has done the Colony a double injustice. Howe, " put uside the plau of escheating the lands as impracticable and absurd at the present day." We have already alluded to one of the reasons assigned for have already alluded to one of the reasons assigned for their coming to this determination. Another is, that if the original grants were annulled all title would be seep a way. This appears to us a very lame argument. What difficulty would there be in the way of the power which gave the original grants confirming freeholders in their possessions, and disposing of leacehold property to the lessees on reasonable terms? But though we object to this argument, we are not disposed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that has been the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion that the results in the seed to dispute the soundness of the conclusion of the printish Government were to consent will not be given, we consider Escheat impracticable.
