Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol → (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ▼ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

La bibliothèque des Archives publiques du Canada

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles sulvants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, seion le cas: le symbole → signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ▼ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

Present State of Affairs with AMERICA,

AND

fpect to publick matters, and who feel in their own minds a strong and clear conviction, with regard to any important public question, are apt to suppose, that men who profess to entertain a contrary opinion, are influenced by some base, factious, or corrupt motive. They make no allowance for those natural causes of difference of opinion, which have existed in all ages. They will not condescend to argue patiently with such men, still less will they suffer themselves to suppose, that their own ideas may be in some degree erroneous, and that the truth may lie between the two opposite sentiments.

When civil disputes have gone so far, as to put arms into the hands of each of the parties, the power of argument is then completely at an end.

В

The

The agitation of violent passions confirms more powerfully each of the parties in their first prejudices; and, until some great calamity or some great and unavoidable danger occasions a pause, the voice of reason will in vain endeavour to make itself heard.

The great question which has for many years agitated this country, concerning America, and has lighted the flames of civil war, affords a convincing proof, with how much violence persons of the first abilities, are capable of embracing the opposite sides of doubtful public controversy, at the same time that it furnishes an interesting example, how very little mere force, is calculated to convince the understandings, or to remove the prejudices of mankind; and though much has been wrote and spoken upon the subject, on both sides of the Atlantic, it seems to me, that neither fide have hitherto allowed a fufficient degree of weight to the arguments of their opponents, nor has the question, hitherto, been treated with that calmness, which promised to discover the truth, or with that impartiality, which was calculated to reconcile the natural prejudices of contending parties.

Those who have at all accustomed themselves to resection, are inclined on every occasion, to suspect the fairness of arguments, which are urged with too much zeal. In the present great dispute, the love of Liberty, natural to a Briton, and the principles in which I have been educated, on the one hand, and my attachment to Great Britain, where my property, and all my friends and connexions are fituated, on the other; have all along balanced my mind in such a manner, as to prevent, I trust, my running into the extremes of either party; and as I feel myfelf incapable of being influenced by any base motive, so my care to avoid political connexions of all kinds, has, I hope, preserved my understanding, in some degree at least, from being warped upon this occafion. If, therefore, my talents were equal to the talk, of canvasting properly this great question, there is nothing to obstruct my doing it in a fair, candid, and impartial manner.

The late events in America feem to have occafioned some degree of pause; and I hold it to be the duty of every impartial man, to seize that favourable moment, of laying before the public fuch lights, as he may think of fufficient importance to call for their attention.

The fentiments which I shall deliver, are the result of my own reflections, without a view to ferve either those who are in, or out of office, but with a very fincere defire, to ferve my country in general; and whatever respect I may entertain, for many gentlemen who have enrolled themselves on either side of this question, that respect shall not prevent me, from canvasting the subject with the utmost freedom.

- In treating of this important matter, I will begin with a review of the grounds which have induced the Americans to take up arms, and will confider whether a sufficient weight has been allowed to these motives, on the part of Great Britain. 4 . 3 then examine the grounds and motives of Great Britain, for rejecting the claims of the Colonies, and infifting on the full and uncontrolled exercife of Legislative Power in America; and whether the Americans have given due weight, on their part, to these motives. This examination of the subject, will naturally suggest the reasonableness and practicability of a reconciliation, by which each party will depart in some degree from their pretensions.

I believe there is now no doubt, that the true motive which has united fo great a part of the Americans in the present contest with Great Britain, is the claim of Britain to a power of taxing them by the Parliament here, and of altering their Charters of Government, without any application for that purpose from themselves, by the sole power of our Legislature. If any man doubts that this is the case, let him recollect, that, before the æra of the Stamp Act, there was no instance of any general combination in America, to refift the authority of this country; that such a general combination did immediately take place, after the passing of that act, an agreement, I think, was entered into by most of the Colonies, not to import or to confume any of our goods or manufactures; but so soon as the Stamp Act was repealed, that combination, and the non-importation agreement was dissolved, and great rejoicings were made in consequence of that repeal; in almost every part of America. At that time many pamphlets were published in America, discussing the eat ies, cife her heir the ness hich their truç f the Briixing their cation fole loubts before stance resist eneral ter the , was to immanuas reportapicings in almany culling the

the right of this country to tax them, and pointing out the confequences which might follow, from the admission of such a right. And so soon as a new attempt was made by the Act 7th of His Majesty, to impose another tax upon tea and other articles, the same fort of general combination followed, and the pamphlet, intitled "Let-" ters from a Pennsylvania Farmer," ascribed to Mr. Dickenson, was eagerly and universally read. But when all these taxes, except the tax upon tea, were repealed in 1770, and strong affurances were given, in the name of Government, by the Earl of Hillsborough's circular letter to each of the Colonies, that it was the determined refolution here, to impose no new taxes upon them, the second importation agreement was gradually diffolved, though, as the tea tax was not repealed, fome of the most zealous Americans endeavoured still to keep it on foot: but the general good sense of the people, when their fears were quieted, prevailed then (as I hope and trust it will do now), and harmony was restored. No attempt was at this time made, to alter the Charters of the Colonies, and therefore it does not appear, that their fears were excited with respect to that important point; but the immediate effect in America of the Bill for altering the Charter of the Massachuset's Bay, is a proof of their fentiments concerning the consequences of such a power, vested in the Parliament of Great Britain.

I shall hereaster take notice of the arguments of those who contend, that the Americans had long ago formed the plan of rendering themselves independent of Great Britain, and that the sear of parliamentary taxation was not the motive, but the pretext for taking up arms against this country. At present I shall take it for granted, that our claims to a right of taxation, and of altering their charters of government, were the true motives of the American resistance, and shall consider what degree of justification arises, from the apprehension which they might fairly entertain concerning the exercise of these powers.

When the American Colonies were fuccessively settled, they each obtained from the Crown, charters, establishing a form of civil government; which, though differing a little from each other, yet in all, refembling very much the Constitution of Great Britain. They had each an affembly chosen by the people, a Council resembling our House of Lords, and a Governor representing his By the united concurrence of these three branches, laws were made, which had force to bind all the inhabitants of the respective Colonies, and taxes were by them imposed; but no law or act of their Legislature could continue valid, unless confirmed by his Majesty in council. By this last check, Great Britain was secured, that no act prejudicial to this country could have the force of a law; for, if his Majesty had been advised by his Privy Council, to give his affent to any fuch improper act, there can be no doubt, that those members of the Privy Council, who gave such advice, might have been called to account by Parliament, and subjected to impeachment, as well as for advising any other abuse of the royal prerogative.

On the other hand, by this species of constitution, the Colonies were possessed of a controul, situated upon the spot, and placed in the hands of the representatives of the people, upon the Governor or executive power in each Colony. They had also a general controul upon the administration of justice; and the same fort of general superintending and inquisitorial power, for controlling public abuses of all kinds, which belongs to the House of Commons in this country; and the members of Assembly claimed, and by usage actually enjoyed, all the personal privileges within each Colony, which belong to the members of the British House of Commons.

Every person who has at all considered the Constitution of this kingdom, must know, that the essence of the liberty of a Briton, consists in the controlling power of the two houses of Parliament, without which, the prerogatives necessarily vested in the Crown, and the necessary discretionary power vested in those who administer justice, would, in spite of the best laws, and in spite even of the controll of juries, that inestimable institution, perpetually tend to abuse, and that Britons would otherwise feel in some degree, that degrading

One of the most material supports of the controlling power of the House of Commons in this country, is its power over the public purse, and that no money can be levied upon the people without the vote of that house; and though a very great revenue in taxes is now established by permanent acts, for the interest of the public debts, and other taxes to a large amount are granted to his Majesty for life, as the expence of his civil list: yet the land tax and the malt tax have never been granted as a perpetuity, and for a long time past, these taxes have only been voted annually. Without the grant of thefe, Government, on its present footing, could not go on; for though, in times of peace, the taxes established for the interest of the public debts, afford a surplus called the Sinking Fund, which comes into the Exchequer annually without any new vote; yet that money could not be applied by Government, to any other purpose than the payment of part of the public debts, without consent of Parliament; neither would that furplus, if feized illegally by the executive power, be fufficient to pay the expence of the lowest peace establishment.

His Majesty is therefore under the necessity of calling both Houses of Parliament together annually, in order to have the land and malt tax voted; and when they are called, they have a right effity of her analt tax a right to to inquire into all abuses, and to refuse voting the money until these abuses are redressed.

In former times; the dignity of the Crown was fupported by the revenue of the Crown lands, and the hereditary revenues to which the King, as feudal Lord, was intitled. During that period, the Crown was not under the same necessity, as now, of calling Parliaments annually together, in order to obtain the necessary grants of money; and accordingly it often happened, that Parliaments were not called for many years; by which means, they were deprived of the opportunity of redressing grievances, or of enquiring into abuses. The alienation of the Crown lands, and the abolition of the feudal tenures, has undoubtedly put the Crown more in the power of Parliament than formerly; but as that dependance has obliged the Ministers of the Crown, to pay more attention to the securing a constant majority in Parliament, the burdens of the State have undoubtedly been thereby greatly increased, and this country, pays enormoully, for the change which has happened, in the inode of exercising the influence of the Crown, which formerly confifted in prerogative, but now consists in the influence of Ministers upon the particular Members of both Houses; and upon the Electors of the House of Commons:

I do not however adopt the idea of those, who feem to think, that the corruption of Parliament has arisen to such a pitch, that it has become merely an engine in the hands of Government. There are, I trust, a great majority in both Houses, who would refift with the spirit becoming freemen, any direct attempt in the Ministers of the Crown to overturn the liberties of this country; and I believe and trust, that there is a still greater majority in the kingdom, who would, upon a like occasion, discover their resentment in such a manner, as would make the Members of the Legislature, as well as the Ministers of the Crown. tremble for their own fituation. I do also firmly believe, that the general voice of the nation, will for a long, and I hope for a very long time, controul the proceedings of Parliament, in spite of any corruption of the Members, especially, whilst our standing army is reduced in time of peace. and is composed of native troops, and commanded by gentlemen of property; and that the spirit of our Militia is preserved. But at the same time, I acknowledge, and every man must feel, that the influence of the Crown upon Parliament, is already an alarming circumstance, and that the expence of conducting Government upon that plan is enormous; and as the progress of despotism in this country, by the road of influence, is likely to be flow and almost imperceptible, there is reason to fear, that it may not therefore excite a general alarm, till it be too late; nor can it escape observation, that the standing army of France is almost entirely composed of national troops, and is commanded by the best families in the kingdom; and that in feveral instances in ancient times, and at present in Sweden, Denmark, Russia and Prussia, an army of national troops, has the care of those chains chains, which are wreathed round the necks of their unfortunate fellow-subjects.

At present, undoubtedly, this country enjoys à degree of liberty, which may excite the envy of the whole world: but perhaps there are few amongst us, who have duly considered, that whatever part of our freedom arises from the controul of Parliament, depends upon fo slight a circumstance, as that which I have already mentioned, namely the necessity the Crown is under of calling Parliament together, in order to vote the Land and Malt tax annually, and the Mutiny Bill, which necessity would not exist, if these acts were made perpetual, or to endure for the life of the King. When these bills pass annually in the House of Commons, they are considered so much as a matter of courfe, that unless an augmentation of the Land tax, or other alteration, is proposed, few members give their attendance in the House, and a still limaller number give any attention to a matter of so much real consequence.

The American assemblies did not indeed enjoy the same degree of controul upon the executive power here, because the Government of Great Britain could go on, although they were never called together. But as their grants of money for their own internal government, were annual, as the salames of their Judges and Governors, consisted in part, till lately, of annual grants made by the respective assemblies; and as therefore the public business of the province, could not well go on, without their being annually called together, they had enjoyed that advantage, with very little interruption, till the commencement of the present contest.

The effect which this controul produced upon the prosperity of the American Colonies, has been very remarkable. They have gone on encreasing in wealth and population, in a manner never before experienced in the world, because they enjoyed a degree of happiness and liberty, which, in provinces distant from the seat of Government, has no example in any former age.

Neither this happiness, nor this success, was the child of accident; they have had Governors of all tempers and of all descriptions, but the happiness of the people has notwithstanding been very little interrupted, and their progress in almost every kind of improvement has hardly met with any check. This can only be ascribed to the excellent nature of their government, so happily contrived for controlling all abuse in the executive power, and so well fitted to establish, from time to time, every kind of useful institution for the interest and happiness of the people.

It has been said by a political party-writer, that these assemblies were to be considered in no other light than as corporations or vestries in England, which have power to make bye-laws, and to levy money for certain purposes, but have no pretext to a power independent of the British Parliament.

pendent lace; it is furficient here to observe, that even if it were to be admitted, which is far from being the truth, that they deserved no better name than that of a Vestry, they were Vestries which communicated to the inhabitants of each respective Colony, the same fort of freedem and security, and the same sort of control upon the executive and judicial powers in that country, which the Parliament of Great Britain or the parliament of Ireland, communicate to the inhabitants of these islands.

There can be no doubt, that the parliament of Great Britain had passed many laws to bind America; they had imposed duties upon goods imported into these Colonies, and had subjected their trade to many restrictions; they had even, in some few instances, imposed taxes upon them which may be called internal, though I recollect only that of the Post Office. And it feems to me an undeniable proposition, that before the year 1754, it did not occur to Great Britain on the one hand, nor to America on the other, that there was any reasonable doubt, of the universality of the power of the British Parliament, to bind the Colonies in all cases whatsoever, although that power, except with regard to matters of trade, had been used very sparingly. I am aware of what passed in the reign of King William, and also that at different times some of the Colonies had claimed an exemption from the power of Parliament, and that some of our statutes had not been strictly executed there; but we never had admitted these these claims, and the Colonies had certainly acquiesced.

In the year 1754, however, the matter underwent a very ferious discussion. The common danger of the Colonies from the impending French war, occasioned a meeting at Albany, of Commissioners from many of the Colonies, who formed a plan, for establishing a Grand Council, of members to be chosen by the several Assemblies. which, with a Go ernor General to be appointed by the Crown, should be empowered to make general laws to raise money in all the Colonies for the defence of the whole. This plan was fent to Government here, for approbation. The plan was not approved; but a new one was formed in place of it, by which it was proposed, that the feveral Governors, and one or two members of each Council should assemble, and be empowered to determine on proper measures for the common fafety, and to draw upon the Treasury of England for the necessary expence, and that the Treasury should be reimbursed by a tax upon America, to be imposed by the British Parliament. This new plan was communicated by Governor Shirley to Dr. Franklyn, then at Boston, who having delivered his fentiments upon it in conversation, he was defired by Governor Shirley, to commit to writing the particulars which he had stated in that conversation. This he did in a letter addressed to the Governor, which occasioned a second conversation and a second letter. These letters were no doubt transmitted home by Governor Shirley,

Governor Shirley, Shirley, and I dare say will be sound in the proper office here, and the effect of them was, that no mention was made of taxing America during that war. A Congress was afterward authorised to meet, and several requisitions for aids were made in name of the Crown to the American assemblies, which were complied with, in a very liberal manner. The letters were afterwards published in the London Chronicle of 8th February 1766, and have since been republished in a French Edition of Dr. Franklyn's works. I have now subjoined them in the Appendix.

In these letters, the American objections to their being taxed by the British Parliament, are fully, ably, and clearly stated; and those who read them with attention, will probably think, that hardly any thing new has since been suggested upon that subject.

The substance of the argument contained in the letters is, that the Americans, by the restrictions imposed upon their trade, did in fact contribute their proportion to the general public expences: That therefore any farther taxation would be unjust: That they are not represented in the British Parliament, and therefore the power of taxing them could not be safely trusted there: That their own affermblies were competent to the power of taxing them, and being chosen by themselves, were not likely to abuse that power: That the compelling the Colonies to pay money without their consent, would be like raising contributions in an enemy's country, and would be treating them like conquered people, and not as true British subjects.

These papers prove beyond dispute, that the American objections to parliamentary taxation, were not first suggested by factious men here, but were the refult of ideas, which naturally occurred, from a confideration of the subject; amongst Dr. Franklyn had indeed been in themselves. England in his early youth, but returned to America in 1728, long before this question was started, and resided in America till about the year 1758. The light which the Earl of Chatham may have derived from these letters, will, perhaps, account for the line of conduct which he observed, in avoiding all attempts to tax America, during the war of 1756, though that war was confidered, as undertaken chiefly, on account of our American Colonies, and also for the opposition which he gave to that measure, when proposed by Mr. Grenville, and for the uniform fentiments which he has entertained concerning it ever fince.

Having premifed these observations, let us consider the merits of this question, a little more closely.

It must appear, I acknowledge, at first sight, an extraordinary proposition to an Englishman, that there should be any bounds to the power of King, Lords, and Commons, which, from his infancy, he has been taught to consider as supreme; and it will be difficult for him to admit, that the Parliament of England, which has protected the liberties of this country, and has exercised without controul the power of taxing us, should not be considered, as sit to be trusted, with the power of taxing the Colonies; that when so great a part of the inhabitants of this kingdom, are taxed without being represented, the Americans should pretend, that the same practice ought not to extend to them, and that they can be well-founded, in maintaining so dangerous a doctrine, as that the supreme power of the State is limited in its authority, and the unity of empire destroyed, with respect to a particular part of that State, and with respect to a part too, which was considered as very unequal to a contest with the whole.

But the best method of judging fairly, in questions with others, is to put one's self in the opposite place.

Let us fairly confider, for what reason it is, that the British Parliament has been trusted, almost without complaint, for fo many ages, with the power of taxing the unrepresented part of England, in order to fee, if the fame reason will apply to America; for I do not deny, that Parliament does in this island, tax great bodies of people who are not reprefented; and I also admit, that the actual representation of the people of Great Britain is very far from being perfect. It may be true, in fome measure, that every foot of land is reprefented; but when we consider, that the whole counties of England fend only eighty, and Scotland thirty, and Wales twelve Members to Parliament, out of five hundred and fifty-fix, the total number of the House of Commons; it is in vain to argue, that the people of England are represented in a proper manner, by those who are elected by the owners of land; and as the Constitution has allowed a numerous separat. Representation for the towns, it may be fairly said, that all those considerable towns which send no Members, such as Manchester, Birmingham, Halifax, &c. and a great part of our people besides, are not represented in Parliament.

But the true reason, why so little inconvenience has heen hitherto felt, from this defect or inequality of Representation, must, I apprehend, be deduced from a circumstance, which, so far as I know, has never been sufficiently attended to, by any political writer, and which, though established by no law, is of the utmost importance in this Constitution. I mean the usage of Parliament, by which it imposes all taxes in a general manner, fo as not to tax any particular district or part of the kingdom, while other parts of the kingdom are not taxed; but imposes the tax on all persons possessing the property, or consuming the taxed commodity, in whatever part of the kingdom they refide. The Land Tax, and Window Tax, for example, are imposed upon all the land and windows of England, in whatever county fituated; and are not imposed on Yorkshire alone, whilst all the other counties pay nothing. In like manner, the Malt Tax is not imposed on the malt made in one county only, but on all the malt made any where in England. place, and the duties of Excise extend to all excifeable goods in every part of the kingdom. There are many instances indeed of special Acts of Parliament, obtained upon petition of the inhabitants, by virtue of which duties are levied in particular places, and not elsewhere; but the money is, in such instances, directed to be applied to public purposes in that particular place, which precludes any objection to the tax. I believe, however, there is an instance or two, of duties levied at the port of London, particularly on coals, which duties are not levied in any other ports of the kingdom; and yet the produce of the duties is not appropriated to public purposes within London or Middlesex, and I am not at present able to explain the reason of that deviation from the general rule. But the usage, as to all public taxes for the exigencies of the State, may, notwithstanding, be considered as universal; namely, that they are not confined to any particular place, but are general over the whole kingdom. W

The effect of this usage, with respect to the point in question, is of much more consequence than may at first sight appear. Though Manchester and Birmingham, for example, are not represented; yet, as the tax which affects them, is at the same time imposed upon all the places in the kingdom which are represented, if the tax were grievous and oppressive, it would excite a general disgust, and the voice of the people in general, being against it, would check and controut, not only the error, but even the corruption of Parliament. I do not lay much weight in this case upon another circumstance, that, by the universality of the tax, it must affect the Members of Parliament themselves, who vote for it; because it is impossible to disguise, that as things now stand, the majority of both houses may enjoy such emoluments from the Crown, as will more than compensate their particular share of the tax; but as they will not o ly tax themselves, but their constituents, and not only their constituents, but the whole body of the people, an irrefiftible check must thence arise, to every remarkable abuse of the power of taxation, until, by the means of a numerous standing army, the liberties of the people are entirely at an end.

The effect of this check, arising from the univerfality of all taxes, operates, we know, with respect to Scotland, which certainly could not otherwife be protected, by fo fmall a representation as forty-five Members out of five hundred and fiftyfix: nor by the stipulation made at the Union, by which the amount of the land tax is in some degree limited as to that country. That limitation is not absolute, so as to prevent the land tax from being ever increased; but is wisely contrived in such a manner, as to render the English Members, the protectors of Scotland; for it was stipulated, that when the land tax in England should amount to 1,997,7631. 8s. 41.d. the land tax in Scotland should be only 48,000 h free of all charges, by which ges, by which If Parliament should deviate from this usage, and should attempt to tax Yorkshire, for example, when no other county was taxed, every one must see, that the thirty members sent from that county, could afford to it, very little protection against the remaining sive hundred and twenty-six Members which compose the House of Commons; and the tax would be unjust, because in voting such a question, the other Members could in no sense be considered as virtually representing Yorkshire, their interest not being the same with that of Yorkshire, but directly opposite; for by taxing Yorkshire, they would diminish the burden upon themselves and upon their constituents.

But although the protection of any particular part of the kingdom, against the proceedings of Parliament, is not so much sounded on the votes of the actual members sent from thence, as upon the universality of the proceedings of Parliament, which therefore naturally unites, not only all the Members, but the whole kingdom, in opposing what is wrong; yet representation is, on many other accounts, of great moment to those places which elect Members, for it immediately and intimately connects each individual of the electors, and all their friends and even acquaintance, with the representative and his friends, and thereby secures to them a degree of protection from injury and oppression, which, with respect to the inferior orders of mankind, exists no where else in any quarter of the globe. This fort of protection extends much wider in England than it does in Scotland, because in England the right of voting descends to a much lower class, and, accordingly, the common people of England have evidently stronger seelings of independence, than those of other countries.

These are some of the great advantages, which the inhabitants of this island derive from representation in Parliament. In the considerable towns, which send no Members, there are always great numbers of voters for the furrounding counties, or for other towns which send members, who communicate protection to the rest, and the whole representatives of England, are to them a protection, against exorbitant taxation.

America has deprived them of many of the infportant advantages of Englishmen, and therefore the same taxes which we impose upon ourselves, whilst we deprive them of an equal privilege in trade, if we were to tax them further, we must do it by a special tax to be levied in America only, and no part of it to be levied on ourselves. therefore of a common interest in our five hundred and fifty-fix Members of Parliament, to protect them from taxation, our whole body of reprefentatives would have a common interest to tax them, in order to lessen the burden on ourselves, No murmurs from England can be expected to arise, upon occasion of any new tax to be paid by America, but on the contrary an universal joy and approbation. No member would run the risk of offending his constituents, or of losing his seat, by voting for fuch a tax; he would read in the countenances of his friends and acquaintance, no marks of disapprobation; he would see in his neighbourhood no fymptoms of the mischiefs arising from the most oppressive taxes; the cries of the Americans, from beyond the Atlantic, would hardly reach his ears; and as he is not elected by them, there cannot exist that connection, which would bind him to afford any individual, his protection from the most illegal insult and violence.

This is not all; if the practice of taxing America here had been once firmly established, does any man doubt, that the executive power, the governors, judges, and officers of all kinds, would soon have been rendered entirely independent of the people and assemblies of that country, so as to leave their conduct without any control existing there.

there. Many steps had been taken with that view, whilst our right of taxation existed only in idea, and we had established Courts of Admiralty, and of Vice Admiralty, for the trial of a great variety of causes, without the controul of a jury, sounded on a suspicion, that our Government was so disagreeable to the people, that juries there were not to be trusted, but would perjure themselves, rather than give verdicts agreeable to truth and justice.

Can it be doubted, that if we had established the power of raising money in America by our own votes, we would foon have found, that the Provincial Affemblies were nurseries of faction, and that they tended only to clog the wheels of Government? Is it to be supposed, that our Governors would have wished to preserve such a check upon their own proceedings; and would we not have liftened more readily to the reprefentations of our Governors, than to the remonstrances of a helpless unprotected people?—Would not the confequences have been, that, by degrees, the calling of affemblies in the Colonies would have been entirely discountenanced; and would not then a degree of despotism necessarily have ensued, in every part of that continent? Every object of ambition in that country would have been at an end; the consciousness of security, and of independence, which is the pride and glory of free men, would have been banished from every breast; the dispositions and principles, the baseness, treachery, cowardice, and indolence, which are the

It may be faid, that no despotism could have been established there, because they would still have enjoyed the laws of England; but what are the laws of England, without the check of Parliament upon the executive and judicial powers, and without the protection of juries; and is it certain, that we would long have fuffered them to enjoy the laws of England? Had we not already, in a great measure, deprived them of juries, in questions with the Crown, by means of our Admiralty Courts? Have we not deprived the inhabitants of Canada of juries, except in criminal cases; and have we not refused that inestimable privilege to our settlements in the East Indies? How little care did we heretofore take, in the appointment of proper judges to be fent to America? Of late, indeed, some attention had been shown to that department, but how shamefully had the prerogative been for a long time perverted, in that important and facred branch?

Besides the natural tendency, which Parliament uncontrolled, would have had, to impose taxes on America; the Ministers of the Crown, would, in suture times, have had a peculiar incitement to increase the public revenue in that quarter, because it would have afforded an opening for great numbers of new offices, to be enjoyed by their dependants here, and executed there, by half starved and rapacious deputies.

It feems to me, that America, under such a fystem, must have stood in the same situation with respect to this country, in which the people of England would have stood with respect to the Crown, if the claims of Charles the First, to levy money by his own authority, had prevailed. They would have been subject to be taxed by a power which had no natural check or motive to fpare them, except what might arise from humanity and indulgence. It was argued for Charles the First, that the Parliament was factious: that it obstructed the public service; that his Majesty could not be inclined to oppress his people, fince his own glory and prosperity was connected. with theirs; that his Privy Counsellors, and those appointed by him to high offices, would naturally be chosen from amongst the principal men in the kingdom, who could not be supposed to concur in any thing injurious to the facred liberties of their country; that the right of the Crown to levy ship-money, was established by innumerable precedents, and was not a new right; and that, therefore, those who contended against it, were merely a fet of fanatical factious men, who wished to make themselves of importance to the prejudice of the established constitution of the kingdom. These fort of arguments had at that time fuch weight, that they imposed on the understandings of a great part of the kingdom, and the pretentions of Charles the First were supported by a large proportion of the English nobility. Fortunately, however, these pretensions did not prevail.

vail, and the exclusive right of Parliament to grant the money of the people, was vindicated, though not without the effusion of torrents of blood.

It will make little difference, that in this cafe it is not a fingle person, under the title of King, who claims the power of levying money on the Colonies, but the united power of King, Lords, and Commons; for, with respect to America, that united body of men stand exactly in the place of one Monarch; they are as much difengaged from all check or controul, arising from the perfons who are the objects of taxation, as Charles I. was with respect to the people of England; and the experience of mankind has shewn, that free states have often exercised a more cruel and relentless tyranny, over other states subject to their dominion, than has been usually practifed by a fingle Monarch. Our own history proves, that the conduct of those great defenders of freedom, who established the Revolution, was not a little despotic, with respect to America,

Such then was the prospect of America, if they had patiently submitted to Parliamentary taxation; and I think I can appeal to the breast of every honest Englishman, whether, if he had been settled in America, and had viewed the matter in this light, he would not have sacrificed the last drop of his blood, rather than have submitted to such a claim.

That the true ground of distinction, between our taxing the unrepresented part of England, and taxing America, has not been heretofore sufficiently attended to, will appear, by examining the various political tracts which have been wrote to prove our right, and the justice of the present Doctor Tucker, Dean of Gloucester, has canvassed this subject very ably, in a treatise, lately republished with four other tracts, entitled, " Letter from a Merchant in London to his Ne-" phew in America," which was wrote before the present civil war commenced. I have annexed, in the Appendix No. II. an Extract from that work, and another Extract from a pamphlet which has passed through many editions, entitled, "The " Rights of Great Britain afferted against the " Claims of America, being an answer to the De-" claration of the General Congress." In neither of these ingenious publications, is any notice taken of this important distinction, though every other argument, which either has been, or perhaps can be urged in favour of America, is very fully and learnedly discussed.

Mr. Grenville too, in the House of Commons, when he opposed, out of office, the repeal of the Stamp Act, appears, by the printed account of his Speech, to have defended the system of taxing America, upon no other ground, than the power of Parliament to tax the unrepresented part of England. The Earl of Chatham, indeed, in the rapidity of a reply, slightly touched the distinction, in one sentence, but did not, I think, dwell sufficiently upon it, to bring it home to the seelings and understandings of the nation. His words, in answer to Mr. Grenville, as printed, were these, mining wrote present er, has treatife, ntitled, his Nefore the nnexed, m that et which , "The inst the the Deneither ce taken ry other iaps can ully and

mmons, al of the nt of his f. taxing power of of Engtinction, well fuffeelings vords, in the feelings words, in

The Gentleman tells us of many who are taxed and are not represented. The India Company, Merchants, Stockholders, Manusacturers. Surely many of these are represented in other capacities, as owners of land, or as freemen of boroughs. It is a missortune that more are not actually represented. But they are all Inhabitants, and, as such, are virtually represented. They have connections with those that elect, and they have influence over them. The gentleman mentioned the Stockholders. I hope he does not reckon the debts of the nation as a part of the national estate.—"

That the Americans, however, felt the full force of this objection, though they have not stated it in words, there can be no doubt. The queftion was stirred in 1754, and the dangerous confequences explained by Dr. Franklyn, refiding in America, long before the Stamp Act. That fubfequent attempt, by Mr. Grenville, in 1764, recalled their attention to it, and it was discussed in many printed pamphlets, and in most of their news-papers. It is well known, that the lowest class of people in America, are taught to read, and that publications concerning public matters, which being untaxed are cheaper there than here, are univerfally dispersed. In such a country, it was easy to interest every man, from the highest to the lowest, in a question of such infinite importance to all; and this feems to account fufficiently for the united and persevering resistance, they have hitherto successfully made.

Whether from the amazing force of this country, we might not have fuddenly overwhelmed them, if the degree of refistance had been fore-feen, is a question, which it is not necessary for me to discuss, my object being only to examine the grounds they had for that resistance.

But it may be faid, that if it is admitted, that Parliament had always exercised a supreme authority over the Colonies, it is not a sufficient ground to overturn an established right, to assert, that such a right is liable to abuse, and that good reasons can be given why it ought never to have existed.

I allow that this argument has great weight, because a contrary doctrine would unhinge most of the Governments which now exist in the world; but in the present case, the exercise of taxation, with the express view of raising a revenue in the Colonies, was an innovation; the Colonies had not acquiesced in it; the matter came to be discussed upon the first avowed attempt; they faw the danger, and as it was contrary, in their apprehenfion, to the spirit of the Constitution, which in this island has established constitutional checks upon those who impose public taxes, it is not to be wondered that the Americans resisted the claim. The right of Charles I. to levy ship-money with out the confent of Parliament, was much better founded in precedent, than our right to tax America; but our ancestors wisely thought, that even these precedents, however strong, could not support a power which was fo dangerous to their liberties.

But it has been faid, that the Americans had ail along a scheme of Independence, and that our claim of taxation was only the pretext made use of for relistance, and not the cause; that this was discovered by Monsieur Montcalm, when in Canada, as appears by his letters lately published; and that after the conquest of Canada, when they were relieved from the apprehension of the French power, their plan, which had been long meditated, was completely formed, and the struggle must have taken place fooner or latter; and that it was an advantage to us to bring it to a trial of force now, rather than at a later period, when their power and their resources would have been greater; and that it was particularly fortunate for us to bring the question to a determination by arms, at a time when we were at peace with all the rest of the world.

This argument, I know, has made impression on many fair and honourable minds, and therefore it deserves a particular examination.

The following reasons convince me, that the Americans, in general, had no desire to render themselves independent of the British government.

In the first place, it is a certain truth, that mankind are not disposed to alter a government to which they have been long accustomed, and under which they have enjoyed felicity; but no people ever enjoyed a greater degree of prosperity and happiness, than existed in America, till the idea of taxing them was adopted in this kingdom; they fubmitted to the laws of trade; they even fubmitted to the Admiralty Courts, where the judges, uncontrouled by a jury, were till lately, paid by a These Admiralty share of the condemnations. Courts, were empowered to judge in revenue queftions, with a view to enforce more strictly the laws of trade; and we refused to trust such questions to juries, from a suspicion, in my opinion, weak and ill-grounded, and rather chose to risk the difgust which might arise in America from the partial and interested determinations of very low men, whom we appointed judges, than run the hazard of a few cargoes escaping condemnation, by the partiality of juries, who were to give their verdicts upon oath.

With the same view to taxation, we determined to make the Governors and Judges independent of the Provincial Assemblies. Before the idea of taxation took place, it was the practice for the Assemblies to vote a salary to the respective Governors, and also to the Judges, and no inconvenience to this country was felt from it; but much good arose to the Colonies, from this control over the executive and judicial powers; but when we proposed to counteract the inclinations of the people, it became necessary to remove all control upon those whom we should appoint to these offices.

The republican form of the American constitutions, then too, began to give us disgust, for, from the reign of King William till then, we had felt no inconvenience that deserved to be mentioned) - tioned from that circumstance; and, if their conflitutions were such as gave satisfaction, and secured good order in each Colony, what motive but taxation could induce us to find sault with them?

From fimilar motives it was, that James II. attempted to destroy the constitutions of all the corporations in England, by virtue of quo warrantos, because he wished to govern without controul. The resistance made to him, and to his father Charles I. did not proceed from any previous plan of independency, but certainly arose from their encroachments; and yet the affertors of our liberties, in those times, were accused of acting merely from ambitious views.

That the Colonies in America might have been governed with ease, if we had entertained proper fentiments, is proved, to my conviction, by the following fact: - The constitution of the Masachusetts Bay is, by far, the most republican of any in America, Rhode Island perhaps excepted. It is that Colony which has always been considered as the most averse to the English government, and to have been chiefly instrumental in lighting up the present slame in Ame-In that Colony not only was the Assembly chosen by the people, but the Council, which, in most of the other Colonies, is appointed by the Crown, or by the Governor, is there chosen by the new Affembly, and fuch Members of the old Assembly as are not re-elected, the Governor having only, I think, a negative. Notwithstanding this this is the form of the constitution, yet I am affured, by undoubted authority, that it has almost always happened, that the persons supported by the interest of the Governor, have been chosen Councellors; and that in no instance, for many years back, was the election of the Council carried against the wishes of the Governor, except that of the last Council, which was chosen immediately before the Masachusetts Charter Bill; and, notwithstanding the agitation of men's minds at that critical period, it required a great deal of address and stratagem, even then, to carry the election of the Council against the Governor*.

Nor will this appear extraordinary to those, who consider the great weight, which the executive power always must have, in every country, where attention is paid to govern mankind agreeable to their inclinations. The office of Councellor was in that Colony an object of ambition, and those who aspired to obtain it, knew the importance of having the support of the Go-

The stratagem, I am told, was this: An eminent politician there suggested to his friends, that he thought, in the agitation which then prevailed, they might be able, by address, to carry the election of Councellors against the Governor. He proposed to elect Mr. Hancock Speaker of the Assembly; and, as he was sure the Governor would make use of his negative, and reject him, the Assembly, he said, would be instanced, and if the election of Councellors was immediately brought on, he hoped their list would have a majority. This plan was followed, and the election of Councellors was carried by a small majority.

vernor's interest in the Assembly; by adding that weight to the scale of either candidate, the party which he espoused was sure to prevail.

The Governor had few offices of profit to beflow, and no fund for bribery out of the public money, and yet, by common attention in managing the passions of men, the influence of the office of Governor was, at all times, very great in that settlement, though not always held by men of the first abilities.

2dly, The Colonies have uniformly denied this charge of independence; not only has it been denied by the Congress in their printed declaration, but it has been denied in still stronger terms by the particular Colonies, Thus the Colony of North Carolina. in their address to the inhabitants of the British Empire, dated 8th Sept. 1775, has disclaimed the accufation with evident marks of honest sincerity. "We " have been told that independence is our obriect; that we feek to shake off all connection " with the Parent State. Cruel fuggestion! do not all our professions, all our actions, uni-" formly contradict this? We again declare, and we invoke that Almighty Being, who fearthes " the recesses of the human heart, and knows " our most fecret intentions, that it is our most " earnest wish and prayer to be restored, with " the other united Colonies, to the state in " which we and they were placed before the year " 1763, disposed to glance over any regulations " which Britain had made previous to this, and

" which feem to be injurious and oppressive to " these Colonies, hoping that, at some future " day, she will benignly interpose, and remove " from us every cause of complaint."

The Congress, in the declaration setting forth the causes of taking up arms, 6th July, 1775, has been also very explicit:-" Lest this decla-" ration should disquiet the minds of our friends " and fellow-subjects, in any part of the Empire, " we assure them, that we mean not to dissolve " that union which has fo long and fo happily " subsisted between us, and which we sincerely " wish to see restored. Necessity has not yet " driven us into that desperate measure, or in-" duced us to excite any other nation to war " against them. We have not raised armies " with ambitious defigns of feparating from " Great Britain, and establishing independent " states. We fight not for glory or for con-" quest. We exhibit to mankind the remark-" able fpectacle of a people attacked by unpro-" voked enemies, without any imputation or " suspicion of offence. They boast of their pri-" vileges and civilization, and yet proffer no " milder conditions than fervitude or death."

If it is faid that these declarations are not to be trusted, it cannot be denied, that they are a proof, at least, that those who made them thought it unfafe to declare any other fentiments, and that therefore the great body of the people were averse to the idea of independency, and, in such 3dly, It is well known, that after the fate of their last petition to his Majesty, and after all the acts which we afterwards passed, yet, when the vote of independency was proposed to the Congress, it was carried by a very small majority the first day, and on the second day the votes were equal, so that the question went off for that time.

4thly, As I know of no facts which prove that the Americans in general entertained ideas of independency, before our plan of taxation, and as they could not, I think, have any reasonable motive for entertaining that idea, fo there are many facts which prove the contrary. quest which they made after these disputes commenced, to be put upon the fame footing as they were in 1763; and the petition of the Congress to his Majesty, presented to the Secretary of State on the 1st of Sept. 1775, feem to me convincing proofs that independency was not their aim. That petition concludes in the following manner: "We " the score befeech your Majesty, that your royal " authority and influence may be graciously inter-" poied, to procure us relief from our afflicting " fears and jealousies, occasioned by the system " before mentioned, and to fettle peace through " every part of your dominions, with all humility " fubmitting to your Majesty's wife consideration, whether it might not be expedient, for facili-" tatin which the united applications of your faithful Colonists to the Throne, in pursuance of their Common Councils, might be improved into a

Our breasts retain too tender a regard, for the kingdom from which we derive our origin, to request such a reconciliation, as might in any manner be inconsistent with her dignity or her welfare."

If it be far the Americans, in general might not aim at Adependence, yet, that this was the idea of many leading men amongst them, and would, one day or other, have been the general It first remains to be proved, that any such men existed among them. It is plain that Dr. Franklyn, in 1754, entertained no fuch notion; and, if it had been the opinion of some particular persons, will any wife man believe, that if our government in that country had been well administered, the favourable opinions of the great body of the people, could have been perverted fo much, as to make them renounce prefent ease, happiness, and security, to pursue an uncertain phantom, which, when attained, might difappoint their fanguine hopes?

5thly, I think it plain, that his Majesty's Ministers did not believe, that independency was the general wish of America; and if they who had an opportunity of the best intelligence upon the subtł

ľub~ ject ject did not believe it, I think it impossible that there could be any truth in the accufation. That they did not believe it, feems to me, to be proved by the famous circular letter of Lord Hillsborough; after the repeal of all the duties imposed by the act 7th of his Majesty, except on tea, and addreffed to the American Governors, to be communicated by them to the feveral affemblies. that letter, the most positive assurances were given, that it was not the intention to impose any further duties upon America by authority of the British Parliament; but is the Colonies had serioully been thought to aim at independency, to what purpose was this declaration. If, on the other hand, it was believed, that the true cause of their uneafiness, proceeded from our claim to taxation; these assurances were proper, and calculated to answer a good purpose, as they certainly did.

If his Majesty's Ministers had believed independency to be a prevailing idea in America, would they have sent so inconsiderable a force, as they did at first, under general Gage, sufficient only to quell a sew factious rioters; or would they have affirmed, as they did repeatedly to Parliament, that the friends of Government were very numerous in America, and that it was only the violence of a sinall number of factious men, which had prevented our friends from shewing their inclinations? The conciliatory proposition of Lord North, moved in the House of Commons, 27th February, 1775, and the act of Parliament, empowering the Crown to send out Commissioners to grant pardons, and with private instructions, probably of a more extensive nature, would have been ridiculous, if administration had seriously believed, that the Americans in general aimed at independence.

6thly, If independence had been in the contemplation of America, can we suppose, that they would have left themselves so ill provided with the means of supporting it, as they certainly were at the beginning of these consusions?

The riot at Boston in 1774, when the tea was destroyed, was merely a resistance to a particular tax they disliked, and not the result of any deep laid scheme of independence*; at the same time, it would not have been surprising, if the Americans had been much better prepared than they were for resistance, considering the conduct of Parliament soon after the regular of the Stamp Act, when the plan of taxation was resumed, and the unnecessary and unproductive tax upon tea was repeatedly resulted to be repeated.

It seems unfair, to urge as a proof that they aimed at independence, the speculations of philosophers, with respect to the probable state of America, at a distant period of time, when it is supposed, their numbers and wealth shall greatly exceed those of this country. These speculations, however ingenious, are merely conjectural, and could not be supposed the real motives of conduct, in the minds of any confiderable part of the present inhabitants of America.

With respect to the letters of Monsieur Montcalm, I believe them to be sictitious, and certainly their authenticity is by no means ascertained. If they had been genuine, it is not probable that they would have been so long of making their appearance; but it was easy to prophecy, as these letters do, after the event had happened. There have been so many publications in France, of letters as genuine, which were afterwards discovered to be the mere works of imagination, that no wise man would chuse to rest his belief, concerning a point of so much consequence, upon the chance that these letters are not invented, but real.

But it will be faid, their late declaration of independence, is a decifive proof that they had no other object from the beginning. Was the republican establishment in England, after the long struggle with Charles the First, a proof that the great body of the people of England took up arms from the beginning, in order to establish a republic? If I have been successful in shewing, that the Americans had just grounds for the most ferious alarm, from our claims of a power to tax them here, to which we added, a claim to alter their charters of Government; if they had more than an intimation, by the Quebec Bill, what was the fort of constitution we wished to introduce in all the provinces, we have no need to fearch further, for motives sufficient to induce a jealous, enlightened, and high-spirited people, to take up arms, arms, without supposing that independency was ever their object. But when they found that we paid no attention to their fears and jealousies, but that, after fending a force to Boston under General He re, which was compelled afterwards to leave it, we prepared and fent out a much greater force, and passed several acts of Parliament, which showed our disposition to reduce them to unconditional fubjection; but above all, when not only the petition from New York was refused by Parliament, but his Majesty was advised to reject, without an answer, the last petition of the Congress; it seems to me, that the Americans had no option left, but either to fubmit as a conquered people, and depend on the generofity of those, who had been taught to view them in the most contemptible light, or to declare themselves independent, in order to establish some regular form of government amongst themselves, and to entitle them to treat for affiftance with other powers.

From the view I have taken of the subject, I think it must appear to every man who will permit himself to judge without prejudice, that the objection of the Americans to their being taxed by this country, was not an unreasonable caprice, but of a most serious and important nature; and that the British Parliament, being neither elected by them, nor imposing at the same moment on themselves and their constituents, the taxes they were to vote on America, had not those constitutional checks, to prevent an abuse of that danger-ous power, which is in truth the essence of the British

British Constitution. It will also appear, that by the fystem adopted with respect to the Colonies, in establishing a monopoly of their trade, we had in fact exacted from them a proportion of our public burdens; that if we had been willing to give them a representation in the British Parliament, it would have afforded them a very feeble protection, unless every tax imposed upon America was to be at the same time imposed upon ourfelves; that we could not, in justice, impose upon them all our own taxes, and yet tax them at the same time, by preserving our monopoly; and that even, if a method could have been devised, of fixing a proportion to be paid by them now, as a full equivalent for their present proportion of the public taxes, and that they should never pay more in future, except a fimilar proportion of fuch increase of taxes as we might hereaster make upon ourselves; yet still they would not have been put upon a fair footing with us, unless they were allowed to fend representatives to Parliament, in order to guard both us and themselves against any such increase; and it would have been farther necessary, in strict justice, that our laws of trade with respect to America should have been fixed, so as to prevent any possible increase of the burden upon them in that respect; for as these laws are not of a general nature, but are made to burden America only, without at the same time burdening our own constituents, the British Parliament would, in all questions of that kind, have wanted that constitutional check, which is G 2 the the effence of the power of taxation, and the supposed representatives from America would have been able to make too seeble a desence in such fort of questions against the united interest of all the other Members of our British House of Commons. And after all, these colonies would still have suffered many disadvantages by the want of a legislative power amongst themselves.

I believe there are few, even of the most zealous in support of the American war, who would in private conversation affert as their opinion, that his Majesty's American subjects ought to be on a worse footing with respect to taxation, than the inhabitants of Great Britain. On the contrary, the constant language is, that the Americans demand privileges which do not belong to Britons; that they ought to bear their proportion of the public burdens; that they have taken arms in the face of the law of the land, and the constitution of the empire; and that not contented with a participation of the happy constitution of this country, they have aimed at privileges, in claiming an exemption from Parliamentary taxation, which we in this island do not enjoy; that this war is meant to restore liberty to the Americans, to restore to them the rights and privileges of the British Constitution, and to rescue them from the despotism of their factious leaders, and of that Congress which they had elected.

But from what has been faid, I apprehend it to be clear and manifest, that the power of taxing America cannot be trusted with the British Parliament, ve ch liament, with the same safety, as the power of taxing Britain; that the Americans would be on a worse sooting than us, and would be destitute of those checks, which control in Britain the abuse of taxation; and that when we insist upon putting them on that sooting, we desire what is unreasonable for us to ask, and for them to submit to.

Ought they not then to contribute to the burdens of the state? They certainly ought, and by the restrictions imposed on their trade, they certainly do contribute very largely; but perhaps they do not contribute their full proportion; the long possession of their exclusive trade, has, I believe, given such advantages to the British manufacturers, that they are now able to furnish a great part of our manufactures to the Americans, cheaper than they could be purchased elsewhere; and therefore, the confining the Americans to take these from us, is no hardship upon them, and is, in truth, unnecessary for us. I believe too, that much relaxation might be made with respect to the regulations of their trade, with great advantage to them, and without any material injury to us; and if that were done, they certainly ought to contribute in another way, to the public burdens of the State.

But I would wish to know, if we might not safely trust, that such contribution would be chearfully granted by their own assemblies; as is done by the Parliament of Ireland. There is certainly nothing unconstitutional in that mode of obtaining a contribution from part of the empire, otherwife Ireland would not have been so long exempted from Parliamentary taxation.

It has been faid, however, that such a mode might become dangerous to the liberty of this country, because the King would thereby have the means of levying money without the consent of the British Parliament, and by obtaining money from the American Assemblies, the Crown might, at some critical period, be rendered independent of the British Parliament.

But this objection, which applies equally to the case of Ireland, is certainly not sounded on any very probable conjecture, and could easily be obviated, both with respect to Ireland and the Colonies, by passing an act, which would bind his Majesty, that all acts of assembly, or of the Irish Parliament, containing grants of money to the Crown, and not appropriated to special purposes in the Colony, should, before they are read the third time in America or Ireland, be communicated to both Houses of the British Parliament, and receive the approbation of each by a resolution to be entered in their journals.

It is faid, however, that it is not to be expected that the American Affemblies would vote their money for the public fervice, because they would have no controul, like the British Parliament, on the expenditure of the money which they might grant; that being removed from the seat of government, the influence of the Crown would be so weak, as not to be able to carry any question; and that, as by their refuial to grant, the wheels of the whole machine would not be entirely stopt, as in the case of a refusal to grant the usual supplies here, there would not be any natural and permanent compulsion upon their assemblies, to make such grants; and that therefore, to give them the exclusive privilege of voting their own money, would, in effect, be giving them an entire exemption.

This argument is plaufible, and, I doubt not, has made an impression on many dispassionate and impartial men; but has the experience of Ireland justified this theory? Did not Charles the First conceive the fame ideas concerning the impracticability of obtaining proper fupplies of money from an English House of Commons? and has the experience of the last century justified these lafpicions? It is, however, extremely probable, that the American Assemblies would at first have been very sparing of their grants, that they would have infifted on the redrefs of many grievances, that they would have stipulated concerning the application of their money before they had voted it, that they would most probably have arraigned the wasteful conduct of ministers, and would have proposed many methods for lessening the expence; but I am convinced; that if the just complaints of the Americans had been liftened to, and their confidence gained, the American Assemblies, whenever there was a real ground for asking money, would have granted liberally; and as a lover of this Constitution, I should have rejoiced, that the difficulty of obtaining money from the American Assemblies had existed, as a fresh motive with ministers for good conduct, and to compel a proper exercise of the executive power.

The truth is, that where men are not afraid of encroachments on their liberties, and their minds are not foured by improper treatment, their representatives, in place of being too niggardly, have, on the contrary, been too lavish, in voting the public money; and the weight of Government is such, from the natural tendency of mankind to be governed, and from the desire which most men have for honours and distinctions, that even in very weak hands, and without the aid of bribery, the executive power can always obtain, in popular assemblies, much larger supplies, than in wisdom and prudence it ought to obtain.

Having thus taken a general view of the argument in favour of America, to which, as it appears to me, this country has not allowed fufficient weight, and to which, I think, no fufficient answer has ever yet been made; I come next to consider how far the Americans have allowed proper weight to the argument in favour of the claims of this country.

And here I must observe, that it was natural for this country to think, that America ought to contribute to the public burdens of the State, and that it was also very natural for us to conceive, that the Parliament of Great Britain had full power to impose taxes upon them, since we had ric d not only made laws to regulate their trade, but had even in some few instances imposed internal taxes: what reason had we, therefore, to doubt of our power by the conflictation, to impose taxes upon them? The non-exercise of our right could not take it away, as that might, with reason, be ascribed to the inability of the Colonies to contribute. The doubt of the power of Parliament to tax America, can hardly be faid to have generally existed in America itself, before the year 1754, when the matter was for the first time canvassed in the papers annexed in the Appendix. It was not, I believe, the idea of Mr. Grenville to make use of that power, if the American Assemblies would themselves have imposed a tax, to raise the fum which he defired, and it was upon their refufal only, that he made the motion for the Stamp Act in the British House of Commons *. I have already admitted, that it was of the utmost importance to the Colonies to refift the imposition of taxes by the Parliament here, and even to refuse imposing taxes on themselves; equivalent to the fum which Mr. Grenville demanded; because I agree with the American argument, that if the Minister or the Parliament here, were to name the

I know it has been afferted, that Mr. Grenville did not give any option to the Cefonies, to impose an equivalent tax upon themselves, but required of them to point out some other tax equally productive, to be substituted by the British Parliement, in place of the intended Stamp Act; but I have always understood the sact to be as I have now stated it.

fum, it is but a finall advantage to them, to be made the judges of the mode of raising it; for fuch a privilege would have resembled only the option given to Socrates, to chuse between the different modes in which he should be put to Mr. Grenville's proposition, no doubt, proceeded upon the supposition of an undoubted power, vested in Parliament, to tax America, and upon that supposition, it was an indulgence to permit them to raife the money under the authority of their own Assemblies; but as the Americans, by that time, were fufficiently enlightened to understand, that if Parliament was to tax them, there would exist no check or controul, as with us upon the exercise of that right, they determined to relift the attempt of taxing them, either directly by Parliament, or indirectly by infifting upon their raising a specific sum by authority of their own Assemblies.

Mr. Grenville might be excused in the method which he pursued, thinking, as he no doubt did, that our right was clear; and certainly he shewed a disposition to exercise it with discretion, both by the previous offer which he made, and by his choice of the tax upon Stamps. But I cannot help thinking, the Americans were here in some degree to blame, for as their claim to exemption from Parliamentary taxation, was not surely an obvious proposition, they had no reason to be surprized, that it was not in rediately admitted; and as they could not reasonably deny, that supposing their right to exemption clear, yet it was just and fit, that that they should contribute in some degree to the public burthens; I think, that instead of statly refusing to impose any tax whatever on themselves, when Mr. Grenville discovered so strong a disposition to conciliate, they ought to have offered to raise such a sum as they themselves thought reasonable, resusing, at the same time, to admit the claim of a Parliamentary right to tax them, or consequently our right to insist upon their voting themselves any specific sum.

Whether or not this would have prevented the passing the Stamp Act, and would have diverted the ideas of this country from attempting to enforce Parliamentary taxation, and would have induced us to rely on the grants of the American Affemblies, it is impossible now to fay; from the good fense of Mr. Grenville, notwithstanding his inflexibility, I think it would; but at any rate, in a new and great question of this kind, and where it was impossible to deny that the State had a claim to fome aids from America, I think it would have been wifer and more becoming, upon the part of he Americans, to have held out to the Minister and the Parliament of this country, a golden bridge, in order to avoid bringing to an immediate decifion, a question of fuch magnitude, and involved in fo much difficulty. See Appendix N°. III.

The Americans ought furely to have confidered, that it was not an eafy matter, to draw the line between the power of legislation and taxation, since in the British constitution they had appeared to be always united; for though Ireland had never been taxed here, yet it was well known, there existed, in the Statute Books, an express act, declaring, that Parliament here had power to bind them in all cases whatsoever; so that the right seemed to remain, though not exercised. This therefore was a political question entirely new, and neither party had a title to condemn the other for the opposite opinions they entertained concerning it; but least of all had America a title to condemn the opinion of this country, because we had been in the exercife of the power of regulating their trade, and of levying indirectly by that means a tax upon them. I admit, that there was much less danger in that exercise of our power, than in directly taxing them; and that our Parliament may be much more fafely trusted with the power of making general laws of regulation, than with that of taxing in a direct manner; but certainly the distinction could not be expected to be admitted as a felf-evident proposition, upon its being first mentioned; and there was not sufficient ground, on account merely, of our denying its truth, to impute to this country a determined refolution, to reduce our fellowfubjects to flavery, though I admit that, in time, fuch might have proved the confequence.

I acknowledge, that as by passing the Stamp Act, Great Britain insisted on so dangerous a right, the Americans were reduced to a most disagreeable dilemma; for if they submitted in one instance, after the question was stirred, they could hardly afterwards have made any effectual opposition; especially as their submission would have been imputed to sear; but I do not think they had just grounds to consider Great Britain as acting on that occasion from any oppressive motive, since the question of right was certainly doubtful; and after the Stamp Act was repealed, and all the duties contained in the Act 7th of his Majesty, except on tea, were also repealed; and after the assurances contained in Lord Hillsborough's letter, they ought, and might, in my opinion, have relied that no further tax would have been imposed upon them; at least, they ought to have delayed any violent measures, till some tax had been actually imposed, which I am inclined to think, would never have happened.

The permission granted by Parliament to the East India Company, to export their tea on their own account to America, in place of felling it to other exporters, was certainly no new tax, and tended to furnish the tea cheaper to the Americans. That permission was occasioned by the unfortunate circumstance of the India Company having overstocked their warehouses with tea, which made it necessary to contrive some means to enable them to dispose of it more readily; and was not the refult of any view to impose a new tax upon The Colonies were therefore undoubtedly to blame, in fuffering themselves to be inflamed by those, whose profits by smuggling were likely to be affected, in confequence of this proceeding proceeding of the East India Company*. If the Colonies had acted upon that occasion with more temper, these unfortunate convulsions would not have happened, for I am convinced, that the Tea duty was refused to be repealed, more from an idea of the necessity, in point of dignity, of preferving this mark of our right, than from any serious intention of ever afterwards imposing duties on the Colonies, with a view to a solid revenue.

The dignity of a nation is certainly a little concerned, not to give up a disputable right, when it is denied with acts of violence, though it loses no dignity in forbearing for ever the exercise of such a right; and as the permission granted to the India Company was no new tax, the Americans had not, I think, sufficient ground from thence to conclude, that this country did not mean to forbear for ever the exercise of that right of taxation which gave America so much alarm; and though I can make great allowances for the jealousies of freemen, in a point of so great moment, yet I must condemn those who endeayoured to excite it upon that occasion.

^{*} It has however been confidently afferted, that Ministers, in proposing that mode of relieving the East India Company, in preference to any other, had a finister view of rendering productive there the unfortunate Tea Duty, which they had so often refused to repeal, as thinking this the most effectual method, to counteract the non-importation agreements, with respect to that article, which had proved unsurmountable obstacles to private Merchants. See Appendix, No. IV.

I do not mean to enter into a justification of the proceedings of Parliament, in consequence of the destruction of the tea, because I never did, and do not now, approve of them. The Boston Port Bill indeed, if it had not been clogged with some unfortunate clauses, and had not been followed by the Massachusetts Charter Bill, might have proved a salutary and effectual measure. But I hasten to another point, in which I conceive the Americans were too precipitate; I mean in their rejecting the proposition made by Lord North, with a view to conciliation.

Lord North, on the 27th February 1775, very unexpectedly, made the following motion in the House of Commons, which has been distinguished fince by the name of the Conciliatory Proposition, "Refolved, that when the Governor, Coun-" cil, and Assembly, or General Court of any of " his Majesty's Provinces or Colonies in America, " shall propose to make provision, according to the " condition, circumstances, and situation of such " Province or Colony, for contributing their propor-" tion to the common defence (fuch proportion to " be raifed under the authority of the General " Court or General Affembly of fuch Province or " Colony, and disposable by Parliament), and " shall engage to make provision also, for the " fupport of the civil Government, and the ad-" ministration of justice in such Province or Co-" lony, it will be proper, if fuch proposal shall be " approved by his Majesty and the two Houses of " Parliament, and for so long as such provision shall ec be be made accordingly, to forbear, in respect of such Province or Colony, to levy any duty, tax, or assessment, or to impose any farther tax or assessment, except only such duties as it may be expedient to continue to levy or to impose for the regulation of commerce; the net produce of the duties last mentioned, to be carried to the account of such Province or Colony respectively."

I had not at that time a feat in the House, as the petition against the return of my competitor had not been heard; but I was present during the debate; and I was and am convinced, that the proposition was well intended, and that it ought not to have been received in the manner it was received, by those who espoused in the house, at that time, the cause of America. The proposition was indeed defective in the mode of expression, and did not convey in a clear and unambiguous manner, what I firmly believe was the meaning of the noble Lord. I am convinced, that it was the intention of that proposition, that after settling in an equitable and moderate manner, with the respective American Assemblies, for a sum to be contributed by each, for the public fervice, that no further taxes were to be imposed upon them by the British Parliament. This was, in my opinion, a most just and proper manner, with respect to America, of fettling finally this unfortunate difpute; for, unquestionably, it was just that they should bear a share of the public burthens, and if Great Britain was willing to fix their proportion at once, and to exempt them for ever from all grounds of apprehension, they could have no reafon to complain. On the contrary, the agreement was highly advantageous to them; for, as they are evidently in a course of increasing rapidly, both in numbers and in wealth, and have immenfe tracts of waste lands still to cultivate, no sum which could possibly be agreed on at this period, could have borne any proportion to what they ought to have paid as their just share hereafter, of the public burthens; fo that to appearance, the proposition was in fact too favourable to them; though at the same time, I am perfectly fatisfied, that if this agreement had been made, and all apprehensions of Parliamentary taxation, and of altering their charters, had been quieted for ever, we should have obtained, in future times, more ample grants from the American Assemblies, on all occasions of public danger, than ever could have been exacted from them by acts of the British Legislature.

But unfortunately the proposition, on its first appearance, was violently attacked by very able speakers, who defended the cause of America; and it was afterwards most unhappily misunderstood, when carried across the Atlantic. It was conceived by the Colonies to be insidious, and made with a view of disuniting them, by giving better terms to some than to others; and it was supposed, too, to be nearly of the same import with the proposition of Mr. Grenville, and that the only concession intended in it was, that the sum to be levied on America, being fixed from time to time, here, in consequence of their respective offers, they were to be permitted to levy that surn by the authority of their own Assemblies, but were to have no other voice in fixing the quantum. They also understood, that the amount of the salaries and appointments to the officers of Government in America, was not to be determined by themselves, but by us; which they conceived would be a source of great abuse, and an inlet to corruption.

It must be confessed, that the words made use of in the proposition, afforded some ground for the construction put upon it by those who objected to it in the House of Commons, and by the American Congress; for, the proposition not only requires, that provision should be made according to the condition, circumstance, and situation of each Province or Colony, for contributing their proportion to the common defence; but the exercise of the right of taxation is to be forborne only, for so long as such provision shall be made accordingly, which certainly admits of this construction, that whenever Parliament should be of opinion, that the sum first agreed on did not continue to correspond to the condition, circumstances, and situation of the Colony, the agreement was at an end, and the right of taxation might, notwithstanding the agreement, be exercifed as before. This would undoubtedly have been infidious; and though I am convinced that these words only meant, that if the Americans did not continue the proportion first agreed on, the exercise of taxation should be revived; yet in a matter of such infinite consequence to the Colonies, lonies, it was not furprifing that they were suspicious, and that they understood ambiguous words as meant to enfoare them.

But it is impossible for me to believe, that the noble Lord meant any thing insidious, or the least unsair ambiguity, by expressing himself as he did, in that proposition. I remember I took occasion, in the following session, to state to the House the sense in which the Americans understood the proposition, and at the same time the sense in which I myself understood it, and I called upon the noble Lord, to explain in his place the sense in which he meant it. His answer was plain and direct, that he meant it in the sense in which I had understood it, and by no means in that in which the Americans had conceived it, and that he meant it as the ground-work of a fair negociation.

The proceedings in Parliament, in consequence of the Petition from Nova Scotia, by which that Colony declared its acceptance of the proposition, though these proceedings were afterwards dropt, are a further proof of the sense in which the proposition was meant and understood by Lord North.

But the public have the utmost reason to regret, that in a matter of such magnitud, and where so much depended on the accuracy of expression, this important proposition was not communicated to the friends of America, before it was offered to the House, that their objections might have been obviated; for it is not to be wondered that a people, whose jealousy had been rouzed to such a degree, and whose leaders did not perhaps wish for a reconciliation, should reject a proposition, so conceived, as to admit of being considered as insidious, and which, if taken in the sense the words could bear, was no other than a snare to deceive them.

It was evident to those who were present, when this proposition was offered to the House, that it was made by the noble Lord, without the full assent of all his associates in administration; which is another proof, to my mind, that he meant by it, a great deal more than the Americans apprehended; for if it meant to leave Parliament at liberty to vary the proportion of each Colony, from time to time, the most violent assertor of the rights of Parliament could not have objected to it; and I, for one, shall always think favourably of the noble Lord, for the candour and moderation which suggested to him the idea of that proposition, though it was attended with so little success.

But as I have taken the liberty to censure the opposition given in Parliament to that proposition; I think myself called upon, in justice, to express the approbation which I feel, of the conduct of the same Members, upon several subsequent occasions. In the course of these American debates, instead of confining themselves merely, as is usual, to objecting to themeasures proposed in Parliament by Administration, they have repeatedly proposed plans of accommodation with the Colonies, which it was in the power of Administration to have amended and adopted, and by which, if they had adopted them, the proposers would have reaped no other advantage, except the satisfaction of having rendered, out of office, a most essential service to their country. This conduct, of which I highly approve, counterbalances, in a great measure, in my mind, the error I think they committed, in opposing, instead of endeavouring to correct, the defects of that proposition of the 27th February, 1775, in order to have recommended it with all their instuence, to the acceptance of America.

I am apt to think, that the unfavourable reception of that proposition in America, was the true cause, that no farther attempt was made in Parliament, to offer terms to the Colonies, and probably suggested the idea of sending out Commissioners; but as the powers granted to them by Parliament were confined to the granting of Pardons, it was impossible that they could do more, than merely to enquire, upon what terms an agreement could be made.

From a general review of this subject, I think it must appear, to every person who will permit himself to consider it, with that impartiality which may be expected from distant ages, that there was in this case, a real ground for difference of opinion, between America and us, on the subject of taxation, without throwing upon them, the imputation of blind and factious zeal, or upon us, that of an insolent desire to injure or oppress them. On the one hand, we had a right to expect from them a contribution to the public expences, not indeed so much as if they had not been taxed by the regulations of trade, but still a considerable contribution; on the other hand, they had good ground to conceive, that according to the principles and spirit of this Constitution, a Parliament neither chosen by them, nor restrained in taxing them, by being sharers themselves with their constituents in the same tax, was not a fit power to be trusted with the uncontrolled authority of impoling taxes upon them. Both parties were therefore, in some measure, in the right, and both were also in the wrong. If mankind were not unfortunately more apt to act from passion than from reason, and if this matter had been clearly understood from the beginning, a line of reconciliation might easily have been adopted, for the mutual satisfaction of this country and of America, without the irretrievable waste which has happened, of so much blood and treasure on both sides.

Matters I hope are not yet gone so tar, as to render it impossible still to adopt such a line; but it will require the exertion of the wisest men in both countries, to sooth the prejudices and enlighten the minds of the great body of the people, both here and there.

I am inclined to think, that it will be much more easy to reconcile the minds of the people of this country to such an arrangement, than those of the Americans. We are now, in a great measure, I believe, cured of the dream of an easy conquest, and we are awake to the disadvantages of continuing, at such a distance, for any length of time, a war of so much expence, which has already cost us much more, than the object either of exclusive exclusive trade or of revenue, perhaps, was ever worth; and which, in the course of human events. may end, not merely in the loss of America to us; but if, by the bravery of our troops, in this or a future campaign, we should reduce them to great difficulties, may throw them into the arms of France, which feem open to receive them; and even if we should prevail to the utmost of our wishes, must entail upon us, not merely an enormous debt, but a military establishment, not more destructive to them, than dangerous to the liberties of this country. But it may not be so easy now, to induce the people of America to accept of those terms of conciliation, which, not long ago. they would have rejoiced at. I hope, however, there are a sufficient number of men in that extensive continent, endued with a true love of their country, and fufficiently diverted of passion and prejudice, to be able to diftern the true interest of America upon this occasion.

To fuch men I would wish to address myself, and I think they will readily admit, that if the uncertain events of war should compel them to a union, either with this country, or with France, it would be infinitely preserable to return to their ancient friendship with us. The old ties of connection are not yet broken, and the spirit they have shown, in desence of their pretensions, will, after the end of this contest, place them high in the estimation of every Englishman. They have no reason to apprehend any future attempts, to encroach upon their rights; on the contrary, the attention of ministers to what concerns them, will probably as much exceed the true medium, in their favour, as it before fell short of it, against them. United with us, we should stand firm and secure, if assailed by the united efforts of the most powerful states in the world, and America will thus be preferved, not only from foreign wars, but from the danger of internal discord, and will go on, in that high career of prosperity, which it enjoyed before the unfortunate æra of 1764.

But America has declared itself independent, and the idea of establishing a new and magnificent empire, upon the pillars of freedom, is a flattering object, and must captivate every youthful and generous mind; but are there no rocks or quickfands to be dreaded? Even if the object were already obtained, it would be a new phenomenon in the universe, a republic possessing an extensive continent, and yet preserving its liberty; the wifest and most plausible theory, cannot provide against all the dangers of so new and untrodden a path. The English Constitution, with all its defects, is undoubtedly the best that has ever yet existed upon the globe, and it will be time enough for the Americans to separate themfelves from us, when the natural decay of all human institutions, has rendered this fair fabric a scene of corruption, and when despotism begins to rife upon its ruins; till then, it will be the interest of America to continue united with Great Britain. The two countries are peculiarly fitted to contribute to each other's prosperity; and if any thing bable conjecture, the freedom and prosperity of this kingdom, I conceive it would be, the connection which may now be formed with British America.

The passions of the Americans, who are in the midst of the scene of action, must no doubt be more excited than here, where all is still at rest, and certainly resentment, from the desolation of war, must be strong in the minds of many; but the fuccesses they have had, against the best disciplined and bravest troops in Europe, as it must. elevate their minds, will also, in brave men, alleviate their refentment, and the conduct of General Gates and his army, after the capitulation of General Burgoyne, is an evident proof, that this has been the case. The conduct of that victorious army, was that of a brave, generous, and civilized people; and at the same time that it deferves the highest praise, is an evident proof, that the violence of refentment was extinguished with victory.

Another obstacle may arise, from the ambition of individuals, who having been raised by the present disputes, to situations of great importance, may dislike to return to their former situations. But as the Americans have not existed as a separate people, for more than two years; as the individuals which compose that people, have not yet had time to be corrupted; and as I do believe, that the greater part of those, who have put themselves most forward, on this occasion, have been influenced influenced by a strong and servent love of their country; I do not believe, that if a sair prospect is opened, of establishing the rights of America upon a clear and id sooting, and of restoring the ancient connection with this country, upon homourable terms, that these men will, from personal motives, throw any obstacle in the way. That such selssish principles are the growth of corrupted states, and do not exist in the early ages of a Republic, may be seen, from what frequently happened in ancient Rome, where those who had served the state in the highest situations, in times of public danger, retired, without regret, to the plough, and resumed the humble care of their domestic concerns.

America must know, that notwithstanding our bad successes hitherto, we are still able to distress them much, if not to conquer them. That if our blood and treasure is wasted, theirs cannot be spared; and if it were clear, that the aid of France would turn the scale in their favour, yet that aid cannot be obtained without concessions on their part, more prejudicial to them, than would result from a proper connection with us, nor would the trade of France compensate to America, the loss of the trade of Britain.

I will fairly confess, that I do not know, if it would have been wise in America, to have entered into an agreement with us, till they had convinced this nation, as they have certainly done, of their power to resist, and to defend their rights; because till then, they could not have relied with perfect confidence, on the observance of such an agreement in all future times, and the prejudices entertained in this country, to their difadvantage, perhaps required as ftrong proofs as they have given, of their spirit, to be entirely removed. But the case is now extremely different; whatever treaty is now made, they are fure will be faithfully performed, and they are certain of enjoying every advantage arising from the British Constitution, to the utmost extent. Will any man say, that it is possible to exchange it for a better? Or will wife men trust to uncertain speculations, in a matter of fuch infinite confequence to their happiness, and will they reject a certain good within their reach, in order to grasp at an imaginary idea of perfection?

The case may be stated in another view: Let the Parliament of Great Britain be in this cafe confidered, in the question with America. as one person, and as representing the executive power; this power, we shall suppose, has attempted to encroach on the liberties of America, in the point of taxation, as Charles the First did with respect to England. The Americans resist, and have at last an opportunity, of fixing the limits of this power for the future, fo as that no tax shall be thereafter levied, without the consent of the respective Assemblies chosen by themselves. They have also an opportunity of afcertaining all other doubtful points in the constitution, and of having all their grievances redressed. Would it not be a degree of lunacy, to let slip an opportunity to favourable to their happiness, and to persist in a ruinous and bloody war, in hopes that at last, with the aid of a despotic Government, they may establish a new and independent empire. Can they at once forget, the happiness they enjoyed, and the freedom and prosperity which was every where diffused, throughout these fertile provinces, before the British Parliament attempted to tax them; and can they hope for more prosperity, under any possible form of constitution, provided their rights are now clearly ascertained? Were the natives of any ancient free State, or are the natives of Holland now, more free or happy, than those of the British isles? Some of the leaders in America have, however, affirmed in their writings, that though every ancient and modern form of Republican Government, has been defective; yet they have discovered the true causes of their decline; and that the new system formed for America, is free from all of these defects. But human wisdom is too limited, to foresee all the consequences of a new institution; and all wise men will rather chuse to trust to actual experience, in fuch ferious matters, than to uncertain theory. The defects indeed of the present American plans of Government, are too apparent to escape observation.

The perpetual sources of war and dissension, which must arise between Great Britain and America, on account of the Newsoundland Fishery, and the West India islands, is another argument for conciliation. It is not to be supposed, that Great Britain will give up these, without the utmost exertion to preserve them; and if they remain with her, continual disputes must arise with America, particularly with respect to the Fisheries which lie so near to their coasts.

I flatter myself therefore, that the ancient good humour will still return, between these two parts of the British empire. It is unnecessary to enter into a detail of what would be the proper terms of their reconciliation. The great outline is, That Great Britain should take every honourable step, which may be necessary, to remove the jealousies and obtain the confidence of a people, who, like our ancestors, have given signal proofs of their bravery, as well as their enthusiastic love of liberty; and for that purpose, the Americans should, in my opinion, have the most perfect fecurity given to them, with respect to the right of taxation; and that their charters of government shall be inviolable, unless in consequence of petitions, from the great body of the people themselves; that the trial by jury should be universally established; that Canada should enjoy a British Constitution; that the laws for regulating their trade should be revised, and every alteration made, which can benefit them, without materially injuring us. word, that their grievances of every fort should be inquired into and redreffed, that so they may repose with entire confidence on the good faith and friendship of this country*. And that, on the other hand, they should contribute a generous share of the public burdens, and grant such further aids in times of war, as their own assemblies shall think reasonable. These occasional aids, in all cases of real public exigence, will, I am convinced, be greater, notwithstanding the debt they have lately incurred, than our most fanguine ideas have ever reached.

I think it extremely immaterial to us, whether the fum to be annually contributed to the public burdens, be fixed now, or left to the annual vote of their Assemblies. By leaving it entirely to their own Assemblies, we should certainly gain more effectually the confidence of a brave and generous people, which is of infinitely greater consequence, than any fum for which we could stipulate on this occasion. But if a mistaken idea, of the proper dignity of a great and powerful state, should require some positive stipulation, after such a contest, I cannot believe, that the Americans would hesitate, if that became the only point in dispute, to grant us, after a due confideration had, of the great expences they have incurred, a reasonable and even a liberal annual revenue. If we are, however, entirely relieved of the former expence of our establishments there, and America does not require the bounties we formerly paid, on the importation of her goods, the revenue from these two fources alone would be an object of the greatest importance. But these are points, which would be eafily fettled by negociation, if the animofity on all fides were once removed; and for that important portant purpose, it will, in my opinion, become the magnanimity of this country, to begin with quieting the just apprehensions of so valuable a part of its feliow-subjects, by giving them ample security against taxation, and against the exercise of certain other acts of legislation, which, I think in my conscience, we cannot exercise, consistently with the true spirit of our own constitution.

If we are fincere in the intention of doing this, the mode of executing it must certainly be, by refolutions moved in the House of Commons. But I apprehend it would prove most effectual, for disappointing the arts of untractable spirits, in both countries, if, without minutely entering into a detail of conditions, the most extensive general powers were immediately granted, by Act of Parliament, to proper Commissioners, named in the Act, to conclude an agreement with America, upon such terms as shall be found most effectual, for establishing a mutual and lasting confidence between the two countries.

APPENDIX.

Nº. I.

Letters of Dr. Franklyn, published in the London Chronicle, from the 6th to the 8th of February, 1766.

To the Printer of the London Chronicle.

SIR,

IN July 1754, when, from the encroachments of the French in America on the lands of the crown, and the interruption they gave to the commerce of this country among the Indians, a war was apprehended, Commissioners from a number of the Colonies met at Albany, to form a Plan of Union for their common defence. The plan they agreed to was in short this; 'That a grand

- ' Council should be formed, of members to be cho-
- fen by the affemblies and fent from all the Colo-
- ' nies; which Council, together with a Governor
- General to be appointed by the Crown, should
- be empowered to make general laws to raise mo- ney in all the Colonies for the defence of the L whole.

whole." This plan was fent to the Government here for approbation: had it been approved and established by authority from hence, English America thought itself sufficiently able to cope with the French withour other affistance; feveral of the Colonies, having alone in former wars, withstood the whole power of the enemy, unaffifted not only by the Mother-country, but by any of the neighbouring provinces. The plan however was not approved here: but a new one was formed instead of it, by which it was proposed, that 'the Governors of all the Colonies, attended by one or two e members of their respective Councils, should as-' semble, concert measures for the defence of the whole, crect forts where they judged proper, and raise what troops they thought necessary, with opower to draw on the treasury here for the sums that should be wanted; and the treasury to be e reimburfed by a tax laid on the Colonies by act of Parliament.' This new plan being communicated by Governor Shirley to a gentleman of Philadelphia, then in Boston, (who hath very eminently diftinguished himself, before and fince that time, in the literary world, and whose judgment, penetration and candour, as well as his readiness. and ability to fuggeft, forward, or carry into execution every scheme of public utility, hath most deservedly endeared him, not only to our fellowsubjects throughout the whole continent of North-America, but to his numberless friends on this side the Atlantic) occasioned the following remarks from him, which perhaps may have contributed tributed in some degree to its being laid aside. As they very particularly show the then sentiments of the Americans on the subject of a parliamentary tax, before the French power in that country was subdued, and before the late restraints on their commerce, they satisfy me, and I hope they will convince your readers, contrary to what has been advanced by some of your correspondents, that those particulars have had no share in producing the present opposition to such a tax, nor in the disturbances occasioned by it; which these papers indeed do almost prophetically foretels. For this purpose, having accidentally sallen into my hands, they are communicated to you by one who is, not partially, but in the most enlarged sense.

Tuesday Morning.

"I return the loose sheets of the plan, with thanks to your Excellency for communicating them.

Colonies from all share in the choice of the Grand Council, will give extreme dissatisfaction, as well as the taxing them by Act of Parliament, where they have no Representative. It is very possible, that this general Government might be as well and faithfully administered without the people, as with them; but where heavy burthens are to be laid on them, it has been found useful to make it, as much as possible, their own act; for they bear better when they have, or think they have fome share in the direction; and when any public measures are generally grievous or even distasteful to the people, the wheels of Government must move more heavily."

SIR.

Wednesday Morning.

"I mentioned it yesterday to your Excellency as my opinion, that excluding the People of the Colonies from all share in the choice of the Grand Council, would probably give extreme dissatisfaction, as well as the taxing them by Act of Parliament, where they have no Representative. In matters of general concern to the People, and especially where burthens are to be laid upon them, it is of use to consider, as well what they will be apt to think and say, as what they ought to think: I shall therefore, as your Excellency requires it of me, briesly mention what of either kind occurs to me on this occasion,

"First they will say, and perhaps with justice, that the body of the People in the Colonies are as loyal, and as firmly attached to the present Constitution, and reigning family, as any subjects in the King's dominions.

"That there is no reason to doubt the readiness and willingness of the Representatives they may chuse, to grant from time to time such supplies for the desence of the Country, as shall be judged necessary, so far as their abilities will allow.

"That the People in the Colonies, who are to feel the immediate mitchiefs of invation and conquest conquest by an enemy, in the loss of their estates, lives and liberties, are likely to be better judges of the quantity of forces necessary to be raised and maintained, forts to be built and supported, and of their own abilities to bear the expence, than the Parliament of England at so great a distance.

"That Governors often come to the Colonies merely to make fortunes, with which they intend to return to Britain, are not always men of the best abilities or integrity, have many of them no estates here, nor any natural connection with us, that should make them heartily concerned for our welfare; and might possibly be fond of raising and keeping up more forces than necessary, from the profits accruing to themselves, and to make provisions for their friends and dependants.

"That the Counsellors in most of the colonies being appointed by the Crown, on the recommendation of Governors, are often of small estates, frequently dependant on the Governors for Offices, and therefore too much under influence.

"That the Parliament of England is at a great distance, subject to be misinformed and missed by such Governors and Councils, whose united interests might probably secure them against the effect of any complaint from hence.

"That it is supposed an undoubted right of Englishmen not to be taxed but by their own confent given through their representatives.

"That the Colonies have no Representatives in Parliament.

"That to propose taxing them by Parliament, and refuse them the liberty of chusing a representative Council, to meet in the Colonies, and consider and judge of the necessity of any general tax, and the quantum, shows a suspicion of their loyalty to the Crown, or of their regard for their Country, or of their common sense and understanding, which they have not deserved.

"That compelling the Colonies to pay money without their confent, would be rather like raising contributions in an enemy's country, than taxing of Englishmen for their own public benefit.

"That it would be treating them as a conquered people, and not as true British subjects.

"That a tax laid by the Representatives of the Colonies might easily be lessened as the occasions should lessen, but being once laid by Parliament, under the influence of representations made by Governors, would probably be kept up and continued for the benefit of Governors, to the grievous burthen and discouragement of the Colonies, and prevention of their growth and increase.

That a power in Governors to march the inhabitants from one end of the British and French Colonies to the other, being a country of at least 500 miles square, without the approbation or consent of their Representatives first obtained to such expeditions, might be grievous and ruinous to the People, and would put them on a footing with the subjects of France in Canada, that now groan under such oppression from their Governor, who for two years past has harassed them with long and destructive marches to the Ohio.

"That if the Colonies in a body may be well governed by Governors and Councils appointed by the Crown, without Representatives, particular Colonies may as well or better be so governed; a tax may be laid on them all by Act of Parliament, for support of Government, and their Assemblies may be dismissed as an useless part of the Constitution.

"That the powers proposed by the Albany plan of union, to be vested in a Grand Council Representative of the People, even with regard to military matters, are not so great as those the Colonies of Rhode Island and Connecticut are entrusted with by their Charters, and have never abused; for by this plan, the President General is appointed by the Crown, and controuls all by his negative; but in those Governments the People chuse the Governor, and yet allow him no negative.

"That the British Colonies bordering on the French are properly Frontiers of the British Empire:

pire; and the frontiers of an empire are properly defended at the joint expence of the body of the people in such empire: It would now be thought hard by Act of Parliament to oblige the Cinque Ports or sea coasts of Britain to maintain the whole navy, because they are more immediately defended by it, not allowing them at the same time a vote in chusing Members of the Parliament; and if the frontiers of America must bear the expence of their own desence, it seems hard to allow them no share in voting the money, judging of the necessity and sum, or advising the measures.

"That besides the taxes necessary for the defence of the frontiers, the Colonies pay yearly great sums to the Mother-country unnoticed: For taxes paid in Britain by the landholder or artificer, must enter into and increase the price of the produce of land, and of manufactures made of it; and great part of this is paid by consumers in the Colonies, who thereby pay a considerable part of the British taxes.

"We are restrained in our trade with foreign nations; and where we could be supplied with any manufacture cheaper from them, but must buy the same dearer from Britain, the difference of price is a clear tax to Britain. We are obliged to carry great part of our produce directly to Britain, and where the duties there laid upon it lessen its price to the planter, or it sells for less than it would in for foreign markets; the difference is a tax paid to Britain.

"Some manufactures we could make, but are forbidden, and must take them of British merchants; the whole price of these is a tax paid to Britain.

"By our greatly increasing the demand and consumption of British manufactures, their price is considerably raised of late years; the advance is clear profit to Britain, and enables its people better to pay great taxes; and much of it being paid by us, is clear tax to Britain.

"In short, as we are not suffered to regulate our trade, and restrain the importation and consumption of British superfluities (as Britain can the consumption of foreign superfluities), our whole wealth centers finally among the merchants and inhabitants of Britain; and if we make them richer, and enable them better to pay their taxes, it is nearly the same as being taxed ourselves, and equally beneficial to the Crown.

These kind of secondary taxes, however, we do not complain of, though we have no share in the laying or disposing of them; but to pay immediate heavy taxes, in the laying, appropriation, and disposition of which we have no part, and which perhaps we may know to be as unnecessary as grievous, must seem hard measure to Englishmen, who cannot conceive, that by hazarding their lives and fortunes, in subduing and settling new countries, extending the dominion and increasing the commerce of their Mother-nation, they have forseited the native rights of Britons, which they think ought rather to be given them as due to such merit, if they had been before in a state of slavery.

"Thefe, and such kind of things as these, I apprehend, will be thought and said by the people, if the proposed alteration of the Albany plan should take place. Then the administration of the Board of Governors and Council, so appointed, not having any representative body of the people to approve and unite in its measures, and conciliate the minds of the people to them, will probably become suspected and odious; dangerous animosities and seuds will arise between the Governors and Governed, and every thing go into consusion.

"Perhaps I am too apprehensive in this matter; but having freely given my opinion and reasons, your Excellency can judge better than I whether there be any weight in them, and the shortness of the time allowed me, will, I hope, in some degree, excuse the impersection of this scrawl.

"With the greatest respect, and fidelity, I have the honour to be, your Excellency's most obedient, and most humble fervant."

SIR,

Boston, Dec. 22, 1754.

"Since the conversation your Excellency was pleased to honour me with, on the subject of uniting the Colonies more intimately with Great Britain, by allowing them Representatives in Parliament, I have something surther considered that matter, and am of opinion, that such an union would

would be very acceptable to the Colonies, provided they had a reasonable number of Representatives allowed them; and that all the old Acts of Parliament, restraining the trade or cramping the manufactures of the Colonies, be at the same time repealed, and the British subjects on this side the water put, in those respects, on the same footing with those in Great Britain, till the new Parliament, reprefenting the whole, shall think it for the interest of the whole to re-enact fome or all of them: It is not that I imagine fo many Representatives will be allowed the Colonies, as to have any great weight by their numbers; but I think there might be fufficient to occasion those laws to be better and more impartially confidered, and perhaps to overcome the private interest of a petty corporation, or of any particular fet of artificers or traders in England, who heretofore feem, in fome instances, to have been more regarded than all the Colonies, or than was confiftent with the general interest, or best national good. I think too, that the government of the Colonies by a Parliament, in which they are fairly represented, would be vastly more agreeable to the people, than the method lately attempted to be introduced by Royal Instructions, as well as more agreeable to the nature of an English Constitution, and to English Liberty; and that fuch laws as now feem to bear hard on the Colonies, would (when judged by fuch a Parliament for the best interest of the whole) be more chearfully submitted to, and more easily executed.

"I should hope too, that by such an union, the people of Great Britain and the people of the Colonies would learn to consider themselves, not as belonging to different Communities with different interests, but to one Community with one interest, which I imagine would contribute to strengthen the whole, and greatly lessen the danger of future separations.

" It is, I suppose, agreed to be the general interest of any state, that its people be numerous and rich; men enough to fight in its defence, and enow to pay sufficient taxes to defray the charge; for these circumstances tend to the security of the state, and its protection from foreign power: But it feems not of fo much importance whether the fighting be done by John or Thomas, or the tax paid by William or Charles: the iron manufacture employs and enriches the British Subjects, but is it of any importance to the state, whether the manufacturers live at Birmingham or Sheffield, or both, fince they are still within its bounds, and their wealth and perfons at its command? Could the Goodwin Sands be laid dry by banks, and land equal to a large country thereby gained to England, and presently filled with English inhabitants, would it be right to deprive fuch inhabitants of the common privileges enjoyed by other Englishmen, the right of vending their produce in the same ports, or of making their own shoes, because a merchant, or a shoemaker, living on the old land, might fancy it more for his advantage to trade or make fhoes n shoes for them? Would this be right, even if the land were gained at the expence of the state? And would it not feem less right, if the charge and labour of gaining the additional territory to Britain had been borne by the fettlers themselves? And would not the hardship appear yet greater, if the people of the new country should be allowed no Representatives in the Parliament enacting such impositions? Now I look on the Colonies as so many counties gained to Great Britain, and more advantageous to it than if they had been gained out of the sea around its coasts, and joined to its land: For, being in different climates, they afford greater variety of produce, and materials for more manufactures; and being separated by the ocean, they increase much more its shipping and feamen; and fince they are all included in the British Empire, which has only extended itself by their means; and the strength and wealth of the parts is the strength and wealth of the whole; what imports it to the general state, whether a merchant, a finith, or a hatter, grow rich in Old or New England? And if, through increase of people, two fmiths are wanted for one employed before, why may not the new fmith be allowed to live and thrive in the New Country, as well as the old one in the Old? In fine, why should the countenance of a state be partially afforded to its people, unless it be most in favour of those, who have most merit? and if there be any difference, those who have most contributed to enlarge Britain's tain's empire and commerce, to increase her strength, her wealth, and the numbers of her people, at the risk of their own lives and private fortunes, in new and strange countries, methinks, ought rather to expect some preference.

"With the greatest respect and esteem, I have

Your Excellency's most obedient and most humble servant."

man, what it is you mean, by repeating to me so often, in every letter, the Spirit of the Constitution? I own, I do not much approve of this phrase, because its meaning is so vague and indeterminate, and because it may be made to serve all purposes alike, good or bad. And indeed, it has been my constant remark, that when men were at a loss, for solid arguments, and matter of sact, in their political disputes, they then have recourse to the spirit of the Constitution, tion, as to their last shift, and the only thing they had to fav. An American, for example, now insists, that, according to the spirit of the English Constitution, he ought not to be taxed without his own confent, given either by himself, or by a representative in Parliament, chosen by himself. Why ought he not? And doth the Constitution fay in fo many words, that he ought not? Ordoth it fay, that every man either hath, or ought to have, or was intended to have, a vote for a member of Parliament? No, by no means; the Constitution fays no fuch thing—But the spirit of it doth, and that is as good, perhaps better-Very well; see then how the same spirit will prefently wheel about, and affert a doctrine quite repugnant to the claims and politions of you Americans. Magna Charta, for example, in the great foundation of English liberties, and the basis of the English Constitution. But, by the spirit of Magna Charta, all taxes laid on by Parliament, are constitutional legal taxes; and taxes raised by the prerogative of the Crown, without the confent of the Parliament, are illegal. Now remember, young man, that the late tax, of duties upon stamps, was laid on by Parliament; and therefore, according to your own way of reasoning, must have been a regular constitutional legal tax. Nay more, the principal end and intention of Magna Charta, as far as taxation is concerned, was to affert the authority and jurifdiction of the three estates of the kingdom, in opposition to the tole prerogative of the King; fo that if you will now plead the spirit of Magna Charta, against the jurisdiction of Parliament, you will plead Magna Charta against itself."

And in page 108, the fame author goes on as follows: "What then is it, which you have next to offer? Oh! "The unreasonableness, the " injustice and the cruelty of taxing a free people, " without permitting them to have representa-". tives of their own to answer for them, and to " maintain their fundamental rights and privi-" leges."-Strange! that you did not discover these bad things before-Strange! that though the British Parliament has been from the beginning, thus unreasonable, thus unjust and cruel, towards you, by levying taxes on many commodities outwards and inwards, nay, by laying an internal tax, the post tax for example, on the whole British empire in America, and what is still worse, by making laws to affect your property, your paper currency, and even to take away life itself, if you offend against them. Strange and unaccountable I say, that after you had suffered this fo long, you should not have been able to have discovered, that you were without reprefentatives in the British Parliament of your own electing, till this enlightening tax upon paper opened your eyes, and what a pity it is that you have been flaves, and yet did not know that you were flaves until now.

But let that pass—for I always chuse to consute you in your own way. Now, if you mean any thing at all by the words unreasonable, unjust, N and and cruel, as used in this dispute, you must mean. that the mother country deals worse by you than by the inhabitants of Great Britain, and that the denies certain constitutional rights and privileges to you abroad, which we enjoy here at home. Now pray, what are these constitutional rights and liberties which are refused to you? Name them if you can. The things which you pretend to allege, are, the rights of voting for members of the British Parliament, and the liberty of chusing your own representatives.—But, furely, you will not dare to fay, that we refuse your votes when you come hither to offer them, and chuse to poll. You cannot have the face to affert, that, on an election day, any difference is put, between the vote of a man born in America, and of one born here in England. Yet this you must affert, and prove too, before you can fay any thing to the prefent purpose. Suppose therefore, that an American hath acquired a vote, as he legally may, and many have done, in any of our cities or counties, towns or boroughs; suppose that he is become a freeman or a freeholder here in England. On that state of the case, prove if you can, that his vote was ever refused because he was born in America-prove this I fay, and then I will allow, that your complaints are very just, and that you are indeed the much injured, the cruelly treated people you would make the world believe.

"But is this supposed refusal the real cause of your complaint? Is this the grievance that calls

so loudly for redress. Oh! no, you have no complaint of this fort to make, but the cause of your nean, an by complaint is this, that you live at too great a denies distance from the Mother-country, to be present o you at our English elections, and that in consequence pray, of this distance, the freedom of our towns, or the erties freeholds in our counties, as far as voting is concan. cerned, are not worth attending to. It may be are, so, but pray consider, if you yourselves do chuse ritish to make it inconvenient for you to come and own vote, by retiring into distant countries, what is re to that to us, and why are we to be reproached, for come committing a violation of the birthrights of You Englishmen, which, if it be a violation, is comelecmitted only by yourselves-Gtanting that the Covote lonies are unrepresented in the British Parliament, here granting that two millions of people in America rove have in this respect no choice nor election of their esent own, through the necessity of the case, and their rican distance from the place of election, what would mayou infer from this concession, and wherein can ities, fuch kind of topics support your cause? For know, me a young man, that not only two millions, which are On the utmost that your exaggerated accounts can t his be swelled to, I say, not only two millions, but n in fix millions at least, of the inhabitants of Great l al-Britain, are still unrepresented in the British Parthat liament. And this omission arises not from the ielly necessity of the case, not from consulting interest beand convenience, as with you, but from original ideas of Gothic valfalage, from various cafualties e of perty, from the alteration of times and circumstances, and from a thousand other causes. Thus, for example, in the great metropolis, and in many other cities, landed property itself hath no representative in Parliament; copyholds, and leafeholds of various kinds, have none likewife, though of ever fo great a value. Moreover, in · fome towns, neither freedom nor birthright, nor the ferving of an apprenticeship, shall entitle a man to give his vote, though they may enable him to fet up a trade. In other towns, the most numerous, the most populous and flourishing of any, there are no freedoms or votes of any fort, but all is open, and none are represented. And besides all this, it is well known, that the great East India Company, which have such yast settlements, and which dispose of the fate of kings and kingdoms abroad, have not fo much as a single member, or even a single vote, quatenus a company, to watch over their interests at home. What likewife shall we fay, in regard to the prodigious number of stock-holders in our public And may not their property, perhaps little short of one bundred millions Sterling, as much deferve to be represented in Parliament, as the scattered townships or straggling houses of some of your provinces in America? Yet we raise no commotions; we neither ring the alarm bell, nor found the trumpet; but fubmit to be taxed without being represented, and taxed too, let me tell you, for your fakes. It is to be hoped, for the credit of human nature, that the returns which you have made us, for these succours, and your present behaviour towards us, which perhaps is still more extraordinary, may not be paralleled likewife.

ber any thing which we have done for you, though we and our children shall have cause to remember it till latest posterity—let us come to the topic, which you yourselves do wish to rest your cause upon, and which you imagine to be the sheet anchor of your state vessel. "You are not represented, and you are two millions, there- fore you ought not to be taxed." We are not represented and we are six millions, therefore we ought not to be taxed. Which now, even in your own sense of things, have most reason to complain? And which grievance, if it be a grievance, deserves sirst to be redressed? Be it therefore supposed, that an augmentation ought to take

take place in our House of Commons, in order to represent in Parliament the prodigious numbers of British subjects hitherto unrepresented. In this case, the first thing to be done is to settle the proportion. And therefore, if two millions (the number of persons actually represented at present) require five hundred and fifty-eight representatives (which I think is the number of our modern House of Commons), How many will fix millions require?—The answer is, that they will require one thousand fix hundred and seventyfour representatives. Now this is the first augmentation which is to be made to our lift of parliament men. And after this increase, we are to be furnished, by the same rule of proportion, with five hundred and fifty-eight more from the colonies. So that the total numbers will be two thoufand seven bundred and ninety representatives in parliament! A goodly number truly! and very proper for the dispatch of business! Oh, the decency of fuch an affembly! the wifdom and gravity of two thousand seven hundred and ninety legislators, all met together in one room! What a pity is it, that fo hopeful a project should not be carried into immediate execution |"

-P. 3. " NO maxim in policy is more univerfally admitted, than that a fupreme and uncontrollable power must exist somewhere in every flate. This ultimate power, though justly dreaded and reprobated in the perfon of one mon, is the first spring in every political fociety. The great difference between the degrees of freedom in various governments, confifts merely in the manner of placing this necesfary discretionary power. In the British empire it. is vested, where it is most safe, in King, Lords, and Commons, under the collective appellation of the legislature. The legislature is another name for the constitution of the state, and in fact the state itself. The Americans still own themselves the subjects of the state, but if they refuse obedience to the laws of the legislature, they play upon words, and are no longer subjects, but rebels. In vain have they affirmed, that they are the subjects of the king's prerogative, and not his subjects in his legislative quality; as the King with regard to his subjects in general, is to be confidered only in his executive capacity, as the great hereditary magistrate, who carries into effect the laws of the legislature, the only discretionary and uncontrollable power in a free state.

"The discretionary and uncontrollable authority of the British legislature being granted, their right to tax all the subjects of the British empire can never be denied. Some ill-informed reasoners in politics have lately started an obsolete maxim. which has been feized with avidity by the Americans, "That the supreme power cannot take " from any one, any part of his property without his confent," or in other words, that representation is inseparable from taxation. The Colonists, fay they, have no representatives in Parliament, and therefore Parliament has no right to tax the Upon this principle, scarce one in twenty-five, of the people of Great Britain, is represented. Out of more than seven millions, sewer than three hundred thousand have an exclusive right to chuse members of Parliament; and therefore, more than three times the number of the Americans have an equal right with them, to dispute the authority of the legislature to subject them to taxes. The truth is, representation never, accompanied taxation in any flate. The Romans were a free nation, but the fenate, that is the great body of the nobility, possessed the sole right of taxing the people *. In this kingdom,

[•] The foirit of the English constitution will in vain be fought for, in the constitution of ancient Rome.

the House of Commons have an exclusive right of modifying and regulating the quantity of public supplies, and the manner of laying taxes. They decide upon what the legislature ought to receive for the support of the state; but the Commons, by their own authority, cannot enforce the raising the supplies they vote. That privilege is inherent in the supreme and unaccountable power, vested in the three branches of the Legislature united, who are in fact the State, as the virtual representatives of the whole Empire, and not the delegates of individuals.

" If representation is virtual in Great Britair, why then is it not virtual in the Colonies? The people of the four northern Provinces, though they deny the fact in words, own it in their conduct; near one third of the corporations in New England chuse no representatives, to save the expence of paying their deputies. They however own the right of their Assemblies, to impose taxes, and to make laws to bind the whole community, as the representatives of the whole. The truth is, representation has no. Colony. more to do with the right of taxation, than with every other right exercised by the supreme and superintending power. It is interwoven with the very esfence of the legislative power, and is exerted by that power for the necessary support of the State

" Why

This example of the corporations of New England which thuse no representatives, strongly illustrates the argument which I have stated. The taxes imposed by the Assembly of

Why it has been so generally received, as a maxim, in this country, that taxation and reprefentation are inseparable, requires to be further explained. Men little acquainted with the Constitution, derive the opinion from their finding, that it is the indisputable right of the Commons, that all grants of subsidies and Parliamentary aids, should originate in their House. But though they first bestow these subsidies and aids, their grants, as has been already observed, have no effect, without the affent of the other two branches of the Legislature. The common reafon given for this exclusive privilege is, that as the fupplies are raised upon the body of the people, the people only ought to have the right of taxing themselves. This argument would have been conclusive, if the Commons taxed none but those by whose suffrages they obtain their feats in Parliament. But it has appeared, that more than feven millions of people, besides the Peers, who are in possession of so large a share the Province, are general over the whole Province, and not imposed solely on any particular district. The representatives of the other districts, are therefore virtual representatives of those corporations which send none, because they and their constituents are equally concerned in interest with the unrepresented parts of the Province, to keep the taxes low; and this is sound so effectual a cheek against abuse, that one third of the corporations do not find it worth their while to send deputies. The same was the case anciently in England; for it is well known, that many boroughs declined sending Members to Parliament, in order to save the expence of paying their deputies.

of property in the kingdom, have no voice in the election of the Members who fit in the lower House. The Commons therefore, and their constituents, not being the only persons taxed, the former cannot possibly have the only right of raising and modelling the supply, from the mere circumstance of representation *. . But if they have it not from representation, they mut in fact derive it from the supreme and discretionary power, which is reposed in them; in conjunction with the two other branches of the Legislature. It appears upon the whole, that taxation is the refult of the difcretionary power, which is placed in the hands of the Legislature, and exerted by them for the necessary support of the State. To this power, the whole empire must submit, and consequently no one of its subjects can claim any exemption. to the property of the

"The counties palatine of Chefter, Durham, and Lancaster, were anciently in the same predicament with the Americans, on the article of taxation. The Earl of Chefter, and the bishop of Durham, became, by prescription and immemorial custom, possessed of a kind of regal jurisdiction, within their respective territories. A similar form of government was established by King Edward the Third, in the county of Lancaster,

It would require too long a discussion to show the fallacy of the reasoning. I believe it can be made very clear, that in the sendal Governments, all aids or saxes were made by the confent of the people who paid them, and representation was by degrees subdituted in place of actual attendance to vote.

which was created by that prince in favour of Henry Plantagenet, whose heiress carried the same rights and privileges to John of Gaunt and his posterity; but though the subordinate Sovereigns of these counties could pardon treasons, murders, and felonies, though they appointed all judges, nominated all justices of the peace; though all writs and indictments ran in their names, as in other counties in that of the King though all offences were faid to be done against their peace, and not as in other places contra pacem domini regis, though in short they possessed exclusively, the whole internal government of their feveral counties, their subjects, if the expression may be used, were is always bound by the acts and statutes" of an affembly, in which they had no representatives. They were also " liable to all payments, rates, and fubfidies es granted by the parliament of England ?: "

These counties, it must be confessed, like the Americans, considered their being excluded from having representatives, in an assembly by which they were taxed, a grievance. Accordingly the town and county of Chester, as far back as the 35th of Henry the Eighth, petitioned the legislature for the privilege of sending Members to Parliament, and their request was granted by an express statute. The county and city of Durham made a similar application, and with the same success, in the 25th of Charles the Second. Had the Americans, instead of slying to arms, submitted the same supposed grievance, in a peaceable and dutiful manner to the Legislature, I can perceive no reason why their request should be refused. Had they, like the county and city of Chester, represented, that "for lack of knights and burgesses to represent them in the high Court of Parliament, they had been often times touched and grieved with acts and statutes, made within the said Court, derogatory to their most ancient jurisdictions, liberties, and privileges, "and prejudicial to their quietness, rest, and peace;" this country would, I am persuaded, have no objection to their being represented in our Parliament.

"But the Colonies, though that circumstance is only infinuated in the declaration, have uniformly affirmed, that granting the supremacy of parliament should extend over the whole empire, yet that they themselves have a right to an exemption from taxes, either by the concessions of the Legislature, or by charters from the King. It seems incompatible with reason, say they, that the Colonies should have internal legislatures of their own, possessing the authority of taxation, and that, notwithstanding, the British Parliament should retain its power of laying imposts. The first of these affertions is not founded in truth, and the charters neither give, nor can give, an exemption from taxation."

It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of several questionable positions in these quotations.

They are only here inserted, to show, that these distin-

A Gentleman at Paris having given a copy of this Pamphlet to Dr. Franklin, he received the following letter, which he transmitted to me, explaining a mistake into which I had fallen, with respect to the nature of Mr. Grenville's propositions to the Colonies, concerning the Stamp Act. I have since read Dr. Franklin's examination at the Bar of the House of Commons in the Committee on the Repeal of the Stamp Act in Spring 1766. And I find, that he then afferted, in presence of Mr. Grenville, That he had delivered to him the Resolution of Pennsylvania referred to in the following letter, while the Stamp Act was under consideration, and before the Bill was brought in.

I think it my duty therefore to lay the matter fairly before the Public; by publishing Dr. Frank-lin's account of that matter.

" Dear Sir, Paffy, March 12th, 1778.

"In the pamphlet you was so kind as to lend nie, there is one important fact mis-stated, apparently rently from the Writer's not having been furnished with good information. It is the transaction between Mr. Grenville and the Colonies, wherein he understands that Mr. Grenville demanded of them a specific sum; that they resused to grant any thing; and that it was on their resusal only that he made the motion for the Stamp Act. No one of these particulars is true. The fact was this:

Some time in the winter of 1763-4, Mr. Grenville called together the Agents of the several Colonies, and told them, that he purposed to draw a revenue from America, and to that end his intention was to levy a stamp duty in the Colonies, by act of Parliament in the enfuing Session; of which he thought it fit they should be immediately acquainted, that they might have time to consider it; and if any other tax equally productive would be more agreeable to them, they might let him know it. The Agents were therefore directed to write this to their respective Asfemblies, and communicate to him the answers they should receive. The Agents wrote accordingly. I was a member in the Affembly of Pennfylvania when this notification came to hand. The observations there made upon it were:

That the ancient established and regular method of drawing aids from the Colonies had ever been this: The occasion was always first considered by their Sovereign in his Privy Council, by whose sage advice he directed his Secretary of State to write circular letters to the secretary of State to write circular letters to the secretary.

veral Governors, who were directed to lay them before their assemblies. In those letters, the occasion was explained for their fatisfaction, with gracious expressions of his Majesty's confidence in their known duty and affection, on which he relied, that they would grant fuch fums as should be suitable to their abilities, loyalty, and zeal for his fervice. - That the Colonies had always granted liberally during the late war; that the King, fensible they had granted much more than their proportion, had recommended it to Parliament five years fuccessively, to make them fome compensation, and the Parliament accordingly returned them 200,000 l. a-vear to be divided among them. That the proposition of taxing them in Parliament was therefore both novel and unnecessary. That by the constitution of the Colonies their business in matters of aid was with the King; they had nothing to do with any financier in England nor his projects, nor he with them; nor were the Agents the proper canals through which requisitions should be made. It was therefore improper for them to enter into any stipulation, or make any proposition to Mr. Grenville, about laying taxes on their constituents by Parliament, which had really no right at all to tax them; especially as the notice he had sent them of a revenue to be required of them; did not appear to be the King's order, and perhaps was without his knowledge; as the King, when he would obtain any thing of them, always accompanied his requisition with good words; but this Gentle+

Gentleman, instead of a decent demand, sent them a menace, that they should certainly be taxed, and only left them the choice of the man-But all this notwithstanding, they were so far from refusing to grant money that they refolved to the following purpose, "That as they " always had, fo they always should think it their "duty to grant aids to the Crown according to " their abilities, whenever required of them in " the usual constitutional manner." I went soon after to England, and took with me an authentic copy of this resolution, which I presented to Mr. Grenville before he brought in the Stamp Act. I mentioned in the House of Commons (Mr. Grenville being present) that I had done so, and he did not deny it. Other Colonies made similar Resolutions.

"And had Mr. Grenville, instead of that Act, applied to the King in Council for such requisitorial letters to be circulated by the Secretary of State, I am sure he would have obtained more money from the Colonies by their voluntary grants, than he himself expected from his Stamps. But he chose to use compulsion rather than persuasion, and would not receive from their goodwill, what he thought he could obtain without it. And thus "the golden bridge" which the ingenious Author thinks the Americans "unwisely and unbecomingly refused to hold out to the Minister and Parliament," was actually held out to them, but they refused to walk over it. This is the true history of that transaction. And

Copy of a Letter wrote by Governor fohnstone to the Chairman of the East India Company, when the Proposition for sending the Company's Tea to America was in Agitation.

SIR,

HE frequent General Courts of late, and the difagreeable difcussions respecting the affairs of the East India Company at both ends of the Town, have fo haraffed and foured the greater part of the Proprietors of East India Stock, that I do not chuse to run the risk of their displeafure by calling them together on the subject of the Tea to be fent to North America, concerning which I delivered my fentiments fo fully in the last General Court; besides the business having now passed the Court of Directors aided by all the influence of Administration, under whose political craft I know this ruinous mad project was concerted, and is now carried into execution; from these circumstances, I am sensible it would be a vain effort to oppose the torrent, and serve only Proprietors, by furnmoning them together: But I cannot permit fuch a measure to pass without stating in indelible characters my objections and solemn protest: You know how often we have had occasion to appeal to a paper of a similar nature, which my friend Mr. Dempster and I gave in against the exorbitant powers given to Lord Clive. I wish the Company and the Nation may not have occasion to regret this measure as much: My judgment tells me they will: I am sure the Company on every alternative must.

1. Because, supposing the Company quietly to succeed in their project, it is contrary to the principles of their establishment to become the circulators of their own commodities, particularly to North America, where, to sell to advantage, there must be long credits, and to realize the returns, there must be a circuitous commerce, incompatible with the purpose for which the East India Company was established; and therefore it cannot answer the end of supplying us with cash in the present exigency.

2. Because speedy and certain payments under the Public Sales, endured by Law, is the best method of conducting the trade of the Company, and much more so at present, considering our great Debt and the heavy Interest we pay; besides, that we may be sure if there is really a vent at any particular market, private adventurers will find out the means of introducing the commodity better than a Company. And although the price at our fales may be low, yet I am perfuaded, calculating interest of money, charges, loss, infurance, factorage, &c. &c. that the profit will be more by adhering to the old method than the new, on closing and balancing the account; besides, I think this new method injurious to the merchants of England. If the Company grasp at the distributive channels of commerce as well as the monopoly, the nation will not bear it.

3. Because this is aiding Government in continuing the most uncommercial Tax that ever was imposed, to enforce a principle the most unjust and odious to all the People of North America, and contrary to the interest of the East India Company, who should, of all the members of the community, join with the Americans the most strenuously in obtaining the repeal of this Law. To give a drawback to encourage the exportation of a commodity, and to impose a duty at the place of the consumption 1200 leagues off, is such a solecism in the rules of commerce, that it requires a combination of such heads as now govern this country; siirst to impose it, then to enforce it, and now to continue it.

Lastly. If it is said, as was alledged in the House of Commons, that the Provincial combinations in North America prevents private merchants from purchasing at the sales, because they cannot vend the commodity, then I object more forcibly on this account than any other.

Because, in this case, the East India Company is becoming the odious tool of Administration to force a contest upon a subject that might die away or be repealed, where the Company runs innumerable risks with their property—where they injure their own interest by continuing the Tax, if they prevail: but where is it most probable the whole will be lost by accumulating charges, the frauds of agents, and the violence of mobs. I am, &c.
