I have said before that the real object of this development has been very much nisconceived; I tell you now that the great object is to purge the Church itself of its latent infidelity; to renovate the Christian faith; and to bring theology which will be equal to the wants of this age, as it certainly now is not.

You are now touching upon a delicate ubject. You should know that we are inclined to be somewhat tenacious of our theological and religious sentiments, and not to look with favor upon any innovations. Nevertheless, I am curious to know how you justify yourself in this

I will answer by asking: Is it not patent to you and all other intelligent persons, that for the last handred years the Christian Church and theology have been standing mainly on the defensive against croachments of science? Has it not, without adequate examination, poured Phrenology, endeavored to explain away the facts of Geology and some of the higher branches of Astronomy? has it not looked with a jealous eye upon the progress of science generally? and has it not been at infinite labor in merely denot been at innuce.

There is: and I would not by a single harsh word wound the loving hearts of those who have a spark of real religious life in them.
