the international monetary fund under the currency exchange arrangements of June, 1962?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. With respect to No. 1, which was as to the government obligation, I can advise the house that no repayment obligation has as yet arisen in connection with Canada's drawing on the international monetary fund. With respect to the second part dealing with the arrangement between the central banks in question, may I say that the central bank arrangements referred to were for a period of 90 days and were renewable. They were renewed for a further period of 90 days on September 26 last.

REVIEW BY JUSTICE DEPARTMENT OF ORDER IMPOSING SURTAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice, or perhaps to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as the former minister of justice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Make up your mind.

Mr. Knowles: If they will both listen that will be fine. Was the order imposing the surcharge on imports, to which the Prime Minister made reference in this house yesterday, referred to the Minister of Justice for scrutiny under the terms of the bill of rights, in view of the obvious fact that it is a case of taxation without due process of law?

Mr. Speaker: If the Minister of Justice is willing to answer the question, well and good, but I would feel at this time that it is seeking a legal opinion from the minister. That, of course, is not the purpose of orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles: With due respect, may I express the view that I am not seeking a legal opinion. I waited for some days to see whether there would appear on the order paper legislation confirming the surcharge on imports. When it did not come, I wondered what was happening. Yesterday the Prime Minister referred to the fact that the government had done this under statutory provision. That led me to look up the order in question, and I ask, was this order referred to the Minister of Justice for scrutiny to determine whether or not it complies with the terms of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): The order in council providing for the surcharges was passed by council in the exercise of statutory authority conferred upon it by this parliament. Legal opinion to this effect was obtained from the law officers of the crown, the appropriate source for this purpose.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, may I ask whether it was from the law officers of the crown or from the Department of Justice?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think most hon. members are aware that the expressions are, for practical purposes, synonymous.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION OF WORK ON BY-PASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. S. Beer (Peel): I should like to address this question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the telegram addressed to the Prime Minister from the township of Toronto requesting that work on the Toronto terminal by-pass project be—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel that this question is clearly in transgression of the spirit of the rules with regard to questions. I do not think it is quite in order merely to draw to the attention of the house that a telegram has been sent with regard to a particular subject. The information being sought by the nature of the question "has a telegram been received" I think may be obtained otherwise than through questions on orders of the day.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think Your Honour might have listened to the question before ruling thereon. It is a matter of the expenditure of public money.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: If Your Honour will listen to the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I realize that some of the subject matters may be important in themselves, but the question here at issue is the urgency of getting information on orders of the day, and if we limit ourselves to that I think we can get our lines cleared. I have made my decision with regard to that particular question, and we can now go on—

Mr. Hellyer: That is the question I should like to address myself to, if you will just hear me for a moment.

Mr. Speaker: I have made my decision.

Mr. Hellyer: You have not heard the question. How can you decide it is not urgent?

Mr. Speaker: One does not necessarily have to hear the whole of the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: —in order to determine the urgency of it. I trust that hon. members will keep this in mind. I will do my best to have appropriate questions presented and appropriate answers given at this time, and I think those members in particular who have been here for years and are experienced in this matter, especially those who may have been in the ministry in the past, will also realize the true nature of questions at this time of the day.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask for guidance from Your Honour? Is it your ruling that questions should not be asked in respect of telegrams conveying information regarding the possibility and the necessity of employment in areas of surplus unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: The point I am concerned with is the matter of asking about telegrams and so forth. I realize that there are various important problems in regard to constituencies, but I do believe that the type of question that is put may be corrected. This particular question may be asked in some other form. It was the same way earlier this afternoon. I was tempted but refrained from mentioning the nature of so-called supplementaries. I do not believe they were supplementaries. They were related questions and quite in order as such, but as supplementaries they are not true supplementaries. They are related questions. The hon. member, who has a related question, must desist now, let somebody else have the floor and await his turn. Then he can continue his questioning if he has a valid related question. But these questions are not supplementaries; therefore there is always the risk of their being ruled out of order as supplementaries. This is as I understand the rules with regard to questions, and I think we can move along from that point.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not hear it because I sit at this end, but would Your Honour be good enough to tell me what the question was that you ruled out of order?

Mr. Hellyer: Will you hear argument on the urgency of the question which was being asked at the time you ruled? If you will, sir, I put forward with deference that this is a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member has seen the course I have indicated. I have not ruled out questions on that particular subject. I have ruled out the question on the basis of the way it was being asked, and I think the line is quite clear now. If the hon. member will rephrase his question in a way that is acceptable to the Chair, then I am quite prepared to hear him.

Mr. Hellyer: Will Your Honour now listen to the balance of the question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: It is a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. Speaker: I repeat that a question in that form is not acceptable to the Chair.

[Later:]

Mr. Beer: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for my ineptness in phrasing my first question. I have now reworded it and would like to address it to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister know that Canadian National Railways are proceeding to build level crossings in Toronto township, while a petition to prevent this construction has been before the cabinet as of August 21, 1962; and has any decision been reached?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I am sorry to tell the Leader of the Opposition that a telegram has been received by the Prime Minister, of which I received a copy, asking that the work by the C.N.R. on the terminal by-pass in Toronto township be halted. I do not think it was a request to provide work. It was a telegram asking the government to stop the work. That telegram was received yesterday, and it is under consideration.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED DISCONTINUANCE OF TRAIN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask the minister whether his attention has been drawn to the proposal of Canadian National Railways to discontinue trains Nos. 195 and 196 between Prince George and Prince Rupert, British Columbia, this month. If so, what steps are being taken to prevent this proposal, to ensure the safety and employment of the employees concerned, and to guarantee a proper degree of service to the communities involved?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, my attention was drawn to this matter, but I will answer the other part of the question tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INTERNATIONAL NICKEL CO.—PROPOSED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the expressed intention of the International Nickel Company to lay off 2,200 workers, comprising a 15 per cent cut in the work force of Sudbury, and directly affecting some 10,000 people; and in view of the proposed rotational work plan suggested to the management of Inco by local 598 of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: It is perfectly in order.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question succinctly without a lengthy preamble? We have to be fair to both sides.

Mr. Benidickson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the minister inform the house whether he or his department is in any way assisting to avert this lay-off?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Last Friday I met a delegation from this organization who presented me with a brief in which they suggested a rotation of work. I pointed out to them that this was not a matter which came within federal jurisdiction, and that it was entirely a matter to be left for the decision of management. I also pointed out to them that rotation of work had been adopted by mutual agreement between employers and employees in other instances in the past. I may add that I sent the brief that was presented to me to the president of International Nickel Company.

[Later:]

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have sent him notice. This is somewhat related to the question asked by the hon. member for Yukon, but I will try and make it more concise.

[Mr. Howard.]

Due to the lay-off of 2,200 men in the Sudbury area by the International Nickel Company, would the government consider stockpiling nickel and copper as a means of continuing full employment?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. However, it is more properly addressed to my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, who is free to answer the question.

Mr. Mitchell: With due deference, Mr. Speaker, I feel this is just as much a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce as it is for the Minister of Defence Production. As we all know, this company is in domestic and industrial markets—

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understood the answer, the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that the question could more properly be answered by the Minister of Defence Production. I do not believe the hon. member gave the Minister of Defence Production any chance to indicate whether he was going to answer.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, may I now ask whether the Minister of Defence Production will answer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely somebody in the government is interested.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I am always glad to answer, Mr. Speaker. It has never been the policy to stockpile, either under this government or the previous government, except items of strategic materials to be used in an emergency. Under the circumstances I cannot see that the situation warrants any stockpiling at this time.

PRINCETON, B.C.—SUGGESTED DECLARATION AS DEPRESSED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I have given him notice. In view of the urgency of the situation in Princeton, British Columbia, where the closing of industry has had a serious effect on employment and small business operations, has this area been declared a depressed area, and are any plans in offing by the federal government for the purpose of rectifying the situation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Princeton was not declared a depressed area; it was declared a surplus labour area on July 25 of this year. The closing in 1956 and 1957 of mines at Copper Mountain and Hedley were the main reasons for this deterioration. However, in September there were fewer persons registered for employment at Princeton than at this time last year.

TRANSPORT

SHEFFORD COUNTY, QUE.—REQUEST FOR CLOSING OF TUNNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell us what steps have been taken by his department to close the famous death tunnel at South Stukely, in Shefford county?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do feel that this question should be put on the order paper.

MONTREAL-QUEBEC—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF NIGHT TRAIN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Cook (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of representations I received this morning, could the minister tell the house whether his department is considering the possibility of re-establishing night train service between Quebec and Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that his question is one for the order paper.

COMBINES

REPORTED AMALGAMATION OF U.S. AND CANADIAN LOAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has his attention been called to the report in this morning's Globe and Mail of the takeover by an American loan company of two existing Canadian loan companies, and will he consider having this amalgamation of foreign and domestic sharks investigated by the combines investigation branch?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): The answer to the first part of the question is no. My observation on the second part is that I think this matter can safely be left to the director of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You should read the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And you should read a great many things that you do not.

TRADE

RUSSIA—STATEMENT ON RENEWAL OF TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked a question relating to an article he had read dealing with the Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement. The answer is that the renewed Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement, which expires April 18, 1963, provides for annual consultations between officials of the two governments concerning the operation of the agreement, to be held alternately in Ottawa and Moscow. The next such consultations are scheduled to take place in Moscow in late November. The present agreement expires in April, 1963; therefore it is proposed, during the course of the annual consultations, to give preliminary consideration to the future of the agreement.

WHEAT—POSITION RESPECTING CREDIT TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): My question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture, and I have provided the hon. gentleman with notice. In connection with the agreement which exists for the export of food grains, would the minister tell us what the present situation is, in terms of dollars, respecting the credit extended by Canada to the People's Republic of China?

Mr. Speaker: That is definitely a question for the order paper. It seeks statistical information.

CEMENT—IMPORT OF CARGO FROM CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give an answer to a question asked yesterday by my hon. friend for Gloucester concerning a shipment of cement from Cuba. The answer is as follows.

There is a shipment of cement from Cuba awaiting customs clearance at Montreal. Entry is in order under the regular provisions of the customs tariff at the rate of eight cents per 100 pounds, and no special authorization is required when regular conditions of import entry are met.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SIMULTANEOUS TRANSLATION—DISTRIBUTION OF FRENCH ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. Antoine Belanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, after having carefully listened to the discussion which took place a moment ago, and as a new member, I am not quite sure that my question is in order and put to the right person.

First of all, allow me to draw your attention to the fact that several French speaking members complain about the quality of simultaneous interpretation, especially from English into French. Of course, I would not like to lay the blame on anyone in particular, because I do not know what may be the cause of such a situation, but there are many difficulties in this regard.

Second, would it be possible to have the French version of the order paper of the house sent to the French speaking members at the same time as the English version is distributed to the English speaking members? This request is being made in order to help French-speaking members to fulfil their duties in this house.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his representations; I shall examine the situation and see whether it is possible to improve it.

(Text):

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the minister's statement on federal government policy regarding the Atlantic provinces' economy, namely, that "he wondered why it was necessary for the whole family to take castor oil when only some members needed it", does he now disagree with the government's cutbacks in spending in the Atlantic region, in view of the pressing need for employment opportunities in the Atlantic provinces?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROTECTION OF RIVER BED RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, of which I have already given notice. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a matter of urgent importance to the Indian chiefs of Bridge Indian reserve, Fountain Indian reserve and Lillooet Indian reserve, whereby an endeavour is being made by certain interests to claim that Indian reserve rights do not extend over a river bed? If so, what interest and action is being taken by his department to protect the rights of reserve Indians?

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. A very highly technical legal problem is involved here. The department is well aware of it and is making representations to the British Columbia gold commission, which is holding hearings in respect of the matter.

I think that is as far as I would be permitted to go on the orders of the day. I will be glad to give additional details to the hon. member privately.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INQUIRY AS TO GOODS REMOVED FROM CUBAN SHIP

On the orders of the day.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister advise the house the nature of the contraband that was taken today from the Cuban freighter Bahja de Siguanea, and could he also tell the house whether any of the goods seized were of United States origin?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have some information which will be of interest to my hon. friend. Some 1,685 bags of chemicals known as permatox which were to be loaded on the freighter—this is a tough one—Bahja de Siguanea were detained under the provisions of section 22 (2) of the Customs Act. Detention was made pending further investigation as examination indicated the chemicals to be of United States origin. No religious literature was detained during yesterday's action or at any time.

We have no record of action taken in respect to the alleged export shipments of 168 cases of nuts and bolts or of quantities of zinc stearate. I believe those latter items were also mentioned in the article in the newspaper.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say whether a false manifest was filed, and does he contemplate that any charges will be laid?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to answer that question. I have given all the information that we have at the present time. However, I would be glad to take note of the hon. member's question, and I will try to give him the information at a little later date.

AGRICULTURE

HOGS—REDUCTION IN PREMIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the genial Minister of Agriculture?

Could he tell us what was his department's reason for reducing the premium paid to the producers of grade A hogs?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a full answer on orders of the day. I will simply say that we ask all Canadians and all segments of the economy to try to bear some share of the government's efforts to reduce the budget deficit. Since hog prices were at a fairly high level, and since we raised the support price last year by roughly $1.50 per hog, we thought this would impose the least burden on this type of producer.

(Translation):

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question in order to make this clearer?

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry, but the object of a supplementary question must be to clarify the reply which was given. If his question simply relates to the same matter, I would ask the hon. gentleman to give the floor to someone else, and he can ask his question later on.

Mr. Lessard: Well, Mr. Speaker, the object of this question is precisely to clarify the previous one.

Could the Minister of Agriculture tell us if he expects to restore that premium soon.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, nobody is more reluctant than I to reduce the premium, and I shall certainly have this matter under consideration at all times.

LOANS TO SMALL FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Viateur Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell the house whether he intends to ease the present guarantees on agricultural loans in view of the fact that only large farmers can benefit from such loans at present, the smaller farmers being unable to qualify?

Mr. Speaker: As I see it, the hon. member's question calls for an opinion and I think it would be better to have it put on the order paper.

[Later:]

PRICE OF WHEAT IN EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Following the good news we heard yesterday about the sales of wheat, will the farmers and bakers of eastern Canada be able to buy their wheat at the same price as the Chinese and the Poles?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Wheat prices are all based at Fort William, and we will be glad to take any orders from people in every part of the world.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO DECREASE IN CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government proposes to reduce Canada's contribution to the Colombo plan?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the estimates are tabled the fullest information will be available.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is it not a fact that his department has already given an indication that it proposes to reduce the amount of Canada's contribution.

Mr. McIlraith: The answer is yes.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat the statement made by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED REDUCED WAGES IN RUSH SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James E. Walker (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General and I am sorry that I have not given her notice. Is the Postmaster General aware that during the Christmas period casual or regular postal employees are requested to offer their services at a reduced rate of pay to take care of the Christmas rush?

Mr. Speaker: Order. With all due respect to the hon. member, I feel that this question is definitely one that should be placed on the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Since the unemployment insurance fund is in imminent danger of being exhausted, what steps is the government taking to ensure that funds will be available to pay benefits to unemployed persons this fall and winter?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this was the situation prior to January 1, 1962, it was the situation prior to May 1, 1962, and again we have the same situation. There are still funds in the unemployment insurance fund. The government has a responsibility in this respect, which it has always recognized in the past and will in this instance.

Mr. Berger: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What steps will the government take should this situation, which is one of imminent danger, result in the exhaustion of the fund?

Mr. Starr: Appropriate steps.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent him yesterday. What was the financial state of the unemployment insurance fund in September 1962 as compared with the state of the fund—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is definitely a question seeking information of a statistical nature. Unless the minister is prepared to give an answer at the present time, it should definitely go on the order paper.

[Mr. Green.]

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PREPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I do not wish to be repititious on this subject, but judging from the number of inquiries coming in, some importance appears to attach to it. I should like to direct a request to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister advise the house at his earliest convenience regarding the progress which has been made to date in preparation for Canada's centenary?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

ELIGIBILITY OF LOW WAGE EARNERS FOR LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works, and I apologize for not having given him notice. In view of the stimulation which could be given to our economy by the construction of additional housing, would the minister care to comment on a statement made by Mr. Hector Boudreau, president of the associated federation of letter carriers, that he was laughed at when he applied for a central mortgage loan, and that his low salary made him ineligible?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not the responsibility of members of the ministry to comment on statements by individuals that appear in the press from time to time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION COVERAGE OF CHAMPIONSHIP FOOTBALL GAME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Secretary of State in his role as voice for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the board of broadcast governors whether the government has found or is seeking any way to resolve the contretemps between the B.B.G. and the C.B.C. over the latter's application to program a certain pending football match.

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. that they have had meetings with not only the B.B.G. but with the C.T.V., and it looks as though we shall have a solution.

PUBLIC WORKS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR SEWAGE PLANT CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will any municipalities intending to construct sewage treatment plants be able to request and receive federal financial aid after March 31, 1963?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes, within the limits of the funds provided and in accordance with the terms of the amendment to the National Housing Act for that purpose, one of the many constructive pieces of legislation recently introduced by this government.

AIRPORTS

SAULT STE. MARIE, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say how soon tenders will be called for the construction of a permanent terminal building at Sault Ste. Marie airport?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF PARKED AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the insecurity of leaving our cars unattended, because of the pilfering from parliament hill, would the Minister of Justice take steps to see that our cars are protected?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which ordinarily would not be of an urgent nature, but I suggest that in this particular case, because of the indefinite nature of the length of this session, the answer will help our programming of legislation.

Mr. Speaker: I feel that if one were to ask many hon. members here, they might at one time or another place that qualification upon any question regardless of its nature. I do not think it warrants any priority in asking it on orders of the day, if that be its basis.

(Translation):

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAYMENT FOR OVERTIME DURING HOLIDAY SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General?

(Text):

Is it the government's intention to pay regular postal employees for overtime work during the Christmas period by giving them holidays instead of cash?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know the procedure will be the same as that followed formerly.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

SUGGESTED PROSECUTION FOR ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph B. Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I wish to direct to the Prime Minister. On the floor of this house on Tuesday last he said, as reported on page 102 of Hansard of that date:

> They went around and threw out those myriads of documents which they did not dare stand behind; they did not dare place the name on them as having been printed by the Liberal association.

If this is a contravention of section 71 of the Canada Elections Act, I should like to ask why the Prime Minister or the government does not enforce the act by instituting legal action.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

Mr. R. J. Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to add my voice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members might subdue the buzz of conversation so that we may hear the hon. member, and also in particular show the courtesy of this house to hon. members making their maiden speech.

I therefore call on the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) with the due attention of the house.

Mr. Cashin: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my voice to those who have already offered you praise and congratulations on your elevation to your new post. I should also like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply on their very creditable efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy and honoured to take part in this traditional debate. I may say that I am particularly honoured because the constituency which I represent in this house was represented for a great many years in the house which presided over the destinies of the then colony, and later dominion, of Newfoundland by my late grandfather, Sir Michael Cashin.

Would that I could continue in such a reminiscent and pleasant vein on this the occasion of my first speech. But, Mr. Speaker, at this time, in this place, and in this country circumstances are such that the members of the house should at all times devote their energies and their attention to the great problems facing this house, and facing indeed the whole nation of Canada. So, Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the motion of want of confidence placed before the house. If there was any doubt in my mind that I should do so, it was certainly dispelled after enduring the long barrage, indeed the deluge, from the other side of the house. Instead of adopting a straightforward approach which would show that this government appreciates the problems that face the Canadian nation, they have chosen to put on the blinkers that have obscured their vision for so long. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there was no example in the speech from the throne of the moral fibre and the moral courage which the people of Canada have every right to expect from their government at all times, and particularly at this time. Oh yes, there have been a great many words. Indeed, the manipulation of language seems to be one of the few significant traits of this government that I have been able to observe in the short time I have been here watching the other side of the house. Words that I thought had one meaning to all or most people seemed to have different meanings to suit the occasion for the members on the other side of the house. For example, we heard the very fine sounding phrase that fear begets fear, and indeed it sounds good. It perhaps sounds better than does my phrase that government mismanagement begets government mismanagement and that government befuddlement begets government befuddlement.

Another interesting observation is this. While the members on the other side of the house are entrusted with the responsibility of government and have been entrusted with that responsibility for five years, they can come into this house, as they have done in other houses, and accuse 50 Liberals of obstructing about 200 people from governing Canada. If 50 Liberals could be so successful in doing that, how successful would they be on the other side of the house?

An hon. Member: Twenty two years.

Mr. Cashin: Indeed, I am glad to know that those on the other side of the house have not lost their ability to use words. However, I noted that the statements which have been made indicate indeed that the speech from the throne is not what the Canadian people expected. I humbly suggest that otherwise they would have held all of us for, whatever side of the house on which we sit, we are all in the same house. If one group does not live up to its standards, inevitably it affects all of us who are in this profession. I am afraid that is what has happened, namely that they have not given us what they should have given. I humbly suggest that had they done so, they would have been held in higher regard by the people of Canada, instead of indulging in obvious attempts at grasping for straws. They have embarked on a tremendous manhunt to discover what went wrong and who is to blame. I believe it is obvious to the majority of Canadians what went wrong and who is to blame. It must have been a shattering moment to see the house of cards come tumbling in. I suggest that the reason for the great outbursts on the other side of the house and directed at this side of the house and at our leader is based upon the fact that this group is in office but not in power, and that the great shock of it all is not the trouble that faces Canada but the realization that they are not invincible and are subject to mortality. If I were to believe all I have heard quoted from the other side of the house, it would seem that everybody is out of step but them. However, I do not believe that is good enough for the Canadian people.

As hon. members are no doubt aware, I represent a Newfoundland constituency. I should therefore like to devote a goodly portion of my remarks to the constituency and the province which I represent. This constituency and this province have been adversely affected, as have all provinces and all parts of Canada, by the way in which this government has handled itself. However, in this province there are some peculiar and particular problems which are demanding special attention. Indeed, there is another problem down there for the other side which they would like to take care of, but that is not the one about which I am going to talk. I might remind you, Mr. Speaker, that if Newfoundland, the province which I am proud to represent in this house, is to grow, to develop and to make an increasing contribution to the growth and development of Canada—and by that I mean a contribution commensurate with her capabilities and potential—then there are certain physical and geographical conditions which must be recognized by the federal government by way of action. If you look at a map, you will find that the problem of Newfoundland is obvious. It is a problem of communications. We have an area of 43,000 square miles on the island itself. There are 6,000 miles of coast line, and over 1,000 communities are scattered around this coast line.

Progress has been made. In fact progress was bound to be made because there was nowhere to go but up. It gives me great pleasure as a Newfoundlander to drive into tiny hamlets on roads however dusty, because I know that two, three or four years ago there were no roads. I am deeply moved by the enthusiasm of the people who greet me because of appreciation of what has been done. We all remember that in the 19th century the matter of communication was one of the most significant problems to the fathers of confederation. In fact, even today it still is, although "communication" is perhaps a larger word today. I refer not only to physical communication but communication of ideas. However, communication has been and for a long time will be one of the keys to the success of confederation.

The problem in Newfoundland today has reached the stage perhaps that unless and until the federal government of Canada is prepared to recognize the special and peculiar nature of this problem, then I really do not see how Newfoundlanders can be truly integrated into confederation and can consider themselves to be first class and equal Canadians. It is not the fault of the men who go down to the sea in ships, that this problem exists. Their own government and their own people have made great sacrifices over the years in order that many of these problems may be circumvented. What has been done by the federal government to alleviate this problem? What has been done to show that the federal government appreciates and recognizes this problem as a special and peculiar one demanding particular attention? Of course Newfoundland benefits, as do all provinces, from the arrangements made under the Trans-Canada Highway Act to pay all provinces a certain proportion of the cost of building a trans-Canada highway; but this arrangement still leaves Newfoundland with a much greater relative cost than any other province. It must be remembered that Newfoundland has enjoyed the advantages of confederation for about 13 years while the rest of Canada has enjoyed these advantages for 95 years.

This past summer there was a so-called opening of a so-called trans-Canada highway and this matter brings me back to my earlier point about words. I do not know what is regarded in some quarters as a highway. However, I know that in Newfoundland in many places we have secondary dirt roads and in other places none. I also know that most of the people I have met from the mainland of Canada and most of the people I have met from the United States regard a highway as something with asphalt on top of it over which human beings in automobiles can drive in relative comfort. When this opening was held I understand from very reliable sources that a good many inquiries were received from people in the United States wishing to come to Canada. They heard that there was now a highway right across Canada but they did not know about the game with words being played in Canada. So they were very much disillusioned when they arrived in Port aux Basques and began their trek across Newfoundland.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I was very disturbed to see no mention of this matter in the speech from the throne. It is plain that the government of Canada is content to have Newfoundland relegated to a lesser position in the confederacy that is Canada. Therefore it is not very difficult to know why the little strength that the Conservative party has had in Newfoundland is diminishing. It is diminishing because the people in the government have not approached the problems of Newfoundland from the point of view of finding a straightforward and equitable solution.

There is much talk about the Canadian economy and about productivity but in Newfoundland I can think of hardly anything that would help our economy more than the trans-Canada highway. It would literally get our economy moving. It was not enough that this very basic problem of Newfoundland was ignored, but in fact we had to endure the embarrassment of politics being played with the word "highway".

I was also saddened to note the absence of any mention of fisheries in the speech from the throne. In fact I believe that the fisheries are a problem of national importance which affects, of course, not only Newfoundland but Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia. It is disheartening for one who comes from an old historic fishing area to see no mention of the fisheries. When I have travelled about my constituency it has been disheartening for me to learn of the work of foreign trawlers which have ravaged fishermen's gear by coming in to the very headlands of the sea. It was disappointing and made me most sorrowful to learn from the fishermen, who after all live in an area with the highest cost of living of any province and the lowest standard of income, that their gear was being harassed by foreign vessels and, worse still, their traditional inshore fishing grounds were being interfered with by foreign trawlers.

I realize that there has been talk of a 12-mile limit, but from all I can gather it seems that a 12-mile limit will not be realized at all if the attitude of the present government outside of the house is to be believed, or at least it will not be realized in the near future. I believe that the establishment of a 12-mile limit, whether we do it by speeding up negotiations on an international level or by taking the bull by the horns and doing it ourselves, would be a significant step forward for the fisheries not only in Newfoundland but in our sister provinces on the Atlantic coast. It is not enough to tell these fishermen in eastern Canada that a 12-mile limit cannot be established because after all they realize that Iceland, which has less than half the population of Newfoundland, was able to do it. Has Iceland more courage, more moral fibre than Canada?

But mention of the 12-mile limit was not the only omission vis-à-vis fisheries in the speech from the throne. The federal government ought to concern itself more with the policy or idea of putting capital into the fisheries because the fisheries, particularly in Newfoundland, and I realize also in other provinces, have the problem of modernization. Generally speaking, these foreign trawlers that come over and ravage our fishing grounds are far better equipped to approach the fisheries and have an advantage in that regard over our fishermen. There is a real need. I realize that government, be it federal, provincial or whatever the level, cannot take it unto itself to solve all the problems of the fishermen. Indeed, that is not what the fishermen want and anybody who has any experience or knows the fishermen knows that one of their significant traits is their independence of spirit which makes it difficult for them sometimes to accept outside help. They are not looking for handouts; rather, they are looking for a constructive program from the federal government.

Another result of a program to make capital more readily available would be that it would assist men in eastern Canada to get back into the fisheries. In Newfoundland, as in our sister Atlantic provinces, we are confronted with unemployment. We have a very high birth rate in Newfoundland so I suppose that conceivably we could have more people working one year in Newfoundland and have twice as many unemployed as in the previous year. Evidently the natural increase does not seem to be noticed by the federal government. They have not taken judicial notice of the fact that the human race increases and so when they talk about unemployment and jobs they forget to realize that at least in Newfoundland we are very good at it. Indeed, that is what they fear, that we will become too good at it, populate all over the place and bring our political philosophy with us.

Newfoundland itself has recently called a conference on the fisheries and I think this will mark an improvement. The fact that the federal government knew this was going on in Newfoundland made the omission of anything to do with fisheries all the more striking. I am afraid "statesmanlike" is not the word to describe this omission. I wonder, Mr. Speaker.

We in Newfoundland are a reasonable and fair-minded people and we will support any legislation whatever the source of which is aimed at dealing with our particular and peculiar problems. The first is the problem of communications and the need of roads to open up our country so that we may enjoy confederation the same as all other people can enjoy it and so that our storehouse of wealth may be better cultivated. More movement of our people from one place to the other all over the island will help to get our economy moving. It will create, for example, a greater demand in the public service industries. It will give us a better chance to attract secondary industry.

The second of our great problems is the fisheries. I differentiate between these two problems because the fisheries are a problem that we share with many other provinces. We have peculiarities in our fisheries as they have in theirs. The situation is somewhat like that in agriculture. I cannot emphasize too strongly how very important this problem is in Newfoundland. I am sure it was the intention of those who brought about confederation that both governments would deal with Newfoundland in a spirit of co-operation and show an interest in solving this problem. We do not want to slip into confederation and be forever doomed to the role of second class Canadians. We came in so that we could make a contribution to the success of confederation. Is it to be held against us, Mr. Speaker, that our political philosophy does not happen to coincide with that of the government of the day? We did not expect confederation to be a panacea and now that we are in confederation we do expect that we will be required to pull our weight and to do what we can.

The situation is like an investment. We have already given Canada sovereignty over our immense Labrador which has great mineral resources that are just now beginning to be developed, in addition to the resources of timber, minerals and fisheries on the island and around the island itself. We have also contributed to the confederation a market which it did not have previously and now, of course, we get most of our consumer goods from the mainland. However, we still sell the major portion of our products to foreign countries. That is why we in Newfoundland are particularly worried about some of the things said and done about trade policy on the other side of the chamber. Trade policy is very important for the people of Newfoundland, and its mishandling is another example of how the government has alienated the support it originally had there.

We in Newfoundland were shocked, as were people all across Canada, to see the great about-face that took place so shortly after the election. We were told that there was no crisis before the election; but now I, and other hon. members, are glad to learn that the crisis which did not exist has been cured. There is a lesson to be learned from that by one making his first appearance in parliament, and if this session continues—and there is a mathematical possibility that it might—I suppose I shall learn the English language as it is spoken in this chamber. Of course I must also learn the French language, as it is spoken, but I believe I shall have an easier time with it.

The government has claimed that its record is unequalled. I agree, and only hope that we shall never again see a government in Canada with a record like it.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, it is really moving to speak in this house. It is also a fearful task, after hearing so many eloquent speakers.

First I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, for the unanimous vote that brought you to the Chair of this house.

I also want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply.

I should like also to extend special congratulations to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) who succeeded in finding so much enthusiasm to defend a speech from the throne which contained so little.

As is customary, I should like to associate the voters of my constituency of Quebec-Montmorency in these congratulations. That county is the most beautiful in Canada after the one of the hon. member who is listening to me.

Of course, the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency is composed of different classes of people. There are farmers, professionals, white collar workers, as well as people who depend more or less on the federal government's policy. That is why they change parties so often, because they often prefer also to elect a member from another party.

I must say that I was very disappointed by the speech from the throne. We expected much more than that. We thought the government would have heeded the warnings given to the effect that it should introduce much more sensible measures. Moreover, we expected more sincerity on the part of some colleagues of the Liberal opposition. We were greatly disappointed, but in spite of the challenges issued by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) we are still sitting in this house.

I must add that from an electoral and political point of view, we suffered a failure yesterday. We should have taken out the words "Social Credit" from our subamendment. Unfortunately, we are still green in politics. We are not used to the artful tricks performed in this house and we just failed to come up with a brilliant feat, for we would then have stolen our friends of the Liberal opposition's thunder. But I am assured that they slept much better last night than they would have if we had omitted those words.

We have mostly heard the Liberal opposition, through the voice of its leader, take the present government to task for many things which this government itself had criticized when its members were sitting on the other side of the house. These are things which we have too often been wont to hear since confederation. It is hoped that, with Social Credit, we shall succeed in banishing from the house this dialectical interplay, this game of empty words and that at last, we shall get down to business and start working in the interest of Canadians, and especially in the interest of the voters of the Quebec-Montmorency riding.

We have heard the Leader of the Opposition regret the fact that we have come to the point where we must tighten our belts.

I also heard the Leader of the Opposition talk about the regrettable Coyne affair. If I am not mistaken, and if my memory serves me right, I think that when that question was discussed on the floor of this house, Mr. Coyne was precisely asking Canadians to tighten their belts and that Mr. Pearson championed Mr. Coyne's cause.

Which makes us wonder what is happening to sincerity. We wonder when did our career politicians really work for the good of Canadian citizens and for the good of the whole nation.

The Liberal opposition as well as the other two parties speak of a municipal development bank. It is well known that as far back as 1935 the Social Credit party, of which I have the pleasure of being a member on the federal scene, recommended the establishment of such a bank.

People are aware today that the ideas put forward at that time by the Social Credit party are really conducive to an effective action against unemployment and the desperate situations in which we find our municipalities and our school boards.

Naturally, we, Social Crediters, feel that any grant or assistance given by the government to the municipalities must fully respect the autonomy not only of the province of Quebec but of all the provinces.

The Liberal opposition speaks of increasing family allowances and extending them to the age of 21 for children who continue their studies.

I think everyone will agree that the Social Credit party was the first to include such a measure not in its electoral platform but in its social program.

We hear also about Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which should normally help the average or sub-average Canadian. Everybody knows that it is absolutely impossible for a Canadian who earns between $2,500 and $3,500 a year to take advantage of the loans presently provided by C.M.H.C.

I claim that if the government really wants to help the Canadian citizens to become property owners, it might amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act so as to enable the people I have just mentioned to borrow from the corporation.

The government boasts also of having set up the famous winter works program. Because of this winter works program many municipalities are now overburdened with loans that taxpayers find hard to pay back.

In principle, the program is excellent, but it causes the municipalities to secure 20 to 30-year loans, an additional burden which must be borne by the taxpayers.

In my opinion, such conditions are not good enough and are not in keeping with the pride of the Canadian people.

Furthermore, the government was candid enough to confess that the policy that succeeded in keeping it in power was its farm policy.

Of course, we know that there are all kinds of small things that my fellow members will draw to the attention of the hon. members of this house later, but, personally, I am of the opinion that if the government looked after some farmers, they certainly were not in the province of Quebec.

In this connection, I think that the amount of $5 million to be earmarked for an investigation on non-arable or marginal land should be given to the farmers who already own a family farm so that they may be able to set up stocks of wheat along the St. Lawrence river near existing harbours where there are wharves to stock wheat and grains.

I think it would be in fact a very efficient way of helping the farmers of the province of Quebec without hurting the interests of western farmers.

Now we heard the Liberal opposition mention its health insurance program; we also heard our friends the socialists talk about state medicine.

I believe that as a doctor and a free man it is my duty to defend private ownership, even in the field of health. I agree that we have no right to abandon the people who are unable to secure medical care. I agree also that we have no right to deprive people from hospital care if they need it. But we have no right either to tie people to plans and systems which leave them with no freedom.

Socialists often say that Social Crediters are afraid of the state. We are not afraid of the state but we fear that the state will interfere with matters where it is not concerned. And once you understand in that perspective the part which is the government's in the Canadian economy, I think the door is open to several purposes but nothing must be done at the expense of individual freedom.

In view of the fact that in our democratic system we have non-profit organizations, I think that those organizations could render very great service to the Canadian people without the government intervening too directly.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, there was something in the speech from the throne about our national flag and our national anthem. I think I should say, as one of the reporters in our province said, it might be too little and too late. I know everything indicates that we might at some time have a distinctive national flag and a national anthem. We hope, really, that this question will be settled during the present session, because now we know that our Liberal friends will keep the session going for a while.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Marcoux: We have also heard something about bilingualism in Canada. We know it is impossible to make a Frenchman from an Englishman, or an Englishman from a Frenchman. That is impossible, and no sensible person would ever ask that those cultures be melted together. But the thing is that in our capital city and in the parliament buildings here we should really enjoy the complete bilingualism that almost everybody has talked about for so many years and about which our Liberal friends in the opposition were never able to do a single thing during their 22 years on the other side of the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the government should revert to the principles which presided over the establishment of the Canadian confederation in the time of Sir Georges-Etienne Cartier and Sir John Macdonald whom the present Prime Minister admires so much.

I know that in that time, the sole purpose was to promote a normal development in all provinces through the central government. We have reached the point today where the central government controls all the provinces, collects from them the greater part of taxes and decides for them how that money should be spent.

I find however in the official Debates for last April 18 that the government had decided to make quite a few changes in this field, even though we had hoped the amendments would be much more significant as a matter of fact, according to the official Debates for April 18, 1962, the province of Quebec, as well as the other provinces, gets back 50 per cent of taxes on public utilities and power companies, and for the years 1962 and 1963, the amount is expected to reach $2,097,000. Of course, when considering statistics, we find that the Liberal premier of a certain province has suggested that that province should recover payments of approximately $15 million on taxes from private companies. I think, as the fact is known, that it already receives 50 per cent of the tax amount and that what it receives amounts to $2 billion. There is reason to believe that these total tax amounts paid do not come now to more than $4 million.

An hon. Member: Does Mr. Lesage know about it?

Mr. Marcoux: I did not mention any name; if the cap fits some people, let them wear it.

An hon. Member: No doubt Mr. Lesage will wear it.

Mr. Marcoux: Now, the problem facing the country at this time and which we all regret is unemployment. The Conservative government seems to believe it knows the answer, when the facts prove that no solution has been found up to now. The members of the Liberal opposition seem to think they have found a solution, whereas it was duly established in the years just before the war, that the unemployment problem was a matter unknown to them as well. As for our socialist friends, they did find a solution: the solution of planning.

An hon. Member: In the Rene Levesque style.

Mr. Marcoux: Today, we shall have planned unemployment. The workless will be divided in various categories. They will form very definite groups and will be able to boast of having attained an additional status: that of qualified unemployed.

We of the Social Credit party believe that unemployment is due to a lack of jobs. We believe that there is not enough employment because companies manufacturing products make inadequate sales and because people employed by those companies are unable to sell enough as the result of a lack of money. We have always believed that by increasing the buying power of consumers, we would give a new impetus to our economy and bring a lot of stocked-up products out again, while, at the same time getting people—all those unemployed workers qualified by our socialist friends—back to work.

That is why we were under the impression that, even if our solution was not the best answer, it was the only one up to now which would answer Canadian needs; until we are shown evidence to the contrary, we shall continue to believe that there is unemployment because there are not enough jobs.

We heard the leader of the Liberal opposition speak of the place of this fine country of ours in the international field. We saw him upbraid the Prime Minister for having said in London, at the commonwealth conference, things of which the house had not been informed. That is why our leader suggested that the Prime Minister be accompanied by leaders of the various political parties in order to represent the views of part of the house. We remember that at the time, the Leader of the Opposition said that the suggestion of our leader, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), was nonsensical. We therefore really wonder how one can advocate anything new and remain sensible.

For that reason, we feel that everything the leader of the Liberal opposition says probably has no merit whatsoever, because he says that it is all sensible talk. I believe that, in addition to being represented at that commonwealth conference, the Canadian government should have defined this country's true position in the western world, and I even would say in the whole world. We have failed too long to point out the real position of this country to those who are called the West and those whom we call the East. We have had among our most sincere and warmest allies, people who today are our most deadly enemies. To my mind, that is an anomaly which just happened because we did not define the real position of the Canadian people in respect of other nations in the world.

We are a society we dare call Christian. We face a bloc to which we often refer as those countries "behind the iron curtain" and which we should more often call those atheistic and materialistic countries. I believe that our country must stop advancing directly toward socialism as our friends opposite would like, or as the other two parties would want, even though they do not state so clearly. In any case, whether it is overt or behind the scene, we are actually moving toward an ideology we wish to fight on the international front and which we allow to infiltrate our national fabric.

I do not have to give details in that connection, but we still know that an ideology has infiltrated the country, even our crown corporations, and to name only one of those infiltrated organizations, I mention the C.B.C. In my opinion, the government may have shirked its responsibilities by failing to prevent such an occurrence in our own country.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay unduly the debate, because we heard so many unimportant things these last few days that I would not like to deserve the same remarks when I am through.

Mr. Dupuis: Keep on going, we like it.

Mr. Denis: One more or less.

Mr. Marcoux: Before concluding my remarks, I wish only to point out that it is often said that people have the government they deserve. I think it is true and I am even inclined to think that our population deserved nothing better than what they have today. However they deserve a government, not an election in the near future. This is why I sincerely believe that this government can become the best government since confederation, because they will no more speak of an opposition numbering only 50 members using delaying tactics and because the opposition will no more be able to speak of a government majority of 150 members.

When all the members in this house, facing their duties and responsibilities, ready to vote according to their conscience in the interest of Canadians and Canada as a whole, I believe that the government will consider taking the steps which are liable to help Canadians pass through the crisis in which they find themselves, alleviate unemployment which is prevailing at the present time and give our children a certain hope in the future of this beautiful country of ours for which we will continue to exert ourselves, unless we definitely find that there is nothing whatsoever we can do.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), and other hon. members who have already taken part in this debate, in complimenting the mover and seconder of the speech in reply to the address on the very excellent job they did in making their maiden speeches and moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I feel sure that their constituents are proud of them, that their own families are proud of them, and that those who elected these members as their representatives in Ottawa will feel again very sure that they send excellent representatives to be their members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, in the short time available to me this afternoon I should like to speak very briefly about the Canadian economy and about some of the things which the government is doing to assist our industrial and trade expansion. Speaking yesterday, the Prime Minister referred to the strong advance which had been made in several of the key indicators in our economy, and he mentioned that the gross national product had been running at record levels. I think hon. members might be interested in hearing the actual figures of this key indicator which measures the strength not only of our economy, but of any economy. The gross national product for the first half of 1962 stood at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $39.1 billion, compared to $36 billion in the same period of 1961. That is an increase of 8.6 per cent. Mr. Speaker, only a small part of this increase was the result of higher prices. The gross national product expressed in terms of constant —that is, 1957 dollars—rose from $33.8 billion to $36.4 billion between the same two periods, which is an increase of 7.7 per cent. This expansion in our productive activity which has taken place during the past year has made it possible, as the Prime Minister so ably pointed out yesterday, for 200,000 more Canadians to be working in August, which is the last month for which figures are available, than were working at this time last year; and I think that those figures I have mentioned are a clear indication that our economy is moving ahead very strongly indeed.

I should like now to mention some of the things that the government is doing to help maintain that expansion. On September 4 the government announced a new phase of our trade expansion program, made up in several parts. The first part is a plan to fly more than 700 important buyers, carefully chosen from all parts of the world, to Canada next spring to inspect the products which Canadians have to sell. Mr. Speaker, not only will these important buyers be able to inspect our products under the most favourable circumstances and, we hope, be able to place a considerable number of orders here at that time but, equally important, they will be able to advise our producers in instances where our products do not measure up to the standards required by them so that they would place an order, of what must be done by our producers in order to get orders in the future.

This was one of the most important phases of the two similar trade shows which were held this spring in Toronto and Montreal. A great many sales were made to important American buyers who came to these cities from Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, which are important buying centres in the United States market. Also, the large number of buyers who went there were able to point out to our producers, and very kindly did so, where they fell down, and for what reason, in certain instances where they were not able to place orders with the Canadian producers. They showed them that if they were able to improve their design in a certain way, to improve their quality in a certain way, or to lower their prices by a certain amount, then they would be able to place orders with them; and this is one of the important things that our Canadian producers learned at those meetings. I have learned since that time that many large and important orders have been made possible through the information passed on to our producers by the buyers who attended those two shows.

The second part of this new activity will be the bringing of our trade commissioners home at this time to Ottawa for a week's conference with myself and the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce to discuss at first hand, ways and means which we can adopt to enable our producers to sell more actively, effectively and successfully in the markets of the world A similar conference was held, as you know, Mr. Speaker, in this city in December 1960, and very good results were obtained because our trade commissioners who came home at that time were able to discuss at first hand with our officials what could be done in their particular markets; and I would say that in every case their suggestions have been carried out with beneficial results.

The third part of this trade expansion activity will be to invite businessmen from all over Canada to come to Ottawa to meet with our trade commissioners in private session. This will be similar to the meetings which took place here in Ottawa in December 1960, when, as you know, Mr. Speaker, something over 1,350 businessmen from all parts of Canada came to Ottawa, and in more than 10,500 individual half-hour sessions with our trade commissioners from all parts of the world were able to find out at first hand what chances there were for selling their products in the markets in which they were interested. In many cases they found out for the first time that to their great surprise sales could be made of their products in those markets; and since that time they have become firmly established in the export market, their sales have grown year by year, and they are making good sales which have resulted in worth-while increases in employment in their plants. The program which we expect to have carried out here in Ottawa at that time we believe will be about twice the size of the conference that was held in December 1960, and at that time the businessmen who come to Ottawa will not only be able to talk with our trade commissions from all around the world, but will be able then to go across the road and talk to our departmental officials in the trade and commerce building, to the great benefit of both.

Then following that, Mr. Speaker, on September 7 the government held here in Ottawa an industrial expansion conference to which were invited over 400 leading industrialists from every part of Canada, who met with senior government officials to discuss the means that we in this country can adopt for promoting additional industrial expansion. In particular, the conference was called to discuss how to bring about the greater use of products, either made in Canada, or which could be made in Canada but which are now being brought into Canada from outside sources. In the morning, papers were presented by six outstanding industrialists: specifically, the president of the Ford Motor Company, the president of the Imperial Oil Company, the president of Du Pont of Canada, the president of Electrohome, vice president of Northern Electric Company, and vice president of the T. Eaton Company. They were chosen to present these papers because already in their company they had made important contributions to the purpose we had in mind, which is specifically the expanding of the use of products which are already made in Canada, or which could be made in Canada, and which are being brought in from outside.

In the afternoon, a wide open discussion was held. I think it was the opinion of all those who attended, both government and businessmen, that a great deal of benefit resulted. Typical of the excellent papers that were presented was the one given by the vice president of Northern Electric Company, who outlined in some detail a plan which his company had been operating for the past six years. This plan entailed the following. They set up a team of engineers who examined more than 10,000 individual products which the company at that time had been importing into Canada for use in their production, in order to see which of these products either could be bought in Canada, or could be produced in Canada. They set themselves two extremely strict criteria. The first was that they would not accept anything inferior to what they had been bringing in from the outside, just because it was Canadian. The second was that they would not pay more for the product just because it was Canadian. Operating on those two extremely tough criteria they found that the result of this operation has been no less than spectacular. Of more than 10,000 products which formerly were imported into Canada by this company, today only 800 are imported, and they are still working on those 800 in order to ascertain which of them can be changed from one category to the other. The remaining more than 9,000 products which they formerly imported, of a total value of $11 million a year, are now manufactured in Canada, and are providing 1,600 steady year round jobs for Canadians to work at. This operation has resulted in a substantial saving to the company, and the tooling costs have been recovered in the first 12 months of production of the new products. I believe we would all agree that this is an excellent example of what can be done to use more products which are now being made in Canada, or to have manufactured in this country products which we are now bringing in from the outside.

Many of those who attended the conference have since told me that they have already started on a program similar to that embarked on by Northern Electric Company six years ago. As a follow-up to this conference, we are going to hold, all across Canada, similar conferences on a regional basis. The purpose is to bring together Canadian producers in all regions of Canada in an effort to try to get as many as possible into this worth-while and important program to produce more products here in this country and to work out the practical details with the practical men concerned at those regional conferences. The first of these regional conferences will be held in Montreal in the first week of November. Other conferences are planned in other parts of Canada in the months ahead. When completed, this program will produce many thousands of additional jobs for Canadians to work at.

Mentioned in the speech from the throne were several measures which were designed to help industry become more competitive, which already appeared in last spring's budget, and which will be presented to parliament for passage at this session. The first of these measures reduces the tax rate by 50 per cent on sales in excess of those made in the previous year. This tax incentive will be a great spur to production. It will make it possible for producers, who up until now, particularly in the export field, have not felt that certain ventures provided sufficient profit margin to make it attractive to enter those export fields. Now, with this production incentive, they will be able to enter those export markets, become established, and produce more sales and jobs for Canada. It will also be a great help to Canadian producers who produce for the home market, to help them to meet stiff competition from products that come into this country from other sources.

The second incentive is one which makes it financially attractive for producers to do more research in our country. This will do several things. First of all, it will help to improve the design and quality of Canadian products, and will help us to do something which we must do if we are to be as successful as we must be in the markets of the world, namely, to produce individual and distinctive Canadian design and qualities which people will ask for by name. Second, it will provide work for our young scientists, who, all too often, come out of university here in our country and drift to other more lucrative jobs in other countries. It is hoped that a great many of these young scientists will now, as a result of this incentive, be able to stay in Canada. The third incentive encourages the exploration and development of our oil and gas resources. The benefits from that policy, of course, are only too obvious.

Also, in the speech from the throne is mentioned a measure to help producers make sales in the export market, namely the proposed amendment to the export credit legislation. This will make it possible for the Export Credit Corporation to handle a great deal more business on terms which will be more beneficial to our customers, and also, thereby, our export business. This export credit legislation, and our export financing legislation which was amended at the last session, has made it possible for many millions of export sales to be made in all parts of the world and which otherwise would not have been possible. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the export credit legislation insures against loss in these foreign sales, and the export financing makes it possible for us to sell capital goods on long term credit; sales which would otherwise be impossible to many countries to which we sell. These policies will be continued, and will be expanded where necessary.

The programs and policies that I have mentioned are, as I have said, aimed at helping industry produce and sell more efficiently and effectively. However, I think it is obvious to all of us, especially those of us who are engaged in business, that the most important effort must come from industry itself. Government can do a great deal to help industry, and government is doing so and we plan to do more. But industry of course—and this is recognized by industrialists—must do a great deal to help themselves.

Today I am glad to say that I sense a new spirit of confidence and competition among businessmen in Canada. Whereas a few years ago Canadians did not think they could compete overseas in many lines, they have now learned they can do so by having these things pointed out to them by our trade commissioners and other people who have been in these markets. They are learning that Canadians can compete successfully in world markets if their product and their price are right. Also, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, labour, management and government are moving considerably closer together, and are showing a greater willingness to co-operate. As you know, this is extremely important, as it is one of the main reasons why those who compete against us in trade from countries of western Europe are being so successful in their competition against our products. There, labour, management and government sit down at the same table, and in a really co-operative spirit, work out ways and means whereby they can make their products competitive so that they will sell in markets around the world. I think an outstanding example of this new labour-management co-operation was in the excellent railway settlement that took place here in Canada only a short time ago.

Management and labour, travelling together on our trade missions abroad, have seen at first hand how labour and management co-operate in these other countries through which they have travelled, and how this co-operation is making it possible for those competitors of ours to make their products competitive and thereby sell and provide jobs.

Our trade commissioners abroad can do a great deal to help Canadian producers sell their products in the markets of the world. They tell us that Canadians have a great reservoir of good will in all the markets they serve; but these foreign buyers want to see us visit their markets in person; bring our products with us; get to know these buyers; discuss our products with them; and make the sale on the spot. They tell us that if our products are competitive in quality, design, price, service and delivery, we will get a break on almost every occasion, because these people like doing business with Canadians. They like doing business in dollars. They like doing business with people who live up to their word, as Canadians do, and whom they can trust in a contract. Generally, for many reasons, they like doing business with Canadians, and therefore we should make the best use of this very real advantage that we have. But, as I have said, our people must be willing to go abroad and make contacts and sales.

If our products are competitive, they will sell, and thus create jobs. If they are not competitive; if they are passed over; then they will not create jobs, and they will not create profits. The people of western Europe and Japan have learned that only too well. It is up to Canadians to realize that more than they appear willing to realize it at the present time. I believe and I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that if we are willing to work as hard with our brains and with our hands as our competitors are willing to work with their brains and their hands, we can have any level of employment in this country that we are willing to work for.

The government, as I have tried to outline in this house on many occasions, has a great many services available free of charge to business, to be used by these businesses to help them produce better for the domestic market, and to get into the export market, no matter what size they are, and sell with success, to enlarge their sales, to enlarge their runs, to get their costs down, make more sales, and create more jobs. But there is just so much that we can do if they do not get in touch with us. I appeal to every member of the house to go to the producers in his area and tell them that if they are interested in developing small businesses, or making small businesses bigger, they should get in touch with us and tell us what their problems are. We have answers to almost any problem they have got. We are not miracle men, but we have people who have made studies in practically every line of business, and we can be of assistance to businessmen, no matter what the size of their businesses. We can help them produce more efficiently, we can help them produce more effectively, but they must get in touch with us. Please have them get in touch with us so we can be of use to them at no cost to them whatever.

We can help them to get into the export market, no matter what size they are, if they have a product that is a good product or if they are willing to work to make it a better product. We can tell them what they have got to do to make sales abroad, what they have got to do to produce a product of better quality, design, price and so on. We can help them, but we want them to let us know they are interested. Help will then be readily available and will come forward in a very short time, a period of time which may surprise them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that at this particular time when the world is a very competitive place indeed, when new market arrangements are developing; when the general movement appears to be toward a lowering of tariffs; when businesses have got to stand more and more on their own feet; it is up to Canadians in every line of economic endeavour to get to work to bring their costs down and to get their quality and design up, so they can stand on their own feet, and so they can expand in this tough, competitive world. We have a great challenge facing us today, as has every country in the world, because there is a limited market and a great many people competing for it. Nobody is going to buy our products just because they are Canadian. They are going to buy only if they are the best quality and the best price.

I am convinced that Canadians can produce products that are better, and can be sold more cheaply than those of anybody else in the world. I am not willing to accept as a fact that we cannot. This government is ready and willing, as it is doing day by day with people who are coming to see us, to help people to produce better and sell their products more effectively and more widely. I am convinced, as I say, that if we are all willing to work hard to make our products competitive, and if we are willing to go out to the markets of the world and sell our products aggressively, we can enable this country to reach its full economic potential. Mr. Speaker, it is up to us.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my first words in this debate are to extend my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne who, I believe, acquitted themselves very well on that occasion. I have been asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) to put forward at this time some views and policies of the Liberal party with regard to the important field of agriculture. I think it is fitting that at this early stage in the debate this very important industry in this country should be recognized by having a full discussion of its problems. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) has gone about the country telling the people of Canada that he has solved many of the agricultural problems. He has been quite a good salesman of his party. He has been selling the Tories, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to examine some of the things that have actually been going on, some of the statements that he has made and alongside them some of the actions of the government. It has already been said in this debate by the Leader of the Opposition that the Minister of Agriculture did not recognize any recent financial crisis. In the Toronto Star of June 21 he is reported as having said:

> There is no crisis that anyone can point a finger at.

Yet on August 30 the minister issued a statement "related to the necessity of reducing government expenditures", to quote his words, announcing a cut-back in the premium paid on grade A hogs. So the producers of hogs across the country have become victims of a financial crisis about which the Minister of Agriculture has known nothing. This is one of the things that has been done by the government as a result of this so-called austerity program. In the recent election, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Argue: No, my time is limited. When I sit down I will be very glad to hear from the hon. member.

On May 25, during the recent election, the Minister of Agriculture stated in Preston, according to the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, that subsidized agriculture was on the way out. The heading on the newspaper report read, "Subsidies to Vanish". That seems to be the course which he is following. There has been the reduction in the premium on hogs and a recent report in the newspapers indicates that the government may soon move to abolish the payments of storage under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. These payments are very valuable to the wheat producers of the country and were first introduced many years ago by the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

The Minister of Agriculture has not been able to be in the chamber at this time but, when he speaks, I would ask him to assure the producers in western Canada that this legislation will be maintained and will not become a victim of the government's austerity program.

The minister has pointed out the steps which the government has taken in regard to crop insurance. These steps were very welcome, but of very limited benefit.

How much crop insurance is there in Canada today? There is a scheme in Manitoba that covers about 25 per cent of the farmers, and another in Saskatchewan that covers less than 2 per cent of the farmers. Provincial governments have steered clear of crop insurance mainly because they have felt they could not underwrite, as they are required to by the act, the total losses which might be involved.

Now the Minister of Agriculture has a new program. On May 21 he stated in Manitoba that he was about to sign a new agreement on crop insurance with the provincial government of Manitoba in order to provide reinsurance of crop losses. Although on May 21 he inferred it was about to be signed it has not been signed yet. Indeed it could not be signed because it would not be in accordance with the law as it now stands, and there was no announcement in the speech from the throne that the government intends to do anything to improve the crop insurance program. Here is one place where the government should act, and act immediately.

During the recent election the Minister of Agriculture made a lot of forecasts in relation to the government's policy and took a lot of credit for a lot of things he said had been done. Since December 1960, we have heard the minister talk about ARDA, the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. This act was to do wonders for Canada. It was to lift the face of agriculture; but what has been done under it? To date not a single agreement has been signed with any provincial government under the terms of this legislation, according to the information I have received. To sign an agreement you have to have two signatories, and I just wonder what progress has been made in that regard.

The speech from the throne says that the government is making progress under this act. It introduced this act in December, 1960, and now it is coming to parliament for the first time seeking money for something to be done under it.

Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, introduced by the former administration, almost 2 million acres of land were turned into pasture. How much land has been brought into pasture under ARDA? I ask the Minister of Agriculture to answer that when he speaks in this debate. A pamphlet was printed shortly after the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act was introduced in this house. It was circulated across the country and could be read everywhere, but what projects have been undertaken to date?

During the election the Minister of Agriculture told farmers in western Canada how well they were going to get along and, according to him, how well they were getting along. He said, "Our markets are going up; we are selling more wheat." On June 12 in Edmonton, according to the Canadian Press, the minister said that the sales this year were expected to be 375 million bushels, an increase of 22 million bushels over 1961. In 1961 sales totalled 353 million bushels, and in the crop year just ended they reached 357 million bushels, not an increase of 22 million bushels but an increase of only 4 million bushels. Yet the minister made that forecast within seven weeks of the end of the crop year. It was not a very encouraging export total on the basis of the minister's own forecast.

Mr. McGee: Give us the 1957 figures.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Agriculture gave the farmers some additional advice. They were talking about crop conditions and market conditions and he told them "Your job is to grow wheat; you grow it and we will sell it". The farmers have grown the wheat; let there be no doubt about that. The forecasts vary as they are being brought up to date with the continuing harvest, but they are harvesting in the neighbourhood of 550 million bushels.

Last year the minister said we might run short of wheat. He said he was worried about whether he could get enough wheat. This summer they found 100 million bushels that they did not know was in existence and so they have got that much extra. With a carryover of 395 million bushels, and with the forecast crop now on hand this crop year, for sales, exports, seed and other uses we will have 947 million bushels of wheat. That is one of the highest carryovers of wheat this country has ever had.

The minister said we were going to have an increase of 22 million bushels in sales last year. The increase in fact, was 4 million bushels. He said what was worrying him was where he was to get wheat to meet all commitments. His worries should be over because now he has over 940 million bushels, and one may well ask how exports are going.

I have in my hand the board of grain commissioners statistical summary for the week ending September 19, 1962, for the crop year to date and, during the crop year to date, up to this point, 35.8 million bushels of wheat were exported from Canada as compared to an export of 52.3 million bushels in the same period a year ago. That shows a drop of 16,500,000 bushels in Canadian exports comparing the two periods this year with last year. That is a drop of more than 30 per cent, yet the Minister of Agriculture was telling the farmers he had sales for all they could grow. He started the election campaign by telling the farmers to grow 500 million bushels of wheat. Later on he grew really enthusiastic and said, "Grow 600 million bushels." The farmers have grown 550 million bushels but the minister is exporting 30 per cent less. What a colossal indictment that is, so far as the present export period is concerned.

According to press statements the minister said a few weeks ago that he was going to make a sales trip to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Poland, but added that he had to wait a couple of weeks to see if there was a crop. Everybody else knew there was a crop but the minister was waiting to see it. Then the story was given out that we were short of the exact grades of wheat which some countries wanted. Mr. Speaker, I would point out in answer to that that we had a frost and so the farmers produced all grades of wheat. Why has the minister not gone on his super sales trip? The other day he announced a sale to Poland, a welcome sale, but just a fraction more than the same quantity of wheat that was sold to Poland last year.

The government will have to do better. The government has been quite successful, the wheat board has been quite successful, in selling increased quantities of wheat to communist countries. But the sales of wheat to Canada's traditional customers in recent weeks have been falling away. Here is the challenge to the government. The minister said, "Produce the wheat; we will sell it". He is going to have to do a little better than the exports so far this year, which are off by 30 per cent.

The Liberal party enunciated an agricultural policy during the election campaign. The Leader of the Opposition came into the city of Weyburn, Saskatchewan, made a speech and said that a Liberal government would guarantee a return to the producers, during the life of the current international wheat agreement, of not less than $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, Fort William. The Minister of Agriculture pooh-poohed this. He said it did not mean anything. He said, "Why, under our policy wheat prices will climb close to the ceiling of $2.19 a bushel under the international wheat agreement". He said to the farmers, "Vote for us; you will get another 19 cents a bushel". Where is it?

Mr. Hales: They voted for him.

Mr. Argue: They voted all right, but prices did not rise. I have the figures on my desk. There has been an increase of one eighth of one cent per bushel for No. 3 northern wheat, the recent price at Fort William was $1.96⅝ as compared to $1.96½.

The minister said to the farmers, "Vote for the Conservatives; you will get $2.19", and the price has not yet reached that which the Liberal party was prepared, had it formed government, to guarantee as a floor price; not as a fixed price but as a floor price to the farmers based on No. 1 northern in store at Fort William.

Many promises have been made, many statements have been made; but I suggest that the record of the government is not in keeping with the promises it has made or the forecasts it has made. Agriculture in this country is going through a very difficult period of adjustment and there are many, many agricultural producers in 1962 who have great difficulty in making ends meet. Although cash income has gone up to some extent, farm net income from 1958 to 1961 fell by almost 30 per cent. This is not a record that should commend itself to anyone.

There are changes that should be made in the agricultural policies being followed in this country. The farmer is essentially a part of the Canadian nation and a part of the Canadian economy. All the organized producers of this country ask is a chance to share in the great wealth of this nation and the great production that should be ours. This share, in an adequate way, can come about only when there is full employment; only when there is growth and expansion. So to bring about the policies of the Liberal party in the field of agriculture, as in other fields, the revenue will come as a result of expansion and full employment.

The government has an agricultural prices stabilization act that it has bragged about. This is the measure that was to give the little farmer, the producer of hogs and the producer of eggs a chance. Since that act has been on the statute books, not one penny has been paid by way of a deficiency payment to the hog producers. The egg producers received a little years ago when this act was first placed on the statute books. Egg prices have fluctuated greatly. The producers of eggs in many parts of Canada—in all parts of Canada at some seasons of the year—have received prices not in keeping with a stabilizing policy.

Therefore we propose two basic changes in this act and in the way it is administered. First, that instead of waiting a full year to make the calculations on which deficiency payments might be made, and all the inequities that result from that kind of a formula because of seasonal fluctuations, the calculations shall be made on a quarterly basis. This would provide a larger measure of support for producers of hogs and eggs.

Second—and this is a policy that has been recommended by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture—regional supports should be provided in this legislation. It should not be just one figure for all Canada, but rather there should be basic support prices for various regions and the deficiency payments made on a regional basis.

This session the government is proposing some legislation having to do with storing feed grains in eastern Canada and British Columbia. This is something that is required. The producer of livestock in eastern Canada and British Columbia is at a disadvantage because he does not have large supplies of feed grains readily at hand.

There is one thing I suggest the government should do, and should do immediately. That is to place on a permanent basis the freight subsidy on feed grains from the prairies to eastern Canada and British Columbia. This should not be just an item in the estimates; this should not be in the same position as the premium on hogs, which can be taken away at any time. This should be placed on a permanent basis, in the statutes of this country.

ARDA is an act that can be useful; it is an act under which a great deal of good can be done. So was, and is, P.F.R.A. The government, at least in a large part of Canada, did not need another act half so much as it needed the determination to do something under the act that was available. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, in spite of all the criticism that might be made from the other side, is the only act on the statute books today that has made any major contribution to land use and redevelopment in this country. ARDA has been good for the Tory party; it has been good propaganda. But very little has been done under the act, and we are asking the government to do something more than window-dress.

Mr. Speaker, the field of crop insurance is something that should be improved and expanded. The minister makes a lot of noise and a lot of propaganda about crop insurance, and seven provinces out of ten have no crop insurance.

Mr. Hamilton: Correction.

Mr. Argue: If we are to have crop insurance that means anything in this country, the government will have to bring in amendments to the act to provide for reinsurance, so that the federal government will underwrite some of the total liabilities that are now borne by the provinces under this act. Under prairie farm assistance the federal government and the farmers in western Canada had something of a partnership; the federal government paid approximately 50 per cent of the cost and the farmers paid about 50 per cent. When this government introduced the Crop Insurance Act it did not do as much under that act for the farmers in western Canada who would have crop insurance and the farmers in other parts of Canada who might some day get crop insurance; the federal government was prepared to pay only 20 per cent. The 50 per cent of P.F.A.A. was reduced to 20 per cent. If the Crop Insurance Act is to function well, the 20 per cent figure should be increased. This is another of those good policies being advanced today by the opposition in this house.

The minister says everything is well on the prairies. He says the farmers out there have never had it so good. Well, as far as the bins are concerned, the bins are full and the wheat is good. The spokesmen for the Conservative party went back and forth across western Canada during the election. A senator, Senator Hnatyshyn, came into my home village. He said: Farmers, you need not worry any more about quotas; you can sell all you can produce. The quotas are there and the elevators are full. Why, he said, markets are going to be so good that you will haul the wheat directly from the combine to the elevator. What a joke. The Minister of Agriculture said the price of wheat was going to rise—

An hon. Member: May I ask a question?

Mr. Argue: After I sit down you can ask all the questions you like.

The Minister of Agriculture said the price of wheat was going to rise; produce more. Well, the price of Durum wheat to the producer on July 31 was $2.50 a bushel No. 1 CW store Fort William. The very next day it was reduced to $1.50 a bushel. No inkling was given by the minister during the election that if he became the Minister of Agriculture after the election such action would be taken. The farmers have produced a lot of wheat. They have produced a lot of spring wheat and a lot of Durum wheat. The wheat pipe line is full, but the markets are not there and exports are going down. The rate of export from the lakehead this year is just a little more than 50 per cent of what it was last year. These, then, are the wonderful conditions to which this government was looking forward.

The policy of the Liberal party to guarantee $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern for three years is a good policy and a necessary policy. If it were in effect at this time it would give real assurance to the farmers. The Liberal party goes beyond that and says it is prepared to provide a two-price system for wheat sold in Canada, which means a return to the producers of western Canada over and above the $2 a bushel.

We believe there should be a more aggressive sales effort—that the Minister of Agriculture should not have cancelled his prospective trip, and that in addition to selling grain to communist countries—a good policy—the government should make a greater effort to maintain and expand the sales of wheat to our traditional customers. The way to do this is in accordance with a general trade policy in support of the European common market, and in support of free trade, not by a continuation of high tariff policy, not by ridicule of the British government and by the course of generally obstructing world trade which this government has been following.

In 30 minutes there are many things in connection with the agricultural situation that one is unable to mention. There will be other speakers from this party who will deal with further aspects of the agricultural situation in the course of this debate. They will present and develop further policies to deal with this industry. However, there are two more things I should like to mention in the few minutes at my disposal. One is this: it is time there was developed now a policy on railway line abandonment. The royal commission on transportation, the commission set up by this government whose report was presented to this government, said in substance: let the railway companies take up the branch lines. They are doing that now; they are making applications to the board of transport commissioners for that purpose. We say this government should have a policy with regard to railway line abandonment—that the people who built their farms and businesses along those branch lines which will be affected should not suddenly find that as a result of a simple declaration the lines are to be torn up and the value of their properties sharply decreased. We believe there should be a policy as a result of which anything which is necessary in this respect may be done in an orderly fashion; that there should be policies to cushion some of the financial loss which is bound to result. The effects of such a policy will not be confined to any one part of Canada. The board of transport commissioners will be going back and forth across this country and branch lines may be taken up in any part of this nation.

I began by saying I did not feel the agricultural producers were asking for special consideration. They are asking for a fair break and if they are given a fair break they can give a very good account of themselves. But there is another thing they would ask, namely that steps should be taken to make it easier for them to obtain farm labour on a basis comparable to conditions under which labour is obtained in industry and in all parts of Canada. We say, therefore, it is necessary that the Unemployment Insurance Act be extended to cover farm labour as far as it is possible to do this in a constructive way, in consultation with the farm organizations. It is time the farmer had an opportunity to hire a worker in circumstances where the worker would know that if he obtained employment in the agriculture industry he would be eligible for the same kind of unemployment insurance benefits as are those employed in other industries and in other parts of the country.

The features I have outlined are only part of a very excellent agriculture program which I believe the farmers will support in increasing measure in the days ahead.

Mr. Hamilton: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Fine with me.

Mr. Hamilton: I should like to ask the hon. member for Assiniboia whether in view of the statements he has made during the last 30 minutes I am to understand that he is the official spokesman for the Liberal party in this house?

Mr. Argue: I have nothing to add to or take away from the remarks I made.

Mr. Woolliams: I should also like to ask the hon. member a question. As I understood his introductory remarks he left the impression that the policy of this government was not good for the hog producers. It so happens that at this moment—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will put the question. Is that the statement which the hon. member for Assiniboia made—that the policy of this government is not good today for the hog producers?

Mr. Argue: What I said was that it was a very bad thing for the Minister of Agriculture to ask the hog producers of this country for support for the government on the basis of a $3 subsidy for grade A hogs and then reduce it by $1 a few weeks afterwards.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He said that there were large quantities of wheat but that at $1.50 a bushel, there was no market. As a solution, he suggested to bring up the price to $2.00 a bushel. Would this allow him to find markets for our wheat?

(Text):

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the question aright, it was about the price of $1.50 for wheat, and had I found markets for the wheat?

Some hon. Members: It was $2.

Mr. Gregoire: If you do not get markets at $1.50, then how do you get markets at $2?

Mr. Argue: Well, I thought that some of the older members who were giving us this "hee-haw" would know the answer to that question themselves; they have been here long enough. The price of $1.50 a bushel is the initial price being paid to the producers and it was the initial price that was reduced by $1 a bushel. My statement had to do with Durum wheat, and the last figure I had showed that it was selling for around $2.62 a bushel, which was very much lower than the $3.55 a bushel during the election campaign when the minister said all was well.

Mr. J. C. MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate my first words must be of congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have acquitted themselves well. Their families and their constituents have every right to be proud of them, and we can see a great future for them in this house. I should like too to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the office which you hold. Your record in peace and in war is known to all of us, and we wish you many years of success in your position. To you, sir, now occupying the chair we extend our congratulations and our best wishes; your reputation for fairness and common sense is well known to all of us.

Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because I know there are many who wish to take part in this debate. Many years ago it was said to me that there are four primary duties of a member of parliament. First, he should press for those measures which are in the national interest. Second, having done that he should work for those measures which are in the interests of his region, of his province, and of his constituency. Third, if he is a party man, as we in this country who adhere to the party system are, he should support his party; he should be loyal to his party. Finally, it is his duty, having served, to be re-elected. I do not intend to discuss in the short time at my disposal the last two of these, but I should like first of all to talk about those measures in the speech from the throne which are of interest to all of us nationally, then, the matters of interest to those of us who come from the beautiful province of New Brunswick; and lastly, matters of interest to me in my own constituency of York-Sunbury.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that every one in this house regardless of party should compliment our government on the program of legislation which is envisaged in the speech from the throne, and on the action which is intended through that legislation. I would especially like to commend for his address to this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). President Kennedy a short time ago said of the United States of America that they either had to "trade or fade". The Americans use many of these catch phrases, but this one, it seems to me, is very apt. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has brought to his department a dynamic approach, and the steps which he listed this afternoon will go far in keeping Canada in its rightful place in the world.

Another measure in which I was interested, which was discussed in the speech from the throne, was the royal commission on taxation which is now sitting. As one interested in small business, I feel that our government should take the lead in reducing taxes. We are now taxed too much. Taxes after a while tend to become a burden and to stifle industry. I was especially pleased to note that this commission is soon to report.

The last speaker mentioned the unemployment insurance fund in connection with another group which he thought might be brought under this particular fund. I believe, and I think all sound-thinking Canadians believe, that something will have to be done in the near future about the tremendous number of abuses which are taking place under this fund, abuses which were never envisaged when the fund was set up. Also, the proposal to set up a national welfare council was mentioned in the speech. I have never agreed with the principle that voters should be bribed through welfare payments. I think that we in this country have now reached the limit in welfare payments beyond which it is not safe or wise to go. I was pleased to see that in the speech from the throne there were no handouts. True, some people—and this was proven in the last election—are bribed at times by such promises, but surely the majority of right-thinking Canadians will see these promises for what they are worth.

There were two other measures of interest to me. I believe that contributory pensions are a most worth-while step. If people are shown that they do not get anything for nothing in this world but must pay for everything, then I believe they will accept and support this measure. Contributory pensions will make it possible for people to set aside amounts under some well defined plan for their old age to supplement what governments can provide. Also, there was the question of portability of pensions. I realize that this is a provincial matter, but I would urge our government to take every possible action to encourage the provinces to help bring this about. Unlike some who are economists, perhaps, I get a little bewildered on occasion with monetary funds, devaluation, and matters like that, but there is one thing about which I have no doubt at all. As far as devaluation is concerned, we in the maritimes have had the best tourist season in the history of that part of Canada, and I am sure that will also apply to all parts of our nation. For that we can thank devaluation.

I have another item I wish to discuss which is of great interest to me, that is, that we should give consideration to the establishment of a national office of education. True, under the British North America Act each province has its own system of education, and, of course, Quebec has two. That was necessary in times past, but times have changed. In the old days it took many weeks to get across our great nation. Now we can cross it in a few hours. Families are moving about. In my constituency we have Camp Gagetown, and there are several thousand soldiers there with their families. A few years ago I was told that one family had moved five times in one year, and they had children. Hon. members can see what that would do to the education of these children. I think that it is time that we gave some thought to standardizing education across this nation, and I believe it will come, with, of course, the co-operation of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I have reason to believe that the next point will be touchy to many hon. members. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne that consideration would be given to the question of a Canadian flag. As far as I am concerned there will be no other flag that I will support except the red ensign. That was the flag under which I fought during the last war. It was good enough for those who came before me, and I am satisfied with it.

Those were the national measures about which I wanted to speak. Now I should like to talk for a moment or two about matters of provincial and constituency interest. When I came here a few years ago, a very fine member of the House of Commons represented the constituency of Fort William. He had been here for many years. After I had been here about a month or so, he took the occasion one day to walk across the floor of the house to this side to talk to two or three of us. He said to us: "Young fellows,"—I was rather complimented by that—"you will find that there will be so many things going on here that you won't be able to keep track of them all. I suggest to you that you pick out three or four of more interest to you than anything else, get to know all about them, and press for them on every possible occasion. In that way you can make your greatest contribution to this house". On thinking that over, I decided that my objective would be to support in every possible way those measures which would raise the economy of our Atlantic areas of Canada, our maritime provinces.

The history of the maritimes is well known. It is said that England suffers from too much history; but we in Canada suffer from too much geography. We in the maritime provinces are an example for the second part of that statement. We suffer because we are so far away from the central part of Canada. We know that in 1864, when the maritime provinces were talking of union. Sir John A. Macdonald came to Charlottetown. He persuaded those meeting there to go to Quebec, to give up the idea of a maritime union, and to join in the formation of the Dominion of Canada. We did that, of course. On the first day of July in 1867, the Dominion of Canada came into being. However, we gave up a great deal in the maritime provinces when we went in with Upper and Lower Canada and formed this nation. Our trade had been with the New England states, in the days of the wooden ships and iron men. Some have said to me that it might have been better if we had joined the United States in those years. Perhaps we would have been better off. On the other hand, perhaps we would not. At any rate, over the years our people have had to leave the maritime provinces. They have gone out to the rest of the nation and they have gone to the United States to head universities and great business establishments. That is the sort of thing that went on for nearly 90 years until in 1957 there came into office in this country a government which had a new concept of the problems of the maritime provinces. I refer to such matters as adjustment grants, aid to power development and all those other things.

Finally, in the speech from the throne there is the proposal to establish an Atlantic development board. I should like in a moment to quote a short editorial which sums up this matter very well. It is sometimes said that it is all right for you fellows in the Atlantic provinces to be complaining all the time, but what are you yourselves doing about this matter? We are trying to do something, Mr. Speaker. We are trying to raise ourselves by our bootstraps. An example is the Atlantic provinces economic council formed eight years ago and now composed of 1,800 able businessmen, university leaders and so on in the maritime provinces. They are trying by every means at their disposal to encourage industry, by research and development, to raise further the whole level of Atlantic Canada.

I believe that the solution of our problem in the maritime provinces—and certainly in my own province of New Brunswick—lies in the establishment of small industries which will employ 10, 20, 50 or 100 men and based on our natural resources. The experience has been that if one big industry closes, a whole section of our region can be vitally affected, as illustrated by the difficulties in the coal producing areas of Nova Scotia. We, of course, know of these difficulties and we sympathize with these people of Nova Scotia who are having them. However, there is not very much that can be done about the matter. We know that today coal is not being burned. We know that oil is taking its place. We realize the difficulty in the lumbering industry because of automation. Years ago logs were being cut by means of the saw and the use of men's strength. Then the chain saw was invented. It could do in one day what eight men did previously. Now there is a machine that will go through the forest and harvest logs like a mowing machine going through a field of hay. To my mind, small industries are the answer to our economic difficulties in Atlantic Canada today.

Now, I should like to quote briefly from an editorial which appeared in the daily Gleaner of September 28, 1962, and in which the Atlantic development board is mentioned. It states as follows:

> The great news for maritimers in the speech from the throne is, of course, the Atlantic development board announcement. This is what the people of the Atlantic provinces have been fighting for over the past years. It signifies the realization of our hopes and the fulfilment of our aims.
> The Atlantic development board will be the means of implementing the pledges inherent in the Atlantic resolutions. In announcing in the maritimes his intention to establish it, Mr. Diefenbaker coupled it with the Chignecto canal and tidal power development. He said then that he hoped the proposal for the Chignecto canal would be the first project brought before the board, and that the board would also complete the power studies . . .
> Here at last—

In the words of the editorialist of this great champion of Atlantic development, > —is the means at hand to end the injustice that has cursed the regional economy for a century.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that we as Conservatives have not obtained the best press over the last few years. Perhaps that is so. If it is so, perhaps in many cases it has been our own fault. I believe that if Canadians are fully informed about the steps which this government is planning and which are envisaged in the speech from the throne—and by the way, I feel that the press has been giving excellent coverage to it during this past week—they will commend and accept them and will support this Conservative government in the steps which it plans to take in the years ahead.

Mr. Laing: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MacRae: Yes.

Mr. Laing: Did I understand the hon. member to say that he had knowledge of an army family which had been moved five times in one year?

Mr. MacRae: That is what I was told.

(Translation):

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member who just took his seat?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is willing to accept your question and wishes to answer it, he has the time to do so, but you cannot insist upon a reply from him. However, you may ask your question.

Mr. Drouin: I am not insisting, Mr. Speaker, I am simply asking if I may put a question to him.

Does the hon. member understand that other Canadian citizens are not satisfied with the red ensign as a Canadian flag?

(Text):

Mr. MacRae: As I said, I feel that this throne speech contains the finest program of legislation that has been offered, certainly in my time and in the time of many of us sitting here. I believe that Canadians will accept and commend it and will support the government on it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the hon. member for Coast-Capilano who is to speak next?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I surrender my position to the hon. member standing on this side of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members that with the whips the Chair has worked out a list of speakers. After some careful working out of these lists we have arrived at a proper balance. We have asked that the whips submit names in order for the Speaker to recognize the members and so as to keep some control. While the party may nominate anyone under the formula, the Chair would appreciate some foreknowledge of any switching within the party so that we do not get into the embarrassing situation in which the Chair is calling on a member who, according to the information supplied to the Chair, was the next one to speak. I should like that procedure to be followed.

Mr. Chevrier: I think Your Honour has a point in the statement he has made. However, I wish to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that last night under similar circumstances, exactly the same thing happened and it was unknown to us, although perhaps it was known to Your Honour. This unfortunately is a matter which was determined just a few moments ago. That accounts for the fact that Your Honour was not aware of it. I trust that it will not happen again.

Mr. Speaker: The incident referred to last night has been rectified. However, I would ask the co-operation of members in following the list that has been supplied to the Chair.

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in congratulating you upon the very important office to which you have been appointed and in congratulating Mr. Deputy Speaker I should like to apologize for any part that I have had in this slight confusion between the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) and myself. I should also like to congratulate hon. members opposite who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As a new member speaking for the first time in this house I can say with great sincerity that I thought they performed their tasks very well indeed.

I feel deeply honoured, Mr. Speaker, to be here, a new member of this house, as the representative of Davenport riding in Toronto. I follow in the footsteps of two men who served that riding faithfully and well, Mr. Douglas Morton from 1957 to 1962 and my friend, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who was the member for Davenport from 1949 to 1957. Both these gentlemen have many friends in the riding and I shall hope to live up to the standards they have set.

Davenport is typical of the changing city of Toronto. Probably a majority of the residents of that riding were born there or have lived there for a long time; but in addition there are a great many others who have come to Canada since the war. Many of these people have language problems and thousands of them have not yet obtained their Canadian citizenship. These newcomers are unfamiliar with our ways and they should be given special attention and special help with their problems. Many of these newcomers are making a very great contribution to the life of Canada and to the life of Toronto. In Toronto their presence is being felt in the professions, in business, in politics, in the arts and in the art of living. Toronto is a more pleasant place in which to live than it used to be, and to a large extent this is due to the influence these new Canadians are having.

One of the changes, Mr. Speaker, is that the term "Tory Toronto" no longer has any meaning in that city, except perhaps in an historical sense. I expect that 16 of 19 members from the Toronto Yorks and Peel constituencies will agree with me when I say this, and we hope to do better next time.

Mr. Chevrier: Particularly in Eglinton.

Mr. Gordon: Davenport, as I say, is typical of this new Toronto; and its people, its residents, have the same problems and the same fears as many hundreds of thousands of other people in urban centres all through this country.

The first of these is unemployment and the fear of unemployment. This is the No. 1 problem for this parliament to deal with and I for one was not impressed with the rosy optimism and the questionable statistics expressed in the speech from the throne on this score. If anybody would like to go to Davenport or to any other of the similar ridings in Toronto he will find plenty of unemployment now, and the fear that there will be a great deal more unemployment before this winter is over.

In addition to this fear of unemployment, there is a great need in these urban centres particularly, although I think it applies to all ridings throughout Canada, for more action and more help in the field of social security. There is a clear need for a national health plan.

Mr. Knowles: Ever since 1919.

Mr. Gordon: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is older than I and perhaps he knows more about 1919 than I do.

An hon. Member: He is not older than you.

Mr. Gordon: Then I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: You can read history, can you not?

Mr. Gordon: Anyway, Mr. Speaker, I am not too interested in what was needed in the past. I am interested in what is needed now and what must be done. I for one place a national health plan very high on the list and I place it with the need for more adequate provision being made for our older citizens. I include in this proper housing for those older citizens as well as adequate pensions. I think people are more conscious than they ever were of the need for improvements in our educational system, and I include in that vocational and training programs. These are things that concern not only the people of Davenport but people in most parts of Canada these days.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 4, 1962

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRADE

WITHDRAWAL OF U.S.-OWNED SHIPS FROM RUSSIA-CUBA SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to a New York Times dispatch from Washington, presidential orders are to be issued legally banning U.S.-owned ships under foreign flags of convenience from trading between Cuba and the Soviet union. Does Canada contemplate similar action with reference to deep sea vessels owned by Canadian companies but flying the British flag?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. Canada is not directly involved in this whole development. As a matter of fact I believe the United States has in mind various other countries which are actually engaged in this trade.

LUMBER—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Nicholson (Vancouver Centre): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the importance of the hearing now being conducted in Washington by the United States tariff commission to look into a request by the forest industry of the Pacific northwestern states that exports of Canadian lumber be restricted, has the government instructed counsel to appear before the tariff commission to safeguard Canadian interests?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the answer to what this government is doing to assist the lumber producers of British Columbia in presenting their case in Washington was given yesterday when I replied to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Nicholson: A supplementary question. As I understand it, this does not only involve lumber exporters in British Columbia but lumber exporters in all parts of Canada. Are their interests not being safeguarded?

Mr. Hees: As I said yesterday in my answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the Canadian government has taken the steps which it believes proper to be of every possible assistance to the lumber producers of Canada and, because of their particular interest, to the lumber producers of British Columbia in presenting their case.

Mr. Nicholson: My question was, has counsel been instructed to appear in order that witnesses may be cross-examined? I did not ask what assistance is being given but whether counsel had been instructed.

Mr. Hees: The government does not appear before the board in cases of this kind.

FINANCE

ROYAL COMMISSION—TESTIMONY OF FORMER GOVERNORS OF BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister this question, which I trust I have properly regularized. Should former governors of the Bank of Canada James E. Coyne and Graham Towers be asked to testify in secret before the royal commission on banking and finance, would the Prime Minister assure the house that he will arrange for the amendment of the commission's terms of reference so that this undemocratic cloak of secrecy may be dissipated?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, I think he made his question even more hypothetical by the terminology he used. There is no indication that the former governors will be called, or that they may be called, as the hon. member has indicated in his question. I feel that at the moment his question is quite hypothetical and therefore not in order.

REQUEST FOR TAX RELIEF FOR PRIVATE PRODUCERS OF POWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the urgent problem confronting the privately owned public utility companies in this country, is it the intention of the government to take immediate steps to provide tax relief to the private sector of our economy devoted to the production of power?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent me notice of his question this morning. I can only say in reply that if this affects taxation, as it evidently does, it would be a budget matter, and if the government were going to take any steps with regard to it they could not be disclosed until the budget was brought down.

SIGNATURE ON CANADIAN DOLLAR BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister explain why Canadian dollar bills dated Ottawa, 1954, one of which I have in my hand, bear the signature of Mr. Rasminsky as governor when he was appointed only in the summer of 1961?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): This is a matter of mystery which I will have to look into before I can answer. Perhaps the hon. member would give it to me. I should like to have it.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I will not give it to you but I will send it across.

(Translation):

GOLD RESERVE AND MONEY SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put the following question to the Minister of Finance of which I sent him notice.

Could the minister tell us what is the value of the gold reserve kept in the Bank of Canada as a guarantee for the money supply of our country and what is the amount of the money supply at present?

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that his inquiry is worded in such a way that it is improper on the orders of the day. Under our rules, a member must give previous notice of his question long enough in advance so that the minister may prepare a reply. I feel that this question is out of order.

(Text):

SMALL BUSINESSES—SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE CREDIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the curtailment of bank credit by the chartered banks has seriously affected the operation of thousands of small businesses, will the minister consider emergency measures to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act in order to provide short term credit?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I cannot accept the terms on which that premise is based. Any business to be brought before the house will be announced by the leader of the house from time to time as required.

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Is it the intention of the minister to offer to small private concerns low interest loans because at the present time too many of them are going bankrupt as a result of the tight money policy?

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: Government policy on this or any other matter will be disclosed to the house from time to time as required.

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning a report published yesterday, October 3, in La Presse.

Is it true that the Bank of Canada issued a million of the counterfeit $1 bills which were circulating—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not consider it proper, on the orders of the day, to ask questions which deal with reports published in Canadian or foreign newspapers, especially when they require such a detailed answer as this one does.

GRAIN

REPORTED REDUCTION IN CAR LOADINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question arising from the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin dated October 3, which indicates that there has been a sharp reduction in car loadings of wheat and other grains for the seven day period ending September 21. Could the minister advise the house of the reason for this, and when he expects this trend will be reversed?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question to this on September 28, 1962 and the answer will be found on page 18 of Hansard.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED TALKS RESPECTING SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Toronto Globe and Mail carried a report this morning that technical talks are taking place among officials of Canada, the United States and British Columbia regarding the price that the United States would pay for Canada's share of the power to be made available from the development of the Columbia river, does this mean that the larger question of policy concerning whether long term contracts for the sale of downstream benefits should be made has been settled?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report and therefore am unable to comment upon it.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister please advise the house whether he is correctly quoted in the current issue of the Kamloops Sentinel to the effect that there is no necessary connection between the reference in the speech from the throne to long term export of electrical power and ratification by Canada of the Columbia treaty?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO DECREASE IN CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask whether it is a fact that the Canadian government has already advised recipient nations that it intends to reduce its contribution to the Colombo plan.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I dealt with that question yesterday. When the estimates come down the hon. member will see what provision has been made in that regard.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Could the minister say whether information on this subject has been given to persons outside the house which is being denied to the house?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate really should not be so suspicious.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Will the minister—

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East indicates that he has a supplementary question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister for external affairs confirm that two countries have been told by him that assistance under the Colombo plan will be reduced this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. What the hon. member did have was a related question, and if he asks it in its proper turn, I will now recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, Your Honour yesterday used the expression that related—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a point of order; therefore I must hear him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have from Your Honour a precision which, I say with due respect, in the circumstances is not apparent. Surely a question such as that which I just addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the question which I addressed yesterday and which caused Your Honour to observe that it was a related and not a supplementary question, is a distinction which will have to be justified; because the use of supplementaries during the question period is traditionally a very cherished right of oppositions and should not be in any way abridged by Your Honour without the most careful consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I am in full agreement with what the hon. gentleman has said in his last remarks, and it is not my intention so to do. However, I think it would be quite clear that it is in the relationship between hon. members that one feels there has crept in a sort of extra latitude in the interpretation of supplementaries as against related questions. When I say "related questions" I mean questions referring to the same topic. A true interpretation of a supplementary question is that it is one which goes to clarify a point which may not have been indicated clearly in the previous answer. I feel that is the true interpretation of a supplementary question. I quite agree that the questions which come forward in what I call the guise of supplementaries may be perfectly proper questions. However, I should prefer to term them related questions. They may be asked, and hon. members have a full right to ask them, but not to have them come in under the guise of supplementaries, as that procedure really in effect usurps the right of another hon. member to ask a question. If we try to work within these ground rules I think we shall see how it comes out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Speaking on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I point out the serious consequences of what Your Honour has just said. For four years Mr. Speaker Michener, than whom there was perhaps no better Speaker in a long time, treated supplementaries as I have indicated and not as Your Honour now proposes to treat them. What Your Honour is now doing is to destroy the practice of at least four years, if not longer, simply by making a distinction between what you call a related question and a supplementary question. With great respect I submit that Your Honour has no power to disregard the custom of this house as established by Mr. Speaker Michener.

Mr. Speaker: I will agree that I am the servant of the house. Acting in that capacity I will try to discharge my duties to the best of my ability according to interpretations which I hope are reasonable, and we shall see how we get along. I certainly do not wish to curb the right of hon. members to ask proper questions. However, the fact may be that the hon. member and I view these matters somewhat differently. Perhaps the hon. member also views them differently now than he did at other times.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary and related question. Will he say whether or not the government has advised at least two recipient countries under the Colombo plan of the government's intention to reduce Colombo plan assistance during the current or coming fiscal year?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well it would not be proper for me to give an answer to that question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The minister says it would not be proper to answer this question, when the minister has allowed information to be given to the public outside this house, yet denies it to parliament.

Mr. Green: Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege. I made no such statement outside the house to anybody.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did your department?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO POLICY STATEMENTS BY SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, again I should like to address this question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that United States air force officers at NORAD headquarters have said that Canada's non-nuclear air defence weapons would be more harmful than helpful in the event of an all-out nuclear attack on North America, and in view of the fact that Air Marshal Slemon has confirmed those views, will the minister assure the house that these statements on policy matters by senior officers will cease?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not been made aware of the statements to which the hon. member refers. I will study the matter and report to the house.

INQUIRY AS TO NAVAL AND AIR EXERCISES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to advise the house as to the character of the naval and air exercises involving Canadian forces, of which there is notice in the London Times of October 3, 1962?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and advise the hon. member.

COST OF PROPOSED NEW RADAR WARNING NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to pose a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will "The Oracle"—and in this case I am not referring to the minister but rather to the kind of space age D.E.W. line consisting of 13 sites in the United States and seven in Canada as described in the Financial Post of September 29, 1962—be constructed as a joint project by the United States air force and the Royal Canadian Air Force? If so, what will the cost be to the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is information gathered from a newspaper article. I shall have the matter studied and will give precise information to the hon. member.

AIRPORTS

LAKEHEAD—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED EXPANSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Last Tuesday I asked the minister whether he could furnish the house with information with regard to the proposed expansion of the lakehead airport, and whether a start would be made this fall. His answer was to the effect that he would check with the department and find out. I wonder whether the minister has the information now.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I have advised the hon. member and his colleague from the lakehead on previous occasions, changes in the requirements in this connection have delayed the completion of plans, but the preparation of specifications for a tender call has been going forward steadily for some time now. I could not suggest the exact date we will call tenders, but we should be ready for this by late winter or early spring.

PUBLIC WORKS

DORCHESTER COUNTY, QUE.—CANCELLATION OF PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pierre-Andre Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get some information today on a press report published in Le Soleil last August and in which Mr. Noel Drouin, ex-member for Dorchester, was asking the Prime Minister to cancel work projects for an amount of $4.5 million in the riding of Dorchester.

Would it please the Prime Minister to tell the house what projects were to be carried out in the Dorchester riding for an amount of $4.5 million?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is asking for statistical information which the Prime Minister would not have with him at this moment. I think the question should be put on the order paper and it would be answered in due course.

(Text):

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and ask him whether construction has yet begun on the Prince Edward Island causeway.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister is supposed to answer a question the answer to which is evident, or self-evident, but if Your Honour does not rule the question out of order, the answer is no.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that you allowed the question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate concerning the Prince Edward Island causeway, surely my question is just as important. In fact I think it is more important. It is true that I have not sent the minister notice of it. However, I think he must know something about subjects of great magnitude like this one.

Mr. Speaker: May I say this. Notwithstanding the fact that perhaps the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate slipped across and was not noticed by the Chair, if it was of the kind that I rather felt the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was asking, it too was out of order; and I do not think that two wrongs make a right. I am not going to say that all questions this morning have been right or that all have been wrong. However, a certain latitude has been allowed and I hope I have been reasonably fair in allowing that latitude. I recognize the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, affecting the reference which Your Honour saw fit to make to me and a question I addressed to a minister, which question was allowed at the time and which is now retrospectively found by Your Honour to have been out of order. I submit that this kind of question has always been permitted in this house, as was the question by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely I have a right to speak on a question of privilege.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point I am making now is this. The hon. member had the floor on a question of privilege. What he was arguing was the merit of a question or a matter of order. If he has a question of privilege I am prepared to hear it. However, it must be a question of privilege which I hope he will state succinctly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I submit it is a question of privilege for any hon. member who has asked a question of a kind which has traditionally been asked in this house ever since I have been a member and, from my scrutiny, for a long time previously. When His Honour the Speaker subsequently reflects upon the hon. member who asked that question in the way in which that was done by Your Honour, I submit there is raised a question of privilege which affects not only myself but every other hon. member, and more particularly, of course, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria who, I submit with respect, was improperly prevented from asking a question of interest to two provinces and not a matter of merely local interest.

Mr. Speaker: Notwithstanding the observations of the hon. member, I do not feel the hon. member has a true question of privilege.

ASSOCIATION OF MEMBERS' NAMES WITH WORKS PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is based on the premise that the availability of jobs is not only a matter of importance but of some urgency. I direct my question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member has not based his question on whether the matter he is going to inquire about is important, but on whether the information is urgently required.

Mr. Garland: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; you will see in practice that I am referring to that.

Will the Minister of Public Works confirm or deny that since becoming minister of that department he has revived the practice of associating names of Conservative members of parliament with announcements of public works projects, more particularly with respect to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation project announcements?

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly urgently required information at the present time.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—SUBSIDY ON TRANSPORTATION OF FEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister intend to grant subsidies to Quebec truckers for the transportation of feed grain such as those he authorized in the province of Ontario?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am a little at a loss to understand the hon. member's reference to trucking in connection with this subject, because I have no knowledge of it. I shall look into the matter and try to give the hon. member an answer.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO CHAIRMAN OF LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would not normally raise this as a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, but on behalf of the members of this party I would ask that you cast your eye down this way occasionally.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: We are all equal here. Now that the asininity has calmed down, perhaps I could ask my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Notwithstanding certain difficulties which may be involved in the Speaker recognizing a fairly large number of members and endeavouring, according to the list here, to introduce some form of rotation among members of parties as equitably as I can, perhaps since the hon. member has made certain comments and drawn certain observations from the house I could say that I do not think it is incumbent upon him to qualify members in the terms he has. I think we should come back to business, and I will now hear the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: I agree completely with the statement you have made, Mr. Speaker.

May I ask the Minister of Labour, in view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Justice to the effect that one member of the restrictive trade practices commission, namely the chairman Mr. C. Rhodes Smith, will not be reappointed to that position, what will be Mr. C. Rhodes Smith's position in respect of the chairmanship of the labour relations board?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): That will have to be decided.

HOUSING

HAMILTON—EVICTION OF UNION MEMBERS FOR NON-PAYMENT OF RENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Munro (Hamilton East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware that the united glassworkers union of Hamilton has requested Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to grant relief from the payment of rent by certain of its strikers to the Hamilton housing authority? If so, is it the intention of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to force the eviction of these strikers in the event of nonpayment of rent?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Roxborough housing development referred to is a federal-provincial low rental housing project in Hamilton, the cost of which was shared 75 per cent by the federal government and 25 per cent by the province and municipality. It is managed by a local housing authority composed of local citizens who serve on a voluntary basis.

I am aware that representations have been made to the housing authority on the matter of rental payments by members of the united glassworkers union. The policy followed by housing authorities where strikes occur is not to waive rents on a wholesale basis. The circumstances of each case are considered on an individual basis. The housing authority tries to make reasonable and satisfactory arrangements so that the situation is protected.

I might add that the Hamilton housing authority has advised the partnership that the four strikers who were in arrears have now paid their rent in full and their leases have been reinstated.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC CITY—ST. JOACHIM DE MONTMORENCY RESUMPTION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. Antoine Belanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. Is it the government's intention to ask the C.N.R. authorities to resume passenger service between Quebec city and St. Joachim de Montmorency? That service was discontinued following purchase of the Quebec Railways Company by the C.N.R.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I really think the hon. member is transgressing the standing order relative to urgent matters. He may make representations to the minister, but, at this stage, I feel that only urgent matters should be raised.

[Later:]

PROPOSED ENTRY INTO PRINTING FIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could he tell us, whether, as reported yesterday in La Presse, it is true that the C.N.R. is considering the possibility of entering the printing field?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have heard nothing of the sort, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is related to the question asked by the hon. member for Megantic regarding reports that the Canadian National Railways might go into the printing business. The minister's reply was that he was not aware of this. My question is, will he check his correspondence and see if he does not have copies of letters about this matter, particularly from Winnipeg, and will he interest himself in this matter so that employment in the printing industry in many parts of this country will not be interrupted?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I take a very keen interest in everything being done by the C.N.R. I have received tremendous correspondence on these matters and I might have received some representations to that effect. The hon. member for Megantic did send me a copy of this article, and I will certainly bring the matter to the attention of the management of the C.N.R. and follow the matter very closely.

SPANIARD'S BAY, NFLD.—INQUIRY AS TO STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which I think is urgent. Would the minister please use his good offices to see that the Canadian National Railways station at Spaniard's Bay, Newfoundland—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not seeking information; he is proffering information and making an exhortation.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED DISCONTINUANCE OF TRAIN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that I would supplement the answer I gave to the hon. member for Skeena to his question concerning the train service between Prince George and Prince Rupert. As the hon. member knows, he wrote to me regarding the reported reduction in this service, and in my answer I told him that I was referring his representations to the management of the C.N.R. I have now drawn this question to the attention of the management and shall be glad to communicate with him again as soon as I receive a report.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

REPORTED REDUCTION IN AUTHORIZED EXPENDITURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister inform the house whether the $5 million authorized to encourage national fitness and amateur sport has been reduced to approximately $1 million as reported and, if so, why?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In view of the fact that 1962-63 is the fitness program's first full year of operation, and as we are still in the process of building up this program in cooperation with the provinces, it was felt that $1 million was a more realistic estimate of the amount that would actually be spent in the current year. I have no doubt that, as the program develops, expenditures will rise.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to put a supplementary question in order to clarify the answer. Does this mean that the Trail Smoke Eaters, who have been expecting a substantial grant as the result of a speech made by the Minister of Public Works in Trail during the election campaign, will not receive that grant now?

Mr. Monteith: I am not aware at the moment of any such grants having been considered, promised, or anything else.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or anything else.

[Later:]

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet might I supplement my answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West a few months ago by informing him that the Minister of Public Works has corresponded with my department asking that consideration be given to the request of the Trail Smoke Eaters.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to clarify the matter further. Does the minister know that the Minister of Public Works told this meeting that he was sure that the board would take the hint from the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel that the supplementary question is more in the guise of proferring certain information by the hon. member more than anything else.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

NORDEGG, ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR REOPENING OF OFFICE

On the order of the day:

Mr. Robert N. Thompson (Red Deer): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the minister or her department received representations respecting the reopening of the post office at Nordegg, Alberta, and if so what decision has been reached?

Mr. Speaker: I beg the indulgence of the hon. member for Red Deer, but that question is definitely out of order at this time.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE ON REPATRIATION OF CONSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. A. Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, which possibly falls within the province of the Minister of Justice. Does the government propose to call a further conference of the attorneys general of the provinces to seek the concurrence of the provinces before submitting to the house the resolution promised in the speech from the throne for the repatriation of the constitution of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Perhaps I might be able to answer that question. No steps have yet been taken to reconvene a conference of that type. I think the hon. member will permit me to call to his attention that with regard to the other constitutional amendment indicated in the speech from the throne, contact has already been made with the provinces and eight of them have signified their concurrence by letter.

In the case of the other two, no answer at all has been received from the premier of Newfoundland, and with respect to the province of Quebec the premier of that province indicated that he did not expect to be in a position to answer this question until after the conclusion of the election campaign in that province, so I am not greatly encouraged by that fact in considering whether a conference of attorneys general of the provinces could usefully be called at this moment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Brewin: Yes, I am. Will the minister please answer the question as to whether he contemplates calling a conference of the attorneys general before presenting a resolution to this house?

Mr. Speaker: It may be that the hon. gentleman did not feel that the reply answered his precise question, but may I point out to him that his further question is not in the nature of a supplementary. He could ask his question subsequently if he is not fully satisfied.

TRANSPORT

NORTH SYDNEY-ARGENTIA FERRY—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house what progress has been made, or is being made, on the proposed ferry service between North Sydney and Argentia.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I think the hon. member's question is in the same category as many others this morning and should be placed on the order paper.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria is an urgent matter of great importance to the people of two provinces of this country. It refers to one of the promises, made in an endeavour to get votes, by His Excellency's advisers, and surely we are entitled to ask what they are going to do about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Normally I do not doubt that these particular projects are of importance to the people concerned, but the same thing can be said by practically every hon. member of the house; that a bridge, park, trans-Canada highway, harbour works, post office, or major extension of a public building is of equal importance within their particular constituencies. We could spend a whole hour and a half here trying to elicit that type of information. I would submit to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I think he would be in agreement with me, that such questions do not come forward on orders of the day.

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the government has yet reached a definite decision to establish a ferry service between North Sydney and eastern Newfoundland?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this decision was reached some time ago.

WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO TWINNING OF LOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In connection with the government's announced intention of early twinning of the single locks on the Welland canal, when does the government intend to proceed with this project, and has all the necessary land been purchased or acquired?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED IMPROPRIETY OF QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for you. I think it is a question of privilege and relates to question No. 77, part 3, on the order paper. I want to draw it to the attention of the house because I believe it contains an improper assertion of opinion and states it as a fact. I ask for your ruling on it, Mr. Speaker; whether you consider this is a proper question, and should it be left on the order paper or removed.

Mr. Churchill: There is no question 77.

Mr. Fisher: The number is 73, part 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Speaker: At the moment my view in this regard is that the hon. member who places the question on the order paper takes the responsibility for the terminology he has used, and that unless the terms in the question are obviously offensive—and I am not of the opinion at the moment that the term "socialist" is obviously offensive—I cannot see how the question could be deleted from the order paper.

What the answer may be I cannot foresee, but with all due respect to the hon. member I do not feel that this term is offensive to the point at which action should be taken by the house to have the question removed.

Mr. Fisher: I think, with deference, you have missed my point. I do not think there is anything wrong with the word "socialist", and I am proud to be one. What I wish to draw to Your Honour's attention is the phrasing of this question, "to remove the socialists and like-minded persons from the control of the government owned radio and television service." This is an assertion, I would argue, that these government services are under the control of people having a certain point of view. That is not in the Canadian political tradition. It is the McCarthy tradition. I do not want to argue about the truth of the assertion. I say it is an opinion, an improper opinion and not an impartial opinion.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, regarding the point of order raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is the Speaker who has the floor.

(Text):

Here I might say that I would wish to reserve my opinion as to just what action could be taken to remove a question. Certainly I am not of the opinion at the moment that the Speaker could order the alteration of a question or its removal from the order paper. I shall have to take under advisement the point raised by the hon. member as to what procedure might be followed should the case arise.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BILINGUAL MENU FOR PARLIAMENTARY CAFETERIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have quite an urgent question to put to the Prime Minister, since it has to do with lunch. Does the austerity program prevent the government from purchasing a board for the cafeteria, in order that the menu may be shown in French also.

An hon. Member: It has always been bilingual.

Mr. Speaker: The restaurant management comes under the joint restaurant committee, and they are the ones to whom the hon. member should submit his request.

Mr. Dumont: I have already submitted my request to the cafeteria personnel but, apparently, it was rejected because three days have now passed and no change has been made. Can anything be done about this?

Mr. Speaker: I have informed—

An hon. Member: Eat in English.

Mr. Speaker: —the hon. member that he could contact the joint restaurant committee.

AIR TRANSPORT

CARGO IN RUSSIAN AIRCRAFT EN ROUTE TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James E. Walker (York Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and I bear in mind the admonition I received yesterday about the urgency of questions. Can the minister assure this house that cargo en route to Cuba in Russian aircraft for which Canada supplies courtesy R.C.A.F. crews over part of the flight do not contain material which could constitute a danger to the security of Canada and her NATO allies?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): This question has been answered frequently. The hon. member should know that the defence department takes all necessary precautions to ensure the security of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Walker: A supplementary question. When a different version of this question was asked previously, the answer was that the Canadian government had no authority to investigate the cargoes. My question was, is the Minister of National Defence in a position to say that the material in those cargoes does not constitute a danger?

Mr. Sevigny: This is rather splitting hairs—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sevigny: My only answer is that the Department of National Defence, in the fields it has to cover, takes all necessary measures to ensure the security of Canadians.

Mr. MacEachen: May I ask the minister if he would advise the house what those necessary measures are?

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether he can give the house any indication about the fate of the study by the restrictive trade practices commission relating to the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs after October 31 of this year, when the chairman, Mr. C. Rhodes Smith, and one of the members, Mr. Whiteley, will retire from the commission.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): I gave the hon. member a rather comprehensive answer to a similar question within the last two days and I think there is nothing I can usefully add to that answer now.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POLIOMYELITIS—REPORTS OF EUROPEAN CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has his department access to the reports of the European poliomyelitis conference which has just concluded in Prague?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would suspect that we have, but I have not seen the reports as yet.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BAIE ST. PAUL, QUE.—REQUEST FOR TELEVISION SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. P. Antoine Belanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State if the government intends to have the C.B.C. undertake in the near future the necessary work which would allow the people of Baie St. Paul and the surrounding region to enjoy live television service?

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt the information sought is of great interest to the member on this side of the house, but I do not think that his question is in order at this time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MEASURES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In view of a recent statistical report indicating that 13 of the 36 areas of Canada classified as major depressed areas are located in the Atlantic provinces, would the minister indicate what steps his department is contemplating to speed up public works in this area, thus providing needed employment opportunities?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would in reply suggest to the hon. member that he re-read the speech from the throne, where he will find, amongst other indications of aggressive government policy, the proposal to establish an Atlantic region development board.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: As a result of the reply of the Minister of Public Works to my question I have a supplementary one which I should like to address to him now. For the clarification of the house will the minister distinguish between the Atlantic provinces development board as outlined in the throne speech and the Atlantic provinces development board as promised in the Conservative party's campaign speeches of 1957 and 1958?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad now or at any appropriate time to enlighten the hon. member with regard to the constructive policy of the Conservative party or the Conservative government. However, I should imagine that Your Honour would hold that this is not an appropriate time, although my own personal view is that almost any time is an appropriate one to discuss Conservative government policy.

LABOUR REPRESENTATION AT REGIONAL EXPANSION CONFERENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has he invited representatives of labour to the regional industrial expansion conferences to which he referred yesterday?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that this conference dealt with matters primarily under the jurisdiction of heads of businesses, and because of the restriction with regard to the numbers which could be handled at a conference of this kind, those who represented industry at that conference were the heads of businesses solely. There will be considerable labour representation at each of the subsequent conferences which will be held all over the country.

NATIONAL PARKS

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS—INQUIRY AS TO WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question which I submit to you is urgent and important. Can the minister advise the house whether there is to be a winter works program in Cape Breton Highlands national park this year in order to alleviate unemployment?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That has already been announced.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for policy decision, and I shall be informing the house when the decision is made.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, just before the house rose at six o'clock last evening—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might wait for half a minute, although he has the floor, in order to give the house a chance to settle down. Then we shall all be able to hear him.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, last evening just before six o'clock I said I was not impressed with the proposals included in the throne speech for dealing with unemployment in this country. The speech had a tired and musty smell about it. It contained no new ideas. We were not given even a bare outline of the kind of long term measures that are needed to resolve our country's basic problems. In listening to it one might have thought that the government, decimated and discredited though it has been, is still complacent and content with things as they are. Well, they are the minority in this as well as in other things.

When the emergency program to deal with the exchange crisis was announced on June 24 we were told it would be replaced by long term measures of a positive, constructive nature. A month after that emergency austerity program was introduced the Financial Post had this to say about it:

> Ottawa, by raising interest rates and cutting down spending, particularly on construction, is demonstrating to the world its intention to revert to policies which governments considered appropriate for the difficulties of the thirties.
> Does this help unemployment? Of course not. If there is slower business ahead, as many signs indicate, the present policy of pushing down the brakes instead of the accelerator is clearly one which will need very prompt review.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Some people presumed that the delay in calling parliament was because the government was working out a long term program of a positive kind. Now we find this was not the case. Instead we have been informed in the throne speech that the emergency austerity program will be continued. This is bad news for Canada.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that high tariffs, even when described as tariff surcharges, are not the answer to this country's ills. Cutting back on public works will mean more unemployment this winter. A policy of tight money—high interest rates and restrictive credit—is an abomination that already is causing hardship to many thousands of small businessmen from one end of Canada to the other. This policy also will mean more unemployment this winter than was necessary.

In the short time available to me this morning I shall confine most of my remarks to the harmful effects the tight money policy of this minority government is having and will have in the months ahead. If a complicated piece of machinery is to run well and smoothly, the engineer in charge must see that it is properly lubricated. We know what happens to our own automobiles, even when they are not stolen, if they run short of oil or even if we forget to change to a lighter oil in winter. Similarly, if the Canadian economic machine is to run well there must be an adequate supply of credit. This is the kind of lubrication the Canadian economy needs. If we have a policy of restrictive credit our economic machine will run sluggishly and its gears will grate. It is our fault or rather the fault of the government when this happens.

Despite some of the things the Minister of Trade and Commerce said yesterday, most economists seem to agree that we are at about the peak of the current business cycle, that a downturn in business can be expected some time this fall or in the early months of 1963. Therefore this is the very worst time to be pursuing a policy of tight money. Such a policy is bound to slow the rate of economic growth and to hurry on the next recession.

What we need in Canada these days is an expansionist policy and not restriction. We need ample credit and lower rates of interest. We cannot expect to have lower interest rates in Canada than in the United States. If we did there would be a further flight of capital and more devaluation. But if our rates are high in relation to rates in the United States, and if this is done in an endeavour to entice otherwise reluctant investment funds to Canada, the result in times like these when our own resources are not being used to full capacity will be inadequate economic growth and higher rates of unemployment.

A policy of tight money is, of course, much less onerous for the larger corporations which are usually well financed, and unfortunately far too many of these larger corporations are controlled by non-residents of Canada. There can be no question that a tight money policy tends to accentuate the trend under which so much of Canadian industry has been falling into foreign hands. When credit is restricted our Canadian owned companies find it difficult, if not impossible, to finance and to expand their operations. Frequently the only way out is to sell to some large foreign corporation or to its well financed Canadian subsidiary. I believe we can stop this sell-out of our natural resources and our Canadian companies. We can buy back in the years to come many of the resources and many of the Canadian companies that are now in foreign hands. We can remain an independent country if we want to, but we shall not accomplish these objectives with our present policies.

We cannot get anywhere with a policy of tight money. It is a disastrous policy for Canada. The policy of tight money that is a central part of the government's emergency austerity program is bad for Canada. It is hard on small businessmen and farmers. It will mean more unemployment this winter. It is a policy that will bring misery and unhappiness to thousands of our people. It seems to me that a vote of confidence for this government means a vote for tight money, a vote for high interest rates. I respectfully suggest that members of all parties should think carefully before they cast their votes for such a policy. I submit that a government that favours a policy of this kind should be defeated, and as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, in his speech on Tuesday the Prime Minister seemed to suggest that he was somehow or other against the policy put forward by the Leader of the Opposition on the grounds that it would cost too much. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the government does not realize that the larger part of the program put forward by the Leader of the Opposition will be self-liquidating. I wonder if the government does not realize that the cost in terms of human suffering, when thousands of people are unemployed, is something this country cannot afford.

In his speech on Tuesday the Prime Minister attempted to defend himself against the charges of political fraud. According to him the full facts of the exchange crisis were not concealed from the public; the whole thing blew up after the election. Well, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? In the first four months of 1962 almost $600 million were poured out of the exchange fund in a desperate attempt to defend the Canadian dollar from falling below 95 cents. This failed. Then, on May 2, the then minister of finance was forced to appeal to the international monetary fund for help for the first time. The terms were stiff. Canada was forced to abandon the floating rate of exchange, something the minister had always refused to do. The rate was fixed at 92.5 cents. In financial circles there were serious doubts that this rate could be held unless we put our financial house in order.

These doubts increased when a senior member of the government announced that he and other members of the cabinet felt the rate should have been put even lower. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether ministers realize how sensitive the money markets are to remarks of that kind. Certainly this had a very serious effect on confidence in financial circles. In May the records of the exchange fund were juggled, despite which it became evident that further borrowings had been made from foreign banks. Then in the first two weeks of June there were widespread rumours in financial circles of an impending financial crisis. It is inconceivable, Mr. Speaker, that government officials did not know this. It is inconceivable that the minister of finance and the Prime Minister were not informed. If they were not, who was in charge of the government of Canada at that time?

The Prime Minister's defence seems to boil down to this: "please do not find the government guilty of deceit; instead let us change the charge to gross negligence and incompetence". The defence put forward by the Minister of Justice in his Toronto speech on Monday was slightly different. He seemed to imply some knowledge of the impending financial crisis prior to June 18, but apparently he did not think it was bad enough to justify the unwise course of informing the public, at least until after the election. Mr. Speaker, I find both these defences unconvincing.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question? He referred a while ago to American lending companies. Does he believe that those companies came to Canada during the last five years or rather during the 22 years that the Liberals were in power?

(Text):

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I was not referring to finance companies. I do not think I mentioned finance companies.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as one who believes in our parliamentary institution I stand in such awe of parliament that, although I made my first public speech some 35 years ago, I cannot help but feel hesitation as I begin my maiden speech in this house. But I must say immediately, sir, that my awe was somewhat tarnished as I listened to the speeches made on leaders' day in this debate.

I listened to the Leader of the Opposition and I listened to the right hon. leader of the government, and I felt sad for my country.

I thought of the problems which beset our Canadian people, problems internal and external, problems of human insecurity at home and abroad, problems created by automation which throws men off their jobs at the same time that it promises unprecedented progress, problems arising from a changing pattern of world trade and changing patterns of political and economic power, problems concerning our national unity and the strains put on it by the times in which we live, problems touching the integrity and development of the spiritual and cultural life of Canada, threatened by the onslaught of distorted values sent over the airways by the studios to the south, problems of nuclear destruction, of peace and war, of simple human survival. I thought of all these problems, sir, and I felt desperately sad because the speeches of the leaders in this house overwhelmed and drowned those problems of life and death in a flood of irrelevant banalities and petty political prattle.

I hasten to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I do not suggest that with regard to human welfare my party is superior to other parties; still less do I claim any personal superiority. No one feels more keenly the immensity of the problems which face us in a world ever on the brink of disaster. What I do take the liberty of saying in this, my first speech in parliament, is that we political spokesmen and our leaders, by the way in which we attack our duties, are ourselves responsible for the cynicism and scepticism of our people about politics, and their feelings of hopeless and helpless desperation. I suggest to you, sir, this is surely the cause of the political apathy about which we all complain. It is the result of the failure of political leadership to show a sense of urgency, or even a sense of purpose, in these overpowering and perilous times.

(Translation):

It is precisely this national purpose which is lacking at this time, Mr. Speaker.

I would be remiss in not saying a few words in the tongue of my French speaking fellow citizens.

As everybody knows, Canada was founded to a great extent by two distinct nations, and our country will come to its fullest expression only if the equality of the French and English languages and cultures is recognized in fact as well as in law throughout the country. It is not always easy to reconcile the two cultures: sometimes they seem to be in conflict. In the past we were not always successful, far from it, in clearly dividing the purposes of our two main ethnical groups. That lack of success became a threat for the unity and the future of Canada.

In order to correct that situation, our party, at its founding convention, did not hesitate to proclaim its faith in co-operative federalism—the only system that can ensure the harmonious development of Canada as a whole.

With this purpose in mind, we have to seek the means of co-ordinating our economic objectives, as well as our economic resources throughout Canada, without resorting to centralization, and so as to ensure for each province, as well as for the federal government, full respect of their particular rights.

Until now, I think that governments have but rarely taken the trouble to do anything about human distress. Each time they agreed to adopt some social security legislation, they did so because of waning prestige and the realization that it was time to lull the people to sleep again because they were about to wake up.

The people which believed that its needs were being attended to at last, the people which believed in the great Conservative vision, finally realized that visions belong to the realm of dreams.

Therefore, Canadians in all parts of the country have been trying for a number of years to replace by a responsible party the old ones which have both so often and so regularly betrayed the real interests of Canada.

In considering recent developments, I come to the conclusion that no one more than the people of the province of Quebec has so desperately endeavoured to find a new solution. However, such a desperate search should not give rise to false theories or dangerous policies only because they are repeated with a stubbornness akin to demagogy.

Mr. Dupuis: Why don't you applaud?

Mr. Lewis: The useful theory is the one which claims that modern society cannot really have true economic expansion and security without state intervention, without public investments and democratic planning. To reach such an objective, we must do away with outmoded principles whose application allows the strong to become stronger and tends to make the poor poorer.

The economic planning we are proposing is the only remedy to the persistent evil of unemployment. It will give work to all Canadians and will permit everyone without any exception to enjoy the immense wealth of Canada.

(Text):

In our view, Mr. Speaker, we must have a plan and a national purpose. Much has already been said about the speech from the throne, but I suggest the most appalling thing about it is not merely that it is empty of serious policy but that it shows a smugness and complacency which is as dangerous as it is unjustified. I could respect an administration which admitted frankly that we are in trouble, which outlined frankly the steps it was taking to correct the trouble, and which challenged the opposition to show a better way. But I cannot respect an administration which insists on arguing that everything is well when it is in the very midst of an unemployment crisis, a foreign exchange crisis, an international trade crisis and an economic growth crisis. How many crises does this government have to collect around it before it will admit that things are not quite the ultimate in perfection?

In reality, all the problems and all the difficulties now facing Canada really converge upon one fact, namely that our economy has been proceeding at a snail's pace for some years. It is of course true, and the ministers have pointed this out to the house, that there have been continuing increases in the labour force and, therefore, an increasing number at work. However, this does not answer the problem; it is the cause of it. Our employment difficulties arise precisely because there is a constant increase in the labour force resulting from immigration, resulting from the natural increase in the population and resulting, above all, from the displacement of human hands by increasingly automated machines. Thus the very core of our problem lies in the fact of a growing labour force; it flows from our failure to provide work for all the eager hands looking for jobs.

Similarly, government spokesmen are able to point, and do point, to the fact, that there has been a steady increase in the value of our gross national product in real as well as in current dollars. However, the figure that is much more significant is the one that shows that our per capita gross national product in real terms was less in 1961 than it had been five or six years ago. This is the significant figure, because a nation's wealth must always be related to the number of people enjoying it, or not enjoying it, and in order for a comparison to be meaningful you must eliminate price changes in the calculation of the gross national product.

It is a fact, and no amount of defence can possibly obscure it, that even in the months of June, July and August of this year, even in the last month which was somewhat better than the first two, our unemployed represented more than 4 per cent of the current work force, and if you adjust the figure for seasonal fluctuations it was more than 6 per cent and almost 7 per cent, at an annual rate. This is serious unemployment by any definition. We accept it now with some complacency because we have become accustomed to average unemployment rates of about 7 per cent and to winter unemployment rates of 10 per cent and 11 per cent.

Our house leader has already drawn to the attention of hon. members a report prepared by a committee appointed by the United States president dealing with the question of unemployment, where they came to the conclusion that Canada had the highest rate in the western world and the United States the second highest.

A precisely similar story is told in terms of our economic growth. The 32nd annual report of the bank for international settlements gives the growth rates of a number of industrial countries; the figures are based on increases in the real product. They show that Canada trailed in 1961 with a growth rate of a measly 1.8 per cent while countries such as Germany, Italy, Norway, Sweden and Finland had growth rates of 6 per cent, 7 per cent, and 8 per cent. Countries such as Austria, France and Denmark showed growth rates of between 4 per cent and 5 per cent. The same thing was true in 1960 and in the preceding three or four years, when the increase in our real gross national product was only about 2 per cent per year. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that these figures cry for an end to smugness and for prompt, energetic and imaginative action.

The astounding fact about all this is that despite the clear outlines of the picture, the government embarked last June, after the election, on a program which is bound to make the situation worse, as has already been pointed out by other speakers. Obviously what our economy requires now is an expansionist program to provide—and I give this as a precise target—an annual rate growth of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent in real dollars. Only in this way shall we be able to provide the 250,000 to 300,000 new jobs which we shall require each year. To do this requires easier money; it requires lower interest rates; it requires increased government investment; it requires increased useful government expenditure and increased activity on all fronts. What our economy requires, in short, if I may summarize our proposals, are:

1. An imaginative, large scale economic plan developed by the government in consultation with labour and industry and in consultation with the provinces.

2. A careful but effective direction of investment, private as well as public, into the most productive and most useful channels.

3. A massive attack on the problems thrown up by automation to provide for the retraining and reallocation of workers thrown out of work by technological progress.

4. A generous location of industry program to meet the special needs of the Atlantic provinces and similar areas, and

5. An easier monetary and fiscal policy which would provide the necessary money, credit and incentives for economic expansion.

This, and this alone, is the program which this country requires.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the Liberal party's program.

Mr. Lewis: This, and this alone, is what could save Canada at this moment. An hon. member over there keeps on saying "good". If he persists, I may conclude there is something wrong with it.

Instead, the government persists in continuing a policy of tight money, of reduced expenditures, of chasing the will-o'-the-wisp of a balanced budget while keeping their political fingers crossed. I say, without too much presumption, I hope: what outdated nonsense. A first year economics student could have told them that the more they attempt to curtail expenditures for the meaningless purpose of chasing a balanced budget the more they will slow down the economy, the smaller consequently will be the revenue they collect and the greater will be their deficit. Their policy is therefore inevitably self-defeating. There will be deficits, but they will be deficits by mistake accompanied by a depressed rather than an advancing economy. But I learned long ago that there have always been men in our land who, like the Bourbons, learn nothing and forget nothing.

Demagogues and unimaginative banking interests always confuse government with personal housekeeping, and look upon government deficits as they would on their own personal debts. This, of course, is sheer, elementary nonsense which is exploited demagogically in the jargon of Social Credit and preached puritanically by the high priests of finance who, like so many others, do not themselves practise what they preach. The fact is that planned deficit financing is as essential as it is indispensable in lifting a declining economy to new heights, and in starting a stagnant economy moving. Let me not attempt any theoretical analysis of this statement; let me simply point to some current historical facts.

All of us have been for some years astounded at the economic progress made in various countries in western Europe. We have had reports about their rate of growth, surprising figures, particularly when we remember that many of these countries had their industries and their economies seriously damaged in the last war and had to rebuild them from scratch, although, of course, with a great deal of assistance, from the United States in particular.

What has been the budgetary situation in these western European countries? France had budget deficits every single year throughout the 1950's; Britain had deficits every year from 1951 to 1961; West Germany had budget deficits in four of the last five years; Italy, from 1950 through 1961 except for one year; Sweden, every year since 1950 except one; Austria throughout the 1950's. The difference between their deficits and ours is that their deficits were planned deficits, deliberately incurred as part of an expansionist economic policy. The result, instead of being ruin, has been a rapid rate of growth, a steady and rapid increase in wages and living standards, and full employment in most of the countries I have named. In fact some of them have actually had a labour shortage, something that Canada has not experienced since the end of the last war.

In short, striving for a balanced budget is sheer madness at a time of heavy unemployment when machinery and plants are standing idle and when our economic growth is almost stationary. Surely it must be obvious that more and not less production is what this country needs at the present time. But the disease has spread. I have noticed in recent speeches by spokesmen for the Liberal party that they too say their goal is a balanced budget. I urge this house to reject this outmoded and harmful proposition at this time.

Thus it is clear that we cannot have much use for the present government. Nor do we. In our view it has persistently shown itself to be incompetent, inefficient, indecisive and fumbling. But let me make clear that we in this corner have equally no use for the Liberal opposition. In our view it has proven itself since its defeat in 1957 to be completely unrepentant. Just before that defeat it had sold an important public utility to American interests and ignored the rights of parliament. There has not been a single suggestion of repentance or of turning away from the arrogance which that party then showed.

We have seen in the last few years, also, that the Liberals have revealed themselves to be thoroughly unreliable. I listened to the leader of the official opposition and to the hon. member for Davenport, who preceded me, refer ecstatically to the need for a health plan in Canada. The struggle for a health plan in Canada has been carried on by the C.C.F.-New Democratic government in Saskatchewan, and by it alone. It has won that battle in Saskatchewan despite the most cowardly and vicious opposition of the Liberal party, led by Ross Thatcher and supported by one member of this house who sits very close to the hon. member for Davenport.

I remind this house also, Mr. Speaker, of the health program which the Liberal party duly unfolded during the last election campaign. I called it during that campaign, as I call it now, a thorough-going sham and a shameful surrender to vested medical interests. Because what does that health plan offer? It offers free health services for the aged, the pensioners. If I remember the words correctly, and I am sure I do, the plan said they were for some of the aged. It never explained what the word "some" meant. I have always assumed that it meant some kind of means test. It also offers free medical services to young people under the age of 16. The rest of the community between 16 years of age and the old age pensioners, if I remember the words correctly, are to pay substantially less than half of the cost of the medical services; presumably the government would pay substantially more than half. For the worker who earns $3,000 or $4,000 a year, whose family may be the victim of serious illness and who has to pay a medical bill of $1,500 or $2,000, will he really be helped by this program when he is called upon to pay half of that cost?

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, we are driven to the conclusion that the indecent hunger for power shown by the Liberal party in its announcement of a no confidence motion, even before parliament met, was and is thoroughly irresponsible. Indeed, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if one was unhappy at the barrenness of the throne speech, one was equally unhappy at the absence of any positive proposals in the speech of the leader of the official opposition. In a speech of more than three hours—some of us timed him—he spent some 18 minutes on positive proposals.

Mr. Hellyer: Get on with your positive proposals; you have not much time left.

Mr. Lewis: I did not hear the remark of the hon. member, but perhaps it is just as well. Before one o'clock is reached, Mr. Speaker, I want to inform you that it is my intention to move, and I now so move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) an amendment to the amendment before the house. I move:

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the word "advisers" the words "having failed to propose a program of economic planning, designed to bring about economic growth and full employment".

The amendment as thus amended would read as follows:

We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers, having failed to propose a program of economic planning, designed to bring about economic growth and full employment, do not possess the confidence of this house.

Mr. Speaker, I have said many times in the past few months, and I say again today, to the hon. members of the Liberal party that, when one listens to them speaking nowadays one would think they had been out of office 50 years instead of only five years. I say to you that there is hardly a policy in Canada, either domestic or foreign, pursued by the present government the origin of which is not to be found in the actions of preceding Liberal governments.

Indeed, sir, our present economic and financial difficulties were really born, as I am sure every student of economic history will attest, in the womb of the unregulated and unplanned investment boom of 1955-1957. That boom, unplanned and unregulated, created a situation of tight money at that time. High interest rates, let me remind the leader of the official opposition, are not the creation of the Conservatives. Indeed, high interest rates were created by the government of which he was a member—I know of many electors in Canada who in 1957 voted for the Conservatives—I was not then myself a candidate—precisely because they blamed the Liberals for unemployment or lack of business caused by high interest rates.

Mr. Starr: And tight money.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, that is true. The unplanned boom of those years created a condition where a recession was bound to result, as anyone who followed economic development could have foretold. Much of our production was concentrated on consumer durables which glutted the market. Huge inventories were piled up across the country. The usual cyclical recession was as inevitable as night follows day. It is true that the present government compounded the mistakes made by its predecessors, but I say in all earnestness, Mr. Speaker, that the brave Liberal speeches of today stand in distressing contrast to their dismal acts of yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, since I have reached the end of a thought perhaps I may call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned I was referring to the fact that the unplanned boom of 1955, 1956, and 1957 was bound to be followed by a recession. There was one other thing that happened in those two or three years, and that was that the price of the Canadian dollar went up. For some years our currency was at a premium, with disastrous consequences on our exports. Then finally, as every member of the house and students out of it know, some 18 months ago the government started manipulating the dollar in order to bring its price down; and the more it manipulated, the more it became possible for the speculators to step in and a period of crisis was reached last spring.

I wish to say that the devaluation of the dollar was probably necessary and unavoidable in all the surrounding circumstances. However, in my view there is everything wrong with pegging the rate of the dollar. The most objectionable feature of the pegged or fixed exchange rate is, of course, the fact that the government is forced to pursue a restrictionist domestic policy for the sole purpose of hanging on to a rate; and even that, of course, is becoming increasingly more difficult.

Again I do not wish to go into any theoretical exposition. That is not to say that I understand all about it, but I think I do understand something about it. However, it will be sufficient for me to remind hon. members that the fixed exchange rate today is very much like the old gold standard used to be. Precisely as it was necessary for the countries around the world to get rid of the gold standard because it was restrictive and cribbed and confined them, so it is necessary for Canada today to get rid of the fixed exchange rate. Therefore, to the outline of policies I suggested earlier I add this one, that we must free our exchange rate so that it may itself find the best rate consonant with economic growth and full employment.

A part of the program, of course, must always be concerned with the expansion of our exports; because basically that is the best way in which to meet any of balance of payments and imbalance of trade problems. I have neither the time nor is it for me in our group to deal in detail with the export problem. However, I wish to indicate, as I am about to conclude, some lines I believe Canada should follow. First, I remind the house that there are almost limitless and promising markets in Africa and in Asia, in the new, developing nations of the world. If we had the imagination necessary we would take advantage of those markets through the extension of credits at minimum interest rates for long periods of time. We must apply our minds and our imaginations to the instrument of export subsidies, particularly in the case of our secondary manufacturing industries. We should also apply a great deal of energy and some considerable funds to research work in order to see whether we cannot find new goods that Canada could produce; I refer to goods which because of their quality production or for some other reason would be suitable to produce for a small market like Canada and would be capable of being sold outside of Canada because of their uniqueness.

Finally, and most important of all, Mr. Speaker, we ought immediately, without any loss of time, start planning for negotiations with the United Kingdom, the United States, the European common market and other members of the commonwealth looking toward free trade between the continents concerned in order to start an expansion of our exports.

All of these things—and this is the basic point of the proposition I have been trying to put to the house, Mr. Speaker—must be part of one co-ordinated and integrated plan. They must be part of one co-ordinated and integrated attack on all our economic problems. Without such co-ordination, one step can easily negative the other. For this reason planning is the essential ingredient of an effective policy.

As the hon. member for Kootenay West, our parliamentary leader, said the other day, "planning" used to be regarded as a disreputable word, a disreputable idea, but now it has become a popular one. In fact it has become so popular that the government and the official opposition vie with each other as to which one of them made a planning proposal first, forgetting to look at history and see where these planning ideas really came from. However, that consideration is unimportant. What is important is that all over the world and in every part of the world economic and social planning has become an idea which people grasp as essential to our modern complex and interdependent society. Reference has already been made in this house to the report of a mission from the national productivity council to six countries in Europe. According to the report, the members came back convinced of the necessity of planning here at home.

I say that only those blinded by outworn prejudices and those who glory in ignorance can any longer suggest that a modern economy can proceed healthily without active and direct intervention, investment and leadership by the government.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we in the west have very little time to lose. As we sit here debating, crucial events are taking place all across the world. Things have happened in recent days on this continent which make or should make all of us sick at heart, particularly the fact that young students at a university should act so viciously and should express and show such contempt for the basic moral principles of human dignity and human equality. Events are taking place in Europe, in Africa, in Asia, in America which affect the very future of humanity itself. I suggest to you that so far the battle between communist totalitarianism and our western democracies has not gone entirely well for us. I furthermore suggest to you that the reason it has not gone entirely well for us is that we are too frequently bound and governed by outworn ideas, by inadequate institutions, by agglomerations of greedy power and by outdated policies.

I say to this house, Mr. Speaker, that we must free our western world of these shackles. We must throw them out and we must make democracy a dynamic weapon in the war against poverty, prejudice and ignorance. We must fearlessly and quickly respond to the needs of our own nation and to the anxious demands of a world in revolt against oppression of man by man. Our country, sir, must play a part in this; it should play an important part.

This, as I see it, is the challenge. In my first speech to parliament I hope and pray that we shall have the wisdom and the courage to meet that challenge before it is too late.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret very much to tell the hon. members who should like to put questions to the hon. member who just finished his speech that they cannot do so because his time expired at the same time he concluded his speech.

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join others who have participated in this debate in extending my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I say they acquitted themselves nobly, in my judgment, as I am sure all hon. members will agree, and we wish them well in their parliamentary life.

I should like to say a few words about the subamendment. When hon. gentlemen to the right of me talk about economic planning or planning of any sort they are talking about planning in the socialistic sense of the word, an entirely different planning from what a free democracy believes in. Planning in a socialistic sense, Mr. Speaker, means regimentation and nothing else. Whether you call it rotation or regimentation or anything that you want, it means that the government tells you what to do and you do it or else.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Starr: When they talk about planning which will affect the operations of industry and labour all over this country they are surely not talking about plans which they will not have the power to enforce. I simply bring this matter to the attention of the house at this time, Mr. Speaker, and especially to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite who applauded so vociferously earlier today when the subamendment was introduced, so they will know exactly what it was they were applauding.

I should like to dwell for a few moments on something that has been noticed by me and the people of this country since 1957, namely that the prime objective of the Liberal party in this house has been to destroy the Prime Minister in order to get back into power. This they cannot deny.

Mr. Chevrier: Nonsense.

Mr. Starr: It has been evident right through the last five years that in order to attain office again their main objective has been to destroy the image of this great man who has done more in the space of time he has been Prime Minister than any other prime minister in the history of this country. These attacks have not diminished. Regardless of the state of the economy and the damage that might be done to the economy and to the Prime Minister himself, as long as they can get back into office they will employ every tactic that can possibly be employed.

With regard to the foreign exchange situation, they say that the Prime Minister has deceived the people of Canada and has committed a fraud.

Mr. Pickersgill: So he has.

Mr. Starr: The Prime Minister set the record straight in this respect when he spoke the other day. Today the hon. member for Davenport got to his feet and we have been reading his books, we who have looked upon him as the economic planner of the Liberal party, expected something more than he gave us today. His purpose in making his maiden speech today was to try to offset the true facts that the Prime Minister set before the House of Commons and the people of Canada the other day. These tactics, these attacks, these charges of deceit and fraud and of undermining the Canadian economy, are the most degrading in the political life of the Liberal party in recent years, and have never before been experienced in the history of this house.

What is the position of the Liberal party at the present time? The Leader of the Opposition, after spending three and a half hours on his feet, only put forward two rotten old planks out of their platform. He resurrected a national health plan, something they have been promising the people of the country since 1919 without ever intending to bring it about. They do not intend to bring it about now. We have set up a royal commission to review the pros and cons of such a plan, and to do it in a democratic way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Postponement of decision.

Mr. Starr: Then they bring in a new one that they have stolen from the Social Credit party. As an afterthought they are going to extend the payment of family allowances from age 16 to age 21. That is the whole essence of their platform. The Leader of the Opposition had a duty as leader to expound their whole platform in the three and a half hours he spoke, not leave it to some backbencher to do it. We have not heard anything yet, because the hon. member for Davenport had an opportunity and he did not reveal anything new that this government is not doing now and has not been doing for a number of years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised at the speech made by the hon. member for Davenport, because for some years, as I mentioned earlier, his economic thinking and policies have been before the people of this country, first in the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects and more recently in the speeches he made during the election campaign, as well as in a newer and perhaps more authoritative work entitled "Troubled Canada". I have a copy of this book and I note that it is tastefully bound in black which, in my opinion, conveys the type of thinking in the Liberal party.

I understand also that this book is based upon second thoughts following the earlier work he has done. It is called "Troubled Canada". In my view a more appropriate title might be "Troubled Liberals". It is my purpose at this time to deal with the opinions expressed in that work, some of which seem to be of a political rather than an economic nature. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that in the chapter devoted to what the author calls a positive program for expansion, one of the major items in that positive program is increased capital expenditures in the public sector.

In 1956 the total federal government expenditure came to $5,034 million or 16.5 per cent of the gross national product. In the first quarter of 1962 the total was $7,476 million, seasonally adjusted to an annual rate of 19.4 per cent of the gross national product. The hon. member for York South in his speech this morning stated that there has been a decrease in the gross national product per capita since 1957. The actual fact is—and I am surprised that these people get up and say these things that cannot be substantiated—that it has increased by $65 per capita. In 1957 it was $1,913 per capita and in the second quarter of 1962 it was $1,978.

An hon. Member: In real dollars?

Mr. Starr: In real dollars.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not in real dollars.

Mr. Starr: I have only half an hour. I welcome interjections if hon. members will allow me extra time in order that I might continue and complete what I have to say. If that is agreed upon I shall be glad to entertain any interjections or questions.

This certainly indicates an increase in the level of capital expenditures by the federal government which the hon. member, in this book, calls a major step toward relieving unemployment. He suggests this is the way social capital is also brought about, as though this were something new. This government has been more active than any government in history in the field of housing, slum clearance, urban renewal, aid to municipalities, sewage disposal, building schools, aid to universities and so on. They look at the throne speech and say there is nothing in it. There is everything in it that they had in their platform, and that is why they have only two rotten planks left now.

We have had massive expenditures on a scale never before undertaken in this field. This is part of the reason for the deficits we have incurred. I notice also that the hon. member for Davenport is not suggesting we cut down on these expenditures. He is suggesting new ones. Let me tell him that we will get around to those in time, as we have been doing right along.

In this great book, "Troubled Canada", in which he corrects many of the thoughts he expressed in his original work, he talks about providing 100,000 new jobs through municipal winter works. We have been doing this for four years, Mr. Speaker. I say to him that when he made the statement that it was necessary to provide 100,000 jobs, he was being a piker. Last winter we provided jobs for 150,000 Canadians in that one winter alone. Since this program was inaugurated more than $800 million has been spent on municipal works, and some 360,000 jobs have been provided for Canadians.

In this book "Troubled Canada" he talks about stimulating industry. Those who listened to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he spoke in this house yesterday will realize that here again this government has led the way. It is also interesting to note what the hon. member for Davenport said in this book about deficit financing. He said:

> Deficits are justifiable and may be necessary in periods of heavy unemployment and recession. But positive measures should be taken to overcome such conditions as quickly as possible and when this has been done, budgets should be balanced. Not to do this would be an invitation to inflation which no responsible government could contemplate.

This is exactly what we are doing, Mr. Speaker, but it is in contrast to what he said today. He will have to write another book now. There is another interesting paragraph in this book "Troubled Canada" which I should like to quote:

> Some idea of the magnitude of the problem is given by the fact that over the past decade, employment has increased on the average by about 100,000 per year or just about one half the number for whom jobs must be found in each of the next five years.

The decade he was talking about, Mr. Speaker, when employment increased by only 100,000 jobs per year, must have been the golden decade about which the Liberals are always talking and to which the leader of the official opposition referred so feelingly when he spoke. Let me inform you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house that at the moment, as a result of policies brought about by this government, we have doubled that rate of expansion in the creation of new jobs. Currently we are producing 200,000 new jobs annually. This is what they say they are going to do when they get into office. We are doing this now; it is happening now, not two or three years from now. This rate of expansion will be further increased by the measures forecast in the throne speech and to be brought before this parliament at this session.

The speech from the throne placed before parliament a series of measures having as their objective the promotion of this country's economic growth and the creation of new employment for Canadians. This is what we are all after. These are the steps we are taking to bring this about, to accelerate our present efforts. The measures are complementary to the measures already brought forward in a previous parliament and which have been effective to the extent that employment in 1962 has been, on the average, consistently higher than in both 1960 and 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about unemployment?

Mr. Starr: At the same time the gross national product, the measure of economic growth, is currently running at better than 8 per cent above last year; and it, as the hon. member for Davenport will agree, is a very important measure of economic growth. We used to hear a lot about it from the Leader of the Opposition, but since it has increased to 8 per cent over last year we do not hear so much about it.

On page 327 of the very interesting report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, prepared under the authority of the hon. member for Davenport, we find forecast a gross national product in the neighbourhood of $39.5 billion for 1965. It is now running at $39.4 billion, not in 1965 but in the second quarter of 1962.

I have only half an hour in which to speak. I asked for permission to speak longer, but the opposition would not grant it. We are three years ahead of this forecast as a result of the measures taken by the government in what the Leader of the Opposition calls "the wasted years". He must be thinking of the years when he was in office. I would also point out that consumer expenditure is running at about $25.4 billion compared with $14.3 billion in 1955, and that personal income in the second quarter of 1962 reached the figure of $30.4 million.

Let us now look at employment. Since the first quarter of 1961 employment has been rising both steadily and sharply. A record 6,049,000 persons were employed last year, and there has been a further substantial improvement this year. Total employment in 1961 averaged 94,000 higher than in 1960, and in the first eight months of 1962 employment was 197,000 higher, on the average, than in the corresponding period of 1961.

During the summer months some 268,000 young people entered the labour market, a record number for this time of year. Never before did such a large number come on the market but, in spite of this, total unemployment in August was estimated at 280,000, some 43,000 lower than a year earlier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Still too high.

Mr. Starr: Virtually all the drop was among unemployed men. As hon. members who have read the dominion bureau of statistics report know, the unemployment rate in August was 4.1 per cent compared with 4.8 per cent a year earlier; but encouraging as this improvement is, none of us will be satisfied until unemployed men. As hon. members who have possible level.

There has been some discussion as to what constitutes full employment in the economy, and once again I would like to refer to the report published under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Davenport. This is what that report states:

> In a free and dynamic economy in which people are entitled to change their occupations as they choose and to move from place to place and in which there are continually changing products, methods and consumer demands, there will always be those who are out of work at any given time. This cannot be avoided.

It helps to keep the economy flexible and it enables people to seek better opportunities in other occupations or in different places. This we shall refer to as "frictional unemployment".

If there were no "frictional unemployment", if 100 per cent of the working force were fully occupied all the time, which of course is theoretical and not a practical proposition, the inflationary pressures which would be created would be uncontrollable . . .

It goes on to say:

Many people will think that we shall continue to be threatened with serious inflation if on the average only 3 per cent of the total working force are frictionally unemployed; especially so as this average figure includes "seasonal unemployment", which because of our climate is bound to be higher in Canada than in some other countries. It is possible that such fears may be justified.

Professor Neil H. Jacoby, a former member of President Eisenhower's council of economic advisers, has stated that the consensus of American economists is that the United States economy has full employment in a practical sense when 96 per cent of the working force has jobs and about 4 per cent are in process of changing jobs. (Many believe that the ratios are closer to 95 per cent and 5 per cent.)

I bring this to the attention of hon. members and, as I say, it was written under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Davenport.

Farm employment was lower by 107,000 since 1957, continuing a trend which has been in evidence for the whole post-war period. The government is giving serious attention to this long term situation. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture will be dealing with this matter but I would point out, as announced in the speech from the throne, that steps are being taken to work out and establish a program for agricultural training right across Canada, with the co-operation of the provinces, and a meeting will be held for this purpose on October 17.

Employment in the service industries has continued to increase. In those industries employment averaged 428,000 higher than five years earlier. I stress that this is an average, and not the high point. These significant improvements in the unemployment picture come at a time when general output is up to a greater degree than at any time in the past five years.

What is the situation on a regional basis? This is an interesting question. Although in August unemployment for Canada as a whole was 4.1 per cent of the labour force, the rate in the prairie and Ontario regions was considerably lower. The rate for the month of August in the prairies showed unemployment as 1.8 per cent of the labour force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Starr: This means that in the three prairie provinces there was only 1.8 per cent of the labour force out of work and seeking work. In Ontario, which contains a third of the population of the country and is a highly industrialized province, the percentage of the labour force unemployed was 3.6 per cent. In the maritimes the rate stood highest at 6.4 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And 14 per cent in winter.

Mr. Starr: In Quebec it was 5.1 per cent and in British Columbia 5 per cent. I am bringing these figures to the attention of the house because many people do not bother to learn the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the rate last winter? That is the point.

Mr. Starr: References have been made by a number of speakers, including the Leader of the Opposition, to a report by the committee to appraise employment and unemployment statistics, which was appointed by President Kennedy; and attention has been drawn to the fact that, according to estimates prepared by this committee, Canada's average rate of unemployment in 1960 was the highest of any industrial nation. Among the countries referred to were France, Italy, West Germany, Sweden and Japan. I would simply point out that the average wage in those countries leaves a great deal to be desired by comparison with Canadian standards. Having heard the hon. members to my right say this was the kind of economy we should have in Canada—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: You see, they agree. Let me point out that the average wage in Canada was $1.78 per hour at that time. In West Germany it was 63 cents an hour; in France, 44 cents; in Sweden, $1.03; and in Japan, 31 cents. Is this how the opposition want us to obtain full employment in Canada? Is it on those terms? That is what they have been applauding.

Finally I wish to remind the house that the report of the Senate committee on manpower says, among other things, that with the possible exception of the United States, unemployment statistics published by countries abroad do not lend themselves to comparison with our own because they have been compiled on a different basis using a different yardstick of measurement.

As hon. members are aware, the speech from the throne foreshadows legislation to deal with the result of technical changes in industry. It has been said by opposition speakers that there is nothing in the speech from the throne, but surely even the socialist members must agree that something has to be done for those workers who are being displaced by reason of changes due to automation. This is the first effort of any government in the world to do anything about this problem, yet our opponents say there is nothing in the speech from the throne. They talk about the need for a training program. Well that, of course, is our program. It is because we have recognized the need for technical education in this country that we are building 400 new schools and additions to other schools in this country. They have lost sight of the fact that we are spending $267 million as a federal contribution to those schools in order that technical education may be given to over 130,000 old and young Canadians. They say we are not doing anything about it—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Only because we prodded you into it.

Mr. Starr: There was nothing left for them to do in this field. That is why they took the plank out of the platform.

In closing may I say we have been listening to forecasts of doom and gloom for five years. Owing to the measures taken by this government, the forecasts have not been realized. I suppose people would wonder if members of the opposition did not criticize the proposals contained in the speech from the throne because, after all, they are the opposition. They would not recognize anything good in it even though it might be loaded. However, regardless of what hon. members opposite and to my right may say about them, the measures outlined in that speech make those gloomy forecasts even less likely of realization. Let us, then, declare a moratorium on disaster, and for the rest of this parliament address ourselves to the people's business in a positive and constructive way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I address a question to the minister, as he suggested we might at the end of his very interesting speech?

Mr. Speaker: I regret that as in the case of the hon. member for York South, the minister and the clock finished in a dead heat as far as the time allotment is concerned, and unless the house were to give its unanimous consent to an extension of time to the minister I am afraid we cannot hear the question which the hon. member seeks to put.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Next speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I tried at least.

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to congratulate you for the confidence hon. members have shown you in asking you to preside over their proceedings.

I also congratulate the member who just took the chair in your place and who, in spite of his youth, was entrusted with the high office of Acting Speaker.

May I also be permitted to commend the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They deserve our admiration for having succeeded in delivering very interesting speeches, while taking their inspiration in a speech from the throne as laconic as the one we heard last Thursday.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) blamed the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for not having taken the opportunity offered to him last Monday to speak on agriculture. If it is true he did not speak about it, it is not because the opposition takes no interest in agriculture. Quite the contrary.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, just a glance at the Liberal program will show that agriculture is one of the main concerns of the Liberal party.

If the chief of the Liberal party did not deal himself with that question, it is because he can rely on the members of his party and is confident that even his younger associates can be entrusted to deal, in this house, with a matter as important as agriculture. I wish to thank him for his faith in me. It is a great honour that is reflected on all the people, mostly farmers, of the beautiful riding of Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, and my constituents will be all the more grateful for this show of confidence since they have been represented in the past by a Conservative member and a silent one at that, like many others.

Yesterday the house heard an impressive speech on farming conditions in western Canada from the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). As for me, I shall endeavour to set forth some of the problems facing our eastern farmers. I shall point out the unconcern of the present government as regards any farming policy, and then I shall mention the solutions, or at least some of the solutions advocated by the Liberal party to meet those problems.

The government will no doubt realize that some of those solutions were already part of our previous programs, but whatever the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) may think, we will not give them up until they have been incorporated in enactments of this house, which will come about much sooner than the minister may wish.

Mr. Speaker, mine is a constituency which has deeply suffered from the government's unconcern since 1957 as regards agricultural policy. Most farmers back home are dairy producers, and they are facing an unprecedented crisis.

They must invest large amounts of money, first of all to acquire a piece of land, and the equipment they need for the operation of their farms, and to buy the herds which they must improve constantly. Installing adequate cold plants is extremely costly, and today, in order to conform to the requirements of the companies which control milk distribution, they must replace all their former equipment with refrigerated storage facilities referred to as "bulk tanks".

Mr. Speaker, what is in store for the dairy producers as regards marketing?

Our farmers lie at the mercy of the trust shamefully constituted to exploit them to the fullest.

As a matter of fact, the farmers from the economical area of Montreal cannot reach the consumers' market of the metropolis without going through some big dairies, which subject our dairy producers to a sort of unilateral contract called "quota". I say it is a unilateral contract for, according to this agreement, the commitments lie only on the dairy producer's side. He undertakes to supply regularly a certain quantity of first class milk without any interruption or decline, the year round.

On the other hand, the dairy can accept whatever quantity of milk it deems convenient and send the surplus to skimming stations where the producer is paid at the most $2 per hundredweight for milk of the same quality as that which is being sold for whole milk consumption and for which the producer is paid about $5 per hundredweight. This milk is then resold to the consumer at more than $10 per hundredweight, without taking into account the watering down operation to which the dairies—and, as you can imagine, with great pleasure—submit our milk.

You may argue, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer should simply adjust his production in relation to the whole milk consumption market. But, mind you, it is not all that simple. If the farmer who produces daily 20 milk-churns, half of which goes to the powder milk processing, decides to bring down his quota to 10 churns a day, he will simply see 5 churns accepted as good milk and 5 continue to be sent to the skimming station.

It is obvious that the dairies value the skimming stations, and I do not believe that this is without interest.

It is therefore of pressing necessity that the government inquires into this trust and that it takes the required steps to put an end to this shameful exploitation of our dairy producers.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Ask that of Mr. Lemoyne.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be interrupted. Like my hon. friends opposite, I only have half an hour at my disposal to deal with such an important subject.

An hon. Member: In any case, we are not interested.

Mr. Pigeon: The problem comes under the province of Quebec, the "Commission de l'industrie laitière".

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I think I would be right in saying that this is the hon. member's maiden address in this house, and I hope all hon. members will extend the traditional courtesy and let him proceed uninterrupted.

(Translation):

Mr. Drouin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The federation of dairy farmers was justified in raising cries of alarm during its convention held in Montreal in January 1962.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will get an answer to his inquiry—even though I will not oblige him voluntarily—through an editorial published in the January 24, 1962 issue of Terre de Chez Nous which reads as follows:

> Dairy farming is in a state of stagnation. It is even faced with disaster.

A little further on, when the writer allots responsibilities, this is what he has to say about the federal government's responsibility:

> What is to be expected from the government in Ottawa? A contribution equal at least to its share of responsibility in the matter. And this share is quite important. Ottawa is to be blamed mostly for its inaction. The federal government must have a very guilty conscience for having shown such neglect in that connection.

And I go on quoting another passage from this editorial:

> Around 1957, when the consumer used to pay a somewhat more reasonable price than today for his butter, the consumption kept up and it was even necessary to contemplate the need for a certain importation following a decrease in production. Ottawa should have remembered that lesson. They did not. Afterwards dairy policies were adopted according to their electoral advantages rather than with a view to the future of that important industry.

That is what Terre de Chez Nous, the medium of expression of eastern farmers, states concerning the policy of the government in Ottawa.

An hon. Member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Drouin: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), whose absence I notice, will tell us that he has since settled the problem of agriculture.

I am not jealous of the advantages western farmers may have received; quite the contrary, I am sincerely pleased with them.

However, the farmers in my riding, like all those of eastern Canada, are now facing the most serious of crises, one which they will not come through without the federal government's assistance.

I am ready to concede that ignorance, rather than ill will, is the reason why the minister will not consider our farmers' problems. In fact, one should not be too surprised at the government's unconcern when one realizes that it put the fate of agriculture into the hands of a colonel who dreamt of Bomarcs and then into that of a professor who seems much more interested in the dollar devaluation than in the devaluation of agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, it is time our eastern farmers had someone to represent them and look after their interests in the cabinet.

We, the Liberals, are conscious of this need and intend to appoint a minister of agriculture for eastern Canada, as soon as the next Liberal government is formed—which should not take long, despite the shameful about-turn of our Social Credit friends who this evening will no doubt vote with the government—

An hon. Member: More election promises.

Another hon. Member: It will not be long.

An hon. Member: The same old refrain.

Mr. Drouin: The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska pointed out last Friday that the 12 cents subsidy per pound of butter would permit the disposal of butter surpluses by bringing about a 20 per cent increase in consumption.

Well, supposing the hon. member is right, the consumption of butter per person in Canada would still be below what it was under the Liberal administration.

I shall refer to a report published by the economics division of the Department of Agriculture of Canada. Our friends opposite could not repudiate a publication of their Minister of Agriculture. It is, "Agricultural conditions in Canada", January 1962 issue, to which I have added recent statistics obtained from the department.

For instance, during the period 1951-57, we see there that the consumption of butter per head has never been less than 19 pounds. On the other hand, margarine consumption per head has never been in excess of 7.8 pounds per head. Yet, when our friends opposite took over, margarine consumption increased rapidly while butter consumption decreased in proportion.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Drouin: And I shall give you some figures to prove it: 1957, consumption per head, 19.4 pounds; 1958, 18.3 pounds; 1959, 17.4 pounds; 1960, 16.2 pounds; 1961, 15.8 pounds. Even with the forecast increase of 20 per cent, it still remains well below what the Liberals were able to offer our farmers.

An hon. Member: Did you notice the difference in 1959 and 1960?

Another hon. Member: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Drouin: We, the Liberals, also propose to change the Crop Insurance Act so as to make it really available to the farmers.

It is not only in the west that crops are subject to weather conditions.

We, in the east, in the province of Quebec, and more particularly in the economic area of Montreal, have to face devastation by hail, drought, grasshoppers as well as floods, and our farmers cannot count on the benefits of crop insurance, because under that legislation provincial governments have to assume too heavy financial risks.

I shall not linger on a matter which my fellow member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has so competently explained in this house, but I should like to point out some farm legislation introduced by this government.

I have here, in my hands, a sort of election folder published by the Queen's printer, extolling the merits of what is generally known as the ARDA Act, that is the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. Some $50 million were ear-marked for the administration of that act though, as the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, it seems that no final arrangement has as yet been made with the provinces. I said "it seems", because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) is not very wordy when it comes to informing the house of his department's activities. To all intents and purposes, two years later the benefits which one might have expected from that legislation have not yet been felt.

Indeed, I think that act will never be applied as such for the very good reason that it does not take into consideration the context of economic planning.

I shall not make a full analysis of that legislation. We will have the opportunity of coming back to it.

May I, at this point, expound another measure put forward in the Liberal party platform in order to help our farmers.

You are no doubt aware, of the value of publicity. Constant repetitions on the radio, the television and in the newspapers, to the effect that some product is the best, unconsciously leads one to believe it in the long run. Do you think that our wives use the green crystal Oxydol because it is the best detergent? I doubt it. The reason is rather that this detergent is much advertised.

Well, if this kind of publicity is so good for soap, why would it not be good in the case of milk and its by-products?

We can, through an exhaustive publicity program, create a demand equal to production. We will also succeed in securing new markets for our dairy products by financing, after an agreement with the school boards and through the provincial governments, free distribution of milk in all the Canadian schools.

It is unthinkable that our children should lack a food essential to their physical development, when our farmers are selling a good part of their dairy production at $2 per hundredweight.

However, the fact remains that a working man getting $60 a week cannot very well afford to pay 23 or 24 cents a bottle to buy the 8 or 10 pints of milk which his children absolutely need.

Even our Social Credit friends will surely admit that such a plan for free distribution of milk in the schools would be morally good, physically and financially feasible.

I was quite surprised to hear last Friday the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska give credit to his government for the Farm Credit Act.

[Mr. Drouin.]

I believe that this legislation goes back to the 1920's, and that it is due to the Liberal government. On the other hand, it is true that the present government has changed the name of the act and has somewhat altered the lending conditions in 1959.

But if that legislation now finds a certain favour with the farmers of the province of Quebec it is not due to the Conservatives, but rather because the Lesage Liberal government in Quebec enacted a legislation providing for partial reimbursement of the interests charged on those loans by the federal government.

Besides, our friends opposite use that legislation for publicity purposes much more than to really help the farmers.

The fact is that the guarantees asked for in practice are such that most applications are rejected.

The corporation grants loans only to those who need them the least and it asks more in the way of guarantees than any bank would, and that is saying a good deal.

The act becomes too often, with the complicity of certain officials of the Department of Agriculture, a fallacious publicity instrument in favour of our friends opposite.

Let me give you a good example: in the spring of 1962, that is before the June 18 election, a farmer in my constituency approached the then Conservative member concerning a federal loan. The member filled in the necessary application forms and later on sent an inspector to look over the applicant's farm.

Having collected all necessary information, the inspector led the farmer to believe that his chances to get a loan were excellent and that anyway he would hear very soon from the department.

Of course, in the meantime we had the election. In early September our farmer, tired of waiting and wanting to meet his obligations, went to the office of the new Liberal member for his riding to find out about his application. I then wrote to the district inspector and asked him about that application for a loan, and what was the file number.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what that inspector answered me? Simply that he remembered that application, for which, however, there was no file number, for the excellent reason that it had not even been considered.

That application, it seems, did not meet with the requirements of the Farm Credit Corporation.

I do not wish to discuss here the merits of that application, nor whether it was proper to give it consideration, but I should like to point out the fact that an honest farmer was seriously wronged through the bad faith of a Conservative member who, in co-operation with a federal official, resorted to the Farm Credit Corporation for election purposes.

I would not like to give the hon. members the impression that I question the competence and honesty of federal officials. Quite the contrary, I consider that almost all of them are the perfect example of integrity; besides, most of them have been appointed under a Liberal administration.

But I cannot help noting that, in the last five years, some Conservative members have tried to saddle upon the civil service a patronage system which once flourished in the province of Quebec, under the Union Nationale party. But we must not forget that this patronage system was severely reproved by Quebec electors in 1960 and will get, with all due deference to the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pierre Sevigny), its finishing stroke on November 14 next.

Mr. Pigeon: That's what we call petty politics.

An hon. Member: That's one thing you know.

(Text):

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to congratulate the Speaker and Deputy Speaker on their elevation to high office. I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the excellent job they did. I had the opportunity of speaking at the convention of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin) and I know he will make a great contribution to the House of Commons.

In the past few days we have been discussing the speech from the throne. It was very enlightening to see the alignment of the Liberal party with the socialist element in the house. When the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) moved an amendment to the amendment today, which clearly means nationalization of industries and control of the lending institutions of the country, the Liberal members applauded. It is very interesting to see just how far they are going in this House of Commons and in the country as a whole. I do not think it is in the national interest for the Liberal party to be moving closer and closer to socialism.

With regard to planning, I wonder just what planning was done by the Liberals between 1954 and 1957 with regard to slum clearance, vocational schools and vocational training. The trade deficit between Canada and the United States soared and soared in a period when the Liberals said this country was going through a great expansion. They did not even give any consideration to the influx in population as a result of war babies that was going to take place between 1957 and 1960.

The Liberals talk about the great things they have done. What about expansion of trade? The old, doctrinaire concept is that the Conservative party is the protectionist party and the Liberals are free traders. Just what happened from 1945 to 1957? They did nothing. The tariff structure of this country has not been changed almost from the beginning of Canadian history.

Then they talk about social security, how benevolent they are and what they are going to do. I remember coming here in 1957 and listening to them crying, and saying they were sorry, but that they could give the old people of this country only a $6 increase. Then they went out on the hustings in 1962 and talked about portable pensions and medical and health insurance at the ridiculous cost which they described in my riding. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who is a great advocate of free trade only when it does not apply to the automobile industry, did nothing to commend this government for the reduction of the excise tax on automobiles. Indeed, the Prime Minister in his speech proved that the government is doing a great deal to help industry and especially the automobile industry.

In the speech from the throne there are many good proposals that should be given consideration by the house, but the Leader of the Opposition did not want to hear them. Oh, no, he wanted to grab power. The Liberal party was not elected to be the government of Canada. If they had been they would be sitting over here. Therefore it is up to them to look at all the proposals of the government and give them proper consideration. It is very apparent that they are going to support the socialist amendment this evening. I believe this is a great mistake on the part of the Liberal party and I think that the people will judge them on that mistake.

The speech from the throne forecasts expansion, new jobs, increasing trade, a taxation review, increased development through the industrial development bank and portable pensions. Portable pensions are very dear to my heart as one who comes from an industrial constituency. I have advocated such a move before but I remember that when this was announced in the House of Commons the co-leader of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Essex East, questioned the then minister of justice as to why the provinces must give their permission for portable pensions to come into effect. He said we could do it ourselves. Yet the Leader of the Opposition admitted in his speech that the permission of the provinces must be secured for survivor benefits. You can see how the Liberals are repenting all the way down the line for the things they have done in the past.

I should like to refer to the three point program of the Liberal party which really does not contain very much that has not already been started. They talk about urban renewal and providing 75 per cent of the cost. I have been a member of an urban renewal committee in Hamilton for the last two years and it is not a matter of the federal government simply throwing out the money and telling the city of Hamilton or Toronto to rip down houses and throw people out of their homes. There must be a lot of things done before urban renewal can take place. There must be consultation with public and separate school boards and with downtown associations. It is not the prerogative of the Leader of the Opposition to say that the problem will be solved simply by increasing the grants.

He also talked about the industrial development bank and said that the Liberals would do very much more than we have done. By 1956 there had been 349 loans made amounting to $39 million. By the end of 1961, after the Conservative administration had been in power for five years, there were 1,364 loans totalling $71 million. This is proof that the Conservative party has been putting forward these proposals steadily.

He also indicated in his remarks that new housing for the production of jobs should be promoted by the government. This government put $2 billion into the direct lending market of the country. If his figures are correct that 100,000 jobs are created by $500 million going into the economy, this is proof that the government has provided 400,000 jobs in the housing industry over the period of the last five years.

In the field of education the government has made vocational training grants to municipalities to build vocational training schools, as well as university grants, loans to universities for residences and all the way down the line.

I should like to point out one thing to which I feel the government should give consideration at this time. I believe the time limit in connection with the sewage disposal legislation and the vocational grants should be extended beyond March 31, 1962 for loans that are presently in effect, so the projects can be completed. Many of the school boards in this country were perhaps a little hesitant about taking up this plan; but most of them, as the Minister of Labour has indicated, have taken advantage of it and some $267 million have been allocated. I feel we should go ahead and permit people to receive contracts in September and complete their contracts beyond March 31, 1962.

I did note that when this vocational program was announced in the House of Commons the C.C.F.-N.D.P. party and some Liberals laughed at it. They said that this was too little, too late. I do not believe $267 million is too little too late. The municipalities, who are very hard pressed in securing real estate taxes to finance school construction, are very happy with the program. Hamilton has a commitment for $8 million and they are very grateful for the government's interest in this proposal.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) expound his proposal for a utopian economy. At the beginning of his speech, he talked about the problems facing this nation. I am sure we are all conscious of these, except the Leader of the Opposition who did not want to discuss them. He just wanted to get the government out without even talking about them. I may point out that the approach of the socialist party is a very sympathetic and easy-going approach. They talk about a system of medical insurance. I do not want to have happen in this country what happened in Saskatchewan. For obvious reasons, I think that there should be a medical plan in this country. However, the royal commission on health services must report. I do not want politicians in this country trying to secure votes merely by saying, "We are going to have a hospital or doctors insurance plan". I do not want them trying to do this merely because they are uncertain about their political future. We must have all the information so that as a responsible government we can do what is best for this country.

The hon. member for York South talked at great length about planning, looking into the crystal ball to see what is going to happen. This was reminiscent of the call of a premier of Saskatchewan in 1944 and 1945. There was talk about abolishing the 2 per cent Liberal sales tax, a free medical insurance plan and government in industry. All the way down the line, everything was going to be great in Saskatchewan. This was the first socialist experiment in Canada and we have found it has failed. Mr. Douglas packed his bag and left them in a mess. From 1945 to 1962 public debt increased from $120 million to $450 million and in the same period 250,000 people left that province. You look at government in business, nationalization, and competition with free enterprise. You hear Mr. Douglas, in some of his speeches, talk about going into the cement business, the plastic business, the alcohol business and so on. We know this party has gone into a few businesses and every one failed. He did go into the tanning business, the boot business, woollen blankets, and so on, and they lost a million dollars. Then, he went into the printing business, paint business, housing corporations, box factories, brick plant, and so on, and lost another few million dollars. If those in the socialist party who want to plan the whole economy of Canada cannot do this for a little province like Saskatchewan, I think they should be laughed out of this House of Commons.

I can see what is happening to the Liberal party. A man crossed the floor last session. I remember him sitting in this corner over here and telling us about the nationalization of the steel industry, or rather going into competition with the private sector of our economy. It appears as though he has had a great deal of influence on the Liberal party when they applaud so loudly the great socialist plan of this New Democratic party.

During the election and several years before, Mr. Douglas talked a great deal about putting people to work. This is a very important problem in Canada, and we must face up to it seriously. There must be no fooling about it. All during the campaign he talked about getting sticks and stones, picks and shovels and putting these men to work building roads or other things. At the same time, the power commission in Saskatchewan was buying electrical supplies from Switzerland and Italy. I am not saying the Saskatchewan power commission should not go into the competitive market for electrical materials. However, I am saying it is hypocrisy for a man to go across this country and talk about putting people to work with shovels and picks, while at the same time his power commission is buying electrical fixtures abroad that could be produced in my constituency.

Efficiency in government is, I think, a good thing, since it is the biggest business in the country. We have received the report of a study by the Glassco commission and I hope that the government will, without delay, implement some of those proposals. We have spent a lot of money in securing these proposals and I think we should put some of them into effect. At the same time, however, I believe we should set up some machinery for arbitration with the civil service commission. I do not mean arbitration in perhaps the provincial sense, the way labour relations are set up in the provinces, but some type of committee should be brought into effect so that civil servants across the country can talk to the government and reach a mutually acceptable settlement of their problems.

The next point I would like to mention in my brief speech is the matter of transportation in Canada. This problem has been with us for a long time because of our country's size. There was an item in the throne speech concerning transportation which I think every hon. member should read. It is a worry to me, as a member of parliament, every time the Canadian National estimates come before us and I see the great deficits that we seem to be loading on this country. I have no bone to pick with Mr. Gordon because, in a way, he is a good businessman. However, I feel he is trying to take over the whole transportation industry in Canada. The keynote of the report of the royal commission on transportation is that competition makes good freight rates. From time to time Mr. Gordon has come before the federal committee on railways, air lines and shipping and told us of the many things that company is doing in the country.

I was particularly interested when, in 1959, Mr. Gordon talked about a $5 million item in his estimates for truck operations. These truck operations were to take care of the movement of freight to the railhead in areas where lines had been abandoned. It seems to me, however, that Mr. Gordon is going beyond this type of operation for now he controls running rights from Halifax through to Vancouver by means of long haul truck companies. I do not believe that was intended by this parliament. The royal commission talked about competitive rates being the basis of a free enterprise system. I now feel that Mr. Gordon is going against what he said in the committee. I hope the Minister of Transport will convene this committee as soon as possible so that we may seek clarification of what the president of the C.N.R. is trying to do with transportation in this country. He mentioned a merchandising plan in 1960, under which he could buy trucks to bring loose cargo into the railheads and then transport it across the country by rail. Now we find that with his large trucking firms he is shipping cargo by trucks in direct competition with private trucking firms who, at this time, cannot apply to a royal commission or to the board of transport commissioners for relief, even though the C.N.R. and C.P.R. may cut rates by using the finance subsidy given by the federal government.

I believe the House of Commons should give serious consideration to this matter and, through the Minister of Transport, we should seek to bring the president of the C.N.R. before a special committee so that we can look into all the ramifications of the problem. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), has talked about the denationalization of the trucking industry in Britain after the Conservative government came back into power, and said it brought about a great improvement in transportation. Before we give a bureaucrat, or president of a crown corporation, unlimited possibilities to take over rail and truck transportation in Canada, we should thoroughly investigate the matter so that we shall not wake up some morning and find ourselves faced with a greater transportation problem.

The government, under the circumstances it encountered when it came into office in 1957, has done a good job. Of course one can go across the country and point to particular problems. There are always problems, but this is the age of the responsibility of the individual. If people want the government to supply them with jobs and welfare, somebody must pay for that. We must all work together so that we can achieve these things. I do not say the Liberal party did nothing when they were in office, but now they say that under the Conservative party nothing has happened during the past five years. They are very unfair, but I can see what is happening to them. They are moving in with the socialist parties into this new planned economy and the nationalization of industry. That is a most improper thing for a Liberal party which professes to believe in the free enterprise system.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) moving his amendment, and he is a doctrinaire socialist, mentioned that the New Democratic party would direct social capital in Canada; but how can they direct social capital, which in effect means the trust and insurance companies, without controlling them? As a result of what happened with the so-called compulsory medical care insurance plan in Saskatchewan I really do not see how the Liberals, for political expediency, can side with the people who caused that. It was no benevolent thought on the part of the socialist party to advocate free hospitalization and medical care, because it is not free. During the election a medical doctor who opposed me on behalf of the socialist party told the people he could give them hospitalization and medical care for $24 a year. This is hypocrisy. This is bribing the electorate with their own money because the electorate comprise the people who must pay for these services.

[Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South).]

I am certain that in the near future we will see very active consideration given to all these proposals, but not at the expense of Canada and for the sake of winning a few votes. We are a responsible people and a responsible parliament and we work under a democratic system.

The average person in my constituency, who works in a steel mill or with the Firestone Company, does not want handouts. I come from the labouring class myself and I repeat we do not want any handouts. We want the opportunity to be able to buy our homes. We want the opportunity to do things the way we feel we should do them, and not be told by anyone what we should do, where we should go and what work we should undertake.

It is the responsibility of the government and parliament to cure the economic ills of the country; but to describe devaluation of the dollar as bankruptcy—and this was done during the election campaign—is falsehood and fraud. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), when he spoke today was a great advocate of devaluation. In many instances he has said, "Devalue the Canadian dollar and everything would be well." But when that happened during the election campaign the Liberal party said we were going into bankruptcy. Afterwards they talked about an austerity program, and so did the press. This is not an austerity program. Great Britain had one and it was a lot worse than what is going on here today. This is an exchange problem such as we have faced in the past.

We hear great ridicule from the Liberals of the Prime Minister's stand at the commonwealth conference, but this was the first time in a great many years that any Canadian prime minister went out of Canada to Britain and the United States and talked to them in a businesslike way. In the past the Liberal party did not talk to them at all. They just rode along with what was said. They did not even plan ahead, but now they are siding with the planners who are going to take over the economy.

This government was misrepresented by people who wanted to get into power. It is true that they may have complaints about the government and the Conservative party, but the Leader of the Opposition beat his chest all summer, and late into September, saying "We are not going to talk about this. We are going to throw them out without hearing or discussing their proposals."

The government deserves that its proposals be considered by the house and in this situation it is unbecoming for the Liberal party to vote for a socialist amendment. We are moving left all the time and I do not think that people as a whole want government control. They want social welfare that they pay for, and they want pensions to which they contribute. They do not want politicians telling them about some pie in the sky and free hospitalization. The people of Canada are the government.

Before closing I would like to stress that I have not dealt in full detail with Mr. Gordon and the C.N.R., but I believe the government should give very close scrutiny to the operations of the Canadian National Railway system and its intrusion into the trucking industry of the country.

I am sure the Liberal party could not support the amendment of the socialists and I hope at a quarter to ten tonight they will not show their true colours by moving more left into the socialist camp.

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with those who have spoken before me in complimenting both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did a fine job, a wonderful job, particularly in view of what the speech from the throne did not contain, and more particularly with the thought in mind that much of what is in the speech, if the record of the government is any indication, will not be carried out.

I am a new member of the house. I speak with some trepidation; yet representing the second most populous constituency in British Columbia, a riding of which I am very proud, I hope I shall represent it to the best of my ability. It is a riding which encompasses the north shore of north and west Vancouver and runs up the west coast. It includes many industries, mines, pulp mills and factories, and it is the dormitory of many people of varied vocations and high skills who work in Vancouver. They are particularly concerned with trade—overseas trade and trade with the United States—and they want to work with our neighbours as well as to argue with them.

It is an honour, too, to attempt to follow in the footsteps of the Hon. James Sinclair, the former minister of fisheries who represented Coast-Capilano with great distinction for many years in this house. It is a great inspiration for me to be here in a house which has seen many great Canadians do their best for this country, men with a sense of history, a grasp of world affairs and, more important even than that, a confident outward-looking attitude toward the affairs of this nation. It has been a cause of some distress to me to hear the bickering and petty exchanges which have gone on in this house in recent days. More particularly I have become fatigued by the continuing political orations which put party doctrine—words, generally, which are virtually meaningless—before tangible things.

I am responding to the speech from the throne. I want to talk about energy, about power and, more particularly, about the Columbia river treaty. We Canadians have a problem. We live in a changing world. Perhaps that is a cliché. But with respect to energy we now have many choices before us. Fuel oil has become a luxury. Coal is usable in only a few areas. Oil is giving way in many applications to natural gas and hydro power is having to face the challenge of other means of generation. Beyond all this there is the great promise of power from nuclear energy. As I say, people have more choice. Energy is more transportable.

Surely, we should not be concerned about running out of energy. Surely our attitude should not be one of concern about the eventual recovery of electric power. Part of the speech from the throne says that this government will give consideration to the longer term export of electric power. I think this shows a confident attitude which befits Canadians. It is realistic. It is too late in coming, but it is true also of members on this side of the house that they have not yet realized the realities of the technological changes made in our time. We have to be positive and we have to be realistic at the same time. We need safeguards, of course. We must not export something we shall need in the foreseeable future, and we must not give price concessions to people in other countries which are not available to ourselves. However, we shall look after that. We have an energy board to look after it. The setting up of such a board was recommended by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. It was recommended also by the Borden commission set up by the present government. It was a good idea. The board will safeguard our interests through public hearings at which there will be a full disclosure of all the facts.

We have in this country $6 billion worth of investment in power generation plants and equipment, and the latest information to be published by the dominion bureau of statistics tells us that nearly 25 per cent of that plant is idle the whole year round. Our peak requirements are less than 80 per cent of our plant capacity. We have $1,500 million worth of idle plant. What is the answer of the planners? I am an engineer. I have done some planning. I have even worked for a power utility. The power companies say: if you can get some revenue for your surplus capacity until you can use it yourselves, sell it for what you can get. This is a practical problem faced by utilities not only on this continent but everywhere. Let us spread out our overhead—this tremendous investment. Let us be more efficient by interconnecting with the United States as well as across our provinces. This is the way to become more productive and, incidentally, the way to earn United States dollars. Even if we sell only a fraction of our excess capacity we shall earn tens of millions of dollars of foreign exchange for this country. That is one practical way I see of improving our balance of payments position over the next few years at least.

We are not unique on this continent. We had a little problem some years ago with regard to getting some power back, but conditions were different then; hydro power was the only really efficient low cost way of developing electrical energy. We are reluctantly going to engage in this trade. But what is happening in Europe? There is a cable now in the channel between the United Kingdom and France. The Norwegians, who even more than Canadians are dependent on hydroelectric resources, have taken loans from the government of Sweden to build projects earlier than they would otherwise have been built to produce electric power for export to Sweden. In these developing nations of Europe we find electric power being exchanged relatively freely. We even find an over-all energy program for western Europe. Nevertheless, we on this continent by and large are holding back. We are afraid to trade in power. I say we must trade, we shall trade, and we shall trade intelligently.

I should like to concentrate now on the Columbia river treaty. As a Canadian I regard this treaty with mixed feelings. As a legal document it is superb. Phrased in straightforward language, it takes a complex subject and reduces it to terms most, if not all, of which are understandable to the layman. The engineering data upon which the draft treaty is based is less laudable. New information has been collected since the treaty was negotiated nearly three years ago. Construction cost estimates have been revised and interest rates have risen sharply. Still, it is the over-all economics of the Columbia river treaty about which I am most concerned. As interpreted publicly by the present government it must be characterized as nothing short of a fiasco. It is inconceivable that the government of this country should enter into any agreement, let alone a comprehensive treaty with another country to last at least 50 years, which failed to procure any demonstrable advantage for the people of Canada. It is, unfortunately, another awesome example of this government's continual reign of errors. Had the present government been in contact with the competent utility authorities on the west coast it would have been aware of at least two things: first, we in British Columbia have many sources of electric power. They are immense and varied. Second, they would have known that energy from various other sources, including coal, oil and gas based power, can be produced at costs comparable to or less than those which can be achieved by repatriating Canada's share of downstream electricity benefits generated as a result of the Columbia river treaty. I am personally satisfied, and this is confirmed by calculations made both by the engineering staff of the B.C. hydro and power authority and by economists for the well known United States agency, Resources for the Future Inc. of Washington, that a combination of fuel burning stations in British Columbia could produce energy at prices competitive with the energy which this government would bring back from the United States.

Most certainly there are combinations of hydro resources and thermal plants which can produce power even more cheaply; hence there is no immediate advantage, in bringing this power back to Canada, certainly in carrying out a program such as that envisaged by this government.

That we have not made a provident deal economically with the United States can be demonstrated in various other ways. In order to build our three treaty storage projects—we are obligated to do this under the treaty—we must put up no less than $350 million. These three dams will cost us at least three times as much as the Americans will have to put up in order to take advantage of that storage. We put up three times as much money as the Americans.

This is no bargain, Mr. Speaker. But there is a complication: we characteristically pay higher interest rates in this country, and under the present austerity program we are paying a good deal more in terms of interest than is normally paid in the United States. As a result of the fact that the projects that we must build cost three times as much in capital investment, and because the interest rates are higher, the power cost to Canada will be between five to six times as much as the cost of the power that the United States will obtain under this treaty. Perhaps our share of his downstream benefit energy will cost us something of the order of 4 mills per kilowatt hour, while the United States will get its share for considerably less than one mill per kilowatt hour. This has all been given in evidence before the congressional committees of the United States. It is public information, but it simply is not information which is known by the majority of the people of this country. No man, no government, no party can be proud of this achievement. If it is not selling Canada down the river, it is selling Canada short. We will never get rich in this way. We will never be able to strike rates in this country which are attractive to industry and which will bring industry here. In effect we are helping our neighbours too much. We are not looking after our own interests in a businesslike way.

This in capsule form is the greatest single indictment I can think of concerning the bureaucratic bungling, lack of liaison in industry, and the high-handed, opinionated action of the government in respect to matters of this kind. We are in a mess, but we have a dire need in this country to put people to work. We must build projects and we certainly need better rates and lower costs in our industries. How do we achieve these and become positive about it? I submit that the only conceivable way in which we Canadians can rescue this treaty in anything like its present form is to sell our share of the downstream benefit energy to the United States. We must sell it or forget the treaty, and we must sell it for a much higher price than the United States is having to put up for its own share of the power. More than that, I believe it should be sufficient to yield us some sort of profit on this public investment in Canada. What we have to do essentially in our sales to the United States, is to earn something of the order of $24 million or $25 million a year. This is equivalent to more than four mills per kilowatt hour. This is the price we have to get in order to break even on those dams, if we are to be forced to build under the treaty. The sum of $30 million a year, if we were to get it from the Americans, would yield us something like five mills per kilowatt hour. I do not know what the right figure is, but it is certainly a substantial one. We must get a price like that if we are to set in train a substantial development in British Columbia which is useful to the people in that part of Canada.

In view of the high interest rates now prevailing in this country, and in view of the objectives of the government's austerity program, it would be a master stroke, I suggest, if we could get the United States authorities to put up all the cash in advance, not just $30 million a year, year after year for several decades, but a lump sum. We have been prepared under the treaty to accept something of the order of $64 million as an all time settlement for flood control. I submit that we should be going to the United States and asking for a lump sum settlement for the delivery of our share of the power over a long term of years. Something in the order of $500 million might be the figure. This figure would give us a profit. It would give us a capital sum over and above the $350 million or $400 million which we have to put up in order to build these three immense dams. This would be in Canada's interests, would provide us with jobs in building the dams, and would certainly help us to strike rates elsewhere or build projects elsewhere to attract industry. The United States might raise these funds more cheaply than we. By that I mean by lower rates of interest. It would give us a profit in the order of $100 million to $150 million, and we could do great things with this project.

I recommend some such arrangement not only to hon. members in this house, but to those who, I hope, in the not too distant future, will be attempting to negotiate some such arrangement in Washington. This is a crucial negotiation and it is one which must be completed before the Columbia treaty is brought into this house. To ratify the treaty before we know what we can get for our surplus power would be to tie our hands and commit us to hundreds of millions of dollars of investment in terms of controlled water flow out of Canada. Without knowing what price we would get we would be over a barrel, so to speak; we might have to accept perhaps a lower price if we were to ratify the treaty before the actual price was known.

The appropriate procedure as I see it is to get on right away with the negotiation of a price. The term, furthermore, in my opinion should be long enough to give us a good price. Then having a contract for the sale of this energy in our hands, we should promptly bring the treaty before the house. It could then be reviewed at length by our house committee on external affairs with a view to hearing expert opinion and to tidying up some of the details which have been bothering many Canadians for so long. Most notable, in my opinion, is the need to give Canadians the same latitude in respect to the completion of the major treaty projects. At this moment, under the treaty in its present form, we are pinned down as to the precise years in which we complete these three immense projects. The United States can start this project at any time within five years. I suggest that we enjoy similar freedom in respect to our commitments of construction. This is the sort of improvement which I think might well be acceptable to the United States which could conceivably be made in the treaty and made expeditiously. I am optimistic. I believe that it is possible to complete our price and other negotiations in a matter of weeks, at most months. By next spring construction should get under way. But first of all we must rescue the treaty from the hands of those who have been against the export of electric power, and this is why I pressed a question early today with regard to the export of power under the Columbia treaty. I think that this is an intimate relationship, and I do not think, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton) said, that there is no connection between them. The present government has made its own restriction as to interpretations of how we can trade in energy. They suspect the Americans and even suspect sometimes, I believe, their own colleagues. This is no way to go about getting things done. Certainly it will not put people to work.

The question before this house is one of confidence. Do we have confidence in this government and in its ability to carry out its intentions as outlined in the speech from the throne? It has suddenly, very suddenly, changed its mind about the export of power. This comes as a surprise after all that the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) have been saying about the evils of selling electricity to our neighbours in the United States. The government has negotiated a treaty which, unless we can rescue it by the sale of power at a very high price, will place Canada and Canadians at a serious disadvantage for many years to come. And it has clearly lacked the ability to co-operate with the province of British Columbia and the government of the United States in this connection. How can we be sure that this government has suddenly been transformed, that it is now in a co-operative mood and that it can now reverse the awful economics of the Columbia river treaty, and that it is really prepared to set the stage for a confident, outward looking policy on power. We need action, ability and imagination. This government has made a few gestures. I hope this is more than a gesture from the speech from the throne. However, in view of the government's record, I doubt whether it can follow through. At times I even doubt whether they really wish to follow through. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I have no confidence in this government.

There are two other quite separate matters which I should like to mention. One was raised by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) in his recent speech. He said that during the five years since the present government had been in power the per capita income—that is the income per person—in this country has risen by $65. This is roughly equivalent to $13 a year. May I say that 13 is not a very lucky number. May I also say that $13 should be seen as against an average income in this country of close to $2,000. Therefore, people of Canada, your increase in the last five years has been $13 a year, or about one half of one per cent. Just consider what the reputation would be of the management of a firm which was offering its employees year after year one half of one per cent. This is not a very remarkable performance. It is niggardly in relation to the performance of many other countries. May I say that 2 per cent has been the North American average over the long term and 2 per cent, 3 per cent, 4 per cent and 5 per cent have been typical with most countries in the western world since the end of world war II. This is an accomplishment, but it is not one to boast about. May I say that 13 may be a number that will plague this government for years to come.

I now wish to touch on another topic. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who is a very well read gentleman, I believe unintentionally misinterpreted a statement which he attributed to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). It is an objective of this party—I refer to the Liberal party—to achieve a balanced budget. However, it is not the prime objective. The prime objective, as even I as an engineer can understand, is full employment, and with full employment, the maximum possible rate of economic growth. If we do not have unemployment, then a balanced budget is a reasonable thing to achieve; and over the long run let us hope that with good management and, I suggest—with quotation marks around the word "planning"—with good planning, we can some years have surpluses and in other years deficits but in the long run the idea is a balanced budget. I think this is a more correct interpretation of what the hon. member for Davenport had in mind.

Mr. Chatterton: Will the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am looking to the hon. member to reply by giving his consent. Actually, there is time for him to answer the question.

Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Chatterton: The hon. member referred to the cost of power and said that our Canadian share of the downstream benefits would be four mills. Does that take into consideration the cost of power from Mica, fully machined? I am just asking for information.

Mr. Davis: Yes. As it happens the power from the treaty projects coming out of the United States as our share is of the order of four mills. With a fully machined Mica Creek development, complete transmission is of the order of four mills per kilowatt hour.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this house being composed as it is, I suppose it was inevitable that it would reflect the atmosphere of the recent election campaign. Even so, I find this tragic.

During the election campaign that concluded on June 18, the people of this country faced real and serious issues including those of unemployment, matters concerning security, health, trade, maintaining the peace of the world, issues vital to the continuance of our civilization and of life itself. Yet I think it is fair to characterize the recent election campaign as one in which, for the most part, these real issues were drowned in the sound and fury, the fuss and bother, of a campaign in which the two main leaders seemed to be concerned most of all about their personal electoral success or about their position in Canadian history.

Here in this house the situation is exactly the same. Real issues still confront the Canadian people. Some of the crises that were with us have deepened in the months since the election was held. That fact makes this session of the parliament of Canada one of the most important to be held in the 95 years of our history since confederation. But how did this session get started? First of all, of course, there were the formalities and the ceremonial parts of it. However, when we reach serious debate, what do we get? We get a six hour or seven hour duel, a shocking display, with the two gentlemen who are supposedly the topmost political leaders in this country quarrelling with each other as to which one was telling the truth, as to which one was using the right statistics and as to which one should be in office. You can search the pages of Hansard, Mr. Speaker, for those six hours or seven hours and it is with great difficulty that you will find anything constructive or anything suggesting the seriousness of the times in which we are living. That pattern, I regret to say, is to a large extent continuing. In all fairness, I must say that I think better speeches have been made since leaders' day than were made on that day. However, the pattern continues. We have had it today between the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). We have the same political partisan fight that is carried on in complete disregard of the fact that these real issues face the people of Canada.

This might not be so bad, Mr. Speaker, if it were only incidental. However, it has been going on for some time. Certainly for the past few years we have had a government that has been directed, so it has seemed to some of us, with an eye to the leader of that government finding his personal place in history. The same pattern has shown itself in parliament to the point where many people wonder whether this institution will serve the purpose for which it was established.

Mr. Speaker, we in this parliament have a tremendous responsibility. This institution, democracy, freedom, civilization, may well depend upon whether groups of parliamentarians like us, whether we the ordinary members of this house, can take command of the situation and compel the giving of attention to our real problems.

I have already indicated by brief reference what I regard as some of those real problems, and I am free to admit that just about every one that I have mentioned and every one that I have in mind has been referred to time and again by previous speakers. For example, the health or ill health of our economy and the crisis that we face in terms of unemployment have been mentioned repeatedly; but for the most part these subjects become battles of statistics, as the government now in power and the representatives of the last one that was in power each try to prove that one was a little better or a little worse than the other.

I know of no problem facing us, no area where it should be more evident than it is in the case of our economy and unemployment that what we need in our time is a massive attack, a breakthrough, an all-out determination not just slightly to improve the situation but to lick once and for all the problem of unemployment. The Prime Minister the other day drew attention to the statement in the speech from the throne that the government now in power hopes, if it stays there, to provide a million new jobs in the next five years. The Leader of the Opposition in his speech thought he was going one better. I wondered what was coming, only to hear him say that if the Liberals were in power they would provide a million new jobs in the next four years.

We need something a great deal better than that, Mr. Speaker. We need a million new jobs this winter. As a matter of fact, we need something more than just a statistical improvement. We need to order and organize our economy so that the first thing it does, so that its principal aim, is to provide for our people full employment. It is not good enough for governments to put balanced budgets or exchange rates or loyalty to certain doctrines or sacred cows first in the picture. Things like budgets and exchange rates and methods of financing are tools to achieve a more important end. The end is full employment; and I suggest that some day people will read the debates of this house, in fact, the debates of this day, and think it was very sad that hon. members rejected on the floor of the House of Commons the idea of economic planning. They will resent some of the language that was used when they realize that it was by the means of economic planning that economic health was achieved and full employment was provided.

The plea I make, Mr. Speaker, is that we look at this problem not in terms of just a slight statistical improvement but that we look at it in terms of really conquering it. We are in an age when the word "breakthrough" has meaning for us. We are breaking through in the conquest of space. We are even achieving some breakthroughs on earth itself. We are building super highways, freeways and throughways to try to get the increased number of vehicles on our roads moving. We are, as I say, breaking through in some areas; but here, in the most important area of our life, namely, providing full employment, we are prepared to stop short of it because, first of all, there must be a balanced budget or there must be a fixed exchange rate or there must be no departure from loyalty to the principle of free private enterprise.

What we need in our time, Mr. Speaker, is a massive attack, an all-out program of planning, of spending money on the things that our society needs to increase our social capital, to provide jobs, to provide goods and services for our people. We need to recognize this as the No. 1 job of our society, and if it is the No. 1 job of our society it becomes the No. 1 job of the parliament of Canada.

I say that it is our function as private members in this House of Commons to compel attention to this problem. I welcome the speeches of some private members in all parties who have dealt with it, but in particular we must compel the attention of the leaders of the two major parties in the house to the importance of this problem.

What I have said with regard to a breakthrough being needed in the matter of our economic health and employment is also true with respect to other problems and difficulties that face us. Housing has been mentioned a few times since this debate started, and let us admit that progress has been made in building homes in Canada. But it is still true that there are far too many slums, far too many Canadians of all ages living in conditions which should not be true for human beings. Why? Because of the same adherence to outworn principles that holds us back in providing full employment. Housing is a right. Housing is a social asset that our people should have, that they are entitled to; and if our society, our democracy, is worth its salt we should find ways and means in this parliament to achieve a breakthrough so that within a reasonable period of time all people in this country will be living in good homes.

The same is true in the whole field of social security. I rejoice in the progress that has been made in this field. I rejoice in the progress that has been made since I first came to the house some 20 years ago. In some of those wartime sessions we used to have difficulty getting the right to speak on the necessity of doing something about raising the old age pension which was then $20 a month payable at age 70 on a means test basis. We have made progress since those days and I congratulate all those who have participated in the making of that progress. But surely the time has come when old age pensions and other forms of security should be predicated, not just on the idea of providing people with enough to keep them alive. Surely the time has come when a country like ours, which can produce a tremendous quantity of goods and services, could provide for people when their working days are over or under any other circumstances a standard of life just as good as they had during their working days.

It is going to take just as much of a breakthrough in the minds of parliamentarians, in the minds of some people around here, to achieve that idea as it took to break through the means test with respect to the old age pension. But this is the sort of thing that is needed, and I plead that we do not take too much time getting amendments to the British North America Act or referring the matter to royal commissions and so on, but that we really go all out to use the resources that are ours for a social security program that gives dignity to the lives of all our people.

In that same vein I mention the matter of health care which was referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), in that tremendous speech he made this morning. This is something that our people are entitled to, not just in terms of what they can afford to pay for or what they can afford by mortgaging their entire future, but something they are entitled to as much as they are to elementary education, something that they are entitled to as much as they are to any of the rights, benefits and privileges of living in this great land. But we will not get it so long as there is this constant adherence to worn out cliches and worn out principles that surround the practice of medicine. Surely, it is time for those who practise the great science of medicine, and for those who organize society as a whole, to realize that between them there should be co-operation, so that the full benefits of medical science get through to all our people. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but the clock is doing the same.

I want to say a word about the international situation. In our time, we must, to repeat the word that I have been using, work for a breakthrough. I agree with those who say if we are going to achieve the peace of the world we have got to exercise the wisest diplomacy we possibly can; we have got to take a strong stand for general disarmament. But on top of all these things that seem directly related to the questions of war and peace, let us face it: if we are really going to save the peace of the world we have got to raise the living standard of mankind the world around. This, Mr. Speaker, will not wait until the year 2,000. This must come now.

At a time when two thirds of our people in the world are hungry, ill fed, ill clothed, lacking in education and all the things that go to make the dignity of life, we have unemployment in our country and unemployment in the rest of the western world. We have trade problems, and all that. How ridiculous it is, in the face of a world of nearly 2 billion people requiring decent homes, clothing, food, education, medical attention and all the things that we could help to give them if we did a real, all-out job of organizing our economy. This would not only raise the standard of living of our own people but it would operate to raise the living standard of people throughout the world.

It must be obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the key to all of this, the key to our getting started in achieving a breakthrough, is contained in the words of the amendment that this party has placed before the house. Our amendment calls for economic planning, designed to achieve economic growth and to provide full employment. If we do those things we can achieve dignity and a place in the sun for our people. If we do those things we can provide housing, health and security. If we do those things we can play our part in helping to bring about a better world. However, we have to get started on them and not allow ourselves to be held back by these lectures about planning being regimentation, planning being something that is ridiculous, something we do not want. Anyone with any common sense knows that anything that is being achieved in the world today is on the basis of large-scale planning. How did that astronaut get around the world six times yesterday except by the planning of a tremendous number of people? All the things of which we are proud in this day have come about in this way. Yet, we do not seem to have the common sense to apply this concept to the thing that affects us all, namely the organization of the society in which we live. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, we have placed before this house our reasons for expressing our nonconfidence in the government of the day.

We hope, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this house will look at that subamendment, look at the words, and cast their vote on the basis of what those words say. If hon. members are living in the sixties, if hon. members are aware of the problems that face us, if hon. members are aware of what the future expects of us all, they will realize that they cannot, in conscience, say no to the things we are asking for from this corner of the house.

After the vote on our subamendment is over, we shall come to the vote on the main amendment. As this house knows, that amendment is something that is now in the possession of the house. We will cast our vote on it, not on the basis of the speech that was made introducing it. You can imagine what that would prompt us to do. We will cast our vote, not on the basis of the party introducing it. Their record is too much like that of the party now in power. No, we will cast our vote on that amendment on the basis of what it says.

I believe it is fairly clear from what we have said in our own subamendment, what has been said in the three speeches that have thus far been made from this corner of the house, how much confidence we have in either the government of the day or the party immediately opposite. We think that the time must soon come for the Canadian people to be given a chance once again to make their choice for a program designed to achieve a breakthrough for all our people.

In the few minutes that remain to me, Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps one other thing I should like to say. If we are going to do our job in this parliament we not only have to get down to business and deal with the real problems that face us, but we have to keep this parliament on the rails. I recognize the difficult time you are having, sir, particularly in the first hour of each day, and perhaps I add to your difficulties once in a while. But we will discuss that matter on an appropriate occasion. I agree with you that you, from the chair, have a responsibility to guard the dignity of this house and that we, as private members, have a responsibility to respect the dignity of this parliament, to take advantage of the opportunities that are raised to press our points, but to see to it that the rules are followed.

However, Mr. Speaker, I insist that that responsibility rests in a particular way upon those who sit on the treasury benches, upon the government of the day. On the appropriate occasion I shall have something more extensive to say, and it will be documented and as pointed as I can make it, about a government which in my view, from time to time, flouts the rights of this parliament. In my view the most recent and most serious example of the government ingnoring the rights of parliament was the order in council that was passed on June 24 imposing taxation without due process of law. We have been told in this house that this was done by order in council based on legislative authority and that legal opinion was obtained that the government had power to do this. This legal opinion was obtained from the Department of Justice. We all know what the Department of Justice is doing when it gives a legal opinion. The Department of Justice is under the government, and too often it gives the government the opinion it wants.

I can get an opinion, too. Lawyers with whom I discussed this matter agree with me that that order in council, to say the best one can for it, is a case of a subterfuge. It is a case of achieving indirectly what cannot be achieved directly. There is in the Customs Tariff Act a section that gives the governor in council the right to transfer goods coming from certain countries from categories having more favourable rates of tariff to those having less favourable rates. But it can be done only by transferring them completely from one category to another, and when transferred to the other category the rate in that other category shall apply. This is what the statute says.

There is another statute, the Financial Administration Act, which gives the government the authority to remit or give back any tax or penalty to individuals where, for various reasons, it is obvious that a tax already paid should be remitted. When one reads that statute, the Financial Administration Act, and the sections I have in mind, it is clear that these are repayments that are allowed. It is a perfectly proper provision, but this government has seen fit to put these two things together and to pass an order in council transferring certain goods to a less favourable rate of duty and then, under the other act, to forgive all of the higher duty that came about in that way, that is, in excess of 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent as the case may be.

What has happened here? The government, the executive, legislated an increase in taxation without recourse to parliament, and it does not even have the decency, courtesy or respect for the rights of parliament to bring it before the house for approval.

I did not approve of the taxation by radio that Mr. Abbott gave us in 1947 or 1948, but at least those people later gave the house a chance to enact legislation making it retroactive, and the government of that day had a majority to ensure that it was done. But here a government without a majority proposes to exact taxation without due process of law, and does not give parliament a chance to look at it at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Will you wait until I have finished my time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I will not be able to put it.

Mr. Knowles: Can you do it quickly?

Mr. Pickersgill: I can do it very quickly. Does the hon. gentleman really think they figured all this out between June 18 and June 24?

Mr. Knowles: We might find that out if we got a chance to debate it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Knowles: We can remember that Charles I lost his head and George III lost the American colonies by such practices, and this is all being done by a government leader who, perhaps more than any we have ever had, has prated for years about the rights of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I just say, in the vein in which I was speaking when I spoke of the need to break through and tackle our economic problems, that this is a tremendous decade in which we live. It is a decade in which time is giving us a magnificent chance. If we throw it away, it could be our last; but if we in this decade, with determination, do the job we can do, we could build a society worthy of the dreams of centuries. This is a world wide task, Mr. Speaker, but we in Canada have a part in it. Our part is to set our own house in order, to establish security, justice and freedom, human dignity and values worth living for, here in Canada. We must do the job now, while there is yet time.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, like the previous participants in this debate I want to offer you my sincere congratulations. As I am the first Conservative member to speak for the province of Alberta I am sure hon. members will not mind my taking this opportunity to say, speaking on behalf of all the people in the province of Alberta, that they feel highly honoured at the honour you have achieved in becoming Speaker of the House of Commons.

The ancestors of many western Canadians came either from Ontario, the province of Quebec or Europe. Your own ancestors were French Canadians from the province of Quebec, and I am sure your relatives back in that province join in the pride of Alberta that you have been given this high honour.

I would also like to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Waterloo South and the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent). I only trust that when I made my maiden speech in the house I did as well as they, and I hope my speech tonight will come up to their standard.

Although I am sorry to see he is not in the house at the present time, I also wish to congratulate another Albertan, the leader of the Social Credit party, who represents the constituency adjoining mine. I recall reading in the Globe and Mail at the time he achieved that office as national leader of that party that he mentioned, or at least he was reported as saying, that he was one of the true Conservatives from Alberta. When he speaks as a Conservative, then I commend his remarks to you, sir.

The last speaker, from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), said he was discouraged because the leaders of the two major parties had hurled reproaches and recriminations at one another. One must look to see where these commenced. I have in my hand the Globe and Mail for Tuesday, October 2, 1962, in which the leader of the Liberal party is quoted under a heading "Pearson Accuses PM of Political Fraud". That has been answered by other Conservative members, in particular by the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald); but when we talk about misrepresentation and fraud I cannot help thinking of the speeches the Liberals made during the election campaign in reference to the devaluation of the dollar. They must know, and we know as Canadians, that when the dollar reached the value it did reach it meant economic welfare for every major industry in the country. When I say that I am thinking of the primary producers, the western farmers, the farmers of Ontario and the manufacturers of dozens of products throughout the country. But when this misrepresentation and fraud was attempted, unfortunately in some cases people had not time to consider it well and they were left with the impression that the government devalued the dollar. The government pegged the price of the dollar. It did not devalue it; and it was complete fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the Liberals when they suggested what it would do to the primary producers of the country.

I am sure that when those same people have an opportunity to reconsider the position, in the next election, they will know where to mark their ballot papers. I am one of those Conservatives who believe there is an old Liberal trick which has been used against Mr. Meighen, Mr. Drew, Mr. Bracken and all other Conservative leaders, with Mr. Diefenbaker being no exception. It is one of their tricks in trade, when in their references to the matter of the exchange problem they try to leave the impression that there was fraud.

Now they are launching a new attack on the Prime Minister for his stand at the commonwealth conference and his position so far as Great Britain and the commonwealth are concerned.

Sometimes when we are talking factually it is interesting to go to the authorities on a subject, and in this regard I want to refer to a book, "The Commonwealth and Europe", published by The Economist Intelligence Unit, sponsored by Britain in Europe Limited. It is a book prepared by The Economist with the assistance of over 100 leading companies and economists, not only in the commonwealth but in the United States. It refers to what they have to say so far as the position of the Conservative party is concerned, when they deal with the commonwealth, either economically or politically. But before I quote it I wish to say that, listening to Liberal speakers, it seems to me they have underestimated the problems so far as Great Britain joining the European common market is concerned.

Lord Salter has this to say in the foreword:

> Britain's relationship with Western Europe is one of the great political issues of our time. Problems arising from its economic aspects have been given an especial urgency by the formation of the European economic community of the Six and now, in a more acute form, by its decision to accelerate the process of its integration. A new element in the situation was recently introduced by the formation of the European free trade association of the Seven, including Britain. A basis of agreement has not so far been found for a single market covering the whole of Western Europe. Major decisions of policy are involved on both sides, both of a political and an economic nature.

What has been the stand of this party? Why am I a Conservative so far as the commonwealth is concerned? Let us look in this same book to see what these leading economists have to say. Who was responsible for the preference on certain products that come from the commonwealth and are shipped to Britain and vice versa in our trade relations?

I quote again, this time, from page 10:

> The origins of the system date back to the beginning of this century when some commonwealth countries began to give preferential tariff treatment to British goods.

So the preference pattern first comes into play in the early 1900's.

An hon. Member: 1897.

Mr. Woolliams:

> In 1919 Britain in turn gave preference to goods imported from the commonwealth and liable to revenue duties, while during the twenties further preferences were granted.

But this is what I wish to emphasize:

It was in 1932, with the passing of the import duties act and the negotiation of reciprocal preferences at Ottawa between overseas commonwealth countries as well as between the U.K. and the rest of the commonwealth that the system reached its fullest development.

And who brought about that conference of 1932? None other than the Conservative party of Canada. The Liberals attacked the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for his part in the London conference of prime ministers. They attacked him for the stand he took in those negotiations. But, surely, when he went to that conference he was speaking for the farmers of western Canada, and for the farmers of eastern Canada in an effort to preserve these preferences which have been built up from their foundation through the efforts of this Conservative party.

It may yet be possible for Britain to join the common market while retaining the system of preferences which this party took so large a part in developing. As a western Canadian I know that we have other industries besides grain. There is, for example, the oil industry, the production of oil and natural gas which has brought prosperity to Alberta, particularly. Nevertheless our primary industry on the prairies is agriculture. This is what I want the Liberals to answer —and I am sorry the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is not in his place: what effect would Britain's entry have on the sale of western wheat to the United Kingdom in the absence of the preferences which were built up by this party and this government?

This is what the Economist Intelligence Unit has to say about this on page 95—I would prefer to quote from people who have studied this question, in this case the compilers of this book called "The Commonwealth and Europe".

Three grains, wheat, barley and maize, account for the bulk of world trade in cereals and of two out of the three the commonwealth is a major supplier providing almost two fifths of world exports of wheat and barley . . .

The two leading wheat exporters produce different kinds of grain. Most of Canada's exports, whether grain or flour, are based on high quality high protein wheat which is often combined with domestically produced grain of inferior quality in importing countries to satisfy consumer preference for particular types of bread. So long as this preference persists, Canada has a fairly secure hold on world grain markets.

That is why the Prime Minister spoke up at that conference in London on behalf of Canada. Of course, there is a chain effect attached to this. If the farmers do well, the businessmen in the urban centres and in the cities do well. I know hon. members from the east of Canada appreciate that among the best customers for manufactured goods are the western farmers who buy farm machines. Combines today cost between $11,000 and $12,000. No one spends his money better than the western farmer when prices are correct and when he receives the proper value of his production. Thus I say that when the Prime Minister spoke out in London in this regard he was speaking for Canada. He was presenting the facts of Canada's case. On a future occasion the right hon. gentleman will be dealing with this subject again, as he himself said. I want merely to place the facts before the house in proper perspective. Again I am sorry that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not in his place. It may be the reason why the Liberals have had to borrow a socialist to explain their policy in western Canada is because of the position they have taken on this and other matters.

What do the people in the grain business have to say about this? What do the elevator companies or the pool operators have to say? They draw attention to the same problem as is pointed out by the authors of the book from which I have been quoting. This is from the Searle Grain Company's report dated September 26, 1962:

With all this, one does get apprehensive that French wheat will flood into the United Kingdom in a volume which, conceivably, could embarrass millers as well as farmers. British millers are not averse to picking up this wheat at a price but we can have too much of it . . .The point is, of course, that had we already joined the common market we would be expected to absorb the French wheat surplus—

This would mean that our exports of grain to Britain would be largely cut off unless we could find other markets.

This is not a new problem. I have heard hon. members from the eastern parts of Canada say: "Not wheat again!" Before my time in this house there were debates on the question of wheat which lasted three or four weeks. The trade in wheat and the disposal of wheat has always presented a problem to every government. If we did not negotiate properly at the table we could lose the largest purchaser of our grain, namely Great Britain. That is what the wheat pools point out.

I listened to what the hon. member for Assiniboia had to say. I shall have to borrow a phrase used by the Prime Minister and describe the speech he made yesterday as a warmed-over version of the speech he used to make when he was with the socialists. I checked, in fact, and found it was almost identical with the one he made in 1957 against the Liberals. Let us take a glance at the agricultural picture when this government took office. We had a surplus of 700 million bushels of wheat, more or less. Wheat was piled up on the farms all over western Canada, in temporary sheds made up of straw, in barns or old houses or even right in the open. Quotas were at one or two bushels and farmers could not even sell their grain to meet operating expenses. They were even denied cash advances. That was the state of the wheat producers at that time and, of course, when the wheat farmer cannot sell his grain he gets into the production of other commodities such as cattle and hogs. Thus he begins to compete against the rancher. The whole process, as I say, has a chain effect.

Credit can be given to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness), the former minister of agriculture, and in particular to the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), for their work in disposing of this vast surplus which was built up during the administration of the Liberals. Let us see what some of the newspapers have to say about this.

An hon. Member: Choose a good one.

Mr. Woolliams: It will be a good one, no doubt about that. I always choose the best evidence. This is what the Western Producer had to say on April 5: "Wheat board makes record final payment". Again, on April 12, the same paper printed an article with the headline: "Increase in wheat exports seen helping entire nation". The Manitoba Co-Operator printed an article on April 5 saying: "February wheat exports largest since early 20's". Yet despite all this the hon. member for Assiniboia said the export of grain has not been as great over a period of years as it was when the Liberals were in power.

The hon. member for Assiniboia said that the export of grain was not as great over a given period of years as it was during the same period under the Liberals, but he did not say that when he sat in the socialist ranks over in the corner. Mr. Speaker, let us get the facts as far as exports of wheat are concerned. I do not think that the Liberals, especially the hon. member for Assiniboia, would challenge the budget report of the Alberta wheat pool. These figures are taken from the board of grain commissioners. I do not know whether the hon. member for Assiniboia has seen them; he may have got his figures from the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). They seem to have their own dominion bureau of statistics. According to the wheat pool budget—> —Canadian exports of wheat, including flour and bagged seed wheat, totalled 357.8 million bushels in the 1961-62 crop season, according to preliminary figures released by the board of grain commissioners. This represents a gain of about 3.5 million bushels over the previous year.

> Wheat exports, excluding flour, amounted to 322.7 million—second highest in history, and 11.7 million better than in the 1960-61 season.

So I say without reservation that the exports for 1961-62, due to the efforts of the present Minister of Agriculture, were the highest except for one other year in the history of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the allegations of misrepresentation and fraud which have been made I want to deal with one other matter. I think that the biggest joke of the campaign was the promise which was made by the leader of the Liberals. After he embraced the hon. member for Assiniboia on the plains of Assiniboia, he must have whispered to him: "Tell the western farmers $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat". The biggest part of the joke is, very briefly, this: that at that time wheat was $1.98 a bushel at the lakehead and $2.19 or $2.06 at Vancouver. So that he actually promised the farmers less than what they were getting for their wheat when the law of supply and demand was in operation.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, my good friend says that that is not true, but the misrepresentation goes even further than that, because he did not tell his leader all the facts about wheat. They promised the western farmers $2 for No. 1 wheat. Mr. Speaker, as you know—

Mr. Argue: For No. 1 northern.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I know; I have been raised on a farm too. But he had promised the farmers $2 for No. 1 northern wheat. In fact only 5 or 10 per cent of the wheat produced on the prairies today happens to be No. 1 northern. Now, if that is not a half-truth on his part, then there never was one in western Canada. If the hon. member says that is not correct, I should like him to read from the Searle grain report of May 30, 1962. This is what they say and, of course, they are independent.

> A promise of $2 wheat for the next three years, held out to prairie farmers recently (referring, of course, to the price of No. 1 Northern basis Fort William-Port Arthur)—

That was another misrepresentation; they did not say whether it was $2 in the bins, $2 in the elevators, or $2 at the lakehead, and there is certainly a big difference. The report goes on:

> None the less there are some who feel that the promise could return to haunt those who made it unless the government in power would be prepared, if necessary, to make up the difference, through subsidy, between world prices and the $2 level. This is not to say, however, that such a price level could not be achieved.

Then the same article goes on to say:

> Most of the recent increase in the price of wheat was attributable to successive changes in the value of the Canadian dollar.

I do not suppose that the hon. member for Assiniboia told his constituents that when he was running for election.

> While the minimum and maximum prices under the new IWA are to be higher commencing August 1, 1962, with a ceiling of $2.02½ U.S. funds (corresponding to about $2.19 Canadian funds at current levels), there is absolutely no assurance that the price of wheat will approach the maximum, let alone reach it. At the moment the price of No. 1 northern, basis in store lakehead, is $1,98⅜ per bushel.

Yet the hon. member for Assiniboia says that is not true. I just do not know where he got his facts. But I am very glad he interrupted me, because it is rather interesting that the hon. member made some very unusual statements in the press about Liberal agriculture policy. I would just like to place them on record, so that he will be able to read them tomorrow morning and it will save him doing his homework. Speaking in the house in 1957, when he was then critical of the Liberal government before the Conservatives came into power, he said this—and farmers do not forget these things, Mr. Speaker; they have long memories—

> I believe that the only thing standing between the producers of the prairies and cash advances is the ingrown and slavish loyalty of western Liberal members to the party whip.

In October, 1960 Mr. Argue was reported as saying this; that the farmers—> —will never forget that it was the Liberal party, by the removal of price control and by its tragic loss of overseas markets, that placed agriculture in its present position. The cost price squeeze initiated by a Liberal administration remains agriculture's greatest curse.

Now, isn't that wonderful. Browning could not have written better poetry. Then he said this:

> I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to defend on the public platform, if he can, the dismal failure of 22 years of Liberal administration to meet agricultural problems as well as his own record in this regard both as a member of the former Liberal government and as leader of the Liberal party.

In November, 1958 Mr. Argue said:

> The Liberal party is not going anywhere because its leader, Pearson, does not know where he is going.

Mr. Speaker, we are asked to believe, because of that embrace on the plains of Assiniboia by the present member of Assiniboia, the new Liberal member from that area, that the Liberal leader does know now where he is going.

Mr. Argue: They used all that during the campaign. They even paid to put it in the newspapers.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes that is true, and I know the kind of campaign on the part of the hon. member of Assiniboia. I am glad that he interrupted me. Hon. members heard him last night when he talked about hogs. He told us what the government had done to the hog producers. At that very moment hogs hit a new peak in Calgary; they are $32.10 a hundredweight.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know my time is limited and I want to embark upon another subject for a few moments, so I will leave agriculture. As I have only got a few moments to deal with it I will forget about my notes. We have heard a lot about deficit spending, and we have heard the promises of the Liberals that it will cost another $1 billion plus. But the fact is that I am one of those Canadians who believes that one of the problems of unemployment is that personal income tax and corporation taxes are so high that they cut the wages the wage earner earns and reduce the profits of small business corporations, so that the productivity of this country is reduced. I think—this is my own feeling—that before we embark upon another program of social welfare we should make certain first that business is protected, that the farmers are protected, and that the wage earners are protected. Because as one hon. member has already said, we people do not want handouts. I am one of those who believe that there is really no difference. The process may be different. Communism believes in the expropriation of property without compensation. Socialists may believe in expropriation with compensation. And with people who believe that you must have a complete welfare state; the end result is almost identical. Under that process the government runs your business. If they take 50 per cent of your profits, they are the biggest partner in that business. Not only are taxes too high in this country, but there are abuses in this regard. May I say that I am happy that, as the Prime Minister mentioned, there is a royal commission looking into this matter of taxation and investigating it, as it needs investigation. If a person is challenged by the Department of National Revenue under the process of law—and there are a great many cases in Canada—his books are seized, his records are seized and then he is asked to prove himself innocent. His bank account is tied up. In many instances he is not even in a position to hire an accountant, a lawyer or an expert to help him to arrange his affairs to show his net worth and show that it is commensurate with his income. We all realize that the collection of taxes is a difficult problem but in the tax structure these abuses exist.

There is one other abuse which I should like to mention before I sit down. I should prefer to see a capital gains tax than to see the matter in the flux in which it is today. Businessmen who sell their investments or change their business never know, when they make that move, whether it is income under the Income Tax Act or capital gain. Sometimes, unknown to them, new rulings are made, and as a result, what they thought was capital gain is taxable. In many cases they are not able to go to the Department of National Revenue and say. "If I make this move in business, is it income or is it capital gain"? Before I take my seat I wish to make a recommendation, namely that we have a board set up so that the businessman, the farmer and others may go to the Department of National Revenue and say, "If I may move A, B, or C is this income or is it capital gain"? We cannot play ducks and drakes with the taxpayer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Woolliams: I have just one brief sentence more if I may be allowed to complete my statement. I seriously believe that reform in the tax structure of this country is long overdue. As I said, it reduces the productivity of this country. That is my answer to the socialist planners in this regard. That is the real reason for unemployment. How can you expand your business when the profits from that business are going to the government to run their business?

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid the hon. member has overrun his time and that I cannot permit a question by the hon. member unless the house gives unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: Does not the hon. member who has just taken his seat know that the Social Credit government of British Columbia believes in expropriation at a price determined by government without due process of law, a policy that has never been advocated by this party?

Mr. Woolliams: My answer to the hon. member is that I do not know. I never did understand Social Credit so I therefore leave it to him to come to a proper decision in the matter.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in joining in the traditional congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as I do warmly, I hope neither hon. gentlemen will think that, because I am not able to agree with most of what they said, I intend any personal reflection upon them. It has never been my custom to make personal reflections. It has always been my view that a politician who cannot stand tough criticism ought not to be in public office. Although I have had a few hard knocks in public life, I may say that I have never done any whining about them.

I may say that I listened with great interest to the maiden speech made this afternoon by a very old personal friend, namely the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I congratulate him on a speech which was no better than I expected it to be but quite as good. I also listened a moment or two ago to the hon member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Whether or not one agrees with him, one recognizes him as a great parliamentarian, though perhaps not often a very constructive one. However, I was appalled by something that was common to both their speeches. They talked in a high minded way about all kinds of things this parliament ought to do. Except for one or two things that I thought were neither historical nor just about my own party, there were very few things they said with which I do not agree. However, what I was struck by was the fact that these hon. gentlemen seem to be totally unaware of the fact that when a clear decision has not been made by the electorate—and a clear decision certainly was not made on June 18—if we are to have self-government, parliamentary government and ultimately government by the people, the first and fundamental business of this parliament is to decide, if it can do so, who the government should be; and if it cannot do so, it should remit the question to the people and let them decide. It is not for us in this house, to whatever party we belong, to say we do not think it is the right time for an election.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member interrupts. However, I am not going to waste my time by replying. It has been said by a great many people that this is not the right time for an election. That is not at all for us to say. It is our business either for the majority of us to give confidence to the government so that it can carry on and do so for a reasonable length of time with some assurance of continuity or, if we cannot do that, it is our business to let the people decide this matter for themselves. We should not try, by some process of superiority, to arrogate to ourselves a function which belongs to the people. That matter is more fundamental than is anything else. We shall never have full employment in this country unless we have a government that can plan—yes, plan—and manage; and

I may say that management is just as important as planning—we have had very little of it in these last five years—and manage the affairs of this country.

Mr. Knowles: Another planner; good.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was agreeing with the hon. gentleman. If he does not wish me to agree with him, that is all right. However, I think he wishes me to do so. I was glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at the conclusion of his speech came back really to fundamentals—he saved me a certain amount in my own speech—by making part of one of the points I wished to make.

The other thing that really shocked me in the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was his cynical—and I did not expect it from him—suggestion that it really did not matter whether public men told the truth or not, that it really did not matter whether you could depend upon the integrity of a government. I do not agree with that view at all.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member wishes to disagree with me—he knows the rules—he can do so at the end of my speech.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member knows that a question of privilege must be taken immediately. I indulged in no cynicism by word or implication—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a question of privilege at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is argument.

Mr. Knowles: —regarding truth being important or not. My cynicism was with respect to those two individuals, as to their particular place in history. The truth, yes; let us have it.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Let us have it from the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the hon. gentleman has been permitted to smuggle in a speech under the guise of a question of privilege, I hope I will not lose that time because I have some things to say. The hon. member can read his speech and he will see there very well what I was referring to. I was referring to the question of veracity, which the hon. gentleman did not seem to regard as very important. I am going to take an example that in itself is not important at all. Intrinsically it is of no consequence but it is such a neat example of what I am referring to that I cannot forbear referring to it. On the 1st of October, as found at page 75 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had this to say:

I saw the Leader of the Opposition on election night, Mr. Speaker, when he believed he was going to be occupying this seat. That is before the western farmer came in.

It just so happens that I spent the whole of that evening in the company of the Leader of the Opposition and he was not on television until after the western results were in. The Prime Minister was either having another vision or that is just another example of the accuracy of the statements he makes in the House of Commons. I might say, sir, that if anyone wants to see how the Prime Minister looked that day himself it is recorded on page 38 of Newsweek, the issue of July 2, and I commend it to the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Why are we moving this vote of want of confidence in the government? We are moving it because 65 per cent of the voters did so on the 18th of June.

An hon. Member: It is going up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Sixty three or 64 or 65.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Veracity?

Mr. Pickersgill: Approximately two thirds of the voters of this country, two voters out of every three in this country, had had enough and they said that they had had enough of hon. gentlemen opposite. That, sir, would in itself be sufficient justification—the proportion was higher in my constituency—for any hon. member elected by voters that way inclined to vote want of confidence in the government.

But under our system, of course, when a situation like this arises the Queen's government must go on, and it was the Prime Minister's duty as well as his right to remain in office because he had more members than anyone else. No one questioned that at all. He would have had the right to remain in office, I believe, even if he had not had the largest number of supporters. Even if he had not he would have had the right to remain in office until the elected representatives of the people could decide the question.

But he had no right to stay in office one day longer than was necessary for parliament to make that decision. Anyone with the faintest regard for the constitutional rights of parliament or the rights of the people would have been only too anxious to get to parliament as quickly as possible, above all, the right hon. gentleman temporarily presiding over the government of this country who has talked about his love of parliament over the years. But the fact was that the Prime Minister was determined not to see this parliament until the last possible moment and to hang on to the fruits of office.

What did he do with the fruits of office which he had no right to have and for which he was a temporary trustee? He distributed them widespread among defeated candidates of the Tory party in a fashion that has never been done before even by a government with a majority. That, sir, is just one of the many things that surely make it incumbent upon us to treat a government that treats parliament this way the way it ought to be treated when there is an opportunity to do so.

There is only one parallel. The parallel, of course, as everybody knows, is the parallel of 1925 and 1926. One could go into that at great length and I would be very glad to on some occasion, but I simply want to say now that in 1925 Mr. Mackenzie King, whatever the reason may have been, did nothing but the routine business of the country until parliament had had an opportunity to pass a verdict on his government, and his lieutenant, Mr. Lapointe, sought that verdict at the first possible moment. That is precisely what hon. gentlemen opposite, if they had had any genuine regard for our British system of self-government, should have done.

That is not all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised a point this afternoon that is almost more fundamental. The government did not keep parliament from meeting, did not hang on and push parliament aside. This government presumed to impose taxes without parliamentary sanction on June 24. They draw a parallel with what happened in 1947, a parallel which is most extraordinary in some respects. Here is what the Prime Minister said on October 2, as recorded on page 100 of Hansard, with regard to what was done in 1947:

> ...Mr. Abbott, the then minister of finance... imposed by order in council, for which there was no legal authority, the most drastic measures that had ever been used in connection with the economy of the country. It was the only time a law was ever made in this country by radio.

Of course, the Prime Minister ought to have known that that was not true. After all, he is a lawyer and he ought to have known that no order in council could have any force unless it did have legal authority. I cannot believe that he did not know that. I do not think he is quite that bad a lawyer.

But to give you an idea that he knew differently at another time, let me read what he said about this same legislation at the time it was before parliament in December, 1947. As found on page 189 of Hansard he said:

> Having regard to the fact that extraordinary powers are being asked for, I think we should have an opportunity of having brought before parliament some of the invisible incognitos who today dominate this government, who give it advice.

Mr. McCleave: That was you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just wait. I would advise the hon. member for Halifax to keep quiet. I continue:

> They were wrong in July, 1946. Is there any reason to believe that they were right in November, 1947? I suggest to the Minister of Justice that in order to bring back to the House of Commons its powers we have brought before a committee of this house Dr. Clark, Mr. Towers, Mr. Rasminsky, and other members of that group.
> Mr. Adamson: Mr. Bryce also.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: They should be brought before parliament and examined to ascertain whether they made the recommendation to the government on November 17 or prior thereto or whether it was the government that suggested to them the means whereby they could utilize the Foreign Exchange Control Act for the purposes they had in view.

In other words, he knew there was a Foreign Exchange Control Act in 1947. He told this house the other day there was no legal authority. Does that show any respect for the truth? It does not. How can you depend on any statement by a man who would say that? You know, the Prime Minister talks about invisible incognitos. Of course, they were public servants. We know what the Prime Minister thinks about public servants. They belong to that same group of public servants as a certain gentleman who is incognito in this house. I refer to that recent addition to the ministry, the barefoot boy from Bay street. He is one of the people who, according to the Prime Minister, were trampling the liberties of this country under the late C. D. Howe during the war years; that is the incognito who is running the government of Canada today. He is not in this house. He is not facing the elected representatives of the people. I say that we will want the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) to bring him before the banking and commerce committee. We will want him to bring officials of the Department of Finance, as the Prime Minister said we should in 1947. We will want him to bring them all here. We will want to find out when they started to prepare this austerity program.

We know one thing. We know that the day parliament was dissolved or the following day, the Minister of Finance told the departments to cut $50 million out of the estimates while this government was pretending that they were going to spend that money in order to buy votes by the pretense of works that they never intended to carry out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister knows perfectly well that is true; that process was started. There are too many people in Ottawa who knew about it, and in other places than Ottawa. I have not the faintest doubt but that on the day the government put a rubber peg on the dollar, May 3, they started to prepare this austerity program. Perhaps the then minister of finance did not tell the Prime Minister. Perhaps the officials were smart enough not even to tell the then minister of finance in order to save him from embarrassment. I was a public servant for a very long time. I know something about how long it takes to do these things. I know quite well that this order in council and the policy based thereon could not possibly have been prepared between the 20th or 21st, was it, when the distinguished Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) said there was no crisis, and the date of the order. He was a member of the cabinet. In those four days we are asked by these truth tellers to believe, that that order was prepared. The minister knows quite well that the preparation of this whole program began at least as early as the pegging of the dollar, probably earlier.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is false; that is a false statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister can get up and say it is false. He can get up and make a speech in this debate if he dares. He has been repudiated and cast aside by the Prime Minister. He has served his purpose and now he is on the rubbish heap. Moreover, I say that there is every reason to believe the election was brought on when it was, every reason to believe we were denied a budget debate, every reason to believe the government did not proceed with the budget resolutions because the minister knew full well that a financial crisis was coming and hoped to get the election over before the crisis and fool the people.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Every word of that is false.

Mr. Pickersgill: This government had many supporters. There was no urgency for an election at that particular moment. This budgetary program was left suspended in mid air; there was extraordinary haste. What was the reason for it? The reason was that they could see, they had been warned, a crisis was coming. We know some of these officials. We know what competent people they are.

Of course, you know, we heard the Prime Minister on January 20, 1958, say "They hid it; they concealed it." This is exactly what they did. They knew full well when the budget was brought down that there was a critical situation in foreign exchange. As a matter of fact, I took the trouble to read the section of the minister's budget speech relating to exchange just before I undertook to make this speech today. It is quite clear from a reading of that budget speech that the minister already had an inkling of the crisis.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is another thing that is clear. At that time, there was not the faintest intention of pegging the dollar. The situation was quite the reverse. The minister made a strong defence of the floating rate and gave very strong and compelling arguments as to why there should not be any pegging. Then, the government have the effrontery to tell us that, when the crisis came on May 3 and they had to do something; that it was planned all the time. If it was planned all the time, why was it not in the budget? Why were we not allowed to debate it? Why was it not done properly in parliament? Why did this suddenly blow up in the middle of an election?

The plain fact is, sir, that one does not have to go into any kind of detail. Ask our constituents. You do not have to ask them, they tell us. I am sure every hon. member, including a lot of backbenchers over there and perhaps a lot of frontbenchers too, have heard the same thing from their electors. How can they possibly expect anybody to vote for them after the way the government fooled us? That is what the people of this country believe because it is a fact; it is palpable and obvious.

May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was pointing out that it was absolutely incredible, and that nobody in this country believed that the government did not know there was an exchange crisis long before the election. In fact it was perfectly obvious that the dollar was pegged on May 3 as a desperate measure to stop the drain. No government would have changed the policy, announced a month before in the budget, and adopted a measure that was a clear confession that its existing policy was not working, for any other reason than because a terrible emergency existed.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) pointed out some of the facts that were known to everybody at that time about that situation. That was the time, of course, when the corrective measures should have been taken. That was the time to correct the situation instead of letting it drift in the hope that they could get through the election campaign, which was the object from the beginning.

But what really knocked the peg, sir, was that incredible performance, not mentioned by the Prime Minister in his so-called account of what happened that he gave in this house, that incredible performance of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) in Vancouver. I have in my hands the Toronto Globe and Mail, and this is what the minister was reported to have said at his press conference:

> Mr. Hamilton told a press conference the present level of 92½ cents is in effect a compromise between government members. He said some were in favour of 95 cents while others wanted it pegged at 90 cents.
> The 90 cent level, he said, is a "natural peg which is defensible with our negative trade balance".

That statement was apparently made on June 8, and it appeared in the Globe and Mail on June 9. But what do we find in the Prime Minister's speech? The Prime Minister mentioned the date, June 10, and he said it was because of the opposition that he did this. He did not say a word about this minister, this man who was privy to the discussions and who said the dollar should not be kept at 92½ cents but should go down to 90 cents. No, there was not a word about that. Instead what the Prime Minister said was this:

> During the first week of June the weakness in the exchange market continued.

"Continued." After what the Minister of Agriculture said, what else could have happened?

> I consulted the then minister of finance—

—said the Prime Minister—

> —on the matter and on June 10 he issued an official statement making it very clear that the government could and would maintain the Canadian dollar at the 92½ cents exchange rate.

We know what would have happened in Great Britain or in any other country with respect for the parliamentary tradition. The Minister of Agriculture would not have been Minister of Agriculture on June 9. He would have been out of the cabinet for starting a drain on the dollar and saying he did not agree with his colleagues. That is what parliamentary government, what our British system of parliamentary government, means.

Instead of the Prime Minister repudiating him he put up the Minister of Finance to contradict him, so that one minister contradicts another, and which of them do you believe? The average person, knowing the Prime Minister's love for the Minister of Finance, and knowing his much greater affection for the Minister of Agriculture, would naturally have believed the Minister of Agriculture, and that is all that might have been needed. This dereliction of duty, this contempt by the Prime Minister of the traditions of cabinet government, of cabinet solidarity, of budget secrecy, of secrecy about exchange matters—this performance was enough to destroy the money of any country because it absolutely destroyed any confidence in this government.

If anything more was needed it was that incredible speech by the Prime Minister himself on television, on June 14, when he related how everything was rosy, that there was no crisis, and that we were going to have full employment in August, the full employment which the Minister of Labour told us about today that had not been achieved. When the Prime Minister made that airy fairy speech perhaps it might have been swallowed by the general public, but I am sure Senator McCutcheon was not fooled by it and, sir, it was not the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Laurier or myself who exported those Canadian dollars out of the country. It was the friends of Senator McCutcheon in Toronto who had lost confidence in this government. We did not have the money to send out of the country. It was the Prime Minister's newfound friends.

Mr. Starr: You were getting your money from the United States at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: And what did they do about it? They finally made this great discovery after the election. They imposed taxes by order in council under statutes which were never intended for the purpose and, unlike Mr. Abbott, who promptly brought his measures to parliament and gave parliament every opportunity to approve it, there was no mention of it in the speech from the throne—no suggestion that parliament should approve this taxation. We just have taxation by television and order in council. This great champion of parliament imposes taxation by television and order in council, and when parliament meets there is no suggestion that we should have any right to approve it. This is the government that the hon. member for Peace River is going to support—the most dismal failure, he said, in the history of Canada—a government which he said will give us 20 per cent unemployment this winter. The hon. member for Peace River is going to vote for a government which he said will give us 20 per cent unemployment.

Mr. Thompson: There is just one question. I think the hon. member should study his geography a little better.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If I made—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman ran over his allotted time and accordingly there will have to be unanimous consent by the house if he is to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a question of privilege.

Mr. Thompson: I will say no more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will ask the house for unanimous consent if the hon. gentleman will take his seat.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I have the floor when I am on my feet, and I would ask hon. members to co-operate. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is rising on a question of privilege I will hear him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I merely wanted to apologize to the hon. member for Red Deer. I meant the hon. member for Red Deer, and I inadvertently said "Peace River".

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Come on, senator.

Mr. McGee: I see the pipe line boys are back again, are they?

Some hon. Members: Sit down, senator.

Mr. McGee: If the pipe line boys would sit down for the moment—

Mr. Habel: Give way to your minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for York-Scarborough should have the same attention as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. McGee: I am rising to speak on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Bearing in mind the hon. member's concern for the rules of parliament, I wonder if he would apologize to the Chair for turning his back on the Speaker?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am delighted to do so, sir.

(Translation):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks tonight, I should like to congratulate you most sincerely on your appointment to this exalted position. We are all convinced that you are worthy of this great honour.

I should also like to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address. Every member of this house will recognize that they performed their duties with distinction.

(Text):

The votes to which the house is proceeding tonight at the conclusion of this debate are far more serious than those which normally await the verdict of the house. A grave charge has been made by hon. members opposite that a major political fraud has been perpetrated accompanied by concealment and deceit.

Mr. Speaker, I will offer you incontestable evidence that this charge has been supported only by false statements, false accusations and base innuendoes. There has been on the part of hon. members opposite, with their continued obstructive behaviour just now evidenced, a further descent to the lowest kind of tactics that I am sure any of us have seen in this house, even those who have been here longest.

An hon. Member: Except you and the flag.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am asking this honourable house not merely to express its confidence in the government but at the same time to give effective expression to the vindication of an hon. member of this house from these base charges and accusations.

These attacks on the Prime Minister are not new. They have been going on for a long time. The member who just took his seat after that wretched performance of his, here, was one of the first to initiate this kind of personal attack. We had it in my riding during the campaign. The Liberal candidate there made this statement—"Members of the present administration may be prepared to set aside their Christian ethics in the power struggle"—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again, he said: "The Prime Minister's treatment of the hidden report issue was basically dishonest". Note that word as applied to a Christian gentleman who has always maintained in his public and private life the highest standards. This same Liberal candidate also said that the government—here are his words—was "willing to do anything, however sordid, to attain its political ends." It is to that kind of abuse that we ask the house tonight to offer an effective and telling reply.

We have witnessed a descent to a tactic of character assassination and if there is any tactic which is more quickly guaranteed to create political scepticism in the minds of the Canadian public, I should be greatly surprised. There is nothing baser in that category.

We are going to see a vote on the New Democratic party amendment. The hon. members who have moved it will be the first to say that it contemplates socialist planning for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we shall see how hon. members opposite stand by their principles when they come to a vote on an expression of favour for socialist standing in Canada. I predict that such is the appetite for power of hon. members opposite in the official opposition that they will swallow that amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not mind this raucous noise opposite, but I hope to have fair value on my time, which is limited.

I propose tonight, for those who want the truth and the evidence, to review the circumstances leading up to the exchange emergency that we faced in June. The charge that has been made—and I will not flinch from any feature of it, I shall go right down the line—is that there was a crisis before the end of the election campaign and that the government knew or ought to have known about it; that the government ought to have proclaimed the existence of that crisis; and that the government is responsible for the crisis and for the concealment of it. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have not omitted any portion of those charges.

Now, what is the background? Let me start with 1947. There was over a period of 11 months a deterioration of Canada's exchange reserves position. The reserves at that time dropped $750 million until there was only something like $480 million left before the government of that day recognized the existence of an emergency. Now, we were told, and have been told again this afternoon by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that the minister of finance of that time got up in parliament—these were the words of the Leader of the Opposition—told them all the facts, and said what he would do. There were three weeks that intervened before the minister of finance did that. What the minister of finance did was to go on the radio and announce a budget by radio, including the imposition of taxes, and those imposts were applied from midnight that same night at the border. The whole measure was illegal and parliament had to validate those measures months afterwards. That is what they did.

Mr. Speaker, these are the men opposite who claim to be the champions of parliament. They say that parliament should have been called earlier. Parliament has been called. What do they want to do? They say: "Off with the head of parliament at once". They wanted to have parliament dissolved after the vote last Tuesday night. They will be the happiest people in the world if parliament is dissolved tonight through an adverse vote. These are the men who pretend to be the champions of parliament. These Liberals are no more champions of parliament than the Liberal party in some of their expressions have been champions of truth in recent times.

That was the record in 1947, Mr. Speaker. The measures which were applied by the government at that time were much more severe than the measures which we took in June, and they lasted for a very long time. Indeed, they lasted for the better part of two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: They were approved by parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, in the end, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the beginning.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The majority of those days was whipped into line months afterwards, but in the meantime the impositions had been illegally applied.

Now I move on to 1950. In 1950 the Canadian government, having up to that time endeavoured twice to peg the dollar at a fixed value, first at par in terms of the U.S. dollar and later at a 10 per cent discount, found itself, as it thought, unable in the light of the exchange crisis to maintain a pegged rate, and so the dollar was allowed to float free. From October, 1950 until May, 1962 the external value of the Canadian dollar was established in the exchange markets by the interaction of the forces of supply and demand. The decision in 1950 to permit the rate to fluctuate in response to market forces was accepted by the international monetary fund in recognition of Canada's unique circumstances. It was, however, announced that Canada would return to a fixed exchange rate when the circumstances were right. From time to time in the period since 1950 the fund authorities expressed the hope that Canada might find it practicable to rejoin the ranks of those member countries who were in full conformity with Article IV of the fund agreement.

So, Mr. Speaker, we now move on to 1961. In June of that year I announced in my budget that the government considered it appropriate that the external value of the dollar should be reduced to a discount, and if necessary was prepared to use purchases of exchange for the purpose in order to move the Canadian dollar to a significant discount. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar did move to a significant discount. It moved in an orderly manner, in a satisfactory way, and the results accomplished were highly beneficial to Canada.

It is said that there was manipulation on the part of the government of the value of the dollar. It was said in this debate that the minister of finance began to manipulate the dollar by buying U.S. dollars. Mr. Speaker, there was no manipulation. Those charges are false. They have always been false. They were false in the last session as they are false in this one. Mr. Speaker, I said that the exchange fund would, if necessary, be used to purchase foreign exchange and thus influence the exchange rate. As it turned out, this was not—and I repeat not—necessary. For most of the period between June 1961 and May 1962 the Canadian dollar moved within a range of 3 to 5 per cent discount on the U.S. dollar, and the exchange fund interventions continued to be directed towards moderating movements in the rate, not towards initiating such movements.

Mr. Benidickson: It was manipulated the other way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no manipulation at all. It was the use of the fund reserves in the way that they had been used for years.

Now we move forward to the budget speech of April 10, 1962. I made reference there to this problem of the external rate because already there had been intimations from the international monetary fund that they wished us to peg the rate to bring ourselves into conformity with Article IV of the fund agreement. Mr. Speaker, let me say in the light of the utterly irresponsible statements made in this house today by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that there was no exchange crisis before dissolution of parliament on April 18. That is what he was saying this afternoon. The fact is that when I delivered that budget speech on April 10 we were well aware that the fund wanted us to conform to Article IV, and when I spoke in that budget debate I was saying to the fund as well as to this house that we did not want the fund to press us into any hasty action. We well remembered the ill-starred attempt of the former government to maintain fixed rates during the period from 1946 to 1950. We did not want the fund to force us to take an immature decision. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was no pressure on the dollar before the dissolution of this house came on April 18.

Mr. Speaker, the operations of the exchange fund were not extensive in the early part of April. It was at the end of April that pressure began to develop. Here I must begin a series of contradictions of things which have been said in this house by hon. members opposite in quite irresponsible statements we have heard from them during the course of this debate.

First of all, it was said that Mr. Rasminsky, the governor of the Bank of Canada—this was said by the Leader of the Opposition—was advising investment dealers to borrow in the United States at that time. Mr. Rasminsky did not say that. What he said was that the Bank of Canada was no longer asking them to refrain from borrowing in the United States.

This is an example of the way in which hon. members opposite have been skating around the truth and twisting it just enough to serve their unworthy purposes.

The next thing that has been said by hon. members opposite, in their irresponsible way, is that after dissolution I ordered a $50 million cut in the expenditures contemplated in the book of estimates. Mr. Speaker, on April 10 I presented to parliament in the budget speech a complete record that took account of all the expenditures that we had at that time decided we would ask parliament to vote. That decision was taken before the budget speech. The budget speech reflected in every particular every cent the government had decided to take off that book of estimates in asking parliament to deal with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: You slipped up.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We now come to the end of April and the beginning of May. I am not going to pay much attention to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. It will take a while for his frenzy to subside.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course that is not a personal attack.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At the very end of April uncertainty developed in the market and speculation entered. Pressures developed. We went to the international monetary fund and asked them for approval of a rate of 92½ cents and they gave it their very warm approval. That was a realistic rate, Mr. Speaker. It had been carefully considered and the executive board of the international monetary fund, which is composed of some of the most eminent monetary authorities in the world, gave that approval after careful consideration.

Here is another of these false charges. It was said this morning by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon)—and I welcome him to this house; I am glad he is out in the open now—that Canada was forced to appeal to the fund for aid and to accept as a condition the abandonment of the floating rate. I deny that statement completely. It is untrue. We did not go to the fund for aid. We went to the fund for approval of a rate that we ourselves had decided beforehand of 92½ cents and they gave it their warm approval. No conditions were imposed. They approved all that we asked. Mr. Speaker, there was no appeal to the fund for aid. It was Canada's decision, the decision of this government, to fix that rate. I ask the hon. member opposite to ask himself if this is a responsible course for him to follow in making reckless misstatements of that kind.

The next misstatement was by the Leader of the Opposition. He said that devaluation which occurred on the evening of May 2 did not stop the run on the dollar. That statement is untrue. The fact is that devaluation, the pegging of the rate on the dollar, did stop the run. It stopped it cold. I give a flat denial to that statement of the Leader of the Opposition. Exchange transactions during the month of May were not extensive and we did not lose reserves in May.

I come to the next misstatement. The hon. member for Davenport today said that the records of our exchange fund had been juggled. I gather that he was referring to the regular monthly statement for the month of May issued in the first week of June. I deny that baseless and unworthy charge. Those reserves were reported to the public in the same way and on the same basis as all the leading central banks in the world report exchange holdings.

I come to the next misstatement. The Leader of the Opposition says that our currency difficulties had reached crisis proportions long before June 24. I do not know what he means by "long before". He was careful not to particularize and I think I know why. But giving those words their ordinary English meaning, I deny the statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before May 23.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In assessing these matters it is well to remember that the Leader of the Opposition has engaged in a good deal of special pleading. Under the hammer blows of irresponsible Liberal campaign tactics bent on destroying confidence coupled with the statement of Mr. Winters in Truro at the end of the first week of June that Canada was on the verge of bankruptcy, and having regard to the fact that there had been a major break on the New York stock exchange, perhaps it is a wonder that the drain on the Canadian exchange reserves did not begin sooner. Mr. Speaker, Canada was not on the verge of bankruptcy. That statement by Mr. Winters was false.

Mr. Hees: Like all the rest.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Our government finances were in good condition.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We had a surplus of Canadian dollars. We were more flush with cash than we had ever been in the five years during which I was minister of finance. We were in a position to forgo borrowing that had been planned. The emergency that arose was confined completely to our exchange reserves. The Canadian economy was healthy and sound. Canada was enjoying one of the greatest periods of expansion in all her history. It was against that background that the Prime Minister spoke to the people of Canada on June 14 to answer the lies that were being blatantly repeated up and down Canada by Liberal campaign orators. Our reserves at that time were still several times as large as they were in 1947 before the King government recognized the existence of any emergency or took one step or turned a finger to meet it.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has given the house full information on the subject, on the way in which, following I am sure almost inevitably on the things that Liberals were saying up and down the country, heavy sales developed over that last week end of this campaign. Sales were heavy on election day and that night, June 18, Canadians and the world were confronted with a picture that was deeply disturbing to market confidence. The government had lost its majority. Four parties divided the seats in this house. No one of them had a majority. The balance of power appeared to pass to minority groups in the house.

As everyone knows, an election campaign is always disturbing to business. It creates uncertainty. One has only to look at what happens in a general election campaign in the United States. This result on June 18 was infinitely more disturbing to confidence than a mere election campaign. There was no prospect of stability, as the market assessed the election results. On the contrary, I should say there was the prospect of political instability. The government had promised to hold the value of the Canadian dollar firm at 92½ cents U.S. It was no longer in the position, so the market felt, to assure that it could carry out that undertaking. A run set in which, day by day, that week reached enormous proportions and led the government to take extraordinary action to meet it. Had the government been elected with a clear majority it was still possible and not unlikely that confidence would have been restored and the run would have ended without need to resort to severe emergency measures.

The next statement by the Leader of the Opposition is that it was impossible to put together what he calls an austerity program in four days. Mr. Speaker, there was no austerity program put together. This is not austerity. Does anybody seriously pretend that this is austerity? Does anybody but the Leader of the Opposition think there is any justification for saying what he said, namely that the government was asking the Canadian people to tighten their belts? Mr. Speaker, that is just plain fanciful soaring on the part of the Leader of the Opposition. It is nonsense.

I therefore say that the program to meet the exchange emergency was put together in that week following the election. The first and preliminary announcement was made on Friday morning, June 22 in the face of very heavy pressures on the Canadian dollar. The program then was not quite complete. It was completed then and announced on Sunday afternoon, June 24. Here I should like to pay a tribute to Mr. Rasminsky, the governor of the Bank of Canada and the officials of the various departments involved for their herculean labours in that week. It is evident that civil servants work harder and faster nowadays than they did when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a civil servant.

The hon. member for Davenport very unctuously said today that he finds the government's defence unconvincing. Isn't that too bad. If he does not choose to believe the truth, then presumably he will pursue his own erroneous beliefs and propagate these myths that he has been creating in recent months. He should, however, abandon the pretence of being a judge any longer. The mind which found the truth unconvincing is now manifestly a partisan mind.

A word about the program, Mr. Speaker, and I must be very brief. The details are well known. The recovery of our reserves has been remarkable. Indeed, Mr. Per Jacobsson, executive director of the international monetary fund, speaking at the annual meeting of the governors of the fund in Washington a fortnight ago, spoke of the recovery of Canada's exchange reserves as impressive.

Mr. Gordon: What else did he say?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He is a man who tells the truth. Maybe you do not understand that.

Mr. Gordon: May I ask a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question may be asked, how long will this exchange emergency continue?

Mr. Gordon: Will the hon. gentleman accept a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have no time. If the house wants to give me time afterwards I will be pleased to take any questions the house wishes on the subject. The question asked by many persons in Canada and abroad is, how long will the exchange program continue? That will depend, Mr. Speaker, upon the continuance of improvement. It will certainly be in effect a much shorter time than was the program initiated by the King government in 1947. But we need confidence, Mr. Speaker. We need confidence based on stability. If the government were to be defeated and another election precipitated, with the same irresponsible charges being hurled by the Liberals as in the last campaign, believe me—

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —I would not wish to see our reserve position exposed without further strengthening beyond its present position. The more utterly irresponsible talk we hear, such as that which emanated from the lips of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate this afternoon, the greater will be the need of strengthening our exchange reserves against the possibility of attacks.

For that same reason these two votes tonight are very important, Mr. Speaker, as well as the course of events in this parliament in the days and weeks to come. The government will not maintain the program any longer than is strictly necessary, but long enough to ensure that there will be no repetition of what happened in June. We did not like to impose any such program any more than anybody else but it was necessary in Canada's interest, and we did not lack the courage to apply it.

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When the time comes when we can begin to reduce the program I can say that we shall first remove the import surcharges and then cancel the suspension of civil service salary increases.

One question remains, Mr. Speaker. Is the pegging of the Canadian dollar at 92½ cents good for Canada? We on this side of the house say yes, a thundering yes. It has brought great benefits to Canada, to Canadian producers, to the tourist trade—

Mr. Pickersgill: Ask the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —to our balance of payments position. I ask this question and in doing so I challenge all hon. members opposite. Would the Liberals if they had the chance set aside the pegging of the Canadian dollar? They mercilessly misled the voters on this subject. They pretended that it was bad for Canada. I dare them now to deny to Canadians the benefits of the pegging of the dollar. Why, sir, did they say in the campaign the very opposite things to what they had said before? Why did the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who had urged the pegging of the Canadian dollar, say the very opposite?

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Pickersgill: I never did that in my life.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Sir, I must move now to my conclusion. We are a minority government.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, we know that, but we will not be a hesitant or weak government. In the speech from the throne is the greatest program of legislation put before the Canadian House of Commons at least in the last generation. Given an opportunity to proceed with this program, I venture to say that few members of the house will dare to oppose the measures that we will introduce. I think most of them will vie with each other to demonstrate their support. It is an outline, not a whole budget speech. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) will learn that yet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister's time having expired—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not ask for extra time—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not given extra time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not ask—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —for extra time; I simply ask—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —one sentence. Give us your confidence and we shall accept it as a high trust.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to speak in this session and it is almost the anniversary of some two years that I have sat in the house opposite the last speaker and those who now surround him, formerly many more. In that two years from the date of my arrival I had come to expect that the emergency which was deepening within the country would be faced and would be met with action by the last speaker and other members on the treasury benches.

The last speaker has again told us that the emergency which was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) following the election was an emergency which had not existed before the 18th of June. Yet he told the Canadian club of Toronto on Monday of this week that this was not the case. At that time he said:

> It has been said that at some unspecified date, but somehow prior to June 18, we should have made a public statement of the foreign exchange situation in full detail. Let me speak plainly. To do so would have been a most irresponsible act.

By his own words he indicates that the situation was in fact known to the government but says that it would have been irresponsible to let the people of Canada know about it before the election. If the words of the last speaker mean as much now as they did in the past, it is time again for the people of Canada to have the opportunity to say whether they believe his words. They will remember that this man, who charges the party of which I am proud to be a member with partial responsibility for our financial emergency and with smears against his leader, was himself responsible in that same election campaign for the most irresponsible smear ever made in public by a representative of the treasury benches. I refer to a report in the Toronto Star of June 16 last in which we find that at a meeting in Toronto the then minister of finance intimated that because a note had been delivered from the premier of the U.S.S.R. Russia wanted the Leader of the Opposition to be elected to power.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: Talk about personal attacks.

An hon. Member: How low can you get?

Miss LaMarsh: The then minister of finance indicated that this was a "flagrant attempt" to influence the Canadian election and went on to say, "you can see what party the Russians want elected". This is nothing but McCarthyism raising its head in this country. It sits on no human shoulders to use that type of smear, and less on the shoulders of one of those who sit on the front benches of the government.

But, Mr. Speaker, there was one thing at least said by the last speaker with which I can agree. It is to that, principally, I wish to address myself. He said at the commencement of his speech and throughout it, that the votes which face this house within the hour are far more serious than most which face it. How true those words are, for what faces this house is what faces this country. On June 18, Mr. Speaker, despite the jubilation in my own riding, I watched with sorrow what happened to my country. Regardless of where any man or woman sits in this house tonight, no one could have been happy about the result. Now, at a time when there are many major issues confronting our country, singly and in concert with other western nations, now when so many decisions which have been swept under the rug for too many years must be faced, Canada is paralysed by minority government. Tonight there is an opportunity to do something about this. Tonight there will be two motions before the house to express what every member of every opposition group in this house has at some time or another said since June 18, that the people of Canada have no confidence in that side of the house.

There is a group in this house which was not represented in the last parliament, a group that has had much to say since June 18 outside of this chamber. They speak mostly with one voice, but frequently with two. Since June 25 one of their leaders or co-leaders, who styles himself at least as leader in Quebec, has said such things as that the austerity program announced by this government following the election was a national shame. In a report in the Toronto Star appearing on June 25 of this year from an interview at Rouyn, Quebec, that man was quoted as saying:

> As co-leader of the party in the new House of Commons, I will fight those borrowings and fight those tight money policies that would put our people in more misery amidst plenty.

On June 27 in the Toronto Star appears a quotation, "Caouette favours election right off the bat." This is a report of a national television program in which the hon. member from Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) was interviewed and in which he said:

> I am not going to go along with that line of austerity program . . . with probably new credit restrictions, probably a million and a half more unemployed next winter . . .
> . . . if it was up to me there would be an election right off the bat . . .

On June 25 in an interview with the Canadian Press, the Ottawa Citizen quotes the same man as having said:

> . . . the Prime Minister of Canada should find a satisfactory solution to Canada's financial problems or resign.

In an interview at Timmins on August 2 as reported in the daily press of that city, this quotation appeared also from the hon. member for Villeneuve:

> I have fought against Diefenbaker outside parliament. I will not fight for him inside it.

He was reported to have indicated that he and his party would vote for any non-confidence motion moved once parliament assembled. Although he is not at the moment present, I would ask all members of the opposition to listen to the next words with which I at least can agree.

> The country needs a stable government. The quicker we have a new election, the quicker we will have such a government.

In speech after speech throughout the summer the hon. member for Villeneuve said that he would not support the programs of this government. On August 8, he was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen as having made a speech in Vancouver in which he said this:

> If the Liberals come with a non-confidence motion that is only playing politics, we will not support it. But if they come with a non-confidence motion on tight money, we will fight that tight money policy with all our strength.

Throughout the month of August the same repetitious speech was made from one end of Canada to the other. The leader of the Quebec delegation, the co-leader of the national party, repeatedly said that he could not and would not support this government in office. On August 27 he was quoted in the Ottawa Journal as having said:

> If Mr. Diefenbaker offers us an austerity program on September 27, I will precipitate the worst crisis ever seen in the House of Commons.

Well, we have had produced to us now the throne speech, the program of this minority government. What has the co-leader of that same group had to say? On August 27 in the Montreal Star the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) was quoted as saying:

> It would be wrong for us to support the Conservatives who have lost the confidence of the people, but since we are a responsible people we will not precipitate things.

It appears at that time at least they were in agreement. All of these clippings, and there are many, indicate that at least at that time there was a sense of responsibility in the far left corner of this house. September 27 has come and gone. There has been an amendment and a subamendment before this house, a subamendment in which all hon. members were greatly interested. The subamendment was proposed and it included words which, it must have been known, would preclude the support of other opposition parties.

Because it is a rule of our house, Mr. Speaker, that no one would attribute to any hon. member a dishonourable motion, it did not appear that, in good honour, that group had proposed a subamendment which was only a mockery of the parliamentary process. We had listened to words from the new member for Red Deer which rang in the house. He told us that Social Credit was determined to follow the role of statesmanship. This is what the hon. member said, as reported at page 120 of Hansard:

> We will use this opportunity to give leadership and a practical demonstration of statesmanship as against the jockeying for partisan advantages—

Those words which came from a man revealing himself for the first time in the House of Commons must be set against those that appear on the front page of tonight's Ottawa Journal. This is the report of the interview.

> "Do you mean—

asked the Journal

> —that you so drafted your own no-confidence subamendment as to compel the Liberals to support the government?"
> "Yes," he replied, "that is so."

He is quoted as saying this would "make it a lot easier, a lot more comfortable for us now to support the government on the more important issues which will be coming before the house".

An hon. Member: Ten thousand a year.

Miss LaMarsh: In my two years in the house, and longer years in politics, I have never, and I wager neither has anyone else in this chamber, heard of such a lack of good will, a lack of honour, a lack of understanding of one's responsibilities in this house.

All members of the opposition were elected for one purpose, and that was in opposition to the government.

An hon. Member: A negative approach.

Miss LaMarsh: It was negative. No group is here with a majority and, gentlemen, our country bleeds over it. It bleeds because now we need strong government. I watched for two years, and many here watched for longer, when it was necessary to have strong policies, when it was necessary to have boldness and imagination.

Mr. Webster: For 22 years.

Miss LaMarsh: And this administration, backed by the largest majority in history, more than 200 strong, dared not show that boldness and imagination.

An hon. Member: Why are you not still the government?

Miss LaMarsh: How can anyone in this chamber, or in the country, expect with reason to see boldness and imagination now when that same government hovers between life and death in every hour of this parliament? This is not a matter of amusement. We were not sent here to collect our indemnities, to live in leisure while the people of the country bleed.

Mr. Thompson: Oh, come off it Judy.

Miss LaMarsh: We are not here—at least those of us on this side—are not here for that; but in all fairness I would include all members. We are not here without personal sacrifice to ourselves. We have asked the country for confidence in each one of us, and each of us carried a partisan banner during the election. No group has obtained sufficient members to provide a strong government and now it would appear that members of the government and some other minorities are afraid to go back to the people, are afraid of the people's next vote. Indeed it appears as if one opposition party and the government are afraid that the Liberals will form the next government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I happen to believe that would be the case, but I am astonished that those in the far corner of this house have so little faith in their own philosophy that they do not believe they can come back here with the support of the people.

Mr. Thompson: Don't kid yourself.

An hon. Member: Then prove it.

Mr. Thompson: We will prove it.

Mr. Caron: Prove it tonight.

Miss LaMarsh: The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) has said, according to these clippings, and he appears to have confidence, that the next time the people are called upon to vote, Social Credit will have 140 members. If that is the case what fear can there be if they are prepared tonight to support the amendment?

There was every opportunity for my party's leader, when moving this first amendment, to dress it in all sorts of Liberal phrases to take a small partisan advantage, as did the hon. member for Red Deer to ensure that no one else but the Liberals would support it; and so he might have if he was afraid of dissolution. But we seek dissolution, and why not? We seek it for the obvious reason that the people, since June 24, have not had an opportunity to say what they believe in the words of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance. Do those on the treasury benches seek to have us believe them? Is that important? We are but the representatives of the people in our own constituencies.

An hon. Member: So are we.

Miss LaMarsh: Then take it to the people.

Mr. McGrath: Don't forget '58.

Miss LaMarsh: Those in the far corner of the chamber have said they will never support austerity. They have said they will never support this government; yet by the cheapest political trick seen in this house, perhaps since confederation, they have eaten their words and shown that they do not mean what they say.

Mr. Thompson: Frustration on frustration.

Miss LaMarsh: But this evening they have an opportunity to redeem themselves, an opportunity to show to the people who sent them here that what they said up to June 18 they meant, or else how will the member for Red Deer and the other members behind him, go back and explain to their constituents why they are supporting this government. The very thing they went out on the hustings and sought to destroy they are now responsible for upholding.

Mr. Speaker, we ask those members to consider, as we did on Tuesday night of this week, the effect of what they will be doing if they do not support this amendment. On Tuesday night they were asked to remove five political words from their amendment. They did not do it. We are asking them tonight to support an amendment which says simply that those who represent almost two-thirds of the people in Canada, having been sent here to express our lack of confidence, do now fulfil our trust and express it by our votes.

If Social Credit seeks to be believed in those constituencies from which it sent members, or in those constituencies from which it hopes to send members, and if it does not show its lack of confidence in the government, then it can never explain its breach of trust with the people who gave it their support on June 18.

We also ask, Mr. Speaker, for the support of those at your far right. We ask for their support and we are prepared to give them ours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: They have avoided the cheap trick of Social Credit in that they have not included words of pure socialist meaning.

Mr. Thompson: Political planning.

Miss LaMarsh: The words they have included deal only with a matter of planning. Well, there are many who might laugh at planning, but no man or woman can plan to marry, plan a family, plan a business, or plan a government without economic planning. It is a part of nature.

This afternoon when the words of the New Democratic party amendment were given to us by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) it was apparent that at least at this time they, like this group, sought to express their want of confidence and did not seek by devious measures to avoid doing that. It surely can be no surprise that those of us on this side of the house are prepared to accept and follow a subamendment which contains the word "planning".

My leader, on January 20, 1961, as he did frequently before that and has done since, as appears on page 1271 of Hansard spoke as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, at the luncheon recess, in outlining our own approach as a party to the economic, financial and fiscal problems with which I was dealing, I had emphasized the necessity for planning and for co-operation and consultation between government and other elements in our society. As a central agency for this forward planning and for the consultation which is required in the circumstances of today, instead of the limited and inadequate productivity council which the government proposes to set up, we would set up a national planning commission. We have made this proposal more than once in this house. Indeed in the last few years it has been put forward in every session from this side of the house, although I think in earlier days we called it a national commission on employment and automation. A commission of this kind would have members drawn from government, labour, management, agriculture and consumers. It would have an expert staff and it would have adequate resources.

This is only one instance of the way in which Liberals in this house in prior sessions have indicated that they feel the need of planning in our national economy. Some members of the Social Credit group have said they would never go along with planning because they do not believe in it. I would ask these members to consider a report which appeared in Le Droit of August 31 last, a declaration of the Roman Catholic bishop of Quebec in which appears these words:

(Translation):

> It is socialization that gives a human character to planning required by industrial society.

(Text):

It is obvious that those who lead the church at least believe in planning. All the elements of our society have indicated that there is a belief in planning, and nowhere in this subamendment appears the phrase "socialist planning" as used by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming).

I listened with great interest this afternoon to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I found myself in agreement with at least one part of his speech. He believes, as I do, that in order to get our economy moving we should not have austerity but we require, to use his words, easier money, lower interest rates, increased government investment, increased expenditure and activity on all fronts. This is the crux of the matter. This is the one thing on which all the opposition parties have indicated they are in agreement and it is the one thing this government has indicated it will not do.

It is apparent that the hon. member who spoke from the New Democratic party benches was in considerable confusion with respect to the Liberal medical care plan. It is clear from reading a transcript of his remarks that he has not yet read the plan and I would undertake, if he wishes, to send a copy to him at this time. This appears to be the greatest road block in the way of acceptance of the motion which has been proposed by the Leader of the Opposition and I say to the hon. member that if he would read that pamphlet before the vote is taken he would find this road block removed.

I have limited time but I should like to make a last appeal. Perhaps I appeal to those whose minds are already closed—to people who have already made up their minds, false to their trust. But I cannot believe that any man who sits in this chamber has so decided.

I entreat those who have said on every opportunity in the past that they would not support this government to give credence to their words by action and to join this party in voting want of confidence.

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Beaule (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, my opening remarks in this house will be to congratulate you for the unanimous vote which carried you to the exalted post you are now occupying. I also tender my congratulations to the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin) and to the seconder, the hon. member of Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent).

I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) did not pay much attention to us in the past, but as she has taken 30 minutes to call attention to the Social Credit party, I may infer that we are forming a rather important group in our corner of this house.

When, last Tuesday, we introduced a subamendment asking for a balanced economy based on Social Credit principles—which was the reason for which we were elected on June 18 last—the Liberals had a chance of supporting a non-confidence motion against the government, but they did not do so. I really think that the hon. member for Niagara Falls sits in the wrong seat in this house.

(Text):

Miss LaMarsh: May I inquire to what the hon. member is referring when he said I am in a bad position in this house?

(Translation):

Mr. Beaule: She should sit opposite to me.

In the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, I did recognize the familiar style of the Liberal candidate from whom I won the election in the riding of Quebec East. Indeed, that candidate was and still is known as the personal advisor of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that our people do not want to return to the Liberal party.

The riding I represent in this house was the stronghold of the Liberal party for many years. It was even represented by two prime ministers, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, as well as by another great Liberal, the Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

And if I am so proud to speak to the house, this evening, it is because the voters of my county gave me their confidence. It is indeed the victory number one in Canada to have been able to break through that Liberal wall in Quebec East.

(Text):

Mention has been made of the subamendment moved earlier by the New Democratic party. I cannot say we agree with that. We agree that economic growth is essential to progress. To this end planning is essential. But this does not mean the state planning of the socialists.

Legitimate planning comes directly from the people with guidance from government in the role of referee rather than through government regimentation superimposed from the top. The former is true democratic planning; the latter is socialism. Proper planning encourages freedom and enterprise. State domination restricts freedom, destroys initiative and is maddeningly inefficient. New Democratic party economic planning is synonymous with New Democratic party socialism. That, to us, has been made abundantly clear. We are opposed to socialism and therefore we are opposed to New Democratic party sponsored economic planning.

I might say to our hon. friends on the other side of the house that after their health planification scheme has been forced into the socialist province of Saskatchewan, not a single socialist member was elected in the last election, not even the one who will never occupy the empty seat across. That proves without any doubt that when one has tested planification, one wants to get rid of it.

Socialistic full employment cannot be accomplished without regimentation. We call to witness Dr. Eugene Forsey, Canadian Labour Congress research director and former New Democratic party card holder. Dr. Forsey made this very clear. Support of the New Democratic party full employment plan by Social Credit would imply endorsement of state socialism. We are opposed and shall so vote. Liberal support of the amendment as amended would confirm Liberal inability to frame an amendment indicating their own peculiar brand of socialism. It would constitute an endorsement of former Liberal prime minister King's declaration that socialists were nothing more than Liberals in a hurry and it would, no doubt, reflect the thinking of the present Liberal leader, who was reported as having said in Hamilton that the people should vote Liberal rather than New Democratic party because, as he said, the Liberals could give them anything that the New Democratic party could provide.

(Translation):

And now, Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in submitting to the house another very important issue. If we refer to section 2A of the Canadian Bill of Rights, we read the following: Bill guaranteeing to the Canadian citizens the right to the security of the person which is not endangered today in Canada.

On the other hand, it contains no effective provision for guaranteeing work in the agreements between employers and employees.

The right, for a citizen, to seek a job, the assurance of being able to keep such a job without the assistance or the intervention of a third party, shall also have to be an inalienable right in a free democracy.

We owe Canada a great loyalty, that of the labourer. I believe the time has come when the federal government should take steps to amend the labour code. We do not want to impose constitutions to the labourers, but I feel it is necessary to add provisions to the bill of rights so as to protect the Canadian workers, the men who want to work.

Mr. Speaker, I long for the day when our workers will enjoy the basic freedom of electing themselves their leaders and of seeing to it that they have leaders where leaders are needed. In this regard, I should like to refer to the constitution of the brotherhood of railroad trainmen, where I find, in page 10, the following statement:

(Text):

A non-insurance member is not eligible to serve in any office in the brotherhood which requires membership in the insurance department as a qualification, and further should not be liable for tuberclosis assessments or entitled to benefit in a tuberclosis division.

(Translation):

I wonder whether this is not an indirect means of selling insurance.

At this stage of my comments, Mr. Speaker, I could summarize hundreds of letters from railroad employees in which they criticize their own union.

A railway employee writes me:

As a fellow worker, I should like to draw your attention to the dictatorial trend of the brotherhood, the American union which represents the railway employees and whose only purpose is to get our money by whatever means possible, and especially through compulsory dues.

Here is another letter:

You know that the brotherhood is nothing but an insurance company operating under the guise of a labour union.

Another letter:

We do not enjoy now the same labour conditions as other industries.

And this one:

The time has come for railway employees to take over the control of their organization.

Still another letter:

Needless to describe the control exercised on us all by those labour leaders. When the Liberal party passed the compulsory dues system, it sold us to the American dictators; the Conservative party did not have the courage to repeal that legislation.

[Mr. Beaule.]

That is why I bring all those facts before this house. I sincerely believe that when the time comes for the C.N.R. to sign labour contracts with their employees, they should first choose a really Canadian union.

I also wish to speak on behalf of the many federal employees who have been asking for many years the right to organize and to be recognized as a union by the government.

It is about time the federal government grant federal employees the right to organize and to obtain justice in their demands to the government.

I also wish to tell this house how our youth and our Canadian athletes who represented us at the Empire games have been treated in the past. In previous years, when our Canadian athletes had to represent Canada abroad, it was a real shame to see them begging all over the country the money needed to represent Canada at Empire games and Olympic games. And when those athletes came back home with bronze or silver medals, everybody hastened to congratulate them here in this house.

I know that last year the house voted a substantial amount for the establishment of a permanent commission for amateur sports, but with the austerity program I think the project will be postponed to a later date. However, it is time more than ever for the federal government to appoint a commissioner of amateur sports in this country, but this commissioner should have the knowledge required and be absolutely free from any political link.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that now, in 1962, Canada should at long last belong to Canadians, and the government, following the Social Credit principles, should give our people a balanced economy in order to assure each citizen the standard of living to which he is entitled.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.30 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the amendments before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 5, 1962

The house met at 11 a.m.

(Translation):

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUMONT—INCOME OF EASTERN FARMERS—WITHDRAWAL OF MEMBER

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Department of Agriculture informs me that, from Ontario to Newfoundland, 91,368 farms have an income of less than $1,200 per year. On an average basis of six children per family, this means that close to a million persons find themselves in dire poverty—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dumont: —and, back home if a farm has an income of only $1,200, it means bankruptcy.

Right now speeches are being made from all sides, but no legislation has yet been passed to alleviate the misery of one million people—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dumont: Is this reasonable, an income of $1,200?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dumont: I do not accept that, because I find it abnormal—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dumont: If one million people come here to request—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dumont: If you had an income of $1,200, Mr. Speaker—is it normal, is it logical—

Mr. Speaker: I wish to point out to the hon. member that, according to the rules of the house and the tradition of courtesy that prevails in the house, a member must resume his seat as soon as the Speaker takes the floor. Now, I would remind the hon. member that I called for order several times. As a newcomer to the house, his behaviour might be excusable. However, I must urge him to study the standing orders, particularly with regard to the behaviour of the members in the house.

Mr. Dumont: The people of my riding have sent me here to ask that grain storage facilities be built and I ask that legislation be enacted in that regard—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dumont: —that these facilities be built. That is what I want, and I speak on behalf of the farmers of my riding who wish—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have politely asked the co-operation of the hon. member and I do hope he will heed my advice in the matter. He has asked for my opinion on a question of privilege and I have told him on what grounds he could raise such a question and how he should go about it. Consequently, I hope he will follow the kind advice given him by the Chair in this instance.

Mr. Dumont: The 118 socialists who voted last night are preventing us from legislating, because they deliver speeches—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member persists in pursuing this course any longer, I shall have no alternative but to name him. Mr. Dumont it is my wish that you withdraw.

Mr. Dumont: We need grain elevators in eastern Canada, and immediate steps must be taken—

Mr. Speaker: I ordered the hon. member to withdraw. Shall I have to ask the sergeant-at-arms—

(Text):

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the moment there is a question to be put before the house. In due course I will hear the hon. member.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dumont) having complied with the request of the Chair by withdrawing, we will leave the matter as it stands. I will now see the hon. member for Danforth, who wished to raise a question of privilege.

MR. SCOTT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, my attention has been drawn to an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Thursday, October 4. The article is entitled "Liberal M.P. Angry Over P.M.'s Reply". It reads in part as follows:

Question of Privilege

> Reid Scott (NDP—Toronto-Danforth) complained in the commons today about a reply by Prime Minister Diefenbaker to a civil service appeal against the current government wage freeze.
> Mr. Scott asked what consideration the government is giving to a request by the civil service association of Canada, now meeting in Vancouver, for immediate rescinding of the freeze on salary increases for 50,000 clerical and semi-professional workers. Mr. Diefenbaker said that when the government is in a position to make an announcement, it would do so.

My question of personal privilege is this. I do not really mind the people of Canada being informed that the Prime Minister will not deal with this subject, but when it is at the expense of my being publicly called a Liberal M.P. it is almost too great a price to pay.

MR. BARNETT—DESIGNATION OF MEMBERS OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege which has no relation to either of the previous questions. It is a matter involving what I consider to be courtesy in this house.

In view of the fact that several members in the course of their speeches yesterday referred to members in this corner of the house as N.D.P.'s I should like to suggest, if I may, that we are members of the New Democratic party or New Democrats. We do not customarily refer to S.C.'s or P.C.'s. As a matter of parliamentary courtesy I should like to request that we be referred to in the house as New Democrats or members of the New Democratic party.

Mr. Speaker: The effectiveness of the hon. member's representations will be measured by the efficacy of his eloquence.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—TABLING OF AGREEMENT ON RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave of the house to table the agreement respecting the greater Winnipeg floodway signed on May 28 by Premier Roblin on behalf of the government of Manitoba and by myself on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreement received by leave of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Scott.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to say when the report of the royal commission on health services will be ready for consideration by the government. This question was asked of the Prime Minister the other day by the Leader of the Opposition, and the Prime Minister said he would give a reply soon.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, the question the Leader of the Opposition asked me was whether the royal commission on health appointed some two years ago would be reporting soon. In his question he was totally in error, of course, because the royal commission was set up on June 20, 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Announced in December of the year before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not very far out for the Leader of the Opposition. I have communicated with the chairman of the royal commission and he says he expects to be able to make his report by June of 1963.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

THREATENED STRIKE BY TRAINMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister in touch with the Canadian Pacific Railway with the intention of persuading the Canadian Pacific to make the same settlement the Canadian National has made with the brotherhood of railroad trainmen, in order to avoid the necessity of a strike on October 29?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch and will be in touch.

GRAIN

DURUM WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of his interest in getting money into the hands of the farmers. In view of the much lower price being received by producers of Durum wheat, and in view of the low stocks of Durum on July 31, can the minister say whether the 1961-62 Durum account can be closed out at an early date and final payment, which farmers expect should be close to 75 cents per bushel, made immediately?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. I appreciate his statement concerning the minister's interest in raising the income of farmers. I should like to inform him that the 1961-62 Durum pool will be closed as soon as possible. I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that of the approximately 10.5 million bushels of Durum wheat delivered during the 1961-62 crop year, 21.9 per cent of 2.3 million bushels were delivered by producers during the last month of the crop year. These late deliveries occurred notwithstanding the Canadian wheat board's efforts to encourage producers to deliver their Durum earlier to permit the board to take advantage of the active demand for this type of wheat. Every effort is being made by the board to market supplies of Durum wheat remaining in the 1961-62 pool in order that the pool can be closed as quickly as possible.

AIRPORTS

POWELL RIVER, B.C.—REQUEST FOR RENEWAL OF AIRSTRIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the rapid deterioration of the surface on the temporary airstrip at Powell River in British Columbia, and because the municipality in that area has already gone to considerable expense to purchase land for a new airport—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I think that, while this airport may have been deteriorating for some time, the question of whether there is urgency in obtaining the information does arise at this time. I have some hesitation in ruling, but while the matter may be important to the hon. member's constituency I think his question would be better on the order paper.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR CHANGE RESPECTING ADMISSION OF RELATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if the government will give consideration to relaxing the present rigid regulations under the Immigration Act regarding the admission of relatives of citizens of Canada.

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am not prepared to concede the implication which there is in the question. The hon. gentleman and the house know of the massive improvements that have been made in the immigration regulations, and further improvements are under constant consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: A supplementary question by the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is it the intention to introduce a revision of the Canadian Citizenship and Immigration Acts?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Well, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend could predict the duration of the session I would be in a better position to answer his question.

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. I apologize for not sending notice, but it was given to me in haste. In view of the desire of the Canadian association of consumers and many other people for the early completion of the report of the restrictive trade practices commission into the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs in Canada, can the Prime Minister inform the house when we may expect release of that report?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that if the hon. member consults Hansard of the last few days he will find an answer to a similar question which was addressed either to the Minister of Justice or to one of his colleagues.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR MEETING OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Because of the urgent problems resulting from unemployment, would the minister say whether we can expect the committee on industrial relations to be called to sit at the earliest possible date?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): If it is contemplated that there is a need for the sitting of this committee, of course it will be called.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that he has announced his intention to introduce an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act, does the minister intend to proceed with these amendments before he has received the report of the special committee on drugs appointed by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons and requested by himself?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, unless the report is forthcoming in the immediate future.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

TENDERS FOR CHECKERBOARDS AND CHESS SETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): I wish to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production which arises out of the story "For Tender Checkerboards (2), Chess Sets (2), Aircrew, for the use of" in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Friday, October 5, 1962. Will the minister look into the possibility of effecting a more economic purchase—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I think the hon. member is aware that questions at this time must seek information which is urgently needed. His question is one of detail and it would be more in keeping were it put on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WAGE RATES—REFERENCE TO REMARK BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour with reference to a statement of his appearing in Hansard of yesterday's date at page 194, which states:

> I would simply point out that the average wage in those countries leaves a great deal to be desired by comparison with Canadian standards.

Does the minister not agree that wage rates must be related to the cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I would draw to the attention of the hon. member, who is newly arrived here, the remarks I just addressed to the hon. member for Leeds as to the nature of the urgency of obtaining information which could not be obtained in some other way.

[Mr. Starr.]

(Translation):

QUEBEC ARSENALS—REPORTED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is urgent because lay-offs take place every week.

Could the Minister of Defence Production tell us if he thinks that such lay-offs in Canadian arsenals will cease in the near future?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, replying to the member for Quebec-Montmorency, I must say that in spite of every effort we made to secure sales in order to create more work in Canadian arsenals, I am pessimistic and fear that we shall not be in a position to keep all the men now employed there. I believe that there will be further lay-offs.

(Text):

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRIES RESPECTING LAY-OFFS AND TIME CARD CHANGES

On the order of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of a telegram which I received a few minutes ago; therefore I was unable to inform the minister of my intention to ask the question. The telegram contains a vigorous protest from the brotherhood of railway carmen regarding a proposed lay-off of nine men, effective October 19, in their department at Fort William. Would the minister be good enough to have the situation investigated and report on it at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the hon. member may feel that the representations he wishes to make in regard to this matter are of urgency, yet nowhere in his question did I detect anything which indicated that information was being urgently sought from the ministry.

Mr. Badanai: I have another question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is making representations to the minister to look into this matter, so far as the Chair is concerned at the moment he has made his representations. Is he seeking urgent information?

[Later:]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I also received the same telegram as the hon. member for Fort William, and I have had wires and letters during the last few days from Moncton, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Hornepayne in connection with the same general problem of C.N.R. lay-offs arising out of the approaching change in time cards. In order to avoid bringing up each one of these matters separately I wonder if the minister would consider giving a review of these changes and lay-offs, together with their scale and duration, as obtained from the C.N.R. If he did not present it to the house he might at least distribute it to all hon. members who have railway points in their constituencies.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): From time to time I have discussed with the president of the C.N.R. the situation of these employees whose positions are affected by changes of the system. The government is well informed on all these matters, but I shall be pleased to bring these new facts to the attention of the management, and I will report to the house accordingly.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Does the government have any plan in connection with these lay-offs? Does the government have any plan for assisting in the relocation of these people in suitable employment?

Mr. Balcer: At practically every session of parliament when the committee on the C.N.R. sits, witnesses from the crown corporation are asked precisely these questions. On each occasion they have given details of their efforts to find employment for people who are laid off according to seniority and according to the need for the good administration of the company.

(Translation):

LEVIS—CLOSING OF BAGGAGE CHECKING OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Aurelien Roy (Levis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

I should like to know whether steps have been taken to contravene the decision taken by the C.N.R. to shut down their luggage checking depot for the Levis ferry passengers, which—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member does not realize that his question is of the same kind as several others which were asked this morning and about which I had to point out to hon. members that they should not make such representations because there is no urgency.

FINANCE

TRANSFER OF UNION DUES TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In order to put an early end to the austerity program while increasing our Canadian currency reserves, could we not prevent union dues paid by our workers to American international unions to leave the country?

Mr. Speaker: Again, I wish to point out to the hon. member that his question as stated calls for an expression of opinion and does not deal with urgent information.

ISSUE OF BILINGUAL CHEQUES TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I have yet to receive a reply from the Minister of Finance to my question of October 2 about issuance of bilingual cheques to all the members of this house. I wonder if he had time to check on that information which, in my opinion, should be very easy to obtain from his department.

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I have checked, and I find that over 90 per cent of the cheques being issued today by the government are bilingual. However, there is a fairly large number of cheques in the form of payments to individuals the supply of which has not yet been exhausted. That supply is being used very rapidly, however. Perforated cheques are used to pay members of parliament, but if there is any objection perhaps some change could be made. We expect that 100 per cent bilingual cheques will be used by the government in the near future.

(Translation):

Mr. Laniel: A further question, Mr. Speaker. I understand that this investigation concerning cheques would cost approximately $7 or $8. To maintain the principle, I should ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. At present, the hon. member is not putting a supplementary question: I feel he rather wants to express his opinion.

(Text):

SIGNATURE ON CANADIAN DOLLAR BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wonder if the minister has looked into the question of the dollar bill which I sent him yesterday. I am glad he returned the dollar, and I thank him for his honesty in doing so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I believe an old plate was used with a new signature, as has been done on past occasions. I am sure the hon. member will recall when that happened. That is the explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: I wondered if it was a question of falsifying history in order to further the austerity program.

Mr. Nowlan: I think we falsified history to the same extent as the hon. gentleman did.

AUSTERITY PROGRAM—STATEMENT RESPECTING REMOVAL OF SURCHARGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the Minister of Finance, but unfortunately I have not had an opportunity to give him notice. I would ask if the authority of his department extended to Mr. Goldby who is reported by the Japanese department of trade as having told them with great assurance that the tariff surcharges in respect of our austerity program would be removed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that while that would be an interesting bit of information, the question is not of such urgency that it should be asked on orders of the day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF DEFEATED CANDIDATE TO CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Benson (Kingston): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister care to comment on persistent reports that a defeated Conservative candidate may be appointed to the civil service commission?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the reports may be altogether hypothetical, I do not think the question is in order. We could spend our mornings and afternoons asking ministers to comment on this or that article written by unspecified persons for whom the minister has no responsibility.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL—STATEMENT ON TWINNING OF LOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Welland inquired regarding the twinning of the single locks on the Welland canal and the acquisition of the necessary land. I wish to say in reply that all the necessary land was expropriated on May 22, 1962. This matter is under active study, and an announcement will be made when a decision is reached.

KINGSTON—USE OF U.S. PILOT TO MOVE FOREIGN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Benson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the Minister of Transport aware of the fact that a pilot must be summoned from the United States to move foreign ships from berth to berth in the harbour of Kingston, a Canadian port?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I believe that the hon. member is trying to put forward information rather than seek it, and the question is not of that urgent quality that it should be asked on orders of the day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COST OF PROPOSED NEW RADAR WARNING NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Trinity, referring to a recent article in the Financial Post, asked if a new line of radar stations was to be constructed as a joint project by the United States air force and the Royal Canadian Air Force and, if so, what would be the cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

The radar system referred to is known as "The Oracle" and has been developed by a private firm, the Bendix Corporation, and is one of many proposals we can expect to see from industry to provide a means of space surveillance. There has been no commitment on the part of the Canadian government at the present time, and should a valid requirement develop it would be considered in the light of all existing conditions.

STATEMENT ON NAVAL AND AIR EXERCISES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): I should like to take this opportunity to reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Leeds.

The hon. member referred to a news item appearing in the London Times of October 3, 1962, relating to a NATO naval exercise and asked what Canadian forces were participating in this exercise.

The article in question referred to an annual NATO naval exercise taking place between October 2 and 18 and involving sea and air units from Canada, Norway, Denmark, The Netherlands and Britain. Canadian forces participating are H.M.C.S. Bonaventure and its aircraft, and the destroyer escorts Nootka, Crescent, Micmac, Athabaskan and Cayuga.

REFERENCE TO POLICY STATEMENTS BY SENIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, once again I ask the indulgence of the house to answer a question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond resulting from statements supposedly attributed to Air Marshal Slemon. The reply given by the officers concerned, and confirmed by Air Marshal Slemon, is consistent with a statement made by General Kuter in Toronto in September last year, and approved by the Minister of National Defence. It is consistent also with a statement by the Minister of National Defence which appeared in Maclean's magazine on August 25, 1962.

The statement that Canada's non-nuclear air defence weapons would be more harmful than helpful to the population of this country in the event of an all-out nuclear attack on North America is a conclusion reached by the correspondent and not a statement by Air Marshal Slemon or the other Canadian and U.S. officers of NORAD with whom the correspondent conferred. The suggestion by the hon. member of Burnaby-Richmond that senior officers have made improper statements on policy matters is not founded on fact.

FISHERIES

ALEUTIAN ISLANDS—ACTIVITIES OF RUSSIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him if he has any knowledge about the movements, numbers and purposes of Russian fishing boats or other craft in the area around the Aleutian islands, with specific reference to the movement of those vessels in a southerly direction toward British Columbia waters.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I shall be pleased to take the question as notice and give the hon. member an up to date report on fishing activities by foreigners in water adjacent to western North America.

LAKE ERIE—REQUEST FOR MARKETING ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Does the government propose any measures to assist the great lakes fishermen, particularly those of lake Erie, with their urgent marketing problems?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to a difference that has arisen between certain fishermen and certain buyers. No request has been made to the Department of Fisheries for assistance of this kind.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO IRELAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Because of persistent reports, and comments on those reports by the mayor of Ottawa, Dr. Charlotte Whitton, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the government proposes to deprive the capital city of our country of the services of this distinguished woman by appointing her ambassador to Ireland?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Interesting as this question may be, I think at the moment, as far as I can see, it is quite hypothetical and not of great urgency.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOLIDAY FOR STAFF ON THANKSGIVING DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if it has not been done within the last forty minutes, I wonder if Your Honour would see that the necessary instructions are issued so that appropriate notice might be given that Monday is a holiday not only for hon. members but also for the staff of this house. There still seemed to be some uncertainty this morning. I am sure it is intended that the staff will have Monday as a holiday as well the house itself.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for drawing to my attention this possible gap in communications, but I understand that as of this morning the chiefs of the various sections of the staff of this house have been advised as to precisely what conditions will apply. I can assure you that the fundamental principle applied is that all those people who can possibly be spared will be granted the holiday, and those who must, by the nature of their duties, work here on Monday will have their time made up in the usual manner so that no one will be penalized in so far as is possible under the arrangements for keeping this house open on Monday for the convenience of hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the holiday, of course, will be with pay?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles: I am asking Mr. Speaker to make it clear that the holiday will be with pay.

Mr. Speaker: I have never known it to be otherwise.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF ARREARS OWING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of National Revenue. It has come to my attention that there are large arrears of income tax payments by corporate bodies in Canada. In view of the financial urgency of the hour, will the Minister of National Revenue make available to the house the amount of income tax arrears which are presently owing to the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, I believe the main purpose of his question is either to advance views or to get a comment on some form of letter which was circularized to all hon. members of this house. In any event, as a second reason for ruling out the hon. member's question, it seeks statistical information which is not readily available to the minister, and could not be expected to be available. Therefore, much as I regret, the question must be deferred to the order paper.

POSTAL SERVICE

LADNER-DELTA AREA, B.C.—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Is it the intention of the minister to give consideration to the appeals from the residents of the Ladner-Delta area of British Columbia for a revision of the mail service in that area to bring it into line with the urgent needs of the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. gentleman has accomplished his purpose in putting forward a plea on behalf of some of his constituents, but I think he would agree that we all, including the Chair, have areas where we should like a better postal service, or newer and better postal offices, and we could be here until the expiration of anno domini in putting forward our views.

[Mr. Knowles.]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks today may I first pay a word of tribute to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did this nerve-wracking job very well, and I wish them great success in their careers in public life. In addition I should like to pay a tribute to the new members of the house. Mind you, the political complexion is not entirely what I would have wished, but after all they do represent a cross-section of the Canadian people. I am sure they will prove to be responsible and conscientious as has been in the case in each of the other parliaments in which I have had the privilege of serving.

Today I intend to deal with three subjects; first of all the emergency program, then the commonwealth conference and finally Canada's position in the world. Before doing so, however, I think it would be fair comment on my part to say that on each of these subjects, regrettably, the Leader of the Opposition has seen fit to take an attitude which can only be described as abusive.

With regard to the emergency program, in his speech the other night the Leader of the Opposition accused the Prime Minister of this nation of fraud and misrepresentation. In the first place those charges were not true, and in the second place it was not fitting that any leader of any party in this house should make a virulent attack of that kind. May I say to the Leader of the Opposition that it was unbecoming on the part of a man who hopes one day to be the prime minister of Canada.

Then on the question of the commonwealth conference may I say this. While we were in London we had this charge made in Canada by the Leader of the Opposition:

> Mr. Pearson referred to a "deplorable" ganging up by Canada and others at the Prime Minister's conference.

He was referring not only to the Prime Minister of Canada but to the other commonwealth prime ministers. In a further comment about the attitude of the Canadian Prime Minister at the conference he ascribed to Prime Minister Diefenbaker "a 'deplorable' display of diplomatic and political gaucherie". There can be different opinions as to just what gaucherie means but in all kindness I suggest that these are not the kind of remarks that should be made by any leader in Canada.

Then on the subject of Canada's position in the world, as he closed his comments the other evening the Leader of the Opposition, himself a former secretary of state for external affairs and previously an under secretary, sneered at Canada's efforts with regard to disarmament—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: Rubbish and nonsense.

Mr. Green: —the main problem facing humanity today.

Mr. Pearson: Childish.

Mr. Green: He did it in these words:

True, there is some mention of disarmament—

Referring to the speech from the throne.

—and the Secretary of State for External Affairs keeps working away at disarmament, going up to New York and to Geneva, and then back again.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, read the rest of it.

Mr. Green: If that is not sneering, I do not know what it is.

Mr. Pearson: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Green: You can read it yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are afraid to read it.

Mr. Green: The Leader of the Opposition was sneering, Mr. Speaker. It was obvious by the way in which he spoke. This is only one example of the kind of attack that the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Essex East and other Liberals have been making.

On the question of Canada's position in the world, we have been faced with attacks of this kind for nearly the last year. I have here a statement made by the present member for Vancouver Centre, who was the chief Liberal organizer in British Columbia. Here is what he had to say in effect:

B.C. Liberal campaign manager Jack Nicholson says Canada's reputation under a Conservative government has slid from that of one of the most highly respected nations in the world to one that is internationally laughed at and disregarded.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: It has gone down.

An hon. Member: Anything to win a seat.

Mr. Green: Furthermore he had this to say; he referred to Canadian businessmen and tourists coming back from abroad and telling people that Canada's position in the world is so bad that you will be well advised if you go abroad not to admit that you are a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: It has gone down and you know it.

Mr. Green: How low can people get? To some of us who have been very proud to wear the badge of Canada on our shoulder straps it is impossible to understand how any Canadian, least of all anyone seeking public office in Canada, could think in that way, let alone talk in that manner. It is about time the Liberal party realized that in these attacks on Canada's position in the world it is smearing our nation and hurting our prestige.

Mr. Pearson: Read your own speeches in opposition.

Mr. Green: All these vicious attacks on these three subjects are done with a purpose, namely the purpose of getting into power.

Mr. Pearson: The purpose of exposing the government.

Mr. Green: The purpose of getting into power, regardless of methods. I should be greatly surprised if the Canadian people have not already seen through that type of attack.

Mr. Pearson: They saw through it in June.

Mr. Green: These attacks bear little resemblance to the traditions of the great Liberal party. It is no wonder that the Vancouver Sun which, next to the Toronto Star, is the Liberal paper with the largest circulation in Canada, had this to say less than a month ago:

Up to now Mr. Pearson has been anything but a strong man for the Liberals.

Mr. Pearson: You lost 86 members. We doubled our representation.

Mr. Green: Then we come to the emergency program which of course, had to do with the situation of the exchange reserve fund. The necessity to do something about that exchange reserve fund arose at the week end of the election. I came back from Vancouver early on the morning after the election.

Mr. Pickersgill: Were you there when the Minister of Agriculture spoke?

Mr. Green: Oh, you have cackled enough.

Mr. Pickersgill: I ask the minister a question. I ask the minister whether he was there when the Minister of Agriculture spoke.

Mr. Green: I am in the habit of telling the truth, and I am telling the truth today. This is the truth. Furthermore, the Prime Minister of this country is in the habit of telling the truth and the hon. member knows it. When we found this run on the Canadian dollar—and there can be no doubt that it was in part at least caused by all the attacks by Liberals all over the country—

Mr. Pickersgill: By the Minister of Agriculture in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: —we came right back and when we found this situation, we moved to meet it. We brought in this program. The cabinet met practically continuously during that week until the program was announced, I think on Sunday. It took these steps knowing that they were unpopular. How could anyone expect anything else than that they would be unpopular? They were taken because that was what had to be done.

The steps that were taken have been succeeding. There is no question whatever that they will be dropped just as soon as possible.

This situation involved stopping a drain on the exchange reserve fund. The government simply had to carry on, if for no other reason than to prevent any further loss of confidence in the Canadian dollar. Any sign of wavering at that time would have been disastrous.

The same is true of any action which would have precipitated an election. This too would have been disastrous for the Canadian dollar, and I may add that the Leader of the Opposition was not very helpful in this crisis. He was told all about the situation while these steps were being prepared, but when they were taken he did not come out with a statement which meant a great deal by way of helping to retain confidence in the Canadian dollar. He was playing politics then, and he has been playing politics all through the piece.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not true.

Mr. Green: We are criticized for not calling the house. The house could not have been called for a matter of several weeks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Three weeks.

Mr. Green: There was also the commonwealth conference to be considered, which was to begin on September 10. It had been called at the request of Canada, and it would have been impossible for Canada to function properly at that conference if this nation had been involved in an election.

Mr. Pickersgill: It did not function properly anyway.

Mr. Green: I suggest that any reasonable Canadian will admit that the government took the proper course in all the circumstances.

Then a few words about the commonwealth conference. It was called, of course, to consider the implications of the United Kingdom joining the European community. It should be remembered at all times that negotiations between Great Britain and the community were not completed and are not completed yet. That was the situation in which the conference met.

It was impressive and inspiring, Mr. Speaker, to sit at that table around which were gathered the representatives of the 15 free and equal members of the commonwealth as well as the prime minister of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and the prime minister of Uganda, who did not speak but was sitting there at the table. His country will be free before the end of the present month, and has asked to join the commonwealth. That request was granted at the conference.

The prime minister of British Guiana was sitting in the room as well and the representative of Kenya, the prime minister of Singapore, the prime minister of Malta and the representative of Mauritius. These men were there although they did not participate in the proceedings, but in a very short time their countries will be free and full fledged members of the commonwealth. This is something that would have inspired anyone in this chamber today if he had had the privilege of attending such a conference.

In Canada it is almost forgotten that there are two features of the implications of Great Britain joining the European community. First and foremost are the political implications and, second, there are the trade implications. I believe that the political implications are more important, and to my surprise that was the position taken by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom at the conference.

The political implications, what follows if the United Kingdom goes into Europe after 300 years of refusing to take that step, are of prime importance. Of course a good deal will depend on the extent to which Europe becomes a united states of Europe, with a common parliament and a common foreign policy, or perhaps becomes simply a loose alliance. There will be a difference in effects depending upon the type of European community that develops. But in the conference there was a general concern on the part of every prime minister because of the possible effect on the commonwealth. That is very clearly set out in paragraph 15 of the communique, which was in these words:

> At the same time the representatives of various commonwealth governments expressed anxieties about the possible effects of Britain's entry into the European economic community. They trusted that, should there be closer association between Britain and Europe, it would not be allowed, as it developed, to weaken the cohesion of the commonwealth or its influence for peace and progress in the world.

Great value was placed on the commonwealth by every prime minister there, from the one representing the oldest former colony, our own Prime Minister, to the representative of the newest, Trinidad and Tobago. Such value was properly placed on the commonwealth because today it is the finest association of nations in the world. It embraces representatives of all races and creeds, and I do not believe there has ever been anything quite like it in the history of the world.

There are great traditions behind it. Twenty one or twenty two years ago the commonwealth stood alone in saving civilization. While we were in London we attended a memorial service for the young airmen who lost their lives in the battle of Britain, including Canadian airmen. These associations really go much too deep in Canada for words, and they mean so much also to all the other members of the commonwealth.

If the commonwealth should be weakened or brought to an end, think of what would result as far as Canada is concerned. Think of the increased difficulty we would have in preventing our country from being drawn completely into the American orbit. Canadians from coast to coast must keep this fact in mind, just as our ancestors have had to. The Asiatic countries of the commonwealth do not want to be simply cast aside, and they fear that might be the result. With regard to the African countries of the commonwealth, in the negotiations at Brussels Britain obtained the right for them to become associate members of the European community, which would be of great benefit to them economically. But these African countries, Nigeria, the greatest country in Africa with the largest population, Tanganyika, and Ghana, refused to accept associate status because they were afraid it would make them economic colonies of Europe and would interfere with their development as sovereign nations. At the conference they turned down that offer.

Our Prime Minister has always been a commonwealth man. At the conference he made a most statesmanlike address which received from all the other prime ministers far greater applause than that accorded to the remarks of any other prime minister. The opposition talks about Canada's standing being ruined. One had only to sit at that conference table to see the standing that Canada has among the commonwealth nations. That is partially as a result of the stand our Prime Minister took a year ago on the question of South Africa, but today Canada stands in the very front rank so far as admiration and friendship are concerned on the part of the other members of the commonwealth.

The Leader of the Opposition showed no concern in his speech about what happens to the commonwealth. He whined about strengthening Europe, and said that Britain should get into Europe to strengthen it. Europe is not such a weak little sister today. The NATO organization is probably the strongest military alliance there has ever been in peacetime. Europe does not need strengthening in that sense. She is just as strong as she would be if the British were to go into the common market.

Then he charged that our Prime Minister had told the British "You have to decide on whether you keep the commonwealth or whether you go into Europe". There was no such position taken by the Canadian Prime Minister. He made it clear from the start the decision was a decision for the British themselves. You know, the hon. member for Davenport seems to think he has all the answers. He always comes running along with a slick solution for everything. Speaking in January, here is what he said about Canada's attitude toward Britain and the European community:

> ... the government should have been urging and supporting Britain's application.

In other words we should have been shoving the British into the European community in the same way he wanted to shove a lot of maritimers up into Ontario.

Then there are the trade implications, and they are very far reaching for every member of the commonwealth. The Prime Minister of Canada spoke for Canada, which was his duty. I have not the time to quote from paragraph 16 in the communique, but it contains reference to the items in which Canada was interested. The other night the Leader of the Opposition said our Prime Minister should have been approving what the British government put into the communique. Paragraph 12 was the British case. We were criticized because our Prime Minister did not come down in complete support of the British representations. He was there to represent Canada.

Our main concern in the trade field today is foodstuffs. There is to be a procedure set up in the community under which there will be a tariff against many of Canada's foodstuffs, imposed by way of a levy. This levy will be put on by the community's civil servants, not by the British government. The money they get will be paid out by those same civil servants. As the prime minister of Australia pointed out, this is a strange sort of arrangement. This is the type of operation planned in regard to these tariffs to maintain artificial prices on foodstuffs produced in the countries of the European community. Make no mistake about it; as yet the community is inward looking. Let Canadians not expect the approach of the community, certainly on agricultural questions, to be in the direction of cutting down on the restrictions.

Canada is vitally interested in raw materials. Negotiations on these items have not yet been completed. We are hoping for a nil tariff on many of our materials such as aluminum, lead and zinc. In so far as processed goods are concerned, the negotiations have not even started in connection with many of them. For example canned salmon, one of the items which come under this heading, has not been considered. In so far as manufactured goods are concerned, there have been tentative arrangements but we are hoping there will be some more favourable conditions worked out.

There has been a great deal of work done here in Ottawa, in Brussels, in London and in the committees of the commonwealth conference by Canadians. We have pointed out ways in which the position could be improved from the point of view of Canada. For one thing, we believe a great deal of help could follow from the United States trade plan. We would like to see negotiations under the United States trade plan take place with the community and with other nations as much as possible simultaneously with negotiations between Great Britain and the European community. We believe if that could be done the result would be very much more beneficial all around, and it would be much more possible to get lower tariffs.

The Prime Minister's trade proposal had that same objective in mind. He suggested that commonwealth countries should call for a trade conference and invite all the members of the commonwealth, the members of the community, the members of the European free trade area, the United States, Japan, and other like minded countries. This proposal received quite extensive support, for example from the president of Pakistan, the prime minister of Tanganyika, the prime minister of India, and qualified support from others. It was applicable whether or not Great Britain went into the community. I believe that eventually this plan of having a wider conference will be the one which will be followed. I also believe it will be in the best interests of Canada.

The United Kingdom now goes back to resume negotiations in Brussels, and arrangements have been made for a continuation of the consultations with commonwealth. countries. In so far as Canada is concerned, Canada will co-operate regardless of what happens. Canada will also do her best to maintain and strengthen the commonwealth. I have here a very significant paragraph from the speech from the throne which reads:

> ... the government will spare no effort to safeguard the interests of Canada while preserving the unity and strength of the commonwealth as a whole.

[Mr. Green.]

Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two about Canada's position in world affairs. During the discussions in London we had quite a wide ranging talk on world affairs. There the Prime Minister and I suggested that the commonwealth should back up the United Nations in its efforts to settle the Congo problem, and that there should be a statement issued by the conference on the question of disarmament. Both of these suggestions were accepted. If hon. members will refer to the communique they will find that both these subjects have been dealt with. It is a great help in trying to get some disarmament plan worked out to have the unanimous endorsation of these 15 members of the commonwealth.

I really do not believe it is necessary for me to answer those charges that Canada's position in world affairs have been ruined by the present government. I know they were just cheap political talk. Now that the election is over I hope these attacks will cease and that once again the opposition will get in and try to help maintain Canada's position in the world.

I mentioned our position in the commonwealth and in the field of disarmament. Today Canada stands as one of the leaders, perhaps the leading nation of the world, in efforts to bring about disarmament, to bring about a cessation of nuclear tests and to deal with the question of radiation and the horrible effects on humanity which this radiation may bring about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house will have to give unanimous consent, as the minister's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear some dissenting voices.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, according to parliamentary tradition, I take pleasure in tendering my warmest congratulations to the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin) and to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), who have made excellent speeches in this house in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I commend them particularly, not only because of the contents of their speeches, but for their way of expressing them in the House of Commons. I think that both hon. members deserve our praise.

I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, to criticize the Conservative government lengthily today, as it has discredited itself permanently in the province of Quebec during the last election. But, what was a surprise in the province of Quebec at that time, was the rise of the Social Credit party. Its success was mainly due to Quebec's discontent with the Conservative party—

An hon. Member: And the Liberal party.

Mr. Chevrier: —and to the campaign launched by the Social Credit leaders who momentarily succeeded in deceiving the good faith of a number of voters. The reasons for Quebec's dissatisfaction with the Conservatives are well known.

An hon. Member: And with the Liberals too.

Mr. Chevrier: The paradox in our political situation resides in the fact that a great number of Quebecers, by voting for Social Credit, as a protest against the Conservatives, only succeeded in keeping them temporarily in power. That, and also to a great extent the campaign of make-believe and deceit of the Social Credit leaders in the province of Quebec explains the paradox.

The first illusion which the Social Credit leaders tried to create in Quebec was that Alberta and British Columbia had each become a paradise on earth and that Social Credit was still very popular there and that moreover their party would succeed in having a great number of members elected outside the province of Quebec.

Such frequent allegations had their effect on June 18 last, but they were refuted that very same day, because, as we all know by now, Social Credit came in fourth place in British Columbia, far behind the other parties, with only 14 per cent of the votes, in comparison to 24 per cent in 1957 and 27 per cent in 1953.

In Alberta, Social Credit obtained only 29 per cent of the votes in 1962, whereas it had 38 per cent in 1957 and 41 per cent in 1953, when it came first among the parties.

An hon. Member: How much for the Liberals?

Mr. Chevrier: On the morrow of the election, those who had believed in the trickery of Social Credit had to realize that they were alone and isolated in the province of Quebec, like our friends on the left, and that they had simply contributed to the election and maintenance in power of the Conservative party. Thus they had lost everything, even their votes.

Mr. Speaker, turning now to other matters, I should like to discuss the Social Credit doctrine as explained during the election campaign, as set forth in the book entitled "Real Caouette vous parle" and as put forward in this house by the member for Villeneuve.

According to the latter and his colleagues, all our economic problems arise from an only cause: under the present system, there is a chronic and permanent lack of purchasing power; in other words, incomes are lower than the amount of goods produced, with the result that those goods cannot be entirely consumed. This is what he says at page 83 of his book:

> —total salaries amount to $25 billion. Now, with a national revenue of $25 billion, how can people buy for $38 billion. Such is the current problem today.

In my opinion, this is a gross mistake on the part of Socred leaders, because we actually buy every year our total national production. If the member for Villeneuve would only examine a little more closely the statistics pertaining to our national accounting, he would soon realize his elementary mistake. In fact, he compares the disposable personal income with the total income or with the national production. In 1961, for instance, this disposable income on the part of the general public amounted, as he said, to about $25 billion, but personal income accounts for only a part of the total income of the nation. The government and the commercial concerns also have incomes which they spend, in turn, for services or investments. In this perspective, the disposable personal income can only be compared with the consumers' expenses, which amounted to slightly more than $24 billion in 1961.

On the other hand, had the hon. member for Villeneuve examined more carefully the national accounts, he would have realized that if personal income came to some $25 billion in 1961, the total income, or the national product, was close to $37 billion, and the total national expenses also amounted to almost $37 billion. Therefore, it is clear that we buy each year all that we produce, and that the mistake made by the Social Credit leaders simply consists in comparing a part with the whole and in being surprised at finding that this part is less than the whole.

Besides, if the explanation given by the Socred leaders was of any value, it would follow every country would be continuously facing mass unemployment and economic crises, since disposable personal income is always lower than the national product by a several billion dollars margin. How is it then—and I am putting the question to the Social Credit members—that Canada has known periods of intensive prosperity and of rapid expansion from 1896 to 1911, from 1921 to 1930 and from 1946 to 1956, under Liberal governments, without applying the Social Credit doctrine? How is it that these last few years, the countries of western Europe have been enjoying considerable prosperity and an accelerated development without resorting to Social Credit? How can the hon. member for Villeneuve explain these facts when in ours as in other countries, during periods of prosperity as well as of recession, the national income is always less than the national product?

Convinced that they have explained the cause of our economical problems by the difference between the national product and the national income, the Social Credit leaders claim that they can easily solve our difficulties. How? Simply by increasing the money supply and the credit so as to fill up the difference between the national product and the national income. Or again as the hon. member for Villeneuve states on page 61 of his book:

> Social Credit consists in making the amount of money represent exactly the facts of production, and it is nothing else. No more and no less money than there are goods manufactured by Canadians. That is all we want.

And again, as he puts it in page 92:

> For each dollar of products, there must be a dollar of purchasing power.

As I have just said, the cure put forward by the Social Credit members rests on a basic accounting error. But to this basic mistake, the hon. member adds another one just as glaring: he does not take into account the monetary turnover. It is an undeniable fact that money and credit are used several times, by changing hands, during a given year.

It is estimated that money has an average turnover of three times a year, which means that a given amount of money may serve during a year to buy three times as much products.

In 1961, for instance, the quantity of money in circulation remained at an average level of more than $14 billion, while our national production was valued at nearly $37 billion. How could we buy $37 billion worth of products with an average sum of money of about $14 billion? Simply by using that same money several times. So, the unbalance that Social Credit leaders believe to have found between the quantity of money in circulation and national production vanishes, once we take into account the monetary turnover.

Moreover, the inefficiency and failure of the Social Credit remedy has been clearly shown by the Conservative government these last few years. From the beginning of 1957 to the end of 1961, the quantity of money increased by 32 per cent in Canada. During the same period, the national product, in constant dollars per capita, has gone down by 4 per cent. Therefore, this government had already done better than is asked for by Social Credit leaders, and yet, during that period of time, unemployment remained at 7 per cent.

All those facts show that the remedy suggested by Social Crediters is not any better than the explanation they give about our economic problems. They show also why Social Credit has never been applied in other countries. Major Douglas introduced the Social Credit theory about 40 years ago. The hon. member for Villeneuve would like us to believe that such a theory could save the world and easily solve all economic problems plaguing mankind; on the other hand, he is opposed to any planning system and to any nationalization project. But then, if the solution of our problems were as simple as Major Douglas seemed to indicate 40 years ago, how can one explain that he has not more followers in the world?

How can one explain that there is no government in the world nor a serious economist to accept the Social Credit philosophy?

How can one explain that most democratic governments, in France, in England and elsewhere in Europe, and more and more in the United States, are taking up planning, that Pope John XXIII is inviting statesmen to choose that direction and that no one in those quarters is interested in Social Credit? Are government leaders and all the most renowned economists of the whole world so ignorant or is it because they are in the service of commercial banks? Would Major Douglas and the hon. member for Villeneuve be the only ones to see the light and possess the truth? Or is it not simply that the hon. member is having visions, is being mistaken and is thus misleading the others?

In fact, the only concrete proposal which subsists in the Social Credit reform, is the fact that we should create as much money and credit as necessary to bridge the gap between national production and personal income, which would have corresponded, in 1961, to about $12 billion. Social Credit leaders would then have practically doubled the quantity of money and credit in circulation.

Such an experience would have been similar to the experience Germany went through following the first world war. We all recall the disaster brought about by inflation in Germany. It ruined the middle class people and plunged the poor people in the depth of misery leading finally to the rise of Hitler, whom the hon. member for Villeneuve seems to admire.

I should like now to say a word on the question of confidence in this government. During a television interview after the election, the hon. member for Villeneuve made the following promise to the whole French-speaking population of Canada, and I quote:

If anyone comes up with a non-confidence motion, you may be sure that I will vote against the government whoever they are.

That was a definite and clear pledge. What has happened since? It is clear that the government has no intention of ending its austerity program and that it puts forward no efficient proposal to get the economy rolling again and check unemployment. On the other hand, the leader of the Liberal party has put forward a comprehensive program to improve the situation for all Canadians. He has further more moved a non-confidence motion against the government. The motion is simple and does not carry any principle unacceptable to the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Now, his colleagues rose one after the other, last night, to vote against the proposal, against the non-confidence motion, and no doubt I may assume that, if he had been in this house at that time, the hon. member for Villeneuve would have voted against the motion. The Crediter's vote clearly shows that either they are the allies of the Conservatives or they fear another appeal to the electorate; both explanations could be equally true. The implication then is that the hour of truth has come for the hon. member for Villeneuve and his colleagues. I am sure that those who voted for them because they were against a Conservative government have already passed judgment on them after their vote of yesterday.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a series of fallacious, mendacious and untrue statements which I find in the book entitled "Real Caouette vous parle."

Here is what he says at page 17:

Tell me what the Liberals have given you over a period of 22 years, besides a war and a depression?

When the hon. member for Villeneuve asks such a question, he is falsifying the truth.

To begin with, it was not the Liberals who were responsible for the war, but Hitler, whom the hon. member for Villeneuve admires so much.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that one of Hitler's slogans, from 1929 to 1932, was:

Sie haben nichts zu verlieren

"You have nothing to lose." They borrowed not only this individual's philosophy, but also his slogan.

Furthermore, it was not the Liberals who were responsible for the depression. The depression began in Europe and in the United States, and by the time it was felt in Canada, a Conservative government, under Mr. Bennett, was in power. It was not until 1935, under Mr. King's administration, that the Canadian economy picked up strength and, following the war, got started on the most rapid expansion period in its history.

Such is the kind of respect the hon. member shows for the truth when he speaks.

Again on page 27, he asks another question:

We have had the Liberals in Ottawa for 22 years; did they provide us with a steadily growing economy?

Further on, on page 35 he replies to that question:

You have tried the Liberals for years, and you have already tried the Conservatives for four years, but the results have been the same.

How can the hon. member for Villeneuve dare to deceive his fellow citizens in such a way? Either he is not aware that he is distorting the truth, and that is unforgivable for a party leader; if he is aware of it, then, he is not worthy of the trust he is seeking.

Let us consider the facts.

First, the economic field. We have experienced a constant economic growth over the 22 years of Liberal administration. Over that period, our country enjoyed the highest development rate in the world. Our national product, which was estimated at $5.6 billion in 1939, rose to $11.8 billion in 1945 and $30.5 billion in 1956. How can the hon. member for Villeneuve state that under the Liberals Canada experienced prosperity only during the war years?

But that is not all. The national product, in constant dollars and per capita, increased by 22 per cent between 1949 and 1956 but decreased by 4 per cent under the Conservative administration.

From 1949 to 1956, unemployment averaged 3 per cent of the labour force while under the Conservative administration, it averaged 6.5 per cent.

Since 1957, of all industrialized countries, Canada is the one whose economy experienced the slowest rate of growth. How can the hon. member for Villeneuve state that the Liberal and Conservative governments produced the same results?

But there is also the social legislation. Until 1957, the Liberals elaborated our whole system of social security: unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age pensions, pensions for the blind and the disabled, unemployment assistance, hospital insurance, housing aid, support prices for the farmers.

And you talk about respect for the dignity of man? Are there anywhere laws which have respected man and his dignity more than those?

It is true that in 1957 the Conservatives increased some pensions, but they did not introduce any new legislation in that field.

Here is another series of erroneous statements made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, at page 37 of his book. Listen to this:

> Mr. Pearson was a member of a Liberal government in Ottawa from 1939 to 1945, a period of six years. During those six years, Mr. Pearson and the former federal ministers as well as the Liberal prime ministers of that time, went into debt, increased the national debt of Canada by $17 billion.

And a little further on, on page 38, the hon. member for Villeneuve continues:

> —as for the national debt, an increase of $17 billion under the Liberals, an increase of $3 billion under the Conservatives.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how a member can so garble the facts and distort the truth as does the hon. member for Villeneuve in making such a statement?

First, I wish to remind him that, from 1939 to 1945, the leader of the present Liberal opposition was not a member of the government. He became a member of it in 1948 and from that date up to 1957, our national debt, far from increasing, decreased by almost $2.5 billion. Why did the member for Villeneuve fail to mention this essential fact? Indeed most other countries were getting deeper into debt during that same period while in this country our debt was decreasing. And why did he fail to compare that reduction of $2.5 billion with the $3 billion increase that occurred under the Conservative administration?

But even during the war, the net debt of our country increased from $3.2 billion in 1939 to $11.3 billion in 1945, which makes for an increase of $8 billion instead of $17 billion as stated by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

On page 20 of his book, the hon. member continues:

> As a matter of fact, there are only two Canadian provinces where there is no provincial direct tax. And Alberta is one of them—

That is another lie, another falsehood. Indeed, I cannot believe that the hon. member is unaware of the fact that all provinces levy direct taxes and that Alberta, for one, collects income tax on corporations and private citizens, in addition to succession duties.

On page 91, I find this other quotation which the hon. member for Villeneuve repeated in his speech the other evening:

> Mackenzie King said in 1935: As long as a country has no control over its money, it makes no difference who enacts the laws, because he controls nothing.

The hon. member went on as follows:

> Unfortunately, Mackenzie King never did anything about it when he was in power in Ottawa.

That again is false. The hon. member for Villeneuve knows I hope, that the Bank of Canada controls credit and money in our country, and that it became the exclusive property of the state after 1935, thanks to Mr. King, and started to operate as such in 1937.

I could thus continue quoting indefinitely the numerous falsehoods which were repeated not only by the hon. member for Villeneuve but by several Social Credit leaders.

Mr. Deschatelets: All of them.

Mr. Chevrier: Having forgotten the numerous benefits given to them by Liberal governments, after five years of Conservative mismanagement, the electorate believed the Social Credit's deceitful propaganda. They imagined that the Liberals had been just as bad as the Conservatives and they mistook the Socred leaders for men of good faith.

This kind of propaganda reminds me of the one used by the Conservatives, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, when they claimed before and during the electoral campaign, that everything was going well in Canada.

Mr. Bourbonnais: It is true.

Mr. Chevrier: Besides the unjustified pretention that the Social Credit would have elected a great many members outside Quebec, and beside falsehoods he spread concerning the Liberal party in an effort to assimilate it with the Conservative party, the hon. member for Villeneuve also tried to convince the people that the Social Credit doctrine was the only solution to their troubles. I trust I have refuted the arguments of that simple doctrine at the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention another contradiction equally flagrant of which the hon. member for Villeneuve made himself guilty. At page 92 of his book, we find:

Under the present system—

An hon. Member: It is not his book.

Mr. Chevrier:

Under the present system, the chartered banks create money and credit according to their whim and fancy. They create much of it in times of war and make it scarce in times of peace.

That quotation calls for several explanations. First of all, it is true that the commercial banks seek to make profits. But what is so disgraceful about that? It is precisely what private enterprise is looking for, this private enterprise which the member for Villeneuve and his Social Credit chiefs want to preserve and protect. Is the desire for gain a bad thing for commercial banks and a desirable one for other enterprises? Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely false that banks may "create money and credit according to their whim and fancy".

That statement might have been true when Major Douglas was writing, just after world war I, at a time when there was no central bank in Canada, but since 1937, in this country, it is the central bank that creates money and credit and determines the amount of currency, while commercial banks are reduced to the role of retailers.

Yet, in spite of this statement, Social Crediters continue and will continue to say that it is the commercial banks that "create money and credit in our country according to their whim" whereas the situation is completely altered since the Bank of Canada was established.

Besides, the member for Villeneuve contradicts himself on this vital question when he says, as can be seen on page 26 of his book:

Ladies and gentlemen, it is parliament which has entrusted to the Bank of Canada—and note this—the task of regulating credit and money. The bank is authorized by law to issue credit by the purchase of bonds from the government of Canada, the provincial governments . . . etc.

But then, if it is the Bank of Canada which is in charge of controlling credit and money, the chartered banks thus cannot create money and credit to their whim and fancy, as was claimed by the Social Credit leaders. We find there, right from the start in the Social Credit reform, a glaring inconsistency.

When the Social Credit leaders say that they would take away from the chartered banks the privilege of creating money and credit, on their own admission they intend to break through an open door because this has been the exclusive privilege of the Bank of Canada ever since 1937. All the chartered banks do at present, is to divide among their customers the credit created by the Bank of Canada, just as the automobile dealer allots to his customers, if any, the cars which have been sent to him by the manufacturer.

Like the hon. member, I should like—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. The house would have to give unanimous consent, as the hon. member's time has expired. Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear a dissenting voice. I recognize the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. Byrne: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Kootenay East on a point of order.

Mr. Byrne: I should like to ask the Chair at this time how the house proposes to deal with the naming of the hon. member for Bellechasse, since it should have been dealt with at the time the hon. member was named, according to citation 134 of Beauchesne's fourth edition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East should have been raised at the time the incident occurred. In my view it is now too late to put the matter to the house.

An hon. Member: Call in the Speaker.

Mr. Byrne: It will be a question of whether the member is to return to the house. This is a question of privilege for all members. When they are named they may not know whether they are named for a period of time, such as for the day, or whether they shall be expelled from the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I said earlier, this is a matter that should have been raised at the time the incident occurred. We are on the throne speech debate, and I now call on the hon. member for Waterloo North.

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to congratulate you and your deputy and chairman of committees, on your appointment to the important positions you hold in this house.

I should also like to express my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Waterloo South, my next door neighbour and a very close friend of mine, and to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska for their excellent speeches in moving and seconding the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a constituency which is a perfect blend of industry and agriculture, I am pleased and indeed elated at the proposals put forward to assist these two facets of our commercial and business life. As a member of parliament who has worked and fought for his country, I am also happy to hear of the plans to eradicate the major problems facing Canada. I am sure that our government has met these problems head-on with a view to improving the lot of each and every one of the 18 million Canadians and to making this country an even better place in which to live.

To my constituency the encouragement our expanding export program will receive means much. The bustling, thriving metropolitan area of Kitchener-Waterloo, as well as the surrounding smaller municipalities, cannot help but benefit from such things as the production incentives planned, the enlarging of the scope of the Export Credits Insurance Act and the industrial development bank. These agencies should be able to give valuable assistance to business, particularly in the essential task of expanding sales in foreign markets.

Plans for the establishment of a national economic development board I feel will be welcomed by my constituents, as well as by everyone in Canada who has the economic interests of our nation at heart. I am sure this board can serve a useful purpose in guiding private and public development.

While further budget measures are planned to meet our problems, the fiscal plans announced will, I am confident, create better employment opportunities for Canadian people, promote economic growth, strengthen Canada's balance of international payments and help maintain price stability. The farsightedness of our government is evident in the proposals to create new jobs over the coming years and to assist employers and workers in meeting the impact of automation. Such a broad attack on unemployment, one of our major problems for the past several years as well as a giant-sized headache for our neighbours south of the border, will surely be hailed by industry and workers across the nation.

Our government, which has done more for the farmer than any previous government, has not forgotten him in this speech. The plan to convene a national conference on agricultural training this fall is a further step in improving the lot of the farm population.

While many people may have thought the issue of a national flag has been dropped, the speech shows that this is certainly not the case. As one who has spoken in this house on a distinctive flag, I am happy to see that moves are being made toward this end.

As everyone can see, the speech from the throne is extremely comprehensive and makes a determined effort to face the problems confronting Canada, whether they be economic or nationalistic. Our leader, Prime Minister Diefenbaker, could have played safe by keeping his legislative program as non-controversial as possible. Instead he has taken a bolder and more constructive course with a view to eliminating our difficulties. He has announced his intention of balancing the budget, a course which will improve our reputation among the nations and investors throughout the world. He has attacked the unemployment problem and aimed at strengthening the economy and boosting our export volume. He has outlined a variety of plans for improving the health of the country as well as that of the individual. He has also said he plans a budget which will attack even more of our problems.

Mr. Speaker, a little more than a year ago a bill was passed in the House of Commons and the other place to provide $5 million for physical fitness and amateur sport. This announcement caused a great deal of interest among the youth of our country and others. Our government was given high marks for bringing about this legislation.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Speaker, just before one o'clock I had mentioned that a little over a year ago a bill was passed by the House of Commons and the other place to provide $5 million for physical fitness and amateur sport. This announcement, as we all know, caused a great deal of excitement and interest among the youth of our country and others. Our government was given high marks for bringing about this legislation. Some time later 30 distinguished men and women from across Canada were appointed to serve on the national advisory council on physical fitness and amateur sport to carry out the duties of such an important council. I mention this, as much good work has been done by this council up to the present time.

Perhaps one of the most important grants has been the one extended to the Royal Canadian Legion, dominion command, which provided funds for their program of expanding track and field activities through the facilities of a school for coaches representing every province in our country. I had the privilege of attending this school at Guelph, Ontario, which was under the supervision of Mr. Dyson of England, one of the greatest coaches in the world. In interviewing this fine gentleman I was deeply impressed with the set-up of such a program, and in talking to some of the athletes and coaches attending the school I found that in their view the benefits of training under this great coach were much greater than they had expected. They felt that with such coaching they could go back to their various training centres and teach these methods to the advantage of all sportsminded youth. I understand that the Royal Canadian Legion, the sponsors of the coaching school, are endeavouring to secure the services of Mr. Dyson on a permanent basis. If this effort is successful it will be a real step in the right direction.

From the grant that the Royal Canadian Legion received they provided some funds for the eastern track and field meet held last August in Waterloo, Ontario, and sponsored by the Legion branch of that city. This money helped to defray some of the expenses of bringing many athletes from every part of Canada. With nearly 500 of our youth participating in these events, this competition proved to be one of the best ever held in Canada, with many records equalled or broken. The Royal Canadian Legion branch at Waterloo in my riding deserves a great deal of credit for their wonderful efforts, and if some financial assistance can be forthcoming from year to year great strides will be made in track and field in Canada, with the important result that such efforts will help to build healthier bodies and healthier minds.

Before long Canada will again be sending a hockey team to compete with other countries for the world's hockey championship. I understand that with this in mind Father David Bauer of the University of British Columbia has brought forward a proposal to some of the members of the national advisory council and to the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association that such a team could be organized by the university where these players would have an opportunity of playing together for a longer period, something that has not been done previously. Such a proposal should receive consideration by the council and the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association. The efforts of our government regarding this program, supervised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith), along with the good work of the members of the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport, are very commendable.

Some hon. members have mentioned the importance of education. May I say that most of my life I have been very interested in the three great assets of our youth, Christian training, education and recreation. For that reason I was pleased to receive the booklet "Youth Appreciation Week", an event to be held from November 12 to 18 and sponsored by the Optimist clubs. I believe the objectives in this booklet are worth repeating. They are:

To recognize the accomplishments of youth in the home, school, church and community.

To promote more active participation by families in family affairs.

To encourage groups and organizations to publicly show their respect for youth.

To encourage newspapers to devote more space to news of the 95 per cent of youth who are good citizens.

To encourage radio and television stations to recognize youth through special as well as regular programs.

To encourage national magazines to recognize the accomplishments and contributions of youth.

To provide the proper environment, recreation and social activities for youth.

To encourage parents to rededicate themselves to the responsibilities of parenthood.

To illustrate the great influence religion has on the lives of youth and to encourage their active participation in religious activities.

To encourage a greater interchange of ideas between adult and youth, leading to a broader understanding of the problems of each.

May we continue our advice and assistance to our fine youth in Canada, in the full realization that the youth of today will be the citizens of tomorrow.

In closing, I should like to say one word on another subject, Mr. Speaker. As one of the few retired civil servants sitting in the House of Commons, and one who gave nearly 36 years to the civil service commission under different governments, I am still very interested in the welfare of my former associates in this service. For many years the salaries of the members of this service could not be classified as extravagant. I can well remember when my salary was not as great as that of a foreman working in most industries. However, some improvements have been made by our government during the last four years, and I am pleased to see this. We pride ourselves upon having the best public service in the world. This is the result of the conscientious effort of most of these men and women in the performance of their daily duties. Thousands of such servants reside in my riding of Waterloo North and are making a fine contribution to this work. Many qualifications and obligations are expected from these civil servants. Perhaps one of the most important of these would be their loyalty to the civil service commission and the government. Disloyalty could well mean the loss of their position, as we all know.

The recent recommendations made for the federal public service outlined proposals for negotiation, conciliation and arbitration. I hope our government will give consideration to these recommendations at an early date.

I could mention the expansion and development of our industries and agriculture, as well as the universities in my riding. However, I know there are plenty of new members who would like to speak so I will cut my speech short. As noted previously, I am happy at the proposals in the speech from the throne. I am sure millions of my fellow Canadians feel similarly and will take part at the plans our government has outlined for the betterment of our great nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean Eudes Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, my first words in this august assembly will be to congratulate you. Allow me to join with the distinguished and experienced members who preceded me in supporting also the unanimous decision of the house to appoint you to your present office.

I believe you are the first French-speaking Speaker to come from a province other than Quebec.

Since I come myself from New Brunswick, I especially rejoice in this great honour which reflects not only on you, Mr. Speaker, but also on all minorities in the other provinces of our country.

I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address. They performed very well their task which was difficult indeed. Needless to say that I do not necessarily share their views, but if I may recall a word by Voltaire:

I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.

My first duty, Mr. Speaker, is a very pleasant one; I wish to express my thanks to all my constituents. The people of Restigouche-Madawaska put their faith in me and I will always try to be equal to the task they have set me.

Mr. Speaker, while looking through the official reports for previous years and listening to the speeches of the members who spoke before me during this debate, I realized that quite often, in their first speech, the members praise their riding's natural beauties.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that former members for Restigouche-Madawaska often had the opportunity of describing to you the enchanting decor of the Restigouche valley and of the magnificent republic of Madawaska which is situated along the fabulous Saint John river.

My immediate predecessors did not sit on this side of the house, but I am sure that, in the near future, I will be sitting on your right since that is the wish not only of my constituents but of all the Canadian people.

(Text):

However, Mr. Speaker, if I do not indulge today in a poetical description of the scenic beauties of my riding, I do wish to bring before this house the needs of my people. There is perhaps more unemployment in Restigouche-Madawaska than in any other part of this land. Last March the unemployment figures reached fantastic proportions and over 51 per cent of our major force was unemployed. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I still hear a voice saying—we cannot help but remember these words—"As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada no one, not one single fellow Canadian will suffer from unemployment." However, there are thousands of fellow Canadians in my riding who do suffer from unemployment and with this austerity program I am afraid that many, many more will be suffering great hardships. If the Canadian economy is booming, as we were told by many speakers from the opposite side, why not have some of it boom our way?

During the speech from the throne mention was made of the fact that the economy was booming indeed. I quote:

Economic activity in Canada has moved ahead sharply. This strong advance has resulted in more than 200,000 new jobs during the past 12 months. The objective of my government is to accelerate this pace of advance.

In order to accelerate this pace of advance in Restigouche-Madawaska, Mr. Speaker, there are a few local projects that should be proceeded with immediately, and I will deal with those projects very briefly:

1. A complete study of the fishing facilities in the Jacquet river area with a view to constructing additional wharves where needed. At the present time, local fishermen have to put up with a disgraceful situation.

2. Crib walls at Charlo and Richardsville to keep what is left of the coast.

3. A federal building with post office and R.C.M.P. tenements at Eel River.

4. Wharf fill and storage shed for the Dalhousie federal wharf.

5. Development of the Sugarloaf mountain in the Campbellton area or other suitable site for scenic and recreational facilities as a federal park.

6. Immediate dredging of the Restigouche river off the Campbellton federal wharf as recommended by federal engineers.

7. An airport in the lower end of Madawaska county.

8. Immediate start on the federal building in Edmundston for which land has already been purchased.

These are but a few of the federal projects which are vital to my riding and I strongly urge that they be proceeded with as soon as possible in order to provide work for the people now and possibly throughout the winter. Indeed I fear for the hardship and suffering which many of the people in Restigouche-Madawaska may have to endure this winter.

These are critical times and I expect the government to rise to the occasion and offer solutions for our national problems. But there was little in the speech from the throne to indicate that the administration intends to show initiative and positive leadership. That speech reminded me of an old ditty which is best applied in reverse—something old, nothing new; something borrowed, everything blue.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I was particularly surprised to read in the speech from the throne that we would be called upon to abolish the closure rule and to reinstate the special committee on procedure, because I believed that closure had been abolished some five years ago by the present administration. Was not the closure issue one of the main factors behind the victory of this administration following the pipeline debate? I was under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the first move of the Prime Minister, after achieving victory, would have been to abolish closure. But to our great dismay, we find that nothing has been done in that connection, and that the rule of closure is still in force.

On the other hand, I was both happy and surprised to learn that the speech from the throne provided for:

—the establishment of an Atlantic development board to advise on measures and projects that will promote the economic development of the Atlantic region of Canada.

I was pleased because at long last the government acknowledged our needs, but I was surprised because no definite measure, nothing concrete was suggested, no definite project was proposed.

The speech did not mention the causeway between Prince Edward Island and our province. This was, however, the last very solemn promise made by the Prime Minister on the eve of the prorogation of parliament. Has the Prime Minister changed his mind, now that the people of the island gave him their four seats in the house? Does he imagine, by chance, that these fine people will fall again into such a trap?

The speech did not mention the Chignecto canal. It is, however, one of the projects that interest most of the population of our eastern provinces.

Will this development board, which is mentioned in the speech from the throne, be only another one of the numerous royal commissions set up by the government which travel throughout the country to look into problems and publish books which gather dust in the Prime Minister's office?

If it is this government's sincere intention to help the maritime provinces, there will be no need to set up a complex machinery which usually leads nowhere. If this government sincerely intends to help the maritime provinces, all that it needs to do is to start living up to the promises it has made to the people of those provinces over the past five years.

Let the government make an immediate start on the island causeway. Let the Chignecto project be put under way. Let it give more substantial aid to our provincial governments. Let it grant tax rebates to industries which locate there. Let local public works projects such as those I have just mentioned be put under way immediately.

Our people do not want more promises from the government; they do not want any more royal commissions to study problems. They are asking for some bread on the table and for the right and the opportunity for the head of the family to earn a living. What we want is to be on the same level, economically, as the other provinces in the nation. We simply want a place in the sun, as first class citizens.

(Text):

The great majority of the Canadian people, 63 per cent of them, showed on June 18 that they had no confidence in the present administration. In New Brunswick we doubled the number of our Liberal seats, and now that we know the truth we shall do even better in the next election, which I hope will come soon.

During the election campaign the government succeeded in hiding the financial crisis Canada was in, and government spokesmen were telling the people, as I said before, that the economy was booming. On June 14 the Prime Minister stated this on television:

> We have bared the record. We have concealed nothing. We have shaded nothing.

Those of us who held the opposite view were called prophets of doom and gloom. Yet, on June 24, six short days after the election, the Prime Minister was forced to go back before that same television screen and finally tell the people the truth, disclosing the financial crisis which he had been hiding and announcing his austerity program thereby creating, for the first time in modern Canadian history, as I believe was said yesterday, extra taxation and legislation by television. On that ground alone, on the ground of having concealed the truth, the Prime Minister has lost the confidence of the nation.

Duly elected members of this house, whatever their political affiliations may be, have a moral duty not to support what is contrary to our Canadian principles. Last night we all saw what took place, a strange and fantastic alliance coming together, the Social Credit members to my left and the social debit members to my front. If those two go on sleeping together too often they will lose what is left of their respective reputations.

Another breach of our most sacred parliamentary rights was the refusal to call parliament into session as soon as feasible after the election. This should have been done, first to seek a vote of confidence from the house and, second, to advise the house as to what position this government intended to take at the commonwealth conference.

I submit that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) took the narrow view at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. He failed to adapt his mind to a changing world. He took the old line Conservative approach when the world was crying for broad, modern Liberal thinking.

The free nations of Europe for the first time in modern history are trying to unite themselves for their common good. They are succeeding. The common market is the first step in the ultimate goal which is one free Europe united in peace and prosperity. Who are we, or who does the Prime Minister think he is, to sail across the seas and to wave the red flag of the past in an effort to stop the traffic of the future?

This is the second half of the twentieth century, yet our present Canadian government would have us chained and shackled to trade patterns which were obsolete even before they were born.

To be sure, we want to keep the commonwealth alive; but we want a progressive and prosperous Great Britain, and Great Britain cannot, in my humble opinion, become progressive and prosperous outside the common market. It is obvious to any mind—that is, to any mind which can accept and digest reform—that once the common market walls go up around free Europe, the "tight little island" will be left behind and miss her opportunity to soar into the future with her prosperous neighbours. It is our duty to help Great Britain join the new club. We don't want to be tied to her apron strings, yet we don't want to be her ball and chain. Great Britain's entry into the twentieth century club will ensure her prosperity and at the same time will provide us with a prosperous market for our exports.

Above all, Great Britain's entry would satisfy us that the British experience in democracy can become a cornerstone in the new building. The free nations of Europe could use some of the stability and political maturity of English statesmen who were born in the shade of Westminster and brought up by the mother of parliaments.

To help Great Britain into the common market should be our first aim. Our second purpose should be to secure for us, for Canada, closer economic ties with the European economic community.

We already have NATO, thanks to the broad approach of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a real man of vision. Why does not the present administration wake up and sponsor a new form of North Atlantic Treaty Organization to deal with the present challenge? Why not organize all the nations of the Atlantic area, not into a market but into a super market? Perhaps the present antiquated Conservative administration is not aware that over the past few years the supermarket has replaced the corner grocery store. The corner grocery store is still handy after hours, and perhaps on Sundays, but the price is better and the price is more varied at the supermarkets. In the days of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and in the days of the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, when our present leader, (Mr. Pearson) was secretary of state for external affairs, Canada had a strong and persuasive voice in the councils of the world. Canada was not only the link between Great Britain and the United States; she was also the leader of all the small powers of the world. Our then secretary of state for external affairs was accepted as one of the world leaders whose advice and good common sense was sought by all. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, as I look across to the opposite side of this house I see no further material for the Nobel peace prize.

In the speech from the throne I saw nothing which could add even an idea to the international field. From the point of view of foreign affairs, as well as from the point of view of national affairs, it was an empty speech.

The world around us is changing and changing fast. The United States of America have elected a new, young, dynamic president. The modern nations of Europe have united to form a common market and are forging ahead, but our present leaders are standing still. They have nothing to offer; their sole ambition is to hang on to their seats.

The plane is flying in all directions and they fasten their safety belts while asking the taxpayers to tighten their austerity belts. So we are all belting in a state of fantastic confusion.

I submit that the speech from the throne is nothing but a makeshift arrangement, a loose gimmick in order that the Social Crediters may support the government and still save their faces. So these 30 printed money boys who were lions on the hustings during the campaign have become story tellers talking about rabbits, monkeys, worms and little dogs who have lost their way. They have two leaders—a leader and a co-leader. Now they have found a third leader, an old social debit fox who also lost his way and who soon will lose his power as well.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, if all the members of the group I mentioned earlier are satisfied with the austerity program, I, for one, prefer much more such prosperity as has been described by our leader, Mr. Pearson, in the splendid speech he made last Monday.

The positive program of Liberal prosperity can alleviate unemployment. The hazy austerity program of the Conservative can only aggravate the situation.

On behalf of the large families in my riding, I mention with joy the intention of the leader of the Liberal party, when he is prime minister, to extend until the age of 21 the family allowances to the children still in school.

As far as I am concerned, I should also advocate an increase in family allowances proportionate to the pace of the national economic development.

Mr. Gregoire: Where are you going to get the money? You did not have any in 1957.

Mr. Dube: Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks, may I repeat how grateful I am to the voters of my constituency and assure them that I shall work without respite in this house to defend their interests, for the benefit of the country.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to wish you a good deal of patience and courage in front of the group of members in this house.

I should also like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who managed to call forth a rather extraordinary eloquence and enthusiasm in spite of a meaningless speech from the throne. They certainly showed great virtuosity in their performance.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to congratulate the two Social Credit leaders of Canada, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), because they gave the house a lesson in practical solutions. After hearing all those speeches, I am still convinced that they are the only ones who have brought us concrete and positive answers to the problems that face us today. Once again, I extend to them my sincere congratulations.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish you to know that since I have been here, both in this house and elsewhere in Ottawa, I have been able to notice that all those I have met, from all sides of the house, have been extremely kind and considerate towards us. We thank them and wish to tell them beforehand that the battle we shall fight here will not be against men as individual persons, it will be a struggle for certain principles, for certain ideas which we shall uphold in this parliament the same way as we upheld them before the voters in the last election campaign.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house only a few days and I strongly feel that the old parties, and the socialists as well, are so wrapped up in the dust of routine and political manoeuvring that I am more and more convinced that it is not from them that we may expect the solution to our problems and the cure for the economic crisis we are now going through.

After the defeat of the Liberal party, in 1957, the ex-prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, imputed it on the fact that they had kept away from the people. Looking at the way the house is made up today, I must say that things have not changed. The Liberal party has not gone nearer the people.

When I see today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), the leader of the Liberal party, in this very House of Commons of the federal parliament, sitting right next to the director of a chartered bank, before the whole nation, I can only suggest that the Liberal party, not only has not drawn nearer to the people, but has gone nearer to the financial world, which is the best way to go further away from the people.

To be near the people, one must start by drawing away from the financial interests which have always exploited the people, for the people never get but their crumbs.

Oh, I have heard the famous plea made by the director of a chartered bank, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who has very ably protected the interests of his masters in this house. Besides, I am convinced that he has nothing to lose, for when his constituents find out that he is betraying them for the benfit of the financiers, the financiers will give him the reward he will have earned.

Mr. Speaker, reference was made to the trickery of the Social Credit leaders, and the voice putting forward that view in this house is that of the member for Laurier, who, when he blames the Social Credit members for being deceitful and claims to base his views on serious economists, is in direct contradiction of the economists of the country and even of those of the Liberal party. For while the hon. member for Laurier claims that the chartered banks do not create money and credit in the country, the economists of the Liberal party themselves state quite the opposite. And to quote only a few, I will mention first of all the ex-provincial secretary of the Liberal federation of Quebec, Mr. Rene Tremblay, who has squarely and categorically admitted in front of the people, on television, that money and credit are created by chartered banks in our country.

The hon. member for Laurier will still have something to learn from the economists of his party, unless he prefers to grovel before those who control finance, his colleagues.

The Liberals, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Shawinigan.

Mr. Gregoire: The Liberals—Shawinigan. It is nevertheless the Liberal party which enabled private industries to set up in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Gregoire.]

The Liberals, with their 56 fine promises, who during 22 years had the chance to fulfil them—

An hon. Member: That's it.

Mr. Gregoire: —what have they done? They wore the seat of their pants threadbare on parliament's benches.

The people threw them out in 1957. But over a period of 22 years, they never agreed to give us a national flag. Since they have been sitting in the opposition—

An hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Gregoire: To top it all, they promise two flags. Please note: two.

When the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal party, came into my constituency during the last election campaign to make speeches, which changed nothing, I myself had the opportunity of hearing him promise "distinct" flags and not "distinctive" flags.

Gentlemen, will you try to explain to us what that means "distinct and not distinctive".

These people, who never promised any flags now promise two. And they talk about hypocrisy. But where are the hypocrites?

They call us—as the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dube) did a moment ago—story tellers. But who told tales to the people for 22 years, if not the Liberals?

They are responsible for the economic crisis we are currently going through, even though the Conservatives have shown their utter incapacity to remedy it.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party is not the only one in the wrong, both old parties are. You can put them both in the same pot, stir a little and you will never be able to say which is which when they come out.

Besides, for two years it has been said that the Liberals and the socialists look much alike. I noticed that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), while he sits among the Liberals, can still support the same creed he was supporting when he was in the socialist group. Therefore, I feel that the only difference is in the seating arrangements; on all other points there are no differences.

An hon. Member: May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid of questions, I will use the last five minutes of my time to reply to hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to find that the present government, the administration which is still temporarily in office—one must admit it—is so blind that it is not aware that the present restrictive measures constitute a policy of austerity. It is sufficient to notice what is going on in this country, that is the stoppage of work and expansion of our country, to become convinced that we are fully in a period of austerity.

The best advice I can give the government is to open its eyes wide before it is too late and to apply advices and suggestions willingly given him by the Social Crediters, not to get notoriety but in the interest of the population, since we are all here to serve and not to play politics.

Perhaps in creating so many royal commissions, the Prime Minister hopes that some day he may need enough commissioners to give work to all the unemployed. However I doubt it very much.

When one stops to think of the numerous committees, royal commissions, statistics bureaus, investigation committees which have been set up across the country, one would think that the members were sent here by their constituents in order to study on school benches as children do.

That is not what the people want, Mr. Speaker. What the people expect of us, of all of those who are gathered in this house, is not consideration but action. They want definite steps to be taken in order to halt the present crisis and solve our problems. That is what our constituents expect of us.

If the government in power has nothing to offer, they should accept our proposals. Some will say that those are simple-minded answers, but then, some people get lost in problems, such as the member for Laurier did this morning when he attempted to explain the workings of Social Credit.

Indeed, had I not known my way around in politics I would have wondered, after hearing him explain Social Credit as he did, what the Social Credit thinking actually is.

He fashioned his own; it is easier to knock down. What is the reason for that? Because he never even took the trouble to study what is Social Credit.

He would rather have his own opinion of it because his objective is not a healthy administration but the destruction of the other political parties and the pushing forward of his own instead of welcoming the suggestions of others. At such time he chooses to run down instead of welcoming real solutions.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition himself—and on that account we must believe that Social Credit is not all bad—the Leader of the Opposition himself, in his three and a half hour speech so lengthy and so dull, managed to be interesting for five minutes while dealing with some aspects of Social Credit.

An hon. Member: Who established family allowances?

Mr. Gregoire: I will deal with that during the last five minutes of my speech. At any rate, family allowances should have been raised, but it is the taxes which go up instead. You take money from one individual to give it to another. You may give $6 in family allowances but you take back $10 in taxes. Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Who instituted family allowances?

Mr. Gregoire: —the Leader of the Opposition has seen fit to refer to several points of the Social Credit platform, amongst others family allowances to Canadians, from the ages of 16 to 21, who continue their studies.

An hon. Member: It was a Liberal government which established family allowances.

Mr. Gregoire: However, it has been part of our platform for a long while.

We have been recommending the establishment of a municipal loans agency for 20 years. When they were in power, the Liberals did nothing about that. But, have you noticed, Mr. Speaker, that when the Liberals make promises like that, nobody gets up to say: "Where are you going to get the money?" No, no one bothers. Do you know why? Because everybody knows perfectly well that the Liberals will never keep their promises; they have never kept any promise.

An hon. Member: We have always kept our promises.

Mr. Gregoire: There is a member, Mr. Speaker, to whom we shall soon send a cork so that he may plug his jug.

An hon. Member: I have one for you.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, it is the same thing for all the promises made to the people during the electoral campaign.

An hon. Member: Hail Hitler—

Mr. Gregoire: —but we are not going to deprive the people of what little they have and to take their earnings away from them by means of taxes. Now the people are not much better off. The government makes paupers out of them, and then gives them a little more, but in the long run, it amounts to about the same. Social Credit would instead bring the Bank of Canada to reason.

I know that this will not please too much those who, in this house, speak in defence of the chartered banks. But, in so doing, the Bank of Canada will have control of money and credit in our country instead of the chartered banks, which will be unable then to set the purchasing power according to their whims, because from then on it will be set according to logic, according to the production, according to the work of the people. In that way, when our people will have worked hard to produce, they will be able to buy what they have produced.

Mr. Speaker, I went around the beautiful riding of Lapointe, last June 18, to meet my constituents. To all of them, I asked this question "What do you expect from us in parliament?" What do you want us to do for you? And the reply was unanimous. Besides, I am convinced that if each one of us visited his constituency, he would get the same answer: what we want is work; what we want is a solution to the unemployment problem; what we want is work for our people so that they may earn their living honourably in Canada, a country which is overloaded with wealth and which is able to provide a living for everyone.

Mr. Speaker, for those reasons, and since it is the people's wish, we, the Social Credit members, are asking without any political partisanship that the government introduce in Canada a vast public works program, a program which, from coast to coast, will serve to attune this country to the rhythm that twentieth century progress can allow.

There are hospitals, colleges, universities, bridges, roads and several other things that should be built. And yet, even if we have the necessary materials to build all those things, even if we have the steel, the labour and the engineers, even if we have the asphalt, the bricks, the plaster etc. for all that, our government seems to prefer to leave our people unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, we suggest there is a way of carrying out those projects while leaving at the same time the provinces free to act in their own areas. But the government should then see to it that the Bank of Canada becomes, not only the bank of the central government, but also the bank of the provinces and of the municipalities, in other words, the bank of the whole people, so that the provinces may secure from the Bank of Canada interest-free loans to carry out those projects which are essential to our country; this not only will enrich our people, but will also contribute the development of their security and their freedom.

Mr. Speaker, there are many projects which should be carried out at the federal, provincial, municipal and school board levels. But strange as it seems, the governments nearer to the people, those with the most urgent works to carry out, are precisely those with the least income, while the central government, which is farther away from the people, grabs the largest share of the taxes. The municipal government, the most important one as far as the private individual is concerned, the one closest to him, the one which has to build streets, waterworks, maintain fire and police departments, carry out maintenance work, is the one with the fewest sources of income.

The federal government's responsibilities towards the private citizen are much smaller, less important. And, what matters even more, the government which is closest to the private citizen, while it has many projects to carry out, does not have the money to perform the work. Why not let him go to the Bank of Canada, or to the municipal development bank, to try and secure an interest-free loan so that it may build the things it needs.

When you see a municipal council holding a meeting and ratepayers asking the mayor, the aldermen, for a road, a street to be paved, a sewer to be built, a water system to be installed, not a single alderman raises his hand to ask where the asphalt, the machinery, the engineers are to come from. None of them puts that question. All raise their hands to ask where to get money to build this road or these waterworks.

The same thing happens at the provincial level. There are delegations coming to meet the minister of health to request the building of a hospital which is needed so that sick people can be cared for locally. What is the government's answer? We have no money. Always the same answer. If, instead of being asked to build a hospital, these people were asked to build a bank to pile up dollars in it; would it be different? That is the whole thing: no funds.

Mr. Speaker, upon careful reflection, we wonder why, if we have men smart enough to ensure the progress that we witness today and to invent the machines used to develop our country as it is nowadays, why those very men are completely unable to attune our monetary system to the present realities, to changing conditions.

That is important today, Mr. Speaker. We know that our engineers have discovered amazing production techniques. Our people have courage and are willing to work, but something is lacking: this token, this little note which will allow them to achieve economically what is physically possible.

An hon. Member: I am going to cry.

Mr. Gregoire: I heard a member say he is on the verge of crying. If I were he, I would weep at the thought of the foolishness and stupidity of the system under which this country is carrying on at present. Unemployment and poverty are rampant while means to ensure its prosperity lie dormant.

I remember very well the election campaign of 1957 when the Liberals travelled throughout the country kissing babies and saying that Canada was a rich country.

If the country is rich, why are the Canadian people poor? Where is the country's prosperity to be found?

Pay a visit to the homes of your constituents. Go and see them. Maybe you would find it embarrassing to do so. That may be the reason why you do not know what is going on. Go and see your constituents. Do not give previous notice of your visit through the papers that the hon. member for Laurier or a member for some other riding will be paying a visit to his constituents, because they will hasten to spread out the silverware, dress the children in their Sunday best, and wash the dishes. But if you go unannounced, you will see that the prosperity the Liberal leader was talking about in 1957 is not to be found in Canadian homes.

When boasting about the system we have to bear, Mr. Speaker, they tell us that there are engineers, scientists, and citizens who try to produce in quantity. But it may be recalled that five, 10 or 15 years ago, subsidies were paid to cut down pork production. Two dollars were awarded for stopping each little pig from being born. I advise you, who are going to lose out in the next appeal to the people, to set yourself up in that trade. With $2 for each little pig which is not bred, if you have some ambition, and refrain from breeding 20,000 a year, you may retire from business.

Those are stories about little pigs to add to the tales about monkeys and dogs. That means that inspiration is sought in that area.

Mr. Speaker, when, in spite of a huge production, and in spite of stocking up commodities our people are still in distress, some people keep telling us yet that there is no lack of buying power, but only of the capacity to buy. The proof, it is said, is that people are buying. But we are not told about it, and the hon. member for Laurier also forgot to tell us this morning, because it fits into his pattern that things would go that way, that people would buy on instalment plans, and be exploited by finance companies jointly with the chartered banks. People keep on buying furniture and other similar items and paying twice the price, because they are forced to resort to instalment buying, which is an exploitation of the public with the co-operation of the chartered banks.

We shall also be told—and I was surprised to see how many there are in this house who always have pressing and urgent questions to ask as soon as the house meets and begin to speak about foreign markets, and the necessity to find some outlets here and there. Mr. Speaker, here is a good piece of advice, a good suggestion for the government: if they only turned to the Canadian market, to the Canadian consumers, I am convinced that if they tried as hard to develop the Canadian market as they did to find foreign markets, is is not only one, two or three billion dollars that would be added to our sales revenues, but $20 and $25 billion. That increase in our sales on the Canadian market would be possible if the citizens of Canada were given the necessary purchasing power to buy our Canadian products.

Mr. Speaker, during those few minutes, there may have been a few brief humorous digressions, but let us analyse the following point which summarizes almost everything: We are not here merely to talk, we are here to take action.

But what action? In the interests of the people. We are 265 who have been elected from all over Canada to come here and safeguard the interests of the people. For once, let us think of the people. Let us think of the worker, of the farmer, of the small businessman, of the small contractor, of our population as a whole. Let us ask ourselves what the people want: is it a healthy régime where Canadians will be able to benefit from the richness of the country, which God has given us in His bounty and which Canadian citizens, have, by their intelligence, abundantly developed.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time having expired, I call on the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, after listening to all of the forceful eloquence of the past few days I almost hesitate to rise at this time, but I do wish to make a few observations particularly with respect to the omissions of the Leader of the Opposition in outlining the policies of the Grit party. Before doing this, however, I should like to follow the time honoured tradition of this house in offering my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their speeches reflected a great deal of credit to themselves and honour to their constituencies. At this time, sir, I should like also, on behalf of hon. members from my province, to offer our congratulations to you on the position you now hold in this house. You, too, sir, have brought honour to our province.

During the course of this debate we have noticed the omissions from policy statements expressed by those who oppose us. I was particularly interested in the wild appeal by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who displayed rather a lack of caution in making the remarks he made. One thing that did disturb me, and I think this came from at least two corners of the Liberal party, was the statement that it was incredible that 50 members could obstruct the work of a government which had a majority or a membership of 200. I would remind them that the only way 200 members could impose their will upon 50 members would be by imposing closure and by restricting debate. If what they have said means that they are going to impose their will on the house, then we know what to expect in the unlikely event the Liberals are re-elected.

I do want to deal with this matter that has been omitted by the Leader of the Opposition, and that is the question of agriculture. I should like to put on the record, since the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) failed to do so, the policy of the Grit party. It was a rather interesting experience to watch the hon. member for Assiniboia. I recall the time he joined in marriage with the Liberals earlier this year, a blushing bride expecting to live in the lap of luxury. Since that time, however, the honeymoon has been long over. We find that, much to the dismay of the hon. member I am sure, he is being called upon to wash the dirty laundry. This was what he was called upon to do the other day. The Leader of the Opposition failed to make any mention of agriculture for the plain and simple reason that hon. members opposite have no agricultural policy.

An hon. Member: Wrong again.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member was thrown into the breach during the election campaign because the Liberals had failed to come up with anything resembling an agricultural policy. They felt that by simply bringing in the hon. member for Assiniboia, they could win the west. However, this did not prove to be the case. The hon. member was pretty well restricted to the boundaries of his own constituency and barely succeeded in returning to this house. However, we welcome him and are looking forward to his participation in the debates in the days to come.

This afternoon, I should like to outline, not the policy of this party because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) is going to do that, but to correct the omissions of hon. members opposite and reveal, in their true form, the policies that were enunciated by the Liberal party in their agriculture pamphlet. I am reading here from the Winnipeg Free Press and I am sure this is an accurate report of the Liberal party platform. I did not get a copy of their policy statement but I am sure it is correctly revealed in this item. One of the first statements that is made in outlining the agricultural policy is that they are going to expand Canada's efforts to expand farm products. I wonder precisely what this means?

What has been the reaction of the Liberal party to the efforts that have been made by this government to export farm products? What was their attitude on the China grain sale, and particularly the attitude of the hon. member for Assiniboia? What has been the reaction to the efforts of this Minister of Agriculture to find markets for Canadian agriculture products? One would have thought, from listening to these people in this debate and on the hustings throughout the years we have been the government party, that nothing had been achieved in the field of agriculture. They choose to ignore completely the things that have been done. Indeed, they have even prevented their own members from learning the true facts of agriculture policy. Just a few days ago this was illustrated when one hon. member of the Liberal party asked when his government was going to extend crop insurance to the eastern farmers.

Mr. Argue: When are you going to do it in the west? You have not done it either place.

Mr. Jorgenson: Now, the hon. member interrupts as is his nature. He knows quite well that the Leader of the Opposition stated when they implement their policy they are going to do so in co-operation with the provinces; yet the hon. member sits in his seat, does not rise, and says, when are you going to do it? He would wish us to impose a system of crop insurance on the provinces when he knows full well the details of this crop insurance policy. If the hon. member will just contain himself for just a moment—

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Argue: Would the hon. member say when the federal government is going to sign the crop insurance agreement which Manitoba signed last May?

Mr. Starr: Watch that you do not lose your seat next time.

Mr. Jorgenson: I think he is getting all agitated because he fears that the policies of the party he represents are going to be revealed. I do not blame him for getting that way.

Mr. Argue: Manitoba signed an agreement in May. You have not signed it yet.

Mr. Jorgenson: You had an opportunity to make your own speech.

Mr. Argue: What about the Manitoba crop insurance agreement signed by that province last May?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Robinson: Take your medicine.

Mr. Starr: You will not be here next time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Jorgenson: He interjects because he knows well what the policy is, what the agreement is.

Mr. Argue: But you will not sign it.

Mr. Jorgenson: Manitoba has a program of crop insurance based on the provisions of the federal agricultural policy in the federal crop insurance program, and he knows full well it is up to the individual provinces to develop this program.

Mr. Argue: This is the re-insurance agreement.

Mr. Jorgenson: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned the re-insurance program because over there is a group of people who refused to do anything about crop insurance. It is this government which put crop insurance on the statute books, and this government is going to expand and develop that program. They talk as though that program was not in existence. Indeed this was reflected in one of the hon. members opposite asking if there was such a program and, if there was, were we going to extend it to the eastern provinces.

Mr. Starr: They never heard of it.

Mr. Jorgenson: That is typical of the way in which they have completely refused to take into consideration the things that have been done. The world stopped for them on June 10, 1957.

As the second item in their policy they say they are going to provide farmers with information on markets. Well, it was just a short while ago that the Minister of Agriculture outlined the program he was contemplating in doing this precise thing; but when it came up in the estimates the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who was then their spokesman for agriculture, criticized the minister's efforts in expanding the work of the information division to provide information on markets, to provide the precise thing that the hon. member opposite now seeks.

An hon. Member: That was political information he was talking about.

Mr. Jorgenson: Political information? I wonder what type of information hon. members opposite would distribute.

Mr. Argue: Yours is mainly about the birds and the bees.

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate opposed that effort and criticized the expenditures that were going to be involved in providing this information. I just wonder who is the official spokesman for hon. members opposite.

The third point in their policy is that they are going to establish an independent research council to improve consultation between federal and provincial agricultural departments and all farm organizations. I would like them to tell me how, in heaven's name, this council would be independent if they are going to set it up. They have completely forgotten the fact that such a council was set up and is now in operation. Yes, indeed, the world stopped for them in 1957. The council that has been set up was as a result of the initiative taken by the minister of agriculture from Manitoba. All organizations and levels of government are involved in it. One of the greatest problems confronting the council was to ensure that it retained its independence, and I can assure you that had hon. members opposite been given the responsibility for setting it up it would certainly be anything but independent.

Their platform, or what passes for a platform, reminds me of the first step on a streetcar. It is not meant to stand on; just to get in on. Certainly what we have seen of Liberal agricultural policies as outlined in this pamphlet would indicate the hollowness of their proposals.

They have said they would expand Canada's efforts to improve water conservation and encourage the growth of industries in local communities. What do they suppose was the purpose for which the ARDA legislation was passed? One would think they had never heard of it.

Mr. Argue: How many water development projects have been undertaken under ARDA to date? None.

Mr. Jorgenson: The Leader of the Opposition said that the policies they would implement would be in co-operation with the provinces, but he knows full well that the provinces are currently working on their programs.

Mr. Argue: Yes, but you are not. That is the whole trouble.

Mr. Starr: You never heard of ARDA until it was introduced.

Mr. Jorgenson: The speech made by the hon. member for Assiniboia was dealt with very well by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) last night, and I do not intend to deal with it in much detail. The speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia contained absolutely nothing about the agricultural proposals of his party.

Mr. Argue: You are wrong, all wrong.

Mr. Jorgenson: If he mentioned one thing that could be construed as a constructive proposal, then I would like to hear it.

Mr. Argue: Do you want to hear it now?

An hon. Member: You had your chance.

Mr. Jorgenson: He mentioned something about the Grit party providing $2 a bushel for No. 1 wheat based at Fort William.

Mr. Argue: A floor.

Mr. Jorgenson: The farmers would be guaranteed $2 a bushel.

Mr. Argue: A floor.

Mr. Jorgenson: This is not what they said during the election campaign.

Mr. Argue: You are wrong again.

Mr. Jorgenson: "...$2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, Fort William." Read it in Hansard.

Mr. Argue: A floor.

Mr. Jorgenson: He guaranteed $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat for three years. He said it a second time.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order. The parliamentary secretary is deliberately misinterpreting my remarks. I said that this policy was a $2 floor and there would be a parity price for domestic wheat above the floor.

[Mr. Jorgenson.]

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Jorgenson: I know it is not a point of order but I am glad the hon. member has raised it because it gives me a chance to quote from Hansard. At page 166 of Hansard for October 3, the hon. member is reported as saying:

> The policy of the Liberal party to guarantee $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern for three years is a good policy and a necessary policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a floor.

Mr. Jorgenson: There is nothing in Hansard about a floor.

Mr. Argue: Then you will not accept the word of an hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is a guarantee if it is not a floor?

Mr. Argue: You guaranteed $1.50 as an initial price. That is 50 cents less. That is what you guaranteed.

An hon. Member: Ask the farmers what they are getting.

Mr. Argue: That was your guarantee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. gentleman take his seat please? The exchange has become so audible that it is hard to tell whether the hon. member for Assiniboia is making the speech, or the hon. parliamentary secretary. I think opportunities will arise in the ordinary course of debates during the session to go further into these matters. That should be the philosophy applied by the hon. member for Assiniboia and I would ask his co-operation.

Mr. Jorgenson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now for the records. I am going to point out —and I am sure the farmers will be interested in knowing—what this $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern, based at Fort William, means to them in dollars and cents. From the records of the Canadian wheat board's annual report I shall give certain information which I am sure is also available to the hon. member for Assiniboia. First of all, the final price given to producers in the year 1956-57 was $1.58. That leaves a difference of 42 cents. There were 230,854 permit holders that year and there was a total production of 1,565,907 bushels of No. 1 wheat which represent .43 per cent of the total volume of wheat. If hon. members figure this out they will find that as a result of this policy each farmer would have received $2.84. This is the policy which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) now advances as a member of the Liberal party. At the time the farmers marched down here the same hon. member wanted to give them $1,500. A little while later when he was sitting over in the corner, he called a payment of $2 peanuts. Today, $2.84 is enough. In 1957-58, the total amount received by each farmer would have been $1.38. In 1958-59 it would have been $6.73, and in 1959-60, $3.90. In 1960-61 it would have been $7.02, making a total in five years of $21.87 per farmer or an average of $4.37. This is the policy which is being advocated by the Liberal party in support of wheat prices for the western farmer.

Mr. Argue: That is a completely false statement.

Mr. Jorgenson: Well, all the hon. member has to do is to consult the wheat board records and figure it out for himself. It surely cannot be beyond his capacity.

An hon. Member: Diefenbaker mathematics.

Mr. Jorgenson: They are my own. This is the figure—$4.37.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are those ninety cent dollars?

Mr. Jorgenson: There speaks the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who, every time he rises, tries to convince the house that he is a wit. He has only half convinced me.

Well, the opposition has a policy. Its policy is to have the Liberal candidates in the west try to convince farmers out there that this government is doing everything for the east and nothing for them. Then the Liberal candidates in eastern Canada try to tell the voters that everything is being done by this government for the western farmers at the expense of the east. It is the old policy of divide and rule—the old trick used by the Liberals over the years. They have chosen to ignore or belittle what has been done by this government in the field of agriculture. In addition, they carry on a program of vituperation and vilification against members of the cabinet and, in particular, against the Prime Minister. By behaviour of this kind they hope to convince the people of Canada that they are worthy—

Mr. Pickersgill: Cry baby boys.

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as is his custom, makes most of his comments from the seat of his pants. One would think from their quality that that is precisely whence they emanate.

Mr. Pearson: I suppose that is not dealing with personalities—that is statesmanlike.

Mr. Jorgenson: In the course of this debate the hon. member for Assiniboia has been defending policies, I presume on behalf of the Liberal party, which would have the result of assisting those who least need assistance. The deficiency payment proposal so strongly advocated by the hon. member would have had the effect of helping the farmers who at least need assistance. We recall that when the hon. member belonged to the old C.C.F. group which used to sit over in that corner of the house he expressed great concern for the family farm and for the small farmer.

Mr. Argue: I still do.

Mr. Jorgenson: Nevertheless, he sits now and associates himself with those opposite. He has deserted the farmer who needs help—the small farmer and the man who is attempting to establish himself—by advocating and supporting policies which would have the net result of assisting the large farmers who need help least. Mr. Speaker, have you ever seen a greater manifestation of sanctimonious hypocrisy than that exhibited by hon. members opposite?

Mr. Argue: Let us not forget the coalition.

Mr. Jorgenson: During the course of this debate, the Minister of Agriculture will have an opportunity of dealing with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I wanted merely to put on record the essence of what constitutes Liberal policy since hon. members opposite are ashamed to do so themselves, and for a very good reason. They have never been concerned with the problems of agriculture and they have demonstrated this time and time again. They have followed the tactics of running around poking farmers in the ribs and saying: "You look well fed." Instead of making vigorous efforts to sell grain their attitude has been: "If they want it, they know where they can come and get it." They have not changed. They are the same old bunch. As long as they remain over there they can do no harm. The people of western Canada know this, and are prepared to keep them precisely over there on the benches opposite.

Mr. Allan J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be words of sincere congratulation to yourself on the high position you occupy. I wish you well as you cultivate those heroic virtues which are required in that high office. I wish also to associate myself with the remarks made by other hon. members in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply. I think they set a standard that many of us wish to emulate.

This is the third parliament which I have attended as the representative of the electors of the constituency of Inverness-Richmond and I wish to acknowledge with gratitude the confidence they have shown in sending me to the House of Commons. No man is more responsible for my return to the House of Commons than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who, as leader of the Liberal party, has striven mightily and successfully to put the Liberal party in a position to provide an alternative to the present truncated ministry.

The Leader of the Opposition has served his country in war and peace with nobility of spirit and great distinction and it is surprising to me that this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) should have developed the line he did. Is the Leader of the Opposition or any other member of the House of Commons to keep silent when the mistakes and follies of this government lower Canada's reputation and tarnish her good name?

Is the Leader of the Opposition to remain silent when the relations of Canada with other friendly countries are worsened because of the conduct of ministers? Are these men who identify themselves, even as a minority government, with Canada to be immune from criticism? How vain and thinskinned can you get? This morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs complained of smearing; and this from a gentleman who, in a speech in Vancouver, suggested, or hinted or implied, that Premier Khrushchev was working for the Liberals in the last election, from one who, with his colleagues, dared to attack our party and its leader by saying that we wished to ruin our country if we could not rule it. A man who has said that should step silently and softly when he talks about defamation.

Mr. Speaker, I want to bring the house back for a moment to the night of June 18. On that night the people of Canada rendered their verdict on the conduct of the present government. The issues had been presented to the people of Canada in a long and vigorous election campaign. The results are evident: the government was defeated at the polls, it lost the confidence of the majority of Canadians, and it suffered the greatest haemorrhage of government supporters in the history of Canada. Even though the government was demoralized, even though it had lost the confidence of the people of Canada, the government had to carry on. The Queen's government must go on. The very first thing, so we are told, that the government had to face was a crisis in foreign exchange of major proportions. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the actions of the government on previous occasions and its wrong policies were responsible for that exchange crisis. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) told us last night that it was a minority government that caused the run on the dollar. Well, that is a new theory which will be added to the theory on international exchanges; a theory on the same level of sophistication as the view that sun spots cause depressions.

The government was faced with this exchange crisis and it took action. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in a statement to the people of Canada stated that action was necessary to save the dollar. Action was taken and embodied in an order in council which the Prime Minister said was within limits approved by parliament; that he was acting with authority given to him by parliament. The order in council that put into effect sweeping emergency measures rests on two statutes: the Customs Tariff and the Financial Administration Act. One part of the order in council removes the application of the British preferential and intermediate tariffs and accordingly raises the level of tariffs to the general tariff. The second part of the order in council utilizes the Financial Administration Act to relieve individuals in the country from the operation of the first part of the order in council.

Does anybody, Mr. Speaker, in his right mind believe that the statutes on which this order in council is founded were intended to allow a government to take extraordinary and sweeping action to avert a further depletion of Canada's reserves? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) very properly questioned yesterday the legality of this order in council. I am not a lawyer and I certainly do not intend to argue the legality or the illegality of the order in council. But I will say that the government was certainly straining very hard when it chose these two statutes upon which to base this particular sweeping measure. We have had very impressive legal advice suggesting that this order in council is indeed illegal, and that all the regulations and activities carried on under the order in council are consequently illegal. We have had that opinion. The Minister of Justice said that it is completely legal. I do not want to argue that point, but I do want to say this, Mr. Speaker, that once the government had taken this emergency action embodied in an order in council, its first constitutional obligation was to bring parliament together, to bring the elected representatives of the people together, so that they could exercise their traditional and cherished rights of dealing with the taxation that is imposed upon them. Mr. Speaker, the government were obliged to call parliament together. We say that they should have called parliament at the earliest possible moment, even without a crisis, even without emergency and sweeping measures being taken. We say that surely, in the midst of a national emergency, the first obligation of a ministry that had lost the confidence of the Canadian people, that did not command a majority of the House of Commons, was to call parliament together and give the elected representatives of the people a chance to exercise their constitutional rights.

Mr. Speaker, in this country for over 100 years we have enjoyed the benefits of responsible government. We know that responsible government is not prescribed by any specific statute; rather it is a principle of the constitution that sustains and supports the statutes. In Great Britain, for example, since 1688 the responsibility of the ministers to parliament has been enforced by certain various specific legal requirements. The legal requirement or the constitutional requirement that concerns us now is the requirement that the ministers shall neither collect nor expend moneys without the expressed authorization of parliament. This requirement is of absolutely first rate importance to our democratic system, and that requirement was not fulfilled or lived up to by the present government. During the 17th century when the system under which we live was worked out in England there were doubts about parliament's absolute right in the field of taxation but all these were settled conclusively by a provision of the bill of rights of 1689 which declares as follows:

> Levying money for or to the use of the crown by pretence of prerogative without consent of parliament for longer time or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted is illegal.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this order in council which is now the basis for these sweeping measures has been put into effect by the government presuming to itself the pretence of a prerogative. We know that later on in the United Kingdom great deference to this principle is illustrated by a decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Attorney General v. Wilts United Dairies. In this case it was decided that the crown could not collect taxes under a statute which did not clearly and expressly confer on the crown that right. I ask hon. gentlemen if they will point to a single part of the statutes under which they are operating which clearly and expressly confers on the crown the authority which they presume in the order in council.

Professor Hood Phillips of Gray's Inn, in his standard work on "The Constitutional Law of Great Britain and the Commonwealth" has written as follows:

> It has been settled law since the early seventeenth century that the King in Council has no power to make laws for the realm except as a delegate of parliament. Perhaps the most significant application of this principle lies in the rule that no person or body other than parliament ... can raise taxes or spend public money, for it was round that issue of taxation that the earlier struggles between King and Parliament mostly raged.

Sir Erskine May, an authority frequently quoted in this house, makes the same point:

> The crown demands money, the Commons grant it, and the Lords assent to the grant: but the Commons do not vote money unless it be required by the crown; nor do they impose or augment taxes, unless such taxation be necessary for the public service, as declared by the crown through its constitutional advisers.

Another authority, namely Eric Taylor in his work "The House of Commons at Work", states as follows:

> Underlying all the financial procedure of the house are certain ancient maxims or rules, some of them the prize of centuries of struggle with the crown.

He then goes on to enumerate these maxims, and the first of them is as follows:

> (1) the granting of public money, and the imposing of taxation, is the function of parliament, not of the the Queen or the government.

This order in council which has not come before parliament—and we have no indication that it will come before parliament—collects and imposes taxation. May I end this reference to authorities by referring to a quotation from Edmund Burke on this point, referring to this struggle to establish this very principle, namely the right of parliament to impose taxation:

> They took infinite pains to inculcate as a fundamental principle, that in all monarchies, the people must in effect themselves, mediately or immediately, possess the power of granting their own money, or no shadow of liberty could subsist.

I suggest that the action taken by the cabinet through the sweeping measures in imposing taxation violates this fundamental constitutional principle as parliament has not been given any indication that it will have an opportunity to approve this action taken by the government.

If I may, I should like to refer to a Canadian illustration in order to indicate how jealous the House of Commons is of its right to collect money and impose taxation. In 1914, to deal with the emergencies of a great war, parliament enacted the War Measures Act. That act is still on the statute books of this country as our chief statutory provision for wars and insurrections. It permits the governor in council to do almost everything that the governor in council may deem necessary. Yet in 1939 an interdepartmental committee established to examine the effects of this War Measures Act found that under this act no government could impose taxation without the authorization of parliament.

This principle is very important because even under the War Measures Act the government cannot arrogate to itself the authority which it arrogated to itself under the order in council to which I have already referred. Yet the great defence of the procedure followed in this instance was to go back to 1947 and to say that the Liberal government of that day was obliged to impose sweeping measures as it did, that it imposed these measures under an order in council and that "We are doing the same thing; what is wrong with it?"

I wish to tell hon. members what my investigation has revealed concerning the procedure followed in 1947. It is true that Mr. Abbott on the radio made an announcement about these extraordinary measures. But in his speech, a copy of which I have before me, he has this to say:

> Now that the government's proposals have been announced, we propose to follow the usual budgetary practice of asking parliament—

I emphasize the words "of asking parliament".

> —to make them effective from the time of announcement, and taxes at the new rates will therefore be collected on all sales by manufacturers and on imports, beginning tomorrow morning.

In that announcement Mr. Abbott advised the Canadian people that he would be laying these measures before parliament at the earliest possible opportunity. Parliament met at the earliest possible opportunity, namely on December 5, 1947, and what do we find from the speech from the throne? We find these words:

> Provision of a temporary character has been made to conserve and supplement Canada's reserves of United States dollars.
> The measures recently announced to deal with the various aspects of the immediate foreign exchange difficulty will be submitted for your approval.

To parliament. That was in the speech from the throne. When parliament met the then prime minister, Mr. King, asked permission to interrupt the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to bring in these measures. The leaders of the other parties wanted to exercise their right to make speeches on the address in reply. This was on a Friday, I think, and Mr. King told the house that on the following Thursday Mr. Abbott would introduce those measures in the House of Commons so that parliament would have an opportunity to deal with the measures which Mr. Abbott had announced on the radio on November 17.

How different in this case. The Prime Minister in his statement on television on June 24 made no reference to submitting these measures to parliament, not a word, not a gesture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He said we should cool off.

Mr. MacEachen: He told us to cool off. Now we get the speech from the throne, and you can search it word by word and you will find not a single reference to an opportunity being provided to validate the action taken by the ministry. Is there any mention of legislation? Have we seen anything on the order paper? Nothing. That is the difference between the present action and the Liberal action in 1947. At that time the action was announced and parliament was brought together. We had a majority government then. We did not have a government depending upon the unstable whims of a minority group in the House of Commons; but that majority government brought the legislation to the House of Commons for approval.

What did hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party, some of whom are in the ministry today, say on that occasion even though Mr. Abbott had brought legislation into the house to validate his actions? Here is what one hon. gentleman, the present Prime Minister demanded to know of one minister on December 11, 1947. He said to the minister as found at page 189 of Hansard:

> Can he tell me in any country of an occasion where taxation has been imposed by a minister, by order in council?

That was the Prime Minister who asked that question in 1947 when he had an opportunity to debate and approve the action taken by the government. Later, as found on page 408 of Hansard of December 17, the present Prime Minister had this to say:

> Did something happen on November 17 that made it necessary for this government to depart from the time-honoured procedure of having parliament called together for the purpose of having budget proposals presented in a legal and constitutional form?

If the right hon. gentleman could make the welkin ring in 1947 when parliament was given an opportunity to debate a number of proposals, it is no wonder that hon. members of this house should feel outraged at the action of the government in not even intimating that we are going to have an opportunity to deal with these sweeping measures.

An hon. Member: King John.

Mr. MacEachen: I intend to place an amendment before the house, Mr. Speaker, so that the House of Commons will have an opportunity to declare itself on this fundamental constitutional issue, to declare whether commoners, members of the Canadian House of Commons, still have the constitutional right to impose taxation and collect moneys. I am moving this amendment at this stage after an amendment and subamendment have been disposed of on the basis of a precedent of this house in 1957. Therefore I am completely regular, I believe, in moving an amendment at this stage. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin):

> That the following be added to the address:
> "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that the failure of Your Excellency's advisers to place before this house at the earliest opportunity a measure to approve the collection of taxes which have been imposed by order in council, as part of the austerity program, denies to this house the exclusive constitutional right to approve the imposition of additional taxation which is the foundation of our system of responsible government."

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The hon. member for Royal.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, you will excuse my hesitancy in rising but as a new member I am not yet fully aware of all the machinations of this house. I am wondering why the last speaker could not save time by challenging the order in council in the courts if he is so positive about its illegality.

Mr. Pickersgill: Never mind about parliament.

Mr. Fairweather: After what happened in 1947 the Liberals should choke on the citations just quoted. It is particularly gratifying to me to represent the constituency of Royal because of the fact that for 25 years the government leader in the Senate served his people and New Brunswick as a fine representative of this constituency. The fact that I succeed him has made it doubly pleasant for me because of the residue of good will which still surrounds his name and his record of public service in this place. I also wish, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to your thoughtful yet fair guardianship of the rules of this house, without which it seems to me it could rapidly rival the tower of Babel of ancient times. The mover and seconder are now basking in an aura of well merited tribute for the manner in which they began this historic debate. May I, too, pay tribute to them.

Now, I have one other compliment I wish to pay, and it is to the former minister of justice. As a lawyer and a former provincial legislator I have had many opportunities of knowing his unique contribution to the better administration of justice in Canada. The national parole board, the new enlightened penal policy, including the establishment of minimum security facilities, are but one or two aspects of the forward looking reforms for which this country is the better. The justice ministry is not a popular portfolio in the fickle imagination of the public. Nevertheless, the Hon. Davie Fulton is entitled to recognition for the special qualities he brought to this department.

If I could classify and isolate a single impression, Mr. Speaker, after a week as a member of this house, it would have to be that words, and their ordinary plain meaning, are really not very ordinary, neither are they plain. They seem to take on shades and partisan connotations. Now, perhaps this is all very well in this house, although somehow I doubt it. But it does seem to me it makes our supposed dialogue with the public a bit complex. In addition, I am one of those who believe that words should be jealously treated.

May I illustrate this by reminding the house that during our Prime Minister's visit to London last month the Leader of the Opposition in a particularly unpatriotic and uncharacteristic way, said that Canada's attitude was little more than carping criticism. Then, in his speech on Tuesday last the Leader of the Opposition, among many other criticisms of Canada's stand in London, said that this government exhibited its peculiar genius for getting into unnecessary difficulty with its friends. In the Guardian of Manchester on September 12, the well known correspondent Patrick Keatley wrote this:

> The prime ministers and the presidents hurled verbal thunderbolts but they did it with courtesy, precision and a marked lack of excess emotion or phony histrionics.

In a lead editorial entitled "The Reality of Consultation" a few days later the same newspaper said:

> Mr. Macmillan has made a powerful case for British entry into the common market. Equally the commonwealth prime ministers have made a strong case for questioning the terms so far provisionally agreed in Brussels . . .

The editorial ends in this way:

> It is a little frightening that, in all the volume of British press comment and public discussion, there has been so little talk of the commonwealth's detailed anxieties. Rightly the government (of the U.K.) and much of the press have emphasized the gains to be won by British entry into Europe. Rightly, too, the risks of staying out have been recalled. But we must also listen to what the commonwealth says—and not just brush it aside as due to domestic politics or unreal fears. Not long ago Conservatives in this country (U.K.) complained because others were supposed to have advocated "unconditional" entry into Europe. Today, ironically, it is the government (of the U.K.) that would like a blind eye turned to these conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit this evidence of the effectiveness of our Prime Minister's contribution at London last month. The point of the conference, after all, was not just to join hands and sing patriotic airs but to see if Messrs. Heath and Macmillan could be forced to demand better terms at Brussels. After all, was this conference meant to be a sterile thing? Was there to be no frankness, no exchange of genuine points of view? For what it is worth, I happen to share the view expressed by the Canadian trade committee in its study of this subject entitled, "The Impact of European Integration on Canada." This is a most useful short statement prepared by Mr. Dana Wilgress.

It seems to me that Canada has, in fact, adopted the United States approach in facing the challenge on a regional basis. This will result in some form of trading area with the United States. The great legislative victory won by President Kennedy in the senate recently is good news for Canada and is recognized as such in this government. I think Canada is ready to accept the challenge and, as Mr. Wilgress wrote:

> This will involve many difficulties in making the adjustments that become necessary. The stimulus afforded by this necessity may make Canada a stronger nation and a nation better fitted to achieve its destiny.

But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, we must keep in mind that the common market means more than a united Europe the common market means a common tariff. Before that wall is built around Britain, surely Canada is entitled to some collective bargaining.

The throne speech contains three items that I have selected as being of special interest to the people of the Atlantic part of Canada. First, there is the fact that the program of rehabilitation and development of agricultural lands is proceeding actively and that we will be asked to provide funds for it. I am a great believer in the potential of ARDA. I think it is a great program, a great concept and, to use a word that has been abused in this house, I think it is concrete evidence of a great vision. My only concern is that up to now its potential has not been effectively put across to our farm people. The program should be talked about across this land with the zeal of an evangelist because its potential result could literally save rural Canada.

The national economic development board brings to Canada a pattern that is well established in western Europe, but may I suggest that it cannot work here without the voluntary support of labour and management. It also depends on their enthusiastic participation in the planning process. This is the crux of the program and one which must be free of petty political manoeuvering and petulant staged exits of those who must share in the common responsibility for economic and social development.

I shall next deal with another board which has been sought in the Atlantic provinces for many years and is now a part of the evolving pattern of this government's support for the three maritime provinces and Newfoundland. It is the Atlantic development board which has been unanimously welcomed by the press in Atlantic Canada. I am sure that if it is rapidly established and gets down to its job it can make a great contribution to the solution of our economic problems. This approach towards regional decisions for regional problems has long been part of the British government's policy, and also has been in vogue in France. It has helped to solve economic problems in Wales and Scotland, and I believe it can be of great help to eastern Canada.

However, I would hope that, in addition to the setting up of this board, greater flexibility would be provided in our banking system which would allow cash and credit to be made more readily available in different parts of Canada. I have not given full study to this matter and do not know which particular statute would require amendment, but the federal reserve system in the United States carries out this principle to good effect. In the United States they have an adaptable and flexible policy which has proven to be of beneficial effect. Canada is so large that different antidotes are sometimes needed to take care of various regional problems, and I am sure hon. members would agree that there is no inflation in Atlantic Canada, and very little danger of it.

The establishment by the United Nations and the Food and Agricultural Organization of a world food program must touch the imagination of Canadians, and the fact that this program is the result of Canadian inspiration and initiative must be a cause of modest satisfaction to hon. members. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so eloquently reminded us the other evening, two thirds of our people in the world are hungry. The fact that Canada proposes to share in a positive program based on a recognition of this human fact should be proof of our intention to do our part in the solution of this world problem. We have actively responded to a need which is ageless. Missions are already crossing the world to catalogue priorities, and we will soon be asked to make proper appropriation in supplying Canada's contribution.

Step by step we have evolved in this land from dependence to independence, and now the road is open to interdependence. I can think of no finer memorial to the late Dag Hammarskjold than the fulfilment of one of the causes he so effectively championed.

Might not the next step be a program outlined in the September 1 edition of the Illustrated London News by Sir Arthur Bryant? In it Sir Arthur writes:

> In certain strictly defined and limited cases, where new production of real wealth urgently needed by mankind can be accurately gauged and measured, I feel that it would be possible, without causing any inflationary tendency, to attach to the production of certain forms of universally required wealth, notably the production of mankind's chief need, food, the equivalent creation by the state of interest-free capital which would enable the undernourished peoples of the world to absorb the surplus and exportable food production of countries whose peoples are already consuming all the food they require.

Perhaps such a bold program might be part of Canada's adaptation to the changed conditions resulting from Britain's participation in the common market.

My final observation has to do with the national power grid, one more of the visions about which my hon. friends opposite delight in ridiculing the Prime Minister. New Brunswick already knows how beneficial it is to be on a grid with Nova Scotia, and how useful it is to be able to sell surplus power to the adjacent state of Maine. I could never quite understand all the hubbub about the Columbia river, because we have found it most useful and beneficial in New Brunswick to be able to export power to the United States.

To me one of the bright prospects for the Atlantic region, and in particular for the coal mining industry of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, is a national power grid. In one instance it might utilize power from the Columbia and in another power produced by the Hamilton falls in Labrador. It would also be greatly effective in utilizing thermal power generated from the burning of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia coal. This vision is no more unrealistic than was Macdonald's for a cross country railway, and this vision could materealize into exporting much more electricity into the power-hungry United States. After all, power lines know no artificial boundaries.

As this debate has progressed it seems to me that speakers have vied with each other in declaring how important is this session of parliament. Let us prove it to the country by proving it to each other.

Mr. John R. Nicholson (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this chamber for the first time I join with those who congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have made a contribution to the work of this house of which both they and their constituents may well be proud.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) on his maiden speech in this august assembly. It was interesting, informative and witty.

Mr. McGrath: Written by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Nicholson: Regardless of whom it was written by, it was an excellent speech. It was well delivered, and I say in all sincerity that Canada and the Liberal party are indeed fortunate that a young Canadian of such unusual ability has seen fit to continue a long line of public service that was begun by his distinguished grandfather, Sir Michael Cashin, more than 50 years before Newfoundland entered confederation. As a young man I knew Sir Michael Cashin and I am sure he would have been singularly proud with the efforts of his grandson in his first appearance in this chamber.

A new parliament has just opened—a parliament which is faced with grave and challenging problems. The way in which we address ourselves to these questions will affect not only the welfare of Canada but the welfare of peoples in many other nations. I firmly believe that the standard which the people of Canada will apply to this parliament will be an exacting one, and we should govern ourselves accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, as was drawn to the attention of this house when you recognized me, I, like Saul of Tarsus, come from no mean city. I come from Vancouver, a city which I am told by all who know it is not only one of the most beautiful but also one of the most progressive in Canada. It is also one of the most cosmopolitan cities in Canada. Many of its residents are immigrants and the children of immigrants. We have in Vancouver several thousand Chinese Canadians many of whom have won distinguished places in the life of our community, on the staffs of our universities and in other fields. We have several thousand Canadians of Italian, Greek, Scandinavian, German and Japanese origin. But the great majority of the inhabitants of this city are of Anglo-Saxon, Scottish or Irish descent. Vancouver is also the financial and commercial centre of British Columbia and is one of Canada's greatest seaports. The riding which I have the honour to represent, Vancouver Centre, is in the heart of metropolitan Vancouver. It is the core of a population of approximately 800,000 people. Vancouver, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, is on the west coast of Canada far removed from this capital. What I would like you to understand however, is that I come here as a coast-to-coast Canadian. I wish to assure this house through you, Mr. Speaker, that it will be my endeavour not to indicate any degree of sectionalism or any undue partisanship in points of view to which I may give expression from time to time. Undoubtedly I shall be partisan at times. After all I ran as a Liberal and I am proud of my party and of our leader. I trust, however, that I shall not be unduly partisan.

Having made my position clear, I now wish to say that, in my humble opinion, the first duty to which this parliament should address itself is the recovery of its prerogatives and powers. In June, 1956, I returned to Canada after an absence of some five years in South America. I had occasion to be in Ottawa in the early summer of that year and I followed with unusually close attention the proceedings in this house at that time. I did so partly because of my close association with the petroleum industry of Canada through the Polymer Corporation during its first 10 years, and also because of an extended stay in South America where political traditions and practices differ greatly from ours. In several of the Latin-American countries that I have visited, the army plays a most important part in government. It has been said, with some degree of truth, that the army is the greatest democratic force in several of the Latin-American republics. Apart from the army, however, there have been presidents and other national leaders whose viewpoints are extremely nationalistic and who have been high-handed and dictatorial in the way they run the affairs of their countries.

With such a background, it was not surprising that I should follow with unusual interest the matters which were being discussed in this house in the early summer of 1956. In the course of my visit and during the several months that followed I heard several hon. gentlemen, who now occupy front bench seats on the government side, speak in an impassioned and dramatic way about the rights and responsibilities of this house.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) proclaimed time and again in 1956 and 1957, both in and out of the house, that the rights of the members of this house were being ignored and trifled with. I say in all seriousness that the arbitrary, dictatorial actions of the present government during the months which have elapsed since the election in June last are far more deserving of censure and condemnation than anything which took place in the spring and early summer of 1956, especially in the light of subsequent events. Again you will note, Mr. Speaker, it was this same Prime Minister who, in 1958, 1959 and 1960, boasted that he had restored the honour and the prestige of parliament.

Our leader, in his magnificent address on Monday last, dealt effectively with the government's failure to give our nation the leadership needed at this time. He dealt with their failure to implement many of the promises and assurances given in the course of the campaigns in 1957, 1958 and again in 1962. He also referred to the exposure of matters which should have been brought to the attention of the electorate before the election took place but which the people were kept from knowing through the deliberate action of the government in order to win votes.

I had not intended to even refer to what our leader said on these subjects. I would not have done so had it not been for certain things mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) this morning and also by the Prime Minister in the course of his remarks on Tuesday. He said in effect that never in the history of the country had there been such unjustified and unwarranted remarks made in the course of an election campaign and in this house about a government and its leader.

My comment on this statement is that never in the history of this country have the actions of a leader or of a government called for such condemnation. They should be condemned if for no other reason than many of the statements made in the course of the recent election campaign and for making a mockery of their boast that they had restored the rights and prerogatives of this house. As an example of wild and extravagant statements made in order to win votes, I intend to read a few quotations for the benefit of the house. This is what I was criticized for this morning. It was said that I had made wild and extravagant statements in order to win votes. But can hon. members think of anything more extravagant than the statement made by the very minister who made this accusation in this house earlier today? In Hamilton on May 17 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> When James Coyne left his post as governor of the Bank of Canada, tight money went too.

How absurd.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member identify that quotation?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes. It is from a speech made at a political gathering in Hamilton on May 17.

Mr. Churchill: What paper was it taken from?

Mr. Nicholson: I am not quoting from a paper. I have a note.

On May 12, the Prime Minister, speaking in Medicine Hat, said:

> The devaluation will do wonders to increase trade. The critics tell me that inflation will result from this devaluation. Inflation merely means the rising of costs—

Again, the Prime Minister at Edmonton on May 26:

> When we removed the headship of the Bank of Canada we removed the strangulation of tight money.

Was there ever a time in the history of this country that we had tighter money than we have today? These are statements made during the course of an election campaign.

Mr. Churchill: Can the hon. member identify those quotations?

Mr. Nicholson: Again that statement was made at a political meeting addressed by the Prime Minister in Edmonton on May 26, as reported in the Edmonton papers. I am now quoting from a newspaper.

At Ottawa on May 29 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) said this:

> We are enjoying in Canada today one of the greatest periods of expansion in all Canadian history. We've achieved in Canada a remarkable stability in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar.

And the dollar had gone, in a period of months, from a premium of $1.05 to $0.92 and a fraction.

Mr. Speaker, this morning I was criticized in this house for having told the truth that Canada's prestige and reputation had deteriorated greatly since the present government took office. I still believe that to be the case. It has deteriorated, as evidenced by the following articles. In Maclean's magazine, the issue of January 6 of this year, there is an article by Hannon referring to, and quoting from, British periodicals and newspapers of that time. It is headed: "Why even the tolerant British don't like us anymore". I am not going to read the whole article, but the third paragraph begins:

> By year end, responsible London newspapers like the Times and the Observer were carrying reports accusing Canada of deliberately trying to obstruct the British entry into the Common Market and of rudeness and discourtesy at the diplomatic level.

Then again further down in the same article:

> British annoyance really boiled over though when Finance Minister Donald Fleming insisted on the full text... of a speech by the Lord Privy Seal, Edward Heath... No doubt unintentionally Fleming gave Britons the impression that he thought the full text would be significantly different from the summary he had already received—that is, that Britain was trying to deceive her commonwealth partners and sell them out in secret. When the text was finally published, and turned out to be no more than a clear statement of the well-known British position, Britons stopped trying to conceal their indignation. "Inexcusable", said the Manchester Guardian, and the Daily Herald added: "Heath is now due for some Canadian apologies".

I happened to be in Britain last year, Mr. Speaker, when this agitation was going on, and I was confronted every day with articles in the newspapers and also with comments from people I met from time to time.

The situation still continues. I refer now to an article in the Washington Post on September 17 of this year. The Washington Post says:

> —Commonwealth countries, including Canada, probably won't succeed in keeping Britain out of the common market, though it may succeed "in boring the rest of the world with the pettiness of some of their complaints".

The New York Times, one of the finest newspapers in the world, says:

> —the Commonwealth countries are staging a "virtual revolt" against the mother country at the prime ministers' conference in London.
>
> In an editorial it says the conference issue "lies between Prime Minister Macmillan's dynamic world-wide 'grand design', which takes account of modern economic trends, and the separate and even parochial trade interests of the Commonwealth countries".
>
> The grand design... calls for Britain's entry into the European economic community "on the basis of the same imperative consideration that created the community".
>
> "As Mr. Macmillan explained, a modern economy can no longer prosper within the narrow confines of a small national state when economic power is shifting to units of continental proportions".
>
> In contrast, the editorial says, the commonwealth countries fear both a potential dissolution of the commonwealth and, more immediately, serious injury to their economies due to an extension of common market tariffs to Britain and loss of the imperial preference for their goods—
>
> The British government is still determined to press ahead... but the vehemence of the commonwealth opposition is bound to strengthen British domestic opposition.

And lastly the Daily Mail, during the conference in early September of this year, accused the Prime Minister of sulking because of hurt pride in politics.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone should tell me, when you find articles of that nature published in leading newspapers in the United States and leading magazines and periodicals in Britain, that the prestige and international reputation of Canada has not suffered, I would be a very surprised man. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was accused of making an unthruthful statement and was criticized for it, but I said nothing more than the truth. To me, Mr. Speaker, a new member in this house, it is a shocking and deplorable thing that a government, having made extravagant and irresponsible statements such as those mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition when he reviewed the life of this government, and such as those I have read, which in spite of these misleading statements was beaten at the polls, should insist upon carrying on. To me it is an even more shocking thing for the government to adopt the attitude that it did at the recent prime ministers' conference. The Prime Minister, who had been beaten at the polls, saw fit to go to London purporting to speak for Canada without calling this house together to ascertain how the members felt. Is that the conduct that you would expect from a government which says that it has restored the rights and prestige of parliament?

Mr. Pickersgill: "Let's cool off".

Mr. Nicholson: Responsible government is the foundation of our democratic institutions. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I would be gravely remiss in my duties as a member of this house if in my first utterance in debate I did not express my opinion of the government's complete disregard of this basic constitutional principle of responsible government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like in the balance of the time at my disposal to deal with the speech from the throne. It is noticeable not so much for what it says but for what it fails to say. There is a sad lack of any clearly-defined program for this session, and a complete failure to recognize that if the economy is to boom again measures must be taken to stimulate growth and production in the nation's industries. Attention has been drawn to the fact that no mention whatever is made in the speech from the throne of Canada's important fishing industry. But what is even more remarkable is that no mention whatever is made of Canada's most important industry, the forestry industry. There is no mention of forests, forestry or forest products in the whole of the speech from the throne. There is a passage to the effect that the government will reintroduce some legislation eliminating or correcting discrimination in the logging tax, but apart from that there is no mention whatever of any intention to improve matters or conditions in the nation's most important industry. And yet, Mr. Speaker, one out of every 12 Canadians working in the nation's goods manufacturing industries is concerned with forestry and the manufacture of products from our trees.

Of all the manufacturing industries in this country the forest industry stands first in employment, first in terms of wages paid, in new investment and in net value of output. Approximately one third of Canada's total export earnings come from the sale of forest products outside of our boundaries or approximately $2 billion a year. Yet in the speech from the throne there is to be found not a word of what the government intends to do to help this industry. It is not only important to the province of British Columbia, where 50 cents of every dollar comes out of the forest industry, but it is also important to the economies of New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec and other provinces.

This industry has serious problems. During the question period yesterday I referred to one of them, namely the move on the part of the lumber industry in the United States, which is by far our most important market, to reduce through a quota arrangement lumber imports from Canada. A hearing opened before the United States tariff commission in Washington earlier this week on a petition lodged by the lumber manufacturers of the Pacific northwest. Vancouver, Ottawa, Toronto and other Canadian papers have made extensive references to this inquiry. The Vancouver papers are full of it. These articles all highlight one thing, namely that the prime thing that is actuating these Americans in their request is the fact that the Canadian dollar has not only been devaluated but has been pegged at 92½ cents. The United States manufacturers put this fact forward as their basic case. They contend that this devaluation of the dollar constitutes a built-in tariff wall. While admittedly the forest and other Canadian industries have gained some temporary advantages from the "pegged" devaluation, the tables are now turning. As the leader of the Liberal party and other spokesmen on this side of the house have been saying for weeks, the tables are now turning and this move of pegging the dollar which has resulted in the built-in tariff is now becoming a matter of grave concern to Canadian lumbermen and other exporters.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that my old friend the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) would be in the house today, as I should like to have congratulated him upon his appointment as Minister of National Revenue. As an old friend I congratulate him on the appointment and I wish him well in the tough spot in which he finds himself because of the government's austerity program. However, in congratulating this new minister upon his appointment I know I voice the feelings of the forest industry in all parts of Canada that it is a matter of grave concern that this government is so short of good men that one man is obliged to handle two of the most important portfolios.

An hon. Member: One did not exist under the Liberals.

Mr. Nicholson: It seems to me that when parliament in its wisdom decides that there should be a department to look after the welfare of the nation's most important industry, the importance of that industry warrants the appointment of a full-time minister to look after it. When the Department of Forestry Act was passed great stress was laid on research. In fact, three of the five subsections which define the powers of the minister deal with research. In the light of the stress that was placed on research, it is a matter of great regret that, as to the research program which the industry hoped for, no action is being taken upon it. Research is urgently and vitally needed in the forest industry in this country. One has only to go back, as some of my friends in the far corner will recall, to the time when hemlock was a waste product in British Columbia, good for little more than a firewood. Suddenly as a result of research it has become a valuable product in the manufacture of high quality pulp and paper. Cedar is equally a wood that was discarded. Eighty per cent of all the red cedar in the North American continent is in the forests of British Columbia. Only 75 per cent of the cedar is being cut because there is no economic use for the older trees. The matter calls for extensive research. Yet little has been done in that regard.

While in the speech from the throne reference is made to the fact that the government is going to give the big corporations some tax incentives in order that they may carry on further research, what are they doing for the small businessmen? What are they doing for the loggers in British Columbia, with their stands of cedar, who have these problems to solve? Nothing is being done in that regard as they cannot get any benefit out of these tax incentives. Speaking here on behalf of the small operators in all parts of Canada I say that it is high time the government did something about research in this important field of forestry.

I might say that I have a soft spot in my heart for research because during the 15 years that I was in industry, nine and a half of them in the Polymer Corporation, we plowed millions of dollars into research. Think of the handsome dividends that are being paid today on the money that was timely spent at a difficult time in the history of the Polymer Corporation.

If we were to arrange the large nations of the world today in order of their strength, virility and effectiveness, in either peace or war, we would find a similar order if we were to substitute for effectiveness the total national expenditure a nation makes on scientific research.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, one of the trials under which I suffer now in returning to parliament after four years absence is the long unwieldy title that has been attached to my constituency. I cannot help thinking that it is a typical Conservative action, namely as much as possible to smother reality in words.

In coming back to this chamber after four years absence I must confess that I have been assailed with the disconcerting thought that in spite of the rapid pace of events in the world outside, here is some strange cloud-cuckoo land in which time stands still. What do I find, Mr. Speaker? I find our old friends the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition still brandishing their wooden swords, waving their cardboard shields, fighting the mimic battle all over again as they did previously, as they were doing when I left here in 1958. I suppose one can say there is something quaint, amusing and entertaining in this stylized performance; but to me there is something dismaying and disturbing in the flippant and frivolous manner in which these two eminent gentlemen discussed the problems of the nation, if that is what they were doing, on the highly intellectual plane of "You're another", obviously more concerned not with how Canada's affairs are to be conducted but with who is to get the job of conducting them.

My hon. friend, the leader of this group and member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), remarked the other day on the strange fact that the Liberal and Conservative parties can examine the same set of statistics and come up with diametrically opposed conclusions. I am equally impressed by the manner in which these two great parties regard certain dates in history such as the year 1957.

The Liberal party, of course, regards the year 1957 as a date hardly less significant than the fall of man when our first parents were expelled from paradise. Ever since, of course, they have been standing wistfully at the gates, like houris at the gates of paradise, hoping again to be admitted to the green gardens. On the other hand, the Conservatives, of course, regard 1957 in much the way in which the leaders of the revolutionary movement, the liberation movement, regard the anniversary of the day on which they led the forces of liberation to victory, and like such liberators they have a tendency, of course, to imagine that by harping on the horrors of the previous government people will tend to overlook the horrors of the new one.

Being neither a Liberal nor a Conservative I have a different view of 1957 and I rather suspect it is the view that history will take of that doom-laden year. I rather suspect that history will regard 1957 as the year in which the Canadian people awoke from a long uneasy slumber, shot by the occasional nightmares of 22 years of Liberal rule, and that when they awoke, rubbed their eyes and regarded the spectacle of the results of those 22 years they went stark, raving mad and elected a Conservative government.

I am interested in the way in which both the Liberals and Conservatives would have one believe that the year 1957 was a sharp cut-off date at which everything changed. Of course, if one examines the statistical record one finds that there is not even the slightest irregularity in the dismal curve down which we have been descending for the last decade. This government's incompetence, and heaven knows that has been well proven in the last five years, is not so much in having created a crisis as in having been unable to cope with the crisis already created by their Liberal predecessors.

In fact, I wonder sometimes, Mr. Speaker, if the well known occult powers of the late prime minister Mackenzie King may not have descended to his successors because they would seem to know when it is advisable to lose an election, and I wonder whether the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) may perhaps be the custodian of that crystal ball. I must say that it was one of the brighter moments of my life the other day to hear the honourable and irrepressible member for Bonavista-Twillingate, standing arrayed in the white robes of purity, washed in the waters of repentance, with not even a smidgen of oil from the trans-Canada pipe line soiling the hem of his garment, reading us a lecture on the evils of cynicism in public life.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not read it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No, I must say he did not read it; he spoke it. I must say, sir, that there can be no one more expert in cynicism in public life than the members of that group who, with cynical abandon, very nearly destroyed the high office that you now adorn and, moreover, utterly and completely destroyed the unfortunate incumbent of that period. There must, I think, have been great joy in heaven, if what we are told is true that there is more rejoicing in heaven over one repentant sinner than a hundred righteous men. The hon. member stood there, as I say, giving us a sermon on the evils of political cynicism.

An hon. Member: Amen.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I must say sir, that though I do not pose as an expert on the mores of revival meetings, it strikes me as rather comic that the repentant sinner should go up the sawdust trail so rapidly that he cannot even pause for a moment at the mourners' bench before leaping into the pulpit.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been there for five years.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): However, sir, I must not fall into the error of the two great political parties and rake over old and rather malodorous straw. We have to regard what is now proposed for the future by these two great parties of Canada and, of course, if we refer to the throne speech we have some difficulty in discerning just what that program may be. I note that it is one of the aims of the government to adopt measures to develop the Canadian economy, to maintain a high level of employment, to strengthen the balance of payments—all very laudable aspirations. Unfortunately, the rest of the speech does not reveal that the government has the slightest idea of how to achieve these laudable purposes.

One of the points in the throne speech that particularly interested me was the matter of incentives to our shy and diffident business community. I would have thought that the present all too generous depletion and depreciation provisions with regard to oil, petroleum and minerals would have been enough to encourage even the shyest entrepreneur to proceed on his way in making profits. But no, we give him some further incentives. I was particularly interested to notice that some help is to be afforded to the hard-pressed forest products industry of British Columbia, about which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Nicholson) was speaking a few moments ago, because I recall that just a few days before I left the Pacific coast to come to Ottawa two of the largest lumber corporations in Canada were indiscreet enough to report that in the first half of 1962 their profits had increased over the same period in 1961 by 43 per cent and 50 per cent respectively. If this is part of the belt tightening process, then all I can say is that it is going to be a highly selective process. But I am quite sure that those of my constituents, of whom there are a great many who work in the forest products industry, who are members of the international woodworkers of America and the pulp and sulphite workers, will be greatly interested in this gesture toward their employers, particularly as they have recently signed a no-pay-increase agreement on the basis of the stringencies affecting their industry.

We all know, of course, that our Prime Minister is a very devout and pious man but it does seem to me that it is carrying piety to extreme lengths to undertake to implement a policy on one scriptural adjuration alone, namely, "to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath". I have observed that spokesmen both for the Conservative party and for the Liberal party are apparently hoping to overcome our present discontents by re-establishing patterns of the past that have been irretrievably shattered. It is a truism, of course, that we live in an age of revolutionary change, but unfortunately a great many of our people, perhaps a majority, are unable to accept the fact that this truism is in actual fact the plain unvarnished truth. The confusion perhaps arises from a misuse of words or a misunderstanding of words, perhaps a semantic confusion. To all too many people the words "revolution" and "revolutionary" conjure up visions of Fidel Castro or communist conspiracy or people with bombs and beards plotting in basements when in actual fact the revolutionaries of the twentieth century are to be found in other places. They are to be found in our laboratories, in our technical and engineering institutions. They are being urged on in their revolutionary work, of course, by the self-styled opponents of revolution.

They, of course, themselves would be horrified to hear themselves described as revolutionaries. However, they are the real revolutionaries of today and all our problems of today result from the revolutionary activities of these people about whom we hear very little. The European common market, balance of payments, the grim and rising tide of unemployment, the shattered trade patterns, all these arise from the work of these revolutionary forces in our midst. I would suggest, sir, it is time we in this house recognized this revolution and realize that sooner or later throughout the world we have to establish revolutionary institutions to match this technological revolution which is taking place.

I am among those who find it literally impossible to believe that 18 million people in possession of the largest per capita natural wealth in the world are able to produce poverty without the exercise of the utmost ingenuity. We have not lacked ingenuity to date. We have, indeed, been more than ingenious in devising stumbling blocks in our way. In the meantime, we have to face some immediate problems. I suggest to you, sir, we are not going to face them by attempting to re-establish institutions, patterns and customs that have now been shattered beyond repair.

Let us take this question of export trade of which we hear so much from all sides of this house. While the objective of the division of labour throughout the world and the specialization of production between the different economies of the world is undoubtedly a desirable and commendable objective, surely the spectacle of 18 million people allowing themselves to drift into the position where they depend for the elements of their daily living on their ability to force on other people their surplus goods, while at the same time rejecting and resisting as far as possible the efforts of others to force their goods upon us, speaks of inspired lunacy. There is mounting evidence, I suggest, that we are not going to be allowed to pursue these lunatic paths much longer, even if we choose to do so. It is painfully evident that something else must be done. Let us, by all means, export what we can of our surplus products. Let us, by all means, find all the customers we can. But let us recognize that the day is gone when we are going to live in Canada in the lap of luxury, trading in traditional patterns.

We are approaching the end of the age of pack rats, as someone has described this age in which the energies of the human race are devoted to transporting materials back and forth across the face of the globe. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in facing these problems we might well take a look at our own Canadian history to see if a study of that history may not give us a solution for our immediate problem. I am always surprised and somewhat dismayed to hear the statement made, as it is made plainly and bluntly in the throne speech, that Canada's development will continue to require imports of capital, a statement in which I believe the Liberal opposition concur. This is an approach that I completely reject on two grounds. The first is that it is demonstrably false, and the second that it is an encouragement of the continuation of a process that has almost brought us to the brink of disaster.

I think that this is the time when we should begin to grow up. I have noted in recent months in the newspapers rather acid and pointed comments by various authorities in different parts of the world about Canada's infantile and regressive determination to remain in a state of economic infancy. Some very sharp things have been said about Canada and Canadians persisting in regarding themselves as an undeveloped economy in desperate need of help from abroad. I suggest to you, sir, that our history gives the lie to that position.

I should like to take you back, sir, some 20 odd years, to a time when we faced even more dangerous and difficult days than we face at the present time. In 1939 we were faced with the problem of playing our part in a war to exterminate the nazi disease that was creeping over the face of the globe. It is rather interesting to see what we did on that occasion. In fact, I think we sometimes forget the almost miraculous force of that war effort, the astonishing achievements of those years from 1939 to 1945. At that time, from the depths of the depression, with an industry grinding to a halt, almost overnight we transformed ourselves.

Now, there will be those who will say, it is all very well to go back to the days of war, but we cannot do that again. For one thing, people will say, look at the enormous volume of debt that was created. I want, first of all, to deal with this question of the necessity for importing capital which every member, even those who advocate the import of capital, fully recognize is fraught with great danger.

In 1939, the rate of capital formation in Canada stood at $754 million. Only three years later, in 1942, it had risen to a rate of $1,556 million. We will be told, of course, that the people of Canada endured all manner of hardships and restrictions during the war, and cannot possibly be asked to undergo them again. Well, statistics do not bear that out because I find that personal expenditure on consumer goods and services rose from $6,510 million in 1939 to $9,261 million in 1945. Then, we are told, of course, as I say that we would only add to our mounting debt. I have some figures that cast not only a revealing light on what occurred at that time but also what has occurred since those days of the war.

In the depths of the depression in 1933 and 1934 the charges on Canada's national debt consumed over 8 per cent of our gross national product. Throughout the whole of the war, when an enormous war production program was being carried on, when standards of living were being raised throughout the country, the carrying charges on Canada's national debt remained almost constant at just over 4 per cent of the gross national product. Here, perhaps, is an indicator, Mr. Speaker, of the truth of what I said a few moments ago, that the crisis in which we are involved today had its genesis long before the advent of this unfortunate and incompetent Conservative government. I find that back in 1955 the carrying charges on Canada's debt had dropped to 1.8 per cent of the gross national product. In 1957 they went even lower to 1.6 per cent of the gross national product, and last year they had only risen to 2.1 per cent of it. Therefore I suggest that there is ample leeway for a vast expansion program in Canada without any dangers whatsoever of the sort of inflationary pressures which many fear, or any dangers of an overwhelming burden of public debt.

For that reason I would recommend to the government and the Liberal party that they should divert some of their attention from trying to re-establish broken patterns of conduct and behaviour and seek an outlet elsewhere.

If it was possible for Canadians to place their economy, as we did, at the service of the war to defeat nazism, is there any reason today why we cannot place the Canadian economy at the service of providing for the raising of living standards throughout the world? Is there any reason whatsoever why the Canadian government cannot plan, and inaugurate a planned program of production to meet the needs in capital goods of the underdeveloped areas of the world, and do it by long term low interest or no interest credits? Even if we were never repaid we would be in no more difficult or dangerous position than we were during the war when all this vast expansion of production was consumed by the Canadian people in the sense that it was paid for by them, and in the process Canada refound prosperity. I would suggest that this is the great task of the present age.

We have become so involved, mentally and psychologically, in the absurdities and horrors of the cold war, in mutual bomb rattling and bomb testing, and in mutual suspicions, that we are overlooking the fact that this cold war, with the possibility of its erupting into a hot war, is already becoming a thing of the past; that there is another war that is beating on our doors today, and that is the war against hunger, misery and ignorance throughout the world. That is a much more dangerous war. It is a war which, if we lose it, will have as disastrous consequences as any that might come from a nuclear explosion.

Here we have the vast majority of the human species, because remember we members of an affluent society are only a small proportion of the human species, living in conditions which we would consider intolerable deprivation and hardship, and one of the reasons for the revolutionary actions I was speaking about is that today, for the first time in history, two things have happened. One is that we have conquered the problem of production. We know now we can create material abundance, and the other is that, also for the first time in history, human beings in every part of the world are made aware, by sight and by sound, of the way in which other human beings live in other parts of the world.

It is one thing to hear vague rumours that people on the other side of the world live in comfort and luxury while you yourself live in poverty, but it is an entirely different thing to see a picture of these affluent people on the television or movie screen. The vast bulk of the have-nots in this world are not long going to be content. They want to come into the twentieth century.

Here, I submit, is a golden opportunity for a country such as Canada to place our economy—our developing economy, and let us not be silly and place ourselves on the same economic level as Ghana—in the forefront of a drive to combat this misery. We are a developed economy. We can generate our own capital, we have done it before. So let us advance now on this much more important war, this war for human freedom, this war for human decency, this war against misery.

Would not this lay the foundation for a real clarion cry of advance, a call to arms to which every Canadian could respond with good heart? It would give our nation that thing which everyone says we need desperately, a sense of national purpose, and it would give each individual Canadian one thing that every individual requires, a sense of spiritual purpose.

This, I submit, is the challenge of the twentieth century, and this parliament and this nation will fail that challenge at their peril.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I only have time to offer you my congratulations on your recent appointment, and especially for the manner with which you conduct the debates in this honourable chamber.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: It now being six o'clock I shall leave the chair. Pursuant to order made Wednesday, October 3 last, this house stands adjourned until Tuesday next at 11 o'clock a.m.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 9, 1962

The house met at 11 a.m.

FINANCE

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO NETHERLANDS LOAN ADVANCE REPAYMENT

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this statement would have been given on Friday had I received official notification of it in time to give it on the order for motions. As a matter of courtesy I am making it now.

As the house undoubtedly knows at this time, the government of the Netherlands paid to the government of Canada in advance of maturity $32,130,000, representing one half of the remaining debt owed by the Netherlands to Canada for credits received in the years immediately following world war II.

The credits to the Netherlands were part of the post-war Canadian program of assistance to many European countries, including the United Kingdom, Belgium, France, the Netherlands and Norway, designed to help in the reconstruction of their economies. The total credits extended by Canada to the Netherlands in the immediate post-war period amounted to $123.9 million. Repayments by the Netherlands to the end of April, 1962 had reduced the amount outstanding to $64,260,000.

The Canadian government has welcomed this initiative of the Netherlands government. The repayment of this sum in advance constitutes impressive evidence of the economic progress achieved by the Netherlands since 1947; it is a further example of the close ties of friendship between Canada and the Netherlands, and of the growing economic co-operation among the free nations of the world. It will make a further substantial contribution toward the strengthening of Canada's foreign exchange position.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING NOTICE TO ALL INTERESTED PARTIES

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-54, to amend the Expropriation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This bill was on the order paper last year and was not reached. The purpose of the bill is to bring the Expropriation Act into a position consistent with the bill of rights, and represents something that should have been done by the government.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR MEASURES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TREATMENT OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-55, to amend the War Measures Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a bill designed to bring the War Measures Act into a position consistent with the bill of rights. This bill seeks to do what the Prime Minister told parliament, after the passage of the bill of rights, the government itself would do.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE

CUBA—RUSSIAN CARGOES CARRIED IN CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to a special report made to the state department in Washington by the United States maritime administration on, among other things, the part being played by eight Canadian owned ships in trade between communist countries and Cuba.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was before the house the other day. Canada is not directly involved in this matter. We have been informed of the recent United States shipping regulations relative to trade with Cuba, but so far as I know there are no ships of Canadian registry that would be affected. Canada, as the house knows, does not permit the export to Cuba of arms or strategic materials. That is the basis of Canadian policy on this question, and it is not affected in any way by the activities of these ships to which the Leader of the Opposition has made reference and which, as I stated earlier, under maritime law and general international law are subject to the laws of the country under whose flag they operate. The eight ships in question are under British registry and, I again state, are not subject to Canadian laws or regulations.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can control not be exercised over these ships or the companies owning them because of the fact that their profits are taxed in this country and the money goes into the federal treasury?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no information in that regard, but I will look into that matter and ascertain whether there is any basis for the views expressed by the hon. gentleman.

CEMENT—IMPORT OF CARGO FROM CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the house if the destination of a shipload of cement which came from Cuba has been traced, and if so can the minister reveal the name of the importer?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, I have no information with regard to that.

REPORTED CRITICISM OF NORTH AMERICAN BUSINESSMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, believing that he is the member of the cabinet in this house who is seeking the co-operation of Canadian businessmen. I wonder if the minister's attention has been drawn to an irresponsible statement by a delegate to the socialist convention, that North American businessmen were uncivilized apes as compared to businessmen of Europe. Would he care to comment on that?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the statement, Mr. Speaker, but if that statement was made I would very strongly disagree with it.

Mr. Winch: May I ask, sir, why you did not rule that out of order as an irresponsible question?

AUTOMOBILE TRANSMISSIONS—CONTINUATION OF EXISTING TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the present permission for duty free entry of automatic automobile transmissions expires on October 31, can the government indicate at this time that it will not continue to waive the existing 25 per cent tariff after that date?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this is a matter which has occurred at the end of every six months for some years. The government has given consideration to the problem, and in due course its decision will be announced.

EFFECT ON FISH EXPORTS OF RUSSIAN BASE IN CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Fisheries a question of which I have sent his office notice. May I inquire whether he is in a position to assess the possible effect on our traditional Caribbean markets, and if any representation has accordingly been made to the Soviet union or Cuba, concerning the announced intention by the former to build a $12 million fishing port within the latter, presumably in Havana bay, to service the Soviet fishing fleet in the north Atlantic?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Here again I think the hon. member will recognize that he has made his representations and that the question is more fitting for the order paper.

WORLD FAIR—REQUESTS FOR FEDERAL SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lafontaine put to me a question to which the answer is no. No Canadian city, except Montreal, has asked the government to make the necessary request to obtain the world fair in 1967.

STATEMENT RESPECTING RESTRICTIONS ON BUYERS AND SELLERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the hon. member for Bellechasse asked me a question. The answer is that I had no knowledge of this particular shipment. Any buyer or consumer in Canada is free to get his supplies where he sees fit, taking into account prices, availability, characteristics and time to be allowed for delivery of the product.

PUBLIC SERVICE

MESSRS. WHITELEY AND SMITH—REASON FOR NOT EXTENDING APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is there any connection between the government's decision not to reappoint Mr. C. Rhodes Smith and Mr. Whiteley as members of the restrictive trade practices commission and a report in that connection involving the manufacture, distribution and sale of paperboard shipping containers and related products, especially in view of the fact that one Mr. McCutcheon is referred to in that particular report?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has asked a number of questions in regard to this matter and in my view the question is definitely of the kind that should appear on the order paper. Furthermore, I believe I would have to look at the question on the order paper, since it seems to express some sort of opinion contrary to the spirit of questions on orders of the day.

A. S. WHITELEY—INQUIRY AS TO RETURN TO CIVIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if, as he informed us the other day, Mr. A. S. Whiteley, a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, is not to be reappointed at the end of this month, the minister has given consideration to returning Mr. Whiteley to the civil service, in view of Mr. Whiteley's long and loyal service to the government of Canada and to the people of Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): I have no power to appoint anyone to the civil service. Mr. Whiteley has the rights that are open to anybody in that respect.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the answer given to the hon. member for York South by the Minister of Justice, will he himself, and will he have the civil service commission, look into the case of Mr. A. S. Whiteley to make sure that his rights as a long time civil servant are protected? There seems to be some uncertainty as to those rights, in view of the fact that he came out of the civil service and took this position on a commission for ten years.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, expert as he is in the rules of this house, would agree with me that he has made representations rather than seeking urgent information from a minister of the crown.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of concern not only to one individual but to civil servants generally. We have not yet had an answer from the government as to whether a civil servant's rights in a case like this are protected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel, also, that the hon. member was endeavouring to make his argument under the guise of privilege when no privilege of either himself as an hon. member of this house or of hon. members generally has arisen.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINES—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the many applications now before the board of transport commissioners for the abandonment of railway branch lines. Has the government formulated any plan or policy for the orderly abandonment of railway branch lines, as has been requested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture? Will any such plan include compensation for those whose income and investment are seriously affected by the abandonment of a branch line?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps if the hon. member worded his question in a proper way it would be appropriate for this time of day. We have had a series of three questions which would lead me to believe that they would have been more appropriate on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: Before you make your ruling Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would hear me for one minute concerning the urgency of this question. I should like to point out to Your Honour that there are a number of applications now before the board of transport commissioners for the abandonment of branch lines all across this country. The first hearing is to be on Monday next. This question has been placed before the government repeatedly, and I feel it is urgent in view of the hearings that are about to commence. I believe the minister was prepared to reply to the question.

Mr. Speaker: I did not disagree with the hon. member that the question was urgent.

I was more concerned about the form in which the question was put. If the hon. member is prepared to rephrase his question appropriately, without a number of addenda or tail ends, perhaps he could get his question properly before the house. If he now would limit his question to the first part, and the hon. minister is prepared to answer that question, perhaps the hon. member could get a reply to his question.

Mr. Argue: I would be quite happy if I could get a reply to even the first part of the question.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): In reply to the first part of the question I would say that the matter is under active consideration by the cabinet and an announcement will be made in due course.

PUBLIC WORKS

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he is in a position this morning to assess the extent of the week-end hurricane damage to fishermen's wharves and breakwaters in Nova Scotia?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): As soon as the hurricane abated, our engineers went out to the various centres where damage took place, to assess the damage. I am advised that it will take a week or so before they can make a close estimate of the damage, but a preliminary investigation shows there was little damage in New Brunswick, but in Nova Scotia damages are fairly heavy at least in the four counties of Lunenburg, Shelburne, Queens and Yarmouth.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEST BLOCK—FAILURE OF BELLS TO CALL MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister please explain why the bells did not ring this morning to inform members in the west block that the house was sitting?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): No, I am unable to inform the hon. member as to the reason, but I shall be glad to look into it and have an expert electrician attend to the matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED RESTRICTIONS APPLIED TO BOTH NETWORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State if the restrictions imposed upon the C.B.C. under the austerity program are applied to one network only or to both the French and the English networks.

Mr. Speaker: I do believe that, according to the rules, the hon. member ought to put his question on the order paper.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED COVERAGE OF ELECTION IN QUEBEC BY TORONTO TECHNICIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State. Is it true that the director of the C.B.C. news service sent a group from Toronto to cover the election in the province of Quebec rather than a group from Montreal?

(Text):

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): I shall check with the corporation and let the hon. member know tomorrow morning.

(Translation):

Mr. Gregoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it true that in accordance with the austerity program, a team of eight men was sent from Toronto, with a single representative from the Montreal French network, to cover the incidents which occurred in Mississippi?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but in my opinion, he must be able to see the difference between a supplementary question and a related question. The hon. member cannot ask for an explanation from the Secretary of State, since the minister stated that he would take the question as a notice. The last question the hon. member wanted to ask was rather related to his first one.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

KETTLE VALLEY—APPLICATION TO DISCONTINUE PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister which is of urgent importance to the people of the Kootenays, because the sands of time are running out. Has the Prime Minister received representations from municipalities, labour organizations, other organizations and members of his own party in respect of the application of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the discontinuance of passenger service on the Kettle Valley Railway? If so, will he tell the house what his reply was to them?

Mr. Speaker: While I very much appreciate the local concern in the area from which the hon. member comes, and I know it is a very fine part of the country, I feel that he has made his representations; but if he wishes to go into the question further it should be put on the order paper.

AIR TRANSPORT

STUDY OF RADIOACTIVITY ON HIGH ALTITUDE FLYING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Have the senior officers of the Department of Transport made a study concerning the hazards of radioactive fall-out for aircraft flying at high altitude? What steps does the department intend to take with a view to protecting aircraft and their passengers against those hazards?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question only a few minutes ago. I shall have to inquire of the senior officers of my department. I know they are interested in the matter, but I am unable to give a definite answer this morning since this matter is of a strictly technical nature. I am not in a position to say at the moment what are the results of this study made by the officials concerned.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—COST OF APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. Is it true that last Friday he promised the municipal authorities of Montreal that the government would pay the cost of the approaches to Champlain bridge?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no change in the stand taken by the national harbours board who abide by their agreement signed some five or six months ago with the authorities of the city of Montreal.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INTERNATIONAL NICKEL CO.—PROPOSED LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, which he may want to take as notice. In view of the government's policy to encourage industry, and in view of the large tax bill of International Nickel, what steps, if any, are being taken or contemplated to assist workers in the matter of lay-offs at Port Colborne?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I can assure the hon. member for Cariboo that all the facilities of the government will be placed at the disposal of those who are laid off, and every possible assistance will be given to them.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BAIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the acute shortage of squid required as bait for the catching of codfish by Newfoundland fishermen, would the minister advise whether his department intends obtaining squid from other countries, as he did in 1958-59, and would he state whether explorations for squid are being carried out in the waters of Newfoundland in the meantime?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would point out to the hon. member for Trinity-Conception that even though the problem might appear very important to the fishermen, the purpose of orders of the day is to seek information urgently which is not available from other sources. The hon. member has made his representations.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may say a word on the ruling that Your Honour was considering making. I think perhaps Your Honour, coming from Alberta, does not quite appreciate the importance of getting bait at this time and not in two or three weeks from now, when we might hope for a response to a question put on the order paper.

This is a very urgent matter, not just to one community but to the whole province of Newfoundland and to the most ancient industry in this country. I feel sure the minister would be only too happy to make a response.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I indicated in my remarks that I did not for one moment downgrade the importance of the subject matter, but I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is also quite aware of the immediate purpose of questions on orders of the day. The hon. member has made his representations. The minister could merely, if he wishes, take the matter as notice and delay his reply.

I think we are making progress in this regard, and I am hoping that with the passage of time we will arrive at some basis whereby we will mutually agree on generally what are the proper questions for this time. By so ruling this morning, I am not at all downgrading the importance of the subject matter to a community, in much the same way as the railway service in the Kettle Valley is important to the people of southeastern British Columbia as are I am sure the problems in connection with a shortage of bait to fishermen.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—REPORTED SALE OF TORONTO PLAYER TO CHICAGO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is it not a fact that the sale of Frank Mahovlich to the Chicago Black Hawks at any price would constitute a violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: It would help the exchange problem.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—SUBSIDY ON TRANSPORTATION OF FEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on October 4 last the hon. member for Lake St. John asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister intend to grant subsidies to Quebec truckers for the transportation of feed grain such as those he authorized in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Speaker, I have the answer here, but in view of your rulings I think the question would be more proper if placed on the order paper, when I would be glad to provide the answer immediately.

GRAIN STORAGE FACILITIES IN EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Are the plans for the construction of grain storage facilities in eastern Canada, as proposed in the speech from the throne, being prepared now?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously referring to the speech from the throne where we have indicated that we are working on a new feed grain policy for all Canada, with special reference to British Columbia and the eastern provinces. That is as far as I can put forward our views at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH INDIAN CLAIMS COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration when the house might have introduced the measure indicated in the speech from the throne to establish a court of Indian claims, or an Indian claims court?

Hon. Richard A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): In the near future, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO CONCLUSION OF HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question based on a reply given by the Prime Minister on Friday last as to the time when the royal commission on health services would be making a report to the government. Can the minister say, in the light of this reply, if it is a fact that the royal commission has finished its public hearings; and, in that event, can the minister say what remains for the royal commission to do other than to write its report?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check on this to be sure of my answer, but I believe there is to be another hearing.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED TALKS RESPECTING SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the minister for external affairs. Would the minister please inform this house whether the Canadian government is represented at negotiations which are currently under way in the United States between officials of the government of the province of British Columbia and officials of the United States federal government and other public authorities concerning the sale of Columbia river downstream benefits in the United States?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are no such negotiations under way at the moment. There have been informal negotiations, at which this government was represented.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROME—MESSAGE TO ECUMENICAL COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Rinfret (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Like the United States administration, is it the intention of the Canadian government to send a message on the occasion of the opening of the ecumenical council which will open in Rome next Thursday, October 11?

(Text):

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about a message, but Canada will have a representative at that conference.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, October 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. MacEachen.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, the first session of this new parliament is but a few days old and it already seems as though it is going to be a long one, profitable for the Canadian people, yet deceiving for the opposition.

I should like to associate myself with the distinguished members who spoke before me, to offer my humble congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. members for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin) and for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent). Last fall, I made discreet inquiries in Nicolet-Yamaska to find a worthy replacement for His Excellency Hon. Paul Comtois, lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec, who had resigned his seat. Today, I am glad that last June 18, the people of that constituency approved the wise choice I made. I congratulate not only the new member for Nicolet-Yamaska but all the people of that fine riding for having elected a true farmer, a young man who will, in the true tradition of the Conservative party, uphold the rights of the Quebec farmers who were too long ignored by the Liberals at both the provincial and federal levels.

Speaking of new members, I should like to take this opportunity to offer my congratulations and encouragement to a member of the opposition, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon), whose grandfather, Dr. Hormidas Pilon, a professional veterinarian, represented the provincial riding of Vaudreuil at the Quebec legislative assembly for 32 years. He was a friend of the farmers, and the latter showed him eternal gratitude for the countless services he rendered to them. I hope the hon. member will follow in his grandfather's footsteps. He can be sure of my wholehearted sympathy when he has to discuss agriculture within the Liberal caucus or take the advice or orders of the turncoat member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), the Liberal expert on agriculture.

With regard to farming, I would like to draw a parallel between recent Liberal policy in this field and the principles applied by the Conservatives in the county I represent.

On one occasion—in 1940, if I remember correctly, and under Liberal rule—a unit of bulldozers invaded St. Dominique and St. Fereol in Vaudreuil-Soulanges, tearing down fences, toppling down trees, filling in ditches and letting the cattle of about 40 farmers and milk producers run off in an undescribable scramble before an invasion ordered by the dictators of this century, the Liberals of Ottawa.

In order to win the war and annihilate the common enemy, the farmers' fields and herds, as well as the observance of ownership rights, had lost their significance: those peaceful people had to be shown that Canada was at war and that not even a second could be lost to build storehouses for explosives.

The administration of the day did not think it fit to send a message of warning to the farmers of that area to enable them to put their cattle on some other pasture, before the contractors' equipment changed the site earmarked by the Liberal high command for the erection of storage space for explosive matter.

You may imagine the disappointment, not to say the disgust, Mr. Speaker, felt by those 40 farmers or so who saw their land being invaded, their cattle chased about and their crops ruined because instructions had been given by the political appointees of the Liberal government to disregard ownership rights: the war effort was to be a total one, the stocking of explosive matters had a priority over the protection of cattle and farmers' rights.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a factual illustration of the Liberal attitude with regard to the farmers of Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Moreover, after seizing part of their land for which a derisive price had been arbitrarily set, the Department of Defence Production under Liberal rule registered some assessments for about 75 per cent of the whole acreage included while offering $1 a year per acre in compensation. Not only did those farmers have their cattle annihilated, their crops and land put to waste, but they also had to suffer a considerable devaluation of their property without receiving—and this was under Liberal rule—any compensation from the Department of Defence Production.

For over 18 years of Liberal rule in the county of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, these forty-odd farmers had to endure the oppression of their Liberal dictators who, every time these farmers dared complain, would reply: "There is the solution, take it or leave it!"

A Conservative government had to come along, which studied the farmer's problems and offered them a more equitable compensation, which was accepted.

Today that problem is settled, and those farmers are happy to have received double the offer of the Liberals, thanks to the understanding and the intelligent policies of the present Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) to whom I wish to express my sincere gratitude on behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent here.

[Mr. Bourbonnais.]

This, Mr. Speaker, proves the positive arrogance with which the Liberals approached agricultural problems in Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Again today the farmers in my county are being pushed around by another Liberal government. This time, it is the construction of the trans-Canada highway to which the federal government contributes generously. Under the federal statute enacted in that respect, the location of the highway and the expropriation of land come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. The locations chosen by the provincial Liberal government could not make less sense. In Vaudreuil-Soulanges, the highway seems to have been designed so as to destroy as many cultivated areas as possible, thus forcing many farmers to abandon their farms. When the actual construction starts, the Liberals use the same system which is dear to them. Graders start working on the fields, destroying fences, wells and crops, without the owners being advised even a few hours in advance.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals' attitude towards farmers never changes. They seem to enjoy harassing the farmers. I should like to give another example of their lack of consideration for those people whose properties are expropriated to make way for the trans-Canada highway. Lately, a minister in Mr. Lesage's cabinet compelled a school board to buy land at $5,000 an acre for the construction of high schools. This land forms part of a 400-acre farm bought at $1,000 an acre by a group of Liberals under the instructions of the Liberal minister. It is adjacent to the land which will be expropriated for the trans-Canada highway. But the Quebec Liberal government has offered the farmers $250 an acre only for the land to be expropriated. The farmers are given $250 while friends of the Liberal party receive $1,000.

This is a further proof of the lack of consideration, to say the least, that the provincial Liberals as well as the federal Liberals have for the farmers.

When friends or institutions founded by them are concerned, the Liberals are ready to pay a high price; but they do not have the decency to give proper compensation to farmers who are deprived of their property.

There is another case which clearly shows the lack of seriousness of provincial Liberals, caused by the paltry directives given by the federal member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), and in order to better identify him, I mean the ex-member for Stormont, who has now been transferred to the leadership of the federal Liberals in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this house will remember the pressure—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have no objection to the hon. member referring to me, but according to a ruling of the previous Speaker, a member must not discuss provincial elections, nor anything concerning another legislative assembly, as was done by the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges; therefore I object to the attitude taken by the hon. member.

So I think, Mr. Speaker, that you should draw the hon. member's attention to that ruling.

Mr. Speaker: In reply to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Laurier, it goes without saying that we shall hear, from time to time, references to provincial legislative assemblies. I do not think that, during the debate on the speech from the throne, such references could not be accepted, but I believe the hon. member is right when he objects to his speech being considered as an opportunity to discuss the policy of a provincial government coming under another jurisdiction, or activities of prime ministers representing certain legislative groups. Therefore, I think reference cannot be made to such a matter. If the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges has somewhat slipped in this connection—and I believe that we can anticipate references of the same kind, from time to time, because we have heard some quite often—I should like, however, to advise the hon. member to come back to the business under consideration.

Mr. Bourbonnais: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker, I shall begin at once.

The house will recall the pressure exerted by the hon. member for Laurier in order to transfer the Soulanges canal to the Quebec provincial government, a federal property, insisting on the urgency of setting up therein a tourist park, fishing ponds and a birds' paradise. In support of his friends, who were about to vanish from the Quebec political picture, and making himself their spokesman, the hon. member for Laurier was preaching the importance of providing for the welfare of birds and fish, instead of supporting our project of a more practical use of the Soulanges canal properties, that is the sale of certain parts of the canal to interested firms, in order that some manufacturing industries might be set up that would thus provide to the numerous workers of the Vaudreuil-Soulanges areas who had been looking for jobs since June 22, 1960, more permanent and remunerative work.

Despite the merits of that project, and as a result of the pressure exerted by the hon. member for Laurier who thought that his Liberal friends from the Quebec government could implement some of their fantastic projects in the Soulanges canal area, that canal was handed over to the province in July 1961. But, since then, the friends of the hon. member for Laurier have kept silent, have not yet accepted the federal government's offer of handing over to them all properties in the Soulanges canal area, valued at more than $200,000, for the "enormous" sum of $1. Perhaps the financial situation in which the provincial government now finds itself, thanks to Mr. Lesage's tremendous team, does not allow it to dispose of a single dollar for the purchase of the Soulanges canal.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to heed your advice to refrain from talking about provincial politics.

Mr. Speaker: Until now, the hon. member has been dealing with representations and relations between the federal and the provincial governments about a site located in his own riding. I trust that the hon. member will recognize him the right to put forward his arguments.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Yet, last winter, the Liberals of the province of Quebec conducted the widest possible publicity campaign to bring about the transfer of the Soulanges canal. They prepared a model at great cost and displayed huge descriptive panels of their project at the sportmen's show held in the trade mart in Montreal. The minister of game and fisheries, accompanied by his deputy minister, his secretary, the director of fish-breeding for the province of Quebec, his assistant, the chief engineer of highways and his assistant, all of them came here last March in order to urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) to transfer the canal to them immediately. They were even generous enough to give him 15 days to make a decision. This entire delegation, which was typically Liberal, made the trip from Quebec city to Ottawa at great cost, to demand that the Soulanges canal be handed over entirely to the Quebec Liberal government. They insisted that a decision be taken without delay so that fish could be put in the canal to enable fishermen to practise their favourite sport early in the following season.

On July 7, 1961, the Minister of Transport stated in this house that he was willing to transfer the Soulanges canal to the Quebec Liberal government at the ridiculously low price of $1, and the minister of game and fisheries expressed his satisfaction at this happy solution, as reported in the press. But since that time, that is over a period of 15 months, we have not yet heard from the Liberal government of Quebec, nor from the minister of game and fisheries and we got no reply. Apparently, the ministers of the Lesage cabinet are too busy unravelling the threads of the Shawinigan water and power matter to follow up the projects about which they were raising such a clamour last year. I wonder what the hon. member for Laurier will have to say concerning the Soulanges canal.

Talking about the former member for Stormont, I must congratulate him for having the new member for this constituency elected.

But, Mr. Speaker, do you know how he realized that feat? It was because the hon. member for Laurier talked at only one meeting held by the Liberal candidate.

An hon. Member: That brought results.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Lamoureux was elected with a narrow majority of 60 votes, and if the hon. member for Laurier had talked more often at Cornwall, Mr. Grant Campbell would be member for Stormont now.

Mr. Denis: What majority did the Conservative candidate get?

Mr. Bourbonnais: The hon. member for St. Denis seems completely lost; a Liberal won the victory.

Turning to other matters, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the government's attention to the question of taxes paid to the federal government by companies producing power for public consumption.

It is urgent for the federal government to amend the Income Tax Act as regards corporations so that such provinces where power systems are privately owned may collect all taxes which power companies pay to the federal treasury. Such provinces would then be placed on an equal footing with those which own the power systems and, therefore, do not pay federal taxes.

This anomaly has become one of the main arguments used by a few socialists who have forced their way into Quebec's provincial Liberal party and who, through their revolutionary cries, are seeking to divide the French-speaking and English-speaking elements of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, as I do not believe in state ownership, I am against the nationalization of power companies—which Quebec's Liberal party wants to bring about—because in the long run, an enterprise without competition, that is without any counterpart in private enterprise, always ends up by costing more to the taxpayer. Its employees, having lost all sense of efficiency, initiative and ambition, become slack and remiss in their work. Such an enterprise also tends to increase its personnel at an excessive rate, which makes for higher operating costs.

Mr. Speaker, if the Quebec hydro should take over all the power companies in Quebec and the management of all their personnels, we would then see the greatest network of patronage ever set up in America. At present, senior officials of the Quebec hydro are chief organizers of the provincial Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to call the hon. member's attention to the observations I made a while ago, although he was then discussing an agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments concerning the imposition of taxes. I think we should not discuss in this house the pros or cons of the nationalization of electric power in any province.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, I come back to the subject matter, but I must draw a comparison or point out the facts about a certain empire being built up in Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec. I should also like to tell the house that if nationalization took place, the Quebec hydro, after the C.B.C., would become the empire, the den of the Liberal party, to spread out the leftist or socialistic Liberal propaganda at the expense of the state.

The empire of the Liberal party would then cover the bungling press as well as the state radio and T.V. to reach finally every Quebec home with an electric shock. Then, a man such as Rene Levesque would only have to become leader of the Liberal party and, inspired by his idol Senor Castro, he could invite him in and hold wide open the doors of the province of Quebec to communist infiltration.

Under the pretext of giving back to the French Canadians the control of natural resources which are rightly theirs, Quebec Liberals will in fact succeed only in stirring up against us all the interests which control over 80 per cent of our industries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member will not persist in that course.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this matter is absolutely consistent with the spirit which must govern us in this house since we are here to promote national unity and to avoid any shock which could split the ethnic groups composing our nation, in the face of the serious dangers which exist in the province of Quebec at this time. I wish to warn my fellow citizens against this group which is trying to make one section of our people rise against another, and particularly against some separatists or leftists who endeavour to set the Canadians of one group against those of another, and who have only one political purpose in mind, that of being the party in office at any cost.

I wish to denounce such an attitude and such people, and I shall keep on reminding the house that the best interests of all Canadians resides not in being divided but in being united. We have to find a solution to very serious problems, and it is not in trading upon the feelings of a minority that we shall manage to establish that unity we must reach in Canada if we are going to keep prosperity in our country—

Mr. Rouleau: Conservative prosperity.

Mr. Bourbonnais: —and also to maintain our standard of living, which is the second highest in the world.

Mr. Denis: Do not talk against the other parties, then.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, what the province of Quebec needs to help the French Canadians recapture the place they long for in the Quebec economy, are men who will be able to lead them and to give them the means to become leaders themselves; it needs an improved education system, more professional and technical schools, of which the federal government pays 75 per cent of the construction costs, more schools of higher learning. The misconception that leads us to believe that we are the slaves of a superior race must disappear.

Our elite, our leaders will have to convince the French Canadians that success can be reached only through hard work and sustained efforts, rather than make them believe that the government is the only spring-board at their disposal to succeed, and also to remind them that they will have to be qualified enough so that the government will need them, and not the other way around. It is not by coveting another man's wealth that one gets rich, but in improving one's knowledge and working as hard as the other man.

Mr. Speaker, when the politicians, especially those in the Liberal party, stop lying to the people of Quebec and promising them the moon to get votes, when they stop laughing at the French Canadians and setting them against each other in order to come back to power at any price, in order to secure greater benefits from it at our expense, when they become more objective and stop fomenting hatred and, consequently, revenge, the French Canadians, instead of squabbling among themselves about matters of little importance, will stop taking opposite sides in matters of municipal or parochial importance, in sports, and even in business and industry. When the Liberals cease to divide French Canadians, we will stop wasting our time and we will direct our effort towards the improvement of our own business, without trying to blame anyone else for our failure.

What was granted to the Quebec French Canadians in the past five years of Conservative government compares most favourably with what was done over the 22 years of Liberal dictatorship in the Canadian parliament.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the austerity program.

Mr. Bourbonnais: When I see cartoonists and reporters with a conscience about as straight as a corkscrew, mock the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), I have pity on those would-be leaders of French Canada.

Mr. Rouleau: What do you think of Mr. Clement Brown?

Mr. Bourbonnais: The exaggerations and distortions of certain newspapers in the pay of the Liberal party, which are directed against the Conservative government and its leader, show the lack of judgment of their authors and the weakness of their arguments.

Those newspapers render a great disservice to the people of French Canada by distorting the facts and the truth.

Does not Canada enjoy the second highest standard of living in the world? The number of employed Canadians is constantly increasing, and the social benefits for the aged, the handicapped and the veterans have increased considerably under the Conservative government.

The average worker's salary has increased, the amounts paid to Canadian farmers, in the west as well as in the east, have more than doubled under the Conservative regime, and there has been no increase in federal taxes. On the contrary, some of those taxes were reduced by the Conservative administration.

That is, Mr. Speaker, what the Canadian people should be told and it is the beginning of the work done by a great Canadian, which all those people with small minds who take shelter in certain newspapers of Canada should recognize.

Instead of rousing the population against one of the greatest prime ministers Canada ever had since confederation, those people of small account with perverted minds should rather respect and imitate our Prime Minister who is trying so desperately to improve the fate of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, last Friday, we heard the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) batter down the Social Crediters' thesis and attack violently the provincial leader of that party.

I do not intend to defend their theories, but only—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, listen to the hon. members opposite laughing; they remind me of braying donkeys.

As I say, I hold no brief for the Social Credit philosophy, but I will try to throw some light on a real phenomenon: the election of 26 Quebec Social Credit members to this house. Similar causes led me to enter politics. Being the scion of a Liberal family, raised in a Liberal atmosphere, I was so disgusted by the lies and demagogic doings of the Liberal leaders I knew that I chose to join the Conservative party whose doctrine, in my opinion, was the closest to the Liberal philosophy, but whose leaders showed much more dedication to the people and interests of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when the Liberals were in office in Ottawa, and more particularly in Quebec, they never stopped exploiting the people's credulity and making the less prosperous people believe that the government could change their fate and settle them in the garden of Eden. During that time they encouraged the development of financial and industrial trusts, they nominated their friends to all the high positions in the federal government and in a great number of private companies. To stay in office, they resorted to all conceivable means, the most efficient of which were demagogy and promises.

In 1958, the Canadian people rejected them as a whole. And when the member for Laurier refers to the Social Credit group as being isolated at the far corner of the house, it comes to my mind that during the last parliament, the Liberals were not only isolated but wedged in, as in a nut-cracker, between the N.D.P. and the Conservative block. In 1960, another storm of demagogy, abuses and promises swept over the province of Quebec. When the Liberal thunder stopped and the voters realized that they had been submitted to another brainwashing, in addition to a four year Liberal campaign on the radio, on television and in various newspapers, against the Conservatives and their leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, a great number of people in Quebec lost faith in the traditional parties and thought they had nothing to lose by voting Social Credit. If there are now 26 Social Credit members in the house, it is those Liberal gentlemen's doing, and if they go on in the same way there will be 60 after the next election.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that those surviving among the 75 drips mentioned in his paper Le Devoir, by Andre Laurendeau, when speaking of the 75 Liberal candidates in the province of Quebec during the last election, will benefit from that lesson and will not follow in the steps of their leader, the number one demagogue of Canadian politics, the Picasso of politics.

Instead of wasting their time in looking for a bogey and trying to belittle personalities, I would advise them to read a booklet dealing with Frank Buchman's comments on Moral Re-Armament: they certainly would learn some very profitable lessons in doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that I had no intention of defending Social Credit. I must tell you that I do not share their views in the monetary field. Yet, those people have come here with a far greater sincerity than all our friends in the Liberal opposition. They came here to stand up for what they saw at home, to defend the small people who have been abandoned, flouted, and to whom the Liberals had been telling lies for much too long a time. And those people are criticizing and making fun of Social Credit members, which affects their voters. I myself am affected by such an attitude—

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I never heard anybody on this side of the house ridicule any hon. member. This goes to show—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Boulanger: —that the hon. member tries to convince the people that we are making fools of certain members in the house while, in fact, he is trying to make them look as martyrs so as to keep them on their side.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the circumstances, I suppose a member has the right to say that a certain group has certain attitudes but he cannot ridicule anyone in particular. Anyone who has closely followed the speeches made from both sides of the house has heard criticism of the policies put forward by various members but no one has ridiculed the character of a member of the house. Consequently, I would say that there have been no personalities up to now.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that hon. members opposite cannot accuse us of turning into ridicule any member of the house, be it the Social Credit members or any others.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I very much regret, but I fail to see any point of order in what the hon. member is submitting.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member representing a Montreal riding, which I do not know, says that he does not jeer at Social Credit, good for him. They have sufficiently upset and ridiculed the Quebec people during 22 years, and again during the last two years, they need not come in this house and try to apologize.

Mr. Boulanger: I am not indulging in personalities as far as the hon. member opposite is concerned, but I raised a point of order in order to prevent Social Credit members from setting themselves up as martyrs, by repeating the statements of the hon. member.

(Text):

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this intervention on my part in this debate may be attributed to the form of the amendment introduced on October 5 by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) on behalf of the official opposition. This latest contribution to the official opposition's war of attrition on stable government appears in this form:

> That the following be added to the address:
> "We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that the failure of Your Excellency's advisers to place before this house at the earliest opportunity a measure to approve the collection of taxes which have been imposed by order in council, as part of the austerity program, denies to this house the exclusive constitutional right to approve the imposition of additional taxation which is the foundation of our system of responsible government."

The hon. member has chosen, Mr. Speaker, to refer to a program that does not exist. There is no austerity program, but let us not take time on that. Evidently he has chosen to use wrong terms. He seems to be directing his attack against two elements in the exchange program that the government introduced in June. These two elements are the import surcharges and the reduction made in the exemption on tourist purchases. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this subject in relation to the legal and constitutional questions that are raised.

In relation to these two elements in the government's program may I speak first of all of the legal aspects. My first point is that we have proceeded on the advice of the law officers of the crown in the proper manner, and the advice we have is that the measures which were introduced by orders in council in June, which took effect one minute after midnight on June 25, are proper and legal; that the government had full power to proceed to pass those orders in council, and that those powers so exercised were conferred upon the governor in council by parliament. There can be no question about the validity of those orders in council.

As to the import surcharges—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member please wait until I finish my speech? Then if there is time I shall be glad to answer his question. The import surcharges were created by the use of powers drawn from two statutes, the first the Customs Tariff and the second the Financial Administration Act. As to the provisions in the orders dealing with the reduction in the exemption on tourist purchases, the authority for that action is contained in the Export and Import Permits Act and the Bretton Woods Agreement Act. Those are statutes of parliament. No one can question the propriety of those statutes, and those statutes have conferred upon the governor in council the very powers that were exercised by the governor in council in June when the program to meet the exchange emergency was announced.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on this subject of the validity and legality of these orders in council, let me say that the government has proceeded on the highest advice, and that the legality of these orders is not questioned unless hon. members choose to question the opinion of the deputy attorney general of Canada.

May I remind hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that when this program was announced no issue was raised by any member of the opposition, the Leader of the Opposition or anyone, as to the legality and validity of these orders in council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was an objection.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not a question was raised.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An objection was raised.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was not a question raised as to the validity or legality of those orders.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was raised in the Cornwall by-election.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not raised.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we can agree that one hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: And that we cannot continue to have orderly debate in this house if hon. members pop up in their seats from time to time to make gratuitous remarks or interventions. Might I also further indicate—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a new rule.

Mr. Speaker:—that requests for permission to ask a question should be directed through the Chair. There is a tendency to set up a two way communication system which bypasses the Chair, and I do not think that is in keeping with the spirit of the rules of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I proceed now, Mr. Speaker, to the other question that has been raised, what one might call a constitutional question, as to whether the governor in council has somehow or other imposed taxation here. It is an accepted rule, which no one questions, that taxation can only be imposed by act of parliament. That question was settled early in the seventeenth century. I remind hon. members that in 1628, and again in the bill of rights, the rule was then declared at Westminster, and has been observed since, or should have been, until the time when hon. members opposite were forming the government—and I shall have something to say about what happened in 1947—that no man should be compelled to make any gift, loan, or pay tax without consent by act of parliament. Therefore there is no question about the principle.

Had parliament not chosen to confer on the governor in council the powers that were exercised in June there would certainly be no right to impose import surcharges or to reduce the exemptions accorded to returning tourists. Those measures depend for their validity upon these enactments of parliament. I have referred to these enactments, and the authority is clear. Therefore there is no constitutional issue raised here, none whatever.

Parliament does not always proceed to impose taxation in a direct manner. There are various examples one could point to in the enactments of parliament where the taxation is not directly imposed or the rate directly established. I take time to mention only several of these. Section 4 of the Customs Tariff authorizes the withdrawal by the governor in council of tariff benefits, resulting in increased tariffs. Section 7 of the Customs Tariff authorizes the governor in council to impose a surcharge in certain cases. The Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which was on the statute books of this country for many years, authorized the governor in council to make regulations imposing export duties on power exported from Canada, and this authority was continued by section 4 of the Exportation of Power and Fluids Importation Act which was passed in this parliament in 1955. Perhaps hon. members will remember that year when a tax was, in fact, imposed by the governor in council under the authority of that provision, and this tax was made statutory by section 8 of the Excise Tax Act amendments which I had the privilege to introduce in 1959. The Export Act authorizes the governor in council to declare an export duty chargeable upon logs and pulpwood exported from Canada, and also authorizes the governor in council to impose export duties on certain ores and metals.

Therefore let it not be forgotten that when parliament imposes taxation it does not in all cases do so in direct terms. These are examples where parliament has given power to the governor in council to proceed with the imposition of taxation and the variation of taxation. There is nothing extraordinary about the legislation which parliament passed, or about the powers which were conferred by these parliamentary enactments on the governor in council, and which were exercised in June last.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry. I had to refuse a question already because I am not sure I have adequate time. If there is I will answer the question.

I come now to deal with the course we followed. It was a correct and lawful course. Here were powers that parliament had created. We exercised those powers, and we kept completely within the authority conferred upon us by parliament. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question as to the constitutionality of this course. If anybody questions it he has the right to go to the courts, but there cannot be any such question raised in parliament. My submission as to the constitutionality of the course that was followed is that parliament had created powers for this purpose, and we kept within those powers. I shall have something to say about the question of confidence before I conclude my remarks. That is another matter.

Now, by way of emphasizing the course we have taken in 1962, I wish to compare it with the course that was followed by the Liberal government in 1947; because there have been some erroneous and misleading references during this debate to what happened in 1947.

Let us look at what happened in that year. First let me observe that there were three elements in the program introduced by orders in council of the government in 1947 to meet the foreign exchange emergency of that time. First, by order in council they reduced the tourist exemptions. Second, by order in council they prohibited the importation of certain goods; and third, they imposed special excise taxes on certain goods.

Those were the three elements in their program. As to the first of these elements, the reduction of the tourist exemptions, there was undoubtedly authority to do this under the Foreign Exchange Control Act of 1946, which was still in force. I will have occasion to refer to that act further, and also to an undertaking that was given to the house when that legislation was under debate prior to its enactment.

As to the second element, the prohibition that was imposed by order in council on the import of certain goods, this was an order in council passed on November 12, 1947 which was not made public until November 17, 1947. Under its powers prohibition was imposed upon the entry of certain goods into Canada.

The minister of finance of that day, both in his famous radio speech on the evening of November 17, 1947 and later in his speech in the House of Commons on December 16, 1947, said that the government had obtained legal opinion to the effect that the government had power under the statute I have mentioned, namely the Foreign Exchange Control Act, to pass this order in council. Mr. Speaker, we have made diligent search of the records in the Department of Justice, and we have not been able to find any such opinion. I can only conclude, then, that it was an opinion given orally to the minister of justice at that time by the law officers of the crown. But in this regard I do draw attention to a factor of very considerable importance in relation to the use by the government of the powers that they claimed to possess under the Foreign Exchange Control Act of 1946. When that measure, as I have said, was under debate in this house Mr. Ilsley, then minister of finance, gave the house this assurance. It is to be found at page 2547 of Hansard of 1946:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movements.

In passing the order in council the government of that day just tore to shreds and ribbons that solemn undertaking that it had given to parliament in 1946 when it asked parliament to pass the Foreign Exchange Control Act and confer very wide powers upon the governor in council. So whether there was a legal question or not, a very important question with regard to keeping good faith with parliament certainly was involved in that order in council which gave effect to the second element in the program of the government of that time, in relation to the prohibition of the import of certain goods.

The third element in that program, Mr. Speaker, was the imposition of special excise taxes as from midnight on that night of November 17, following the radio speech delivered by the minister of finance that evening. Those taxes then imposed were without a shred of legal justification; they were illegal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what you say.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not simply a question of there being doubts about their legality; they were clearly illegal. Those taxes were collected for weeks and weeks and months before parliament ever validated them by retroactive legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was it ever challenged in the courts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a fine example, Mr. Speaker, of what hon. members opposite did, when they make the fictitious claim to be champions of parliament—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what you claimed a few moments ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —the imposition of taxes by a budget delivered over the radio, when parliament was not even in session.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A shocking derogation from the authority of parliament. A shocking resort to an utterly illegal course. Those were the three elements in the program of the government in 1947. There were very good reasons why they had to bring measures to parliament. With respect to the second element in the program, the prohibition on the import of certain goods, they had to come to parliament and ask parliament to forgive a breach of faith, even if they can have the benefit of the doubt in relation to the question as to the validity of their order in council in that respect. Then as to the third element in their program, the imposition of taxes, they had to ask parliament to validate something that was completely and utterly illegal. That is why they had to come to parliament and ask for enactments at the following session.

An hon. Member: You are really in trouble, aren't you?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not hear that remark, Mr. Speaker, but I have respect for parliament; I always have. I hope hon. members opposite will—

An hon. Member: What about the flower?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, under all conditions I have the highest respect for the traditions of parliament, even when hon. members opposite were seeking to degrade those traditions.

Let us examine a little further the record of the government in 1947. Did they come rushing to parliament and say, "In one case we broke faith with you, and in the other case we have arrogated to ourselves powers that we do not possess; we have taken an illegal course. Now please forgive one and validate the other". This happened on November 17. Parliament met on December 5. When do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, they got around to this subject? They went on to other business. It was not delayed by debate on the throne speech. They took only a day on the throne speech. The government had all kinds of other measures to put before parliament, so they did not bring this measure forward then.

Mr. Pickersgill: At the request of the opposition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not at the request of the opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the Hansard right here.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And so have I. Mr. King was putting forward measures he said were going to run out. There was the transitional measures act and powers relating to agriculture. So the minister of finance got around to moving second reading of the first of these measures, that respecting foreign exchange conservation, on December 16. There was a two day debate and the debate was adjourned. They were in no rush about this. Then there was a recess over Christmas and New Year's. Debate was resumed on January 26, and as a matter of fact this legislation was not passed until months afterward. The Foreign Exchange Conservation Act received royal assent on March 24, 1948. It came into effect on April 22, 1948.

Then there was the act to amend the Excise Tax Act. It received royal assent on March 24, 1948. My word, weren't they in a hurry to put this before parliament and ask parliament on the one hand to forgive their breach of faith, and on the other hand to validate acts on their part that were completely illegal?

Som hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Bell (St. John-Albert): Where was Bonavista then?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was behind the scenes pulling the strings, I expect. When this measure was placed before parliament, and I am referring now to the measure respecting foreign exchange conservation, the measure under which the government asked parliament to validate—let me make this clear; asked parliament not merely to give them authority to do the sort of thing they had been doing under that order in council of November 12, 1947 but, if you please, to validate everything that had been done under that order in council. They must have had some very uneasy consciences, Mr. Speaker. Section 14 of that bill—

Mr. Pickersgill: No; respect for parliament.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —provided not only for the powers in this respect but for the validation of what had been done under that order in council passed on November 12, 1947. Uneasy consciences, yes; but, Mr. Speaker, when they brought this measure forward they were still saying "We had the legal power to do what we did". Then we confronted them with this dilemma; "All right, if you had the legal power and you still assert that you had the legal power, why are you bringing this legislation forward? It is superfluous".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Correct constitutional practice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this is not a question of constitutional practice. The hon. member for Essex East is wrong, as usual.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Correct constitutional practice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is the dilemma with which we confronted the government that day. I am reading from page 393 of Hansard of December 17, 1947:

If this legislation is valid—

Mr. Pickersgill: What are you quoting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I continue:

—there was no occasion to bring the bill here; there was no occasion to bring parliament together to discuss this measure, and therefore the bill we are discussing is entirely unnecessary.

If the government—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, the hon. gentleman has not told us who he is quoting.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Eglinton; and you would have done well to have paid some attention in those days to him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why discredit your own witness?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Therefore this dilemma was presented squarely to the government, and squarely to the hon. member for Essex East, who was a member in those days of that despotic government which ran away from that dilemma.

So we have this position, that if the legislation were valid there would be no need to ask parliament to validate what is already valid, none whatever. The constitutional question in such situations arises in this form. Has the government which has exercised powers conferred upon it by parliament done so in circumstances or in a manner which still retains for that government the confidence of parliament? The constitutional issue is not validity of the order; the question is whether the government which has so exercised powers conferred upon it by parliament retains the confidence of the House of Commons. That is the constitutional issue; that is the issue which we welcome, Mr. Speaker, and that is the issue we are happy to face.

But let there be no mistake, Mr. Speaker, about what is respect for parliament, what is respect for parliamentary enactments, and what is respect for parliamentary practice in this regard. I draw attention as clearly as I can to the differences between the course followed by the government of 1947 and the course followed by the government of 1962. In 1962 we confined the measures which we took entirely within the scope of powers conferred upon us by parliament. There has been no excess on the part of the government of those powers clearly conferred upon it by parliament. Mr. Speaker, in 1947 the government of that day proceeded in a manner that was unconstitutional, because they broke faith with themselves; they broke faith with the parliament, and completely reversed a solemn undertaking given to the House of Commons the year before, and they used that legislation for purposes that in 1946 they said they would never use it for.

Then the third element in their program in 1947 was to take courses which were completely illegal. They tried to defend those illegal courses by saying "Oh, well, we have simply followed the budget practice, because when the minister of finance introduces his budget in the House of Commons with respect to changes in commodity taxes or tariffs, he always says that these will become effective at midnight that night." Then when the bill is introduced later, whether it be the Income Tax, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Tariff Act, or whatever it might be, in such situations parliament is asked to make the legislation effective from budget night. But though that is a parliamentary practice that applies to announcements in the budget speech made here in parliament, it does not apply to what is announced over the radio by a Liberal minister of finance. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the course followed in 1947 and the course followed by the government in 1962 is the difference between night and day. It is the difference between the illegality and unconstitutionality of 1947 and clear legality in 1962.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close this intervention in this debate without comment, with deep regret, on an observation that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when speaking in this house on October 4. The hon. member has always claimed to have respect for parliament and for the officials of government. Mr. Speaker, he allowed himself to say, as reported at pages 209 and 210 of Hansard last week, some things which are a very clear and regrettable reflection upon a very senior and respected law officer of the crown. He was speaking about the order in council, and at the top of page 210 he is reported to have said:

We have been told in this house that this was done by order in council based on legislative authority and that legal opinion was obtained that the government had power to do this. This legal opinion was obtained from the Department of Justice. We all know what the Department of Justice is doing when it gives a legal opinion.

The Department of Justice is under the government, and too often it gives the government the opinion it wants.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a shameful reflection upon the deputy attorney general of Canada. I deplore with all my heart that any hon. member of this house would stoop so low as to make a reflection of that kind. Let it be realized by all hon. members that unless you ask a law officer for his opinion in a completely untrammelled way, his opinion is not worth anything to the government which asks for it. There has not been at any time, Mr. Speaker, any attempt to tell law officers of the crown what opinion the government wanted from them; and believe me, Mr. Speaker, as long as I have the honour to be Minister of Justice, never will any law officer of the crown be asked to frame or change or colour his opinion to suit the convenience of the government. When I ask law officers for an opinion, Mr. Speaker, whether it be a legal opinion or anything else, I want their honest opinion. That is the way in which those officers have been treated. Their opinion has been treated with respect, there has at no time been interference with their opinion, and there will be none.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close these remarks today without expressing the deepest regret that the high regard in which the deputy attorney general of Canada deserves to be held by all hon. members of this house should have been qualified, should have been besmirched, in the way it was by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Speaker, here is our position in a word.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In taking our course we have acted in a legal manner and in a constitutional manner and on the best advice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice said that he would answer questions at the end of his speech, and I am now rising to put a question.

Mr. Speaker: I was on my feet as the minister was finishing to advise him that his time had expired.

Mr. Orlikow: Convenient.

Mr. Speaker: I would say to the hon. member who made that remark that I trust there is no reflection upon Mr. Speaker, that he stood up deliberately.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: While Mr. Speaker is addressing the house—this has nothing to do with me personally—I wish hon. members who have anything to say would stand at their seats and say it. The minister's time having expired, he may answer questions provided the house unanimously gives him approval to extend his time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg.

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to participate in the throne speech debate. My first words will be to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Waterloo South and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. They have set a standard which all of us would like to emulate, and they are a credit to their constituencies.

I should also like at this time to congratulate you, sir, on your elevation to the highest office we have to offer in this house, that of Mr. Speaker. It is a position that I know you will fill with dignity and with fairness to all hon. members in every part of the house. I should like to congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker and the newly elected ministers and newly elected parliamentary secretaries, who I am sure will give a good account of themselves when carrying out their new duties.

As I look at the many new faces in this house I believe it is only fitting that I take this opportunity to thank the voters of Queens-Lunenburg who honoured me by re-electing me to the House of Commons. Since the opening of the 25th parliament I have listened to the speech made by our Prime Minister, as well as to the speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Social Credit party and his deputy, and the acting leader of the C.C.F.-N.D.P. party. In my opinion our Prime Minister and his cabinet deserve the praise of all Canadians for the monumental, well planned program enunciated in the speech from the throne. I also believe that our Prime Minister in his remarks gave an outstanding résumé of industrial growth and development taking place in Canada that is bound to instil confidence throughout this entire nation.

Unfortunately I cannot say the same for the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition or of the leaders of the other two parties in this house. As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition outline his program I could not help but realize that here is the leader of a party completely devoid of a sense of responsibility to the Canadian people. His program would indicate that Canadian Liberalism has taken a mighty swing to the left with an impact that has left old line Liberals clinging to the rigging.

An hon. Member: Let us have an election.

Mr. Crouse: The Liberal ship of state is running into heavy weather, and the new boys on deck will soon wish they had the old compass by which to steer rather than the new chart which I believe has been prepared by the hon. member for Davenport and more lately by the hon. member for Assiniboia, which charts none of them can read and few of them can understand. These new planks will force even the C.C.F. or N.D.P., whatever they choose to call themselves, to seek out more distant horizons of socialism. It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, more than 80 years ago, when defining a Liberal stated as follows:

> His cravings will always extend far wider than his resources, his actions will never reach the level of his concepts. His completed task is always ready to be done over.

Even Sir Wilfrid would look in wonderment at the proposals of the present Liberal leader, for the big question which must now be asked is whether this nation can at this time stand the extra bill that would come with these new ventures in the realm of state welfarism, state paternalism, or state socialism as enunciated by the Liberal party. It is estimated that these proposals would cost an additional $1 billion or more annually if implemented; and it must be remembered that it is the Canadian taxpayer who must pay this bill and not promising politicians who sit in this House of Commons.

The impact of the socialist from Assiniboia is quite evident. I wonder how long it will be before he will be taking over the leadership of the Liberal party. What did we hear before the election? The Liberals in my constituency were critical of our deficit budgeting. They said we spent too much money on Canadians, that we were going too far too fast.

Mr. Byrne: You are going in the wrong direction.

Mr. Crouse: I will get around to you after you make your speech. What did we hear from the Leader of the Opposition? We heard plans for a program of massive spending, creating even greater deficits. Is this the opinion of the eminent business consultant, the hon. member for Davenport, or of Mr. Sharp, or of Mr. Lamontagne? Is this their assessment of the present state of the Canadian economy? Never in history has this country seen a fear campaign comparable with the one which was conducted during the recent election. My predecessor, a former Liberal cabinet minister, when he came to Nova Scotia, as he had nothing to lose, said to the people in Lunenburg that Canada is on the verge of bankruptcy and that it would be wrong to mislead the people into thinking a new government can easily balance the country's budget. We observed other types of fear campaigns conducted. When the hon. member who has just taken his seat went to speak in Newfoundland, what did we see on the front page of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald? We saw this headline: Smallwood gave order; Fleming cancels speech.

An hon. Member: It is a Liberal quotation.

Mr. Crouse: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he made his speech. I would ask him not to interrupt me. In speaking about the interference which the Prime Minister was obliged to undergo when he tried to conduct a meeting in Vancouver, the Leader of the Opposition said that Liberalism does not do that kind of thing, that it staunchly defends the right of any man to be heard. What arrogance that is, and what rot. Socialism under a Liberal banner or a C.C.F.-N.D.P. banner has never gained a strong following in Nova Scotia, and this is especially true among the thrifty, hard working citizens of Queens and Lunenburg counties. Neither will they be fooled by the Social Credit promise of no more debts, interest payments or taxes. We know any government can get along without debts or taxes. This can be done by simply printing the money; and we know what this action would do to our present financial system.

Mr. Speaker, as I contemplate the results of the recent election and look at the four parties in this house, I cannot help but feel concerned for Canada. While it is true that my party did not receive an over-all majority from the Canadian people, indicating over-all confidence in our program, it is equally true that the Canadian people placed less confidence in the program of the Liberal party, and that only small areas elected members of the Social Credit party or of the C.C.F.-N.D.P. party.

Some responsibility for this indecision of the Canadian voter must rest upon the shoulders of all parties, especially upon the shoulders of the two old line parties in this country. With a population of slightly more than 18 million people in Canada, in my opinion we cannot afford the luxury of more than two political parties. Canada has grown to its present state of importance and influence in world affairs under one or the other of the two old line parties which have controlled its destinies since 1867. We would not be faced with another election at the present time if there were only two parties in Canada. Unless we return to the two party system I have grave doubts for the future of the democratic processes in Canada.

Some responsibility for this situation must also rest upon the Canadian voter. It would appear that some Canadians have lost the spirit, the will to achieve, the desire to accomplish that helped build this nation.

Mr. Berger: Why blame the people for your own shortcomings?

Mr. Crouse: When you have a chance to make a speech, we will listen to you. Rather than strive for independence, some people are willing to sacrifice their freedom for promised security, a form of security promised by government. What we need in Canada is a new sense of purpose, a genuine realization that we must work hard, and a realization that we can share only that which is first produced. We have been somewhat local in our thinking without realizing that the world is changing fast. New trading alliances among our friends threaten our traditional markets.

This fact was brought forcefully to my attention during the past few months, when I met with delegates from 17 commonwealth countries at a commonwealth parliamentary conference in London. We were there to discuss the future role of the commonwealth in the modern world. In my opinion, following this conference it was the intention of the United Kingdom to join the European common market as soon as convenient, if at all possible.

This attitude, of course, did not meet with the approval of any of the representatives of the other commonwealth countries. Our Prime Minister, when he recently attended the prime ministers' conference in London, took the same stand. I think it is his responsibility to make representations on behalf of Canadian industry, Canadian farmers, Canadian fishermen and Canadian labour. After all, this is one of the reasons prompting the United Kingdom to join the common market. She is attempting to gain greater economic benefits for her people. Would we expect our Prime Minister to do any less on behalf of Canadian citizens? However, a close study of the European common market indicates that this is a magnificent political achievement, and when you stand at the memorial at Verdun and realize that part of this transformation is the reconciliation of France and Germany, you then have a greater appreciation of the new spirit permeating Europe and of Britain's desire to become a part of this development.

Where does this leave us? We must be prepared, if Britain joins, for some loss of our privileged position in the United Kingdom market, but Britain will continue to need many of the things we now export to her and trade may be less drastically affected than we might suppose. In fact, with Britain entering the common market it is possible her industries may increase their imports of raw materials from Canada. On the other hand, we must not underestimate our sales prospects in a western Europe enjoying rising prosperity and high living standards. However, our progress in this direction will depend upon the initiative of each and every one of us. We will have to go after these markets with well designed products at competitive prices and with vigorous and imaginative salesmanship. Obviously, the more successful we are in holding down our costs and improving our productivity, the more successful we will be in increasing our exports. This also implies progressive and forward thinking on the part of management plus a spirit of cooperation among labour.

This is the challenge faced by all Canadians, management and labour combined, if we are to successfully meet the threat to Canadian jobs posed by intensified foreign competition. This is a problem that not only concerns the government but is the concern of every Canadian; and when we realize we can only improve our living standards not by leaning on the government but by working harder and in greater harmony together, we will then achieve a new sense of national purpose. We must endeavour as a nation to conquer our unemployment problems, and this can only be achieved by providing improved opportunities in our primary and secondary industries.

The speech from the throne offers many incentives that will help bring this about, and it is indicative of the careful thought given to these problems by the Prime Minister and his cabinet. There is not sufficient time for me to comment on all the proposals in the throne speech, but I should like to deal with a few that are important to my province and to my constituency of Queens-Lunenburg.

I note it is the intention of the government to take positive, constructive measures to strengthen Canada's balance of international payments. The recently stabilized exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has helped producers in all parts of Canada, both in the domestic and export markets, and is contributing as well to a large expansion in the Canadian tourist industry. This fact unfortunately became a political football in the recent election, with Liberal money being printed with caricatures of our Prime Minister and the then minister of finance on either side and showing a value of 92½ cents. This Liberal money, Mr. Speaker, was of no more value to Canadians than the Liberal promises were during the 22 years they were in office, though it was indicative of the childish attitude of the Liberal party toward the Conservative administration. I am certain this juvenile Liberal paper money did not gain any supporters in Queens-Lunenburg, for the voters in my constituency remember only too well the depreciation in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar under 22 years of Liberal rule.

Inflation ran rampant under the Liberal government; it kept statisticians busy altering the cost of living index until we realized that in 1956 it took $1 to buy what 50 cents would buy 20 years before. However, the stabilized exchange rate has been beneficial to our great and expanding fishing industry, our pulp and paper industry and our tourist industry. It is the tourist industry that offers still greater potential income for Nova Scotians, and as the industry expands it strengthens Canada's balance of payments.

One project that would be helpful to our tourist industry is a second ferry between Nova Scotia and Massachusetts. I am fully aware that such a link has not always been successful in the past. Services once provided between Yarmouth and Boston declined and were withdrawn. However, I believe these connections were casualties of changing times, and that a second ferry service today between Nova Scotia and the United States would be beneficial to both countries. The present service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor has not been able to accommodate the demands of traffic, especially in the summer months. It is primarily a service to Canada, for it favours drivers from Ontario and Quebec. I find no fault with this, but travellers from Massachusetts find it necessary to stay somewhere overnight in order to proceed to Nova Scotia, and they may as well drive all the way to the maritimes.

I believe a daylight run from Nova Scotia to Gloucester would be a great convenience. It would eliminate the need for costly sleeping accommodation on board the ferry, and it would open up for us the potential tourist market in the greater Gloucester, Boston and New York area, where over 50 million people reside. In addition, the ferry would provide quicker delivery for the products of our expanding fresh fish industry, which are daily gaining in favour and enjoying increasing sales in the United States market. This link is essential to provide an increased flow of trade between these historic trading areas, and I hope the government will give favourable consideration to this proposal.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Crouse: When the house rose at one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was making a plea on behalf of the tourist industry in Nova Scotia. I should like now to make a plea on behalf of agriculture. The throne speech points out that the prosperity of agriculture remains essential to the well being of the entire Canadian economy, and the government recognizes that livestock is occupying a position of increasing importance in Canadian agriculture. It is proposed that a program be instituted to assure the availability of storage facilities and the continuity of supplies of feed grain, especially in areas of British Columbia and eastern Canada where supplies of feed grain are normally deficient. This is a program that I heartily endorse, for it will fill a long felt need in eastern Canada, especially in my riding.

In a previous speech I pointed out that approximately 50 per cent of the people in my constituency earn their living by working in primary industries such as agriculture, fishing and lumbering. In Lunenburg county, especially in the areas surrounding the town of Bridgewater, there are a large number of people entirely dependent upon agriculture for a living. This is true also in the Caledonia area of Queens county. In former years many people were engaged in mixed farming, but recently some farmers have become more selective and have specialized in the raising of hogs, cattle or poultry. I believe there is a greater awareness today of the fact that agriculture is no longer a method of earning supplementary income. Our Lunenburg and Queens county farmers are now looking at agriculture in its proper light, as an industry, a big industry, that can provide a way of life with peace of mind and material benefit unsurpassed by any other type of employment.

Gross farm income last year from all agricultural production in Nova Scotia exceeded $60 million. Nova Scotia has long been recognized as a grass country, a province in which grass grows probably as well as it does anywhere in the world. However, a trip through the province will show some neglected farms, with land standing idle, and this is indicative of the fact that we are wasteful of our resources. It is gratifying to note the throne speech indicates that the government recognizes the need for further training in agriculture, with present facilities under review. This is the heart of the problem, and is most commendable; for it is only through proper training that we can further develop the great potential of our land resources.

Agriculture today offers unlimited opportunity to Nova Scotians. We are a province deficient in both hog and beef production. At present we consume over 100,000 carcasses of beef annually, while producing less than 70,000 head. We produce approximately 80,000 hogs annually while our requirements are in excess of 250,000, to say nothing of the sales potential in the adopted home of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or the new market that is opening up in our northern regions, areas opened up by the progressive policies of this Conservative government. There is no reason whatever, Mr. Speaker, why Nova Scotia and the counties of Queens and Lunenburg cannot maintain a much larger production of livestock such as beef and hogs than it does at the present time. We have many factors in our favour, and grass is not the least of these. The figures I have given indicate there is tremendous room for development, expansion and growth in these areas of production.

However, if we are to make the most of our opportunity and use our resources to the best advantage, we must be prepared to produce the pasture, the silage, the hay and other forage crops that a greatly expanded livestock enterprise both requires and demands. Assistance toward this end is now available under ARDA, and community pastures can be developed to provide grazing areas for livestock. However, one of the problems facing farmers in Queens and Lunenburg counties desirous of increasing hog production has been the high cost of feed grains. The new proposal to establish storage facilities for feed grains will go a long way toward alleviating this problem.

I suggest that the federal government give earnest consideration to establishing a feed grain depot at Bridgewater in Lunenburg county. Situated on the beautiful Lahave river, Bridgewater is the centre of a large shopping and agricultural area. It has adequate facilities for docking large ships, and cargoes of grain could be brought directly from the head of the lakes to Bridgewater for dispersal to the agricultural industry on the south shore of Nova Scotia. Facilities for grinding grain are already available at Bridgewater, and distribution could readily be made to New Germany, Chester and Lunenburg, as well as to all points in Lunenburg county and agricultural areas of north Queens and Caledonia.

I am pleased also to note that according to the throne speech amendments will be proposed to the Canada Shipping Act to preserve for Canadian vessels the coasting trade in the St. Lawrence and great lakes area. This, Mr. Speaker, is an endorsement of a proposal I made when speaking in this house on May 22, 1958, and will be welcome news for Canadian ship owners operating out of Lahave and Lunenburg as well as Queens county. It is gratifying, too, to note that funds will be requested to implement the shipbuilding program announced some months ago, and that plans will be made to establish an Atlantic development board. I hope this board will give earnest consideration to the problem of assisting in the establishment of another fish processing plant at Liverpool.

Since the announcement by the Conservative government of the shipbuilding assistance program a total of 15 new draggers over 86 feet in length have been approved for construction in Nova Scotia. At present nine of these draggers are under construction, and in addition assistance has been provided for 84 smaller fishing craft. Some of these new fishing boats could, I believe, operate out of a new fish plant if it were established in Liverpool.

This federal program has stimulated a spectacular boat and shipbuilding program which will result in the creation of more than 1,000 new jobs for fishermen and fish plant workers within the next two years. Despite this fact, what does the Leader of the Opposition say? He says that no progress is being made in Canada. Well, the nine Conservatives in this house from ridings in Nova Scotia somewhat refute that statement. We in Nova Scotia have certainly seen great changes in the last five years, with new development taking place in our province and with 14 new manufacturing industries established in the past year. In the report of the president of the Halifax board of trade we read this:

> Nova Scotia is entering a new era of prosperity, spurred on by stepped-up construction projects in nearly every section of the province.
> When we look at the projects and construction going on in every section of the province we believe there is sound basis for our view that this whole area is indeed on the brink of a boom.

It is a boom, Mr. Speaker, generated by Conservative policies not only in Nova Scotia but throughout the entire Dominion of Canada.

In conclusion, as we see our shipbuilding plants, some of them with orders booked ahead for one year and some for two years; when we see our people working; when we see our fishing industry and agricultural industry expanding, and when we see progress on every hand, then I know that the people in my riding and throughout Nova Scotia look to the future with confidence and optimism.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to join those who have spoken in praise of yourself as well as of the Deputy Speaker of the house.

I also wish to associate myself with all those who have congratulated, and properly so, the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker, we are back in the House of Commons for the first session of the twenty fifth parliament of the Canadian nation. We notice, with a certain pride, that a change has occurred on this side of the house, since the end of the last session of the 24th parliament. We come back to this house with an increased representation from the Liberal party, which can rely on members ready for the task they will have to fulfil.

We also notice with pride that the Canadian people have indicated very clearly their lack of confidence in the Conservative Tory government headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), since they have sent to this house more than twice the Liberal representation they had during the last parliament and they have a majority vote for the Liberals throughout the country, a vote which exceeds that of the Conservative party by a margin of 4,315 votes.

Mr. Speaker, we owe this increased popularity of the Liberal party to the personal popularity of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who is recognized not only in Canada, but throughout the world, as one of the leading statesmen of our times.

We also owe this popularity to the Liberal platform which has succeeded in securing the attention of the people and in answering the hopes of the majority of Canadians which we are called upon to serve as members of this house.

Now, if we study the position of the Liberal party in Canada, we notice with pleasure that the result of a Gallup poll conducted throughout the country which was published last Saturday gave 47 per cent of the popular vote to the Liberals, 25 per cent to the Conservatives, and the remaining percentage to the other parties.

Is it surprising, Mr. Speaker, that with such a result, a new and weak party should shrink before the prospect of an election? Is it surprising that a party which claims to be a renovating force should unite with the old worn out Tory party to prevent a general election? What has the house witnessed lately? The unholy alliance of a new party with the Conservative party. What a marriage. The children which will come out of it will certainly not be strong.

An hon. Member: What nonsense.

Mr. Dupuis: If I had your brains, I would keep quiet. This is something to see, this alliance between the Social Crediters and the Conservatives. By voting with the Conservatives, the Social Crediters have shown to the people that they have confidence in the Tories which they fought during the last electoral campaign.

An hon. Member: That is not what was said.

Mr. Dupuis: Isn't it?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Dupuis: No? Listen to them, Mr. Speaker. They do not even know what a vote in this house means.

Well, tonight, our friends will have to vote once more. They will not support the non-confidence motion, based on a very sound and democratic principle, which consists in finding out whether a government has the right to impose austerity measures or to increase the tax rate, without previously consulting the House of Commons, the people's only voice, which is elected by the people and for the people.

They will have to vote tonight, Mr. Speaker, and I shall tell you that I much prefer belonging to the Liberal party to finding myself in the phony position in which our Social Credit friends have now been for much too long a time. Yet we heard them say that they are happy about their attitude.

You just have to read once more the statement of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), their number one leader—because they have a leader and a deputy leader—now, the number one leader the hon. member for Red Deer, claims in this House of Commons that more than 25 per cent of the population intimated through their votes that they had no longer any confidence in the old parties. He was not aware that by such a statement he was condemning himself, because if 25 per cent of the population indicated their lack of confidence in the old parties, the remaining 75 per cent indicated their lack of confidence in the new parties.

I think our hon. friends would gain something if they read the magnificent speech delivered by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I feel our Social Credit friends had better seek information on the role played by their party in Canada's history. I believe they should read the statistical data quoted by the hon. member for Laurier last week.

In the past there were many Social Credit members; nowadays, there are none left, except four in British Columbia. There are those newcomers from Quebec whose leader, I mean the deputy leader, stated that the Social Credit surge was a miracle. In their stead, I would be suspicious of a surge. Mr. Speaker, I will quote Corneille, and I am sure my hon. friends the Social Crediters will not say that he was a Liberal. I invite them to meditate on this sentence. Here is what Corneille would think of that surge; if he were living nowadays, he would not say otherwise:

Le Cid by Corneille, Scene 3, Act IV:
The flow brought them in and the ebb took them back.

Such is the present situation of Social Credit in the province.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, have we ever seen so striking an example of the saying that extremes meet and opposites attract each other.

So, we see that marriage to which I referred a moment ago, and so we see that unbelievable party, directed on the one hand by the hon. member for Red Deer, who is supported by Mr. Manning, the premier of Alberta, and on the other hand by the Social Credit deputy leader (Mr. Caouette), who is supported, helped and seconded by the questionable premier of British Columbia.

Here is an example, Mr. Speaker, proving that the status of the deputy leader is not as good as our Quebec friends believe it to be.

According to the Canadian Press of August 25, 1962, Mr. Manning stated the following:

Whoever wishes to know the position of the Social Credit in all matters has but to interrogate the only person who is competent to speak on behalf of that party, that is, the national leader, Mr. Thompson. The ideas expressed by Mr. Caouette about Hitler and Mussolini are his personal ideas.

They are ashamed of Mr. Caouette in the west.

The premier of Alberta, a Social Crediter, takes the trouble of cautioning all Canadians, all Social Crediters, against the propaganda of the Social Credit deputy leader. Where is he heading to?

Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, the premier of British Columbia has no particular sympathy for the leader, the hon. member for Red Deer. As far as he is concerned, his man is the great Caouette. He describes him as the greatest French Canadian since Sir Georges-Etienne Cartier. What a joke.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well to remind the present Social Credit leader—the western one, the real one—that the success of his party in Quebec is not miraculous. Everyone knows what happened in Quebec. While, in this house, a group of hard-working members were looking after the interests of Quebec constituencies, there were "door-to-door" people spreading the Social Credit doctrine; and while we were doing our duty here, those people were talking nonsense to the population. We did not know anything about it. We discovered that too late. But today we can tell them that we know their methods, that we shall fight them and hurl them back into the sea at the next election.

Mr. Speaker, they used television—

An hon. Member: They also used boats.

Mr. Dupuis: I believe that on the day of reckoning, the boat will be so overcrowded by defeated candidates that it will sink.

The deputy leader of the Social Credit party appeared on television. He stated, after he was elected, that that was his most powerful weapon. He spoke to each constituent, each week, through T.V. He knew full well that no member of this house had the time to see or hear him on television unfolding his tales as he did through that publicity medium. That is how he abused the good faith of the Quebec voters.

Thus, unopposed, he made, on television, statements which were utterly false, condemnable and amazing.

Today, fortunately, we have come back to the Canadian parliament. Now, instead of being able to make all kinds of statements, unknown to us, these men are before us and we shall call them to order each time they will lie to the people of the province of Quebec.

They tried to show in beautiful words, that a country managed by a Social Credit government would be heaven on earth.

An hon. Member: Who composed that, a bank manager?

Mr. Dupuis: We were told that all was well in the west under the Social Credit system; it was even stated that debts had been wiped out in British Columbia.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Dupuis: And it was even maintained that there was no more direct taxation in Alberta.

An hon. Member: That is correct.

Mr. Dupuis: What ignorance, Mr. Speaker. We shall give them figures. You are not in the backwoods any more, you are no more among people who have not the statistics.

I do not blame you for lying, and I shall never say that a Social Credit member is a liar, even if he should tell an untruth, because, according to the Christian dogma, to be a liar, you have to fulfil three conditions: You must have sufficient knowledge, fully realize what you are doing, and the matter in question must be grave.

They have such incomplete understanding of the facts that they come and tell us in this house, and repeat it too, that debts have been wiped out in British Columbia.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what do the figures tell us, the official statistics which are now available to members, and which they did not have before the election. That is what official statistics tell us.

In British Columbia, the debt per capita amounting to $738.88 is the highest in Canada. Mr. Speaker, in the province of Ontario, under an administration—

An hon. Member: On a point of order.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Shefford is rising on a point of order.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: I hope it is not a point of disorder.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, this morning our Liberal friends prevented a Conservative member from speaking on provincial matters, because they said it was not in order. These very matters are being dealt with now.

Mr. Dupuis: The Social Crediters even dared to tell us during the election campaign that there was no debt in British Columbia.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville has the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate that our hon. friends feel pain when we point out their lies in this house, but their suffering is not over because, in the name of public honesty and out of respect for the men who make up the Canadian nation, it is our duty to set the facts in their true light, and we will do it.

In Ontario, a province headed by a Conservative government, the per capita debt amounts to $505.05. The debt in the province of Quebec, with $254.59, is the third lowest.

That should give food for thought to the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais) who praises the Social Crediters in this house.

Mr. Speaker, not only did they lie about statistics, but they stated that there was no direct taxation in Alberta, while they should have known better. I do not say that they knew, for I know they did not, but I say they should have known that in the province of Alberta there was direct taxation, personal income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. If they were not cognizant of those facts, they know them now, they will no longer be able to repeat that on television. Now, the people will know that they are lying.

Mr. Speaker, reply has not yet been given to the statements made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who, having quoted an extract from the book "Réal Caouette vous parle" added that they had even asserted that the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was a member of the federal cabinet from 1939 to 1945. This is completely false, because the Leader of the Opposition was made a minister in 1948. When the Social Crediters made such a statement, they were lying to the voters in the province of Quebec.

During the election campaign, you asserted in the province of Quebec that the Liberal party had gotten Canada into debt—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Dupuis: —for $17 billion during the war. If you look at the statistics however, you will see that Canada's debt increased by only $8 billion during the war.

Third, you said at one time that the Bank of Canada could issue money, and at another time that this was done by chartered banks. You cannot even agree with one another, you are confused and lost, you do not know where you are going.

An hon. Member: Social Credit is hard to take.

Mr. Dupuis: Not at all. I am in a good mood and I only want to put your affairs in order.

Mr. Speaker, I hear the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau). Now, there is a member who stands high for you. Listen for a while to the hon. member for Shefford—

An hon. Member: Not of the same standing as you.

Mr. Dupuis: Right after the general election, he held a press conference. He had become somebody. He expressed the hope that T.V. would come into this house to show the empty seats, to show members going out in the hall to get drunk and play cards.

And, after that, we are being told that one of the first points of the Social Credit doctrine is respect for the human person. Well, Social Credit no longer respects anything. I hope that it—

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order. I should like to know where the hon. member held his press conference and if he could please provide me with the text.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dupuis: If the member for Shefford cannot even remember what he said, let him get La Presse and I shall show him. The poor little boy. The poor little boy.

Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) that when he comes and says in the province of Quebec that members of the House of Commons are getting intoxicated and are playing cards in the lobbies, when we hear on television that members are drunk because they are not in their seats, I ask the member for Shefford to look at the seat of his deputy leader, for that seat is the one which is the most often empty.

Mr. Gregoire: On a point of order. Mr. Speaker, if the seat of the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is empty it is because the population—

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no point of order. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Speaking of publicity, I think it would be a good thing if our Conservative friends, who rely on the support of Social Crediters to remain in office, read this morning's Globe and Mail. I do not have the time to read the article but they should do so, as it might make them think. The article states that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dumont) takes the same attitude as the fascists did when they decided to abolish human freedom. That should give them something to think about. Obviously, the Conservatives are mad at their leader for degrading their party by joining forces with people like the present Social Credit members.

Mr. Speaker, we proudly remind the house of the Social Credit members' predecessors.

I should like to recall the memory of Mr. Boivin, a member who always did his job with dignity. There is also Mr. Bourget, a great citizen who, for 22 years was a credit to the house, to his constituents and to all Canadians. Mr. Augustin Brassard, the former member for Lapointe, was a first rate and very active member who will return to parliament at the next election; Mr. Jean-Paul Racine, a young man who was active, dedicated, progressive and able to work for his own people; Mr. Roberge, the former vigilant member for Megantic, and Mr. Samuel Boulanger. Those are all worthy men who were replaced by loud-mouths who do not even know what they are doing or saying.

Mr. Speaker, in referring to the respect due to the human being, I wish to remind the house of what the Social Credit leader said in his maiden speech. He stooped to say that when he heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Leader of the Opposition, the whole proceeding reminded him of a television program from Havana.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, it does not behoove a party leader, especially in his maiden speech before the nation, to speak nonsense, even though he is the leader of the Social Credit party. I hope that after hearing his deputy leader, he was reminded of the golden era of the Italian government under the Benito Mussolini administration.

Mr. Speaker, I have little time left, but I have enough to keep speaking of my friends.

An hon. Member: Keep on, we like it.

Mr. Dupuis: They lied to the people during the last election campaign, they lied on television and they are keeping it up. Last week, the deputy leader of the Social Credit party appeared on T.V. with the president of the Canadian Labour Congress.

An hon. Member: No, the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

Mr. Dupuis: He said he was right to admire Hitler—he always keeps in contact with Germany—he said that he received a letter from Hamburg, from the president of the Reichsbank, and that he would show it soon. Before he shows it, I shall tell him as a friend, that if I were in his place, I would not mention the president of the Hamburg bank.

Here is what the president of the Reichsbank, a former finance minister under Hitler, said—

An hon. Member: You also correspond with him.

Mr. Dupuis: I will tell you where I got my information. This is what Dr. Schacht, a friend of the deputy leader, a former finance minister of Hitler, said of the Social Credit philosophy in his book entitled "Memoirs of a Magician":

> When a nation spends more than its revenue and when it tries to meet its financial obligations by increasing the amount of its currency (therefore by printing money), the value of that currency decreases. Such was the situation in which Germany found itself following the first world war. Those who were most affected by inflation were the common people in Germany.

Mr. Speaker, "to issue currency" is what the member for Villeneuve wants to do, and this is what his friend, the president of the Reichsbank, writes on page 163 of his book. I quote:

A great concern and a growing bitterness took hold of the labourers, employees, investors, who could not any longer meet even their daily keeping expenses. In vain did they keep on increasing salaries in paper money; it did not change anything. On the contrary, the more paper money was put into circulation, the faster its buying power diminished.

For the guidance of the member for Villeneuve, he continues on page 164, in the same book. I quote:

In 1923, devaluation of currency progressed at a frightful speed. It was necessary to issue such a volume of paper money that the printing press of the Reichsbank was far behind in meeting the demand. Many private printing presses were required to print more and more paper money. The day came when a street car ticket cost one billion marks.

And if I may continue, on page 165:

The living standard of the common people in 1923 took such a fall that communism grew in disquieting proportions. The magnitude of the political unrest forced the stabilization of the currency to avoid a catastrophe. One must remember that in those years banknotes were shipped in huge bales through towns and provinces, in moving vans, in railway cars, and that the cost of printing exceeded the face value of the bills off the printing press; this may help us fully understand the folly of those times. They were shamefully playing with the most precious capital of our people: its working power.

We condemn Social Credit today, and we remind our hon. friends that such experience gained in Germany should make them take a second look, and so should the experience of France when it printed those famous "consignats" during the revolution. But what can you do? They know nothing of history. Therefore I ask them to take the first page of the "Third Reich", a book they will find in the parliamentary library, and read the following words at the beginning of the book:

Those who do not remember the past are condemned to live it again.

Those are the words of the American author Santayana.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have this to say to the Social Crediters: You have no right to come with your false doctrines, and to try to deceive the population of the province of Quebec. The citizens of the province of Quebec who voted for Social Credit are no fools. No, but the people of the province of Quebec are a proud people, they have believed in your words, but they are now aware of your deceit and they will never forgive you.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the 30 minutes at my disposal do not allow me to turn back on—

Some hon. Members: Keep going.

Mr. Dupuis: Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Dupuis: I will talk about that, if you allow me the time I need, I will accept.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit doctrine has been explained in a book. Fortunately we have that book. Social Credit has also been explained on television the other night, and there again, we fortunately have the verbatim text. We have the facts before us today and our Social Credit friends will no longer be able to deny what they said. They will instead have to face the responsibilities that have resulted from such statements.

An hon. Member: Your 30 minutes are up.

Mr. Dupuis: You remember the debate that was shown on television? Those who saw it are waiting for explanations.

And now the Social Credit deputy leader tells us: How can the population buy a production of $36 billion with an income of $25 billion?

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, our friends know nothing about nothing. They should have a look at the statistics, and that is just what the hon. member for Villeneuve said: "Mr. Marchand, you do not know anything about that. Come to Ottawa, we have the figures. Come and see."

We are in Ottawa now and Mr. Marchand is the one who was right.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Villeneuve would take the trouble to refer to the monthly publication on statistics in Canada, and particularly to page 506, he will notice—

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Dupuis: What year? 1962, of course.

If the hon. member for Villeneuve will refer to page 506, he will find the tables indicating that our national production has always been purchased in Canada. But, you see they take one part of the thing and compare it with the whole, instead of comparing equivalent figures.

An hon. Member: Then do the computing yourself.

Mr. Dupuis: Sit down. You will have your turn to talk.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we will remember that Mr. Marchand was right on television because it says here, in the first table, that our production amounted to $36,844,000—

An hon. Member: Million?

Another hon. Member: Do you want me to read it for you?

Mr. Dupuis: No, I shall read it myself. I do not need your assistance. The total production amounted to $36,844,000,000 and that is indicated on page 506 of the statistical accounts.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Villeneuve said, and I have the text in my hands, because I do not want to make up anything—

An hon. Member: Read what he said.

Mr. Dupuis: Here is what I find in that statement. Listen to the fine picture painted by the hon. member:

Mr. Caouette: You have only $8 billion or $9 billion something in the money supply circulating in Canada—

He is in the know. He said something like $8 or $9 billion.

A little later, he said something like $10 or $11 billion. To him, it is all alike, it has the same meaning. Here, again is what Mr. Caouette said:

You have only $8 billion, $9 billion something in the money supply, now in Canada, circulating at a rate of approximately 2.4 per cent. That means a total national income of $24 billion.

Mr. Marchand: For your information, the money supply stands at $15 billion.

Mr. Caouette: No, no, not at present.

Mr. Marchand: Find out for yourself.

Mr. Caouette: No, no, write the Minister of Finance—

Naturally, he is his friend.

—at present, it stands at $10 billion 200 million, something like that.

A while ago, it was $8 billion, $9 billion, something like that; then it was $10 billion, $11 billion, something like that.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask my hon. friends the Socreds to set these things straight, so that the population—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member's speech, and I know that the hon. members share my feelings, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I have the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Mr. Speaker: Permission to continue was asked indirectly by members sitting in one section of the house. Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to continue his remarks?

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A l'ordre, à l'ordre. I will give the hon. member a little extra time. I just want to caution hon. members in the house about rising to make remarks that are not points of privilege or of order. I would let them know that this makes it difficult for the Chair to hear the debate. I am going to give the hon. member who has the floor a little extra time because of my intercession.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, they know they are out of order, but they want publicity.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I wish to draw your attention to the fact that the one who occupied the chair before you gave me to understand that the time taken by interruptions to my speech, which totalled about five minutes, would be added to the time allowed to me.

Some hon. Members: That is true, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Besides, what the hon. member has to say is not important.

Another hon. Member: You will not be here long.

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry I was not in the house when the Deputy Speaker was in the chair. In any case, the assistant clerk informs me that the hon. member is still entitled to two minutes to make up for the time he lost because of interruptions.

Mr. Dupuis: Two minutes to balance five minute interruptions, that is not too much.

Mr. Speaker, the population of the province of Quebec has the right to know who was right, Mr. Marchand or Mr. Caouette.

Our friends should examine the statistics issued here in Ottawa. There is no need to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan); besides, he himself might not know. If they would only study the statistics given on page 475 of the summary published in August 1962 by the Bank of Canada, more particularly in the eighth column, they would find that the money supply in Canada has always ranged about $15 billion and that since February 1962 up to now it has always stood at $15 billion. Therefore, Mr. Marchand was right when he said on television that the money supply reached $15 billion, which goes to prove that the member for Villeneuve is misleading the people once again when he says that the money supply stands at about $9 or $10 billion.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, my first words are of congratulations to you. In fact, in appointing you to that position, the house has recognized in you those high qualities which make you a distinguished parliamentarian, who has already had a brilliant legal career, as well as a military one which is an honour to the country as a whole. As a member from the province of Quebec, I am particularly glad that a French Canadian from the west has been appointed because, once again, we have recognized in a practical way the bilingual character of our country, from coast to coast.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to congratulate the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

First of all, I might recall that the hon. member for Waterloo South is a businessman of great experience, the son of a former government member who sat in this house. He has shown a deep knowledge of our great problems, and explained how the steps taken by the government could offer a solution to our present needs.

As for my colleague, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), newly elected in this house, he has fulfilled his task in a masterful manner, as if he had been sitting here for several years. When he spoke about agricultural problems, he did so as a farmer, fully conscious of the needs of that class of people, conscious also of the importance of that industry for the prosperity of Canada as a whole.

To both of them, I am sure, the future reserves the most brilliant career, here in this house as well as elsewhere in the public affairs of our country.

I should like also, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the recent appointment of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. In fact, it's the first time that a minister of agriculture has had a member from the province of Quebec as a parliamentary secretary who is a farmer's son, as well as an agronomist by profession, and who, for many years, has closely studied the needs of the farmers in his province. Such an appointment, Mr. Speaker, is really a valuable acquisition for the government.

I should like also to refer to the appointment of the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown), as well as to the appointment of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) as deputy chairman of committees. All those appointments are lending new glamour to the government benches and are strengthening our government, in addition to giving the house an additional buoyancy which will be felt more and more as this session develops.

(Text):

If I may, I should now like in a few words to speak about the speech made here last week by the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition saw fit to charge the government with political fraud in respect of the exchange position, alleging both concealment and misrepresentation on the part of the government and its leader. I know that already the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and many others have answered this baseless accusation by giving a complete factual account, step by step, of the events that led up to the situation which confronted this country and affected its foreign currency reserve, even listing, month by month and for the latter part of June day by day, the demands that were made on the reserve position of this country. These charges have been found to be what in effect they are, namely baseless and, I might say, also base. If one requires any further proof let him just consider one action which was taken by this government—and, in my submission, it was an act of great political courage undertaken by the government—in the midst of an election campaign. The government had the courage, when the situation called for it, to take on May 3 last—

Mr. Hellyer: It was a case of using the only available life raft or drowning.

Mr. Martineau: Well, he laughs best who laughs last.

An hon. Member: They pretended to have courage.

Mr. Martineau: I have a few observations to make and I hope I shall be able to make them, even though it does hurt members of the opposition.

Mr. Hellyer: They will have to be more sensible than that.

Mr. Martineau: The government did go ahead and peg the dollar at 92½ cents on May 3. I ask you, was there ever an act of greater political courage—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: "Desperation" is the word.

Mr. Martineau: —because no matter what may be said, if the government had been in the throes of trying to conceal anything from the Canadian people, the very first step they would have taken would have been to refuse to peg the dollar in the midst of a campaign, and the Liberals know that very well themselves. I do not doubt at all that privately among themselves they rejoiced at the action, though they may have qualified it as one of political naïveté.

In pegging the dollar the government obtained the warm and full approval of the authorities of the international monetary fund, and the Minister of Justice last week stated that this action on the part of the government stopped completely, stopped cold, to use his word, the run on the Canadian dollar and the accompanying pressure that had developed in late April of this year. Where, I ask you, is there any concealment in all this? The government by pegging the dollar publicly, despite the campaign that was in progress, revealed for all to know that it intended to deal firmly with the situation that had arisen, and it did so.

If I need any further backing for my words I need only examine the words that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate poured forth last week. They can be found at page 218 of Hansard, where he is recorded as having said:

> In fact, it was perfectly obvious that the dollar was pegged on May 3 as a desperate measure to stop the drain.

If it was perfectly obvious, Mr. Speaker, where then is the concealment?

Mr. Pickersgill: The concealment was that it was not stopped.

Mr. Martineau: It was stopped. The hon. member then went on to use these words: "Facts that were known to everybody about the situation". That in itself is a complete admission coming from the opposition benches, coming from those who are making these charges, that there was no concealment, no misrepresentation.

Mr. Pickersgill: How silly can you be?

Mr. Martineau: The hon. member says "how silly can you be?" I ask the hon. member, how silly can he be when he says that facts that were known and obvious to everyone were facts of concealment and misrepresentation? Either there was no misrepresentation and no concealment, or else words do not have the meaning generally given to them in the English language and in the English dictionary I have here.

But, Mr. Speaker, we were in the midst of an election campaign. As it developed, the Liberal opposition saw a very unique opportunity to turn the tides that were far from running in their favour, and this act of great political courage was ridiculed and turned into an object of derision. Almost all economists in our country have for many years favoured devaluation, and I should like to quote from a certain economist, one among many in this country who have held this view. Here is what this gentleman said:

> The high exchange rate for the Canadian dollar made it easier for imported goods to compete successfully with goods produced in Canada; they could be sold for lower prices in Canadian dollars than would have been possible if the Canadian dollar had been at par or at a discount. It meant also that Canadian exporters received lower prices for their sales in other countries, when converted into Canadian dollars, than they would otherwise have done. Thus the premium on the Canadian dollar worked to the disadvantage of both our export industries and our domestic manufacturers.

Summing up his case in favour of devaluation, this noted economist stated:

> It is probably true to say, however, that the increased costs or losses of this nature—

He was speaking about the small increase that might be produced in the cost of living.

> —would be far outweighed by the economic and psychological gains to be derived from increased activity in Canadian industry and a reduction in the number of people employed.

Hon. members may be interested to know from whom I have quoted.

Mr. Hellyer: We know who it is.

Mr. Martineau: Nevertheless all members may not be as well informed as the hon. member for Trinity. It happens to be from a certain pamphlet written by none other than the member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). The pamphlet is entitled "Troubled Canada", that "timely, inclusive and forthright follow-up", or so the flyleaf states, to the 1956 royal commission report on Canada's economic prospects, otherwise known as the Liberal bible, authorized version.

So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that here is where the baselessness of these charges appears in all its full light. Here is where it also appears that the Liberal party, the Liberal high command, engaged in a campaign that was not going according to their wishes no matter what they say—the results prove it was not going according to their wishes—staged one of the greatest mystification campaigns ever put on in the annals of public affairs in this country. I will give the elements of that campaign of mystification if you want them.

As I have said, all were agreed, and the Liberals had been agreed for five years, that devaluation would be a good thing for Canada, but all of a sudden it became a ridiculous act; it became a sort of psychological humiliation for the people of Canada, and Liberal spokesmen throughout this country forgot all the beneficial effects that such a move could have and in fact did have, as I will prove in a few minutes, with regard to Canada's export trade, Canada's tourist trade, Canada's manufacturing industries and Canada's agriculture, to mention but a few.

It was suggested that Canadians had been hurt by the dollar devaluation. Somehow it was put over that the Canadian dollar had been intrinsically degraded, that it had become an object of contempt and that even in Canada it was worth less than the dollar it appeared to be. Phony bills, as phony as the Liberal program they were going to put across to the people, appeared all over the country, to such an extent that they became standard equipment in the kit of every Liberal candidate. Where is the mystification, where is the contempt for the people, the contempt for the real welfare of Canada? It is there in the high Liberal command, in the Liberal campaign. Last week they again renewed their charges. They thought they would take the offensive, and they thought the people of Canada were not wise enough to unveil the treachery that lay underneath their charges. Liberal spokesmen decried the country's financial structure, its financial integrity and its ability to meet its commitments. Statements such as have been made by Hon. Robert Winters, mentioned earlier in the debate—

Mr. Pickersgill: And the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. Martineau: —that this country was on the verge of bankruptcy were the ordinary stock in trade of every Liberal spokesman on every public platform in Canada. There is the great mystification. Then they spilled crocodile tears because a run against the Canadian dollar did develop in the latter part of June. It is small wonder that it did not develop before, and it was a run that they had no small part in provoking.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Martineau: Then, to continue dealing with the illogic of the Liberal party, we find them now saying that the finances of the country are in a terrible state, that we are on the verge of bankruptcy. However, let us consider this Liberal program that is going to cost many hundreds of millions of dollars in expenditures by the public treasury—and these suggestions are being made at a time when they say this country is on the verge of bankruptcy. I should like to enumerate a few of the proposals which involve either the expenditure of public funds or a reduction of government income. They are a national medical plan, extension of present hospital insurance services to include optical, dental and nursing services; free education at all levels, despite encroachment on provincial rights in this matter; 10,000 university scholarships worth $10,000 each; increased aid for urban renewal; benefits to persons in training; a municipal loans fund; increased pensions; increased foreign aid; increased depletion allowances; reduced corporate tax rates; extension of several insurable categories under the Unemployment Insurance Act; greater agricultural aids and subsidies and a host of other odds and ends.

Many of these measures would be of benefit to the country, and many of them this government has already implemented to the benefit of Canadians everywhere. The point I am trying to bring out is the ridiculous nature of the charges which were laid when they said that this government, by its mismanagement, had brought the country to the edge of bankruptcy and yet, on the other hand, they say we can still spend millions more without reaching that stage of bankruptcy. There is illogic in that kind of situation. These statements were made in the heat of an election campaign; but then the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) the other day quite coolly again proposed measures involving the training of workers, a health plan, contributory pensions and increased family allowances. All of these measures would again involve increased expenditures of several hundreds of millions of dollars.

The great economist from Davenport (Mr. Gordon) likewise, in his speech, said that there was a need now for a national health plan, more adequate provision for our older citizens, and so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, where is the logic in all this? On the one hand they would tell you that this government is composed of spendthrifts, and on the other hand not only do they not propose any reduction in the present expenditure but they propose to add hundreds of millions of dollars of new expenditure.

Then, they decry excessive taxation, and indeed we all do. However, their own proposals would mean that the government would have to impose and collect these additional amounts from the Canadian people in order to implement their program. As the Prime Minister noted last week, this program would mean an increase of 40 to 50 per cent in income tax alone. The Liberals declare themselves appalled by deficits that have been incurred, and yet, irresponsibly they propose measures that would at least double any existing deficit. Finally, they clamour irresponsibly for a new election without waiting to see the government unfold its legislative program and without considering for one minute whether or not an election at this time would or would not be in the general interest of the country.

There is the real situation, Mr. Speaker. They talk of bankruptcy, lacking complete evidence of the charges they have hurled forth, and there, I believe, is the answer to those who still believe the Liberal party in this country warrants any measure of support from any important sector of our country. I may say here that not all the prophets are as good as the hon. member for Davenport. In his report on Canada's economic prospects a few years ago, the hon. member indicated certain projects to which he referred again in that pamphlet entitled "Troubled Canada". In "Troubled Canada" he refers to predictions made in the preliminary report and points out that the final report contains a note of caution to the effect that the probability is therefore overwhelming that the future will not be obliging enough to conform to what we have predicted. On page 26 of the book he says:

> The prophecy that was ventured in the last sentence has already proven to be true.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport prophesied that he would not be a good prophet and this is the only one of his prophecies that has proven to be true.

What have been the effects of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, Mr. Speaker? Since I am now Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I should like to refer to a recent edition of the Northern Miner dated September 27, 1962. This is what the editorial writer in that paper states:

> Altogether, devaluation has been a good thing for Canada, not, in truth, for everyone, but for the overwhelming majority. Business was in a state of stagnation prior to the Fleming action. Now it has a glowing spark of life, and mining, as we can say out of close associations, is enjoying very good times whereas under world conditions it might have fallen on evil days if the currency had not been altered.

This editorial eloquently sets out the situation in a very important sector of the Canadian economy. Now, sir, I was reading the Financial Post last week, the edition of October 6, 1962. In the column entitled "The Outlook" I found the following:

> From all indications, general business activity still was rising through the third quarter just ended—as it should be in the pre-peak period of the business cycle.
>
> Preliminary evidence suggests that gross national product probably ran close to $39,800 million for a 1 per cent increase over the second quarter. Recently released figures for the April-May-June period showed gross national product at an annual rate of $39,424 million, up 1.5 per cent in the quarter.
> The implication: A full year 1962 gross national product of $39,600 million for a healthy 7 per cent, or greater, advance over 1961.

Here is a report from another publication of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for the month of September, 1962, entitled, "Forging Ahead". I quote:

> How fares the Canadian economy as summer gives way to fall in this year 1962? The answer is that it is faring very well indeed. Most of the mid-year statistics relating to business and industrial activity are now available and they make impressive reading.
>
> Industrial production in the first six months of this year was up more than 9 per cent on the same period as 1961. Likewise manufacturers' shipments. Retail sales were higher by more than 5 per cent. Output of passenger cars and passenger trucks climbed by more than 30 per cent in the first half of the year, sales by more than 20 per cent. The number of new residential dwellings under construction at the end of July was 9 per cent greater than the year earlier, while the number of completions in the first six months of this year was 11 per cent greater than in the first half of 1961.
> The buoyancy of the economy in general and of manufacturing industry in particular was the reason why there were a record number of Canadians at work at the end of July—180,000 more than a year earlier—and why nearly 50,000 fewer were without employment.

That is from an organ published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, an association which should know how Canada's economy fares. It is a performance by a country which, should we listen to the benches opposite, was on the verge of bankruptcy.

The predictions that were made earlier by the then minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice, estimated a rise of 7 to 8 per cent in gross national product. The Liberals speak about the great years of prosperity during the entire post-war period, but from 1945 to 1961, in constant dollars, that annual increase was only exceeded twice in all the years of Liberal rule.

An hon. Member: What about 1961?

Mr. Martineau: They are all there. You can have them if you want them. This should suffice to debunk the baseless charges of the opposition. It should also suffice to convince all impartially minded Canadians that our economy is not going through a period of deep stagnation, that we are not on the road to bankruptcy but that given industry, effort and proper direction, the country will forge ahead as this industrial publication says we are now doing.

I submit that the speech from the throne, and the legislation announced in it, are an act of faith in Canada, an act of faith in the ability of the country to compete. They are an act of faith in Canada's ability to provide high standards and rich rewards to those who want to work. The government, on its part, will do its full share, as it has done in years past, to solve the problems of the hour. None will deny that these are many but it is not by baseless accusations, irresponsible statements and charges unsupported by evidence that confidence will be restored.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks by simply saying that the legislation advocated in the speech from the throne answers the real needs of our confederation. We find there some measures which are to apply the concept of Canadian confederation. There is some legislation tending to give our country national symbols, which the people have been demanding for a number of years, but which have also been laughed at by none other than the people who are now trying to pose as the champions of Canadian nationalism.

During the many years they were in power, they did nothing but talk about it. Measures mentioned in the speech from the throne indicate definite action, and I believe this will greatly help make this country a truly united nation when we celebrate its centenary.

The other day I had the privilege to attend the official inauguration of the trans-Canada highway. There, we have a Canadian achievement, a 4,600 miles long road. All along that road we could see the great Canadian panorama in all its diversity and, in spite of the diversity unfurling all along that distance, the unity of a single highway was noticeable, which seemed to me a true symbol for Canada, where unity is found in diversity.

That principle forms the basis of our confederation and it is also the principle, Mr. Speaker, which our party, and our government, in short which we all on this side of the house shall, now and always, protect and defend with every effort.

(Text):

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to join those who preceded me in offering you my congratulations on being in the exalted position for which you have been chosen. To say this is more than a formality on my part, because I have a genuine respect for the extraordinary qualities required in the discharge of your duties. I am also pleased with the choice of Deputy Speaker, a man I have had occasion to admire as committee chairman during the last session of parliament. To him and the other presiding officers of the house I wish a successful tenure of office, be it short or long. The mover and seconder of the address in reply also deserve congratulations for having performed a very creditable job.

The speech from the throne has been described in various terms. One hon. member has described it as a speech to fit the times. Some call it a bold speech; others regard it as a very cautious one. We on this side of the house claim it was inadequate to meet the problems confronting the nation. However, it did contain a few constructive suggestions such as enlargement of the industrial development bank and the provision of more funds for the Farm Credit Corporation. The establishment of an Indian claims commission and a national medical council are proposals which will not find any opposition from us, but the suggestion to call a dominion-provincial conference on the choice of a national flag does not commend itself. In view of our critical financial situation and other matters of vital importance, time should not be wasted in debating such a proposal, time which can be used to better advantage in finding ways and means to correct the many ills of the nation.

So far as I am concerned there is no time to waste on awakening old animosities and wrangling about the merits of designs for a distinctive flag. As a matter of fact I believe we already have a flag which is recognized everywhere throughout the world. I am referring to the old red ensign. Nations are moving towards the idea of a unified world in which the importance of national flags is diminishing.

The idea of dividing the Northwest Territories may be sound but I doubt the wisdom of prematurely preparing the territories for provincial status until they have sufficiently large populations to justify such a move. Otherwise additional governments could only mean additional burdens which the taxpayers of the country would have to meet.

We can all agree that the speech was long and replete with generalities and hints of measures which had a familiar ring, but it contained nothing of a definite nature outlining a program designed to inspire the Canadian people with a call for action, to which every adult Canadian could respond, in order to ensure a return of confidence in an economy badly shaken by the revelations made by the Prime Minister only a few days after the election last June.

The speech contained many items, some of which are of a rehashed nature and some new, intended to provide some vehicle that will bring back order out of the chaotic conditions for which the present government must accept responsibility. Gone are the days when it was convenient for the Prime Minister and his supporters to blame the former Liberal administration for everything that went wrong. It is surprising—indeed, it was surprising to me—that in the long list of intended legislation the question of immigration was completely ignored. Reform of the immigration laws of our country should be one of the items of consideration by this twenty fifth parliament, if it is allowed to proceed for any length of time.

The present policy, based on the unemployment situation, is unrealistic. It perpetuates a state of fear, a lack of confidence, and general disintegration of the idea that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. The high sounding words with which the new regulations were announced during the last parliament, such as "no more discrimination against prospective immigrants on grounds of race, colour, creed or country of origin" were soon discovered to be nothing more than a smoke screen to conceal the substitution of one form of discrimination for another.

Under the new regulations, which went into effect on February 1, 1962, an unsponsored person can qualify for entry into Canada on his own merit. But this is the real catch. Unless the applicant can qualify under the regulations, which spell out certain skills, and unless he or she is a doctor, nurse, medical laboratory technician, dietician, teacher, accountant, qualified social worker, priest, minister or a lawyer, he or she need not apply. As I look around this chamber—I do not have to look very far—I fail to see a shortage in the legal profession.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think immigration should be restricted to people of particular trades or professions. We should be willing to admit to our shores people of enterprise and imagination who will continue to build Canada in the spirit of the early pioneers. At least, I thought that was what the Prime Minister wanted when he was in opposition. To suggest that only immigrants with certain skills need apply, under Canada's long term immigration policy, is to cripple the future growth of this country for generations to come. The present regulations can only succeed in keeping people out. The very idea, Mr. Speaker, of the grading of applicants for admission to Canada, as cattle are graded for the purpose of exhibition, will not encourage anyone to seek entry into our country.

Countless people in Canada—and I venture to say that some may be now sitting in this parliament—who have succeeded and have made good Canadian citizens might not have got into the country if they had been subjected to the test which this government has applied to all prospective immigrants.

The Prime Minister and most of his supporters were in favour of a generous immigration policy before they were elected to form a government. They had nothing but condemnation for the Liberal government for not allowing more people into the country. As far back as February 25, 1953, the Prime Minister said, as reported in the Globe and Mail, that complete disintegration of Canada's economic structure was predicted unless its population jumped to 40 million in the next 25 years. He said, "We cannot sit on the storehouse of the world with a population of 15 million without inviting disaster."

Mr. Speaker, at the rate we are admitting immigrants into this country, and allowing for a generous birth rate, it will be, not 25 years before we reach a population of 40 million, but even 50 years will not do it.

On April 27, 1957, the Toronto Telegram reports the Prime Minister saying that increased population was required if Canada's development was to keep pace with her vast resources; that a Conservative government would apply a vigorous immigration policy in co-operation with the provinces, and that the Immigration Act would be overhauled. "Canada must populate or perish."

Well, Mr. Speaker, a Conservative government has been in power for more than five years but no change of policy designed to encourage more immigrants has taken place. The actual policy which has been in operation for five years can hardly fit the statement the Prime Minister made when addressing a gathering in London, Ontario, on May 7, 1961. He then said:

> Unless we populate and use the God-given resources of ours, we stand in peril of perishing under communism.

Mr. Speaker, because of high unemployment there has developed in some quarters doubt as to the advantages of immigration, this despite the fact that Canada's domestic market is more than a million consumers greater because of the former Liberal government's immigration policy in the decade between 1947 and 1957.

Those who question the benefits of immigration would do well to consider the opinion of the eminent British economist, Colin Clark. Professor Clark holds the view that population growth, far from being something to be feared, should be welcomed. His reasoning is that pressure of population has proved a beneficial force, stimulating nations into creating a more productive economy, improving their cultural patterns and in many cases moving toward the direction of a freer market. In other words, immigration pays off.

Every immigrant coming to Canada has a certain value and is an asset of merit. Our entire future is concerned with this. We must have immigration to prosper. The Immigration Act, which was to receive an overhaul, as I have already indicated, is still intact. What has been added to it is a set of restrictive measures based on the hypocritical statement that racial discrimination has been eliminated, when in fact the end result proves that the device was designed to keep people out. The government must bear responsibility for the unenlightened performance of the department. It is to be hoped that under the direction of the new minister a more realistic attitude toward immigration will be adopted.

It is hard to believe, but figures speak for themselves and indicate that this government, while professing to be in favour, appears to be set against an increase or a growth in population. Every action taken so far during the past four years has given ample cause to suspect an unwarranted reluctance to formulate a policy which would allow more people into the country. No one can successfully deny that present regulations as administered at the discretion of the minister are such as can be turned on and off like a water hose in one's garden. There has never been a time when arguments could not be raised against immigration. Some hold the view that immigrants are, in effect, job takers and that the more immigrants allowed in the greater the threat to employment and living standards. Extensive studies made by responsible persons have shown the opposite to be true. One of these studies revealed that in 1961 some 50 per cent of a group of 6,969 immigrants applying for citizenship in Toronto and Montreal had become employers and were themselves providing work for no less than 3,070 people. Mr. Speaker, these facts deserve to be made more widely known if the misconceptions which are so prevalent are to be corrected.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Bell) an editorial which appeared in the Fort William daily Times Journal of August 4, 1962. It says:

> During the 12 months ending June 1 of this year, 70,000 immigrants entered Canada. During the same twelve months 72,000 people emigrated from Canada to the United States and other countries. Roughly two thirds of our loss of 72,000 went to the United States. The situation calls for sober study by national administrators at Ottawa.
> Since the close of the last war, those prospects brightened considerably. Year after year around 200,000 people arrived annually from overseas to join us in the development of the country.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Because of the noise across the line, including noise from a number of ministers, I cannot hear the hon. member who is giving his speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member feels he is experiencing some difficulty, there is provided for his personal use an amplifier which can give him the speech in either of the two official languages of this house.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is very confusing for the person who is speaking, who is unable to keep an earphone to his ear, or perhaps does not find it necessary; but the noise from the other side is, I am sure, distracting the speaker.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I was just quoting before the intervention, from the editorial in the Fort William daily Times Journal. I continue:

> Some of them brought money, others were able to contribute great talents of workmanship and business sense. All of them provided a brand new market for shoes, clothing, food, and the manufactured products which go into new homes.
>
> Due to pressures from those who cannot see the tremendous value of heavy immigration in the creation of new jobs and the betterment of our domestic market, the powers-that-be have restricted the inflow of new citizens to the low total of 70,000 in the last 12 months.
> That could be an important factor in a general explanation of the industrial slowdown we have experienced in the past five years. At a time when competition for export business has been increasing, we have chosen to throttle vital domestic trade by reducing the number of buyers at home.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the editor of the daily Times Journal has provided an excellent text for the new minister to guide him in his decisions when confronted with applications from prospective immigrants. A systematic campaign to attract and encourage immigration should be a target of the new minister. General peacetime prosperity and full employment have all coincided with a high immigration rate. I submit to the new minister that he should give serious consideration to the introduction of a bill on immigration reform and give a parliamentary committee an opportunity to examine and discuss it. Members would then have something to work on. It would enable them to give this important subject maximum consideration and avoid a hasty, wrong decision which may well affect and retard the growth and development of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other omission in the speech from the throne. While not in the same category, it is a matter which, if not overlooked, would have generated satisfaction among the men and women who are the employees of the government. It is the failure to make any reference to the need for the revision of certain sections of the Civil Service Act. During the last parliament an effort was made to amend section 7 of the Civil Service Act to include a provision for negotiation, conciliation and arbitration of disputes, similar to that enjoyed by crown corporations, and which would cover all civil servants in Canada. The government rejected the suggestion that we made on this side of the house, and the government majority proceeded to approve the anaemic proposal which, in substance, gave civil servants the right to initiate negotiations but which denied them the right to negotiate. We should all be concerned with the fundamental rights of employees to negotiate with their employers in a manner recognized as a standard practice by the trades and labour movement of our country. The decision of the government to delay indefinitely the approval of recommendations of salary increases made by the civil service commission last April is also to be deplored. I urge the government to give consideration to these important matters, which are vital to the cause of good government, thus ending an era of discontent and misunderstanding between the government and its employees. The civil servants who are employed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act regulations are the only organized group in Canada who do not have the right to negotiation, conciliation or arbitration. A Liberal government will not hesitate to grant our civil servants these fundamental rights.

Mr. Speaker, any changes in freight rate legislation, which will have the effect of removing the need for across the board rate increases, a vicious method which in the past has been responsible for the inequalities in freight rates in certain regions across Canada, such as northwestern Ontario, will be indeed welcomed. At the same time some of the changes recommended by the MacPherson royal commission on transportation should be approached with great caution. The committee should be given ample opportunity to study and discuss proposed changes in order that services provided by the railways for the convenience and development of Canada be protected.

We cannot be too complacent or smug if we are to recover our former enviable place occupied five years ago. We cannot therefore vote confidence in this government which has dissipated the best opportunities to attain what it hopes to achieve with a program which does not bear the resemblance of anything like what we on this side believe to be necessary to emerge from a situation about which a United States economist has recently said this: "Canada has the largest percentage of unemployment of any industrial nation".

It is a view shared by all three opposition parties. Such being the case one would have expected unanimity in voting against the government. However, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), the leader of his party, notwithstanding his accusation against the government which he described as "one of the most dismal failures of a public administration in Canada's history", has seen fit to vote confidence in this government.

[Mr. Badanai.]

In the Financial Times of October 8, there appear a few paragraphs I wish to quote and which have a close relation to what I am talking about:

> The prevarications of the Social Credit members who sustained the government last week defeated the Liberals' no confidence motion. But they do not prove that Mr. Diefenbaker has the confidence of the country.
>
> On the contrary, his performance last week did more than all his opponents could do to destroy the trust and respect of responsible Canadians. His audacious claim that the exchange crisis developed unexpectedly after his pre-election telecast on June 14 admits of only two explanations.
> One is that Mr. Diefenbaker regards the Canadian people as almost infinitely gullible. The other is that he did not then, and still does not now, know enough about the business and financial world to understand what every citizen of economic literacy has known since early last spring.

That was last Thursday. Today we are offering the gentlemen on our left another opportunity to redeem themselves and to vote for the Liberal amendment moved by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) and to put an end to the deception and incompetence of this government.

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in my first words as I take part in this debate I wish to perform a very pleasant duty indeed and to offer my congratulations to the Speaker and to you, sir, on your election to the high office you occupy in this session of parliament as Deputy Speaker.

To the mover and the seconder of the motion now under debate I also wish to offer my congratulations for their commendable contributions.

I have two and possibly three objectives to gain in the time that is available to me. First, I wish to make a comment or two on the debate thus far. We in this group have noticed that several of the Liberal members, particularly those from the province of Quebec, have spent nearly all of their time acting as though the Social Credit party now forms the government. It seems to us that they are indicating that some members in the party they represent have hurt them in recent days. I suggest that their attempts to move in this house one amendment after another indicate that they seem to be in a tremendous hurry to have this parliament dissolved and to be getting on with the business of another election. This attitude may change in the next few days after the culmination of an event that is now taking place in the province of Quebec and is occupying the attention of their colleagues there. There must be some reason for this rush to get back to the hustings.

Certainly we in this party have taken the attitude that we were elected as members of this parliament, as representatives of our constituencies, to carry on the business of government to the best of our abilities. We recognize the fact that during this past summer we were not elected in sufficient numbers to form the government and therefore we do not assume responsibility for the policies followed by this government. At the same time charges have been made that we are betraying our mandate. I suggest that the greatest betrayal of our mandate would be to support the Liberals in advancing any of their policies in this parliament. The Liberal party did not receive a mandate to administer the affairs of the country. As has been mentioned on numerous occasions, this entire house is made up of minorities. If we were to accept their contention that the time is now ripe to seek dissolution and to go back to the country, I suggest that we would not be doing the responsible thing at this time. We in this party have assumed the responsible position of giving the government an opportunity to bring on their legislative program. At the same time we have reserved the right to examine that program. At some future time, if they do not attempt to correct some of the mistakes and mismanagement we have seen over the past four years, we would join with other opposition groups if they choose to bring on an election and to change the composition of this house. At the present time, however, there are 264 members elected in this house. If another election were called immediately, that is all we could elect. The people of Canada could elect only 265 members. We take the position that it is the responsibility of members who are now here to settle down, to give the government an opportunity, and to see what they have to offer. In addition to that, each one of the members of this group was elected primarily to give effect to the policies of the Social Credit party. Previously in this debate we moved an amendment designed to give effect to them. Our subamendment was lost. However, as I say, we were committed to advocating those policies and we did so.

I should now like to turn to one or two things that have been said respecting these policies we have been advocating. As I mentioned a few minutes ago, some of the Liberal members have spent all of their time denouncing those policies. In fact, it looks as though they have given a great deal of attention to the study of Social Credit policies. We appreciate this effort. Certainly one cannot come up with the right answers unless one does some studying of the problems. But I would say in answer to the hon. member for Laurier's accusation of faulty accounting on our part that he missed the most important point in the Social Credit policy when he was discussing the difference between the value of the goods available and the purchasing power found to purchase those goods. He talked about the velocity of purchasing power accounting for some of this difference and with that I agree; but he failed to mention anything about the additional increase in debt that has taken place in the country for the people of Canada to buy the goods that they themselves have already produced. If he does not take this factor into consideration he loses the entire point of the Social Credit policy.

I noticed too that the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) had a few words to say about the laws of accounting and the laws of finance as they apply to the Canadian economy. From the point of view of unemployment and the other problems that Canada has at this time, if the Conservative government's interpretation of the laws of accounting and finance confines them to the limits of the economic activity that we have in Canada today, then I think it is the first responsibility of this parliament to change some of these laws of accounting and finance.

It was rather interesting to note in the course of this debate that the Liberal party in their great plan, their great program for the future, have taken some of the planks from Social Credit policy. For example, their great plan of making capital available to the municipalities has been advocated by Social Credit spokesmen all across Canada for the last six to eight years that I know of and perhaps even before that. We would do this a little differently from what they have advocated. We have said that it is now and should be the responsibility of the Bank of Canada to set up a branch for the purpose of making long range capital available to the municipalities for the social structures that most municipalities need. We believe that if this were done long range social capital could be provided at a lower rate of interest and, further, that this kind of expansion at the municipal level, in the form of schools, hospitals, roads and all the responsibilities of municipal government, could be one of the greatest moves in alleviating the unemployment situation that could be taken in Canada today.

We are not advocating that the federal government should make this capital available on the basis of straight grants because we have had experience in this regard in the province of Alberta. We set up a municipal finance corporation in the last two or three years but previous to that large scale loans and grants were made directly through the department of municipal affairs, and the problem in making direct grants for these purposes is that there is not an equitable distribution of the funds. It boils down to a position of those municipalities that ask the most actually receiving the most.

We believe that the assets of the federal government through the Bank of Canada belong to all of the people and if in one given year or cycle one municipality or one area of Canada asks for more and it is considered prudent to give them more the money should be made available by way of an interest bearing loan so it will be recoverable. Then at some future date other municipalities could make the same request. I think too that we have to recognize that this is one of the greatest problems facing municipalities. Certainly the success of the municipal finance corporation in the province of Alberta could now be a pattern for the federal government in setting up a similar organization at the federal level, and in addition the enormous resources of the Bank of Canada would be available to them, whereas at the present time the municipal finance corporation of Alberta must go to the money market to borrow its requirements over and above the money available from the provincial treasury.

I have one other very important matter that I should like to bring before the house. I refer to the concept of agriculture and what has been received by agriculture from the government during the past four or five years. I want to quote one or two passages from Hansard to give some background to the point I wish to make. As found on page 75 of Hansard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had this to say:

> I saw the Leader of the Opposition on election night, Mr. Speaker, when he believed he was going to be occupying this seat. That is before the western farmer came in.

It is perhaps the prerogative of the Prime Minister and other members of the Conservative party to take as much credit for their political activities as they wish. I believe though that there is a misconception in the minds of most Canadians not engaged in agriculture to the extent that they believe that agriculture has received a far larger share of the funds of the federal treasury than they are entitled to. I think the Conservative party should be deeply indebted to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for getting so much mileage out of so little fuel; but that is not what concerns me. What concerns me at the moment is that in the future the position of the Minister of Agriculture is, I think, going to be jeopardized to some extent because of the widespread feeling that farmers are already getting too much. I quote now from an editorial headed "Let's Get This Straight" in the Western Producer of August 2, 1962:

> We are completely fed up with some of the glib assumptions made by the people who, before, during and after the election campaign undertook to size up the prairie vote situation by implying the Conservatives "bought" the farmers' vote with large and unwarranted government "handouts".
> Readers may remember some of the "funny" men on election night remarking that you couldn't get in the door of the average prairie farm house without kicking aside the pile of government cheques. Another wisecrack—at least we think this is what was intended—was to the effect that every time a farmer opened his mail box at the post office a few more "handout" cheques tumbled out—
>
> But as lately as last week—

The reference is to the last week of July.

> —we read in an eastern newspaper a "learned" dissertation on how much government money it cost to buy the prairie farm vote.

I know that a great deal was said during the election campaign about the fact that the government of the day was passing out large amounts of money and that in fact they had established agricultural policies that were giving the farmers a larger share of the national income than at any time in history.

For example, on page 98 of Hansard I find the Prime Minister had this to say:

> Prices have increased to such an extent that in every part of Canada farmers are receiving more for their production than they could have hoped for a matter of a few years ago.

In the next column on the same page, I find he says this:

> I believe that everywhere across this country people are deeply indebted to the Minister of Agriculture for the effort he has made.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I looked at some of the statistics with respect to the actual cash income of farmers in Canada for the period that was under consideration during the election campaign. This is what I found. For example, from the sale of wheat during the first three months of this year, January to March 1962, farmers received $66,026,000 as opposed to $82,336 for the same period in 1961. In the matter of Canadian wheat board payments, during the period of January to March 1961, there was distributed to farmers $37,750,000 to the farmers, and in the corresponding period in 1962 this figure of $37,750,000 had been reduced to only $17,000. I want to say that there was $3,853,000 paid out in wheat board payments on oats in 1961. During the same period in 1962 there were no payments at all. The total cash income from the sale of farm products in Canada for that group under the heading of "Crops" for the period 1962 was $189,042,000 as opposed to $270 million for the same period in 1961. I think it is abundantly clear, therefore, that the farmers have not received a disproportionately high share of the national income during this year, 1962.

I want to be fair in this to the Minister of Agriculture because it is my hope that in setting this record straight I will be able to assist him in his avowed purpose, indeed in his obligation, to pursue policies beneficial to agricultural producers in all parts of Canada. I want to say, to be perfectly fair, that during the next quarter, from April 1 to June 1, the statistics which have been made available to us recently indicate a substantial increase in these Canadian wheat board payments. I suppose some hon. members opposite in the Conservative party will disagree, but it appears to me that there may have been a deliberate withholding of these payments during the early months of this year so that they could have great effect immediately preceding the election. There is a note attached to these later statistics for the three month period April to June, 1962, to the effect that the greatest contributing factor in raising the cash income to farmers was these payments out of the Canadian wheat board fund. I believe that this gives to Canadians generally, other than farmers, the erroneous concept that the farmer got more than his share.

Mr. Herridge: It was his own money.

Mr. Olson: It was his own money, that is true. He should have had it in the first quarter of this year as he did in former years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many other statistics to which I could refer, as well as a number of other points that would perhaps change this erroneous attitude towards the farm population of Canada. However, we will be going over the whole field of agriculture from time to time when the estimates are under consideration, if this house is still in session.

I should like to turn back now for a moment to the condition in which we find ourselves with respect to what to do about confidence in the government. We have no great confidence in the present government. It is obvious that they have made mistakes. It is obvious to me, too, that they have not followed policies that were in the general interest, at least from my point of view. However, we have to face this fact, that the last election campaign was conducted in what I might call a factual vacuum. The Canadian people did not have all the facts with regard to the Canadian economy or Canadian exchange reserve. Certainly, if we were to precipitate another election at this time before this house has an opportunity to study all the facts in this regard we would go into another 60 or 70-day period in which we will again be in a factual vacuum.

I feel that the parliamentary committees should be set up at once so that we will have an opportunity to inquire into many things with regard to Canada's economy. Furthermore, I believe that these committees should be strengthened to the end that they will have an opportunity to send for whatever information they require in order to obtain a true picture of the facts at this time. Now that we have the 20-20 hindsight of the last few weeks, we are wondering why the information was not made available to us preceding June 18. However, we are assembled in this parliament for the purpose of getting this information at this time.

I wish to commend the government, Mr. Speaker, if that is the right word, upon their avowed intention of adopting a pay as you go policy, in other words, balancing the budget. Our members believe that the greatest injustice to the Canadian people is the enormous debt service charges that we are obliged to pay at this time. We believe that this is one of the areas where the imagination and effort of all hon. members could be used to advantage. I know that in the constituency of Medicine Hat, where I spent most of my time during the election campaign, the one thing that came up time and again was this: Why was it good for the Canadian people to have their government call in all the bonds in the fall of 1958 and reissue them at a 50 per cent increase in their earning power? We still have no satisfactory answer to this and we should like to know why the government felt it was going to be beneficial to Canada to call in bonds that had not yet matured and reissue them at a 50 per cent increase in their earning power.

We know that most of those bonds were issued during the war at interest rates varying from 2¾ per cent to 3 per cent but when they were reissued the interest rates were from 4 per cent to 4½ per cent. We cannot determine exactly how much this infamous conversion loan cost the Canadian people, but on an amount of $6.4 billion, carrying additional interest charges of approximately 1½ per cent, the amount is certainly big and the unfortunate part is that these charges will be with us not for a year or two but in some cases for the next 25 years. My Conservative opponent in the election campaign had more difficulty explaining this than any other single act of his government. I believe it is the most expensive single action ever undertaken by any government in Canada, other than during wartime.

Across the country there have been a number of charges made with respect to Social Credit's statement about the sale of Canadian wheat to red China. We do not object to selling wheat to anyone who can use it for food; that was made abundantly clear. But we do object to the use of Canadian wheat in promoting the cause of international communism. For example, we know—at least we have been told and the government has not denied it—that when several cargoes of wheat were shipped from Vancouver they were transshipped on the high seas to places like Cuba, Albania and East Germany.

If there were starving millions on the Chinese mainland who needed this wheat then there can be only one reason why they transshipped it or changed the bills of lading to send it to these other countries, and that is to advance the political objectives and ideology of international communism. Perhaps the government of Canada had no control over what happened to the wheat after it left Canadian shores, but I just want to correct the erroneous statements attributed to us, that we objected to the sale of Canadian wheat to the Chinese or anyone else. What we do object to is the use that was made of it.

Dealing with the international field I wish to refer briefly to a statement made by a United States senator. I quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 21, 1962:

> At a time when the free world looks to Canada for strength and leadership in the development of the free world's economic, political and military resources, it is tragic that Canadian leadership will be subject to dictation of the irresponsible Social Credit party which now holds the balance of power.

All I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are interested in advancing understanding between the United States and Canada, and perhaps I should offer a word of advice to the honourable senator—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has more than slightly expired. The reason I permitted him to go on for a few seconds was that I felt he should close his remarks with some comment on the quotation he used.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): I had hoped that Mr. Speaker would be present at this time because I would like to start my remarks by congratulating him, both on behalf of myself and the fair province of Alberta, on being elevated to his high position. I would also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I compliment them on the very able way in which they have made their first contributions to debates in this house.

Now, having put away the compliments I have a very serious objection to make. For well over a thousand years democracy has been well served by the parliamentary system, but of recent months, recent weeks and recent days I have come to worry a little bit about the future of this system. This chamber is not a circus. This is a place where I trust able men, dedicated men, come to present a program for maintaining democracy in an able, conscientious and decorous way.

Democracy is not perfect; it never will be. We as members are not perfect and never will be; but surely we can try to maintain the high standards which our ancestors and our fathers, and which many present members of the house have maintained up to this time. I beg of hon. members to keep this in front of them. There is something going on here more than the mere arguing about the price of hogs and interest rates, or the advancement of new ideas on the way in which we run the country. Our very freedom depends on the way we run this house, and unless we maintain the confidence of the people of Canada it is better that we should stay at home.

I carried on a positive campaign in order to be re-elected to this house. I believe it is somewhat of a surprise to some that I still sit here, but I think the reason I was re-elected is that what I preach I practise. I do not criticize for criticism's sake; but now I am going to go round this chamber a little and do what I rarely do, and that is criticize the critics.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) said the other night, at page 227 of Hansard for October 4, as it is reported—and these were not her exact words as I heard them, but I take them as they were recorded—

> All members of the opposition were elected for one purpose, and that was in opposition to the government.

I say to the electorate, to the people of Canada and to every hon. member in the house that this is a very negative approach to politics. I suggest there is a need for an opposition. We need at least two parties so that we can file down the legislation which we present, or which we intend to present, and make it work for the good of the whole country. No such policy of pure opposition can do that.

I believe there are hon. members opposite who have a contribution to make. I think there are hon. members in all four parties who have a contribution to make. I want them to have an opportunity to make it and when they make that contribution I will vote for it. I am no narrow party man. I was not born a Tory. I was born a Canadian and it is from reading the history of our country and this party that I still stand on this side of the house and give my allegiance to our great leader and the party he leads. When this party fails to run the country the way it should, I will cross the floor of the house and I will sit alone because at the present time I see no alternative to the leadership or to the policies of this party which I support.

Mr. Byrne: That is a hopeless outlook.

Mr. Bigg: With regard to the Social Credit party which has returned to the corner of the house, what do they offer and what can we expect them to offer as long as this parliament sits? They are going to criticize our monetary policy. They think we can live like an island in the western world with new, phony monetary policies. We know we cannot. Our monetary policies are not perfect; our capitalistic system is not perfect. But it has produced the finest opportunity for ordinary, working Canadian boys or girls to develop their own personality and to make their own way in the world. I see no alternative to this.

I am surprised to see a great party, such as was the Liberal party when led by Gladstone in England and Laurier in Canada, descend to any kind of a working agreement with avowed socialists. I am, most seriously surprised, ladies and gentlemen, because—

Mr. Habel: "Mr. Speaker".

Mr. Bigg: I am, most seriously surprised, Mr. Speaker, because it does not offer me free choice with my time and talents. If hon. members do not think that socialism is nothing but a white horse of Troy and inside are red soldiers, read your history. Read the past and present history of socialism and then ask these people in the corner what they intend to do from here on in.

I wish their leader were here to answer this question. I wish he were here to tell me whether he adheres to the same old avowed stand of the socialists in Canada. I refer hon. members back to that great spiritual leader of theirs, Mr. Woodsworth—and this has never been refuted or denied—when he was asked whether force would be necessary. He said, "I hope not, but it may well be necessary". If any hon. members in the corner of the chamber want the quotation, I have it here and I can give them the date, time and place. It was in this house. However, I have not the time to give it now; I have some things to say which are even more positive than the things I have said already. But those words are there.

Therefore I say that we want something besides mere criticism from those hon. members or I will never cross the floor of the house to sit with them; that is quite certain. I do not have to. But I promise those hon. members that I will, if they can come up with a better program, better leadership and better service to the Canadian people. If they can do that, I will join them, when I have lost confidence in this government—which I have not. Then I will sit alone in this house, and I believe that as long as I take this stand, as long as I am at least one of those people who came here to do a positive job, I will be here until I am ready to retire.

Have we a positive program? We have. What is this positive program? It is a go-ahead program along the same lines as we have had in the last five years. I speak principally of agriculture because this is a matter about which I know something. I suggest hon. members in this house would do better if they talked about matters they knew something about. If you do not know anything about farming, keep quiet about it. I know that is why some hon. members opposite have kept quiet in recent days, because they have no agricultural policy and they have never had one satisfactory to the people of Canada. They are strangely silent about this fact. But the farmers of Canada know they have never had the attention paid to their problems that they have received from this government. We have given that attention to their problems. It is suggested that we have overdone it, but I do not think we have.

There are many small farmers, family farmers in Canada today who have new hope. They have not a cinch. You still have to work on the farm; you still have to milk the cows, raise the pigs and bring in the crops—and they know it. We are not offering these people something for nothing, and they know it. We are offering them hope for some kind of square deal. Western Canada is getting on its feet—I can assure hon. members that it is—and we are proud of that record. If eastern farmers are not as much ahead as they should be, I for one will do all I can to give them the same deal as the western farmers, and a better deal if it is needed. I do not think we have done everything for the farmers of Canada that could be done, but we are going to do as much as we can.

I can go through my campaign speech. It consisted of one sheet of paper. That was because I come from a farming district where agriculture is the lifeblood of the people. I campaigned from one sheet, the promises of our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—that no longer would the farmers of Canada be the orphans of this country; that we would try to give them a fair share of the national income.

You can take figures and juggle them; you can make them prove anything you like. I am not going to talk about figures; I am going to talk about human values. The small farmer of western Canada today is not ashamed to hand his farm over to his son. Four years ago you could have bought land from one end of this country to the other; they were glad to let you take it. Today, try and get them off the farm.

The answer is there. Their sons are coming home from the oil fields, the bonanzas and the gold creeks and want to stay home with dad. They want to take advantage of our agricultural policies. Today a young man in western Canada can stay on the farm and make a living. We are going to see that we do all we can to make that living even better. We are proud of selling their wheat; we are proud of giving them stabilized prices, and we are going to do more and more to improve world markets.

I am not afraid to criticize this government at any time. As I have said, if they do not do the things I want them to do, I let them know it. They will tell you that. I have been in the Prime Minister's office and have spoken to him about things of which I did not approve. Yes, little, human errors, creep in. What kind of a reception did I get? Was I pushed out? No, I was listened to. On one or two occasions I think I had something to offer, and my suggestions were acted upon.

I am not going to bore hon. members with repeating them today, but the people of western Canada know; the small farmer in my district knows, and he is going to keep on sending me back here just as long as I give him this kind of service. These people are not going to turn me out for any member of any one of the other three parties until they can come up with something different. They are not going to get me out by slurring my personal character, and attempts were made to do this. They are not going to get me out by slurring the Prime Minister's character, and those attempts were made. They are not going to get me out by slurring the Conservative party, because the people of Canada know we are the only party offering a positive program for agriculture. They may be disappointed that we did not give them perfection or a bonanza. There is no such thing. There is no short cut to a higher standard of living and security. It takes hard work. You cannot do it by turning a crank; you cannot do it by taxing the rich. We can only do it by each and every one of us getting back to good, hard work.

We have an unemployment problem and there is a great onus upon this government, as there is on all governments, to find employment for every man and woman in Canada who wants to work. I suggest that today we have been lax. We have been too paternal. We have legislated people into idleness. One of our main jobs—and here I am throwing the ball right to our own quarterback and his team in front of us—is to do something to avoid legislating people into idleness.

Let us take the Unemployment Insurance Act and look at it again. Let us make it an insurance act, and not a welfare fund. Where welfare is needed, let us have it; but let us not legislate people into idleness. How are we going to do it? I can suggest one or two improvements. Let us make it an incentive to stay at work. Let us make a man's contribution less if he is not always dipping into the fund. Let us make it tough to draw on the fund for those who are just milking the people of Canada and lying down on the job. We are going to tackle that problem. We are going to do what we can.

The next thing is, what can business do to employ more people? They can become more efficient. They can show leadership in this matter. Again I throw the ball to the government and say, give incentives to small business, to medium business and even to big business to encourage better production in Canada.

How are we going to do this? I am not an expert on taxes. I know that we have to raise taxes and raise incentives. But I suggest that the tax structure of the country could be tailored to encourage Canadian investment in Canadian companies, and to encourage our own businesses to improve production and put more Canadians to work. I think this should be encouraged by tax concessions. I suggest that if this is done and if the tax concessions which we give lead to investment in our own factories, and in turn provide jobs, it will all come back on the payrolls.

I will have to hand this to the opposition. I do not usually give them many compliments, but after the war they did send the veterans back to school; and I am sure that if you were to look at the records of those veterans, they paid back in income tax over and over again the very cost of this schooling. I suggest that we take a page out of their book and give tax concessions and tax incentives to the young businesses of Canada, the growing baby industries, and give them a chance to get on their feet. In this way, when they are employing more Canadians and making more money, the country will get it back, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Flemming) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) will see that it has been a good investment.

Hon. members ask us to take bold steps. Well, they are the members of this house. When we take bold steps, they must have the courage to be Canadians first and Liberals, Social Crediters or N.D.P.'s second, and vote for these bold steps. I promise them today that I will do this thing. When my leader and his cabinet are bold, I am right in there for them. I know sometimes these bold steps are gambles. If you build railroads into the north, if you build a trans-Canada highway through the northern part of the country, and take a chance that Canada will really be as wide as she is long, this takes foresight and vision, and it is partly a gamble. It cannot be done by a minority government alone; it would require statesmanship from everyone in this house. I pledge myself to do this. I promise hon. members that I will do it, and I expect them to do it. I am not cynical in politics.

I know that the great Liberal party has been a great Liberal party in the past, and I want it to be a great Liberal party in the future. To the Social Crediters I say this. If they are really Conservatives, as they say they are on the hustings, then join our party and be Conservatives. I ask them to forget the "funny money" policies which they know cannot work in the present structure of our country's economy. But they sit in the corner in smug complacency and know that they can criticize without fear, that they can never form a government but will sit here as long as they like and take advantage of the Conservative leadership in our country. If they are Conservatives let them be Conservatives, cut out the "funny money" policies and stand with us, if we ask them to, on principle.

It is a strange thing for me to sit in this house and listen to members of the "junker class" voting socialist. For what? Nobody can believe but that it is for pure political advantage of the day. I suggest that political advantage of the day will not last long, and the eggs you hatch may pick your carcass. Think that one over. They are strange bedfellows, the industrial leaders of our country and the gentlemen on my right, the socialists.

It is also strange to hear the policies put forward by our party criticized by those who have no such policies of their own. It is strange to hear about fears being spread across the world about our loyalty to the British crown. By whom? By those who in 1938 refused to allow empire airfields; by those who allowed only the volunteers of Canada to risk their lives and shed their blood. I was one of them. Do not talk about solidarity of the empire unless you are willing to stand alongside the flag under which I served; and until we get another one, one which is recognized in solemn parliament assembled, the red ensign is good enough for me. We buried my pals in it in the last war. We buried my uncles and my friends of another generation in another war. It is an honoured flag, and though we may not agree with the design of a new flag, the design is not all for which the flag stands. The flag is a symbol of our purpose in sacrifice and loyalty. It is red bunting which has been nobly served, and the sacrifices have been great. Until this parliament decides that that flag should be changed, I will be ready again to stand alongside it and give it anything which is needed.

How about others? Let us have no hypocrisy. Let us have no maudlin sentiments spelled out for political reasons. I will go further and say that whatever the flag is, let it be quartered with the fleur-de-lis, the sheaves of Saskatchewan, the fish of the maritimes or the timber of British Columbia. I do not say that I do not care what that flag is, but I do say that if this parliament, or the next parliament, or any parliament of Canada, ratifies that flag as a symbol of unity and service, I will be there to serve it whenever I am needed. And I will writhe in my seat when I think that anybody is using our flag as a spade or a club of disunity.

People out west where I come from know this. They know that I will never use it as a dividing line.

The promises that we have made in the past we have kept. The promises we make now in the throne speech hon. members can be assured will be kept. We cannot offer an easy way out, but we can offer hard work and a square deal.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I be allowed to offer you my warmest congratulations on your appointment as Speaker of this house. I know that you will be the guardian of the rights and of the prerogatives of each and everyone of us in this house and that you will watch over the dignity of our debates.

Impartiality, patience and good will are the qualities required of a good Speaker. I am sure that you will show, to a high degree, those qualities by which your predecessors have deserved the commendation and the admiration of all.

(Text):

I should also like to congratulate the chairman of committees on his nomination, and to offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the speech from the throne for the very creditable way in which they performed their tasks.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that no one who follows me, particularly from the far corner of the house, will complain if in what I have to say today I do not preface my observations by agreeing with them that we are faced as a country in our contemporary world with some very serious problems involving peace or war. But under our rules we are limited to 30 minutes at this particular juncture in our proceedings. Accordingly we have to allocate our time in order to observe the rule of relevancy and deal with matters immediately before us. But I take it there will be an opportunity, and I hope it will be soon, when we can discuss important aspects of the government's foreign policy and when we can take up some of the observations made, notably by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green). At the moment, however, we are dealing with an amendment moved by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) on Friday last in a memorable speech. I should like to recall to the house the wording of that amendment. It strikes at the very fundamentals of parliament, an institution which the hon. member who preceded me said now stood in jeopardy in this country. The terms of the amendment read as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that the failure of Your Excellency's advisers to place before this house at the earliest opportunity a measure to approve the collection of taxes which have been imposed by order in council, as part of the austerity program, denies to this house the exclusive constitutional right to approve the imposition of additional taxation which is the foundation of our system of responsible government.

That is an amendment of the greatest importance. It is one that must be observed in its implications if we are to support the view that parliament indeed is an important institution in our national life, and that we must take every step to see that its strength and its integrity are protected. In this amendment the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has done that. To any hon. member of this house who is disposed to vote against this amendment I suggest that a vote against the amendment will be a vote in favour of the government's austerity program which was brought about, not by a decision of this parliament but by process of an order in council.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming), who is the former minister of finance, this morning asserted that the government's austerity program had a legal basis. He did not offer any proof for that statement. He simply said that he had consulted with the law officers of the crown and that the three aspects of the government's austerity program met the requirements of the law as interpreted by the law officers of the crown. I wish to submit first of all to you, Mr. Speaker and to the house, that there is a contrary view.

What I wish to say today will be divided under two headings. First of all I question the legality of the government's austerity program under the two acts mentioned by the Minister of Justice this morning. Not only do I question the legality of a policy based on those acts but I say that, whether they were legal or not, under our constitutional practice there was an obligation on the government to come here at the earliest possible moment and obtain from this parliament either rejection of the policy on which it had embarked or ratification of it.

First, as to the legality, may I say this. There can be no doubt that the argument by assertion made this morning by the Minister of Justice with regard to the incidents of 1947 does not in any way bolster the case which he sought to make. I say that section 4(1) of the Customs Tariff and section 22 of the Financial Administration Act do not contain authority from parliament to the governor in council enabling the governor in council to make the two orders which make up the surcharge on imports order. The Minister of Justice did not even allow for the possibility of difference of opinion in this regard. In that modest, humane way of his he simply said, "There is no doubt about the legality of what the government has done, take it from me". The minister of finance of another day, the present Minister of Justice, said, "Accept my word that there is no doubt about the legal basis of the action the government has taken".

Hon. members should recall that while parliament has delegated to the governor in council authority to reduce or to eliminate taxes under prescribed conditions, parliament has, by and large, retained unto itself the power to impose taxes. It must also be borne in mind that the Minister of Finance has the responsibility to parliament in the matter of raising or lowering the incidence of taxation; and the means by which this is done, Mr. Speaker, as you so well know, is a budget.

The Customs Tariff, I argue, is in no way concerned with Canada's balance of payments, notwithstanding the fact that it may contribute to what that balance may be. In section 4(1) of the Customs Tariff, parliament has delegated to the governor in council certain powers necessary to promoting Canada's trade with other countries. Raising duties against all countries will not in any way promote trade. Moreover, the language of section 4(1), as I see it, makes clear that the country to which preferred rates are extended or from which preferred rates are withdrawn must, under that section, be specifically named. The words employed are "extend to any"—which means any one—"country" and "withdraw from any country or all countries". Also, the benefits are spoken of as having been extended to or withdrawn from, "such country", not "such country or countries". I therefore say that the exercise of the authority conferred by section 4(1) requires the naming of a country or countries. Hence if no country is named, that section 4(1) does not give the sanction of parliament for the action taken.

I ask the Minister of Justice to produce, as indeed his leader asked the minister of finance of the day in 1947, the opinion of the law officers of the crown which states that section 4(1) gives this government the authority to impose surcharges as it did when parliament was not in session and when indeed as the government of this country it occupied an extremely tenuous position with only a minority support in this house.

With regard to section 22 of the other act, namely the Financial Administration Act, on which the minister and the government base their case, may I observe that the statute was enacted by parliament in order to give authority to the governor in council to deal with a comparatively few special cases involving a comparatively few individual importers and a comparatively small range of imported goods for a comparatively few special purposes, as stated in the act. If parliament had intended to delegate broad powers of extensive application to customs duties on imported goods, it would have done so in the Customs Tariff and the Customs Act. However, that was not done.

So I say that section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, on which the government relies as one of the two supporting measures, was not intended by parliament to delegate to the governor in council authority over a large portion of the customs tariff involving a large range of goods and all importers of those goods in a single case, which is not essentially one of the customs tariff itself but is a case of balance of payments. This, in a general statement, is my answer to the alleged legality of the measures on which the government relies for the course it has taken in a matter so seriously affecting the economy of our country, because of the austerity program which it has seen fit to adopt to meet the emergency created by our balance of payments position.

Having said that the course taken by the government is illegal, I now address myself to the other ground in the amendment before us, namely, that parliament should have been called together at the earliest possible moment so that the government could have laid before the house its proposals for taxation, its proposals by way of an austerity program to meet the serious situation that arose out of our balance of payments position. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) says, compare what we did with what the minister of finance did in 1947. I do not want to base my case only on what was done, then, but I do now, because the Minister of Justice has invited it, want to compare in one very important respect the difference between what his government and he did and what Mr. Abbott did in 1947.

I have before me Hansard for December 16, 1947, page 359, and I wish to refer to an interjection by the then minister of finance explaining to the then hon. member for Calgary West what course the government was taking with regard to imposing taxes on the Canadian people. To hear the Minister of Justice one would think that what the Canadian government had done was to impose on the Canadian people taxation by radio and then to have come into the house later and have sought confirmation of that course. That is not what was done at all. There were three aspects in the emergency program of 1947. There was first of all the prohibition of imported goods from the United States. That did not involve any imposition of taxes. Second, there was the imposition of excise taxes and restrictions on the amount of money that tourists were allowed to expend in the United States when out of the country. The then minister of finance did not impose excise taxes by radio. Those taxes were imposed as part of the emergency program of that day as the result of a recommendation made by the minister of finance in this house. That is the difference. The minister of finance said at that time:

> I say I am not claiming the right to tax the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister cannot take that position today because he has taxed the Canadian people, and taxed them without first of all obtaining approval or receiving from this house the necessary parliamentary sanction. Mr. Abbott went on to say:

> It is nothing more than a notice that that tax will be imposed if parliament approves, and if parliament refuses to impose it nobody is under legal obligation to pay the tax today until parliament does approve. But I have notified the Canadian people, as is done when the budget resolutions are tabled, that I shall ask parliament to make this tax retroactive to the 17th day of November, when I gave the notice.

So I say to the Minister of Justice, there is no analogy in the two positions at all. If I had time I would remind the Prime Minister of what he said in that debate. I think perhaps what he did say is so relevant to the present situation that I should remind him of some things that he told the government of that day and which now have special relevancy to the very act about which we complain in this amendment. The Prime Minister said, as found on page 408 of Hansard for December 17, 1947:

> Did the law officers of the crown in any way advise that it was possible for a minister of the crown, two or three weeks before the opening of parliament, to impose taxation from that date? I say to my hon. friends in the government of this country, that by that action they committed a crime against constitutional government in this country. And they wish us to act as rubberstamps and be accessories after the fact, by our vote now given, for conduct illegal to begin with.

Of course, as I have just indicated, his argument was faulty, but the recommendations that he made to the ministry apply to him today. We are not even rubberstamps. We are not given the opportunity of even passing on the illegal course which this government pursued in an unconstitutional way before parliament was called together on the 27th of September last. I will say for the record that no one has as commendable a record clearly establishing his love of parliament and all its institutions as the present Prime Minister, but I say to him with the greatest respect that since he became Prime Minister no one has initiated measures that are more inconsistent with this affection and this love of parliament than the right hon. gentleman himself. That is so at every turn. Here is what Mr. Abbott said as found on page 331 of Hansard for December 16, 1947:

> I consulted the law officers of the crown, the deputy minister of justice, and I was advised that under the Foreign Exchange Control Act the governor in council had power to designate the currencies which could be used for imports and that that act was available for the purpose of imposing such restrictions. As I said a moment ago, it was never believed that the act contained those powers, and certainly the foreign exchange control board never had those powers and never wanted to have them.

But when it came to the matter of taxes, and hon. members will want to look at the exact provisions as contained in Hansard, they will find that on December 19, 1947, as found on page 535 of Hansard, Mr. Abbott moved certain amendments to the Excise Tax Act. These were debated by parliament. Many hon. gentlemen opposed those taxes. Parliament, however, approved of the government's policy and the imposition was made retroactive to November 17. Is the record not clear then that the government did no more than announce taxes outside of this house? There was an emergency. There was no other course open to the government at that time than the action taken by the then minister of finance. But at the earliest possible moment he came into this house and asked parliament to observe its traditional practice of giving its sanction to a proposal that would involve further taxes on the Canadian people.

That is the point. That is the point at issue in this amendment. That is the reason for the particular provision in the bill of rights to which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) called our attention on Friday last. That is implicit in the bill of rights passed in this house at the instance of the right hon. gentleman two years ago and now so flagrantly being flouted and violated by him in this particular instance. We say that parliament is a valuable institution. I certainly believe it is. I have spent more than 27 years in this house and I believe in this institution. But I know of no incident in the history of our country where parliament's rights have been more seriously violated—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The pipe line.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —than in this particular form of taxation involving over $200 million by way of additional taxes imposed as the result of executive action without first of all having received the prior approval of parliament. This is bad in itself; this is wrong in every way. But in spite of this amendment, in spite of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and others who have complained about the failure of the government to take parliament into its confidence at the earliest possible moment, even now we are not given any assurance by members sitting in the ministry that before this session has terminated they will have placed before us their program of taxation. Surely, we are not going to be denied this.

There are five ministers sitting in this house now. The leader of the house has just entered. They can tell us now whether or not parliament is going to be given the opportunity of passing on this particular program of taxes imposed on the Canadian people as part of the government's austerity program. I say to hon. gentlemen sitting at the extreme left on this side of the house, that they have been properly critical of the government's austerity program. They have said, through one of their leaders, that they will not stand for a program of austerity; that they believe such a program of a non-expansionist character is not in the interest of the economic welfare of Canadians at this time. I repeat that by voting against this amendment they are voting for this program of austerity. They are also denying to themselves and to other hon. members, the opportunity of passing judgment on the merits of these proposals.

It is not only that the government has acted illegally, it is not only that the government has not taken parliament into its confidence on a matter of vital concern to this house, it is something that goes even deeper than that, something that is involved in the historic conflict, over the centuries, between the crown and parliament. I refer to the right that was finally established, that of the House of Commons to assert authority over the government of the day in the matter of imposing taxes on the people who are subject to the direction and to the laws of parliament. This is what is involved. Are we going to take the position that, notwithstanding the violation of this principle, something for which our ancestors have fought, we are not going to allow ourselves to be inconvenienced because of what might eventuate if we were to condemn the government by supporting this particular amendment? Of course it would be inconvenient. Of course the nation would have a period of suspense. However, I would much prefer to see this period of suspense than to allow this government to get away with having violated the fundamental principle which is involved, the purpose for which the institution of parliament has been created.

I could very well understand if I felt that Mussolini and Hitler were men to be idolized, I would not take this position. But I do not take that position. I believe that, unlike their treatment of the deliberative assembly, the right of the people to assert their final and ultimate authority in the matter of the dispensation of public funds is an inalienable right and must be preserved, recognized and cherished in any free country. We will regret the day if this government does not bring forward its program, if we are not given an opportunity to pass on this program, as the government of the day did in 1947 with regard to the particular suggestions for the imposition of taxation in 1947. Not only has this government failed to take parliament into account with regard to this particular matter upon which I have been dwelling, but the Prime Minister went further.

It is true that there was no legal way by which his actions could be arrested. As a result of the election of June 18, the Prime Minister no longer commanded a majority of this house. Notwithstanding that, although it involved a matter that might affect the character of the economic life of the western world for many years to come, the Prime Minister of this country not only failed to take into account the interest of the Canadian people in this problem but he went to the prime ministers conference and took an important position with regard to the common market and all that implies in terms of the economic welfare of the west, perhaps the peace of the world. He asserted, on his own, what the position of Canada should be. I say parliament has been flouted by the Prime Minister and by his government by his failure to bring these tax proposals to parliament, by the failure to call parliament together at the earliest possible moment, by the failure to call parliament together before he went to the prime ministers' conference.

I say what authority, under our parliamentary system, did the Prime Minister of a minority government have to go to a prime ministers' conference and say, without some direction by this house, what course this country should pursue in a matter of such fundamental importance? We may not be able to impress every member in this house, Mr. Speaker, with the validity of the claim that is made in the amendment presented. I still hope that every hon. member in the opposition, regardless of party, will condemn this government for the reasons I have stated. During this debate every opposition party has expressed agreement on the immoral position of this government because it did not disclose during the election, the true financial situation that confronted Canada, on the constitutional requirement of parliament being taken into the confidence of the government at the earliest possible moment, and the obligation of a prime minister to consult with parliament before going to the prime ministers conference. For these reasons, let us uphold the dignity of this parliament and defeat this government.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak for the first time in this house I do so with a deep sense of humility. Having been accorded such a privilege by the electors of Portage-Neepawa, I feel very honoured indeed.

First of all, I must mention the growing admiration which is steadily being accorded to you, Mr. Speaker, as we observe your sagacious discharge of the duties of your difficult office. May I give a further salute to our Deputy Speaker, not only for the capable manner in which he is filling that office but because, of course, he is a fellow Manitoban. I need only mention that I am happy to endorse the tributes already paid to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for their very creditable performances a few days ago.

No one can deny that the ceremonial opening, with all its pageantry and emphasis on traditions, is the kind of spectacle that is unequalled in Canada. From the 21 gun salute as the horsedrawn carriage brings the Governor General to parliament hill, and his inspection of the impeccable guard of honour, to the taking of his place in the Senate chamber and delivering the traditional speech from the throne thereby introducing measures of legislation to be considered during the session, one cannot but be impressed. I for one rate the fact that I have been part of the opening of this first session of the 25th parliament as among the most significant events of my lifetime. There is inherent in such an event a profound sense of history.

As I observed the close attention paid to tradition in the carrying out of the business in this house I began to wonder why there could not be the same respect for a high level of conduct and speech in this chamber. Having witnessed the ceremonial opening one hardly expects to hear remarks from hon. members opposite more fitting for school boys on street corners than those attributable to the distinguished parliamentarians we might be. If it is a mark of distinction to be elected to the House of Commons, why are some hon. members not constrained to speak at all times with that kind of distinction this high office demands. If we believe in free speech and the democratic process of government why are some hon. members so virulent in their criticism? And if by this democratic process a prime minister is elected, why cannot this highest of positions in the realm be accorded the respect, the dignity and decorum which has befallen only 13 men since confederation. No matter by what minority the Conservatives now form the government it should be remembered that the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker held the office in an earlier parliament with a majority never before equalled in history.

I quote from the September 22 issue of the daily Packet and Times:

> Whatever his limitations, and they are not nearly so marked as his critics would have us believe, history will show Mr. Diefenbaker to have been one of this young nation's ablest leaders. He took office at a time when the Liberals openly admitted they were pleased to get out from under, at a time of apparent economic crisis. His government has introduced a host of measures which have improved the condition of most Canadians, and when the economy was again threatened, he did not hesitate to adopt measures which are proving themselves completely successful. On his record he merits the respect of Canadians of all political persuasions. The bitter and unwarranted campaign of hatred and ridicule to which he is currently being subjected does not reflect credit on many of Canada's political commentators.

I am certain that the residents of Portage-Neepawa and Canadians generally have received with favour and wide acceptance the proposed legislation contained in the speech from the throne. I am proud to sit with a government that in the throne speech has offered to introduce measures to create more jobs, to stimulate trade, to give greater advances to agriculture, to initiate economic planning and tax reform, to create a national power grid, to encourage action on a national flag, to initiate tax reform and the rest.

Mr. Speaker, I feel proud to be in such very distinguished company. As I have observed the Prime Minister, the ministers of the crown and the manner in which they carry out their responsibility of office, I feel proud to be associated with them.

My constituency of Portage-Neepawa has the signal distinction of being one of only 13 constituencies throughout this great nation that has been represented in this house by a prime minister. Because of this, the residents of Portage-Neepawa are cognizant of their place in history. I refer, of course, to the fact that the late Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was elected to the House of Commons in 1908 by this constituency, which seat he held until the general election of 1921 and regained in 1925. In the various portfolios he held in the cabinet he was prominently identified with many important measures of national significance. You will understand, therefore, that I felt highly privileged indeed that in this auspicious parliament I should have the honour to represent such an historic seat.

In my first speech in the House of Commons I mentioned that a reading of Hansard would indicate that this riding has on numerous occasions been well described to this house. I will therefore forgo a traditional practice of giving some details of my riding except to remind the house that the city of Portage la Prairie is the hub of the finest agricultural areas in the plains; that the town of Neepawa as well as Carberry and McCreary and all the communities in that riding, and especially Kirkfield Park a suburb of Winnipeg, are most progressive communities. This area has produced in more recent times a long time premier of Manitoba, the Hon. D. L. Campbell, a chief justice for the province of Manitoba in the person of the Hon. Mr. Justice C. C. Miller, and in their turn a series of cabinet ministers for the provincial legislature. Presently the Hon. John Christianson of Portage la Prairie is very ably manning the portfolio of Manitoba's first minister of welfare.

The previous member for Portage-Neepawa was Dr. George C. Fairfield who so successfully represented this seat in the 1957 and 1958 elections. In 1958 he won this seat by the greatest majority ever polled by any member in this riding. Many of my colleagues have inquired about him. I have assured them that he will be following the outcome of this session with keen interest.

As I mentioned earlier, the residents of this constituency are progressive folk with high purpose in their actions and expressions. They are responsible, and mindful of their civic duties; they are above all good Canadians. These are people who hold high expectations from this 25th parliament. I am quite certain that my constituents, no matter what their political persuasion, do not want to see another election at this time. They would show great impatience at the continuation of hon. members who gnaw doggedly at the same bare bone of contention. The possibility of several provincial elections being held in the next few months added to the fact that no new alternatives since the June 18 election to the present government are arising, is further argument against a hasty return to the country.

The government is repeatedly being reminded of the "rights of parliament". Hon. members opposite are accusing us of proceeding in haste on certain measures and taking steps that are altogether unconstitutional—they say. We keep hearing that the time has come when the Conservative government should have regard to the people's wishes; there should be an immediate election, is the cry.

I have stated that members of parliament on both sides of this house should be reminded that the people have spoken. They have said we are the government and Mr. Diefenbaker is the Prime Minister. This debate is becoming tedious because of the repetition of the same remarks uttered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) as well as by many of his followers. Congratulations of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house are due however to the Leader of the Opposition by reason of the very manifest evidence of the determination on the part of his followers to show fidelity to his leadership, evidence that came frequently to our ears in the way of applause and which was all the more pronounced and impressive when we recall the long succession of platitudes that evoked that applause.

The speech from the throne contains many measures that, when implemented, will add to the very real dimension of progress of our nation. Surely the members opposite can see some considerable merit in each of the numerous proposals in this speech; or is it, Mr. Speaker, that none of them can be persuaded by reason?

Many of the proposed measures in the speech from the throne have already been put forward by ministers of the crown and other colleagues and I feel well advised to leave further debate to my more experienced colleagues. I wish to remind hon. members of a most reliable yardstick or measure that should once and for all cause all this talk of austerity to cease. This measure, I suggest, is tourism of Canada. Surely if there were any real austerity in this country, tourism in this summer of 1962 should have shown a severe decline. Instead, what do we see? We see a marked increase, an increase well in line with the growth in the previous five years, to the extent that in some areas it has become a major industry. I ask hon. members, would this be the case if there were real austerity?

There has also been much criticism of the Prime Minister's stand on the commonwealth. I feel that the world needs more of the spirit of the commonwealth unless peace in the world is to depend on the balance of terror. The commonwealth exists, for the help of its members and as an encouragement to all who want political freedom and friendship with their fellow men. This spirit has been fostered by our Prime Minister at all times.

Mr. Speaker, if each one of us puts forth that kind of effort that has as its goal the best interest of our nation, then in spite of a rather delicate balance of power, in spite of pressing and serious problems not only within the country but throughout the world, we could come through this period and history would record some of the best legislation ever produced in this house.

Quoting from an article in Canadian Business, the September issue, page 14, I read:

> Barring unforeseen eventualities there is no reason to expect an election before 1964.

Just because we have become accustomed to house majorities in recent years is no reason why this need continue. A review of the record would show that this situation is far from normal in this country or in other countries. I need only quickly refer to Australia or to some of the European countries.

In the past there were times when the governing party ruled with a small margin over the opposition. These governments were by no means weak and indecisive by reason of their lack of overall majority. Crises of some magnitude were surmounted then, and there is no reason why the present government cannot do the same now.

I am confident that we as Canadians have a prosperous future before us and that full employment will go hand in hand with increased prosperity. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would submit it is vitally important that parliament continue without further interruption so that effective and much needed legislation as outlined in the speech from the throne can be implemented.

(Translation):

Mr. J. C. Cantin (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I am truly moved in speaking before the house for the first time.

First of all, I wish to congratulate you on your unanimous election to your present office. I have no doubt that, thanks to your fairness, the house will smoothly expedite its business and that each member will be treated by you as fairly as he expects.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to join with the other members who spoke before me in congratulating the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the speech from the throne for their remarkable speeches.

Indeed, it is not an easy job to present so splendidly the policy of the present minority government, a policy which has been condemned last June by the great majority of the Canadian people. Both members deserve even greater congratulations for their feat.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

(Text):

An hon. Member: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Cantin: Mr. Speaker, at the outset, it gives me pleasure to thank and congratulate the national leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Pearson) for the message of hope he addressed to the Canadian people in his speech during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Never in our history has a Leader of the Opposition been so endowed with so many qualities that would make him an ideal prime minister. His objective criticism of the policies of a minority government is only equalled by the positive value of his views on national and international politics.

He combines the wisdom of the ancients and the vitality of contemporary statesmen. This man is the living symbol of the international brotherhood for which he has rightly deserved the Nobel peace prize.

I am especially proud, thanks to the voters of my riding of Quebec South, to serve my country under the guidance of such a leader, in whom a future great prime minister is already recognized. His influence which spreads throughout the world, will serve the internal as well as external interests of our country.

Mr. Speaker, since my arrival in the national capital, I felt sometimes like a rescued person. On the electoral map, you will find my riding in the centre of that eastern region of the province of Quebec, which experienced a western wind last June; however it is a wind that dies down very fast. Let us wait for a little while yet and this little storm will hardly deserve the name of "Socred".

Mr. Speaker, my riding's history is as old as that of Canada. Old Quebec expounds its history at every step, from the recollections of the foundation of Champlain's city, through those of French colonization, to the English conquest. In order to survive, the French Canadian became a nationalist for fear of English assimilation; and, in order to survive also the English Canadian became a nationalist for fear of U.S. assimilation.

Then, North America witnessed the faithfulness of the French Canadian people toward their one and only country, Canada, at the time of the American war of independence.

Without that loyalty of our ancestors, today Canada would form as many U.S. states as there are provinces. History had seen that conquerors and the conquered be united by a common interest. Then, there was the Act of Union and the confederation act, giving all Canadians a framework to attempt the development of a common ideal. Unfortunately, it seems we have not gone any further, or at least our progress has been very slow, because our pursuit of national unity has often been misunderstood.

At the time of the invasion of Paris, a French lady stood on the sidewalk watching the German troops marching down the Champs Elysees. One of the soldiers shouted at her: "Do you not hate us Germans?" The lady replied: "You are wrong, soldier. We love Beethoven."

In Quebec, one has sometimes the feeling of having been left on the sidewalk, each time the Conservative party has been in power. To give a recent example, last June, right in the middle of the election campaign, Mr. Guy Hudon and Dr. Forsey, two eminent Canadian citizens whose political affiliations are well known, created quite a stir when they resigned from the board of broadcast governors in protest against the injustice this agency, established by the Conservative government, was about to commit towards the population of Quebec by denying the C.B.C. the right to open a French T.V. station in our area.

A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Halpenny) what was the government's decision in this regard, the answer was that none had been taken.

I would have liked the Secretary of State to reassure our people by telling them that this permit would be issued to none but the C.B.C., and on the other hand, I would have understood that the austerity program established by the present minority government perhaps did not allow them to provide immediately for the establishment of that station.

And then, what will happen if, because of this austerity program, the C.B.C. does not renew its application to the board of governors? Will the latter feel justified in recommending to the government to grant the only available licence to another applicant whose alarming shadow haunts the halls of this parliament?

And I wonder why our region still has to maintain a state of alarm on that matter, when 102 public organizations intervened to support the application of the C.B.C. to the board of governors, when it is not only normal but in the national interest that the only French capital in America be at last provided with a French state-owned television station.

Besides, the evidence collected by the board of broadcast governors during its public investigation proves without a doubt that such a station would be a great asset to the cultural life of our country. How much longer will the government defer its reply?

Mr. Speaker, in 1958, my province had placed great confidence in the Conservative party by electing a great number of its members, that is more than 50. In 1962, there are only a few left—14 exactly. In the province of Quebec alone, the Conservative party lost 285,000 votes in the last election. Therefore, the notorious unpopularity of the Conservative party made possible the election of several Social Crediters in eastern Quebec.

In my opinion, that is the main cause of that party's partial success in the last election.

An hon. Member: What about yours?

Mr. Cantin: But make no mistake. Quebec has in no way voted or approved the confused and utopian economic philosophy of that party. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) admitted in this house—

An hon. Member: They are the only angry men.

Mr. Cantin: —that his constituents liked to change their member once in a while, and I truly believe that the present member would be quite acceptable if it were not for the fantastic monetary theories he advocates. Quebec has too much confidence in its institutions, its trade unions, its credit unions, its co-operatives—

An hon. Member: Its chartered banks.

Mr. Cantin: Yes, its banks, its insurance companies, its industries, and its business community to risk undermining their foundations through the establishment of a regime which is only clever as far as the mind that created it was, and as far as it succeeded in deceiving some part of our population with its repetitions, its redundancies, its arguments based on approximations and unrealistic undertakings.

Mr. Speaker, in Quebec—

An hon. Member: Hurrah for taxes.

Mr. Cantin: It is only a matter of resuming the dialogue first engaged by Cartier, Macdonald, continued by Laurier, resumed by Lapointe, Cardin and Power and, nearer to us, by St. Laurent, and today by Lester B. Pearson and Lionel Chevrier.

Mr. Pigeon: And Maurice Sauve.

Mr. Cantin: And through this dialogue, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to teach the development and the exercise of a national spirit. A great Frenchman, General Lyautey, said: "I am national-minded, not a nationalist." Nationalism is a doctrine that divides while national-mindedness is a fact, a source not of civil war but of union.

An hon. Member: L'Union Nationale.

Mr. Cantin: Furthermore, he who is national-minded by instinct never fears that he will not look like a nationalist.

The practice of bilingualism, the confirmation of our civil and constitutional rights, the search, by one or the other of our groups, for economic freedom, are, in brief, only so many manifestations of that same national spirit, and the pursuit of those objectives will help us realize our common ideal, which is national unity in the best interest of an economically strong Canada.

(Text):

What is the Liberal program on national unity?

Strengthening national unity and fostering national purposes are the constant aims of the Liberal policies.

French speaking Canadians must have the fullest opportunity to share completely in every phase of our national growth. Both English and French must feel that they are able to work out their special destinies inside confederation, through a full partnership that is appreciated by both, as a national asset and not an imposed requirement.

There should be scrupulous acceptance of the full equality of French and English language and culture, which should find expression in such things as documents issued by the federal government. These are, however, only the evidence of a partnership which must be instinctive and inviolable, something of the spirit, rather than documents and words.

On the basis of this partnership of English and French, Canadians of other origins must be brought fully into the common national life, not through assimilation but through integration.

Liberal policies seek to develop our homeland as the common heritage of all Canadians, new and old, and to achieve equality of opportunity for all Canadians regardless of their origin, their language or the region of Canada in which they live.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, if I did not believe in the possibility of seeing the two great intellectual families in this country united in a single common effort to build together a Canada stronger for being served by two great civilizations, I would have declined the honour of serving it in this parliament.

In this Telstar age, when man has found this marvellous means of being seen and heard simultaneously and instantaneously in all parts of our globe, at a time when those who had been enemies for centuries unite to open up their frontiers to common markets, at a time when people and nations gain their freedom, at this historical hour when we have begun the conquest of space, we are no more entitled to picayune behaviour, and it is our duty to be ourselves while respecting others. That is the ideal set by the Liberal party in order to accomplish national unity.

The Quebec area, Mr. Speaker, expects a great deal of the Liberal party, and it will not be disappointed.

If, inside its ancient walls, the old city of Quebec needs restoring, certain sections, decayed and devoid of historical interest, would have to be cleared of slums, as is sadly evidenced by the Martin report. However, the present facilities of the act remain too heavy to allow the city of Quebec to continue this radical transformation. With due respect to constitutional rights, our party, as soon as it comes to power, intends to amend the act as it now stands in the following manner:

For the slum clearing stage, the federal aid to municipalities will be increased from 50 to 75 per cent.

For the reconstruction stage, the federal assistance will remain at 75 per cent of the cost, but will be extended in the same proportion as the cost of establishment of public services, such as waterworks and sewer projects, street reconstruction, and other services to which the federal government does not at present contribute.

Besides this new form of assistance, the Liberal party will set up, with the help of the provinces, a municipal loan fund for the development of municipal services. Having been a mayor for nearly 12 years, I am in a position to state that our municipalities, especially in the Quebec suburbs cannot implement essential projects for lack of capital.

These initiatives on the part of the Liberal party, in addition to others mentioned in its dynamic program which is constantly brought up to date, will open an era of prosperity which all Canadians hope for, prosperity which will be given to them very soon by the only party capable of bringing this about, the Canadian Liberal party.

(Text):

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate you, sir, on your unanimous selection for a difficult but most important post. Next, I extend the traditional but none the less sincere congratulations to the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should also like to refer to my predecessor as member for Greenwood, Mr. J. M. Macdonnell, and pay a tribute to him. Mr. Macdonnell is a very fine gentleman and a great Canadian. I should like the house to know that he is held in high regard and affection by many who like myself do not happen to share his political views.

I propose in this speech, Mr. Speaker, to deal with problems affecting the constitution of Canada and international affairs raised in the speech from the throne, and the attitude of this group to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen). First of all, however, I should like to make a few general remarks. At a moment like this when one speaks for the first time in this historic parliament one naturally thinks of the people of one's own constituency. I think of the people of Greenwood, as I am sure other hon. members think of their constituents, as the salt of the earth and I hope I can justify the confidence they have placed in me as their representative.

I think particularly, Mr. Speaker, of the people I met during the election campaign, as I called from house to house, who have experienced and are experiencing the bitterness and frustration of prolonged unemployment. I think particularly of the fathers of families, fathers over 50 who are told that they are too old to work. I think of youngsters getting out of school and having the keen edge of their enthusiasm for life dulled by finding themselves unwanted and unused in the labour market.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that primarily unemployment is a moral problem. Have we the imagination to realize the wastefulness and the wickedness of the enforced idleness of our fellow citizens? If we do realize this, have we the will to organize society so that our human resources shall be fully employed and unemployment in fact brought to an end? The reason that I am proud to be a member of this party is that I believe this party has recognized and accepted the only means that can end unemployment, the means of economic planning and expansion of the public sector of the economy to the extent required to give everyone willing and able to work a job.

I think also of those in my constituency who are crushed and defeated by the burden of debt and anxiety caused by expensive operations and medical bills. Again, I am proud to be a member of a party dedicated to solving these problems in the only satisfactory way they can be solved, by a complete national health plan.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is my task today to call attention to what we believe are some serious gaps in the program presented in the speech from the throne on other than economic matters. The speech from the throne refers to the proposed repatriation of the Canadian constitution. With this proposal we warmly agree. With the hundredth birthday of this country a few years away, it is indeed a strange anomaly that the control over the constitution of Canada rests, in form at least, with the imperial parliament of Great Britain long after Canada's full sovereignty was recognized by the Statute of Westminster.

But it is not enough to say that the Canadian constitution should be repatriated. The outlines at least of the proposed method of repatriation must be given. The constitution sets out the basis of our Canadian confederation and the relationship between the people of this country and their governments. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that the constitution should entrench beyond the possibility of change the basic rights with respect to language, religion and education and should recognize fully the two nations and the two cultures that are the main streams of our existence. It is also our view that the amended constitution, to be made in Canada and by Canadians, should embody a genuine and constitutional bill of rights setting out the fundamental freedoms inherent in our parliamentary system. These freedoms, as members of the house know, are freedom of religion, freedom of speech and freedom of association. The present bill of rights, and I call the attention of the government members to this, is merely a declaratory statute capable of being overruled by this or subsequent parliaments and totally inoperative so far as provincial legislatures are concerned. If these fundamental rights and freedoms are contained in the solemn compact of our constitution, neither subsequent acts of parliament or the legislatures nor any subordinate authorities can invade them, and the courts will be able to act as the effective safeguard of our liberties to a degree that they cannot now.

I should like to employ this occasion, Mr. Speaker, to point out to our friends of the Social Credit party across the chamber, who sometimes seem to have so strangely perverted a view of history and politics, that so far from democratic socialism being the enemy of freedom, as they appear to believe, democratic socialists in Canada and throughout the world have been foremost in the struggle against every form of totalitarianism and bureaucratic oppression, whether from the right or the left, whether communist or fascist. Indeed, the most mature and successful democracies in the world are democracies such as Sweden and Norway which have had or have democratic socialist governments that successfully combine economic planning and individual liberty.

We in this group intend to carry on the battle in this parliament for the fullest respect for parliament and democratic institutions. That is why this group will vote tonight for the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. This matter, I would point out, Mr. Speaker, was first raised in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The facts of this matter are clear. I do not propose to repeat the observations of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), although I must say I agree fully with them. The government has imposed a surtax on imports by order in council or decree and no one but parliament has the right to impose taxation on the people of this country.

There is no more fundamental or historic right vested in parliament than control over taxation. Our ancestors shed their blood to establish this right. The attempt to justify this action under the provisions of the Customs Tariff Act and the Financial Administration Act is specious and unsound. The unsupported assertions of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) cannot remove the facts, and in my judgment it is not good enough to tell this house that it has no right to consider the legality of the government's action. What do these two acts contemplate? The first contemplates the removal of certain articles of import from one class or schedule to another and the goods so named attracting the appropriate fixed rate of duty in the class to which they are transferred. The Financial Administration Act contemplates the remission of taxation in the proper case, and in individual cases as the terms of the act make clear. Particularly, I should like to call the attention of the minister to section 22, subsection 8 of the act which makes the matter quite clear. The Financial Administration Act was never intended for a moment to justify the action taken by this government. Neither statute contemplates what was done here, namely the simultaneous transfer of class of article to a particular schedule and the remission of a part of the new rate of duty to the whole class so transferred. This is an indirect way to impose a direct tax or duty without calling parliament together to approve it. We in this group do not think it of importance that some previous administration may or may not have acted improperly before. I cannot follow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) in his suggestion that the sins of some former administration somehow blot out or condone the present sins of this administration.

What we are concerned with is that this government has, for its own convenience, usurped the rights of parliament because it did not see fit to call parliament to meet the emergency that developed soon after the election. The government was more anxious to allow passions to cool after the election, as the Prime Minister put it; or, as I would prefer to put it, the government was anxious to cling to power by taking steps to secure the support of a particular minority group. I call on all members of this house, Mr. Speaker, who believe that it is important to maintain the supremacy of parliament to vote for the amendment. I suppose it is too much to hope that the members of the government party will pay much attention to my suggestion, but I do most seriously suggest to the members of the Social Credit group that their vote on this amendment will be a test of the genuineness of their concern for parliamentary institutions, a test, moreover, of their faithfulness to their duties as a loyal opposition in this house.

May I make one last reference to the repatriation of the constitution? Much as we believe such repatriation to be desirable, it must not be done in such a way as to fasten a rigid and practically unamendable constitutional structure on this country or to give the power of veto to any one province in matters other than basic minority rights. In the proposals put before the in camera conferences of the attorneys general called by this government, such rigidity and such a veto were included.

The absurdity of such a veto power over any change whatever in constitutional provisions is made evident by a suggestion in the speech from the throne itself. The speech from the throne indicates an intention to put before parliament a resolution seeking an amendment to the British North America Act enabling parliament to legislate for contributory pensions. We in this group welcome this proposal. Supposing, however, all the provinces agreed to this change except one—and taking as an example the province of Newfoundland—would it be reasonable that one province, representing perhaps a small fraction of the people of Canada, could frustrate the will of the people of Canada as a whole in a matter in no way affecting basic provincial rights? Would it be reasonable to confer on the government of Prince Edward Island the right to veto the transfer to federal control of labour relations in nationwide industries such as steel and meat packing, which many believe can only be effectively handled at the national level?

The proposal for repatriation is a good one, but its method should provide for proper flexibility when required. There must also be a full opportunity for public discussion and scrutiny of anything so vital to the good government of this country as the form of a fully Canadian constitution.

There was one other aspect of the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, that we in this group found gravely disappointing. I refer to the references to international affairs. The complacency of this government about international affairs and this country's role is, in our view, totally unwarranted. In the rapidly changing world of today, we have become an interdependent part of one world. All the people of the world are united by a common fear of nearly universal destruction. From day to day, the B-52's of the strategic air command fly an airborne alert over the United States and Canada, carrying, on the average, 25 megatons or 25 million tons of explosive power, more than 12 times the amount of explosive dropped by all the bombers in world war II, including the two atomic weapons.

The stockpile of nuclear weapons in the United States is, we are told by responsible authorities, equal to ten tons of explosive for everyone in the world, and the U.S.S.R. presumably does not lag far behind. We live in an explosive world. We in this group respect, as all Canadians do, the persistent efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) to get the major nations of the world at least started on the road to disarmament. But there is no room for complacency. A striking gap in the speech from the throne is the complete omission of any reference to Canada's own part in the acquisition of nuclear weapons. Is the government still in the mist of indecision or has it made up its collective mind but is unwilling to tell the people of Canada of its decision?

We in this group believe that any addition to the security of the western alliance that Canada could bring by becoming, even to a limited extent, one of the nuclear club is far outweighed by the disastrous consequences involved in the further spread of the control of nuclear weapons to other nations. We regret that Canada did not take up clearly and unequivocally the Swedish initiative in the United Nations for the formation of a club, as it were, of non-nuclear nations pledging themselves to refrain from manufacturing or acquiring nuclear weapons and to refuse to receive them in their territory. The present degree of stability in the balance of deterrence may afford the human race a breathing spell when nuclear power to a significant degree is confined to two nations. The spread of nuclear weapons will quickly undermine any such stability of deterrence and make a nuclear holocaust set off by accident more probable than now. In any event, what the western alliance lacks is not so much tactical or strategic nuclear weapons. What it lacks are highly mobile conventional forces. Canada's contribution to her own security and that of her allies will be far more significant if it takes the form of strengthening conventional forces for non-nuclear purposes.

We have to build, while we can, a world community so that we can eventually establish a rule of law over the nations. This is the task of this generation and it will tax our efforts and our imagination. Can Canada claim she is doing all that she can to create this world community? In an appeal issued by the World Council of Churches at New Delhi to all governments and people of the world, the following statement appears:

> There is a great opportunity for constructive action in the struggle for world development. To share the benefits of civilization with the whole of humanity is a noble, attainable objective. To press the war against poverty, disease, exploitation and ignorance calls for greater sacrifice and for a far greater commitment of scientific, educational and material resources than hitherto. In this common task let the peoples find a positive program for peace, a moral equivalent for war.

In the Globe and Mail of May 31 of this year a reference appears to the testimony before a United States congressional committee by the United States aid chief, Mr. Frank Coffin. He said that Canada is far behind the leaders in the field of providing aid to underdeveloped nations. Canada, according to Mr. Coffin, gave .21 per cent of its gross national product, compared with .6 per cent by Britain and the United States, and .56 per cent by West Germany.

The New Democratic party at its founding convention said a reasonable standard for the amount of grants and long term interest free loans for economic aid was an expenditure equal to 2 per cent of the national income. We are convinced that with an expanding economy and full employment such a contribution is possible. Furthermore Canada might make a decisive contribution to the economic breakthrough of countries like India.

We live in days of challenge and we must make a creative response to it. That creative response will involve changing some of our traditional thinking and practices. Petty partisan bickering in this house, which unfortunately characterized the contributions to this debate by the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, are not good enough in the world in which we live today.

I shall conclude my remarks by quoting some words of Barbara Ward, or Lady Jackson as she is also known, whose works have already been quoted in this debate. She uses these words:

> The western citizen of today, if he is to face the world's crisis of freedom, cannot ignore the deepest ideals of his own free tradition. He must wish to recreate the face of the earth. He must see the human race as one brotherhood. He must set his abundance to work to end other people's misery and want. In this spirit freedom will conquer. Without it freedom hardly deserves the name.

I commend those words to this house.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when rising to take part in this debate I of course want to pay the conventional, indeed more than the conventional tribute to the mover and seconder of the address on this occasion. I also, sir, want to pay my tribute to you for having achieved the position which you are occupying right now as Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, and to the Speaker of the house who, for three or four years, was associated with me as parliamentary secretary. I hope that some of the lessons which we learned together in discipline and in working out the problems of national revenue may be of some assistance to him and to you in presiding over what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) calls this house of minorities.

We are speaking strictly on the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen). I am sorry to say that much as I welcome him personally to this house I deplore the fact politically that he happens to be here. But, if we have to have a Liberal from Nova Scotia, there is no one I would rather see here than the hon. member. He will pardon me if I do not propose to comment on the amendment further than was done today by my colleague the Minister of Justice because I am quite sure the hon. member, with his educational background, coming from that province where some people excel in that area, will realize that his arguments were somewhat phony and unrealistic, and that when the Minister of Justice got through with them today he should know there is nothing more I should say about them at this time.

This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the great milestones in the life of a parliament. During our regular sessions of parliament we have this debate on the address which, according to tradition, is always hard fought. It enables hon. members to speak about almost everything under the sun before finally the address is passed and the executive receives the confidence of the house. We are working towards that end at the moment. I am not anticipating what the votes may be, but at least on this occasion we are treading along one of the parliamentary highways which have made great the history of parliamentary procedure within the commonwealth.

As I say, one can speak on almost anything dealing with the affairs of the nation, and in a few moments I shall refer to some of the specific problems with which the Minister of Finance is perhaps more directly associated than any other minister; but I would like to make one or two casual references as I proceed along the way. Recently there has been a great deal of controversy and discussion about the entry of the United Kingdom into the common market. My friend—and I say that advisedly—my friend, the Leader of the Opposition has sometimes spoken caustically about the position that the Prime Minister of Canada has taken with respect to the problems with which this government was confronted in that matter.

Recently the Prime Minister attended the prime ministers' conference in London and, without attempting to read into the record a large number of quotations which one might read because one's time is very limited in this debate, I think it is fair to say that the Leader of the Opposition has criticized the Prime Minister for having taken a position in opposition to the United Kingdom going into the common market, suggesting that he was rather crying about the problems with which we were faced, and altogether belittling the efforts which the Prime Minister was making in defending and protecting the interests of Canada in the event of the possible entry of the United Kingdom into the common market.

This government, of course, has taken the position that it is a problem for the United Kingdom and none other; but I hope the Leader of the Opposition has read the speech made by the Hon. Hugh Gaitskell at the labour conference in Brighton on Wednesday last. One does not have to subscribe to the political tenets of that gentleman—and I do not—to recognize the fact that he is a distinguished leader in the parliament of the United Kingdom and one who some day may possibly be the prime minister of Britain. Although the resolution which was passed by the conference, as of course with all resolutions, had escape valves and escape hatches—and some of us in this parliament are not entirely unfamiliar with that process—certainly the leader of the Labour party came down four square on that occasion in opposition to the United Kingdom going into the common market, because he said it threatened the existence of the commonwealth as such.

We in this party attach a great deal of importance to the common market and to the entry of the United Kingdom into it. We believe it presents problems to us at the moment, but we believe they can be solved. We are also concerned about the future of the commonwealth as such, and I just wonder if the Leader of the Opposition when he was criticizing the Prime Minister, during those days and weeks when the Prime Minister was overseas, and before and since, knew what he would have the Prime Minister of this country do with the Hon. Hugh Gaitskell, whether he should take the Hon. Hugh Gaitskell by the hair and pull him into the common market or put his shoulder behind him and push him in. But certainly there was a wide divergence of opinion between the two at that time.

With respect to the balance of payments crises which followed after the election, I am not going into the details of that at the moment because we have had a great deal of talk with respect to this, but it has been suggested that the Prime Minister misled the country and deceived the electorate with respect to the position which we took in not going more fully into this matter before the election.

I think the Prime Minister dealt with this matter very effectively the other day, and I am not going to say anything more about it at the moment except to recall the figures which he put before us at that time. I think perhaps I should interpolate this. The Leader of the Opposition I think with a slightly twisted sense of humour, suggested that the reason this crisis developed was because of the lack of confidence in this government. I thought he made that fairly pointed. If that is the case, I would like to ask the Leader of the Opposition how he reconciles the figures, because as the Prime Minister pointed out the other day, between June 1 and June 14 there was a substantial loss in our foreign exchange. There is no question about that.

In fact, there was a loss of $128 million between June 1 and June 14. Then came June 15, which was a Friday, the last day of trading for that week. June 16 was a Saturday; June 17 was a Sunday. Then came June 18. Possibly some people may call that the Black Monday; that was election day. Then you get the balance of exchange for that week. We find that between the 15th and the 22nd, only five trading days, the fund lost $270 million, $142 million more in those five trading days than in the two previous weeks when people in Canada were hoping that this government would still be in power. But when they found that we were in a minority position, when they found that so many Liberals had been elected, there then came a run on foreign exchange control. So, as I say, we lost $142 million more in five days with the dire threat of the hon. gentleman opposite as a possible prime minister than we lost in the two weeks before when the people were hoping the Prime Minister would be returned with his government.

Mr. Pearson: Anyway, you have not lost your sense of humour.

Mr. Nowlan: An hon. member opposite says we deceived the electorate, that the Prime Minister deceived the electorate. I have dealt with these two matters, the common market, in the light of Mr. Gaitskell's statement last Wednesday, and the foreign exchange crisis. As I said earlier, the Leader of the Opposition is a good friend of mine, a good personal friend. We happened to come into the House of Commons on the same day more years ago than perhaps we would like to recall. Five of us came in on that day. Only two of us are left. The Leader of the Opposition was then secretary of state for external affairs; he is now the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. I was a junior backbencher in the House of Commons at that time, and I happen to be standing where I am tonight.

During all these years we have been very, very good friends, and I want to express my appreciation for what the hon. gentleman did when he was a minister and I was a private member. But in view of these misstatements which have been made, the misleading misstatements which have been made with respect to both these matters, and knowing the hon. gentleman as I do, I would hope that before this debate were over he would rise in his place and apologize to this house and the country for the charges he has made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: That is an old cliché.

Mr. Nowlan: I must say, Mr. Speaker, that as a private member it was much simpler to enter this chamber with an envelope stuck in your pocket which you could look at, than it is, as Minister of Finance, to come in with a text, the pages of which I invariably get mixed up.

Perhaps a word should be said with respect to the political complexion of this house. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) said the other night that this is a house of minorities. Naturally our friends in the press gallery are having a lot of fun speculating as to who is supporting who and what machinations or deals are going on behind the scenes. As I think one of the Social Credit party said the other day—at least, he is reported to have said this—perhaps they were a little bit unsophisticated in stating honestly their opinion that this country did not want an election at this time and that it was not the intention of that party to defeat the government for purely political purposes.

This has given a great deal of false courage to our friends on the extreme right and to our friends opposite, each of whom I would say are more afraid of an election than I think is the Social Credit party, and they are certainly more afraid of it than we are. So again we see the strange association between the one-time great Liberal party and the socialists now on my right.

The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—

Mr. Knowles: Tell us about your own bedfellows.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad to hear that voice. It reminds me of days when we walked up the aisle together confronting the Liberal party when the pipe line debate was on.

However, Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for York South, one of the new members of the House of Commons whose reputation preceded him, in a very able speech expounding socialistic philosophies said, among other things, of this government that we persisted in maintaining a policy of tight money. I will deal with that in a moment, perhaps, if time permits. Then the hon. gentleman continued that the government insisted on reducing expenditures and on chasing that will-o'-the-wisp of a balanced budget willy-nilly, with fingers crossed. A will-o'-the-wisp of a balanced budget—and they went to bed together. Shades of the great Liberal party. It is no wonder that there is some confusion in the gallery above as to who is supporting whom, which deals are made, and why. But in any event, when the division bells ring tonight, because perhaps of the forthrightness, or at least the sincere and honest declarations of our friends of the Social Credit party—I say "our friends" because I am very glad to see people in this house being honest enough to stand up and say what they believe in, instead of hiding behind statements made for their own purposes—or at least when they rang the other night, because far be it from me to say what will happen tonight when the division bells ring—

An hon. Member: You know.

Mr. Nowlan: —the pronounced socialists down on my right and the pseudo-socialists sitting opposite me climbed under the same blanket, shivering and shaking and hoping the lightning would be deflected, because they hoped that the Social Credit party would act as a lightning rod and deflect the lightning so they would not have to face the electorate in the near future. Mr. Speaker, this should be said, and I think it should be said seriously of all party divisions in this house. The government does not agree with the theory of monetary control, the theory of monetary expansion, which is espoused by the Social Credit party. As a matter of fact, I suppose I might say—I hope I will not be misunderstood in saying this as Minister of Finance—that if any of us can find any three people in any place in the country who agree on monetary theory, then we are accomplishing a miracle. But be that as it may, we do not think that the theory espoused by the Social Credit party bears this out, but this also should be said. The Social Credit party, according to its pronouncements, stands fairly and squarely on its principle of supporting the maintenance of private enterprise in this country. This government does likewise, Mr. Speaker. In the division which this house saw the other evening you saw a division on principle. You saw parties supporting private enterprise on the one hand, and the socialists and pseudo-socialists divided against them on the other. Mr. Speaker, a very distinguished leader of the Liberal party, the prime minister when I had the opportunity of sitting in this house in opposition, once said that the C.C.F.—at that time there was only the C.C.F. with us—were "Liberals in a hurry". Now I suspect that my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and others who were here in those days when we sat more or less together on the far side of the house, would say that they had witnessed a conversion which was greater than that witnessed by Saul of Tarsus when he was on the road to Damascus, and now we see that it is the Liberals, not the socialists, who are "socialists in a hurry".

Mr. Speaker, having indulged, as I said, in this parliamentary road block when one can cover everything under the sun, and which is one of the great traditions of our parliamentary system, perhaps you would expect me in the very short time which is left to me to deal with some of the financial problems with which we are faced. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that there will be many other opportunities, as I am sure there will be if this house has the intelligence which I think it has, for hon. members to raise these points and I will be able to develop further some of the matters which were referred to at this time.

There have been many good speeches made here during this debate. The newspapers have paid tribute, columnists have paid tribute, and I think we all will pay tribute, to the quality of the debate which has taken place so far in this chamber. Not that we agree with all that has been said, but perhaps it does have some merit in having competing groups more closely allied than they were heretofore and you get an expression of views which is refreshing and which is interesting.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) is one of the new members of this house whose reputation preceded him as a sort of deus ex machina of the Liberal party, and who I presume can assume to himself some credit for the rather substantial gains which it made in the last election. He talked the other day about tight money. I could go into this complex subject for a long while, but I am not going to do it at this time. However, I do want to say right now that I deny categorically and absolutely that there is any policy of tight money in this country. The hon. gentleman, as my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) pointed out the other day, has written at least two books, and he may have to write another one on this matter. I am sure he, with his knowledge of economic problems, would be the first to admit, as I know he does, that the needs of our monetary policy must satisfy the needs of our balance of payments position, as well as the needs of our domestic economy. Interest rates did rise. On June 24 the Bank of Canada rate went up to 6 per cent, but on September 7 it was reduced to 5½ per cent. Interest rates have eased accordingly.

One could go on and on dealing with the theoretical question of interest rates, but the interest rate of the bank itself is not the only criterion by which this government should be judged. It is not the only criterion by which the people of this country are going to judge this government when the time comes.

There are various mechanisms which we have to which I think some attention should be paid. Let us take the industrial development bank, for instance, for the moment. We talk of tight money. The loans in 1961 amounted to $71 million, which is 85 per cent more than in 1960. You could go down through the various classifications covered. In the retail trade you find that loans were up 150 per cent. Loans to the construction industry increased by 140 per cent. Manufacturing loans in some fields were up over 100 per cent—over 200 per cent in some cases—and in the 11 months of this year, and we are not through this year yet, including the period of the alleged austerity program—and I would like to take half an hour on that, but time does not permit—they are up over 31 per cent. The loans issued by the industrial development bank are up 31 per cent over last year at this time. If that is tight money, Mr. Speaker, then give us more of it.

Then let us take the loans under the Farm Credit Act. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, loans totalled $68.6 million, an increase of $8 million over 1960. In the first six months of this year there has been an increase of 22 per cent over the loans made in the same period last year.

Let us take the Small Businesses Loans Act, which, Mr. Speaker, you and I have good reason to know, having worked on the bill in days gone by. Loans up to December 31, 1961 totalled $25.6 million, and they were made to various classes of business. Loans for the second quarter of this year are running at an annual rate 21 per cent over last year. Mr. Speaker, is that tight money? With regard to home improvement loans, in 1961 they rose to a record level of $42.8 million compared to $30 million the year before. For the first seven months of this year the report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shows although the figures are not definite and conclusive, a definite improvement and an increase in loans over the same period last year. And one could go on.

Those are the principal lending agencies which this government is operating and which are being developed, and have been developed, under the aegis of this government. Then, of course, you have the Export Credits Insurance Act, amendments to which are being brought forward in the near future. I am not sure what business has been set forth for the rest of the week, but I think very shortly the house will be asked to deal with those matters. Section 21, the long term credit section which provides for exports of our products to the world, was absolutely inoperative under the preceding administration. Under this government we have loaned $100 million, almost $200 million, and we are going to ask for an increase of that amount so that we can continue our export sales program which has been instituted and carried on so well by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). And that is only one measure, Mr. Speaker.

I am warned that my time is running very short, Mr. Speaker, but I might also mention the substantial purchase of bonds which has taken place, and I am sure the hon. member for Davenport will appreciate that. A large number of bonds have been sold in the last few months following the problems that we faced. The bonds have all been taken up on the domestic market, and that of itself shows the confidence of the Canadian people in government bonds. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been made available from the banking system. I am not saying at the moment what tight money is. At the moment I am not trying to define what the level of the currency should be in this nation. That is a matter for determination and for government policy from time to time. However, I say this without hesitation or without fear. If the policy which this government is following is that of tight money, then Mr. Scrooge who is referred to by Dickens in his work, was a Santa Claus. There can be no question whatsoever about that matter. I think we have proven fairly well that substantial funds are available for various media of employment and development in this country. Having said all those things, and there are many more that I could say but my time is running very rapidly to an end, I do not wish anyone to assume for one minute that we feel we have solved all the problems of this country. There are many difficult problems ahead of us, including the balance of payments problem with respect to the over $1 billion a year that we pay out for services, dividends, interest and goods. Only once in the last 10 years under the aegis of this government have we had a surplus of goods, and that was last year.

An hon. Member: How about this year?

Mr. Nowlan: I hope that the figures will show that there has been an improvement this year. The hon. member for Davenport pointed that out. If I had the time, and I have not, I should like to read the speech of my distinguished predecessor, now Mr. Justice Abbott, back in 1947, when he pointed out the long term solution they were going to take to solve this problem. He said it would be solved by GATT, by gold subsidies and some of those things, all of which failed. The hon. member for Davenport referred to it in his report on economic conditions. A very distinguished commentator who is not very friendly to this government and who spoke at Queen's University a while ago said the record of the Liberal government from 1950 to 1956-57 on this matter was such that millstones should be hung around their neck and they should be drowned. That is the situation.

I am not professing for one moment that all these problems can be solved overnight. Their solution is going to take time. It is going to take a long while before they all can be solved. In the speech from the throne we have said—and I believe it is a factual statement—what we will do in the first five years of this revolutionary period. The whole world is going through a revolution, and a substantial one. The other day what happened? Our United States friend brought his spacecraft down within a few feet or a few miles of an allocated point in the Pacific ocean. That is a much more important scientific development probably than was Columbus' discovery of America. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether this is a scientific problem which you are trying to overcome—

Mr. Speaker: While the discussion at this moment has taken an extremely interesting turn, I regret that we must postpone further discussion. The minister's time has expired.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): If I venture to intervene in this debate, Mr. Speaker, it is because of the extremely friendly invitation or indeed challenge, issued to me by the Minister of Finance a moment ago. An invitation or challenge, if you like, couched in such friendly terms by one whom I admire personally so much is one that I think I should not turn down. This also gives me an opportunity to congratulate the minister on his new portfolio. I rejoice in his steady promotion on the ministerial ladder as a member of the class of '48. I thank him for his friendly references to myself and I most warmly reciprocate them as he knows.

The Minister of Finance spoke for one half hour and when he had ten minutes left he said, "It is time now for me to deal with finance". The minister should be more careful to speak as Minister of Finance at every opportunity. In this debate this is the first time we have heard from the Minister of Finance when so many financial subjects were being discussed and dealt with on the other side by the former minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice, who is still minister of finance so far as international financial affairs seem to be concerned and who is still the Canadian member of the international monetary fund and the bank of international settlements. I therefore suggest in a friendly way to the Minister of Finance that he take every opportunity to prove that he is the Minister of Finance, especially as there seems to be lurking in the other house someone who has aspirations in that field as well. We do not wish to see our old friend the Minister of Finance crushed between the upper and the lower millstones.

I am delighted that the minister has kept his sense of humour, which has stood him in such good stead over the years and which I hope will do so in the future. Perhaps he has never given a better illustration of his possession of that sense of humour than he has given tonight in the remarks which he has just made, especially when he said that we have nothing like tight money in this country at the present time. Then he went on to say, however, that he was not quite sure what tight money was, that he was not going to define it tonight. But whatever it is, we have not got it.

I ask him to inquire of any small businessman who is trying to get a loan whether we have tight money. I ask him to go to a bank and try to arrange a small overdraft and to find out whether we have tight money. The minister will no doubt on some other occasion tell us what he means by tight money. However, I tell him tonight that we certainly have tight money in this country at the present time.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Another example of the minister's sense of humour was given when he invited me to rise in my place at once in this debate before it was brought to a conclusion on this amendment and apologize.

Mr. Nowlan: I gave you two days.

Mr. Pearson: Presumably it was to apologize to the Prime Minister for what I have said about the attitude of the Prime Minister and his government on the common market and the attitude of the Prime Minister and the government in the election campaign to what we considered to be, with a great deal of evidence to support it, concealing vital financial facts from the electorate. If any apology is due to this house, Mr. Speaker, it is due from the other side. I do not accept the minister's invitation on this occasion.

Mr. Nowlan: I will repeat it later on.

Mr. Pearson: The minister said, "Our attitude toward the common market and Great Britain's entry into the common market must have been right because it was supported by the leader of the Labour party in Great Britain". He asked me whether I had read Mr. Gaitskell's statement. Of course I have read it. I have also read Mr. Macmillan's statement on the same subject. Our criticism of the government in this matter is a simple one. It is not that they are not trying to protect Canadian interests, and I hope I made this position clear in my first speech.

The criticism is that they do not know how to protect Canadian interests; and that in their efforts to protect Canadian interests, by adopting a shortsighted, narrow minded policy they have made Canada's reputation in this particular field lower than it should have been. Our criticism is that they have no understanding of the implications of this great move of Great Britain across the channel in the interests of the political and economic unification of Europe and the Atlantic world, something that may stand between us and destruction in the years ahead. We can have that and the commonwealth too, Mr. Speaker, but hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to understand that fact.

The other subject for apology is the concealment of the financial facts during the election. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) proved how right they were and how wrong we were and that they had concealed nothing because there was no crisis until two days after the election. That was the argument. He brought forward the figures that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had brought forward before to show that we had lost, how much, in those two days? One hundred and eighty million dollars or $200 million in a couple of days. According to him, and this is a magnificent example of the minister's sense of humour, the reason for that loss of dollars which reflected lack of confidence was that the people, presumably in Canada and outside of Canada, who are concerned with these international financial transactions had suddenly realized that the Liberals had elected 100 members in the new house. The reason for it, Mr. Speaker, is that the people who are concerned in these matters suddenly realized that the Liberals had not elected enough to take charge of the government at once.

The morning after the election, Mr. Speaker, the international and the national financial communities suddenly realized that this government had not been replaced, and on that knowledge dollars fled the country.

Mr. Nowlan: You have the sense of humour.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Finance had something to say about the amendment on which we are voting in a few moments. It is a very simple one, Mr. Speaker. It condemns the government for taxation without representation. It is a historic and age-old principle of British constitutional law and propriety that there shall be no taxes levied on the people without the people's representatives having a chance to express their will in respect of such taxes.

What have we got now? We have a government that has put into effect taxation by order in council. We on this side challenge the legality of that order in council. That is a matter for legal dispute. They say it is legal; but saying it is legal does not necessarily make it legal. Even if you assume it is legal, even if you assume that there is a legal basis for this action, the government having taken the action now refuses to give the people's representatives a chance to pass on the action they took by order in council.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense. That is what we are going to do right now.

Mr. Pearson: That is the issue. The Minister of Justice says that we are doing it now because we are voting on a motion of confidence in the speech from the throne. In this motion is that particular action of the government under consideration? Is it to be decided on any motion of confidence? The Minister of Justice knows it is a fantastic argument that if we vote the address in reply to the speech from the throne we confirm and ratify all the actions of the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have raised it yourself in this amendment.

Mr. Pearson: But, Mr. Speaker, taxation without representation and refusing to let the representatives of the people even discuss the matter—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is perfectly ridiculous.

Mr. Pearson: —that is what is being done now. The Minister of Justice tries to support this, the Minister of Justice who once draped himself in a Canadian flag and walked out of this house because he said parliament's and the people's rights were being debased.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They were too. You were a party to that.

Mr. Pearson: I ask the Prime Minister once again, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) did this afternoon, is he going to give this parliament a chance to decide and to express its opinion on the austerity program of the government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have been doing it for ten days now.

Mr. Pearson: There is going to be no opportunity given for us to discuss and decide on the taxation measures put into effect by the government by order in council and covering over $200 million of the people's money. That is the position that the government has taken. That is the issue in the amendment. It is as simple as that. We condemn the government. We have no confidence in a government that will take action of that kind, taxation on the basis of very doubtful legality at best, and then refusal to let the representatives of the people even discuss what they, the government, have done. How can any member of this House of Commons—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What have you been doing all these days?

Mr. Pearson: —who believes in parliamentary government vote against an amendment of this kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What have you been doing for the past two weeks?

Mr. Pearson: We put this subamendment before the house confident that every member of the house who really believes in parliamentary rights, parliamentary privileges and parliamentary government will vote for it and, Mr. Speaker, if the subamendment carries, if it means a general election, who are we to run away from a general election at this time?

It is very hard indeed, Mr. Speaker, to understand that a government, headed by my right hon. friend who once talked so much about the rights and privileges of parliament, will come into this house and tell us: We have done this by order in council and that is the last you are going to hear about it; you will be given no chance even to discuss it, let alone decide on it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have been doing it for two weeks.

Mr. Pearson: That is the very negation of parliamentary government—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a negation of the facts.

Mr. Pearson: —and that is only one reason why we have no confidence of any kind in this minority government at this time.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Pearson: I am informed that it is 9.30, Mr. Speaker, and the vote is to be taken at 9.30. Therefore—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.30 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment or amendments before the house.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. MacEachen) which was negatived on the following division:

OIL

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DISCOVERY OF OIL SATURATED SAND DEPOSIT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that last year I was able to announce the issuance of new regulations for oil and gas exploration and development in the north. These regulations outlined a policy which it was anticipated would encourage continued effort not only on the mainland of the territories but also in the Arctic islands. Since that time a deep test well has been drilled on Melville island and over $1,100,000 have been spent on geological exploration in the islands.

It is my pleasure to announce today that a geological party of J. C. Sproule and Associates, working in the Marie bay area of northwest Melville island for permit holders including Canadian Oil Companies Limited, Bankeno Mines Limited and W. R. Sheeky, have discovered a large exposure of sand saturated with oil. Preliminary information indicates that the saturated oil sand is between 60 to 80 feet thick and is exposed at the surface for a distance of approximately 60 miles. While much work remains to be done before the full significance of this discovery can be determined, it does give tangible proof that oil is to be found in the Arctic islands.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO PERMIT PROVINCIAL LOTTERIES

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-56, to amend the Criminal Code respecting provincial lotteries.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Valade: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code so as to enable the provinces which would like to do so to establish provincial lotteries with a view to providing assistance to hospitals and promoting social welfare.

The aim of this bill will be: (a) to bring into effect the act which, in 1935, amended the statutes of the province of Quebec, authorizing the latter to hold provincial lotteries, (b) to establish provincial lotteries for provincial purposes, (c) to help the province of Quebec to make up, in a democratic way, the deficit incurred in the last two years by the present Liberal government which has caused a state of stagnation in that province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

LIEFCORT—INQUIRY AS TO HALTING OF DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister advise the house whether the distribution in Canada of the preparation liefcort was stopped after similar action had been taken by the food and drug administration of the United States?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker; before.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Essex East. The question is this, Mr. Speaker. Did the food and drug directorate of his department know of the constituents of the drug liefcort before the department allowed the Endocrine Research Laboratories to distribute this drug?

Mr. Monteith: Our food and drug directorate has been dealing with this individual for a number of months while he has been in the process of gathering the information required for a new drug submission. This has involved a number of calls by officials of the department to determine the steps being taken by Dr. Liefmann to meet the requirements necessary before a new drug may be cleared for general distribution under medical prescription.

My officials have recently come to the conclusion that the present indefinite situation could not be allowed to continue. While the drug has been in circulation amongst investigators, suitable progress reports have not been forthcoming. For this reason, Dr. Liefmann was advised last week that distribution of his drug should cease. At the same time, it was pointed out to him that if he wished to reintroduce the drug for investigation at a later date, my department would be happy to review the situation again.

I might add that the reports furnished the department by Dr. Liefmann from time to time have not indicated the development of serious side effects associated with the use of the drug.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member a supplementary question?

Mr. Haidasz: My question, specifically, was did the food and drug directorate know that one of the constituents of the drug liefcort contained ten times the therapeutic dose of estradiol?

Mr. Speaker: This is hardly a supplementary question. The hon. member is putting forward an opinion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There is a question of a related question here.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you have just told the hon. member that his question was not proper. I suggest to you that this is a matter that might involve life and death in this country. Surely any question that bears on a question so related is one that may be asked at this time by an hon. member of a minister of the crown.

Mr. Speaker: At no time have I suggested that the hon. member should not ask his question, but he asked it, I would not say under the guise but under the heading of a supplementary question, and I judged that it was not. In that regard he has intruded or cut back on the rights of other hon. members. It does not matter to the Chair, but it is a matter of the rights of other hon. members who may have true supplementary questions to ask, as I understand the meaning of "supplementary".

Mr. T. R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether his department has discovered whether the preparation liefcort was used in Canada by persons suffering from arthritis prior to distribution of the drug being stopped last week?

Mr. Monteith: I believe it was being used in some instances, Mr. Speaker, but under direct distribution by the manufacturer.

[Later:]

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister inform this house today, if he can, or later if he has not the answer to my question, whether the food and drug directorate knew before this drug liefcort was distributed that one of the constituents of that drug contained ten times the therapeutic dose of estradiol.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical question, which I am not prepared to answer at the moment.

IMPORTATION AND SALE OF JEQUIRITY BEAN NECKLACES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. P. Ryan (Spadina): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government taken any steps to prevent the further importation, sale and distribution of jequirity or death bean necklaces in Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no legislation under which my department could take action in this matter. The Food and Drugs Act gives us certain powers with respect to goods designed for human consumption or for the treatment of illness, but its terms go no further than that. Such hazards to health are always deplorable, but with the publicity this matter has received I would hope most earnestly that parents are well aware of the need for caution.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

TORONTO—ALLEGED OVERCROWDING OF FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that the premises and facilities for the training of unemployed persons in metropolitan Toronto are seriously overcrowded? If so, is the government giving consideration to providing assistance for the building of additional facilities there under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order. With all due respect to the learned member I do believe that by now he will have realized his question was not one of the kind asked on orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL-SARNIA—WORKING CONDITIONS OF PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister investigate the matter of the professional pilots serving in the Welland canal-Sarnia area of the seaway, where pilots claim they are working up to 500 hours a month, and also claim that nearly all the promises made to them have been broken?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am asking the co-operation of hon. members, particularly those who have been here some considerable time and who know that representations may be made to the ministry on occasions other than the orders of the day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I say a word on the point of order Your Honour has raised. It does seem to me that in the recollection of those of us who have been here longest, who have observed parliament the longest, it has been the immemorial custom in this house to ask questions based on urgent telegrams received from constituents about matters of public administration that arise suddenly in these places. This seems to me, sir, precisely the character of the question asked by the hon. member for Welland. I submit with great respect, sir, that a new boundary seems to be suggested by the ruling of Your Honour.

[Later:]

Mr. J. C. McNulty (Lincoln): May I inquire of the Minister of Transport if he has replied to the urgent request of Mr. Stevenson of the great lakes pilots? If so, would he communicate the nature of his reply to the house?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have not seen this wire yet. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as we have received it we shall take action.

TRADE

CUBA—RUSSIAN CARGOES CARRIED IN CANADIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question in regard to the part played, as he said, by eight Canadian owned ships in trade between communist countries and Cuba, following which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) used these words:

> I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can control not be exercised over these ships or the companies owning them because of the fact that their profits are taxed in this country and the money goes into the federal treasury?

To this I replied that I had no information in that regard but would look into the matter. I now find that the owners of approximately 125 Canadian vessels were allowed, in 1949 and 1950, to register their ships in the United Kingdom under the transfer plan. Control of these vessels was vested in United Kingdom managers who were required by the agreement to operate these ships in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom.

Of that transferred fleet only 15 ships remain, and these are still under the control of the laws of the United Kingdom. I am informed that the Canadian taxation law cannot be used to override the law of the flag which controls ships operating in other countries.

WORLD FAIR—REPRESENTATIVES ATTENDING PARIS MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's interests and activities in connection with the world's fair for Montreal, has the minister's attention been called to the press report appearing on page 1 of the Gazette today? If so, what is the purpose of the meeting to be held in Paris and who are the persons representing the federal government?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, two subcommittees of the bureau of international exhibitions are at present studying the rules and regulations which apply to all world fairs or exhibitions, and in particular are studying the rules and regulations which apply to the petition which has been made by Canada to have the world fair of 1967 in the metropolis of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: One of them.

Mr. Sevigny: I say "metropolis" with due respect to the members from Toronto. The representatives of the federal government who are at present studying these rules and regulations are Mr. Kniewasser of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who is our trade commissioner in France; Mr. Bannerman, also of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who has taken a particular interest in the matter of world fairs in the past, and also Mr. Smith from the Department of Justice. May I say also that the city of Montreal is represented at these meetings by its mayor, Mr. Jean Drapeau, Mr. Lucien Hetu and Mr. Valmore Gratton. The province of Quebec, I am told, asked to be represented at these meetings by its delegate general in Paris, Mr. Charles Lucien.

REPORTED EXPORT OF TRUCK PARTS TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is based on a report in today's Toronto Telegram. Will the minister confirm or deny that an export permit has been issued to permit a shipment of approximately $62,000 worth of truck parts to the communist Chinese government by a Canadian automotive manufacturer?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Trade and Commerce is aware that automotive parts, wholly manufactured in Canada by various automotive manufacturers, have been exported to the People's Republic of China in limited quantities. Automotive parts are not covered by any item in our export control list, and are considered to be legitimate export business for Canadian traders.

[Later:]

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement he made in reply to my earlier question, and in view of the general unrest in North America on the subject and our obligation under NATO not to furnish strategic equipment to communist countries, or equipment that can be converted into strategic equipment, has the minister considered revising the present regulations to which he referred in his statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is advancing an argument rather than seeking information.

LUMBER—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. What information has the minister relative to the progress of the hearings on exports of Canadian softwoods to the United States?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the case before the United States tariff commission is being presented by various representatives of the British Columbia lumber industry especially. The information I have is that the final stage of the hearings has yet to be reached, and that this stage will take the form of the appearance before the commission of a number of United States importers of lumber and certain representatives of other United States groups. It is possible that these groups will be more sympathetic to the Canadian viewpoint than were the earlier United States witnesses.

It is felt that the Canadian delegation have made a very strong case, particularly in rebutting certain arguments put forward by United States interests. I shall be glad to keep the hon. gentleman informed as to any future information we have.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INTERVENTION IN DISPUTE WITH AUTHORS AND ARTISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): May I put a question to the Secretary of State?

Does he intend to intervene in the disagreement between the C.B.C. and the Canadian council of authors and artists?

(Text):

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to raise that matter with the officers of the corporation and advise the hon. gentleman.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORTH BAY, ONT.—CHANGE IN ALERT POSITION OF BOMARC CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is it a fact, as reported by Peter Newman in the current Maclean's, that the R.C.A.F. crews manning the North Bay Bomarc station recently went off 24-hour alert and on to an eight hour day; and if so, can the minister advise the house the reason for this change?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no information I can give on that matter at the moment. I will inquire into it.

TRANSPORTATION TO EUROPE OF CF-104 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if it is a fact that the first of the CF-104's is now being air transported in a partially dismantled condition to Europe by C-130 Hercules air transport. If so is there not, in the minister's opinion, a more economical way these planes could be transported to Europe?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The matter of transporting these planes to Europe was gone into in very considerable detail from a cost point of view by the R.C.A.F., and the conclusion was reached that this was the most economical means of getting them there.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIMES—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF CORN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the extremely urgent need for corn in the maritime provinces' agricultural industry, and since low grade western wheat will not be available as a substitute for another month, would the minister consider extending the subsidy on corn to the maritimes for another month beyond September 30, as requested by the provincial governments concerned and the maritime provinces federations of agriculture?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a number of hon. members on this side of the house approached me some weeks ago on this matter, as well as the various provincial governments in the maritimes. I had the question looked into. Incidentally another hon. member on the opposite side of the house, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart), indicated his intention of asking this question today.

I may say in answer that the subsidy on corn shipments to the Atlantic provinces was instituted in April of this year to meet the deficiency of high energy feeds caused largely by the short western wheat harvest of 1961. When this subsidy was introduced it was announced and understood that it was a temporary measure which would be discontinued on September 30. However, the administrative arrangements did permit feed retailers to obtain subsidized corn up to September 30 to cover temporary forward needs.

On the basis of average utilization rates as compared with the total movement of subsidized corn to the area, there should be at present adequate supplies of high energy feeds in the Atlantic provinces to meet total requirements for several weeks yet.

HOGS—INQUIRY AS TO RESTORATION OF PREMIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Honey (Durham): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Having regard to the necessity for hog producers to have accurate market information in order to regulate present breeding decisions, and in view of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture in the house on October 3 that the reduction in premiums on grade A hogs represented the contribution of hog producers to the national effort to reduce the budgetary deficit, can the minister advise the house if this premium will be returned to its former level when the austerity measures are lifted by the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may feel that the subject is rather important. While I agree with him, I do not think that at the moment the information is urgently required.

(Translation):

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

MONTREAL-OTTAWA—REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL HOSTESSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, I was travelling from Montreal to Ottawa on board a T.C.A. aircraft, flight No. 259, and I noted that two hostesses were unilingual, that is to say they did not speak French. Now, while I have much sympathy and respect for the English language, and while I am trying to improve my knowledge of that language as much as I can, I should like to know whether the minister intends to take steps in order that the personnel of Trans-Canada Air Lines speak French as well as English.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that having made his representations, the hon. member is not anticipating a reply from the minister, since he is not trying to obtain urgent information on this matter.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Lincoln.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I think the Minister of Transport intends to reply to my question, and I should like to have a reply. I demand a reply.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member may demand a reply, since no member may do so here.

The hon. member having made his representations, I consider his question as irregular for the time being. However, if the minister wants to reply, it is up to him to decide.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am doing everything possible to settle to the satisfaction of everyone the problem of questions asked on the orders of the day. If the question period is to become a fishing expedition, it is the privilege of the members of the house to do so, but I fear that we will not achieve much as regards the business of the house.

Therefore, if a minister and a member have agreed on a question, it's all very well, but I am asked to rule on the matter at once, and I think that if the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member would kindly examine the standing order concerning questions asked on the orders of the day, he will note that it is up to the Speaker to rule as to whether a question is regular or not, and that is why I often have to rule on the validity of a question. This is not a negative attitude, at least in my opinion. However, if the minister wishes to reply—

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

(Text):

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): If I may rise on a point of order, I think once Your Honour has indicated a ruling, as you have done in the past and as you have just done with respect to the question asked by the hon. member, you have no right to leave it to the discretion or desire of a minister as to whether or not he should answer. If we are to have rules or rulings on questions, then they should be rulings of your own and you should stick by them.

Mr. Speaker: In reply to what the hon. member has said, let me observe that perhaps he is setting a precedent which some day he might regret, inasmuch as he too might ask a question which the Chair might consider to be out of order but which a minister would be prepared to answer. I would advise him to judge the present situation in the light of what I have said. At no time do I wish to prohibit the giving of information, and if a minister is prepared to answer a question then it is in the hands of the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to discuss your decision because I accept it. However, since in the circumstances you mentioned I could answer the question, I must tell the hon. member for Villeneuve that I shall be pleased to co-operate with him in order to help him talk as often as possible with the T.C.A. hostesses. So I shall ascertain that his representations are referred to the management of the corporation.

Mr. Caouette: I thank the hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Text):

GRAIN

PROVISION OF STATUTORY BASIS FOR ACREAGE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address to the Prime Minister a question which I trust is under the wire and above the belt. In view of the great expectations of prairie farmers will the Prime Minister inform the house when the government intends to place acreage payments on a statutory basis?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question does not fall in either of the categories mentioned by the hon. member.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Rosedale): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, and may I take this opportunity of congratulating him on his assumption of his new responsibilities. The question relates to one of them, and has to do with the Currency Act. The question is this. Has the government entered into contracts with the two major printers of bank notes in Canada for the preparation of a large supply of funny money in order to fulfil the conditions of the government's most recent political alliance?

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the hon. member may have wished to make certain observations, I think he has plenty of opportunity in the throne speech debate to make comments of the nature of those he has made. Without attempting to give a lecture, may I say that this type of question is the thing that turns the orders of the day question period into something that is not in the best traditions of this house.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF IMPORT SURCHARGE ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In order to clear up a matter of serious uncertainty, will the government give consideration to referring the surcharge on imports order to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act for determination as to whether or not the order is valid?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no uncertainty. Therefore the government will give no consideration to the submission contained in the hypothetical question.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Justice a question based on the reply which the Prime Minister gave a few moments ago regarding the legality of the surcharge order in council. Will the Minister of Justice table in this house or give to this house the legal opinion which he told us yesterday the government received prior to the decision of the government to impose its austerity program?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): I said we had received the opinion of the deputy attorney general, and we did. I did not say that there was a formal written opinion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are communications that pass between a minister and his deputy on this subject, Mr. Speaker, or any subject which are regarded as privileged. I made the statement that the deputy attorney general of Canada had given an opinion that the order was valid and within the authority conferred upon the governor in council by this parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice in 1947, and the Prime Minister in that same year, said that the government of the day should produce the legal opinion given to the then government by the law officers of the crown, will they explain to the house the answer the minister has just given? Is he not—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think all we are doing is reviving last night's debate, which was concluded with the vote on the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, may I say that during the course of the debate yesterday the Minister of Justice spoke. The Prime Minister did not speak. He did make an answer on the subject a few minutes ago, and I am now asking if the Minister of Justice will table the legal opinion which the Minister of Justice's reply yesterday indicated was a written opinion and which he now says was oral.

Mr. Speaker: I am not commenting on the first question which the hon. member asked, which was whether the minister would table something. He received a reply. His supplementary question is a straight revival of last night's debate in this regard. I think the hon. member fully understands the rules on this point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If Your Honour will bear with me, I should like to say a word on this point of order. Your Honour will recall that the Minister of Justice said that while the opinion was oral, there had been an exchange of letters between the law officers of the crown and the minister which he regarded as privileged. This indicates that there was, in fact, a written opinion. My question, which I ask with great respect I be allowed to persist in putting, is, in view of the attitude taken by the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister in 1947, could we be given now or at the earliest possible moment the written opinion of the law officers of the crown which will determine whether or not this government was advised as to the legality of the austerity program?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member finished his question, I have not changed my opinion as to the nature of his supplementary.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What does that mean?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Speaking to the point of order, may I say that we cannot have matters left in this way. Either my question is improper and should not be answered, if Your Honour so rules, or if it is proper Your Honour should not leave the matter where it is, as indicated by your remarks of a few minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I had made it reasonably clear that I consider the supplementary question which the hon. member was pursuing was reviving an argument made in the debate that had been pursued yesterday evening, and upon which there was a vote. The matter, therefore, is concluded. I permitted the hon. member, at his request, to complete his question, and I have indicated that nothing which he added to his question changed my opinion that he was reviving a debate that was entered into yesterday evening.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS IN UNORGANIZED MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he tell me if steps will be taken this autumn, under the winter works program, to come to the assistance of parishes which are not incorporated as municipalities and which the county councils do not want to look after?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that this time the hon. member is asking a question which, in my opinion, does not seem very urgent at the moment.

(Text):

WINTER WORKS—HIRING OF REGULAR SUMMER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold A. Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In the administration of the winter works program, are municipal authorities prevented from hiring regular summer employees who have now been laid off but who are not registered as social assistance cases? Will the minister make a statement to clarify this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for clarification of certain detailed rules of a particular program which are a matter of public record, and I suggest to him that his question would better appear on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PARKS BRANCH—ALLEGED INCOMPETENCE OF SENIOR OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I should like him to tell us what is the present status of Mr. Coleman, a top official of the national parks agency, in the light of published reports that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) and other Alberta members of parliament have gone to the Prime Minister asking for his replacement on the ground, as I understand it, of alleged incompetence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The subject matter having existed for some considerable time, I do not think an answer to that question is urgently required on orders of the day.

Mr. Fisher: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you say that the subject matter has existed for some time. All I know is that I saw it very recently. It certainly is a question at issue, and the minister should give an answer when one of his senior officials has been criticized in this way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not disagree with the hon. member that the matter may be important, but the point at issue as far as I am concerned is whether the answer that he is seeking from the minister is urgently required at this time in our proceedings.

Mr. Fisher: At what point in the proceedings would it be proper?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day are not the time when we seek all sorts of information of this particular type.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur, I would respectfully draw Your Honour's attention to almost any day's Hansard in the mother of parliaments, where it will be found that questions having to do with the civil rights of a subject, however obscure that subject may be, are always allowed by the Speaker of that house. I suggest that when a very senior servant of the government is criticized by a member of this house, who suggests he should be dismissed, it is a proper matter for inquiry on the orders of the day at the first possible moment, if we are to uphold the rights of the subject, which is our first duty in this house.

A. S. WHITELEY—GRATUITY IN LIEU OF RETIREMENT LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. If Mr. A. S. Whiteley is retired at the end of this month as a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, will consideration be given to granting him a gratuity in lieu of retirement leave, as provided in the regulations under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member is making a representation rather than seeking information of the sort that should be given on orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think we will have to have a session about this whole matter of questions. This is a matter in which the fate of an individual is at stake, but we have been unable to get answers to the questions we have been asking in order to find out whether consideration will be given to the protection of his rights as a civil servant. In fact I put my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that under this government the Civil Service Act was amended—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is speaking now on a question of privilege, and privilege is a matter of the rights of an individual member or of members of the house as a whole, and as such it very rarely arises as a question in this house. As I said yesterday, I am not for one moment downgrading the importance of the subject matter about which the hon. member may wish to direct a question. What I am trying to do is to limit orders of the day to those questions where information is urgently sought which cannot be obtained otherwise, so that we can get on with what I conceive to be the appropriate business of the house.

Mr. Knowles: May I submit that this is a question concerning which it is urgent that an answer be obtained before time runs out, so that if anything is going to be done to protect the rights of this civil servant it will be done in time. I would press my question to the Minister of Justice.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—CONSTRUCTION OF LANDING STRIP AT SPANISH BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have told the Minister of Transport of my intention to ask him today if his department has any interest in or any knowledge of the proposed building of an airplane landing strip at Spanish Banks in the city of Vancouver?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the project that is mentioned by my hon. friend but I must say that the Department of Transport has no interest whatsoever in the project.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINUTES OF MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. When did the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission last meet, and when will the findings of that meeting be tabled?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): They met in the middle of this year—I do not know the exact date—and their recommendations have been tabled in the house and have been available to members for the last two weeks.

FISHERIES

ALEUTIAN ISLANDS—ACTIVITIES OF RUSSIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has he any knowledge about the movements, numbers and purposes of Russian fishing boats or other craft in the area around the Aleutian islands, with specific reference to the movement of those vessels in a southerly direction toward British Columbia waters?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my department has no specific information on this matter, other than that the official publication of the United States fish and wildlife service has reported a fairly large Russian fishing fleet active in the Aleutian islands area, but there is no confirmation that it is moving toward Canadian waters.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BAIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether his department has taken any steps to relieve the shortage of squid in the Newfoundland fishery.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether the question of getting the information has become any more acute today than it was yesterday. I am sure the problem is of the same type, and I am sure that the representations which hon. members made in that regard yesterday, and the hon. member was one of those, have been duly noted. But there again, is it within orders of the day?

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by Your Honour, I submit that the question I asked today is not the same as the question that was asked yesterday. I inquired, and I was only inquiring, whether the government had taken action. The question asked yesterday was a question about intentions. I was asking about a matter of fact. I submit to Your Honour that squid are just as important in the fishery of Newfoundland as corn is in the maritime provinces, and Your Honour raised no question about corn.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker, but not the action that was suggested by yesterday's question.

INCOME TAX

QUEBEC—COLLECTIONS FROM PRIVATE POWER COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I gave the Minister of National Revenue notice of my question.

I should like to ask him what was the amount of taxes paid to the federal government in 1961 by private power companies in the province of Quebec.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member fully understands that his question requires detailed statistical information and that it is not proper on the orders of the day.

HARBOURS

MONTMAGNY, QUE.—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Cook (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Public Works considered the question I asked him on October 4 last, which was put on the order paper under No. 112?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will look in Hansard and I shall reply later to the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLEGED IMPROPER USE OF QUESTION PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which I regret bringing before the house. It relates to a breach of the rules that we witnessed this afternoon by the Liberal party, so I think I have to bring up this point of order. I want to mention this point of order because three members of the Liberal party have broken the rules this afternoon by asking questions of the ministers pertaining to articles—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Valade: I am putting my point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is, as I assume, endeavouring to state his point of order succinctly he should be allowed to do so without being interrupted by repeated calls of "Order" from either side of the house. If the Chair is to make a ruling on the point of order I should be allowed to hear it clearly.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no question before the house on which a point of order can be raised.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Mary is stating a point of order; he has the floor.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no question before this house and a point of order cannot be raised. The rules are clear on that.

Mr. Valade: The reason I am bringing forward this point of order is that three members of the opposition have read articles from newspapers and have asked ministers to confirm or deny those articles. This is entirely contradictory to the rules according to Beauchesne, citation 177. The members of the opposition are wasting the time of the house on articles appearing in newspapers, and I think this is contrary to the rules. I should like Your Honour to take a position in this respect so that the Liberals, either by ignorance or otherwise—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is endeavouring to see, although it seems to take some considerable time to get the point across, that the questions asked during the question period are of a kind permitted on orders of the day. I must say that I believe it is contrary to the spirit of orders of the day when hon. members take this or that article and ask a minister to confirm, deny or comment upon them. I believe that has been amply shown to the house.

However, I must say that I am not in the confidence of all the members of this house in this regard, nor do I feel it is the Speaker's job to read over their shoulders if they are able to use long range vision and refer to some newspaper article. I leave it to hon. members to govern themselves discreetly and properly within the rules. I do not see that the raising of the point of order has helped too much at this time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LE SOLEIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Dumont incident was largely commented on last week in the province of Quebec and here is a report carried by Le Soleil on October 6:

> That is only the beginning, told me Liberal whip J. A. Habel while one of his colleagues predicted that in the end, Mr. Diefenbaker will be so ashamed of owing his political survival to those clowns that he will call for an election himself.

I state here that there is no question about the integrity of our group in this house and I say that the biggest clowns ever seen in Canada since it became a country are the Liberals as we have seen and heard them in action—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to citation 113 of Beauchesne dealing with questions of privilege.

With all due respect I do not think the hon. member can raise a question of privilege, and retort by calling another group the same name.

I do not believe there is ground to raise a question of privilege at the moment.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would hon. members who are leaving the chamber please do so as expeditiously as possible and without entering into conversations on their way out so that the hon. member who has the floor may address the house.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, like all those who have preceded me in this debate I wish to extend my congratulations to you and Mr. Deputy Speaker on your elevation to the high offices you hold. Though my words may be brief, and though your job is becoming more difficult, my thoughts for you are none the less sincere.

I extend the same compliments equally sincerely to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and before proceeding further I should like to pay tribute to the efforts put forth in this house by the deceased member for Wetaskiwin, Mr. Speakman, on behalf of the veterans of Canada and in the field of agriculture, as well as all his other interests.

Before making any comments on the debate which has taken place so far I should also like to make some specific mention of the assistance that has been rendered to me by the ministerial benches. I particularly mention the Minister of Agriculture because I represent two counties in Ontario, the county of Grey and the county of Bruce for which, as well of course as for others, the minister has laid down a program the implementation of which, he assured me within the last few days, will be expedited.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to whom I extend my gratitude for instituting, in conjunction with provincial authorities, a survey program for determining the feasibility of establishing a park in the Bruce peninsula. I also recognize the assistance given by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Robinson) and the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Noble). I hope this park will be established in the vicinity of the terminating point of the Bruce trail, which will probably come to fruition in 1964 or 1965.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have some thoughts to put forward on things that have been said in this house. These subjects have been brought back to me in some cases by my constituents and in other cases by the newspapers which have some influence in the riding I have the privilege to represent. They deal with the efforts of the official opposition to downgrade and vilify the Prime Minister of Canada, and hence the Canadian people. Unquestionably the Liberal party has downgraded the standards of political life. They have done this not only in the past but during the last few days in the course of this debate. For instance, there was the statement by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, which is to be found on page 216 of Hansard for October 4:

> I might say, sir, that if anyone wants to see how the Prime Minister looked that day himself it is recorded on page 38 of Newsweek, the issue of July 2, and I commend it to the hon. gentlemen opposite.

That is a statement which is very definite in its implication, and there was a further statement by the same hon. member, to be found at page 218 of Hansard, when he made this remark in regard to the Minister of Justice:

> He can get up and make a speech in this debate if he dares.

That was rather typical of the hon. gentleman from Bonavista-Twillingate. Earlier than that, as recorded at page 73 of Hansard for October 1, the leader of the official opposition said:

> If the government tries to tell us that it has continued to play an increasingly effective role in international affairs, then I would ask it to present the evidence in support of that.

Then there was the statement made last evening by the leader of the official opposition replying to the invitation of the Minister of Finance, in which he said:

> Presumably it was to apologize to the Prime Minister for what I have said about the attitude of the Prime Minister and his government on the common market—

There are other things I would like to comment on with regard to the interest shown by my constituency, by myself, and by other people who support the stand that we take.

First of all I regret that the Leader of the Opposition is not present, because I wish to remind him that on many occasions and in many circumstances I supported him because of his type of personality and the type of man he was, in the past, but not the type he has now become. Some time before the end of the last parliament he made a speech in my home town of Hanover in which he said:

Our influence as a country abroad has diminished.

This will be found in the Owen Sound Sun-Times of that date. There are many other such quotations that I could use. I could refer to the one used by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, from a speech made by the former minister of public works when he stated Canada was on the verge of bankruptcy. I could also refer to another statement made by the same man at Sherbrooke, Quebec, when he said that Canada's prestige had been lowered and it had even lost the confidence of its own people at home. If these were not deliberate efforts to downgrade our country and our political life, then I am afraid I must be wasting my time here. I say that because it is the type of representation in this house and the support and assistance I have received, in my own experience, from the ministers of the crown that permit me to stay here in my own good conscience to serve the people of my constituency, and not the sort of thing that has been coming from the other side, particularly from the senior members.

Let us go back a step further, Mr. Speaker. This all did not happen in very recent times. For instance, we recall the many, many speeches made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the great effort he made to play up the circumstances that existed when we were having a difficult time finding employment for all the workers of this country.

I refer hon. members to a newspaper article published in the Galt Evening Reporter by one of the local members of the press gallery. He said:

The Hon. Paul "Mother Goose" Martin is spreading his fairy tales with a heavier hand than ever. But it is as a wicked fairy that he continues his three year old campaign of smearing Canada as a country of misery, depression and unemployment.

This was about the hon. member for Essex East, and you will note, Mr. Speaker, that he has been rather quiet of late; just a little bit quiet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are going to arouse me if you continue.

Mr. Winkler: We know why. Is he now unhappy because a lot of Canadians are working, more than ever before in the history of our country? This reporter goes on to say, of the hon. member for Essex East:

Would not his pulse quicken with glee, if he could rise in the house and talk about one million Canadians out of work?

But it is a regrettable effort on the part of the hon. member for Essex East. That is not all. I could go on all day, but I have chosen these examples because I am endeavouring to prove that the members of that party did what they could to the best of their ability to downgrade this country and vilify its leaders, particularly the Prime Minister. This quotation comes from the Owen Sound Sun-Times, the only daily printed in the vicinity of my constituency. It is the issue of February 10, 1962, after the hon. member for Essex East made a terrific attack on the government's policy of endeavouring to get people back to work. The commentary was this:

And, as so often is the case of such critics, he took the risk of actually harming the nation's economy to attain his end.

I wonder what that end is. I do not think it is very difficult for hon. members of this house to see, although it may not be the same in all quarters of the country. It might be wise at this time to warn the leader of the official opposition that he has other problems to deal with. Perhaps the hon. member for Essex East is sitting in his quietude and waiting for a campaign to start on that side of the house; or perhaps it would be the former minister of public works, in view of that speech in Lunenburg and Sherbrooke, Quebec, who is waiting; or would the elections in Quebec have any connotation regarding what we might expect as the leadership of the Liberal party in the near future? I do not know; but it all looks very, very significant to me.

Then let us consider what the country had to read about statements that were made regarding the Prime Minister's efforts overseas in relationship to Britain's entry into the common market. I will read from the Ottawa Journal. I admit that here we can perhaps expect a little sympathy for our stand and our views. Here two questions appear in regard to statements made about Canada in the commentaries of newspapers of Great Britain. This article specifically mentions the Observer, the Sunday Telegraph, and so on. The two questions posed are these:

(1) Who inspired these offscourings in the London Observer, and (2) does Mr. Lester Pearson, who from Ottawa kept stabbing Mr. Diefenbaker in the back every day he was in London, go along with them?

These were very derisive statements. I am sure most hon. members have read them. I wonder if that is true. Certainly his activity all through the period when the Prime Minister was out of the country will require some sensible answer, if it is possible, to those two questions. Or I wonder, does the Leader of the Opposition not understand that without putting forth a strong view and a strong stand at that time, Britain's own position would be weakened upon going into the common market. It would have been weakened today. Not only our Prime Minister, who may have taken the lead and I hope he did—but every prime minister of the commonwealth understands that when the time comes for Britain to enter the common market, not only should there be a strong political union, but our rights and privileges should not be lost. We wish to feel as important a part of the commonwealth in the future as we have in the past. Our contribution, Mr. Speaker, as you know, has been a very substantial one.

How far will the Liberals go to smear a leader, a policy or a country? I hold in my hands—hon. members may possibly have seen it—a pamphlet without any heading, not being authorized by anyone, which is headed on the back, "Can the deceivers govern?" On the front page there are two pictures of the Prime Minister, in one of which he is very well dressed and in the other he is supposedly in rags. One picture is dated June 18, 1962 and the other June 25. This may be all in the course of putting their propaganda to the country, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker and hon. members of this house, that this was a piece of literature that came to me from the Liberal booth at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto. How did it come to me? It came to me through a gentleman who is concerned with the export of Canadian goods out of this country, who does quite a substantial amount of business with the Chinese nationalists.

This was handed to a Mr. Wu, who is the Chinese trade commissioner from Taipei. What can we expect outside this country if they try to dish this out at one of the places where we have international figures coming in to buy our products? Can we expect any increase in trade? It is a wonder to me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is meeting with any success whatsoever in his programs, and it is a wonder that such booths are set up at places where these international buyers can come and buy our products. It is a wonder to me, also, that these people do not put up loudspeakers and tell them not to buy. That is what they are trying to do, and they are not making too bad a job of it.

I might say that it bears the name of Mr. Kuch in the top right hand corner. The editorial was taken from the Winnipeg Free Press.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: Nothing more need be said. It is interesting to note that while all this was going on in regard to Canada and their efforts to downgrade our position internationally, all the newspapers across the country that were sympathetic to them did not necessarily agree with them. We read this in the daily Packet and Times. It has been referred to before in this house. This is published in the city of Orillia, Ontario, and it is a newspaper that is noted for being neutral. I say it again, Mr. Speaker; it is noted for being neutral:

> Whatever his limitations, and they are not nearly so many or so marked as his critics would have us believe, history—

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members across the way:

> —history will show Mr. Diefenbaker to have been one of this young nation's ablest leaders.

Then I ask you, Mr. Speaker, which one of the hon. members opposite wants so badly to be leader of the campaign they have been carrying on?

Perhaps I may digress from my remarks at this particular moment, but this is very relevant. I did not see the program referred to on C.B.C. television, but I have before me an editorial, again from the Owen Sound Sun-Times of September 18, 1962, which makes some comment in this regard. Again, it seems to me there are people in other places who would carry out the Liberal program. This is what the editorial has to say with regard to a program called "Anatomy of an election". They call it the "vivisection of a Prime Minister":

> There was one quick reference to Diefenbaker's "finest hour" following a quickie shot of his Vancouver reception.

Then they go on to say:

> We think the Prime Minister had many fine hours—

And this is true. The truth is that when these people go out of their way to destroy a person, they certainly know how to approach such a program.

Now I should like to move on a step further, because I have some interesting communications from my constituency in regard to what has transpired recently. I should like to say this: we heard a debate yesterday which culminated last evening in a vote. That vote was determined fairly and squarely. There are many indications around the house of who is getting into whose political bed. But these do not concern me as a supporter of the government. Why? Because, again, there is a deliberate program opposite. Let us consider the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). I regret he is not here, because he is the fellow who rose in his place and said he could vote with the Social Credit party if they would lose their name. That is what he would have everybody do—lose their names and join him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not say that.

Mr. Winkler: He said that, and that is a fine way to respect elected representatives in this house.

An hon. Member: Quote Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, what the hon. gentleman is attempting to do is to establish that the hon. member for Leeds took a position in this house which in fact he did not take. The hon. member for Leeds suggested that if, in the Social Credit amendment, the words "in accord with Social Credit principles" were withdrawn, then it would be possible for him to support the motion. That is not what the hon. gentleman who has the floor was attributing to the hon. member a moment ago in seeking to suggest that the hon. member for Leeds was prepared to adopt Social Credit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That really is not a point of order or a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member for Leeds is capable of speaking for himself if he has been misquoted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is not here to do so.

Mr. Winkler: Not only that, if they were interested in anybody else's opinions in this house there would be more than 19 members sitting in those seats over there now. We certainly extend to them a great deal more deference than that. I think the hon. member for Leeds would be better occupied trying to drum up more enthusiasm among his own members. Anyway, my statement stands. If he will withdraw his, then I will withdraw mine.

Whom do the Liberals crawl into bed with? There is no question of what their intentions are in this house. Not only that; there is something much more deliberate. Does anyone in this chamber think they want an election right now? Let us not be deceived. I say this because on every occasion, prior to every one of the votes which have been taken there has been a definite smear made by one member of the Liberal party on the Social Credit party. It is not a case of whether I agree with it or not. That is not what I am trying to point out. My point is that they are making a division between parties in the house in order to make absolutely sure they do not have to go back to the country.

The Leader of the Opposition has made it plain where he stands on the taxation issue. Regardless of what certain principles may be, any one of the elected representatives here can ask his constituents what the effect has been. When I quoted the Leader of the Opposition as saying that an apology should come from across the floor to him, I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the article and the cartoon put out as Liberal propaganda at the Canadian National Exhibition and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, from whom the apology should come. It should come from every one of them.

I wish now to turn to the actualities of our present economic situation and the attitude of the public towards the measures taken by the government. It seems to me that the Liberal party has entirely failed to take this into consideration. That may be perfectly right, because they do not take many other people into consideration, anyway. Let us refer at this point to the great argument made last night by the hon. member for Essex East on this subject and the legalistic approach he took to the situation in which the government found itself. He may or may not have been right. I couldn't care less. Today, I am satisfied that the right thing has been done and I am prepared to justify this by a little more comment based on communications I have received from my constituents which I have in black and white here before me.

To introduce this, may I say that all the cry and howl by the Liberals on the question of these surcharges and taxes should lead us to reflect on the situation as it exists in this country. For instance, Canada is the largest spender on imported goods in the world. This country is spending per capita $235 a year on imported goods as compared with $35 in the United States, $75 in Great Britain and $60 in West Germany. Does this in itself not give us good cause to consider what we have to do. What do the Liberals want to do? Do they want to ruin our secondary industries completely? That is what would happen if they had their way. However, things are straightening themselves up. I should like to quote from the St. Catharines Standard of August 15:

> Canada's current dollar crisis notwithstanding, a number of the foreign countries that trade with Canada persist in trying to tell us that it is in our own best interests to import more from them. Trade, they continually remind us, is a two-way street and if we do not buy from them we cannot, in turn, expect to sell.

Mr. Speaker, we have to wake up to the fact that what this government is doing now is not only plainly beneficial in its effects but might well have to be continued for some time. I have received a letter from one of the largest manufacturers in my constituency. As a matter of fact he is the largest manufacturer in his field in the entire country, and he says this—I quote part of the letter:

> As at time of writing we are operating with full staff. Some departments are on overtime and as a result of excess business accumulated commencing during the summer months we presently have the largest backlog on hand since 1958 and it is increasing each week.

That is what I like to hear. This sentence, I think, is even better:

> It is odd, too, to see the apologetic approach of so many of these buyers. Long live austerity—and may it never end as far as I am concerned.

That is proof of the value of the program which we have put into effect. Possibly it should have been brought in some time ago. I am all in favour of it myself. I have received further letters from producers of poultry in my constituency, as well as letters from other producers. They all support the program. Not only do they support it, but they do not want it to be removed even when our present exchange position improves. Let the Liberals be a little more careful, then, in assessing the effects of what this government has done and is doing. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how can a country with a population of 18 million compete on the markets of the world when our secondary industries are at their present stage—a stage at which in most cases a mere 10 per cent of the industrial capacity of our neighbour to the south could lock the doors of any of them? Again, I refer to a telegram received by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Chaplin):

> Dear Sir, we want to forward this information to the Prime Minister. The Kitchener Waterloo Record of Wednesday Oct. 3 had an editorial entitled Pearson harps too much on one issue. The third paragraph says Mr. Pearson concentrated his fire on the governments concealment of the impending dollar crisis which he termed a major political fraud.

This is the important part:

> He also said that the crisis didn't come like a bolt from the blue but that it had been building up for some time back. The industrial committee of the Hespeler chamber of commerce takes exception to this type of talk and has called it political treason and wants it known that the town of Hespeler is bursting at the seams industrially working day and night shifts in all textile and metal factories and has expansion programs on hand and attribute this to the devaluation of the dollar. Adjacent towns and cities in this mid-western hub of industry are experiencing the same kind of industrial boom. We think Canadians everywhere should be told the truth.

The only thing I am inclined to do today is to put the situation before the house the way the people back home see it. This is the kind of member I hope that I can always be. I wish to represent my people in the best way possible and in their best interests.

To me it was interesting to hear some of the comment and criticism that was made against the speech from the throne when this debate opened initially. Then, of course, it came down to leaders day when we heard the Leader of the Opposition put forward his alternatives, and to review the whole thing in the light of what has happened in the past. I refer not only to the recent past but a few years back.

I noticed that in one of his programs—he has five points as you will recall—is a government boost to construction, including a municipal loan fund to finance local works projects. There are a number of measures to provide this kind of assistance in the throne speech. Number two, a program to seek out new ways of expanding industrial production. For instance, the automobile industry imported $300 million worth of car parts. Surely a good fiscal policy is to increase the Canadian content of cars made in this country. Surely it is understood that this is what we are trying to do. We presented a program in this regard and we are endeavouring to assist it through labour and management organization. Four, a national health—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Winkler: I wonder whether I might be extended an extra moment that was taken up by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in this my first attempt to speak at any length in this 25th parliament of Canada I wish my first words to be those of congratulation to you upon your appointment as our Deputy Speaker. Were he here, I would also extend my congratulations to our Speaker. I extend them to both of you because, like myself, you come from the western tier of Canadian provinces where the sun lasts longer every day.

I must also extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do so particularly because in September, 1949, in this place it was my honour and responsibility to do the same as they did on this occasion. I wish to say to them that I was particularly delighted that they had a great deal more composure than I was then able to achieve or than I am able to muster today. I hope their sojourn here is profitable and I feel certain they will contribute a great deal to this beloved country of ours.

I wish to deal today with a government which I think, out of some experience, is supported by the most curious parliament I have ever seen. I was here for four years only. Since then I have spent some time—and I may say it has been a very interesting and indeed hard time—in the legislature of one of our provinces. However, I cannot believe some of the things that I hear in this chamber.

An hon. Member: The Liberals.

Mr. Laing: No, my friend, it is not the Liberals. I cannot believe the attitude of a government which sits on the front benches as if nothing had ever happened; which does so in spite of the problems which are known to everyone, problems which are probably put forward as an assertion from this side and met by a denial from the other side. It is not important that people on this side say that a certain condition exists, that the government let Canada down or that we do not stand where we stood previously, or that members upon the other side deny that is the case. The important thing is whether the people writing this material believe it to be true. When I see a magazine like the Economist of London with its "Shaky Canada" on the front page, with its two articles, "Canada Sags" and "Canada's Warning" and then observe the attitude of nonchalance that exists on the front benches of this government, I am worried for Canada.

I wish particularly to bring forward a point of view from the western tier of provinces of Canada. In my opinion we who are from that area would not be doing our duty if we did not bring it to the attention of this house. I am addressing myself particularly to world commodity prices and the position of the western provinces in selling raw materials at the basement bargain prices of the world today. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that since 1947 world commodity prices have slipped very seriously. Lead and zinc, of which we produce a tremendous amount in British Columbia, are off 40 per cent from their high. The price was 16 cents and 17 cents a pound and last week lead broke 10 cents. Aluminum is off 20 per cent, copper is off 40 per cent from its high. Lumber is off 10 per cent. Although lumber sales are relatively easy to make, nevertheless lumber is off 10 per cent from its high on a world commodity basis. These things are of particular concern to my province of British Columbia, the province of Alberta and the province of Saskatchewan. We are unlike the two great central provinces in which is found 66⅔ per cent of the population of Canada. We have not that great home market at our door. We are obliged to sell into the world market at the lowest possible price that can be obtained.

I was interested in the action of this government when the Prime Minister went to the conference of commonwealth prime ministers. I do not think this government is aware that only 17 per cent of everything that Canada exports at the present time comes under the commonwealth preferences. I do not think they are aware that only 4 per cent of protection is granted under these preferences. When insistence is made that we must hold the mother country to the preferences, I think we are acting in a manner which indicates that we do not realize that history has moved on and that these preferences have not the validity nor the advantage to Canada which they once had. In Canada—and my province of British Columbia is a particular example of this—we are depending upon the great nation to the south of us to purchase our goods. Last year we exported to the United States $629 million worth of newsprint; of book paper, with some more Canadian labour in it, $1,300,000 only; of writing paper, with a great deal of Canadian labour in it, $58,000 only. However, we exported $629 million worth of newsprint. Of lumber we shipped out $250 million worth; of Douglas fir plywood, which my people in British Columbia would like to sell in the United States, $128,000 worth only; of iron ore, $95 million, but of steel manufactures of all kinds only $13 million; of aluminum pigs, $54 million and of aluminum fabrication of all kinds, only $7 million; zinc slabs, $13 million, zinc fabrication of all kinds, $96,000; lead pigs, $9 million, lead pipe, $125,000; asbestos fibres, $45 million; asbestos products of all kinds, $119,000; nickel ingots, $136 million and nickel fabrication of all kinds, only $4 million. Here is a situation in which these raw materials have to go into the world market at the lowest prices.

I wish the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been here today because I had intended to implore him not only to be more active in his own department but to seek the support of other departments. He spoke in this debate and he indicated he was doing a number of things. He was bringing our trade commissioners together, which is a splendid thing. He was bringing buyers from th United States on these so-called champagne trips to buy goods in Canada, and I have no objection to that. But I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that attempts to sell are largely the responsibility of the manufacturer himself and that government activity in this regard should be directed toward negotiation with governments and the conditions in the countries in which we try to sell. I do not think that has been done adequately.

I should like to know to what extent the government has gone to the department of commerce in the United States and pointed out to them that we cannot forever have an imbalance of trade of the nature that now exists between our two countries. I remind the house that in the first four months of this year we had an adverse balance of trade with the United States alone of $218 million. Would it not be possible for the government to put the proposition to the government of the United States that we have to equate our sales, that we have to sell them as much as we buy from them and therefore they must lower their tariffs to the point where we can export to that country some goods with a higher Canadian labour content?

My friend from British Columbia, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) is of the opinion that foreign trade no longer has any validity. He talks about pack rats. Let me tell him that I disagree with him completely. The great, long-standing Liberal concept, and I hope I can express it, is that goods the world over are naturally wanted by human beings the world over and the freer the movement of those goods the better it is for all mankind. I suggest, therefore, that our policy will be a continuation of that splendid policy enunciated by my leader before the last election when he talked about freer and freer trade. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this statement in a speech in Hamilton:

> The Pearson freer trade plan will lead to enormous increases in imports and a rise in unemployment.

When the minister spoke the other day I noticed that he had recanted somewhat from that position. He said, as found on page 162 of Hansard:

> I say that at this particular time when the world is a very competitive place indeed, when new market arrangements are developing, when the general movement appears to be toward a lowering of tariffs, when businesses have got to stand more and more on their own feet—

He went on to say that we must bring down costs and get quality up. That is all very nice, Mr. Speaker, but what is the Minister of Trade and Commerce doing to accomplish this? He is not accomplishing it by bringing people here on champagne trips to buy Canadian goods. He is not bringing it about by bringing the trade commissioners together or by bringing businessmen together. It seems to me this is dependent upon a drive on our part with those with whom we deal to lower their tariffs in exchange for a lowering of tariffs on our part. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here I would not want him to tell me that GATT prevents us from entering into such an agreement because it seems to me that today we can make any agreement in respect of these things.

When the Prime Minister spoke in this debate he instanced the case of a truck factory that had moved to Canada as the result of the austerity measures. He was referring to Mack trucks. I would remind the house that this company produces a specialized truck capable of carrying heavy loads and used to a great extent in the lumbering industry of British Columbia. The company is going to build Mack trucks in Canada. I would remind the house that as a result of the depreciation of the dollar and the tariff surcharges the cost of a Mack truck went up $3,600.

Mr. Skoreyko: In the United States, yes.

Mr. Laing: It is $3,600 in Canada.

Mr. Skoreyko: What are they going to cost in Canada?

Mr. Laing: I would suggest that probably the plant will be able to sell them at an increased cost of something like $3,000. This is bringing industry to Canada, so the Prime Minister says, so the Minister of Trade and Commerce says. This is the result of the austerity measures, but austerity has a cost. In the case of our industries in the province of British Columbia, which have to sell at the lowest possible prices they can, when they go to buy a Mack truck they are going to pay $3,000 more for it. The plea of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to get costs down is made impossible by virtue of the other action of the government which immediately raises costs.

So far as the depreciation of the dollar is concerned, I say quite frankly that the big exporters in the province of British Columbia are doing better today because a depreciated dollar sells more in foreign countries. But do not say that there is no cost involved in a depreciated dollar. Do not say that there is no cost in austerity. A cheap dollar buys less here and austerity today is being visited upon a very great number of people who are not in good shape to withstand it. I should like to give some figures as to the cost of austerity. These are bureau of statistic figures which I obtained the other day. In June of this year sirloin steak was $1.06 a pound while in August it was $1.12. Prime rib roasts were 95 cents in June and 99 cents in August.

An hon. Member: The farmers are not getting it.

Mr. Laing: The farmers in my area are not getting it, and I will tell you something about that shortly. Pork shoulder roasts were 56 cents in June and 64 cents in August, ham 98 cents in June and $1.07 in August, a half a pound of bacon 48 cents in June and 54 cents in August and poultry, grade A, 43 cents in June and 47 cents in August.

I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he should co-operate with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton). We heard a great deal the other day about agriculture but it centred only on the feed grains which are grown in western Canada. I remind the house that the biggest agricultural activity in this nation is in Ontario. There are a great number of specialized crops coming along such as the one referred to the other day by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan), who said that an experimental quantity of fresh frozen beans had been exported to Germany. Last year we shipped from the city of New Westminster to Great Britain a considerable quantity of fresh frozen peas.

I plead with the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take an increasing interest in these aspects of agriculture because the sale of these commodities will result in more and more labour being used and the opportunity to maintain the family farm will probably be provided. So far as agricultural problems are concerned, there is the tremendous problem of integration and corporate farms which is rising in this country. There is also the cost of machinery and mechanization of farms which have already resulted in a great number of farmers going to the cities. We are faced with the problem of the lowest one sixth of the farmers in Canada from the point of view of income being forced to go into the cities and creating real social problems there. The real problem in respect of agriculture is that it has been visited by the greatest invasion of technology of any of our industries.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with a problem that is of tremendous moment to us in the province of British Columbia. I refer to the proposed building of the Columbia river dam. I note that the new Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton) is with us. I cannot, for the life of me, understand where he stands on this question today. A short time ago he seemed to indicate that the adoption of a treaty along the lines insisted upon by the premier of British Columbia would be equivalent to the sale of Manhattan island.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what I said at all.

Mr. Laing: A change has been made in policy. The minister seems to be shaking his head to indicate he is in agreement—

Mr. Fulton: No, I said that you did not quote accurately what I said.

Mr. Laing: The minister has been quoted on a number of occasions as having said that the export of power to the United States under conditions that the premier of British Columbia wanted would be equivalent to the sale of Manhattan island.

Mr. Fulton: That is entirely different from the treaty. If you are discussing the policy with regard to the disposal of the benefit, that is right; but the hon. member said I applied those words to the treaty.

[Mr. Laing.]

Mr. Laing: The minister will have an opportunity to make his explanation in the future. I cannot explain the legal gyrations of his mind at the present time.

I want to remind the house what one of the members of the government said in respect of this matter in 1957. On January 21, 1957, five years ago, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), who was viewing with alarm this project and was not pointing with pride as he is now, said this:

> There has already been a great delay in this matter. Someone either here or in Washington is dragging his feet in connection with these negotiations.

Then again, the same hon. gentleman said on April 6, 1957, as recorded on page 3188 of Hansard:

> May I ask why it is necessary to wait until the negotiations are completed before any attempt is made to reach agreement with the province of British Columbia?

In the light of what has happened since in respect of agreement with the province of British Columbia, I think the minister did not take sufficient action then.

I should like to return, Mr. Speaker, to some remarks made by the preceding speaker in this debate, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler), who largely made an attack upon members on this side of the house. I only want to say of him this, that his very great predecessor in this house never had to look across the aisle to see only 19 members listening to him.

In so far as the negotiations that took place in London on commonwealth matters are concerned, I am of the opinion that the United Kingdom is either going to walk upright into the European common market or she is going to fall in. If this matter is procrastinated and obfuscated to the point where Britain falls into the common market, she is not going to be a very good buyer of our goods. Let me ask this of the Prime Minister, who claims to have such foresight and love of the commonwealth: Two or two and a half years ago when the leader of this party was pointing out most admirably the inevitable position the United Kingdom was facing with the development of this tremendous new agency in Europe, why did the government not then do something about strengthening the commonwealth to enable the United Kingdom to make stronger representations when she had to go to Brussels? Our commonwealth is not weak; it is exceedingly powerful. We have a territory several times that of the United States, and I think that we have three and a half times her population. We are rich in tradition and we are rich in moral fibre.

Why did the Prime Minister not, two and a half years ago, as the leader of the greatest country outside of the mother country, call the commonwealth countries together to see what they, collectively, could do for the mother country in respect of a massive five year loan in connection with these foodstuffs we want collectively to sell? Why was this action not taken? Then, the mother country would have been strengthened to the point where she could have gone to these other countries and said: I want an arrangement that is beneficial not only to me but is beneficial to the commonwealth countries as well. Instead of that there was procrastination, delay, until finally the Prime Minister had to choose another argument and call for an international meeting on world trade. Well, this is too late. I would think that those countries in Europe today are too preoccupied with the building of their enormous engine to attend such a gathering. I would agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he indicated that the future of the common market is now indefinite. It is true that success breeds success, and they have had nothing but success. I think anyone would be taking a risk if he suggested he had enough foresight to indicate what is going to come out of all this.

This is what I feel. I believe that in the next few years my suggestion will be borne out. I believe that these great nations of Europe are getting themselves into a position where they can, with impunity begin to buy products from the U.S.S.R. One of the most significant situations in Europe is the increase in purchases from the U.S.S.R. It is going to be very difficult for this government to complain against that movement to purchase goods from the U.S.S.R. when last year we increased our exports to that country 300 per cent in one year for a total of $24 million. What concerns me is that the great variety of goods they were purchasing from the U.S.S.R. were parallel to the goods Canada would sell to that area.

Are these things of no concern to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees)? Has he not his eye on this situation for the future? Is he not going to tell the Canadian people what the facts are in respect of these matters? This is what Canada needs at this time, to be given all the facts, instead of a call going forth from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whom some people in my province say is a good drummer. I am going to say very frankly that of all the ministers he enjoys the best reputation. I have heard more compliments given to him in British Columbia than to any other minister. I am going to suggest to you that the finest compliment I have heard of him is that he could be a lot worse. This is a fact. But we are not meeting the situation that is confronting Canada today in so far as exports are concerned. I do not know what the solution is. I hope the solution by this government is not the solution that was found, for a short period in the days of my old friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), when the government of Mr. Bennett decided he would have one set of tariffs west of old Fort Garry and one east of old Fort Garry. It is one of the great historical facts of Canada that for a time we had two sets of tariff laws in the country.

The great central provinces have problems different from those we have, but we would not represent the true position of the western provinces if we did not bring our solutions before this house. We could, to great advantage, deal in complete free trade in the province of British Columbia. There is no question about that because we sell $50 millions a month worth of products to the United States out of British Columbia alone. Indeed I am quite sure that at this particular time there is no other market for those goods, and I am quite certain no other country has the money to pay for them in the way the United States does.

However I question why there was not, at least, a burst of indignation from the federal government when it was suggested that the United States was going to prevent the importation of lumber from British Columbia. I saw no great action taken by the federal government. Industry and labour on the coast joined together, but the federal government did not give the leadership it should have at that time. When we are buying, in a four month period, $218 million more worth of goods from that country than we sell to it, then any change should not be made without the strongest possible representations from the government of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Those representations were made long before you suggested them.

Mr. Laing: Well, they were not strong enough to have been recognized by any newspaper in Canada that I have seen.

Mr. Fulton: They were fully reported. You have just not been reading the papers.

Mr. Laing: The industry itself has been very active.

Mr. Fulton: Just read the papers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laing: If I am to have these interruptions from the former minister of justice then I shall require another five minutes. After all, he is a citizen of my province and I am sure he wants to hear me.

Mr. Fulton: I want to hear you speak accurately.

Mr. Laing: I plead with the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take a more active interest, a deeper interest in these matters beyond bringing buyers or suggested buyers into the country. I plead with him to make a much deeper study of these affairs so that he and this government can make proper representations to the nations with which we trade. This is the best security for Canada to grow and develop.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to tender you my congratulations for the unanimity of your election as Speaker of the house. I also want to congratulate you for having, up to now, led our parliamentary debates with a remarkable objectivity.

I also want to thank and congratulate the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker, as it is the first time I have the privilege of sitting in this imposing assembly, I should also like to commend all members of the staff, in the external as well as the internal services, for their courtesy and for the prompt and kindly way in which they fulfil their respective tasks and duties.

The atmosphere, the spaciousness and size of this house, as well as its comfortable set-up should, to my mind, incite hon. members who sit here to establish in Canada an economic system inspired by the comforts which surround us in this august chamber.

Mr. Speaker, the night of June 18 last we, and more particularly the French Canadians in the province of Quebec, gave a sigh of relief. Considering that, in our province, which had been called Liberal for almost a hundred years, Liberal governments had always been elected, except in 1957, and more particularly in my riding, where the people had voted Liberal for 68 consecutive years, we cannot but give a big sigh of relief.

My predecessor was a member of parliament for 17 years. Yet, yesterday, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) tendered him his congratulations, whereas he knew very well that, like the others he named yesterday, my predecessor had lost out and been rejected by the people and the voters of his county in the June 18 election. For 17 years, my riding had been Liberal, and, for 68 years, the voters in the province of Quebec had voted in favour of the Liberal party.

Now, we begin to breathe again, to feel freer. We begin to feel the effects of a new economic system which will, perhaps, not be at the mercy of the old parties that have led the province of Quebec, and the whole of Canada, into the economic stagnation we are having today.

We obtained a clear vote on June 18 last, and we shall win a greater victory in the future. Some people looked upon the Social Credit vote in the province of Quebec on June 18 as a tidal wave, but I think that at the next general election, the tide will sweep away all the political rats, more particularly in our province.

At the first public meeting I held in my riding after the election of last June 18, I did not hold a press conference as was suggested yesterday in this house. It was only an organization meeting where I expressed the hope that the house proceedings would be televised during at least one hour every day. If the people could have witnessed the behaviour of some members of this house during the past week, they would have found out the truth about, first of all, their turpitude, their trivialities and their empty words and they would also have seen how those members beat around the bush for an hour's time or four hours on end, as the leader of the Liberal opposition did, to achieve absolutely nothing. Our constituents, who, in addition to being taxpayers, are also those who provide the funds to finance the C.B.C., should be the first to know what goes on in this august assembly. I feel it would not be too much to ask to have the parliament debates televised an hour each day, so that the people could be informed directly, instead of being given a falsified account, of what goes on in this house.

Mr. Speaker, we are not here to play into the hands of the old parties or to lend ourselves to the Liberal practice of seeking a means to overthrow the government overnight. Did not the Liberals themselves deplore the fact, and rightly so, that France experienced nothing but temporary governments which changed from one day to the next? We do not wish to see Canada in a similar situation. And that is why we of the Social Credit party shall not play into the hands of the Liberals, who are seeking to overthrow the government tomorrow or the day after or next week, to end up in that same situation which we do not want.

We do not wish to keep the Conservatives in power just for the fun of it, but for one purpose only, and that is to obtain better legislation for Canada and for all Canadians.

To us, the important thing is not to change the seats of the pants on the benches in parliament but it is rather to amend the legislation which in the near future will govern the destiny of our people. We want legislation and we do not intend to be satisfied with empty promises, or beautiful phrases or billing and cooing on the part of the Conservatives, to get nowhere. We are ready to co-operate. We are willing to assist. We are ready to give them an opportunity either to legislate for the common good of the Canadian people or to weave the rope they will be hanged with at the next federal election.

We want better laws from the government. Among other things, we want family allowances proportionate to the cost of living index. When family allowances were initiated in 1945, milk sold at 8 to 10 cents a quart, but the cost of living has increased threefold since then, while family allowances have been increased by a single dollar. For that reason, on behalf of my constituents and of Canadians throughout the country, I ask that family allowances be proportionate to the present cost of living index.

I also request an adjustment in old age pensions. Our older people must live just as our younger people. The rate of old age pension was not adjusted since the adoption of the act. I, therefore, request that it be proportionate to the cost of living index.

I request also for the small wage earner, the worker, the farmer, all those who build the real wealth of Canada and of our province, an exemption of taxes as being heads of families. Such an exemption should be at least $5,000 for the head of a family and $3,000 for a single person. Statistics show that it costs at least $86 a week to live, to give the bare necessities to a family of five. If such is the case it is only logical and normal for us in this house to request a total exemption of tax for all salaried people earning less than $100 a week.

We also want, Mr. Speaker, more encouragement for private enterprise.

In 1962, everybody is against private enterprise. Public bodies, aldermen, municipal councils, provincial governments and even the federal government are grabbing private enterprise by the throat. We are trying to crush it by imposing heavy taxes upon it, and in one province in particular there is even some talk of nationalization. Yet, it is thanks to private enterprise if we have prosperity in Canada right now.

It is neither the Liberals, during their 22 years in office, nor the Conservatives, in the last five years, who have made Canada what it is today.

If Canada is rich and prosperous in 1962, if she has abundant natural resources, if her production is high, that is not due to any government but to private enterprise, because private enterprise was the one to understand the situation in our country.

We rise to the defence of private enterprise. If we do not save it, we will soon live to regret it. In fact, a country which is 1,800 miles away from here but which is quite close to the U.S.A., Cuba, was in the same situation not so long ago. Today, everybody deplores the way things turned out there.

There were millionaires in Cuba before the communists took over; there was private enterprise and also the proletariat, workers and farmers. Came the day when those people had enough of being exploited and crushed by taxes. Revolution started to brew and Castro entered the scene. Under the guise of planning, of state socialism, he removed private enterprise and established a totalitarian government which handed the country over to the communists. We Social Crediters knew already that the Liberals were socialist and that the socialists were Liberals. We fully understand their stand in this house, we know why they want economic planning and nationalization of our business concerns.

We of the Social Credit do not advocate the nationalization of private enterprise.

I am an industrialist, and my problem is not to produce but to sell the goods; my problem is to face farmers in need, to face farmers who need my products, but who must live in debt for five or 10 years in order to purchase today what I can produce and manufacture today.

Our economic system, as it stands today, does not allow our farmers, our workers to live today, in this country of ours, with the money they earn today and to buy what is produced today. They have to go into hock for many years to come.

That is the baseness of the present system. We have been elected to fight against this system, and that is the reason I want to be the prime defender of the people of my constituency who elected me. I have not been elected to be a supporter of the Liberal and Conservative policies, but for the sole purpose of seeking improved legislation for the farmer, the worker, the small businessman and the individual who is still self-employed.

Everybody is crying for the opening of new markets abroad and no one is looking at the markets we have here in our communities, our provinces and across Canada.

Once upon a time, two gentlemen were admiring a beautiful mountain. One said to the other "Do you see that mountain in front of you?" And the other replied "Indeed I do" and the first gentleman went on: "Can you see the fly on the mountain?" The other replied "No, I cannot see it on the mountain because it is on the tip of your nose."

Well, Mr. Speaker, when we see Conservative or Liberal politicians wracking their brains in order to find ways and means to sell Canadian goods throughout the world, while there are so many people who need them here at home, we are inclined to tell them: Instead of going outside Canada, why not try to sell from door to door in our cities or in our municipalities. Visit our farmers, our workers, our small contractors, see what the needs are in the province of Quebec, and then you will realize that we do not need to send commissioners in other countries in order to sell our products, we can sell a lot of them right here, in our own country.

Let us ask ourselves why it is that so many firms, so many plants, so many businesses have to close their doors at the present time or have to lay off some of their employees because of a lack of orders.

Let us ask ourselves why, in my own constituency, for instance, over 600 employees from three different plants were laid off.

Let us ask ourselves why, in the constituency of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, workers were laid off by the hundreds not later than last week, although it is said that we have enough buying power in Canada.

If we do not lack buying power in this country, why do we try to sell our products to the tourists? Why woo the American tourists? Why woo the foreign tourists? In order to extort dollars from them in exchange for our products.

Production in Canada is well known for its quality and its variety. Those who will set up a system—and we want to do it—that will enable Canadians to live in a wealthy country, where production is not lacking, those will not remain in power during 22 years, instead power will be theirs for the rest of their lives.

At the present time, people say jokingly that we want to form a coalition with the Conservatives. Such is not the case.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is in a dilemma. His own supporters, after suffering two defeats, would like a new leader. And because his party was defeated twice, that gentleman would like to have an election as soon as possible, in order to prevent the Liberals from choosing a new leader.

Last night, when the non-confidence motion proposed by the official opposition was put to a vote, several Liberal members had not been consulted. They were asked to vote although they had not been consulted before. And several have told us of their surprise.

We do not want to get caught at the game of "old gimmicks" nor do we want to get involved in the old game of petty politics. Our mandate is clear and simple, and we want to serve the voters of our ridings and those of the province of Quebec especially.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec elected the Liberal party for 22 years, in Ottawa, and I must say today in this house that it is the province which has been the most badly treated.

The Liberal party is shocked and offended in considering that its favoured province, the province on which it thought it had forever a grip, has forsaken it.

Today they realize that Social Credit, on June 18 last, achieved a break through which we shall continue to enlarge, not only in this house, but also during the next election, which may be not far off. We are going to wipe off the political map of the province of Quebec, not only the Liberal party but the old parties who have not been able to give Canadians prosperity in our province, as in other provinces, whereas Canada has all it needs to yield that prosperity.

The small retailer, the industrialist and private enterprise want a prosperous Canada.

What we want, is not a planning government, not a government with socialist leanings, not a government which is perpetually searching our pockets. What we want is a government with sound business principles. We do not want the government to be mixed up in our business, but we want sound business principles in the government.

If, in the past, legislation had been based on sound business principles, we would not now have to deplore the fact that Canada has a terrible debt which is increasing every day.

Canada has known and still knows today, a period of recession. We are still going through times where private enterprise is exhausted and gives all its benefits away in taxes. The proof, Mr. Speaker, is that today our savings capital is swallowed up by public works.

People have lost confidence in the administration of Canada, but not in private enterprise. Why is that? Because, today, our savings capital goes to finance sidewalks, water mains, bridges, sewers and public works.

If people had confidence in private enterprise, in this country, they would not be interested in financing public works.

That is why we ask, as did the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), that a municipal development bank be established to give municipalities in our province, and throughout Canada, a source of credit which would help carry out their public works. We should not finance public works with our savings. The money we have saved should be used to finance private production, and public capital made available to our governments should be used to finance public works.

Mr. Speaker, people complain at this time—and justly so—that our national economy, and also our provincial economy, are slipping into the hands of other countries and of international finance. We need hardly be surprised at that fact, when our own government does not even make available to our private industries the capital they need to finance their projects. We must draw from our savings capital to finance 50- to 100-year projects.

It is about time, Mr. Speaker, to stop laughing at Social Credit proposals. It is very easy to laugh at a certain thing, one has only to twitch one's face and that's it, but it takes much less intelligence to laugh at something than to understand it.

Before June 18, many were those who were laughing at Social Credit proposals, as well as at the Social Credit philosophy. Many were those who were laughing at all that, but on the evening of June 18, they got the lesson of their lives.

We shall keep on explaining to the people what is Social Credit; we shall keep on explaining to the people that we have not been elected here by means of election funds which would tie us to national or international financiers who would like farmers to be still exploited by companies which have contributed to both parties' funds.

My election cost only a few thousand dollars, about ten times less than the campaign of the one who was defeated after sitting here for 17 years, wearing out the seat of his pants to such an extent that one day he was so mixed up—and those who were here at the time will remember the incident—in his absent-mindedness he voted against his own party. By the way, he asked the Speaker to correct his mistake, and to record his vote as his party wished it.

Having been defeated on June 18 last, he is now trying to find himself another place in provincial politics. Well, I wish him the same fate he has known on June 18, in order that all these jokers of our province and of our country disappear before long from the political map of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, those few minutes were put at my disposal to serve and represent the electors of my constituency who gave me a wonderful majority on June 18. I congratulate them and I shall try in this house to serve them with honour and to be always at their disposal.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your good attention.

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): May I take this opportunity of associating myself publicly, as I have already done privately, with those who have extended to you, Mr. Speaker, their congratulations and compliments upon the occasion of your elevation to this high office? May I also associate myself with the things which have been said in complimenting the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne? With respect to yourself, Mr. Speaker, it is naturally a matter of particular pleasure to me, coming as I do from your neighbouring province in the west, to see you occupying the chair in this house, not only a fellow western Canadian but one who in his person combines also the two major racial divisions of this country.

To the mover and the seconder of the address in reply I wish merely to say this, in addition to what I have already said. I desire them to know that I experienced profound admiration for the way in which they discharged their duties here. That admiration was perhaps tinged with a little bit of envy because I recall that on the occasion of my maiden speech I was far from acquitting myself with the distinction with which they acquitted themselves in a much more onerous position, having undertaken as they had the much more onerous task of moving the address in reply to His Excellency. It is an onerous task not only because of the fact that it is a difficult and nerve wracking burden on a new member but because, as I am sure they would agree, Mr. Speaker, and as they themselves indeed said, it fell to them to move the address in reply to one of the most important and far reaching throne speeches that have been laid before this house.

As we are now nearing the end of a time allotted for the debate on the address, it is perhaps not inappropriate to spend a few moments in review, as it were, of what has taken place during this debate. One of the things, of course, that marks the debate on this occasion, is the fact that we have seen moved in the house a variety of amendments, all of which have raised the question of whether this government should continue to have the responsibility of governing. On those amendments, I am glad to remind you, Mr. Speaker, the government has been sustained by a majority of the members of this house. Of course, this result but confirms the verdict which the people of Canada recorded on June 18. It is not inappropriate to recall that on that day, under our system, the Canadian people entrusted the continued responsibility of government to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the present government and thus far this house has sustained that verdict.

One can therefore understand the obvious frustration of the Liberal party, a frustration arising not only from their experience to date in this house but out of the fact that they have made three attempts in the last five years in carrying their case to the people to take over the responsibility of office and that in all those attempts they have failed. In the last attempt we saw the most desperate scramble for power in Canada's history. In the course of that attempt, culminating on June 18, we saw the Liberal party stop at nothing in their efforts to translate into reality their highly imaginative lust for power. After all, I suppose one could almost sympathize with them in their frustration. Three times they have tried and on the night of June 18, Mr. Speaker, you will recall what happened. I am sure you watched with me, as I am sure did many other hon. members, the Leader of the Opposition when he appeared on television so confident that he was going to be able to drink the wine of victory. How frustrating it must have been to have that cup so rudely dashed from his lips at the last moment before he had really tasted a drop. Hence he is left now only to drain the dregs of the cup of bitterness. We recall these things.

As I say, one can sympathize to an extent with the members of the Liberal party in their frustration. However, as they seem to have forgotten it, it is perhaps as well to remind them that while they lust for power, there is one essential requirement which they have not yet met, namely that they win the largest number of seats in this house, if they are to have that responsibility. This fact they continue to overlook. However, until that event takes place or that remote possibility occurs, with the support of this house the responsibility of government rests upon this party and this government under the present Prime Minister of Canada. We accept that responsibility.

It is my view that the Canadian people, as they look towards their parliament now, expect the government upon which they imposed that responsibility on June 18, to respect it and to discharge it. The Canadian people expect this government to offer them a program designed to meet the problems with which this country is confronted. In accordance with that expectation and in accordance with our responsibility we have introduced that program into this house by way of the speech from the throne. It is a conscientious and, in my submission, a constructive program designed to meet today's problems and to lay a further foundation for the coming long range problems and requirements of tomorrow. That program represents no compromise or concession. It represents nothing by way of a deal or a special arrangement with any party or group. It is the government's own program which we have worked out to deal with the problems for the solution of which we are responsible. Thus far that program has been accepted by a majority in this house, although opposition parties in the house on various occasions have attempted to defeat that program.

In the time at my disposal this evening I propose to elaborate somewhat on the constructive actions and detailed programs which we lay before the house and country. First, however, in order that it may better be seen in perspective, it may be helpful if I deal for a moment or two with the background or the backdrop against which that program is presented. The salient feature of that backdrop is, of course, the Liberal tactics which were started prior to the election campaign, reached their climax as it progressed, and then continued in this house as well as outside of it since that time. I refer to the scream and scare tactics which characterize the current approach of the Liberal party to Canadian problems. A little earlier I said that during the election campaign they stopped at nothing in their desire to achieve power. We saw them indulging in a tactic of attempting to create panic and confusion in the business and financial community. I shall give some examples of each of these criticisms. For this one, I think particularly of the example of a prominent Liberal businessman who, speaking in Truro, Nova Scotia, in early June said that Canada was teetering on the verge of bankruptcy.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Fulton: Nothing could be better calculated to create panic, confusion and uncertainty in the minds of the business and financial community.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Fulton: We heard them uttering cries about the financial crisis while they themselves proposed measures that would add at least a billion dollars to the Canadian tax bill or the Canadian deficit. The Leader of the Opposition talks about irresponsibilitiy. He says now, as he said then, that he knew there was a financial crisis. Yet he deliberately advocated measures which, if he knew there was a financial crisis, he must also have known would add immeasurably to that crisis.

That is their tactic, Mr. Speaker, charges of misrepresentation and misleading while they themselves indulge in the most cold-blooded misrepresentation and distortion of policy that has ever been seen in the record of political campaigns in this country.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have effectively given the lie to these charges in so far as they are applied to the government, but let us look for a moment at the tactics followed by the Liberal party during that campaign. Virtually every policy, in many cases policies which they themselves had advocated or knew to be right, for political purposes they distorted, misrepresented and criticized as being wrong and leading the country to the brink of disaster.

I think of some prominent examples. There is the policy of devaluation. Did you ever see such a spectacle as these prominent advocates of a policy of devaluation, a policy they knew to be to the advantage of Canada and which they had advocated before they became Liberal candidates, turning around and adopting an attitude and associating themselves with and participating actively in a campaign which would have had the Canadian people believe that the policy of devaluation was the worst policy that the country could follow? I think particularly of such members as the member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) and the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Nicholson) who were prominent in urging upon the government that we should follow a policy of devaluation; and when we did, and in the light of the fact that it was having the results it was calculated to have in that industries in Canada were benefiting, we then saw these members go about distorting and misrepresenting not only their own position but the effects and the nature of the policy. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) placed before the house a list of commodities today which are exported from British Columbia and Canada, but he forbore to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that every industry producing these commodities has been immeasurably helped in British Columbia by the devaluation policy of the government.

What did the Liberal party say about the cost of living, coupling this with devaluation? They attempted to strike fear into the hearts of the Canadian people on the grounds that devaluation would lead to astronomical rises in the cost of living. The Leader of the Opposition, speaking in Halifax on June 8, a popular day for misstatements on the part of the Liberal party, was it not, Mr. Speaker, said words to the effect that the Canadian cost of living can rise to a point where it would be very dangerous indeed. What happened to the cost of living, Mr. Speaker? The fact of the matter is that the cost of living has remained satisfactorily stable in the months since. The campaign began in April, and yet between the months of August and September the cost of living experienced an appreciable drop. Again, the hon. member for Vancouver South, having reinherited the tactic of the selective use of statistics which is, after all, characteristic of members of the Liberal party, proceeded to quote some statistics from the dominion bureau of statistics in his speech today; but he conveniently overlooked the fact that the cost of living as a whole has dropped and that the major reason for that drop is a decline in the cost of food index. This is the very index that the Liberal party said repeatedly during the campaign would be sent up out of sight as a result of the policy of devaluation.

Nobody can be unconcerned if there is an increase in the cost of living, and there has been an increase over all between April and September. But the fact of the matter is that by comparison with previous years there has not been as great a rise between April and September of 1962 as was the custom in those earlier years. Therefore one can see the extent to which this tactic was used by the Liberal party to mislead the Canadian people.

Finally, we see the tactic, unprecedented in the history of Canada, Mr. Speaker, indeed, I should think unprecedented in the history of the western world, of a direct and deliberate attack on the nation's currency, an onslaught on the integrity of the Canadian dollar, an attack on confidence itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: By the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fulton: Attacks on policy, of course, may be expected and should be expected, particularly during an election campaign; but as for attacks on confidence in the currency, never before have I seen and never again will I see, I hope, a tactic such as that, destructive of confidence in the very integrity of our currency. Never again, I hope, will we see such a tactic such as that policy because confidence in the dollar outlives governments and parliament if it is maintained; and if it is destroyed it is more important and is a greater loss than the passage of any government or the demise of any particular parliament. This is what my hon. friends lost sight of, driven to the lengths of irresponsibility that they were in their lust for power.

I know that someone has said or maybe suggested: why do you rehash the election campaign? This is not just a rehash of the election campaign because unfortunately these tactics are still continuing. The fact of the matter is that apparently it is still the view and objective of the Liberal party that on the self-imposed ruins of the nation's currency, if they had their way, on the backs of Canadian workers and consumers whose devastation they would have encompassed, they would build a political future for themselves.

It is a continuing policy. We still see them in their frustration continuing their attempts to destroy confidence on the part of the Canadian people in their institutions, trying to capitalize on the fact that the country has a minority government by seeking to intimidate and frighten investors, businessmen and people generally with regard to the course of events. As authority for this statement I cite words used by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) speaking in the Stormont by-election campaign, as reported in the Montreal Star of July 13. He said:

> Their minority will not stand. We can destroy it at a moment's notice ... at the opportune time.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Could any words be more calculated to inspire and instil lack of confidence in those who are looking, as they are entitled to look and expect, for stability in the affairs of our government? "Destroy it at a moment's notice, at the opportune time", even though the Canadian people had entrusted them with the responsibility of government, before they had any chance to submit their program to the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course they did not entrust.

Mr. Fulton: Under our system, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people entrusted us with the responsibility of government and until the hon. member for Essex East gets that through his head I fear he will be doomed to sit in frustration on the other side of the house.

With this approach, Mr. Speaker, I should like to contrast the program which we have offered this house and the country. As I have said, we accept the responsibility for government. We are fully conscious of the fact that we are a minority government but that fact does not relieve us of the responsibility of governing. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you, and it our view, that it but heightens the responsibility that we must show. So we have come before the house with a program of working, building and planning. That is the aim of the program embodied in the speech from the throne.

I should like to give the house some illustrations of it by referring to the work and planning of my own department, but I also think I can illustrate it effectively by contrasting it in the course of my remaining remarks with that ragtag and bobtail collection of left-over bits and pieces that the Leader of the Opposition tried to characterize as a program toward the end of the speech which he delivered on Tuesday of last week.

First, as to planning, Mr. Speaker, let me point out to the house that in spite of the fact we have had to implement emergency measures in my department, and there are some restrictions on physical construction, we have not in any way interfered with the planning vote of that department. Therefore, the vote of $1.5 million under which the planning of major and minor projects is carried on is untouched. Those plans are going forward so that at the earliest moment, when other factors permit, the plans can be implemented for the people of Canada.

Next, I should like to say a word with regard to physical activity, working and building. The Leader of the Opposition calls for a massive increase in construction. Let me refer to the July figures. Building permits issued for construction amounted to over $273 million for the month of July alone, up 20.2 per cent from a year earlier. The Leader of the Opposition says that half a billion dollars of construction means the equivalent of a year's work for 100,000 men, and their employment in turn would mean stimulation for a great deal of other business. This reference is found at page 70 of Hansard.

May I point out that permits issued in July for construction amounted to over a quarter of a billion dollars. If we have another month like July, we will have the half a billion dollars in construction ready to get under way and the 100,000 men to whom the Leader of the Opposition referred will be going back to work under Conservative policy.

May I refer the house to an item which appeared in the Gazette of October 9, which reads as follows:

> Construction contract awards during the first nine months total $2,525 million—5.6 per cent higher than for the same period last year, according to the MacLean Building Guide. The increase derives from more housing and business construction conceentrated in the Quebec and Ontario areas.

These are some of the positive achievements and programs. The Leader of the Opposition speaks of the Liberals' national plan for municipal development. He speaks in the same breath of the colossal failure of our proposal and then goes on, in the same breath, to advocate more of the same. Let me give you some of the particulars of what has been done in this field in the years from 1957 up to August, 1962. There have been 724,000 new dwellings started in Canada, 45 per cent of which are financed under the National Housing Act, and $1.5 billion have been advanced in direct Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans during that period. There have been 20,000 units of rental accommodation provided for low income families, in an aggregate amount of $157 million.

The next item concerns some 5,000 public housing units which have been approved under the federal-provincial partnership arrangement since we took office; some 3,300 land assembly lots have been approved; approximately $675,000 have been contributed to urban renewal studies. Forty four such studies have been undertaken in the five years since the Conservative government was first elected, whereas there were six under the Liberals.

The Leader of the Opposition speaks of urban redevelopment. If I may paraphrase his own words used in another context, he thinks this program is as new as his own knowledge of it. The total contribution approved for urban redevelopment purposes under this government has been close to $20 million. Then, again, he speaks of sewage disposal. He criticizes, Mr. Speaker, but carefully omits to point out that it was this government that amended the National Housing Act, in December, 1960, to provide for sewage disposal projects and to assist municipalities. Since that time, 264 loans totalling over $68 million have been made and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has now some 271 preliminary applications on hand with a loan potential of another $67 million. This is the first time in the history of this country that a direct attack has been made on the joint problems of pollution and water conservation, the first time in the history of this country any constructive approach has been made to the problem of helping the municipalities whose need in this field was so desperate.

I could go on. The greatest tribute, I may say, should be paid to my predecessor, the Hon. David Walker, for the vision he had and the broad concept that he had in bringing this legislation into effect. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but in fact we have spent the last five years in working, building and planning in areas ignored by the Grits. I say without hesitation that if, in fact, there is a national concept of municipal development, it rests with this government and this party. The plans and the programs that I have outlined indicate the truth of that statement.

Coupled with that, I say that further imaginative, practical plans are to come. As an example of what I have in mind, I may say that I am asking Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to study three important and closely related matters. The first of these is in the broad field of providing housing for the physically handicapped; second, the study of a proposal to build university residences for married couples; third, the general question of the further application of the sewage disposal plan.

I think I have said enough. I hope I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to show, particularly by way of contrast as against the scare and scream tactics of the Liberals, that we have for this country a constructive program of planning, building and working. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and his colleagues would have the business of the country grind to a halt, they would have Canadian and foreign investors run from the country, they would have this parliament become little less than a forum for their scream and scare tactics, they would have everybody stop and wait while they make their play for power. We cannot allow the government, parliament and people of Canada to be intimidated by threats such as the one used by the hon. member for Laurier, that they can destroy us at a moment's notice at an opportune time. No, Mr. Speaker, it is the electors of Canada who will determine when any opportune time comes, on the basis of which any government will be defeated.

I believe it is our duty, Mr. Speaker, and we accept the duty and responsibility of placing our program before this house, bringing in the detailed legislation by which this program will be implemented. On that basis, I invite the support of this house without compromise or concession. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we can leave to the hon. member for Laurier and other members of the Liberal party such ideas as they believe will destroy us, and that they will destroy this program at a moment's notice at the opportune time. What an arrogant statement. I suggest to hon. members of the Liberal party, in spite of their bravado, that they well know if, for opportunism such as they wish, they were able—they will not be able—to succeed in frustrating this constructive program and deprive this parliament of an opportunity of seeing this program implemented, it would be the most inopportune thing that could happen to them as well as being disastrous for Canada.

On the basis of the program, Mr. Speaker, I say to you that the Conservative government, the Conservative party, is prepared to go ahead and accept that responsibility of giving constructive government which the people have imposed upon us, satisfied when the proper moment comes to face the people on the basis of that program and that record.

(Translation):

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, like many others, to offer you my congratulations for your appointment to the high office you now occupy. My short experience in the house has already convinced me that the welfare of our country depends, to a large extent, on the integrity and impartiality with which you fulfil your functions.

May I be allowed also to congratulate the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The quality of those first two speeches has set a standard that all members will no doubt wish to emulate.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, as I stand here to speak for the first time in the House of Commons I do so with mixed emotions. I am very proud of being part of this house and representing the English speaking population of the province of Quebec. It is traditional, and perhaps in the spirit of democracy, that they have picked a backbencher to represent them here today, but at the same time I realize very humbly that I speak in the presence of so many distinguished parliamentarians, men I have admired and respected, men who are sitting on both sides of the house.

I have just listened with great interest to the Minister of Public Works. I listened with concern as he expressed his disapproval of our attack on the monetary system of Canada during the election, but I say in all sincerity that it was not the printing of funny money or our remarks on the monetary system which caused a run on the Canadian dollar. It was the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture when he blithely admitted that it did not matter whether the dollar stood at 95 cents or 90 cents, and that they could decide by a flip of a coin that it should be 92½. One cannot have respect for a government when one hears such talk from a minister of the crown.

Yesterday I listened with great respect to the Minister of Justice when he sprang to the defence of the deputy attorney general of Canada. With great indignation he stood up for this gentleman who, allegedly, was attacked by a member of the New Democratic party. What a contrast was his defence of the deputy attorney general to his behaviour in the Coyne affair.

Mr. Speaker, I am conscious of the fact that there is a new sense of awareness in the country. Never before in the peacetime history of Canada have so many people looked to parliament for leadership. Never before have so many people looked so desperately for some guidance and reassurance, for a plan to be formulated to show that leadership is available, leadership that will put the country back on the road to recovery. Like a man who has had his first heart attack this country realizes all is not sound with its economy. Its people are bewildered at the fact that there is no indication of a plan for the recovery of the economy, and they are anxious because the government does not take them into its confidence and confront them with the problems impeding our progress.

I am convinced that had the government introduced its austerity program a year sooner the people of Canada would look more favourably on the government than they do today. The people are ready, in a manner reminiscent of their wartime effort, to work, to increase production, to put their shoulders to the wheel if only the direction and leadership were available. Unfortunately the government is not taking advantage of this desire to face the facts. Rather, it is once again assuring the country that all is well, that unemployment is vanishing at a rapid rate and that in the very near future everyone will be back to work. For the sake of the unemployed I hope so.

The people remember the days when the prestige of Canada was at an all time high, when Canada's voice was a powerful one in the United Nations. They recall the time when the economy of Canada was strong and vigorous. Those were the days when skilled immigrants regarded Canada as the land of milk and honey. Those were the days when our dollar was more sought after than that of our mighty neighbour to the south. In five long years of Tory government the people have seen our prestige dwindle until our voice is no longer listened to, and our shores are no longer the goal of immigrants from prosperous Europe. Our money is no longer eagerly snapped up.

Canadians have sat back in amazement and watched the once proud Tory party accept, with gratitude, the assistance of the Social Credit party to stay in power. They accept the help of a splinter party whose very doctrine is fundamentally opposed to anything the Conservatives hold sacred. One would have thought that at least the Conservatives would have refrained from showing their glee.

As I listened first to the mover of the address in reply as he traced the industrial development of his constituency, and next to the seconder as he spoke with obvious pride of the industrial achievements of his country, I realized that I could not eulogize Verdun in either of these fields. The truth of the matter is that, situated as it is on the island of Montreal, the city of Verdun has long passed the time when it could lay claim to any achievement in the field of agriculture. Nor can we claim any fame in the field of industrialization, since the citizens of Verdun have long been happy to earn their living in the vast industries outside our boundaries.

(Translation):

The Verdun riding is remarkable for the quality of its citizens. It has a population of 86,000 and is the third largest city in the province. But as regards bilingualism, Verdun is probably first in the country. For years, English Canadians and French Canadians have lived side by side in perfect harmony and nobody will make them believe that in the sight of the Divine Providence, there is any difference between the nations that live on this earth.

(Text):

Our degree of bilingualism can be traced directly to our vast recreational program. From an early age our French speaking and English speaking children play together on our many playgrounds, and when they reach the age of reason it is very difficult for any adult, already poisoned by the seeds of racial intolerance, to convince them that their French speaking or English speaking neighbour is not a wonderful person.

(Translation):

As an English Canadian born in the province of Quebec, I have been for many years aware of the tremendous part played by the French Canadians in the building up of our country. Their faithfulness to Canada in the truly critical moments fills many pages of our history.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, of being a citizen of Verdun and a resident of the province of Quebec. I boast of speaking, although with some difficulty, the tongue of my French Canadian friends.

(Text):

There are two other accomplishments of the community of Verdun about which I wish to speak very briefly. I am proud of the fact, for instance, that the name of Verdun is known throughout the free world, and indeed behind the iron curtain. Within the boundaries of Verdun lies the famous Verdun Protestant hospital, the leading institution dedicated to the alleviation of mental illness. There a dedicated staff, under the direction of Dr. Roberts, has introduced new techniques and new methods of curing mental illness, methods based on kindness, compassion and the restoration of human dignity. These methods have been copied by other institutions throughout the world for there are no barriers, nor should there be any, to the exchange of ideas in this field.

The last item to which I wish to refer is the tremendous contribution Verdun made in the last war. It is on record that Verdun had the highest rate of enlistment per capita of any large city in Canada. Is it little wonder then, Mr. Speaker, that the citizens of Verdun resent certain political leaders expressing their admiration for the two greatest exponents of man's inhumanity to man?

Listening, as I did, quite attentively to the speech of the Prime Minister I found little of consequence. I think it is a little surprising when one realizes that this government had an abnormally long time at its disposal to prepare its program. While the opposition and the people of Canada cooled their heels waiting for the convening of parliament, the Prime Minister prepared a program that got progressively worse as the available time became shorter.

I did, however, hear him express the desire to balance the budget. This after five years of record deficits—not calculated deficits to relieve unemployment, but record deficits at a time when the unemployment rate was at an all time high in the history of Canada. I could not help thinking, again on a regional note, as I listened to the Prime Minister, that a week or two before the election our Prime Minister promised to visit the city of Verdun, as the Leader of the Opposition graciously did. We prepared the gold book, and all the traditional ceremonies that go with it, for our Prime Minister. What did he do? Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and his entourage sped through the city of Verdun by the shortest possible route and at the highest speed they could possibly go. Thousands of disappointed citizens were then left with the impression that the Tories had written Verdun off as being a bastion of Conservatism. On this latter conclusion I commend the Prime Minister for his foresight.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because the city of Verdun has as its proud city manager Mr. French, who has been able to balance the budget of our community for 24 consecutive years. Unfortunately for our Prime Minister, Mr. French is an avowed Liberal. So when the following evening came and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) rose to his feet, I listened very attentively. I have had occasion to hear his marvellous oratory on previous occasions. Here was the voice of French Canada in the Conservative government. Perhaps in his own inimitable style he could fill in the many voids in the Prime Minister's speech. After all, the Prime Minister had things on his mind when he delivered his speech. He knew from the evidence confronting him, documented evidence, concisely and accurately placed before the people by the Leader of the Opposition, that Canadians were aware the government had callously hidden the true facts about the economy of Canada before the election.

What did the Associate Minister of National Defence do instead? He used the valuable time at his disposal to attack the Liberal government of the province of Quebec, the very premier who, by his co-operation, by his sincere desire to help his people, had gladly co-operated on the removal of tolls on the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, probably the sole reason the Associate Minister of National Defence sits in parliament right now. I listened to the attack on the province of Quebec first started by the deputy leader of the Social Credit party and continued by the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais).

The Lesage government, in the two years it has been in office, has done more to close the economic gap between Quebec and Canada than any other government in the history of that province. His reforms in the field of education, his introduction of the hospital plan, his exposure of the most corrupt political machine in the history of that province will result in an overwhelming Liberal victory in November. May we suggest that the Associate Minister of National Defence, instead of repaying favours to the remnants of this broken Union Nationale machine, should instead thank Mr. Lesage for keeping him in parliament.

I can document what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to refer to La Presse of Thursday, May 10 with regard to the Champlain, Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges. For hon. members outside the island of Montreal and the province of Quebec I would just like to take a moment or two to explain a little of the background. The Champlain bridge was conceived and started by the Liberal government in 1956-57. It was designed to alleviate the deplorable traffic conditions that existed on the two bridges, the Victoria and the Jacques Cartier. This magnificent structure was developed barely a mile or two from the two existing structures. The Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges at that time were being taxed beyond their capacity—and when we come to think of it, so are the Canadian people today.

Therefore it was agreed to construct the Champlain bridge in order to alleviate traffic on these existing arteries. I compliment the government for having agreed that it was necessary to relieve the traffic across the mighty St. Lawrence.

However, Mr. Speaker, is this new bridge fulfilling its role? Is the Champlain bridge carrying thousands of automobiles in and out of the island of Montreal daily? In fact, while automobiles still line up on the old bridges bumper to bumper, the new bridge is relatively unused. The trouble comes from two sources. First of all, in their haste to assure the Associate Minister of National Defence re-election, the government removed the tolls from the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. This was a good move; it helped the people. But the government omitted to remove the tolls on the new bridge, which is situated just a few miles away. Consequently, those motorists situated equidistantly from the toll-free bridges and the new Champlain bridge still use the old arteries, for in this day and age of austerity 50 cents a round trip is still a lot of money.

This is what La Presse of Thursday, May 10 had to say with regard to the alleviation of tolls on two bridges and leaving them on the third:

> The lack of logic is obvious. It was decided to build the Champlain bridge besides the two others to alleviate the traffic on these two latter bridges. Everyone understood the necessity. But what motorists who, having a choice between three bridges situated very close to each other, will seek out the only one on which they must pay? There will be some, of course, but they will be in the minority. Therefore these two bridges will continue to be taxed to their full capacity. The purpose for which the new bridge was designed will not be achieved.

The following paragraph strikes me very forcefully, Mr. Speaker.

On the other hand, as the eventual minority of motorists using the new bridge will come from Verdun and St. Lambert-Laprairie, the toll will be for them a sort of indirect tax that will apply to them exclusively.

One of my confreres has suggested wryly that we surmise that this toll on the Champlain bridge will not last beyond the next election. Evidently the government does not intend to cede everything at once, in order to have some ammunition on hand for the next election. But in the present case one would suppose that reason would prevail. The Lesage government in particular has acted very impartially. It has not refused its collaboration on the excuse that it would help a rival government at the time of election.

I would suggest to the government that if it is their intention to remove the toll on the Champlain bridge just before the next election, they should do it in the next few days that remain at their disposal.

There is another problem in my constituency, Mr. Speaker, which I think exists right across this vast dominion of ours. It is the plight of a vastly growing segment of our population. I am referring to those young men—and I stress "young men"—who have reached the age of 40 and are out of work. Whilst the government is now discovering the need for vocational training and is attempting to turn out skilled labour for our industries, other very skilled workers, men who have worked for 20 years or so in the railways, in the aircraft industry and in the electronics field are being laid off because of automation or for other reasons. These men start out confident in their ability to find work. Has not the press blared out the need for skilled workers? But their confidence is soon destroyed as company after company refuses to hire them.

This was not because of any lack of talent but because these men are considered to be too old to work and too young for their old age pensions. Who says so? The architects of our company pension plan say so—these dealers in cold mathematics whose plans cannot tolerate the addition of new employees over the age of 40. Is this situation logical?

I did note in the speech from the throne some indication that the government has finally recognized this injustice. I would suggest that they discard for once the lines of political expediency and use the plan outlined in the Liberal program and elaborated upon by the Leader of the Opposition in a speech in the House of Commons last year. On this particular point, the government did finally recognize the difficulty, and I suggest they should use the few days at their disposal to implement without further delay a pension scheme which will end forever this insidious discrimination against our citizens in their best years of life.

When the Leader of the Opposition in his brilliant address suggested an extension of the federal share of expenditures in connection with slum clearance and urban renewal, members on the government benches ridiculed the proposal or referred him to the winter works program. But, in fact, Mr. Speaker, my community urgently needs some type of housing development for the use of its senior citizens, as do thousands of communities across Canada. It is of no use for the Tories to point to existing legislation in this regard. Private contractors, with few exceptions, are not using the legislation which is presently on the statute books pertaining to the construction of homes for the aged. The government itself, if necessary, should enter upon the construction of such homes. Every year, thousands of married couples in the twilight of their lives are forced to separate as the husband goes pathetically to an old men's home and the wife elsewhere. What we need, and need soon, is provision for our senior citizens to live out their lives together in security, comfort and privacy, and this might best be brought about through housing of a motel type such as is common in the Scandinavian countries. Our obligation to our senior citizens goes much further than simply raising old age pensions every few years. Private industry is not interested in the problem to any great degree, for if it is to build and operate these homes under present legislation it must charge rents far beyond the normal reach of our senior citizens.

I should like to point out briefly the experience of Toledo in the United States whose one-storey group of row housing units for older people represents one of the first of the new and imaginative approaches in this field in that country. Early in 1956, extensive research was begun to determine the extent for the need for public housing. I am sure the five points which I am about to mention and which represented the result, in part, of the survey, are deeply applicable at this time to Canada. These are:

1. Existing public housing did not provide the type of living arrangements often needed by elderly families.

2. Retirement acceleration had become an established practice in industry and many unprepared employees were being forced to retire.

3. The number of recipients of social security benefits was mounting monthly.

4. There were no opportunities for elderly families to continue living independently at a cost they could afford.

5. Neither private nor public funds were available to meet the need and to make this type of development a reality.

Unfortunately, time does not permit me to go into the Toledo plan in further detail, but the subject is one which I am sure hon. members would agree must be of great concern to us all.

Mr. Speaker, when I walk along the miles of boardwalk for which Verdun is famous I can look across the water and see ships from all nations as they travel up the mighty St. Lawrence seaway, contemplated and executed by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) during the time when the present opposition was in power. When I listen to our good friends at the opposite end of this house saying that there is no difference between the two old parties I want to tell them this, that there is a basic difference. The Liberal party is a party of action and the Conservatives are a party of words. The record is here. Take, for example, unemployment insurance, a measure which members of the Social Credit party admire and want to stretch a little—in fact, I think most of them are sitting on their unemployment insurance now. Well, this was implemented by the Liberals in 1940. The veterans charter was brought in in 1953; family allowances in 1945; a national health program in 1948; old age pensions in 1951; old age assistance in 1951; allowances for the blind in 1951; and extension of the health grants in 1953; a measure to assist disabled persons in 1954; the second phase of the national health program in 1956; unemployment assistance in 1956; the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act in 1957, and increased payments to children under the Family Allowances Act in 1957.

Lack of time does not permit me to give a complete list of all the accomplishments of the Liberals while in office. In closing, may I thank hon. members on both sides for the attention they have shown me in my maiden speech.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which I have at my disposal, I join all the other members in offering you my sincere congratulations on your appointment as Speaker of this house. The appointment of a French-speaking Canadian from a province other than Quebec is an honour for all citizens of my province, for we are conscious of the rights of the French minorities both in the other provinces and in the Canadian parliament. I congratulate you and offer you my best wishes.

I also wish to join all the other members of this house in congratulating the mover (Mr. Chaplin) and the seconder (Mr. Vincent) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who gave such a good account of themselves. They were a credit to their constituencies, to their party and to their country.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I now leave the chair until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 11, 1962

The house met at 11 a.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT EXCEPT FOR TREASON

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-57, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, under the Criminal Code as it presently stands murder is divided into capital and non-capital classifications, with death being the punishment for capital murder and life imprisonment the punishment for non-capital murder. The purpose of this bill is to provide that, except in cases of treason, the punishment for murder shall be life imprisonment. In short, the purpose is to abolish capital punishment except in cases of treason.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Balcer: The purpose of this bill is to bring into legislative force the protocol to the Warsaw agreement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC HARBOURS

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND ONTARIO

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-59, to approve an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario respecting public harbours.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Balcer: The purpose of this bill is to give legislative authority to an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario respecting harbours, along the lines of section 108 of the British North America Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING LIABILITY LIMIT, ETC.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to increase from two hundred million dollars to four hundred million dollars the limit of the liability of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21 of the act; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BOARDS OF INQUIRY, ETC.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to authorize the Minister of Transport to establish boards of inquiry to investigate aircraft accidents, to give such boards the necessary power to carry out their functions and to provide for the expenses of witnesses appearing before these boards, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRANSPORT

BAGOTVILLE, QUE.—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to report on the accident that occurred at Bagotville yesterday, and has a board of inquiry been set up?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague the Minister of National Defence has an answer to that question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I regret to inform the house that at approximately 7.50 p.m. yesterday, October 10, a very unfortunate accident occurred at R.C.A.F. station Bagotville, when an R.C.A.F. CF-101B Voodoo aircraft, while taking off on a routine night operation, collided with a T.C.A. Viscount as it was turning off the runway. One member of the T.C.A. crew was killed instantly and one passenger died shortly after being admitted to hospital. The crew of the Voodoo managed to control their aircraft until they could ensure that it would crash in an open field before they ejected at a dangerously low altitude, and with some injury to themselves.

Until such time as a complete and exhaustive investigation has been carried out it will be impossible to determine the exact cause of this accident. Such an investigation was instigated immediately, and the most highly qualified personnel available were flown to the scene within hours. Every facility and assistance are being provided to this team. However, it is not yet possible to forecast when the results of this investigation will be available.

The Department of Transport is co-operating in the investigation.

Mr. Hellyer: As a supplementary question, is the control tower at the airport operated under the Royal Canadian Air Force or the Department of Transport?

Mr. Harkness: This is an R.C.A.F. station and the control tower is operated by the air force.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Will the minister give the house a complete and official report, when it is available, on this unfortunate accident?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

[Later:]

BAGOTVILLE—AIR COLLISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, following the fatal accident which occurred yesterday at Bagotville's military airport, could the Minister of Transport inform the house of the steps his department intends to take to avoid the repetition of such a tragedy?

Does the minister feel it would be worthwhile to consider the eventual use of St. Honore's fine airport by all civil and commercial aircraft?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of National Defence has just stated, a full investigation is under way.

As for the possible use of the airport in St. Honore, I do not think that will come in the near future.

(Text):

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Since the Thanksgiving season is over and fall is upon us, could the minister give us any information as to when we may expect the report of the Gill commission that is investigating the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier in this session that we expect to have the report from that commission some time this fall.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SONS OF FREEDOM, B.C.—REQUEST FOR CO-OPERATION TO SOLVE PROBLEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister which is of great importance to the people of British Columbia and particularly those in southeastern British Columbia.

In view of the excellent suggestion made in the other place concerning the establishment of a Senate committee to investigate the Sons of Freedom problem, and in view of the urgent necessity of not allowing the problem to drift further, would the Prime Minister express the readiness of this government to co-operate with the provincial and local authorities to achieve a long term solution to this problem?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on the suggestion in the form of a resolution made in the other place. The matter is still under debate there, the discussion having been adjourned. However, I think I might say that throughout the years the Sons of Freedom have been problem adults, not only in Saskatchewan in my early days but also, in recent years, in British Columbia.

As far as the federal government is concerned, in so far as any portion of this problem falls within the responsibility of the federal government every consideration will be given to bringing about a settlement, though I must say, on the basis of the experience of years, one might express the hope without too much hope.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. In view of the Prime Minister's experience in connection with this matter, may I ask him if he has had—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I ask him if he has had any recent contacts?

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Viateur Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could the minister give us some explanation about the 12 cents a pound subsidy paid at present by the government on Canadian butter and tell us for what reason whey butter is not included in that category?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel that the hon. member should put his question on the order paper.

HOGS—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR PREMIUM REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and it concerns the 92,000 eastern farmers with an annual income of less than $1,200.

What compensation will the Department of Agriculture offer following the reduction of hog production premium, which means a loss of a million and a half dollars for our farmers? Shall we ask them to tighten their belts during the coming winter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the question, as put, rather aims at giving some information and expressing certain views. Moreover, and even if the question has some urgency, the information asked for is not of the kind which should be sought on the orders of the day.

Therefore, if the hon. member would have his question put on the order paper, he would no doubt receive an answer in the near future.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. How is it possible to judge whether a question is important or not, urgent or not, or whether it should be put on the order paper? I notice that about 75 per cent of all questions are referred to the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: It is true that most questions should be on the order paper and the only ones allowed on orders of the day are those asked in view of immediately obtaining information which is urgently needed.

Again, I would suggest to the hon. member to read, or perhaps re-read, the comments in Beauchesne's book on the subject. The explanations it gives are, in my opinion, complete and we might continue—

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, coming back to my point of order, I would like to point out that Beauchesne's book is printed only in English. We have no French copies.

Mr. Speaker: I am extremely sorry, but this book is a publication which, though it was accepted by parliament, has not been brought out by parliament, and the volume was only printed in English—

Mr. Dumont: Does the austerity program stop us from having it in French?

Mr. Speaker: There is no French copy of this publication in existence.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, could one not possibly have it translated into French?

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter which it is up to the house to decide and I do not think it possible to obtain an answer from anybody for the time being, nor that it is the responsibility of any one department in particular. However, I shall consider the hon. member's suggestion.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could comment on the point of order which has been raised and suggest that no where in the citations to which you have referred us—certainly not in English; it may come out this way in the French translation —is there any reference to the question of urgency of a reply.

HARBOURS

HARBOURS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he will table the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario respecting public harbours before the legislation comes up for consideration by the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN POSITION OF RETIRED PENSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will there be any action taken at this session of parliament supplementary to that taken just before the end of the last session toward improving Canadian National pensions in the case of those already on pension?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman knows, the proper answer in that regard is that when government policy has been determined, the house will be made aware in due course.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED DISCONTINUANCE OF TRAIN SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. On October 3 I asked the minister whether his attention had been drawn to the proposal of Canadian National Railways to discontinue trains Nos. 195 and 196 between Prince George and Prince Rupert in British Columbia later this month and, if so, what steps were being taken to prevent this proposal in order to ensure the safety and employment of the people involved and to maintain a degree of service to the communities. The minister answered on the following day, October 4, by saying that he had drawn this matter to the attention of the management of the C.N.R. and that when he had a report from them he would communicate with me again.

Because of the impending discontinuance of these lines which is coming closer day by day, I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to give the house some indication as to what is happening. Second, will he reply to the proposal with respect not only to trains Nos. 3 and 4 but to other trains of the C.N.R.?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I have to say is that I have not received a report yet from the management of the C.N.R.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question. Would the minister get in touch with the C.N.R. again because of the extreme urgency of this matter to the people involved?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Speaker: Right away on a supplementary the hon. member has been able to get his point across, but it is not a real supplementary. He is making a representation.

TRADE

TOBACCO—EFFORTS TO FIND EXPORT MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question of which I have sent him a copy. Have any of the trade missions dispatched by the government been advised to make a special effort to find a market for Canadian grown tobacco? If not, would the government consider instructing a mission to do so?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Most of our trade missions have been specialized industry groups, and as yet a mission representing the tobacco industry has not been arranged. However, during the past six months small missions of the Ontario flue-cured tobacco growers marketing board have visited Europe twice and Southern Rhodesia once, for the purpose of investigating export markets for Canadian tobacco in Europe and the production and marketing methods used in Southern Rhodesia. Departmental officials here and abroad facilitated the efforts of the two missions, and continuing work is being carried out as a result of these missions.

I might add that further activities will be undertaken shortly in the export promotion of Canadian tobacco, in which the department is co-operating with the tobacco marketing board.

OIL—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO CONTINUED ENTRY INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that oil import quotas into the United States are announced prior to January 1 of each year, and because the recommendations of the United States interdepartmental committee are now in the hands of the President of the United States, what representations, if any, is the minister making to ensure that Canadian oil will continue to enjoy unlimited entry into the United States?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is in constant touch and is corresponding with its opposite numbers in the United States regarding this and other important trade matters; and the United States government has been kept fully informed of our very definite views on this important subject.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—NEW PROPOSALS BY BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government been advised by the government of the United Kingdom what the new proposals are that Mr. Macmillan has said he is going to put before the common market to deal with the points raised at the commonwealth conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are continuous communications between the two governments but, according to parliamentary procedure, the nature of those communications is not given to the house.

Mr. Berger: A supplementary question. I was not asking the Prime Minister what was the nature or content of the communication. I simply ask by way of a supplementary question, if I may do so, whether the new proposals have been communicated to the government of this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave earlier applies to this question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—INQUIRY AS TO ARMING OF CF-104 JETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the report in this morning's Globe and Mail that delivery has begun of 200 Canadian CF-104 jets to No. 3 fighter wing in West Germany, and in view of statements by officials that the plane cannot carry out its role as a strike reconnaissance aircraft without nuclear armaments, can the minister advise the house if the decision to deliver these planes constitutes a decision to arm them with nuclear weapons without which they would be unusable in their intended role?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel the question transgresses the rules of the house in a number of ways; first, as to the urgency of obtaining this information, and second, because I seem to detect a number of opinions expressed in the question. It appears to be an argumentative type of question rather than one seeking information.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTH BAY, ONT.—STATEMENT ON ALERT POSITION OF BOMARC CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Trinity asked if there had been a recent change in the manning of the North Bay Bomarc station. The answer is in the negative. Aside from a brief testing period earlier this year when the unit was first formed, there has been no change in the working hours of the crews on the Bomarc base at North Bay.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise the house if there is any intention of changing the state of operational readiness at that station at an early date?

Mr. Harkness: Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laureat Maltais (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell the house what steps his department intends to take in order to facilitate winter navigation on the St. Lawrence river between Quebec city and Seven Islands during the winter of 1962-63?

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that his question should be put on the order paper.

(Text):

COMBINES

LUMBER—ALLEGED PRICE FIXING BY B.C. MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a question for the Minister of Finance; I am sorry I have not been able to give him notice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the allegations made before the United States tariff commission regarding the formation of a price fixing combine by British Columbia lumber mills, and has the restrictive trade practices commission recently had occasion to investigate such allegations?

Mr. Speaker: I think the observation I made with regard to an earlier question respecting the urgency of information applies here also. Further, since the allegations appear to have been made only yesterday it would be rather difficult to have an answer as to whether the restrictive trade practices commission has had a chance to look into the matter.

REPORTS ON HEARINGS IN WHICH RETIRING COMMISSIONERS PARTICIPATED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance what steps he has taken, now that the services of Mr. Smith and Mr. Whiteley will no longer be available to the government, to see that any unfinished reports in connection with any hearings which may have taken place under their direction will be completed.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I have not taken any steps in that respect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the house will understand the quick reply of the Minister of Finance. One has heard so many speeches from the Minister of Justice on finance this session, it is understandable that this mistake is made.

I ask the Minister of Justice, in view of the fact the services of Mr. Whiteley and Mr. Smith are no longer going to be available, what has the government done, and the minister in particular, to assure that reports on which they were working will be completed in regard to hearings which took place under their direction.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Everything possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Minister of Justice, since the announcement of their retirement, had any communication whatever with Mr. Smith or with Mr. Whiteley with regard to this particular question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to interfere with any member of the restrictive trade practices commission in the discharge of his duties under the statute.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does that mean, then, that if these gentlemen do not make any reports, having in mind the fact that their services terminate at the end of the month, the hearings which took place will be allowed to lapse in so far as results are concerned; or will the minister order new hearings?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It means that the hon. gentleman does not understand the situation. If he will examine the statute he will see what the situation is in this respect.

[Mr. Speaker.]

These terms do not expire suddenly. They are ten year terms that expire at the end of this month. If the hon. member will examine the statute he will find there is no provision for extending the terms for any lesser period than ten years. The only provision the statute makes is for appointment for a ten year period. In that situation, the utmost will be done to assure that the work of the commission will proceed with a minimum—with a minimum, Mr. Speaker—of problems.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF EXPROPRIATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask him whether it is the intention of the government at this time to introduce the bill amending the Expropriation Act, as suggested in two or three speeches from the throne.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has overlooked the fact that the bill has already been introduced.

POSTAL SERVICE

HAWKESBURY, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO DELIVERY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Viateur Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to put to the Postmaster General.

Could the Postmaster General tell us when letter carrier delivery service will start in the town of Hawkesbury?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member knows well that his question is out of order and that he will have to put it on another occasion, and not on the orders of the day.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

LIEFCORT—STATEMENT AS TO COMPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale asked me a question relating to the composition of liefcort. I am advised that the food and drug directorate was not aware that the dose of estradiol in liefcort was ten times the usually recommend dose. I should point out, however, that much higher doses than the usual dose are given in the treatment of certain diseases. It was only after an involved chemical analysis that we found it not to be an extract of adrenal glands but a synthetic extract of hormones and hormone-like substances related to the adrenal and sex glands, including estradiol.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify an answer I gave in the house yesterday on our action in banning the distribution of liefcort. I told the hon. member for Essex East that the food and drug directorate of my department had stopped the distribution of this drug before action had been taken by the United States. In fact I find we acted before the United States food and drug administration let it be known that the drug could not be legally imported into the United States.

The point is that it is illegal for any drug to be imported into that country unless a United States new drug submission has been filed. The United States authorities discovered some time ago that liefcort was crossing the border, and customs officials were alerted automatically to refuse entrance to it. However, these instructions were based on the procedural question I have indicated. When Washington advised my department of the release on Tuesday, I assumed that it coincided with the issuance of instructions to border points.

Mr. H. C. Harley (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to liefcort. Dr. Liefmann has stated that he and his colleagues could continue to use liefcort. Is this in keeping with the order of the food and drug directorate?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, a clear distinction must be drawn between medical practice and the manufacture of drugs. While my department does have the right to control a drug under manufacture, it has no power to interfere with a doctor using his medical judgment to give treatment to individual patients. Dr. Liefmann is no longer manufacturing this drug for distribution under any circumstances outside his own office, and that is the only point with which we can be concerned. If there is any question as to whether his medical qualifications permit him to prescribe treatments, that could be considered only by the appropriate medical licensing body, in this case the college of physicians and surgeons of the province of Quebec.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC AGAINST IMPAIRMENT FROM SMOKING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the urgent question by an hon. member a little while ago, asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce what steps the minister was taking to improve the tobacco industry, I should like to ask the minister what steps he is taking to protect the public from the impairment of health which results from smoking?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the division of responsibility in the public health field is such that my department is not in a position to initiate educational programs in this respect. Each province must make its own decisions in such matters, though we are always ready to provide what assistance we can on request.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BAIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, notice of which has been given. In view of the answer given by the minister yesterday, as recorded in Hansard, at page 351, would the minister advise the house what steps have been taken to relieve the shortage of squid used for bait by Newfoundland fishermen?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the bait service of the Department of Fisheries has succeeded in obtaining small supplies of squid, inadequate it is true, but supplies of other types of bait have been made available and exploratory fishing in the area is being done to ascertain whether squid may be available in the near future. The whole problem is being very carefully watched.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL-SARNIA—WORKING CONDITIONS OF PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question of the hon. member for Lincoln yesterday with regard to the Sarnia pilotage station, I should like to report that the department is aware of the work load situation at the Port Weller-Sarnia pilotage station. Pilotage in these waters is the joint concern of Canada and the United States. We initiated discussions earlier this week with the United States great lakes pilotage administration. Agreement has now been reached to register four additional pilots immediately, and others in training will be available in the near future.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—CONSIDERATION OF REMOVAL OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the very heavy traffic on the toll free Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, is the government considering the possibility of eliminating the tolls on the Champlain bridge, which under present conditions is relatively unused?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): My answer is no, even after my hon. friend's speech of yesterday.

PUBLIC SERVICE

A. S. WHITELEY—RETURN TO CIVIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. What is the reason that assurance has not yet been given that Mr. A. S. Whiteley will be returned to a civil service position when his term as a restrictive trade practices commissioner expires at the end of this month?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, neither I nor the government has any power to appoint any person to the civil service. This is a matter for the commission. Mr. Whiteley has the opportunity that is open to him, and I am sure is well known to him, to make application for whatever position he may regard as suitable, if that is the course he chooses.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Justice a brief supplementary question. Does the government's austerity program stand in the way of the civil service commission restoring Mr. Whiteley to the civil service?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government has no austerity program. There is no such thing.

Mr. Hellyer: It has no program, just austerity.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether or not the government has any type of program.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has a most comprehensive program that will, if given an opportunity, commend itself I am sure to the wisdom of this house.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Speaker: I think on that note we may proceed with orders of the day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, October 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon Chaplin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Speaker: I believe now the house is ready to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this 25th parliament meets in special circumstances since Canada must face heavier responsibilities.

Personally, I am both pleased and honoured to be able to bring my modest contribution to this task as parliamentary secretary to such an important minister as that of agriculture. To my knowledge, it is the first time that a French Canadian holds such a post for that department in this house. I shall thus have the opportunity of being of greater service to the farmers of my country, to my fellow-citizens in eastern Canada as well as those of my province and of my constituency, who are already assured of my devotion. I have no greater wish than to put the knowledge I have of agronomy and my humble talents at the service of our nation's agriculture and of the development of the area which has done me the honour of re-electing me. Farmers from all across Canada, as well as eastern farmers and especially Quebec farmers, will find that I am ready to listen to their problems and to co-operate.

Although Canada is becoming an industrial power in the world, agriculture remains indeed one of the most vital factors in the Canadian economy. But it is true to say that the number of individuals directly concerned with agriculture has come down in these last few years, although farms are getting larger and production is more and more industrialized.

Agriculture remains the basis of our national economy and the yardstick of our prosperity. But in Quebec, we note with regret that of the 134,000 farms under cultivation in 1950, there were only 122,000 left in 1956 and scarcely 96,000 in 1961. Agriculture has not been too affected however, since farm production has continually gone up. Using new machinery and new methods, our farmers are more active and our farms more productive.

It cannot be denied that it is the result of the work carried on, during the last few years, by our federal Department of Agriculture, the dedication of our county agronomists, the co-operation of numerous experts and in particular the result of the sustained efforts made by professional associations and co-operatives who lead and support the farmers.

However, in the front rank of these organizations comes our federal Department of Agriculture whose experiments and research benefit the whole country. I will be called upon to work more closely, in the future, with that department and I am proud of it because I will have an opportunity to help implement our Minister of Agriculture's great instructions regarding the marketing of agricultural products, their classification, the health of livestock, the freight subsidy for grains and finally the fine provisions of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. The last report of the stabilization board, which was received a few days ago, shows that more than $126 million were spent on agricultural prices support in Canada and that 18 products of various kinds benefited from it.

In Canada, and especially in our province, the considerable progress already seen is due to an elite of farmers who have been trained by great agronomists and true philosophers of rural thinking.

However, I worry over the fact that most of our family farms are not getting an adequate income. When one thinks that rural life rests first upon the family and then the parish, it is urgent that every endeavour be used to raise the standard of life of our rural families, so that the farming class can enjoy the same benefits and the same privileges as the other social classes.

According to the figures of the 1951 census —those from last year are not yet available— the gross income of more than 50 per cent of farms in the six eastern provinces of the country amounts to less than $2,500. This is absolutely insufficient for the owner or the producer who had to make heavy expenditures to organize his farming operations and who finds himself with a completely inadequate income which prevents him from enjoying a standard of life where he could honourably provide for his family and for the education of his children. This situation exists mostly in the areas which are called marginal. There might even be some at home.

I firmly intend to use my knowledge and energy to seek a solution which will raise the living standard of our farmers, especially in Quebec. In many cases, our farms are undoubtedly too small to give an adequate yield. We shall very likely have to make full use of our tillable land and industrialize reasonably our farms for the processing of western grain, in order to promote more extensive cattle farming at home.

We shall also have to strive to produce economically feed grain for the production of poultry, hogs and beef, if possible, in the eastern provinces. I am sure that the committee on feed grain will be able to consider this problem with the co-operation of the Canadian wheat board. This problem is of particular interest to me.

Other marginal areas will need additional assistance, and I believe that the legislation adopted some time ago under the name of Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, better known as ARDA, can bring a solution to this problem.

This legislation can become a vital instrument in these areas, either by promoting certain specialized crops, the development of co-operatives and local industries, the grouping of certain operations, reforestation, and the rest. The act permits use of the knowledge, energies and goodwill of all those who want to contribute to the economical improvement of the less favoured centres. Here again, I find a problem which calls for a solution and I have been working at it for some time.

I should like to point out that, as early as the first of May 1962, the Minister of Agriculture, with whom I have the honour of co-operating presently, sent out to premiers of the provinces an invitation to co-operate with the federal authorities for the implementation of this Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. For instance, the federal Department of Agriculture is contemplating an assistance of about $10,439,000 for the province of Quebec, over a three year period, $750,000 of which would make up the first payment.

I dare hope that the government of the province of Quebec will sign an agreement on this matter with the federal Minister of Agriculture, at the earliest possible date.

ARDA, with the possibilities for action and adjustment it opens, has already been recognized as the legislation of the century. It is a new tool in the hands of men who pride themselves with being modern. Therefore, it is up to us to make use of it so as to give better service to the people.

May I now quote a few thoughts expressed by the minister Edgar Pisani, of France:

> Since we are swept along, rivalled and buffeted by civilizations opposed to ours, it is our duty to give to all men mastery over their trade, the capacity to organize their efforts concerning their industry and to bind them to a civilization of which they are the trustees, the beneficiaries and the guardians. Each farmer must be given mastery over all that, if not, we will have failed in our task, which is to give everyone a hope, everyone a future.

We earnestly wish that the provinces will agree to implement that important piece of legislation.

Allow me to point out the benefits which have accrued to Canadian dairy producers since the support price on butter has been increased from 58 cents to 64 cents a pound, that is a supplementary increase of 6 cents a pound, from May 1958 to September 1962. Total production during that period amounted to 1,633,901,000 pounds. If we add to that amount the estimated production, from September to December 1962, that is 108 million pounds, the total amount would reach more than $98 million. That additional income is, therefore, what Canadian farmers have gained and will gain, for butter production, on account of the increase in the support price from 58 cents to 64 cents at the end of December 1962. To that might be added the fact that all Canadian producers of milk, to be processed for purposes other than for butter, have also benefited from an increase of about 25 cents per hundred pounds for their milk, either for the production of cheese, concentrated milk or other concentrated products, there again about $12 million a year.

May I emphasize that the provinces alone have the right to legislate in connection with the sale of dairy products within their respective territory. To that effect, all provinces—except Newfoundland—have a provincial milk board. These boards determine milk prices paid to the producers for the sale of non-processed milk on the public market. Minimum prices for milk producers selling their non-processed milk to the consumers have been established, and several provinces have even established minimum prices per quart to be paid by the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, some provinces have entered into an agreement with Ottawa in order to implement our excellent federal crop insurance act. It is quite pointless for us to wait for a reply from the Quebec department of agriculture, which would allow farmers of that province, especially those who are engaged in specialized farming, to benefit from the advantages of that act. The federal government is prepared to pay 20 per cent of the cost of premiums and 50 per cent of the administrative cost of that act.

Mr. Speaker, it is probably as a result of the excellent farm policy of the present federal government, as a newspaperman from La Presse wrote on September 25, that:

> Quebec farmers prefer to borrow from Ottawa.

The same newspaperman also pointed out the following:

> Under the federal-provincial agreement on farm loans, the provincial government grants a 2.5 per cent refund on the 5 per cent interest claimed by Ottawa from borrowers. This means that the rate of interest on federal loans is equal to that of the provincial farm loan board, i.e. 2.5 per cent.

The Quebec government is granting that refund because the provincial farm loan board has run out of funds.

> Even if the interest rates are now identical—

The La Presse journalist goes on to say:

> —what advantage is there for people in Quebec in appealing to the federal government rather than to the provincial government?

To those who ask the question, Ottawa answers that the maximum loan awarded by the federal farm credit corporation is $27,500, i.e. $12,500 higher than the loan granted by the provincial farm loan board. The large farm owner who wants to modernize his facilities therefore finds it more interesting to borrow a large amount than to ask for a small loan, and that is why he turns to Ottawa.

It is, therefore, not surprising, in order to complete the figures I quoted a moment ago, to hear that the number of loans granted in Quebec this year is about 750 per cent higher than last year, having risen from 109 to more than 800. This is how the federal government helps Quebec farmers.

It should also be pointed out that, for the first time this year, the farm credit corporation published in a single volume a completely bilingual report. This is another gesture in favour of bilingualism on the national level.

With regard to French Canadians, it also seems proper to mention that two of our own people have recently been appointed members of the advisory committee of the agricultural stabilization board. I refer to Mr. Georges E. Turcotte, who has been recently appointed assistant director of the federated co-operative of Quebec, and Mr. Lionel Sorel, deputy president of the catholic farmers' union of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, another achievement of the present government could well, in the long run, become vital for the cause of peace and agriculture in the world. I refer to the development of a world food plan, called for a long time food bank. The purpose of the plan is to achieve a more equitable distribution of the food resources in the world; to put at the disposal of depressed or underdeveloped nations food that the more developed nations sometimes produce with surpluses.

Decisive action along those lines was taken early last month when delegates from some 30 countries met at the United Nations headquarters in New York. It was, as it was called, a subscription conference aimed at raising the necessary funds for the financing of this food plan. In fact, some 20 countries agreed to subscribe the equivalent of about $87 million out of an objective of $100 million. Other contributions will probably come to complete this objective during the next few months, thus getting the plan going on an experimental basis, at first.

Mr. Speaker, this recent conference in New York followed logically the meeting of the FAO held in Rome last fall. At both meetings, the leader of the Canadian group was no other than the present Minister of Agriculture. At both meetings, the minister moved the adoption of measures necessary to ensure a good operation of the plan. On behalf of Canada, the minister pledged, moreover, a financial contribution of $5 million, with a third in cash and two thirds in farm products.

During a recent speech he made in my riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, the present Minister of Agriculture said unequivocally that the main Canadian contribution to the plan would be in dairy products.

In that respect, I should like to point out that such a plan had been advocated for practically 20 years. The international federation of farm producers had been asking for such a scheme at everyone of its annual meetings. So had the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and, by the same token, the catholic farmers' union and the Quebec federated co-operative which automatically support the international federation since they are affiliates.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure all my colleagues are just as happy as I am about the fine steps taken and the important appointments made by the present government.

We can only be confident in the future because the speech from the throne pointed out that Canada's crops this year are abundant and of fine quality, and that our foreign markets for agricultural products have greatly improved.

The Department of Agriculture is headed by a very likeable and competent man who fully understands the needs of farmers as I found out.

Mr. Speaker, even though I have been immediately concerned with the affairs of the Department of Agriculture for only a few weeks, I was in a position to realize that some of the recommendations of the Glassco commission are well founded.

I appreciate the aspirations of our ethnical group within the Canadian confederation. In my opinion, the main duty of the Canadian Department of Agriculture, where I shall now be working, is to guide, direct and support the efforts of Canadian farmers. Now, in the province of Quebec and in other areas of the country, in eastern Canada mostly, there is a large group of farmers who want to progress and to bring their contribution to our economy, but who do not speak the language of the majority. Now to guide and manage properly, this department, which is now in command, must have excellent communications with French speaking farmers.

After spending a few weeks in studying the organization of this large department, I feel that improvements would be possible in this field of better communications between this department and our French centres in particular.

I wish to assure the farmers in my province and in other centres of French Canada that I shall make every effort to improve that situation. On that point, I can already count not only on the understanding but also on the full co-operation of the Minister of Agriculture as well as on the co-operation of my colleagues in parliament, especially if

I can show them that everything that could raise the economic level of our people, when they understand better the instructions of our national Department of Agriculture, will help strengthen the whole Canadian economy.

Without interfering with the business of the civil service commission, we encourage by every possible means, the bilingual agronomists and agricultural technicians to take their place within the federal Department of Agriculture. After all, the role of agriculture in Canada is first of all to feed the nation, to feed it well as far as quantity and quality are concerned, and then to do its own share in order to restore the general economy through exports in every available sector.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the farmers from all over Canada that I shall be very glad to help them, to do my best to co-operate with their organizations, their officers and their families. It is a great challenge for a young agronomist from the province of Quebec to study the problems of all Canada, but it is also a great privilege to be called upon to serve under such a distinguished minister as the one who now directs the Department of Agriculture. I shall do my best to understand the problems and to look for the best solutions.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, for my part, I hope I will be of some help to Canadian farmers, especially to those of eastern Canada. Any requests or suggestions that they, their associations, their agronomists send me will be welcome since that will enable us to help Canada maintain the position of honour it occupies at present in the world's economy. Thus, we shall play a part in safeguarding our farmers' fine reputation. Anyone who gives me his co-operation will receive in return unselfish and full support from me, in the best interests always of this social class which the farmers constitute.

Mr. R. J. Teillet (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first, let me offer you my best wishes of good health and success as well as my sincere congratulations on your election as Speaker of this house.

The honour conferred upon you is a credit not only to your electors of Edmonton West, to your city of Edmonton and to your province, but, even more important, I think, to the French speaking population of our beautiful western prairies, this population which, perhaps more than any other group in the whole of Canada, not only works and makes tremendous efforts to maintain and ensure, first, the survival of its culture and its mother tongue, but also makes enormous sacrifices to ensure the development of the true spirit of the Canadian confederation.

I could easily dwell upon this matter for hours, and with all my heart. However, this is not the time to deal with such a subject. I hope to have the opportunity to do so later.

(Text):

May I also express my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown). I am certain the hon. gentleman will do honour to his riding, where many of my family reside and where I was born. He will also do honour to his and my province. While I say these things very sincerely, I must also say with equal sincerity that I cannot give him any assurance of assistance in retaining his seat at the next election.

May I also join with other hon. members who have spoken and express my congratulations to the hon. member for Waterloo South, who so ably moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

I also congratulate the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) for having performed his duty so well.

Mr. Speaker, since I am making my maiden speech before this august assembly, I should have liked today to say a few words about the beautiful riding of St. Boniface, about the city of St. Boniface, which is the cradle of civilization in western Canada.

I should have liked to speak about that beautiful province so closely related to the past and to the history of my ancestors and of my family, history which is one of the glorious chapters of the history of our entire country.

Lack of time and the atmosphere prevailing in this parliament prevent me from doing so.

However, Mr. Speaker, I must call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mrs. Fairclough)—I am sorry the hon. lady is not in her seat—to a difficulty which exists within her department. A few years ago, the people of St. Boniface were given the assurance by the Post Office Department that their postal designation would not be changed. A few years later, I think it was in 1960, without any notice to anybody, that department publicly announced that in the future, St. Boniface could be designated as Winnipeg 6. As a result of the protests coming from that city, the then authorities agreed that St. Boniface could be designated as St. Boniface or St. Boniface 6. Since that time, because of the continued publicity given to the original regulation that there was an option between Winnipeg and St. Boniface, we have been constantly receiving letters addressed to Winnipeg 6.

That city of St. Boniface, which already has to fight unceasingly in order to keep its identity, takes exception to the fact that because of a blunder made by that department, people keep using the name of Winnipeg to designate St. Boniface.

I think that the new minister should secure information on that matter and that steps should be taken to put a stop to this unfortunate habit. She should take immediately the necessary measures to make sure that any communication, especially from the federal government, is addressed correctly and that instructions are sent to the local authorities in order to put an end right away to that situation. I will no doubt have the opportunity to take that matter up again later, if the house continues to sit.

We have seen, since the opening of this parliament, the most unbelievable tactics. We have seen the leader of the government and his ministers behave in such a way that the level of debate in this house has become that of a school for badly brought-up children. If the ministers, in spite of the position they hold in this house and in the country, have been able to see their duty in such a light that their present behaviour is the result, I can understand, Mr. Speaker, the hard task that is yours in maintaining order.

Mr. Ricard: It is your fault.

Mr. Teillet: After all, it is the ministers who set the tone of the debates and they have failed in this regard as in many other fields.

These past few days, the official opposition and its leader have made a sustained effort to check the massive propaganda put out by the Conservative party through a propaganda machine whose efficiency is perhaps unrivalled anywhere on this side of the iron curtain. Every trick is used: half truths, implications, slips of the tongue, serious accusations without any foundation, but especially a technique which was developed to a high degree during the 20 years which preceded world war II and which was perfected by the communists throughout the world. It consists in repeating false accusations loudly enough and often enough so that not only the public but even those who spread them come to believe them.

We have seen the government become so smug and conceited that they think themselves infallible. And if any one has the courage to criticize them and show them their mistakes, they cry out that they are attacked personally, because, after all, since they are infallible, any criticism becomes a personal attack. We heard the leader of that party and of the present government complain that he was attacked from all sides—

Mr. Ricard: It is true.

Mr. Teillet: —but when he is requested to show evidence in support of his statements, he keeps silent, absolutely silent.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Mr. Teillet: We are aware that the propaganda machine is preparing another offensive in order to have the chief of the government look like a martyr—

Mr. Ricard: Just drop in my office, and I will show you some.

Mr. Teillet: Just a minute, give me a chance to make my speech.

But, for that purpose, it needs some standing ground. Since those statements are baseless the leaders of the present government are supplying such a ground with their remarks here, in order to enable their propaganda machine to quote Hansard and make the voters believe that there is some truth in those statements.

Mr. Ricard: Just pay me a visit in my office, and I will show you some.

Mr. Teillet: There is also that other technique which consists in accusing the opponents of using the tactics one is preparing to use.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Teillet: We have seen such tactics used by the Conservative party, when they accused the Leader of the Opposition of making personal attacks on the head of the government, while knowing such charges were baseless and without any substantiation; they were in fact false statements, and they knew it. On the other hand, what were they doing themselves? The Prime Minister himself was attacking the Leader of the Opposition, charging him with the responsibility for the financial stress of our country and moreover accusing him also of sympathizing with the communists. An accusation of incredible baseness, when it is recalled that the present Leader of the Opposition, with his predecessor, were among the main architects of the sole organization that could finally stop the inroads of communism in Europe.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Mr. Teillet: I refer to NATO. Attempts were made to deny the Leader of the Opposition credit for this, because it would have proved the baselessness of too many statements made by the Conservatives. Therefore, attempts were made to destroy him by accusing him of sympathizing with the greatest threat against today's world. This manoeuvre at the disposal of their propaganda machine succeeded in deceiving many people. Finally in order to pit himself against the great talents of the Leader of the Opposition, the head of the government tried fraudulently to monopolize for himself the credit for the famous incident of the communist shoe in the united nations assembly. Falsehoods.

Here are further examples:

(Text):

You will have noted, Mr. Speaker, the method by which the Conservatives have avoided the problem of unemployment. Every time the question comes up they tell us that there are more people working in Canada today than ever before. That is correct; I do not deny it. That is their method of answering criticism of their policies to maintain full employment. I call this tactic the tactic of the half truth. By telling this half truth they hope people will believe, as many did during the last election, that there are no problems, that everything is well in the best of worlds because the fact of a Tory government being in power is enough to chase all these problems away.

Let us look at the declarations of these people in the field of agriculture. They have claimed that the farmers have never had it so good. They have claimed that their policies have vastly increased our exports of grain. They have claimed that "cash income from farm operations reached an all time high." That is a quotation from a speech of the Prime Minister in the house the other day, and it appears on page 98 of Hansard.

These same statements were made in all areas of Canada during the election campaign; half truths, all of them. In each case they have told only half the story. In each case when the full story is told the picture becomes altogether different. Each case is a good example of the work of that party's propaganda machine, and in each case such a good job has been done that I almost think the Minister of Agriculture himself believed he was telling the truth—almost, but not quite.

Let us look at the facts. It is important that these facts be known. This distorted picture has caused such an impression on the people of our urban areas both in western Canada and in eastern Canada that it may become difficult to obtain the assistance that western farmers need. The picture painted will make it look ridiculous when we come to claim needed and justifiable assistance for western farm communities. With such a rosy picture in the minds of the public generally, how will this government or the Liberal one to follow justify itself when expenditures are required to assist western farm communities?

There are still many things that need doing, and some of these things are referred to in the Liberal policy declaration which was laughed at the other day by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture when he took a document supposedly to be placed on record in Hansard and then proceeded to place on that record only a very small part, and that small part distorted. We may have more to say about that later on.

First let us look at the export record. Here, if the government and the minister concerned had told the whole truth, no one would have been able to criticize too severely. The record for the period of Tory government from 1957 to date is good. In fact it is almost as good as it was in the corresponding period of Liberal administration. That, for a Tory government, is quite an accomplishment. During the years from 1957 to 1962, total exports of grain and grain products amounted to 2,029,560,000 bushels, or an average of 405,900,000 bushels a year for that period of five years. In the corresponding period of five years, 1952-57, the total exports of grain and grain products were, 2,199,503,000 bushels, or an average of 439,900,000 bushels per year. In other words, the Tory record was only 169,932,000 bushels during the period under review, or 33,986,000 bushels average per year less than the previous corresponding Liberal period.

But in all fairness there may have been a good reason for this. Production dropped considerably during the latter half of the period which I am reviewing, and these figures are most interesting. During the previous five years farmers produced in wheat alone 2,760,212,000 bushels, while during the latter period wheat production was 1,922,061,000 bushels. In other words, if the production record had been maintained during the Tory period of this review, we would find an additional 837,151,000 bushels of wheat on hand at the end of the 1961-62 crop year. That, Mr. Speaker, is the complete picture; and incidentally, the figures I have quoted here are from the Canadian wheat board.

Now let us look at the claim "You have never had it so good", and "Farm cash income from farm operations reached an all time high". Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the other day I attempted to have the Prime Minister define what he meant by "cash income" and his attitude to me was "Sit down, little boy. You are new here. Talk when your elders will permit you". And he refused to answer the question. He said, as reported on page 98 of Hansard:

> All I can say is that I think it defines itself for most hon. members.

Well, Mr. Speaker, does it define itself for most hon. members? There is one here to whom it obviously does not. The term "cash income" as used by the wheat board and by the grain trade means "cash received from all farm operations", and is the equivalent of the term "gross income". The Prime Minister's statement is almost correct. The cash income from farm operations in 1961 has been exceeded only twice, and that was in the early fifties. But that is not the point I wish to make. The real point is that that figure of the highest cash income in 1961, according to the Prime Minister, points up the real difficulty of our western farmers. If we add the last half of this story to the first half stated, we then have the whole picture and the whole truth, which is this. During the year when the Prime Minister says that the cash farm income from farm operations was at an all time high, the net income for the farmer—that is, the amount left to him after deducting his costs—was the lowest in ten years. That is the complete story.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member the same privilege the Prime Minister gave me; if I have time later, perhaps.

At this point I want to appeal to all hon. members of this house to understand that this is the real plight of our farmers in Canada. The cost price squeeze is equalled in importance only by the need for markets when judging the problems of our farm community. I trust that when a government comes before this house to legislate for assistance for our farmers in our western country, hon. members will overlook the glowing reports given by the Minister of Agriculture and the Conservative party. I trust that hon. members will tell their constituents that our western people are not crying wolf while they are rich and have "never had it so good".

I wonder if the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who I do not see in his seat, has heard the story going the rounds in Manitoba about the statement by the Minister of Agriculture that the people in the constituency of Brandon-Souris, the constituency of the minister of northern affairs, were so rich that it was impossible to buy an automobile in Brandon, and that they were taken as quickly as they came in. Someone took the trouble to check that, and that story is in the same category as the rest of the Conservatives' statements. There are ample automobiles available in Brandon.

Mr. Speaker, there is on this question a most interesting editorial in the Manitoba Co-Operator of September 6 of this year, which I should like to quote at length. The heading of the editorial is "Mr. Hamilton's Prophesies", and the editorial describes the present crop situation as it appeared to the writer. It goes on to say this:

> It is true that farmers delivering wheat will benefit initially from the higher prices received at the time of delivery, but this only applies to wheat, and to suggest that farmers will have the opportunity to deliver grain to country elevators in large volume prior to Christmas would be foolish. This means that the grain farmers' income from the sale of cereals will be well distributed over the crop year and controlled by quota regulations. It is possible that there may not be room in country and terminal elevators for all of the anticipated deliverable grain in this crop year. This, however, will be determined by the volume of export business.
> The farm organizations, the management of their elevator facilities and the private companies are realistic on this issue and understand it thoroughly. They are not pumping propaganda to incite the layman. In their modesty they refrain completely from predicting big prices that may not be realized. They are well aware that this year's crop may well produce a great variety of grades, and when the final returns are in at the end of the crop year, No. 3 Northern is likely to be the average wheat grade and the average price. The initial price for this grade is $1.42 per bushel basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, but less than $1.25 per bushel at the average western Canada country elevator point after handling and elevation charges are deducted. Oats will probably average No. 1 Feed or 44 cents per bushel at the average shipping point. Barley will probably average No. 1 Feed and this will fetch a price of 72 cents per bushel at the time of delivery at the average shipping point. There is no responsible grain spokesman in the west, outside of the political field, suggesting that wheat this crop year will approximate $2.00 or oats 90 cents or barley $1.20 a bushel.
> Agriculture Minister Hamilton has been enthusiastic enough to do this. To reach the prices he suggests, No. 3 Northern will have to fetch at least another 75 cents a bushel over and above all charges. No. 1 Feed oats will have to realize at least another 46 cents, and No. 1 Feed barley another 48 cents per bushel average for western Canada. Mr. Hamilton is not only doing the west, and the grain farmers in particular, a disfavor by his inappropriate statements, but is giving eastern Canada and the western layman a greatly distorted impression of what is to come out of the west. True, the prospects are optimistic and thoroughly better than a year ago, but Mr. Hamilton's exuberance puts him in the category of being excessively adventurous in his prophesies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about crop insurance. The problem of crop insurance, as we see it now in Manitoba, is a relatively simple one. Enough research and experience has been acquired to reach certain conclusions or, to be more accurate, to confirm the conclusions reached when the scheme was first examined. No one today will deny the necessity of a sound crop insurance scheme. It has become a vital necessity if the farm community is to survive and avoid becoming wards of governments. I have not time to develop this, but I recommend an examination of the crop insurance scheme report in Manitoba, which in effect said that it was not practicable for a province to carry out an insurance scheme on its own.

Then, Mr. Speaker, a crop insurance scheme was set up under a federal act and some test areas, I believe five in number, were set up in Manitoba. So far, of course, less than 10 per cent of our farmers have participated. There seems to be some doubt about things in their minds, and that, of course, is understandable. When the act was put into effect, the basic requirements for the success of such a scheme were overlooked. Federal participation in premium cost was too low, and it left to the province the larger share of the risk.

I believe that the parliamentary assistant made a statement that confirmed this just a moment ago. This is the very area where the resources of the province are too weak to ensure success. In fact the present scheme, if established over the wide area required for full participation, would risk becoming an open end liability for the provinces which would cause them to become bankrupt.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a speech by the minister of agriculture for Manitoba, which he made to the agricultural bureau of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce and which is reported upon in the Winnipeg Tribune of December 13, 1961, as follows:

> Provincial agriculture minister George Hutton has ruled out any expansion in the Manitoba crop insurance program unless the federal government comes up with a better method of backing it.
> Tuesday he told the agricultural bureau of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce that crop insurance couldn't be expanded to cover the whole province with the present system of federal guarantees for losses in the scheme.
>
> Unless the federal government makes changes in its crop insurance act all the western provinces, not just Manitoba, could not provide sound crop insurance, the minister said.
> In Manitoba another bad crop year could bring losses as high as $30 million in the insurance scheme, because there could be a large number of applications following this year's drought. This would be a "tidy sum" to dump on the provincial treasury, said Mr. Hutton.
>
> Under the existing agreement with Ottawa, the province pays the first $200,000 in crop insurance liabilities after the premiums collected and the previous year's reserve have been paid out. Then the province can borrow 75 per cent of extra money needed to cover losses from Ottawa. The province floats its own loan for the remaining 25 per cent. "This in effect means that the province has to borrow all the money in the losses", Mr. Hutton said.
> The Manitoba government has proposed a new guarantee for the plan under which the federal government would pay for a large part of losses incurred in years when the crop insurance scheme goes in the red. The federal payment in bad years would be made in exchange for an annual premium paid to Ottawa in both good and bad years.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that these people have yet to understand fully the problem with regard to insurance in farm areas. This scheme is not only important in western Canada; it is needed in all parts of the country. The other evening the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) made quite a point of this, and I suggest to the members of the government that they take a serious look at the matter and make sure that they come up with an adequate scheme.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, during the debate of these last few days, we heard the leaders and members of the opposition in masterly speeches make crushing charges against the Conservative party which formed this government.

The replies we heard were only a repetition of the same old stories which are quite inconsistent and might make us believe that, like the old Bourbons, the Conservatives never forgot anything, though they also never learned anything. I can hardly believe that some hon. members opposite would not be disappointed with their leader's attitude.

After such a disappointment, after having built up the thesis that the Conservative party and its leaders are above criticism and also above the average human being, some among them must agree with me that those leaders only deserve to be sent back before the people to receive at last the final verdict.

(Text):

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to have the opportunity to participate in this traditional debate as the representative of the constituents of Cape Breton South. Canada today, Mr. Speaker, is going through perhaps the most crucial period in her history. We are faced with a variety of gigantic problems in this nation, brought about as a result of the rapid changes taking place domestically, internationally, politically, socially and culturally. Unfortunately the minority Conservative government that faces us in this house today is not adequate to face the challenge posed by these problems. This is a traditionally conservative group of men who refuse to accept the fact of change and to make the adjustments necessitated by change.

The other evening the Minister of Finance in a burst of optimism hinted to the members of the house that he and his colleagues were looking forward with some degree of enthusiasm to the next federal election. We would caution the government members against such displays of overconfidence, and remind them of their recent stand in the last election campaign when they told the people of Canada that they were prepared to stand on their record. Surely this was a statement that represented the height of presumption, for their record since 1957 has been one of indecision, incompetence and confusion. The government, Mr. Speaker, to put it mildly has given us the most fumbling, the most bumbling and the most grumbling ministry since the days of confederation. Though the government stood on its record, fortunately the people of Canada refused to stand for that record.

I am afraid we have to admit that on the basis of the speech from the throne there is no indication that the government is now prepared to change its attitude and its policies with respect to the important and pressing problems facing us.

They have indicated their intention, for example, to pursue a balanced budget. Surely in view of the domestic situation in this nation this is precisely the wrong policy to follow at this time. What does it mean? It means that we have to look to the private investment sector in this country for the expansionary movement that is necessary to increase the employment opportunities that are available. But I am afraid the private investment sector of the Canadian economy cannot save the day. It cannot provide the spark and the initiative that are needed to provide additional employment opportunities for our people and to provide them with the income to buy the products that the private sector of the economy is at present capable of producing. It is precisely as a result of the fact that the private sector of our economy is overexpanded, in so far as its capacity to produce is concerned, that we have to look to a new field for the necessary initiative to provide economic growth.

I suggest to the members of the house that there is only one other such field, and that is the field of public investment. If we are going to pursue a balanced budget this necessarily means, as the government have indicated, that they are going to cut back their expenditures and we are not going to get the push that we require in the public sector of the economy.

I should also like to contrast at this time what we might term the energetic attention on the part of the government to the economic implications for Canada of Britain's proposed entry into the common market, on the one hand, with their lack of concern for, and attention to, and energetic attack on the domestic problems of too slow a rate of economic growth and unemployment in this nation of Canada. I say that we should contrast the difference in their approach, because on the basis of the economic analysis provided by Drs. Ruben and Kaliski it is estimated that if Britain enters the common market, the cost to Canada in the form of higher tariffs on the products which we will be exporting to the members of the European economic community will run us somewhere in the vicinity of $225 million a year.

This is serious, Mr. Speaker, and certainly deserves our attention. It certainly deserves a different kind of attention than the government has been giving it. But, on the other hand, if we compare the average unemployment that we had in Canada during 1960 and 1961, namely 7 per cent, with the average unemployment rate from 1954 to 1957 of 4½ per cent, it is estimated that the cost to Canada, as a result of these domestic problems of lack of economic growth and unemployment, in the form of the loss in our gross national product runs somewhere between $2½ billion and $3 billion. Surely there is evidence in these statistics to suggest we could expect the same type of energetic concern on the part of this government with regard to the problems of unemployment.

I wish now, for a few moments, to turn to one aspect of the throne speech which particularly concerns the people of our area; that is the proposed Atlantic development board. This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that such a board has been proposed to our people. We have heard such rumours since the days of confederation, and more recently in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958 by the Conservative party. We not only were promised an Atlantic development board, but we were promised a national fuel policy. We were promised that nobody would suffer from unemployment. We were promised that Canada was going to be brought into a new era of prosperity in which the people of the Atlantic provinces would share for the first time.

No part of Canada, Mr. Speaker, has so consistently supported the old line parties as have the people of the Atlantic provinces, and look at our situation today. The Atlantic provinces of Canada constitute the most retarded, the most depressed region in this nation. I suggest to you that the governments of the past have either lacked the necessary courage or the know-how to adequately solve the problems that have faced us in that part of the country. Whether it was lack of courage or lack of know-how, in either case their failure is inexcusable.

The problems facing the Atlantic provinces are not something that developed overnight. This is not the first occasion upon which we have felt it necessary to speak up about our problems. The politicians and statesmen we had in the province of Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces in 1867 expressed their concern at this union with Upper Canada. If I may be so bold I should like to quote a statement which appeared in the morning Chronicle in our province on December 18, 1865. I think this very neatly sums up our economic situation at that point in our history:

> Our province is prosperous beyond example... We are in the full tide of prosperity under the lowest tariff in America.

Consider for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, if you will the problems that face the people of my own constituency of Cape Breton South. We have been plagued now for years with a declining coal industry. Granted, we have closed dozens of mines, but when this government came to power they told us they were going to do something about the problems facing our coal industry. We had a royal commission under Mr. Justice Ivan Rand appointed to investigate the situation. Not only have this government failed to come up with a long term policy to deal with the problems of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, but they have even refused to accept the minimum recommendations of this particular commissioner. He suggested, for example, to the people of Canada that it might be necessary to close three mines in Cape Breton over a five year period and a fourth mine over an additional five year period, for a total of four mine closures in ten years.

What has been the result? With the most recent closure of No. 16 colliery at New Waterford under this Conservative government that promised us a national fuel policy, we have closed three mines in a little over one year. We are threatened with an end of the steel industry on which we depend to a great extent in the province of Nova Scotia. Last winter our people experienced unemployment at the rate of 25 per cent. We will be the first to admit that we have received assistance from this and other federal governments, but the assistance has always been of a temporary, of a stopgap, of an emergency, of a meet each crisis as it comes along, nature. There has been no progress under this Conservative government since 1957 toward a permanent solution of the economic problems of the coal industry in Nova Scotia or the Atlantic provinces in general.

The Minister of Finance, at the time of the closing of No. 16 colliery in New Waterford, in a press release stated that in the opinion of the government it was in the best interests of the Nova Scotia coal industry to close No. 16 colliery. Well, Mr. Speaker, surely this is a fantastic statement. We ask simply, how can a responsible minister of the crown tell us what is in our best interest when he does not have any kind of policy to deal with this particular problem?

It is regrettable, but I think it is also necessary, that we remind members of this house that the right hon. Prime Minister came to our constituency during the last election campaign and he told responsible representatives of the miners, the district executive of the united mine workers of America, that he was not going to turn his back on the miners. The mine eventually closed, and the Prime Minister not only turned his back on the miners but he refused to meet them to discuss the repercussions of this closure. Under no circumstances, should No. 16 colliery have been allowed to close until a definite policy had been established for the coal industry in Nova Scotia and for the Atlantic provinces' economy in general. There has been evidence, and it is unfortunate, of a disturbing lack of planning and decision making, as well as a complete lack of the application of any kind of social philosophy in the present federal government's handling of this situation.

A few moments ago I said that our region was the most retarded in Canada. Thirteen of the 36 surplus manpower areas in Canada are to be found in the Atlantic provinces. We have 10.4 per cent of the population of Canada but only 7.2 per cent of her income. Our average per capita personal income for 1961 was $1,066 as opposed to $1,593 for all Canada. We have experienced consistently higher unemployment than has Canada as a whole. The present situation is further aggravated, though somewhat disguised, as a result of the considerable underemployment in our primary industries. In other words, if I might sum up the situation in the Atlantic provinces, the only prosperity that we have had in that region of Canada since confederation was witnessed during the railroad construction boom prior to the first world war and during both world wars. Certainly these are events to which we cannot look forward in the future with a great deal of anticipation.

(Translation):

May I now say a few words in French, Mr. Speaker, for there are quite a number of French speaking citizens not only in my riding, but throughout the maritime provinces. Moreover, the claims of eastern Canadians are rather similar to those of the people in Quebec. We too find that our confederation is still far from perfect.

In the past, the Atlantic provinces received temporary federal aid. It was a stopgap policy, a policy of emergency measures. What we want today is planned economic rehabilitation.

In order to succeed, such a program should be quite exceptional and more far reaching than ever before.

There is no other way of solving the basic economic problems which the Atlantic provinces have been facing for quite a few generations.

I trust that the Canadian people would be ready to support, morally as well as financially, any development program for the economy of the Atlantic provinces, because they would understand that this is the only way of solving a problem as old as confederation.

I want to stress that the time has come to develop and fully use the valuable human and natural resources of our eastern provinces. Such a program is of national as well as of local interest.

(Text):

In such an environment as this comprehensive program of economic development would bring about, existing industries could be induced to expand and new industries would be attracted into our area. On the basis of the many research projects carried out in relation to the economy of the Atlantic provinces it is generally agreed that resource development, although a basis for future economic development of that economy, will not really be able to relieve the twin problems of unemployment and underemployment. Therefore consideration needs to be given to that combination of capital, transportation and taxation incentive required to bring about new secondary industrial growth in the Atlantic provinces.

We do not need an Atlantic provinces development board to make suggestions as to what should be done. We have the research behind us. We have had enough study; now we want action. There are all kinds of proposals and suggestions backed up by research.

1. First we suggest that the basic development of our iron, coal and steel industries should be protected. In this regard the federal government should co-operate with the province of Nova Scotia in providing a crash program of retraining, and other special educational programs, for displaced miners and unemployed people. It should also consider the extension of unemployment insurance benefits, or the payment of some realistic allowances, to enable our unemployed people to take advantage of these courses and at the same time look after the commitments they have to their dependents. We suggest that the existing markets for our coal in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Ontario must continue to be protected from imported oil and American coal.

2. In co-operation with the provincial and municipal governments we suggest that a major program of capital construction be undertaken, including such socially desirable and useful projects as schools, hospitals, mental institutions, senior citizens' housing and so on, and that it be undertaken immediately in order at least to bring the level of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces down to the national level.

3. In the long view we look for a single and particular department in the federal government whose sole responsibility, so long as the need exists, will be to look after and direct action in regard to the economic problems facing us in the Atlantic provinces. We suggest that such a department could speed up more comprehensive research into the future of our coal industry, and also could consider the development of a national fuel policy.

4. We require special income tax concessions and special depreciation allowances from the federal government for industries presently operating and new industries desiring to locate in our area, which industries necessarily depend on the central, major Canadian markets for the sale of their products.

5. We require a major revision of the national freight rate structure to end the present pattern and reduce the wide differences now prevailing between charges for the movement of high value, processed and semi-processed commodities, and the charges for low value primary products.

6. We require low rate capital loans for the expansion of industries now operating in the Atlantic provinces and for the establishment of new industries desiring to locate in those provinces.

7. We ask for a greater regional allocation of defence and public works contracts for publicly financed undertakings.

8. We ask for increased attention to be paid by the federal government in future tariff negotiations with regard to the problems of the retarded regions of Canada.

9. We ask for the establishment of a social fund and an investment bank to help industries and areas adjust to the changes that will necessarily follow from what I hope will be our more liberal trade policies.

These are not radical or new suggestions. They are already in practice in the nations forming the European economic community and have recently been adopted by the President of the United States in his new tariff legislation.

10. We ask for an expanded and intensive program of technical and trades retraining for our adult workers, with a view to developing a more highly skilled labour force in the Atlantic provinces.

11. We ask for more flexible monetary and fiscal policies on the part of the central government.

12. We ask the co-operation of those responsible for the development of new manufacturing centres, and the co-operation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the provision of living accommodation in areas specified for development.

13. We ask for a return to the system of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements that had been established for the greater rationalization and equalization of the Canadian fiscal system, based as it was on the average per capita yield in the two richest provinces.

14. Finally we ask that university grants be based on need rather than on population figures, as they are presently allocated.

There are those who would question these particular suggestions. There are those who would say, "Don't you understand these are uneconomic proposals you are making?" In reply, Mr. Speaker, I would say that it is not a question of immutable, irrefutable economic principles. We defied the laws of economics when we built this nation, when we decided to enter into confederation, and surely there is sufficient argument for overlooking some economic principles in view of the particular difficulties of this part of Canada.

There are those who will argue that this policy we advocate is far too protective, but in reply we can point to the protection we are already giving to major industries in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. For example, we can ask hon. members to consider what would be the attitude of the United States government if it were faced with a declining industry, such as our coal industry, when 98 per cent of the market for bituminous coal in the province of Ontario is supplied by the United States.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, prior to the noon recess I was dealing with the various arguments or charges that might be laid against or put forward in opposition to the comprehensive and specific measures which I had introduced to the house and in which we believe, in the Atlantic provinces, in so far as the economic problems of this region of Canada are concerned. Specifically I was dealing with the second such possible objection, namely that the policies which we propose are perhaps too protective in this day and age.

In addition to what I have already said with regard to this particular criticism, I would simply like to point out that it is essential, in relation to the coal industry of Nova Scotia, that this government or any other federal government provide our coal industry with sufficient financial assistance to make coal competitive with foreign oil in the province of Nova Scotia, to assure that coal will be used as the basic fuel in generating thermal power in that province. If this is not done, then surely we cannot expect the Ontario market to use coal from Nova Scotia, if we are not successful in ensuring that our own local industries do the same.

Third, Mr. Speaker, it might be suggested that these proposals would all be very well and would probably help our situation substantially, but they cost too much money. We say, first of all, that in measuring the cost of the proposals that are necessary in order to deal firmly and finally with the economic rehabilitation of the Atlantic provinces, we must consider the eventual and ultimate social costs involved in the Atlantic provinces if action is not taken today.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we would point to the fact that Canada has already, spent huge sums of money to build her canals and transcontinental railway system, to provide wheat storage for the western farmers, acreage payments, and so on. We would further point out that the tariff system presently operating in Canada, protecting and insuring the life of our central Canadian industries, costs the Canadian taxpayer indirectly, it is estimated, something in the vicinity of $1 billion a year. These same tariff policies have a doubly depressing effect on the producers and consumers in the Atlantic provinces, because they mean our people must buy their products from the high cost, non-competitive industries of central Ontario while these same protected industries are enabled to turn around and buy their raw materials across the border because they can obtain them there more cheaply. This represents double protection for a large part of our Canadian industry.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, it might be suggested that we are perhaps somewhat naïve down in the eastern part of Canada. It might be said, for example, "Well, after all, you decided in 1867 to participate in confederation, and this is the economic price you have to pay for it". We say, no. We say that the fathers of confederation recognized the economic implications for that part of Canada when confederation took place, and they wisely and justly attempted to provide for the dislocations that were bound to take place as a result of the national development policies adopted in this House of Commons.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are those who would say, "well, your program sounds very good; we would like to help you, but this represents state planning". In other words we come back to the old bogeyman that the Tories raised in the last campaign; it is a question of free enterprise versus socialism. This is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. These are the word fighters; these are the labellers who try to criticize and discredit a new idea by labelling it with a name that is unacceptable to the Canadian people. It is not a question of free enterprise versus socialism. It is a question of the old way versus the new way. It is a question of the principles which at one time apparently were successful in Canada, to some extent, as opposed to the new procedures and methods that we must adopt for the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. H. E. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, upon rising to take part in this debate it is with genuine pleasure that I give you, and through you to Mr. Speaker, my best wishes. It is indeed a pleasure to see two old friends filling such high offices so capably. At this time I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo South and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska on the capable way in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Last Friday night in that sometimes dramatic C.B.C. television show "Viewpoint" the star of the night said that too many of the speeches in the debates on the speech from the throne were nothing but dreary recitations of the virtues of some backwoods constituency. I think it is well that those who spend a great deal of their time in Ottawa—perhaps too much of their time—should hear from time to time of the virtues, the problems and the wishes of these constituencies. I say this because the strength of Canada is nothing more than the aggregate of the strength of those 265 constituencies. A visit to my riding last week end supported and confirmed the wisdom of the course the official opposition are taking to make sure they do not win any of those non-confidence votes they have been bringing with such regularity.

To preface my remarks in this debate, and in order only to demonstrate the interests of my constituents, I should like to discuss briefly the economy of my riding of Simcoe North. I think every hon. member who sat in the last parliament is well aware that Collingwood is the largest and most important shipbuilding centre on the great lakes. The policies of the Conservative government in the last five years have brought Collingwood to the highest level of activity in its history even higher than during wartime, because shipbuilding is an industry highly productive of jobs. There are few things which the Canadian government could have done to provide more jobs for Canadians than to introduce the system of subsidies for shipyards, and in case anyone should think that only the larger centres have benefited from this policy, let me tell them that is not so. Shipyards large and small across Canada have benefited from our shipbuilding policies.

Along with the shipbuilders and sailors of my riding I look forward to the realization of the promise in the speech from the throne of added protection for Canadian shipping on the great lakes. If we permit foreign ships to carry our cargoes it constitutes just as large a drain on our foreign exchange fund as, for example, the purchase of imported electrical appliances.

I am sorry the hon. member for Davenport is not here in his place, because harsh things have been said by him and to him during this debate. I should like to thank him for the assistance he gave me during my election campaign, when he made something of an issue of the fact that the devaluation policies of the Conservative government were causing an increase in the price of imported electrical appliances. Now in the city of Barrie, in my riding, there is to be found the largest manufacturer of small household appliances in Canada. There are many other factories there making a wide range of household and consumer goods from tires and plastics to tape measures and cosmetics. I can assure this house that the message of the hon. member for Davenport was not lost on those people when election day came around.

It is interesting to see, now, that the hon. member has finally and firmly come down on the side of the angels, and on the side of the Conservatives; because in the last issue of that journal of Liberal opinion the Fundy Fisherman he says that devaluation is a good and necessary thing. I should also like to note that though the majority of our factories are Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies, almost without exception the local management is completely Canadian in viewpoint and directed to the best interests of Canada.

The farmlands of Simcoe county are rich and productive. Indeed, they too might be said to be secondary manufacturers, because much of their products find their way directly to the consumer. Pork is processed through Canada's first and largest farmer owned packing plant, with its famous Copaco brand products; finished beef is sent to the Toronto stockyards; tobacco is sold in reasonable quantities on the home market; milk goes to Toronto consumers and cream to the many county creameries; fruit and vegetables go directly to the consumer or else to Collingwood to be packed for domestic or export use.

At this point I should like also to extend my thanks to the Leader of the Opposition for the help he gave me in my election campaign. The hon. gentleman appeared on a Toronto television station cradling a Georgia watermelon and deploring in solicitous terms the fact that as a result of devaluation the price of Georgia watermelons had increased. This brought vividly home to the growers of the famous Georgian bay apples the benefits of the Conservative devaluation policy to the sale of their product.

Many people in my riding earn their livelihood in service businesses as railroaders, truckers, civil servants working in Camp Borden, caterers to the various branches of the tourist industry and so on. In short, they are engaged in all the multitude of services which make up our complex and prosperous society. The number of unemployed is low and is confined mostly to the unskilled, the unadaptable and, at certain times, to some categories of workers in the construction trades. In the factories generally there is a shortage of skilled operators, and in some factories production is being hampered as a result. The government is to be commended on its technical school building program, and I am sure that proper use is made of the schools, two of which are now under construction at Collingwood and Barrie. In Simcoe North, the graduates of those schools will contribute greatly to the productivity of Canadian industry.

I do not propose at this time to deal with service businesses, because their prosperity and level of activity depend entirely on the prosperity of the productive parts of our economy, our farms, factories and shipyards. However, I should like to point out in passing that a gratifying number of small businesses have been able to take advantage of the small business loans made available through Conservative legislation a year or two ago. Conservative policies have been good for the economy of Simcoe North. The farm credit corporation, as far as our farmers are concerned, represents the finest piece of credit legislation ever passed in Canada. In the course of the past year, or a little longer, over 100 farmers have taken advantage of these loans in our area. Their farms are now efficient and competitive. They are making money. Farm credit corporation loans are keeping farmers' sons on the farms, and for the first time in many years are even bringing some back from the cities. Conservative tariff policies protect our fruit and vegetable growers. No longer are producers in Simcoe county at the mercy of United States dumping as was the case so often, particularly with cherries, asparagus and potatoes.

Conservative policies have contributed to the stability of beef and hog markets. Conservative policies have assisted in the orderly marketing of tobacco. Indeed, I wonder if the tobacco farmers in other parts of Ontario realize that the true worth of the guarantees made available to them at the end of the 1961-62 tobacco market was far in excess of the actual value of the guarantee. I am sure it is unnecessary to remind the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh), who this morning was asking a question about export sales of tobacco, that Canada's tobacco farming industry, an industry highly productive of jobs and requiring many man hours of labour, developed under the protection of a substantial tariff. It is an industry whose export future might well be adversely affected by Britain's entry into the common market, or by the United States trade bill.

Sometimes one hears criticism of the government consumer subsidy on butter. I would just make this observation. Many of our smaller farms are still very marginal operations. It would not take too much to drive these farmers from their land, and very often at an age when they are not adaptable to an industrial society. Surely the butter subsidy, when looked at in this light, is not such an ogre as it is sometimes made to appear.

But the greatest boon to Canadian agriculture and to factory productivity has been the reduction in the external value of the Canadian dollar to 92½ cents U.S. Its value to the farmers, factories and factory workers cannot be exaggerated. Beef and pork are finding new markets and are more competitive in the U.S. Our fruit and vegetables are given additional protection in Canada, and our canned fruits and vegetables are finding foreign markets. Cherry pie filling, for example, grown and canned in my riding is now being sold in Germany. For those who worry about the infinitely small increase in the price of imported grapefruit, I suggest that they try Georgian bay apple juice. If the beef you buy costs you just a little more, then think of the jobs and spending power which is being provided for Canadians by the increased exports of beef and pork.

Conservative government policies have been good for the factories and the factory workers in Simcoe county. Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver South quoted some export statistics, and the hon. member who has just finished speaking had some statistics concerning the cost of protection to Canada and the Canadian consumer. I do not think it is correct to use statistics in this way, because exports and imports must be considered not only in their dollar value, but must be considered in relation to the production of jobs for Canadians. Because I think that is the aim of all policies; it is not the ultimate dollar sales value or the dollars that we import, but the jobs we provide. Also, I feel that the primary and extractive industries no longer provide the best or the most jobs. These are found, in my opinion, in the secondary and service industries; and of course, as I said before, the service industries depend entirely on the productive industries.

A recitation of the policies applied by our government through the industrial development bank would exhaust my time. Factories employing from two to 200 in my riding have benefited. The aggressive sales policies of the Minister of Trade and Commerce have been used to the fullest. Our factories take every opportunity given to them to explore and get into foreign markets. Indeed, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport have the stature of heroes in Simcoe county. Devaluation has provided incentive, protection and job opportunities for the workers. I am sure the hon. member for Davenport, who is so interested in imported electrical appliances, could find all his needs satisfied from the catalogues of Barrie's appliance industries.

Mr. Speaker, the competitive need to find Canadian material resulting from devaluation has been a challenge that our factories are meeting with zest and initiative. New machines are being installed as fast as people can be found to operate them. I will just mention one example. Hardwood flour is a product which I understand is very little else than hardwood sawdust ground very fine and very dry. It is used extensively in the manufacture of certain plastic products, and until now it has been imported into Ontario from Buffalo. Very shortly it will be manufactured and sold in Barrie.

The factories and factory workers in Simcoe county look forward to the tax incentives now proposed for increased production and export, and they will use these incentives to the fullest to increase production and to provide more jobs. They look forward to the change in our export credit legislation as an essential aid to the products which Canada must export if it is to continue to grow.

In the modern world changes in political, economic and trade alignments are inevitable and continuous. In Simcoe North we have watched the evolution of the European free trade area, called the European common market. Britain's application to join it and its possible effect upon the commonwealth, upon Canada, and upon Simcoe county we have watched with interest. It may be that the European free trade area is best for Europe, and it may be that it is best for Britain. I think that is for the Europeans and the British to decide. I do not think, though, that it is being parochial or narrow to say that our consideration should be directed to what is good for Canada; because it is only by being prosperous that Canada can make an effective contribution to the free world and to the vast underdeveloped and under privileged areas of the world. If the European common market develops on its present lines—and I think at this time it would be only wishful thinking to suggest that its world outlook will be toward freer world trade—Canada, a country of 18 million people, will lie between two great western trading blocs, the United States with 180 million or more and western Europe with 175 million. It is now that we must speak out and bargain for our essential needs.

Much of Canada's secondary industry was established by the United States to avoid the tariff differential between the British preferential tariff and the most favoured nation tariff, the most favoured nation tariff generally being higher than the British preferential. Many of the Canadian branches of United States factories have been built in Canada to fill, in addition to Canada's domestic requirements, the import needs of Britain, the commonwealth and other countries. It would now appear that the British preferential tariff must disappear if Britain is to enter the E.C.M. United States manufactures would then enter Canada at the same duty rates as British.

Canada's labour costs have gradually grown closer and closer to those of the United States. We in Canada have a high level of social security which is translated into high taxes and directly into production costs. The smaller Canadian market makes other costs higher. Many United States plants near our borders, with subsidiaries presently in Canada, could satisfy the entire Canadian market for some products with only a few extra shifts in their home factories. If the British preferential tariff disappears, is the devaluation of the dollar by itself going to be enough to keep our secondary industry healthy? What incentives will be left for such Canadian development? Are these companies now going to build their factories in Europe and elsewhere? Must we not now look more and more to other parts of the world for markets for the products of our factories? Will the European common market leave us as hewers of wood and diggers of ore? These are some of my reservations concerning these new trade developments. I think they are important, because it is only in the secondary and the service industries that we can supply the needs of our new job seekers and maintain our high material standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, there is much else in the speech from the throne that commends itself to me and to my constituents, but I have limited myself today to those matters of most immediate interest to Simcoe county.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate in reply to the speech from the throne in the first session of the twenty fifth parliament and begin to apply myself to the discharge of my duties, I should like to express my congratulations to you for having been chosen by the members of this house to be their Speaker. I should also like to congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker for the confidence that this house has shown in his ability to assist Mr. Speaker. I should like in addition to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I am aware that on this occasion it is the custom for members to reveal some of the interesting features of their constituencies and the needs of their constituents. In the case of my constituency, Parkdale, which is in the western sector of Toronto, I believe these are well known to the older members of the house through the efforts of the illustrious members for that constituency who have preceded me.

To the new members I should like to say that Parkdale is a fair cross section of Canada. In addition to the Anglo Saxons, virtually all nationalities and colours are represented. In the same way as many of our forefathers, some emigrated to this country seeking a better life; some sought adventure, and some came to this country to enjoy our freedom. Having come to this country in large numbers, for the most part under the wise immigration policies of past Liberal administrations, these people have found freedom and a better life. Today they cling very closely to this freedom and better life, and burn with an abiding desire to assist the enslaved peoples in their homelands during their present adversity. It is this devotion to self government and to freedom, exemplified by so many people in my constituency, which in my opinion is the foundation upon which our future hopes for a greater Canada can be built.

Since it is the duty of members of the loyal opposition to oppose, I cannot see how one can have effective opposition without constructive criticism. Yet we have read in the press and heard from many members of the government that political criticism is an ugly word. In that regard I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who recently made the appalling statement that it is unpatriotic to criticize the government. Before we realize it, Mr. Speaker, political criticism may unfortunately be regarded as an un-Canadian activity instead of democracy's greatest safeguard. Nowhere in the world more ardently than in communist Russia and her subjugated countries is the critic considered unpatriotic, a conspirator and one even deserving of death, but in western civilization the traditional attitude is that criticism is an attempt to test whether what is might not be better. Personally I believe that no reform can be achieved and no survival is possible without the freedom of honest and vigorous criticism.

No manipulation of words, Mr. Speaker, no twisted ideas or faulty memories on the part of hon. members opposite can alter the historic fact that when the present Conservative government took office in June, 1957 it did so as the government of a country whose prosperity was never higher, whose prospects were never brighter and whose prestige among the nations of the world was never so great. In the past five years increased taxes, economic stagnation, high levels of unemployment and loss of international prestige have plagued this country. No one with a sense of fairness, therefore, can honestly argue that the present government through its incompetence and ill-timed policies is not responsible for the chaotic condition of the affairs of this country. In view of the present serious and emergency conditions in Canada, it is the right and the duty of all members of the house effectively to criticize the present government so that alternative and remedial measures will be proposed, the remedial measures so eloquently and wisely proposed by the Leader of the Opposition in this house.

I regret to say that the speech from the throne was a complete disappointment to the people of this country. This has been stated many times by the majority of the speakers who have preceded me. As already described, it is filled with many pious platitudes and is not much more than a rehash of things mentioned in previous speeches from the throne. This government had five years and the largest majority in the history of the House of Commons to bring those measures into being, but still the government continues to fail to put forth clear reasons for the cause of the present economic difficulties, and to reveal definite major policies which are aimed to cure this sick economy.

The seriousness of the situation was cleverly played down in the speech from the throne. Burning matters concerning which the government still owes our country an immediate and detailed explanation are absent from the speech from the throne. To solve the problems of chronic unemployment, slow economic growth and the imbalance of international payments the government has nothing substantial to offer.

In my leader's masterful exposition of the failures of the Conservative government the country has learned about the present administration's damaging mismanagement. This house and the country had the right to hear the Leader of the Opposition condemn the deliberate concealment by the government of the perilous financial state in which Canada found itself last spring. Moreover, all responsible members in the opposition appreciated learning in our leader's clear reply the full facts proving the unfair political manoeuvre committed by the Prime Minister and the former minister of finance last June. In his speech the Leader of the Opposition rebuked the thirteenth Prime Minister of Canada, and rightfully so, for contempt of parliament because it was not allowed to convene after the government failed to get a clear mandate from the people. Still worse, the people of Canada and their elected representatives continued to be shamefully ignored when the Prime Minister dared to attend the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London, and to present his views and ignore ours. The Prime Minister's disgraceful exhibition of bellyaching in London demonstrated his ignorance of the importance of the European common market.

After all the gloom and doom and crying by the Prime Minister at the commonwealth conference, it was refreshing to hear Mr. J. A. Roberts, deputy minister of trade and commerce, tell the members of a Canadian organization in Vancouver last month that Britain's entry into the common market will be far from a disaster for Canada. He predicted that it would provide potential markets for Canadian goods. What a sharp contrast, Mr. Speaker, to the remarks of the spokesmen of this government who have failed to understand the long term implications for this country of the new overseas trade developments. The other major issue—

Mr. Sevigny: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I will allow the minister to ask me a question after I have finished my speech. The other major issue which we must deal with in this debate is the government's austerity program brought in without the consent of parliament. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we are dismayed to learn from the speech from the throne that apparently these emergency austerity measures will continue to exist. We in the Liberal party condemn these austere policies and consider them to be a danger to Canadian growth.

The tariff surcharges are hampering trade and throwing men out of work. The cuts in many national public works are reducing construction jobs and throwing more people out of work. No wonder the unemployment figure this summer of 300,000 jobless Canadians is double that of June of 1957. The unemployment insurance fund, which in June, 1957 stood at $853 million, had fallen to $28 million last June. This is more evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the misery and suffering that the people of Canada must endure as a result of the mismanagement of the Conservative government.

Furthermore, the high interest rates allowed by this government brought in tight money. Tight money slows the expansion of Canadian industries and makes it very difficult for provincial and municipal governments to pay for projects of social improvement, throwing still more people out of work and increasing local taxes. The taxpayers of Parkdale, indeed across the country, burdened with continuously increasing taxes, including provincial sales taxes, are very hard pressed. The costs of education, the support of the indigent, caring for the sick, the clearing of slums, the building of roads and railway overpasses, I believe should be the sole responsibility of the federal government.

The home owner, in my opinion, has to carry the great load of the unjust burden of the present overtaxation. Repeatedly since early 1957 the Prime Minister of this country has stated that the Canadian people were overtaxed by $500 million, and promised to reduce taxes by $120 per family. In fact, Mr. Speaker, taxes have been increased by at least $36 per family since the Conservative government took office.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member identify the quotation he gave? What newspaper was it in, or where?

Mr. Haidasz: In the impending tax reforms in this country I believe primary consideration should be given to easing the tax burden of the common working man.

I should also like to make a few remarks about the small businessmen, who are the backbone of our national business. Many small businessmen are hard pressed and headed for bankruptcy as a result of unfair competition from giant corporations, tight money and high taxes. It is disquieting to learn that the number of commercial failures in Canada from June, 1957 to June, 1962, reached the enormous figure of 11,712. Furthermore, according to dominion bureau of statistics reports, for the first six months of this year there were 1,562 commercial failures, which is 7.8 per cent more than during the same period last year. This is another reason small businessmen urgently need in Canada not only tax relief but also more liberal consideration from the industrial development bank.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government's devaluation of the dollar has caused much hardship to the people of Canada, not only in rural but also in urban areas. The devalued dollar resulted in a higher cost of imports and, therefore, higher domestic prices. The savings of thrifty Canadians already lost will probably never be recovered. In June, 1957 the cost of living index was 121.6, which the Conservatives complained was high and which they promised to keep from rising. However, the cost of living index kept on rising and in August, 1962 reached the high figure of 131.4.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It is down.

Mr. Haidasz: It is up ten points since June, 1957. Most disturbing is the fact that the greatest rise is in the essential category of food. This brings more hardship for all Canadians, especially to the jobless, to the people with low incomes and to the people who are subsisting on meagre pensions.

There are a few more burning issues which I should like to bring to the attention of the government during this debate. Last summer this government announced the deferment of pay increases for 50,000 civil servants, explaining that an increase in wages would be inconsistent with the government's austerity program. By this explanation the Conservative government unloaded some of its problems on the backs of a relatively small group of civil servants unable to fight back strongly. Our country, one of the richest lands on earth, should be able, with a competent government, to easily afford to pay its civil servants decent salaries.

Other categories of citizens who have been neglected by this government are those thrown out of jobs through automation, the sick, and our senior citizens. We on this side of the house welcome the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition to provide an improved retraining program for workers before, not after, losing their jobs. We are proud also that the Liberal party recognizes the urgency of extending family allowances from age 16 to age 21 for all boys and girls attending school.

We welcome too the other points in the Liberal program of social reform which, though it will cost money, will actually be an investment in this country. As explained by the Leader of the Opposition, under conditions of an expanding economy a Liberal government will provide for health care and adequate pensions, which are repeatedly being refused by the present government. In my varied experience as a practitioner of medicine amongst the working people and senior citizens of Toronto, I learned intimately of their needs. I am deeply concerned with the present inadequate health care and social welfare programs.

In order to refresh the memories of hon. members opposite I should like to state that every piece of social legislation on the statute books of Canada today was enacted by a Liberal government. After the economic depression of the 1930's and the crippling war expenditures of the early 1940's, the Liberal government was financially able to embark on a sound, progressive program of health legislation. Beginning in 1948 the national health program provided for hospital construction, medical technicians and public health research, as well as anti-tuberculosis drugs free of charge to patients in sanatoria, and many other items related to general health.

The second phase of the Liberal health plan, from 1955 to 1956, made available to the people of Canada more hospital additions, medical rehabilitation services, radiological services and free Salk vaccine. In April, 1957 the Liberal minister of health and welfare, now the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), steered through parliament the National Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. This government is to be condemned for failing to implement all the sections of that act, especially the one relating to the cost of diagnostic tests performed on an out-patient basis, the most costly part of health care today. The blame rests mainly on the present minister of health for failing, in his negotiations with the provinces, to insist that the people of Canada receive the benefit of free diagnostic tests when referred to a hospital laboratory by their doctor.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that my party has always been, and still is, in the forefront in dealing with matters of health care. The Liberal health plan for the future will include progressive coverage of doctors' fees, dental care, nursing services, drug bills and sickness insurance, after full consultation with the provinces and with cooperation from the medical profession. This plan is more comprehensive and more realistic than the plan of any other party in this country.

While speaking on matters of health, Mr. Speaker, I must express my disappointment that the government has failed to explain why it discontinued the free mass immunization program against poliomyelitis with existing safe vaccines. Furthermore, we on this side of the house are still waiting for the government's explanation of the delay of three months in taking the drug thalidomide off the market. We sincerely hope that the government will take early action to improve its control not only over drugs but also over food additives and pesticides, for the greater protection of the Canadian people.

Advanced countries like Canada are facing a great challenge in the field of water and air pollution. Disease causing viruses and chemicals are finding their way into the water supplies of our cities. Many new chemical compounds, including pesticides and detergents, used by industry, farmers and housewives contain inert chemicals which cannot be destroyed by germs in the soil or by present sewage disposal techniques, but chemical engineers tell us it is possible to make a detergent that can be broken down by bacterial action. I would like to bring to the attention of the government the fact that west Germany has already passed a law compelling all manufacturers to abandon the use of hard detergents by 1965.

We also need more government assistance to aid municipalities in improving the purity of water; because disease causing viruses, including that of hepatitis, can pass through in water in present sewage treatment plants. These problems are both medical and political, and should be acted upon without delay by a responsible federal government.

In view of the remarks of the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, and of the remarks I have added, I believe it is clear that in the speech from the throne the real and urgent needs of the Canadian people have been forgotten and the true condition of Canada's economy has not been revealed. Therefore the Conservative administration stands condemned.

Mr. Sevigny: May I ask the hon. member who has just resumed his seat to answer the following questions. Is he not aware that the gross national product is higher than it has ever been in the history of the country? Is he not aware that more people are employed today than ever before in the history of the nation?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sevigny: Is he not aware—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Badanai: This is a speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I put it to the minister that any questions which may be put to an hon. member who has the floor, or to one who has finished his speech, should be entirely for the purpose of seeking information and not engaging in a debate in a disguised form. I would also like to add it is the hon. member's privilege to answer or not.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, with great respect for what you have just said, may I point out that while you were not occupying the chair I got up and asked the hon. member, when he was telling the house something which I believed to be rather inaccurate—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Habel: You spoke in the debate already.

Mr. Sevigny: May I speak to the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am not disputing the minister's right to ask a question, but what I am referring to is the nature of the question which he was putting.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I think it was made very clear in my speech, and in the speeches of hon. members who preceded me, that even though the gross national product has gone up it has not gone up at the same rate as it did when the Liberal government was in office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In real terms.

Mr. Harkness: It went up at a faster rate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, it did not, in real terms.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that the question was in an argumentative form, that it has not brought forward information, and is now merely continuing a debate after the hon. member had resumed his seat, I think we shall leave it at that.

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to join with the other hon. members who have participated in this debate in extending traditional words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to His Excellency's speech, the hon. member for Waterloo South and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. I would also like to join the hon. members who have preceded me in expressing to you, sir, our great pleasure at your elevation and appointment to the highest office of parliament, and to wish you well in the discharge of your very onerous responsibilities as Speaker of this house.

I would be remiss if I did not refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), who has just taken his seat after making his maiden speech. All I want to say is that he must have leaned quite heavily upon that fund of questionable knowledge of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), for some of his facts. His speech contained erroneous statements and inaccuracies, but I am sure they were not deliberate.

He referred to the implementation of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act by the previous Liberal administration in 1957. However, he forgot to say that this followed over four decades of Liberal promises. He further forgot to add that it took a Conservative government, as in so many other areas, to implement that legislation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Wholly inaccurate.

Mr. McGrath: I would commend to the hon. member for Parkdale the speeches made in this house and in other parts of the country by his illustrious predecessor. I refer to that distinguished Canadian Mr. Arthur Maloney, Q.C., whose reputation is known the length and breadth of this country. It is a reputation for honesty, fairness and, above all, accuracy.

I should like to refer to the maiden speech made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), who regrettably is not in the house today. I would like to deal at length with some of the remarks he made, but I shall let that wait for another occasion as I understand the hon. gentleman had to return to his home due to an illness in his family. But, Mr. Speaker, what can be said of that speech is that one could mark it quite highly for eloquence, but I am afraid it would get a zero for content. It contained practically nothing, and I suspect the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) had a hand in it. In any event I would also commend to the hon. gentleman who occupies the seat for St. John's West the brilliant speeches of his predecessor in this house, Hon. W. J. Browne.

I would also say to that hon. gentleman, were he here, that if I were in his place I would weigh my words very carefully, because he may not hold that seat for much longer; and, Mr. Speaker, I am referring to events that are taking place in another part of Canada at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? Does my hon. friend think—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McGrath: No. The hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order—

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Harkness: There is no question of a point of order; you know that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East is raising a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend would not want to discuss something that is now before the courts, and I greatly suspect that the observation thus far made is one that traverses that well known and established practice.

Mr. Speaker: While I recognize the fact that the hon. member has raised a point of order, he himself has put a title to certain events. He is the one who selected certain events. From what the hon. member for St. John's East was saying, there are many events taking place in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order—

Mr. McGrath: Of course, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, Your Honour could not have been listening to what the hon. member said, referring to certain proceedings in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had used the word "event"—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I may—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Essex East is now engaging in what he heard and what the Speaker heard. I feel that under the circumstances the hon. member for St. John's East was not deliberately making reference to any court proceedings or to any other proceedings to which it would be improper for this house to refer. I think the hon. member made a general statement. The only particularized statement I heard was one made by the hon. member for Essex East. I think we will leave it at that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Your Honour was not listening.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I say this —and I accept your ruling, of course—that the hon. gentleman, the distinguished member for Essex East is obviously as eminent in law as he is in statistics.

Mr. Harkness: Too bad for his clients.

Mr. McGrath: I was referring to the former member for St. John's West, that distinguished gentleman the Hon. W. J. Browne, a man whose career in the public service of this country stretches over 40 years; a man who has served in this house in three parliaments, 1949 to 1953; 1957 and 1958; 1958 to 1962; who also served with distinction in the legislature of the province of Newfoundland. Hon. gentlemen in this house who are familiar with the great speeches this man made, hon. gentlemen in this house who are familiar with his record, will no doubt be pleased to hear what some of the peddlers of slander, libel and calumny, some of the colleagues of the hon. gentlemen opposite, had to say about this man in the last election campaign.

I have in my hand a tabloid. I think you could refer to it as the essence of yellow journalism. It is entitled "The Liberal". It was put out by the Liberal party in Newfoundland during the last election campaign and a copy was sent to every voter in the province, and even the hon. gentleman for Essex East would not want to have himself associated with some of the things contained in this paper.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Even him?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): "Even he", you mean.

Mr. McGrath: On the last page, Mr. Speaker, there is a very familiar looking picture. I leave it to hon. gentlemen to identify it, because even at a distance it is obviously identifiable. Next to that picture is a story entitled "The communists' friend", and with the indulgence of the Chair I would like to quote a small part of that article. It says:

> All his life Mr. W. J. Browne was thought to be an enemy of communism and communists. He was always preaching against them—

And so on:

> What did he do when his government, headed by Mr. Diefenbaker, made business deals with those two communist countries?
>
> Did he resign from the government?
> No, he did not—

Mr. Speaker, the story then goes on to refer to Mr. Browne as a friend of the communists.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: I ask you sir, has there ever been a greater example of libel or calumny in this house?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. McGrath: This is a man who has always stood up inside and outside this house against communism and everything that atheistic communism stands for. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: Typical Liberal tactics.

Mr. McGrath: —I commend this piece of pseudo journalism to hon. gentlemen who have not read it—yes, to the hon. member for Essex East—because all you find in it are words such as "lies", "slander" and all sorts of other adjectives that hon. gentlemen opposite are only capable of at election time, and they are capable of some dandies.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why go after the member for Essex East all the time?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: What about 1957?

Mr. McGrath: The Hon. W. J. Browne will not be long out of this house, and I would commend that to the new member for St. John's West.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order. Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I hope Your Honour heard the remark that has just been made, which I say is absolutely improper in the light of the proceedings that are now under way in Newfoundland before the courts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been following what the hon. member for St. John's East has been saying. I think that in the light of all we know about what is happening in Newfoundland, perhaps he should steer a careful course in his references to those proceedings. A passing reference may have been made on a previous occasion, and I think the hon. member would be wise to leave it at that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the nature of my remarks, bearing in mind that this matter could possibly be sub judice. For that very reason I was very careful in what I had to say. I did not refer to any specific event taking place in Canada today.

I would also like to say, before you, sir, pass this point of order, that I hope the Chair will take due note of the many interruptions of the hon. gentleman from Essex East and that I will be allowed additional time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh; put yourself in order; that is all you have to do.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, during the campaign leading up to the general election on June 18 we saw at work in the province of Newfoundland a political machine unequalled on the continent of North America, a machine corrupt in every respect—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: —corrupt in every respect; and I commend these words to the hon. gentlemen who interrupt me right now, because there are certain hon. gentlemen on that side of the house who owe their seats to the machinations of this corrupt political machine that has imposed on the province of Newfoundland a totalitarian regime of a type never seen in Canada before.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East is raising a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made a very serious charge. He has said that certain hon. members in this house owe their position in this house and their tenure in this house to corrupt practices on the part of individuals outside of this house with whom they are associated.

An hon. Member: He said, a political machine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suggest to Your Honour that is an improper remark and it should be withdrawn, because the hon. gentleman, under our rules, has no right, as he knows well, to reflect upon the character, the integrity or the honour of any member of this house.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret that owing to my momentary preoccupation with a request from an hon. member of this house which was being made to me directly, I did not get the exact words the hon. member for St. John's East used on that occasion. However, I will say that if his words were as indicated by the hon. member for Essex East, namely, that a member of this house owes his election or his tenure of office to corrupt practices by other persons, then I feel the hon. member did not mean to go that far and he would have to withdraw those remarks, if they were made—if they were made.

Mr. McGrath: For your benefit, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said. If I can remember the words correctly, I said there are certain hon. gentlemen opposite who owe their seats to the corrupt machinations of a corrupt political machine in Newfoundland. Those were my words and they obviously offended the sensibilities of certain hon. members opposite. Now I should like to continue my remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman will be allowed—

Mr. Speaker: If those are the words the hon. gentlemen used, I do not feel they reflect directly on any individual member. We have heard allegations of this or that already in this debate—that members of one party, for example, deliberately misled the public. They have not been challenged. Such remarks have been made on both sides of the house and I take it they were made in this instance in the same spirit. I would ask the hon. member to continue his speech, bearing in mind the injunctions which have been made so far.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order which I have not yet been able to argue: Your Honour now takes the position that the words as amended by the hon. gentleman still do not offend the rule to which I directed your attention. I suggest with confidence that any hon. member who says of another that he owes his place in this house to corrupt practices, directly or indirectly, is defaming that person and that it is contrary to our rules for one hon. member to impugn the character of another, directly or vicariously. I suggest to you that the words even as amended by the hon. member should be withdrawn at this time. I submit this especially because the hon. gentleman was speaking at a time when certain of the hon. members concerned are not present in this house and cannot now rise and take issue. I am doing so on their behalf.

Mr. Ricard: Who are they? Name them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Members from Newfoundland to whom the hon. member directed attention.

Mr. McGrath: May I speak to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Essex East? I did not mean to infer that certain hon. members opposite had indulged in corrupt practices. It must have been evident to anyone who was listening that what I was inferring was: the corrupt practices of a corrupt political machine.

Mr. Robichaud: Are you talking about the Union Nationale?

Mr. McGrath: No, I am talking about the Liberal party in Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: The citation is standing order 30.

> If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member, or his election, or his right to hold his seat, he may make a statement and shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

I think this rule does not apply directly to the situation before us now. I may say that this is a borderline case. The hon. member has furnished an explanation of what he meant and, provided he is willing to add that such members may have been elected without their participation, their knowledge, or their desire in relation to these corrupt practices alleged by the hon. member, that may pass; but beyond that I do not think I would permit him to go, and he will have to withdraw that particular segment of his remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, may I suggest with great respect that Your Honour has not correctly interpreted standing order No. 30, which reads:

If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member—

Now I point out these words:

—or his election—

That is the point. What has been stated is that hon. members in this house owe their election to corrupt practices. That clearly affects an hon. member's election.

—he may make a statement and shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

That is what the standing order says. No one has the right to go beyond the meaning of that order. The hon. gentleman has violated the order and he should be called to attention forthwith by Your Honour.

Mr. Harkness: May I say a word on this point of order as read by the hon. member for Essex East? I submit that no hon. member from Newfoundland, which is what the hon. gentleman put into question, has risen and made any complaint in connection with the matter of his election.

An hon. Member: There is one on his feet now.

Mr. Harkness: Therefore, the point which the hon. member for Essex East has made does not arise. If one of the hon. members from Newfoundland wishes to rise and protest against the statement which has been made, then there is a different situation.

Mr. Carter: I was on my feet, Your Honour, but you chose to recognize the Minister of National Defence. The hon. member for St. John's East did not specifically mention Newfoundland but it was clear his imputation was that there were certain members from Newfoundland in this house who owe their seats—these are his words—to the corrupt practices of a political machine in Newfoundland.

I am one of those members and I am here in the house now.

An hon. Member: You are one of them?

Mr. Carter: I ask the hon. member for St. John's East to specify the members he had in mind, because I challenge him to prove that I owe my seat to any corrupt practice of any political machine anywhere.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo speaking on the point of order although I think he went altogether beyond the point of order and engaged in something else. I do feel, however, that the rule which has been cited by the hon. member for Essex East—and I thank him for his observations—goes to a particular instance and I think the interpretation I have placed on the general principle of this matter, together with the injunction I gave to the hon. member for St. John's East, would correct the situation. I hope the hon. member will govern himself accordingly, that is, if he would make the statement that he did not believe any of the hon. members from Newfoundland—we understand them to be those whose cases are before us—willingly or otherwise participated in any of these activities, or that it was done without their knowledge.

Mr. Batten: On the point of order, I am a member from Newfoundland. I do not hold my seat in this chamber as a result of any corrupt practice. I deplore the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for St. John's East and I hope he will retract those remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member but I must say they are not really on the point of order as such. When we are discussing a point of order, we are discussing the interpretation of a standing order. We are not discussing the merits of the position of an hon. member. Unless there are any contributions toward the interpretation of the standing order, I think we shall proceed with the hon. member for St. John's East. But I would ask him to make the necessary correction.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order and for the sake of the record, and also for the sake of hon. gentlemen who have raised points of order arising out of my remarks, may I say this: that at no time did I mean to cast any reflections upon the honour and integrity of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), whose reputation in that regard is well known; or the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), who I respect and admire very much, whose reputation in that regard is also well known, and I look forward to a continuation of our friendship; and equally my hon. friend from Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker), whose honour and integrity are also well known outside this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the others?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue with my—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. member has narrowed the field. We know who are the hon. members from Newfoundland and I do not think that I can now let his remarks stand.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, were I permitted to finish I would have continued to refer to the hon. gentlemen from Newfoundland who are not present. Because, Mr. Speaker, it is evident that what I was trying to deal with was a political machine in a province. I did not mean to infer that the hon. members were part of that machine. For the sake of the record, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not intend to cast any reflection upon the honour and integrity of any hon. members of this house, and that includes the three hon. members I have just mentioned and also the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), were he here to hear me, and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger)—and even the hon. member for Essex East, if he wants me to say so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, I would relate to the house certain events which took place in June of this year. Hon. members are well aware of the fact that the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Eglinton, was invited to speak at a luncheon of the Rotary club of St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 7 of this year. I was present at that luncheon, Mr. Speaker, and I witnessed an ungracious attack upon the freedom of speech in this country that is unexcelled in the history of the British Empire. I saw the Queen's first minister of the province of Newfoundland use the authority of the Queen's government to suppress freedom of speech in the province of Newfoundland on June 7 of this year. I was at the table at the time. I happened to know of the events leading up to the invitation by the Rotary club to the then minister of finance to address them. The Rotary club of St. John's chose the subject they wanted the minister to speak on at the then minister's insistence.

During the course of the luncheon, Mr. Speaker, as the minister was arranging his notes in preparation for the speech that was about to follow, a messenger made known the presence in the next room, of the premier of the sovereign province of Newfoundland, and he had words to say to the president of that service club. Here is a letter which was written in his own hand to the president of the club:

> Dear Sir: As Rotary club, by permitting a politician in the midst of an election to speak on a political subject, became a partisan body I have to inform you that the invitation of the government of Newfoundland to a group of Rotarians to be the guests of the government at dinner next week is hereby withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker, what I did not add was that on the following week the Rotary club were to be host to a regional convention of their particular service clubs taking in the Atlantic provinces, and it was to be quite a large assembly. And the premier was to speak. The fact remains that there are no facilities in Newfoundland big enough to host such a convention other than the facilities owned by the government of Newfoundland. So it was obvious that what the premier was saying was: "If you allow that Tory politician to speak, I, as Her Majesty's first minister, will not let you have the people's facilities for your convention next week, and I will withdraw the invitation of the government of Newfoundland to be host at a banquet for that convention".

Mr. Speaker, this was quite a state of affairs. I submit that this has never happened before in the history of this service club, whose distinguished record of providing a platform to speakers on various subjects is well known across the length and breadth of the country. The then minister of finance, realizing the predicament of his host, the president of the Rotary club, and the other officers who were present, offered to acquiesce to this unreasonable demand. Yes, I say unreasonable because he was still Her Majesty's minister of finance for Canada, and not a "Tory politician" from Toronto. The premier of Newfoundland forgot that fact, just like he forgot that he also was still the first minister of Her Majesty's government in Newfoundland. What a pity he forgets that fact too often. As I say, realizing the predicament of his host, the minister decided it would be the better part of valour to acquiesce to this unreasonable demand, and so another messenger was sent to the little adjoining room to tell the premier, who was shaking with rage, that the minister of finance would speak, but not on the subject of the pegging of the dollar which the Rotary club wanted him to speak on. The minister asked whether it would be all right if he got to his feet and brought greetings to the club. And back came the reply. The reply was: "If that man so much as gets to his feet, I will consider it a partisan act on the part of the Rotary club and I will withdraw the invitation of the government of Newfoundland to host the convention next week".

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: What kind of a political machine is that, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Liberal.

Mr. McGrath: I ask, what kind of political activity is that?

Some hon. Members: Liberal.

An hon. Member: What about the bill of rights?

Mr. McGrath: I commend the bill of rights to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wish they would commend it to the premier of Newfoundland. I commend the bill of rights brought into this house by the champion of free speech in this country, the right hon. Prime Minister, a man who has always steadfastly stood against oppression in this country wherever it existed and against whomever it was directed. I commend the bill of rights to hon. gentlemen opposite and to their partisan colleagues in Newfoundland in view of the shameful tactics which they used in the last election campaign.

Mr. Robichaud: Time.

Mr. Harkness: No wonder you are calling time; you do not want to hear the truth.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester is raising a point of order.

Mr. Robichaud: My point of order is this, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who presently has the floor started his speech at 3.27 p.m., 33 minutes ago. I think he is allowed 30 minutes under the rules.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair and its officers are arbiters of the time. In view of the protracted point of order, I have made a minor adjustment in the hon. member's time with regard to when he finishes, and that will be at 4.02 p.m. The time taken up with the point of order was eleven minutes, and therefore, in view of the fact that the hon. member speaking may have brought some of the problems upon his own head by his language, although we heard a lot of other matters which were not truly points of order, the adjustment was made on that basis.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was just about to conclude that portion of my remarks by commending to hon. gentlemen opposite an editorial by one of the great Liberal pundits in Newfoundland, Mr. Albert Perlin, the man who, next to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, is perhaps closest to the premier of Newfoundland. I was about to commend to the house, Mr. Speaker, an editorial that appeared in the daily News of St. John's on June 8 in which that great Liberal journal deplored the action of the premier of Newfoundland in preventing the former minister of finance from speaking to the Rotary club of St. John's. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate were here, I would tell him that during the course of his remarks not once did he refer to the Atlantic provinces development council mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has now expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Albert Bechard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, you will understand my apprehension and emotion in this solemn moment when I am rising for my maiden speech in this chamber where so many great men of our history have performed with far greater oratory than I can muster.

Like my distinguished colleagues, Mr. Speaker, may I offer you my most sincere congratulations, on behalf of the people I have the honour of representing in this house and myself, for your election to the office of Speaker of this august assembly. Being a newcomer, I have not had the good fortune of knowing you before this session, but the list of your great talents and qualities mentioned here, when you acceded to your high position, together with the military discipline you acquired during the last world war, will certainly be most valuable assets in overseeing our proceedings, which is actually the highly responsible task you have just been called upon to perform. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the best of success to you in the discharge of your exalted duties which are mainly concerned with protecting our parliamentary freedom and our democracy.

Although I disagree with the hon. members for Waterloo South and Nicolet-Yamaska (Messrs. Chaplin and Vincent), the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, about everything they said here, I wish to congratulate both of them for the elegance and the eloquence they showed in the discharge of their task.

It is in our tradition, I believe, that the debate on the address should give an opportunity to the members to speak of their counties and to briefly expose their needs.

Being the representative of a remote region, perhaps more or less known—I might even say, unknown to several of my hon. colleagues—I shall take this opportunity to speak of Bonaventure county.

First I thank my fellow citizens of Bonaventure for the honour they bestowed upon me in choosing me as their spokesman and I thank the honourable leader of the official opposition in the house as well as my colleagues from Quebec, for having thought of the Gaspe peninsula at the very beginning of this session.

Bounded in part by the Matapedia river, in part by the Restigouche river and for the greater part by the Chaleur bay, the constituency of Bonaventure extends from Routhierville, in the west, to Gascons, in the east, over a distance of about 150 miles.

The population of my constituency earns its living with agriculture, fisheries, forestry and the tourist industry which, incidentally, does not seem to have benefited to a great extent from that healthy devaluation of the Canadian dollar, mentioned in the speech from the throne and about which much fuss was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) last Tuesday, in an earnest effort to explain that urgent measure—a pre-election measure in this case—because never, in the touristic lifetime of the Gaspe peninsula, has there been such a decrease in the number of American tourists than during the summer of 1962.

My constituency is in one of those areas of the country that can be considered as being economically underdeveloped, on account of its remoteness from the larger centres and the prohibitive cost of electricity, an essential factor in the establishment of the manufacturing industries in our area. The result is, and more than elsewhere I think, a frightful and continuous increase in unemployment.

Agriculture being one of the main sources of income in the constituency of Bonaventure and since—

> The prosperity of agriculture remains essential to the well-being of the entire Canadian economy.

—as can be read in the speech from the throne, I should like to draw the attention of the house to the outstanding importance which must be given to agriculture in the province of Quebec, and in the Gaspe peninsula in particular, to that sector which I consider as the basis of Canadian economy, if we want to save it.

The high-sounding words uttered and the sensational tricks performed in this house will not make us forget, in Quebec, in the Gaspe peninsula, that the famous post-electional austerity program (so-called urgency measure) in the field of agriculture seems to have been invented, created and brought into the world by the government to "austerize", ostracize and penalize the farmers of the province of Quebec. I shall come back to that in a moment.

Our Gaspe farmers and, I might say, most of our eastern Quebec farmers are complaining that they cannot live on their farms, on account of the lack of development of the land, the lack of marketing organization for the sale of our farm products, which would allow us to sell and consume in this country our own products; in other words, on account of the lack of a farm policy really conceived in the interest of the farmer. Why in the world could we not produce in this country what we can consume in the matter of farm products? According to experts, we have in the Gaspe peninsula the best climate perhaps in Canada for general farming.

[Mr. Bechard.]

However, in view of the prohibitive price of manure and fertilizers, the distance between us and our sources of supply, which increases even more the cost of those products essential to the economical development of our lands, our farmers cannot see when their lot will improve.

Most of those who are still interested in farming, are crushed, overcome, burdened by an enormous debt incurred in buying farm machinery, and which they cannot pay back because the land, insufficiently prepared, will not yield enough to enable them to meet their numerous responsibilities. The result is an abnormal situation, where our farmers are obliged to look for work, in the bush or elsewhere, in order to earn the extra money, if not all the money, they need to pay for their machinery. In my opinion, that does not make sense. A man is a farmer or a lumberjack. He cannot and must not be both at the same time, if he wants to succeed in one field or the other. Not to mention the fact that the farmers who are thus compelled to join the labour force add to the number of unemployed by taking the jobs of available workers. We are making the same mistake again in the field of agriculture, we are putting the cart before the horse. Allow me to explain. The Canadian government is much more favourable to the granting of loans when they are used for the purchase of machinery and equipment than when they are used to improve the land.

To support this statement, I should like at this time to refer to the speech delivered here this morning by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) when he stated that when Quebec farmers want to improve their farms by buying machinery and want to pay off debts they have incurred through such purchases and which can amount to $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000, they address themselves to the central government. On the other hand, the provincial government is more concerned with land than with machinery; land comes first, equipment after. And it is the land which should be tackled first, so that it may produce. Then—and only then—shall we think of farm market organizations and farm mechanization. Our local market, if well organized, is able to absorb all that our farmers can produce, and even more.

Without a domestic market, it is useless to think of a progressive development in agriculture. To promote marketing, our farmers must be sure to have, during the off-season, a stock of those products which are most in demand. To this end they must have storage facilities here and there, grouping various neighbouring communities. There is, in this case, a federal-provincial arrangement to help the farmers build such storage facilities which is, at least, accepted in the province of Quebec. Already, in my county, localities where the establishment of such facilities would be appropriate have been approached, and construction should begin during the summer.

Unfortunately, austerity on the part of this government—the austerity program decreed after the election without any previous consultation of this parliament—a procedure I heartily disapprove, because it is contrary to the most elementary observance of constitutional principles—this austerity program came into being, as I say, to paralyse at home, in Bonaventure, and all over the province of Quebec, the introduction of the policy advocated by the government of Quebec.

It could really be said, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister conceived that emergency program especially to counteract the plans of Quebec farmers.

On the other hand I am told that farmers in the province of Quebec will, because of this austerity program (this so-called emergency measure) be deprived of approximately $1,200,000, which were to be paid out to those who use lime on their farms. Statistics reveal that Quebec farmers use more lime than the farmers of all other Canadian provinces together, and the disappearance of that subsidy is therefore causing to the Quebec farmers considerable injury.

The farmer is furthermore the victim of that same austerity program in that the premium for grade A hogs was lowered from $3 previously to $1, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) having, in addition blotted out the grade B. I was unofficially told that changes have recently been made or will shortly be made to the scheme for grain transportation from western Canada to eastern Canada, which will again bring about a loss of $10 million to the farmers of the province of Quebec.

As far as my constituency of Bonaventure in particular is concerned, I must say that we have there, at Caplan, an experimental farm which gave valuable help to farmers of the Gaspe peninsula.

However, according to a rumour that started going round last winter and is getting stronger all the time, the experimental farm established in my riding by the Liberal government which preceded the present government, is likely to disappear. Therefore, I strongly urge the government, the Minister of Agriculture, to prevent such a disaster from happening in our province, to stop such an injustice while there is still time. It is all very well to say that everybody must tighten their belts and do their share in these times of austerity; but for goodness sake, do not always take it out on the same people.

I bear no grudge against our western friends. On the contrary, I am delighted to see how much was done for them, even though it was not enough to answer all their problems; but you must admit, Mr. Speaker, that they were far better treated in that respect than eastern farmers.

As the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes mentioned the other day, the province of Quebec suffered during certain years much more than the western provinces from the loss of crops through drought, excessive rain, etc.

What did the federal government do for the farmers of the province of Quebec? Nothing. The Liberal party will make the present crop-insurance legislation more flexible and less costly for the provinces, so that farmers' fear of such disasters at the first whim of the weather may be alleviated.

Mr. Dumont: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Bechard: After I have finished my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the farm labourer of my region should also be entitled to the benefits of unemployment insurance, which is denied him by paragraph I, section 154 of the act.

In such a climate of indecision and insecurity, how do you expect our rural youth to take an interest in the farm?

Concerning fisheries, the least we can ask the Canadian government is to improve the fishing harbours which have been shamefully neglected since 1957. At certain places, they will have to be completely rebuilt; at others, extensive repairs and improvements will have to be made.

Since the establishment, in my riding, more particularly in the last two years, of large sawmills, especially in Carleton, New Richmond and Bonaventure, as well as the setting up of shipyards at Paspebiac, and above all, the definite prospect of having a very important plant at New Richmond—the population of the Gaspe peninsula begins to feel some relief—thanks to the co-operation and determination to decentralize industry, of the dynamic Quebec government, which, whether my hon. fellow members from Longueuil (Mr. Sevigny), Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais), Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and St. Mary (Mr. Valade) like it or not, will come back to power with a crushing majority for the greater benefit of the province of Quebec.

However, the coming of those industries, which means an economic revival in the Gaspe peninsula, calls for the building of new docks, as well as for the extension and a considerable improvement of existing facilities.

For instance, in order to answer the needs of the New Richmond plant, a deep sea wharf will have to be built on a site where there is already a beginning—that is, more precisely at Cap Noir—to facilitate the shipping of wood and wood products to the domestic and foreign markets. And if we want to be ready in time, I shall ask the Minister of Public Works to look immediately into the problem with the greatest of care.

For the same reasons, the wharf at Carleton must be extended by a few hundred feet, and that seaport which is the most beautiful natural haven in Canada, after Gaspe, must be improved. A wharf should be built at Maria, and some urgent improvements made on all other wharfs, some of which are in rather bad condition. Some protective work is also needed in various localities, like Saint Godefroi, Port Daniel, Shigawake, Bonaventure, Caplan, New Richmond, Maria, Carleton, St. Omer and Matapedia, and more particularly at that spot where the waters of the rivers Restigouche and Matapedia are causing considerable damage each spring. In those cases, as in many others, we are only asking that projects started by the former government be continued and we shall be satisfied.

Numerous public works could be carried out, without too much of a strain on the imagination, which would greatly help the economic development of our area. A post office in New Carlisle, chief town of the constituency of Bonaventure, must be built at once, as well as a public building in Carleton to a house a post office, a customs office and the R.C.M.P. headquarters.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in this 20th century the telephone may be considered as a luxury. If I told you that in my constituency, in 1962, there are places which are still deprived of that essential public service, which do not even have the hand-operated telephone, my hon. Conservative colleagues would no doubt be surprised. Well, that is a fact, Mr. Speaker. Yet, under the previous administration, telephone lines were built in several remote places in the constituency of Bonaventure. St. Fidele, St. Etienne de Restigouche and St. Conrad in the constituency of Bonaventure—and I probably have forgotten some—are still deprived of that service, while they are more than 15 miles from the nearest telephone. Is that not a shame, in this second part of the 20th century? There is another parish, St. Edgar, which, having been promised a substantial grant from the Department of Transport, did build a telephone line, more than a year ago, and yet, according to the latest news, it had not obtained the grant it had asked through the medium of my predecessor in this house, and is thus faced with serious difficulties.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Bechard: That community, which does not have enough income to afford such an expense, must not only suffer from the present austerity program, but also tighten its belt to make its monthly payments for the construction of that line.

The most tragic evil in this country, Mr. Speaker, is still unemployment. And yet, no one was to suffer from that evil under the leadership of the present Prime Minister. After having carried out completely the public works I have just recommended and after having built the public buildings which the Gaspe peninsula needs, the government will have to seriously consider helping small industries, if we want to do something tangible to ensure some development in our region, create jobs and thus alleviate unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, what is being done at present to promote the small industry in the Gaspe peninsula, apart from levying somewhat too heavy taxes? Our soil contains abundant natural resources only waiting for imagination, capital and leadership to play the part they are expected to play in our national economy.

As for the Liberal party, it advocates the following assistance in order to promote the small industries in the remote areas, in the areas that are economically less favoured: tax abatements for corporations; special depreciation rates for new machinery, and deficiency grants during a limited period to economically sound projects, with priority being given to industries in the areas where employment will be most urgently needed and to industries that will increase their exportations. Here is, at last, something concrete and likely to bring our people to improve their businesses, or to take the initiative of setting up the new industries which are needed by our country and which the Gaspe peninsula is anxiously awaiting.

Mr. Speaker, it is only fair that the federal government, which levies too many taxes in the province of Quebec, according to my way of thinking, which controls all possible taxation fields, including estate duties that belong exclusively to the provinces, it is only fair that the federal government distribute in a somewhat more equitable manner the yield of those taxes by improving the lot of our people who are claiming, not bread and games, but their daily bread.

We, from the Gaspe peninsula, have been too long forgotten. This tragedy has been with us ever since 1534, when Cartier took possession of our country by setting up a cross in Gaspe. Mr. Speaker, are you not of the opinion that this has been going on long enough? Are you not of the opinion that we have had our share of neglect?

The Liberal party has spoken of crop insurance and of the organization of farm marketing in order to compete with foreign markets. It has mentioned the building of storage facilities, of extending support prices to all farm products, in order to help the farmers, and of offering incentives to the small industry. But what we have heard and seen on the other side of the house? Laughs, jeers, dramatics, in short, a comedy.

The Gaspe peninsula has always been unrecognized, forgotten. It is time to put an end to such a situation. The Gaspe peninsula people, the farmers, the fishermen and the workers, and especially in my riding, do not want to depend on the charity of the state, on pensions, on dividends; they do not want to sponge on society. The people from the Gaspe peninsula are too proud to stoop to doing such a thing. Those people are only asking for work enabling them to earn a decent living for their families and thus contribute to the development of our economy.

In these difficult times our country is going through, when attempts at infiltration are being made by subversive movements and ideas by every means possible, what worries me most for Canada's future and the security of its citizens, is the appearance on the Canadian political scene of certain revolutionary zealots who rouse the people faced with all kinds of problems, and teach them to hate those who are a little more successful in society, stirring up the class struggle by their demagogic talk and their no less demagogic statements of policy, drawn solely from their visionary imagination. Where will this lead us, Mr. Speaker, if the people let themselves be taken in?

Here is the answer: to what certain totalitarian countries have known and are still experiencing.

Is it not the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who, addressing workers in a political speech around 1945, after parliament had approved an increase in the parliamentary indemnity of the people's representatives, said something which amounted to this:

> You see, those gentlemen have just voted an increase in salary for themselves, but they forgot to think of the workers.

Words worthy of a revolutionary, but we do not have to go very far to find people better off than members of parliament, even among the working class.

The situation is serious and it is time more than ever for all men of good will, for all members conscious of their responsibilities, to join and work together, uniting all their knowledge and their efforts in order to find an answer to the problems facing us, in agreement, security and peace.

This is no time for rebellion, but it is time for joint work centred on one purpose: the greatness, security and prosperity of our country in unity and peace.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my fellow citizens of the constituency of Bonaventure, of Quebec, and all Canadians, that as long as I shall be allowed to sit in this house, I shall be the keen defender of the rights they prize the most and of their just claims, all in an increasingly greater and stronger Canada within the community of nations.

Mr. Dumont: How many millions?

Mr. Denis: He wants to be thrown out.

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

An hon. Member: That is not written.

An hon. Member: No, it is too late, his time is up.

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to congratulate you on having acceded to the honourable position you now occupy. I also want to congratulate the two hon. members who proposed and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I am very proud to speak in this parliamentary house, in the nation's capital, this city of Ottawa, formerly called Bytown, and of which my maternal grandfather was one of the pioneers.

As the representative of the magnificent constituency of Chicoutimi, I have the honour of being one of the seven members of the Social Credit party whose ridings are linked with the great Saguenay area—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: —the total population of which is over 350,000 people. May I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Saguenay region was so named in 1535 by Jacques Cartier, discoverer of Canada, that is 427 years ago, and that the limits of that splendid region were established by the king of France in 1732 and confirmed by a document from the British privy council in 1926. No region in Quebec and Canada has a name and boundaries so genuinely established by seniority and official recognition. Chicoutimi is the capital of that area as well as the center of elegance, refinement and French culture. That area covers 150,000 square miles, which is equivalent to five provinces of the size of New Brunswick.

May I say, now, to the hon. members of the old Liberal and Conservative parties which have taken turns in office for 95 years, that I do not have to blame them too much for all the efforts made in order to increase the national production, because it seems that they have been successful in this field if we are to judge on the basis of the surpluses which have been a source of worry for governments for so many years. However, the Canadian people do not have the money to purchase $37 billion in production when, according to eminent economists, they might be able to consume normally $50 billion in production to meet their basic needs.

Neither do I dare cast too much doubt on the sincerity of their violent outbursts and the abuse they throw at one another. However, I shall say that the most painful discovery I have made is that they have all been prisoners of an obsolete and outdated debt-money financial system which squeezes and strangles them until they can no longer breathe. They will not succeed in freeing themselves from this stranglehold unless they decide to get off the beaten paths, which I doubt very much when I think of their party funds.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: As for our hon. friends the socialists, so well-intentioned, they would rather turn everything upside down in our country, through government planning, and strive for the implementation of state capitalism, instead of fixing the basic flaw in our economic machinery, that is, our monetary system, which, whatever may be said, has been conceived by men and must be rectified according to the needs of the times.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: It has been approximately 50 years since our country entered the era of mechanization and automation, and despite all the technical and scientific progress made, we still have the same old capitalistic debt-money financial system which was the fashion when ox-drawn wagons roamed down the main street of Bytown, which is the limit of irrelevance and absurdity.

If all the Liberal and Conservative governments which have administered our country during that period had realized that their first duty was to respect and protect the citizens and families of this nation, their financial policy would have been set up differently.

But, did they really have a financial policy? Is it not a fact that, until now, the whole financial system of Canada has been left to some people's discretion and to chance? These old Liberal and Conservative parties, instead of rectifying our shady debt-money system, are leading us gradually towards state capitalism, this vicious system which every right-minded Canadian rejects in his heart, because we all agree that the system which prevails in Russia has no place here. Indeed, the Canadian government owns and manages nearly 30 Canadian companies, to which you must add 36 companies involved in the national railways network.

Besides, which parties have been in power in our country for the last 50 years which have given us a funny money, constantly depreciated, and which have pushed us over from inflation to deflation, from recession to stagnation and from depression to financial bankruptcy? Was it the Social Credit party, or the Liberals and the Conservatives? That is what Canadians must know and remember. The time of camouflage is over and we will state the facts in broad daylight. Since June 18, the chips are down, hon. colleagues, because Social Credit has now entered parliament in triumph through the front door and from now on, this rise to power will only stop at the top, according to the will of the Canadian people.

After the votes recently cast in this house, there are only Social Crediters and socialists left, because the Liberals voted for the socialists. So they put down their masks of disguised socialists. As far as the Conservatives are concerned, having introduced the monetary reform in 1934 by the establishment of the Bank of Canada, they indicated that they always had an inclination towards Social Credit and they must be commended for it.

An hon. Member: We knew it.

Another hon. Member: It did become obvious.

Mr. Cote: It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that to several members of this house, the mechanism of the Bank of Canada and of our monetary system is something very mysterious. Many think that money grows in the field like mushrooms and that it is a sacred thing not to be touched. That is an indication of a lack of elementary knowledge of public men.

What we need is the socialization of credit or money. That is the main problem facing our country.

According to the economist Paul Del'Anielo, professor at the school of higher commercial studies in Montreal:

> Canada's banking system is very different from that of its neighbours, the Americans. In the United States, there are practically 14,000 various banking institutions, whereas Canada has only eight commercial or chartered banks. Our banks having the tendency of amalgamating, especially since the turn of the century, one can truly wonder if, twenty five years from now, banking operations in Canada will not be controlled by only three or four financial giants.

On the other hand, Mr. Pierre Harvey, an economist, writes the following:

> For banks, credit is just another merchandise. We must remember that chartered banks, being private enterprises, are interested in making as much money as possible by selling credit because, in their eyes, credit is just another merchandise.

Mr. Harvey then goes on to explain the mechanism of credit:

> If, for instance, deposits total $110, the bank will be able to extend credit up to $900 and still keep a reserve fund of 10 per cent. In other words, banks can lend ten times as much as the amount of deposits they hold.

And then:

> When bank managers claim that chartered banks cannot extend credit because of the high rate of interest charged by the Bank of Canada, they are speaking nonsense because even if the central bank were charging 10 per cent interest and a chartered bank only 6 per cent on a loan of $110, for instance, the latter would have to pay $10 but it would extend $1,000 worth of credit at 6 per cent which would net $60 in profits.

Indeed, as Mr. Harvey, who teaches at the school of higher commercial studies, states:

> Except in cases of great emergency, the chartered banks never borrow from the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I could quote fifty other well-known economists to prove the creation of bank credit. That is what led a great Liberal senator, the late Hon. Gerry McGeer, of Vancouver, to say to the financial editor of the Toronto daily Star, Mr. Boland Honderich, on May 1, 1947:

> Where do the banks get the money they loan to the government? They do not use the funds depositors have left with them, although they have tried to make people believe it. It is rather money they create by making entries in their books.

And he added:

> The creation of credit is a power that should be wielded by the government of the country, through the Bank of Canada, to meet the justifiable financial needs of the federal, provincial and municipal governments. As long as the power to create credit remains in the hands of private banks—he added,

> —the country will remain under the economic domination of the banks.

And the Liberal Senator McGeer concluded by saying:

> 1. It is not necessary to go outside Canada to borrow money to meet the needs of Canadians; we can create all the credit we need.
> 2. We do not need gold reserves to guarantee our money.
> 3. Our prosperity does not rest on the export trade.

Those are the words of a Liberal senator.

Mr. Speaker, one of the great problems facing the present government is the international balance of payments. That is not surprising because when the international monetary fund was created in 1944 through the Bretton Woods agreement, the old capitalist formula prevailed. Three great countries, alone, held a majority of shares. Instead of creating an institution "controlled" by a few countries only, the same contribution should have been set for each country or all the members should have had an equal vote.

On July 9, 1956, Mr. Solon Low, then member for Peace River and the Social Credit leader, said this:

> The Bretton Woods agreement favoured mainly the creditor countries like the United States without putting them under the obligation to balance their trade by accepting goods from other countries.
> However, they imposed that obligation upon the debtor nations. They set up the international gold standard and gave the creditor nations the right to wait and demand gold or American dollars.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the root of the problem of the balance of international payments. But, unfortunately, those arrangements were approved in 1944 by the Liberals who were then in power and by the Conservatives and the socialists in the opposition. Only the Social Credit party, under the leadership of Mr. Solon Low, was definitely against those obnoxious agreements. Events have shown that only the crediters had proved to be competent financial administrators.

Those who now state, in this house and elsewhere, that Canadians do not lack purchasing power and that our monetary system is perfectly balanced are good people who are terribly unaware and blind, or men who knowingly distort the facts.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: Because if we add up the number of officially and unofficially unemployed persons in the nation, we come up with a figure of over 600,000 unemployed, with more than 2,500,000 dependents. Officially unemployed persons are those who collect unemployment benefits, while the unofficially unemployed come under public assistance. Those family heads collect approximately $35 a week, which is definitely insufficient in view of the cost of living at the present time. Those fellow citizens are in most difficult circumstances. They are undernourished and lack the essentials of life. In the face of such suffering, the government must place the resources of the Bank of Canada in the service of the nation.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: We must do away with any austerity program and launch large public works in the most affected areas in the country, without levying any extra taxes and without borrowing, that is, by issuing new money. To this end, let us set up without delay a bank for social financing or for social investment, directly responsible to the Bank of Canada, but endowed with the same powers for creating credit as those available to the chartered banks. Such a bank for social financing would make loans at a rate of interest which would only cover the costs of administration, amounting to about one half of one per cent.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it would be possible to undertake urgent projects which are simply a must all over Canada. And if you want examples of urgent works which would absorb all the available working force in the Chicoutimi or Saguenay areas, I give you a list of them: three bridges across the Saguenay; 20 maritime shipping relays; erection of a modern hospital in Ha Ha Bay; construction of a university, ten post offices, a direct route to the north shore, which has been requested for 25 years; rebuilding of the Chicoutimi-Quebec city-Montreal railway line; repair, improvement and construction of sea wharves; replacement of old railway cars that are falling apart; relocation of the St. Honore airfield to service commercial and private aircraft and to prevent air tragedies such as the one that occurred last night at the Bagotville R.C.A.F. airfield, in my constituency.

The development of the airport at St. Honore by the Department of Transport is a matter of national emergency. This country cannot afford loss of human lives and millions of dollars because of stupid accidents when there is a $5 million airport ten minutes from Chicoutimi, which could accommodate all private and commercial flights.

Mr. Speaker, that list represents only part of our requirements in the Saguenay district. Those are only examples of the social capital expenditures mentioned by the American economist J. K. Galbraith, and many others like him. Those public works projects would increase employment and allow Canadians to live a decent life in their own country.

The dean of commerce at McGill University in Montreal, Mr. Donald E. Armstrong, said not so long ago:

> Only drastic measures can put a stop to unemployment. The remedy is simple and painless. It is necessary to spend more. What is particularly necessary is an increase of expenses in what is known as the public sector; expenses for public education, health, amusements and a variety of other services and installations of which Canada is badly in need.

Besides the necessity of creating one million new jobs in Canada during the next five years, on account of the population increase, it is necessary to think over the words of Mr. Frank Capon, a director of the Du Pont de Nemours Company:

> Three years hence, 15 per cent of the workers will be displaced through automation and in 5 years, at least 25 per cent of the workers will be dismissed on account of mechanization and automation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to state in this chamber, that those choruses that were loudly sung on every occasion in favour of national unity must henceforth be replaced by a definite program of national understanding. National unity means a melting pot, which is absolutely inadmissible and intolerable, while national understanding means the progress of two nations side by side in mutual respect of each other's rights and privileges.

Everything coming from the federal government must be written and presented in the two official languages of this country. Everywhere in Canada as well as in federal services in foreign lands, federal civil servants must be perfectly bilingual and government buildings must carry bilingual inscriptions. Briefly, French and English must be treated on the same footing, because if it is not, before we celebrate the centennial of confederation, the dream of Cartier and Macdonald will be carried away by the wind of separatism which rumbles with an increasing strength due to the unfair treatment meted out for so long to the French Canadians in every part of this country.

The federal government must control again the issue and volume of money and credit. Production in our country must not be measured in terms of money but money must be issued on a scientific basis of accounting through a practically automatic process, in order to maintain a permanent balance between our purchasing power and the goods and services available.

We must get rid of the silly money-debt system which is responsible for all the financial ups and downs and replace it by a monetary system based entirely on mathematical logic. This very system of money-debt, false and silly, that we use at present, is supported only by people who would rather live in freezing steadfastness rather than to take care of the welfare of their fellow citizens.

The current royal inquiry on money and credit should give us full details about all the credit money which has been created by the chartered banks ever since 1934, that is since the establishment of the Bank of Canada until today. To achieve prosperity in Canada, we must transform our old obsolete money system. Today, the Social Credit theories and philosophy are accepted by millions of people throughout the world. It is the most powerful weapon we have against creeping communism.

Mr. Caouette: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cote: We no longer have to look for a solution; let us not look for difficulties where there are none. Social Credit is not based on faith or confidence; it is a scientific system adapted to the economic needs of our country and of the whole world.

At this time, I should like to remind the Conservative government that there is a very striking difference between our two parties and that because of the philosophy, principles and theories of Social Credit it will never be possible for us to make any alliances as some people seem to expect.

An hon. Member: Why do you vote with them, then?

Mr. Cote: However, Mr. Speaker, we shall not make any systematic opposition to questions as futile as those which have been put forth by the Liberals—

An hon. Member: Election fear.

Mr. Cote: —to make a display of false courage, but we shall support all measures in keeping with the program we have advocated for the welfare of our people.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have only a few minutes left, I wish to add that the strongest means to create peace and happiness in Canadian families would be to make provision for loans, through the Central Mortage and Housing Corporation, at a rate not exceeding 1 per cent, and to grant a refund to make up for the difference in rate, to Canadian heads of families who bought or built themselves a home in these last five years.

(Text):

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you on your appointment to that lofty seat where you will preside over this house. I am sure all hon. members of this house wish you the very best in an office which will require a great deal of sagacity and wisdom at all times. I should also be remiss if I did not congratulate the mover and seconder of the speech from the throne. I thought that they made excellent speeches. As I have looked around and seen so many speakers making their speeches without reading them, I must offer the comment that at no time have I noticed in this house so many speeches given off the cuff and with as few references and as little reading as on this debate in reply to the speech from the throne.

I think that by now it has been proven beyond peradventure that the period of economic crises in this country developed in the few short weeks before the election. Again, I do not want to belabour this point, but I think I should draw attention to the fact that the dominion bureau of statistics issued a report on the flow of capital from this country in the period April 1, 1962 to June 30, 1962. Dissolution of parliament was on April 21 and election day was on June 18.

The report shows very definitely that during this period $300 million went out of this country as interest on investments in Canada. There was a net outflow of short term capital totalling $168 million. But $242 million was invested abroad by Canadians in foreign banks and short term securities, be it noted, and $77 million was spent on travel abroad by Canadians, foreign shipping, and other intangibles. In all, the sum total was $1 billion. That, Mr. Speaker, represents $10 million every day for that 100-day period. What were the causes of this? Various causes have been ascribed but I think the first thing we must look at is the lack of capital coming from the United States. The United States was looking across the ocean to Great Britain's entrance into the common market. The United States was looking for investment there where labour is cheaper and where investment would yield bigger returns. The second point was the $242 million which was invested outside of Canada by Canadians. In my view full credit for that should go to the Liberal party and I think they must accept that.

I want to speak for a minute or two on the devaluation of the dollar. I think the pegging of the dollar was a most courageous step. It was something that had been asked for over a period of years because businessmen knew what the situation would be if we were tied to a dollar that was stable and not fluctuating. They welcomed it. It allowed them to do business and know the price. I could go on and say more about the history of what France and other countries did in that regard but I do not think that is necessary.

I wish to dwell for a minute or two on the effect on my riding of devaluation of the dollar. I represent the riding of Simcoe East which has water on three sides. It is one of the greatest tourist areas in Canada and those in that industry have all experienced a great boom. Practically all of the hotels and summer places were filled at the beginning of the third quarter of the year, the season when the industry experiences a big boost. I want to give all credit to the government in that regard because income from the tourist industry is going to be up $150 million or $160 million. The industry has shown a deficit for years but this year Canada will likely break even. This is due to the courageous action of the government in pegging the dollar.

But I want to go a little further and point out how farsighted the government has been with respect to the tourist industry. Government support of the tourist industry has increased by 75 per cent since 1957 when the Conservative government came into power. Let us compare this with the situation formerly. In the five years from 1952 to 1957 the tourist budget increased by less than 30 per cent but now we see a great increase in the tourist industry in my riding and all across Canada. The Canadian economy has benefited from the increase in income from tourists brought about as a result of aggressive tourist promotion. From 1957 to 1961 income from the tourist industry increased by 30 per cent, or $110 million, while from 1952 to 1956 the growth was 22 per cent or $62 million. Federal programs that have been carried out have laid the foundation for this increase and the pegging of the dollar gave the industry a shot in the arm in every province in Canada. People engaged in the tourist business realize this and they appreciate what this government has done.

I should like to speak for a moment on medical care. Important and all as medical care is, perhaps we in this house would have to agree that food is more essential. Yet food is still bought and sold in the market place. But medical care seems to have something magnetic about it for the politicians. I wonder how much of this is deep concern for the people's welfare and how much of it is concern for the politicians' welfare? I am not going to answer that question. I am going to leave it alone and let hon. members answer it according to their own consciences. Suffice it to say that Liberal policy over the years has been to advocate medical care and forget it as the seasons change. I well remember when they first advocated it away back in 1919. Now, however, since they appear to be swinging far out into left field, they trot it out again in spite of the fact—I wonder sometimes how short their memories are—that very recently they opposed it in the province of Saskatchewan.

One would think that the socialists here would heed the warning to go slow after the medical crisis they precipitated in the province of Saskatchewan. There is no crisis in medical care in Canada. No one is being denied medical care. As a matter of fact, the Ontario hospital commission report indicates that less than 10 per cent need help in this province. They include the indigents and those with marginally low incomes. No one denies that this group needs coverage by insurance or some other plan. As for the remaining 90 per cent, an increasing majority are becoming insured under P.S.I., Associated Medical Services, Windsor Medical Services and other insurance coverage. So I state that this government is taking a very sensible position in having a royal commission bring in a report on medical care.

Canada is a big country. From the Atlantic to the Pacific conditions vary immensely. They vary immensely in Ontario from the city of Toronto to the northern part of the province. No physician objects to insurance against sickness. Most of us practise under it now, but we want no interference with freedom of action according to our consciences in treating the patient. That is the way most doctors want things and, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is the way most patients want them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what the Liberal party will guarantee.

Mr. Rynard: In this way the patient will receive as good treatment as is obtainable anywhere in the world. Furthermore, under this plan it is my firm conviction that no insurance company or group should have a monopoly so far as insurance is concerned.

In my opinion there are a couple of factors that are urgent. I want to bring it to the attention of the house that these are urgent needs. We urgently need more hospital beds, active, convalescent and chronic, in the province of Ontario and throughout Canada. Once we get more chronic beds we can relieve the convalescent, and more convalescent beds will result in relieving the active. But we are in dire need today of active hospital beds, convalescent beds and chronic beds before medical services can be improved. Staffs are urgently needed to man these hospitals. Nurses and other help are required. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if we did not have married nurses giving of their time and effort we could not operate the hospitals that are operating in Canada today, and may I say that to do so I know some of these nurses have made a great sacrifice so far as their homes are concerned.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention to the fact that we urgently need more doctors in Canada. The situation is bad, indeed; but it will be worse because the United Kingdom is getting short of doctors today, and that source will dry up. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that a new medical school is needed in this province to provide 100 doctors more per year. It is estimated that the basic science buildings, the hospital and technical buildings for such a school will cost well over $40 million. The need for doctors is urgent because without them no plan of medical care can be carried out. There is urgent need for more hospitals, more staffs and more doctors. These are the urgent medical problems before the people of Canada today. When I say "staffs" I refer to the technicians, radiologists and personnel staff.

Then, I wanted to dwell for a moment or two on the question of welfare payments. I noticed a reference in the speech from the throne to the fact that a welfare council would be set up to review welfare and social payments. This, in my opinion, is an excellent idea. This matter should be taken out of the hands of the politicians entirely, in my opinion, and these payments should be tied to the economic factors operating in our country. For far too long, the politicians have gone across this country, if not entirely misleading the people, at least attempting to bribe them with their own money.

Mr. Hellyer: Shades of 1957.

Mr. Rynard: Shades of 1962.

I should like to discuss briefly the common market situation. First of all, as a Canadian, I regretted reading the comments that were being reported from the Leader of the Opposition. It is my feeling that when the Prime Minister of this country is engaged outside of this country, whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative, his position should not be weakened by irresponsible comments. He is there representing all Canadians and, in my opinion, he is entitled to the support of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. He should not be hampered and hamstrung or belittled at home and reported at home as doing the wrong thing.

The Prime Minister of Canada, the senior member of the commonwealth, occupied a place of respect and dignity in the commonwealth meetings. Of course, he was the first speaker. Not one country questioned the right of the United Kingdom to go into the common market. The United Kingdom negotiations up to this point had been meagre. Only the African nations had been promised associate membership. No arrangements had been considered for Canada's wheat or the other goods that were traditionally sold to England. Little or no discussion had taken place regarding Australia's goods or those of New Zealand, and New Zealand has been the farm basket of the United Kingdom for years. We recall that Mr. Duncan Sandys assured the Australian cabinet less than a year ago that the United Kingdom would never go into Europe unless satisfactory arrangements could be made for Australia. The chancellor of the exchequer had said that the signing of the treaty of Rome would mean having common external tariffs which, in turn, would mean the end of the commonwealth free entry, and he could not conceive of any government of his country putting forward a proposition which would involve the abandonment of commonwealth free entry. However, little or nothing had been done regarding Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India or Pakistan.

There were traditions in that room where these meetings were held. Twenty two years ago the commonwealth stood alone for civilization. Many of these countries had been through two world wars. The question arose, would the United Kingdom become greater as the leader of a quarter of the world's people, five sixths of whom are coloured, with different religions and different ideals than we have but with great supplies of raw materials and few skills strengthened by over 100 million of the white group. We have Canada coming to the rescue of the United Kingdom in the war and post-war years with $2 billion of help. Canada has supplied the finest wheat in the world to the United Kingdom over the years. Canada buys $2 worth of supplies for every $1 worth the United Kingdom buys in Canada. Ten Canadians visit the United Kingdom for every person who comes to Canada from the United Kingdom. Canada has more than upheld her end in so far as trade is concerned.

To reiterate, perhaps the United Kingdom, with over 100 million whites in the commonwealth, could be a power that would greatly enrich the free world. The Prime Minister's proposal that there be a meeting of all commonwealth members, the common market countries, the United States, Japan and like-minded countries, was a good one. He graciously offered to play host for this meeting. I should like now to quote the following from Canadian Saturday Night:

> It was Diefenbaker's finest hour.
> To say that his address was deplorable, as Lester Pearson did, shows a complete lack of understanding of the situation which exists in Britain today. Opposition to the common market is growing rapidly, and it appears extremely unlikely that Macmillan will be able to push through his plans. The representatives of the dominions were wheedled back into line by Macmillan, Sandys and Heath, but their endorsement of the vaguely worded memorandum supporting Britain's stand could not be construed as giving the British government carte blanche. The dominions have not had their final say. Nor have the British people.

Now I want to say a few words about the growing viciousness in public life. It is my opinion that a political conscience must be developed if democracy is to function or continue to function in Canada. Downgrading personal attacks and vilification of the Prime Minister of this country, regardless of his political stripe, are wholly unwarranted and unjustified. They create, in my opinion, a lack of respect for the recognized authority of government and debase the character of Canada. They also tend to dilute the political fervour and love of one's country, an atmosphere that is so necessary to developing young Canadians if we ever want them to reach their potential, whatever their avocation may be.

If these scurrilous, unjustified and untrue attacks keep on developing in the trend indicated, then very few men of high calibre will be seeking public office. I am not saying that leaders in public life should be above criticism. They must accept criticism, which is the essence of politics and political life. However, let us make it constructive. There is no place for destructive criticism or vilification in a country so dependent on exporting 30 per cent of its goods and on the importation of foreign capital to develop its resources fully. Note of this was made by the daily newspaper in my hometown of Orillia.

This paper was founded by Mr. C. H. Hale, who still lives in the city, and who is recognized as a great citizen and newspaper publisher. In fact his contribution to newspaper publication was recognized by the University of Toronto in conferring a doctor of laws degree upon him. His newspaper was finally purchased by the Thomson interests. Mr. Farmer Tissington, now in the press gallery took over. He was already on the staff and he carried on the newspaper with the same high sense of responsibility that was characteristic of Mr. Hale. Then Mr. Tissington went to the Thomson chain at Prince Albert and Mr. James Lamb became publisher, with Mr. Peters as editor. The newspaper's high sense of responsibility to its readers has continued, and I would be most remiss if I did not mention one of the very fine columns contributed to it by Mr. Patrick Nicholson from the parliamentary press gallery. It is from this same newspaper, the Orillia Packet and Times, that I wish to quote an editorial in its issue of September 22:

> In the magazine and radio-T.V. field, the grounds are somewhat different. Most of the so-called political commentators who give magazines like Macleans, Saturday Night and Canadian Commentator, and all C.B.C. public forum and political comment programs such a decided leftish slant, are drawn from the same handful of left-wingers whose views range from parlor pink to the sort of fuzzy idealism which is almost a Canadian trademark. To such men Mr. Diefenbaker, with his forthright views, portentous manner and authoritarian leanings is anathema; it is impossible for such men to write objectively of him.

The editorial goes on to state:

> Whatever his limitations, and they are not nearly so many or so marked as his critics would have us believe, history will show Mr. Diefenbaker to have been one of this young nation's ablest leaders. He took office at a time when the Liberals openly admitted they were pleased to get out from under, at a time of apparent economic crisis. His government has introduced a host of measures which have improved the condition of most Canadians, and when the economy was again threatened, he did not hesitate to adopt measures which are proving themselves completely successful.
> On his record he merits the respect of Canadians of all political persuasions. The bitter and unwarranted campaign of hatred and ridicule to which he is currently being subjected does not reflect credit on many of Canada's political commentators.

While attending the commonwealth prime ministers' conference Mr. Diefenbaker spoke to the Canadian club in London. I wish, Mr. Speaker, you could have been there. It is one of the biggest halls I have ever been in, and he delivered a great speech there. He made no reference to the scurrilous attacks being made on him back home, but he built up Canada. Had you been there, Mr. Speaker, you would have been proud to be a Canadian. He stood and spoke to that vast audience on an ankle which could not help but be giving him misery. It was his task to build Canada up, and he did.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you on the honour done you in your appointment to the responsible position of Speaker of the House of Commons. I should also like to congratulate the Deputy Speaker on his appointment, and I would be remiss if I did not compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As a new member I can truly appreciate what an honour it must have been to the two gentlemen concerned and the satisfaction they must feel in having discharged their duty admirably.

The particular aspects of the speeches which followed the speech from the throne which I desire to discuss are those dealing with the unemployment situation generally, the social welfare program of my party, and observations I have to make with respect to the position taken by the other minority parties, particularly that taken by our friends of the New Democratic party.

On the question of unemployment a brief descriptive background of the character of my riding would shed some enlightenment on my primary concern with this question. It is a riding comprising the industrial heart of Hamilton and also, though to a somewhat lesser degree, the industrial heart of Canada. Undeniably it constitutes the steel hub of Canada. Within its boundaries are situated many major industries such as the Steel Company of Canada, Dominion Foundries and Steel, the International Harvester Corporation, Studebaker Corporation, Westinghouse and Dominion Glass, to mention only a few. Thus it can be readily seen it is an industrial riding comprising to a great extent constituents who earn their livelihood through industrial labour.

The continuity of work undertaken by these firms is of vital concern, not only to their employees but to all the people. A slowdown of production or the closing of a particular phase of a productive process reflects on the success of all those whose earnings are of a derivative nature. The small businessman, the man who provides a service, be it professional or otherwise, is deeply concerned with the degree of success enjoyed by these plants. If one or more of these concerns experience difficulty, whether it be a shortage of work resulting in lay-offs, or whether it be strikes, the ill effects which result reverberate throughout the riding, and indeed throughout the whole city.

One cannot enjoy the confidence of the constituents of such a riding without being in deep sympathy with any policy, policies or party which espouses and embraces this primary premise, namely the betterment of those groups of our citizens who earn their living through physical labour of one form or another. One must realize that the security afforded by continuity of earning power can never be taken for granted by such men. That security is of a far more tenuous nature than one would imagine.

For example, look at the industrial worker. A change in government policy or a change in company policy such as the relocation of one particular phase of its operation, or a slowdown in demand for the company's products, or automation, may result in sudden unemployment with truly grievous consequences not only to the confidence such men have in their country and in our way of life, but even more grievously in the resulting effects of loss of confidence in themselves, irreparable damage to their pride, and damage to the so important and essential belief of Canadians in their own independence and self-reliance, to say nothing of the accompanying hardship which results to the family of an industrial worker when he experiences sudden unemployment. His is a family who do not deserve to suffer, a family who deserve, in a country such as ours, all the essential benefits like proper shelter, nourishment and education. That such essential benefits should be so completely predicated on the constant employment of the breadwinner is a thing which should give us all cause to reflect. Unemployment insurance is but small alleviation for such a devastating toll.

This picture is further aggravated by the fact that an industrial centre such as Hamilton is a focal point in the settlement of many recent arrivals to this country, and without adequacy of employment opportunities these people become disillusioned with the capabilities of this, their new country. This initial disillusionment is hardly a healthy initiation into what we regard as our Canadian way of life.

Unemployment is a serious situation in the country. It is reflected in the city of Hamilton today and can be readily ascertained by an examination of the following facts. First, in the month of July, 1961 there were over 7,000 on the relief rolls of the city of Hamilton; this in the supposed peak of our employment period. This does not even take into account all those unemployed persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits. The bill for providing this very necessary relief was over $3 million for the year 1961, over $1 million of which had to be borne by the city.

Second, home construction is presently grinding to a stop, with the resulting unemployment of contractors, labourers and tradesmen of all manner and kind. Third, lay-offs have occurred and are occurring in our principal industries. The monumental failure of this government to take any constructive measures since it first obtained office in 1957 has been amply dealt with since the opening of this session. Needless to say, the lack of any co-ordinated plan for future economic development, the tight money policy of the present government, with its accompanying high interest rates and the abandonment of many public works, are retrograde steps and ones which will only have a tendency to increase this unemployment which plagues our country. Yet this is the party that held out such radiant hope to the people of this country that the plague of unemployment would no longer visit our land.

The inadequacies of the Conservative government have been so thoroughly dealt with in this house that I think this would be an opportune time to look at the position of the New Democratic party in relation to government policy. May I say now that I share the respect of hon. members for the many distinguished and able men of that group, many of whom have proved themselves, in every type of forum, able and articulate debaters.

Their repeated utterances in this house, however, would lead one to believe that only they, fully and sincerely, reflect the aspirations of the Canadian people; that only they embrace the social ideals so necessary for those Canadians who do not share to a sufficient degree the wealth of this country. Their somewhat sanctimonious attitude would seem to pre-empt all the political virtues unto themselves, to the exclusion of all others. This attitude can, and does, become tiresome. It would lead one to believe that they and they alone are solely fit to carry the torch on behalf of those people who do not adequately share in our abundance, that they and they alone are the sole proprietors of political morality. So jealous do they appear at times that one might even suspect that they resent the fact that any adherent of any other organization or group, be it political or otherwise, might desire to champion the cause or causes which they, our friends, have appropriated unto themselves.

The record of my party in the field of social welfare has been a constructive and tangible one over the years, and one of which I, as a Liberal, am justly proud. To name only a few: veterans allowance legislation, family allowance legislation, allowances for the blind legislation, old age pensions legislation, phase 1 of the hospitalization plan and in 1956 phase 2 of the hospitalization plan. This only mentions a few. The Liberal party, over the objections of some in this house, were the party that actually implemented this social welfare legislation which is so integral a part of our everyday life today.

Yet were one to read the text entitled "The New Party", the author of which is the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and were one to be unfamiliar with Canadian history, I am sure he would come to no other conclusion than that the C.C.F. party formed a government in this Canada of ours during the years in which this social legislation was implemented.

Mr. Speaker, I would quote a paragraph from page 12 of that text as a leading example of a tendency toward plagiarism indulged in by the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre. It is as follows:

> It is generally known that old age pensions were first enacted in Canada in 1926 and that this important social advance was achieved then only because J. S. Woodsworth and a few colleagues held the balance of power in the House of Commons. It is also generally known that the promise to bring in old age pensions had been made by the Liberal party at its convention of 1919.

That last sentence, Mr. Speaker, would seem to be a half-hearted endeavour by the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre to be objective. Yet to involve oneself in a dispute as to who was the initial author and as to who first implemented such legislation that is so widely accepted today is a childlike discussion. It would then appear that both parties are grappling for the handle of the torch of social change. It would leave one with the distasteful thought that the two parties are more concerned as to who is to acquire the most progressive public image than in a true implementation of the policies necessary to bring about a greater degree of social justice in this country.

I have heard with interest the comments made by the hon. member from York South (Mr. Lewis) and others of his party in their addresses following the speech from the throne. The comments I am referring to are those dealing with the Liberal party, many of which I consider of questionable accuracy. A few examples would be the following. The hon. member from York South stated:

> I have noticed in recent speeches by spokesmen for the Liberal party that they too say their goal is a balanced budget. I urge this house to reject this outmoded and harmful proposition at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the actual position of the Liberal party, if my friends in the far corner would care to examine it, is that, yes, the Liberal party is for a balanced budget in prosperous times and in times of full employment. The same hon. member, after condemning the Conservative government, went on to say this about the Liberals. Referring to our health plan, he said:

> I call it now a thorough-going sham and a shameful surrender to vested medical interest, because what does that health plan offer? It offers free health services for the aged, the pensioners. If I remember the words correctly, and I am sure I do, the plan said for some of the aged, and never explained what the word "some" meant. I've always assumed that it meant some kind of means test. It offers free medical service to young people under the age of 16. The rest of the community between 16 years of age and the old age pensioners, if I remember the words correctly, are to pay substantially less than half the cost of the medical services; presumably the government would pay substantially more than half.

The hon. member went on to state the hardship involved in such a plan for a worker who earned $3,000 or $4,000 a year. This statement, again, is of questionable accuracy and it is fortunate that the hon. member qualified his remarks with the words "if I remember the words correctly".

An examination by our friends in the far corner of the brochure put out on health care by the Liberal party would reveal these words. The quotation I am now going to give is referring to all Canadians who are not retired, who are not under the age of 16 and who are not unemployed, who will unquestionably receive the benefits of medicare without any contribution:

> For all other Canadians, the plan will cover all doctors' bills above a low annual cost. There will be no charge to anyone who does not go to a doctor. Liberal action will take fear out of health costs. The maximum amount of doctors' bills that anyone will be required to pay will be small; but it will be a safeguard against unreasonable demands for attention.

There, I suggest, is the fundamental principle involved, that the payment contributed by employed persons between the age of 16 and retirement age will be small for the purpose of providing a safeguard only.

The brochure went on to explain how the government would bear the cost and underwrite the expenses of such a program. It is one thing for a party to promote a social welfare program and it is another thing for the party to undertake the responsibility of showing the people how it shall be paid. This latter undertaking by the Liberal party it was, and is, with responsibility and courage, prepared to meet.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Munro: It is all in the pamphlet, if you care to read it accurately.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, this is considerably more than can be said for the program advanced by our friends in the far corner, who never quite seem able to meet the added onus of explaining how their programs are to be financed. This same hon. member, presumably referring to the Liberal brochure to which I have just referred, must have been referring to this statement in his comments. I quote from the pamphlet:

> They—

"They" is referring to the payments made by individuals for the Liberal health scheme:

> They will be designed to cover rather less than a half of the total cost of medical care.

The hon. member for York South did not see fit to quote the sentence immediately preceding that. That statement reads as follows:

> How these payments—

Again referring to payments by individuals > —are made will be arranged in agreement with the provinces.

The brochure went on to say that the federal government will pay the rest of the costs from general revenue. For the hon. member to suggest on the basis of such wording that the plan means that a worker earning $3,000 or $4,000 a year would be required to pay half the cost of medical services is a completely unwarranted interpretation. The pamphlet clearly states that with respect to the amount of less than half the cost not incurred by the federal government arrangements will be made with the provinces. How the wording of the brochure could possibly lend itself to the interpretation given by the hon. member for York South is beyond any powers of objective reasoning.

Again, though the hon. member referred to the program as a thorough-going sham and called it a surrender to vested medical interests, it is worth while noting that he did not care to go into the reasoning establishing such a sweeping generalization. By going into these matters, Mr. Speaker, I hope in some degree to have explained with accuracy the program of the Liberal party and, to an extent, to have defended it against baseless attacks.

Some of the comments made by our friends in the far corner—I have referred to several of them earlier, and I shall refer later to others—lead one to wonder whether that group has forgotten that the Liberal party has not been in power for the last five years. At any rate, sweeping generalizations of a condemning nature, together with name-calling depreciations, are always looked upon, fortunately, by the public with a degree of suspicion and scepticism. Such statements, together with one to which I will refer later, are neither fair nor particularly objective. They would certainly not be conducive to that spirit which the hon. member for York South found so lacking when he was prompted to say:

> I thought of all those problems, sir, and I felt desperately sad because the speeches of the leaders in this house overwhelmed and drowned those problems of life and death in a flood of irrelevant banalities and petty political prattle.

I imagine that when members of that group in the far corner conceive speeches such as this containing statements such as I have just quoted, to say nothing of references to our indecent hunger and dismal acts of yesterday, these must have been some of the thoughts which ran through their minds: "Everyone knows we are perfectly capable of rendering effective speeches dealing with the incompetency of the government in power as was so effectively done not only by our leader, Mr. T. C. Douglas, but by ourselves prior to June 18. But lest anyone misinterpret our remarks we must be equally deprecatory of the official opposition lest the people of this country should take our remarks respecting the government so to heart that they may throw the rascals out, though, not alas, to replace them with our party. No change will we accept, no change will we tolerate, unless it be the change that we want in the manner and to the degree we want it."

Could their thoughts have continued, then, in the following vein? "Even more distressing is the thought that should the people see fit to retire the present government and substitute those unrepentant Liberals, the authors of the dismal acts of yesterday with their indecent hunger for power, they, these Liberals, might implement the social welfare proposals of which their leader, the Hon. Lester Pearson, spoke only so recently. Should this event occur it may be accompanied by the horrifying conclusion on the part of the Canadian people that the necessity for the existence of our little group is superfluous."

Then I imagine their thoughts went on: "To prevent such an unpalatable result, we of the N.D.P. must continue at every given opportunity to rout through the pages of the past, examine in detail all past grievances against previous Liberal administrations and incessantly lay them at their doorstep. We must open every closet hoping to discover skeletons; we must become such experts on the historical background of that party that to every constructive proposal from those Liberal benches we may never be at a loss to indulge ourselves in our now famous and joyous but hardly constructive pastime of saying 'why didn't you do it before?' Times change, things change, ideas become outmoded, parties change—some parties even change their names. Manifestos become outmoded but we must not allow those Liberals to change or adopt new policies, especially if we consider that to be an invasion of our own hallowed ground, lest we be forever relegated to one little corner of this house destined forever more to reflect on the mouldy pages of the past and indulge in our piteous yelps of 'you don't mean it, but we do.'"

To be completely ungracious one might reflect upon the criticisms of the Liberal position made by representatives of the New Democratic party on the subject of the speech from the throne. Everyone knows that the leader of the Liberal party, like his supporters, was critical of the present administration prior to the election. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition indicated before the speech from the throne was forthcoming that the Liberal party had no confidence in this government. The hon. member for York South used the following words in the course of his speech:

> Indecent hunger for power shown by the Liberal party in its announcement of a no confidence motion even before parliament met was, and is, thoroughly irresponsible. Indeed, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if one was unhappy with the bareness of the throne speech one was equally unhappy at the absence of any positive proposals in the speech of the leader of the official opposition.

Are our friends of the N.D.P. suggesting that the Liberal party could justifiably and sincerely indicate confidence in the present government in view of our criticisms, irrespective of whether they were made before parliament met or not? Are sincerity and firm conviction no longer included among those ideals for which our friends in the far corner are prepared to fight? Despite some recent disillusionment, I am still reasonably convinced that had they been the official opposition they would not have repudiated their own election statements by voting confidence in this government. Let us examine those statements. This is what Mr. T. C. Douglas said at Peterborough on June 16 referring to the 7 per cent level of unemployment:

> Mr. Diefenbaker's promise and forecast of today were as meaningless as his practice and policies during the last four years.

Speaking of the devaluated dollar, Mr. Douglas, went on to say:

> Sixty seven per cent of Canada's imports were from the U.S.A. A sharp increase in the cost of living in Canada could be expected soon because of the dollar devaluation.

And he continued:

> The present government has set the stage, through devaluation, for higher interest rates and a tight money situation.
