House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT.

Friday, May 6, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) presented the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix—Montmorency) moved that the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC STEAMSHIP COMPANY

Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That the petition of the Quebec Steamship Company be received forthwith, subject to the additional charge provided by Rule 89, paragraph 3 (a).

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING

Bill No. 137, to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Quebec Steamship Company.—Mr. Casgrain.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. K. SPINNEY (Yarmouth) moved that the first report of the Special Committee to which was referred Bill No. 122, to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 138, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill covers quite a number of proposed amendments to different articles of the Code as it now stands. I will indicate briefly those that are of the most importance.

There is a provision to make it an offence to have illicit connection with any feeble-minded girl or woman, and the definition of feeble-minded is taken from the English Act.

There is a provision giving a Recorder's Court jurisdiction, as well as the recorder himself, and power, if a court of record, as it is in Montreal, to keep its records. This is a provision made necessary by recent decision to the effect that while the recorder acting, not as the Recorder's Court, had the extended jurisdiction of two magistrates, the Recorder's Court itself had not that jurisdiction. The business had been carried on for years on the assumption that the court had at least as much jurisdiction as the individual recorder. It is to correct the situation that the provision is introduced.

There is a provision repealing a proviso that was inserted in the Senate to the Bill that was passed by this House at the last session, which proviso had the result that on trials for seduction the judge might instruct the jury that if they did not think the evidence showed that the accused was wholly or chiefly to blame, they might acquit. The purpose of this amendment is to re-establish the Bill as it was passed by the Commons. There is a special provision also to prohibit illicit connection with Indian women. It has been found that there was necessity for special provision in that regard.

Another provision of the Bill is to make illegal the possession of bombs without lawful excuse.

Then we have a provision with regard to the existing law in connection with the necessity of permits for the possession of firearms. There has been very general representation that the existing law operated too rigorously, lent itself to abuses and subjected citizens to unnecessary annoyance. This matter has been pressed from many quarters. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon), the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) have been particularly insistent upon the necessity of reform. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) also has made representations in the matter, and as the House is aware, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has introduced a Bill dealing with the subject. I am not prepared to say that our provision is identical with the terms of that Bill but the aim sought to be attained is the same.

Then there is a clause reintroducing a provision which has been passed by this House on different occasions and rejected by the Senate, making it an offence for persons who are not married to register themselves in hotels as being married.

There is a provision to make it an offence for intoxicated persons to drive motor cars.

Then there are special provisions with regard to the offence of stealing motor cars. We had very general representations that it was desirable or necessary to stiffen the law in that regard.

There is a provision to assimilate the law with regard to indecent assaults to the law with regard to rape or having illicit connection with children, so that in the case of indecent assault the consent of a child under the fixed age shall not be a defence, and also raising the age from fourteen to sixteen. There is a provision to add whipping as a possible punishment for rape, robbery, and assault with intent to rob. It is found that the law as it now stands permits whipping for the attempt to rape but does not permit it for the graver offence. With regard to robbery and assault with intent to rob, we have had very strong representations from many parts of the country urging that this would be a more effective deterrent. There is also a provision striking out of the article dealing with the offence of carnally knowing girls the words inserted by the Senate, "of previous chaste character".

There is a clause to provide for the whipping of juvenile criminals under twenty-one years of age. It is not intended that they should be flogged; the term used is "spanking." I understand, as a matter of fact, that there is not at the present time any law providing for this, but several judges have taken it upon themselves to order this punishment, and it is reported that it has proved most efficacious.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there an age limit as to that?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, it will be applied to people under twenty-one.

There is a provision, at the instance of the Public Works Department, to make the letters "D.P.W." indicate that any articles to which they are attached is the property of the Public Works Department, and to protect the property accordingly.

There is a provision to prohibit what is known as the game of three-card monte. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) has already, as the House knows, introduced a Bill for that purpose, and I think the present provision meets the intent and purpose of his Bill. In any event, I shall be glad to consult with the hon. member if there be any difference in the wording.

There is an amendment to the provision constituting the crime of arson, making the burning of chattels over $25 in value constitute the offence.

There is a provision extending to gas wells the protection now given to oil wells.

There are provisions with regard to cruelty to animals. Without going into details, I may say that the purpose of these provisions, which are asked for by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, is to bring our law, if I may use the expression, up to date, to introduce into it some reforms that have been introduced into the law in England and in others of the Dominions.

There is a provision against making metal tokens redeemable in goods.

There are some minor changes with regard to procedure, and one particular provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court in criminal cases where, the accused having been acquitted by the trial courts, a court of appeal has set aside that verdict and ordered a new trial. As the law stands at present, a man who is convicted in the first court, and who upon an appeal to the Appellate Court of the province succeeds in having even one judge dissent from the decision, expressing the view that the conviction should be set aside, is entitled to appeal to the Supreme Court, whereas a man, who has a verdict of absolute acquittal in the first court, is debarred from any appeal if the Court of Appeal should set aside that verdict in his favour and send him back to be tried over again. Attention was called to this condition of affairs by a recent case in Alberta, and I think the fairness of providing for an appeal in this case will be obvious to everybody.

There is a provision making it possible in certain classes of offences to place the convicted person, in whose case the sentence may have been suspended, under a system of probation where his conduct may be observed.

There is a provision for increasing the fees of magistrates and constables in prosecutions in summary cases. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) was interested in that matter.

There are provisions to simplify the procedure before justices of the peace by doing away with the necessity of fees in such cases and simplifying the forms. This matter has been pressed upon us by different magistrates who seem to establish that there is an unnecessary degree of formality at the present time.

I think this covers all, at all events of the substantial modifications which are sought to be made in the existing code.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The right hon. gentleman spoke of the illegal use of bombs. What does he mean by that?

Mr. DOHERTY: This makes it illegal to have bombs in one's possession—the mere possession—without lawful excuse. As the law stands at present, there is no absolutely clear provision that the mere possession without explanation or excuse should be an offence, and it is thought proper that there should be such a provision.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I had hopes that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) would have included in his Bill—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. On the introduction of a Bill no debate could possibly be allowed. It is impossible to remind the hon. minister of some clause that should have been and is not included in the Bill, without in some measure debating the motion. This is a matter that should be brought up on second reading or in committee, but not upon the motion to introduce the Bill.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not want to criticize your ruling, Sir, nor to debate what the Minister of Justice has said, but simply to make a suggestion. I had introduced a Bill, and I hoped the minister would have included in the present Bill the purpose of my Bill. I think he will do so, if I remind him.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That could be done much more regularly in committee, after the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very happy to consult with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CANNON: Will the minister inform the House when he intends bringing up this Bill for discussion?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill will naturally come up for second reading at the next sitting of the House. It will be brought up at as early a moment as is convenient, and I shall be glad to consult the convenience of any members interested.

Motion agreed to, and the Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 139, to amend the Immigration Act. He said: I might remind the House that earlier in the session a Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), one purpose of which was the repeal of the section in the present law providing for the deportation of persons who had made seditious utterances under certain circumstances. It is proposed to repeal that section. In addition to that, the Bill contains some fifteen or twenty sections providing for very slight modifications in the law, required very largely from the standpoint of administration. I doubt very much if I should take up the time of the House at this time in explaining the small minor changes which I propose to make.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

STATISTICS ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 141, to amend the Statistics Act.

He said: This is a Bill of one clause to provide that statistical forms and schedules which are returnable from the source to a provincial department in pursuance of any arrangement made between the Dominion Government and the provincial Government for the more economical and efficient gathering of statistics shall be, when forwarded to this department, free of postage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 140, to amend the Patent Act.

He said: This is the Bill of the provisions of which I gave notice to the House when I moved for the discharge of the Patent Act Consolidation Bill. The present Bill consists of four proposed amendments, which it is felt are necessary to be made this session for the purposes set forth therein.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the nature of the amendments?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One is to provide for granting relief to patentees and inventors who through disturbances caused by the war have lost their patents by voidance, either through failure to manufacture, non-payment of fee, or failure to acquire patents within the prescribed time. The Bill also provides that Canada may get the benefit of the reciprocal clauses in what is known as the Nolan Bill, which has passed through both Houses at Washington.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PREMIER MASSEY'S INTERVIEW

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): The morning papers announce that Premier Massey has arrived at Victoria on his way to the Imperial Conference, and that he gave out an interview. According to the despatches, Premier Massey has stated that he is prepared to place a measure of reciprocity with Canada on the statute books of New Zealand, and he also advocates a constitution for the British commonwealth of nations and an Imperial executive. The two latter he describes as vital needs of the Empire. May I ask if it is intended to have a conference on this subject with Premier Massey on the part of the Government?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): No request has been received by the Government for any special conference with the Prime Minister of New Zealand on this or any other subject. I did observe the headline in the paper that an interview had been given by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, but I really do not understand that because another Prime Minister desires to give an interview that should be the occasion for a new expression of opinion from me. There has been no request for an interview on this or any other subject relating to the Imperial Conference.

EXTRADITION TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): A few days ago I drew the attention of my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to the fact that a treaty of extradition between Canada and the United States had been passed by the United States Senate and that we knew nothing of it here. I do not suppose it is a matter of first-rate importance, but the session is drawing to an end and I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to submit that treaty to Parliament.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): We have had telegraphic confirmation of what appeared in the newspapers with regard to the ratification by the American Senate of a treaty making, as between Canada and the United States, wife desertion an extraditable offence. With that message was sent us an assurance that the information would be sent to us by mail in proper form, and as soon as it arrives, it is in contemplation to submit the treaty to the House for authorization to ratify.

Mr. FIELDING: Have we no copy of the treaty? Have we to wait for Washington to provide us with a copy of a treaty to which we are a party?

Mr. DOHERTY: We are awaiting the proper evidence that the treaty has been ratified.

Mr. FIELDING: I am speaking of a copy of the treaty. We ought not have to wait on Washington for that.

Mr. DOHERTY: No. I will see that the copy is brought down. What had been in contemplation was to bring it down as a schedule to the Bill. The treaty deals simply with the making of wife desertion an extraditable offence.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works, I think it would be, to the fact that five or six weeks ago an order for a return was passed in connection with a question of mine as to the amounts of money spent on Government harbours throughout the country. I understand that this would involve some work, but it is now almost six weeks since the order was passed, and I am anxious to have the return this session.

Hon. F. B. McCURDY (Minister of Public Works): I shall be glad to look into the matter and see that the return is brought down at the earliest possible date.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): On March 4, last an order for a return was passed regarding the amounts of money loaned by Canada to Greece and Roumania since April 19, 1920. I called the attention of the Government on April 29, to the fact that the return had not been brought down, and the hon. Minister of Finance said that he would make inquiry, but the return has not been brought down yet. I can therefore only conclude that the Government does not intend to have the matter discussed on the Budget.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I speak only from recollection, but I think the information has been given to the House, if not in the form of a return, in answer to a question. In fact, I recall being in my place and hearing the matter referred to.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I know I did not get the return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it was in answer to a question. I will make a note and direct the hon. gentleman's attention to where he will find the information.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUGS

On the Order: Third reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): At the request of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Calder), I beg to move that this Bill be referred back to committee for the purpose of amending subsection (e) of section 1 by adding thereto the following words:

In any case where a fine is imposed the sentence may adjudge a term of imprisonment or a further term of imprisonment not exceeding in any case twelve months to be served by the offender if such fine is not paid.

The member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) having called attention to the fact that in the Bill as it went through the committee, here is a provision under which a penalty may be imposed in the form of a fine, and no specific provision fixing a period of imprisonment to be imposed in default of payment of that fine, I find, on looking into the matter, that the hon. gentleman was quite right in saying that under any general provision of law the maximum imprisonment under those circumstances, would be three months; and I agree with him that in the case of this particular offence the term of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine should be longer.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve—Gaspé): When we were discussing this Bill the other day I mentioned to my hon. friend the Minister of Health that a seizure was made not long ago in the city of Montreal of two or three trunks filled with cocaine, presumably imported from Europe. That cocaine was seized and delivered to the police court authorities, and later on some persons, evidently the owners, in league with certain lawless characters, broke into the Court House and got possession of the drug. I am told that the cocaine has been located and that attempts are again being made to get it back. My hon. friend said the other day that he had been informed of the fact, and would give some information in regard to the case.

Mr. CALDER: When the matter was drawn to my attention the other day by the hon. member I said that I had asked for information respecting this incident. It has not yet come to me from the department, so that apart from my knowledge of the fact that this cocaine was lost sight of for a while, I really know nothing about the matter. I shall be glad shortly to ascertain the facts and inform the hon. member accordingly.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Bill as ameded reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT.

Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 60, to amend the Judges' Act.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The amendments which the Senate has made to this Bill have no relation to or connection with the provisions of the Bill itself. With one exception, they deal with a perfectly distinct subject. There is an amendment in which I propose to ask concurrence, but another amendment deals with the subject of judges acting on commissions and provides that no judge mentioned in this Act shall act as a commissioner or arbitrator on any commission or inquiry, provided that this section shall not interfere with judges who are at present acting as commissioners or arbitrators, completing the work on which they are engaged. This proposed amendment raises, of course, a very important question. I do not desire to pronounce now pro or con on the merits of the proposal, but I may point out that it is a question that calls for careful consideration, and might very properly form the subject matter of a measure dealing professedly with it. The Bill itself provided for a new judge in Saskatchewan in view of certain provincial legislation; it dealt with the income tax of the present Chief Justice; and made certain provision with regard to the travelling allowances of judges resident in the province of New Brunswick. This amendment introduces an absolutely different matter, and presented to the House in its present form, it affords, it seems to me, no opportunity of dealing with this important question upon its merits, and giving it the consideration to which it is entitled. I feel, therefore, that this House should not concur in that particular amendment.

There is another amendment made to paragraph three to meet the case of the judge resident at Moncton, in New Brunswick. It has been made perfectly clear, by representations of the Attorney General of the province and numerous others interested who would have been affected by the change provided in the Bill, that it is essential for the proper carrying on of public business that there should be a judge resident at Moncton, and that, in consequence, an exception should be made to the general provision with regard to travelling allowances. With regard to that amendment I desire that this House should concur in it. With regard to the other proposed amendment I would respectfully submit that this House should not concur in it. I beg therefore to move:

That this House do concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Section 3 of the present Bill.

Mr. COPP: The amendment to section 3 has reference to the judge living in the city of Moncton?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I now move that the other amendments be not concurred in.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There should be reasons given to the Senate for non-concurrence in these amendments and these reasons should be included in the motion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I wish to ascertain if I am right in my impression that when the Judges Act was amended a year or so ago, the judges were obliged to act as commissioners or investigators, but without any special fees? If that is so I have no objection to this proceeding.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman states correctly the present condition of the law.

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend permit me—is that quite correct? I do not think an amendment was made to the effect that the said judges were obliged to act on commissions. What we did say was that if they did act on commissions they were not to get public money. I do not think the amendment said they were obliged to act on commissions.

Mr. DOHERTY: If my memory serves me the provision was that judges would be obliged to serve on commissions, where they were requested so to do by the Dominion or provincial governments, and to do so without remuneration. It will be obvious, if no such provision was made but merely a provision that they were entitled to no remuneration, that, if it be desirable in the public interest that they should serve, either this Government or a provincial government might find itself in great difficulty in assuring themselves of the services of judges for the purposes of such commissions. I have not the text of the Act before me but I do not think I am mistaken.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman is probably correct.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move:

That this House do not agree to the amendments made by the Senate as ss. 4 and 5 of Bill No. 60, An Act to Amend the Judges Act, for the following reasons: because the said amendments (a) deal with matters entirely unconnected with the Bill; (b) bring the questions therein treated before the House in a manner which does not afford proper discussion, and (c) should form the subject matter of a separate measure.

Mr. MOWAT: I understand that the House cannot express its opinion one way or the other as to the advisability of these amendments. In reality the present motion is in the nature of an appeal to the Senate not to insist on their amendments so that the matter can be properly brought up. I would not like to see the House object to the substance of the amendments by the Senate, because I think the time has come when something of this kind is necessary. There are many judges in the land who would like to see such a clause passed, because they think when they are being called upon by the Dominion or the Provincial Governments to act as commissioners it very often detracts from their usefulness and importance as judges.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: They can always refuse to act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Doherty moves:

That a message be sent to the Senate acquainting Their Honours with the non-concurrence of this House in the amendments made by the Senate by the addition of sub-clauses 4 and 5 to Bill No. 60, an Act to Amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Tolmie Bill No. 136 to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Clause 1—Operation of provision for compensation extended for three years.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this Bill retroactive in its effect, and if so why?

Mr. TOLMIE: In 1918 certain sums were fixed as compensation for animals destroyed, but the Bill was made operative for only three years, from May 24, 1918. That time will expire on May 24 next, and it is necessary that we should extend the operation of the Act for three years longer, making the period six years instead of three. No change is being made in the amount of compensation paid; the period of payment is simply extended for another three years.

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought from reading the section that it was retroactive.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES

On motion of Right Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 35 to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—age limits of boys and girls raised from 16 to 18.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to make an addition to this section. Its purpose is to make susceptible of being dealt with as juveniles in reformatories young persons of both sexes up to the age of 18 years; the present limit is 16 years. My own observation and the widespread representations I have received have convinced me of the necessity of this modification. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that the reformatory institutions of the provinces are not at present prepared to deal with this additional class of criminals, and persons quite competent to speak upon the subject have strongly urged that until and unless proper preparations be made there may be danger to the younger inmates of those reformatories from association with those older boys and girls; in other words, that in order to protect the latter from the possible contamination with older prisoners in the penitentiaries, we might expose the younger children in the reformatories to contamination from these older boys and girls. In order to try to conciliate the two views, and to make provision for proper preparation being made for the reception of the class of criminals in question, I beg to move to amend section 1 by adding thereto as sub-section 2 thereof, the following words:

4 p.m.

This section shall only come into operation in such province or provinces as the Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation prescribe.

This amendment will enable us to know that there are suitable institutions for this class of prisoners to be sent to before this law comes into force in a particular province.

Mr. McKENZIE: When we pass a criminal law do we look after the expense incident to the imprisonment of such persons as may be dealt with under its provisions?

Mr. DOHERTY: By the British North America Act the maintenance of prisons and reformatories falls on the provinces, and the maintenance of penitentiaries falls on the Dominion; it is not a matter that depends upon our legislation.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Part IX not to apply to Nova Scotia:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most of this Bill seems to have special reference to Nova Scotia. Have there been any representations in this regard on the part of the Government of Nova Scotia?

Mr. DOHERTY: The rest of the Act deals entirely with Nova Scotia, is drafted by the provincial authorities and is being enacted at their request. It is to make our present law adjust itself to the provisions made by Nova Scotia with regard to their reformatories. I may say that the provisions which they have adopted are, so far as they modify existing conditions, mainly with a view to assimilating their system with the systems prevailing in other provinces. This subject of reformatories is dealt with in different parts of the existing statute dealing with each of the provinces, and from time to time as a province finds it desirable to make certain modifications we modify our Act accordingly. This Bill is exclusively for that purpose and, as I say, is the drafting of the provincial authority itself.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—repeal:

Mr. McMASTER: Is there any provision for supervision over children who are indentured as provided by this section?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. Subsection 9 provides:

The Superintendent of Neglected and Delinquent Children for the Province of Nova Scotia shall, subject to the laws of the Province of Nova Scotia, exercise and maintain supervision over every child after its discharge from a reformatory institution under the provisions of this section.

I would take it that that would apply to the child while he is in the custody of persons to whom he has been indentured.

Mr. McMASTER: I did note that clause, but I was doubtful whether that applied to a child under indenture, because it seems to me the child had not been discharged when it was indentured.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will turn to sub-clause (c), he will see that power is conferred upon the Superintendent of Neglected and Delinquent Children to order a child's return. I think that infers his power to supervise. From past experience, I know as a matter of fact, that the superintendents of this and similar institutions do exercise supervision and control. If they, who have that duty, find that these provisions are ample to enable them to carry it out, I think we may safely accept their view upon the subject. I would be a little loath to modify what they find perfectly sufficient, and I think it is a perfectly justifiable inference, from the fact that the superintendent has power to order the return of a child, that he must be in a position to inform himself on the subject. Furthermore, there is to be remembered just what the hon. gentleman has pointed out, that during that period of time the child has never been discharged. He is in the custody of other people; but he is subject to be returned and, I should say, necessarily under the supervision of the authorities of the institution to which his sentence is still in full effect.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can assure the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that the practice is as has been explained by the minister. The superintendent has full control over those children and looks after them very carefully.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not doubt that everything is done in the best possible way, but it seemed to me that there should be no doubt about the matter. The children who are let out in this way, are, as a rule, very kindly looked after; but some distressing instances, exceptional, I must say, have occurred, and it seems to me that the law could not be too specific in providing for a regular supervision of homes in which children under the care of the State are placed for their own benefit. Might I direct the minister's attention to subclause (e) which reads:

Any wages reserved in any indenture under the provisions of this section shall be paid to such child or to some person for such child's benefit.

That is delightfully vague. I do not quite know who is to be the judge as to what person shall be entitled to receive this money for the child's benefit. Perhaps practice has made the matter less objectionable than it appears at first sight.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should take it that the superintendent or other person in charge would see to it that the money went to a suitable person. I would rather not undertake to modify this, for an additional reason, that, with all respect to those who have asked us to enact that provision, I am really very strongly of the impression that that provision, being a provision with regard to the manner in which people sentenced to a reformatory institution are to be dealt with, and being a matter of dealing with their property, the provincial legislature was perhaps more competent to decide than we are. We properly ought to deal with the criminal end of the matter, and this coming to us from what really rather strikes me as the proper authority to decide what shall be done with the property of persons and particularly of persons in their own provincial institutions. I would hardly feel called upon to modify it, and my view would be that the provincial legislature might have settled that question itself. I would say, however, that it is for greater precaution that we are asked to concur in the matter.

Mr. McMASTER: The next question which I have to ask the minister is rather theological in character. This Bill provides for Protestants and Roman Catholics. I have met certain English Church people who say that they are not Protestants. I do not think they are Roman Catholics. Perhaps some Nova Scotian member would enlighten the committee what happens to people of that denomination if they have delinquent children.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will refer the hon. gentleman to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. I may say in a general way that the definition, not only in that province, but in provinces generally has been found to work without difficulty.

Mr. McMASTER: In the form of commitment, what does "S.S." stand for? I have often been intrigued by those letters and I have never had any satisfactory explanation. It is a pleasure to be able to apply to the fountain head of judicial learning.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall have to refer that to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. I am ignorant as to the meaning.

Mr. MOWAT: Does it not mean the plural of "seal?"

Mr. DOHERTY: That may be, only why there would be a plurality of seals, I do not know. I would be curious to know what it means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Sturdy Scotchman."

Mr. DOHERTY: I think a sturdy Scotchman would never get into trouble of that kind. I would like to move one amendment to this clause. It will not change the substance of the law, but it is to make the particular definition of "child" in this Act compare with the definition in the Juvenile Delinquent Act, not merely as it stands at the present moment, because now it provides for an age of sixteen, and I think it desirable that with regard to all the different reformatories the definition of child should be the same. While there is in the Juvenile Delinquents Act a definition of child which presently fixes the age limit upwards at age sixteen, there is in contemplation an amendment to make it conform with an amendment which we have already made in this Act. Therefore, in order that we may secure uniformity, I move:

That sub-clause (a) of clause 3 be amended by striking out in line 30 on page 1 of the Bill the following words "a boy or girl under the age of eighteen years", and substituting the words" a child as defined by section 2 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, chapter 40 of the Statutes of 1908."

That will leave it at the present time that a child will be limited to sixteen years. If we amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act to raise the age to eighteen, the effect will be to raise the age under this Act, or if in the application of the previous provision of this measure, the word "child" is made to include persons up to eighteen, that will apply in this case. If there should be no change in the law, the present age of sixteen will stand. This is one of the institutions which pointed out that they were not, at all events at the present time, prepared to deal with children above sixteen years of age. This clause was not inserted by them but by us, to make the section such that if a general modification should be determined upon it would apply to them also. That is the purpose for which I seek to make the present amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice that subsection 2 of section 3 uses the phrase "the laws of Canada." Is it intended to differentiate between the law of Canada and provincial laws?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be disposed to think that it is intended to mean the laws of Canada, that is, the laws of the Dominion of Canada. If it were a matter of dealing with violations of the provincial law, it would be for the provincial authority to say to what place the person convicted may be sentenced. We only undertake to determine what sentences shall be imposed and where they shall be executed, in cases of offences against our law. In the case of offences against a purely provincial law, that law would prescribe where the person convicted should be sent.

INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE

House again in committee on Bill No. 73, to authorize the ratification and carrying into effect of the Proctocol of the sixteenth day of December, 1920, accepting the Statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice of the thirteenth day of December, 1920.—Right Hon. Mr. Doherty.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the committee clause 1 had been under consideration for an entire evening. It had been amended by replacing the word "ratify" in the first line of the said clause by the following words, "advised that His Majesty be humbly moved to ratify on behalf of Canada." Shall clause 1 be carried?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood that the Bill stood in committee to afford opportunity for more careful examination of the schedule. We really had threshed out both sections very fully, I think. The Bill has now stood for a considerable period of time. I postponed taking it up on one occasion at the request of hon. gentlemen, and I would suggest that the Bill be now allowed to go through.

Mr. McKENZIE: The language of the amendment comes before us, I think, for the first in the history of this Parliament. I have no recollection of ever seeing that language in any legislation passed in my time, namely, that the King be moved to do a certain thing. I rather thought that in theory the making of treaties was the act of the Sovereign, and that a motion was therefore not necessary, that all that would be expected of us would be to ratify or concur in the act of His Majesty. From that standpoint, I am not quite satisfied with the language.

Mr. DOHERTY: I may say that when it was a matter of our advising the ratification of the German Treaty and the other treaties, the matter was then looked into as to what was the accepted form for the addressing of advice of that kind to His Majesty, and it was found that the accepted form was, to humbly move His Majesty to be pleased to take this action. It is, quite true, as I understand it, at all events, that constitutionally the ratifying power is in His Majesty; certainly there is no legal requirement that there should be any action by this House. But, with regard to certain classes of treaties, a practice has grown up in the past which has made it constitutional to ask for authority to ratify from a popular body. I am not prepared to say that perhaps this particular treaty would come within that class, but as I said the other evening, it seemed to us sound democratic policy to bring every treaty of any consequence to this House for its consideration when that is conveniently possible, and we have adopted that course in this case. That will involve the Governor in Council addressing to His Majesty the document that evidences the ratification, and we have put it in what we understand to be the usual form.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Miscellaneous disbursements for Railways and Canals chargeable to Income, $166,284,290.72.

The CHAIRMAN: Before this resolution is submitted to the committee, if the hon. minister and the members of the committee are agreeable, the Chairman desires to make a suggestion which can be adopted only by unanimous consent. The suggestion is that full and entire latitude be given to the committee in discussing the present item, No. 126, and that any question concerning railways be in order on that item, with the understanding that when this item is carried, it will carry with it items, 113, which refers to rolling stock, and 341, which has reference to the Canadian National railways.

Mr. PARENT: I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this does not seem fair to the committee. It happens on Friday afternoon that very few members are in the committee, and possibly if it had been known that this item 126 would be discussed, more members would be here today. I think we should follow the ordinary procedure and take up the items as they come, one by one. The public interest will be best served if we do that.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman pointed out that his proposal could be adopted only by the unanimous consent of the committee. As there appears to be some objection to this course, it will be necessary to take up the items one by one, and it will be incumbent upon the Chairman, as far as possible, to keep the discussion strictly relevant to the subject matter of the item under consideration.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the Minister of Railways say what is the purpose of devolving tens—I was about to say hundreds —of millions of dollars, and grouping them all together? That is not good management of the public business. A great many items are included in this one, and they should be separated, so that the committee might discuss each on its merits, being at liberty to vote for one, and against another. I do not know why the minister should group them all in this one comprehensive item occupying two-thirds of the first page on which it appears, the whole of the second page, and a large portion of the third. This is not a proper way in which to submit the Estimates for the consideration of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. REID: I did not make out the list as it appears before the committee. The items in connection with the railways were sent to the Finance Department, and authorized to be printed in their present form. We sent the list to them. However, I cannot see that there is room for difficulty, because this one vote is divided into different sections, and as I understand the procedure, we shall have to take them up item by item. For instance, the first item under No. 126, is provision of $2,000 for Arbitrations and Awards and Costs of Litigation, and we shall take that up now.

Mr. STEVENS: You cannot vote for it separately.

Hon. Mr. REID: Any hon. member might move to strike it out.

Mr. FIELDING My hon. friend, I am afraid, lays himself open to the charge of what is sometimes described in other places where they venerate things less than we do, as "passing the buck"—blaming some one else for his own omission. I say that the present form of submitting these Estimates is bad, and should be corrected, and I suggest now, as the only remedy, if the Chairman will consent, that we deal with each of these various sections of the item—some of the subitems are very lengthy—individually. I move that we take them up separately, confining ourselves to each item. Because, it is not fair to ask Parliament to vote these enormous sums of money in bulk, by one vote under one resolution.

Hon. Mr. REID: I had no intention of passing the buck at all; I assume full responsibility for everything in connection with my department. As regards the present form of this vote, I may say that this is the way these items have always been submitted to the House; but as we are about to take them up one by one, I see no reason for objection.

The CHAIRMAN: When several items are included in one resolution in the Estimates any hon. member has the perfect right to make the motion just made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), that those items be considered separately. I may point out that when several items included in the same resolution are thus considered separately, it is quite competent for an hon. member to move to strike out any particular item. The Chairman has previously ruled that a motion to strike out an item from the Estimates is not in order. This ruling applies only when there is not more than one item in a separate resolution, because a motion to strike out the item would then be a negative motion. When, however, there are several items in the same resolution, hon. members may move to strike out any individual item. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's moves that Resolution 126 be considered item by item. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Arbitrations and Awards and Costs of Litigation, $2,000.

Hon. Mr. REID: This is an annual vote to provide for the payment of law costs, etc., in connection with arbitrations and judicial awards not anticipated or otherwise provided for. Nothing was spent in this direction last year, and this vote is intended to meet any cases that may arise.

Mr. PARENT: Whereabouts in the Auditor General's Report does the expenditure in connection with this item appear?

Hon. Mr. REID: Nothing was spent last year and consequently there is nothing in the Auditor General's Report in connection with this item.

Mr. PARENT: What was the reason for the vote last year, why was it not expended, and why is it necessary again this year?

Hon. Mr. REID: We are asking for the vote because occasionally the need for this expenditure may arise.

Mr. CANNON: Why is it not indicated as a re-vote?

Hon. Mr. REID: It was thought that between January and March 31, last, there might be a possibility of some of the money being expended.

Mr. CANNON: Then the department still has this money at its disposal?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, the vote lapsed on March 31. Whenever the vote lapses we must insert it again in the Estimates each year.

Mr. PARENT: After the experience of last year why was it necessary to repeat the vote?

Hon. Mr. REID: This vote has been in the Estimates for a good many years. An arbitration may take place at any time and we must have this vote to meet the expenditure.

Mr. PARENT: The item reads "miscellaneous works not provided for." If the minister can point out one single work carried out by the National Railways which does not involve a cost of more than $2,000 I will be very glad to hear his statement.

Hon. Mr. REID: This item represents arbitrations and awards and possible litigation. It has nothing at all to do with the Canadian National Railways; it relates solely to the department. If the item had reference to arbitrations and awards in connection with the National Railways it would appear in the National Railways vote.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada: Maintenance and Operation of, $206,060.

Hon. Mr. REID: Of this vote $159,760 is required for the salaries of the staff as compared with $154,890 for the fiscal year ending March 31, last; official reporting, $11,800; official car, including the salary of a porter, $3,800; printing, $2,900; stationery, $3,800; telegraph and telephone, $2,000; board and staff's travelling expenses, $12,000; contingencies, $10,000. The only change is in the salaries of the staff, and that is accounted for by the application of the reclassification.

Mr. CAHILL: Are the findings of the Railway Commission laid on the table of the House at any time?

Hon. Mr. REID: The annual report of the commission was laid on the table a short time ago; it consisted, I think, of three or four large volumes.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CAHILL: Does that report contain the findings of the commission in regard to the increased railway rates and the evidence taken before the commission in that connection?

Hon. Mr. REID: It does not give the evidence, as I understand, but according to my recollection does contain a summary of the decisions rendered.

Mr. CAHILL: Where can we get a copy of the evidence referred to?

Hon. Mr. REID: That evidence is public property. One could obtain it by applying to the Secretary of the Railway Commission, Mr. Cartwright.

Mr. CAHILL: Doesn't the minister think that printed reports of that kind should be laid on the table, or at least typewritten copies, so that members could have access to them from time to time? It is impossible for a member to go down to the office of the commission and sit there and read the evidence through. On the other hand if it were made available here he could make good use of it.

Hon. Mr. REID: I am afraid the making of typewritten copies of the evidence given in each case would involve a lot of work and cause a great deal of expense, and in the long run very few of the reports might be asked for. If any hon. member desires to have a copy of such report, or any other person, it would be desirable to write the secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CAHILL: I made application for a copy of the evidence in the rates increase case and was referred to some gentleman in Toronto who would furnish it to me for a certain price. I think when the minister is expending millions of dollars on these railways the extra cost of getting a copy, or copies, of this evidence for the records of the House, or for reference purposes of members, would be very trifling.

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course if these reports are asked for while the House is in session they will be obtained and laid on the table. When the House is not in session and members require reports it is a rather different matter. Then it would not be unfair to ask members, or the public, to pay the actual cost of preparing such reports.

Mr. CANNON: Who are the members of the Railway Commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Carvell is the chairman, and Mr. McLean, the vice-chairman; the other members are Mr. Boyce, Mr. Nantel and Mr. Rutherford. I think there is one vacancy.

Mr. CANNON: This commission is in no way under the jurisdiction of the minister, is it?

Hon. Mr. REID: No. There is a right of appeal to the Governor in Council from any decision of the commission; that is all the jurisdiction the Government has over its actions.

Mr. CANNON: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the rather extraordinary situation which arises from the fact that the chairman of the Railway Commission in his travels throughout the country speaks officially in his capacity as chairman. If I am not mistaken, a few weeks ago he was out West and there made some rather strenuous statements—according to his habit of speaking which always was strenuous. As a matter of fact, he got into rather sharp conflict with the Minister of Labour. When such a situation arises, has the minister control over the chairman, or does that gentleman represent simply his own personal views?

Hon. Mr. REID: As I understand, he was speaking for himself. He certainly did not speak for my department.

Mr. PARENT: What railways come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Hon. Mr. REID: All railways that have been declared for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. PARENT: I mean the Canadian Government railways.

Hon. Mr. REID: There is the Canadian Northern Railway system and its subsidiaries; also the Grand Trunk, if we take it over—

Mr. McMASTER: The Grand Trunk is under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, anyway.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, that is what I say. The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental will not legally come under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission until the Canadian National Railways Act has been brought into force. Pending that, the Railway Department notified the Board of Railway Commissioners to treat those railways as if they actually were under their jurisdiction. In other words, if any person had any complaint against those lines he could make it to the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the decision of the board would be confirmed by the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. PARENT: Is that done by Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. REID: No, the minister has power in cases of that kind. Let me give the hon. member a case to explain what I mean. Suppose an application came in for a farm crossing, we would ask the Board of Railway Commissioners to deal with it, and we would confirm their decision; or if the application was made direct to the Board of Railway Commissioners, they would notify the management of the Canadian National railways of their decision, and the latter would carry it out as though the Canadian National railways were actually under the jurisdiction of the board.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend take this occasion to explain the divergence of opinion between him and one of his former employees—I refer to Mr. Payne—regarding the railway deficit this year?

Hon. Mr. REID: When we started on these items it was understood that we would deal with each item separately, and the item under consideration relates simply to the Board of Railway Commissioners. I think we had better adhere to that understanding.

Mr. PARENT: When the Board of Railway Commissioners were sitting at the city of Quebec three or four months ago I presented a petition signed by the people of a certain parish in my constituency, to the effect that if the commission placed an agent at a certain station the Government railways would be better off to the extent of $15,000 a year. The line in question in that particular case was the Transcontinental railway. Mr. Carvell stated that the commission had no jurisdiction, and I was inclined to agree with this view. Now I am at a loss to find out which is really correct, the chief commissioner or the minister.

Hon. Mr. REID: If I remember rightly, I wrote a letter to the secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners when Sir Henry Drayton was chairman and gave him those instructions, and it was some time after Mr. Carvell was appointed chairman that some one did have trouble such as the hon. member has mentioned and drew my attention to it. I took it up with Mr. Carvell and he said he had never heard of the instructions that I had given. I then drew his attention to it by letter and received a reply from him stating that of course the commission would carry out those instructions. I am satisfied that if the hon. member has a similar case to bring before the Railway Commission now he will have no difficulty on the score of jurisdiction. The hon. member, of course, will appreciate that the time is very near now when the Canadian National Railways Act will be brought into force, and under that Act the Intercolonial and Transcontinental railways automatically come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. PARENT: I am glad to hear the explanation given by the minister. But the case I have in mind is much simpler. Fifteen miles outside the city of Quebec the Transcontinental railway runs through the parish of St. Augustin, but no agent has ever been placed in charge of the station built in that parish. The citizens of that parish presented to the Board of Railway Commissioners not very long ago a petition in which exporters and importers at that place set forth in detail the amounts which they exported or imported in a year, giving the names and complete information, the amounts ranging from $200 to $1,000, $1,500, and so on. They showed that they were paying in freight at least $1,700 a year and they pointed out that if an agent was placed at that station the Government would make at least $15,000 a year. This petition was presented not very long ago at the city of Quebec, after I had tried, but without success, to have the matter attended to by applying to the Canadian National railways. The answer given to the petition by the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners was that they had no jurisdiction over such cases. Where, then, are the people of Canada to go in matters of this kind? If you go to the Government, they turn you aside; if you go to the Board of Railway Commissioners, they say they have no jurisdiction. To whom can the people go with a proposal under which the Government, by spending $2,000 a year would make a profit of at least $15,000 a year—and at a time when the Government railways are showing a loss?

Hon. Mr. REID: If the hon. member will write me a note I will bring the matter to the attention of the management of the Canadian National railways and ask them to give it consideration. If their decision is not satisfactory—and this is the procedure with other railway companies as well; in the case of the Canadian Pacific the same thing would be done—I will have the matter taken up by the Board of Railway Commissioners, upon whose decision the board of management must act.

Mr. PARENT: I will give the hon. gentleman another example; it is just as well that the public should know these things. In that very same parish the Canadian Pacific has had an agent for fifteen or twenty years; but since the making of the application to which I have referred the Canadian Pacific have applied to have their agent withdrawn. The minister can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This House has appointed a Special Committee to consider the question of Canada's fuel supply. I notice that Hon. Mr. Carvell was interviewed by several deputations at Winnipeg on that very important question, and it was suggested that if there was a fair reduction of freight rates on coal—during the summer season only, so as to give way to the grain trade in the fall—that would be a practical solution of the problem of coal supply for the West. Mr. Carvell has returned and I would like to know whether the commission has come to any conclusion with regard to the suggestions made by western boards of trade on that subject.

Hon. Mr. REID: I noticed something in the newspapers to the effect that it was the intention of the chairman of the Railway Commission to submit to his colleagues upon his return all the evidence and information obtained at the different points. He has only been home a few days, and I understand that so far no action has been taken.

Mr. FORTIER: I understand that there is a French secretary as well as an English secretary for the Railway Commission. What are their names and their respective salaries?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Cartwright is the English secretary and Mr. Primeau is the assistant secretary. Mr. Cartwright gets $5,000 a year; under the Railway Act as amended his salary was put at that amount. Mr. Primeau gets $3,200, according to information given on page W-57 of the Auditor-General's report.

Mr. FORTIER: Mr. Pirmeau was a member of the Montreal bar, having been a law partner of Hon. Mr. Coderre, one time a colleague of the hon. minister. He has wide knowledge and experience; his responsibilities and duties are similar to those of the English secretary, and I do not see why his salary should not be the same as that paid to Mr. Cartwright. I hope the minister will see that these salaries are put on the same basis.

Hon. Mr. REID: Possibly Mr. Primeau's salary has been increased by the classification. Of course, this matter is out of the hands of the department; it is dealt with by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CANNON: Does Mr. Nantel sit with the Railway Commission now?

Hon. Mr. REID: Oh, yes, he works hard every day.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that there is a vacancy on the board. Is it the intention of the Government to fill that vacancy, or is it not thought that five commissioners are sufficient to do all the work which comes before the board?

Hon. Mr. REID: I would have to consider that.

Mr. ROSS: Has the Cabinet considered it?

Hon. Mr. REID: We have been very busy with these Estimates.

Mr. ROSS: This is a very important matter. There used to be seven members on this board, I understand.

Hon. Mr. REID: I think the number is six now. There is a vacancy at present.

Mr. ROSS: I want just a straight answer from the minister if they have considered the matter.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have not considered the matter up to the present time.

Mr. ROSS: Does the minister think it is necessary to fill the vacancy?

Hon. Mr. REID: If I did not think it was necessary, I would not have it filled.

Mr. ROSS: I do not believe the people of this country think it is necessary to fill the vacancy. There is not work for six commissioners, and it is an unnecessary expense to impose on the country to have six commissioners when there is not work for six. With the heavy debt with which this country is burdened, that is one of the expenditures which it might be wise to cut down.

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member was one of those who supported the appointment of six commissioners. This commission was created under the previous Government. I can only give my opinion for what it is worth; my opinion —and it is just as strong as that of the hon. member—is that there should be six men on that commission. Therefore, I say that the naming of six men originally was in the interest of the country.

Mr. ROSS: I have great respect for the minister's opinion, and I always have had; but to say that, because six men were appointed originally, when the work of the commission was in its initial stages and it was getting organized, and making new rules, and when there may have been work for six men, six men are necessary to do the work now when a great deal of the work has become routine work, is not very sound argument. My contention is that there is not work on the commission now for six men, and in the interest of economy this vacancy should not be filled.

Mr. FIELDING: How and when did the vacancy occur?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Goodeve, one of the members, died some months ago, I do not know the date.

Mr. FIELDING: If the commission has been able to get along with five members, and there is no urgency about the matter, the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) would have some ground for saying that the additional member is not necessary.

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member, (Mr. Fielding) during the years while he was in office, I suppose, had many cases where a vacancy in a court remained unfilled for months and yet the work was carried on. Other judges may have had to work a little harder, and the same is probably true in this case.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister is not very happy in his illustration. The courts are determined by the provincial legislatures which determine the number of judges.

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that the Government at Ottawa fills the vacancy.

Mr. FIELDING: But the number is decided by the Provincial Government, and the Government at Ottawa have nothing to do with the number. I am glad of the admiration which the minister expresses for what was done by the Laurier Government, although he is a little late in expressing it. When these things were done by the Laurier Government, my hon. friend and his friends were the most severe critics. Now my hon. friend shields himself behind what was done by the Laurier Government.

Hon. Mr. REID: We were always glad to support everything that we thought was in the interest of the country. In this particular case, I supported the Bill creating the Board of Railway Commissioners. I remember when the Bill came in, and I am glad that at that time my hon. friend and myself agreed.

Mr. CANNON: A few months ago the commercial interests of the city of Quebec, after having tried for a long time, succeeded in having the Railway Commission visit our city so that the representatives of the Government and the commercial people of Quebec might discuss before the Railway Commission the improvement of the railway situation at large. If I am not mistaken, it was understood at that time that the discussion was to take place between representatives of the Government and these interested parties. Much to the surprise of the public in general and especially of the commercial interests, the Canadian Pacific railway was very largely represented through attorneys and otherwise, and most of the discussion took place through the representatives of the Canadian Pacific. The whole situation was reviewed; the Railway Commission apparently took a very keen interest in the debates which took place, but since then we have never heard a word from the commission. No decision of any kind has been rendered, and the situation remains in exactly the same position as it was then. The minister, earlier in the afternoon, in answer to a question, told me that he had no control over this commission in the way of changing its decisions or anything of that sort; but I would be very anxious to accept the friendly offers, made by the minister frequently while he is passing his Estimates, to do whatever he can for us on this side of the House. About half an hour ago he offered my deskmate, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) to send a note to the Canadian National railways to try to settle up a difficulty which existed in my hon. friend's constituency. I should be glad if the great influence of the minister could be brought to bear upon the Railway Commission, so that we might get some decision and that the Quebec people might know, some time before the end of the year, if possible, exactly where we stand. That would be only fair, especially when we see by the item before the committee the enormous amount of money which is spent every year to pay for the Railway Commission and the staff, in order that it may give proper service and satisfaction to the people. What is the use of having a commission and going to all the trouble which was gone to in the city of Quebec, by both the Railway Commission and the people at large, if, after a hearing of that importance, no decision is rendered?

Hon. Mr. REID: I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and ask him what the situation is in connection with the matter which the hon. member has mentioned. As I stated, decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners are made entirely independent of the department. I will get a reply from the chairman as to exactly what the situation is in connection with the matter and will let the hon. member know.

Mr. PARENT: Just this morning I heard a committee member from British Columbia state that when they wanted members of the board to go and study questions in their part of the country, they could never get them to go to that province. Representatives from British Columbia have to travel to Ottawa in order to appear before the commission. Is there any way in which the commission can be compelled to visit a province like British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not know that there is any way in which we can compel them to go. I do not know whether there is anything in the Act to force them to go to any particular part of the country; but I have always found that if any matter is of great or sufficient importance, the commission will go to any part of Canada. They do go through all parts of Canada. They have, as the hon. member knows, officials whom they send to any place where there is a complaint and where it is necessary that some one should go. I would hardly think that if a case were put up to them where the commission should go and attend personally to a matter, they would not go. If the hon. member has any case of sufficient importance that he thinks they should have gone, and they did not go, I should be very glad to bring it to the attention of the commission. When the facts warrant it, the commission will take the evidence and look the situation over.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as filling the vacancy on the Board of Railway Commissioners is concerned, I was going to suggest to the Minister that we could probably get along very well without filling it, and save the expense. My own view has been that three members on the Board of Railway Commissioners, with the staff they have should be quite sufficient to discharge all the work that the Board has to do. As a matter of fact I think in the past the active work of the board has really devolved on two or three commissioners. I would earnestly commend to the Minister of Railways that he might well save a few thousand dollars by leaving this vacancy unfilled. In my judgment a board of three commissioners will function just as well as a board of six, and this is not a time when we can think of lightly spending money that it is not absolutely necessary to expend.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada: to pay expenses in connection with cases before the Board, $5,000.

Mr. COPP: What is that for?

Hon. Mr. REID: This is to provide for the payment of counsel, expenses, and so forth, in any case in which the department might require to have a representative before the Railway Commission. Previous to 1920-21 an amount of $15,000 was in the Estimates for this purpose. We have reduced that to $5,000.

Mr. COPP: What was spent last year?

Hon. Mr. REID: Nothing. The item is only there in case something might turn up where it would be necessary to engage counsel.

Mr. CANNON: By the Government or by the commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: By the commission.

Mr. CANNON: Would the railway commissioners have to do with the payment of counsel?

Hon. Mr. REID: Some case might arise where they would require special counsel.

Mr. PARENT: My hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) mentioned that whenever a case comes before the Board of Railway Commissioners, the Canadian Pacific is always represented by counsel. Are we to infer that the Canadian Government railways also want to have their counsel present in the same way?

Hon. Mr. REID: The Canadian National railways would have to pay their own separate counsel. This is only in connection with the commission itself.

Mr. CANNON: How the commission itself? Has not the commission on its staff somebody in a position to give legal advice? We have just voted $206,000 for the staff. Am I to understand that there is nobody on that staff in a position to give legal advice to the commission?

Hon. Mr. REID: There might be a case between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern, for instance, in which the public should be represented, and where it would be in the public interest that the commission should have an independent counsel. In cases of that kind they would have to engage counsel, but it is only in exceptional cases. The appropriation is very seldom used.

Mr. CANNON: I do not wish to show any lack of proper consideration for the Minister, but when he gives an explanation such as he has just given to the committee, I think the members have a perfect right to smile, and smile broadly. The minister said that counsel might be engaged in cases where it was in the public interest for the railway commission to do so, and he instanced a case between the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific.

Hon. Mr. REID: They both might appear before the commission.

Mr. CANNON: But the people of this country are paying millions of dollars every year for their railways; either this railway is ours or it is not.

Hon. Mr. REID: There might be a case in connection with the Grand Trunk.

Mr. CANNON: The minister did not suggest the Grand Trunk, but even if he had, his argument would be no more applicable. For the last three or four years this House has been voting millions of dollars to acquire railroads. Every year the amount we have to pay increases and the Minister of Railways, who spends that money to buy railways—he certainly did spend the money, and I hope he has bought something with it—now comes before the committee this afternoon and tells us that we do not own the railway. I think that the people of this country are entitled to a clear explanation from the minister. If this railway belongs to us, the Government can protect their own railway, and we do not need to vote $5,000 or $10,000 or even five cents for special counsel. We have the Department of Justice, and counsel attached to the Railway Department. If the minister seriously makes the declaration that the railways do not belong to us, but are absolutely independent of the Government and their interests different from those of the Government, I think the people of this country will have something to say to the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the minister give a concrete case, or even a hypothetical case, where this money might be used? Candidly, I do not understand just for what purpose it is to be used.

Hon. Mr. REID: In answer to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), if it was a case in connection with the Canadian National Railways they would pay their own counsel; the money would not come out of this vote at all; but there are cases where it might be in the public interest to engage outside counsel.

Mr. CHISHOLM: For instance?

Hon. Mr. REID: There might be a telephone rate case, or something of that kind, where the public should be represented other than by the officials of the commission. This vote has been used in years past, and it is thought well to keep it there to protect the public.

Mr. CANNON: When was the last case?

Hon. Mr. REID: If the hon. member wishes me to give some better explanation, I would suggest that the item stand and I would ask the Chairman of the Commission to furnish me with more details.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Has this item been used in one instance?

Hon. Mr. REID: My deputy tells me that it was used three years ago.

Mr. CANNON: In what case?

Hon. Mr. REID: I cannot say at the moment, but if the hon. member wants concrete cases, we can let the item stand until after dinner, and I can get the information from the commission.

Mr. CANNON: I would like to have the explanation now. I do not want to be unjust to the minister. He does not know everything, but what he does not know, his help here ought to know. When he comes before this committee, I think we are entitled to a satisfactory explanation, and I think we should have it now. The minister is a very clever man, in a way. Whenever de does not give an explanation, he proposes that we should go and have dinner, knowing that after our dinner is over our digestions may not be in good order and we may forget about the explanation. I want that explanation now, not after dinner, and I think it is only fair that the minister should give it. The minister has right next to him his chief engineer and the deputy minister, who knows all about the railway situation in Canada and the Railway Commission. My hon friend, a moment ago, told us that one concrete instance in which this item might be applied would be the case where the Canadian Northern might be before the commission. His second statement nullified the first, because he said it would not apply in such cases. When I asked the minister to state a real instance of this application, he said it would apply when a telephone case was before the commission. Why should it apply particularly when a telephone case is before the commission? Would it be because, when a telephone company is before the commission, some of the commissioners cannot sit? We ought to know. I am a lawyer, accustomed to pleading before the courts, and as a rule, whenever a question arises before a court, parties interested are represented by counsel and the tribunal has not to pay extra counsel. Generally the parties interested have too much representation.

Mr. FIELDING: I am going to come to the aid of the minister. I have a hazy recollection of circumstances arising which led to this vote being originally proposed. You do not want any special vote for the Canadian Northern, or the Canadian Pacific, or the Grand Trunk, or a telephone company, or any of the big corporations; they are always represented before the Railway Commission. But I think it was alleged that sometimes a public interest is developed which is not represented before the commission, the case of some person who is not able to employ expensive counsel, and it was thought well to make provision for such cases.

Mr. PARENT: If the Minister of Railways had made such a statement as we have just heard, there would have been no objection to the vote.

Item agreed to.

Contribution to International Association of Railways Congress—$97.33.

Mr. CANNON: Who got the money under this vote last year?

Hon. Mr. REID: The International Association of Railways was established in 1882, and its object is to further all matters particularly connected with the progress of railway communication, by uniting in one association the railway administration of states and public companies in all parts of the world. This has been an annual vote.

Mr. CANNON: I have no objection whatever to the vote, and I must congratulate the person, whoever he may be, to whom this money is paid, for the moderation of his expenses. I trust that whenever the Government is called upon to appoint a delegate this gentleman will be chosen. He is most reasonable, and I hope that the results he obtains will exceed in value the expenses he entails.

Item agreed to.

Commissioner of Highways. To provide for the organization and payment of staff to Commissioner of Highways, including A. W. Campbell, C.E., as Commissioner of Highways at $5,000 per annum, $53,000.

Hon. Mr. REID: The following is a list of salaries and expenses:

Commissioner	$ 5,000
Secretary and two clerk stenographers	2,010
Messengers	300
Chief Engineer	6,000
Senior draftsman	2,220
Two clerks	3,660
Inspecting Engineer, Quebec	3,300
Inspecting Engineer, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island	3,000
Inspecting Engineer, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta	3,600
Stenographer	1,020
Total	$30,110
Expenses Inspecting Engineer, Quebec, rent and expenses	600
Inspecting Engineer, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, rent and expenses	600
Inspecting Engineer, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, expenses	300
Travelling Allowances	10,000
One motor, (Quebec) inspector	2,000
One motor, Maritime Provinces inspector	2,000
One motor, Western inspector	2,000
One motor, Ontario inspector	3,000
Printing and stationery	1,000
Total	$21,500
Unforeseen	$ 1,390
Grand Total	$53,000

Mr. CHISHOLM: The minister has mentioned inspectors in connection with several provinces; he has mentioned Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Manitoba. He has not said anything about Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. REID: Ottawa is headquarters for Ontario. The men here do the inspecting for this province, and save an engineer's expenses.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What about Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. REID: We had a Mr. Henry, and now Mr. Woss.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What salary is paid this man?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Woss is not in this list because he was temporarily employed after Mr. Henry's resignation.

Mr. CHISHOLM: You have provided automobiles for inspectors in some provinces, and not in others. I do not understand this.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have not a special amount for an inspector for Nova Scotia. We have an inspector for New Brunswick, and he has been assisted by Mr. Woss. We shall have to ask for an inspector for Nova Scotia in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. FIELDING: I take it that the work done by the Government of Nova Scotia is so satisfactory that they do not need to employ any one to watch it, and we accept the compliment. Has not Mr. Campbell the rank of a deputy minister? If so, why does he not get the same salary?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Campbell occupies the position of Commissioner of Highways. That is the title that was given him, and he gets the salary that was fixed for the position.

Mr. FIELDING: Has he not the rank of a deputy?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

Mr. COPP: There is an increase in this item from $25,000 to $53,000. I presume there has been a reorganization of the department since last year to account for that increase.

Hon. Mr. REID: There was not very much work done last year; and, as the hon. member will have observed from the statement I read, one large item is the sum of $9,000 for motors. Inspection work in all provinces is on a larger scale than it was a year ago and requires a larger expenditure.

Mr. COPP: But the motors make a difference of only $9,000. Has there been a reorganization of the office and staff since last year? I want to know what accounts for the increase.

Hon. Mr. REID: Last year we only had Mr. Grant at the time the vote was passed. The others came on later in the year and we have to provide for their salaries. The work had not been really organized or got very far ahead and the engineers of the department handled it and kept the organization moving. Then we appointed permanent inspectors and their salaries in full are required for the year.

Mr. COPP: Who is the inspector for the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and when was he appointed?

Hon. Mr. REID: Mr. Dick is the inspector for the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. He is an engineer and was employed on railway construction.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On the Quebec and Saguenay.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes on the construction of the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Mr. COPP: Is he a former resident of the province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. REID: I could not say.

Mr. PARENT: What is the amount of the Budget that will be at the disposal of the Commissioner of Highways?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member will recall, of course, that a vote of $20,000,000 was passed. Each province is entitled to its share of that, and the commissioner and his staff will have supervision of the expenditure. The money has to be expended within a period of five years. Some provinces will perhaps expend more of the proportion allotted to them in a year, and others will perhaps expend less. The staff must supervise and audit the expenditure and see that it is made in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. PARENT: I would imagine that the Commissioner of Highways, who is to have the control of the expenditure of such a large amount of money, should be paid a larger salary than $5,000 a year. Although not in favour of lavish expenditure I should think that a professional man, such as a civil engineer, who occupies such a responsible position, should be paid a larger salary, and if the minister wishes to do justice to an efficient official he should see to it that his salary is more commensurate with the responsible duties which he discharges.

Mr. CANNON: Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee what amounts, out of this $20,000,000, have already been expended, what amounts are to be expended this year, whether any balance will remain after this year's outlays, and, if so, what that balance will amount to?

Hon. Mr. REID: The money has been divided as follows among the provinces: Prince Edward Island, $603,455; Nova Scotia, $1,468,720; New Brunswick, $1,163,845; Quebec, $4,748,420; Ontario, $5,877,275; Manitoba, $1,602,265; Saskatchewan, $1,806,255; Alberta, $1,477,810; British Columbia, $1,251,955. As to the expenditures already made they were given in reply to a question put in the House on April 12. It shows that Ontario had received $295,100 of its share; British Columbia had received $86,446.52; Prince Edward Island, $40,264.79; and Quebec had received up to that time $56,374.19, but a day or two afterwards additional payments made raised the total to $109,000.

Mr. CANNON: Those are the expenditures for the last two years?

Hon. Mr. REID: From the time the Act came into force up to the present.

Mr. CANNON: Then there was not half a million dollars spent?

Hon. Mr. REID: There was not anything paid last year; there was very little work done. But these highways are all under way now, and from this time forward the expenditures will be made in larger amounts and at a much faster rate.

Mr. CANNON: What are the estimated expenditures for this year? It strikes me as rather extraordinary that we should maintain a large staff and provide them with salaries and automobiles, when only half a million dollars has been spent in two years, unless there has been a change in policy.

Hon. Mr. REID: There was very little expenditure last year on the staff and organization, but the commissioner tells me that, as nearly as he can estimate, we shall have to pay about $2,500,000 this year. But the provinces may rush the work on at a much faster rate, in which case we will pay our proportion of the expenditure.

Mr. CANNON: How will that $2,500,000 be distributed among the provinces?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not got that precise information but it will be paid in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. CANNON: Have there been any pressing demands for this money from the different provinces?

Hon. Mr. REID: Every province is taking up its full amount, there is no doubt about that. The provinces are all carrying on work that will use up every dollar they are entitled to under this Act.

Mr. CANNON: Apparently not. Judging by the figures given by the minister a little less than half a million dollars has been expended up to date. This year the minister estimates that his expenditure will amount to $2,500,000, or a total of about $3,000,000, so that the requests from the different provinces cannot be very pressing when there is such a small expenditure out of a total of $20,000,000 at their disposal.

Hon. Mr. REID: I may say to the hon. member that the first year after the Act had gone into effect the provinces had to prepare their plans and locate the works to be constructed. As a result of that the calls for money did not involve a considerable amount. Now these works are going ahead pretty fast, and there is not any doubt at all the provinces will use every dollar to which they are entitled within the period of five years during which the Act is effective.

Mr. CANNON: In the minister's opinion would it not be a very good policy for the Government to cut out this expenditure altogether?

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course the hon. member knows that the policy of Parliament decided the making of these agreements. Under those agreements works have been undertaken that will require every dollar of the money to be granted, and it would be impossible now to cut out these grants.

Mr. CANNON: Does the minister mean that an agreement has been signed between the Federal Government and every province?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: Will the minister say when the agreement with the province of Quebec was signed?

Hon. Mr. REID: We signed agreements for each particular road.

Mr. CANNON: For each particular road?

Hon. Mr. REID: Each province has a layout of the various routes projected, and then as each route is ready it is submitted to our staff for report and approval and, if approved, an agreement is made and signed in which an estimate is given of the total cost of the particular road, of which cost we agree to pay forty per cent.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that, but my information is that the Provincial Government of Quebec refused at first to accept the condition made by the Federal Government. I do not know whether later on an agreement was signed, but if so, I would like to know when, the nature of it, and what new conditions were arranged.

Hon. Mr. REID: We have signed several agreements with the province of Quebec, and so far as I understand there is not any trouble between the two governments at the present time.

Mr. CANNON: When were those agreements signed?

Hon. Mr. REID: Agreements were signed from time to time during last year.

Mr. FORTIER: Has the minister a list of the proposed road construction in the province of Quebec submitted by the Provincial Government to the Federal Government?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have in my hand a plan submitted by the Provincial Government showing the layout of various projected roads and the agreements that we have signed in connection therewith. For instance, it shows the following projects:

No.	Name of Road	Miles
1a.	Montreal-Sherbrooke	85.25
2.	Montreal-Quebec
3.	Lévis-St. Lambert	177·
4.	Caughnawaga-Malone	45.38
5.	Beauce Junction-Sherbrooke	95.58
9.	Montreal-Rouses Point	39.47
10.	Lévis-Sherbrooke	128.18
11.	Montreal-Mont Laurier	140.04
12.	St. Hyacinthe-Chambly	14.72
15.	Victoriaville-St. Angèle	35.
16.	Richmond-St. François du Lac	39.4
14.	Lacolle-Laprairie	34·
6.	Lévis-Rivière du Loup-Rimouski	184.45
17.	Hull-Aylmer	6.184

Mr. PARENT: All those are suggestions?

Hon. Mr. REID: These have been approved and agreements have been signed.

At Six o'clock the committee rose and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 132 (from the Senate), respecting the Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

Bill No. 133 (from the Senate), for the relief of Elizabeth Gertrude Conner.—Mr. Copp.

Bill No. 134 (from the Senate), for the relief of Louise Sullivan.—Mr. McMaster.

THE JAMES MACLAREN COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. Fontaine, the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 8, respecting The James MacLaren Company, Limited, were read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item No. 126. A motion had been made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that the resolution be considered item by item, and we had reached the fifth item, which reads as follows:

Commissioner of Highways: To provide for the organization and payment of staff of Commissioner of Highways, including A. W. Campbell, C.E., as Commissioner of Highways at $5,000 per annum, $53,000.

Mr. CANNON: The minister has said that several agreements have been entered into between the Federal Government and the Government of the province of Quebec with respect to the construction of highways, the cost of which would be above the $20,000,000 voted by Parliament two years ago for the whole of Canada. Under what conditions were these agreements entered into? Were the first conditions offered to the Provincial Government accepted, and if not what changes were made?

Hon. Mr. REID: In all the provinces the procedure is to select the roads they intend to work on; then they take the matter up with our officials and an agreement is entered into in respect to those on which we are willing to pay our forty per cent, the province paying sixty per cent. The amount involved in respect of the roads in the province of Quebec on which we have definitely agreed to pay our forty per cent does not come to anything like $20,000,000. Some of the provinces have submitted plans which will take up the whole of their proportion; others have not proceeded to the full extent of the amount to which they are entitled. Quebec and Ontario are among the latter. If I remember rightly, Ontario has submitted plans which on the basis of our forty per cent involve an expenditure of about $2,800,000.

Mr. CANNON: For the coming year?

Hon. Mr. REID: Oh, no. Some of the roads may be completed within a year; in other cases it may be two or three years before the work is completed. Quebec has entered into agreements involving about $1,800,000, but they are busy preparing plans for the taking up of the rest of their allotment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has any proposal been submitted by the province of Quebec with regard to a projected highway between St. Joachim in the province of Quebec and St. Simeon, passing through Baie St. Paul and Murray Bay?

Hon. Mr. REID: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think there was a discussion between the minister and the Commissioner of Highways with regard to the granting of these subsidies to different municipalities along the road between Quebec and St. Joachim. Has the Government arrived at any decision in that matter?

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not know whether that particular point was discussed; the question was taken up as to including certain villages, and so on. Of course, each province has its own regulations with regard to its incorporated villages, towns and cities, but we came to a satisfactory arrangement in that regard. I may say that so far no difficulty has been experienced with any of the provinces in connection with the administration of the Act.

Mr. BEST: How many miles of highway in Ontario have been approved by the Dominion Government?

Hon. Mr. REID: The number of miles approved in each province is as follows: British Columbia, 10 roads, 140 miles; Saskatchewan, 3 roads, 104 miles; Ontario, 16 roads, 526 miles; Quebec, 10 roads, 154 miles; Prince Edward Island, 63 miles; Nova Scotia, 44 miles. This statement was made in March, and there has been a number of additions since, which I have not here.

Mr. BEST: Is it a fact that on the different provincial highways throughout Ontario, the Dominion Government is paying 40 per cent.

Hon. Mr. REID: Only on those regarding which we have signed an agreement with the Ontario Government, not on the whole plan as laid down.

Mr. BEST: The minister told us that there were no complaints about the way in which this money was spent. I have been in Parliament for twelve years, and I have never heard so much complaint regarding any government in power as I have of this one with regard to the way in which this money has been spent. Three members of this House went down to the commissioner to find out what amount had been paid to the Ontario Government by the Dominion Government. We were told distinctly by the commissioner that nothing as yet had been paid. We were also told that very few miles of road had yet been taken over. Two days later, when a communication was sent to the commissioner's office asking for a report as to how many dollars had been paid out, to whom it had been paid and what number of miles had been taken over, we found that about a quarter of a million dollars had been paid. Something must be radically wrong if the commissioner is not able to tell what amount of money has been spent. This money has been spent very foolishly in Ontario; in some instances two or three roads running parallel have been taken over while other parts of the province have not been getting any benefit from this grant.

There is a government road running right through the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and our roads are worse than they were before they were taken over. Immediately they are taken over, the municipalities decline to do a dollar's worth of work and the roads are left in a bad state. Roads in our province are 66 feet wide, and now the Ontario Government is speaking about making them 86 feet wide, whereas 66 feet is too wide. The people are finding fault and rebelling against this proposition, and it is up to the Government, when they pay money to any Provincial Government, to see that it is properly and not foolishly spent. My contention is that moneys granted for highway purposes as well as for other purposes are spent foolishly. Farmers say that if this sort of thing is continued, they will have to abandon the farms because taxes are getting so high that it will be impossible for them to pay them. It is about time for the Government to instruct its officials, who are paid to look after the spending of this money, to make sure that it is honestly and justly spent. I was informed that the work on these roads was being done by contract. There is no such thing as contract work on roads in any part of the province; the work is done by day labour, and almost all of the halt, lame and blind in the community are on the road, mostly sitting under shade trees, drawing four or five dollars a day. I am speaking now of what occurred last year. Few people know that the Dominion Government is providing part of this expenditure, and now that people are finding that out, they are finding fault with the Dominion Government for the way in which the money is spent. Under what conditions is this money spent? Who sees if the department here is getting value for every dollar that is spent on the roads in order that the money may not be wasted?

Hon. Mr. REID: What road does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. BEST: I refer to a road in Wentworth county that I travel over, that will cost probably $1,500,000, and I do not think there is any need in the world for such an expenditure. A high bridge is being built in connection with it, and farmers and other people are rebelling against this expenditure. I do not know whether the road from the city of Toronto to Brantford, or any part of it has been taken over, but I know that the money along there has been squandered.

Hon. Mr. REID: With reference to the expenditure in Dundas county, and in fact, in all of the counties where men are at work on roads, there is no doubt that the roads cannot be kept in good shape while the work is being carried on. The men have to excavate and dig out the roads and then put in rock and a top on that. It takes two or three years before you can get a road in good shape, so that once a road is taken over and work is commenced on it, the people travelling along that road are bound to suffer great inconvenience until the road is completed. In fact, until then, they have to take another road if they want to have a road on which they can travel satisfactorily. As regards the road in the district in which the hon. member lives, I do not know whether that has been approved or whether an agreement has been entered into. I could not tell unless I knew the road referred to.

When this work was commenced, we had to create a special organization, first, of engineers to inspect the work as it goes along. The Provincial Government have their staff of engineers who are in charge of this work. The arrangement is that the Ontario Government, or any other provincial government, call for tenders where it is possible to let the work by tender; the work is carried on under the supervision of their engineers, and I presume that the provincial governments endeavour to get value for their 60 per cent of the expenditure. The duty of our engineers is to see that specifications are prepared and the work carried on in accordance with the agreement made for the particular road; to see that we get value; and that the expenditures are fair and reasonable. We also have our audit staff which goes and investigates the books of the Ontario Government from time to time and keeps a close watch on all expenditures. I do not know that there is much more that we could do to protect expenditures.

Mr. EULER: As regards roads being built in Ontario—I am referring more particularly to roads in western Ontario, such as the highway from Hamilton to Dundas and up to Galt and Kitchener—I should like to know whether the kind of road that is being built meets with the approval of the department. I presume they have something to say with regard to that; that they would not sign an agreement unless they were satisfied that the road was of the right type.

Hon. Mr. REID: Our engineers and staff must approve all the roads before we sign the agreements. We have not made any agreement with the Ontario Government regarding the road from Dundas to Kitchener; so of course we are not responsible for anything in connection with the construction of that road.

Mr. EULER: Is there an agreement as to the part from Hamilton to Dundas?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Is the road further to the north to be of the same kind?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Hon. Mr. REID: I cannot say until the agreement is submitted.

Mr. EULER: I am not an expert on roads, but I understand that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction with regard to that particular section of the road. Of course, it may not have been well founded.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): There is a certain road, which I have been told is the county road, running north from the city of London. Is that portion of the road running north from the boundary line of the city a Government road?

Hon. Mr. REID: I understand it is a road that the Dominion Government have approved, and have undertaken to pay a certain portion of the cost.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): I have been over that road, and positively it is the worst piece of road I have seen for years. Let me give you an idea of the condition it is in. The automobiles make ruts in the road the size of the tire, and last summer I counted seven ruts in the road nearly a mile long, running from the city of London north. They told me that the road had been built only two months before. All the money spent on it has been lost—every cent. If that is one of these Government roads, I think a special committee should be appointed to go out and examine it and find out whether or not our money has been thrown away. I believe it has.

Hon. Mr. REID: I know that some roads which people think are completed are not at all completed. After a certain amount of work has been done on the roads, they must remain in that condition until the foundation settles and becomes hard enough to have the top dressing put on. I know some roads in Eastern Ontario that are in just about the same condition as the one my hon. friend has mentioned. Only the foundation is there, but after that has settled and become hard, perhaps in the fall or next year they will put the top dressing on, and it will then be a permanent road. That is the intention, and it is what the agreement provides for. All our officials have been warned that the roads will not be accepted unless they comply with the terms of the agreement, and the money is not paid until the roads are approved and taken over.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): The minister's answer only makes matters worse. The foundation is what we want substantial. Everybody who knows anything about a road knows that the top is only a light cover, and is quite different from the foundation. I would like to know whether that road is finished or not.

Hon. Mr. REID: The road is not finished, so far as any agreement we have entered into is concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): Is the foundation finished?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not been over that road lately, but I will get detailed information and send it to my hon. friend about Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): If the minister will give the information to the House that will be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If there is any difficulty in building roads in Ontario, the province of Quebec will be only too glad to lend its good offices and send its engineers to help in this work. In our province we have the best roads in Canada to-day, and we have any number of tourists travelling over the province in the summer, although, of course, there are many other reasons besides the good roads why tourists come to our province.

Mr. BEST: Has not the province of Quebec already lent its engineers to the Dominion Government?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. Last fall a road near Ottawa was required to be completed in short time, and the Government of the province of Quebec did not wait for the application of the Ontario Government but sent along its engineers and the necessary machinery. There was a real love feast between the two provinces, and it was a striking evidence of the good spirit which exists between them to-day.

Speaking of highways, I would like the Minister of Railways to take notice of the decision which has been arrived at lately by the Government of the province of Quebec to rebuild a road, which is practically a federal road, in the peninsula of Gaspé. It is known as the Maritime road. It was originally built by the Federal Government at the time of Confederation, for the maintenance of light houses and the telegraph line. The telegraph line in those days was the property of the Dominion Government. Now it is the property of the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, but the lighthouses are still dotting the coast from Cape Chat as far as Gaspé basin. At my request, the Government of Quebec decided this year to undertake the renewal of that old road, which was badly in need of repair. The Hon. Mr. Perrault, of the Quebec Government, has told me that he is awaiting the decision of the Dominion Government as to contributing its share towards the reconstruction of that road. I will send the papers to my hon. friend, and I hope he will consider the application favourably.

Hon. Mr. REID: No agreement has yet been entered into by the Dominion Government as to that road, but when the application is submitted by the Quebec Government, we will try and do what we can.

Mr. BEST: When the Provincial Government asks the Dominion Government to say whether it approves of a certain road, does the Dominion Government send an inspector to inspect the road after it is completed, or does it send an overseer who watches the progress of the road from day to day?

Hon. Mr. REID: The roads are under the charge and supervision of the Provincial Government. They have a permanent engineer on the road. We also have engineers travelling over these roads as they are being constructed. We do not have a man on one particular road all the time, but he travels about to see whether the work generally is being carried on in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does the minister expect this co-operation between the Dominion Government and the provinces to go on from year to year? Is it to be a perpetual co-operation? Is that to be the permanent policy of the Government, or is it only temporary?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member understands that we are working under a Bill that was passed by Parliament regarding the construction of highways, and our assistance will continue until the $20,000,000 has been exhausted. Then it will end.

Mr. FORTIER: Before recess the minister was reading, from a map approved by the province of Quebec, and submitted to his department, a list of the highways in Quebec. When the committee rose he had not concluded. I understand that another highway has been approved of by Quebec—probably it is mentioned in the plan—from Hull to Montreal. Many years ago the Government of Quebec contemplated work on this road, and I am sure that an agreement in respect of it has been submitted to the department. Already work has been commenced on that highway, many miles having been completed. I am informed that last year the work was carried on with the understanding that the Federal Government would contribute its share of 40 per cent. Operations have now been suspended, to the great disadvantage of the municipalities concerned. My impression is that this highway has been approved by the Dominion Government also. Is that correct, and is it the intention to proceed as quickly as possible with the work during the coming summer? Many municipalities, especially in the county of Labelle, have passed by-laws in regard to the road, in the belief that the federal grant would be given. They will be greatly disappointed if they do not receive an assurance this year that the federal grant will be given them.

Hon. Mr. REID: An agreement has been entered into in regard to a portion of the road between Hull and Montreal for about six miles. This road is on the general plan of the province of Quebec, but the Provincial Government has not yet made application to the Dominion Government for an agreement under the Act in regard to the whole road. Until they do make application and an agreement has been entered into, no action can or will be taken by this Government.

Mr. FORTIER: Has any action been taken by the Provincial Government.

Hon. Mr. REID: They must first take action. They must decide what roads they want to come under the Act, and then make application to the Dominion Government. We will then send our engineers to report whether we would be justified in entering into the agreement with the province in regard to those roads. But until the province itself moves in the matter we will do nothing.

Mr. FOURNIER: How much has been expended in the province of Quebec under this Act, to date?

Hon. Mr. REID: I gave a statement this afternoon on that question, but I will repeat it. On April 12, I gave an answer in the House to a question, and stated that $56,374.19 had been paid to the province of Quebec to date. The accounts are now being adjusted with a view to further payments, but the last time I looked into the matter, a week or so ago, the amount was $109,000.

[Mr. Fortier.]

Mr. FOURNIER: I have some criticism to offer on this question. I have no fault to find with the Commissioner of Highways, whom we properly call "Good Roads" Campbell. But in the Act there is a provision that everything must be done by contract. Now I may say offhand, and I think I am right, that in the province of Quebec we have built roads without calling for tenders, and have got satisfaction. We have been able to build them cheaper and with better results. If the work is given to contractors they will absorb about 35 per cent, and we will get, in the province of Quebec, only 5 per cent benefit out of the grant. Quebec has been paid, so far, according to the minister's statement, only $56,000, and if that province has not taken advantage of the scheme to any greater extent, it is because we can build roads cheaper and to better advantage, and do not think we should have the Government pay 40 per cent, the great bulk of which would only go to contractors, the province benefiting to the extent of only 5 per cent. I put this to the minister as a fair matter for discussion.

Hon. Mr. REID: When the Act was passed the House agreed, and a clause was inserted so providing, that wherever possible, in the public interest, tenders should be called for; and where this has been done it has been as a result of agreement between the Provincial Governments and the Dominion Government. Of course, there are some cases in which you could not call for tenders because the work could not be done by contract. In such cases an agreement is entered into to have the work done by day work. As I said a while ago, the province of Quebec has entered into an agreement under which, so far, we shall have to pay them at least $1,500,000; and judging by the agreements that are now being submitted, there is no doubt that at the end of five years they will have taken the total amount allotted.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What roads are about to be built in Quebec this year?

Hon. Mr. REID: The roads are: Montreal-Sherbrooke highway; Orford, Magog, Bolton, Shefford, St. Cesaire, St. Marie de Monmoir. Montreal-Quebec highway, 48.13 miles. Levis-St. Lambert highway: St. David, St. Telesphore, St. Romuald, St. Nicholas, Deschaillons, Contrecoeur, Boucherville, Longueuil, Beauce Jct. Sherbrooke highway; Levis-Rivière du Loup-Rimouski highway. Montreal-Rouse's Point highway. Levis-Sherbrooke highway.

Mr. SEXSMITH: How much money has been paid up to date on the Toronto-Kingston highway, and what progress has been made?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not the details of each road; I have only the total amount for each province. If the hon. member wants to have the details in regard to each road I shall have to get them.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think what I have asked for is a very important detail in connection with this highway from Toronto to Kingston.

Hon. Mr. REID: No doubt about it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think we should have some information in regard to the matter; they have been spending money on this highway for the last eight months, perhaps more. If the minister cannot give us the actual amount of money, can he state what it is estimated this road will cost per mile?

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not any information of that kind before me now. If hon. members would mention what information they require I will get it for them. I have not this particular agreement here. There are a great many agreements and in each of them it is stated what the road provided for is estimated to cost, but if the cost be more than the estimated amount we only pay our forty per cent. There is a clause in the agreement with each province which provides that notwithstanding the fact that the road may cost more than the total amount the province is to receive as its quota, the grant shall not exceed what the province is entitled to receive under the Act.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That is a very indefinite statement. We are going to expend $20,000,000 toward the construction of highways in the provinces, of which amount it is proposed to expend $7,000,000 in the province of Ontario. I think at least we should have some idea whether that money is going to be spent on one particular road, or in one particular part of the province. The minister has his engineer sitting in front of him, and if we have entered into any agreement with the province of Ontario in connection with this particular road I think we should be told something about it. The Toronto and Kingston road, as we all know, runs along the lake front, and through the same district there are three railways running—one double track railway, and two government owned railways, and in addition a hydro-electric railway is proposed. Now, I understand, the proposition is to expend perhaps a million or two million dollars on this highway while not a dollar has been spent in the district forty or fifty miles north of it. I would not want to say that the minister or the department was deliberately setting out on a policy of building speedways such as we heard so much a year or two ago in the last provincial election. During that election in the province of Ontario great opposition was made to this road plan by the party now in power in the province on the ground that it contemplated building speedways for the inhabitants of the cities to run automobiles and go picnicking over. I do not know as to the truth of the report, but I am now beginning to entertain the suspicion that that is exactly what the department here, in conjunction with the Provincial Government, is deliberately setting out to do. I am not saying that the proposition is absolutely wrong, but I do maintain that it is not to the best interests of the country. Of course hon. gentlemen around me may be quite satisfied that this cement highway should go along the lake shore where there are already two government railways and a privately owned double track railway. Later Sir Adam Beck will come along with his Hydro Electric railway, because I understand that is on the programme, and place it side by side with the others. At the same time there are other parts of the province of Ontario which need consideration just as much as the district through which this Toronto and Kingston highway will run. If we are going to open up highways throughout the province of Ontario, or throughout Canada, for the benefit of the people, supply we are not going to spend all the money on one highway or one chain of highways. I would again ask the minister if he cannot give us some information as to the arrangement which has been entered into with respect to this road? I would ask what the road is going to cost and of what material it will be built?

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member is absolutely right in his statement, and he is entitled to get all the information he wishes with respect to any road. As I stated a few minutes ago, I have not the information here as to any particular highway. My officials should have it here at my disposal, but I have not got it. Now, what I propose doing is this: At the next sitting I will have before me a statement showing each and every contract, or agreement, that we have entered into with every province. That is what I should have had here to-night, but unfortunately, my officials came unprovided with it. In the meantime I am going to ask that this item stand, and when we take it up again I shall have full details with respect to every one of these agreements. Then I hope to be able to afford such information as the hon. member asks for. For that reason I would ask that this vote stand and that we proceed with the next item.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I am glad the minister has agreed to let the item stand. If we are going to vote money for highways we should have full information with respect to the proposed expenditure and some concerted plan should be agreed upon.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, a Conservative plan.

Mr. SEXSMITH: A well thought out and comprehensive policy should be adopted, instead of having two or three men going out and building speedways from Windsor to Halifax. Of course, if that is what the Dominion and provincial governments contemplate, as being in the best interests of Canada, I am not going to do any more than enter my protest; but if we are going to enter upon the expenditure of millions of dollars on highways we should be informed where the money will be spent, how it will be spent, and how much the expenditure per mile on each of these roads will be.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In the year 1912 or 1913, under the previous administration, the attempt was made to pass a certain highway law, but it was blocked in the Senate, the view of the Opposition at that time being that it was a purely patronage measure, and that the Government would try to use it in order to influence the electorate at the ensuing elections. The present law, which was passed in 1918, is not framed quite along the same lines, but it provides for the granting of subsidies in aid of such highways as the provinces wish to improve. I respectfully submit that if the Government is of opinion the roads in the different provinces need improving, the grants in aid of those roads should not be given in this round-about way, but in the form of an increase of subsidy to the provinces. I submit that by the present policy the Government is simply trying to maintain a hold on the provinces which receive grants and that sooner or later—we may see it sooner rather than later—it will endeavour to influence or direct these governments. I ask what better authority could undertake the improvement of provincial highways than the provincial department organized for that purpose? That is especially true of the province of Quebec where the administration of the Roads De-Department has been characterized by such signal success. I submit that we are departing from the spirit of the constitution when we allow the money of the country to be voted in this way. If the Government wants to increase the grant it should do it in the regular way, that is by increasing the subsidies to the provinces. There is no doubt that the feeling for complete provincial control which was predominant before Confederation and which our forefathers so strongly shared is again becoming prevalent. The premier of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, recently in an address at Montreal protested against the action of the present Federal Government in encroaching upon provincial privileges by dealing with highways, technical education, health and other matters, and I for one would reluctantly see money granted in this way unless it is granted freely and with due regard for the constitutional rights of the provinces.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend the minister knows his own business best, but I think he would be well advised to let this item stand over. He has still some information to supply to his own followers. I at any rate would like to clear myself of any suspicion of wanting to hold up the item, least of all should I care to be under the suspicion of holding up the salary of the excellent public servant who is mentioned in connection with the Highway Act. However, I should just like to remind the minister that my hon. friend from Dufferin as well as myself and many others opposed this policy at its inception, and I am not surprised at the story my hon. friend from Dufferin has to tell to-night. He pointed out that the duplicating of the work of the province by the Dominion was sure to lead to trouble; but when wilful ministers will not listen to plain, honest farmers, like my hon. friend from Dufferin and myself, on road-making, they are sure to get into trouble. It is all very well when they want information regarding high Imperial schemes to go to hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Maisonneuve or the right hon. gentleman from King's, but when information is wanted on matters relating to daylight saving or roads or anything else touching the life of the farming community, the minister would do much better to consult plain men like the hon. member for Dufferin and myself. I am glad to know that his experience now bears out his foresight and that he was right when he joined the men who afterwards became members of the Progressive group in resisting this retrograde measure. I have hopes if my hon. friend from Dufferin will only broaden out on the tariff, that he will eventually find himself over here altogether, and I can see in him an excellent recruit for the Progressive party. I do not want to prolong the discussion, but can the minister inform us if there are many returned 9 p.m. soldiers employed under this expenditure? I think that was expected at the time the legislation was enacted.

Hon Mr. REID: In localities that I am familiar with, I know the undertaking did furnish work to a large number of returned men.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am glad to know that, for it is something good. But as he states that only $20,000,000 has been voted I hope he will be careful on this policy in the future. A speedway has been referred to. There was one speedway my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria did not tell us about, a certain steep place down to the sea, which was taken by some unfortunate quadrupeds. Well, if the minister and his Government go in for many expenditures of this kind they will find they are constructing a speedway down to the sea.

Mr. COPP: They are on their way.

Mr. FONTAINE: I understand that the ratepayers of Hull and Wakefield have passed a bylaw for a road about fourteen miles in length to be built connecting the two municipalities. Is the Government ready to supply the money for that highway?

Hon. Mr. REID: So far there has been no request from the province of Quebec to spend any of this Dominion money on that particular road.

Mr. BEST: I do not wish to hold up these Estimates, but I think it might be as well to have an understanding now rather than delay later on. I appreciate what the hon. member for Red Deer has stated, but after the example set us in the province of Ontario in extravagant expenditure it would take a very great inducement to get me to go over to the Progressive party; in fact, I would be ashamed to have anything to do with it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Not the provincial but the federal men.

Mr. BEST: Nor the federal branch. But, Mr. Chairman, this Government is just as much responsible for the money spent on the highways in Ontario as is the Provincial Government. As the hon. member for Peterborough said, we have heard a lot about one driveway along the central part of Ontario. Personally I would appreciate very much if we had one good driveway, and I am in favour of good roads all over the country, provided we get real value for our money. But should the people of Ontario or any other province take his money from the Federal Government and have it all spent in the one place in the province? The Federal Government has the right to see that the money is spent in various parts of the provinces. We have been told that over 500 miles of road have been approved by the Government. That would cover a highway leading east and west or north and south through the province. But where has the money been spent? Over a quarter of a million dollars has been expended along the lake front, where they have far better road accommodation than up through the central part of the province. All I ask the minister to do is to see that the different parts of the province get fair play, and that somebody see that this money is not squandered, for I do say and believe—and I am not the only one—that the people through Ontario are beginning to realize that the biggest part of this money is being spent for political purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BEST: Not that this Government is making anything out of that expenditure. As the hon. member for Red Deer said, I opposed the legislation at the outset. I believe there is too much duplication by the Dominion Government and the Provincial Governments spending money on the same set of works. I believe it should be definitely laid down what the municipality, and the province, and the Dominion are respectively to do, and then let them strictly mind their own business.

I know that this expenditure is doing the Dominion Government a lot of harm because we are blamed for squandering the people's money and not looking after its expenditure. Certainly the officials of the Ontario Government are not attending to their business. I make the statement knowing what I am talking about, and I say to hon. members on this side of the chamber that the farmers in our part of the country are crying out against the great extravagance on roads.

Mr. MURPHY: As a neighbour of my hon. friend from Hull across the river, I should like to supplement what he has said regarding the road from Hull to Wakefield. In reply to the hon. gentleman the Minister of Railways said that no request had yet been received from the Government of Quebec for the construction of this road. According to the newspapers, the municipalities concerned have concluded preliminary agreements and have reached a complete understanding regarding the road to be constructed and the abolition of tolls on the remaining toll roads. Is the request from the Quebec Government the only further step necessary in order to have this work carried out?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, it must come from the Quebec Government. We take no action until we get an application from the Provincial Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MURPHY: Upon receipt of that request, the work will proceed?

Hon. Mr. REID: The matter is looked into and considered, as if we see no objection we approve the plans and the work proceeds, the Dominion assuming forty per cent of the cost.

Mr. COPP: It is gratifying to observe that my hon. friends opposite have at last come to realize that the expenditures of the Government are made in a very slipshod and haphazard way. They are beginning to appreciate the facts as we on this side have been stating them for some time, and if they take that attitude in connection with a small item such as that which we are now considering, a matter of $53,000, it is evident that they will take a similar stand when we come to consider items involving large amounts. The member for Dufferin finds much fault with regard to the building of some roads in his constituency; he says the farmers there are on the point of selling their land and moving away. Well, if my hon. friend wants to be honest with himself and honest with his electors he will go back to them immediately after the close of this session and tell them to keep their powder dry until the Government has the courage to go to the country, and advise them, as in effect he advises us, to vote against an Administration which squanders the public money. Now, with regard to this particular item, as I understand it the aid for the building of roads is distributed honestly and equitably among the provinces, each province getting its fair apportionment according to population. As I understand the procedure, it is this: specifications are submitted to the Commissioner of Highways with respect to highways with which the province desires to proceed within a certain length of time; these are considered by the commissioner and his engineers; the kind of road to be constructed is determined upon. Then the provincial government call for tenders, and if these are found to be satisfactory the contract is awarded and the work proceeds, supervision being exercised by Dominion Government engineers in co-operation with provincial engineers, and the cost is borne by the Dominion Government and the provincial government in certain proportions. It seems to me that this item should not stand. The details of the number of roads to be built, the mileage and so on does not matter, because these are the subject of consideration and co-operation between the Dominion and provincial governments. In view of these considerations, I think this item might very well pass.

Mr. STEELE: I should not like the committee to cease discussion of this item after the speech of the hon. member for Westmoreland in which he suggests that members on this side have admitted that the expenditures of this Government are being made in a slipshod way. The only thing wrong with the expenditures made by this Government on roads in Ontario is that they are being made through a very inefficient medium. The money is handed over to the Ontario Government for expenditure. The plans concerning the roads may be all right; the specifications may be very accurate, but unless the money appropriated for these roads is spent wisely, carefully and economically, the whole thing falls to the ground. That is what the people of Ontario are suspicious of to-day; that is what they have doubts about. They are not satisfied that the money spent on roads in Ontario by the Provincial Government and its officials is being spent wisely, economically and carefully and in the best interests of the people.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does my hon. friend not think that that sort of thing will arise inevitably from the dual authority? It is the mixing of Dominion and provincial authority which leads to trouble.

Mr. STEELE: I was just going to say that those of us who some years ago approved the original plan of the Government that the expenditure should be made directly by the Federal authority now see that we were not very far astray, and when the Government acceded to the suggestion that that plan be changed and that the money be handed over to the Provincial Governments for expenditure, it is possible that a very great mistake was made. I would just point out to the member for Westmoreland that his friends on that side almost unanimously, I think, supported that method of making the expenditure.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does this money have to be handed over by the Dominion Government whether the roads are properly constructed or not?

Hon. Mr. REID: The work must be done in accordance with the agreement entered into; the road must be completed and in first-class shape.

Mr. STEELE: When we realize that every dollar of the money is expended by, and every day's work done under the supervision of, the Provincial Government's officers, we see how difficult it is for the Federal Government or the Federal officers to know that every dollar is being wisely spent. I do not agree with what some of my friends over here have said with regard to expenditures on good roads and the inadvisability of building so many roads. I am in favour of good roads throughout Ontario; I do not think we can have too many of them. But I think the minister should impress upon his officials the necessity for seeing that every dollar which is spent on roads in Ontario, by the present Government at least, be spent on what will turn out to be permanent roads. It would be a crime against the people of this country, particularly against the people of Ontario, if millions and tens of millions of dollars are spent during the next few years on roads that will have to be rebuilt in the course of another ten or twelve years. That is what the result has been in connection with the money spent under the county system during the last fifteen years; long before the debentures are paid off the roads have to be rebuilt, and I fear that too much the same system is being followed under this present highway scheme. I have no lack of confidence in the Dominion officials, but I do think they should be very alert and exercise every precaution to see that nothing is put over them by the officials of the Provincial Government; for I can say that there is a very strong suspicion in the minds of a large section of the community, including many who are practical road builders, that the country is not going to receive for this expenditure the value which it should receive.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Whose fault is it that the value is not received?

Mr. STEELE: The fault of the men who are directly responsible for the supervision of the road. They are the officials of the Ontario Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Who is directly responsible for handing over the money from the Dominion Government?

Hon. Mr. REID: An agreement is entered into and a road constructed under the direction of the officials of the local government. We have our engineer who inspects the work as it is in progress, and he must or should see that the road is constructed in accordance with the specifications. When that is done, the accounts of the Ontario Government are audited by our special auditors for this work. When the Ontario Government prove and we are satisfied that they have spent a certain amount, after we have examined the work and audited the books, we hand over to the Ontario Government 40 per cent of the expenditure in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do I understand that money is paid over by the Dominion Government only on the result of a report from the inspector?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, our inspector.

Mr. CAMPBELL: From the federal inspector. Then if money is paid over by the Dominion Government for work that is unsatisfactory the responsibility lies with the Dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. REID: The engineers of the local governments must approve expenditures on behalf of their governments; but our engineers see that the work is carried on in accordance with the agreement, and they must be satisfied that the work has been done in accordance with the agreement and that the expenditure is fair and reasonable. The certificate of the local engineer, confirmed by our engineer, is the certificate upon which we pay the money over to the Ontario Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: No money is paid out by the minister's department until a satisfactory report is received from his engineers?

Hon. Mr. REID: That is correct. Our auditors audit the accounts and our inspector examines the roads.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If a road turns out to be unsatisfactory, the fault lies with the minister's department in paying out the money.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): It is very important that the people of Canada should know this. There may be many hon. members who do not know how roads are constructed. I built many roads in my young days, and there is something going on with these government roads that is certainly very hurtful to the Dominion. I am told that Mr. Biggs and the Ontario Government are building roads in the vicinity of Hamilton out of limestone. A limestone foundation is not so objectionable, but to put on a surface of limestone is merely throwing away money and is of no use whatever. A limestone surface will last, perhaps, a couple of years, whereas if granite or field stone or some other hard metal is put on the surface, twenty years' use might be got out of a road. If they are putting on a limestone covering, it is time that the Dominion Government should put a stop to that, because it is just throwing away money. I should like to know what the roads are being covered with.

Hon. Mr. REID: I understand that they are covering them with some bituminous covering. No road that has been proceeded with up to the present time has yet been completed. I understand a covering is to be put on them next year. They are trying to get a good solid foundation; then they will put gravel over that, and in another year they will put on a covering that should be permanent. Our engineers are endeavouring to watch the construction as best they can. I understand, of course, that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction as regards the location of the roads. Every person would like to have a good road as near as possible, and we cannot blame him for that. We have had to allow the local government to do a great deal of locating of the roads. While, perhaps, some fault may be found with my department for not having the roads located differently, if my information is correct, the Ontario Government are also having trouble as regards location, because they have laid out a programme three times as great as the amount of money available from this source, and I do not see how they can ever proceed with their programme. If they do not, they, as well as we, are likely to have some trouble regarding location of roads.

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): The answer which I get from the minister is not at all satisfactory to me, because I know for a fact that the roads are being finished with limestone. I want to know what the minister says they are finished with. The two men with the minister know quite well what the roads are covered with. Why not tell us?

Mr. REID: I will say again to the hon. member that he is entitled to the information with regard to that par[illegible]ar road. My officials should have had right here before me to-night a copy of every one of the agreements so that I could pick up an agreement and tell what it calls for, the construction of the road, the kind of road, the total amount and so on; but I have not that information here and it is an absolute impossibility for me to give an answer to-night. For that reason, I have proposed to let the item stand. The next time I shall have all the information and I will not ask that the item pass until every member has the information which he desires.

Mr. CANNON: The minister says: "My officials ought to have had the information to-night." The minister lays the blame on his officials. I wish to remind you, Mr. Chairman, and through you the minister, that this discussion did n[illegible] to-night; it started this afternoon, [illegible] early in the afternoon when this item [illegible] called, I asked the minister for i[illegible] mation regarding several roads. I [illegible] him for information regarding agre[illegible] and at no time during the discussion [illegible] we had this afternoon, did the minis[illegible] offer to let the item stand, nor did he blame his officials for not having the information for which I was asking? To my surprise to-night, when the storm blows, not from this side, but from that side, the minister immediately veers around, lays the blame on officials who cannot answer, and says: "Let the item stand." The attitude taken by the minister is neither fair to the officials nor fair to the country. If this minister did not have the information this afternoon, he had plenty of time during the recess to secure it, and he should have brought it down to-night. But seeing that a member of the Opposition had asked for that information, the minister did not think fit to bring the information down. Now that his supporters are asking for exactly the same particulars as I was asking for this afternoon, the minister says: "You are perfectly entitled to that information, and as long as you do not get it, the item will not pass." I hope the minister will adopt one standard of fairness and justice to both sides of the House and, in future, when I ask for information, I shall be given the same answer as if that information were requested from his side.

Hon. Mr. REID: I might say that my officials during the recess went over to the department and endeavoured to get all the information they could. They could not get all the information that I wanted during that time. We tried to get the information, but we could not secure it.

Mr. CANNON: Then why did the minister not allow the item to stand at the beginning of the sitting?

Mr. LALOR: When the minister is getting information as to the roads, will he give us some information as to the Hon. Mr. Biggs, Minister of Public Works in the Ontario Government? I cannot vouch for the truth of the statement, but it is said that he has built a road from the highway through his farm right to his own gate. Are we paying for that part of the road?

Mr. STEWART (Hamilton): Yes, we are. It is a Government road.

Item stands.

Governor General's cars: attendance, repairs and alterations, $10,000.

Hon. Mr. REID: This is an annual vote for repairs to these cars, alterations and attendance.

Mr. DENIS: How many cars are there?

Hon. Mr. REID: There were three, but one was destroyed by fire last year.

Mr. CANNON: Last year the vote was $17,000. This year it is $10,000. What is the reason for the reduction?

Hon. Mr. REID: There are only two cars this year, as compared with three last year. Last year we had also to make some extraordinary repairs.

Mr. CANNON: Then if we burn another car this year, we could reduce next year's vote by $7,000 more. Let us try and burn one. Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee where those cars were bought, and at what cost?

Hon. Mr. REID: Two of them were purchased from the Canadian Pacific Railway about ten years ago. They were the cars used at the time the present King was out here.

Mr. JACOBS: We will have spent in the last two years $27,000 on these cars. I fancy they are railway cars, not motor cars, although there is nothing here to indicate which is meant.

Item agreed to.

Loan not exceeding $50,000,000 repayable on demand with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable half-yearly, to be used (where amounts available from net operating earnings may be insufficient) to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred at any time by or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian National Railway Company, or any Company comprised in the Canadian Northern Railway System, or any of them, on any of the following accounts:—(a) operating deficits (b) acquisition of property, materials and supplies, (c) interest on notes, securities or obligations, (d) the principal and interest of maturing or matured loans, secured or unsecured, and (e) construction and betterments; such loan to be secured by mortgage or mortgages upon the undertaking of the Canadian Northern Railway Company or the Canadian National Railway Company on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve. The loan or assistance herein authorized may be made in cash or by way of guarantee, or partly in cash and partly by guarantee, in the discretion of the Governor in Council. Any guarantee from time to time given under the authority herein may be of the principal and interest of the notes, obligations or securities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company or the Canadian National Railway Company, and may be signed by the Minister of Finance, on behalf of His Majesty, in such form and on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, $50,000,000.

Hon. Mr. REID: The details of this expenditure are as follows:

Construction—
Western Lines Eastern Lines		$ 2,000,000
Betterments—
Western Lines	$4,234,403
Eastern Lines	4,123,334
H. & S. W. Ry.	250,000
Telegraph	500,454
Co-ordination, C. N. R., G. T. R.	270,480
		9,378,671
Canadian National Express Company		112,569
Financial—
Operating Account	$ 5,000,000
Fixed Charges	18,074,847
		23,074,847

Requirements for fuel, ties, etc..	8,360,274
Equipment principal ..	5,750,000
Contracts payable.. ..	321,993
Subsidiary Co. interest.	1,706,030
		$50,704,384

We have placed an amount of $50,000,000 to meet that expenditure.

Mr. ARGUE: How much of that construction has been done in the province of Saskatchewan, and where?

Hon. Mr. REID: I will give that information in a moment.

Mr. DENIS: I should like some information about betterments on the eastern lines of the Canadian National railways, particularly between Montreal and Quebec, passing through Joliette.

Hon. Mr. REID: On the Canadian Northern, eastern line, Bury deviation, $272,302, and on the Yamachiche river, grade reduction and bridge strengthening, $102,900. Then we have St. Paulin deviation, $249,348; St. Ursule deviation, $236,050; coaling plant, Garneau junction, $30,000; terminal improvements at Joliette, $30,000.

Mr. DENIS: I am particularly interested in the bridge at Joliette and St. Elizabeth.

Hon. Mr. REID: The terminal improvements at Joliette amount to $30,000.

Mr. DENIS: I am referring to the bridge on Assomption river on which work is being done at the present time.

Hon. Mr. REID: The total expenditure for the Quebec district is $1,426,900.

Mr. DENIS: At the present time Fletcher and Company are building a bridge at Joliette on the Canadian Northern line and another bridge at St. Elizabeth, nine miles below Joliette, on the same line, and that work has been going on for over a year.

Hon. Mr. REID: I think the bridge my hon. friend refers to is on the Transcontinental.

Mr. DENIS: No, on the Canadian Northern, between Montreal and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have not any item for that.

Mr. DENIS: Is there not some work going on, on account of the deviation, between Montreal and Quebec? Anybody could see work was being done there last summer and fall.

Hon. Mr. REID: It may be included in the amount of $272,302, which is for the Bury deviation. There is also the St. Ursule deviation for which there is an amount of $236,050.

Mr. CANNON: That is a divergence.

Hon. Mr. REID: And there is another for $249,248. What my hon. friend refers to may be included in one of these large amounts.

Mr. DENIS: There is a bridge being built at Joliette now, and towards the end of March it was partly destroyed. Trains of the Canadian Northern could not move between Montreal and Quebec for two or three days owing to the partial destruction of that bridge. The contractors for the work are W. M. Fletcher and Company, and the minister must know something about it.

Hon. Mr. REID: That is charged to operation, and is not voted by Parliament. It will come under the total results of earnings and expenses of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. DENIS: This vote of $50,000,000 is for construction and betterments. Where are we to draw the line? Does not the re-building of a bridge come under the item of construction and betterments? If the minister tells me that the bridge which is now being built in Joliette does not come under this item, I will, of course, take his word.

Hon. Mr. REID: If the work is merely the renewing of the bridge, and putting it in the same condition as it was before, it would be charged to operation. If it is a larger or more costly bridge, it will come under the heading of betterments. Evidently the bridge to which my hon. friend refers comes under operation. Now, I desire to answer a question in regard to Saskatchewan. We are trying to put rails on where any grade has already been constructed or is under contract. In Saskatchewan work is being done at the following places: Peebles-Lampman; Thunder Hill Branch-Melfort northwest; Melfort-Humboldt; Prince Albert northeast-Swift Current.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is being done on these roads this year?

Hon. Mr. REID: Grading has been done and it is the intention to put rails on as many as we can. On Prince Albert-Swift Current, there is a stretch of 10.07 miles of rails to be laid to a place called Neidpath. Then there is Luck Lake, and Alsask southeast.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps the minister could save time if he would give the details of the work that is to be done on these roads?

Hon. Mr. REID: On the Thunder Hill branch there are thirty miles yet to be done; Melford to Humboldt, fifty-four miles yet to be done; Swift Current, to finish to mile 109, thirty-five miles to be done; Luck Lake, twenty-eight miles to finish.

Mr. KNOX: There is some mistake about the line to Humboldt. That is already finished except the ballasting.

Hon. Mr. REID Yes, fifty-four miles to ballast. I have here another statement, with respect to Saskatchewan which I think is the correct one:

From Peebles to Lampman when present contracts complete grade will be to mile twenty. No track has been laid on this twenty miles.

Thunder Hill Branch—

Mr. DAVIS: Is it not the intention to lay the rails on that?

Hon. Mr. REID: I will give that information when I mention each line:

Thunder Hill Branch. Starting point of branch mileage Thunder Hill Junction. When present contracts complete, grade will be to mile 118. The track as of December 31, 1920 was at mile 100. That will leave 17 miles yet to put rails on and to complete it to Thunder Hill Junction.

Melfort northeast. When present contracts complete grade will be to mile 30. There are no rails laid.

Melfort to Humboldt. Starting point Melfort. When present contracts complete grade will be to mile 54. There is no track on that.

Prince Albert north east. When present tracks complete grade will be to mile 20. No track on that.

Swift Current Extension. When present contracts complete grade will be to mile 120. Track as on December 31, 1920 was at mile 109. When present contracts complete there will be 10 miles and 4-10 of a mile to lay on that.

Luck Lake Line to Dunblane 35 miles. When present contracts complete grade will be to mile 35. The track on this laid to 19.7. There are still 15 miles to grade.

Alsask, south east, starting at Elrose Junction 148 miles when the grade contracts are completed. There are 148 miles of track on that road.

Eston south east, starting at Eston. When the contracts for grade are completed there will be 35 miles graded. No track has been laid on it.

Turtleford to Meeting Lake, starting at Turtleford, 23 miles of grading when the present contracts are complete. No rail has been laid on that.

Jack Fish Lake starting at North Battleford, 83 miles. When the present contracts for grade complete grade will be to mile 83. There have been 64 miles of rail laid on that road leaving 18.3 to be constructed.

Acadia Valley starting at Eyre. When the present grade contracts are complete 12 miles will be ready for track. No rails have been laid on that.

I may say that we made a contract for some new rails a week ago, and it is our intention to place these new rails on the main lines. The rails we take up will be placed on the branch lines such as I have mentioned, as far as those rails will go, and to the extent we are able to lay during the present year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What kind of rails are these and what price was paid for them?

Hon. Mr. REID: The new rails that we purchased are 85 pound rails and we paid $55 per gross ton for them—that is the contract we have made for rails. I am sorry that we were not able to make such a price much earlier. Had we done so we would doubtless have been able to lay many more rails than we will probably be able to do on account of the delay.

Mr. TURGEON: Before this amount of $50,000,000 is voted I should like, if I may, to make a few remarks on the general railway situation which confronts us to-day. The statements and reports which we have received in regard to our railways, have certainly aroused a feeling of disquiet in the minds of the people, and from one end of Canada to the other every one is asking himself what is going to be the outcome of the present situation. To many persons that situation seems appalling, and the dictum that the railways are the safeguard of the nation has, in the minds of a great many people, been changed to a fear that they may become the nation's ruin. To-day the people of Canada as a whole are interested in what is to be done, not in order to immediately remedy the situation, for that is scarcely possible, but by judicious measures to put an end to the present waste of money which every one deplores and, I am sure, none more heartily than the Minister of Railways himself.

An hon. MEMBER: He bears it cheerfully.

Mr. TURGEON: I do not claim to be an authority on railway matters; I am merely accepting the sincere and generous invitation of the Minister of Railways himself when, on March 17 last, in making his annual railway statement, he invited every member of the House to come forward with any suggestions of a reasonable character in the hope of bettering the existing state of affairs. Notwithstanding my limitations in connection with this matter, of which, I am only too sensible, the Minister of Railways will admit that during the twenty-one years I have sat in this House I have at least endeavoured to give some consideration to railway matters and in particular to the construction of branch lines. I am sure the minister will not forget my efforts in connection with the branch lines.

We have two large corporations that are to-day owning and operating the railways of Canada. On the one hand there is the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company with a world-wide reputation for the efficient administration of railways and ocean steamships. On the other hand we have the board that is administering the Canadian National railways, young as yet but following a policy which certainly has not created any confidence in the personnel of that corporation. As one who has always entertained some confidence in the policy of the Dominion Government owning and controlling at least a certain mileage of Canadian railways I had hoped for better results. The Government's railway policy, at the inception of Confederation, was rather conceived from the standpoint of competing against the owners of privately-owned railways in order that the people should not be burdened by oppressive freight rates and other charges, and in order to establish fair and reasonable rates—rates which would allow of that commercial expansion which is necessary if this young country is to develop to the extent which we believe is her destiny. For it is undoubtedly true that we must look to our railways to lay the real foundation of our future happiness and prosperity so strongly desired by every true Canadian.

During last session I warned the Minister of Railways more than once not to apply to the Railway Commission for an increase of freight rates, because I considered that any further increase would certainly hamper the development of our industries all over the country. My predictions have come true, in fact, they are confirmed by the statement which the minister himself made to the House quite recently, when he declared as follows:

> Our railways were built to develop our natural resources, to build up our country, and to connect the East with the West in interprovincial trade. Good work has been done and it must not stop. Let me give you one or two illustrations of what high freight rates are doing. We in the province of Ontario have for many years required, in fact used, lumber and timber grown and manufactured in the province of British Columbia. To-day this trade is absolutely cut off owing to high freight rates, thus injuring British Columbia, and Ontario and our country as a whole. British Columbia requires the markets of the western provinces and even the eastern provinces for their products. It is impossible for British Columbia to grow and ship fruit and lumber at the present high rates of freight. The Prairie Provinces must live from the products of the soil. They cannot produce wheat and other products of their farms and ship it to foreign markets if these high freight rates are to continue indefinitely, and vice versa, things that are manufactured in the East that the people of the prairie and British Columbia require, cannot be produced and shipped to the western provinces if these high rates of freight are to continue.

That, Mr. Chairman, bears out my warning of more than a year ago against the imposition of increased freight rates. I then advised the minister to urge the members of the Railway Commission to find other ways of relieving the railways, for instance, by effecting greater economies of administration. I also cited the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Quebec East, who I regret is not here to-night, that a representative of the workingmen should be represented on the board of management of the national railways, as he would be able to secure greater labour efficiency. We have heard a good deal of complaint about the high wages paid to railway men, but I do not wish to complain of their being too high, and I am willing to believe that the cases which have been instanced of very high rates of pay are merely accidental and do not represent the average rates, and certainly I feel that the men on our Government roads as a whole are as honest and efficient as their brothers on the private-owned roads. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company only a few days ago at the annual meeting in Montreal offered his thanks to the officials and men of the road who, he said, had given the best service possible. I trust before another year is over the directors of our national railways will be able to voice a similar appreciation of their own staff.

Certainly increased freight rates have contributed to the present depression and unemployment. It is said that these increased rates were necessary to offset the higher wage scales under the McAdoo award, but I make this statement, Mr. Chairman, that the increase in freight rates has not contributed at all to bettering the condition of the railways, simply because of the diminished amount of traffic offered to the roads in consequence. The lumber trade of the Maritime Provinces has been paralyzed, and our yards are full of lumber awaiting water transportation, which means that all that traffic has been lost to the railroads. The delay in transportation has also caused a great loss to the Maritime Provinces, for operations have had to be curtailed, business has slackened, railway traffic has decreased, and in consequence there has been less work to do and a growing volume of unemployment. The same condition of affairs is prevalent in the West, as is borne out by the statement of the Minister of Railways which I have just quoted. And business in central Canada has suffered proportionately. Therefore traffic has been lost to the railroads which would have amply covered the increase in wages.

We have to look to the future to see what can be done to effect an improvement, and if I can only make one suggestion which will be of value I shall consider it my duty as a representative in this Parliament to make it, not only in the interest of my constituents but in the interest of the country as a whole, for the local interest in the aggregate constitute the national interest. It is the business of the railroads not only to carry the traffic that arises in different parts of the country, but also to assist in the development of our natural resources and to make the widest possible distribution of all the products of those resources. Only by the most thorough distribution of our products and commodities east and west and north and south can trade be developed and the railroads be put in a position to earn enough to pay operating expenses. I am not alone in contending that freight rates should be reduced. This question is one which is uppermost in the minds of the people of the United States, particularly in the minds of leaders in the agricultural world. While there are differences of opinion as to the best methods of making their railroads prosperous in the future, they are of one mind when it comes to the matter of freight rates, declaring that a reduction of rates would bring about greater production and therefore more trade for the railroads. They are appealing to the President of the United States to consult with representatives of capital and of labour with a view to ascertaining the best means of bringing about a decrease in rates in order that there may be more transportation of all products available in the United States. Only a few days ago the Legislature of New Brunswick adopted unanimously a resolution moved by the premier of the province, seconded by Mr. Baxter, leader of the Conservative party in the Legislature and supported by Mr. Fawcett, leader of the Farmer's party, complaining about the present rates and asking that the Government of the day take the necessary action through the Board of Railway Commissioners to bring about such a reduction in those rates as will enable the industries of the Maritime Provinces to send their products to the western portions of Canada.

There is one particular feature of this problem which has always occupied my mind and which I have discussed on more than one occasion in this House. I may be permitted to point out the difference between the present position of the Intercolonial Railway and that which it occupied before the Canadian National railways were instituted as a system and placed under a Board of Management. It has frequently been stated, not only in the press, but occasionally by members of this House —I even hear it said occasionally by some of our old compatriots in the province of Quebec—that the Intercolonial has been a burden upon the rest of Canada. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that had it not been for the Intercolonial railway the Maritime Provinces would not have become part of the Confederation, and that without the advantage of the Maritime Provinces, particularly the advantage of their open ports, Ontario would have remained the back door of the United States. The people of the Maritime Provinces have given impetus to the trade of the country through the advantages conferred by their open ports —ports placed there, as I have often said in this House, by the hand of Providence, not merely for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces themselves, but for the benefit and advantage of the whole Dominion for all time. And how can it be said that the Intercolonial has been a burden to the rest of Canada? In the first place, it has been a barrier against the high rates which most of the railways in Ontario and Quebec would impose; it has been in a position to keep the rates down to a certain level. Moreover, Ontario and Quebec have benefited by the trade of the Maritime Provinces the greater part of which before Confederation, went to the United States by water routes. Every day for fifty years trains have been filled with their products —with their farm implements, their waggons, their trucks, their flour and so on, all of which have been carried at much cheaper rates than those applicable to transportation to other parts of the country. And what have they had to pay for that service? What has been the cost of the prosperity which has thus been brought about? Until two years ago, a deficit each year in operation of a few hundred thousand dollars.

To show that the Intercolonial has not, after all, been such a burden as people are apt to think, I wish to quote the statement of no less an authority than the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) as contained in the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917—a report which has commanded the respect and attention of the people of Canada. It has commanded also my respect and attention, although there are a few things in it with which I do not agree, particularly the suggestion as to the advantage of the Grand Trunk railway coming into the hands of Canada. However, I wish to give this quotation; I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not in his seat.

Mr. McMASTER: He is worried about his budget.

Mr. TURGEON: I suppose his budget is a matter of more importance just now than the few remarks of the back-bencher from Gloucester. Here is what the Drayton-Acworth report has to say with regard to total deficits on the Intercolonial during the twenty-eight years prior to the year in which this report was made:

> Whatever question there may be as to the propriety of endeavouring to earn interest on capital, it will hardly be questioned that the line ought to be so managed as at least to earn operating expenses, including therein a proper allowance for taxes. And even ignoring the early history of the undertaking, and considering merely the years from 1889-1916, during which the greatest advance has taken place in Canada and the traffic of Canadian railways has shown the greatest increase, the Intercolonial has paid no taxes and still not earned operating expenses. During this period the total operating deficits reported amounted to $11,188,885.50. The total operating surpluses amounted to $1,651,239.73. In addition, however, there was in the years 1912-16 an amount of $3,046,406.86 charged to working expenses and devoted to renewals, which under the accounting methods in force before that date would have been credited to surplus. Adding together these two latter figures, and deducting them from the deficit, we find that in the 28 years from 1889-1916 there was an accumulated deficit on operation of $6,491,-232.91.

A deficit of $6,491,000 on the Intercolonial at the expense, I will admit, of the whole people of Canada, during 28 years, means a deficit of between three and four hundred thousand dollars a year. If the new Board of Management had been able to operate, at the same rate of deficit, the railroads which are under their control to-day, and which have about eight times the mileage of the railroad operated during those 28 years by the governments of the country, they would have come before the people of Canada in the last few years with a deficit of some two or three million dollars a year. If they had done so, every Canadian would take off his hat to the board and say: "Go ahead; we have a prosperous country." The present situation, therefore, shows that there is something wrong with the administration. Moreover, as I stated last year, before this Board of Management took over the Intercolonial, it had a deficit of a million dollars some years, a million and a-half one year and a surplus another year; whereas, last year under the commission, there was a deficit of $4,500,000 for the Intercolonial alone, not counting the different branches that have been taken over, and this year there is a deficit of $6,500,000. My hon. friend is one who brought in a surplus during his administration and his late respected predecessor also brought in a surplus. I judge of the immense deficit on the Canadian National railways by the accrued deficit on the Intercolonial. If the Board of Management had operated the National railways at the same rate of deficit as that of the Intercolonial during that twenty-eight-year period, we would say: the Board of Management had done well. We would encourage them to continue and to bring prosperity to the country; but the deficits during the last few years have been increasing by leaps and bounds, so that there must be something wrong with the administration. The Minister of Railways must devise some means by which these deficits will be stopped, and if not changed into surpluses, at least brought to a condition which will give renewed hope to the peopele of Canada.

I am presenting these observations to the committee, and especially to the Minister of Railways and Canals, I am not actuated by any desire to make, as he said, a political football of the road. We must, however, consider the policy of the Government in the light of the railways that we have to-day. Until two or three years ago, it was the habit of hon. members on the Government side to deplore the deficits on the Intercolonial and to oppose the idea of Government ownership, control and operation of railroads in this country. Some fifteen years ago, when I and others in the Maritime Provinces, asked for subsidies for the national railways of the Maritime Provinces, we were met by a condemnation of Government operated railroads on the part of hon. members opposite. But they have suddenly become strong supporters of Government operation. It was only when circumstances compelled them to reverse their attitude that they favoured Government ownership of railways. I remain consistent and persistent, as I have been during my life. The Minister of Railways and Canals knows my persistence and perseverance, my only virtue, and he knows that they have at times enabled me to reach my objective. I wish I could by persistence, impress my view upon the mind of the minister so that he could, in turn, impress it upon the mind of the Board of Management and induce them to reverse their policy and if necessary, to reverse the policy of the Conservative party as regards railways in times past because I believe—and these few remarks which I am going to make on the railway situation are inspired by honesty of purpose and vision—that if the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the building of this Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Quebec and the Maritime ports of St. John and Halifax had been put into effect with the view which he had in mind, we would not be confronted to-day with one-half the deficit that we have. That road was constructed with a view to a certain trade and more particularly to secure that cheapness of operation which is necessary in order that the products of the West may be brought over Canadian lines to Canadian ports instead of being diverted to American ports. My convinction—and I speak my conviction and nothing else—is that had that policy been carried out, we would not be in the situation in which we are. The West was at that time the great promise of the future of Canada, and we had to prepare for the shipment of its products. The West was that part of Canada which alone could become the granary of the world, more particularly of the British Empire, because the Prairie Provinces alone could produce the grain requirements not only of Canada and the British Empire, but of the world, as was proved during the last few years, more particularly during the war. It is, therefore, important that we should keep within our own channels, not only the export of the grain from the Prairie Provinces through Quebec, St. John and Halifax, but the return trade, both of which have gone during the last few years to American ports on account of lack of proper railway facilities for the traffic. It was to provide those facilities that the railway from Winnipeg to the Maritime Provinces was constructed. That route is 215 miles shorter than any other route. That means rapidity of transit and quicker returns for the farmer. The line has also the advantage of low insurance. This road would have been the best, not only in America, but in the world, if it had been used for the purposes for which it was intended of bringing the products of the West by rail down to the East. A train of from 60 to 75 cars could have been hauled from Winnipeg to Quebec with scarcely a stop. We all know how railroads lose time in the winter, and how they spend almost as much time at stations as in running between them. If these products had been brought from the West over the Government road it would have meant an immense saving of coal. By the time the Canadian Pacific train leaving Winnipeg has arrived at Port Arthur, the Transcontinental has reached Armstrong; by the time the grain has been transferred from the Canadian Pacific to the ship and is on its way across the lakes the Transcontinental has reached Quebec, and its load of grain is going down the St. Lawrence before the lake boat has reached Buffalo. That illustrates how much faster a route the Transcontinental is. It is a well known fact that grain should have been carried over the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec for six cents a bushel without there being any deficit on the railway. To-day, under present conditions, it can be carried for 18 cents a bushel, which is still from 6 to 8 cents a bushel cheaper than the rate to United States ports, but this trade has been lost to the country in the last four or five years. Every time we on this side of the House mention railway deficits, hon. gentlemen opposite condemn us for the construction of the Transcontinental. It is only a few days ago that I heard with regret the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, say that the Transcontinental traversed a wilderness, that we had been promised mountains of information, but that nothing in that direction was to be had. I would ask him if he has travelled through that portion of the country from Winnipeg to Quebec. If he has, he must have seen living mountains of information in the persons of hundreds of thousands of settlers along that route, cultivating the forests and working in the pulp and paper mills, notwithstanding all the handicaps under which they are placed. I believe that any man who knows anything about railways, notwithstanding any prejudices he may have had at first, if he will only sit down and study the matter for a while, will admit that we have suffered a tremendous loss by not taking advantage of this route from the first. The Prime Minister takes pleasure in calling it the ill-fated Transcontinmental. That wounds my feelings, but that perhaps is not of much moment to him; more than that, it arouses the ire of great corporations in this country, more particularly in the East. The farmers of the west have lost from 5 to 8 cents a bushel on their wheat on account of the Government's policy in connection with this road. My hon. and beloved friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), has come in since I started to speak, and in justice to him I want to repeat what I have said. No man has a greater respect for him than myself. My hon. friend some time ago referred to the Transcontinental railway built between Quebec and Winnipeg, and in the course of his remarks, in reference to the question of the Government submitting information to the House touching the railways of the country, he said that when that project was under consideration the late leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had promised mountains of information, and had declared that this railway would be a great benefit to the country. I would ask him now if he has visited that portion of the country from Winnipeg to Quebec since the railway has been in operation? I receive no answer, and I presume my hon. friend has not done so.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have travelled over a good portion of that road twice.

Mr. TURGEON: I dare say, between Cochrane and Winnipeg, but not between Cochrane and Quebec. If the hon. member travelled between Winnipeg and Quebec I can assure him he would see the mountains of information of which he spoke, in the shape of thousands of live settlers who have erected lumber mills and pulp mills and engaged in other activities, thus creating a trade the benefit of which is lost to the farmers of the West because of the lack of proper transportation facilities. I have spoken of the quantity of wheat shipped to the United States, and I think that the more sold in that country the better for us. The United States market we tried to get, and it is no fault of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier that reciprocity was defeated in 1911. If that agreement had been entered into, the people of the West would to-day have been happy. It was my privilege, through the generous invitation of my admirable leader, to address some meetings in Saskatchewan last fall, and I remember there making the statement that had reciprocity been the fortune of Canada in 1911, there would have been no need to-day of a Farmers' party, because the farmers would have been prosperous and quite content. Recently it was my pleasure to read in the newspapers a report of certain utterances of the leader of the Agrarian or Progressive party, the hon. member for Maquette (Mr. Crerar), in which he stated the same thing. He said that had reciprocity been carried into effect there would have been no need for a Farmers' party in Canada at the present time because the farmers would have prospered. I was very much pleased to note that sentiment on the part of the hon. member.

The minister will, no doubt, recall that when we were considering the taking over of the Grand Trunk two years ago I warned the House that the products of the West, particularly grain, would not find their way to St. John or Halifax but would go to Portland. My hon. friend promised me at the time—I had no reason to doubt his word, and he would probably have carried out his promise had he not been prevented—that he would take steps to see that this would not occur. I warned the minister that if we did not take steps to prevent the diversion of our products from the port of St. John to Portland, he would find himself faced with a situation which it would be exceedingly difficult to overcome. I regret the new minister for New Brunswick, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Wigmore), is not here. Complaint was made in the city of St. John, in the month of February, that no grain was coming through the port of St. John, but was going to Portland. A delegation waited upon the minister, and certain questions were also addressed to the head of the Board of National Railways. Mr. Hanna replied that he had not so far sent any grain to St. John, nor had he sent any to Portland. He added however, that it was his intention to send some to St. John as soon as possible but that perhaps the Grand Trunk had been taking grain. On inquiry it turned out that the Grand Trunk had been taking grain from Montreal to Portland. Now, if that is to continue, and grain is to go through American routes, then I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, that the people of St. John might as well have no harbour at all. It is not only money for their harbour that the people there require; they need trade as well, and as we know, only about 24 per cent of the grain trade last year moved through Canadian ports.

Mr. McMASTER: The Minister of Railways is shaking his head; you had better prove your statement.

Mr. TURGEON: He knows I am correct. Only 24 per cent during the past six months has gone through Canadian ports; the rest has gone through American ports.

Hon. Mr. REID: The very opposite is the case; the figures should be reversed.

Mr. TURGEON: I have not under my hand at this moment the figures to establish my statement, but it is well known that from twenty-four to thirty per cent of the grain trade of the West has gone to Canadian ports, and of that thirty per cent at least eighty-five or ninety per cent is controlled by the Canadian Pasific Railway Company, leaving very little available for the Canadian National Railway. It is in the hope that provision may be made for the future that I am now impressing upon the committee and the Minister of Railways the existing conditions in this country. As I say we have lost the export trade and we have lost the imports which the control of that trade would have meant for the West. The Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific was especially designed to haul heavier trains than the other railways could haul—they are railways designed to carry as much as 10,000 bushels of grain in less time at a lower rate than other railways could do. Special transportation facilities are required for the carriage of wheat owing to the small profit which the farmer is necessarily bound to get; with such a long haul, and that factor in the future is bound to be of much greater importance than it has been in the past. It is quite true that owing to the war the grain products of the West for a few years commanded a high price; but when things return to normal state the farmers of the West will inevitably suffer unless we can cheapen the cost of transportation for them, and the heavy cost of carrying the wheat will swallow up, or greatly reduce, the small margin of profit likely to come to them. If the situation is not seriously considered and a remedy provided the farmers of the West are bound to encounter hardships in the future, and it would be indeed an evil day if our western wheat should ever come to lose its commanding place in the markets of the world. The price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool and the cost of the long rail haul in Canada should be reduced in every way possible. The profits or losses incurred by our western farmers depend to a great extent upon whether the cost of transporattion has been brought down to the lowest possible point. In the case of a train load of silk, intended for the large centres of the East, which our railroads carry from the Pacific and which is perhaps worth millions of dollars, an enhanced freight rate may not be a very serious thing; but the addition of a cent or two to the cost of carrying wheat, and other farm products, may mean all the difference between profit and loss.

In the matter of ocean insurance the improvements in the St. Lawrence have made that route absolutely safe and today there is no greater danger of accident on the St. Lawrence than there is on the ocean itself. That is as regards summer navigation. If we take winter navigation the ports of St. John and of Halifax also provide safe routes, and there is no reason why a higher rate of insurance should be charged on vessels sailing from these ports than in the case of ships sailing from Boston or Portland. Our summer and winter ports are therefore in a good position to handle the export trade coming from the West, and excessive ocean insurance rates should not be demanded.

The National Transcontinental railway was built with the idea not only of carrying eastward and westward bound freights, but of providing a fast passenger and mail service. We have lost this trade also. It has gone mostly to the United States ports; the balance has been captured by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. On the Canadian National Railway passengers and mail could have been carried from our ocean ports to Winnipeg twenty-four hours quicker than by any other route. Yet this business has been lost to us. No wonder the Canadian National railway does not pay. It is certainly, in large measure, owing to these losses that the couutry is to-day faced with the present railway situation. Not only has there been a failure to use the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec, but the operations of the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Winnipeg have largely been strangled by allowing Mackenzie and Mann to build parallel lines all the way to the Pacific. This policy resulted in the downfall of Mackenzie and Mann, to say nothing of a provincial administration in British Columbia, but because of it we to-day hear the story of deficits and of insufficient traffic on the Government lines.

This is a very serious problem, and, as I said at the outset, I am not making these remarks for any political effect. What I am saying will not bring me a single extra vote in Gloucester. Last fall the Prime Minister when he came down to Nova Scotia called us Bolshevists and Communists, and as I had been talking very strongly in favour of free trade I considered I was in that category, and was rather surprised. As a matter of fact I am called the "peacemaker" in Gloucester and I have succeeded so well in that role that you could not find to-day ten Conservatives in my county. But I do say from the bottom of my heart, and in the hope that it may have a salutary effect on the Board of Management, that those gentlemen must understand that the people expect an improvement or else that the Board will demobilize themselves, Each year the deficit grows bigger, and I can derive no hope of any improvement in the immediate future from their utterances. For instance, I read in the Ottawa Journal a few days ago that Mr. Hanna had stated before the committee which is inquiring into our national railways and merchant marine that freight rates should not be disturbed. That to my mind is a hopeless outlook. We talk of the success of the Canadian Pacific, but the men in control from Lord Shaughnessy and Mr. Beattie downwards are human beings, and surely other human beings ought to be found capable of administering our national railways with an equal measure of success. We cannot dispose of these railways with any advantage to the country. We have the Grand Trunk Pacific, for instance, which cost the country three times per mile more than the Transcontinental cost. The latter is the cheapest road Canada possesses to-day. It has cost $180,000,000, but it must be remembered that it has cost no more. But let us consider what the Canadian Pacific has cost the people of Canada. According to the reports of that company $70,000,000 yet remains to be paid on the lands they have sold, notwithstanding the millions of dollars they have collected every year from land sales, and in addition they value the balance of the land they received from the Canadian people at $91,000,000. There is over $160,000,000 which the Canadian Pacific has cost this country, and if we had placed the same quantity of land to the credit of the Transcontinental the land itself would have paid for its construction, as we have paid practically for the construction of the Canadian Pacific.

If I may be permitted to refer to the offer made by Lord Shaughnessy to the Government in connection with our railway problem, I would say that although I have the greatest respect for him, neither he nor any other man can make an offer today that will relieve the situation. If the Canadian Pacific railway and our national railways were operated as one complete system we could no longer control the rates which the management might find necessary to secure sufficient revenue to pay dividends. But I am heartily in accord with that part of Lord Shaughnessy's memorandum in which he states:

> Even at this advanced stage it would be wise for the Dominion Government to drop all measures looking to the acquisition or control of the Grand Grunk, to relieve that Company of all obligations in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and to grant easy terms covering a period of years for the repayment of any amounts advanced by the Government to the Grand Trunk or secured on the credit of the Government in the last two years.

It is practically the same proposal as I myself made in 1919 when speaking on the Grand Trunk Bill. I agree with Lord Shaughnessy to that extent, but I cannot agree with him when he says that the Transcontinental railway has cost too much money. I would not assume to oppose my judgment to that of Lord Shaughnessy but I would give the opinion of no less an authority than the late Sir Sandford Fleming, one of the greatest engineers that Canada—indeed, the British Empire—ever possessed. Sir Sandford Fleming points out that a railroad should be built with the idea of permanence so that it will not have to be reconstructed every twenty or thirty years. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Government saw to it that the Transcontinental was constructed of the very best material; that the very highest degree of perfection was attained in order that traffic could be moved with the greatest possible speed and at the least possible cost. I quote from the historical sketch of the Intercolonial, 1832 to 1876, written by Sir Sandford Fleming, page 110:

> No portion of railway work is more important than its bridges. When a line is carried out by private effort, a circumscribed capital may compel the adoption of cheap structures. In such cases it is not the character of the structure, or its economy, which commends itself; but it is the necessity of the case, which limits its cost.
> A railway constructed to meet a national requirement, and situated like the Intercolonial, is controlled by no such limitation. It requires no argument to establish that in such circumstances all structures should be of the best form suggested by experience, and that the most durable material should be used. They are then permanently built, and require no subsequent renewal. The first expense is the one cost and in the end, the durable structure is by far the least costly.

This is the opinion of that eminent engineer who served Canada so faithfully and well for many years. When later on he was connected with the construction of the Canadian Pacific he was forced by circumstances to accept bridges of a less durable structure than those which he here recommends, but those have since had to be rebuilt. During the last twenty years the Grand Trunk Pacific has practically rebuilt its road, while the Transcontinental is there for years to come, with its small cost of maintenance per mile compared with that of other roads.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will bear with me in my expression of opinion with regard to these matters. Only by discussion and suggestion can we hope to arrive at a solution of our difficulties in connection with the railway situation. Of course, it would require a mind greater than mine, minds even greater than those of many others who have considered the matter, to find the right solution for the problem. But if in the few suggestions which I have made I have been of some assistance to the Minister of Railways, my remarks shall not have been in vain. I feel sure, Mr. Chairman, that hon. gentlemen opposite who have had the patience to listen to me know that what I say is right. It is hard to admit a false policy, but we all at times have had to admit error. Let my hon. friends, therefore, admit that they have been in the wrong, and go ahead and do something. Let us take such steps as will result in affording us the cheapest possible means of transportation consistent with rapidity and efficiency, so that our people will be able to command a market for all that they produce.

Some attempt has been made, on the ground of lack of cheaper transport facilities, to export grain from Alberta through the Panama canal. One ship, I understand, was loaded last fall and proceeded via the west coast and through the Panama canal to Europe. It was estimated at that time that the farmers who were shipping via that route would save three cents a bushel on the cost of transportation. When the Board of Railway Commissioners last September were in a hurry to raise the freight rates forty per cent, they thought they would help the farmers in connection with the shipment of their grain to the seaports of Canada, but the effect was that the grain went through United States ports. But now the farmers are endeavouring to find a remedy for themselves by shipping through the Panama canal. The Panama canal has certain advantages; it may be of advantage to British Columbia in the export of her lumber, coal and other products, but it cannot possibly rival transportation over Canadian railways through Canadian ports. When the western farmers' grain reaches the Panama canal, it will have to meet competition from Buenos Ayres and Argentine ports. Wheat produced in the Argentine Republic can reach the Panama canal at very little cost, at a cost not to be compared with that of transporting wheat produced in Alberta to the Pacific coast. Therefore, the farmers of Alberta will not be able to compete with the farmers of Argentina. Moreover, shipment via the Panama canal will be a slow process so that the wheat could not reach the market at the desired time, and rapidity of transit is a great consideration in the shipment of wheat. Therefore, the only really possible route for the transportation of the products of the West is from Winnipeg to Quebec in summer and to St. John or Halifax in winter.

If I have not been able to interest the committee as I should have liked, I have taken part in this debate in the exercise of my duty as the representative of the people of my constituency, and in the hope that others will have the same courage and will offer suggestions. Had it not been for the invitation of the minister to any member, who so desired, to make suggestions in honesty of purpose I would not have taken that liberty. I thank you, Mr. Chairman and the committee for extending the privilege that you have given to me. My observations and suggestions have been given in the spirit of a true Canadian.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member rises to speak, I must remind the committee of the ruling given when this resolution was called this afternoon. The Chairman suggested that all of these items be taken together by unanimous consent in order that all hon. members could discuss fully all matters pertaining to railways. This suggestion was not accepted. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Turgeon) was not in the committee at the time, and for that reason he was not interrupted. I must, however, point out to hon. members that all questions relating to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the National Transcontinental railway and the Canadian Government railways are not in order under this item. The motion was made that the items be considered separately, and it becomes the duty of the Chairman to prevent a repetition of the same arguments and to direct that the discussion should be relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. HALLADAY: In the year 1918, the Canadian Northern started to build a railway from the town of Hanna, on their main line running from Saskatoon to Calgary, to the city of Medicine Hat, a distance of about 130 miles. They laid more or less steel north of the Red Deer river and did a certain amount of grading south of the river. How much grading is there to be completed? Will the steel be laid on this grade this fall and, if so, will the connection be made over the Red Deer river? It is very important that this road be completed as soon as possible, because it connects the Canadian Northern system with one of the best manufacturing cities in Western Canada, and it will add greatly to the revenue of this road when completed.

Hon. Mr. REID: I find that this road is in the list of work to be done in Alberta. A contract was let in 1920 for the steel work on the bridge over the Red Deer river; that bridge is now under construction and, I understand, it will be completed in the near future. The starting point of this branch is from a place called Bonar. When the present contract is completed, the grade will be at mile 135, and, as I understand the matter, that is practically at Medicine Hat. My memorandum states that grading has been done within two or three miles of Medicine Hat, so that the grading is ready for rails practically all the way from Red Deer river to Medicine Hat. The track on December 31, 1920, was at mile 58.3. I take it that that is the line from Bonar to Red Deer river. As I understand the matter, the rails have been laid as far as Red Deer river, and the farmers last year had the advantage of the use of that portion of the railway. There are 76.7 miles of rails to be laid from the Red Deer river to Medicine Hat and that is in the list of works to be done. It is expected that this will be completed during the present season. As regards Alberta, this is the work laid out up to the present time:

Acadia Valley branch. The starting point is at Eyre. When the contracts are completed, the grade will be at mile 25. There are no rails laid on that so far, but 13 miles will be laid this year.

There is another branch of the Acadia valley, commencing at Eyre, and when the present contract is completed, the grade will be at mile 43. No rails have been laid. Eighteen miles of rails will be laid this year.

As regards the line from Hanna to Medicine Hat, as I have stated, it commences at Bonar. The total length is 135 miles. 58.3 miles of steel have been laid, and 76.7 miles of steel will be laid this year.

Oliver northeast branch, commencing at Oliver, 120 miles. When the present grading is done, there will be 120 miles graded, 120 miles of rails are there now ready and the line will soon be completed if it is not in operation at the present time.

Red Deer spur starting from the Brazeau Junction branch, 6 miles. The rails are laid on that.

Onoway branch, starting from Peace river junction, 72 miles when the grading is completed; 60 miles of rails are in place, and the rails will be put on the remaining twelve miles this year.

Munson double track, starting from Munson. The total length is 322 miles. 313 miles of rails have been laid, and 9 miles of rails will be laid this year. That makes a total of 128.7 miles of rails to be laid in Alberta this year.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that the question I am going to raise was discussed this afternoon. This item is asked for the purpose of a—

Loan not exceeding $50,000,000 repayable on demand with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable half-yearly, to be used (where amounts available from set operating earnings may be insufficient) to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred at any time by or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian National Railway Company, or any company comprised in the Canadian Northern Railway System.

In 1919, on June 6, an Act was passed, subject, however, to coming into force by Order in Council, for the purpose of bringing all the Government railways under Dominion Government control under the provisions of that Act, and those provisions were to the effect that these Government railways were to be subject to the Board of Railway Commissioners, and to the provisions of the general Railway Act. Now either one of two things is true: either the Canadian National Railway Company exists, or it does not exist. If it exists, we have a right to discuss anything that comes within the purview of the Government railways which are to be included in that company. Of course, there is a restriction in the Act; the Governor in Council reserves to himself the power to designate what railways shall form part of the Canadian National Railway Company, but ordinary commonsense, even good horse sense, would make us presume that every railway under government control would form part of the Canadian National Railway Company. Now if this company does not exist, the minister has no right to ask us to vote this money for a company which is not in existence—for railways which are supposed to exist and be operated under a law which is not in force. This Act I speak of was passed under closure. I remember the circumstances distinctly, because there were certain disagreeable remarks addressed to me at that time. I say that the present situation as to the existence or non-existence of this company works an injustice to the public, and I will give you a concrete case.

In January of 1920 I filed a petition of right for $180,000 odd for a client of mine, the Belgo-Canadian Pulp and Paper Company. I also filed a similar claim, although the amount was not quite so large, for the Laurentide Company, for damage caused by the National Transcontinental operating north in the St. Maurice region. Those petitions of right are still in the hands of the Government, and all we got was an acknowledgment of receipt. In the meantime dams were destroyed by the Transcontinental, resulting in damage to property to the amount of $183,000, and we had to reconstruct them in a hurry to save the lumber coming down the St. Maurice river. One of the dams caused a jam of logs, and this jam of logs caused an erosion of the shore. Our petition of right filed in January, 1920, has been ignored, and in the meantime the Government has taken action against my clients for erosion, for a similar amount. I say that is a shame. Either this company exists or it does not exist. If it exists, I have the right to go before the ordinary tribunal. If it does not exist, I do not have that right, and I have to ask for a petition of right. Personally, I do not feel like voting money when the minister comes before Parliament and asks for a vote for the National Railway Company which is not in existence. We ought to know the exact status of that Canadian National Railway Company—what it hides, or what it covers. If we are going to vote money for the Canadian National Railway Company, why not pass the Order in Council and bring the Act into force? Why abuse the power vested in the Government? As the result of this negligence on the part of the Government, we have cases such as I have just cited. For my part, I do not feel ready to vote for this item under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. REID: This vote is for the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. BUREAU: Then strike out the Canadian National Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. REID: The Bill that the hon. member refers to was passed for the purpose of bringing all the Government railways under one corporation. At that time negotiations were going on with the Grand Trunk, which it was expected on completion would lead to its transfer to the Canadian National Railway system. The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental would also come into the one system. The Act was to be brought into force by Order in Council. That was the intention when we got the Grand Trunk.

Mr. BUREAU: There was no question of the Grand Trunk at that time?

Hon. Mr. REID: That was the intention when the Act was passed, but the negotiations fell through.

Mr. BUREAU: It must have been a pretty silent intention.

Hon. Mr. REID: Since then the management of the Canadian Northern have been appointed, and later, by Order in Council, a Board of Management was appointed to manage the Canadian National and the Canadian Northern.

Mr. BUREAU: That was before the Act.

Hon. Mr. REID: No, since the Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I am talking of the Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. REID: Prior to that, Mr. Hayes was general manager of the Intercolonial.

Mr. BUREAU: But as to the Order in Council, was it prior or subsequent to the Act?

Hon. Mr. REID: It was since the Act was passed. I am quite satisfied that Mr. Brady resigned from the Transcontinental and Mr. Hayes from the Intercolonial to be appointed managers of the road. The hon. member, if he had a claim against any portion of the railway—

Mr. BUREAU: I had three.

Hon. Mr. REID:—he would have to get a fiat and sue the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot get a fiat; that is the trouble. I have been trying for a year to get one.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have never heard of the case, and I am surprised that the fiat has not been granted. However, now the hon. member has brought the matter up I shall certainly see why it was refused. There is no reason why they should refuse a fiat at any time if they will not settle, and it is a surprise to me to hear there has been a refusal.

Mr. BUREAU: I would not surprise you at all. It takes a year or a year and a half to get a fiat.

Hon. Mr. REID: I can hardly believe it takes that long. However, I do not think the committee feel they have all the information they desire on this item, and I am not going to urge that it be passed to-night. In the meantime I shall make inquiries into the matter my hon. friend has brought up.

Mr. BUREAU: Leaving aside the question of the claim, why has the Canadian National Railway Company been included here? It does not represent the Canadian Northern Railway system. The Act provides:

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, — "Canadian Government Railways" means and includes all such railways or parts thereof, and all such properties, works, powers, rigts and privileges, or interests or any of them as may be designated, whether generally or in detail, in any Order in Council from time to time subsisting, entrusting the management and operation thereof to the company under the provisions of section eleven of this Act, and includes, unless expressly excepted, all properties, works.
> And so on.
> "Canadian Northern" means the Canadian Northern Railway Company; "Canadian Northern System" means the Canadian Northern and the companies designated in the First Schedule to this Act.

We know exactly what "Canadian Northern Railway" means and what "Canadian Northern System" means, because every company included in those terms is designated under a specific name in the schedule attached to the Act. But "Canadian National Railway Company" is absolutely meaningless unless there are words there to cover something we know nothing about.

Mr. MANION: Before I discuss the subject which I desire to take up for a few moments I want to state a fact which will, I think, warrant the view that I shall not be out of order in what I have to say. The line to which I shall refer was originally a Grand Trunk Pacific line, the lake Superior Branch, but about the year 1913 it was leased by the Government to be run in conjunction with the Canadian Northern Railway. Having stated this, I think I am perfectly in order in discussing this subject, and I can assure the committee that I shall not occupy very much time. It will be remembered that a few years ago it was the custom of the railways particularly, but also of other companies, to look for bonuses. We know that the railways used to look for bonuses, not only from the Dominion Government, but also from the Provincial Governments, and the municipalities. At the time the lake Superior Branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific was built, from the main line to lake Superior, a distance of about 196 miles, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company entered into an agreement with the city of Fort William on March 29, 1905, by which the city gave them, among other things, a cash bonus of $350,000. They also gave them some land grants, some rights of way over streets of the city, certain exemption from taxation, police and fire protection, and street railway and other facilities. The citizens of Fort William estimate those grants, apart from the $350,000 cash, to run into hundreds of thousands. In return for this, the company agreed to establish their terminals at Fort William. Practically in the words of the agreement, they undertook:

To erect and maintain in Fort William its principal Lake Superior terminals, works, and head office, and engineering, construction, and operating staffs in connection with and pertinent to the said Lake Superior Branch.

These terminals consisted of such things as round houses, machine shops, repairing shops, work houses, superintendent's headquarters, engineering, construction and operating staffs, and the lake and rail traffic pertinent thereto. That at least was the spirit of the agreement entered into by the city of Fort William, which has lived up to the agreement. It has paid over the money, given the exemptions, and fulfilled all the other terms of the agreement. The people of Fort William never believed that they got their money's worth from the agreement, but so long as the company lived up to the conditions they agreed to, the city felt that though it had not derived very great advantage from the contract it must nevertheless take its medicine, so to speak. The people thought they would be sports enough to stand by the agreement, whether they were winners or losers.

About 1913 the Government took over the line on a lease to work it in conjunction with the other lines of the Canadian Northern and the Government railways, and from that time on the people of Fort William have been gradually losing as a result of the agreement. You will readily understand that a city of 8,000 or 10,000—the population was about that when the bonus was given—having given $350,000 cash, to say nothing of the various other concessions they made, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, have shouldered a a heavy burden in this undertaking, and they are realizing now that it has been a losing proposition. The Board of Trade met some months ago. I was present at the meeting and on my suggestion they appointed a committee to look into this matter. They waited upon the superintendent at that place, but on orders from the authorities higher up, he refused any information as to the conditions that existed at that time in comparison with previous conditions. At various times since, citizens have noticed, without any information from the superintendent, that various trains have been taken off which made their headquarters at Fort William, both passenger and freight trains, various officials have been removed and freight, passenger and other traffics which had been transferred at Fort William, were no longer being transferred there. Large staffs of men were taken away and the city has lost what it would have gained had the agreement been lived up to by the other party. I will not go into the question in great detail.

There is nothing new in this condition, because I remember that nearly three years ago I came to Ottawa with a deputation and waited on the Minister of Railways. At that time we foresaw that we were going to lose certain things on behalf of desire for efficiency, but while we had no objection to anything being done to promote greater efficiency, we wished either to get what was coming to us or something equivalent to what the city had spent, both in this cash bonus and in the various grants it had given. We waited on the minister and later on we interviewed Mr. Hanna in Toronto. I have under my hand a letter written by the Board of Trade to the Minister of Railways on November 2, 1918, two and a half years ago. The minister throughout has been very friendly to the city, and I believe it has been his desire to give the citizens justice. But it has always been pointed out that the railways are operated by Mr. Hanna and a directorate. The city lately concluded that they were not getting justice. There was no sign of their getting what was due them, and so they took legal advice. They consulted some of the best lawyers in the country who upheld their contention that they had undoubted rights in the matter, and that if the terms of the agreement were not complied with on the part of the other party, they had a perfect right to institute a lawsuit. I have spoken to, waited upon, and written to Mr. Hanna on the question and he gives various excuses as to why changes are made, but he always insists that Fort William should and will get a fair deal. He claims that the changes have been made in the interests of efficiency, and I have no argument against any steps in that direction, nor have the people of Fort William. But neither they nor I agree that all these changes have been necessary in order to promote efficiency, and whether they are necessary or not, they should not all be made at Fort William's expense and the city unquestionably has a right to some return for this cash bonus of $350,000 and the various other grants they have made. Certainly the citizens do not intend to sit quietly by and see the profits which should accrue to them taken away. Without going futher into the question, I wish to say that the people of the city of Fort William which I have the honour to represent expect that this agreement will be lived up to by the other party. They realize that when a private corporation enters into an agreement with a city or another corporation, if the agreement is taken over by a third party, that party is expected to fulfil its terms just as through he had been one of the original parties to the agreement; and in the same way when the Government takes over a railway, as it has done in this instance, it is expected that the agreement will be observed. The Government must live up to the agreement just as the Grand Trunk Pacific would have had to do. There is not only a moral but a legal claim as well, and the citizens of Fort William have legal opinion behind them in this position. As I have stated, I believe that the minister and Mr. Hanna have both tried to be fair. They both claim that they have been endeavouring to do justice by Fort William, and the minister on various occasions has taken the matter up with Mr. Hanna to see that everything that could be done to ensure a fair deal by Fort William should be done. But the citizens of that city have reached the stage where they demand a show-down and they expect that this agreement will be fully lived up to. I expect the same thing, and I may say that the people of Fort William will certainly fight to see that they get their rights in the matter. If the agreement is not lived up to the Government is sure of a lawsuit; and if the lawsuit does not give the city justice I can assure the Government that during the next session of Parliament I will see what the Parliament of Canada has to say about it. Finally I would like the minister to assure me—he has done so privately and I feel sure he will be quite willing to do so publicly—that he will make strenuous effort to see that Fort William will not suffer injustice under this agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Hon. Mr. REID: The hon. member has several times very forcibly brought this matter to my attention, and I think the people of Fort William can rest assured that he is looking after their case satisfactorily. The trouble is this: It is impossible for me to take the matter up at the present time on account of the railway situation being in an unsettled state. There will be some dissatisfaction as a result of placing the Transcontinental system, and the Canadian Northern and the other railways together on account of the changes that must be made, which changes are in the interest of economy. These cases, when the Government gets control of the whole system, must be dealt with, and I would say would be dealt with fairly by any government. I am sorry that we have not been able to take this matter up and get a decision earlier than this. I have within the last few weeks taken up the case of Fort William with Mr. Hanna and urged him to do what he could to carry out the agreement so far as it was consistent with the operation of the railway. I am satisfied that the question will have to be taken up by the management within the near future, and if an agreement cannot be come to between the management and the city it will, of course, have to be settled through the courts. The Government, however, has no desire whatever to take advantage of any claim the city of Fort William may have. All it would wish to do would be to see that in any settlement made—if it is necessary to make a settlement, on account of placing the two terminals together at either one point or the other—such settlement is fair and reasonable, and I am satisfied Parliament will vote any amount that would be necessary to settle a claim that was properly established.

Mr. MANION: May I say, in justice to the minister that he has done what he stated; he has taken the matter up with Mr. Hanna and has endeavoured to get the matter straightened out to the satisfaction of the people at Fort William. May I also say, in justice to Mr. Hanna, that he always asserts that he intends to do the same and that at the present moment he is dealing with the matter. The reason I brought the question up to-night is because when we are dealing with the Estimates, as we are now doing it is practically the only opportunity when I can reasonably bring it forward. I wish to put myself on record as stating positively here that if the city of Fort William does not get justice in this matter, that when the time comes I will again bring it before hon. gentlemen, if necessary, and ask the House to deal with it.

Mr. FIELDING: May I bring to the attention of the minister a matter concerning one of the railways which are included in the Canadian Northern system and therefore entirely within his department. There is a railway running through the western part of Nova Scotia known as the Halifax and South Western, which is one of the subsidiaries of the Canadian Northern. A fire occurred along the road a year or two ago in the district known as Sable River and Louis Head. The people in the neighbourhood, regarding the road as now controlled by the Government, not unnaturally made representations to their members of Parliament, and I brought the matter before the railway management. I must in fairness say of them that they acted very promptly in the matter of an investigation. An official was sent down and made the necessary inquiry. My impression is he reached the conclusion that the claim was a just one, but when some delay occurred and representations were urged upon the management, the reply was that under the Railway Act not more than $5,000 could be paid on one fire claim —I think that was the statement made to me—and as the claim of these people exceeds that amount nothing could be done. Now this is one of the anomalies arising from the questionable character of the ownership of the road. If it is a government road there should be no limitation; if it is a private road, a corporation road, I suppose the general principles of the Railway Act will apply. It would certainly seem to me that the claim is a just one. I do not wish to assert that; I only speak of it because I think the inquiry that was made rather led to the department having the impression that the claim was a just one. If the claim is found to be a just one and these people have a real grievance, I do not think this $5,000 limit should stand in the way in the event of their having suffered damages to a larger extent. I do not suppose the minister himself has any particular knowledge of the subject, but there is an impression in the minds of the people down there that they have not had fair treatment in the matter, and I would be very glad if the minister could, in any way he thought best, look into it.

Hon. Mr. REID: I will be glad to look into the matter and find out exactly what the situation is. Of course the railway in question is part of the Canadian Northern system, having been built by a private company, and the Railway Act would apply to this particular case. However I will look into the matter and perhaps at the next meeting of the committee I will have some information with respect to it and be able to discuss it.

Mr. ARGUE: I would like to have a more definite statement from the minister with reference to the branch line in Saskatchewan to run from Gravelbourg to Swift Current, on the Canadian Northern. In 1918 we were promised by the president of the company that the railway would be in Swift Current in 1920, and we have been very patient so far in waiting for the road to be built. Now the grade is up to Neidpath, and steel is laid to within ten miles of that point. The farmers of that district have made arrangements, and laid all their plans, to build an elevator at Neidpath but they were advised that it would be better to wait until they could get some more definite assurance with regard to laying the rails on that branch. What I would like to know is whether the rails will be laid on the branch in time for these people to get out their wheat this fall. There is something like 40,000 acres of grain which will be marketed in Neidpath providing the elevator can be built so as to store the grain until it can be got out. I would like the minister to give me that assurance so the the farmers can go ahead with the arrangements for building the elevator with the certainty of being able to take out the grain this fall.

Hon. Mr. REID: In speaking to Mr. Hanna about the matter he mentioned that they would lay this ten miles this year for the reason that an elevator would be built, and it was for that purpose the rails would be laid. I am quite satisfied that it is the intention of the Canadian National Railway management to lay the ten miles in question, and I feel satisfied from the way Mr. Hanna mentioned it to me that there is no doubt it will be done. Unless something unforeseen should happen it is the intention anyway to lay the rails before that time. The 50,000 tons of new rails which were purchased are now being rolled and sent on to the main line. The rails thus released will go on to the branch lines and the branch in question is one of those that will be taken up first.

Mr. DAVIS: Can the minister give us the Manitoba programme?

Hon. Mr. REID: In Manitoba: Amaranth extension, starting point Delta junction. When the present track is complete the grade will be to mile 61.9; track on December 31, 1920, was at mile 44.1; 17 miles yet to lay. That will be laid this year. St. Rose du Lac branch, starting point Ochre river. When the present track is complete the grade will be to mile 40; track on December 31, 1920, was at mile 14.9; 25.1 miles will be laid this year.

Mr. COWAN: What policy is being followed in putting steel upon grading already done? The reason I ask is that it looks to me from the programme submitted to-night as if the department have completely lost a railroad in the province of Saskatchewan. I refer to the line that was built from the Canadian Northern at Lumsden to Craven, and which has been operated in a sort of a way for freight purposes for a number of years. About seven or eight years ago the line was graded from Craven down through the Qu'Appelle valley to serve a very thickly settled district that is badly in need of railway accommodation. Is it the policy to lay steel on grading done in the last year or two and neglect grading completed five or six years previously? It seems to me there ought to be some preference given to the grading first done.

Hon. M. REID: It is quite evident from the remarks of the hon. member that I have not that line on my list. The policy is to lay rails on the grading already done at the earliest possible date. I will make inquiries and when we come to the item again at another sitting I will have full information ready.

Mr. KNOX: Will the same assurance be given in reference to other lines in Saskatchewan that the minister stated a little while ago were already graded?

Hon. Mr. REID: I gave a list of the lines in Saskatchewan and stated that the management intended to lay rails as fast as they could get them from the main line.

Mr. TURGEON: When I made the statement that only 24 per cent of the grain of the West was exported through Canadian ports I could not lay my hand on the information. It has reference to the six months ending last February.

Mr. FIELDING: May I be permitted to call the minister's attention to another little line in connection with the Halifax and South Western? We are repeatedly assured by hon. members of the Government that we must all practice self-denying ordinances and not ask for new construction of public works owing to the financial situation. That argument has very much weight, but exception appears to be made, and perhaps justly made, in the matter of branch railways. My hon. friend has read a list of branch railroads in connection with the Canadian Northern which are to be constructed in the West, most of them lines of considerable length and involving large expenditure. I take it for granted that these are really urgent matters, and I do not wish to be understood as offering any objection, but there is a small matter down in my county of Shelburne affecting the branch line running into the town of Lockport. Lockport is one of the most important fishing towns in Nova Scotia. It is about four miles away from the main line, and its traffic at present is done by ferry. That is better than nothing, and the people are glad to have it, but at the same time the business of the community would be much better developed if they had this siding—it is not more than that—of four miles. I mentioned the matter last year when the minister was talking of branch lines in the West running into an expenditure of millions of dollars, and I said I thought it would not be asking too much to have this small branch line of four miles constructed. I think I made such an impression on the mind of the minister because I find he answered me in these terms—I am sorry I cannot find the reference at the moment, but he spoke to the effect that the matter was already engaging the attention of his department, and he did not see any reason why the line should not be constructed. Nothing has been done. I am not making a complaint on that score but I do think a strong case can be made out for this little branch if the Government is going to indulge in new expenditures of that nature in other parts of the country. The hon. gentleman assured me last year that he would send a responsible officer down there to see the people concerned and report on the traffic prospects. I know when Mr. Hanna was in Nova Scotia making a general survey he was to have looked into the matter, but he was summoned back to Ottawa on urgent business. He assured me that he would send some one down to inspect and report. I cannot say that that has not been done, but I have heard nothing further about the matter. I would again urge the importance of this little branch line. If we were refusing branch lines everywhere I would not make this request, but this small branch of four miles I think can, for business reasons, be amply justified. I hope my hon. friend will again take a favourable view of it and see if my request cannot be complied with.

Hon. Mr. REID: I well remember my hon. friend bringing this matter to my attention last year. I cannot remember now what was done but I will make inquiries and have the information ready at the next sitting of the committee.

We have had quite a discussion, Mr. Chairman, and I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Saturday.

Saturday, May 7, 1921.

The House met at Two o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FROM THE SENATE—FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 142, for the relief of Lily Appleton.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 143, for the relief of Harry Hirshenbain.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 144, for the relief of Percy Christopher Paul.—Mr. Harrison.

Bill No. 145, for the relief of John Graham.—Mr. Smith.

TARIFF INVESTIGATION REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I think it is the intention of the Government to have the Budget presented on Monday. Is it the intention of the Government to lay on the table of the House any report of the committee of the Cabinet which held an inquiry into questions of the tariff during last year? In the speech from the Throne, it is mentioned that the conclusions of that investigation will be presented in due course. Shall we have them in a form in which the House can consider them?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): I will make inquiry of the Minister of Finance and let the hon. member know a little later in the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the Budget speech is brought down?

Hon. Mr. REID: A little later in the day.

INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) for Right Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), moved the third reading of Bill No. 73, to authorize the ratification and carrying into effect of the Protocol of December 16, 1920, accepting the statute for the Permanent Court of International Justice of December 13, 1920.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Immigration and Colonization—salaries and contingencies, $223,257.50.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister kindly explain the increase of $48,205?

Mr. CALDER: There is an apparent increase in the staff of the department. It will be noted in the statement of details that the number of officials employed last year was 102, whereas the Estimates this year show 126. As a matter of fact, however, there has not been any addition to the departmental staff. During the year there has been a process of readjustment. Heretofore, we have had on the regular staff at Ottawa employees who were paid out of general votes, and I am of opinion that that practice should cease. All that has been done in this case is that a number of officials who being on the staff, were paid out of general votes of the department, have been placed on the Civil Service List. I think that is the better practice. Therefore, there is no increase in the number of the staff, and any other increase there is as regards the staff is due to increases of salaries arranged for by the classification.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know whether I am in order or not; but with the approval of the committee, I should like to ask if the minister would tell us something about a new Order in Council passed by the department, I think, on April 30.

Mr. CALDER: I did not know to what Order in Council the hon. gentleman was referring—

Mr. JACOBS: There were so many.

Mr. CALDER: Not so very many; there are a goodly number necessary in connection with the administration of the work of the department. If I understand what the hon. gentleman has in mind, it was an Order in Council issued recently providing for the payment of a small fee where permits are granted to people who are allowed to enter Canada temporarily. In the case of persons affected mentally, that is, insane persons or persons approaching insanity, a fee of $25 has been fixed for the granting of temporary admission of those persons to Canada. In the case of others, I think the fee is $5. As the committee can readily understand, we have a great deal of work and a good deal of expense in connection with those cases. They must be followed up, and officials must be employed to do that work. In addition there are other incidental expenses; and it is thought that when permits are granted by the department to people to enter Canada temporarily and where we have that additional work and expense cast upon us, those who are granted that privilege should be charged a fee.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it the policy of the department to make intending immigrants pay for the upkeep of the department? Is not this incidental to the work of the department?

Mr. CALDER: These are not immigrants who are to remain in Canada permanently. They are simply granted permission to enter Canada for a short time, say for a period of six months, and in some cases a year. There is a good deal of expense in connection with granting these people this privilege, and I think they should contribute something towards the expenses entailed.

As regards the general question raised, I am not so sure but that the time has come when we would be justified in charging a small fee to people who enter Canada. The expenditure in connection with the department is very large, and it may be that, within a measurable distance, the policy should be adopted of requiring those who enter Canada to pay a small fee which would help defray a portion of the expenditure. The United States charges a head tax of $8, if I am not mistaken. I have not the figures before me but their expenditure on immigration runs into millions of dollars, and it is all paid out of the head taxes collected, and there is a surplus. I do not say that the time has arrived when we should do that in Canada, but I do say that the subject is worthy of consideration. The matter has been under consideration already, but no decision has been arrived at, and consequently nothing will be done in that direction this year. I think, however, that the matter might very well be considered before another session, and a conclusion arrived at.

Mr. JACOBS: Under the Laurier Administration we paid a little in order to induce immigrants to come to this country. We are evidently reversing that policy now. This small tax which the minister proposes to impose is an inducement, I suppose, for people to come to this country.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. KNOX: What revenue is received annually, or has been received altogether, from the tax on Chinese immigrants?

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that these questions are not strictly in order upon the present item. The present item concerns only the salaries of the Civil Government employees here in Ottawa. If hon. gentlemen would only wait till we reach Items Nos. 52, 53, and following, which will be taken up immediately, all these questions would then be strictly in order, and, as an acting chairman once said, it would make the task of the Chairman much easier.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Am I to understand that the Chairman, whose wisdom I never doubt, is calling the minister to order for obstructing his own Estimates?

Mr. CALDER: I might say in reply to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that I was asked a question from the other side of the House, which I politely endeavoured to reply to.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): From what I gathered, the subject under discussion was of considerable importance, and the minister made a very provocative speech in reply. He may consider himself lucky if the Chairman saves him from a long debate.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the Deputy Minister of the Department of the Interior the Deputy Minister also of the Immigration Department?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, Mr. Cory is still acting as Deputy Minister of Immigration.

Mr. JACOBS: A couple of years ago an additional $1,000 was placed in the Estimates for Mr. Cory, on account of the work he was doing for the Department of Immigration exclusive of his duties as Deputy Minister of the Interior Department. Why has that been dropped?

Mr. CALDER: The reason was that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House took very strenuous objection to that procedure being followed.

Mr. JACOBS: Only one.

Mr. CALDER: As a matter of fact, the Immigration Department was part of the Interior Department for a great many years, until it was thought advisable to separate them. I doubt if Mr. Cory has very much more work to do now in connection with the Immigration Department than he had when the two departments were amalgamated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is not Mr. Scott the Deputy Minister of the Department of Immigration?

Mr. CALDER: No, he was the superintendent.

Mr. CAHILL: In view of the statement of the minister a few days ago, in which he intimated that the principal part of his work was to keep immigrants out of Canada rather than to encourage them to come in, how does he account for the increase of $45,000 in this item?

Mr. McMASTER: On account of the harder work he has keeping them out.

Mr. CALDER: In the first place, I did not say that the chief work of the department was to keep immigrants out. In the second place, as I have already explained, there is no increase in the staff. We are simply carrying them here instead of under the general vote.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is evidently a mistake in the Estimates, for I read on page 83, "Department of Immigration and Colonization, deputy minister, $6,000," and then on page 80, "Department of the Interior, deputy minister, $6,000." Are we voting the amount twice?

Mr. CALDER: That vote in the immigration has been carried during the last two years, but the position has not been filled. Mr. Cory is simply acting as Deputy Minister of Immigration, and as such he does not receive any salary. If the appointment were made at any time, the person appointed would get this $6,000.

Mr. DECHENE: How is it that the Chief Inspector of Immigration is receiving an increase of $1,335? His salary last year was $2,625, and this year it is $3,960. That is a large increase in one year. The big fellows in this department seem to be getting all the increases.

Mr. CALDER: The hon. gentleman is probably aware that the salaries of all the officials in the service have been carefully reviewed by the Civil Service Commission during the past year, and as a result of their study of the whole subject they have made certain recommendations to the Government as to what the salaries should be for the different positions. The Chief Inspector of Immigration has very considerable duties to perform, and very responsible duties too.

Mr. JACOBS: Who is he?

Mr. CALDER: Mr. Percy Reid. I would judge that the Civil Service Commission, after a study of his work in comparison with that of the other chief officials, came to the conclusion that he had not been adequately paid in the past, and consequently recommended this increase.

Mr. DECHENE: Does the same reason account for the increase of $1,000 in the salary of the secretary of the department, and for the increase of $635 in the salary of the secretary-clerk, and for the increase of $1,060 in the salary of the Division Commissioner of Immigration? These are substantial increases among four or five employees drawing the biggest salaries. The smaller-salaried men do not seem to be receiving much of an increase at all. In my opinion, the higher officers in the department were pretty well paid before the reclassification, and they were of course able to put their case before the Board of Hearing, as the junior officials could not, with the result that they succeeded in many cases in obtaining increases while the less fortunate ones were left in the hole, if I may say so. That is hardly fair, and I think that the Government, if they saw fit to increase the salaries of high officials, should have saved something for those lower down.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know much about the work of the Chief Inspector of Immigration, but I do know something about that of the secretary of the department, and any salary that we pay him is nothing compared to the work he is doing. I would advocate reversing matters, and would suggest that the secretary receive the salary which the minister himself receives and that the minister be given the secretary's salary, because most of the work of the department is done by the secretary. This gentleman performs his work well, and shows tact, judgment and discretion; and altogether I am surprised that up to the present he has remained in a position for which he draws a paltry $2,900. He should have resigned long ago and obtained a position with a salary commensurate with the kind of work he does.

Mr. DECHENE: A new position has been created, that of supervisor of women's division of immigration, at a salary of $2,700. Is this officer a man or a woman?

Mr. CALDER: A lady.

Mr. DECHENE: Is she located in Canada, England, or where?

Mr. CALDER: In Canada.

Mr. DECHENE: What is her name?

Mr. CALDER: Mrs. Robson. She has been occupying the position temporarily for some time, having been in the service now for about a year or a year and a-half. She does excellent work.

Mr. DECHENE: Is she only a temporary employee?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. About three months ago the Civil Service Commission advertised to have the position filled and a dozen or more applications were sent in. They were all carefully considered and the conclusion was reached that the position should again be advertised as none of those who had applied were considered as having the qualifications necessary for the work.

Mr. MURPHY: On whose advice was the position re-advertised?

Mr. CALDER: During the past year there has been established an organization known as the Canadian Council of Women's Immigration, which deals particularly with the immigration of women. Some eight, ten or twelve national organizations are represented on that council, and at their last meeting, held about two or three weeks ago, the Civil Service Commission made representations to them regarding the difficulties which had been encountered in having this particular position filled. On the request of the commission that council appointed, I think, three of its members to go over and consider with the commission all the applications that had been made, and finally, as a result of their representations to the commission, it was decided to advertise the position again.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that council a body constituted by Government?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that this lady deals exclusively with women immigrants?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: She is at the head of that particular department?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: How many applications were received in all by the minister?

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. CALDER: I did not receive any; they went to the commission.

Mr. CAHILL: Well, how many were there?

Mr. CALDER: About a dozen.

Mr. CAHILL: And none qualified?

Mr. CALDER: That was the conclusion come to.

Mr. CAHILL: By the Civil Service Commission or the department?

Mr. CALDER: By the commission.

Mr. DECHENE: Who is the gentleman who is classified as secretary to the executive?

Mr. CALDER: Miss Johnston; she is secretary to Mr. Scott, who was Superintendent of Immigration and is now assistant deputy minister.

Mr. DECHENE: Miss Johnston is secretary to the assistant deputy minister?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. DECHENE: Has the deputy minister himself also a secretary?

Mr. CALDER: He uses his own organization in the Interior Department; he has no secretary provided for in these Estimates. The deputy minister is Deputy Minister of the Department of Interior as well, and, of course, he has his staff there.

Mr. DECHENE: I see there are four assistants to the secretary. Do they all assist the secretary of the department, or Miss Johnston?

Mr. CALDER: They are assistants to the secretary of the department. As the hon. gentleman can readily understand, the secretary carries on, in the main, the correspondence of the department, and these are simply his assistants in directing and carrying on that large volume of correspondence.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Scott, I understand, is assistant deputy minister?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: And his salary has been increased some $800 during the year?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Was there not some question of his resigning? I understood his health demanded his resignation?

Mr. CALDER: I would scarcely say that. Mr. Scott has been in the service a long time and has done very valuable work in the past. While his health to-day is not what it was some years ago, still he has hardly reached that stage where he should resign. He is still a very capable and useful worker.

Mr. JACOBS: Could he retire on an allowance?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, he could be retired under the Retirement Act.

Mr. JACOBS: I am glad to hear that his health is better.

Mr. COPP: Under "Health contingencies," there is an item of $5,000 for clerical assistance. I judge from the details of the vote that the clerical staff is pretty well provided for apart from this $5,000, and perhaps the minister will say what this is for.

Mr. CALDER: This is a vote that is usually taken in every department, because there may be periods in the course of the year when it might be necessary to procure help of a purely temporary character. There are times when the business of the department is more or less rushed, and it is necessary to have a vote of this kind. The custom prevails throughout the entire service, and it is merely to take care of any temporary help that is needed.

Mr. COPP: There are twenty-four clerks and other officials more this year than last year. The number this year is 126 as compared with 102 a year ago.

Mr. CALDER: The hon. member was not in the House when I explained that. There is really no increase in the number. It is simply a transfer of members of the staff who were carried on the general vote of the department. They are now transferred to the civil government list, which should have been done long ago. Where officials are here on the staff at Ottawa they should not be carried on a general vote but should be put on the Civil Service list, where they rightly belong; and we propose now to carry on the civil list persons who previously were carried on the general vote. As I have said, there is really no increase.

Mr. COPP: Has any part of the $5,000 voted last year been expended?

Mr. CALDER: We had eight temporaries last year who were employed at salaries totalling $5,980. I do not know whether they were carried throughout the entire year, but that was the total of the salaries that would be paid them.

Mr. JACOBS: Who is the Commissioner of United States Immigration, and where is he located?

Mr. CALDER: Mr. W. J. White has been commissioner for a good many years. He makes his headquarters at Ottawa.

Mr. JACOBS: What are his duties?

Mr. CALDER: He has general supervision of our work in the United States. He overlooks and directs all the work of the various agencies there.

Mr. JACOBS: Looks over!

Mr. CALDER: He overlooks their work.

Mr . JACOBS: He does not overlook much as far as I can see.

Mr. CALDER: Well, it all depends on what you mean by "overlook." His work is carried on entirely in the United States in supervision of our agencies there.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that at Ellis Island?

Mr. CALDER: No.

Mr. JACOBS: We maintain an office at Ellis Island do we not?

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the committee that consideration of any matter connected with Ellis Island would come up under item 52 where there is a vote of $80,000 for immigration in the United States. I hope the committee will allow progress to be made with the large item for salaries in the Inside Service, and the matter of Ellis island will then be in order under item 52.

Mr. JACOBS: I am asking for information concerning the commissioner of United States immigration, and wish information about it.

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but anything pertaining to the work of the Department of Immigration in the United States and at Ellis Island does not properly come up under the vote for civil government.

Mr. JACOBS: I beg your pardon Mr. Chairman, you will find on page 83, as the third item—" Commissioner of United States Immigration, $4,500," which is an increase of $500 as compared with last year.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is quite at liberty to ask anything concerning the duties of that official here at Ottawa, but not to discuss the matter of the office at Ellis Island.

Mr. COPP: I would like to ask my hon. friend also in regard to the item of $28,000 for travelling expenses and sundries under the heading of "Contingencies." How much of that was expended last year, and what part was for sundries? What is included under the word "sundries?"

Mr. CALDER: Take the whole vote for contingencies of $40,000, we over-expended last year some $4,000. That included provision for these temporary clerks. In addition that item covers all the printing—forms, envelopes, record books, letterheads and everything of that kind for the department.

Mr. COPP: That would be under printing and stationery?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. The travelling expenses cover the travelling expenses of the chief officers of the department.

Mr. COPP: I understand that.

Mr. CALDER: My hon. friend will see the list of officers. Those officers have a good deal of travelling to do. Take for example the chief inspector of immigration—take the officer in charge of juvenile immigration, and other of our chief officers—they travel a great deal throughout the country. I have not the details here of the expenditures for travelling expenses last year; I simply have the total amount expended under the head of contingencies.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not ask particularly about the travelling expenses, although they are under the heading of sundries—I asked particularly, what was under that heading—what would be included in sundries that is not provided for in the other votes?

Mr. CALDER: I think that is intended to cover items like telegrams and telephone messages, and so on, expenditures incurred directly by the department itself.

Mr. COPP: You have not those particulars separate from the travelling expenses?

Mr. CALDER: I have not.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice we are providing for the salary of "Supervisor of Personnel." Who is that official and why should this department particularly have a supervisor of personnel?

Mr. CALDER: Mr. Featherstone is acting in that capacity; he is an old officer in the department and has been there a great many years. I understand they have an officer doing similar duties in connection with nearly all the departments. Mr. Featherstone has work outside of this. In a general way he looks after all appointments to the service, carries on all the work that is necessary to be carried on with the Civil Service Commission—at least a great deal of that work—and generally has charge of the details connected with the personnel of the staff. That does not occupy all his time. As members are aware he assists me a good deal here while the House is in session, in connection with my own work in the House and also in connection with departmental matters.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What are the duties of this Division Immigration Inspector grade 2?

Mr. CALDER: I think the vote will show it. We have three officers of that class. Canada is divided into three immigration districts, the Eastern District, the Western District—that is the prairie district—and the Mountain District, with three commissioners in charge. Under each of these commissioners there is a division inspector. That inspector has the supervision of the work of all the boundary inspectors under the jurisdiction of each of these commissioners. Mr. Willans is the gentleman who occupies that position in Eastern Canada, and it is his duty to oversee the work of the boundary inspectors along the borders in Eastern Canada and see that everything is running properly.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the Supervisor of Personnel draw a salary for performing the duties of that office and another salary for doing some other work?

Mr. CALDER: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Referring again to an item which the hon. gentleman has partially explained, I would like some further explanation with regard to it. That is the "Supervisor of Women's Division Immigration" at a salary of $2,700. I observe that this is a new vote, therefore I take it this is the creation of a new position. Is that correct?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman has explained that the duties pertaining to this office have been discharged temporarily by a lady who has been in all respects satisfactory. That also is correct?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: May I inquire why her services are not going to be continued?

Mr. CALDER: Mrs. Robson has made up her mind that she does not wish to continue in the service, and she remains on temporarily until such time as an appointment is made. Let me say this to the committee, and say it very frankly,—that in my view, the handling of the problem relating to the immigration of women is one of the most difficult problems that the department has to deal with, and it is most essential that we should get a woman who is thoroughly competent and thoroughly trained, with the necessary tact and judgment to handle that work. I would be the last man who would want to see any person appointed who did not have such qualifications, because there is no position in our service where more trouble can be caused by not having the right kind of person in the position, and I have been most anxious that an appointment of right class should be made. Mrs. Robson has made up her mind that she will not continue in the service, and it is expected that she will leave very shortly, and I am very anxious that we should get, as her successor, some person who can do the work and carry it on in the way in which it should be carried on. We must have such a person, otherwise we are going to have a great deal of trouble.

Mr. MURPHY: Then I understand my hon. friend to say further that the position had been advertised as being a new one, and applications had been invited for it; that applications were sent in, a dozen or more; and that after these had been inquired into the decision was reached that none of the applicants came up to the requirements, and it was decided to re-advertise the position. Is that correct?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood my hon. friend to say further, that the applications sent in were inquired into jointly by the Civil Service Commission and the representatives of a council of women appointed in some way by the Government. I would like to know who compose this council, on what basis they are appointed, and by what authority they have a voice in making this Government appointment.

Mr. CALDER: In the first place, the appointment was by Order in Council under the Immigration Act.

Mr. MURPHY: That is, the first appointment?

Mr. CALDER: The body was created under the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the hon. gentleman now speaking of the Council of Women?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. The organizations represented on that council are: Interprovincial Farm Women—a nation-wide organization—by Mrs. John McNaughton, of Harris, Saskatchewan; the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, by Mrs. J. S. Robson, of Winnipeg; the Young Women's Christian Association, by Lady Falconer, of Toronto; the National Council of Women, by Mrs. Vincent Massey, of Toronto; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, by Mrs. Gordon Wright, of London; the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, by Mrs. W. D. Spence, of Calgary; the National Committee on Mental Hygiene, by Mrs. Colin Russel, of Montreal; the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, by Mr. Tom Moore; the Great War Veterans Association, by Mr. MacNeil, Secretary; the Catholic Women's League of Canada, by Lady Pope, of Ottawa; the Women's Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada, by Mrs. H. A. Lavell, of Kingston; the Women's Missionary Society of the Presbyterian Church in Canada by Mrs. J. N. West, of Toronto; the Women's Auxiliary to the Missionary Society of the Church of England, by Miss Bogert, Ottawa, and the Social Service Council of Canada, by Dr. J. G. Shearer, Toronto. The Council is composed of persons whose names I have mentioned. They have had several meetings. The main object of the Council has been to consider the problem of women immigration and to make certain recommendations to the Government from time to time as to the best method of carrying on our work, and I can say quite frankly that their recommendations have been very helpful to us. As a matter of fact, we have made a number of changes in the handling of women immigration, which I think, have resulted in great good to these people. For example, these various organizations have women officers at the ports in addition to our own, and when the immigrants land they are very much better looked after than in the old days, being provided with all sorts of comforts and assisted in every way. In fact, these organizations handle, very efficiently, all the problems connected with women immigration, and when it becomes known overseas how carefully the work is done, it will tend to increase our immigration.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the hon. gentleman got the date of the Order in Council to which he referred?

Mr. CALDER: I have not a copy here. It must have been made about two years ago.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to bring it down?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Who defines the duties for each of these positions which are set forth in the advertisements of the Civil Service Commission inviting applications?

Mr. CALDER: The same practice prevails there as in all the departments. The department in the first place suggests to the commission what the duties should be If any objection is taken by the commission, then I presume there would be a conference between the departmental officials and the commission, and as a result the duties would be finally fixed.

Mr. MURPHY: I understand that the general rule is as the hon. gentleman states it, but I should like to know who defines the duties of this particular position. Is it the hon. gentleman, or his department, or the Civil Service Commission, or this Council of Women?

Mr. CALDER: That would be done by the deputy head of the department in consultation with his chief officer.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the hon. gentleman know that that has actually been done?

Mr. CALDER: I would think so.

Mr. MURPHY: Can the hon. gentleman say so definitely?

Mr. CALDER: I have no knowledge to the contrary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Council of Women hold regular sessions?

Mr. CALDER: I think their meetings have been confined to one annually.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they paid to attend such sessions?

Mr. CALDER: If I mistake not, we paid their travelling expenses the first time they met; since then, they have paid their own travelling expenses.

Mr. MURPHY: Have advertisements been published inviting new applications for the position?

Mr. CALDER: That I cannot say.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. MURPHY: Does the hon. gentleman know when such applications will be invited?

Mr. CALDER: That I cannot say.

Mr. MURPHY: Could the hon. gentleman state who were applicants for the position, and what their respective standings were?

Mr. CALDER: I do not know the name of one of them. I never had the list before me, and I never made inquiries. I have persistently kept away from the Civil Service Commission and their work, and I propose to continue to do so. I never heard the name of a single applicant for that position, and I do not want to.

Mr. MURPHY: Surely my hon. friend would not take the attitude that for a position comprising part of the machinery of his department he is going to allow one or two outside bodies to define the duties of that position, and generally to disregard him in the appointment?

Mr. CALDER: That is our law.

Mr. MURPHY: No, that is not the law, I beg my hon. friend's pardon. Now, in connection with another department—in regard to which my hon. friend could get information from one of his colleagues—an incident happened, something similar to the one we are discussing, and my fear is that instead of having regard for the duties attaching to this position, and for the good that may be done by the person occupying it, there is danger that certain qualifications may be drafted which, like a suit of clothes or a hat or a pair of boots, will fit only one particular person, so that nobody else, no matter how much better qualified, may obtain the position. Hence my curiosity.

Mr. CALDER: That did not occur here, surely.

Mr. MURPHY: I hope not. I am curious to know why nobody was appointed out of these dozen applicants and why the position is to be re-advertised. The fact that my hon. friend says he does not know anything about the matter merely increases my suspicion that some busybodies—with whom long residence in Ottawa makes us fairly familiar, no matter which Government is in power—have been at work. In another department a job—not to put too fine a point upon it—has been "framed up" for a person who is not even a resident of this country, and the qualifications have been so drawn that they just apply to this particular person and nobody else "would have a look in." Now, that is the point of my inquiry, and that is why I would like my hon. friend to obtain more details about this particular appointment than he seems to be in possession of to-day.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I should like to be permitted to make one general observation. My hon. friend the minister, in a statement which I described at the time as very interesting, mentioned a "vigorous immigration policy," and he mentioned it for the purpose of putting a question to the committee: "What is a vigorous immigration policy?" I am not sure that the minister got anybody to tell him what was a vigorous immigration policy. His speech, as I pointed out at the time, was rather non-committal and it was non-committal on that point also. He indicated certain lines along which his policy would be vigorous, and he pointed out that his decisions along such lines would be flatly moved against by the governments of the countries in Europe where he was operating. Now, so far as the minister is opposed to what may popularly be considered a vigorous immigration policy, I am in agreement with him. I do not think that we need in Canada to-day a vigorous immigration policy. I hold very strong views upon this point. I have been nearly twenty years in Canada and I have profound faith in its possibilities for men and women who are worth having as citizens, and I hold the view that if this country is properly ruled—I am not now going into what I mean by that phrase: I will take an early opportunity of explaining my observations along that line, possibly in the Budget debate—if this country were properly ruled we should have a policy of immigration which was vigorous in the matter of effectiveness because every satisfied settler would be an immigration agent without salary. In short, that is my view on this matter. I think if we could send it out to the world, as we might very well be able to do, having regard to the gifts which Providence and nature have put in our hands, that Canada is the best country and the cheapest country and the country of greatest opportunity in the world to-day, we would get the very best classes of immigrants and get them very cheaply. Now I have said enough to indicate that if the minister himself is really opposed to a vigorous policy, I am in agreement with him. But when you come to analyze this question of vigorous immigration policy; when you come to analyze the word "vigorous," you might very well, as I have indicated, apply the word to an immigration policy if it was effective in getting good immigrants. But there is a vigorous side to the minister's policy—a very vigorous side, and it is a most unhealthy vigour because it is along the line of expense. I note that in these details of civil government, while the minister is actually restricting the immigration—and I think wisely; with regard to the general policy of his department I am agreed—there is an increase of $50,000 in the items of civil government over those of the previous year. I have tried to make my point of view clear: that if we have a non-vigorous policy with regard to the pushing of the advantages of Canada, then we should not have this vigour in expenditure. We preach economy and we all profess to believe in it, but I want to bring to bear upon the mind of the minister as one member of the Government—not wanting him to carry any more than his own particular share of the burden—that if we are going to economize in the expenditure of public money we have to begin somewhere. I would like to hear how the minister accounts for an increase of $50,000 in civil government alone. Altogether I think the department are spending about $2,000,000, and the department is a new one, created since the war. If we are going on extending our expenditures in this way, we may talk economy theoretically as long as we like, but we are rapidly running the country into a position of virtual insolvency. I have the utmost sympathy with the ministry with regard to how they are going to raise taxation in the coming Budget. I know their unparalleled efforts in the war, along with the unparalleled efforts of our people; no one has a higher appreciation of what Canada did in the war, and for all the expenses that the minister has been run into on that account I offer no criticism. But this is a different matter, and I submit to the minister that the last form in which he should be vigorous is in the form of expenditure in connection with a department which does not think it should pursue a vigorous policy along other lines.

Mr. CALDER: I shall deal now with only one or two of the points raised by my hon. friend. In the first place, I did not say the other day when I was addressing the House that I was opposed to the adoption of a vigorous immigration policy.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): No, my hon. friend was non-committal. He did not know what it was, so he could not say it.

Mr. CALDER: I stated that during the last two or three years the department and the Goverment had exercised all the power and influence it could to get certain classes of people into this country and that in that respect we were acting as vigorously and as energetically as we could. I would like to make that perfectly clear, in the first place. I stated, as well, that we were opposed to certain classes of people coming in at this time and that because of that the Government was put to a great deal of expense. I would say that fully half the work of the entire department in Ottawa has to do with all sorts of cases that arise in connection with people who are struggling to get into Canada. We have an enormous correspondence in that respect, a correspondence that must be taken care of. The hon. member for Red Deer would be the last to say that we should not have a sufficient staff here for that purpose. Again, there has been cast upon the Department of Immigration work that is entirely apart from any effort to get people into Canada. Let me give you a very simple illustration. This Parliament passed, not long ago, a new naturalization law. The Department of State, before it issues a certificate under that law, must know, in the case of every foreigner: when he came into Canada, where he entered, and, in general, whether the statements made in his application are true. As a consequence of that we have to keep complete and accurate records and have those records always readily available. We have had to change our whole system in that regard, and we have a staff constantly employed in furnishing that information to the Department of State. If we want to do away with that, well and good; if we want to have a repetition of the frauds that were committed in the past in connection with the issue of naturalization certificates, it would be very easy to do away with this work. I could cut down the expenditure by hundreds of thousands if this House would agree to it. Further: Some years ago Parliament turned over to the Department of Immigration the whole work of policing the entire border between Canada and the United States, for the purpose of keeping undesirable people out of the country. As a consequence of that, we have an expenditure of at least $500,000, if not $600,000 or $700,000, on account of this work alone. Thus it will be seen that our total expenditure, as shown in the Estimates for immigration, is not solely for the purpose of endeavouring to induce people to come in to Canada. Other duties and responsibilities have been thrown upon the department, which duties must be carried out as long as the law stands as it is. From my knowledge—and I think I have a fairly accurate knowledge—of the department, and the mass of detail work that must necessarily be carried out, I think I can say without fear of contradiction, that the Department of Immigration is not overstaffed. Many hon. members have some knowledge of the details of the work that is carried on in the department, and I am sure I am safe in stating that there are no unnecessary officials in that department. Where certain duties and responsibilities are thrown upon the department by statute, those duties must be carried out. It is most important that the mass of correspondence that reaches us from all parts of the country should be dealt with as promptly as possible. Since the beginning of this session, I have had instances with members of this House where some person was probably held up and debarred from entering Canada or another person was deported before there was an opportunity of dealing with the merits of the case, simply by reason of a short delay. It is necessary, therefore, that in the administration of a department like the Immigration Department, where you are dealing with the rights and obligations of individuals—their right to come in or the need of rejecting them—a sufficient staff should be on hand to enable the department to carry on the work as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. DAVIS: What is the system by which regard is kept of American immigration to Canada, and of immigration from Canada to the United States? It has been stated by the United States authorities that there is a very considerable difference between their records and ours, much to our disadvantage, and it seems to me there is a flaw, in that connection, either in their records or in ours. Perhaps the minister can offer some explanation.

Mr. CALDER: That is another case, where, if the House desires that information, it can be very easily arranged for. All that would be necessary would be simply to duplicate our staff, and instead of spending only five or six hundred thousand dollars on border work, to spend another five or six hundred thousand dollars to keep tab on people who are leaving Canada.

Mr. DAVIS: Is that what the Americans do?

Mr. CALDER: They check everything going in. As regards people who are coming in to Canada as immigrants, to study in Canada, every one of those must fill out a card giving all particulars regarding himself, his birth, etc. Those are recorded here and kept on file for reference. If we are to provide measures that would keep a check on all people going out of Canada, that would simply mean duplicating our staff. We have just a sufficient staff to look after trains coming in and other means of entrance into Canada. Very few of our staff would be able to work on trains going out. Therefore, if we are to have reliable information as to the number of people leaving Canada permanently, we would have practically to duplicate that staff. Does the committee desire that an expenditure of three, four or five hundred thousand dollars should be made for that purpose? We have not attempted up to the present time to keep any record of that class.

Mr. JACOBS: We have given some figures to the public as to the number of Canadians who have left the country, and those figures do not tally with the figures given by the United States authorities.

Mr. CALDER: When were they given out?

Mr. JACOBS: About three months ago.

Mr. MURPHY: As I understand the minister's answer to the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis), if that gentleman or any other gentleman wanted information as to the number of people leaving Canada for the United States, that information could be got only from the American authorities.

Mr. CALDER: That is all;

Mr. MURPHY: We would, therefore, be dependent upon them for the accuracy of the figures.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that not sufficient? Surely the Americans will not cook their figures with regard to Canadians entering that country. Why spend half a million dollars to find out how many went out of Canada, if we can get that information from the Americans?

Mr. CALDER: That depends on the method by which their records are kept.

Mr. JACOBS: I presume they keep good records.

Mr. CALDER: Then, I presume we can depend upon their records.

Mr. DAVIS: I understand the Americans have a system of keeping track of incoming and outgoing persons, and their figures differ by many thousands from ours. What is wrong with our method of checking? Or what is wrong with theirs?

Mr. CALDER: I could not, of course, explain the matter without knowing how they keep their records. I know that on the whole, our records can be taken as being accurate. Supposing, however, a man is coming in from the United States, travelling on a train. He has a grip with him. The immigration officer sees him, and the man says: "I am going up to Canada only for a visit." As a matter of fact, he is coming into Canada permanently. He is simply lying, and he stays in Canada. That man is not recorded, because he did not tell the truth to our officer. As regards all persons coming into Canada from the United States or abroad, if they will tell the truth when they are coming in, their statements are recorded accurately, and we know exactly the number of immigrants. I use the word "immigrant" as applying to a person coming to Canada for the first time to stay in Canada, and our figures as regards the number of immigrants are, on the whole, accurate. There may be a number who slip past our officers and who continue to stay in Canada, whom we do not catch at all. There may be some who state that they are coming in to stay, who do not stay, but who leave Canada within a short period, and in that respect, our figures will be inaccurate. These things cannot be controlled.

Mr. DAVIS: The substance of the minister's statement is that he does not know what the American system is by which they get different results from ours.

Mr. CALDER: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: Salaries of agents and employees—

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): The minister stated that our immigration officials work on the trains. If they worked on a train going one way—

The CHAIRMAN: The work and salaries of agents and employees in the Outside Service are included in the item which the Chairman has been attempting to place before the committee. Hon. members persist in discussing this matter on the item now before the committee, and in doing so, they are not in order. If the hon. member will permit me to read the next item, his question will be perfectly in order.

Mr. DAVIS: The fault, in a sense, is mine and not that of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid). I understood that this was an item by which the immigration staff kept their records. That is what we are inquiring about and, therefore, the discussion distinctly comes under the item which we are considering. The minister, at least, referred to it in that sense.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Neepawa was quite in order, because his question related to the keeping of the records at Ottawa. Immediately after the question had been asked, the discussion wandered to the work of agents and employees at the border and the manner in which the statistics are kept. All that comes under item No. 52. The question was quite in order, but the subsequent discussion was not relevant.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): As regards your ruling, Sir, may I appeal to your leniency just a little by reminding you of the fact that the Immigration Estimates have taken a rather peculiar course? When the minister introduced his Estimates, he made a very long and most interesting statement, and he appealed to the committee for a debate; in fact, he rather courted a debate upon his statements. And, then, very suddenly, at a certain period of the evening, he withdrew his Estimates in the middle of the debate which he himself had started. As far as I know, that debate has not been continued, and I should very respectfully suggest that perhaps a little liberty should be allowed to us in view of the peculiar course the debate has taken, and that the minister should not be altogether baulked in his wish to have his own mind broadened by communications of reasonable length from the committee in regard to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman, of course, is entirely in the hands of the committee, and if it is the unanimous desire of the committee that the debate should be continued and that the questions and answers should be of a general nature and relate to all subjects that could properly be discussed under the Estimates of the Department of Immigration, the Chairman certainly has no objection, but as we are starting a new day, and no mention of the debate had been made, the Chairman felt it his duty to keep the committee to the respective items under consideration.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. CALDER: I would like to suggest that if this item be allowed to pass, the next vote is a general one, covering all our Outside Services, and it would give the widest latitude for discussion. The next vote is of such a nature as to open up the whole subject.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I did not mean anything so wicked as to re-open the whole debate. I am sure the minister does not take me for an obstructionist, but I think a few remarks that are perhaps a little wide of the item under discussion should be allowed. We shall get on all right.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I was not going to ask a question, but to make an explanation. I would not have asked my question if the minister had not mentioned the matter. What I had intended to do was to state to the House that I had before me the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States, which sets forth the number of immigrants we lose to the United States, but if it is not in order to bring that matter up now, and I shall have an opportunity later, I shall bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like some information with regard to the salary of the Exhibit Decorator. Last year he was down at $900, and this year he is down at $1,320. Who and what is the Exhibit Decorator? What are his duties?

Mr. CALDER: He is one of the officials of the Exhibition Branch of the department. It appears that this man was appointed under the old regulations as a member of the Inside Service at Ottawa; otherwise, he would appear in the Estimates with the rest of the exhibition staff. There has grown up some old practice that I could never quite get to the bottom of, that if a man was once appointed to the Inside Service at Ottawa, there was always a struggle to retain him in the Estimates. This man is a decorator. I presume that his time is occupied in arranging display exhibits, which require a certain amount of painting or fixing up.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand that we want to decorate and exhibit our immigrants? I do not understand exactly what his duties are.

Mr. CALDER: There is an Exhibition Branch in the department. It was formerly in the Department of Agriculture, but has been transferred to the Immigration Department. It has a staff of about five or six.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Exhibits, I suppose, such as they have at the Windsor station, Montreal?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. The time of the staff is spent in arranging exhibits on a small scale. The staff has prepared exhibits for 100 state and county fairs in the United States, if I am not mistaken, and it has also prepared a good many small exhibits for what they call the one-day fairs in Great Britain.

Mr. JACOBS: This man's salary has been raised from $900 to $1,320.

Mr. CALDER: That is about the average increase; about 50 per cent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Personally, I approve of this expenditure. I have seen some of the exhibits that have been prepared by this staff at the various exhibitions in Europe in which Canada has taken part. I particularly remember the one at Brussels. The Canadian exhibit there was certainly the sensation of the exhibition. It consisted of the reproduction of a farm in Western Canada, with all the necessary appurtenances, and if there were not ten or fifteen thousand people around that exhibit every day, there was not one. It was certainly the feature of that great exhibition. We have on a smaller scale an exhibit of somewhat the same nature at the Canadian Pacific Railway's Windsor Station, Montreal. These exhibits certainly appeal to the would-be immigrant. In London, England, the Canadian Immigration Office, near the statue of Charles the First, in Charing Cross, has exhibits which are most attractive to the people. You can never pass by without seeing a crowd of people in front of the exhibits, making comments on the happiness that awaits those who come to this country.

Mr. JACOBS: If they can get in.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to ask the minister a question regarding the inspectors of British Immigration. Are those inspectors located in Canada or in Great Britain? It seems to me that in view of the large number of immigrants coming to this country from the British Isles, the proper place to have them examined would be at the ports in Great Britain. Why should you force an immigrant to cross the Atlantic, only to be rejected at Quebec, Halifax or St. John? There might be difficulties in having our own agents at ports in foreign countries, such as Holland, Italy or Austria, although there should not be any very great difficulty even there, but certainly as regards Great Britain I think our inspectors, and particularly our medical inspectors, should be located at the chief ports on the other side, and there pass definitely on who should be admitted to this country. It seems cruel to let an immigrant cross the ocean, detain him at the port of entry, and ship him back to the Old Country, when the whole thing could be avoided if the examination were made on the other side. I repeat, it might be a little more difficult to adopt this system in foreign countries, but surely arrangements could be made for having the examination of British immigrants take place at ports in Great Britain.

Mr. CALDER: This is a matter that has been up for discussion many times. Personally, I should like very much to see the suggestion that has been made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) carried out. But I can assure the committee that it bristles with many difficulties. I fear that if we undertook to carry on all the inspectional work that would be necessary on the other side the Government would have to come to the House again for another item of probably $200,000 or $300,000 in order to meet the expenses that would be involved. The Australian colonies tried that method and dropped it because they found it was very expensive and unsatisfactory. We have tried partially to meet the situation, and when I was overseas this year I took the matter up with the officials of the British Government as well as with our own officials there. We have sent representatives from the Health Department to Great Britain and they have got in close touch with the medical officers of the Board of Trade, who play a part in this work, as well as with the medical officers of the steamship companies. Many conferences have been held, and the medical officers over there have received information which they never had before in regard to the working out of our law and the requirements thereof. In addition to that we have given our agents on the other side authority, to a limited extent, to make use of the medical practitioners in Great Britain for the purpose of preliminary examination. As a result of these two actions

I am inclined to think that a good deal of the hardship that has prevailed in the past will be obviated. My officers tell me that since the visits of our medical officers to British ports—the first visit was made about six months ago—the number of hardship cases has been materially reduced, and I believe that if our work proceeds along that line there will not be as much difficulty as there has been in the past.

Item agreed to.

Salaries of Agents and Employees, Outside Service; Canada, $425,000, Great Britain and Europe $115,000, United States $80,000, $620,000.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): In regard to the number of immigrants which we have lost to the United States, I have collected certain statistics which I desire to give to the committee.

The following figures are taken from the Annual Report, for the year 1920, of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States:

	Year ending June 30 1918-19	1919-20
United States to Canada—
United States citizens ..	30,223	36,511
Canadian citizens..	9,765	7,953
Other aliens..	4.015	4,160
Total..	44,003	48,624
Canada to United States—
United States citizens ..	22,441	19,504
Canadian citizens..	44,110	72,994
Other aliens..	29,524	51,345
Total..	96,075	143,843
Total immigration from United States..	44,003	48,624
Total emigration, Canada to United States..	96,075	143,843
Net loss to Canada..	52,072	95,219

I do not know why the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States is not to be found in the Library of Parliament. It is an important volume and should be available. I would direct the attention of the minister to a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press which I shall read. It was handed to me on the train, when I was returning from the West during the Easter recess, by an English medical doctor who has been travelling in Canada. This gentleman, whose card I have, is Dr. Charles Hawkins, and the cable despatch from London, dated March 31, which he brought to my attention, reads:

The Canadian steamship companies here say that they are receiving from 12 to 15 cancellations daily for passages to Canada, which have been booked by prospective emigrants from the British Isles, the reason given being the continuation of the restriction requiring the increased amount of landing money, which was recently decided upon by the Canadian cabinet. The Canadian immigration authorities here are said to favor this action in so far as it affects continental immigration, but it would appear that it might well be modified in the case of Britishers. It hits hardest those who had booked their passages and made their arrangements before the landing money requirement was altered. Now some of these people find that they cannot go and hence are cancelling their passages daily, much to the discomfiture of the Canadian railway and steamship companies.

Dr. Hawkins told me that he had positive knowledge of a great many immigrants who were cancelling their passages to Canada and who he assured me were agriculturists and farm labourers. Instead of coming to Canada they were re-booking their passages to Australia. I see the minister smiles; no doubt he knows all about it. Well, if such is the case, I think it is most unfortunate that we should lose immigrants of this class. In my opinion, if the British agriculturist and farm labourer have not even $25 in their possession we should welcome them.

Mr. CALDER: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I can save the time of the committee. The $250 that we require of immigrants is not asked for in the case of agriculturists and agricultural labourers. No farmer, farm labourer, or domestic coming to Canada is required to have $250.

Mr. CRERAR: To what class does the regulation apply?

Mr. CALDER: To skilled and unskilled labour, particularly the artisan class.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): May I ask then how this information has got abroad?

Mr. CALDER: You see some funny things in the press at times.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I have this gentleman's card here and he assures me this is quite correct.

Mr. CALDER: He was absolutely mistaken.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I must take the minister's word and I am glad to hear him make the statement. I was very much surprised at what was told me. There is another matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the minister. I have here a booklet published by J. Obed Smith in which he makes the statement that immigrants coming to Canada cost us $6 per head. Does the minister confirm that statement?

Mr. CALDER: I should put it for last year at $5.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): That is a very low figure, but does the minister deduct the emigrants that we lose to the United States? That would make a different showing altogether, would it not? Mr. Smith, our immigrant official in the Old Country, makes some very good recommendations in the booklet to which I have already referred, which no doubt the minister has read. Mr. Smith states that after our immigrants land at the port of debarkation the train accommodation is very often not what it ought to be. I know that thirty-nine years ago the accommodation on the railway was not what it should have been and I speak from experience. Mr. Smith also recommends that on every one of our immigration cars, usually known as colonist cars, an official should be placed, and I think the recommendation is a very good one. Perhaps the minister will see what can be done in that direction so that our immigrants shall not be preyed upon at very many stations where they stop to purchase goods. Furthermore, when our immigrants reach the city of Winnipeg they are turned loose very often. I would like to ask the minister if he has any policy whereby the immigrants can be taken care of from the time they leave the port of debarkation until they reach their destination—whether they are going to work for some farmer or whether they are going to locate right away on land either purchased or homesteaded. Does not the minister think some improvement can be effected along the line of taking care of our immigrants, something of a similar nature to that which has been adopted by the Soldier Settlement Board?

Mr. CALDER: I would be only too glad to put into operation a whole series of improvements I have in mind along these lines. No person comprehends the necessity or value of that more than I do; but again I would say that these things cost money. On the one hand you have members of Parliament complaining most bitterly of the increased cost of government, the increased expenditures, and so on. There are very many improvements that could be made in many departments of government but, I say again, they cost money. Now to put into being an organization that will look after the immigrant who comes into Canada, in every province of the Dominion, follow him up, see that he is placed, and all that sort of thing, would mean a staff of one hundred or probably one hundred and fifty. These people scatter all over the Dominion, and to follow them through on every train, see that they are properly placed on farms, in factories, and elsewhere, see if they are contented, and all that sort of thing, would necessitate a staff of one hundred or one hundred and fifty and the cost to the country for salaries alone would reach probably $150,000 or $200,000. A very good thing—very helpful and good for the immigrant and for Canada—but, I say again, it costs money. If the House is prepared to vote the money for such a purpose, and for other work as well, I would be only too glad.

Mr. JACOBS: Better to spend money for that purpose than to give it to the provinces to spend for roads.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): As a business proposition I would draw the minister's attention to the larger flow of immigrants from Canada to the United States as compared with the flow of immigrants from the United States to Canada. The net loss for the year 1918-19 was in round numbers 52,000, and for the year 1919-20 approximately 95,000. If these immigrants only cost us $5 or $6 a head they are well worth keeping in the country, especially when we realize the high value placed by the Canadian Pacific Railway on a farmer or immigrant who settles along any of its lines of railway.

Mr. CALDER: I am not going to question the figures given by my hon. friend—they have been discussed backwards and forwards every year for the past ten years. There would be only one way probably of finding out the truth and that is by the census. When the census is taken we will know exactly what the figures are—we will have our immigration figures for the last ten years, and we shall know as to whether or not these figures are correct. Looking at the position in Canada to-day, in so far as the urban population is concerned, does my hon. friend mean to say there has been a decrease in that population? There is no city in Canada that is not overcrowded to the extent that people cannot get houses to live in. Take the situation as regards the rural population of Canada. There have been here and there certain decreases; but I doubt very much if, on the whole, the rural population of Canada has decreased in the last decade. I say that on the whole you will find places where there has been some decrease, I daresay there has been a change in the proportion between the rural and the urban population; but if you will take our total rural populations as shown at the last census I doubt very much, when we ascertain what the new figures are, if you will find any material discrepancy there.

Mr. JACOBS: There is the natural increase.

Mr. CALDER: I think it will be found that there is a very material increase.

Mr. JACOBS: I said there has been a natural increase.

Mr. CALDER: Oh, more than the natural increase because you can estimate that. As regards our urban population, our cities, throughout Canada from coast to coast, are simply teeming with people—they simply cannot find places to live in. So I say, there is only one way eventually whereby we will be able to check up these increases and that is through the census in both countries.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I wish to ask the minister whether he, as Minister of Immigration, and the Government, have considered a vigorous immigration policy whereby selected immigrants may be placed along the line of the national railways and if so has he anything to say with regard to it?

Mr. CAHILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. CALDER: Of course our whole policy, in so far as agriculturists are concerned, is to bring as many of that class as possible to Canada. We have not, I may say, directed our attention to placing these people along the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern railways here in Ontario—that has not been done.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not?

Mr. CALDER: That has not been done with the exception of certain people who came from the eastern part of the United States, a number of French Canadians, who are being repatriated. Many of them have gone up into those northern regions, but outside of that we have not directed our attention along those particular lines.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I did not mean particularly along the lines of railway in the province of Ontario; I had reference to the western provinces also. Would not such a policy be worthy of the serious consideration of the Government?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, I think so.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I would like to draw the minister's attention to the work done in the early eighties by the colonization companies in the western provinces, or what at that time the North West Territories. I was one of the immigrants who settled upon the land as a result of colonization work of this kind, and I know that these companies did very good work indeed. Of course some of them were not a success; but the York Farmers' Colonization Company, of which the minister has no doubt heard, occupied itself with settlement in the Yorkton district. Such a company as that was a very great benefit to the settlers, and its local agent helped them in the purchase of their supplies. Such a company as that was of very great benefit to the settlers. They were also given local land agents, and the settlers were able to make their homestead entries right in the township where they made their selection. I know of some immigrants who settled outside what was at that time known as the Yorkton land district, and they had to go all the way to Regina, or Pile o'Bones, as it was known then, to make their entries, a distance of 135 miles. If some such scheme as that was evolved, I am sure that benefits would result in our favour. Just a word about our immigration officials who work on the trains. I presume they meet the trains at the border coming in from the United States. They must travel back on the trains, say, from Winnipeg as one point, to meet the trains again. If they worked on the trains incoming, why could they not check up the people on the outgoing trains? That may be possible.

Mr. CRERAR: Can my hon. friend give the figures of the total immigration during the last decade?

Mr. CALDER: I gave figures to the House for the five-year periods from 1896 down to 1911, then for the three following years and for the last three years. Those figures will all be found in Hansard.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall look them up.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I should like to take advantage on this item, Mr. Chairman, of the invitation extended by the minister to discuss generally the question of immigration and to put forward certain views which I hold and which I believe are held by a great many people in this country. Immigration is a very large question, for the reason that some nine million of us occupy a country which is over three million seven hundred thousand square miles in area, and we are distributed in a most extraordinary fashion, for we occupy a ribbon of territory not more than 300 miles wide at any point stretching from coast to coast. And this great country is capable of maintaining without difficulty a population of two or three hundred million people. If we are to become a great nation we must have population. On the other hand, many people regard unrestricted immigration, particularly of foreigners, with grave apprehension. The question is viewed from four standpoints—the sentimental, the patriotic, the humanitarian, and the material. While some hold that it is dangerous to allow too many foreigners to come in, there are others who take the humanitarian view that we have no right to restrict immigration into a country of such vast area and such boundless natural resources, especially while other countries are overcrowded and congested. And there are those who take the material point of view, that for the purpose of exploiting our resources and developing the country the more immigrants we bring in the better. A variety of causes superinduce immigration, being chiefly the following: industrial depression, political oppression, religious persecution, poverty at home, and prosperity here, the solicitation of friends and relations here, employment agencies, facility of transport, solicitation of steamship companies, assisted emigration, and epidemics.

In considering the people who come to this country of foreign blood, we have to consider them in the light of possible amalgamation in the future or immediate assimilation. Amalgamation is defined as that process which occurs when, by reason of proximity, nations grow together by intermarriage, a process which takes hundreds of years. The best example of this is perhaps the British race itself, the last immigrants having arrived in the British Isles somewhere about 1066. The process of amalgamation has gone forward steadily and as a result a type has been produced. We are not particularly concerned for the next two or three hundred years at least with the process of amalgamation, but we are concerned with the process of assimilation, which is defined as that process whereby immigrants may learn to speak our language, understand our customs, and the working of our political machinery, whereby they may take their places with us upon terms of equality. But it may be laid down that the process of assimilation is rendered slow and difficult or quick and easy precisely in the proportion which the foreign element bears to the British element. That, I think, is fairly obvious. If we have one foreigner living among four men of British blood,—surrounded, so to speak, by men of the British race—the process of assimilation will be quick and easy; but if we have, say, two foreigners, to three men of British blood the process is slower, and the number that can be assimilated is necessarily smaller, until the time might come when by the increase of the percentage of persons of foreign birth the process of Canadianization might come to a standstill, and that of "foreignization" might begin.

I recognize the virtues of the foreigners who have come to us in the past, particularly those who settled upon the western prairies and who came to us with practically nothing but their ability to work. They have made a great success, they have increased agricultural production, and they are slowly but surely climbing up the social and cultural ladder. But there are certain statistics which cannot be denied, and I desire to place them upon Hansard because I believe they are worthy of study by our people. I will take first the immigration between the years 1900 and 1910, arranged to show the immigration of the British born and the foreign born, with the total and the percentages thereof. These are the figures:

Year	British born	Foreign born	Total
1900..	5,141	18,754	23,895
1901..	18,810	37,339	56,149
1902..	17,259	50,120	67,379
1903..	41,792	86,572	128,364
1904..	50,374	79,957	130,331
1905..	65,359	80,907	146,266
1906..	86,796	102,268	189,064
1907..	55,791	68,876	124,667
1908..	120,182	142,287	262,469
1909..	52,901	94,007	146,908
1910..	59,790	149,004	208,794
	574,195	910,091	1,484,286

Now, that immigration had a certain effect upon the population of this country. I have obtained from the Dominion Statistician the figures as to the number of persons in Canada of British descent, French descent and foreign descent, in 1901 and 1911 respectively. They are as follows:

	1901 Per cent	1911 Per cent
British descent..	57.03	54,08
French descent..	30.71	28.51
Foreign descent..	14.46	17.40

In other words, during that decade the number of persons in Canada of British descent fell three points; the number of persons in Canada of French descent fell two points, and the number of persons of foreign descent increased by something like 4 per cent.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the hon. member any statistics with regard to people of Canadian descent?

Mr. GRIESBACH: The Dominion statistics give only, as a matter of policy I believe, the racial descent of the individual. I give the figures as furnished to me by the Chief Statistician. I will now read the figures of immigration for each of the years in the following decade, from 1911 to 1920. In this case the number of immigrants from the United States each year is shown:

Year	British Isles	United States	Other Countries	Totals
1911.. ..	123,013	121,451	66,620	311,084
1912.. ..	128,121	133,710	82,406	354,237
1913.. ..	150,542	139,009	112,881	402,432
1914.. ..	142,622	107,530	134,726	384,878
1915.. ..	43,276	59,779	41,734	144,789
1916.. ..	8,664	36,937	2,936	48,537
1917.. ..	8,282	61,389	5,703	75,374
1918.. ..	3,178	71,314	4,582	79,074
1919.. ..	9,914	40,715	7,073	57,702
1920.. ..	59,603	49,656	8,077	117,336
	687,215	821,490	466,738	1,975,443

The totals show: British immigration 687,215; foreign immigration 1,288,228; total, 1,975,443 or 32 per cent British and 68 per cent foreign. Contrasting these figures with those of the previous decade, which showed a falling off in the numbers of persons of British and French descent and a substantial increase in the number of persons of foreign descent, it is reasonable to assume that the census of 1921 will disclose that there has been a still further falling off of the British element in this country with a very substantial increase of the foreign element.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Of course my hon. friend recognizes that the war was a potent influence in producing the results shown by his figures.

Mr. GRIESBACH: Quite so, I am not discussing now the cause; I am merely pointing out the result. I should like to read in this connection an extract from a book entitled "Races and Immigrants in America" by John R. Commons, page 198, where he quotes Francis A. Walker, the leading American statistician of his time, and superintendent of the census of 1870 and 1880. He said:

"Foreign immigration into this country has, from the time it first assumed large proportions, amounted not to a reinforcement of our population, but a replacement of native by foreign stock. The American shrank from the industrial competition thus thrust upon him. He was unwilling himself to engage in the lowest kind of day labour with these new elements of population; he was even more unwilling to bring sons and daughters into the world to enter into that competition. The more rapidly foreigners came into the United States, the smaller was the rate of increase, not merely among the native population separately, but throughout the population of the country as a whole," including the descendants of the earlier foreign immigrants.

I should like to read also an extract from a book on "Immigration and its Effects upon the United States," by Prescott F. Hall, in which he states at page 176:

A democracy, to be a success—and we are trying it here on a hitherto unprecedented scale—depends on the intelligence of the average citizen. Wherever civic intelligence and initiative are low, democracy becomes impossible and oligarchy or an empire takes its place. The United States has had to suffer and is still suffering untold miseries from the reckless introduction for purposes of material gain of an alien people, to wit, the African negro.

The same arguments were used for the admission of negro slaves that are now used for the admission of the cheapest European and Asiatic labour. Wherever a superior and an inferior race are brought together, one must rule; and one will withdraw itself socially and politically from the other. When this happens universal democracy ceases to exist, and no amount of preaching the rights of men or any other theoretical considerations will modify the result. As Professor Shaler has said, this result has already happened in the South; and in the North, society is beginning to experience a social stratification which is breaking up its formal homogeneity, and, as we saw above, is affecting profoundly the matter of race survival.

I read these extracts in connection with the figures that I have just read, in order to point out that there is a real danger of the submersion of the civilization for which we stand, the institutions which we hold to, by the introduction through immigration of people who do not understand our language, who do not understand our customs, who know nothing of our traditions and who have borne no part in the creation of those traditions.

But in addition to that there are some other facts that are well worthy of the consideration of the committee. I have in my hand some statistics supplied to me by the Dominion Statistician on April 26, last, in which he gives me convictions by birthplaces in 1913. He gives me the population and three crimes, with all indictable offences lumped together. The population by birthplaces is for 1911, but the statistics are for 1913. These are the figures:

Convictions by Birth Places, 1913.

Population by Birth Places 1911		Murder	Attempted Murder	Manslaughter	All Indictable Offences
Born in Canada..	5,619,682	5	6	16	7,619
Born in British Isles..	784,526	8	2	3	2,983
Born in other British possessions.	29,188	..	1	..	87
Born in United States	303,680	1	7	3	1,216
Born in other foreign countries ..	449,052	9	13	18	2,674

These figures work out in this way. The British and Canadian-born represent 6,433,396 of the population, and he foreign-born, 752,732. The foreign-born in 1913 constituted 13 per cent of the whole population, and that 13 per cent of our population supplied us with 34 per cent of the crime for that year.

These are further statistics supplied to me by the Dominion Statistician on April 26, 1921, for crime in Canada for the decade from 1911 to 1921:

	Percentage of population	Percentage of crime
Canadian and British-born in Canada...	89	74.5
Foreign-born in Canada..	11	25.5
	100	100.0

Penitentiary Population 1904.
Annual Report, Inspector of Penitentiaries, Sessional Paper No 34A 1905.

	Population Per cent	Penitentiary population	Per cent
Canadian and British-born..	89	1,094	82
Foreign-born	11	234	18
	100	1,328	100

If these figures had stood by themselves without referring to any other country, one might have looked for certain contributory causes; but I have taken the trouble to go into American statistics on the same subject, and I find, in reading from Prescott F. Hall's book on "Immigration, and its Effects upon the United States," page 147, that these statistics are given for five decades:

Decade	Native-born in population Per cent	Native-born Criminals Per cent	Foreign-born in population Per cent	Moreign-born Criminals Per cent
1850	90.32	64.21	9.08	35.79
1860	86.84	53.14	13.16	46.86
1870	85.56	73.47	14.44	26.53
1880	86,68	78.15	13.32	21.85
1890	85.23	79.91	14.77	20.09

It is to be noted that the percentage of criminality increases in native-born and decreases in foreign-born. At first glance one would say that that was a healthy sign in the foreigner. His percentage of population creeps up in that period from 9.08 per cent to 14.77 per cent, and his percentage of crime falls off in that period from 35.79 per cent to 20.09 per cent. The point I wish to make, however, by these statistics is that the foreign-born population in each generation is being absorbed into the native-born population of the United States, and it is having its effect there. This is manifested by the fact that in 1850, 90 per cent of the native-born population had 64 per cent of the criminality. That native-born population had decreased in 1890 to 85 per cent and the criminality had increased to 79.91 per cent, showing, in my belief, that the population of the United States has been strongly affected in the matter of criminality by the introduction of this foreign element into the native stock.

The statistics with regard to charitable institutions, hospitals and lunatic asylums bear a class ratio, not only in Canada, but in the United States. In a report from the United States Commissioner General of Immigration, for 1906, at page 62, these facts are stated: In 1900 in the United States, the foreign-born population was 14 per cent of the whole. In 1904, they supplied to public penal, reformatory and charitable institutions of the United States 28 per cent of the inmates. In other words, the tendency of the foreign-born to crime is twice as great as that of the native-born.

I spoke a moment ago of the introduction of these people and their gradual assimilation amongst us, and the profound effect which that must have upon us and our institutions. It has a political effect, in that the towns dominate the country, and in the United States 18 out of 37 of their larger cities are to-day dominated by the foreign-born. According to statistics in last night's press report there are 2,000,000 foreign-born people in New York, the percentage of foreign-born in that city being 34 per cent.

There has been some discussion of a policy of immigration, and as to the cost of immigration, and so on. I believe it will be admitted by all concerned that our problem is not a problem of getting people to come here, for the whole world is willing to come to Canada if it can get here; our problem is cautiously to admit those who are fit to come here. In an article by Kenneth L. Roberts in the Saturday Evening Post of a few days ago, there is a long discussion of the situation in Europe, and its effect on immigration to the United States: I am told that the United States has just recently passed a law, or is about to pass a law, restricting the number of immigrants admitted to that country to 365,000 per year. There can be only two forms of restriction; restriction by numbers, and restriction by classification or qualification. It may happen, and it probably will, that restriction by classification or qualification will in the end produce numbers that we did not expect, and that we shall be unable to deal with. I shall just read the concluding paragraphs of this article I have referred to.

"All of the lines", he told me early in 1921, "are preparing for greatly increased emigrant business. In the spring they are going to tap new districts for passengers. They are preparing additional emigrant hotel, barrack and quarannttine-station facilities. These preparations are based on urgent messages from their agents in all the countries.

"As soon as Germany and Austria are opened for emigration the present flood will be greatly increased. When Russia is opened, then will come the deluge. The people who are coming are the lowest type of humanity that Europe can send. America has got to keep them out or suffer bitterly in the future."

Americans in Europe are warning their country against the classe of people that are pouring into it, just as they warned it that typhus would break out if a strict quarantine was not imposed. They know the situation, and every word of their warnings is true.

The warnings can never be made strong enough, because of the gravity of the situation and the limitations of the English language.

If no emergency exists for America in respect of immigration, the America that exists to-day is vastly different from the America of ten years ago.

In other parts of the article the writer goes on to describe the mental, moral and physical condition of these millions of people who are clamouring to get to this country if that be possible.

As a result of a study of these figures, I have reached certain conclusions. As I said at the outset, the process of amalgamation does not interest us at the moment. What we are interested in is the process of assimilation. I have adverted to the danger of bringing to this country people unacquainted with our system of government, with our institutions and our ideas, and placing our resources and the control of government in their hands. That is a project that is fraught with danger, and my view is this: I think we ought to fix a definite ratio, based on statistics, and we ought no to exceed that ratio. We can restrict either by numbers or by classification and qualification, but no matter by which method we seek to accomplish our end, the Government should have power arbitrarily to decide the moment when that limit is reached, and thereafter we should stand fast and deal with the situation as we have it, until it is dealt with completely. In the determination of this ratio, and in the process of assimilation, we shall have to consider as factors whether we are going to continue the policy of the past, which is the policy of standing still and doing nothing to educate or assimilate the foreigner, or whether, on the other hand, we shall adopt some comprehensive scheme of education which will aid the process of assimilation. If we decide that we shall do no more than we have done in the past, then the ratio we shall decide upon will be a certain figure. On the other hand, if we decide that we will undertake the forced assimilation of the foreigner by a process of education, then, of course, we can raise the ratio or the standard of qualification which may be decided upon.

In my judgment, we cannot look forward to an increased foreign immigration, based upon the figures which I have given, without grave apprehension and misgiving. We cannot look forward to an increased foreign immigration with any degree of satisfaction unless, in the first place, it is controlled and restricted, and unless, in the second place, we adopt a great nation-wide, all-embracing system of education, backed by all the power of the State. Last year I discussed this question very briefly in passing, and now I would say that I know of no plan or scheme of education that has been put forward which will assist or aid in assimilation save one. The churches are practically powerless; our educational system gets us nowhere; there is no plan before this country except the one I have mentioned which begins to measure up to the magnitude or importance of the task. The system which I would lay before the committee—a conclusion which I have arrived at quite independently of the solution itself, and based merely on these figures—is the plan of universal military service which I laid before the House last year. There you have a scheme which is nation-wide, all-embracing, and backed by the supreme power of the State. From the operation of this system no person can escape. You would take your young foreigner at the age of 19, and at the ages of 19, 20, 21 and 22, four years, you would give him three months of military training each year, during which time he would learn to speak our language, keep himself clean, be obedient, and become disciplined. The duties of citizenship and its responsibilities would be impressed upon him, also the fact that he might some day be called upon to defend this country. There you have a system, and the only system that has been proposed, which I believe can adequately or effectively deal with this great problem of keeping the people of this country true to the ideals and traditions which have brought us thus far.

This is a great question. Our actions in this decade are more or less irrevocable. We cannot in this matter of the movement of people and population undo tomorrow what we may do to-day. Therefore, for the future happiness and greatness of this nation, let us hope that in this great matter we come to-day to a right conclusion.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister mentioned a few moments ago that he had been looking after colonization on the Transcontinental, and had expended a certain amount of money in the movement of French Canadians from the Eastern States and from the eastern part of the province of Quebec to the Transcontinental. I should like to ask the minister what part he has had in settling that section of the Transcontinental known as the Abitibi country. What assistance has he given to the colonization departments of the Quebec and Ontario Governments in locating settlers along the Transcontinental system in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec?

Mr. CALDER: We have not given any direct assistance. In the eastern part of the United States we have our agencies at two centres, Manchester and Biddeford, where there is a fairly large French Canadian population that has been there for some years. Our officers at those two points have been in touch with the people, and, while I do not know the exact details, I have no doubt that hundreds if not thousands of people have been induced to return to Canada, some of whom doubtless must have been directed to those regions in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the minister ever been to the Northern Quebec district?

Mr. CALDER: No.

Mr. CAHILL: I asked the minister last year if he would be good enough to make a visit to Northern Quebec and I think he promised me at that time that he would make an effort to do so. The Department of Immigration seems to be at a standstill; so far as colonization is concerned it certainly is absolutely stagnant. There is an opportunity in Northern Quebec, and in Northern Ontario as well, for the execution of a vigorous colonization policy as well as for active work in regard to immigration, for the figures which the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) has given are adverse to Canadian immigration. As the hon. member pointed out, we are losing more people than we are getting. We have been bringing in people for the last fifty years at a great cost to Canada, and we have not only lost every last man, woman and child of them, but we have also lost a portion of the Canadian people as well. We have lost more Canadians, either native born or those who came and settled in Canada, than we have brought to the country in that time, and the vital statistics will substantiate that statement. Within the last forty or fifty years, I venture to say, we have not retained our natural increase in Canadian population. There must be something wrong. In the period from 1901 to 1911 we made quite an advance in immigration and, as the minister is well aware, in colonization as well; but I do not believe we have made any progress in colonization since the close of that period, and we certainly made none previous to that time. During that period a policy was in vogue which aimed at bringing in to Canada, and putting on the land, all the people that we could get. But the Government since that time have adopted a different system. If the minister will go to the Abitibi country, as it is his duty to do, or, at least, if he will send his officials there to make a study of the conditions and the opportunities for settlement, he will be doing as good work for Canada as he can possibly do in any other direction. There is abundant opportunity in that district for the French Canadian settler to take up land, because the country appeals to him and he likes it. But he is not given a fair chance; he is not given the encouragement which he should have. The French Canadian is the only man that will settle in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec, and until we settle these districts our Transcontinental railway will be a failure.

Until you settle the great districts which are in need of population in Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces, you will continue to have railway difficulties. We have the land, the resources and the opportunities; all we need is a Minister of Immigration and Colonization with courage and foresight, a man who is anxious to bring people into the country and settle them on the land. The minister with such enterprise would render a great service to the country. But instead of that, the minister tells us, in so many words, that his time is taken up in keeping people out of the country; his remarks the other day were tantamount to that. There are thousands of people who want to come into Canada, but apparently the minister thinks it advisable to keep them out. He did not mention anything about a colonization policy, and in answer to an hon. member on the other side this afternoon, he made a statement to the effect that he had made no attempt at colonization in our northern country. The result of his policy and the general policy of the Government has been to drive people out of Canada. Every few days you may pick up the papers and find something about the Mennonites, or some other class of people in Western Canada, trying to locate elsewhere because they are not treated properly in Canada. They are living up to the understanding they had with the Government when they came in, but the Government of the day are not even attempting to fiulfil their end of the agreement. While it might not be desirable to bring in Mennonites, or Hutterites, or Doukhobors, or Galicians in numbers out of proportion to the balance of the population, yet I claim that they are good settlers and producers and would become good Canadians if given a chance. If my hon. friend had a policy to bring in people from Great Britain and the United States, and desirable people from Europe, and had some policy for their assimilation in Western and Northern Canada, he would at once be increasing the population of the country and adding to its productive capacity. Every man who has given any study to the railway problem to-day realizes that our greatest need, if we are to solve our difficulties, is a progressive immigration and colonization policy. It goes without saying that if the land tributary to the railways is not producing anything the railways cannot pay, and my hon. friend a few days ago held out no hope of any immigration or colonization. It seems to me that the minister simply throws up his hands and bewails the fact that he is helpless. Well, in that regard he is pretty much in the same position as the rest of the Governemnt; he is in good company. I wonder if his attention has been drawn to an article in MacLean's Magazine, by Fred V. Seibert, B.A.Sc., who deals with the colonization problem in Canada? This gentleman, apparently, has been in the Survey Department for some years and has given considerable study to the land settlement question in Canada. On page 8 of MacLean's Magazine for April, 1921, he says:

> Settlement needs directing force. There is weakness in our present system and urgent need of control to correct that weakness.

The article is well worth the attention of the minister, who should give more serious study to the question of immigration, and particularly of colonization. His time would be very much better occupied in a close study of these questions than in playing politics, because his political career, so far as the Government at least is concerned, is very nearly at an end. He could, however, make for himself a reputation as Minister of Immigration and Colonization if he set himself to the task. If the minister has no policy in regard to immigration, then we are to assume that the present muddled condition of our railways will continue, and it will be impossible for us to overcome our railway difficulties, and, in a few years, utterly impossible to pay our taxation and meet our other heavy obligations. There are thousands of people who would come to Canada and make good citizens, and when the minister says that there is no more homestead land I am afraid he is giving Canada rather bad advertising, because there are millions of acres of land that would be suitable for settlement in Western Canada and in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec. And if it is necessary to build a few branch line railways to develop that country, I think the investment might be considered a good one. But the indiscriminate settlement of homesteaders is a policy I do not believe in. I am not now advocating the continuance of the policy of homesteading at all; a better policy might be worked out. I am satisfied that we could get hundreds of thousands of good people from the United States and across the seas who would make splendid settlers in this country and who would help discharge our burden and pay our interest charges and taxation for the next few years. I exhort the minister to turn his attention more seriously to these important questions than he has done in the past.

Mr. BOYCE: I am surprised to hear the statements of the last speaker in regard to Northern Ontario. I think he has not been up in that part of the country or he would not have such a doleful tale to tell. He has found fault with the minister because there are no immigrants or other persons going into that country. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I visited that part of Ontario twice during the last ten years and I noticed that a very great improvement had taken place. At New Liskeard a very fine town has sprung up. Within a radius of fifty or a hundred miles of Matheson and Cochrane, the country is very well settled. The hon. member (Mr. Cahill) has always a doleful tale to tell about something, and he may as well talk about this subject as anything else. He talks about Doukhobors and the like. There is no need to get Doukhobors to settle that country; any amount of good people are going in there—going about as quickly as they possibly can, and that is fairly quick too. I want to tell my hon. friend that there is a fine section of country up there, and ultimately it will be equal to some of the best districts in the older parts of Ontario. I would advise the hon. gentleman to try and assist the minister and the authorities to get people to settle in that northern country and not run it down.

Mr. CAHILL: I cannot allow that statement to pass unchallenged. I did not run the country down, I praised it very highly.

Mr. BOYCE: Now, take your medicine.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not wish to be misrepresented.

Mr. BOYCE: I have sat and listened to you time and time again and you were never happy unless you were abusing somebody.

Mr. CAHILL: Abusing the Government.

Mr. BOYCE: Yes, and I am going to abuse you and you will have to take it like a man. You are like myself; you are good natured enough and you are not going to get vexed about it. I say: Be a man and help Canada all you possibly can; let us all work together shoulder to shoulder and then we will make a success of the development of this country. If we all do what we ought to do, we will make New Ontario a fine part of this Dominion. I do not like to hear any man run down his country; I do not like a bird that befouls its own nest.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CALDER: There are only one or two items left but I am very sorry that I have to leave now. However, the items are minor ones and we can deal with them later on. Earlier in the afternoon the leader of the Opposition asked if it was the intention of the Finance Minister to lay on the Table the report of the Tariff Committee and the Minister of Railways stated he would give a reply before the House rose this afternoon. I am to advise the House that no such report will be laid on the Table before Monday next. I now beg to move that further consideration of the Estimates of the Department of Immigration and Colonization be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Department of Customs and Inland Revenue, $532,947.50; Contingencies, $48,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When was the Minister of Customs officially installed in the department? When did he assume the duties of the office after his election?

Hon. R. W. WIGMORE (Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue): In answer to the hon. gentleman, I think about July 14.

Mr. LEMIEUX: July, 1920?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When did the election take place in St. John?

Mr. WIGMORE: I think about September 20, 1920.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to ask my hon. friend if he belongs to the firm of Nagle & Wigmore?

Mr. WIGMORE: I did; I was a member.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the hon. gentleman still a member?

Mr. WIGMORE: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Until when was he a member of that firm?

Mr. WIGMORE: Until—the exact date I could not say—within three months ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In his dual capacity of Minister of Customs and member of the firm of Nagle & Wigmore, did the hon. gentleman write any letters concerning the business of his firm?

Mr. WIGMORE: Mr. Chairman, I think the item under discussion is an item in connection with the Estimates. I do not know that my hon. friend's question has anything to do with the business before the House. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think I am within the rules in questioning the hon. gentleman as regards the administration of his department.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the minister rose I was about to rise myself. I must say that the questioning of the hon. gentleman seemed to me to be most intimately personal. I have no idea what he is driving at but I submit to you, Sir, that no minister of the Crown, or no member of the House, should be subjected to personal interrogation regarding his private connections unless such interrogation is preceded by a specific charge of some kind affecting the public interest. If such a charge is made in the usual way by an hon. gentleman, upon his responsibility as a member of the House, then it seems to me that no one can object to the interrogation; but I submit to you, Sir, and to my hon. friend who is doing the interrogating, that it is scarcely fair—certainly not to the committee and I hardly think to the minister himself—to pursue these questions without we on both sides of the House knowing the object, and the purpose, and the basis of the personal interrogations.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Douglas, Strathcona): I would ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve, if he is going to pursue this course of interrogation any further, to show what bearing it has upon the Estimates in question. If he is leading up to some question bearing on the Estimates, then I do not think that he would be out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, we are studying the various items of the Customs Department, and that department is under the direction of the hon. minister who is in his seat. What I wish to call his attention to is the fact that he should do one thing or the other—either attend to the business of the department solely, or to his private business, but not use the Customs Department as a means to advertise his own firm. If the Chairman rules that the question is out of order, there are other means to bring it before the House, but I believe that as we are dealing with the Customs Department, I have the right to question the mode of administration pursued by the hon. gentleman. This is what I wanted to refresh the memory of the minister for, Mr. Chairman. I am informed that since the hon. gentleman took over the administration of his department he has been writing letters right and left in order to promote the business of the firm to which he belongs. To be fair to him, I will read the letter I have in my hand.

Mr. MORPHY: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I first asked him on what date he had taken charge of the department. He said it was in the month of July, that his re-election took place in September, and that he severed his connection with his firm a few weeks ago.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order before the hon. gentleman reads this letter. Just before you took the Chair I had drawn to the attention of the Chairman who preceded you (Mr. Douglas) that my hon. friend was pursuing a series of quite intimate personal questions—

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a public, not a personal question.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member for Maisonneuve was putting a series of interrogations to the Minister of Customs of a very intimate, personal character.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They refer to the public interest only.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit, sir, that before this course is pursued, the hon. gentleman should state clearly the connection between his series of questions and, if I might be permitted to use the word, the insinuations in the form of a charge or a definite statement that there is some public interest involved. I failed to gather from the questions anything relating to the public interest, and I do not think that any minister or member should be subjected to such a cross-examination unless the committee are taken into the confidence of the hon. gentleman as to his reasons for submitting the questions; and, further, I submit that the item under discussion being an item in the Customs Department, this course should not be pursued under it. If my hon. friend considers that the Minister of Customs has in any way used his position improperly, then I submit that a charge should be made and the letter read in that connection, and not placed on Hansard when there is no proper opportunity to deal with it in a parliamentary manner.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret, that I was not in the Chair to hear the preliminary remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), but from what I have heard upon the point of order, I would judge that the question is this: Has an hon. member in Committee of Supply the right to refer to any act of a minister of the Crown which does not concern his official conduct as such minister? The doctrine laid down in May's Parliamentary Procedure on that point is quite clear. At page 486, he says:

> Regarding the general conduct of debate in the committee of supply, it may be observed that remarks on the conduct of a servant of the state, made on the grant containing his salary, must be restricted to his official conduct. The committee of supply does not afford the proper opportunity for discussing, whether a minister should be in the cabinet or not.

Anything, therefore, which would concern the official conduct of the minister would be perfectly in order. On the other hand, any complaint which any hon. member might have to make concerning his conduct in relation to his private life or affairs would be more properly made either upon a motion to go into Supply or introduced as a matter of privilege.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, the matter I have to call to the attention of the minister and the committee is one which affects the public interest, and if I were permitted to read the letter which I have in my hand the committee would at once see its relevancy. The letter emanates from the Department of Customs; it is written on the official paper of the department, and in the body of the letter the hon. minister intimates that he writes as Minister of Customs. Therefore, it is in the public interest as it affects the administration of his department. I have no charge to make at present against the minister; that is why I was asking him a few questions. He may have a perfectly satisfactory explanation, of which the committee will be able to judge. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I purpose to read this letter and ask the hon. minister if he admits its authenticity, and what explanation he has to give regarding it. This letter is written on the official paper of the department, and bears the Royal Coat of Arms. it is as follows:

> OTTAWA, January 13, 1921.
> French Purchasing Commission,
> Care of French Embassy,
> London, E.C., England.
> Dears Sirs,—I am informed that your Government will have quite a few French steamers taking grain from the port of Saint John N.B. Canada this winter.
> The firm of Nagle and Wigmore of which I am a member are very anxious to secure this business. We are the largest firm of shipbrokers in Saint John and have done a very large amount of business along these lines.
> We have our own tow-boats, tend to all stevedoring and all matters in connection with the general brokerage business.
> As you are no doubt aware, I am Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue in the Canadian Government and I spoke to Sir George Foster, my colleague in the Cabinet who has just returned from England being Canada's representative at the League of Nations' conference which has just been concluded at Geneva and he advised me to write to you.
> We are in a position to handle your business to your satisfaction and would refer you to the Bank of Nova Scotia as to our financial ability.
> We are agents for the Canada Steamships Lines Limited, the Compagnie Canadienne Transatlantique, Limited, the Fracanda line and the Acadian Shipping Company Limited.
> I would very much appreciate your giving us your business.
> Thanking you in anticipation,
> I remain,
> Yours very truly,
> R. W. WIGMORE.

Sir, I consider this a matter of public importance, because the hon. minister speaks not only as a member of the firm of Nagle and Wigmore, but as Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue; and he refers to an interview he had with one of his colleagues—indeed, the senior member of the Government, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). It is a matter of public interest whether a minister of the Crown has the right to act in this way, using his position to promote the business of a firm with which until a few weeks or months ago he was connected. My object in bringing the matter before the committee is to ascertain whether or not the hon. gentleman admits that he wrote this letter. I would like to have an answer from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WIGMORE: I am not surprised that the hon. member for Maisonneuve has brought this question up, because I heard that he had a copy of this letter and had had a photograph of it made. I want to say, to begin with, that since being called into the Cabinet I absolutely have received no benefit in any way, shape or form, financial or otherwise, from the firm of which I was a member at that time. I wrote this letter not with any understanding that it would benefit our firm personally. I wrote it as I would write a letter on behalf of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve if he were in the business and came to me and asked me if I would write on his behalf to this firm; for if he had done so I certainly would have written a letter on his behalf.

I did not write it with any idea that there was to be any benefit from the Minister of Customs' standpoint, or in any other way, only in writing to this firm in England they would not know who I was and I simply said I was Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue in Canada. I have received no benefit, as I say, in any way, shape or form, financially or otherwise, from the firm of which I was a member at that time. My partner is carrying along the business and I wrote this letter with the idea of securing business for him just as I would to secure business for any other firm that would write to me. We receive letters from day to day asking us to recommend certain firms and certain people, and it was in this way that the letter was written.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that there is one gentleman who applauds. I would like to know if the people of Canada would applaud if they were witnesses to what is taking place this afternoon. The hon. gentleman has made his answer and we must accept it. I do accept it, especially that part of it in which the hon. gentleman admits that he signed this letter and mailed it. All comments are unnecessary. Mr. Chairman, in all the annals of British parliamentary government, either in Canada or in the Mother Country, I challenge any one to find such a glaring example of personal interest mixed with the administration of public affairs. No minister of the Crown, either in Canada or in the Mother Country would ever dare to mix his own personal business with the public business. I dare say that if the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knew that his name had been mentioned in this letter he would at once have disowned the author of it. It is highly improper for a minister of the Crown to boost his own private business whilst using the royal coat of arms and the official paper of the Government. It is improper per se; then, it is improper so far as it affects his competitors in the city of St. John. It is also improper because the hon. gentleman was competing with the Government of which he is a member, because they also have a merchant marine which can perform the business which the hon. gentleman is seeking for his own firm. Besides, he was practically writing to a foreign government, and that indeed is a sad feature I find in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. member for Maisonneuve that under the rules of the House he is obliged to accept the statement of the hon. minister that he was not interested in the firm at the time the letter was written.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, I accept what the hon. gentleman said, that he wrote the letter. But the letter cannot bear two interpretations. I will read it again. At the top there are the words "Minister of Customs," and immediately underneath, the royal coat of arms. The letter says:

OTTAWA, January 13, 1921.

French Purchasing Commission,
Care of French Embassy,
London, E.C., England.

Dear Sirs:—

Mr. MORPHY: I rise to a point of order. The letter has already been read.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order is well taken. The hon. member certainly has no right to read the letter again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister admits having written and signed the letter, but he qualifies that statement by saying that he had no personal interest, whereas by the very reading of the letter you can see the interest blazoned across it. He says—

The CHAIRMAN: The letter is on Hansard and it speaks for itself. I must rule that the letter cannot be read again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But I may comment on the letter?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman may comment on it, but not read it again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman says he has no personal interest. What does he mean when he says in the letter?—

We have our own tow boats, tend to all stevedoring and all matters in connection with the general brokerage business.

As you are no doubt aware I am Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue in the Canadian Government and I spoke to Sir Geo. Foster, my colleague in the Cabinet who has just returned from England, being Canada's representative—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is evading the rule; he is reading the letter again under the guise of commenting upon it. He certainly cannot do that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman. My comment is that the hon. gentleman as Minister of Customs has written a most improper letter which should arrest the attention of the right hon. leader of the Government. The Minister of Customs in writing this letter promoted his own personal interest or the interest of this firm—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, I accept the statement he made. I must accept it, qualified by the terms of the letter. At all events I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister to this question—

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does he approve of any of his minister's writing such a letter?

Mr. STEVENS: My point of order is this. The minister made a statement in reply to the interrogations and the reading of this letter by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), I submit that the hon. member has no right whatever to insinuate or suggest any improper motive on the part of the minister, unless, as I stated before, when I appealed for your ruling, he is prepared, from his seat in the House, to prefer charges of improper conduct against the minister. I submit the hon. gentleman is not in order under the Estimates of this department in pursuing the course that he has pursued.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is quite obvious that the hon. gentleman is not in sympathy with the minister who wrote this letter, and I do not see why he rises to this point of order. I was simply asking the leader of the Government if, taking cognizance of this letter, he approves it, and if he does not think that a minister of the Crown who could write such a document does not deserve to remain in the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether there is a point of order awaiting your decision or not; if there is, I do not wish to intervene. Otherwise, I want to assure my hon. friend that I am not able to be so profoundly moved by the letter to which he refers as he seems to be. The letter which was brought to my attention—I think it must be the letter to which he has referred this afternoon; I do not need to see it—appears to have been a letter written for a firm of which the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore) had been, or was a member and with which his name was still associated.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He signed it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On behalf of that firm. The only reference in the world to his position is by way of explaining how he comes to write the letter, by reason of his being a colleague of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and the matter having been brought to his attention by that minister upon inquiry on his return from overseas. I did not know that it was a penal offence for a man writing a private letter to refer to the fact that he was a minister by way of explaining that the information prompting the letter came from a colleague who happened to have been overseas, and to have learned that this commission, whatever it was, was to have boats running to St. John. I tried to inquire, that is, in my mind, whether or not there could possibly be any motive in it that could be criticized in any way at all; but my imagination or ingenuity was not sufficient to enable me to see how there could be any improper motive. If there had been any way in which, as minister, he could have assisted them, the case might have been different, but there is no way in the world by which he could do that. The hon. gentleman was merely explaining how he came to write the letter; being a colleague of Sir George Foster, Sir George Foster told him that the commission would require this service. The reference was merely incidental; there was no improper thought or improper purpose, either real or imaginary. It is not for me to approve or disapprove of conduct particularly, unless such conduct is of a character inconsistent with the duties of the minister as a minister. I must say that I was not able in this case to discern conduct of any corrupt or culpable nature.

Mr. COPP: I noticed in the press the other day the retirement of Mr. Belyea. Can the minister give me the details about the retirement of this official from the St. John office?

Mr. WIGMORE: The amalgamation of the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, not only in St. John, but throughout the Dominion, is in the hands of a committee of the Civil Service Commission, and their report to a subcommittee of the council was that we could dispense with the services of Mr. Belyea in the city of St. John. The positions of Collector of Customs and Collector of Inland Revenue have been amalgamated, and both of them are now in charge of Mr. Lockhart. Mr. Belyea has not been in good health for some time, and he will retire on his regular superannuation allowance.

Mr. COPP: How does that superannuation allowance compare with the salary which he was receiving?

Mr. WIGMORE: His salary was $2,280. He will retire on a superannuation allowance of $1,568.

Mr. COPP: I have only a slight acquaintance with the gentleman in question, but as regards his age, I thought from his appearance he would be a more likely man to take charge of the combined office than Mr. Lockhart, and that the latter would be more in line for superannuation than Mr. Belyea. I was wondering why Mr. Belyea was selected for retirement.

Mr. WIGMORE: I know this case very well and I can assure my hon. friend that Mr. Belyea's condition is such that it would be impossible for him to carry on long. I would not like to say here just what that condition is.

Mr. COPP: He was quite satisfied to retire, was he?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes. He was a much younger man that Mr. Lockhart, but there are reasons why he retired. I will give the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The minister might give a similar explanation with regard to the Collector of Customs at Pictou, N.S., Mr. R. P. Fraser. I am informed that he was retired. Why was he retired from the Customs Department and another person taken from the Inland Revenue Department and put in his place?

Mr. WIGMORE: That is a similar case. He was retired by the Civil Service Commission. He was, I believe, 76 years of age. It was found possible to do away with one of the two officers at Pictou. The man succeeding him is 67, a much younger officer. Mr. Fraser will retire on quite a substantial retiring allowance.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does the minister invariably take the ages of these officials as a qualification?

Mr. WIGMORE: No, the Civil Service Commission handles the matter.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not know anything particularly about these two gentlemen. I know that Mr. Fraser is very vigorous and is and always has been a satisfactory officer. It occurred to me that, perhaps, this was pretty cruel treatment to mete out in his old days to a gentleman who was in good health and vigour and able to attend to his office and to his work. He has a large family to support, he is not blessed with too much of this world's goods, and his retiring allowance will not be at all sufficient to meet the necessary requirements of his family. I do not know either of them personally, but this is the information that has been given to me.

Mr. WIGMORE: The retirements are recommended by the Civil Service Commission, who report to a sub-committee of council. Mr. Fraser was the oldest employee there, and I suppose on that account it was decided that he should be retired.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Who was his successor?

Mr. WIGMORE: Another man by the name of Fraser, who was Collector of Inland Revenue. The two offices were amalgamated.

Mr. CHISHOLM: In former times there were certain preventive officers—I forget their title—whose duty it was to go around the country looking for the manufacture of liquors against the law. Has the department retained these officers?

Mr. WIGMORE: Illicit distillers.

Mr. COPP: Moonshiners.

Mr. WIGMORE: We still have these officers.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I know that there are certain officers in the important centres, but I think there used to be subordinate officers here and all over the country, local men, who went around to see if any illicit manufacturing was being done. They received only a small salary. Has the minister such officers in his department now?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes, they are still employed at the same work.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Is there any such officer in the very important county of Inverness? I know we do not manufacture any illicit liquors there, but I should like to know if there is such an officer in the county.

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes, a gentleman by the name of Mr. Carrol.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Where is he located?

Mr. WIGMORE: At Pictou.

Mr. CHISHOLM: He is not in the zone at all.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Can the minister tell me the salary of Mr. Schmouth, who is customs officer at Rivière du Loup? In fact, he is both customs officer and inland revenue officer.

Mr. WIGMORE: His salary has been $1,500 from April 1. Formerly it was $1,440.

Mr. GAUVREAU: For both offices?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Does the minister think that is a fair salary in these days for a married man with twelve children? This man has also been obliged to collect taxes for the Minister of Finance, with no extra remuneration whatsoever. When I was coming up here at the beginning of the session, the poor man asked me if I could not say a good word in his behalf to the minister, to try and get an increase of salary for him.

Mr. WIGMORE: Unfortunately, the minister has nothing to do with the salary. If I had my full say in the matter, I think some of these salaries would be very much increased. The salary is fixed by the commission, and this man is receiving the maximum of his class.

Mr. COPP: I understand that there has been a reorganization and a combination of the inland revenue and customs offices in certain localities, possibly all through the country. I think it would be interesting to the committee if the minister would give a short resumé, stating where these offices have been combined, and whether a saving has resulted. I think a general statement in regard to his department would be very illuminating to the committee, and would probably save time by anticipating a number of questions that we otherwise might have to ask.

Mr. WIGMORE: There is a net decrease in the first item under Civil Government of $116,105.85. With regard to the item now before the House, the increase is partly due to transfers from the one department to the other. I have a report here which it might be just as well to read so that the committee will know the facts as to this increase :

Owing to the consolidation of the two services from April 1, 1921, a combined estimate is submitted for the fiscal year 1921-22.

The first item is that of "Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act,—and temporary buildings and rentals," the vote for which in 1920-21 was $4,984,433.25, made up as follows:

Customs	$4,250,000 00
Excise	734,433 25

The $734,433.25 for excise was made up of the following items, viz.:

Salaries of officers of excise and to provide for increases pending upon the result of excise examinations	$465,033 25
Extra duty pay at large distilleries and other large factories	15,000 00
Duty pay to officers serving longer hours at other than special survey	2,000 00
Excise travelling expenses, rent, fuel, etc.	112,400 00
Amount to provide for salaries in connection with war taxes	140,000 00

The estimate for the fiscal year 1921-22 shows an increase of $505,381.75, of which amount $165,533,75 represents salary arrears for 1920-21 due to reclassification, leaving $339,848 covering increase for the fiscal year 1921-22.

This latter amount is made up of the following items, viz:—

Statutory increases	$144,635.00
Amount to provide for 33 auditors (accountants) in charge of districts to audit books in connection with the collection of Excise Tax; for temporary employees relieving regular officers on sick leave with pay; and for promotions, transfers, etc.	114,113.00
Amount due to transfer of officers from Preventive Service salaries under reclassification	75,000.00
Amount required due to increased cost of contingencies	6,100.00

The second item is that of "salaries and travelling expenses of Inspectors of Ports and of other officers on Inspection and Preventive Service, including salaries and expenses in connection with the Board of Customs," the vote for which in 1920-21 was $543,575.00, made up as follows:—

Customs	$500,000.00
Excise	43,575.00

The $43,575 for Excise was made up of the following items, viz:—

Salaries of inspectors and to provide for increases	$ 32,575.00
Travelling expenses, etc., for inspectors	11,000.00

The Estimate for the fiscal year 1921-22 shows an increase of $77,805, of which amount $34,497 represents salary arrears for 1920-21 due to reclassification, leaving $23,308 covering an increase for the fiscal year 1921-22.

This latter amount is made up of the following items, viz:—

Statutory increases	$ 13,780.00
Amount to provide for increased cost of travelling expenses and for employees relieving regular officers on sick leave with pay, and for promotions, etc.	9,528.00

The third item is that for "Miscellaneous"—the vote for which in 1920-21 was $437,100 made up as follows:—

Customs	$240,000.00
Excise	197,100.00

The $197,100 for Excise was made up of the following items:—

Premiums on guarantee bonds	$ 1,600.00
Stamps for imported and Canadian tobacco	170,000.00
Stamps, etc., in connection with War Tax	25,000.00
Minor revenue expenditure	500.00

The Estimate for the fiscal year 1921-22 shows a decrease of $14,100. This decrease is made up as follows:

$15,000 less for stamps from which is to be deducted an increase of $900 for premiums on guarantee bonds.

The fourth item is "to provide for expenses of maintenance of Revenue Cruisers and for Preventive Service," the vote for which in 1920-21 was $278,000 made up as follows:—

Customs	$150,000.00
Excise	128,000.00

The $128,000 for Excise was made up of the following items:—

$110,000 for Preventive Service salaries.
$18,000 for Preventive Service contingencies.

The Estimate for the fiscal year 1921-22 shows a decrease of $40,000, which is made up as follows—$75,000 owing to salaries of 65 officers being transferred under the reclassification from this item to that for Port Salaries and Contingencies, less an increase in the Customs Preventive Service owing to the increased cost of maintenance and of repairs to be made to the Customs cruiser "Margaret" and s.s. "Grib."

The fifth item—the amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it, for Secret Preventive Service"—the Estimate for 1921-22 remains the same as for last year, viz:—$10,000. This amount being considered sufficient to meet the expenditure.

Mr. COPP: How much was spent last year of the amount voted?

Mr. WIGMORE: About $8,000.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I understand that the Customs and the Inland Revenue offices in Brantford have been combined. Is it the intention to take care of the retiring officers of the Inland Revenue in the Customs Department?

Mr. WIGMORE: In Brantford the Collector of Inland Revenue is to be superannuated.

Mr. MORPHY: I should like some information in regard to the case of Listowel, in the county of Perth.

Mr. WIGMORE: In that case it is the Customs Officer who will be superannuated.

Mr. MORPHY: The other staff will be continued?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: In regard to the retirement of the Customs officer there, a man who has been in the service nearly ten years, what provision is being made?

Mr. WIGMORE: This man will receive $125 gratuity plus $1,000.

Mr. MORPHY: If he had continued in his work for the next year or year and a half, having performed ten years service, what would he have got?

Mr. WIGMORE: He would have received ten-sixtieths of his average salary for the last three years.

Mr. MORPHY: For life?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the minister think it is equitable and fair that a servant of the public, who is being dispensed with in that way, should by some arbitrary rule be deprived of what is really a right? Supposing he had nine years and three hundred and sixty-four days in the service; if he had been one day longer he would get a certain allowance. Is it equitable and fair that because he has failed to put in that much longer time he should suffer a reduction? The minister should consider the case of worthy officers who have given their time to the State, and, out of the saving which he contemplates making, he should provide something for cases of that kind, where men have gone out of their ordinary occupations into the service of the country, having unfitted themselves for other work. This seems hard, especially as some of these men have not saved any money out of the meagre pittances they have received from the Government. The salaries in the country do not approximate those paid in Ottawa and the other cities. The men in the country are under paid, while it might be said that in Ottawa many of them are overpaid. Can the minister really not provide, out of the vast savings he expects to make, something for worthy officers on the outside?

Mr. WIGMORE: I agree with the hon. member that in many cases the recommendations for retirement work a great hardship to certain men, but unfortunately the minister of the department has nothing to do with the matter. These recommendations are made by the Civil Service Commission to a sub-committee of Council and are acted upon accordingly. It does seem unfortunate that a man should not benefit by the amount of retirement that would be given to him if he had served a few days longer than the date of his actual retirement, but the ruling having been laid down I cannot help it.

Mr. MORPHY: I wish to take up the case of Stratford, where the collector of customs is now presumed to take over the offices of both Customs and Inland Revenue. His work is fairly heavy and responsible now. If the collector of customs cannot be given an increase at all, I should like to know whether some representation could not be made to the Civil Service Commission with a view to securing fair play in this matter. What is the revenue at Stratford from customs and inland revenue, and what is the salary paid the officer now conducting both services?

Mr. WIGMORE: I quite agree that on amalgamation, particularly of the larger offices, where greater responsibilities are placed on the collectors, and where in some cases it is almost impossible for them to get through with their work, some consideration should be given. It is my intention on the reorganization of the department to make certain recommendations to the Civil Service Commission, who have this matter in hand, so that in those cases where there has really been an extra amount of work placed on these men, the work should be graded differently and some consideration should be accorded them. I assure the hon. gentleman that I will take this matter up with the Civil Service Commission and make a recommendation along those lines. The Customs revenue at this particular port is $185,000.

Mr. MORPHY: And the salary is what?

Mr. WIGMORE: The salary of the collector is $2,160.

Mr. ROSS: I would like to ask the minister a question with regard to the outport of Strathroy. I notice on page D-43 of the Auditor General's Report the following:

> Strathroy: W. H. Murray, sub-collector, $1,300 bonus, $396; H. W. Paddell, clerk, $1,200, bonus, $396; Miss M. DeCourcy, preventive officer, $850, bonus, $420; G. E. MacKenzie, relieving officer, 3 m. to Mar. 31, $274.98, bonus, $72.55; board, etc., W. J. Element, $32.40; postage and p.o. box, $22.25—

Do I understand from this item in the Auditor General's Report that all these officers are stationed at the town of Strathroy, and that they occupy offices, and draw salaries for work performed there?

Mr. WIGMORE: The headquarters of that particular district and the chief port is London; Strathroy is just an outport.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that quite well, but I would imagine that if that were the case the salaries of these people would be charged to the city of London. What have they to do with Strathroy?

Mr. WIGMORE: Nothing at all.

Mr. ROSS: Take Miss DeCourcy; what are her duties in the Strathroy office?

Mr. WIGMORE: There is only one officer at Strathroy; all the rest are at London. This lady the hon. gentleman speaks of is at London.

Mr. ROSS: Then this item in the Auditor General's Report should not be in the form in which it is, and the salaries of these officers should not be charged to the Strathroy office. Miss DeCourcy, H. W. Paddell and W. J. Element have never been in the Strathroy office.

Mr. WIGMORE: If the hon. member will refer to page D-42 of the Auditor General's Report he will find that is all under the chief port of London, the total for salaries being $43,722. The different offices are enumerated, and Strathroy is only an outport.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that quite well. But why should these salaries be charged to the Strathroy office? These people have never entered the Strathroy office in their lives.

Mr. WIGMORE: They are not.

Mr. ROSS: But at page D-43 all these offices are under the heading of "Strathroy" and their salaries are charged to that office. Mr. Murray is the only officer there.

Mr. WIGMORE: There is something wrong. They should be under the London office; there is no question about that. There is only one officer at Strathroy.

Mr. ROSS: That is what I was pointing out. From the way the information appears in the Auditor General's Report any person reading it would believe all these persons are stationed at Strathroy.

Mr. WIGMORE: It is a mistake; they are all stationed at London with the exception of one officer at Strathroy. I think his name is Murray.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I was going to make further inquiry when the member for Perth (Mr. Morphy) intervened with regard to the amount of collections at the port of Stratford. I was going to ask if it is the intention of the minister to recognize the increased responsibilities and work that will devolve upon the collector at the port of Brantford by reason of the amalgamation. My recollection is that the collections in the Customs will amount to a million of dollars almost, and probably $200,000, or perhaps more, in the Inland Revenue. The offices having been amalgamated and it appears to me that the Customs officer, who has now been in the employ of the department several years, would be entitled to further consideration by reason of the vast amount of work that will be put upon him, and the increased responsibilities that the double office will create in the city of Brantford. If the minister has these facts I would like to hear them.

Mr. WIGMORE: The revenue from Brantford last year in customs was $900,000, and in inland revenue $175,000. The same statement that I made to the hon. member for Perth, applies in like manner to Brantford or any other place. I believe that these men who have had extra duties placed upon them should receive extra consideration, and my recommendation to the Civil Service Commission will be along that line.

Mr. McKENZIE: May I ask the number of Customs and Inland Revenue officers in the riding of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and the different places at which they are stationed?

Mr. WIGMORE: It will take some little time to look that information up. Will the hon. gentleman tell me to what ports he refers? I have not got them in alphabetical order here, but only by counties.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think there is a custom house at Cape North, in the northern end of the county. I think there are also customs houses at Neil's Harbour, North Ingonish, South Ingonish, Englishtown, Baddeck, Little Narrows, Iona, Grand Narrows, North Sydney, and Sydney Mines.

Mr. WIGMORE: There are fourteen officers at Baddeck and at out ports. There are fifteen at Northm Sydney and out ports. I will be very glad to read the names of the officers at Baddeck. They are as follows:

D. J. Macrae, Collector of Customs, at Baddeck; J. A. Bain, Customs Patrol Officer, New Campbellton; J. J. Bain, Customs Patrol Officer, New Campbellton; Captain A. Carmichael, Customs Patrol Officer, Munroe's Point; Edward Dowling, Customs Patrol Officer, Neil's Harbour; John Larusic, Customs Patrol Officer, Aspy Bay; W. R. McKinnon, Sub-collector of Customs, New Campbellton; Donald McAulay, Customs Patrol Officer, St. Ann's; P. A. MacIntosh, Customs Patrol Officer, White Point; D. B. McKay, Customs Patrol Officer, Little Narrow's; Alex. McLeod, Customs Patrol Officer, Englishtown; Edward Macneil, Sub-collector of Customs, Iona—

There are a couple of temporary officers:

—T. D. Curtis, Customs Patrol Officer, Ingonish; Duncan Carey, Customs Patrol Officer, New Campbellton.

The names of the officers at North Sydney are:

Jos. McPherson, Collector; J. H. Cameron, John Cogan, John J. McDonald, David Edwards, F. E. Jackson. H. W. McNeil, Angus Young, John Boutillier, D. J. McGillivray, Chas. J. K. Jessome, Roderick McDonald, Robert Newton, James Peck, and E. A. McNeil.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is any provision made for increases to these men from year to year? Some of them are rather old officials and get small pay.

Mr. WIGMORE: No provision is made for increases to these patrol officers. Statutory increases are granted to collectors of customs, and are fixed by the department and the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McKENZIE: Were any increases made in the last two or three years?

Mr. WIGMORE: Not for those small offices.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the hon. gentleman give the number of port officers for Montreal this year as compared with 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920?

Mr. WIGMORE: I have not the information here, but last year there were 398 officers in the port of Montreal, and the out-ports connected with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And this year?

Mr. WIGMORE: I can give the hon. gentleman that information later on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What were the total salaries paid to those officers? And have any increases been granted?

Mr. WIGMORE: The total salaries for 1920 were $511,600. The proposed statutory increases will amount to $17,135.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will those officers get the bonus?

Mr. WIGMORE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the customs revenue from the port of Montreal?

Mr. WIGMORE: The customs revenue was as follows: 1915-16, $23,116,305; 1916-17, $34,890,790; 1917-18, $36,459,793; 1919, $36,662,151; 1919-20, $47,921,847.78.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the Inland Revenue receipts from the city of Montreal?

Mr. WIGMORE: I have not any statistics.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many Inland Revenue officers are employed in the Montreal district?

Mr. WIGMORE: About one hundred and four or one hundred and five.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many seizures were made by those officers last year?

Mr. WIGMORE: The seizures made were as follows: 1917-18, 7; 1918-19, 28; 1919-20, 29; 1920-21, 59.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend received representations from the Board of Trade and from the Chamber of Commerce of the district of Montreal as regards the duties levied in view of the premium on the American dollar?

Mr. WIGMORE: I do not remember any such representations. I should judge they would get to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. But has any decision been made as regards discrepancy in the duties affected by the premium on the American dollar?

Mr. WIGMORE: No, there is no difference between the standard dollar of Canada and the standard dollar of the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But as a matter of fact there is with the appreciation of the American dollar, and the depreciation of the Canadian dollar. Is not the department by not adjusting this matter giving the Americans a real preference in shipping their goods here?

Mr. WIGMORE: Of course, under the present law we cannot make any change. I do not know what may be done in the future.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But my hon. friend can see at once that it works in favour of the American and against the British exporter to Canada. It seems to me that the provisions of the Customs Act with respect to standard currency should be amended in order to give our friends in Great Britain and importers in Canada a chance to compete with the Americans.

Mr. WIGMORE: The Act says:

> In computing the value for duty of such currency the rate thereof shall be such as has been ordered and proclaimed from time to time by the Governor in Council who is hereby empowered to make such order.
> The rate so ordered shall be based upon the actual value of the standard coins or currency of such country as compared with the standard dollar of Canada in so far as such comparative values are known.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of the depreciation of the Canadian dollar on the American market, does my hon. friend not think that an amendment might be introduced to effect an adjustment of things? I am afraid that we shall have to suffer from this depreciation for quite a number of years and the Americans will get the best of us. Canadians will lose the benefit of the British preference because on your Canadian dollar you lose 13 or 14 cents; it has even gone as low as 17.

Mr. WIGMORE: Of course, this is a question of policy and is a matter for the Finance Minister. I may tell my hon. friend, however, that it has been under consideration for some time.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to ask the minister how he arrives at the total of this vote, $6,782,195, showing an increase of $129,086.75. I find there is an actual decrease of $454,100 from last year's Estimates. Why does this discrepancy exist?

Mr. WIGMORE: Last year we had two votes, one for the Customs and one for the Excise; this year we are amalgamating the two departments, so there must be some consideration that the hon. member has not taken into account.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am simply taking the figures as they appear in this Estimate, page 66. I find it difficult to reconcile the amounts as given on this page. Apparently there should be a large decrease in the amount asked for, whereas there is actually shown an increase.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Six o'clock.

Mr. WIGMORE: I would like to get this item through if possible.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, I think the minister should be satisfied. I would like him in the meantime to consider the last question that I brought up and to be ready to make a statement when we return to his Estimates.

Mr. WIGMORE: That is a question for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is administering the Customs Act. At any rate, the matter should be considered either by him or the Finance Minister.

Progress reported.

Bill No. 137, to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Quebec Steamship Company.—Mr. Casgrain.

DOMINION EXPRESS COMPANY

On motion of Mr. Green, Bill No. 108 (from the Senate) respecting the Dominion Express Company, was considered in committee, reported without amendment, read the third time and passed.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Monday, May 9, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918, AMENDMENT

Hon. E. K. SPINNEY (Yarmouth and Clare): I beg to present the second report of the Special Committee to whom was referred Bill No. 122, to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918. I move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: In the absence of notice, this motion requires unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if the conference between representatives of insurance companies and the superintendent of insurance has taken place, and whether my hon. friend will proceed with his resolution some day this month?

[Mr. Pedlow.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): The conference my hon. friend refers to has taken place. There was a long meeting of the various interests, and I think that if the interests desire to be fair, the differences can be largely composed, and the Bill, I hope, introduced as soon as we are finished with the Budget.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. DENIS

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I rise to a question of privilege. Speaking in Committee of Supply, on the Estimates of Immigration, on April 26 last, I said that I was in favour of admitting into Canada the immigrants of Europe, the subjects of former enemy nations included, provided these immigrants be morally and physically fit, and of the desirable class that we want in this country. Incidentally, I also made reference to the question of unemployment.

Commenting upon my remarks, some newspapers in the province of Quebec said that I had expressed the view that I would not be adverse to the idea of bringing into this country immigrants who would eventually take the jobs of our working men. I wish emphatically to protest, Sir, against any such interpretation being given to my remarks. By no means do I want foreigners to come to this country to the detriment of our honest working classes. What I said, and what I still maintain, is that this country is wide enough and has resources enough to allow hundreds of thousands of immigrants to come here without any detriment to any class of the population, but, on the contrary, to the mutual benefit of all classes.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROY BUILDING, HALIFAX

Mr. CHISHOLM:

1. Is the Roy Building at Halifax rented by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment? If so, for what period, what rental is paid, and for what purpose?

2. (a) How many doctors, nurses and employees are engaged at Halifax by the said department and (b) how many patients were treated from March 1, 1920, to March 1, 1921, and (c) what is the average daily cost per patient?

3. What is the total Government expenditure on account of Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the above period?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. No. The Roy building at Halifax was held under lease by the Halifax district office of the Board of Pension Commissioners prior to the amalgamation of that office with the Unit Office of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; immediately the amalgamation was effected, the lease of the building was terminated.

2. (a) The department maintains at Halifax, Camp Hill Hospital and Clinic. The medical staff consists of: 7 full-time physicians; 4 part-time physicians; 22 nurses; 88 other employees.. (b) During the period from March 1, 1920, to March 1, 1921, 1,331 in-patients were treated at Camp Hill Hospital and 3,728 clinical treatments were given to out-patients. (c) The average daily cost per patient was $3.42.

3. The total expenditure by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the period March 1, 1920, to March 1, 1921, was $38,455,098.01.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

Mr. McDONALD:

1. What was the total amount (a) voted, and (b) paid out, for bonus during the past fiscal year?

2. Have any representations been received from Civil Service organizations on the subject of bonus?

3. Have these been considered by the Government and have the said organizations been given opportunity to support their views?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. (a) 1920-21, $12,500,000; (b) as shown by books of Finance Department to April 21, 1921, $9,843,697.07.

2. Yes.

3. Answered by No. 2.

CIVIL SERVICE—PREVAILING RATES

Mr. McDONALD:

1. Have any representations been received from any Civil Service organization re men in the service classed as paid prevailing rates?

2. If so, have these representations received consideration and by whom?

3. What recommendations have been made and what action is being or will be taken in this matter?

4. What opportunity has been given this class of men to present their case, either to the Government or to the Civil Service Commission?

5. Were the prevailing rate men of all departments represented at any conference which may have been held? If not, why?

6. Has the Civil Service Commission any data as to prevailing rates of various classes of labour in the several parts of Canada?

7. If so, where was the data obtained?

8. Have the various departments interested been advised by the commission that prevailing rates must be paid and that data is available?

9. Are permanent men classed as coming under prevailing rates regarded as Civil Servants?

10. If so, are they entitled to holiday and sick leave?

11. If not, why, and what body made the ruling excluding them from these privileges?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, Civil Service Commission.

3. The matter is under consideration at the present time.

4. The Dominion Public Works Federation appeared before the Board of Hearing of the Civil Service Commission on December 22. The Board made certain recommendations which were concurred in by the Civil Service Commission, that salary ranges should be substituted for prevailing rates and that this principle be applied generally where practicable.

5. (a) No. (b) The commission was not asked by any other body of men classified at prevailing rates for a conference and had any other body done so their request for a conference would have been complied with.

6. Yes.

7. Department of Labour.

8. Departments have been advised that the commission has this information and that it is available on request.

9. Yes.

10. No.

11. Prevailing rates were granted at the request of those concerned who believed it was to their advantage and would give them better terms. Consequently all the usual conditions governing the application of prevailing rates outside the Public Service obtain, and no outside employers paying prevailing rates pay for lost time either holidays or sick leave.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough):

1. Are any of the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine operating in conjunction with the Cunard line or any other steamship company? If so, with what companies?

2. If any of the said vessels are so operated, who pays the wages, coal and insurance?

3. What are the names of the vessels, if any, that received a fixed rate per month or other period for their services, and how much does each vessel receive?

4. Who purchases the supplies for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

5. Are public tenders called for?

6. What officer is responsible for the purchase of coal for the said Canadian Government Merchant Marine at Halifax, Nova Scotia?

7. How many office employees of every description are in the employ of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

8. Where is the head office, and where are the Branch offices, if any, located?

9. What was the total expense of every description connected with the office staff and overhead charges of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the year 1920?

10. Who has the appointing of these officers and employees?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

The information asked for is information as to operating details under the Canadian National Railway Board, and is not in possession of the Government.

The question as to the desirability in the public interest of securing such and like information, and making same available on motion or on question in Parliament, is being considered by a special commitee of Parliament.

SERGEANT T. ASHLEY, C.M.S.C.

Mr. POWER:

1. Was Sergeant T. Ashley, C.M.S.C., discharged from the staff of Militia Headquarters, Ottawa, on March 31, 1921?

2. If so, what reason was given for this action?

3. (a) Is the said Sergeant Ashley a returned soldier, and (b) was he trained by the Vocational Service Branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment for the position which he formerly held?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Yes.

2. Demobilization of all C.E.F. personnel except those who were required after March 31, 1921, for certain special work.

3. (a) Yes. (b) It is understood he was given a vocational course in stenography and typewriting by the Vocational Service Branch of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, but it is not known whether he took this course with a view to obtaining employment in the Department of Militia and Defence.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SASKATOON

Mr. BUREAU:

1. How many switch engine hours have been absorbed at Saskatoon during the month of April, 1921?

2. How many tons of freight were handled during the same month at the said place?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

3. How many cars were handled at the said place for the same period?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1, 2, 3. The member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Mr. Bureau) does not indicate what railway or railways he has in mind at Saskatoon.

Assuming that he means the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific, both under Canadian National operation, it should be pointed out that the question as to whether such information should be made public is at present before the Select Committee on Railways and Shipping. Saskatoon is an important competitive point, and the information asked for would be of service to the Canadian National's chief competitor.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. EULER:

What is the number of voters in each riding, on the lists upon which the recent prohibition referendum was held on April 18, in the province of Ontario?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a return showing the names of all postmasters in the counties of Chambly and Verchères, in the province of Quebec, the date of their respective appointments, and the name of the person who recommended the appointment of such officials in each case.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all correspondence between any member of the Government or any official of the Insurance Department with any member of any Provincial Government or any Provincial Superintendent of Insurance or any association of Provincial Superintendents of Insurance with respect to the resolution amending the Insurance Act standing in the Minister of Finance's name on the Order Paper or the subject matter of the resolution.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 130, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I assume that the statement which was made by the hon. Solicitor General in moving the first reading of this Bill is correct, namely, that it simply embodies the different recommendations which the Chief Electoral Officer presented to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and which were unanimously approved by that committee. As far as I can see in looking over the Bill, these recommendations appear to relate exclusively to matters of administration, and have nothing whatever to do with any question of principle involved in the Act. I would ask the minister if, when the Bill goes into committee, he will be prepared to consider other amendments than those which are embodied in the Bill. There are two or three features of the Dominion Elections Act which by-elections recently held disclose to be in the public interest. There is one clause in particular which has been strongly objected to by members on this side of the House, the clause relating to a class of voters who have to appear before a judge in order to get a voting certificate before they are allowed to vote. That is a clause that should come up for further consideration when the Bill is before the House. Will my hon. friend state whether he will be prepared to consider either amending the Bill in this and other respects at the present time, or referring certain amendments to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for their consideration at this present session?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the hon. minister rises to speak, I must remind the House that he will be exercising his right to close the debate, and if any other hon. member desires to speak upon the second reading, he should do so now.

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE: The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), is correct in his statement that this Bill follows with precision the recommendations made by the Chief Electoral Officer to his Honour the Speaker, pursuant to the terms of the Dominion Elections Act, and the Bill as now presented embodies only amendments which were prepared by the Chief Electoral Officer, considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and unanimously agreed to and reported to this House. No other amendments are proposed by the Government. But I do not see that there can be any objection to considering other amendments when the Bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—urban polling division:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The change in this section is in regard to the number of population required to constitute an urban division. In the Act as passed last session, the number was 1,000; it is now proposed to make it 2,500.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—administration of oaths:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is merely to empower the election clerk as well as other officials to administer oaths.

Section agreed.

On section 3—revising officers:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The former rule 11 was said to be cumbersome and difficult of interpretation. The object of this amendment is to clarify the rule as far as possible, and correct some apparent errors in it. The former rule did not provide for duties being performed by district judges in any province but the province of Quebec. Now we have district judges in the province of Ontario, and that fact was overlooked last session. In the northern portions of Ontario there are district judges.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a schedule of fees for the payment of judges, but what about those persons whom they may appoint when they are unable to act? Is there any provision for the payment of a man whom the judge appoints, when he cannot attend to all the business, to act in place of himself?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Paragraph (d) provides as follows:

> The duties hereby imposed upon judges shall be deemed to have been imposed upon, and to have been performable by them since the thirtieth day of June, 1920, and any fees allowed to revising officers by any tariff of fees approved under section seventy-six of this Act shall be payable to judges who hereafter personally undertake the revision of lists of voters.

It is an addition to the judicial salary of course.

Mr. McKENZIE: But a judge is authorized to appoint another man in his place under this Act. A judge who has two or three counties to look after, as is the case in our province, and can only attend to one county himself, has power to appoint somebody else in another county. There appears to be no provision for the payment of that man.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that such substitute may exercise all powers and perform all duties. I would think one of his functions would be to receive the fees prescribed by this Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not make it perfectly clear by adding "that the fees shall be paid to the judge or any person appointed by him"?

Mr. FIELDING: Is it deemed expedient that judges should be paid for doing this work? We have recently increased the salaries of judges and therefore why have we to pay them extra. I object to the whole idea. I think a good salary should be given to a judge—I do not at all object to that—but he should not get extras in any shape or form for the performance of the duties which pertain to his office.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is also this fact to be borne in mind: On Friday, I think it was, we had a little discussion in the House about judges who might be called upon to preside over inquiries or investigations, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) refused to concur in an amendment made by the Senate debarring judges from accepting such positions. The right hon. gentleman stated that last year, when the Judges' Act was amended, and salaries of the judges were increased, and so increased with the idea of debarring them in future from accepting any remuneration where they presided over inquiries or special investigations. The increased salaries granted to judges, therefore, debars them from accepting any other remuneration. In the case of this legislation they are carrying out the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, and it seems to me they should not receive any special remuneration in the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: That may apply all right to a judge, but the man whom the judge appoints gets no remuneration at all. Surely he should be paid for his work, but apparently no provision has been made for that.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite concur that we should make provision to pay a substitute. It would be all right to do that. I do not think the substitute, who possibly gets no other remuneration from the Government, should be debarred from payment; we cannot expect him to work for nothing. But surely we have a right to expect that every judge in the Dominion of Canada who is in receipt of a salary—and if the salary is not sufficiently generous I would make it so—should perform these duties without receiving any extra remuneration in any shape or form.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: If they do not get the extra remuneration will they not appoint substitutes in most cases?

Mr. FIELDING: Well, let them do it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no tariff of fees applicable to judges at the present time, but I suppose there is power in the Act to fix such a tariff. Section 76 of the Act is the one which applies in regard to the fees and expenses of election officers. It provides as follows:

> Upon the recommendation of the Chief Electoral Officer, the Governor in Council may make a tariff of fees, costs, allowances and expenses to be paid and allowed to returning officers and other persons employed at or with respect to elections under this Act, and may, from time to time, revise and amend such tariff.

The judges are not specifically mentioned. I suppose they would be included in the general language "returning officers and other persons." When a tariff of fees is fixed the provision is that it should be laid before the House of Commons within the first fifteen days after the next ensuing session. The amendment does propose specifically to include judges. I suppose they would have been included under the former tariff under the words "other persons" although they are not named there as they are in the present proposal.

Mr. FIELDING: But will my hon. friend himself not volunteer an amendment that this provision shall not now apply to the judges? There is a principle in this matter. We have been increasing the salaries of the judges on the ground that the dignity and responsibilities of their office require generous treatment. I agree with that, I do not quarrel with giving any judge a generous salary; but I do ask the minister not to introduce in this legislation any provision to pay extra remuneration to judges,—I think it is a very undignified way for judges to get their money.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On principle I agree with my hon. friend, but I think there must have been a reason in the mind of the Chief Electoral Officer when this clause was worded as it is. However, I will ask the committee to allow the clause to stand until I have had an opportunity of consulting with him.

Mr. FIELDING: All right.

Section stands.

On Section 4—name omitted added to list.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The clause now reads:

> If any registrar, at any time after posting up any voters' list. . . is fully satisfied from representations made to him by any credible person under oath that the name of any person who was qualified as an elector to vote at the election then pending within the polling division for which the registrar has been appointed has been omitted from the voters' list he shall add such name to the copy of the list in his possession.

The amendment proposes to strike out the words "below his signature" which follow, "in his possession" in the ninth line, so that the wording then would be:

He shall add such name to the copy of the list in his possession and attest by his initials such addition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned a moment ago that a test has been made of certain features of this Act and that some recent experiences have proven the existence of certain limitations in the measure, and I asked the minister if he would consider submitting some representations to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for their consideration. I would like to read him, if I might, part of a communication which I have received from the Attorney General of Alberta in reference to the powers of the registrars and the manner in which this clause in the Act operated in the taking of the recent plebiscite in that province. The communication is dated November 20, 1920:

We had a sample of how it worked in connection with taking the plebiscite in Alberta. The following are a few of the worst features of it:

1. Registration is not made by polling subdivisions, and the person registering does not know what polling subdivision he will be placed in, even if his name be placed on the list.

2. There is no means provided for any record which would be a check upon a dishonest registrar; the voter appearing before the registrar is not required to sign anything and does not receive any document whereby he could prove that he had personally appeared and registered. The result is, and it happened in the recent plebiscite, that a man may appear before the registrar and think he has done everything to get his name on the list, and discovers afterwards that the registrar denies having ever seen him.

Then the communication contains a rather appropriate suggestion with reference to the practice followed in British Columbia regarding registration, which might be deserving of consideration:

British Columbia has the only fair registration system, and in that province all persons applying for registration sign an application. This application is placed on file by the registrar and the original is given to the deputy returning officer before polling day and is by him taken to the poll. When a voter comes to vote he is required to sign his name before he gets his ballot, and comparison can be made between his signature and the original signature of the party who registered. This is not only a valuable check against impersonation, but is some guarantee that the party actually appeared and made application to be placed upon the list.

I think the minister will see that these suggestions have considerable force, and while I am not prepared and would not like to take up the time of the committee in moving any formal amendment at the present time, I should like to suggest to my hon. friend that he consider whether these suggestions might not properly be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections, with a view of having the Act amended in a manner that will make the registration more effective and less liable to be misinterpreted one way or the other.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have had a number of discussions with the Chief Electoral Officer with regard to the manner in which the Election Act has worked in the various constituencies where it has been on trial, and from all I can gather from him it has worked exceptionally well and few, if any complaints have been received. It is the privilege and duty of successful and unsuccessful candidates after a by-election to make reports under the law of any defects or unsatisfactory conditions in the working of the Act. The suggestions are all brought to this House in the report of the Chief Electoral Officer. Any suggestions so far received are of very minor importance, in fact we have heard scarcely anything but commendation of the working of the Act. After discussing all the suggestions with the Chief Electoral Officer, he thinks that we have hardly had sufficient experience under the Act yet to see just where it can or can not be materially improved. I am satisfied that it has given pretty general satisfaction so far. One great objection to it, no doubt, in the future is going to be the fact that it will be a fairly expensive Act to administer. But, as to giving a complete record of persons entitled to vote which is up to date in every respect, I think it is a decided advance on any other Act we have ever had on the statute book.

I had an opportunity of discussing with the premier of British Columbia a few days ago the method adopted for indentification of voters in his province, and he told me that the system was particularly necessary there because they had what was known as a "shifting vote" in almost every constituency, which in many instances would run to forty, fifty and sixty per cent of the total population. He said that under their system special steps had to be taken towards better indentification than was probably necessary in the other provinces. I think that is a very good system, but it would be fairly cumbersome and slow and would add still further expense to the working out of this Act. It might be well that these suggestions should be considered at some future time, but I do not think at present they are of sufficient importance, nor have we sufficient information in regard to them, to delay the present Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These suggestions come from the Attorney General of Alberta, and he being the legal member of his government is probably the person best qualified to express an opinion on its behalf. I think representations coming from such a quarter in regard to actual experience under a plebiscite which of course relates to the working of the Act as a whole in that province, are of a character that the Government cannot regard too carefully. I hope my hon. friend will consider further the suggestion I have made of referring these with other possible suggestions to the committee on Privileges and Elections, and thereby perhaps avoid the necessity of any formal amendment in the House.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—copy of certified list for returning officer:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section as at present framed reads as follows:

Every registrar, having revised and corrected such retained copy of the voters' list compiled by him shall write at the foot of such copy and close to the last name thereon, on the ninth day before the polling day, a certificate in the form of the certificate contained in said Form No. 11 to this Act. He shall also on the same day deliver or mail by registered letter to the returning officer a copy of the list so certified—

Then follow these words, which should not be in the section at all:

—and the returning officer shall forthwith transmit the same to the Chief Electoral Officer.

Their retention would deprive the returning officer of his only copy of the list.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—when new lists unnecessary:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that addition?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 1 of section 32 at present reads:

Except as provided in this section, it shall not be necessary to prepare new lists of voters for the purposes of any election to be held in any electoral district when there has been in that electoral district a previous election for which the lists of voters prepared are of record in the office of the Electoral Officer and there is an interval of less than two years between the dates of the writs for the two elections.

The proposed amendment is in the first line, and is made by inserting after the word "except" the following words: "at a general election and". The section will then read:

Except at a general election and as provided in this section,—

And so on.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—indexed copies of Act or excerpts therefrom for election officers:

Mr. GUTHRIE: That, I think, Mr. Chairman, is a great improvement. The present law is that a copy of the Act shall be given to these officials and they shall be allowed to study and interpret it for themselves. Under this proposal the Chief Electoral Officer shall get up in concise form the main and important provisions of the Act in a way that will be easily intelligible to the ordinary layman. It is hoped that in this way a great deal of the difficulty which we now find in interpreting the Act may be avoided.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—postponement of nomination day on death of candidate:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the change there?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 42 of the present Act reads:

Whenever from unforeseen accident, delays or otherwise, the proclamation in Form No. 19 cannot be mailed as in section 37 required, or whenever any candidate dies after being nominated and before the close of the polls, the returning officer shall fix another day for the nomination of candidates, which day shall be the nearest which will admit of compliance with the requirements of said section, and shall reissue and republish in manner provided by this Act said proclamation, with such necessary changes thereof as result from the postponement of the nominations. In every such case, the returning officer shall, with his return, make to the Chief Electoral Officer a special report of the causes which occasioned such postponement.

This section was held to be too indefinite to be any kind of guide to the ordinary returning officer; he would not know the number of days necessary to elapse and might innocently make a mistake in fixing the new date. The new section is more definite in its terms.

Mr. FIELDING: Suppose a candidate were to die the day after the election, or before the day of declaration and return, would the returning officer have to return the dead man as elected?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the Act law as it has always stood, I do not think there would be anything else for him to do.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): This amendment seems to do away with the proviso "whenever from unforeseen accident, delay or otherwise", and to limit the occasion for postponement to the death of the candidate. Might not some other unforeseen accident or occurrence make a postponement necessary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Chief Electoral Officer thought that everything was pretty definitely determined by the law, and himself suggested that these words be taken out, and that the section should provide only for postponement in the case of the death of a candidate.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): If it were found impossible to take the necessary steps for an election before the proper date, what would be the effect?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have provided for that in the general clauses.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—oath of secrecy:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 1 of section 52 permits each candidate to be represented by two agents or electors who are given the right to be present in the polling station. Subsection 2, however, requires only one of those electors or agents to take the oath, a limitation which seems an obvious error. The repeal of subsections 1 to 3 inclusive of section 52 and their re-enactment in the terms of the Bill is recommended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has said that the Bill follows word for word and without variation the recommendation of the Chief Electoral Officer. I find, however, that the Chief Electoral Officer recommends in this case the repeal of subsections 1 to 3, inclusive, of section 52 and their re-enactment in the terms following; then the "terms following" include clauses 1, 2 and 3. Clauses 1 and 3 do not appear in the Bill and clause 2 does not appear in the terms in which it appears in the report of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: After discussing the report fully in the committee the Chief Electoral Officer himself undertook to remedy the defect by re-writing this amendment in the form in which it is printed in the Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then the amendment as it now stands has been approved by both the Chief Electoral Officer and the committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was drafted by the Chief Electoral Officer.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—when polls shall be held:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The effect of subsection 1 of section 55 was to permit in certain by-elections seven days to elapse between nomination and polling. The Chief Electoral Officer thinks it would be better to make it fourteen days for all elections; consequently the special provision with regard to seven days, being the last paragraph of subsection 1 of section 55, is struck out.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—hours of polling:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The present section provides that the polls shall be opened at the hour of six o'clock in the forenoon in urban polling divisions and be kept open until six o'clock in the afternoon, and that in rural polling divisions the polls shall be kept open from eight o'clock in the forenoon until six o'clock in the afternoon. The practical experience has been that few if any votes have been cast before eight o''clock in the morning; the officials have been in their places, but the voters have not come forward to vote. The committee thought, therefore, that the change embodied in the present amendment would be satisfactory to all persons concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it was suggested last year that the hour of opening should be eight instead of six. This change, like several others, follows the recommendation made from this side.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will give my hon. friend credit for it, then, I do not remember it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There is not the slightest necessity in rural districts of opening polls at eight o'clock and closing them at six o'clock; all votes can be polled between the hours of nine and five, and in those districts where there is not a very large number of voters, from nine and five is a long enough time to stay at the polls. I do not speak now about cities or towns where men are at their work and may want to go to the polls at a later or an earlier hour. In rural districts, the old law of opening the polls at nine and closing at five was very satisfactory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been said—I do not know whether there is much foundation for the statement or not—that the hours are too short in the rural sections of Ontario, for instance, in certain rural polls where perhaps 350 votes may be cast. Time is not allowed for casting all the votes if voter after voter is challenged. In fact, many representations were made, prior to the last referendum in Ontario, that the hours of polling should be extended, if possible. There is also power in rural districts to add names at the polls, and that takes a little time. For those reasons, it would be well to keep to the hours of nine in the morning to six at night. Although I myself preferred the old method of opening at nine in the morning and closing at five in the afternoon, on account of the extra oath that may be administered it is necessary to give a little more time. We can see how this works out at a general election.

Mr. McKENZIE: I notice the period between nomination and polling day is extended from seven to fourteen days all around. Has any corresponding change been made as regards the completion of the lists? There was some fixed time before polling day when lists had to be completed. Can the minister from memory tell me when the lists must be completed? Must they be completed before nomination day?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That has not been changed in any way. I could not from memory state the number of days. A tremendous number of calculations of time are involved, and while the Chief Electoral Officer has them at his finger ends, I have not. The only change in the section to which my hon. friend refers would affect certain by-elections. The Act of last session provided that in certain by-elections where there were lists, only seven days should elapse between nomination day and polling day. The general provision in the Act is that in all elections the period should be fourteen days. The effect of the present amendment is to make the fourteen-day period applicable to all elections, whether general or by-elections. Consequently, all the calculations of time that would apply with respect to the fourteen-day period, will apply under this amendment as well as under the Act of last session.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

On section 12—name, address and occupation corresponding closely to another.

Mr. McKENZIE: At what stage of the proceedings is a man called upon to take this very drastic oath? A man may be mistaken as to his qualifications. In the province from which I come, a man's name appears on the list, and it is taken for granted that he is a qualified voter. This sounds a little drastic—that a man should swear that he is qualified. He may make a mistake; there may be some property disqualification of which he knows nothing. This is a very far-reaching oath.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only say that my hon. friend's friends in the committee insisted on this oath. The objection which they took to this Bill was that this oath was not in the former legislation. I do not think the oath is any more drastic than the ordinary oath. A man who makes a mistake, if his mistake was a bona fide one, could hardly be chargeable, taking an oath of this kind, with committing the offence of taking an improper oath. In order that he may be so chargeable, the offence must be wilful and corrupt.

Mr. McKENZIE: It might be presumed to be done maliciously.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It might be; but all the oaths attached to the schedule to this legislation are equally strong in language, and they are drawn with the idea of making them as strong as they can be made. This oath was insisted upon by hon. gentlemen opposite in the committee; a legal gentleman, whom they had present as an expert, dwelt particularly on this oath, and the committee agreed that it should be inserted. The object of this clause, as pointed out by the Chief Electoral Officer, is that:

> There is no provision made in the Act for an oath to be sworn by a person who applies to vote and whose name, address and occupation is almost but not quite identical with a name, address and occupation appearing on the voters' list; in other words, no provision is made to meet the case of clerical or like errors made by a registrar or revising officer. When provincial lists were used at Dominion elections the procedure in such cases was ordinarily governed by the provincial laws, but now that special Dominion lists are always prepared, the Dominion Elections Act should, it would appear, specify a procedure to be followed. The insertion of a new section as section 57 A, and of a new oath as Form 32 A, in the following terms would meet the case.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I can see that that is a very necessary provision, but some difficulty might arise. Suppose the names of two men are similar. Let us say that the name on the list is "John McDonald," and a man called John J. McDonald comes to vote on that name; he takes the oath, and he says that he is qualified. There is only a slight difference between the two names. When the real John McDonald turns up in a few minutes and wants to vote, what becomes of him?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Chief Electoral Officer points out to me that the same difficulty would exist in regard to any name. Suppose the name "John Smith" is on the list, and a man comes along and says: "I am John Smith," and he swears to that. The thing has happened. The real John Smith may come along after this, and somebody has voted for him.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is he debarred from voting?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In a rural division he certainly could vote by taking the oath. In an urban division there is also a special provision and a special oath to cover the case cited by my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Then they would both vote?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. The man would have to take a special oath.

On section 13—application for recount on re-addition by judge:

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand this to mean that there may be a recount after the candidate has been declared elected? Did not the old law provide that the candidate must apply for a recount before the declaration day? It seems extraordinary that a man should be declared elected, a recount take place, and that he be declared elected again.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My information is that prior to the Act of last session there could be no recount until somebody had been declared elected. It was provided that, so many days after the declaration, the party aggrieved could apply for a recount, but until somebody was declared elected no application for a recount could be entertained. The provision here is that an application for a recount shall be made within four days after the declaration. The amendment goes further and provides that in cases where the judge has territorial jurisdiction over several ridings, in case there may be two or three applications to him for a recount, he shall take them in the order in which they come to him, and further, where one riding extends into two or three territorial jurisdictions of judges, provision here is made as to the judge to whom application shall be made. These were omissions in the Act of last session which we desire to clear up.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): The amendment provides that a recount may be had in case of an improper addition by the returning officer. The old Act provided for a recount in the case of an improper addition by the deputy returning officer. I think it is well that provision has been made to cover an improper addition by the returning officer, but why strike out the provision with regard to the deputy returning officer? Is not a mistake in addition just as serious in the one case as in the other? I presume that the intention was that the phrase "improperly counted" in line 24 meant "improperly passed as good," and I should like to know whether that was the intention. Also, is it not a fact that the deputy's count is taken by the returning officer unless it is shown to be wrong.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the question of an improper addition is covered by the language of this section. It says:

If within four days after the day on which the returning officer has declared a candidate elected it is made to appear, on the affidavit of a credible witness, to the judge hereafter described, that a deputy returning officer in counting the votes—

It is the deputy that does the counting.

—has improperly counted or improperly rejected—

That is, refused to count

—any ballot papers or has made an incorrect statement of the number of ballots cast for any candidate—

Would not that cover everything?

Mr. THOMSON: I think probably that last would cover it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not this a new section altogether as compared with the election law before the 1917 War-time Elections Act? I think the old law was entirely different.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it was different. This was taken from the old section No. 193.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the old law contained provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court judge, but as I heard the Chairman read this section, I did not hear any such provision.

Mr. COPP: The last two lines provide that "all such recounts or re-additions shall proceed continuously from day to day until the last of them has been completed." Does that mean that there can be no postponement for any cause whatsoever?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the judge would always have jurisdiction to grant any reasonable postponement. That would be considered a proceeding from day to day.

Mr. COPP: An adjournment by the judge?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—report by returning officer:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section as it appears in the Act requires the returning officer to make a report as to the state of the ballot boxes or ballot papers as received by him. Now the returning officer, if he does his duty, never sees the ballot papers except in the case of a recount, and it appears likely that the clause was intended to refer to the election papers as received from deputy returning officers. The repeal of the subsection and its re-enactment in its present form is to prevent a misconception.

Mr. McMASTER: Section 2, subsection (f) of the Act defines the words "election papers" to mean all ballot papers including unused ballot books, lists of voters, and other documents used at a polling station. These words would therefore include ballots as well as the books kept at the different polls.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In subsection (1) of section 72, paragraph (b) of the Act as it stands, the returning officer, immediately after the election, is required to transmit by registered post to the Chief Electoral Officer a return of his proceedings, which return shall contain such observations as he may think proper as to the state of the ballot boxes or the ballot papers as received by him. Now, the term "election papers" includes ballot papers, but, as pointed out by the Chief Electoral Officer, the returning officer will never see the ballot papers. The deputy is the man who sees them put into the boxes. He seals the boxes and they are all forwarded to the returning officer with the other returns described under the term "election papers".

On section 15—penalty for voting if disqualified, not qualified or incompetent

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section contains a provision which was omitted from the Act of last session. In the opinion of the committee it should be inserted now.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I notice, in section 64, subsection 2, of the Act, provision is made for the laying of information, while there is no punishment meted out, and I am not sure that in some cases punishment should be inflicted. We saw in the referendum in our province, perhaps more clearly than we should see in a General election, what would be the effect of the application of this section if it were applied to all sorts of elections, such as that particular one. If the section were applied to referendum elections some unreasonable things might occur. For instance, though the referendum vote was province-wide, and affected every person in every constituency, many persons under the Act were shut out. This happened in the case of people living on the border line between two constituencies. I know of a girl, a teacher, whose home was in the town of Wolseley. She had lived there up to a short time before the election, but was not residing there at the time, having crossed the river Qu'Appelle to teach in a neighbouring school. According to the Act she was not entitled to vote anywhere, although as a matter of fact, I believe, the registrar in the polling district where she was living at the time of the election, put her name on the list without application on her part. Suppose that girl had voted, would she have been liable to imprisonment under this Act? It seems to me that a great many cases of that kind may and will occur. I believe that most of the offences that will be tried under the Act, under the provision that prohibits a person from voting where he is not entitled to vote, will be committed by those who feel they have a moral right to vote where they do vote, although technically they might be shut out. When a person finds himself accidentally on the voters' list in a district where he is living at the time of the election, even though he has not been living in the district the required length of time prior to the election, he will be tempted to vote, and it is not very probable that people generally will be aware of the provision of the Act which makes it an indictable offence to exercise what they may believe to be a moral right. Perhaps the minister will tell us what the effect would be if a person were placed on the list, without his application, in a rural polling division where he lived, and he went in and voted. Would he be guilty of an indictable offence?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot see what wrong he would be doing. In the first place, in a rural poll, he would have a right to vote on polling day.

Mr. THOMSON: Not necessarily. I am supposing a case where he had not the technical right to vote because he had come in from an adjoining constituency. There may be something more to be said in favour of punishing a voter in the case of a general election than in the case of a referendum. But suppose a person goes across the boundary line and, not having lived two months in the rural district where he desires to vote, he finds his name on the voters' list, although he had taken no part whatever in having it placed there. It is the most natural thing in the world that under such circumstances he would want to vote. If he did so, would he be guilty of an indictable offence?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In that case, I understand, he does not take the oath at all.

Mr. THOMSON: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, unless he deliberately and intentionally seeks to do a wrong in voting when he knows he is not entitled to voted, I do not think he would be liable to punishment. I grant that in the working out of this Act, particularly in endeavouring to apply it to the Canada Temperance Act, there were considerable difficulties to be overcome. But it was thought by this House to be far better to apply the Act than to pass new and elaborate machinery to take a single referendum. The difficulty which my hon. friend points out in Saskatchewan and Alberta was overcome in the province of Ontario by an amendment which we passed during the first weeks of this session. We allowed the provincial franchise in Ontario, so that a man, notwithstanding thet he was on the list for the city of Toronto, could vote in the city of Ottawa if he had been here two months; and if he went to a rural poll, he could vote in any case, no matter in what part of the province he resided, so long as he could swear that he had been two months resident in Ontario. When the votes were taken in the western provinces on the referendum, this difficulty was not anticipated and considerable inconvenience arose in consequence.

Mr. THOMSON: Perhaps I am taking up too much time over this, but I think there will be some difference of opinion as to the meaning of some of these clauses. This section, for instance, speaks of a person who votes or attempts to vote, knowing that he is for any reason disqualified, non-qualified, or incompetent to vote. Now, a person whose name has been placed on the voters' list may say he is not disqualified. He is not non-qualified or non-competent because his name is on the list and he has been asked to vote, but would he, because he was a few days short of the time, be liable to criminal prosecution by reason of voting when his name was placed on the list without any request of his own.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see how any man could get his name on the list without any request of his own, under this law. In the first place the rural enumerator takes as a basis the provincial list where there is one that is not more than two years old. There is a provision, in addition, for a man to apply to get his name on. How then does somebody else get this fellow's name on the list?

Mr. THOMSON: I am talking of the practice in our part of the country. I do not think that we have, in the rural parts of Saskatchewan—but as to that I am not sure—any list to start with. I think the general practice is for the registrar or enumerator in the first place to make out a list of voters in the polling district. He knows that a certain person is living in the district, and he thinks that person is entitled to vote and he puts his name on the list. The person in question sees his name on the list and very naturally says "I am not disqualified, I am not non-qualified, I am not non-competent, for they have put my name on the list. Therefore I vote."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I doubt very much whether any one could prosecute that man.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—voting on advanced polls.

Mr. KING: Is there any change there?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under subsections 9 and 10 of section 100 as it now stands, certificates entitling a voter to vote at an advanced poll may be issued at any polling division by the registrar or the revising officer. Both urban and rural registrars are thus entitled to issue these certificates, although the urban registrar prepares only a preliminary list which may be substantially changed by the revising officer. Transfer certificates, under section 53, can be issued only by the revising officer in urban polling divisions, but a corresponding limitation with respect to certificates to voters at advanced polls would prevent possible irregularities. This would involve the repeal of section 100 subsection 9, paragraph (a) and the first line of section 100, subsection 10, and of the substitution therefor of the following, —the amendments being indicated in italics. Then in the Bill we have the amendments suggested.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—issue of certificate gratis to applicant for vote at advanced poll.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is just consequent on the last section.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—attendance of officers and notice of time and place.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is for the general information and convenience of those persons entitled to vote at advanced polls.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—no amendment to apply to election for which writ is issued within three months, except after notice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is by way of safeguard in order to provide time for the necessary printing to be done in case amendments are made by Parliament at any session and an election held shortly thereafter. The note I have from the chief electoral officer is as follows:

Amendments of the Act often, indeed almost always, involve change in the forms and instructions, and if they go into force suddenly, upon receiving the Royal assent, grave inconvenience might arise and irregularities ensue by reason of the use in an immediately following election of forms and instructions for the reprinting of which the interval was insufficient. The insertion in section 102 of the following is recommended to cover this point and authorize consolidation of amendments to the Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—new forms substituted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The reason for this is that it was found, notwithstanding the care that was exercised in the preparation of the forms last session when the Act was passed, that there were very important clerical errors in the forms, some of them very serious and some maybe exceedingly misleading. In the interval the forms have been thoroughly revised, and we think all such irregularities, all such clerical errors, have now been eliminated. The proposal is, and it has met with the hearty approval of the committee, that the forms should be re-enacted.

Mr. COPP: All of them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: All of them, in order that we may get rid of the old forms, which were open to a good deal of doubt, and have an entirely new set, and that is the object of the next two sections. There is one other form which is even omitted in this compilation and which the Chief Electoral Officer has handed to me. Perhaps I can deal with it now. It will be known as "Form No. 29" under section 53, "the form of oath in Transfer Certificate." It is apparently the ordinary oath but was omitted in the book. This is to take the place of the one in the old Act which the Chief Electoral Officer says is inadequate. The form of oath is as follows:

Form No. 29 (S. 53)

Oath on Transfer Certificate

I, (Name) of (address) (occupation) do swear (or affirm) that:

1. I am the person described in the transfer certificate which I produce authorizing me to vote in Polling Division No. instead of in the Polling Division No. in the electoral district of :

2. I am a British subject of the full age of twenty-one years and have ordinarily resided in Canada for the year and in this electoral district for the two months immediately preceding the day of 19 , (naming the date of the issue of the writ of election).

3. I am not within any of the classes of persons who lack qualification or are disqualified by reason of appointment to judicial office, employment for pay or reward in reference to the election, place of birth, race, crime, mental incapacity, the receipt of public charitable support or disfranchisement for corrupt or illegal practices.

4. I have not already voted at this election and have not been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice in relation thereto, So Help Me God.

Sworn (or affirmed) before me at the polling station for polling division No. this day of , 19 .

.....

Deputy Returning Officer.

This is the oath which applies to those persons who vote on transfer certificates, scrutineers, and the like.

On the schedule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have all these forms been approved by the Chief Electoral Officer and by the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, they have all been drawn by the Chief Electoral Officer and approved by the committee unanimously. Form 29 is the one I read.

Mr. McMASTER: Speaking as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I do not remember that we ever went over all these forms. We took the word of the Chief Electoral Officer and of the minister that the forms were consistent with the Act, and that the changes made in them were merely so that the forms would dovetail—to use the minister's expression—in with the Act itself. But I should not like the committee to receive the impression that the Committee on Privileges and Elections had really worked over these forms.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If not you ought to have done so.

Mr. EULER: Before we go on with the schedules, Mr. Chairman, am I in order in proposing an additional clause?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member would certainly be in order in proposing an additional clause now, but as we have already started on the schedule, and as I understand the minister desires to dispose of clause 3, if the hon. member will allow the present amendment to be proceeded with he will have an opportunity later to move his additional clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that the section be amended by striking out Form 29 and substituting therefor the form which I have just submitted.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the committee returned to the consideration of section 3—revising officers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the Elections Act passed last session judges would certainly have been entitled to fees but for the provisions of the Judges Act. Under that Act it has been held that a judge performing services during an election could not receive fees. The judges have performed a lot of pretty hard work in this connection, and it has been suggested to the Chief Electoral Officer—not to the Government or any member of it—that they might receive reasonable remuneration for such services. The Chief Electoral Officer points out that if Parliament wants the lists to be revised by judges provision for payment will have to be made, and that if we do not make such provision the greater part of the lists will be revised by substitutes appointed by the judges.

Mr. McMASTER: Who would be lawyers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes; but the substitutes will be paid. If it is the desire of the House to utilize the services of judges for this work, I fancy that as a practical matter we will have to make provision for their payment. A judge has power under the Act to appoint substitutes, and it is absolutely necessary that that power be given because in many ridings, such as Toronto, Montreal, and the like, a judge cannot do all the work and substitutes are a necessity. If the judges find they are not going to receive anything for their labours, they will not work any harder and substitutes will be appointed. Personally I do not favour paying judges, and it is a suggestion made by the Chief Electoral Officer for the working out of the Act. Whatever the committee decides will be agreeable to the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend does not state in so many words that the judges, although paid servants of the country, will not do their duty under this Act unless paid extra, but that is the implication. I am quite willing to have our judges well paid—and I have supported every proposal to increase their salaries—but I hope the suggestion is not justified that they, who should be the highest exemplars of good citizenship, will not do their work without receiving extra pay, although they are already paid liberal salaries. If we want the judges to do this work, it is part of the public service for which they are already paid, and they have no right to receive extra payment for it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have not placed this as an obligation on the judges; they have the option under the Act of doing it or not doing it. The idea I intended to convey was that if they get nothing for their services they will probably appoint substitutes to do the work, and those substitutes will have to be paid; but if the provision in this amendment were to pass, judges doing the work would receive the same remuneration as their substitutes.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my hon. friend can provide that it is incumbent on a judge to do this work in so far as his other duties will permit him, but where that is not the case he will be allowed to appoint a substitute. I am obliged to repeat my former observation that the time a judge devotes to this work is time for which he is already paid.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's in respect to what should properly be regarded as the duties of judges. The duty of a judge in administering the law is a part of his profession, and he certainly should not get any extra payment for the discharge of that duty; but when we take him away from that and ask him to do work that has nothing to do with his calling or training as a lawyer, we are asking him to do something which his salary as a judge is not intended to cover at all. The minister has not said anything about the point I raised in regard to those salaries. There must be substitutes, and there is no provision made for their payment in the amendment read by the Chairman. If an account came to the hands of the Auditor General for payment of such work, I think he would be disposed to say, "there is no provision under this Act for passing this account." If this provision for paying a judge is made to read that it shall also apply to the man he appoints in his place, I think it would very much simplify matters, and we would not be troubled with what construction a taxing officer might put upon the law. If the judges are called upon to do work which is outside their regular duties they should be paid for it just as anybody else would be paid for it.

Mr. FIELDING: But a judge who does that work is devoting his time to a service which has no relation whatever to his duties of office.

Mr. McKENZIE: But he has to do the other work as well.

Mr. EULER: Will this provision apply in the case of judges who issue voting certificates under section 29?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the present tariff, framed under section 76, the whole fee to which a judge or his substitute would be entitled, for doing all the work in connection with an election would be $50.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): It would seem to be the general policy of the House to avoid extra payments to judges, and to let them depend on the salaries which we vote them. I think there is a great deal in the contention of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's that when we assign a salary to a judge we are paying him for such time as he is able to give to the service of the country. I know, and the minister himself knows, that there are some judges who have not much to do, but who get the same salaries as those who have twice as much to do; I think that is why the minister himself is not wholly in favour of his amendment. Some judges have very little to do; others have too much to do. In the case of the judge whose duties are so great that he has no time to give to such services as these, it is well that we should have a provision enabling him to engage some one else to do it. But where the judge himself does the work—and a great many of them will feel that they themselves should do it—I do not think they should be given extra pay, because if that judge has not enough work to do there is no reason why he should not give gratis the time for these duties. There is no reason why the judge who has only half enough work to keep him busy should get extra pay which the busy man is not in a position to get. I think, therefore, that the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. McKENZIE: Every province has its set times and places for holding courts in all districts. The time for the opening and closing of the court is set. The judges must hold chambers on certain days of the week. The judges must have time to keep abreast of their profession and thus be enabled to discharge properly their duties as judges. But you cannot put judges out at statute labour between times; you cannot send them to follow threshing mills and do that sort of thing. That is not their business. They are called upon to do certain work at certain times and outside of that we have no claim on their time.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I agree with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. The judges should be well paid. I think that since I have been in this house we have twice increased the salaries of judges. If those salaries are not sufficiently high we should increase them still further. But I do object to any particular class of people having their salaries increased indirectly through fees and commissions and things of that kind. I notice, of course, the very earnest manner in which the lawyers of the House come to the defence of the judges, not only on this occasion but on every occasion. I am not saying they should not, because they all have prospective judgeships in mind, I presume.

Mr. McMASTER: Perish the thought!

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I think the principle is bad, Mr. Chairman. I do not think that judges, especially judges of the county court in Ontario, are worked very hard. In fact, any of them with whose work I happen to be acquainted have a very easy time. Some of them hold court three or four times a year, three or four days each time, and they are quite free not only to leave their districts at times, but occasionally to leave the province and sometimes the country for long periods.

Mr. JACOBS: That is because the doctor orders complete rest.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I hope my hon. friend will have a very considerate physician when he reaches that stage. As I say, the principle is absolutely wrong. The judges are certainly supposed to give all their time to the country's interest, and if these matters come under their jurisdiction I do not think they should receive extra pay.

Section agreed to.

Mr. EULER: Before the Bill goes out of committee I would like to suggest the addition of a clause, amending section 29 of the Dominion Elections Act of last year. I directed the attention of the minister and of the Government last year to what I thought was an injustice in connection with the disfranchisement of certain citizens. At that time the Government gave us an amendment which corrected the wrong to some extent but which in my opinion did not go far enough. Believing as I do that a thing is not settled until it is settled right, I am going to suggest to the minister the addition of a clause which will remove entirely what I believe to be an injustice to a large number of Canadian citizens.

I should like to explain briefly the significance of the clause to which I take exception, subsection 2 of section 29. It is that all women of alien origin who are married to British subjects and by virtue of that marriage have themselves become British subjects are not given the vote as are their sister British subjects in this country, without being put to the necessity of appearing before a judge to whom they must show cause why they should be granted a voting certificate. In effect, while it is possible for these women to obtain voting privileges, the provision results in the practical disfranchisement of 100,000 or more people who are citizens of Canada under the law. I want to suggest that the conferring of citizenship should carry with it the franchise without unnecessary restrictions. In my opinion the minister offered no convincing reason last year why an exception should be made in the case of these women. To-day we have a condition whereby not only women of former enemy alien origin but women who come from France or Belgium or Italy or Russia, if they are married to Canadian citizens and have thus become British subjects, are debarred from voting if they do not go to the trouble of appearing before a judge. I will admit frankly that a good many people in my constituency are affected by this. I think many more are affected in the western provinces. I would again urge upon the minister to go the whole length of removing this grievance and of allowing British citizenship to carry with it the right to vote. Under the British law, so soon as a woman marries a British citizen, she herself becomes a British subject. She should by right have the vote as have other women who are citizens of Canada.

One other point has, perhaps, been lost sight of. Under the law, when a man of foreign origin becomes naturalized, the minor children of that man also become British subjects, and in the past, on attaining the proper age, they have been allowed to vote. Under the law as it now stands, even those men who, perhaps, for many years have been voting, are put to the necessity of appearing before a judge and obtaining a voting certificate. That is wrong; it is an indignity to those people; it is not fair. Practically the only privilege that goes with British citizenship is the right of the ballot, and this Government should not place itself in the position of giving citizenship with one hand and taking away the greatest privilege of citizenship with the other. For that reason, I move that the following clause be added to the Bill as clause 22 thereof:

22. "Subsection (2) of section 29 of the Dominion Elections Act, chapter forty-six of the Statutes of 1920, is hereby repealed."

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I take it from the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) that the intention of the amendment is to make provision by which any woman, it matters not from where she comes, who marries a British subject, shall at the moment be entitled to the franchise in Canada. Am I right in my interpretation of the hon. gentleman's proposition?

Mr. EULER: If she fulfils the other conditions.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Under that condition the native of an enemy country, who has been in Canada long enough to become a British citizen, who returns to the country of his origin, who marries a citizen of that country and who immediately returns to Canada, will automatically create a new elector in this country. If we take the ground that a woman gets the franchise merely by right of her husband having the franchise, there might be something in what the hon. member says; but I think all will agree that when we granted the franchise to women, we felt that we were giving the franchise to an independent body of electors who would be themselves responsible for the position that they took when they cast ballots, who would themselves decide which side of the question they were going to vote on. I do not think my hon. friend would argue that a woman, coming into this country from Eastern or Central Europe, one of the enemy countries, if you will, or for that matter, any other country, who has no idea whatever of what the ideals of Canadian citizenship are, who has never had an opportunity of understanding what they are, who simply becomes the wife of a man who, perhaps, was born in Canada and who understands them, automatically, by reason of her marriage, becomes a British citizen entitled to the franchise in Canada.

Mr. EULER: Would my hon. friend say the same thing of a Mexican woman who marries a Canadian citizen, a British subject? Should she be entitled to vote? She is, under the Act, and so is a negress from the West Indies, but a woman from France, Belgium, Italy or Germany is not.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): My personal opinion would be, if the hon. member wants that, that no man or woman, who comes from any country, the ideals of whose citizenship are wholly different from or opposed to the ideals of Canadian citizenship, is competent to exercise the franchise in this country, until he or she has lived here long enough to understand something of what Canadian citizenship means. There is in the Act a provision that makes a difference for citizens of North American countries because it is recognized that people born on the North American continent have ideals largely the same as ours.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. JACOBS: Is it because they are born on this continent that they have similar ideals?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Because they are trained here, because they are educated here, because they live under conditions similar to those that we have. That cannot be said of citizens of Eastern and Central Europe. I think my hon. friends will agree with that, and I will not labour the point. My position is simply this: I am wholly opposed to the idea behind the suggestion that, merely because a woman, coming from an enemy country or, for that matter, a friendly country, whose ideals are wholly different from ours, marries a man who is entitled to the franchise in Canada, she shall receive the franchise. In the first place, such a proposition is a direct contradiction of everything underlying the granting of the franchise to women. If a woman is to vote simply because her husband has a vote, you are simply giving the man two votes; you are not setting up an independent body of electors, and that was the idea behind the whole question of granting the franchise to women. At this time, during the years following the war, during 1920 and 1921, large numbers of men from the newer parts of Canada are going back to the countries of their origin; a very large number of them will return with their wives, newly married. These men may have been living in Canada for many years; they may know something of Canadian citizenship; but it cannot be argued that, because of that fact, their wives know something of Canadian citizenship. Their wives, if they receive the franchise, will be, in political affairs, mere automatons registering the opinions of their husbands. I do not think the hon. gentleman can offer anything in the nature of a sound argument for the granting of the franchise to a woman solely because her husband has the franchise.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): The arguments of my hon. friend may be very convincing to himself, but I am sure they are not convincing to any one who has given the subject any consideration at all. He deals entirely with an exceptional case and there is no reason why the exceptional case which he suggests should not go before a judge, get a certificate and vote. The only difference is that the applicant is put to some trouble. He must surely see that the exceptional case which he suggests is not touched by this at all. Another exceptional case is put up to him, but he ignores it entirely. Is a woman coming from France, who is not permitted to vote under this legislation, any worse than a woman coming under similar conditions from Mexico? My hon. friend does not care to deal with that. That is exactly the position of the Act as it stands at present. That is what he is defending. He puts up an exceptional case, and the Act does not touch the exceptional case at all because the woman to whom he objects to give the franchise can vote under this Act. All that my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) is asking for is that a woman should not be put to unreasonable trouble, and I think he is right in his contention. I do not think the circumstances in his constituency are as bad as they are in others. I know, in many parts of the West, this will simply mean shutting out from voting women who have lived in the West for the last thirty or forty years and who have become thoroughly good Canadian citizens.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Can these women not go before the judge and qualify the same as their husbands?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Certainly, and so can people coming from alien enemy countries. Don't shut these people out at all; if they want to go before the judge, let them go. I think that you will find that the bigger proportion of the crooks who want to do some harm to the country—Reds, if you like, thorough Bolshevists, who want to upset the institutions of this country—will go to the judge and get the right to vote, while the honest, hard-working woman who thinks of her home, and is a good citizen, will not go as a rule. That will be the effect of the law as it stands now.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Thomson) has expressed my view exactly. There is nothing in the world to prevent these women from voting; if they parade before the judge and exhibit their finery to him, they will obtain their certificate. And that is what we object to. Why should the women be put in a different position from the men? As soon as a man holds his British certificate of citizenship, he holds it out to the world and can go to the poll and cast his vote for any person he likes. But a distinction is made with regard to the women. They are British subjects by the fact of their husbands' naturalization, and we say that no good purpose can be served in the world by having these women apply to the court during the period of an electoral campaign for the purpose of receiving from the judge a certificate to the effect that they are entitled to vote. The only reason why that provision was introduced was because the Government felt that these women, who are supposed at times to act by intuition, might know who were their friends and who were not, and vote against the Government. That is the only reason I can see why this was introduced. It is silly, and it is against the principles of British fair-play; it is a departure from the ordinary rules, and it should at once be abolished. There is an old saying that people ought to repent before death, and this is a fine opportunity for the Government to do so. It is said of someone that the finest thing he did in his life was the way he went to his death, and I think it would be fine for the Government, before they finally eliminate themselves, to perform this act of pure and unadulterated justice to this class of the voters in this next election. After all, there may be some women who may vote for this Government; in certain antediluvian sections of this country there may be some women who have not read of the record of this Government, and may vote for them. But if it were pointed out to them that this Government is no friend to the women, that it put every possible objection in the way of their voting, I ask you on which side would the women cast their votes, regardless of the record of the Government? Most certainly they would cast their votes for the people who were in favour of giving to women the widest measure of liberty in the matter of the franchise. We argued last year for a considerable time the absurdity and the anomaly of the law as it then stood. We pointed out that women who married British subjects and who came from parts of Central America, where certainly the ideals are not any higher than they are in France or Belgium, or in the Scandinavian countries, would have the right to vote while the woman from France or Belgium or these other countries would not have the right to vote. Is this law going to have the effect of barring out the women that my hon. friend from Algoma thinks it will have? I say that it will not have that effect. The thing is an absurd piece of legislation. I venture to say that in no other country in the world have they such legislation as this, and surely hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, many of whom are more or less intelligent, cannot possibly vote against the resolution of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) without having to explain to their electors and the country at large their reasons for doing so.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I am ready to admit my denseness, but I must nevertheless say that what I have heard from my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) and my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) has not converted me, but rather has it convinced me that I was right in the first place. As to what my hon. friend has said with regard to women from Mexico, if he wants my personal opinion, I am opposed to giving the franchise automatically to a man or woman from any country, I care not which, who does not understand something of the ideals of Canadian citizenship. If the provision in the Act is wrong that makes it possible for a Mexican woman to have that right, I would hold up both hands for amending the law and making it impossible for her to have that right.

Mr. JACOBS: Wherein do the ideals of French citizenship differ from those of Canadian citizenship?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I do not know that they differ at all, but one thing I know, and that is that the language of the average French citizen is different from the language of many Canadian citizens.

Mr. JACOBS: French is an official language in this country, and in this House.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I appreciate fully what is in my hon. friend's mind. I know we have a dual language system, and I have no objection to it in any sense whatever. But that does not answer the argument at all. The whole argument in favour of granting the franchise to women because their husbands have the franchise is based on the supposition that the woman automatically becomes a British subject because her husband is. Now, becoming a British subject does not carry with it the right of the franchise; there is no question about that.

Mr. JACOBS: It should.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): But it does not. What underlies this whole question is simply this: When the franchise was granted to women I think it was recognized by those who advocated it that the women were going to be an independent body of electors, exercising their own judgment and having their own opinions, and not simply following the opinions and judgments of their husbands. My hon. friend says that because a man goes before a judge and takes the oath of allegiance and becomes a British subject, he can then marry any woman he pleases and she automatically becomes an elector.

Mr. JACOBS: She should not have to go before the court; that is onr objection.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): She should have to go; there is no reason why she should not qualify the same as a man. If it is necessary for a man to undertake certain obligations and possess certain qualifications in order to become an elector in this country, it is necessary that the woman who is exercising the same franchise and has equal privileges and responsibilities should be in identically the same position as the man, and that is what the Act calls for.

Mr. CRERAR: When my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) brought this matter before the House a year ago, when the Franchise Act was under discussion, I supported the position he took then, and I am very glad to support it again to-day notwithstanding the arguments that have been advanced by my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson).

There may be something said for this position: that the woman coming to Canada in the future and marrying a Canadian citizen should be required by personal naturalization to qualify for the right of exercising the franchise, but there is absolutely no defence for the position of affairs resulting from the existing section in the Act which my hon. friend from North Waterloo wishes to have repealed. We have, not single isolated cases, not scores, not hundreds, not thousands, but tens of thousands of cases in this country, of women who have been living in Canada, some of them for as long as fifty years, who are disqualified under this section from voting until they have secured, often with very great difficulty, the necessary certificate from a judge.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Can these women not go before a judge and get the right to become elected?

Mr. CRERAR: Why should they have to do that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why should a man have to do it?

Mr. CRERAR: He does not have to go before the judge.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He has to go before the judge to be naturalized.

Mr. CRERAR: Let me cite an illustration. An American citizen, a person who owed allegiance to the United States, came to Canada, say, in 1900, bringing with him his wife. He qualified in due time as a British subject, and secured the right to exercise the franchise. By that very act his wife has always been recognized in Canada, up to the present time, as a British subject. There is no question as to his right to vote, because he has qualified. Now, according to this Act, his wife must go through all this formality—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CRERAR: Pardon me; it is one of the anomalies of the Bill that it does not apply to a woman born in America; I am taking the wrong case. But let us take the case of a French woman or an Icelandic woman, or a Norwegian, or a Swedish woman—and we have thousands of these people in the country. These women have to go personally before a judge and comply with all this formality in order to be able to exercise the franchise.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So has the man.

Mr. CRERAR: No. The man has been a British subject and his wife has been recognized as a British subject in this country for years, but there is a discrimination against the woman, in this section of the Act, that should not exist. As my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), and my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson), pointed out, a Mexican woman coming to Canada is not under the disability that has been placed upon the French woman or any of the others I have mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mexican women do not come, as a matter of fact.

Mr. CRERAR: They may not, but they can, as a matter of law, and my hon. friend knows they can. It is not an argument to say that they do not, for the law expressly provides that they can come.

Mr. JACOBS: And so can a coloured woman from Georgetown.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Such a woman can marry a Canadian citizen and by that fact she is entitled to the franchise without going through this formality. Why place this discrimination on these other women? There are thousands of Icelandic women in Western Canada, born in Iceland, some as long as fifty or so years ago. They have been living here, claiming and exercising all the rights of British citizenship, and yet, under this provision, they are not qualified to vote, while their husbands may have been qualified for a generation. That is not a desirable condition of affairs. If the minister in charge of the Bill drew the line at the present time and said that henceforth every alien woman coming to Canada, whether from the United States, from Mexico, Iceland, Germany, Russia, or anywhere else, must personally naturalize and qualify for the franchise, something could be said to support that position. But this discrimination should not be continued, and I suggest to my hon. friend that he might very well settle the matter in that way, which, I believe, would be entirely acceptable to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). What is complained of is the disability placed under this section upon women who have been in Canada for perhaps two generations. That is wrong and should be remedied, and I think my hon. friend from North Waterloo has stated in very reasonable terms a perfectly fair proposition to the Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question which I should like to have answered in connection with this subject is, how a woman is to go before a judge if there is no judge before whom to go. That is the real problem presented by the Act as it stands at the present time. In many constituencies there are only three or four judicial centres, and in order for a large majority of women electors to become entitled to vote under the law, they have to go some ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, and in some cases, one hundred miles, to obtain the voting certificate. That is a physical impossibility, and very costly in the case of a large number of citizens. That is a feature of the Act that requires to be looked into. I made the suggestion earlier, in regard to another section of the Act, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections might be asked to consider one or two of these features of the Act, and report upon them to the House before the close of the session. I should like the minister to consider that suggestion in regard to this amendment; if he cannot accept the amendment outright, the Committee on Privileges and Elections might look into this particular matter in view of the injustice which it occasions to thousands of women electors who are about to exercise the franchise now for the first time. Unfortunately, there is not in Parliament any woman to voice the women's point of view on this disability as women see it. Happily, however, I happen to have here an article which has been written by a woman who has given careful study to this particular section of the Act, and which presents in a manner that I think will appeal to hon. members, the real nature of the difficulty involved in the section as it stands, and the great injustice which it does not to hundreds but to thousands of women who are British subjects in this country. The article in question appears in the Manitoba Free Press of May 2, and is written by Miss Mary P. McCallum, assistant secretary to the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I shall not read the whole article, but the part that relates to the point brought up by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, where he spoke of the inconvenience to which numbers of electors are put, and the unnecessary trouble which is entailed upon them in consequence of this section. The article says:

> The most serious difficulty is that of the inaccessibility of judges to most rural residents in the prairie provinces. There are not more than one or two judicial centres in each federal riding. In one at least, Last Mountain, there is no court centre. Each judge has an itinerary of three or four places in his judicial district where he holds district court once or twice a year. The court sits at these points usually for not more than a day. The majority of persons who require these certificates reside scores of miles from any place where the judge is scheduled to hold court. Railways are not convenient which may require an awkward change of trains, long delays, hotel expense, etc.

Hon. members will see from that statement that women under the Act as it stands now have to know, first of all, the one day of the year on which a judge may be at a particular centre, and then may have to travel hundreds of miles in order to get the voting certificate. I am sure that if hon. members appreciated the real nature of the working of this section of the Act, they would not willingly inflict this injustice on a large number of British subjects. Take a concrete instance, which is the next point mentioned in the article, of the by-election which will be held in Medicine Hat in the near future. Here is the exact statement as to how the Act will operate in connection with this one by-election:

> This may be illustrated by taking the case of Medicine Hat. There is to be a by-election there some time this summer to fill the vacancy created by the death of the late Hon. A. L. Sifton. There are parts of three judicial districts in Medicine Hat, but in all, the judge holds court at only five points in the entire riding, which is 192 miles long and 66 miles wide. Three railways run east and west across the constituency. A woman at Iddesleigh at the western edge of the riding on the Empress-Bassano branch of the Canadian Pacific railway, enquired where she must go for her "voting certificate". She may go to Empress, 118 miles away, on June 14, when the district court sits, or to Calgary, 138 miles away; or to Medicine Hat, 148 miles distant, changing trains in either of the latter two cases. In these times the cost in money and time is prohibitory and amounts to disfranchisement.
> Compared to McKenzie or Humboldt or Victoria constituencies, Medicine Hat cannot be said to be largely a non-English constituency but the disfranchisement in Medicine Hat is not inconsiderable.
> Taking the case of women only, according to the census of 1916 there were 3,246 females in the electoral riding of Medicine Hat who were not British born. According to the same census three-fifths of them would be of voting age. This leaves about 2,000 women born in foreign countries and of voting age. In Alberta 18 per cent of the people in 1916 were born in the United States. This percentage, applied to the women in this constituency leaves something over 1,500 women of foreign birth outside the Continent of North America who must travel to one of these five points and obtain their "voting certificate" to enable them to vote in the by-election this coming spring or summer.

Now there is the case of just one constituency with respect to the pending by-elections, and what is true of that constituency is more or less true of every constituency in the Canadian west, and is true in a large measure of constituencies in other parts of Canada as well. If these facts are correct—and I challenge the minister to dispute them at all—it will be apparent that this Act, instead of being an Act to enfranchise women voters, is going to disfranchise thousands of British citizens in this country. Is it any wonder, therefore, that the writer of this article concludes with the following paragraph:

> The Government may deny the disfranchising effect of the Elections Act on technicality. But it disfranchises on a scale not approached by the War Time Elections Act. That Act affected the persons of enemy alien extraction, but it did not touch the Dane, or the Frenchman, or the Hollander, or the persons of any other friendly foreign country. Now, it says to all persons of foreign birth, who have been naturalized by operation of law, except those born in the United States, no matter whether they have voted in this country for the last thirty or forty years, that they are no longer British subjects and may not vote until they produce evidence by a most roundabout and inconvenient method, that they are qualified to vote. Their thinking process in their adopted English is likely to get a very stubborn hold of one fact, namely, that they are disfranchised. Professions of lofty motives on the part of the Government are likely to excite still more their resentment and not to interest or mollify them at all. Unless something is done soon to re-establish their pre-war confidence in Canadian men and Canadian institutions the thin edge of the wedge of disruption already will have been driven into the life of Western Canada. With absolute power virtually to disfranchise thousands of persons, does it look as if the next election is to be the free and unbiased opinion of the whole people of Canada upon the issues engaging the Government of the country?

I contend that that statement, which is from a woman's point of view on a matter which affects the women voters of this country, is entitled to the most careful consideration of this House. I think, on the face of it, it clearly discloses the truth of the statement that the Act, as it stands, disfranchises thousands of British subjects; and I would therefore repeat, in order that the matter may be dealt with in as thoughtful and careful a way as possible, that I think the minister would be well advised if he would allow the Committee on Privileges and Elections to take this representation, by a woman of this country, on behalf of the women of Canada, and consider this section of the Act in relation to these representations, and see if it is not possible to make some amendment which will serve the purpose which is most needed. May I point out this fact: If it is not possible for the minister to see his way to amending the Act, so as to prevent it being necessary for women to travel these hundreds of miles on one particular day to get a voting certificate, perhaps the law can be amended in a way that will fix a certain date by which judges would be required by itinerary to visit the different parts of these constituencies so as to give the voters there a chance to obtain their voting certificates. I think the Government should seek to meet the people, rather than that the people should be obliged to run after some officer of the Government in order to obtain what is the just and right privilege of every British subject.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This question comes up before the committee rather irregularly because it forms no part of the Bill under discussion; but the leader of the Opposition intimated on the second reading of the Bill that he would like permission for the discussion of one or two amendments which were not incorporated in the measure, and for the purpose of discussion we readily agreed. However, I had not at that time any idea that this question which was so thoroughly discussed eleven months ago, was going to be re-introduced into the House again to-day. I know of no clause in the Franchise Act of last session which occupied quite as much time as the question under discussion to-day. After the most prolonged consideration and discussion, eleven months ago, this House adopted a certain course, and I do not think that in the meantime anything has transpired to cause it to change its opinion. However, I have received a little light on the subject this afternoon from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition —a suggestion which was not before us when the clause was considered last year— and that is that something might be done in the way of asking judges, or procuring judges, to go round the various country districts a little more than they have done in the past. This, however, must be kept clearly in mind: There have been eleven full months now during which these women could have obtained these certificates. Very few of them, I understand, have made application. They take little or no interest in the matter. They have not shown enough interest in the question to go and apply for certificates, except in very few instances—not in the West, but in the thickly populated districts in the East. Now, I can well understand that in certain of the more remote constituencies there will be some degree of inconvenience to some people. We knew that last year, we discussed it last year, and the view of the House at that time was, that notwithstanding some slight inconvenience with which a limited number of people would have to put up, the principle was nevertheless a sound one; and if it is a good principle to apply it to people coming to this country in the future, as is suggested by my hon. friend the leader of the Agrarian group (Mr. Crerar), it would be just as sound a principle to apply it to those already here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If we are going to include all those who come in the future and require with respect to them that they shall apply to a judge, why draw a distinction between them and those who are here? Those who are here have never voted in Canada, those who are coming in future have never voted, and if one class is to be placed at some disadvantage and inconvenience so should the other class. But the inconvenience has been very much magnified here and in the matter which has been read. In the vast majority of cases there is no inconvenience at all. These people have not regarded the sacred right of the franchise very highly because, even in the county of my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) the county of Waterloo, little advantage has been taken, if any, of the permission to obtain these certificates. Under that state of affairs I submit there is no grievance and there are no hardships; but I do not think it would be improper to suggest that some measure might be framed, particularly with respect to the more remote constituencies, whereby, within the next twelve or fifteen months, say, judges should make periodical visits to the more remote sections in order to give every facility for obtaining these certificates. However, I do not think that is a ground for amending the Dominion Elections Law. I think that matter is well worth consideration, but not in connection with this Bill—that would be in connection with the Judges Act or some other Act; and I shall have to ask the committee to vote down the amendment of my hon. friend from North Waterloo.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot agree with my hon. friend that there is anything irregular in the amendment that is proposed. The measure before us is a Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act. It is perfectly true that the minister has put in a number of clauses of his own, but there is nothing to preclude any hon. member—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I have not put in any clause of my own, not one.

Mr. KING: The hon. gentleman says he has not put in any clause of his own. He must accept responsibility for the clauses that are in the Bill, and I am speaking now entirely of his responsibility for the measure. The minister, as I have said, has a number of clauses in the Bill which he has presented to the House. It is the right and privilege of any member of the House to add to these clauses—to suggest additions, or amendments. That is all we are doing—we are suggesting amendments to the law, amendments based on an experience that the House did not have when the measure was before it the last time. Now my hon. friend says that the hardships in regard to this particular phase of the Act have been very much exaggerated. I ask my hon. friend, will he challenge a single statement in what I have read? Will he say that a single word of Miss McCallum's article is incorrect? Unless he is prepared to say that this article is not expressing the truth with regard to the distances these women have to travel, the number of times these courts are held, and the number of judges holding these courts, I will have to accept the article as correct. My hon. friend said that women had not shown very much interest in this matter and that very few had registered. Well, he knows, as any other member knows, that the laws as passed by Parliament are not known to the electorate within a month or two, or even a year or two, and that in many cases laws such as these affecting particularly the rights of persons of foreign origin are not likely ever to be heard of by them. That is not through any fault of theirs, it is their misfortune. They cannot keep themselves informed of all legislation. We know as a positive fact that probably not more than one woman out of five hundred or even out of a thousand who would be affected by this law would ever know of it from the press or from the records of Parliament, but would have to gain such knowledge through something which persons connected with the candidate or the party organization might tell her. In large constituencies, whether in rural areas or crowded cities, it is an impossible thing to expect that individuals will go about informing different persons who are entitled to naturalization by operation of law that they must appear before a judge and obtain a certificate. When we have that condition of affairs, it seems to me, it is the duty of Parliament to provide a means for what is an obvious necessity. My hon. friend says that he does not think this is a reason for amending the law. I must thank him for intimating that he sees something in the suggestion that some method should be arranged whereby judges can be brought a little nearer those who would have to apply for voting certificates. But I submit that it is proper that any changes of this kind should not be a matter of discretion or chance.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The provinces could regulate that. They fix the places for the holding of the courts, and they could spread them out for this purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This will not be a court. This being Dominion election machinery, it would have to be expressed in some enactment by the Federal Government before the province would act on it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we have given jurisdiction to all those judges. We do not fix the places where they hold their courts; that is done by the provinces; and if there is such a grievance in these remote districts as to make it necessary to designate more places where the judges shall hold court, the provincial authorities could act in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the Government of each province may direct the judges for the purpose of this Act to appear at different—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, for the purposes of holding court. Each judge, no matter where he is in his own district, can grant these certificates. Now, if the provincial authorities say that a judge shall hold court at this, that and the other point, within the next six, eight, or twelve months, that will give the people of those remote districts an opportunity to get certificates,—if there is a real grievance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that the provinces would not likely authorize or direct a judge to hold court simply for the sake of holding court. I want to find out if my hon. friend means that a province might direct judges to visit different centres for the purpose of permitting persons to appear before them to get voting certificates, and whether it would be within its jurisdiction in instructing the judges to act accordingly?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. They could direct the judges to hold court at A, B, C and D for all judicial purposes; that would be sufficient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows, better perhaps than any one else in the House, that that is not going to be done by any province where they have only two or three customary centres.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are paying for it; it does not cost the province anything. If there is a real grievance—something that has not been magnified in this House; and I maintain it has been—in these remote parts, all the local government has to do is to designate certain convenient point for the judges to hold their courts, and the judges are bound to go. We pay them their salaries and travelling expenses. There the people can appear and get the certificates that they are entitled to. That gets over the inconevnience; and it is the only thing wrong with the Act, if it is a grievance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To make this perfectly clear, would the attorney general of Alberta, for instance, be justified, with the support of his government, in directing that the judges in that province should hold court this next year, say, in forty different centres in each constituency?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, each province has power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He would be acting within his rights if he gave instructions for the judges to hold court for the electors to appear before them for this purpose?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For all purposes connected with their judicial functions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the attorney general have power to do that without enactment of the legislature?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not say he would without legislation. When I say "the provincial government" I mean the provincial power, which is the legislature.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I think my hon. friend, to be fair with the House, ought to make perfectly clear what is in the back of his mind. Before that step could be taken, which on the face of it is plausible enough, it would be necessary for each province to enact legislation establishing additional courts for all purposes. That is a step the provinces might very well hesitate to take. But I do think this Government ought, in connection with the administration of this Act, to put in a clause which would meet what I am sure my hon. friend sees now is an injustice that will not bear examination.

Mr CRERAR: Did I understand the minister to say that in any case the Federal Government would pay for the costs involved in holding these additional courts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Federal Government pays the travelling expenses and salaries of the judges.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but would they pay the hall rent and the other expenses?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course not. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not mean that.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend knows very well they do not do that. And this would mean, so far as the provinces are concerned, that if they were to establish the necessary number of courts to properly handle this work it would mean a great additional expense, and my hon. friend knows perfectly well they will not undertake it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps my suggestion was too expensive.

Mr. CRERAR: I would like to ask my hon. friend another question. I am not a lawyer and I—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Thank God therefor.

Mr. CRERAR: —am asking for enlightenment. I will illustrate my question in this way. An Icelander came to Canada say, forty years ago, with a son five years of age. In due course that son attained the age of twenty-one years. His father had qualified for the vote, and the son was thereby also qualified and exercised the vote for the past twenty years. Am I correct in interpreting the Act as it stands at present to this effect, that the son is now disfranchised unless he goes before a judge and gets a certificate?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where was he born?

Mr. CRERAR: In Iceland.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, he has to get a certificate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the son would have to get a certificate.

Mr. CRERAR: Then, really this Act is not an enfranchising Act, it is a disfranchising Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, he has to get a certificate.

Mr. CRERAR: But although he has exercised the vote for twenty years he is disfranchised.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be odd cases of that sort.

Mr. CRERAR: They are not odd cases, there are thousands of them.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): He was lucky.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I am forced to the conclusion that the Government in adhering so rigidly to this unfair clause are simply seeking to get some political advantage in disfranchising tens of thousands of people who are likely to vote against them, and who by all the rules of fairness are entitled to vote. This can be the only reason, and it will not commend itself to the fair judgment of the country.

Mr. HAY: Before this matter comes to a vote I would like to say that I agree largely with what the member for Marquette has said. We should consider this amendment seriously before we vote it down, because I am satisfied that it will work some hardship on people in Western Canada—the Icelandic people, and perhaps some people from other countries. In the case cited by the member for Marquette, as I understand it, a young Icelander who had been voting for a number of years would be disfranchised if he did not get a certificate of naturalization. Now, I think that would be unfair; the very fact that citizenship had been extended to the son through the naturalization of the father should entitle the son to the franchise. I am not going to argue that foreigners should be enfranchised simply because they have married British subjects, but I do say that men and women who have lived in Canada for a great number of years and who have already had the privilege of the franchise should not be disfranchised by this Act. I urge upon the Acting Solicitor General and the Government the necessity of carefully inquiring into this question before finally disposing of it. If that is not done, I would ask that the Government make provision for judges to sit at convenient points all over Canada in connection with this matter. This is particularly necessary if the lists to be revised are two years old, as would be the case in some provinces. I am satisfied that if this Bill becomes law in its present form it will work hardship upon hundreds of thousands of people in Western Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not quite agree with the principles enunciated, first by my hon. friend the Solicitor General and then by my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). The elementary right of a British citizen is his right to the franchise. The law of Canada as regards naturalization has been revised on several occasions, and it now is as perfect as it can be. Naturalized British subjects should not be prevented in any way from exercising the franchise, but by this legislation you are putting obstacles in the way of the exercise of the franchise by certain people. The leader of the Opposition has cited instances in which it would be impossible for a woman living in a remote part of Canada to reach a judge in order to get a certificate. It would be more British; it would be much fairer to give de pleno the franchise to the person who has been naturalized. My hon. friend from East Algoma is a stout Britisher; he will not forget that the question of the franchise has always played a great part in the history of the Empire of which we are all so proud. He will remember that war was declared on South Africa some twenty years ago because the Uitlanders—British subjects—in the Transvaal were denied the right of the franchise by President Kruger, and that on that occasion, a resolution was adopted by this House joining hands with the Mother Country. There is an object lesson for my hon. friends; and if they are true to their ideals, as I have no doubt they are, they should give the people a fair chance to exercise their right to vote. The hon. member for Algoma has a queer notion as regards female suffrage. He seems to think that by granting woman suffrage we have created a special class of voters. Mr. Chairman, at any election to take place hereafter, there will be no distinction between the female and the male electors; they both belong to one class of citizens—Canadians, exercising their right to vote.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Then if they are both in the same position why should we not place them in the same position with regard to the securing of the right to the franchise?

Mr. LEMIEUX: That point has already been elucidated. I do not think my hon. friend is putting the question as it should be put before the committee. I am taking exception to the obstacles put in the way of the woman who is a British subject because of her marriage to a British subject. Parliament has granted to that woman the right to the franchise; yet under this proposed legislation, unless she goes a long distance and obtains a certificate you prevent her from reaching the polls. Let us be British; let us be fair; let us be tolerant in the administration of the Elections Act. Remember that it is the elementary right of every British citizen to exercise the franchise. In a country like Canada no such barriers should be put up against the exercise of the franchise.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I think the committee would not make a mistake if they referred this question back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for reconsideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would hold up the Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Well, I still say that it would be worth while to send it back.

Mr. EULER: When I submitted the motion which I made I had hoped to appeal to the ordinary sense and fairness of members of the committee. I am still under the impression that the committee is not really seized of the full significance of that which we are debating this afternoon. The hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson) gave an extreme case. I am quite in agreement with him that it would not be right and proper, as a general thing, to give the franchise to a woman of any foreign country, who had become a British subject by virtue of her marriage with a Canadian citizen a few months ago. She comes with him to this country; the hon. member states that under this amendment she would be entitled to vote. That that should be objected to sounds quite reasonable to me. A case like that, however, would not occur in more than one instance out of a thousand, and for my part I would be quite prepared to support some suggestion that would eliminate that sort of thing. If the Acting Solicitor General could bring in an amendment to the Act, whereby women of that class would have to go through the usual period of residence in this country, five years if you like, before they would be entitled to vote, I think he would be on fair ground. The hon. member for Algoma East also stated that he thought these women should be placed on exactly the same basis as the men and go through all the requirements. Very well, then, I will put this question to him: If men have to become actually naturalized, to become possessed of naturalization certificates, why has a married woman not the power to obtain the same thing? To-day, under the new Naturalization Act which was passed last session, a married woman has not the power to obtain personal naturalization. That discriminates unfairly against married women. I say that merely by the way, and I think the Naturalization Act should be corrected in that regard.

We have in Waterloo county, as in the West, women of foreign birth who have lived in this country for thirty or forty years, who are Canadians, who have sons who have voted repeatedly in this country, who have daughters who will be permitted to vote. While I do not wish to make any appeal whatever to sentiment—it is, perhaps, made too frequently in this way—it is a fact that, under the law as it exists now, if this amendment is not accepted, there will be women, who have lived in this country for thirty or forty years and who had sons in the war, who will be put to the necessity of appearing before a judge before they can vote. I want to put this question to every member of the committee, whether a woman of that kind—and I am not exaggerating when I say that there are literally hundreds and thousands of them in this country—is not entitled to at least the same privileges as a woman receives who came here five or six years ago from the United States or from some other North American country. There can be only one reply.

The minister stated a few moments ago that no injustice is done to these men who are obliged to get a certificate, because they have not voted before. I desire to correct him in that regard. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has already referred to the matter. There are men who came here, as boys with their fathers, from Austria or Germany, whose fathers were naturalized, and under the law as it now stands those men who were permitted to vote even during the war, will no longer be permitted to vote unless the law is changed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to: Progress reported.

At Six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY SIR HENRY DRAYTON, MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, following the usual practice I now take advantage of this motion for the purpose of introducing the annual Budget.

The past year has been a difficult and trying one for business practically the world over, and Canada has suffered in common with other nations from the commercial and economic conditions obtaining. The year has been a year of deflation, and deflation is always difficult. During the first portion of the year the price of commodities, instead of declining after the cessation of hostilities, as was generally expected, sharply rose. Extravagant and luxurious buying was common, and the cost of living in Canada unreasonable.

As a corrective measure, as well as for the purposes of revenue, the taxes of last year, commonly known as Luxury Taxes, were imposed. The object of these taxes was stated in the Budget speech as follows:—

Not only is more revenue necessary but extravagant and luxurious expenditure ought to be checked. Just so long as expenditure on non-essentials and extravagant expenditure continues, just so much longer will the drop in the value of essentials be postponed. On those having income more than necessary for properly maintaining themselves and families, there rests a special duty of saving whenever possible and in this manner adding to the available financial resources for development and for industrial undertakings.

Extravagant buying was slowly but surely checked, and in November declines in commodity prices, both manufacturers' and wholesale, were well marked. The buying public which had previously been so well accustomed to rising markets and then bought freely in the fear that prices would be higher, were convinced that the prices of commodities were on the downward trend, and instead of buying in advance of their needs, stopped purchasing as much as possible in the expectation that prices would continue to fall.

But not only were the taxes designed to check wild spending on the part of the public, they were also calculated to check unnecessary purchases by the trader, so that his inventories might be all the smaller when the inevitable drop in commodities came, and so that the lower level might be reached in more easy stages and with little goods on hand.

Having served these main purposes, the so-called Luxury Taxes were, with but trifling exceptions, abolished on the 18th day of December, 1920.

The year has been a trying one in many activities, but it is felt that the lower price levels have been reached, and that working on the sure foundation of lower costs, the conditions of our trade and commerce ought to steadily improve.

Trade

The year just closed gives a great total for Canadian trade. The previous year, notwithstanding that it was a year of rising prices and general activity in business, showed a total of imports and domestic exports of $2,304,008,267, as against $2,429,288,757 for the year ended March 31, last.

This is a remarkable showing, more particularly in view of the fact that prices had materially declined during the last half of the year and that our heavy export of grain was made on the lower price level. These figures show an increase for the year of $125,280,490. If foreign merchandise brought into Canada and exported be added, the respective totals become for the year ended March 31, 1920, $2,351,174,878, and for the year just closed $2,450,553,175.

For the purpose of comparison, it may be noted that the years at the end of the past two five-year periods, that is for 1916 and 1911, show a total trade of $1,287,117,229 and $741,745,318 respectively. The figures of the past year show great trade activity. Taking nine millions as the approximate population of Canada, and the calendar year as a uniform basis of comparison, it will be found that the aggregate foreign trade per capita in 1920 was $293.30 for Canada, and $127.78 for the United States.

The mere bulk of trade activities does not of necessity, however, show national prosperity. While, on the one hand, the nation may increase in wealth with a comparatively small total business, on the other hand, it is possible to become the poorer in increasing ratio to the amount of gross business done. The vital question is as to whether or not the business as a whole is profitable.

Canada has continued to be a large buyer. Our imports in the year have increased by the sum of $175,608,887, while, on the other hand, our domestic exports have dropped from those of last year by $50,328,397. If the export of foreign produce be included, the total decrease becomes $76,230,590. If mere size of trade was the whole criterion of national prosperity, Canada would indeed be prosperous, and the problems of industrial unemployment and dissatisfaction with farm results entirely non-existent. While it is perfectly true that Canada, relatively, is very much better off at the present moment than many other nations are, the fact nevertheless remains that conditions are not as we would have them.

It has also to be borne in mind that while our total exports are only $76,230,590 short of those of last year, they are $375,741,673 below the gross export peak reached in 1918.

The unfortunate part of our international balances is that with the United States. The unrevised figures for the year show that our exports to that market amounted to $542,304,456 of domestic, and $18,379,342 of foreign produce, while our imports amounted to $856,593,470, resulting in an unfavourable trade balance between the two countries of $295,909,672. This large unfavourable balance, coupled with the largely increased invisible payments which have to be made to American holders of Canadian securities and investments, of necessity creates a heavy demand for New York exchange, resulting in a premium on New York funds. The real balance against Canada is also increased by the aggregate of the discount on Canadian money in New York, as the trade figures do not include the resultant increased cost to the Canadian purchaser.

If Canada is to continue to buy as much as she now does from the United States, she ought to sell a great deal more in that market. It is undoubtedly to her immediate interest that she should do so. The position of our trade with the United States, unfavourable as it is, is likely however to be made still more unfavourable. The Emergency Tariff, commonly known as the Young Bill, which has already been favourably considered by both Houses of the American Congress, calls for the imposition of taxes which would practically prohibit the importation of—in the chief part—Canadian agricultural commodities which amounted in volume during the past year to some $168,350,000. The measure is for but a six months' period, and the permanent Tariff Bill has not yet been brought down.

The legislation is treated as emergency legislation, and is pressed on the ground that the United States have a large surplus of these products, which their farmers are unable to sell, and that the American farmer is subject to unfair competition in the United States market as owing to the discount on Canadian currency the Canadian farmer receives just so many more Canadian dollars, just as useful to him in his own country as the American dollar is to the American farmer.

The underlying difficulty of the whole matter would appear to result from the condition of foreign exchanges and the difficulty of financing overseas sales. Under former conditions, exports of Canadian products, to a large extent, merely added to the exportable surplus of the United States a very profitable business for that country, while to-day, according to statements made in support of the emergency legislation, the stocks of American produce are large, and additions thereto by Canadian imports merely add to the difficulties of the American producer, who cannot today profitably dispose of his own surplus. In other words, what in the past was profitable business for the United States is now regarded as unprofitable.

Our business with the United Kingdom continues to be satisfactory, although it is unaccompanied with favourable balances as great as in the past. Last year our exports to the Mother Country amounted to $495,960,118 while our imports amounted to $126,359,249, resulting in a favourable trade balance of $369,600,869. This year our exports have fallen to $314,226,348, while our imports from the Mother Country have grown to $213,930,946, reducing our favourable trade balance to $100,295,402. In view of the large holdings of Canadian securities in the United Kingdom, while exact figures are not available, the net balance would be much reduced if not indeed turned against us. The showing, however, is very much more satisfactory than that of our trade with the United States and the buyers of English goods have the additional satisfaction of knowing that their dollars were at a premium in the English market.

I have much pleasure in calling the attention of hon. members to the remarkable recovery and extension of British trade in Canada. Imports from the United Kingdom first reached the hundred million mark in 1911. In 1913 they were $138,741,736. As a result of the war, in 1919 the figures had dropped to $73,035,118. In 1920 the total was $126,359,249. The increase of this year over last—although last year's figures were greater than those of any previous year except 1913—is $87,571,697, or over 69 per cent. The sales by the Mother Country in Canada have by the prevailing rates of exchange been made the more easy in the same ratio as our sales to her have been rendered the more difficult. Our sales have also, by reason of the exercise of British Government control, been further restricted.

Revenue, 1920-21

The country's revenues have been well maintained. The revenue for the fiscal year when the accounts are finally closed will approximately reach $432,000,000, as against $349,746,334 for the year before. This marked increase, in a year of deflation, can only be regarded as satisfactory. The chief sources of revenue are as follows:

Customs	$163,000,000
Excise	37,200,000
Post Office	26,000,000
Business Profits War Tax	40,000,000
Income Tax	46,500,000
Inland Revenue War Tax	79,050,000
Other War taxation	2,355,000

Expenditure 1920-21

The estimated expenditure for the year amounts to $533,368,077 as against a total outlay provided by the Estimates of $613,225,411.

The total expenditure has been met without new loans, being covered entirely by current revenue and cash resources available at the close of last year. The amount of cash resources from the past year and applicable to 1921-22 will be relatively small. The figure cannot be definitely stated, as sundry expenditures and revenue for 1920-21 have yet to go through the books. I might say, at this juncture, that we expect to find that the available cash at the end of the year when the accounts are closed will amount to approximately $10,000,000.

In considering the consolidated fund expenditures, having regard to the country's pre-war activities, it will be found that these amount to some $141,000,000. Consolidated fund charges connected with and growing out of the war, such as increased interest, pensions, military records, Air Board, expenses of Land Settlement Board, Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, etc., and such new services and expenses as cost of collection of war taxation, bonus to the Civil Service, aids granted for technical education and road building, etc., approximate $225,000,000. Other war expenses, including Soldiers' Land Settlement loans and demobilization, increase the total payments resulting from the war and new services to $277,000,000. Services similar to those provided for by the consolidated fund expenditure of $141,000,000 this year as referred to above cost in the year 1913-14 $127,384,472.

Of the expenditures, the total chargeable to consolidated fund is $362,600,000. Special expenditure, including capital of $36,972,000 and demobilization of $20,000,000 accounts for a further sum of $57,102,000. Then there are investments, classed as non-active for the time being, as follows:

Canadian Northern Railway	$48,611,077
Grand Trunk Railway	26,520,000
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway "Rec. a/c"	18,300,000
Grand Trunk Pacific Guaranteed Int.	3,500,000
Quebec Harbour Commissioners	335,000
	$97,266,077

And, finally, disbursements for railway equipment of $16,400,000.

The revenues for the year exceed the ordinary expenses of the country, including all pensions and all current war charges, by $69,400,000 and exceed the sum total of the ordinary expenses, together with the regular charges to capital and war by $12,298,000.

Debt

As already stated, there have been no fresh borrowings. On the other hand, the debt has increased by the amount that the liquid surplus of the year before has been used, namely, $101,368,077. It should be noted that out of available cash, tax exempt bonds aggregating $89,228,300 have been acquired and taken off the market. It is proposed to cancel them.

The result is that, having regard to the writting-down of assets which took place last year, the net debt now amounts to $2,350,236,700. An interesting observation may be made as to the increase in debt. In the period 1896 to and including 1914 the net additions to the debt totalled $77,499,417. As compared with this, during the period 1914 to date, if the writing-down of non-active assets had not taken place and if the bare war cost be deducted but resulting current expenses arising from the war such as for interest, pensions, etc, be nevertheless charged, the net debt to-day would stand at approximately $115,000,000 less than at March 31, 1914. The situation may be otherwise expressed by saying that notwithstanding the largely increased cost of Government, to the extent of this sum the country's war activities have been financed out of current revenue.

Over and above all this the charges to the consolidated fund of payments made on current war account from and including the year 1914-15 to 1920-21 amount to $553,732,120 and for new services and expenses $30,077,580, making a total of $583,809,700. The amounts by years are as follows:

	Due to War Burden	New Services	Total
1914-15	$ 2,843,238	.....	$ 2,843,238
1915-16	8,828,080	.....	8,828,080
1916-17	25,956,437	$ 58,174	26,014,611
1917-18	44,134,890	108,196	44,243,086
1918-19	88,854,759	3,498,126	92,352,885
1919-20	170,722,951	13,139,084	183,862,035
1920-21	212,391,765	13,274,000	225,665,765
Total.	$553,732,120	$30,077,580	$583,809,700

The net result is that war obligations current and capital have been met and paid to the extent of $698,809,700.

Probable Revenue and Expenditure 1921-22

All indications point to a falling customs revenue and with the disarrangement of business consequent on imminent tariff legislation of the United States, it is difficult to accurately forecast the revenue for the coming year. The following Estimate—based on existing legislation—may be given:

Customs	$135,000,000
Excise	33,600,000
Post Office	26,000,000
Interest on Investments	19,000,000
Casual Revenue	4,000,000
War Tax Revenue—
Inland Revenue	72,000,000
Business Profits and Income Tax.	70,000,000
Miscellaneous War Tax Revenues	2,000,000
All other Revenues	11,000,000
	$372,600,000

The main Estimates tabled call for a total expenditure of $582,062,698 and the supplementary for bonus to the service an additional $9,375,000. The policy of the Government is to pay at least all current expenses, including capital charges, out of current income. The following summary gives the details of these votes properly appropriated to their various objects:

Estimated Consolidated Fund Expenditure	$343,021,594
Estimated Capital Expenditure	27,459,127
Estimated Demobilization Expenditure	7,777,380
	$378,258,101
Investments—Non-Active—
Canadian Northern Railway	$ 50,000,000
Grand Trunk Railway	89,687,633
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway	26,000,000
	$165,687,633
Investments—Active—
Soldiers Settlement Board	$ 32,000,000
Housing Loans	13,310,000
Sinking Funds	2,181,963
	$47,491,963

From the above it will be seen that $378,258,101 in the first instance ought to be raised out of current revenue. It is true that this amount includes capital expenditure for canals, public works, etc.—capital expenditure, which does add to the equipment and facilities of the country. Under the policy adopted this, however, ought to be met out of current revenue. It should be noted that this capital vote also includes $1,903,133 required for railroad equipment. It also includes $7,000,000 for deficits of the Canadian Government Railways proper which must be regarded as a current expense.

Provision is made for non-active investments to the extent of $165,687,633 on account of railways, investments which at least for the time being will yield no return. To the full extent that provision is required for the payment of current liabilities, deficits and interest, that payment ought to be met out of current revenues. The vote, however, in part, covers maturing capital obligations. Railway capital obligations ought not to be paid out of current revenue at the present time but should be refunded.

Of the vote, the current liabilities of the Canadian Northern call for payment of $25,102,870 made up of stock additions, operating deficits and interest charges.

The Grand Trunk vote is required largely for old accounts and maturing capital obligations, as well as obligations owing the country. The old accounts will be taken into consideration in the arbitration proceedings as deduction from the compensation that may be payable. The company, however, ran last year at an actual deficit of some $6,500,000, apart from all Grand Trunk Pacific obligations. Part of this deficit is accounted for by back pay amounting to some $3,000,000. It would not be safe to regard the account, however, as one not requiring a substantial sum, possibly $6,000,000, for current deficits for the year.

Included in the Grand Trunk Pacific vote, apart entirely from expenditures which add to the value of the property, is $19,817,873. The position of this undertaking is such however that the whole vote of $26,000,000 ought to be raised out of current revenue, making a total current railway expenditure to be this year provided in cash of $57,102,870.

The resultant total to be raised is $435,360,971.

In addition, the other investments of $47,491,963 are active and revenue-producing and constitute a proper deduction from a gross debt.

It is obvious, however, that additional revenues ought to be provided.

Tariff

It is not proposed to put into effect now a general revision of the tariff schedules. While Canada must make her own tariff and while that tariff must be a tariff dictated in the interests of Canada and her people, it is not advisable that frequent changes should be made.

The tariff deals with international business and the proper interests of the country can only be considered in the light of international business and the tariff laws of other countries. It is idle to attempt to disguise the fact that any proper Canadian tariff must have consideration to the settled tariff conditions obtaining in the United States. Of our total trade of the past year 57 per cent was with the United States. Of total imports of $1,240,125,056, those from our neighbour to the south were $856,593,470 or 69 per cent of the whole.

As already pointed out, temporary tariff legislation of the United States would place a barrier against our exports to that country amounting to no less than $168,000,000. Such or similar action made permanent, of necessity, would require a careful and thorough revision of the Canadian tariff for the purpose of ensuring the proper continuance of Canadian business —of ensuring employment and Canadian stability—a matter of gravest moment to all classes of our citizens, of moment to the farmer as well as to the industrial worker, of moment to the farmer because the home market, always of importance and value to him, would become in view of the action of the United States and of the difficulties of financing overseas sales, more important than ever.

An illustration of the value of the home market under past conditions may be given in connection with the dairy business. The production of butter in Canada for the year 1919 was 226,000,000 pounds and of this amount but 17,000,000 pounds were exported. On the question of profitable prices in the home market, it may be noted that last autumn when the Ottawa wholesaler paid 57 cents for butter and the Ottawa public were paying 59 cents and 60 cents a pound, the export price was 47 cents a pound. The home market is valueless without purchasing power and that purchasing power will diminish or largely disappear with the advance of industrial unemployment. Under the circumstances, having special regard to the fact that there ought not to be a general revision of the Canadian tariff now and another after the close of the United States Congress, no action will now be taken.

In indicating that regard must be had to United States tariff laws when framing the Canadian tariff, I do not desire to be understood as suggesting that the Canadian tariff should, in any way, of necessity follow the American customs rates. The underlying economic principles which apply to tariff necessities of creditor nations, as compared with debtor nations, are entirely different. Creditor nations are not under the necessity of discharging money claims with an excess of visible exports over visible imports or by fresh borrowings. While it is not in the interest of debtor nations to increase money claims against them by an unfavorable balance of visible trade, in the case of the creditor nation it well may be that the only manner in which the creditor nation may receive payment on its investments is by creating money claims in favour of the debtor nation through an excess of visible imports over visible exports.

As a matter of fact, besides goods and commodities creditor nations export coupons, representing interest on borrowed money, while debtor nations import them, that is, pay them. It is impossible to accurately state the amount of coupons annually imported by Canada. In all probability $180,000,000 would not be an outside figure. Under such circumstances, Canada has to be considered as having an adverse balance of $180,000,000 before any consideration is given to the results of her visible import and export trade. On the other hand, as a great creditor nation, the United States, apart altogether from her visible imports and exports, has the advantage of a very large invisible export credit, none the less real because unseen, under the heading of returns from investments. Canada like all other countries in process of development required and indeed still requires foreign capital and is of necessity a debtor nation.

Tariff Changes

Changes in the schedules, however, become necessary for the purpose of implementing the trade pact with the West India Islands which has been ratified by both Houses and assented to. A resolution will be submitted dealing with these.

Amendments to Customs Act

Changes ought to be made in the Customs Act with a view to securing a more efficient carrying out of the principle of the dumping provisions. Much of the unemployment at present existing, results from the importation into Canada of goods at prices below the cost of production. In so far as the public are concerned, little, if any, price advantage has accrued to them through these importations. Indeed, it could not well be expected that they should because these low costs cannot be looked upon as at all permanent and as a matter of fact they have been found to be temporary. It has been established that, after large shipments of goods have been made from a foreign market and entered at customs at a valuation justified by temporary quotations in that market, prices there have registered substantial increases. The result, however, is directly felt by the Canadian producer and worker. Goods ought to be valued for customs purposes, not at forced-sale prices, justified by temporary quotations to the foreign market, but having regard to the regular standard value in that market and to cost of production and a reasonable profit thereon.

A further change should also be made having regard to the valuation of goods imported from foreign countries whose currencies have greatly depreciated. Under the law, valuations are made in the currency of the country of export and this value has under customs ruling been adjusted to the basis of exchange prices. The increased cost of production in the foreign market does not, however, bear a direct inverse relation to the extent of the depreciation of the currency, more particularly so having regard to countries where currencies are depreciated to a greater extent than 50 per cent. It is therefore proposed to provide that any depreciation of a foreign currency greater than 50 per cent shall be disregarded and that the lowest valuation which can be made will be arrived at by a depreciation of 50 per cent. Where the rate of exchange is adverse to Canada, the value for duty will be computed at the rate of exchange existing at the date of the shipment of the goods. To put into effect these provisions, a Bill will be introduced providing for amendments to the Customs Act as follows:

Section forty of the said Customs Act is amended by adding thereto the following clause,—"such value in no case to be lower than the wholesale price thereof at such time and place," and by adding thereto the following subsection:

(2) Provided that the value for duty of new or unused goods shall in no case be less than the actual cost of production of similar goods at date of shipment direct to Canada, plus a reasonable profit thereon, and the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue shall be the sole judge of what shall constitute a reasonable profit in the circumstances."

Section fifty-nine of the said Customs Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(6) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this section, in computing the value for duty of the currency of an invoice, no reduction shall be allowed in excess of fifty per cent of the value of the standard or proclaimed currency of the country from whence the goods are invoiced to Canada, irrespective of the rate of exchange existing between such country and Canada on date of the shipment of the goods, and in respect of goods shipped to Canada from a country where the rate of exchange is adverse to Canada, the value for duty of the currency of the invoice shall be computed at the rate of exchange existing between such country and Canada at the date of the shipment of the goods.

Marking of Importations

Representations have from time to time been made to the effect that the goods of one country were being farmed off on the Canadian public as the goods of another country. Especially have representatives of British business urged that many goods were being sold as British goods, which either had not seen Great Britain or were merely collected in and forwarded from that country. In my judgment, immediate effect ought to be given to these representations. Not only has the British importation some right to protection from dishonest competition, but much more so the Canadian public have a right to know from whom they are buying. A resolution will, therefore, be moved to provide that all goods imported into Canada capable of being marked, stamped, branded or labelled without injury shall have indicated on them legibly in English or French the country of origin. This provision will come into force September 1, 1921.

Business Profits War Tax

The Business Profits Tax will be dropped. With present business conditions it would in any event become largely inoperative —excess profits generally speaking will not be found. This tax is one which is only justifiable as an emergency measure in a time of ascending values and inflation and national stress. It is a tax which works harm to the general financial situation and business conditions in an ordinary period and more particularly in a period of business depression. The Act will not be re-enacted.

Excise Taxes

Many complaints have been received from will be abolished. In lieu thereof, having particular regard to the necessities of revenue, duties will be levied on playing cards and wines. The duties on spirits will be increased from the present $3 per gallon customs duty and the $2 additional duty under the luxury taxes, to a straight $10 customs rate. Increase will also be made in the excise duties on spirits of local manufacture released for sale in Canada. The former differential of the excise duty as against the customs duty was 60 cents, a differential of 20 per cent. The excise rate will be increased to $9 a gallon.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Many complaints have been received from hospitals and the producers of proprietary medicines and pharmaceutical preparations who represent that the burden of taxation under the law, which is now being changed and which provides for a total tax of $5 per proof gallon, was unduly heavy. The hospitals in particular represent that they have had great difficulty in properly carrying on. It is proposed to grant a rebate of 99 per cent of the duties paid on spirits actually used for medicinal purposes in bona fide hospitals certified to as such by the Department of Public Health and subject to regulations to be promulgated by the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue for the purpose of ensuring that no abuses take place. Under appropriate regulations it is proposed in the case of patent and proprietary medicines and pharmaceutical preparations to reduce the tax to the rate of $2.40 per proof gallon. This is the rate which applied prior to the enactment of last year's luxury taxes.

Sales Tax

In addition to the foregoing new provisions, it is proposed to increase the rate of the sales tax. Many submissions have been received in favour of a sales or turnover tax. The principle of either a sales or turnover tax has been strongly advocated by many boards of trade and commercial bodies. The general turnover tax in particular has been strongly supported. This tax would call for the payment of a tax on every transaction taking place in the country. It would include all sales by retailers. Theoretically a general turnover tax on commodities and services has much to commend it. In practical administration, though, in view of the fact that after careful survey it has been established that books are not kept in many retail stores, the cost of administration would be unduly great and difficulties of collection many.

9 p.m.

Instead of extending the tax, it is proposed to confine its operation to the sales of manufacturers, wholesalers, jobbers and importers, and to continue a list of special exemptions which, broadly speaking, will cover foodstuffs in their natural state, initial sales of farm produce by the farmer of his own production, as well as the first products of the fisheries, mines and forests.

The 1 per cent and 2 per cent rates on domestic transactions will become 1½ per cent and 3 per cent respectively, and the present import rates will become 2½ per cent and 4 per cent. The import rates thus become 1 per cent higher than the like domestic rates. The necessity for this lies in the fact that more than one sales tax is included in the finished article made in Canada, while the materials entering into the manufacture or production of the foreign article are not subject to any such tax.

Mr. Speaker, we in Canada have a great task before us. The world is sadly out of tune. May we help in restoring harmony? Trust and confidence are sadly lacking. Class interests are advanced with selfish insistence. Unemployment is with us. Faith in our fellow-men is weakened. Doubt of the future is often voiced. And what is the trouble? The sun still shines—the rivers still sparkle—our lands are as great and fruitful as ever—our resources just as vast. Shall it be said that the work and sacrifice of the past few years were in vain? That we Canadians of to-day do not think that that Canada for whom so great a stream of heroic blood was shed—a Canada great enough to die for—is a country worth living for? Living for Canada! To do that means living for and helping our fellow Canadians, means the realization that no real advantage can be taken by this class at the expense of that—that the wrong of one works to the injury of all—that Canada requires honest, clear thinking and the abandonment of racial, class and political prejudice—that our task is worthy of the efforts of a united Canada and the best, unselfish, constant work of each and all of us. If we can but again renew faith the one in the other and in our country, live for Canada and in the faith of our forefathers, the future holds no shadows for Canada.

RESOLUTIONS

I beg to give notice that upon the House resolving itself into committee I shall move the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907, by inserting the following section immediately after section 8:

8a. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, goods, other than tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, spirituous or alcoholic liquors and articles specified in Schedule A of The West Indies Trade Agreement Act, the produce or manufacture of British Honduras; Bermuda;

the Bahamas;
Jamaica;
Turks and Caicos islands;
the Leeward islands (Antigua, St. Christopher-Nevis, Dominica, Montserrat, and the Virgin islands); the Windward islands (Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia); Barbados;
Trinidad and Tobago; and British Guiana

when imported direct therefrom shall not be subject at any time to more than fifty per centum of the duties imposed on similar goods as set forth in the General Tariff under regulations by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

2. Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter 15 of the Acts of 1913, by chapter 26 of the Acts of 1914, and by chapter 5 of the Acts of 1914 (second session) be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 20, 21, 22, 23, 39b, 77a, 101, 101a, 103, 104, 110, 111, 113, 134, 135, 150, 151, 153, 156, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164 and 165, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of Customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duties be inserted in said Schedule A:

3. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the tenth day of May, 1921, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions, imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

4. Resolved, that the Customs Tariff, 1907, be amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 12:

12a. That all goods imported into Canada which are capable of being marked,, stamped, branded or labelled, without injury, shall be marked, stamped, branded, or labelled in legible English or French words, in a conspicuous place that shall not be covered or obscured by any subsequent attachments or arrangements, so as to indicate the country of origin. Said marking, stamping, branding, or labelling shall be as nearly indelible and permanent as the nature of the goods will permit.

Provided, that all goods imported into Canada after the date of the coming into force of this section which do not comply with the foregoing requirements shall be subject to an additional duty of ten per centum ad valorem to be levied on the value for duty purposes and in addition such goods shall not be released from Customs possession until they have been so marked, stamped, branded or labelled under Customs supervision at the expense of the importer.

Provided further, that if any person shall violate any of the provisions relating to the marking, stamping, branding, or labelling of any imported goods, or shall deface, destroy, remove, alter, or obliterate any such marks, stamps, brands, or labels with intent to conceal the information given by or contained in such marks, stamps, brands, or labels, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or to both fine and improisonment. The Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section and for the enforcement thereof.

5. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of September, nineteen hundred and twenty-one.

1. Resolved that it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act as amended by Chapter 6 of the Acts of 1914 (second Session) by repealing section 154 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

154. There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all spirits distilled, the following duties of excise which shall be paid to the Collector, as herein provided, that is to say:—

(a) when the material used in the manufacture thereof consists of not less than ninety per centum, by weight, of raw or unmalted grain, or when manufactured from sugar, syrup, molasses or other saccharine matter not otherwise provided for, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, nine dollars, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for any less quantity than a gallon;

(b) when manufactured exclusively from malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or excise has been paid, or when manufactured from raw or unmalted grain, used in combination, in such proportions as the department prescribes, with malted barley taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or of excise has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, nine dollars and two cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon;

(c) when manufactured exclusively from molasses, syrup, sugar or other saccharine matter, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, nine dollars and three cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon.

Provided however that any person licensed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue to manufacture patent and proprietary medicines and pharmaceutical preparations by the use of spirits in bond subject to The Inland Revenue Act and regulations thereunder, the following duties of excise shall be imposed, levied and collected, that is to say:—

(a) when the material used in the manufacture thereof consists of not less than ninety per centum, by weight, of raw or unmalted grain, or when manufactured from sugar, syrup, molasses or other saccharine matter not otherwise provided for, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof, and for any less quantity than a gallon;

(b) when manufactured exclusively from malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or excise has been paid, or when manufactured from raw or unmalted grain, used in combination, in such proportions as the department prescribes, with malted barley taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or of excise has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty-two cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon;

(c) when manufactured exclusively from molasses, syrup, sugar or other saccharine matter, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty-three cents, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon.

Provided further that when such spirits testing not less than fifty per centum over proof are sold and delivered in such limited quantities as may be prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue to any university or scientific and research laboratory for scientific purposes only, or to any bona fide hospital, certified to be such by the Department of Public Health, for medicinal purposes only, a drawback of ninety-nine per centum of the duty paid may be granted, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

2. Resolved that any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the tenth day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-one.

Resolved that it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, as amended by Chapter 71 of the Acts of 1920, by striking thereout sections 19BB and 19BBB, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of excise taxes specified therein, and to provide that the following sections be substituted therefor:

19BB. (1) The following excise taxes shall be imposed, levied and collected on the articles hereinafter specified, namely:

(a) A tax on playing cards for every fifty-four cards or fraction of fifty-four in each package,—when selling at twenty-four dollars or less per gross packages, eight cents par pack; when selling in excess of twenty-four dollars per gross packages, fifteen cents per pack;

(2) The excise taxes as imposed by the preceding subsection one shall be payable at the time of importation or when taken out of warehouse for consumption in addition to the present duties of customs or at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer, but shall not apply on playing cards when exported, and shall be accounted for to His Majesty in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

(3) (a) A tax of thirty cents per gallon on wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, containing not more than forty per cent of proof spirits;

(b) A tax of three dollars per gallon on champagne and all other sparkling wines.

(4) The excise taxes as imposed by the preceding subsection three shall be payable at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer, but shall not apply to such wines when exported, and shall be accounted for to His Majesty in accordance with such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

(5) Every person selling or dealing in the articles upon which taxes are imposed as prescribed by this section may be required by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue to take out an annual license therefor, for which license a fee not exceeding two dollars shall be paid and the penalty for neglect or refusal to obtain a license shall be a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars.

(2) That any such tax, costs or penalties may, at the option of the minister, be recovered and imposed in the Exchequer Court of Canada or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, in the name of His Majesty.

(3) Resolved that any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the tenth day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-one.

19BBB (1) That in addition to the present duties of customs and excise there shall be imposed, levied and colected an excise tax of one and one-half per cent on sales and deliveries by Canadian manufacturers or producers, and wholesalers or jobbers, and a tax of two and one-half per cent on the duty paid value of goods imported, but in respect of sales by manufacturers to retailers or consumers the excise tax payable shall be three per cent and on goods imported by retailers or consumers the excise tax payable on the duty paid value shall be four per cent.

Provided that in respect of lumber an excise tax of three per cent shall be imposed, levied and collected on sales and deliveries by the Canadian manufacturer and further excise tax will not be payable on resale.

Provided also that the taxes specified in this section shall not apply to sales or importations of;—

Bread;—flour and oatmeal when in packages weighing not less than forty-eight pounds each; animals living; live poultry; meats and poultry, fresh; milk including buttermilk; cream; butter; cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter; lard, lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils; eggs; vegetables, fruits, grains and seeds in their natural state; hay; straw; hops; nursery stock; chicory, raw or green; bees; honey; sugar; molasses; other farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production; ice; fish and products thereof not canned or medicated; ores of metals of all kinds; fuel of all kinds; gold and silver in ingots, blocks, bars, drops, sheets or plates unmanufactured; British and Canadian coin and foreign gold coin; logs and round unmanufactured timber; fence posts, railroad ties, pulpwood, tan bark, and other articles the product of the forest when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer; newspapers and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines and weekly literary papers unbound; materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships; ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade; calcium carbide; electricity; gas manufactured from coal, calcium carbide or oil for illuminating or heating purposes; materials for use solely in the manufacture of oleomargarine or any substitute for butter or lard or for the production of collolene; artificial limbs and parts thereof; artificial eyes; donations of clothing and books for charitable purposes; settlers' effects; War Veterans' badges; memorials or monuments erected in memory of soldiers who fell in the Great War; articles imported for the use of the Governor

General; articles imported for the personal or official use of Consuls General who are natives of citizens of the country they represent and who are not engaged in any other business or profession; Bibles, prayer-books, psalms and hymn-books, religious tracts, and Sunday school lesson pictures, and the Governor in Council shall have power to add to the foregoing list of articles exempted from the excise taxes on sales, as he may deem it expedient or necessary to exempt from the said excise taxes.

Provided further that the excise taxes specified in this section shall not be payable on goods exported, or on sales of goods made to the order of each individual customer by a business which sells exclusively by retail, under regulations by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue who shall be sole judge as to the classification of a business; and a drawback may be granted of ninety-nine per cent of the said taxes paid on materials used, wrought into or attached to articles exported.

(2) That the minister may require every manufacturer, producer, wholesaler or jobber to take out an annual license for the purposes aforesaid, and may prescribe a fee therefor, not exceeding two dollars, and the penalty for neglect or refusal shall be a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars.

(3) That any such tax, costs or penalties may, at the option of the minister, be recovered and imposed in the Exchequer Court of Canada or in any other Court of competent jurisdiction, in the name of His Majesty.

(4) That the provisions of this resolution respecting a tax on sales shall be deemed to have come into force on the tenth day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-one, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, we had anticipated that in pursuance of the announcement made some days ago the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) would have been able to deliver his Budget speech earlier in the day, and that we might then continue the debate at once, but he was kind enough to intimate to me early to-day that, for reasons which he explained, it would be more convenient to him and to the Government to bring on the speech to-night. We then agreed that in that case, after he had delivered his speech, a motion to adjourn the debate would be in order. With that understanding, I desire now to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and the debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Health—salaries, $155,612.50; contingencies, $82,000.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister promised us a few days ago a statement regarding the Department of Health.

Mr. CALDER: I might give a very brief review of the work of the department during the year. It will probably be helpful to the committee in considering the Estimates in detail. The Department of Health was created in 1919, and under the Act then passed provision was made for transferring to the Department of Health many activities carried on by other departments of the Government, and shortly after the Act was passed, the necessary Orders in Council were put through for that purpose. The quarantine services as well as the work of medical examination that had been previously carried on by the Department of Immigration were transferred. Under some statute in force the Marine Department had been looking after sick mariners. It was thought advisable that that work should also be transferred to the Department of Health, and that accordingly was done. Then the administration of an Act relating to the adulteration of food was transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Health. There was also some statute relating to drugs, apart from the statute we were discussing the other day, the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and its administration was undertaken by the Department of Health. Then there was an Act administered, if I am not mistaken, by the Department of Inland Revenue relating to proporietory and patent medicines. That work also was in due course transferred to the Department of Health. In addition to these old services which were carried on by various departments of the Government, certain new work was undertaken. It will be remembered that when the Act creating the Health Department was before the House, a suggestion was thrown out that it should contain provision for the creation of a branch dealing with child welfare. That branch in due course was created, and is now under the management of Dr. Helen McMurchy, having been in operation for some months. The housing scheme submitted to the Government some two years ago, and finally approved by the Government, was also handed over to the Health Department.

It will be recalled that certain provision was made in the Estimates for dealing with the problem of venereal diseases, the sum of some $200,000 was placed in the Estimates a year ago, and it is proposed to continue the same sum this year, the Department of Health, co-operating with the various provincial departments of health, with a view to suppressing those diseases as far as possible. We also had very considerable discussion, I think, at the time the Bill went through, with regard to the advisability of establishing a research bureau in connection with the Department of Health. That has not been done. No progress has been made in that respect, not because a research bureau of the character discussed at that time was not considered advisable, but mainly because we contemplated the establishment of a general scientific bureau at Ottawa, and it was considered wise to let the whole matter rest in abeyance until such time as a decision is finally reached regarding the larger problem.

I do not propose to keep the House very long in dealing with details, but in so far as quarantine is concerned, I may say that the officer in charge of that work for many years in the past, Dr. Montizambert, was retired during the year. He had given long years of service, and, if I remember rightly, he had charge of all our quarantine stations in Canada for something like thirty or thirty-five years. During the year, owing to his advanced age, it was thought well that he should be retired, and that some one else should be appointed in his place. Dr. Montizambert gave very long and valuable service to the country in the work he performed during those many years. His place has been taken by Dr. Pagé, who was formerly our chief medical officer in the Immigration Department at Quebec, and who is now in charge both of the quarantine work and of our immigration medical inspection work. He is now stationed at Ottawa.

We have in Canada four main quarantine stations, one at St. John, one at Halifax, one at Quebec, and one at Victoria. Besides these we have a number of minor stations. Throughout the year, I understand, Dr. Pagé, the officer mainly responsible for the conduct of these stations, has carefully reviewed the whole situation and has made a number of improvements. Other improvements are very necessary, and that applies particularly to our stations at St. John, Halifax, and Grosse Isle, Quebec; and various sums have been placed in the Estimates for the purpose of providing facilities which are necessary in order that the work of these stations may be properly carried on so as to protect our people from infectious diseases. In addition to actually reviewing the situation at those stations and making provisions for such alterations as were necessary, the Health Department has had two of its officers during the past year in Europe and in the United States studying very carefully the plans and methods followed by these countries, and, as a result, I have no doubt at all that a great many improvements will be made in our system in so far as handling these quarantine stations is concerned. Personally, I think, from my own knowledge of the situation and the work carried on during the year, and from the improvements that have already been made, and those that are in sight, I think we may quite confidently say, that there is very little danger of many of the diseases that are now rampant in Europe being introduced into Canada.

As regards the medical inspection of immigrants, I think I may truthfully say that that work is now being carried on much more satisfactorily than was the case in the old days. After the discussion we had some two years ago, when the immigration Act was being amended, and on account of the views that were very freely expressed in the House at that time, and the opinions expressed in the press as well, steps were taken to tighten up as far as possible the work that was being done in that respect, and I have no hesitation in saying that the work is now being carried on much more satisfactorily than heretofore. At any rate, I am advised that fewer complaints reach us in this regard than in the old days.

Two of the officers of the Health Department have also visited Great Britain and Europe for the purpose of advising and helping those who are responsible for passing immigrants at the ports of embarkation. Under the British law, the Board of Trade has its medical officers at the ports of embarkation, and, in addition to that, every shipping company has its medical officers in order to make certain that immigrants that are not sound physically and mentally shall not sail from those ports. Our medical officers have been in consultation with them for some weeks at a time, advising them, as best they can, as to the course that should be followed by them in their inspection and in passing immigrants. I have no doubt whatever that as a result of the work done in that connection very many people have been prevented from coming to Canada who, had they not been rejected at the ports of embarkation, would not have been allowed to land in this country.

We have also adopted the practice during the year of appointing permanent officers for this work. Some five or seven years ago many of our medical inspectors were merely temporary officers appointed only for short periods, and very often paid by the day. That practice has been entirely abolished and our officers are now permanent men. On the eastern coast, where we have three main ports of entry, namely, St. John, Halifax, and Quebec, in the winter time, when our ports are closed, our officers move to St. John and Halifax, and in the summer, with the great rush of people to Quebec, they locate these. There is sufficient work to keep a full staff of permanent officers engaged, and that plan has been adopted instead of having a number of temporary officers who are changed from year to year. The new plan operates to the advantage of the service generally.

With reference to the care and treatment of sick mariners, it will be remembered that a year ago the fees charged to the owners of vessels were increased, if I mistake not, from one and a half cents to two cents per ton. As a result of the year's operations it will be noted that the fees charged are just a little more than is sufficient to carry on that expenditure—there is a slight saving in that regard. There again, in that branch of our work, the staff has been re-organized. We have adopted the plan of paying our medical officers a lump sum every year for which they are required to render certain services. Heretofore the plan prevailed of paying these men fees for the amount of work which they actually did. Instead of doing so now, we give them a retainer and they are required to give whatever service is necessary in connection with this work; and I am advised that this system is working out very much more satisfactorily than the old plan. We have only some three hospitals left. I think there were six originally but there are now only three, and it is proposed to close one of those shortly. It is in New Brunswick at a place called Douglastown. Instead of our maintaining hospitals, the plan has been devised of having our sick mariners taken care of in the ordinary hospitals in these seaports for which, of course, we pay the daily rates for the maintenance of the patients.

As regards the administration of the Adulteration of Food Act—

Mr. DUFF: Before the minister leaves the subject of the Sick Marineer's Fund; do you also pay for the medicines used by the doctors, or do they pay that out of their salaries?

Mr. CALDER: I understand the amount paid the doctor covers everything that he is required to furnish in the way of medicines. He must himself pay for what is required in the shape of medicines. We simply give him a lump sum which is to cover all his expenses in connection with work—his own service plus what medicines he must buy.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister think that is a fair proposition? One doctor might have only five patients in the year, and another practioner might have one hundred and five?

Mr. CALDER: That is a detail. I would like to have my deputy here when we come to consider details of that nature. At any rate that is the plan that has been devised and, so far as I know, has worked out satisfactorily. In any event no complaint has reached me regarding it.

I made mention of the administration of the Adulteration of Food Act. Under that law Canada has been divided into twenty-five districts, and there again provision has been made for the appointment of permanent officers who will give their entire time to looking after the administration of the law. I am advised that heretofore we had a fairly large staff of part time employees which plan, I understand, has worked out more or less unsatisfactorily. It seems to me that if there is sufficient work to be done under that law it is far better to have a man permanently on the job who is familiar with the law and with its administration. That has been worked out during the past few years, and now we have a permanent staff in some twenty-five districts extending from coast to coast. In addition to that we have laboratories established at Ottawa, Halifax, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, these institutions existing for the purpose of analyzing the various food commodities where there is any suspicion as to their having been adulterated, and of course a staff of analysts and chemists is employed for that purpose. Last year we had a vote, for this branch of the work of the Health Department, of some $90,000. This year it has been reduced to $80,000, and I dare say, if we had the figures before us for the year, it might have been still further reduced—because I find that the total expenditure for last year down to March 28, was only some $56,000; so it would appear that we will scarcely require the full vote that is asked for this year. As I said, last year $90,000 was asked for; this year we are asking for $80,000; whereas the total expenditure down to March 28, was only some $56,000. It is quite true the books are not closed and that that amount may be swelled to some extent. The total revenues collected from the administration of the adulteration of the Food Act and the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act amounted to some $38,373.95. Speaking of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, I find that there were convictions in 309 cases during the year, and fines were levied totalling some $57,-265. Of these fines levied, however, only some $16,697 were collected; in other words, a good many people upon whom fines were levied preferred the jail penalty rather than pay the fine. The amount derived from licenses under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act was $4,760. I have been given some rather interesting figures to illustrate the effect of the provisions included—I think it was last session— in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. I have only the figures for nine months, but I dare say the same figures would be true comparatively for the whole twelve months' period. I find, for example, that during the nine months up to the end of December the total quantity of cocaine imported into Canada was 5,007 ounces as against 2,967 ounces for the same nine months' period of the previous year. In the case of morphine there were 9,838 ounces imported as against 23,666 ounces the previous year; and in the case of gum opium the importations for the nine months period were 2,478 pounds as against 12,837 pounds. Those figures certainly show a very remarkable decrease in the quantities of these drugs imported into Canada for the nine months period ending December 31, last.

I do not know that I should take up the time of the committee just now in relating what has been done in connection with housing. I have the figures here, however, and if any member of the committee is interested I shall be very glad to give the moneys that have been allotted each province. I have a statement as to the number of houses that have been built, and as to the manner in which the accounts with the various provinces stand at the present time. If any members of the committee are interested in them. I also have statistics here from all of the provinces, I think, with the exception of one, as to the results of our co-operation with the various health departments in connection with the suppression of venereal diseases. The figures are very interesting. I have some doubt as to whether some of these figures should be given publicity to—that, however, will be a matter for the committee to decide. I have the figures here, and if hon. gentlemen are sufficiently interested in them, and think they should be made public, I will have no objection to submitting them to the committee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Has the minister any figures in connection with the mariners' dues, showing the amount collected and the amount expended?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, I have those figures. I made a very brief reference to the creation of the Child Welfare Branch in the department which was created some months ago. We were very fortunate in securing the services of Dr. Helen MacMurchy. Personnally, I feel she is doing splendid work there. She has been co-operating with the various health departments, and as a result of her activities a national body has been created that is very deeply interested in this work. They had a convention last year when some 200 delegates were present, and I understand that another convention will be held this year. I have no hesitation in saying that if the work of that department is carried on for a number of years a very distinct advance will be made by all the provinces in connection with the problem of child welfare.

I have run over only very briefly the main activities of the department. I have numerous statistics before me which I think might well be presented upon the various items of the Estimates when we come to them in detail.

Mr. BELAND: The minister has stated that the quantity of cocaine and morphine imported last year showed a great diminution on the importation of the previous year. This is of course very gratifying news. To what activity in particular does the minister attribute that decrease? Is it through a stricter surveillance? And how far has it been exercised with the medical profession, or the hospitals, or the druggists? It has come to my knowledge during the recess that, regrettable as it may be, some medical men have resorted to selling cocaine and morphine to their patients to satisfy their craving for these drugs. I should like to have some further particulars with regard to the work that has been accomplished in restricting this undesirable trade.

Mr. CALDER: I am inclined to the view that the reduction has come as a result of the change in the law and the close supervision of its administration. In the first place, all importers of these drugs must take out a license; in the second place, local manufacturers of these drugs must also take out a license; and during the year the department has closely scrutinised the records of these licensees. In addition to that. I think that dealers in these drugs generally have come to recognize the fact that the department means business. The mounted police have been co-operating with the department to the fullest possible extent, and I think the reduction in the illicit traffic is due in very large measure to the knowledge the traffickers have that the mounted police are extremely vigilant. Many of the convictions secured during the year have been the result of the operations of the mounted police. Another factor is that on account of the changes in the law the department has been co-operating to a fuller extent with the local municipal police. In other words, more people have become interested in the proper administration of this law, and I think it is a combination of all these circumstances that has resulted in the figures which I have given to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BELAND: In so far as the regular importation of cocaine and morphine is concerned, I have no doubt that it is not a difficult matter for the department to get from the importers an exact statement of the different channels through which those drugs have been distributed and as to whether the quantity sold to hospitals, druggists or doctors is more than would be required for their lawful needs. But I understand that a large quantity of these drugs is smuggled into the country, and I doubt very much if the mounted police can accomplish very much in preventing it. However, the department is in a better position to judge than I am. It must be extremely difficult to restrict smuggling entirely.

Now, leaving this subject aside for a moment, I understood the minister to say that the Health Department was represented in the port of New York. Am I correct?

Mr. CALDER: One of our officers visited New York.

Mr. BELAND: Has Canada a permanent medical adviser in the port of New York?

Mr. CALDER: No. What I stated was that a couple of our officers had visited Great Britain and the Continent and also the United States to observe the methods there employed in handling quarantine and immigration matters, in order that we might improve our methods if possible.

Mr. BELAND: I have in mind the case of the child of a professor of Laval University who landed in New York with her grandmother and was detained for some time without any apparent reason except that she was not accompanied by her father or her mother. The Minister of Health, who is also Minister of Immigration, will appreciate the predicament in which these two persons found themselves in the port of New York, where they were placed on a small island, I believe, and had to await the arrival of the father of the child, who was notified by wire and arrived on the scene as soon as possible. The department should see that such cases do not occur, especially when the persons concerned are provided with regular passports viséd by all the required authorities.

Mr. CALDER: Were these persons held on account of disease, or was the only reason the fact that the child was not accompanied by her parent?

Mr. BELAND: That was the only reason given. I assume that it is a regulation of the American Department of Immigration, but the case could be taken up and looked into. I have no objection to giving my hon. friend the name; the father of the child was Dr. Vallée, whom the minister may know. The child was, I think, with the mother of Dr. Vallée.

Mr. CALDER: We have at least two immigration officers, not medical officers, at New York. I have no doubt that if that case had been brought to their attention they would at once, if these people were coming to Canada, have advised the United States immigration authorities to pass them along. But it will be understood that on some of these boats thousands of people come in; all sorts of cases have to be dealt with, and the matter may not have been brought to the attention of our officers for some time.

Mr. BELAND: My information is that the case was brought to the attention of the Canadian officer and that he undertook to release the old lady and the granddaughter but was without success for five days, and it was not until Dr. Vallée himself reached New York and showed that he was the father of the child that the child and the grandmother were released.

Mr. CALDER: I shall be glad to look into that case.

Mr. BELAND: Is the old marine hospital in Quebec still used by the Department of Health, and who is in charge of it?

Mr. CALDER: It has not been in use recently, but there is a provision in the Public Works Estimates for repairing the old building, and it is to be put in use again. Dr. Nadeau, I understand, will be in charge of the hospital when it is re-established.

Mr. BELAND: In connection with the European ports of embarkation, the minister has referred—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the discussion proceeds any further I think it is the duty of the Chairman to point out that unless the committee unanimously consents to discuss together all the items of the Department of Health, the Estimates should be considered item by item. I am not blaming the hon. member for Beauce for proceeding to deal with matters of general administration, because he is merely continuing the discussion, but if the discussion is continued along the same lines, it will be agreed that all items shall pass together.

Mr. BELAND: Your observation, Mr. Chairman, is warranted, but I am only following the hon. minister in his general review of the work of the department. If I may proceed with the question, I would ask the minister if the department has considered the advisability of having a medical officer at the principal ports of embarkation for emigrants bound for Canada—Liverpool, Rotterdam, Antwerp and Havre. I have brought this matter to the attention of the department in years past with a view to securing on the other side some system of inspection which would reduce or almost entirely do away with the cases of deportation when the immigrants reach this side—cases which are very sad indeed in their character. Is the medical inspection at Liverpool, for instance, carried on only by the medical advisers of the ship companies?

Mr. CALDER: We have had a couple of officers over there during the last six months, more for the purpose of advising the local authorities—that is, the Board of Trade doctors and the shipping doctors. We discussed this matter on the Immigration Estimates; evidently the hon. member was not present at the time. No one would be more pleased than I would be if we could arrange just what the hon. member suggests. Under ordinary conditions, in order to accomplish the object to which my hon. friend refers, it would be necessary to have a staff on the other side to examine medically all persons coming to Canada and give them a certificate which would enable them to land in Canada, taking the responsibility entirely off the shoulders of the transportation companies. In other words, we would have to maintain a staff on the continent sufficient to look into the cases of all persons desiring to come to Canada, not only from the standpoint of health, but from the standpoint of mentality as well. Now, it would not be sufficient to do that in respect of the people who left Liverpool for Canada, because many persons leave other ports to come to this country—Bristol, London, Southampton, Queenstown, Belfast, Glasgow, and so on. The great bulk of the people may come through certain ports, yet some come from all these other ports. Take the continent: the Italians, for instance, come from Genoa; the Greeks come from ports in Greece, and the same is true all the way around. If you are going to amend a law of this kind so that it will be applicable to all people, the only thing to do is to establish special machinery to handle the whole population in every country in Europe. As I explained to the committee the other day, I estimate that it would cost two or three or probably four hundred thousand dollars, simply to place at the different ports ordinary medical practitioners who could discover a contagious disease such as measles or smallpox or something of that kind. You would also have to have your mental experts. Supposing a man wants to leave Roumania or Greece for Canada and there is a question as to his mental condition. Where are we to catch him?—in Roumania or Greece or at one of our ports? The same problem may come up in the case of a man in the north of Scotland. He leaves from Glasgow. Are we going to put in a special staff so as to catch such a man at that port? The same thing is true as regards all other ports throughout Europe. There is no doubt that the system suggested by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), if it were not for the enormous expense involved, is the proper system, but it would involve the expenditure of a very large sum of money. The United States attempted to develop that system in Great Britain, but after trying to operate it for some time they had simply to abandon it. We throw upon the transportation company the responsibility of deciding whether an intending immigrant is all right from the health and mental standpoints. They have their medical officers, and we place large penalties upon the transportation companies if they make a mistake. In addition to that, the British Board of Trade are interested in the examination of every emigrant who leaves the British Isles, and they have their medical officers at all British ports in order to safegard their people who wish to go to Canada and other countries. They have a system of supervision, so that you have the double check—the Board of Trade and the medical men of the transportation companies.

Last year for a period of some six months we sent overseas two of our medical men who are thoroughly acquainted with our requirements, standards and everything of that kind. They have got in touch with the medical men of the British Board of Trade and the shipping companies, both in Great Britain and on the continent, at the chief ports. As a result of their representations and work, very much of the hardship that had been occurring in the past has been eliminated. Instead of attempting to establish machinery overseas under which certificates will be given to people giving them the right to land. I rather think it will be better from our standpoint to extend our work there so that we shall have a supervising staff to aid these people in clearly understanding our law and its operation. As the matter stands now, we have the whole problem on the east coast of Canada centralized at the three ports of St. John, Halifax and Quebec, and we can keep at those three points a comparatively small staff of thoroughly trained men, men who work at that class of work for months and months at a time and get very expert at it so that they can have a pretty clear idea, simply by looking at a person, whether or not he should be set aside for examination. To train a large staff to carry on that work properly and to be spread over a large part of Europe would cost a great deal of money.

Mr. BELAND: I have not suggested in particular that the minister and his department should undertake to inspect on the other side of the sea would-be immigrants to Canada. I only asked the minister whether he had considered the advisability of doing that. I realize the force of his argument that the expenditure would be very heavy and if cases of deportation are not numerous, I do not see the advisability of resorting to that policy at all. The minister is, perhaps, in a position to tell the committee what number of deportations occurred during last year.

Mr. CALDER: Those figures were given when we were on the Immigration Estimates.

Mr. BELAND: Leaving that aside for the moment, may I ask the minister whom the department sent abroad to inspect the different ports and confer with medical officers of the different transportation companies?

Mr. CALDER: Dr. Nadeau was in Europe for a period of about five months. When he returned we sent over Dr. Jeffs. Dr. Jeffs has now been overseas for about three months. We have really covered a period of eight months instead of six months as I mentioned.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that Dr. Nadeau visited the principal ports of Continental Europe. I have known Dr. Nadeau for a great number of years, and no better qualified man could have been selected to make the tour, confer with medical men connected with the different ports and give them advice regarding our regulations. Why was the other doctor sent over? Was he sent over to complete this mission or was he sent on another mission?

Mr. CALDER: The department has adopted the practice of using every endeavour to train its chief officers. Dr. Nadeau was sent across in order that he might familiarize himself with the situation in Great Britain and Europe. He spent some five months there for that purpose, and I am sure the hon. member can understand that, in addition to his giving advice, he would also learn a good deal that would be very valuable to him on this side. When Dr. Nadeau returned, he went down to New York, and it was thought well to send over one of our other doctors interested in this work. This scheme of sending our medical officers across the seas is part of the general scheme of the department of giving our chief officers every opportunity for a thorough training in the work of the department.

Mr. BELAND: Who has replaced Dr. Pagé who, I understand, has been promoted to the position formerly occupied by Dr. Montizambert?

Mr. CALDER: Dr. Nadeau of Quebec.

Mr. BELAND: He is in charge of the Immigration hospital?

Mr. CALDER: He has charge of the medical end of our work there. Dr. Pagé was immigration agent and medical inspector at Quebec. I think Mr. O'Connor is now the agent at Quebec and Dr. Nadeau is health officer at Quebec.

Mr. BELAND: Dr. Montizambert has been a very long time with the department as a higher health officer and later, I think, as General Superintendent of Quarantine Stations in Canada. The minister stated that Dr. Montizambert had been superannuated. Was he retired under the provisions of the Civil Service Act passed last session?

Mr. CALDER: He was under the old superannuation law, and was retired under its provisions.

Mr. BELAND: At his own request?

Mr. CALDER: No, I could hardly say that. I think he was quite prepared to carry on.

Mr. BELAND: We are all sorry to lose Dr. Montizambert's services, and our sorrow is only diminished by the fact that he has been replaced by such a distinguished medical authority as Dr. Pagé.

Mr. CALDER: He is a first-class officer.

Mr. BELAND: The very best.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): The department is now administering the Opium and Drug Act. How many convictions have been secured, and what quantity of these drugs has been seized?

Mr. CALDER: There were some 309 convictions. I have not the information before me as to the quantity of drugs seized. In the case of these 309 convictions, there were fines imposed to the amount of $57,265. These fines were not all collected, as some of those convicted preferred to stay a while in jail. The amount actually collected in fines was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $16,000.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): What I am trying to get at is the amount of these drugs that were attempted to be brought into Canada through illegitimate channels. It is quite easy to keep track of what comes in legitimately, but I do not think we are warranted in saying there are certain reductions unless we have some evidence to that effect. All that we know is that there has been a reduction through legitimate channels.

Mr. CALDER: That is quite correct.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I would like to ask the minister—I brought this question up when the Bill creating the department went through the House a couple of years ago—if there is not some way of making this Act self-sustaining. Can we not make the fees sufficiently high to pay for the administration of the Act?

Mr. CALDER: To a certain extent the Act is self-sustaining. Let me give an example. The Department of Health deals with the Act respecting the adulteration of foods and the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. We also have been administering Acts respecting feeding suffs and fertilizers, proprietary and patent medicines, and marine hospitals. In the case of these services the expenditures for last year down to March 28, amounted to $128,382.77, and the revenue derived from the administration of these laws amounted to $126,934.36. That shows a deficit in so far as these services are concerned, of only $1,448. Of course, there are other services. You will find in the general vote, an item for quarantine, for example, in the neighbourhood of $250,000. You could not make that service self-sustaining. Then you have the Civil Government vote of $231,537.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): When may we expect to have a scientific branch started? Along with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) I impressed the necessity of this upon the House when the Bill was going through, and when I left the chamber in the old museum I was very much astonished by what a Cabinet minister who has since given up that rank told me. He said that I had only been advocating the passing of an Act which would simply be used for creating more positions and voting more salaries, and that the Act would be absolutely useless. It rather surprised me that a man whom we would have expected to have better judgment could make such a statement. I do think that if this department is going to have any justification for its permanent existence, we ought to branch out into the scientific line. All these other Acts have been successfully administered, perhaps just as successfully as now, by other departments, and I do think that if Canada is going to take her place among the nations of the world in a scientific sense, and if the Department of Health is going to play the part it should play, it is absolutely essential that a scientific branch should be established, with a man in charge with the proper scientific attainments and qualifications. It seems ridiculous to me to see in the Estimates an item of $10,000 for research, and $200,000 for veneral diseases. It is almost a travesty on our intelligence to bring before Parliament items of that kind. Can the minister hold out any hope of having this department put on a real scientific basis in the near future.

Mr. CALDER: All I can state at present is that the Estimates contain a sum of $10,000 for research work. I am not in a position to state what the further policy of the Government may be in this regard. I may, however, throw this out as a hint as to what may happen. I stated at the outset, when dealing with the Estimates generally, that there is a possibility that provision may be made for a research laboratory somewhere in Canada. In my judgment it would be very foolish to establish a separate laboratory for our purposes. If we are going to have a general scientific laboratory for carrying on scientific research and investigational work, it seems to me that whatever we require in that direction should find a place in that laboratory in order to save expense and duplication, but until that larger question of policy is determined I am not in a position to state anything further in regard to the matter.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I do not agree that that is the larger question of policy; I think it is the minor one. The question of industrial or scientific research is an entirely different matter. We have also been advocating that in this House for a good many years, and I am glad that the Government have at last passed a Bill for that purpose. As far as a home for a scientific department is concerned, it might be housed in the same building as the Department of Health, but I do not see how one could be brought under the other or even associated with it. The objects are quite different; scientific and industrial research is an entirely different thing.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I did not get the information I asked for with regard to sick mariners.

Mr. CALDER: I was just wondering whether we were going to take up the items separately. I shall be very glad to give the figures when we come to that item.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I understood that we were going to consider the items together until we got our information.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the committee have agreed to that, and that all the items are to be passed together the moment the discussion concludes.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is the way I understand the matter.

Mr. CALDER: That is quite agreeable to me. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), wanted to know the revenue derived from marine hospitals. The fees collected in 1919-20, the full year, amounted to $78,227.04, and the expenditure amounted to $88,886.36. For the year 1920-21, down to March 28, just prior to the close of the year,—these figures will not be absolutely accurate because the books were not closed at that time—the department had collected $79,047.25, whereas the expenditure down to that time, March 28 this year, amounted to $69,-286.97. In other words, there was about $10,000 on the credit side of the ledger.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That is very satisfactory, but I understood that the rate was increased to twice what it was before. Is that correct?

Mr. CALDER: No, it was increased from one and a half cents to two cents.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The rate has been doubled.

Mr. CALDER: No; if it were doubled, it would be three cents.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is it not three cents now?

Mr. CALDER: No, two cents.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Then I think there should be a larger increase in the revenue. The revenue in 1919, under the old rate, was $69,243.65, according to the returns, so that there is very little increase in the revenue this year.

Mr. CALDER: I understand that the new rate only went into effect on January 1 of this year, so that there will be nine months of the last fiscal year under the old rate.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Do government ships pay dues the same as other ships? We have two classes of government ships, the ordinary marine vessels that are used for lighthouse service, like the Stanley and the Lady Laurier, and ships of the Canadian Government Mercantile Marine. Do both or either of these classes of ships pay the ordinary dues?

Mr. CALDER: I understand that the government ships have not been charged this rate.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): None of them?

Mr. CALDER: No, the reason being that in the past none of the government ships run by the Customs Department, the Inland Revenue Department, or the Marine Department, have ever paid these fees. Where their mariners have been sick they have been taken care of in the ordinary way, and the accounts for their care have been charged against the department. That is the custom that has prevailed in the past.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): That does not seem to be fair.

Mr. CALDER: I do not like it myself.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There is no reason in the world why Government ships should escape taxation and the care of the mariners employed by the Government should be thrown on the other ships. But that is apparently what the Government does. I notice by the Auditor General's report that this statement is borne out, a considerable sum of money having been expended in taking care of sailors on Government ships. Apparently this expenditure is charged against the revenue collected from the ordinary mercantile ships. This seems to me to be a grievous discrimination. The Government has never taken care of sick sailors on the coast of Canada; I can make that statement without the slightest hesitation. They have neglected the duty of looking after these sick mariners, and I know this to be the case in my own constituency as well as along the coast of Nova Scotia. Every hon. gentleman in this House from that part of the Dominion knows that proper attention has never been given by the Marine Department to sick sailors in Eastern Canada. The way in which doctors are paid is a good illustration of the Government's policy. The doctor is given a lump sum of $400 or $500, and he is supposed to provide medicine out of that. You can understand what this means in a port where sick sailors come in requiring expensive medicine. It simply means that the sailors do not get medicine at all, for it would be impossible for the doctor to buy drugs, at present rates, to be prescribed for any number of sick sailors out of the small amount he gets as a salary. That is one of the systems carried on by the Government in the penurious way in which they have dealt with this matter. I protest against the practice of charging the care of sick sailors on Government ships against this fund, as well as against the neglect which is shown these men, the reason for which is the alleged fact that there is no money in the fund to look after them. As a matter of fact, there has been a considerable surplus in this fund for a good number of years. I remember that this matter was looked into some time ago, and there was a large sum of money—some $200,000 I believe—of a balance to the credit of the fund. Application was made in my own constituency many years ago for some accommodation for the sick sailors at the town of Canso, which is the largest fishing port in the Dominion, or at all events, on the Atlantic coast. More ships call there and more sailors visit that port than is the case with any other port in Eastern Canada; and yet there is no accommodation for sick sailors. The nearest marine hospital situated at Louisburg, which is 140 miles distant from Canso by any means of public conveyance. No steamer runs between Canso and Louisburg, and the only way of reaching the latter place from Canso would be to take the patient up to Mulgrave, some thirty miles away, and then to Sidney, another ninety miles and from thence to Louisburg or to Antigonish, which is also a long distance from Canso. The only thing to be done in a case like this is to provide some hospital accomodation at Canso itself for sick sailors. This question has been brought to the attention of the department many times, but nothing whatever has been done. I presume that the ships of the Mercantile Marine are treated in the same way, are they not? Do they pay?

Mr. CALDER: When the hon. member asked his question, he referred to Government ships, and I immediately asked the officers if they paid the ordinary tonnage rate and was advised that they did not. But they had in mind, not the Canadian Merchant Marine, but the ordinary boats run by the different departments, which do not pay. The Canadian Merchant Marine boats pay the same as the others. With reference to doctors engaged at comparatively small figures running from $300 to $400, in the great majority of cases the sick seamen are sent to hospitals and the charges for medicines and supplies are included in the hospital bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): But take a place where there is no hospital?

Mr. CALDER: Where that does not prevail, the medical man himself out of the annual fee agreed upon provides whatever is required in the way of medicine. He is a party to the agreement, he expects it, that is his bargain, it is understood; so there cannot be any very great hardship in that connection. After correspondence and consultation with these men they came to an agreement as to what amount should be charged as an annual fee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is news to me that the doctor is allowed to state the amount he will take for attending the sailors and paying for the medicine. If that was the case there would be no complaint, and we would not have cases like that at Canso where a small sum of about $500 is paid to a doctor, which amount is to include the cost of medicine. My hon. friend's statement is not really a recital of what actually does happen. The doctor is offered a small sum to attend to this duty at the port, but he is not consulted as to what medicine shall be used. If he were he would tell a very different story from that told by my hon. friend. It is a cause of complaint among the doctors all along the coast that, out of the small salary they receive, they have to furnish medicine principally to the sailors. It is an improper method in the first place and my hon. friend ought to correct it. There should be a separate account for the medicine. The medicine is one thing; the doctor's service is another thing. They should not be mixed up together in the way my hon. friend states because it operates to the neglect of the sailor; it cannot operate otherwise. Sometimes expensive medicine is required, the salary of the doctor is often not more than $400 or $500, and it would be impossible, as every medical man knows, to give any decent treatment on a salary like that and pay for the medicine, especially as the sailor is a long time under the doctor's care. The system is wrong, and I would like my hon. friend to say now, before we get through with this discussion that he will correct it. This matter has been turned over to the Department of Health. The Marine Department is not supposed to know anything about health matters, but this department does know, it is their business, and they ought to deal with the question in a businesslike way. Pay the doctor a certain salary for looking after the sailors, and pay for whatever medicine is required out of the fund. The fund is in a healthy condition so far, and there is no reason why we should be penurious about it. It has given a credit balance this year, it will likely give a larger one next year. It has constantly given a credit balance, I think, and there is a large balance to the credit of the fund when you add up the results of the different years. Now, there is no reason why we should treat sailors this way. We are collecting money from the ships for the special purpose of taking care of them, and the Government is a trustee for the distribution of that money. I want to be emphatic on this question; the matter should be adjusted by the Health Department and adjusted at once.

Mr. CALDER: I am inclined to agree with the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Hon. matter has now come to my attention and I can see that there is a good deal in the argument. I might state, however, that the amount that has been fixed for a fee for the doctor at these various ports has been based upon past experience covering a number of years. Well, that in itself may be all right, but I can quite conceive of a case where a doctor might have half a dozen sick mariners, with a certain class of disease, or diseases, that would require a great deal of costly medicine. I can quite conceive of that, and it seems to me that the suggestion thrown out is worthy of every consideration and should be gone into with a view of seeing whether or not we cannot work out a system along the lines which have been suggested. I can promise the hon. gentleman that I will be only too glad to do that. I will admit at the same time that I can see a great deal of force in his argument, and I hope we will be able to work out some plan along that line.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will my hon. friend also look into this question of the hospital at Canso?

Mr. CALDER: I will be only too glad to do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I would like him to give that matter serious attention.

Mr. CALDER: I shall look into it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I would like my hon. friend to do this specially because I know it is the policy of the Government to close up these hospitals, and it is a good policy in places where ordinary hospitals exist for treatment.

Mr. CALDER: What is the nearest hospital to Canso?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I was explaining to my hon. friend that there were two or three hospitals, but I suppose the hospital in Antigonish would be the nearest.

Mr. CALDER: About how many miles distant would that be?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): About a hundred. It is rather difficult to remove the patient, who is on a boat, to the train and convey him to the hospital at either Antigonish, Louisburg, or Halifax; there are three hospitals to which patients from Canso can be sent. Men have lost their lives at Canso in recent years because they could get no proper treatment there. In some cases it was impossible to remove them to a hospital, they had to be treated in a kitchen or some place where people would take them in, as there is no hospital of any kind there. The consequence has been that sailors have not had the proper treatment at that place. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Marine Department constantly for years back, and promises have been made but nothing has ever been done. I would submit that the proper way to deal with this question would be to have a cottage hospital at Canso, and for the department to agree to pay a substantial sum for the purpose of maintaining it, throwing the rest of the burden upon the town. There is no reason why something should not be done by the town as well as by the Government provided the hospital can be made to serve the sick of the town as well as the sailors. I think an arrangement could be made by which the local people would bear part of the burden, if the Government would give a substantial amount each year towards maintaining a small hospital there to look after these sick mariners.

Mr. CALDER: I shall be very glad to look into it.

Mr. CHISHOLM: My hon. friend from Guysborough has been very moderate in his figures. The fact of the matter is that these medical men are often only paid $300, and the medical man in his own town of Canso was only paid $468.75 for fifteen months' work.

Mr. CALDER: He will get $550 next year.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Well, if he got $550, as my hon. friend has said, he would expend that in drugs if he gave proper treatment to the patients. The same condition obtains all along the coast. My hon. friend has made a strong plea for a hospital at Canso. He has made out a very strong case, I admit, but the same condition obtains along other sea-coasts. Take the coast of Inverness county. There you find one hundred miles of sea-coast where a large percentage of the population devote their entire time in the summer season to fishing and sailing. These men go outside the province, and therefore are entitled to participate in the Sick Mariners' Fund. There is not a hospital within a hundred and fifty miles, there is no hospital in the county, I may say, but an effort is now being put forth to build a hospital there. I would suggest to the minister that perhaps he could adopt some policy or other by which the department would give reasonable assistance to the building of that hospital. The department would then have, so to speak, a claim on that hospital for the treatment of the sick mariners. I would urge him to take that matter into consideration. As to the salary paid to the doctors, the policy now adopted is simply unique. I can explain it because those concerned are doctors, and as usual they give their services for nothing. I could tell my hon. friend the number of patients that have been treated in Cheticamp, but before doing that I would ask the minister one question: Do these men send in any report to the department as to the work they do, or as to the number of patients they treat? I see my hon. friend has the data there. If I were to tell the minister the number of patients that have been attended to at Cheticamp and Grand Etang alone, he would be surprised and would wonder how the doctors could have given those patients proper attendance and medicines on the small amount of money that is allotted. So really I am afraid the doctors accept these positions simply because their work is humanitarian. The minister's explanation a moment ago is not sufficient. It is not fair to say that because these men have been generous enough to give their work for nothing, merely getting sufficient from the Government to pay for the drugs they prescribe, that the present inadequate remuneration should be continued. It is not encouraging. These men, I suppose, would give much better service if it were shown that the country appreciated their work, and the only practical way of showing that appreciation is by the Government increasing the salaries, and that is a most reasonable request. I think the department should come to one conclusion, and that is to pay these men something reasonable or tell them, "We do not want your services."

Mr. CALDER: Probably if I had before me a statement of the number of patients each officer treated in the year I would be able to give some justification for the method that has been followed. But I quite realize the force of the argument presented by the hon. gentleman. It is quite possible that a doctor might spend all his remuneration on drugs if he is doing the right thing by his patients. I shall be quite prepared to go into the whole subject sympathetically with a view to trying to meet the arguments that have been advanced.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad indeed that my question has brought forth this discussion, because the subject is a very important one and affects certain officials of his department in the maritime provinces. It was brought to my attention some years ago that the physician who was looking after the marine hospital in my home town was not receiving very much for his services. I think if the minister will look over his statistics he will find that more patients are treated in the marine hospital at Lunenburg than in any other hispital on the Atlantic coast. This man, although to-day getting $500, which includes the medicines he has to purchase for the sick mariners he attends, only two years ago was getting but $300.

Mr. CALDER: $600 this year.

Mr. DUFF: But he got only $500 last year.

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: He is a very worthy physician and gives excellent care and attention to his patients. I feel confident that if the minister will look into the matter he will come to one conclusion, that the payments for salary and medicine should be separate. During the war when medicine was very expensive this doctor informed me that it took practically all his salary to pay for the medicines he supplied. The hospital is about two miles from the town and he has to drive out there three or four times a day to look after the patients as well as to go aboard the ships and examine the sick mariners before they are taken to the hospital. The position is no sinecure and the doctor should be paid a good fair salary.

I agree with what the hon. member for Guysborough has said in regard to the Canso hospital. Vessels from my county call at Canso perhaps more than at any other port in Nova Scotia or Newfoundland. It is a port of call for these vessels when going either to the Grand Banks, the banks off Nova Scotia coast, or up into the gulf of St. Lawrence. I have seen in the port of Canso 100 sail of vessels carrying crews of from fifteen to twenty men. There is no hospital there at the present time, and one should be established at the earliest possible moment, for the reason that sick mariners landed at Canso to-day have in a great many cases first of all to be taken from their ship to another ship which runs from Canso to Mulgrave and then transferred to the train for Halifax. I have known of several cases where sick men landed from ships belonging to my own county have died on the way to Halifax, and in other cases their condition has been so imperilled that their lives were despaired of for a long time. This condition of affairs should be remedied at the earliest possible moment.

Another matter which should be attended to is the treatment of sick mariners who are landed at Newfoundland ports. As the minister is well aware, 150 sail of vessels carrying some 3,000 men leave the county of Lunenburg every June on what is known as the summer fishing trip and proceed to the Grand Banks, about 100 miles east of Cape Race. While on the banks they call at Cape Broyle, St. Johns, Carbonear, Burin and other Newfoundland ports and land any sick men, but under the Act there is no provision for looking after them when they are sent home to Nova Scotia. That is to say, they are not allowed to enter their home hospital for the simple reason that they were taken sick outside the province, and consequently the owner of the vessel has to pay for the men's passage home and then the men themselves or their employers have to pay for their medical attendance and hospital bills. I think the minister will agree with me that the department ought to pay these expenses, or allow the men to enter hospital immediately on their return to their home port. The present situation is very unfair in view of the fact that these ship owners pay their fees and are getting no benefit therefrom. I trust the minister will look into the matter and issue orders that under these circumstances the men shall be properly looked after by the Health Department.

Mr. CALDER: I shall be very glad to look into that question as well. In the case of these fishing vessels, if a man is seriously ill and landed in Newfoundland, is any provision made for caring for him there?

Mr. DUFF: None whatever; the owners of the vessel have to pay all the bills.

Mr. CALDER: And if a man is capable of being moved he is taken back to Nova Scotia and the owner of the vessel must pay his fare and all expenses until such time as he is placed by the department in some hospital.

Mr. DUFF: No, the man comes home; he has to pay his own doctor's bills and get his own medicine, or the cost is met by the owners of the vessel. The department will take no responsibility and will not pay the bills.

Mr. CALDER: I shall be very glad to look into it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I would like the minister also to look after the Minister of Marine and see that he pays his sick mariners' bills as well as other people.

Mr. CALDER: Is my hon. friend referring to the Canadian Merchant Marine?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am referring to the ordinary vessels in the Government service such as the Laurier and the Stanley and the Montcalm and a number of others, all with large crews. The care of these men, when ill, is all charged up against sick mariners' dues, and nothing is paid into the fund by these Government vessels. I find, however, in the Auditor General's report that expenditure is charged up against this fund.

Mr. CALDER: It is recouped by the department. In the first instance it is charged up against the fund but the accounts are finally squared by calling upon the department to reimburse the amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Well, the expenditure is here, making up the amount that my hon. friend said he had spent during the year. The vessels are the Aranmore, Druid, Estevan, Lady Laurier, Laurentian, Light Ship 15, Montcalm, Stanley, Tug Lisgar, Patrol Boat Bethelama, Patrol Boat F, Lillooet and Madras. These boats are mentioned in the Auditor General's report and expenditures made in connection with them are all apparently added into the expenditure that my hon. friend has mentioned.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. CALDER: My hon. friend will find a corresponding amount on the revenue side.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I submit I am entitled to an explanation from my hon. friend. I have already understood him to say that no money was collected from the sailors on these Government vessels. Now, here is money expended from the fund, and that is what I want explained.

Mr. CALDER: As I have already stated, if there is a charge of this kind for taking care of sick mariners on these vessels the charge is first made against this fund and afterwards the amount which is paid is reimbursed by the department owning or operating the vessels.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Why is that not shown in the Auditor General's report?

Mr. CALDER: It will be found on the revenue side.

Mr. DUFF: When my hon. friend looks into the matter which I mentioned with regard to sick seamen, will he advise me when he has the information, because in a month's time the vessels will be leaving for Newfoundland, and I would like to be able to advise the captains as to the position they will be in.

Mr. CALDER: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have on several occasions directed the attention of my hon. friend's department and of the Marine Department to a most peculiar condition which exists: a vessel sailing between ports in Nova Scotia cannot participate in the sick mariners' fund, but if that vessel goes to Magdalen Islands or any place outside the province, she may participate in the fund. That has always struck me as a most extraordinary condition.

Mr. CALDER: The law would have to be amended to change that.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is what I have been protesting against all along. For the last fourteen years I have been bringing the matter to the attention of the Minister of Marine, because it does not appeal to me as being reasonable.

Mr. CALDER: It does not strike me as reasonable.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Will the minister give me the promise that he will look into the matter and that he will bring down legislation next year removing that absurdity?

Mr. CALDER: I will not promise to bring down legislation, but offhand it strikes me as a very peculiar arrangement. You have the condition where a boat which makes a small trip of ten miles outside the province—say, to an adjoining province—comes under the operation of the law, whereas, if the trip is, say, 400 miles around the coast of the province, the law does not operate. It seems to me that there must be some history in connection with this law when it has stood for fourteen years notwithstanding frequent protest by hon. members. I shall certainly look into the matter and see what the explanation of it is.

Mr. CHISHOLM: If there is any history I have never been able to learn it; I never could get any explanation from the minister or from the officers of the department.

Mr. DUFF: I can give the minister another thought with regard to the way this matter works out. A vessel leaving a port in Nova Scotia to proceed to another port in Nova Scotia to load for a foreign port does not come under the operation of the Act. For instance, two years ago, during the influenza epidemic a number of vessels were chartered in Nova Scotia to go to North Sydney and load coal for St. John's, Newfoundland, and then to proceed to Barbados or Europe. When they arrived at North Sydney the crews took sick. These vesesls had paid sick mariners' dues but it was found under the Act that the crews could not be received in the hospital and that the Marine Department, under whose charge the sick mariners' dues were at the time, would take no responsibility. The result was that although, as I say, the vessels had paid their sick mariners' dues, the owners of the ships—or the sailors themselves, whether they went home or were under the doctor's care in North Sydney—were compelled to pay their own expenses. I tried to get the Minister of Marine to change the law a year ago but nothing has been done. I certainly think that the crews of vessels which have to proceed to a local port to take cargo to a foreign port should, in case of illness at the port where the vessel is loading, be treated in the same manner as if the illness had taken place in other than a local port.

Mr. BELAND: There is a good deal of misrepresentation on the part of dealers and manufacturers with regard to the supplying of coffee to the consuming public. There are offered for sale in tins different brands of coffee, all more or less represented as the pure article and as more delicious than the coffee you would obtain if you ground the beans yourself. Now, is the department taking any action in this regard? I know of some ground coffee retailing at 70 or 75 cents a pound in which there is not more than 25 per cent of real coffee the remainder being made up of peas, chestnuts, acorns, tree leaves and so on. It is one of the greatest exploitations of the public by unscrupulous dealers. Will the department not take the matter in hand, gather samples of the different brands of coffee that are offered for sale in tins, analyse them and put through regulations, or, if the department has no authority, have legislation passed to compel those manufacturers to specify clearly on the tins: "This contains 20 per cent of coffee only and no more"? The public is under the impression that it is getting the pure article, or at least 75 per cent coffee and, say 25 per cent chicory. A mixture like that is a good one and a very agreeable beverage, but will you find a single one of those mixtures containing more than, say 30 per cent of coffee? I do not believe you will. The department seem to be absolutely heedless of this shameful exploitation of the consuming public. I am a drinker of coffee, and I always ask myself why the department does not take up this question. My answer is that the officials are Englishmen who are used to tea, and they do not care about the quality of the coffee. But try to make an old English lady drink adulterated tea, a tea that is only 20 per cent pure, and you will hear a storm brewing somewhere.

Mr. JACOBS: "A tempest in a teapot."

Mr. BELAND: It will be "a tempest in a teapot" this time. As regards coffee, which is a wholesome stimulant, which is an article that you will find on every breakfast table in Quebec and very much now throughout the English provinces, why should we not be supplied with the pure article or, at least, know what we are getting? We do not know. This commodity is being sold at a fancy price without the public having any possibility of knowing whether the product is adulterated or not.

To pass from coffee to maple products, according to the existing law you are supposed to get only the pure article when you buy maple sugar, or maple syrup especially. I make the statement without any fear of successful contradiction that the market is flooded with adulterated maple syrup. Unscrupulous manufacturers and dealers now avail themselves of the general impression that prevails that when you see maple syrup on a tin, it must be and is pure; but in the majority of cases it is not the pure article; it is a mixture, and the public should know that it is a mixture and the exact quantity of pure maple syrup which the article contains should be stated. I insist upon the department collecting samples, not only of maple syrup, but especially of ground coffee offered for sale in tins and letting the public know what they contain. These articles will then sell at the price at which they should be sold, and that is a few cents a pound and no more.

Mr. CALDER: I am personally glad the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) has brought these matters to our attention. Canada, as regards the Adulteration of Foods Act, is now divided, as I stated at the outset, into five districts. During the year we have adopted the policy of having permanent officials in charge of the work in each of those districts. I find, for example, that in Montreal we have four officers, one of whom is on part time. There are a few part-time officers still left. We throw the administration of the law upon these permanent officers; it is their duty, under the law and under instructions from the department, to endeavour, in every way possible, to chase up people who deal in these adulterated food products.

Mr. BELAND: I am afraid the officers are too lenient as regards coffee especially.

Mr. CALDER: I am very glad the hon. gentleman has called our attention to the matter because it will be my business to take it up with the department as regards these two products, at least; that is maple products and coffee. The hon. gentleman rather frightens me because I use daily one of these coffees put up in a tin can.

Mr. BELAND: The minister is drinking peas all right.

Mr. CALDER: I had better have it analysed just for the purpose of knowing what I am drinking daily because there may be but a small proportion of pure coffee in the article. There is no doubt that if either of these conditions prevail, if the market is being flooded with large quantities of coffee that is not coffee at all or that contains only a small proportion of pure coffee, we and the public should know that. If we have a law that provides for the sale of pure maple products, and if that law is not being lived up to, we should follow the matter up, and see that the law is carried out.

Mr. BELAND: Have all the provinces availed themselves of the amount that was voted last year for combatting venereal diseases?

Mr. CALDER: All of the provinces, with the exception of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. New Brunswick would have been entitled to $7,517 and Prince Edward Island to $1,915. That would be the total amount to which they would be entitled out of $200,000, and they have not availed themselves of the grant.

Mr. BELAND: The remaining provinces have taken the whole of the amounts to which they are entitled?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, but unless quite recently, they have not been paid the full amounts to which they are entitled. Generally speaking—I am speaking broadly, there may be one or two exceptions—all the provinces have expended far more than the grants paid to them. For example, I find that Manitoba has a grant from us of $6,305 and, according to the last figures available, she spent on this work $30,201.

Mr. BELAND: Is that all that was allotted to Manitoba?

Mr. CALDER: $12,611 would be the total grant for the year. I find that Saskatchewan was entitled to $15,361 and the last figure that we have available indicates that Saskatchewan, in dealing with the problem, spent $53,571. Thus most of the provinces are spending far in excess of the grants which they are paid.

Mr. BELAND: They are earning the subsidy all right?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Grant to assist the Canadian Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, $10,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CALDER: This is an old grant which has been carried on from year to year. I think it was first started in the year 1902 when it began with the grant of $1,000, and it was gradually increased to $5,000. In 1910, the amount became $10,000, and $10,000 has been paid annually since then. This Association was formed some years ago and it is still being carried on under Dr. Porter, who is the secretary. It has interested itself during all these years in the care and treatment of tuberculous patients. I think it may be said that, as a result of the activities of this organization, there has been established throughout Canada from coast to coast a series of sanatoria that have done a splendid work in caring for this class of patients. From my general knowledge of the situation I would say that their work is not yet through. It is now very largely of an educative nature, and I think it might very profitably continue for a while at any rate.

11 p.m.

Mr. JACOBS: What can you do with $10,000? That is nothing.

Mr. CALDER: I presume they get other funds as well.:

Mr. BELAND: The association gets very large subscriptions from the public. This grant has been made for a number of years, and I think very properly. I have been connected with the activities of the association all over Canada, and I think the grant is a very small one. The association is supported largely by the public, and their work is commended in all respects. Dr. Porter is the secretary. He travels a good deal and any one who has come in contact with him and heard his lectures will agree that they are very, very instructive and useful.

Item agreed to.

Grant towards defraying the expenses of the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene, $10,000.

Mr. CALDER: This grant was first paid in the year 1919-20. This organization was formed for the purpose of investigating the mental condition of at least some of our people—those found in asylums and jails and other institutions of that character. Dr. Martin, of Montreal, is president, and the executive consists of Drs. Clarke, Mundie, and Hincks. I had the privilege two years ago of meeting a committee representing these gentlemen and discussing their work with them. I got a good many of their reports at that time, and went through them, and in my judgment the association is carrying on a very valuable work. They have assisted the provinces very materially. They have made a survey of the institutions in Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, and I know they have had an invitation to do so in Saskatchewan, but I do not know whether they have yet visited that province. Their survey was undertaken mainly with the object in view of advising these provinces as to the treatment of mental defectives. I remember meeting one of the doctors from Quebec, Dr. Desloges, who is Superintendent of Health for that province. He was very pleased with the work this association had done in that province and with the assistance he had received. It is proposed that this grant should be continued this year. Whether or not it should be continued after that, will be a matter to be decided in the future. I have no hesitation in saying that these gentlemen have done very valuable work. When the association started, they collected $50,000 by private subscription, and it was only after collecting that amount that they came to us because their Budget covered a very much larger sum. They came to us for a grant of some $10,000. I presume that within the last two years they have raised large amounts by private subscriptions. In any event, I think they are doing a very valuable work.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

House again in Committee on Bill 118, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the committee, on Tuesday, May 3, all of its clauses had been read and considered; a majority of them had been adopted, but clauses 11, 12, 40, 41, 42 and 43 had been allowed to stand. Mr. Guthrie had also proposed to amend clause 11 by inserting after the word "Act" in line 51, on page 4 of the Bill, the following words: "for the purposes of such meeting," but this amendment had not been adopted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the amendment has now been practically agreed to.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 11, as amended, agreed to.

Section 12, agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Guthrie the committee by unanimous consent returned to the consideration of clause 8—receiving order or assignment to be filed:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move to strike out clause 8 and substitute therefor the following:

The Act is amended by inserting immediately after section ten, the following:—

Every authorized trustee to whom an assignment is made under section nine of this Act shall within four days of such assignment fyle, in the Court having jurisdiction in the locality of the debtor, the said assignment, and should another authorized trustee be subsequently appointed in his stead such other trustee shall within four days of his appointment give notice thereof to the said court.

I am taking this clause from the Bill now before the House introduced by my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs).

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move to insert, immediately after section 8, as section 8 (a) the following:

Section 5 is amended by adding as sub-section (2) the following: (2) the said interim receiver may, under the direction of the court, summarily dispose of any perishable goods and carry on the business of the debtor for all conservatory purposes.

Mr. JACOBS: That clause is suggested by Mr. Justice Panneton, judge of the Superior Court of Quebec.

Mr. MORPHY: There is no definition of the word "conservatory" in the clause. Is it left to the judgment of the judge?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It only applies to perishable goods.

Mr. MORPHY: I did not know the word "perishable" was in the clause.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move to insert as clause 8 (b) the following:

Paragraph (b) of sub-section 1 of section 11 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "and except also the rights of a secured creditor under section six of this Act."

This is suggested by the same learned judge of the province of Quebec.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move to amend section 40 by replacing in lines 10 and 11, the word "one" by the word "three."

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, under the new law the landlord will be entitled to six months' rent, three months past due, and three months accelerative?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 41, 42 and 43 agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move to add to the Bill, as clauses 52 and 53 thereof, the following:

52. The French version of The Bankruptcy Act, chapter thirty-six of the statutes of 1919, is hereby amended by striking out the words "tenir maison" in the last line of paragraph (d) of section three thereof, and substitutisg therefor the words "se renfermer dans sa maison."

53. Section eleven of the said French version of the said Act is further amended by striking out the word "meubles" and replacing it by the word "réels" in the eighteenth and twenty-third lines of subsection one, in the eighth line of subsection eight, in the fifth line of subsection nine and in the seventh line of subsection eleven.

Mr. CANNON: Would the hon. member who suggested that amendment please explain it?

Mr. JACOBS: When I introduced the Bill originally, I explained that the French version is not quite in accordance with the law as it was intended to be placed on the statute book. The words "tenir maison" are in the statute instead of the words "se renfermer dans sa maison." That is, in the section itself one of the acts of bankruptcy which the insolvent can commit is "keeping house," and the party who translated the expression into French, instead of saying "se renfermer dans sa maison" translated it literally and said "tenir maison," which means that the insolvent keeps house or is a housekeeper, which is not an act of bankruptcy. The amendment is purely for the purpose of bringing both versions into harmony.

Sections agreed to.

Mr. JACOBS: Before the Bill is reported, I would draw to the attention of the Acting Solicitor General the question of the remuneration of the trustee and of the solicitor. Section 40 of the Act deals with the remuneration of the trustee, and another section, which I have not before me, provides for the remuneration of the solicitor of the estate. The law says that the trustee is entitled to a remuneration of 5 per cent. Section 3 of section 40 provides that the remuneration of the trustee shall not, under any circumstances, exceed 5 per cent of the cash receipts. Subsequently, when the general rules under the Bankruptcy Act were passed, a table of fees was provided, under which the trustee is entitled to various fees for different services which he renders while managing the estate. The trustees in bankruptcy in the province of Quebec,—I do not know what they do in the other provinces—not only credit themselves with five per cent remuneration, but also with these fees, and in many cases the trustee walks off with the entire estate. Now this law was passed for the purpose of keeping down costs and seeing that the creditors get something out of the estate, but the creditors now find they are in a very much worse position than they were before this Act was passed. I should like to know from the Acting Solicitor General whether it was intended that these trustees should receive the remuneration provided for in section 40 and also the fees referred to in the general rules? Whatever I have said also applies to the solicitors themselves. If it is a fact that both the solicitors and the trustees are entitled to the five per cent each, plus these fees as provided under the general rules, we would like to know forthwith because, as I said before, the Act will not function very long if this is allowed to remain in force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the Act was very clear and definite upon the question of costs and the question of fees. The whole remuneration of the trustees is dealt with under section 40, and subsection 3 of section 40 is very specific. It says:

> The remuneration of the trustee for all services shall not under any circumstances exceed five per cent of the cash receipts.

That is an absolute limitation, and that is for all the services that he performs. But in any event his fees are again limited to such an amount as the creditors shall see fit to vote to him. He is not entitled to exceed that limit or to collect another bill of costs or fees as provided by the tariff contained in the general rules. I think the tariff in the general rules was provided for the purpose of fixing the fees of solicitors and attorneys, but in any case the fees of solicitors and attorneys shall not exceed the amount specified in section 67 of the Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Not even with the consent of the creditors?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the debtor would be the sufferer then. Section 67 is pretty definite. It provides:

> All attorneys, solicitors and counsel acting for the trustee or for the estate of a debtor in respect of proceedings under this Act, shall be paid out of the assets of such estate their reasonable costs and fees as fixed in a tariff provided by General Rules;—

We have the tariff. It goes on to say:

> but, except as hereinafter provided, the aggregate amount of such costs and fees so payable out of the assets of estates whereof the gross proceeds exceed five thousand dollars shall not exceed five per centum of such gross proceeds.

That is in estates over five thousand. Then as to smaller estates there is this provision:

> This provision shall not disentitle such attorneys, solicitors and counsel to any costs or fees which may be awarded against or be payable by persons other than the trustee or the estate of the debtor, and notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, in estates whereof the gross proceeds do not exceed five thousand dollars, the costs or fees payable may, by unanimous vote of the inspectors, be increased to any amount not to exceed ten per centum of the gross proceeds of such estate. Such tariff shall direct by whom and in what manner such costs and fees are to be collected and accounted for and to what account they shall be paid.

I think it is quite clear under that section that in estates where the amount realized is over $5,000, solicitors or attorneys shall be paid according to the tariff, but the whole of their costs shall not exceed five per centum. In smaller estates under $5,000, if the inspectors of the estate unanimously agree, then these fees may be up to ten per cent of the amount of the estate, but they are not entitled to their commission and also their bill of costs. I have been told that in some parts of Canada a practice has grown up that a solicitor gets his commission and likewise a bill of costs. All I can say is it is contrary to the spirit and letter of the law and such a custom should not be allowed to prevail.

Mr. JACOBS: Has the Secretary of State any disciplinary power over the trustee and solicitor?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He is deliberately breaking the law.

Mr. JACOBS: I invite my hon. friend's attention to page 83 of the rules of practice, the general rules, in which an elaborate system of counsel fees is published. I see that they run up from $10 in some cases to $50 in others. Then in section 88, on page 84 I find this:

> Solicitors fees on collection of account claims, collected after notice on demand and owing as a whole or in instalments, on the first $300 or less, fifteen per cent; on the excess over $300 up to $1,000, eight per cent; on over $1,000, four per cent; Minimum charge $5.

Is that also included in the five per cent which the solicitor is entitled to receive?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that everything collected, no matter what the bill of costs is, must not exceed the percentage set out in scetion 67 of the Act. Now I realize that these rules do not in all respects conform to what I consider to be the meaning of the Act, and I think the rules, in the near future, will have to be re-drafted. There are a number of inconsistencies between the rules and various sections of the Act. I think when they are re-drafted care should be taken to lay down expressly in the rules that the solicitors or attorneys shall not in any case accept more than the percentages set out in 67.

Mr. MORPHY: Before the section is settled, may I point out that nothing is said about disbursements, and I can imagine a case where the disbursements in a small estate might, for some unaccountable reason, run high.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a provision for the disbursements of a trustee in another section af the Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Would it not be a good idea for the Secretary of State to circularize the trustees who have been appointed, and of whom he has a list, drawing their attention to the fact that in some cases the law is being contravened, and that they must adhere strictly to the letter of the law in the future.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I think something of the kind should be done.

REPORT

Report of the Air Board for the year 1920.—Hon. Mr. Guthrie.

THE CONSERVATION ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): The Prime Minister is not present or I would ask him whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this session to repeal the Conservation Act, as foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I am not quite sure, but I am strongly of the opinion that it has been introduced in the Senate.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. Hugh Guthrie (Acting Solicitor General), Bill No. 118, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, was read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 9, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, in one important respect the task which falls to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in these days is one that must demand our sympathy rather than adverse criticism. At a time of severe depression, financial, industrial and commercial—a condition which, I am afraid, will have to become worse before it can be better—the hon. gentleman is called upon to devise ways and means for raising enormous sums of money, sums so large as to be almost beyond the comprehension of the average citizen, sums so large that, by comparison, the Budgets of a few years ago, large as they seemed in their day, dwindle into insignificance. In a very large degree we recognize that these demands which the hon. minister is obliged to make are the result of the war, and we must treat them accordingly. The people of Canada willingly, cheerfully, even enthusiastically, entered into the Great War; and now that the war is over, and the day of settlement is come, we must all be prepared to accept the consequences with the utmost possible equanimity. However much we may differ from my hon. friends opposite with regard to some of the methods they employ in the raising of these moneys, and in their distribution, in all that makes for meeting our obligations arising from the war, in all that may be necessary to make provision for the dependents of those who made the supreme sacrifice, in all that may be necessary to make adequate provision for the men who have come home wholly or partially disabled, in all that is necessary as arising from the war, we desire to share with hon. gentlemen opposite the responsibility and the honour of the occasion. It is when we come to questions not directly arising from the war that we are obliged to differ from those hon. gentlemen.

The situation is a very grave one financially. It calls for very serious deliberation, and for a larger measure of economy than the Government have been able to observe. With the details of the proposals which my hon. friend submitted to the House last night, I do not propose to deal at any length, although some of them I may refer to. They will require more careful consideration than any of us can give on a moment's notice. There are, however, some general principles involved in the minister's Budget to which we may properly make reference. I notice that my hon. friend has made no change in the income tax. It was not without some difficulty that the previous Government, of which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was a member, under the leadership of the late Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), were induced to take up the question of the income tax. They clung to the old notion that all you had to do to raise money was to boost the tariff, and for a time they seemed to rely on that theory. However, sounder judgment prevailed in the end, and they adopted the income tax. If they had deemed it necessary even to increase the tax at the present time, I do not think any of us on this side could complain; but the tax has become a rather serious burden, nevertheless. Now, one of the virtues of the income tax is that the people know exactly what they are paying; while an alleged virtue of indirect taxation—it is not really a virtue, but rather a weakness, as a matter of fact—is that the citizen pays his money cheerfully and is not quite aware of what he is doing. And that is a fact. It is economically better to have direct taxation than indirect, and yet indirect taxation has a convenience and an advantage which often recommend it to favourable consideration. In this case the Government are raising very large sums from the income tax and we commend them for it. In the first year, or possibly two years, of the imposition of the tax there was some complaint, perhaps not without reason, of laxity in the enforcement of the law. Possibly that condition was unavoidable, as the system was a new one and the machinery was not complete. But I want to do the Government the justice to say that if there was any laxity at the beginning they are now making amends for it and are apparently putting forth great efforts to collect the income tax. I commend them for so doing, although I cannot commend the methods they are pursuing. This tax is a great burden to-day. It is a burden to people of moderate means and even to those who are in the possession of large incomes, who may not find it very easy to provide quickly large sums that are needed. I think, however, that, considering the novelty of the tax, and the indisposition generally of people to bear this direct taxation, the effort of the Government should be to apply the most convenient method of administering the law. It would be absurd for me to say that the Government have tried to find the most inconvenient method possible; that would be silly. But I think I may say that if they had been aiming to devise an inconvenient and troublesome method, they could not have succeeded in hitting upon one more difficult than that which is at present in operation. The complaint to-day with most people paying the income tax is not with the tax itself. The tax has to be paid, although it is a burden. But the penalties which my hon. friends are imposing in their efforts to get money are the cause of much vexation, and give just cause for complaint. I recognize the fact that the Minister of Finance, like any other creditor, must get his money, and he must exercise a little pressure sometimes to obtain it; but I do not think he is justified in out-shylocking Shylock by charging 60 per cent interest to the poor devil who fails to pay promptly. Yet that is what my hon. friend is doing. Shylock demanded his pound of flesh because it was so nominated in the bond. It is not nominated in the bond that my hon. friend shall charge some poor defaulter with 60 per cent interest because he happens to be a short time behind with his payment.

That is with regard to the past. With regard to the methods employed during the present year, if there is anything in the world calculated to give every Canadian a headache to-day, now that there is no whisky to be obtained, it is the making up of the return which the hon. gentleman calls for. It is exasperating; it is creating a new profession, the business of making up returns. The average man cannot make it up with satisfaction to himself, and I trust that my hon. friend, who has once or twice referred to some change which he intends to make, will make the thing a little less disagreeable than it now is. Here is a description of the system which the hon. gentleman has employed. It is not my description—it will only take a minute or two to read—it is a description given by one of the great trust companies of Canada, the Royal Trust Company, which issued a book of instructions to tell income taxpayers what they should do. I am now quoting:

"The citizen must not wait till he is asked for his tax; nor may he leave the calculation of this amount to the officials. He must calculate it himself and pay it without being asked. Along with the form showing his income for 1920 he must send in (by April 30, 1921) at leat one-fourth of the actual tax which he reckons himself liable for—the rest being payable later with six per cent, interest in three two-monthly instalments.

"If he puts the figures too low he becomes immediately liable to several penalties, even if his error is unintentional. The government officials have no power to let him off. The law decrees the exact sum which he must be fined.

"For instance: If he understates his income by a trifling amount, up to one-tenth, he must pay income tax on the deficiency with ten per cent interest. If he understates his income by more than ten and less than twenty per cent, the fine is one-half the amount of income omitted—not merely half the tax. If the deficiency is twenty per cent, or more, the whole of the unreported income is taken. Thus, if he states his income as $4,500, when it is $5,650, he is fined $1,150, besides of course the unpaid tax.

"If he is late in sending in his return, twenty-five per cent, is added to his tax.

"If he pays less than a fourth of the tax as estimated by himself to begin with, or less than the proper amount in the case of later instalments, twenty-five per cent, of the deficiency (and in no case less than $5.00) is added to his tax. The same penalty is prescribed for not paying within thirty days any sum demanded in addition to the tax as estimated by himself.

"If he is asked for further information and is late in sending it, or if he fails to keep such adequate records and accounts as the Finance Minister may prescribe, he may be fined $100 a day for his default; and a false statement may be punished with a $10,000 fine and six months in jail."

Now I humbly submit, Mr. Speaker, that the income tax is burden enough to impose on the people without adding all these pains and penalties which are, I do not hesitate to say, of a very ridiculous character. I do trust that before the session is over my hon. friend will make such changes as will, at all events, enable the unhappy taxpayer to feel that the thing has been made as easy as possible.

Mr. BUREAU You might add flogging.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes provided he is under twenty-one years of age.

Now the present financial situation is such that we need to think seriously of what we are to do to meet it. I am going to read the opinion of some wise men as to what are the sound principles that should govern public bodies in meeting the difficulties of the situation. We were represented at the Brussels Conference, a meeting of very prominent economists and financial men some months ago, by three delegates, one of whom was my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie). The Conference adopted a number of resolutions to which I may have cause to refer as I proceed. Here is one of them and the explanation given by the president:

The President: The third part of the resolution says: It is imperative that every Government should, as the first social and financial reform, take the following steps:

(a) Restrict its ordinary re-current expenditure, including the service of its debt, to such an amount as can be covered by its ordinary revenue.

(b) Rigidly reduce all expenditures on armaments in so far as such reduction is compatible with the preservation of national security.

(c) Abandon all unproductive extraordinary expenditure.

(d) Restrict even productive extraordinary expenditure to the lowest possible amount.

This resolution was carried unanimously, and approved by the Government of Canada through the Minister of Militia who, as I have said, was present. I deeply regret to say that though the Government of Canada supported that excellent proposal at Brussels they do not seem to be willing to support it at Ottawa. There does not seem to be as much zeal for sound financial principles in the climate of Ottawa as there was in the delightful climate of Brussels. Now it seems to me that if we inquire into the manner in which we are disposing of the public funds we shall have some difficulty in bringing all our appropriations within the four corners of this excellent resolution. We are asked by the ministers of the Government, from time to time, to pass what I may call "a self-denying ordinance". We are all told that we must not make unreasonable demands upon the Treasury. Each one of us, no doubt, in his community has some public work which is demanding attention—it may be a public wharf, it may be a pier, it may be a breakwater for the fishermen, it may be a public building; all these things, worthy and commendable in themselves, are pressing upon us. But when we present them to the Government we are met with the declaration that these are not urgent matters, that in these days we must have economy, and these things must wait. And it is a reasonable answer if the Government would only live up to that idea all through—then we might have no difficulty in explaining matters to our constituents. The trouble is that when temptation—say an election or something of that kind—arises, my hon. friends are not willing to be the exemplars of the excellent doctrine which they preach; they are quite willing to yield to the temptations which arise, and to make appropriations which are not of an urgent character. Now, if we want a sample, let us take the case of the dry dock out at Esquimalt, Victoria. Victoria is a beautiful city, a lovely residential city, and a city of commerical importance too. As I think of the prairie farmer and look ahead and see the day when, as the fruit of his toil—he is not going to accumulate much just now; but when as the fruit of a life period of hard work—he acquires a competence and wants some place to rest and enjoy the evening of life pleasantly, I do not think he could do better than turn his vision out to the Pacific and sit down in the beautiful city of Victoria. It has advantages, it has charms; but what earthly reason was there which demanded that millions of money be spent on a dry dock in the presence of these advantages? I do not think it was even necessary politically. Why, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) could be elected out there on his personal merits—a good many of us would be willing to vote for him. But the Government do not seem to have had enough confidence in themselves, or in him, or in their cause; and so at a time when they were preaching economy to us they undertook to expend millions of money for this dry dock at Victoria. There is a dry dock, too, at Prince Rupert, which is not very busy; and a dry dock is under contract at Vancouver. Now, as to why, under these circumstances, it was necessary to spend millions for a new dry dock at Esquimalt, where already there was a small dry dock, I do not think any explanation can be given to the people of Canada which will be satisfactory. Each one of us when he goes back to his constituents will be asked: "Why didn't you get this public building? —that public work?" We may say: "Oh, the Government cannot do anything for us, they have not any money." But of course we shall be met with the answer: "They had millions of public money for a dry dock out in Victoria." For my part, I think that case is a very strong illustration of the fact that the Government are not willing to follow out the excellent principles that they laid down in the case of the Brussels resolution. The principles set forth in the Brussels resolution are very sound, but I am afraid they are not going to be carried out to any very great extent.

Now come, if you will, to the question of naval and military expenditures. If anybody says that in this country we have no need of any naval or military expenditures —once in a while I hear some suggestion of the kind—I do not wish to be included among the list of people who entertain such views. A self-respecting country must have a small standing army, a nucleus that would be available when an emergency arises, and it must have, in a moderate degree, even some naval organization. But, I do humbly submit, this is not the time for these things. My hon. friend the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), himself a gallant returned soldier, the other day reminded us of an important fact. We have 400,000 trained soldiers in Canada to-day—the best material for fighting that the world has ever produced. These men can be called upon if any emergency arises. Why we should anticipate any emergency at this time is not easy for anybody to conjecture. If there ever was a time when we had need of but little military expenditure it is to-day, and I believe the men who will be most ready to confirm that view will be the returned soldiers themselves. They have had all the war they want; they want a chance to get back to the arts of peace. And so I say that the military expenditure might well have been curtailed in the present year in larger measure than has been attempted by my hon. friends opposite.

Then, if you turn to the question of naval expenditure, the only good thing to be said in favour of the Government's policy in that respect is that it indicates repentance in sackcloth and ashes for the wrong they did the Laurier naval policy a few years ago. It has that merit, and one should not ignore it altogether. We have all reached the conclusio nnow that, whether our expenditures be large or small, whatever may be done in the way of naval policy in Canada must be done on the lines laid down in 1909 and 1910 by the Laurier Government; that is, a local navy of a modest character, constructed under advice of Imperial officers and designed to co-operate in time of war with the Imperial navy. That "tin-pot navy," as some of my hon. friends opposite described the Laurier policy of that time, they have accepted to-day, and to that extent I am willing to give them credit. But the volume of money that has been spent in that direction is largely unnecessary. The time will come when we must take larger responsibilities for our share in the defence of the Empire, and the best way we can share in that defence is by making adequate provision, as far as that may be possible, for the defence of our own shores, and in that way relieve the Mother Country of the burden which she would otherwise have to bear. In that respect it is gratifying to know that we have reached this common ground, that whatever may be done in naval affairs is to be done on lines which will be no longer the subject of conflict between political parties in this country.

The British Government offered the Government of Canada several ships, and in a moment of weakness the Government of Canada accepted the white elephant. We did not need them at that time, we do not need them to-day; but we have them, and since we have them I suppose we must provide decently for their upkeep. But I think the country will say it was an act of unwisdom on the part of the Government to accept this white elephant that the British Government were kind enough to offer. I credit the British Government with the best intentions in the matter, but I do not think we should have accepted their offer.

The great need of the world everywhere is disarmament. The efforts of one nation to prepare both in naval and military organization for another war, and then to plead that it is in favour of disarmament, do not seem to result in any progress towards the end desired. Everybody is waiting for somebody else to take the lead. It is to be hoped that the statesmen of Europe may find some basis upon which all countries can begin to engage seriously and to a greater degree than they have yet done in effecting reasonable disarmament. We have not a very extensive organization to disarm, but I think we should be careful at all times not to plunge into naval and military expenditure which is really not likely to be needed, and which, speaking generally, is not going to be of any value.

Now, when I come to the question of the tariff it is difficult to be serious in dealing with the convolutions of the Government with respect to the work of tariff revision. There has come to be a well understood rule that the tariff of Canada should be revised about once in ten years. There was a revision in 1897, followed by another revision in 1907. Our successors in office have accepted the rule. If I am not mistaken, the late Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, stated in one of his Budget speeches that the time for revision was long overdue. It is well understood that the ordinary process of tariff revision had to be suspended on account of the war. The revision which might have been made in 1917 could not very well be undertaken. The Government had good reasons for delay —the war was still on. But when the war ceased, then the demand for tariff revision began, a demand begun among friends of the Government, as well as by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. My hon. friend the member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in a moment of—shall I say?—indiscretion, told us of what had happened in caucus. He said he had insisted that there should be tariff revision. But they jollied him along somehow or other, and he comforted himself with the idea that it would be all right next year. In 1919 Sir Thomas White, in the course of his Budget speech, spoke of an inquiry that ought to be held. He said:

> The result of such an inquiry should be a body of information which will enable the Government to effect a general revision of the tariff, fair to all parts of the country and effectively promoting the national welfare of Canada This inquiry should proceed just as soon as conditions are sufficiently stabilized to permit it My own view is it might well be commenced about the autumn of this year.

That was in 1919. Well, Sir, the autumn came, but there was no tariff inquiry and no tariff revision. What they did was to send out a polite intimation that everybody who had anything to say on the tariff should send in a letter on the subject. I suppose that was done. At all events there was no tariff inquiry and no revision. The Government again were able to jolly along that portion of their friends who pressed for revision. When it came to 1920 my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), was not lacking in the positive assurance that we were going to have this inquiry and this revision. We brought forth a motion calling attention to the fact that the promises of the Government in that respect had not been kept. The answer was, "Oh, all right, we will have it next year." They have been going on this way for three or four years. I quoted a couple of lines on a former occasion which I might repeat with greater force to-day. In this matter of tariff revision the course of the Government has been to:

> Promise, prepare, propose, postpone
> And end by letting things alone.

I want to return to the Brussels conference. I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) is present. I find that they not only gave consent to the doctrine of financial management which I have read, but they also gave consent to sound tariff principles. Here is the resolution supported by the Government of Canada through my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence:

The Conference recommends that within such limits and at such time as may appear possible each country should aim at the progressive restoration of that freedom of commerce—

Will my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) note these words?

—of that freedom of commerce which prevailed before the war, including the withdrawal of artificial restrictions on, and discriminations of price against, external trade.

Carried unanimously.

Another resolution to which the Government of Canada subscribed through their delegate to the International Financial Conference was as follows:

The International Financial Conference affirms that the improvement of the financial position largely depends on the general restoration as soon as possible of good-will between the various nations; and in particular it endorses the declaration of the Supreme Council of the 8th March last "that the States which have been created or enlarged as a result of the war should at once re-establish full and friendly co-operation and arrange for the unrestricted interchange of commodities in order that the essential unity of European economic life may not be impaired by the erection of artificial economic barriers."

Our representative helped to carry that resolution unanimously at Brussels. Then my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence came home and assisted his friend the Prime Minister in a declaration that we wanted artificial barriers and did not want to have anything approaching freedom of commerce!

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister in his interesting trip out West made frequent references to the tariff. He pictured more than once the small reforms, as he described them, which had been made by the Liberal party. He was very strong on the matter of percentages; he compared one tariff with another and was quite ready to show that there was only a fraction of difference between them. Now, my right hon. friend has perhaps not given the matter sufficient attention to know that there could be a large measure of tariff reform, without any reduction of percentage at all. If you increase your taxes on luxuries and diminish your taxes on the common things of life, the net result may be a larger average rate of taxation than you had before, but you have made a tariff revision which the mass of the people can understand and appreciate. If you turn to the Liberal policy—and I wish only to briefly refer to it—of 1897 you will find that in order to value the measure of tariff reform that was then given, you need to look at it from three viewpoints. In the first place, there was the advantage that came to the people from the direct reduction of duties. It can be established positively, I believe, that if you take into account simply the difference between the duties that were paid during the period of the Liberal Administration and the duties that would have been paid had the Conservative tariff remained in force, the money that went directly into the pockets of the Canadian people on that account alone was from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000. But it must be remembered—and economists, I think, will agree—that the saving you make in a case like that is not to be measured only by the amount that you did not pay into the Customs; you have to take into account also the check that was put upon the rise of prices at home, and that for every dollar saved to the people in that direct way probably two dollars were saved in the difference between the prices prevailing and those which would otherwise have been charged by the home manufacturer. The third point is this: at that time, although very great changes were made in the tariff as respects commodities consumed by the public generally, the duties were increased upon wine, cigars, tobaccos, spirits and all things that might be deemed luxuries. If, therefore, you make a distinction between the luxuries and the common things of life you will see that the reduction made to the masses of the people was even much larger than I have indicated. Now, when my hon. friends on the other side, in an effort to defend their position, represent the Liberal party as having made no material change in the tariff, they are not doing justice to us; they are not doing justice to common truth. I could, if time permitted, give a long list of reductions that were made. I can give one case which I have in mind. I remember very well, in the campaigns in which I took part, I acquired a bag containing samples of goods taken from the shelves of a wholesale house in the Maritime Provinces. To every piece there was attached a label telling exactly what the goods cost, what the price was to the consumer, and what the duty amounted to. I remember that on articles of common cloth, such cloth as would be found in the clothing of most of the people, the farmers and workingmen of Canada, the duties were so much per cent and so much a pound; there was a mixture of specific and ad valorem duties—any sort of scheme to make the people pay more without their knowing it—and the combined ad valorem and specific rates on these articles of clothing amounted in some cases to from 50 to 60 and 70 per cent. Well, when you cut down duties of that character to 22, 23, 24, 25 and 30 per cent, who will say that there was no tariff reform? Sir, there was a great tariff reform. My hon. friends opposite are very fond indeed of making assertions which would give the impression that our tariff reform did not amount to anything. More than one minister has been in the habit of saying: We are going to stand by the policy that we have had continuously for the last forty years—thereby implying that there was no change of policy; that the policy of the Liberal party was merely a continuation of that of the Conservative party. Sir, the facts do not warrant any assertion of that kind. When hon. gentlemen say that they are going to stand by this policy which has been followed continuously for forty years, they are saying something which is at variance with the facts of our tariff history. If it be true that we have had the same policy for all these years, what did the Conservative leader mean when, at the time of the bringing down of the Liberal tariff reform policy in 1897, he spoke about the "sorrowful wail" that went up from the country? Hon. gentlemen have heard it before, but it is really interesting enough to submit to the House again—this is what the leader of the Conservative party of that day said when the whole matter was fresh in his mind and everybody understood the facts:

> Now, what is the result? The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralysed in consequence. While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

Well, Sir, if we made no material change; if we continued the old national policy, why did the venerable statesman who then led the Conservative party make such a rumpus? We have all heard the story of the superstitious thief who had invaded a butcher shop and carried away a ham. When he got out on the street a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning came on, and the thief had a superstitious feeling that the storm was a kind of penalty for his deed. So he said: "Oh Lord, I am sorry I took the ham, but isn't this a dreadful row to raise about one small piece of pork?" It is the same in this case; if there was nothing in the tariff reduction made by the Liberal party; if the changes were insignificant,—if, indeed, there was practically no change in the fiscal policy under that administration, then it seems to me that my hon. friends have been making a terrible noise for a long time with regard to the matter. However, they have now given that up and are approaching the other side of the question.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, speaking at Winnipeg, made an allusion to myself which I must be permitted to quote. He said:

> Mr. Fielding has time and again given his adherence to the protective principle, and never in language more unequivocal than employed in recent years.

My right hon. friend is mistaken. I never gave any adherence to the principle of protection. I have said again and again, and I say now with increased emphasis, that you cannot make a sound fiscal policy for Canada by rigid adherence to any particular theory. I accept the philosophy of that much-quoted expression: It is a condition, not a theory, which confronts us. But I say that if I had to choose between the two principles, by all means I would start from the standpoint of free trade, because I believe it can be defended far better than the principle of protection. I say without hesitation that the public man who aims to build up a tariff in this country starting from the standpoint of protection, basing it on the principle of protection, carrying it through on that principle, will never produce a tariff with which the people of Canada will be satisfied. You may win a temporary victory; it was done in 1911, but the men who brought about that victory, so far as the commercial side of it is concerned, have had sad reason to regret the blunder they made. For the condition of unrest which prevails in this country, they are largely responsible, a condition which is not likely to end in the very early future. Someone has said, and the expression is often quoted, that "nothing is settled until it is settled right." You may depend upon it that a tariff built up on the protective principle, a tariff designed to protect industries merely because they are industries and without regard to the economic conditions of the country, cannot and should not succeed. If there are any people in Canada who are contemplating the establishing of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary, I do them a friendly service when I say: "Don't do it," because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection, again, I advise him not to come. I say, Sir, that the policy of indiscriminate fostering of industries in that way, without regard to economic conditions, is not a sound one.

The Prime Minister has said again and again that there must be sufficient protection to protect and keep the industries we have and to bring others to us. That sounds like a nice statement, but it is much too broad to be accepted without qualification. The general statement that you must establish industries in order that you may create business and give employment involves the adoption of a dangerous doctrine. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) gave us some information the other day of a very interesting character with regard to the city of Victoria—and in this case it is not the dock I am referring to. My hon. friend gave us a pretty picture of the gardens of Victoria in this early spring season. Amongst other things, he said that they have been experimenting in growing tea in Victoria. See the oportunities afforded there for development under a protective system! You can give immense employment in the growing of tea out there! Think—and that is the main point; you want to keep the people busy—think of the employment you will give to carpenters in making green houses! Think of the glass industry you will build up in British Columbia! If the question were only one of giving employment, perhaps nothing could be better, in the hands of my hon. friends opposite, than that they should start to grow tea out in Victoria. Then, of course, the question is only one of degree; they need not confine the tea-growing to Victoria; they can come further East. There is plenty of vacant land in the Rocky mountains where, with a little more expenditure, you could give more employment, more work to the carpenters, more work for the glass-makers. If the question were only one of giving employment, one might say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) should be given a large subsidy to cultivate the tea-growing industry.

The true policy, however, is to cultivate chiefly those industries which are based upon the natural resources of the country. I would not have any industry which is at present established in Canada unfairly dealt with; I would not try to strike down any industry that exists to-day, even if it were not wisely established. But when we are looking to the future, for the purpose of adopting a sound policy as regards the creation of industries, let us not be carried away with this idea of creating industries in order to give employment. Let us create industries which, based upon the natural resources of the country, will give rise to healthy enterprises with a good prospect of future success. Certain conditions are required to justify the creation of an industry. What are they? First, there is abundance of raw material. Surely, we produce some things in Canada in abundance. Our protectionist friends will hardly admit that we can produce anything in competition with others. I believe myself they would want a duty on icicles to keep them out. They think that Canadian industries need to be protected by glass houses. Protection, like conscience, "makes cowards of us all." We lose faith in our country. Let us get away from that; let us find the things that we can produce, that God and nature intended us to produce; let us try to develop industries based upon those conditions, and then such industries will not need much protection.

Fuel is a great asset in the creation of an industry. You may establish an industry simply because you have an abundance of fuel. A combination of coal and iron is a great combination on which to establish an industry; that is the strong point of the industry in Cape Breton to-day. There are in Cape Breton no known large bodies of iron ore, but across by a ferry in Newfoundland they have iron ore, and Cape Breton has coal in abundance. Thus you have a combination of those two things, if not at the same point, at any rate, close together. There you have a sound basis on which industries ought to be built up, they should not need much protection to enable them to be developed. We have abundance of water-power in Canada, and that is another condition on which industries may be established. There was a time when cheap labour had something to do with the establishment of an industry. There are sections of Canada in which industries were established chiefly because labour in those sections was deemed to be cheaper than elsewhere: but with the changes that have taken place under our modern conditions, in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, with the rapidity of communication, railways, telegraphs, telephones and all the other modern improvements that we have, with the organizations of workingmen in the different sections of the country, there is no longer cheap labour in any part of the continent of America, at least amongst the white population; rates of labour are not materially different to-day in different parts of Canada,—the labour unions look after that point,—so that cheap labour is not a live asset. There is another condition by which an industry can be established. It is possible by the ingenuity of man, by the skill of some group of men, to establish an industry. I heard an illustration of that given some years ago by a distinguished Irishman when he was making a speech in London urging the people to cultivate home industries. "Look at Dundee;" he said, "you do not grow oranges in Dundee; you do not produce sugar in Dundee; you do not produce anything in Dundee that goes into the manufacture of marmalade. But there was a Scothman up there who produced a combination called marmalade, who gathered around him all the raw material necessary for the making of marmalade and who developed a great industry in Dundee. Although Dundee did not produce the fruit nor the sugar, the skill, the enterprise and the reputation of that man built up the industry". All these are conditions upon which industries may be built up. If we build up our industries, based upon the natural resources of our country, we have just cause for believing that with reasonable enterprise and without any high protection, those industries may flourish. That is the true policy for Canada; that is the policy that I would strongly advise to-day rather than the general statement that we must have industries regardless of the economic future.

I notice that the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) made a very brief reference to the condition of the American tariff, though I must do him the justice to say that he treated it with more gravity than some people do. There are people throughout Canada who flippantly say that they do not care what the American tariff is. There is an Irish proverb which says: "It is aisy to bear another man's toothache." Stock raisers in Western Canada and, for that matter, further East, do not regard it as a small matter that they are likely to be shut out of the American market. That prospect is grave and serious to them. They may be comforted by the remark that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) made in Montreal the other day, when he was giving good advice, as he thought, to the women of that city. He said in effect: "As regards the American tariff, there is this to be said: if they adopt that tariff, the consumers in the United States will have to pay the bill." Speaking broadly and generally, one may say that there is a good deal in that. It is not, however, worth while entering into a debate now as to the conditions under which the consumer pays or the shipper pays; there is something to be said on both sides. But I have not found my right hon. friend telling the consumers of Canada that they pay the duty. In general he cultivates the notion that the man who ships the goods into Canada is the man who pays the duty; but when he gets into Montreal, before the women of that city, the truth comes out of him that the consumer pays the duty. There is this to be said with regard to the American tariff. For many years our American friends did not treat us fairly in tariff matters; for one reason or another they built up high tariff barriers against us, and we felt that we had just ground for complaint that they were not treating us generously. There came a time when they saw the error of their ways, when their leading men frankly said that they ought to deal more generously with their great neighbour, Canada, and they made a proposal; they met us half way, and between us, we agreed to a certain thing. The present Government of Canada has opposed that; the people of Canada, through their constituted representatives, have turned that down. Therefore, we have no longer any right to complain of what the Americans do in tariff matters. They made an approach to us; we rejected it, and no matter what tariff they may impose now, we have no right to complain. They did long ago treat us unfairly, but in this case we are in the wrong. I am going to make this suggestion to the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen). If we are going to adhere to this view, to have a quarrel with the United States again and to build up barbed wire entanglements on both sides, I want him to say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce: "Do not go down to New York again and make a whining appeal to them not to pass the Fordney Bill. That is not a dignified position for Canada to take."

In view of the large trade that we have with the United States, in view of the fact that we are one of the best customers that the United States has, I still cherish the hope that, before this matter is all through, a ground will be found upon which we can come together, notwithstanding the differences that may have arisen in the past, and that instead of building up barbed wire entanglements on both sides, some such arrangement, call it by what name you will, as that which characterised the reciprocity agreement of 1911, may be entered into.

I have made some reference to what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has said in the West. I want, before I conclude, to make a passing reference to something my right hon. friend said in the East. Speaking at Sherbrooke, a manufacturing town, after presenting his own views on public affairs generally, he used these words: "We have therefore a clear-cut issue: Do we want free trade in this country, or do we not?" I am sorry to have to say that I regard that as a statement which does not do credit to my right hon. friend. In the strife of political parties there is always a temptation perhaps to build up your own case by misrepresenting what your opponent says and does. It is a small political game, which small politicians easily fall into, but we have a right to expect something better from the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada. When my right hon. friend told the people that the issue now before the country is, shall we or shall we not have free trade? —my right hon. friend must have known that he was making a statement that lacked the essential element of truth. There is no issue of free trade in Canada to-day. The Liberal party of Canada has not proposed free trade, did not propose free trade when it was in office, does not propose free trade to-day. The Farmers' party, though they go further than we do, have not proposed free trade. Who is it then that talks of free trade? Only my right hon. friend and his friends. They talk of free trade. Why? Simply to conjure up a bogey with which they may scare the manufacturers of the country. I again say that the Liberals have not proposed free trade; the Farmers do not propose free trade; only my right hon. friend and his friends talk of free trade, and they use it simply as a bogey to scare the manufacturers of the country. It has not even the merit of novelty. It is a very old yarn indeed. It is the old story of 1896 over again. I really think that my right hon. friend, whose ability we all know, might have done something better than to revive that old game of 1896. In 1896, on every hustings in this country, they told the people that if the Liberals came into power there would be free trade and the industries of the country would be ruined. Everything that can be said to-day on these lines was said in 1896. Fortunately, the people of Canada knew better than to trust these representations, just as the people of Canada will know better to-day than to trust representations of that character when made, unworthily made, by the right hon. the leader of the Government of to-day. The Liberals won in 1896 and they came into power. Did they destroy the industries of the country? Did the prediction of the great Conservative leader, and the "sorrowful wail" about the industries of this country, come true? The fifteen years of the Liberal Government, so far as their tariff policy was concerned, were fifteen years of progress, peace, and prosperity. It was the golden era of Canada's prosperity. And just as we said then to the people that they could trust the Liberal party, if they came into power, to be fair and just while following sound principles, so we say to the people of Canada and the manufacturers of Canada to-day: Do not be misled by the statement made by my right hon. friend about free trade, because it is merely, as I said, a repetition of the old game of 1896; and as it failed in 1896, so it will fail in 1921 or 1922 whenever the election arrives.

Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. King:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question, be omitted, and the following inserted instead thereof:

The House regrets that, after repeated assurances by the Government of an intention to have a revision of the Customs tariff, and after a protracted inquiry extending from ocean to ocean by a committee of cabinet ministers, the Government have made no proposals for any reduction of the tariff;

That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises, giving promise of enduring success;

That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;

That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: If I would make any comment on that it is that it should have the same result as the policy of 1896 upon the industries of the country:

That the House, while recognizing that the obligations arising from the war must be met, and declaring its readiness to make all necessary provision for that purpose, regrets that the financial proposals of the Government are not made with due regard to the economy that is so urgently needed, and expresses the opinion that, before resorting to new taxation, the Government should make a substantial reduction in the proposed expenditure.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, all I propose this afternoon to do is, in a very short time, to make some comments upon the observations which have been made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who has just preceded me. He showed the kindlier part of his nature, which we all appreciate, in sympathizing both from experiences which he himself has had and from his natural kindliness with the hon. Minister of Finance in the task set before him, who proposes to-day under the existing conditions to bring in and carry through the House of Commons a Budget, which shall deal with the methods of raising revenue, with the proper expenditures that may be undertaken, and with tariff matters. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), will allow me to join my sympathies with those of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), on the task which he commenced and carried through with such credit to himself, and, I think, with such appreciation on both sides of the House, as was evident from the way in which his financial statement was received. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in speaking, also took his just share, which any Opposition ought to take, of responsibility, for after all, though we may have parties, we all have a common country, and the obligations thereof must be shouldered by the House as a whole, representing the country at large; and his statement that all proper obligations of the country, which have been incurred by reason of the war which has taken place during the past five or six years, were common obligations and must be met in a common spirit of accord and co-operation. This is an eminently just position to take, and one with which, I think, both sides of the House will fully agree.

When my hon. friend comes to deal with the raising of the revenue he practically confines himself to one branch alone, that is, the income tax. I listened for any adverse criticisms of the income tax, either as to its principle, or as to the rate of taxation by which the revenue through income was to be raised. The hon. gentleman had no criticism either for the income tax itself, or for the rates which were levied upon a graduated scale; the only criticism he offered was as to the methods by which the tax was collected and as to the penalties which were imposed for avoidance in any way of its condition. Well, that eliminates any difference between my hon. friend and myself, between gentlemen on the other side of the House, and gentlemen on this side, as regards that particular portion of the Budget which aims at gathering revenue through the income tax. It may be said, in passing, that no person need incur the penalties of the income tax administration. All that is required is that one shall turn in his statement at the stated time, shall turn in a proper statement, and shall make his calculations in an honest manner. No man will be penalized who fulfils these three conditions. But my hon. friend gave it all away when he said that every law must have its penalties, and that unless you imposed penalties it would be impossible to enforce the law.

In one respect I sympathize with my hon. friend, and I think I shall have to join hands with him if, within the course of the next year or two, the Finance Minister does not devise some simpler methods to aid our dull intellects in what was, to myself, at any rate, a very great effort to figure out just exactly the return that I should put before the minister, and what amount of money I had to accompany that statement with in order to avoid any penalty. Whether or not I succeeded in the first, I am not certain up to this day. I did succeed, I think, in the second, because I sent in about three-fourths of everything that could be taxed against me as my initial payment, and I hope to avoid any penalty in regard to the remaining fourth. But if, by the exercise of any methods that may occur to him, it is possible for him to make it easier for us, after this, to make our calculations, I should advise him to do so, and make a name for himself, softer and sweeter and more pleasing than that which now attaches to him when we set ourselves with our pencils to calculate our income tax.

My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), then fled over to the Brussels Conference, and read to us one of the very good resolutions which were passed there. I understand the purport of the resolution which he read. In brief, it divides itself into four parts. In the first place, it urges that it would be the part of wisdom for all nations of the world to restrict current expenditure to ordinary revenue. I think that the Minister of Finance last year and this year, as did the Government which he represents, paid reasonable attention to that sound dictum, and he had an opportunity of stating to the House last night that what was necessary for last year's expenditures has been raised out of taxation and has not been placed to the debit of our national account. I think, furthermore, that the statement he has made this year shows that we are proceeding along the same lines; and with truth it may be said that in that respect we have lived up absolutely to the first part of the resolution of the Brussels Conference. The second part of the resolution advocated a reduction of armaments and munitions to what was reasonably necessary in order that a country's position should be secured in this insecure and uncertain world. Now, a great deal is said with reference to the failure of the nations to reduce armaments. Some armaments have been reduced almost to extinction by the fortunes of war. But, though war has ceased, in so far as the actual conduct of the great principal struggle is concerned, yet it is true that there is no peace in Europe, and European peace would not have been in the past year advantaged, nor, in the present and coming year, made more secure or more certain if all the nations engaged in the Great War on the allied side had suddenly abandoned their arms, disbanded their armies, and reduced their navies to the zero point. Until European peace is established; until you know more of what is going to happen on the part of Russia; until you know more of the probable events that will occur amongst the central nations of Europe; until you know more of what is going to take place on the Mediterranean sea, and in the Far East;—until you know more about all these things, and until there is a more settled state of world conditions, than you have to-day, the cause of peace itself would only be injured by the entire destruction of armaments either by land or by sea, or by both. It is necessary, until that process is concluded—and it will take some time in my opinion, before that is realized —that armies and navies shall be maintained.

That sentiment was very well expressed, and thoroughly canvassed at the first assembly of the League of Nations. Nine-tenths—yes I might say ten-tenths—of the powers represented there were absolutely in favour of the restriction, reduction, diminution of armaments both by land and by sea. Why should they not be? The vast burden that rests upon these peoples is the burden which has been built up because of armaments necessary in the war, and made and carried on both before and after the war. Every one of those nations, even the most prosperous of them, is at the end of its expedients in finding sufficient revenues to bear the burdens of the present day, and to make fair and reasonable provision for the improvements, social and otherwise, which are demanded in these times when legislation is applied to a thousand different objects, and which tends in a thousand different directions from what it did twenty-five or thirty years ago. So that in heart, as well as in mind, it must be the wish, the hope, the overwhelming desire, in every one of these countries that the period of the limitation, and diminution to a minimum, of armaments, both naval and land, must be held in view. But, on the other hand, it is a fact, self-patent as no other fact in the situation to-day, that it would be suicidal to do that absolutely at once and now. And so in the assembly of the League of Nations—with all the strong sentiment in favour of the diminution of armaments by land and by sea, and the consequent getting rid of the burdens necessary in order to support these—the reasonable ground was held and the reasonable conclusion come to that, in so far as it is possible and as quickly as possible, these pressing armaments should be reduced; and it was made a condition of every new arrival into the League of Nations that its armaments, by land or by sea, should not be increased—they had to take that as a condition of their admittance into the league. So that, I think, Canada, as far as that is concerned, has followed a reasonable course. As far as our army is concerned—if you call it that, or our militia —it is a fact that we have those who have come back from the war; but there is also the fact that my hon. friend stated—I was glad to hear that statement, I want it emphasized, I want it kept in mind—that, so far as he was concerned, Canada in the future must take her fair share in the defence of this country and in the defence of the Empire. No fair-minded man will oppose a statement of that kind. Under present financial conditions, and until the world comes to a fair conclusion as to what it is going to do in the future about armaments in general, it is the part of Canada to proceed as carefully as possible. It is also the part of Canada to preserve her organism both by land and by water, the organism of her army and the organism of her navy. If for one, two, three, four and five years, there were to take place entire disbandment, for instance, and the spirit of the people were not to be called upon at all for any military force or any naval force, when the time came to take that reasonable position stated by my hon. friend Canada would be at a great disadvantage. It is therefore her part to carry on in the meantime, with reasonable respect to the financial situation, but to keep up her organization, and to keep up the spirit of her people as well,—which is just as important as a mechaical organization. Have we gone beyond that? On the whole we have not. We are spending to-day on our navy two and a half million dollars. If I remember rightly, that is less than we spent before the war period came on, anyway it is not more; and there is this additional point—that the effectiveness is a great many per cent greater now than it was before the war, and we are keeping up on a less personnel what is an effective organization, seaworthy and seagoing, and doing it on less money than the organization cost before the war. Now it seems to me that it is reasonable for Canada to say "Yes, along these lines we will keep our organization. We will keep up the spirit of our people—which is necessary in every people that is going to be self-dependent, self-respecting,—and when the skies grow brighter and when financial circumstances become more favourable, then we will take our part and our share, with all the other British peoples, in defending our own country and the Empire of which our own country forms a part."

Then, a third branch of the Brussels Conference resolution was that each country should abandon extraordinary expenditures that were not remunerative—that is that were not absolutely necessary. We are doing that. The whole Budget as brought down last year and this year is testimony to that effect. But I should have liked to introduce my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's—who was finance Minister in the golden era of which he speaks, in an era when peace and quietude and comparative comfort in administration was the rule—to the last eight years of financial management in the Dominion of Canada as a Cabinet minister, and, if I could, to have instilled into him the groanings in spirit that took place, acquaint him with the burdens which rested upon our shoulders and with the obligations which were—day by day and night by night—constantly coming in increased volume upon us, which we could escape by no will or wish of our own, or effort of our own, if we were to stand to our guns and carry out the wishes and desires of the people of Canada in that long war which has taken place. During all that time what was the situation? Great burdens of administration and the difficulties of finding ways and means; utter powerlessness to keep down expenditures in war time when the demand came by telegram and letter, day and night, every hour: "More munitions, more men, more clothing; we cannot wait for you to get easy bids; we want these things now; get them no matter what it costs!" That is the spirit that dominates in war time. Great Britain could not wait to make small contracts on more reasonable bases when her soldiers were exposed to the enemy, and munitions, clothing and provisions were necessary every hour of the day. These things had to be got no matter what they cost. Any reasonable man knows that under pressure of that kind, in times of that kind, expenditures will grow in spite of efforts to keep them down, and extravagances, compared with peace times, will be absolutely the rule and not the exception.

Well, Sir, in those years our debt has increased from $300,000,000 up to $2,500,000,000. These obligations have massed themselves upon us. The man is foolish—and I do not think there are many such in this House—who would assert that the moment war stopped these obligations ended. These obligations were in the shape of promissory notes to pay, signed by the country, and they had to be met—and they are being met now. The war was one thing, demobilization was another, and in one way it is as expensive as the war itself. The war lasted four years; demobilization has already been in progress for two years and is not yet completed. But there is the trail of consequences of the war. Demobilization did not end when you got your able-bodied soldiers back here, nor did it end when you got your disabled and shell-shocked soldiers back here in hospitals and gave them pensions that will go on for a generation. These obligations mount higher and higher to their peak, and their peak was not reached until the armistice; they must be met and the wherewithal must be found to meet them. It is easy to talk of what you did in peace time when the revenue was overflowing, and to vaunt yourselves more than is meet on the golden era that you happened to float through upon clouds as soft as down; but we are not in a golden era now, nor have we been for the past six years. We have been in a war era where the blood and flames of war have been the accompaniments rather than the balmy breezes of peace time, and as reasonable men we must take that into account, and we do always, except when we want to make a point against the other fellow—then we go back to the "golden era" business.

What I have said comes even with the fourth clause of the Brussels resolution—that you should restrict even praiseworthy expenditures, what indeed might be called in peace time necessary expenditures. We are doing that. There is one constant battle going on, and it is to try to overcome the demand for expenditures which arise not merely from the desire of a member to do service to his constituency, but which go further back to a desire to serve the public interests. The member of Parliament presses for that expenditure because it is pressed upon him, not by his constituents merely but by the situation itself. And those expenditures mount up into a tremendous volume when they come from all parts of this Dominion. I could easily point out to this House a dozen, fifty, a hundred, ways in which millions of money could be spent to the economic advantage of the country, if we could undertake it; but it is impossible. And this Government—and the House is behind it—is trying to keep expenditures down to what is absolutely necessary. My hon. friend picks out one sample of a dry dock which is to be built in or near the charming city of Victoria. He pictured that city in such bright colours that he almost condoned the building of any old thing you might think of in a city so beautiful.

Mr. McMASTER: It is not in need of that dry dock.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has a great admiration for my colleague from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) and I am going to turn him over to my colleague to give him his answer in reference to this dry dock. And he can tie up to that dock when the time comes.

My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) then attacked the lack of tariff revision. He was not on very safe ground, and I am not quite sure that before he undertook that line of attack he exercised his memory as much as he might have done with profit to himself. But we are all subject to lapses of memory sometimes. I have a little document before me which I shall not read, but it is almost a complete duplicate of the statement that he has made in criticism of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and to put the two side by side and trot them out would be an amusing example of how to distinguish between twins. What do I find? That year after year my hon. friend when Finance Minister, or a spokesman for him if he himself was not in a position to attend to it at the time, made his excuse before the House each year from 1903 clear up to 1907—for four years my hon. friend in his time was excusing himself from bringing on a tariff which he had promised to bring on the year before. The year 1904 sees him bringing in an excuse for not doing what he promised to do in 1903; 1905 sees him sturdily making the same excuse for failure to do what he had promised to do in 1904; 1906 sees a repetition of the same excuse; and it was not until 1907 that the promise came to fruition. If my hon. friend would just reverse the names he has made an almost perfect description of what was done during the four years of his own administration. But, after all, there was a good deal of common sense abroad at that time, and although he had to make his promises and follow them up by excuses for those four years, I do not think that he came up against any very great opposition in the country or in the House; that is, the people are apt to take a reasonable view of these things, and I think they will take a reasonable view at the present time.

In my opinion the Minister of Finance gave pretty good reasons why it was not either advisable or reasonably possible to undertake a thorough and complete revision of the tariff this year. If we make a survey of the position, I think we can all easily come to that conclusion. It is safe to say that it is not only a perilous, but it is an unwise thing, to attempt to make a revision of the tariff which brings our own country into comparison with every other country, at a time of trade confusion when no man can predict what will be the commercial and financial conditions six months hence.

I read not long ago an article written by one of the most celebrated publicists in the United States in which he stated, upon returning from Europe and having made a thorough study of the condition of the nations of the world, that he knew of no financial authority who could make a forecast of the financial and economic conditions of the world four months from this time; that it could not be done. The exchange situation, for instance, grows worse every day, and its improvement depends entirely upon the working out of a series of factors having relation to Central Europe in particular and to the world in general. No man is wise enough to forecast what that result will be. In six months' time you may have comparative peace amongst the nations of Europe, or you may have conditions still worse than those which prevail to-day. The exchange condition, then, is in a confused and indefinite state and no one can tell what it will be in the days to come—and upon the exchange conditions, much depends in the fixation of your tariff.

Then, take the condition of credits. It was thought at one time that after the war the shelves of the countries of Europe would be bare of supplies and that, therefore, export trade from other countries would find markets there. It is true that the shelves of Europe are bare of supplies, but there is alongside of that the other circumstance that the treasury, the banks, the pockets, the resources, of European countries are not in such a state that the goods which those countries require to fill their empty shelves can be paid for. Trade depends upon credit, and particularly is this true of trade at the present time with the European countries which were engaged in the war. Countries which hope to do very much export business with European nations must be ready to extend credit to them. Now, are the export countries in the position to make advances? Ask Canada if she is in a position to make further advances to European countries to enable them to buy her products. The answer from Canada would be a negative one. Ask Great Britain if she is in a position to do it—with all her burdens; with all her heavy debts; with all her accumulations of interest and her calls for payment to foreign countries; with all the large amounts she has lent to the Allies, upon which she has received not a single cent of interest, and upon which she is not likely to receive any interest for many years to come, to say nothing of principal. Ask France if she is able to make credit advances for exports for the goods that she may be able to manufacture. The same applies to all countries. The United States, rich as they are, forehanded as they are, are not prepared as a government to make advances. Their bankers and financial men are trying to arrange resources for the financing of trade and exports, but matters proceed very slowly and nothing of a definite nature has yet been arrived at. So that in this condition also you have another consideration which makes it impossible to forecast the future.

In our neighbouring republic of the United States an emergency tariff Bill covering a period of six months has been agreed to and will be put through. But everybody knows that in the United States everything points to the introduction of a permanent tariff measure as soon as that can possibly be done. Whether that measure will be introduced into Congress within six months or within twelve months—and if, introduced, whether it will be passed—I do not suppose any one can definitely say. But that permanent tariff, differing from the emergency tariff of six months which is now being put through, will be a thing which will influence, a measure which will have to be taken into account by Canada when she makes her permanent revision of the tariff. It is not only unwise, therefore, but practically impossible to make any revision of the tariff which will be of permanence or of advantage until we know just what the United States proposes to do and until we have a little more knowledge of what the great trading countries of the world propose to do with reference to their tariffs. Not until then; not until we know more about the financial and economic conditions of the world than we do to-day shall we be justified in sitting down and making up a permanent tariff which will avoid the pitfalls to be guarded against and confer the benefits to be expected when tariffs are made. Therefore I do not think that those who think coolly over this question will call the Government in fault because they do not now set to work to make a permanent and general revision of the tariff. Anyway, so far as we are concerned, we are quite willing to leave that to the common sense of the House and the common sense of the country, which is represented, I believe, by the common sense of this Parliament.

My hon. friend went on to convey to the House another resolution of the Brussels Conference which had to do with trade and commerce. Now, my hon. friend was very strong in condemning the misrepresentation which, he says, has unfortunately been made by members on this side of the policy and the results of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am afraid he rather fell into the same error himself if he meant to translate the Brussels Conference resolution as he read it into a resolution which could be cited in the case of Canada or any other country making its tariff, and, in doing so, having relation to the tariffs of, and conditions prevailing in other countries. He led us to believe—at least this is the impression which his remarks made upon me—that that resolution had to deal with the ordinary business of making tariffs, and that when it spoke of unrestricted interchange and unrestricted commerce, it meant an interchange and a commerce such as we debated years ago when we were talking about unrestricted reciprocity, unrestricted trade. Such was not the meaning of the Brussels resolution at all. The Brussels resolution dealt with conditions in Europe. His remarks would lead one to believe that the condition which was being treated by that resolution of the Brussels conference was the ordinary interchanges, means of communications, that existed in peace time between the nations of Europe, each one of which had a tariff and most of them, a protective tariff. That is not a fair exposition of the case. In peace time, each country, each with its tariff and regulations, had methods of conveyance, transport, interchange of its commodities with the commodities of other countries which also had their tariffs, their national regulations. But as a result of war time, those regulations had been abolished, and, consequently, the communications and methods of distribution which held during peace time in Europe before the war, no longer held because some of the young nations put up an absolute barrier, and they would not allow goods from another country to come in at all; they prohibited them. Others passed regulations of one kind or another to prevent interchange of goods on any basis whatsoever. It was those mutilated and abnormal conditions of restriction that this Brussels conference was launching its resolution against, for the purpose of doing away with those and coming back to the amity of intercourse and interchange which had existed before the war. It was to that end and for that purpose that the Brussels resolution was given to the world. So my hon. friend, if he wanted to make an argument for unrestricted commerce and interchange of commodities between us and other countries on the basis of that resolution, was fighting on a basis which was not meant for that kind of interchange at all.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to make any further remarks with reference to the tariff of my hon. friends who were in power during the time that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance, but I may be allowed to say this with reference to it. He said that we misrepresented them. If we did, in 1896, misrepresent the Liberal party, we did it because the Liberal party, during its long campaign which it carried on before it got into power, misrepresented itself. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) looks wise; he points his dexter finger at me—

Mr. McMASTER: I was not pointing my finger at my right hon. friend.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:—to be cautious, but I must still stick to my text. Do I not know what took place in 1896? There are not in this House nor in this country many men who know better than I know the assertions that I had to meet. Do I not know that it was a bone-and-sinew constituent of the Liberal declarations from 1888 to 1896: "Put us into power and we will eliminate every vestige of protection." The subaltern in politics repeated that as his creed, believed it more or less tenaciously. The prime factor and exponent, the Liberal Prime Minister himself, never made a speech in which he did not incorporate that as the groundwork of their policy. Protection was slavery! Protection was robbery! Protection was everything that was bad!

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are adepts at politics. My hon. friend (Mr. McMaster), if he had any political existence during those years, shouted the same with his party, just the same as he shouts with his party now. Once in a while, to appease his conscience, he will raise his voice in tones which jar against those of the occupants of the front seats; but when the important time comes, he always shouts and votes with the rest. So, seventeen years, eighteen years of this misrepresentation of the party by itself, as to its fundamental in tariff legislation, wrought upon us upon the opposite side of politics; we believed them, and we represented them as they represented themselves. We were sometimes perturbed in heart because, here and there, as we passed through the country, some manufacturer would come to us and say: "Do you not think you are wrong? One of the satellites of this party was in my office only this morning and he said to me: 'Close your ears to the propaganda on the platform; trust us; when we come into power—that is what we are after—we will not injure you by a single hair'." When that came to our ears, for a moment, we were unbelieving; but the next morning the trumpet note sounded out: "Put us into power; we are the enemies of protection; we will eliminate every vestige of it from this country." Then we went on representing them as they represented themselves. Whose fault is it if we were confiding and trustful, and took them at their word and refused to listen to the whisperings, in the alleys and byways, of the satelites who were trying to instill into the ears of the manufactures that they would not be injured if the Liberal party got into power? This was the darkey's platform which was made to get in on and not to stand on. So my hon. friends came into power. What about their statement that after they came into power they did not disturb the industries of this country one whit? There was no such disturbance for the reason that they did not carry out their expressed programme and their professed platform one whit. At the end of their term of office, when the golden era had trailed out to its finish, they left on the statute book of this country a tariff which was as high, if not higher, than the tariff which they found when they went in. We came into power, and to-day, at the latter part of the war era, we have on the statute book, a tariff, which, as regards the average of dutiable goods, is several per cent less than it was when my hon. friends left it; a tariff on dutiable and non-dutiable goods which is less than their tariff on both; a tariff on agricultural implements—about which they talk so much—very materially lower than the tariff which they left when they went out of office. Now my hon. friend says: Put us into power, and we will do just the same as we did before. That is exactly where we take issue with them. Having got into power by misrepresenting yourselves, we hold that it is best not to let you into power again by any similar misrepresentation or any evasion of a plain definite declaration.

My hon. friend outlined a kind of policy that he would put into effect when he came into power. He does not know what policy he would put into effect if he comes into power in two or three years, any more than I do. He will put into effect what his party behind him will support him in putting into effect, and that is where they are in a tremendous mix-up. Here is an hon. gentleman in my eye who is a protectionist down to his heels. Here is another gentleman who is either at present a member of the Farmers' party, or is being wooed with honeyed speeches and with languishing glances to become a member of the Liberal party, who believes that if they get into power they will simply treat the good old path of "free trade as they have it in England," and come ultimately to a free trade absolutism in this country of ours. How are they going to get together? Is there any Whip powerful enough to drive that side of the House into a union which will agree upon a tariff which will be laid upon any basis that my hon. friends can make a confession at the present time? It is all in the lap of the gods; it is all in the future, and we cannot see very well what it will be.

I do not know that I have anything more to say particularly. I take a little exception to the general principle my hon. friend laid down. He says that he would not be in favour of any policy which was founded upon protection, and he seems to think that a policy is not founded on protection when it proceeds on the assumption that you apply it to a certain industry which cannot live without it in this country, and apply it for a certain number of years until it gets able to live without it; he seems to think that in that case it is not a protectionist principle. My hon. friend made his confession full and free last year as to what he did down in beloved Nova Scotia, in the coal district, with regard to the iron industry. He saw there an industry which was not natural to this country, but which if subsidized for a sufficient length of time, might be built up, and in being built up would build up cities and towns and the surrounding countryside. He applied it, and it was successful; and it did build up an industry, and did build up the towns and the countryside. But that is not protection, according to my hon. friend. I think that that is protection. Nobody is such a dolt as to say: I am in favour of protection and I will apply it to everything, natural or unnatural, reasonable or unreasonable. The Prime Minister does not say that; we ourselves do not say that. That is purely a figment of the imagination of hon. gentlemen opposite. But we do say this: that in our country looked at from its own internal situation, and from its contiguity and its interchanges with the other nations of the world, some of the industries of this country do need protection, and so far as they do need protection to keep them on an even keel, we believe that the protective principle should be applied to them. My hon. friend would cut out every industry not founded on the natural resources of this country. I go into other countries, many of them—I go into Great Britain itself—and I find that some of its most flourishing industries, some of the greatest employment-givers that are to be found in Great Britain, are in the great cotton and the great woollen manufacturing districts of that country, and they do not raise an ounce of cotton in Great Britain, and not very much wool. Does my hon. friend take the position that when he comes into power he will rout out every industry in this country—the men to whom it pays wages, and the families it thereby supports—because its raw material is not raised in this country? I think it is a most excellent thing to do to get our raw materials from wherever you can get them economically, and bring them to our own country and manufacture them into the finished product, thereby employing our own men, giving support to their families, and building up our towns and cities and the country generally. That is good business. I would be sorry to see our woollen industries cut off. I would be sorry to see cut off our cotton industries, our sugar industries and all the other industries that depend for their raw materials upon other parts of the world. It is all a question of economical advantage applied in its widest sense, and we have to take into consideration when we are making up our minds with respect to this, more than simply the duty or tax.

I am a very moderate protectionist myself. I do not believe in protecting any industry beyond what is absolutely necessary to give it standing and competing power having regard to conditions in other countries of the world with which we compete.

My hon. friend presumes to speak for the U. F. O., for the Progressive party. The Progressive party will be heard from itself by-and-by, and it will say what it means. But that breach between your down-East protectionist Liberal, and the Farmers' organization in the far plains of the West, seems pretty difficult to heal. I have in my eye the wise countenance of my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). I would like to see him and the leader of the Progressive party deploy and conduct their debate and lead up to a conclusion where the two could join as a happy family on a tariff policy for this country.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member will live to see it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have passed a considerable number of years in this world and, I do not say that I had hoped, but I rather had a premonition that my years were not so many in front of me as they are behind me, but if I am to fulfil the prophecy of my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria, I am quite sure that I shall live one hundred and fifty years longer.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was facetious over the tea industry; he amused the whole House, but it was such an extreme proposition upon which to found an argument, either for or against a policy, that I do not think it is necessary for me to follow that any further. Protection is not simply for the purpose of giving employment. Protection will run very wide indeed if its basic principle was that you must protect wherever you can get a band of men together, pay them wages, and keep them employed. Surely that is an extreme statement of protection. But protection, on the other hand, does have its interest in employment, and it does stand upon this basis, that the men of Canada have a right to employment in their own country so far as the economic conditions of the country make it possible, and so far as a policy of justice and of reasonableness can ensure that employment. There is a great difference between that and and the other. So far as I can see, my hon. friend would have no industries in this country which were not based upon native raw materials, native fuels, native water-power, and cheap labour, which he says now no longer exists. I should be very sorry to reduce to those limits any policy which I desired to follow.

One word more in conclusion, and that is by way of reply with reference to myself. My hon. friend said that when I got before the women's meeting in Montreal I had to be truthful. Well, that is a great compliment both to me and to the ladies. It shows that I have some quality which can be called upon, and it also shows that the ladies have an attribute that evokes the best that is in a man. Both these facts I endorse. However, what I said to the ladies in Montreal, if I may be allowed to advert to the matter, was this: That if there were in the United States of America demands that could not be supplied in that country itself, for any of the articles upon which they put a duty, my view was that those articles would probably be imported into the United States and that the United States consumer would pay the duty, or at least most of it; I thought that probably he would pay all; and that is where I thought I saw a little lifting in the cloud with reference to this emergency legislation. If, for instance, hard wheat is necessary in the United States of America for their milling operations and they have not sufficient of it in their own country and must, of necessity, have it to make their proper grades of flour, they will get it wherever they possibly can, no matter what they have to pay for it, and consequently the duty placed upon it by the United States Government in its tariff would not prevent much of that product from going into the United States. It would have a different effect according to the necessity for the product in the country which was importing it. That was the view I expressed, and I stand by it.

My hon. friend, I observe, also gave me a little dig in regard to my New York speech. He brought it up again to-day, and said he was sorry I went "whining to New York," asking them not to put a heavy tariff on Canadian products. Now, I did not whine before that audience in New York. Upon my word and honour, if my hon. friend will take my word for it, I did not whine in the least degree. In a conversation which I had, however,—a very confidential and intimate conversation with a certain audience in New York—

Mr. McMASTER: But published in the newspapers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:—I did bring to their notice this fact, that if a country wanted to retain the trade of another country it could not do so by having all the trade on one side, and that if it wanted us to buy, it ought to be somewhat careful and should take thought before it barred us out from getting products into that country with which to pay for the goods we bought. That was my sentiment, and I may say to my hon. friend, to relieve his anxieties, that it was very well received indeed.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman made some converts. I read the speech.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, and my hon. friend, I am sure, believes every word I said.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not need conversion.

Mr. ANDREW R. McMASTER (Brome): It is always delightful to listen to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I do not know whether there is a word in the English language that quite conveys the idea as to the nature of his speech in general, but I think there is a word in the Scottish tongue which aptly describes it: it is a delicious sort of daffing, and I must say that if the right hon. gentleman lives as long as he hopes to live in order to see the rapprochement—I, like himself, have sometimes to find a French word to express my meaning—between the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) or the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar)—if he reaches the mature span of 150 years, which we all trust he may, we may feel certain that his speeches will be syndicated and distributed among Life, Punch, Judge and Le Rire. I shall endeavour to pick out carefully and quietly the gems of thought which lie embedded in the setting of humour with which the hon. gentleman has surrounded his remarks.

Now, as regards the income tax, if I remember correctly, the members on this side of the House during the war pressed the Government of the day to introduce this form of taxation long before they took their courage in both hands and applied it; and therefore there is little or no credit to be taken by those gentlemen which does not in large measure belong to the members on this side of the House, or at least to the party which we represent. Let me make one suggestion in reference to the income tax, a suggestion which I submit for the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). It is not quite fair that the rate of income tax should be as heavy upon earned incomes as it is upon revenue resulting from investments. A heavier rate should be imposed upon revenue from investments than is imposed upon professional earnings or upon the salaries of men and women, because in one case you are taxing a person on the proceeds of his superfluity, while, in the other, you tax him upon his own efforts. Of course, my genial friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce quite gave away the Government's case in regard to the difficulties, which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) spoke about, in calculating the income tax, when he uttered the pious hope that his friend and colleague the Minister of Finance would arrange these matters better and avoid all this trouble in the future. May I point out to my right hon. friend that some of us have not the three-quarters of the highest possible assessment to send, as he generously did, to the Minister of Finance? And I would remind the right hon. gentleman, with all deference, that he is just as responsible to the House and to the country, as the Minister of Finance, for the form in which the income tax is now collected.

The minister (Sir George Foster) was recently at a meeting of the League of Nations, of which body great hopes have been entertained, and he returns to speak in terms of pride of the fact that we are spending only $2,500,000 on our navy,—little, if any, more than we did before the war. But, Mr. Speaker, the war was fought with the intention that we should set our heel upon militarism and enjoy better conditions in the future, and it is cold comfort indeed to say that we should be thankful because our naval expenditure has not risen. And I did not like the prophetic vein into which the minister then passed. He says, When the sky is brighter and economic conditions more favourable, then we will spend more money on the navy. I trust that will not come true. He then spoke of the burdens of the war. He said that he wished he could introduce the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) to a knowledge of the burdens which he and his colleagues had borne during the war. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce think for one moment that all the anxiety and all the burdens which the people of this country suffered during the war were suffered and borne by the members of the Administration? I venture to think, when I look down at the front row of this side of the House, that there were men who had anxieties and burdens, and troubles and sorrows, as grave as any that afflicted any member of the Government. The obligations did not cease when the war was over. Indeed they did not; and could there have been, Mr. Speaker, any more generous affirmation of the willingness of the Liberals of this country to support their fair share of war expense than the words of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's? I doubt if there could have been. I say this: that never did any government, in conducting a great war, find its hands so upheld by any Opposition as the Government of Canada found its hands upheld by the Liberal Opposition while the war was on. If there was any expenditure brought forward for the legitimate expenses of the war that the Liberals did not concur in, and if ever differences arose, it was because the Liberals felt from time to time that expenditures of an extravagant nature, or worse, were being incurred and we protested against them—we did our duty in that regard. When the minister tells us, Mr. Speaker, that demobilization is yet a matter for expense, I would say that is, in no small measure, due to the very extraordinarily large idea of what constitutes war expenditure, of what expense could properly be carried to demobilization, which the Government holds. For in the Public Accounts Committee, Mr. Speaker, the other day we found that the money paid to the lawyers in the Winnipeg strike for prosecuting men—among others one whose crime, was that he had quoted a verse out of the prophet Isaiah—that that expenditure, equivalent to $300 a day in some cases, was paid out of demobilization account. To that part of the "war expenditure" I object very strongly indeed; not perhaps to the Government having helped to have these men tried, but certainly to carrying the expenditure to an account in which it has no proper place. For it will not be forgotten that the war was over for more than a year, the fighting had ceased for more than a year or two years, before this expenditure was incurred. The minister says he is a very moderate protectionist. Well, one of my earliest recollections of political life is reading a speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he quoted:

> That man's the true Conservative
> Who lops the moulder'd branch away.

The minister shakes his head.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That was a speech made by Sir John Thompson,—just as good.

Mr. McMASTER: I accept the correction, but my hon. friend sat next to Sir John Thompson, he was, if I mistake not, his Minister of Finance, and he took full responsibility, I am sure, for Sir John Thompson's statements. If I have credited the statement to the wrong man I beg my hon. friend's pardon, but those were his sentiments at that time. But he goes on to say:—and I do not propose to deal very long with this part of his remarks—"I am a very moderate protectionist, I want to give an industry just enough to give it standing and competing power." Well, I would like to place this superstitious case before him,—I know that with that nimbleness of mind which distinguishes him he will surely be able to follow my arguments. Let us suppose there are two factories—factory A and factory B. Factory A, is properly capitalized, a dollar was put in the treasury for every dollar of stock issued. Factory B was floated into existence in a company promotion, and every dollar of stock outstanding only represents fifty cents put in the treasury. Factory A is properly located, it went where railway communications were good, and where water communications were good. Factory B was seduced from a choice that it had made originally by a bonus, a vicious bonus, held out by some ambitious towns, and located in that town. Factory A is well run, and well managed; factory B is managed by the nephew of the principal shareholder who thinks much more of his golf score than he does of the success of the factory. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce be able to tell me what rate of duty he would grant to both these industries in order to give them "standing and competing power?" The Prime Minister of this country says "I am not a very high protectionist." It is wonderful, for protectionists, how they like to whittle down their protectionist beliefs—but that is just by the way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does the hon. gentleman want an answer?

Mr. McMASTER: Of course, I always like to hear you speak.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend an answer, he seems anxious for it. I would give them both the same protection, and I would base the protection on reasonable location, business management, and the like of that, and the man who did not manage his business efficiently should not call on the Government, surely, to give him a protection for his inefficiency.

Mr. McMASTER: That, of course, would be the sensible thing to do.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, that is what I would do.

Mr. McMASTER: But let me point out that if factory B did not find a protection, say of twenty per cent, which was quite sufficient for factory A, sufficient to enable it to carry on, you would find the local member from the riding in which factory B is found, if he is a protectionist, importuning the country's administration for an increase of the duty, you would see him making a claim for "adequate protection" or "protection just enough to keep the wheels moving" as the Prime Minister once said.

Now let me, before I pass from this part of my subject, answer another argument advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He says that the duties, as a rule, are paid by the consumer. He is quite correct in that. He says that the Americans need our hard wheat; they will import our hard wheat and pay the duty. Yes, but the price of our hard wheat will rise and the advance in the price of our—

Mr. ROBB: That is in the United States?

Mr. McMASTER: In the United States of course. Let me make my point perfectly clear. If this duty goes into effect in the United States, and a substantial rate is imposed on Canadian wheat, the American mills will yet require our hard wheat—they will yet have to import it. But that will increase the price to them and it will decrease the demand. It will tend to force the growing of wheat in the northern part of Dakota, and it will tend to hurt us, because you cannot apply a duty without raising the price to the consumer, and you cannot raise the price to the consumer without diminishing the demand. As things become inexpensive the demand for them increases; as things become expensive the demand for them diminishes; and you cannot get over economic laws, which after all exist whether the world is in turmoil or not.

I shall endeavour, Mr. Speaker, to extract from the mass of figures placed before the House yesterday by the Minister of Finance a few of the more salient items. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has claimed that this is a really economical Government—that appearances are deceptive and that the Government really possesses the virtue of economy. Well, the net debt on March 31, 1920, amounted to $2,248,868,623.79. During the year the net debt went up in round figures just $100,000,000. What did that mean? Taking our population at 8,500,000, the per capita debt on March 31, 1920, amounted to $264.56, while on March 31 last it amounted to $276.48, a difference of $11.92. That is to say, every man, woman and child in the country owed in round figures $12 more this year than he or she did the year previous. That is a fact that I should like to have burned into the consciousness of the Canadian people. I should like to have every man and woman and every child of understanding years realize that this Government has increased the national debt by $12 per head during the past year. That meant that for every day during the fiscal year the debt had increased $277,720. During the short space of one day, while my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce arose in the morning, pursued his avocations and retired to bed at night, the debt increased to that extent.

What are the other facts which I think should be brought home to the Canadian people? The total revenue for 1920 amounted to $349,746,334. The revenue for 1921 amounted to $82,500,000 more. But our expenditure amounted to $101,000,000 more than our revenue. So, although the revenue in 1921 rose by $82,500,000 over the year before, this spending aggregation was able to keep up with the increase of revenue—not only able to keep up with it, but to surpass it, so that at the end of the fiscal year we were $100,000,000 more deeply in debt than we were on March 31, 1920.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shame!

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member for Quebec East says "Shame." And it is a shame, because it was the duty of this Government to cut down expenses, but they have not done so.

We have relied very much in this country, as is natural, upon our customs tariff as an engine for collecting revenue. It is interesting to note that the American Republic collected last year less than five per cent of their federal revenue through their customs tariff. Their total federal revenue amounted to $6,695,000,000, of which they collected $323,000,000 from their customs tariff, while we collected $163,000,000 from our customs tariff during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1921. In round figures, we, with 8,500,000 people, collected half as much money through our Customs as did the United States with their 110,000,000 of population.

The Minister of Finance has told us that the estimate of revenue to be collected under the existing laws amounts to $372,600,000, but that it will require $591,437,000 to pay the estimated expenditure. That is to say, we will require to raise in order to meet our expenditure $228,800,000 more. He proposes to raise $62,760,000 of this by new taxes or by the increase of old taxes, and the balance of $156,000,000 will have to be borrowed. I cannot see how it can be done any other way. You can call it "refunding," taking the debt due by a railway and paying it off, borrowing the money for the purpose, but at any rate we have got to find the money either directly from taxation or indirectly by borrowing.

Let me pass for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the trade question. Our total exports and imports the minister stated increased last year over the year before by almost $100,000,000. For ease of remembrance one can say that our total debt increased from one year to $100,000,000, that our expenditure increased about $100,000,000, and that our trade increased about $100,000,000. Then I would like to draw the attention of the minister—although he is not in his seat—to the fact that his comparison between the United States and Canada is totally misleading. I noticed some members on the other side of the House applauding when the Minister of Finance stated that the per capita trade of Canada was $293 and some odd cents while that of the United States was $127.78. There is no cause for any expression of exultation, for those figures really mean very little. The United States has varieties of climates and an industrial development which make it possibly the most self-contained country in the world, and as these figures relate merely to foreign trade they, of course, bear no relation to our figures.

The Minister of Finance seemed to express grave fears because our exchange with the United States was so unfavourable. May I state, Mr. Speaker, with all courtesy, that the fears of the hon. minister are based on the fallacy of the mercantile system and on the unsound theory of a favourable or unfavourable balance of trade? I have in this House on previous occasions by a short example shown the absurdity of that line of reasoning, but as a sound lesson cannot be too often inculcated I ask the indulgence of the House if I repeat what I have said before. If a vessel leaves Montreal, loaded, let us say, with a cargo of wheat worth $100,000—(I observe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicates that I should designate the ship as one of our Canadian Merchant Marine, but as, for the purposes of my illustration, the ship has to be lost, out of consideration for the Minister of Marine [Mr. Ballantyne] I will not follow my hon. friend's sotto voce suggestion.) Well, this ship leaves Montreal loaded with $100,000 worth of wheat. It goes over to Liverpool and brings back a cargo of hardware worth, let us say $150,000. In that case exports are $100,000 and imports $150,000, and according to the protectionist mind that constitues an unfavourable balance of trade of $50,000 against Canada. But if on the way out the vessel is lost, then we have exports $100,000, imports nil; favourable balance of trade for Canada, $100,000. To reason on such a theory is to deceive and mislead oneself and to deceive and to mislead—unwittingly of course—others.

The Canadian nation does not buy from the United States. Individuals in Canada buy from individuals in the United States, and they only buy in that market if they get better value for their money. If they have to buy under a condition of depreciated currency, that, of course, is a pity, but as long as they get better value for their money than they would if they bought elsewhere they should be allowed to buy there, and for the Government to endeavour to interfere will merely hurt the country, not help it. In order to encourage the Minister of Finance I would like to tell him also that the United States will not sell to us unless they get paid for what they sell; that they will not lend to us unless the security both for capital and for interest is satisfactory to them; and that a young country is bound to have an unfavourable balance of trade, especially if it has heavily indebted itself, as Canada has. A great deal of our exports, of course, go to pay the interest on our debt; the minister is perfectly right in what he says in that regard. But you will never help a country by interfering with the way private individuals propose to carry on their private business.

Now, the minister, after establishing the necessity for new taxes, comes down with his tax proposals, and his first tax proposal is a disguised but serious increase in duties. It was said of old-fashioned medical men that they were always willing to bleed their patients. If a man fell sick, they lanced him and bled him; if he had a relapse, they bled him again. The same principle seems to be upheld by my hon. friends opposite; they think that the only cure for the ills of the body politic is more bleeding—in other words, more taxation.

First of all, then, I wish to say that this taxation is disguised taxation; it is a disguised raising of the tariff schedules. The minister himself has not raised the schedules, but he has devised or some person has devised for him, this somewhat ingenious, but, I venture to assert, unwholesome, method of proceeding. A great many of the currencies of Europe are in a depreciated condition. The franc, usually worth twenty cents, is only worth nine; the lira, usually worth twenty cents, is worth less than six; the German mark, worth in normal times twenty-four cents, is worth less than two cents. What the minister proposes to do is this: in calculating the duty on an import an arbitrary depreciation of 50 per cent will be fixed, if the depreciation in fact is more than 50 per cent. The depreciation under 50 per cent will not enter into the calculation; no greater depreciation than 50 per cent will be recognized. Now, let me show you how that will work out. A man comes into the custom house with an invoice of goods from France. Let us suppose that the franc, instead of being worth twenty cents, is worth ten. As that is no more than 50 per cent the francs will be turned into dollars on that basis and the duty assessed accordingly. But another man comes in with an invoice for Italian goods. Let us say that the lira, usually worth twenty cents, is only worth five. Now, that full depreciation will not be allowed; they will only allow it down to ten; the goods will be valued for duty purposes at twice their real value, and the duty imposed upon those goods will be twice as high as the schedule provides. The manufacturer, therefore, in Canada who is manufacturing goods which are made also in Italy is receiving twice as much protection as he got before. I think it is unsound; it will tend to keep goods out of the country, and it will have other effects which I will speak of in a moment. Then, suppose a man comes in with goods, let us say, from Austria or Germany. The mark has depreciated to less than two cents instead of its normal value of twenty-four cents. But these goods must be valued for duty purposes not at two cents but at twelve cents, to the mark six times as much, and the result will be that nothing will come in. The Minister of Finance is pursuing this mistaken and unsound fiscal policy with the idea that he is going to help Canada. I tell him that he is going to hurt Canada, and I will show him exactly how it will work out.

Mr. RINFRET: How will it work with the United States?

Mr. McMASTER: It will work the other way with the United States. As a matter of fact, as United States money is at a premium, if you accept their invoices at their face value you would be reducing the duty. I understand that the minister proposes in the case of the United States, to bring about an assessment of duty on the real value of the article. I have no great objection to that. But I am dealing with the case of goods coming from a country in which the value of the currency has depreciated. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I tell the minister that so far as Canada is concerned he is hindering the economic recovery of Europe. As long as the middle kingdoms, Austria and Germany, are in the slough of economic despond there can be no real recovery in Europe. Now, does it affect continental Europe alone? No, it affects Great Britain also. Great Britain before the war exported to Germany as much merchandise as she exported to all her colonies. By helping to keep Europe in the slough of despond you tend to push the Mother Country down the same bank. You spoil our European market. You spoil our British market. If we are going to be kept out, to a certain extent at least, from the markets of the United States, we should wish to cultivate more strongly the British market. If you hurt the British market by hurting the European market, then you diminish the demand for the natural products of Canada. If you diminish the demand for the natural products of Canada, as the producers of natural products form a large part of the great consuming population of the country, you hurt the manufacturers themselves. This policy is a short-sighted, uneconomic one. It just tends to keep the world out of tune, to use the minister's own expression. It is a mistake, and in the long run, it can work only harm to the country.

At Six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. McMASTER (resuming): When you, Mr. Speaker, so kindly, considered it six o'clock slightly before that hour, I had been endeavouring to develop the point that the underhand method of raising the tariff adopted by the Minister of Finance, by giving an untrue and arbitrary value to the currency of a country depreciated in comparison with our own, would in the long run react upon ourselves to our disadvantage.

I now wish to develop the point and to show how the raising of these duties will affect the consumer in this country. For a long time, publicists in this country have been talking about reducing the high cost of living. At one time there was in Canada a Board of Commerce, of brief and unhappy memory, appointed for that very purpose. That Board of Commerce failed to reduce the high cost of living. It hardly came into being before it ceased to function, and now the Government is placing upon the statute book laws which will not only retard a reduction in the cost of living, but, on the contrary, will increase the cost of living. The safety of the world, the economic and, I think I might say, the social safety, of the world, in no small degree depends upon clearing the channels of trade, and this action on the part of the Government will tend not only to maintain the barriers which are now in the channels, but to insert other snags and quicksands in addition to those which are already there.

The next fiscal proposal of the Minister of Finance is the sales tax. The sales tax has been raised. It is now 1½ per cent on a sale within Canada, 2½ per cent on goods imported into Canada and where the sale is made directly from the manufacturer to the retailer, it is 3 per cent, if the transaction takes place in Canada, and 4 per cent if the transaction takes place between a vendor outside the country and a buyer within the country. I wish, first of all, to point out to the minister that this sales tax will take considerably more out of the pockets of the people than it will bring into the Treasury of the country. The manufacturer, in the first place, who sells to the wholesaler has to put on a tax of 1½ per cent. That 1½ per cent will form part of his cost of production. He will establish his profit on it as well as on the prime cost of his goods, and will hand it on, plus the profit, to the wholesaler. The wholesaler, when he comes to sell to the retailer, will do the same thing, so that ultimately when the tax reaches the consumer, instead of being 3 or 4 per cent, it will amount to 4, 5 or 6 per cent. There is another objection to this tax, and it is this: One of the first maxims of taxation is that the taxes should be determined by the ability of the taxpayer; they should be ability taxes, rather than consumption taxes. Now this is a consumption tax. If I am a man with a large family I shall have to pay more to the Government on account of this tax than a man who lives next door to me with an income just as large as mine, but who happens to be blessed with fewer children.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a blessing to have a larger number; the other man is blessed with fewer. No one can misunderstand what I said. The fact of the matter is that you are placing this tax most heavily on precisely those people who should not be called upon to bear it.

The next impropriety in the tax is this: You make the tax substantially heavier—3 per cent—when the sale is directly from the manufacturer to the retailer. Therefore, you encourage the middleman; you encourage that distributor whom it is desired to get rid of as far as possible. We want, if possible, in a civilized society to bring the producer and the consumer as closely as possible together. Every extra pair of hands through which goods pass increases the price without advantage either to the producer or to the consumer. Very often, of course, it is an advantage to have a middleman of this sort, but here there is an artificial stimulation given to the existence of the middleman, and I humbly submit that that is unsound economics.

Again, the Minister of Finance has taxed the sales of imported goods more heavily than sales of goods manufactured in this country. What does that mean? It just means another indirect way of raising the tariff. We have a tariff, say, of 30 per cent, and remember, that the duties as a rule, as was admitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, are paid by the consumer. Now why should the consumer pay, let us say, 34 per cent—30 per cent tariff and the sales tax of 4 per cent—in respect of one article which is brought in from abroad, while he will only pay to the Government if he buys the article from a manufacturer within the country, 3 per cent? It is absolutely wrong. What should have been done was to make the sales tax as far as possible a counter-vailing excise tax. Then you would have got more money into the treasury, you would have placed no greater burden upon the consumer, and you would have protected your revenue, because what will happen under this sales tax is that the Government will lose some revenue that it otherwise would have had. Customs duties are already high, and the sales tax placed on top of the customs duties may keep the goods out of the country, and thus the Government may get no revenue in respect of such goods whatsoever. In this connection, may I point out something which I noticed in the resolution? Flour is removed from the sales tax unless it is sold in packages of less than 48 pounds. If it is sold in packages of less than 48 pounds, it has to pay the sales tax. That is extremely unfair to the flour merchants and manufacturers who sell their wares in comparatively small parcels. It makes a distinction which I do not think is justified in equity. Why should the flour manufacturer who puts up flour in parcels under 48 pounds have to pay a tax while other manufacturers who do not sell in such small parcels are freed from the tax? It is unfair to the small flour miller, and more than that, it is unfair to the small family. I pointed out a moment ago how a tax was unfair to the large family. I suppose the Minister of Finance wanted to be fair in his unfairnesses, and now he has developed an unfairness to the small family. It is suggested to me by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), who is as conversant with the flour business as any one in the House, that the working man often buys his flour in small quantities, and if he buys his flour from a miller who puts it up in small quantities, he will have to pay this tax, while if he is rich enough to buy a barrel at a time, or over 48 pounds, he will not have to pay the tax.

There is another matter to which I would invite the attention of the House. It is the increase of duties in connection with cocoa paste, cocoa beans, and cocoanuts. One would almost think that the Minister of Finance in his early days in visiting some exhibition had been very unfortunate at the cocoanut shy, because he has certainly come down heavily upon cocoanuts and all cocoa products. In our climate cocoa is a very valuable food, and anything that tends to raise its price is a mistake. It is a drink easily prepared, "grateful and comforting," as the advertisement of a certain brand states, and there is no reason why, when the minister is taxing whiskey, he should also turn his attention to cocoa. He has raised the tariff on cocoa paste or "liquor" from 3½ cents and 4 cents per pound, the old rate, to 4 cents, 5 cents and 5 cents. Cocoa paste or "liquor" sweetened is also raised, and preparations of cocoa or chocolate come now at a considerably higher rate than before. The old rate was 22½ per cent, 27½ per cent, 27½ per cent; now it is 27½ per cent, 35 per cent, and 35 per cent. I do protest against this taxing of one of the necessaries of life, because, besides being a healthful drink, it is a vital liquid food, and there is no social or economic reason why it should be raised in this fashion. Then arrowroot has been singled out by the minister for attack. This is the invalid's food, and now the duty has been raised by 50 per cent. It used to be half a cent, a cent and a cent; now it is ¾ cent, 1½ cents, and 1½ cents. I cannot see any good reason for this increase. Cocoa beans have been raised from free, 75, and 75, to free, $1.50 and $1.50.

I may be told that this is done in order that we may give a preference to the West Indies. I am anxious to trade with the West Indies and with any other country where I can get the best value for my money, but I do protest against these efforts, which I do not think will be successful in the long run, to direct the stream of commerce at the expense of the Canadian consumer. The minister also feels that grape fruit should now be increased in price—for the increase in duty will no doubt bring about an increase in price—and even the small lime has not escaped his attention. He has pushed up the duty on these fruits by one half.

I do not propose to take up the time of the House any longer on this matter. In closing his remarks last evening, the Minister of Finance said:

> Mr. Speaker, we in Canada have a great task before us. The world is sadly out of tune. May we help in restoring harmony? Trust and confidence are sadly lacking. Class interests are advanced with selfish insistence. Unemployment is with us. Faith in our fellow-men is weakened. Doubt of the future is often voiced.

I give the Minister of Finance credit for sincerity in the sentiments which I have just quoted, and I free him from any imputation of wrong intent in what he said. I believe he is as innocent of any wrong intention as he is powerless to control the spending proclivities of his colleagues as well as being quite unacquainted, it seems to me, with the fundamental laws of economics. He asks: "And what is the trouble?" I will endeavour, as briefly as I can, to tell him some things in which I think we are following wrong methods and in which I believe there is room for improvement. We are following an unsound economic system. I know that our friends on the opposite side like to raise the bogey that we propose in one fell swoop to change the economic system followed for some time in this country and by so doing bring about distress, not because our cure is unwise, but because we want to apply it too quickly. We who believe in a low tariff, Mr. Speaker, are prepared to give every reasonable opportunity to manufacturers, or any other people who think that they are beneficiaries of the present system, to adjust themselves to new conditions; but we will not permit the foundation on which we propose to build our policy to be obscured. It is our firm conviction that protection has been a snare, a delusion and a mistake. That is my belief and the belief of a great number of people in Canada. Why have the people lost faith? I think that this Government has something to do with it. This Government has ceased to be representative; it has outlived the period of its usefulness, and should have gone to the country months if not years ago. It is holding on to office after the occasion for which it was given a mandate has expired, and I think that the best proof of this statement is the disinclination amounting to a practical refusal on the part of the Government to hold by-elections in time to allow the unrepresented portions of the country to be represented in this Parliament at the present time. The Government, I believe, is doing a wrong to the people in holding on to office in general, and it is doing a wrong to the people in refusing to hold by-elections at such a time as will afford constituencies unrepresented an opportunity to elect members to represent them in this House. There has also been another practice on the part of the Government which has tended to undermine public confidence in public men, and that is the attempt that has been made by members of the Cabinet and other gentlemen on the other side to seduce men from their political allegiance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: Those hon. gentlemen who laugh and say "Oh, oh," know as well as I do that what I say is absolutely true. Recently there has occurred in this House an incident which is also calculated to undermine the confidence which the public should have in public men. I propose to refer to this incident for two reasons. In the first place, I may say that I was engaged in a by-election at which the minister in question was elected. He asked the people of St. John city and county to elect him for certain reasons. He said: "I will go to Ottawa, not as a Liberal or a Conservative, but to represent, first, the port of St. John, secondly the people of St. John, thirdly, the province of New Brunswick, and then the Dominion of Canada." On that occasion I protested against that method of political appeal and I warned the people of St. John that that was not a proper sentiment to be uttered by a public man. My words were not heeded, but I have in my hand to-night the proof that what I said was wise and true; and it would have been well if my audience had harkened to me. Again, in this House, earlier in the session, I introduced a Bill for the purpose of dissociating public men from their private interests. I proposed that men who entered the Cabinet should cease to act as directors of incorporated companies. The Government spoke and voted against that Bill. Some were kind enough to say that they approved of the ideas which I entertained but that I was entering on the field of private honour, and that private honour was best left to private honour and legislation would be unwise. Under these circumstances I beg leave of the House to bring this matter before it: On January 13, 1921, on the paper of the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue, the following letter was written:

French Purchasing Commission,
Care of French Embassy,
London, E.C., England.

Dear Sirs,—I am informed that your Government will have quite a few French steamers taking grain from the port of Saint John, N.B., Canada this winter.

The firm of Nagle and Wigmore of which I am a member are very anxious to secure this business. We are the largest firm of shipbrokers in Saint John and have done a very large amount of business along these lines.

We have our own tow-boats, tend to all stevedoring and all matters in connection with the general brokerage business.

As you are no doubt aware, I am Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue in the Canadian Government and I spoke to Sir George Foster, my colleague in the Cabinet who has just returned from England being Canada's representative at the League of Nations' conference which has just been concluded at Geneva and he advised me to write to you.

We are in a position to handle your business to your satisfaction and would refer you to the Bank of Nova Scotia as to our financial ability.

We are agents for the Canada Steamships Lines Limited, the Compagnie Canadienne Transatlantique, Limited, the Fracanda Line and the Acadian Shipping Company, Limited.

I would very much appreciate your giving us your business.

Thanking you in anticipation,
I remain,
Yours very truly,
R. W. WIGMORE.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Now I do not propose to animadvert at any length on the discredit of this communication or to reproach the minister for, having written it. I merely state that it shows the minister is not familiar with the conventionalities, or the proprieties, or even the decencies of public life; but what I do want to bring before the House and the country is the attitude which the Prime Minister has assumed in connection with this matter. The Prime Minister is the master, when he desires it, of clear expression, and I have read with care in Hansard what he said when this matter was brought to his attention in the House. His clarity on that occasion was conspicuous by its absence. He surrounded his thought in a cloud of words, but no word of disapproval of this action escaped his lips:

It is not for me to approve or disapprove—

He said:

—of conduct particularly, unless such conduct is of a character inconsistent with the duties of the minister as a minister. . . . I must say that I was not able in this case to discern conduct of any corrupt or culpable nature.

If the Prime Minister of Canada is not able to discover anything of a culpable nature in regard to a letter of this sort, then it is the duty of the Opposition to point it out to him as clearly and as emphatically as possible. I say that such action on the part of a minister of the Crown is first of all unfair, and grossly unfair, to the electors who elected him. The electors of St. John may have come to the conclusion that it is quite proper to elect a man to represent their port first, their city next, their province third, and then the Dominion of Canada; but they never would come to the conclusion that his first duty was to represent the stevedoring firm of Nagle and Wigmore. It is grossly unfair to the electors of St. John who elected him. Then I say it is lacking in dignity. I could no more imagine certain members of this Government doing such a thing than I could imagine them flying, but if they remain silent, if they do not protest, then, to a certain degree at least, they must bear a share of the responsibility.

The next point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that it is dangerous to the state. Some years ago there was a trade arrangement negotiated in Washington. One of the ministers of the Crown who went to Washington to negotiate that trade arrangement was then Minister of Customs the late deeply regretted Hon.

William Paterson, and it is quite possible if this Government should maintain itself in office for some time longer that the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue may be sent to Paris to negotiate a trade agreement with France. If he was there, and if the discussion waxed somewhat warm as to whether this concession or that concession should be granted to Canada, would not the minister be in a nice position if one of the officials in the French Foreign Office, who perhaps had been attached to this Purchasing Commission in London, said: "Well, Monsieur Wigmore you should be a little easy with us. Do not forget we gave an extremely lucrative contract a couple of years ago to your firm of Nagle and Wigmore?" For a minister of the Crown to solicit business for his firm from a foreign government, or any department of a foreign government, or any commission of a foreign government, is unwise, in fact dangerous, to the state. It may be summed up as a prostitution of public position to promote private profit.

What may it lead to? If it is correct, if it is proper, for the minister to solicit business from a foreign government, why should it not be proper for him to solicit business from another department, or a commission, in his own country? There may be a difference—no doubt the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice or the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) can draw the distinction—but what is the gravaman of the charge? The gravaman of the charge is that a man uses his public office to further his private business and the impropriety would be merely a question of degree. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his place for it is with him I wish to deal. It is with his failure to disapprove of this conduct with which I wish to deal. If the Prime Minister says that it is all right, what objection could there be to one minister asking another to promote the interests of the companies in which that first minister is engaged? I have on my desk before me a little book called "Landor's Imaginary Conversations." There you find a conversation between Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. You find one between Queen Mary and Bothwell, and between Cromwell and Walter Noble. I have, along these lines, prepared two letters. They are absolutely imaginary; there is no intention in my mind to assert for a moment that it is possible for the man, who is supposed to have written this imaginary letter to have really written it—I want that distinctly understood. But I say once you throw the door open this is what we may find in the case of a man, perhaps of not as high character as those who are at present in the cabinet. This is the imaginary letter:

* * * *

[The matter deleted is in the form of a letter to Hon. F. B. McCurdy, Minister of Public Works and signed, "C. C. Ballantyne." See ruling of Mr. Speaker, p. 3260.]

* * * *

Here is another letter somewhat of the same sort. I again say that it is an imaginary letter, and I do not imply that the gentleman whose name I will read out as the fictitious author would have written such a letter. I merely place this before the House and before the country to show how far the matter may go if the Prime Minister's view is taken that such conduct as that of the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue shall pass without any expression of disapproval.

D. B. Hanna, Esq.—

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not know whether I am correct or not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HAY: —but I should like to have your ruling, Sir, on this point: whether it is in order to attach a minister's name to an imaginary letter.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is rather difficult to get hold of an intangible thing, for the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) says the letter is purely imaginary; were it otherwise I should have been the first to rise and call him to order. I do not see that under the circumstances I can properly call the hon. member to order, because before he read the letter he clearly stated that it was purely imaginary. It is perhaps questionable whether it was in good taste for the hon. member to refer by name to another hon. member who is also a member of the Government. That is quite another matter. But so far as the strict application of the rule is concerned, I do not see that I could properly call the hon. member to order.

Mr. McMASTER: I am always glad, Mr. Speaker, to accept your ruling on matters of parliamentary etiquette. I am not prepared to accept your ruling on questions of good taste; I believe that I am sufficiently endowed to deal with such questions myself

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member, if he questions the ruling of the Chair, knows his proper remedy under the circumstances. I did not call the hon. member to order; I merely raised the question as to whether the proceeding which he was taking was or was not in good taste. But I wish the hon. member to understand that so long as I am the incumbent of this Chair, if he desires to take exception to my ruling he must do so in the constitutional manner.

Mr. McMASTER: I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I take no objection to your ruling. I take objection to a gratuitous remark as to whether I am proceeding in good taste or not, because I do not believe that is within your province.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe it is within the province of the Chair, subject always to its occupant having the confidence of the House, to see that the proceedings of Parliament are conducted in a proper spirit and with due decorum. I think the hon. member will find that that is true in all British deliberative assemblies. But I do not think the hon. member should take the attitude that he has taken in respect to a remark made by the Chair, because there was no intention whatsoever to unduly reflect upon him. It is, however, quite proper for the Chair, to direct the attention of the House to the circumstance that it was questionable whether the hon. member was proceeding in good taste or not.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I certainly take very strong exception to the hon. member for Brome—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the Speaker will allow me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it is most unfair for the hon. member for Brome to read to the House an imaginary letter phrased as this letter is and then to give out as the signature to that letter my name as Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I therefore rise to a point of order and ask that my name be stricken out of the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is upon that point that I used the expression that it was questionable whether it was in good taste to use the name of an hon. member or minister of the Crown in respect to a purely imaginary letter, because there is the possibility in the guise of such a letter of contravening the rule which explicitly states that an hon. member may not be called by name in the course of debate. If the hon. member for Brome had used an imaginary letter attaching to it the signature of a fictitious person, he would be absolutely in order and his conduct would be unquestionable. But I say there is very grave doubt whether the hon. member has used proper discretion in attaching to an imaginary letter the name of a minister of the Crown, calling him by name.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, I think in fairness to myself I should be allowed to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as well as of yourself, Sir, to the fact that I very plainly stated that it was an imaginary letter, and I also went further and added that I did not imply that such a letter could be written by any member of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: I have no desire to hurt the feelings of any one, and I have every desire to bow to your ruling, Sir. We will call the imaginary writer "C. C. Jones." That is the very commonest name.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I rise again to the same point of order. I wish to make it abundantly clear that I want stricken from Hansard my name which the hon. member attached to the imaginary letter he read.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I should like your ruling.

Mr. McMASTER: The ruling has been given.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled upon the point or order, and the hon. member has met the objection by substituting another name for that of the minister's. It is, of course, inconvenient to have stricken from the record what has already gone down, but I take it that in substituting the fictitious name the hon. member has put himself within the letter of the rule. Further than that I cannot go.

Mr. McMASTER: I have endeavoured to show what the failure to disapprove of this sort of action may lead to. I have done it in such a way as to amply prove my case, because the Minister of Marine and Fisheries resents so strongly the idea of being connected with such a letter that he protests in the most emphatic terms against his name being attached to it even when it is declared in the most unequivocal terms to be purely an imaginary letter. We have to see in this House that public confidence is restored. It is not for the Prime Minister to excuse the inexcusable, to justify the unjustifiable, and to defend the wrong. It would have been more fitting, I submit, for the Prime Minister not to have endeavoured to palliate the conduct of his colleague but to have kindly reproved him. It is along the line of restoring confidence that we must proceed, and we can only restore confidence when the men and women of this country know that the members of this House are seeking no selfish or private interests but only the welfare of the state.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said this afternoon that there was no free trade issue in this country; that the Liberal party had never advocated free trade; and he assumed to speak for the Progressive party, saying that that party had never committed itself to free trade. In view of this statement by the hon. gentleman I would like to quote to the House a plank of the Liberal platform of 1893, which says:

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford relief to the trouble under which this country labours.

That was the platform of the Liberal party in 1893, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was then a prominent member of the Liberal party and had a part, I would assume, in framing that particular part of it. But in speaking on the Budget last year the hon. member said:

> I think we will find that we are all prone, in framing platforms, to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise, and we all find that we have, when we come to the responsibility of office, to modify our views.

With a wave of his hand the hon. member sweeps away the pledge that was given by the party to which he belonged in 1893 and which was backed up by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in these words:

> If the Liberals are successful they will cut off the head of protection absolutely and trample on its body. We will tax for revenue but not one cent for protection.

What does that pledge mean? Has it any meaning whatever? Does it convey any thought to the people of the country? What do these words of Sir Richard Cartwright mean:

> Our policy is death to protection. Our policy from first to last has been to destroy this villainous system of protection which has been grinding out the vitals of the country.

Do these words mean nothing? Were they intended to impress the public mind or not? Sir Louis Davies said:

> We are attacking this policy year after year. This is an accursed system—a system accursed of God and man.

Well, it has been cursed enough by certain men on the other side, there is no doubt about that. But the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, with a wave of his hand, says: The best evidence we can give the people that the Liberal party is not a free trade party, never was a free trade party, never had any thought of adopting free trade, is that notwithstanding our very definite and specific pledges along that line, made to the people of Canada and repeated from one end of the country to the other, for fifteen years we have made no attempt whatever to carry out our pledges. And he wants the people of the country, Mr. Speaker, to accept that explanation. In fact, he told us this afternoon that just as the people accepted their statements in 1896 they would accept their statments in the election whenever it should come, be it this year or next. But there is this difference, Sir: In 1896 the people had had no experience in the deliberate breaking of solemn pledges made by the leaders of a party, but in the fifteen years that these hon. gentlemen were in power they demonstrated how little dependence could be placed by the people in any promise which they made. I say, therefore, that when the hon. gentleman and his friends again face the electors of Canada they will not find the people quite as credulous, quite as ready to believe their statements and accept their pledges, as they found them in 1896.

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has at times advocated free trade in this House with a reverence which would almost make one believe that the free trade doctrine was a part of the Sermon on the Mount, but in practice the hon. gentleman has paid just as little attention to that doctrine as a heathen would pay to the doctrine of Christianity. That is the difference between the free trade theorist when he advocates his theory and the free trader when he comes down to practical politics. The hon. gentleman has frequently posed in this House as a free trade economic expert, and on many occasions he has given us some excellent illustrations of the arbitrary use of a specialized imagination. To-day, however, he has gone beyond that and has attempted to place this specialized imagination of his in book form so that it may be handed down to posterity. The hon. member made an attack upon hon. members on this side and in order to drive home his attack he professed to read what he called imaginary letters. He questioned the propriety of a minister of the Crown having anything to do with a business enterprise, advertising himself because he was a minister of the Crown as connected with a business enterprise. The hon. gentleman, I think, has forgotten some things which have taken place in this country within recent years. I would like to draw his attention to an advertisement which appears in the Canadian Law List of 1910. It is an advertisement which takes up the whole of one page; there is nothing imaginary about it; it is here in black and white. It is the advertisement of a firm described as "Murphy and Fisher, Barristers, Solicitors, Parliamentary, Departmental and Patent Office Agents; Practice Before Railway Commission," and the members of the firm are Harold Fisher and the Hon. Charles Murphy, who was at that time a member of the Liberal Government. What, may I ask, was the purpose of putting this advertisement in this book if it was not to secure business for that firm? Why should they call particular attention to the fact that they were parliamentary, departmental and patent office agents if it was not to try to get the public to deal with them, and why should they call attention to the fact that one of the members of the firm had the prestige of a position in the government of the day? Did that call forth any adverse criticism from the member from Brome? As a lawyer he would naturally look over this list and know that this advertisement was there; did it bring anything from him? Not that we have ever heard of. Then, again, I call attention to the Canadian Law List of 1911, and in that I find another firm advertising their wares—Gouin, Lemieux, Murphy and Berard, and it goes on to tell us who they were: "Sir Lomer Gouin, Premier of Quebec; Hon. R. Lemieux, C.R., M.P., Postmaster General." What was the idea of putting "Postmaster General" in there if it was not especially to call the attention of the public to their peculiar fitness or ability to deal with matters as a firm? I might refer the House to the Canadian Almanac of 1911, which contains, amongst other advertisements, an advertisement containing the name of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), and the information that he was at that time Solicitor General.

Mr. BUREAU: What year is that?

Mr. EDWARDS: The Canadian Almanac of 1911. It occurs to me that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is living in a glass house when he is attempting to throw these stones; that in this connection, as in connection with everything with which he has had anything to do with our public life, trade matters and the like, my hon friend has always had two different kinds of songs. One song he sings, for instance, when he wants to pose as a great free trader, and another song he sings, as he did before the Liberal Convention in 1919 in this city, when he wants to get a little bit of support from those manufacturers whom he is sometimes disposed to speak of very harshly on the floor of this House. We have various kinds of free traders. We have in this House a number of free traders who seem to agree as regards what they oppose, but who never seem to be able to agree on any definite, constructive policy. One finds in the free-trade doctrine something that he cannot just swallow or agree with; another finds something else, and when the question is one of playing politics, even the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who has posed repeatedly in this House and in this country as an out-and-out, uncompromising, free trader, finds himself playing the game of practical politics. I will quote the hon. member's words in that regard a little later on. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) a couple of years ago found himself in a very much different position from that in which he finds himself to-day. On that occasion he moved an amendment, and he was not quite as much in agreement with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) as he appears to be now. On that occasion the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's did not occupy a seat on that side of the House. The hon. member for Brome, I remember, pictured the ship of state with Sir Thomas White as captain, and he pictured the captain of the ship as being threatened by what he called the starboard watch and the port watch. Then he added these words:

Then approaches with swift tread the quartermaster from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and he says: "Captain, I belong neither to the starboard watch nor to the port watch. I believe in party government, a party of one. I tender you, captain, my independent support until I consider it is time for me and my friends to unite and make you walk the plank." I do not know whether I can congratulate or commiserate the Acting Prime Minister, the captain of the ship, for the support he gets from the eloquent and the revered quartermaster from Shelburne and Queen's.

The hon. member for Brome has become quite docile since then. He has handed over the particular portfolio that formerly belonged to him as the great resoluter of the House. He sits mildly and quietly several seats back behind the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, who now moves the resolutions and passes the word back to the hon. member for Brome to play the soft pedal on his free-trade business for a while "until we see if we cannot fool the people as we did in 1896."

The hon. member for Brome, in his speech, rather blamed Canada for preventing Europe from getting back to normal conditions. I do not know that those were his exact words, but I think they convey his idea fairly well. He rather 9 p.m. objected to the fact that we did not allow German goods, for instance, to come into Canada and assess them at the present exchange value of the German mark. I have heard what seem to me to be some very curious arguments from my hon. friend, but I do not think I have ever heard anything which has struck me as being quite as peculiar as that argument. If we were to follow his lead—and he says that the German mark is worth only about two cents—that would mean that German goods made by the cheap labour of Germany—German labour that is hardly worth anything—would be allowed to come into this country and be assessed at an ad valorem valuation according to the present value of the German mark. He might as well have no tax on the goods at all. He is taking a roundabout way of advocating what is practically free trade. There are in this country enough men walking the streets looking for work; we have made sacrifices enough as a country in the war that we went through, and I for one would strongly object to allowing German and Austrian made goods to come into this country to take the place of goods manufactured by our Canadians, while our Canadians walk the streets of our cities looking for work. That is the position taken by the hon. member for Brome, and I take issue with him on that point just as strongly as it is possible to do so.

I want to say a few words in regard to the tariff, and I desire to preface my remarks by this statement. We have reached a time—in fact, in my judgment, we have long since passed the time in this country—when we should have a permanent tariff commission to gather facts for the information of whatever Government is in power and for the members of Parliament, a tariff commission similar to the one which is in existence on the other side of the line and which, according to expressions of opinion of their statesmen, has done magnificent work for that country. The appointment of such a tariff commission would go a long way towards resoring public confidence in this or any subsequent Parliament in its dealing with tariff matters. Satisfy the public that you have the facts before you; that this House is in a position to deal with known facts, and I am convinced that you will find very few people in Canada who are free traders. I believe that the vast majority of the people of this country are in favour of moderate protection and that they will support a government which has that for its policy, if they are convinced that the government is dealing in a scientific way with the tariff on absolutely irrefutable facts for a basis.

In connection with what has taken place in this country during the past few years, may I say that as regards the public debt in Canada, our debt in March, 1911, was $340,000,000, and in 1914 on March, 31, $333,300,000. That is to say, between 1911 and 1914 there was a reduction of the debt of $6,700,000. Then the war came on. I want to say this, and only this in regard to our debt. It is, of course, very large but I do not think one needs spend time in attempting to prove that the increase in our debt is due entirely to the war and to the needs growing out of the war. I obtained from the Finance Department last year some figures in regard to this, and I propose to place them on Hansard. The interest on the war portion of our debt, on soldiers' civil re-establishment, and pensions, up to March 31, 1920, amounted to $1,996,000,000. I think I am right in quoting from the speech of the Minister of Finance yesterday that the amount spent along these lines in the last fiscal year was $225,000,000. That would make a total up to the end of the last fiscal year of $2,221,000,000; that is the amount of money spent in connection with the war—war interest, soldiers' pensions, soldiers' civil re-establishment, and so on. Now when we take that into consideration, I think that this country has made a splendid showing so far as its finances are concerned. I believe that in the period from 1911 to 1914, notwithstanding the fact that the people of Canada had contributed in Victory Loans about $1,000,000,000, and large amounts also in voluntary contributions, the deposits of the people in our savings banks increased by 87 per cent, which was 7 per cent more than the increase of deposits of the people of the United States for exactly the same period. Having regard to these figures, and the fact that the Government has during the years of the war not only kept up the grants to agriculture, but multiplied those grants by four, and given special grants in many other directions to assist the people generally. I think that the financial position of this country is one of which we need not be ashamed.

Now in regard to Budgets. The first Budget after the 1911 election was delivered in March 1912. There were no tariff changes in that Budget. In 1913 the next Budget was delivered. It reduced the duty on cement from 12½ to 10 cents per hundredweight, and from 43¾ to 35 cents per barrel of 350 pounds; type-setting and type-casting machines bearing a duty of 20 per cent were made free; traction ditching machines, bearing a duty of 27½ per cent, were made free; sugar duties in the general tariff were reduced from $1.24½ to $1.07¾ per cwt. So, as far as that Budget is concerned, I do not think that anybody can claim that its tendency was in the direction of greater protection, but rather in the direction of lowering the duties.

In April 1914 the next Budget was brought down. A duty was imposed in that Budget on wire rods, but an exception was made where those wire rods entered into the manufacture of fencing. The duty on bituminous coal was removed when such coal was used for making coke. The duty on binders, mowers and reapers was reduced from 17½ to 12½ per cent. In that Budget of 1914 I think that any person who is disposed to be fair will say that the tendency was in the direction of lowering, rather than increasing the duties.

We come to 1915. The war was on then, and the necessity for raising revenue was pressing very strongly upon the Government. The War Revenue tax of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent was added. There was a general addition of these duties, but certain exceptions were made, and I wish to call attention to those exceptions because they indicate a desire on the part of the Government to give the farmer the benefit of as low a duty as possible. The exception to the addition of the 5 and 7½ per cent duties were wheat, wheat flour, tea, sugar, anthracite coal, binder twine, binders, mowers, reapers, ditching machines, and salt for fishermen. Special taxes were imposed on banks, trust companies, loan companies, and express companies. Then there was a tax on cheques and railway tickets, and an increase in the letter postage. I would again call attention to the fact that in that Budget preference was given to the farmer.

The next Budget was brought down in February 1916. It raised the duty on apples to 90 cents a barrel; the duty on petroleum oils was increased half a cent a gallon, and The Business Profits tax was imposed.

In 1917 there were no tariff changes, but some changes were made in the Business Profits tax and the Income tax.

We come now to the Budget of 1918, when the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was Acting Minister of Finance. There were no tariff changes to speak of in that Budget. A duty was imposed on tea and some change was made in the duties on coffee and chickory. The excise duties were increased on cigars. I wish to quote briefly from the speech of the hon. member for Halifax, then Acting Minister of Finance (Hansard, 1918, P. 1256):

> To redress the adverse rate of exchange with the United States, we must lessen our imports from that country, or the United States must buy more from us.

I quote those words because they are very much in line with the words that were used a year later in this House by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar).

Now I want particularly to call attention to what took pace in the Budget of 1919. The Customs War Revenue Tax which had been imposed in 1915 of 5 and 7½ per cent was removed entirely with regard to the British and practically repealed in regard to the general tariff. Both the 5 per cent and the 7½ per cent, which had been imposed in 1915 and which I think was unanimously accepted by the House,—although I am not sure of that statement,—were repealed on food stuffs, linen, cotton and woollen clothing, boots and shoes, fur caps and fur clothing, hats, caps, bonnets, gloves, mitts, collars and cuffs, hides, skins, leather, harness and saddlery, agricultural implements, petroleum, oils, mining machinery and bituminous coal. In addition to the removal of the 5 per cent and the 7½ per cent, further reductions were made in the tariff rates as they had existed since 1907. There was a reduction on coffee of 5 cents, and on tea of 3 cents per pound; wheat, wheat flour and potatoes were included in the free list, potatoes being an addition thereto. The general tariff on agricultural implements was reduced from 27½ per cent, first, by taking off the 7½ per cent which had been added in 1915, and then by taking off an additional 5 per cent. That is to say, the duty was brought down to 15 per cent on cultivators, harrows, horse rakes, seed drills, manure spreaders and weeders; and there was a reduction from 27½ per cent to 17½ per cent on ploughs, windmills, portable engines, and traction engines for farm purposes, horse powers, threshing machines, and separators. There was a reduction from 32½ per cent to 20 per cent on hay loaders, potato diggers, feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, field rollers, farm wagons, post hole diggers, and other agricultural implements. The duty on cement was reduced from 10 to 8 cents per hundred pounds. The above changes which, as hon. members can all see mostly affected the farmers, meant a tariff reduction and a consequent loss of revenue of over $17,000,000.

Now, Sir, I have called particular attention to this because certain hon. gentlemen in this House, who sit over to my right and call themselves the Progressive party, showed an attitude in regard to that Budget which has always seemed to me most peculiar and inconsistent. On that occasion the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) moved an amendment to that Budget, which called for free foodstuffs and free machinery, and the adoption of the Reciprocity Pact of 1911. There was a manifest contradition in the terms of the amendment, inasmuch as if you adopted the Reciprocity Pact of 1911 you would raise the duties on agricultural implements higher than they were at that particular time. At the same time, however, the amendment called for free machinery. On that occasion the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the leader of the Progressive party, said, as recorded at page 3331 of Hansard: "This is a protectionist Budget." That was his opinion at that time. I agree that it was a moderately protective Budget. But what did the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) say in regard to the Budget on that occasion? I quote his words from page 3381 of Hansard. Referring to the statement of the hon. member for Marquette, he said:

> "I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend from Marquette. . . I think a fairer thing would be to define it—and I think history will so define it—as a Budget tending towards free trade. I am particularly grateful for the Budget."

How did he show his gratitude? He showed it by voting against that Budget, for which he said he was particularly grateful. Again, as will be seen on the same page, he said:

> The Budget has this advantage at least over the amendment: that it can be pointed to by its authors as having done something. . . we must give a great deal of credit to people who do things in preference to those who. . . . only profess them.

And then he manifested the sincerity of his desire to give credit to people who do things, rather than to those who only profess to do them, by voting for the amendment. He voted in support of those who only made a profession and against those who were really doing something. Again, he said, in referring to the Budget of 1919:

> The reciprocity agreement is very largely embodied in the Budget proposals.

Well, the reciprocity agreement, I have always been led to suppose, was something which my hon. friend from Red Deer and those who sit around him, were particularly favourably disposed towards. Yet, notwithstanding his assertion that the reciprocity agreement was largely embodied in the Budget proposals, he registered his vote against the Budget. And again, he says:

> The Government has also imposed fairly steep direct taxation—

Another thing which was in keeping with what the hon. gentleman and his party were advocating.

> Here the Budget has a very great advantage over the amendment.

But for the purposes of practical politics, the hon. member for Red Deer could not and did not support the Budget, although in many respects, he pointed out its superiority to the amendment proposed. Again in the Budget debate in May, 1920, to which an amendment was moved by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), I find these words of the hon. member for Red Deer. On page 2671, he is reported as saying:

> I should have hoped that the amendment would have contained more milk and less water under those circumstances, and would have been less a shilly-shally, temporizing and opportunist piece of print.

Now, that is hitting pretty hard in one sentence; I do not know what more the hon. member could have crowded into a single sentence in the way of condemnation of the amendment. He describes it as nothing but milk and water, and a shilly-shally temporising opportunist piece of print. That was the language which he used to characterize the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's on that occasion. Nevertheless, he proceeded to record his vote in favour of the said shilly-shally temporising milk and water amendment.

I should like to call the attention of hon. members and the attention of the people of the country, especially the farmers, to the fact that when the Government made the proposition in June, 1919, to lower the duties on farm implements, making very substantial reductions all along the line, the hon. gentleman from Red Deer, as well as the member for Marquette, and those who sit around him, and who have frequently stated in this House and to the country that all duties should be removed from farm implements, recorded their votes against that budget which was making more sweeping reductions on farm implements than had ever been made in the history of this country, from Confederation down to the present time, by any former Government. Their attitude was one of hostility and absolute inconsistency. Party politics is what they were playing just as they were playing party politics this session in asking this House to accept the reciprocity pact which, if accepted would raise the duty on farm implements, and which, in another breath and in their platform, they say should be free. Sir, I want to call your attention to this: The tariff under the Laurier Government on dutiable goods averaged 28¾ per cent; the tariff now on dutiable goods averages 23 per cent. The tariff prior to 1911 on all imports, dutiable and free, amounted to 16.5 per cent; the tariff now on all imports, dutiable and free, averages less than 15 per cent. The tariff on farm implements prior to 1911 averaged 20.18 per cent; the tariff on farm implements under the reciprocity pact averaged 17.33 per cent; and the tariff on farm implements to-day, averages 14.64 per cent.

But, Sir, while I call your attention to the fact that the tariff on farm implements is lower to-day than ever before in the history of this country, may I also call your attention to the fact that the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), is also president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company.

[Mr. Edwards.]

While objecting to this duty of 12½ per cent on binders, mowers, and reapers as being extortionate and as robbing the farmers, the company of which he is president, according to the sworn evidence of Mr. Rice Jones, their $13,000 manager, which evidence I have under my hand, collected in profits out of the pockets of the farmers 21.06 per cent on farm implements. Oh, consistency thou art a jewel! Here we have the president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, the hon. member for Marquette, the leader of the Progressive party—and who in his own estimation and according to his own confession and the confession of his followers is here especially to champion the farmers—objecting to a duty of 12½ per cent on a mower, of 12½ per cent on a binder or a reaper, as robbing the farmer, and at the same time taking out of the pockets of the farmers over 21 per cent profit for his own company. These gentlemen may be able to get away with that sort of thing out west, but I want to assure them that so far as Eastern Canada is concerned—and I am perfectly certain I can say so far as the province of Ontario is concerned—he cannot pull the wool over the eyes of the farmers. They may be able to justify themselves in finding fault with the Government for imposing a duty which would mean —say, $31 on a binder, while at the same time they take out of the pocket of the farmer over $52 and put it in their own treasury in the way of profits for themselves; they may be able to justify themselves out west by objecting to the Government taking an average of $14.64 in the way of a tariff on farm implements while they at the same time take $21.06 profits for themselves on farm implements. They get over that very conveniently, or think they do, by telling the farmers in the West "Oh, you are partners in this concern and we are giving you a part of the profits—you will get that in the shape of dividends." Well, there is some of it that I believe they do not get in the shape of dividends. In one year their profits on implements, according to the sworn statement of Mr. Rice Jones, amounted to $272,215. Yet they believe in free implements or say they do. In one year their profits on lumber—another thing that they want free of duty —were $68,383. Then we have the statement from the hon. member for Marquette—

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Will the hon. member give us the number of thousand feet of lumber that profit was made on?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether I can give it or not. It may be in the evidence of Mr. Rice Jones but I do not think that matters at all. My hon. friend and his leader have stood up in this House time and again and spoken of the aggregate profits made by the Monarch Knitting Company, the Dominion Textiles, and so on, and they do not divide those profits by anything; but when it comes to themselves, when their own foot is pinched, they say "Oh you divide the profit that was made by the number of bushels of grain, or by the number of feet of lumber we handled"; they do not for one moment, allow any other company in the Dominion to do the same sort of thing. The hon. member for Marquette, in answer to the member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson), said he thought the duty on apples should be removed, and that apples should be free. But he and his company could soak the farmer to the extent of some fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars profits in one year in handling a few barrels of apples, and they could shove that into their treasury. In two years, 1916 and 1917, their profits amounted to $1,699,689, according to the sworn evidence of Mr. Rice Jones, and those were the two years when the war was on—war years, war profits, war profiteers! We have heard the word "profiteers" quite frequently from hon. gentlemen opposite. Now I want to show, Sir, that if hon. gentlemen opposite are justified i nreferring to any company in this country which makes a profit of 38 or 40 per cent as war profiteers, the company of which the hon. member for Marquette is president comes under that censure because according to Rice Jones' sworn evidence it made in one year a profit of 62.2 per cent, and in another year a profit of 44.9 per cent; and in the case of its New York subsidiary company—according again to the statement of Rice Jones, the $13,000 manager, corroborated on the floor of this House by the $15,000 president, the member for Marquette—on $100,000 invested in the New York Export Company it made in one year a profit of $530,000 or 530 per cent.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of course, I understand my hon. friend from Mackenzie is interested in that company and it gives him joy to think of the amount of money it has been able to make. Where did the hon. gentleman and his friends get this money? Every dollar that the Grain Growers Grain Company has made in the way of profits has come out of the farmer in one way or another. It has come in the way of profits on grain that they bought from the farmer, or it has come in the way of profits on goods of one kind or another that they sold back to the farmer, and the hon. gentleman says "hear, hear". Certainly, that pleases him. It is not going to please the farmers of the West as soon as they understand—and they will understand before very long—just how far these hon. gentlemen go. It is all right enough for a certain hon. gentleman drawing $15,000 salary, others drawing $13,000, others drawing $11,000, and others looking forward to drawing that much or more, to say "Hear, hear." This is the sort of thing that appeals to them. Mr. Speaker, I want to say right here that the Dominion Textile Company, the Canners Company, and some of these other companies which have been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, are not living up to their opportunities if they do not raise the salary bid and get the hon. member for Marquette to be president of one of these companies, the hon. member for Mackenzie to be manager and the hon. member for Red Deer to be secretary. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I venture to say the moment it is mentioned in the press of this country that the hon. member for Marquette has become the president of any one of these companies its stock will go up sky high.

Mr. LALOR: They are money makers all right.

Mr. EDWARDS: A man who exhibits to the degree that the hon. member for Marquette does the facility for feasting at the farmer's table and filching his spoons is a man who ought to make any company rich if he only had the management of it. Where did they get some of this money? In five years, according to the sworn testimony of Rice Jones, they took 367,000 bushels of grain out of the farmers in overages. They did that to protect themselves from a shortage of 3,800 bushels! That is what you might call playing "safety first." That was worth, according to the same authority, $418,000. The overage did not belong to the company, it did not belong to the president of the company or to those who were fortunate enough to have a block of stock in it, but it belonged to the farmers of Western Canada, and they took that money out of the pockets of those farmers and put it in their own treasury. Then they had another chance to make money on the side in regard to screenings. Taking the six years, including the last years of the war, the average price of screenings was $8.84, but in 1918, when the hon. member for Marquette, the president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, was Minister of Agriculture, he bought screenings from those various companies, and the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) knows very well that the president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company got quite a lot from him at $35 a ton.

Mr. MAHARG: What year was that?

Mr. EDWARDS: 1918, I think.

Mr. MAHARG: They did not get any screenings from the company that I represent.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, they got 1,330 tons and paid $46,560 for them. That is once where the president of the Grain Growers' Comany put one over the Minister of Agriculture. I might also call attention to how anxious this special pleader for the farmers was to assist them. He commandeered the butter which was being made—not which had been made—at 46½ cents a pound at the very time when there were over 27,000,000 pounds of butter in cold storage in various parts of the country; and yet he posed as the great friend of the farmers.

Now, for political purposes, there has been so much misrepresentation on the other side of the House as to the attitude and policy of the right hon. Prime Minister on the tariff and he has been so frequently portrayed as a high protectionist, that I want to place on Hansard the words which the right hon. gentleman delivered in this House on May 25 last year. At page 2708 of Hansard for 1920 it will be found that in referring to the tariff he said:

> This is the tariff, and not higher, but lower than that adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office under circumstances of far less urgent need. It is admitted to be a tariff which is lower than that which hon. gentlemen opposite unanimously supported all through those fifteen years. It is a tariff not designed to benefit the rich in this country; it is designed, so far as our own information goes—and it cannot be complete without investigation—only to give such measure of assistance as to retain within this country its industrial strength, and which does not alienate from this country a measure of the industrial strength that we have. We never can have a high tariff in Canada. We connat have a high tariff in Canada for the most obvious reasons. In the first place, a high tariff is unsound in principle in that it tends to eliminate one of the factors of competition, namely, foreign goods. Foreign goods should be allowed to enter into competition under fair conditions in this or in any other country. But the conditions under free trade or without protection are such that the foreign competitor has every advantage.

The principle enunciated in those remarks has been endorsed at various times and in almost similar words by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and, I may say, by all other prominent public men in this country who lay any claim to statemanship. As against the opinions of these men we have a few free trade theorists who denounce protection as a vice. That is done repeatedly by the hon. member for Red Deer, by the hon. member for Marquette, by the hon. member for Brome and by others when they want to bolster up their free trade doctrines.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): What does the hon. gentleman say I have been doing?

Mr. EDWARDS: I will tell the hon. gentleman what he has been doing, and I do not think that it will sit very well on his stomach. These hon. gentlemen say, "If protection is a good thing, why not go the limit and make your wall so high as to exclude all goods?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hear, hear. Then may I retort: If free trade is such a good thing, why not go to the limit and sweep away every vestige of protection at once? "Oh no," they say, "protection is a vicious thing, but for practical political purposes it is preferable to have a measure of political vice rather than complete political virtue." That is the attitude of hon. gentlemen just across the way.

Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer wants to know some of the things he has been doing, and I am very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to accede to his request, with the hope that the reminder may have a salutary effect upon him. I think one of the first speeches made by the hon. member for Red Deer in this House was in 1909. On that occasion he said that he had been in Canada, I think, only some six or seven years and that he was tilling one thousand acres of land. After six or seven years residence in Canada, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was the owner of one thousand acres of land and the honoured representative of the people of a part of this country. May I say, Sir, that in my estimation that was no small achievement and was infinitely to the credit of the hon. gentleman. Not only so, but it was a tribute to the fiscal policy of this country under which it was possible for him to attain such marked success. Why, if the hon. member could accomplish all that under the accursed system of protection, to what lengths would he have gone had he remained in Great Britain? Is it too much to suppose that had he remained there under the placid influence of free trade he would have owned nearly all the little island and would at least have been Prime Minister of the United Kingdom? But he came out here; it was a loss to the Mother Country, but it was our gain. I hope the hon. gentleman will stay in this House for many years, but I sincerely hope he will change his views before very long and come round to sanity on political questions.

Now, the hon. member for Red Deer has not always been quite so strong for free trade as he apparently is now or has been for the last few years. He was first elected in 1908 and in the session of 1909, discussing the Budget, he said—you will find these words on page 4703 of Hansard:

> Whereas under what I still claim is a revenue tariff you have a series of surpluses under the able administration of the minister.

The hon. gentleman condemns as an accursed protective tariff a tariff which is very much lower than the one which he called at that time a revenue tariff, and which apparently met with his approval. Again in 1910 the hon. gentleman, discussing the Budget, used these words:

> The statement of the Finance Minister shows that we are steadily building up a great people in a great land with a great destiny and a great future, not by booms, not by fits and starts, but by slow, steady, sure and certain progress.

Well, now, I am not inclined to quarrel with a fiscal policy which enables us to do that sort of thing, and draws a tribute of that kind from so pronounced a free trader as the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Slow and steady.

Mr. EDWARDS: Slow and steady, and apparently it appeared to the hon. gentleman as being a very fine thing. Now a tariff for revenue is a very elastic term. It suited the hon. gentleman in 1909 and 1910; he thought it was a very fine thing for this country.

I would like to call attention to another matter along tariff lines. The hon. gentleman referred to the tariff of 1910 as a revenue tariff. He will not contradict me in the statement, that the tariff of to-day is a very much lower tariff than the one which was in force in 1909-10. The hon. gentleman says that during the fifteen years that the Liberals were in power they did not touch the tariff, or did not touch it in any way worthy of the name. He said that even in the reciprocity agreement the tariff was not proposed to be touched in any way worthy of the name. He said that the Liberal party went to sleep between 1897 and 1907 so far as the tariff was concerned and that hon. gentlemen supporting that party showed a wonderful patience in all those years while their friends were in power. Well, the hon. gentleman himself has exhibited that virtue about as well as any person who sat in this House during those years, for I do not find him on record as moving any resolutions at that time along the lines of his free trade doctrine. But I want to bring his attention to something else which is of more recent date. The hon. gentleman, according to the press, spoke at Timiskaming on March 13, last. I may say that in my estimation he used some of those forked methods which he objects to when used by the leader of the Opposition, but which he and his friends refer to as political strategy when used by themselves. Speaking at Timiskaming he said, as reported:

> They say there is no doubt about Clark. He is a free trader—the other fellows don't go so far, and we do not know how far they do go. Well, for purposes of practical politics there is not one whit of difference between myself and Mr. Crerar and Mr. McDonald, and the other members of the party on the trade question.

The "Mr. McDonald" is the hon. member for Timiskaming, who was affectionately referred to on that occasion, I believe, as "the sweet little cherub." Well there is something wrong with that cherub and with the other cherubs who sit in that particular party—there is something wrong with their wings. They have never seemed to be able to try their cherubs' wings in flying into the ethereal regions of free trade. "For the purposes of practical politics," he says, there is no difference between them. I do not know whether the hon. member for Red Deer is so weighted down with Cobden medals that he is afraid to try his free trade wings; he has never tried them in the form of a resolution to test the feeling of this House, that is certain. On that occasion the hon. gentleman referred to the Prime Minister in these words:

Mr. Meighen has been saying that there are only two principles possible before you, wanting to convey the idea that if the Progressives get into power in this country they are going to overturn everything all of a sudden. Well, let me disabuse your minds of anything of the sort. There is no progress that is worth the name that is not made a step at a time. I say these words to allay the fears of any here who may feel the Progressive party is going to go too fast, and I say it also to modify the hopes of any who may think that if the Progressive party gets into power you will have the millennium next day. You won't. It is not coming that way.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Very wise language.

Mr. EDWARDS: Very wise language it may be, but it seems to me to be very inconsistent with the vociferous expressions of free trade opinion which my hon. friend voices on occasions. He denounces protection as a curse, but he says it would be wise to retain the curse for a while—to get rid of it gradually. One would naturally suppose that if protection was a curse and free trade a benefit, the sooner you got rid of the curse and acquired the benefit, the better it would be for the country. But my hon. friend says that is not the way to do it. "Protection is a curse, but don't you fellows think we are going to do away with it all at once; we will hang on to it for a little while." He says that protection makes the rich richer and the poor poorer, but he says also that if the Progressive party get into power they will continue for a time to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; they will not do away with a system which they condemn as bringing about that result. He says: Protection is a violation of sound economics, of sane reasoning and of elemental, common sense. But for practical political purposes, both he and his party are perfectly willing to follow a line of policy which is not sound economics, which is not sane and which is not good common sense. To argue that the proper thing to do is to eliminate a vicious thing by degrees, is to admit that a measure of political vice is preferable to complete virtue. I am reminded of the lines:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I am afraid the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is actually degenerating; he is becoming rather familiar with this vice; he wants to coddle it along now for practical political purposes. He is making his appeal now to the manufacturers of the country. I venture to guess that in certain parts of the West he would not use that kind of language at all; but in certain parts of Ontario and in certain parts of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, it is good practical politics to play the other side of the game, to play, in fact, a double game. Yet the hon. member for Red Deer said on that occasion:

> I do not know exactly where the official Opposition stands in regard to this question of trade, but we of the progressive party are not in any doubt as to where we stand.

For practical political purposes, I can tell them just where they stand. They stand exactly where the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) stands—all things to all men, ready to play the game of free trade when it suits their constituencies to do so, and ready to pander to the manufacturers where they think they can get a few votes by that means. That is where they stand; yet they pose as great political purists, and you would think angels' wings were almost sprouting on their shoulders. Not one of them has yet dared to try out those wings in testing this House as regards the theories which they profess. They seem to be afraid of one another. They denounce protection in that degree; but they seem to be afraid to put the matter to the test for fear that some persons will not see the thing just as they do. So they carry on this policy of deception.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) undertook this afternoon to speak for his party and also to speak for the party across the way. He said that the Liberal party did not favour free trade and he said that the Progressive party did not favour free trade. I do not know whether he has been having any little private conference with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) before making that statement or not. He went on to move an amendment which certainly endorses the principle of protection. The principle of protection has been denounced in the strongest terms by the hon. member for Marquette and the hon. gentleman who sits to his left, the hon. member for Red Deer. We will see what these hon. gentlemen will do when it comes to a question of voting for the amendment or for the Budget proposed by the Government. I have an idea of what they will do. I think both of those hon. gentlemen will, as they have done time and time again in this House, talk on both sides of the question until no person can tell exactly what they are going to do except by judging them by past experience, and then they will wind up by voting for anything which is moved against this Government. They think that they can pull the wool over the eyes of the people in this country and that the people will swallow that sort of thing. I can tell my hon. friends that the people will not do that. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's has made a statement regarding the Liberal party not favouring free trade, and he has also made the same statement in regard to the party led by the hon. member for Marquete. I do not know how you are going to judge a party except by the platform issued by that party and by the atterances of the acknowledged leader or leaders of that party. I want to place on Hansard some statements made by the hon. member for Marquette, who is leader, for the time at least, of the so-called Progressive party. Last session, in this House, the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) put this question to the hon. member for Marquette:

Mr. Morphy: The hon. gentleman has been quoting authorities in favour of free trade, but is he himself in favour of free trade for Canada?
Mr. Crerar: I will say this, that the fiscal policy for Great Britain, in my judgment, would be a very admirable one for Canada.

We all know what the fiscal policy of Great Britain is. It is a free trade policy, and it seems to me that the hon. member for Marquette, the leader of the Progressive party, in making that statement, announced himself as a free trader. I should like to quote one other observation which he made on the same occasion and this is to be found in Hansard of May 31, 1920, page 2908:

I have never been able to see the sense of creating, for instance, a cotton industry in Canada—which I shall refer to in a moment—and which is entirely an artificial industry in this country.

I quote that because it is in line with statements made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's this afternoon. If those words mean anything at all, they mean that the hon. member for Marquette, if he had his way, wuold wipe out every cotton industry in the Dominion of Canada. If those words do not mean that, I do not understand the English language. I do not know any other construction that you can put on his words.

10 p.m.

Free trade, as they have it in England, will be, the hon. member for Marquette says, a fine thing for this country. I represent a rural constituency, and I want to discuss the question of free trade for a few minutes as to how that policy as advocated by the hon. member for Marquette would affect the farmers of this country if it were put into effect. I want to call the attention of the House to a statement made by Cobden in 1844. I trust the hon. member for Red Deer will forgive me if I undertake to quote some of those illustrious gentlemen whom he has quoted so frequently in this House. I do not suppose he wants a monopoly of the quoting of their names and utterances. At all events I will run the risk of quoting them.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I forgive the hon. gentleman freely.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend's generosity is simply marvellous. I thank him very much. In 1844, Cobden said:

Free trade in corn is the very way to increase the production at home and stimulate the production of the poorest soils by compelling the application of more capital and labour to them. We do not contemplate deriving one bushel less corn from the soil of this country.

Cobden proved to be a mighty poor prophet. Thompson was more honest than his companion, when, in his "Free Trade Catechism" he wrote:

It may be information to the home agriculturists to state that "there would be no physical impossibility in living without them altogether."

Some hon. members in this House seem to think the same now. In 1853, there were 4,200,000 acres in wheat in the United Kingdom. In 1910, there were 1,856,000 acres. In 1870, Great Britain and Ireland produced 13,500,000 quarters of wheat; in 1910, only 7,000,000 quarters. Cobden's prophecy was evidently a very poor one. Taking the 105 registration districts which, in 1911, contained no portion of an urban district, I find that in the fifty years between 1801 and 1851, the agricultural population of the United Kingdom increased, and that in the next fifty years it decreased. There was a steady increase in each decennium under protection and a steady decline in each decennium under free trade. I would like the hon. member for Marquette, particularly to note that, because he has gone on record several times as saying that the decline in rural population in Canada is due to our policy of protection. Each census of the United Kingdom for the past forty years shows a decrease in the acreage of arable land and a corresponding increase in the acreage of grass land. This retrograde movement in agriculture has caused British statesmen considerable alarm, and has led to a very careful and special investigation. The report of the Land Inquiry Commission, referring to emigration, says:

In 1900 there were 9,000 male agriculturists who left the United Kingdom for non-European countries. This figure rose steadily up to 1907 when 26,000 emigrated and then after dropping in 1908 to 15,000, rose to 23,900 in 1912. In the year 1912, about one in every fifty of our male agricultural population found their prospects in the United Kingdom so poor that they decided to leave the country altogether. And it is generally the most capable and energetic who go.

My hon. friend from Red Deer is himself a proof of the correctness of that last sentence. In 1906 a report was made to the British Government on the decline of the agricultural population of Great Britain, from which I quote:

The reduction in the number of persons returned as engaged in agriculture in Great Britain has been one of the most prominent features of the census returns for the past fifty years. In almost every county of Great Britain a reduction has taken place during the past twenty years.

Going back fifty years brings us to about the time when free trade was adopted in the Old Country. One official, writing in the report in regard to a 400-acre farm in Somerset, says:

The rent of the farm in 1866 was £600 but it was cheaper then at that sum than it is to-day at £100.

I want to give an expression of opinion voiced by Sir A. Boscawen, Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture in Great Britain. Speaking in the British House of Commons last December, and referring to agricultural depopulation, particularly since 1897, he said:

Free imports which had been introduced some years before began to have their effect. Corn was brought over and prices tumbled and farmers found it no longer possible to keep their land under the plough. Many bankruptcies occurred amongst farmers. It is estimated that £800,000,000 of capital, landlords and farmers were lost, during the period between 1897 and 1906.

He also said:

In 1913 we were importing one billion dollars of food stuffs which could have been grown in this country.

I commend these words from this gentleman holding a high position in the British Government to the hon. member for Marquette and those who think with him. The hon. member for Marquette says that the free trade policy of England would be an admirable thing for this country. I am trying to point out what effect it has had on agriculture in the Old Country, and I am willing to let the farmers of Canada decide whether it would be good for this country.

In 1917 the British Parliament passed the Corn Production Act, which also included provisions as to agricultural wages and rents. By that Act a minimum price for wheat and oats was fixed for five years on a downward scale, running from sixty shillings a quarter for wheat and thirty-eight and one-half shallings a quarter for oats in 1917, to forty-five shillings and twenty-four shillings respectively in 1922. That is what they calculated on, but in 1919 it became evident that the fixed price could not be on the downward scale, and they fixed the minimum price of sixty-eight shillings a quarter for wheat and forty-six shillings a quarter for oats.

In December last the Agricultural Act was passed in Great Britain; that is bringing matters pretty well up to date. It was not passed as a temporary, but as a permanent measure. It guarantees a minimum price for wheat and oats, and confers autocratic powers on the Minister of Agriculture. For instance, he can go on a farm and say: I do not think you are farming this land right; I want you to appoint another manager; I want you to make certain repairs and to put in certain drainage. Not only has he the power to do that, but he can go further and if the soil does not produce what might reasonably be expected of it, he can impose a fine on the farmer. And the hon. member for Marquette says that that would be an admirable policy for Canada! I would like to see him undertake to enforce that kind of a policy among the farmers of this country.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Is my hon. friend sure that that Act has passed?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes. It passed the House of Commons by a big majority.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): But not the House of Lords, I think.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend is often wrong, and he is wrong this time. It passed the House of Commons by a vote of almost two to one, and it also passed the House of Lords, but not by such a large majority. Speaking on this Agriculture Act last December the Minister of Agriculture, Lord Lee of Foreham, said:

The national returns show that since 1910 there has been a reduction of over 450,000 acres of arable land, and since 1870 a reduction of over 3,000,000 acres.

This is the policy which the hon. member for Marquette says would be a fine one to adopt in the interests of the farmers of this country. The Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain said:

I can conceive that self-interest might possibly dictate the conversion of the whole of England into a grazing ranch, but the national need would be ignored and the occupation of lands involves national obligations as well as individual interests.

May I also quote from Viscount Milner, Secretary of State for the Colonies? He says:

"I believe we are very near getting to a point where our agricultural industry will be entirely secondary and our agricultural population reduced to a most dangerously low proportion. I look with real alarm at the possibility of the agricultural people of this country being reduced to a perfectly inconsiderable and negligible minority."

Another quotation from Sir A. Boscawen:

"Free trade has made us dangerously dependent on foreign countries for our food supplies and has depopulated our country districts and massed the people more and more into our big towns."

These are expressions of opinion which cannot lightly be passed over. In this connection may I quote from the speech made by the hon. member for Marquette last year. He said:

"My hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) also speaks of the decline of agriculture in Great Britain, and he attributes that decline to the fact that Great Britain is a free trade country. If my hon. friend seeks a reason for the decline of agriculture in Great Britain, if there has been a decline, he will find it in the land policy of the Old Country, and not in the free trade policy that obtains there. When my hon. friends says that agriculture is declining in Great Britain because a free trade policy has been in operation there for the past 70 years, he is unquestionably very wide of the mark."

I have given you not mere haphazard opinions, but the opinions of members of the British Government up to as late as December of last year, and their opinions do not agree at all with the opinions of the hon. member for Marquette.

I want to place a few more statements on Hansard in regard to this question of free trade, and I do so because the hon. member for Red Deer has, for the last ten or twelve years, ever since he became a member for this House, been voicing his free trade opinions and quoting British authorities and all that sort of thing, in an endeavour to influence public opinion in this country. He has a few disciples who, in somewhat weaker voice, echo his remarks; and for that reason, because I believe his arguments are fallacious, and because he has been putting before the country a lot of free trade folly, I want to call the attention of hon. members to a few further facts in regard to the way in which this policy has worked out in Great Britain, and the effect it has had upon agriculture in that country.

In 1860 Great Britain had 4,019,735 acres sown to wheat which produced 13,135,124 quarters, and her imports of wheat and flour were 7,364,439 quarters. In 1914 Great Britain had only 1,904,932 acres in wheat, which produced 7,804,041 quarters, and their imports were 27,509,031 quarters.

In 1870 Great Britain had 24,092,075 acres of arable land and 22,085,295 acres in pasture. By 1914 the arable land was reduced to 19,414,166 acres and the pasture land increased to 27,349,650 acres. Between 1871 and 1911 the number of farmers and farm employees had decreased by 684,256.

In 1870 the average prices were: Wheat 46/ 11d. per quarter, barley 34/ 7d, oats 22/ 10d., beef 4⅝d. per pound, mutton 5¼d. per pound, wool 16¾d. per pound.

In 1914 the average prices were: Wheat 34/ 11d., barley 27/ 2d., oats 20/ 11d., beef 3⅜d., mutton 4d., wool 1/ ¾d. (12¾d.) per pound.

The above figures show just how agriculture has declined in Great Britain, and what its position was in August, 1914. Why was it that British agriculture had been declining and its output dwindling, and cheap food from overseas playing an increasingly dominant part in supplying the needs of the people, while the exact opposite was taking place in Germany, a country that possessed, on the whole, a poorer soil and a less favourable climate? I wish to quote, in this connection, the words of Mr. T. H. Middleton, C.B., Assistant Secretary of the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain. He says:

"It is not possible to resist the conclusion that it was the economic policy adopted by his country that prevented the German from following the methods of the British Farmer. The agricultural policy adopted by Germany was indeed extraordinarily successful in restoring confidence and emboldening farmers to resort to intensive cultivation. The main value of the tariff policy to German agriculture was the sense of security which it created in the farmer. It was the conviction that he was essential to the community; and it may be added that it was the knowledge that his grain was not wanted, and that his fellow countrymen did not depend upon his exertions that led the British Farmer at the same period to cut down expenses and reduce or at least fail to increase the productivity of his land."

Now, that is the situation. May I just refer to one industry other than farming? If free trade is a policy which cannot be assailed on the ground of unsoundness, then, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that inasmuch as Great Britain had, at the time of adopting free trade, a lead in manufacturing over any other country in the world—I do not think that any one will question that fact—and if protection was a bad policy, and one that would operate to the detriment of the country that adopted it, then Great Britain should be in a vastly better position to-day, in regard to manufacturers, than she is. Inasmuch as Great Britain, at the time she adopted free trade, had a start over every other country in manufacturing, surely, if her policy was right, she not only should have maintained her lead, but should have increased it.

Let me refer to one industry. In 1880 Great Britain produced 8,000,000 tons, Germany about 3,000,000 tons, and the United States about 4,000,000 tons, of pig iron. By 1888, the United States had forced Great Britain into second place, and by 1902, Germany had forced Great Britain to take third place. True, free traders may say that between 1880 and 1910, British production of pig iron had steadily increased from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 tons under free trade. In answer to that I say that in the United States, in the same length of time, the production increased from 4,000,000 to 27,000,000 and in Germany from 3,000,000 to 14,500,000 tons—in Germany and the United States, under a policy of protection, and in Great Britain, under free trade. Mr. Speaker, we cannot get away from this fact: Great Britain, under her free trade policy, has been forced by her own fiscal system to pass remedial legislation for the benefit of the farmers of the country. Under free trade agriculture has been ruined in Great Britain to such an extent that to-day that country is obliged to pass legislation guaranteeing the prices of certain commodities to the farmers. She has to put her hand into the public treasury in order to subsidize the farmers in the growing of certain products, and that is the policy which the hon. member for Marquette says appeals to him as one that would be in the interests of the farmers of this country.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for Marquette has referred at various times to the province of Ontario, which he has misrepresented, and for that reason I want to place on Hansard some facts in regard to that province. I take my facts from a source which the hon. member for Marquette will hardly question on the ground of reliability. I take them from a report issued by the Drury Government under the imprimatur of the Hon. Mr. Manning Doherty, the Minister of Agriculture in that Government. Between 1898 and 1908 the number of farms in Ontario increased from 177,000 to 183,000, and the mortgages on farms and farm stock decreased by over $65,000,000; while in the same time the number of farms in Michigan increased from 175,000 to 178,000, and the mortgages on farms and livestock increased by $79,898,000. The state of Michigan had no tariff barriers to keep the produce of its farmers out of the big centres of population on the other side of the line. Now, comparing 1919 with 1909, Ontario shows an increase of 441,758 acres in assessed land. It shows 640,670 acres increase in cleared land, and increase of 549,803 acres in slash land—that is land partly cleared—a decrease of 267,025 acres in swamp or waste land—showing that that land had been re-claimed. Every county in the province of Ontario, except three, shows an increase in the acreage cleared in the last ten years, and there has been a decrease in the number of chattel mortgages against farmers from 6,816 in 1899 to 3,457 in 1919, the total decrease amounting to $290,583. The acreage under all field crops increased by 812,091 acres in the ten years, and the value of products by $238,077,019. Ontario in the ten years shows the following increases: In the value of land $167,978,000; buildings $128,958,000; implements $59,519,000; livestock $511,315,000; total $867,772,327. Remember these are increases in the last ten years, a showing unequalled, I venture to say, by any state in the American Union. In addition to the value of livestock, let me add that the horses, cattle, sheep, swine and poultry sold or slaughtered in 1919 had a value of more than 85¼ million dollars in excess of that of 1909.

Now, Sir, I want to invite your attention just for a few minutes to some figures, which I will place on Hansard, along this line in regard to the United States—figures which are to me very significant, and I will promise the House not to be very much longer. I want to say that there was an increase in the number of farms in the United States between 1900 and 1910 of 624,130. Between 1910 and 1920 there was an increase of only 88,496 farms. Mr. Speaker, will you please give your attention to this fact, that out of forty-eight states in the American Union, twelve showed a decrease and thirty-six showed an increase in the number of farms in 1910 as compared with 1900. Now note this fact: In the census of 1920, twenty-five of the forty-eight states show a decrease in the number of farms, and twenty-three an increase in the number of farms, as compared with ten years ago. It will perhaps be of special interest to the people of Ontario to know that the states of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan had 17,051 fewer farms in 1910 than in 1900, and that these same states show a further decrease of 65,235 farms in 1920 as compared with 1910—that is a decrease of 82,286 farms in those four states in the last twenty years, and they are right close to the big centres of population. The people of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces may be interested in the fact that the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Vermont had 2,747 fewer farms in 1910 than in 1900, and a further reduction of 17,741 between 1910 and 1920. Add to the eight states I have already given you, the states of Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Illinois, Indiana and Iowa, which show a reduction of 26,711 farms between 1900 and 1910, and a further reduction of 50,710 between 1910 and 1920, and you have the startling fact that in the sixteen states I have named, and which are close to Canada, there are 192,110 fewer farms to-day than twenty years ago, and that the big part of the reduction has taken place in the last ten years. I do not think we need wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the United States Congress has seen fit to introduce an emergency tariff Bill for the protection of the farmers of that country. But, Sir, I want to call your attention to another fact. Not only do twenty-five of the fourty-eight states show a reduction in the number of farms, but they show a decrease in the farm acreage and in the improved acreage amounting to millions of acres in the aggregate. The farm mortgage indebtedness represents a higher percentage of the actual land values than it did ten years ago. I want my hon. friend from Marquette, when he is trying to make an argument to influence the farmers of Ontario and the people of this country by trying to make them believe that they have abandoned farms in Ontario, to consider the figures that I have given and compare the states just across the line with the province of Ontario. I may say, Mr. Speaker, and I give it to you as my firm conviction—although I have not gone into the figures—that I believe, in so far as farm acreage and improved farm acreage are concerned, the province of Quebec will make a better showing in the last ten years than did the province of Ontario in that regard.

I want to call your attention to a very significant fact. When I found that twenty-five of the states on the other side of the line showed a decrease in the number of farms I naturally began to look around to see how matters stood with the states just across the line from Ontario. I followed that up and I found that with possibly two exceptions, speaking from memory, all of the twenty-five states which show a decrease in the number of farms in the last ten years are northern states, are states which have a climate similar to the climate that we have in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. The states which show an increase in the number of farms and in the improved farm acreage are the states of California, Oregon, Washington, Texas, North Carolina, Virginia, and so on—those states which have a decided advantage over the northern states in that they do not have a winter to contend with. It is impossible for the United States Government to draw a line between those states which have a climate similar to ours, and those states in the south which have a mild climate, and place a duty on the products of those southern states as a means of protecting the producers of the same articles in the northern states. They cannot very well do that. But can we get over the significance of the fact that the states which show an increase in the number of farms and in the improved acreage are those which do not have a winter to contend with, and that those states which are in the north and which have a winter —states like Ohio and Illinois, and no person will question the fertility of the soil of those states—show a decrease in the number of farms and in the improved acreage.

What is the conclusion? That the farmers of those states cannot compete on even terms with the farmers who are more advantageously situated in the southern part of the country. Now, while the United States cannot put up a barrier against the farmers of the South, we are in the position of being able to protect our farmers from the unfair competition of their rivals in the southern and southwestern states where they have the advantage of a mild climate. Our farmers can produce only one crop a year; there they produce two or three crops annually. Our farmers and those of New York, Pennsylvania and Michigan are in the same position in that they have to spend thousands of dollars on barns and stables to protect their stock during the winter months, while the stock of the southern farmers is roaming outside all the winter. That is a capital investment which our farmers must get a return on. Furthermore, they have to spend more money in this northern country in houses and clothing to protect themselves against the winter weather than have their competitors in the states of Texas, Oklahoma and Oregon; in fact, in those states the mild winter renders unnecessary this extra expense.

And yet my hon. friends opposite announce as their policy that if they have the opportunity they will oblige our farmers to compete on even terms not only with the farmers of the southern and southwestern states, but with those of the Argentine, Brazil and other countries where they have the double advantage of cheap labour and a mild climate. I cannot conceive of anything more unfair and unreasonable than such a policy. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) gave us to understand this afternoon that the Liberal party is not a free trade party. Other hon. gentlemen in order to gain votes from those interested in the industries of this country say that they will not at one fell swoop do away with tariff protection for manufactured goods because that would cause too much economic disturbance; while they believe in a policy of free trade they assure manufacturers that they will introduce it gradually. Mr. Speaker, have the manufacturing concerns in the Dominion as much money invested in their factories as the farmers have invested in their land, buildings, stock and implements? If free trade is such a good thing, why is it proposed only to bring it in gradually in regard to manufactured articles, but at one fell swoop so far as farm products are concerned? I maintain that their attitude is most inconsistent and most unfair.

In this period of reconstruction, Mr. Speaker, the man who is first going to feel the decline in prices is the farmer. That is quite evident to-day. I take up the paper and find that butter is offered in the city of Montreal at 25 cents and a fraction a pound. And right here I want to say, as one representing an agricultural constituency, that I am not at all satisfied with the Budget in so far as butter and oleomargarine are concerned. It is absolutely illogical and unfair to allow oleomargarine to be imported free of duty while four cents a pound is imposed on butter. If you say, "We have a duty of 4 cents a pound on butter for the protection of the farmers who produce that article," then how in the name of common sense can you say that it is proper to allow oleomargarine to come in without any duty at all? It certainly takes the place of butter. Last year it displaced butter in this country to the extent of some seven million pounds imported from the United States.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk sometimes about the United States being the great natural market for the surplus farm products of Canada. That is absolute nonsense, and if instead of preparing theses on free trade hon. gentlemen opposite would take the trouble to acquaint themselves with certain facts in regard to farm production in the United States and in Canada they would not make such a ridiculous statement. The natural market for our surplus farm products is not where they have a greater surplue of those farm products than we have, but in those countries where they lack those products. On that basis I want to say that the United States is not the natural market for surplus Canadian farm products. Last year we had a surplus of 17,470,000 pounds of butter, but the United States exported over 34,400,000 pounds of butter and oleomargarine, and they supplied us with 7,352,000 pounds of that butter and oleomargarine, for which we paid them $2,275,547. When I see the farmers of the Dominion hunting all over God's creation to find a market for their surplus butter and finally selling it to some thirty-five different countries, practically greasing the whole globe in order to dispose of that surplus, and at the same time the United States is allowed to export to this country butter and eleomargarine to the extent of millions of pounds, and forcing our own butter off the home market, I state frankly that if I were handling the tariff I would say, "The duty on butter is not as high as it ought to be," and I would increase that duty. The same thing applies in regard to eggs. The United States had a surplus of 25,183,000 dozen and sold us 7,000,000 dozen, for which we paid them $3,333,658, although we had 5,800,000 dozen of our own eggs to dispose of. My conclusion is that when we were forced to hunt for markets all over the globe to sell those eggs, and at the same time imported 7,000,000 dozen from the United tates, our duty on eggs is not as high as it ought to be for the protection of our farmers. Canada's surplus milk last year amounted to $2,500,000 worth, as against the United States surplus of $59,204,000. Does that look as if the United States provides a market for our milk? They ship milk in here in the form of cheese and condensed milk. Canada's surplus meat last year amounted to 260,100,000 pounds, and we had to look all over the world to find a market for it; at the same time the United States had a surplus of 1,663,700,000 pounds. Yet notwihtstanding our own surplus of meat and dairy products for which we had to find a market in a great many countries, the United tates sold us last year over $10,000,000 worth of meat and over $7,790,000 worth of dairy products. I argue from that condition of affairs that the duty at present is not as high as it should be in the interests of the Canadian farmer who is producing these articles. The Canadian farmer is entitled, just as the Canadian manufacturer is entitled, to the first chance to sell his products in the home market. To tell him that he must compete on even terms with the surplus products of the world is to disregard the climatic conditions under which he operates and to treat him most unfairly. To put into effect the policy advocated by the Liberal party in this House, and by the Progressive party as well—for the two policies are the same in regard to making natural products free—to put that into effect will prevent the Canadian farmers from getting the highest prices for anything that they have to sell. Just as soon as prices in Canada become high enough to attract these products from other countries, if our doors are open they will come in and take advantage of those prices, while the countries from which they come will keep up their tariff walls against us. If Australia has surplus eggs to sell and we admit them into Canada free of duty while Australia charges a duty of 12 cents a dozen on eggs going into their country, is that fair? Is that reasonable? Is that honest treatment for the farmers of this country? In my estimation, it is not. I know that the leader of the Opposition is the father of this idea. I know that he it was who some years ago, after making a careful study of the matter, after noticing that the farmers were getting such prices as 16 cents a pound for butter, 7 cents a pound for cheese, 6½ cents a dozen for eggs, 18 cents a bag for potatoes, and so on—he it was who proposed the policy of opening the doors of Canada and letting the surplus products of the world come into this country free so as to bring the prices down still lower. He said at that time that the country was on the verge of a revolution because of the high prices the farmers were getting for their products. He advocates the same thing today, namely, that our doors should be open to allow the surplus products of the world to come in here while other countries retain their tariff walls against us. Mr. Speaker, I protest against that as most unfair to the farmers of this country. The farmers do not ask any favour, but they do ask for a fair deal, and a fair deal in my judgment they are not getting at the present time. After all, the great producers, the great manufacturers of this country are the farmers, and they more than any other class of the community deserve to be protected in their own home market. They more than any other class have built up that home market and they should be given the first place in the matter of selling their products in their own home market.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, permit me to express my appreciation of the courtesy and attention with which hon. members of the House have listened to a speech which has been somewhat more lengthy than I anticipated at the start.

Mr. P. R. Du TREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I shall not undertake to make any extended remarks on the Budget. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Edwards) told us that he favoured the establishment of a permanent commission to revise the tariff. A couple of years ago I made that suggestion to the Government, but I must say that it seemed to fall on deaf ears. At that time I thought it would be a good thing, but I have changed my mind; I believe that the Government should take the responsibility in respect to tariff changes. But it does not appear to be the intention of the Government to make any change in the tariff, and that is why I think the reason given by the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in his able speech of yesterday evening is hardly the real reason for the Government not making any change in the tariff. I really think the Government are afraid to touch this question, in view of the fact that an election is coming very soon, or within a year or so. The Government would like to have the support as far as possible of the big interests, and, on the other hand, they want to make the consumers of the country believe that they are doing something in the way of lightening their burdens.

I do not think that the suggestion of the Finance Minister that the action of the United States in connection with tariff changes would affect this country is a very sound one. At the time when the speech from the Throne was delivered the Fordney Bill was before the country and it was known what that Bill contemplated and what its effect would be upon Canada. So that the reasons given by the minister and by the hon. member for Frontenac, are, in my opinion, only apparent reasons; they do not meet the real issue. During two or three sessions tariff changes have repeatedly been promised. Hon. gentlemen all remember that two or three years ago we were to have this revision of the tariff. Last year it was arranged that a special commission should travel about the country and obtain information from the different interests upon which tariff revision could be based. The Minister of Finance presided at those meetings in such a way as to merit the appreciation of the people; he had a pleasant trip throughout the country, but I am sorry that he did not come to the conclusion to give the country the benefit of that work and those conferences in the form of tariff changes at this session.

I wish to congratulate the minister for the moderate changes he has made in the tariff as outlined in his Budget speech. I really think the minister has shown a laudable desire to assist the business interests of this country. I know that he likes to hear the other man's views; he likes to learn, and he is always very desirous of doing the best he can for this country. But I know, at the same time, that he has the thankless task of collecting as much money as possible so that his colleagues in the different departments may spend it as quickly as it comes in. I do not intend to hold him responsible for all the sins of Israel, for all that this Government has done. He is rather a young man in politics and before he came into the Government almost all the wrong was done. There is not much change in the present legislation. It is moderate. I must say that I approve dropping the business tax and I will say that I do not disapprove the other changes of minor importance as regards liquor and so on. It is, however, because the changes are rather too moderate that I would complain. As I said a minute ago, the people at large had been expecting a general change in the tariff. There is in this country the feeling that the Government represents the big interests, the rich people; that it does not sufficiently protect the poor consumer, and the people thought that at this session something would be done towards reducing the high cost of living. That has not been done. Although there is not much change, the wrong that I spoke of a minute ago still remains; the heavy debt contracted by this Government, the unfair, unjust taxation imposed on the people during the last five or six years still exists, and if you go to any place in the country to-day, you will find a feeling of unrest.

[Mr. DuTremblay.]

It is, perhaps, no secret to the Government that it will have difficulty in finding, amongst business men, many who approve its conduct in administering the affairs of the country, especially since the end of the war. Nearly all business men in Canada are against the Government, and when the elections take place, the Government will fare badly.

What is the condition of affairs to-day? I was speaking of the business men especially, because members of the Government often speak about the business interests of this country. The general feeling throughout the country is really one of discouragement, because the people feel that the Government is watching them in the enterprises that they undertake. The people have to pay heavy taxes in customs and excise, on cheques, on notes, and on many necessities of life, and then if they dare to make a litle money by their efforts or energy, they feel that the Government is watching them, ready to take them by the throat and take away part of their little profit by means of the income tax. This is a time when individual enterprise and energy should be given encouragement.

The Minister of Finance told us that, in round figures, the public debt of Canada was about $2,350,000,000. I do not know if this huge sum of money comprises the obligations of the different railways such as the Grand Trunk and the Canadian National railways. A debt of $2,350,000,000 means a debt of $300 per capita for every man, woman and child in Canada. If you take a father with his wife and three children, that means that he owes $1,500 for himself and his family. If you take into consideration what the people owe for their provincial debt, for their municipal debt, you will come to the same conclusion as thoughtful business men who realize that the country is not on the road to prosperity. The proposed expenditure for next year, according to the minister, will be about $435,000,000. We must add to this obligations that we have to meet for the railways, obligations which I understand are in the neighbourhood of $137,000,000. That makes a total of $582,000,000. As the revenue supposed to be available is $372,000,000, you have really a deficit of $210,000,000 to meet this year. My hon. friends opposite may say to me: "Well, it is only for this year that we have to meet these extra obligations for the railways." But according to men who know, and according to the way the situation appears to-day, we shall have a recurring deficit of between one hundred and two hundred million dollars on account of railways.

The Minister of Finance, in his very learned and capable speech, referred to the golden times of the Liberal party, which assumed office in 1896, and whose long and prosperous administration we recall with pleasure. Let us compare the condition then with the position in which the country is now. At that time the public debt of Canada was about $340,000,000 or about $42 per capita. That amount represented all the money that had been spent to build up the country, by way of subsidies, to assist the construction of railways, and expenditures on post offices, wharves and other public necessities. What do we spend this year? $582,000,000, or $73 per capita. That is to say, we are spending this year for the administration of this country two-thirds more than our entire debt in 1911. It is no use of hiding our heads in the sand like the ostrich; we may as well look the facts in the face. We are to-day spending nearly twice as much as the entire national debt in 1911. That is why the people, and very properly so, do not think our financial position is very good, and why they are calling for a halt on the Government spending millions as if they were thousands. I am pleased to see the Prime Minister in his seat, also the Minister of Finance. I want to tell them that that is the message of the people of the country and of the business men of Montreal.

The Government may ask me what I suggest as a remedy, and in reply to my suggestion they may say, as they usually do: Oh, but our present condition is the result of the war; we have been through a war, and we have had to spend millions on this and that. I would very humbly suggest that if the Government are in earnest, if they are strong enough, if they are sufficiently independent of strong "pull," if they really want to do something for the good of this country, if they really want to put aside patronage and adopt some other method of administration, there is still hope for Canada—I will not say, of getting on a sound business basis—but of being able to make a fresh start and to gradually pay off her debt.

I would suggest that the Government should give up now and completely their policy in regard to the railroads. Give the railroads away. A proposition was made some days ago by the Canadian Pacific. I do not say that that proposition was the best that could be made, but if it is necessary, pay the Canadian Pacific to take these roads over, because the Government will never make money out of them. They will always be a burden. Why? Because you have too much expenditure on management for instance. It is nothing new that I say. Any capable railway official will tell you that parallel railways are a big expense to a country and must be operated at a loss. Take, for instance, a district that I know well, between Ottawa and Montreal. You have every day of the week about ten trains coming over the Canadian Pacific from Montreal to Ottawa, about seven over the Grand Trunk, and four over the Canadian Northern. Why is this? From information that has been given to me I believe that ten trains would cover this whole district that is to-day served by over twenty. It is this duplication that adds to the expense, and we know that in winter the expense is especially heavy. So I say it would pay the Government to get rid of these roads, but I do not suppose the Government will do it, and I will tell you frankly why. The Government wants to keep the roads on account of the patronage it can exercise in connection with them. The Government may say that there is no more patronage, but the people of this country know to the contrary. It is no use trying to hide the fact. The people know why the Government want to keep and operate these railways.

I could say the same thing with regard to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Why not sell these ships? You will lose probably about $20,000,000 if you sell this year, but it is better to take that loss now than to continue your losses from year to year. The report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) issued in December last is not very encouraging. I know him well; I know he has good intentions; I know he did his best, and that under the present conditions he could not do much better. It is not his fault; it is the trade conditions in this and other countries. Probably the minister made a mistake in not taking our advice last year when we told him to sell. That was the time. If he had sold the vessels last year the Government would not have lost one cent, but the vessels were kept in the hands of the Government just for patronage.

What are the facts with regard to our merchant marine? The Government has built about 47 ships, costing about $50,000,000, borrowed from this country on Victory Bonds, costing us 5½ per cent interest. The Minister of Marine tells us that we made $781,000 on the merchant marine this year, but he did not take into account that we have to pay 5½ per cent interest on that investment of $50,000,000. When that is taken into consideration, the year's operation would show a deficit of about $1,500,000. It has been stated to the House that there has been a shrinkage in the value of these ships. These ships cost us $191 per ton to build; we could build them to-day for $131 per ton. Mr. Bosworth, chairman of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, speaking at Vancouver not very long ago said:

"I could get all the ships I want, enough to fill your whole harbor (Vancouver) here for from $50 to $75 a ton." Therefore, considering this tonnage shrinkage, there has not only been experienced an actual loss in operation, but a serious depreciation in capital as well. Last year every ship in operation could have been disposed of for what they cost; to-day it is doubtful whether they could be sold for two-thirds of their cost. For this condition, four things are responsible:

(1) An unlooked-for surplus of ships. (There are 16,000,000 more tons of shipping in the world to-day than at the beginning of the war);

(2) A decline in ocean freight rates. (On some commodities it has been as much as 65 per cent.);

(3) Smaller cargoes; and

(4) An increase in operation costs; supplies and wages having advanced from between 100 and 300 per cent.

Now, this matter of shipping will cost us money this year as well as in the year to come, and, I think that the Government should pay some attention to representations which are made to them in this respect and in regard to the expenditures in connection with the Militia Department. We are spending this year for military and naval purposes some $20,000,000, and I think this is altogether wrong. Our men, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the majority of the people, had enough training in Europe during the past five or six years, without coming back to this country to go in for any military course in Canada at great expense to the public. During the past few weeks we have voted some $3,000,000 for the militia, an amount which is entirely unnecessary and which is an unwarranted extravagance at the present time. To say the least, we could have waited for two or three years before spending this large sum of money, and I cannot reconcile this expenditure with the Government's pretensions at retrenchment in the various departments.

There is another matter in which the Government's policy is not meeting with favour in the country; I refer to the Civil Service, both Inside and Outside. The Government can find room for economy in the Civil Service of Canada; it is my opinion that there are too many civil servants at present and that some are over-paid. The Government should be able to economise in this direction, but I presume they dare not touch this department of the public service. Now, if the Government were really anxious to help the people by reducing the burden which they have to bear to-day, they would take vigorous steps to economise in the various branches of public affairs; if they did so it would go a long way towards restoring public confidence in our system of government.

May I urge once more, as I have done many times in this House that the Government endeavour to secure, if not our full share, at least some reasonable portion of the war indemnity that is due us. I have pressed this question many times, but apparently the Government is heedless of my representations. Mr. Speaker, we went into the war with the distinct understanding that we should be reimbursed, and the then Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), frequently declared during the war that we would not stop until Canada was indemnified to the last cent, until Germany was made to pay or something to that effect. Well, in view of these professions on the part of the Government, I was surprised the other day to hear the statement in a speech by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), in this House, that the advice which he would give would be not to press this question too far. I was really surprised to hear such advice, especially from an hon. gentleman who has been much talked of as our probable representative at Washington. I always considered that this question of the indemnity that Canada, with the rest of the Empire and of the Allied countries, would get from Germany, was one of the most important that would be considered in deciding the Peace Treaty, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that about the only reason which can be given why the Prime Minister might profitably attend the conference to be held in London in June is that he should press Canada's claim in this respect. This, I think, should be the pre-eminent question in his mind when he goes to London. Canada should have her share, and her proper share, of the indemnity. All other countries are looking out for themselves; France, England and the rest are looking after their own interests. While the war was on England did not lose sight of her own interests; she sought to secure a market in Africa and elsewhere, and she has already benefited to a large extent at the expense of Germany, not only directly with respect to money payments, but indirectly in other respects. The mere fact that the German marine is destroyed is advantageous to Great Britain as well as to New Zealand. This question of indemnity is not easy of solution. I read a despatch the other day, containing the report of an interview which was had with Mr. Massey, the Prime Minister of New Zealand. He said:

> The Canadian Government expected to get some reparation from Germany through the sale of German ships. I do not believe a word of it. Neither Canada, nor New Zealand will get anything, and we must make up our mind to it. It is really quite absurd to think of it. All that Germany can pay must go elsewhere—the Dominions must realize that.

That is the statement of the Prime Minister of New Zealand, uttered about a month ago, and I trust that the Prime minister of this country will not go to the conference that is to be held in England in June next imbued with the same views. I tell him now that if he goes to London with the firm determination properly to represent this country's position and to press her claim, he will merit the gratitude of the Canadian people, and in this respect I trust that his efforts, if he exerts them in the right direction, will meet with every success. Now, Mr. Speaker, at this late hour—it is now about half past eleven—I do not intend to take up more time, because I realize that I have already taxed the patience of hon. members and also of the press. I shall therefore resume my seat, expressing, in conclusion, the hope that the Prime Minister will take note of the suggestion I have just offered him.

Mr. O. D. CASSELMAN (Dundas): I wish, first, humbly to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), on the fact that he has outlined in his Budget speech methods of taxation which I hope and believe will adequately meet the difficult conditions that now exist in the country and, in so doing, has imposed the minimum burden on all classes of the Canadian people. The imposition of taxes is at best a disagreeable duty, disagreeable to the Government that finds itself under the necessity of imposing them, and infinitely more disagreeable to the tax-payer who is called upon to pay the taxes. So that the Minister of Finance, in an effort to provide for the extraordinary expenditures with which Canada is faced this year, had a difficult and disagreeable task; and in that he accomplished it so admirably, he is entitled to the commendation and the approval of the Canadian people, which I have no doubt he will receive. In reading the Hansard report of the speeches delivered in the last " Go as you please and free for all " debate, on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I noticed that in almost every speech delivered by the members of the Opposition—both the Liberal Opposition and the Agrarian Opposition—a large part of their arguments was devoted to a demand for a dissolution of this Parliament and an immediate appeal to the people of Canada in the way of a general election, and on every subsequent occasion, which offered the slightest pretext, those arguments were repeated and those appeals were made. Mr. Speaker, this Government was elected, as all governments are, to carry on the business of the country for the regular Parliamentary term. It is true, Sir, that at the time of the last general election, in December, 1917, there was one matter or question which, in importance and danger, infinitely exceeded and dominated all other issues. It is true that at that time there was one mandate—one paramount duty— which, by an overwhelming majority, was laid on this Government by the people of Canada. Will anyone say, Sir, that that duty was not performed, that that mandate was not obeyed and discharged, in a way that brought everlasting glory and honour to Canada; discharged in such a way that it came to pass that all the living forces of Canada were thrown into the struggle and helped very materially to shorten and bring the struggle to a satisfactory conclusion; discharged in such a way that an army of 500,000 men was placed in the field, and back of that army, here in Canada, was another army of hundreds of thousands of men, women and children who worked unceasingly that equipment, munitions, food, money, everything required for the war, were provided in abundance; discharged in such a way that our financial fabric remained secure, that our industries were prosperous, that our commerce was uninterrupted; discharged in such a way that we can look forward to an era of national peace, national prosperity and national safety? Is it because, Sir, that duty was discharged so thoroughly and that mandate obeyed so honourably, that the call is now made to dissolve this Parliament and appeal to the country in the way of a general election?

Mr. Speaker, no charges have been made against this Government. The searchlight of the Opposition, which has been turned to play on every part and on every point of the Government's activities, has disclosed no scandal. Canada and this Government stand unique in this regard. In all previous wars, and in almost every country that was engaged in this war, scandals abounded; but the most diligent search on the part of the Opposition has failed to disclose one single scandal, one solitary case of graft, one instance of mal-administration, and the plea for dissolution, made so continuously by the Opposition, stands unsupported by any single reason or by the wishes of the people of Canada.

A general election inevitably will come soon. In the ordinary course of time, perhaps before the Opposition wishes it, an election must come. What will be the issue? It must be the tariff. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) may endeavour to evade that issue—to advocate this policy in one place and that policy in another place. The leader of the Agrarian party, in this House, is not the out-and-out free trader that he professes to be in some parts of the country. There is an evident disposition on the part of the leaders of both parties to be all things to all men. But, Sir, the country knows that the Liberal party was pledged to the platform adopted in this city in August, 1919. The leader of the Opposition was chosen as the leader of a party that adopted a free trade tariff policy as one of the important planks of its platform. The people expect the Liberals to maintain and to stand on that platform. They will be judged by that platform.

Since 1878 the tariff has been a political issue. The merits of protection and of free trade, and the evils of both, have been discussed for more than forty years on every political platform in this country and, Sir, it still appears to be a debatable question. But out of the multiplicity of arguments and the endless debate I think the following facts have been adduced: First, tariff protection is a selfish policy of government. It goes on the assumption that our standards of living are higher than the standards of living in other countries with which we must compete in trade, that it is by protection we must maintain those higher standards of living. 2nd. that free trade equalizes the living conditions of the countries between which it operates. Where free trade exists the only difference in living conditions should be the cost of transportation. If we were legislating for the whole world undoubtedly the principle of free trade should obtain. This principle is well illustrated in our constitution, which provides that there shall be free interchange of trade between the provinces in order that conditions of living in all parts of the Dominion shall be as nearly equal as possible. Third, that a certain tariff policy may be good at one period of a country's industrial history and bad at another; that as industrial and economic conditions change, the tariff should be changed to meet those conditions. Fourth, that protection may be made to serve a double purpose—provide revenue; afford protection. And, fifth, that protection, in order to be just and fair, ought not only to protect all classes of the people, but if it imposes a burden, that the burden should be equally distributed.

At this late hour I will not attempt to offer any arguments in favour of the first four propositions. The strongest arguments against protection and in form of free trade hinge around the fifth proposition. Those who oppose the tariff for protection generally contend that the farmers get no benefit from protection; that on the contrary, they are compelled to bear the heaviest part of the burden; that they are compelled to sell their products in a free trade market and to buy what they use and consume in a protected market; that since they produce a surplus of farm products which they must sell in the world's market, therefore the world's price fixes the price of their entire product. If those arguments are well founded, Sir, then protection is an unmitigated and unqualified evil which hinders and hampers the greatest of Canada's industries,—an industry in which more than half of our people are directly or indirectly engaged, one in which an immense amount of capital is invested, and a vast amount of human energy is directed.

I want to lay down two propositions, both of which, I think, will be readily admitted by all students of the subject. First, if we exported all the products of the farm and consumed none, then a tariff on farm products would be of no benefit whatever to the farmers. Second, if we consumed all that we produced, and the balance of the world had a surplus of farm products, then the farmers would get the full benefit of whatever duty might be levied on such products. The chief industry of my county happens to be the production of milk and the manufacture of milk products, and I should like to use that article as an example to illustrate how the propositions that I have laid down work out in actual practice. For instance, if, instead of Canada being an exporter of milk products we consumed all we produced and were, even to the slightest extent, an importer, then the producers of milk would benefit to the fullest extent by whatever duty might be imposed on milk products. If, on the other hand, we exported all our milk products, and consumed none then producers would get no benefit because of the tariff. If our surplus were small, the benefit would be greater than if our surplus were large, because we would be approaching the point of total consumption where we would get the full benefit of the tariff; in other words, the larger the home market the greater the benefit of the tariff to the producers. In my county we have three markets for milk: first, the world's market for milk when made into cheese; secondly, the world's market for milk when made into condensed milk; and, thirdly, the market of the city of Montreal, which is available only to those few who have secured connections with the city dairies. The price received by those farmers for the milk which they deliver in Montreal is from 75 cents to $1 per hundred pounds more than the price received by those whose milk is manufactured into cheese. It seems strange that this should be so, but a better article must be produced and shipped in the best possible condition, which, in itself, is a thing to be desired. Our Department of Agriculture has for years been aiming to increase the quality of farm production. Montreal gets its milk supply from the surrounding country. Naturally as the city grows larger and larger, the dairymen are compelled to go farther and farther afield for their milk. The demand is not yet sufficiently large to take care of all the supply included in a radius that would cover my county, but if it were, all would ship their milk to that market and all would avail themselves of the highest price. Could a better example of the advantages of the home market be given than this? Those who can avail themselves of that home market who have been fortunate enough or provident enough to secure city connections get 25 per cent more for their products than those who have to accept the price fixed by the world market.

Naturally, those farmers who ship their produce for consumption in the city are anxious that the city should grow, they want to see the city market develop and increase in value; and if protection is necessary for the growth of our cities, then they want protection. The home market that absorbs farm produce is the population of our cities, towns and villages. Analyse those centres of population and it will be found that a considerable part of the activities of their inhabitants is centred in the factories. Manufacturing is the life blood of the wholesale and the retail trade, of transportation, of professional practice and of commercial enterprise. In a word, business clusters around the factory. Close or restrict the factory and those dependent activities dwindle correspondingly and the home market declines. Even in Canada, Sir, which is said to be, and is, an agricultural country, it is worthy of notice that 80 per cent of our farm products is consumed at home and only about 20 per cent exported. Surely, Sir, the market that takes care of four-fifths of our products is the market that should and must be protected. The home market, under normal conditions, is a constant market, and in a country where the population is steadily increasing it is a growing market. A foreign or open market is an uncertain market. It may be entirely destroyed by war; it may be restricted by legislation or other economic causes.

The stock argument of free traders when they are speaking against protection is that protection builds up the industrial centres at the expense of the rural districts. That argument, Sir, is not well founded. The facts do not bear out that contention, because our agricultural production has increased more rapidly under protection than has our industrial production. In 1900 the total agricultural production was $364,906,866. During the first twenty years of this century it has increased by six times. Surely Sir, that is a marvellous record, made in what is called a protected country. In 1919 it had increased from the amount I have mentioned to $1,975,841,000. Then, again, the average capital invested in Canadian farms has increased marvellously. In my county during the last ten years the value of land has increased from 25 to 50 per cent, and stock also has increased in value. Taking the Canada Year Book's estimate of the agricultural capital of Canada in 1917, as $6,830,145 and dividing this sum by the number of farms in Canada, given by Government statistics as 730,000, we find that the average capital per farm was $9,356. It has increased very materially since. It is now much larger.

Another argument of free traders is that protection has caused rural depopulation. It is unfortunately true that, in Ontario, our rural population has decreased, but that decrease has not been due to protection. In 1911 the rural population of Canada was 54.45 per cent of the total population. In England, when free trade was adopted, the rural population was 49.08 per cent of the whole. In 1913, in England, after many years of free trade, the rural population had fallen to 29.9 per cent. In free trade England the rural districts became depopulated infinitely more rapidly than in protected Canada. The true explanation of rural depopulation is not to be found in the tariff. The causes are obvious. One cause, I think, is the advent of farm machinery and labour saving devices. With the present labour saving farm devices one or two men can do the work which required five or six to do some years ago. Then again, Sir, in taking our census it is usual to include in the rural population the inhabitants of small unincorporated villages. Unfortunately those villages are disappearing. The village blacksmith, the village shoemaker, the village wheelwright, the ordinary village mechanic are disappearing, at least from rural Ontario, and the work formerly done by them is now being done in the factories of the cities. These are two reasons which I think account largely for the rural depopulation.

I have said, Sir, that protection is a selfish policy of government. But Canada's fiscal policy should be designed for Canada. We are here to legislate for Canada. If we were here to legislate for the whole world, undoubtedly free trade should be adopted. But, as I say, we are here to legislate for Canada, not for the world; we are not international philanthropists. But after all, Canada cannot stand alone; a selfish Canadian policy dictates that we must have regard to the action of the nations with which we trade. The fiscal policies of countries are interrelated; they swing together like a pendulum, now towards free trade and now towards protection. This fact is significant, because the swing of the world's pendulum is strongly towards protection. The war has accentuated that swing. All the nations which were engaged in the war are taking extraordinary precautions to guard their home markets, to guard their home industries in order that their demobilized soldiers and others who were engaged in war work and their people generally may have employment in their own country. Great Britain, so often cited as the highest example of a free trade country, is in the front in this movement. Mr. Speaker, Great Britain is no longer a free trade country. She has become less and less a free trade country. The Hon. Austin Chamberlain, new House leader of the party in power in England, said in a speech which he delivered not long ago that the United Kingdom raised the sum of £149,460,000 from customs duties imposed on goods entering the United Kingdom during the year ending March 31, 1920. That is, every resident of the United Kingdom paid in that year a custom tariff tax of about $16—and that in free trade Britain. In Canada the average tariff per capita tax during that year, exclusive of the war tariff now removed, was about $19.50. Yet some describe Britain, with an average per capita customs tax of $16 as a free trade country and Canada with an average tax of $19.50 as a protectionist country.

Most countries are increasing instead of lowering their tariff protection. France increased her tariff rates during the last year by amounts varying from 10 to 300 per cent. Italy, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, Roumania, and the Balkan States have made general increases in their tariffs. Recent dispatches show that still higher protection is being provided in most of these countries, especially in France, Italy and Spain. Japan is now maintaining a high protective tariff. The following clause was adopted by the National Republican Convention of the Republican party of the United States at Chicago on June 10, 1920:

> The uncertain and unsettled conditions of international balances, the abnormal and economic trade situation of the world and the impossibility of foretelling correctly even the near future, precludes the formulation of a definite programme to meet conditions a year hence, but the Republican party reaffirms its belief in the protective principle and pledged itself to a revision of the tariff as soon as conditions shall make it necessary for the preservation of the market for American labour, agriculture, and industry.

Official records show that there is not in the world to-day one country making any pretensions towards industrial greatness that is without a protective tariff. Canada's tariff legislation, designed for national development, must be affected by the fact that every great industrial nation has erected protective tariff barriers against the exploitation of its markets by other nations. Were our customs 12 m. tariff removed, while other countries maintained and strengthened theirs, our markets would be deluged with the overflow goods from protected foreign countries, while our goods would be largely shut out of foreign countries. Let me just say that a system under which Canada, for forty years, has improved so rapidly, sanely and uniformly, ought not to be hastily discarded, to be replaced by a system of doubtful character, a system which every other great industrial nation of the world is getting further and further away from, a system which, however faultless in theory, has been found to be a failure in actual practice.

There is just one other matter that I should like to refer to very shortly, and that is the tendency, in Canada, in fact, throughout the world, to adopt a system of Government which might well be described as the group system. I can see nothing wrong in any group of men, whether they are united by ties of similar occupation or not, in uniting to secure adequate parliamentary representation. It is not only the privilege, but the duty of every class, every group, every district, to secure adequate and legitimate parliamentary representation; but the effort to secure representation is one thing, and to endeavour to secure control of the government of a country is quite a different thing. The departure lies not in an effort to secure class representation, but in an effort to secure class control. Party government is the tried and proven principle upon which democracy itself is founded. It stands alike for the liberty of the individual and for the protection of the nation as a unit. Any system of government which is based on a principle that makes a sharp distinction between the classes of our citizenship, is fatal to the welfare of our citizenship.

The government should be representative of all classes of citizens. I am not referring particularly to what is known in this House as the Farmers' Group, though they are the greatest offenders because they have been the most successful, because they have brought their group organization to the highest pitch of perfection, and because, in Ontario at first, the farmers' organization have served notice that none but farmers need apply for admission to their organization.

Only a short time ago, in Ontario, Premier Drury, broadened, I suppose, by the responsibilities of office, announced publicly that his party was big enough, broad enough, liberal enough to include representatives from every group and every class in Ontario. This was the announcement of a statesman. This was a welcome announcement to the people of Ontario, because it indicated a desire to revert to the sane and tried system of party government. But it was not welcomed by the farmers' organization; it was not approved by Mr. Morrison, the secretary, who appears to control that organization, and Mr. Drury was immediately and publicly notified that he was Premier of the province of Ontario by the grace of, and as the representative of, the United Farmers of Ontario. If he wished to maintain the position, of premier, he must be good or get out, He did not want to get out; he decided to be good. One wonders whether Ontario is governed from Queen's Park or from the offices of the United Farmers of Ontario, in Toronto. When Premier Drury is inclined to broaden out and make his party a provincial party, he is called upon the carpet by Mr. Morrison and disciplined, and he leaves a chastened, docile representative of the United Farmers of Ontario alone. In Ontario, there is no attempt on the part of the Farmers' party to disguise the fact that the Drury Government is a class government, and that they intend to see that it is maintained as such. If the Premier is not so inclined, he must give way to another who will be, and this class organization is now to be used for the distinct purpose of aiming at control of federal affairs. The Drury Government in an accident. It does not represent a majority of the farmers of Ontario. A study of the vote shows that its support came from both country and town. The Drury Government is an accident; an accident for which the farmers alone are not responsible. It is a government placed in power by the disaffected and dissatisfied voters of Ontario, by those who had or imagined they had grievances against either the Hearst or the Federal Government. It was a revolt against the restrictions and restraints placed on individual liberty that the war might be carried on with the fullest vigour. It was a protest against the curtailment of privileges which people had come to regard as rights, a curtailment of privileges made necessary in order that the war might be prosecuted with vigour and success.

In eastern Ontario, at least, the Farmers' party is already preparing for the coming election campaign, and in the rural counties the political fight will be, not between the Government supporters and the Liberals, but between the Government supporters and the candidates of the United Farmers of Ontario.

What will be the nature of the appeals of the Farmers' candidates to the electors in the coming election? They will appeal for free trade, yes; but principally, they will appeal to the electors to condemn this Government for measures passed by this Government during the war—measures which in the opinion of this Government were demanded in order that the war might be carried on with the utmost vigour, but which in their opinion interfered with their personal rights and privileges, limited their profits, and increased the difficulties of farming. They will insist that increased production was infinitely more necessary than increasing the size of the army; they will condemn this Government for fixing the price of cheese too low, and for fixing the price of feeds too high. They will condemn this Government for wheat control; for the actions of the Canada Food Board; for the regulation providing that housewives must use a certain amount of substitutes in their flour at a time, Sir, when milling companies were forcing flour on dealers and dealers were forcing it on their customers. Those are the arguments which will be used, and above all, the iniquities of the Military Service Act. The appeal will be to condemn this Government for those things, and to vote for a party whose leader was a member of that Government when those things were done. Consistent? Hardly. Mr. Speaker, the whole political history of the world affords no such ludicrous example of political inconsistency as the selection by the Farmers' party of Ontario of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) as their leader.

They complain of the fixing of the price of cheese. The hon. member for Marquette was a member of the Government when that was done. Not only was he a member of the Government, but he was minister in charge of the department which exercises control of dairy products.

They complain of the fixing of the price of feeds. The hon. member for Marquette was a member of the Government when that was done. Not only was he a member of the government, but he was Minister of Agriculture, and so is most responsible.

They complain of the fixing of the price of wheat. Who is most responsible for that act? Of course, there must be collective responsibility, but the hon. member for Marquette was Minister of Agriculture when the price of wheat was fixed. He was President of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, first, at a salary of $15,000 a year and Minister of Agriculture second at a much less salary.

Who, when the farmers' sons were conscripted, if the need of the farm was greater than the need of the army, should have been the first to register a protest, and if unheeded, to resign? The member for Marquette.

They complain because the farmers' sons were conscripted, and, at the same time, are advised to vote for a party led by the hon. member for Marquette, who gave his blessing and benediction to that Act, who was a minister of the Crown when that Act was passed. We cannot get away from the fact that agriculture is now and must be for generations to come the most important Canadian industry. We cannot get away from the fact that it is an industry that has not always enjoyed rewards which the labour and capital involved entitled it to. We cannot get away from the fact that it is not profitable enough or attractive enough to induce those who are now on the farms to remain there or others to take up farming as a life's occupation. If by organization and union a better condition of affairs can be brought to prevail, such organization and union should have our hearty support and sympathy, but organization to promote better conditions of trade is one thing, and political organization to secure control of the government is quite another thing. The one is justifiable and practical—the other is neither.

In conclusion let me just say that the war has brought us an immense debt. It has left us with a restless, uneasy people, but it has brought us something else which immeasurably outweighs the dangers of those. It has left us with a national purpose and a faith in our national prowess.

We are richer because of the war, infinitely richer, because something more imperishable than money, than our lands, our mountains and our seas, has been created, and is peculiarly and eternally our own—a national faith, a national spirit.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Standstead): Mr. Speaker, in olden times when the Budget was debated in the House it used to be provocative of vigorous speeches, but this particular one seems to have got down to the basis of a fellowship meeting. We had two ex-Ministers of Finance to-day talking along the same line, saying that tariff revision was to take place.

The tariff question has always been an important one in this country. It has involved the life of many governments. At the present time we have an appalling debt, which imposes very great burden upon all our people. The railways have been more largely responsible for this than anything else, and they constitute the darkest cloud in the future. Personally I was very much relieved when the great Shaughnessy made overtures to the Government recently to take over the National Railways. I believe that Shaughnessy is the highest authority in Canada in connection with railway operation. He was brought up under the great Van Horne, has had a vast experience, and he shows his genius in his selection of his lieutenants.

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has discussed the tariff reductions, reciprocity, and so forth. Some have accused the Liberal party of being a free trade party. I probably have had as long an experience as most members of this House and I have never known the Liberal party to proclaim a free trade policy. It may have been proclaimed by individuals, but not by the party leaders. Away back in the days soon after Confederation, when the Hon. Edward Blake and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie had the colonial tariff, that great opportunist and leader Sir John A. Macdonald came in with the national policy. I have heard that question thrashed out on the hustings of this country for more than 40 years. The policy of reciprocity in natural products was advocated by the late great Sir John Macdonald, the Hon. John Henry Pope and the Hon. C. C. Colby, who represented the county I now have the honour to represent.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), has gone down to Washington many times and tried to effect a reciprocity treaty in natural products with the United States, and this I think shows the insincerity of the right hon. gentleman. I trust the day will come when we shall take this question of the tariff out of politics, and appoint a commission of scientific men to consider it from the international viewpoint, because it is a matter of international concern in which we have to deal with other countries as they wish to deal with us. You cannot have a hard and fast tariff that will satisfy every section of the country. Now, there are other matters of greater importance than the tariff at the present time, and one question of supreme urgency is the development, to the best possible advantage, of the great resources of Canada. To-day Japan is making practically all the silk goods used in Canada, and she is invading the markets for cotton, musical instruments, etc. She is manufacturing almost every conceivable thing, and Germany is doing the same. That country is selling steel to the manufacturers here at 8 cents per pound, for which they have been paying 32 cents to the United States and Great Britain or wherever they could get this product.

What with the eight-hour day and the laziness that is rampant in this country to-day, it is quite evident that if we do not wake up we shall find ourselves in an unenviable position. We should do something to prevent certain people from overrunning the country, berating capital and labour, and every decent institution that tends to hold together the fabric of a civilized country. The people who went from my part of the country down to the New England cotton mills to work in the early days, laboured twelve hours a day, from half past five in the morning to half past six at night, the young men and women at 35 cents a day, and the older men at $1.25. And they were perfectly content and happy. Conditions to-day, however, are entirely different. Canada and the United States can truthfully be said to be in analogous positions, in that conditions in this country are much the same as the conditions that prevailed in the United States after the Civil War there. By inflation, prices have reached a fictitious levelty.

I am interested in the tariff because I desire to see the development here of a great country. I believe in commercial unity. I think that commercial unity should be aimed at, and I should like to see the whole of the British possessions in the Caribbean sea, not only commercially, but politically, united with Canada. But in order that this may be realized, there must be no coercion; every part of the Empire must enter the union willingly. If possible, I should like to see Canada indemnified for the part she took in the Great War. In this connection it seems to be that the member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Du Tremblay), advanced a very forceful argument when he said that the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Meighen), when he goes to the Old Country, should put forward Canada's claim as the question of greatest concern to this country. I cannot be equally as confident as the hon. gentleman in the assertion that the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), made the promise that we should be reimbursed if we succeeded in winning the war, but the statement seems to be only reasonable.

Now, it seems to me that the Government made a serious mistake in loaning money to Roumania and Greece. I remember very well that that staunch Liberal gentleman who represents the constituency of Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) warned the Government time after time, as I did myself, that it would be disastrous to loan money to these countries that had no responsible governments. To-day, we are informed by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that no interest has been paid on these loans and that there is no prospect of any payment. I can remember that about the time these loans were made I tried to buy various goods, such as overalls, shirts, jumpers, etc., having been in the mercantile business for more than forty years; and the result of the Government's decision to lend this money to these countries was that these goods went up 20, 30, 40, 50, and probably 100 per cent. Now, had the Government spent that money in this country in developing our internal resources, in building highways, and extending our canals, they would have been doing something that would be greatly to the advantage of this country, instead of helping foreign countries at our expense, when we can ill-afford to lose a cent. They could very well have spent this money on the great Welland canal, which, notwithstanding that some people regard the expenditures on it as monstrous, I claim to be well worth every improvement that can be made to it.

The Government of a country, it seems to me, might well be compared to the father of a large family, who has the control of children of varied temperament, some pugnacious, some disobedient and others submissive. I say that the Prime Minister and the Government must take hold of our present conditions fearlessly; in other words, they must take the bull by the horns. The tariff is not the only question with which they should deal; they should take hold of our internal and commercial affairs, and carry out a sound policy in regard to them. I am confident, for instance, that one-half of the civil servants of the country could be dispensed with.

Now, it is obvious that there has been a considerable decline in prices of farming products, and the farmers to-day are practically throwing away hides because they are not skinning their animals themselves. Our present economic conditions demand careful consideration on the part of the Government. The manufacturers of boots and shoes, to give one illustration, take the view that the fewer hides placed on the market, the higher the price of shoes will be, and in other respects the manufacturers say: "We will not operate this year, because we cannot get help, and the people next year will be practically in rags and goods are bound to go up then."

All of these things that require labour cannot be produced for much less as yet. Farm commodities are produced by the sweat of the farmer's brow, and the farmer is not getting more than fifty per cent of what he received a year ago. He cannot therefore pay more than fifty per cent of what he formerly paid to the man that he hires and who sleeps in as good a bed as he does and eats at the same table. Some one in this country has to be bold enough to stand behind the administrative affairs of Canada, and the Civil Service, to a certain extent, requires to be dealt with. The civil servants should work just as hard as anybody else. If there are fifty-five or sixty thousand civil servants who only work three, four or five hours a day how can you prevent people in the country from wanting to come and live in the city and attend the moving pictures? They see men and women wearing silk hose and good clothes and who, apparently, have nothing much to do, but who are employed in the service of the country. It is because we are not properly handling the problems of this kind that we are not able to run our own railroads—that is one sure sign. There are lots of other things we cannot do, and it is for that reason I say that the Government, as the head of the great Canadian family, should go to work and grapple with these problems.

Look at the present financial situation. Last year we had a debt of two billions and to-day the debt is beginning to look as if it would soon be two and a third billions. Heaven knows where things will finally stop. The country needs an increase of population, but we are following the policy of hand-picking immigrants, which means that we do not get them. In that connection let me say that the whole world seems to be upset, and the United States and Canada in particular. The people that came to Canada and built the Grand Trunk railway, from Portland to Chicago, were the Irish. The Irish built that road and they demonstrated the fact that they were not only able to build railroads but that they were capable of helping to run the country. They went down to the New England States and the people in Boston were afraid of them—afraid they were going to run the city. There was a time when it was thought the Irish were going to run New York, but a change has come and that belief is now entertained of the Jews. Go west and southwest and you find the people are afraid of the Mexican greaser. Go out to the Pacific coast and you find that the people in California are afraid of the Chinese and Japanese. In British Columbia fear is entertained of the Chinese, the Japanese and the Hindoo. Travel from the west eastward through Canada and you will find fear expressed regarding the Hutterite, the Mormonite, or some other ite, and the Doukhobors. Humanity would appear to be getting suspicious. Come farther east and you hear fear expressed of the French in the province of Quebec, the greatest province in the whole Dominion —a province where the most stable institutions prevail, and the most peace-loving and industrious people dwell. The remarkable thing is that this fear exists in regard to the people who are doing the work. The Anglo-Saxon race have got rich and lazy in all the communities which I have mentioned, especially on the Pacific coast. People move from the East to the West, they become affluent, and they will not do any menial labour; they get the Chinese and Japanese in to perform domestic work for them. The Orientals started work at fifty cents a day and have now got up to $100 a month—they are getting wealthy too and have commenced to buy beautiful homes and to acquire land.

There is one way out of the existing trouble and that is for every able-bodied person in the country to peel off and get to work. It cannot be done by any philosophizing, preaching, or political propaganda. People have got to get down to brass tacks; they must get down to the very bottom and work up. There are unemployed in this city and there is a strike at present in progress. In Toronto there are a lot of unemployed people who are demanding that married men amongst them be paid $20 a week and single men $15 a week. At first the mayor of that city did not nip the demonstration in the bud, but he had to do it before many days; otherwise there might have been such a demonstration as occurred in the Haymarket Square, Chicago, some years ago. On that occasion bombs were thrown and a number of people were killed. But eight or ten of the culprits paid the penalty for their crime and were executed. I believe that no able-bodied man in this country has any right to ask the Government to feed him—all should work for what they eat and what they have. Some policy will have to be adopted in Canada by which idle persons will be set at work. You cannot do anything else; if you do not do something of that kind these people will become criminals. There is lots of work in the country for the unemployed. Take the districts between Montreal and Ottawa, Montreal and Sherbrooke, and Ottawa and Toronto. In these sections of Canada you have some of the finest and most fertile land. The great pity is that in many cases the farm buildings are running down for want of repairs and a little paint. If a little paint were applied it would effect a wonderful transformation. In our province we see lots of whitewashed buildings with red painted doors and the tourist as he passes through declares "You have a most beautiful country here." I do not wish to run down the paint business, but really paint is getting to be almost too expensive an article for the farmer. It must be remembered that in addition to other handicaps the farmer has weather conditions to contend with. It was only a short time ago that in many parts of the United States, when the peach trees, and even the peccan trees, were in bud and things were most promising a frost came and devastated everything. In the Niagara peninsula the country is beautiful and at the present time the fruit trees are all out in blossom; they are garbed in white. In California after the frost came not a single blossom was to be seen on the fruit trees. We have one of the grandest countries in the world in Canada but it must be properly administered. Our governments must quit playing politics—as a matter of fact the public mind is in such a state it will not tolerate playing that game very much longer.

My hon. friend from Frontenac has been making a lot of comparisons. He cannot deny that the Laurier Government was elected upon certain pledges and that it fulfilled all its pledges. It accorded preferential treatment to Great Britain and reduced the postage from three cents to two cents. Times were good and almost everybody was prosperous. Now the Government is taxing everybody and everything. Perhaps the only thing that escapes taxation is the oxygen in the air that we breathe. Under the Laurier Administration prosperity prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the land and the people were happy and contented. To-day we have a Government that does not administer the affairs as they should be administered; it is watching for the opportune time to hold an election and seeking every chance to re-elect itself. I ask, if that is doing right by the common people of this great country? We have the greatest country in the world if we will only develop it by sane policies. Instead of bringing coal from Pennsylvania let us utilize our native coal and our great water-powers.

The Minister of Finance speaking in Montreal and Toronto gave the people good advice to spend their money at home and support Canadian industries; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave similar advice. With our Canadian dollar so deflated in the United States a person must be insane to buy anything there that is procurable in this country. But I fear that in many respects we fail as a people. For instance, if we used all our money to develop our own country instead of spending it to develop other countries we would be in a far better position than we are to-day.

I have not seen any particular attention paid to our great railway problem. With our constantly increasing deficits, already running into nearly $100,000,000 annually, would it not have been better to have treated our railroads in the same way as the United States have treated theirs? As a matter of fact we should have let our railroads go into the receiver's hands in the first place. I would not be in favour of our National system being absorbed by the great Canadian Pacific railway, but if the Government could make an arrangement with the Shaughnessy syndicate, or whoever it may be, to take the system over the Government would be in a position to see that freight and express rates were lowered, and they could control operating expenses to a greater or less extent. For instance, the McAdoo award cost the Canadian Pacific Railway $12,000,000 last year, and it severely handicapped our National railways. In fact, we are playing into the hands of the United States every day. That is what pleases me in regard to the Budget, that it gives still further preferential treatment to the British Empire.

There is not very much to be censured in this Budget, except that I would not have removed the tariff on beer and confectionery. My personal impression is that the higher duty in this regard would be an advantage to our youth and to many of our adults. But the business men of this country have stood about all the taxation they can in this respect, that there is never any lack of enterprise among them, but they are disinclined to embark on any enterprise when they see the Government so ready to take away their profits. Therefore, I am glad that no further hardship has been imposed, as it is undoubtedly a mistaken policy which tends to destroy the ambition of our people. Men used to go into a bank and say to the manager, "We want $50,000, or $100,000, and we not only want it, but we are going to have it. If you do not like to accomodate us, we will get the money somewhere else." But they would be courageous men who would talk that way to-day, simply because the banks have not got the money to loan. We have taxed the people to the limit. And with our huge railroad deficit what can we expect in the future? I say that the Government will not get from the sales tax in 1921 60 per cent of what they got last year, and the same remark applies to the income tax, simply because industries all over the country are passing dividends. I know, because I am hit very severely myself, and I am aware that others are hit a mighty sight worse. But the Government are simply going along in a spendthrift way building up military works. Have we any right at this juncture to be expropriating money for drilling purposes? We have men enough in this country to-day trained to the hilt to last a decade. I say to our soldiers: If you saved your country from Germany, it is your duty now to save her from bankruptcy. Let every abled bodied returned man consider himself a civilian and do his best to develop the resources of Canada and make her people a great nation.

I have not much to say about labour, because it is a question that often arouses a cantankerous spirit, but I venture to say that our labour organizations are paying thousands of dollars every year to American scalawags who tell our workingmen: "Keep a stiff upper lip and don't work." This advice can only lead to a most appalling state of affairs, and already small investors are holding their money and very few institutions are running more than twenty-five or thirty per cent of their capacity.

In the Eastern Townships, the fairest land in all the Dominion, there were built last year a number of plants involving an expenditure of over $20,000,000. The people are industrious down there; there are no strikes, and thank God for it. The people honour their King and worship God, and if you can get a people to do that the country is safe. It would be well if the considerable number of people who have a habit of trying to get a living out of the other fellow's pocket would go to work and delve out an existence from the rich, fertile soil which is to be found in this country. I heard the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) say that he was brought up on oatmeal and the Bible. Well, that is a pretty good diet and I want to say that if more people lived on such a diet they would come to a full realization of things and would know a little better what they were created for. It is said that mankind was created to glorify God, but I think that the percentage of those who do so outside the province of Quebec is very small indeed. There we teach the young people to take off their hats to their seniors. Now, I suppose I work as hard as any man in the country; when I get home I put in fifteen hours a day—go down to the mill or farm looking like a tramp, with ragged clothes on; yet the little children whom you meet take their caps off. I say that the people of the province of Quebec are going in the right direction, not only for the present, but for their eternal salvation.

Now, coming back to the immigration policy of the Government, I was going to speak the other day when the Estimates of the Department of Immigration were before the House, but the minister suddenly gave over to one of his colleagues and I did not get the opportunity. I have said a few things about the United States and Canada. Now, the most populous country in the world is not Canada and is not the United States; the most populous countries are found not in this hemisphere, but in Europe, Asia and Africa. Some people think we can go on with this hateful talk about foreigners; that we can employ these people and pay them, and simply because they want to invest their money honestly in this country that we will make them subservient to our will and keep up a hatred. Why, Mr. Speaker, the thing is deplorable. We all believe in the fatherhood of God, and if we do we should believe in the brotherhood of man. If not, it would be a farce for the Speaker of this House to implore the divine aid and the divine guidance for our King and our country in the deliberations of Parliament. I know as clean people who have black skins as I do mean people who have white skins. If I run across the Japanese ambassador here, I think I have met a gentleman. We need to shake off some of these ideas; the people should realize their duty not only to themselves but to their families and to mankind in general.

I think it is tweny millions which is proposed to be spent on militia and naval affairs. Now, one would think we were trying to follow the great and populous United States. The United States would not sign the Peace Treaty so she braced up and said: We have the money; we will build a navy that will make the rest of the world get on their knees to us. Well, that is against the spirit of the age; it is against the spirit of the father of the Peace Treaty, ex-President William H. Taft.

An hon. MEMBER: Wilson.

Mr. BALDWIN: Ex-President William H. Taft was the father of the League of Nations and the Peace Treaty. He stood upon the platform with President Wilson and at various meetings held throughout the country he advocated that policy. And what happened? About the time the United States elections were to come on some of the big politicians said to Mr. Taft: Do you remember that you were President of the United States by the vote of the Republican party? Withdraw your affiliations with this Democratic President. From that time on, did William H. Taft advocate the League of Nations or the Peace Treaty? No. So it is that politics and its intrigues serve to destroy the prospects of a people; it is the old question of the political game.

One of the ministers has suggested that it is difficult to forecast what the condition of Europe will be six months from now. It may be a raging tempest of war. Well, so far as I am concerned I declare against a policy of going over there if they want to keep up a raging tempest of war; I say, in that case let us stay on this side of the Atlantic. I do not want to speak on conscription now but I do want to say that conscription cost the country probably half of its present debts. That noble, patriotic man, the late Minister of Militia who is now probably nearing his end, said: "We do not need conscription; more men are volunteering than I can equip." But the present Minister of Militia is broad and well-fed and he gets pretty chesty; he brings up that spirit of antagonism; he wants to devour some one. When a military machine is set up it has to do something, even if it comes to declaring war on a peaceful nation, as Germany did. Now, this business of annual drill is the biggest farce that has ever been known. I say without fear of contradiction that not two per cent of the men who were drilled in Canada at the annual drills before the war were fitted physically or any other way to enter upon active military service. Why? Because they were made up of old men, men who were halt and blind—well, blind so far as their sense of duty went. That christian gentleman, the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) made some reference to-day to the doings in Victoria. With already three or four dry docks on the Pacific coast, one of them at Victoria. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) laughs; we may get after him by-and-by if the hour is not too late. If, there were three dry docks or two or only one, what would be the occasion for building a new one when we think of the tonnage that is lying idle at the docks in the different coastal towns of Canada and the United States? Building dry docks at this time when such a condition of things exists, is preposterous, but I do not want to discuss this matter which was so ably dealt with by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding).

The Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) said that the hon. member for Stanstead would allow to come into Canada any law-abiding citizen. I stand by that statement. Immigration is required if we are to produce sufficient traffic for the huge mileage of our railways and to develop the enormous extent of our country. If we cannot get revenue to pay the appalling amount of interest due on our public debt without ever thinking of paying it off, it will be a sad thing for we fathers to point out to our sons, the coming generation, that taxation is to be worse and worse as the years go by. We want to do something, not only to pay promptly the interest on the national debt, but to pay off a good sized lump sum of the debt each year under the present taxation. How can we do that with the population that we have at present? We must develop all our resources. We are told that Mackenzie, going down the Mackenzie river 130 years ago, found oil in that section of the country. I have statistics to show where we buy our gasolene from, and most of our money spent on gasolene goes to the United States. We have our oil wells up in the Mackenzie River district and we need a railway there to enable private enterprise to develop them. Of course the great Imperial Oil Company will put in their plant, but that will be another monopoly. If the Imperial Oil Company, the big child of the Standard Oil Company puts in a pipe line, you will not see cheaper oil. A railway must be built or some method of transportation provided. It would cost a great deal of money to put in canals or locks, but there should be some way of getting into that vast territory.

The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Thompson) entertained the House a few years ago with some wonderful statistics of the vast resources of the Yukon. How are we going to pay off this appalling debt and build up the country, and what hope of the future is there without development of our tremendous resources? Quebec alone is a good deal more than one-fifth the size of the United States. Our policy as regards immigration should be a broad one, and I have enough knowledge of the human race not to be discouraged. In the early days of the war we were told about the horrible Kaiser and his military machine, but the German people are fine people. When hon. members in this House speak about the horrible German and the horrible Austrian and look with scorn on anybody who sympathises with those people, I say that that was due to the German machine and I have respect for the people of Austria and Germany. We should imitate the spirit of Great Britain in that respect. Their policy is 1 a.m. to extend the hand of fellowship to the enemy when he is conquered. When she conquered this country she gave the conquered race their language and religion. Yet we here, an insignificant number of people as compared with the great nations of the earth, are settling up a hatred for our former enemies. How can we ever expect to trade with them, to do business with them, to receive them in this country if we keep up that hatred? We would win far more people if we held out a cordial hand.

I remember being in the western United States and seing people pouring in there with perhaps nothinb but a tin box or a red handkerchief to hold all their belongings, and yet they have become good respectable citizens of that country. God created the Germans and Austrians just as much as ourselves and we have no right to set up this hatred against them. If we have an unruly, dishonest criminal in this country, we should punish him quickly. We must adopt a new policy of immigration. Who in this country has backbone enough to adopt some principle of common sense in this matter? Are we to go on playing politics without any sound business principle to go on? It is time that we began to realize what a government is for, what civilization is for. We have sent out missionaries throughout the broad world to Christianize the people of the dark spots but we at home are playing a game that is wholly dishonest, wholly unpatriotic, wholly disloyal to our country and wholly nonsensical. Let our leaders grasp the situation and deal with it as they should.

My observations are probably very much distorted; but they come from my heart, and I shall be glad if what I have said, when it is placed on Hansard, does some good to this world that is so much troubled and in which there is so much hatred, so much enmity and so much despair.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

LEAVE FOR MR. CRERAR TO ATTEND SENATE COMMITTEE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate requesting this House to give leave to the Honourable Thomas Alexander Crerar, M.P., to attend and give evidence before the special committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into and report at this session upon the conditions which are responsible for a large portion of our export trade (more especially the products of the West) being routed via American instead of Canadian ports.

WAYS AND MEANS RESOLUTIONS

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE moved:

That 300 copies of the Ways and Means resolutions submitted to the House on the 9th instant be printed forthwith, 600 in English and 200 in French, and that rule 74 be suspended in respect thereto.

On the motion of the Hon. C. C. Ballantyne the House adjourned at 1.07 a.m. Wednesday.

Wednesday May 11, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

ARMISTICE DAY

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to ask the consent of the House to move that Bill No. 119, an Act respecting Armistice Day, now appearing on Public Bills and Orders be transferred to Government Orders.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRADITION TREATY

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I beg leave to lay on the Table of the House, copies of a Supplementary Extradition Convention with the United States signed at London on January 15, 1917. This is the treaty which makes wife desertion an extraditable offence.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 146, to amend the Chinese Immigration Act.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Explain this.

Mr. CALDER: The most important amendment contained in the Bill will be found in the first section. As the law now stands, Chinese merchants coming to Canada are admitted without paying a head tax, on the production of a certificate of identity which is issued by the officers of the Chinese Government and viséd by the British Consular Officers in China. It has been found during the past year—I think to some extent owing to conditions in China—that a good deal of abuse has prevailed in connection with the issuing of these certificates. Consequently we propose to abolish the certificates and require every Chinese merchant landing on our western coasts to satisfy the controller of immigration there as to the bona fides of his status.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this controller of Chinese immigration an official of this Government?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. The second amendment is to the effect that a board of inquiry, appointed under the general Immigration Act, may determine the question as to whether or not a person of Chinese race has legally entered Canada. Under the law as it now stands, if any question arises in that connection it must be tried by a magistrate. Under our general immigration law, applying to all other people, these cases are heard by a board of inquiry and determined by them, so it is proposed to make the two laws uniform in that respect. The third amendment relates to section 18 of the Chinese Immigration Act. That section deals with and enumerates the prohibited classes—for example paupers, lunatics and others of that category. The provision in the present Chinese Act does not go as far as a similar provision in our general law, and the object of this amendment is to make the two laws the same in that respect—that is to define in both our Acts, the general Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, the classes that are prohibited and to make them the same. Then there is a further provision to this effect: Under the law as it now stands, Chinese, other than the non-immigrant class, who enter Canada are required to pay a head tax of $500. They, however, have the right to return to China. That is called "registering out." They obtain a certificate when they leave and under that certificate they are entitled to return to Canada at any time within the year without again paying the head tax. It is proposed to make the period a two-year period instead of, as at present, one year. Then there is a fifth amendment to this effect: That where a person of the Chinese race has entered Canada illegally—if he belongs to, say, any of the prohibited classes, and has succeeded in securing entry to Canada illegally, and is afterwards found—the question as to his right to remain in Canada shall be determined by the controller of Chinese immigration. There is, of course, in all cases an appeal to the minister, as under the general Immigration Act. In addition there are a number of minor amendments which deal largely with small matters of administration.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Mr. Murphy.]

CARTIER SQUARE, OTTAWA—STORES SHED

*Mr. FRIPP:

1. When the Stores shed was erected on Cartier Square for Military purposes during the Great War were assurances given to the Corporation of the City of Ottawa, by the Department of Militia, that the building was only of a temporary character, and that it would be removed as soon as possible after the war terminated?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to cause this unsightly structure to be removed at an early date?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. No.

2. It is unfortunately necessary to require this building for some considerable time, as it is fully occupied with war stores.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY—ST. SIMON

Mr. TRAHAN:

1. Has Mr. Didace Rodrique ever been in the employ of the Canadian National Railways at St. Simon, as telegraph operator or station agent?

2. Is he still in the service of the Government?

3. If not, when did he resign or was he discharged?

4. If discharged, what was the reason for his dismissal?

5. Does the said Rodrique receive a pension from the Government? If so, what is the rate of same?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes; as station agent at St. Simon.

2. No.

3 and 4. He was pensioned December 1, 1914.

5. Yes; twenty-three dollars and eighteen cents per month.

POSTMISTRESS OF PIERREVILLE

Mr. BALL:

1. Did the Post Office Inspector of the Montreal district visit Madame Boucher on the date of her dismissal as Postmistress of Pierreville?

2. If so, did he say to her on that occasion, "that she had served the Crown and the public faithfully for twenty-five years; but here are my orders from the Postmaster General. Hand me your keys and your equipment. You are dismissed as Postmistress."

3. Did he give her any reason for her dismissal?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes, the Pierreville office was visited by the assistant inspector.

2. No.

3. Yes, that she had allowed outsiders to handle mail contrary to regulations, which she admitted.

STE. ROSE DE WATFORD—MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. CANNON:

1. Who has the contract for the transportation of mail from the station at the village of Ste. Rose de Watford, in the county of Dorchester?
2. How many times daily is the mail carried?
3. Has the number of trips been decreased of late?
4. If so, why?
5. What is the amount of the contract?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Jean Lacasse.

2. Once daily with one additional trip on Saturdays.

3 and 4. Yes. The former frequency was found to be in excess of actual requirements, seven trips per week being a sufficient frequency to meet the postal needs of the locality.

5. Seven hundred dollars per annum.

JUDGE SNIDER'S REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANGUS McDONALD (Timiskaming): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister when we may expect Judge Snider's report.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The commissioner has not notified the Government of any date when the report will be submitted. So far as the Secretary of State knows, to whose department the report will come, it has not yet been submitted.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 10, the debate on the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the very able Budget presented to the House by my colleague the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will receive very general approval throughout the country, and I have been very much gratified to hear the warm words of commendation that have fallen from hon. members on both sides of the House who have so far taken part in this debate.

I do not intend to refer in any great detail to the Budget, but one or two salient features of it will, I am sure, appeal to hon. members and to the people generally. The revenues for last year exceeded the ordinary expenses, including all pensions and current war charges by $69,400,000, and exceeded the sum total of the ordinary expenses, together with the regular charges to capital and war, by $12,298,000. I am sure hon. members will agree with me that, considering the very trying year the country has passed through, special thanks are due to our able minister for the skilful manner in which he has looked after the national finances, particularly in view of the very significant fact that he has been able to do so without any fresh borrowings. Another very gratifying feature is that our revenue for the year 1920-21 exceeded that of the previous fiscal year by the large sum of $83,000,000.

I recognize, Sir, that great freedom of debate is allowed to hon. members when speaking on the Budget, but I must say that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) last night exceeded, in my humble opinion at any rate, the usual bounds of courtesy and failed to maintain that high standard of debate which is associated with our deliberations when he took up the time of this House by reading imaginary letters evolved from his peculiarly fertile brain. If the hon. member in taking this course had refrained from connecting the names of ministers of the Crown holding two of the most important portfolios in the Government, no one in this House would have taken any exception to the playful diversion that appears to appeal to the hon. member in writing imaginary letters. But I want to say that your Honour very properly described the action of the hon. member last night when you reminded him that it was in very bad taste.

I am sorry that the hon. member is not in his seat at the present time. I am satisfied that he had an ulterior motive when he wrote those imaginary letters. I do not consider that it was either good taste or good political tactics for the hon. member to weave together the letter of the hon. Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore), the reply of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and his imaginary letter that was supposed to have been written by me as Minister of Marine and Fisheries to my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy). I can imagine that when the general election is on certain politicians of a peculiar type will take care on the hustings all over the country to say: If you will turn to the pages of Hansard you will find first of all the letter of the Minister of Customs, then the reply of the right hon. Prime Minister, and also a letter written by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the Minister of Public Works. And what will follow? The usual declaration, that these men occupying the treasury benches are making an unfair use of their power in trying to influence business to the companies that they may happen to be connected with.

I find it difficult, Sir, to keep within the bounds of parliamentary language in referring to an incident that has never before occurred in this House, and I am sure will never be repeated. Aside from the hon. member for Brome, I do not think there is a single gentleman in this House who would have invented such an imaginary letter and placed it on the pages of Hansard. It is true that I am a director of various companies, and I have on a previous occasion stated to this House that I have no apology to make for holding those positions, for necessarily a business man must be a member of several boards of directors. But I want to point out to my hon. friend from Brome that two of the companies that he credits me in this imaginary letter with being a director of are companies in which I have no such control. Therefore his imagination led him astray in this instance. Sir, I have already taken up too much of the valuable time of this House in referring to the tactics of my hon. friend from Brome. Such tactics are beneath the contempt of every hon. member, and therefore I shall refrain from making any further allusion to them.

In connection with this incident, however, Mr. Speaker, I think it is the duty of this House to so amend the rules that in the future we may have no recurrence of this practice of producing imaginary letters. As I have already stated, I do not know of any other hon. member who would be so lacking in good taste as to follow in the steps of the hon. member for Brome, but at the same time the rules of the House should not allow such imaginary letters to be officially recorded on the pages of Hansard with the names of ministers of the Crown attached thereto.

Now, Sir, I desire to pass from that to the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). No man holds the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in higher esteem than I do; he is a man very highly thought of in this House and throughout the country. There was a time when he and I could see eye to eye on the matter of the tariff, but in these days our views are, of course, totally divergent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member for Quebec East says, "Hear, hear." But I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that my views have not changed; those of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's have. I was somewhat amused to hear the veteran statesman, speaking officially for hon. gentlemen opposite, voice his disappointment that the Government had not seen fit to revise the tariff, and express the view that a general revision should have taken place at this session. I was reminded of the speeches of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I recall, as all hon. gentlemen do, his statements in this House and outside of the House that the Government hold no mandate from the people; that we have no right to change the tariff. Yet in his speech yesterday the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's expressed deep regret at the decision of the Government not to make any general revision of the tariff.

I was surprised also at the remarks made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's with regard to free trade. As was evident to every hon. member on this side, he skilfully baited his hook with the very best bait he could get and dangled it for some time in front of our friends of the Agrarian group. He said: "I am a free trader as far as theory goes." He appealed to them and said: "You think you are free traders, but you are not. What is the use of thinking any longer that you are a free trade group? After all, there is a great similarity between the Agrarian party in this House and the party to which I belong." But Sir, I find it difficult to reconcile the arguments of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's with the speeches that have been delivered in this House and outside by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), leader of the Agrarian party and by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). Every one will agree that the hon. member for Red Deer is an out-and-out free trader. He has never hidden his light under a bushel; in this House and everywhere he speaks he says that he is a pronounced free trader of the Cobden type. The leader of the Agrarian party, the hon. member for Marquette, is equally a pronounced free trader, except that he is of a somewhat more prudent turn of mind; instead of cutting off the heads of the protectionist voters in this country at one fell swoop he is in favour of a slow, lingering death. But so far as the abolition of protection is concerned his views are identical with those of the hon. member for Red Deer. I need not dwell further on that subject; we accept the free trade sentiments so eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer and by the hon. member for Marquette, and we realize that if they ever reach power they will wipe out every vestige of protection and carry out the policies that they have enunciated. But, Sir, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's made another statement yesterday which differs a little from the views which he has enunciated in the past. Referring to the establishment of new industries and the investment of new capital in this country, he said:

> If there are any people in Canada who are contemplating the establishment of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary, I do them a friendly service when I say: "Don't do it," because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection, again, I advise him not to come. I say, Sir, that the policy of indiscriminate fostering of industries in that way, without regard to economic conditions, is not a sound one.

Those are the words of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, speaking in this House yesterday. But let us look at the words to which he gave utterance when speaking on the Budget on May 18, 1920. His remarks will be found on page 2505 of Hansard of that year. Here is what he had to say then about infant industries:

> Now, I would be always willing to help an infant industry if I were sure that when the infant grew up it would accept the full responsibility of manhood.

Further on he says:

> I repeat, I would willingly help an infant industry, and as between protection and bounties, I think I would prefer the bounties.

I think all will agree that the views of the hon. member as expressed last year on the Budget, so far as new industries are concerned, are diametrically opposed to those which he now expresses. I have very often heard hon. gentlemen who compose the Agrarian group say that they are against the policy of protection but that a still more vicious system is that of bounties; yet the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's stated last year in this House that he was in favour of bounties. Then he went on to point out—and I do not disagree with him—the beneficial results which accrued through the granting of bounties to the iron and steel industry by the government of which he was a member.

The policy of the party to which I have the honour to belong is well-known; under our young, able, progressive, and distinguished leader we stand four-square in this House and from the Atlantic to the Pacific on the policy of moderate protection. We believe in a policy that will not only keep all the industries going which we now have, but will induce new capital to come to this country. We favour the establishment of all the new industries that it is possible for us to induce to come here. They will be treated fairly. We will not give them a tariff "as high as Haman's gallows," nor do we stand for or believe in free trade. But we do believe in the policy of moderate protection, and so long as we occupy the seats of office we will do our very best to encourage new industries to come in. And I know of no country which offers the same golden opportunities to capital and to business men as this country in which we have the good fortune to live. Especially is that true with regard to my own province. We have a quiet, law-abiding people; we have a splendid labour market; we have good water-powers. While all the provinces of Canada offer excellent opportunities for the establishment of new industries, there is none better than the good old province of Quebec that I have the honour to represent in this House.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's expressed regret that the Government had accepted from Great Britain the free gift of one modern oil-burning light cruiser, two destroyers and two submarines. He went on to state that, in these days of peace and in view of the sentiment of the country in favour of economy—which he thought was not being exercised by the Government, but which is—we were not warranted in accepting these ships from the Mother Country. He stated that they were a white elephant on the hands of the Government and the people of Canada. I stated very plainly in this House last year, and I reiterate the statement now, that we are not increasing, nor have we increased, the naval expenditure of this country by one copper. We are carrying out, as regards naval affairs, the policy that was placed upon the statute books of Canada by the passing of the Naval Service Act in the year 1910. What did we do? We said that it would not be right to continue to spend a sum of money equal to what we are spending now (two and a half million dollars) on old, obsolete ships—the old Niobe, thirty years of age, tied up to the dock at Halifax, not able to go to sea, costing the people of this country $450,000 a year; and the Rainbow, another ship twenty-five years old, also absolutely obsolete, tied up to the dock at Esquimalt, costing this country $275,000 a year. This Government saw fit to reorganize the naval service and we have done so; we have put it on an efficient basis; we have done away with 782 naval ratings and civilians that we did not need. We have done all without a single increase in expenditure. Where, then, does the "white elephant" come in? The "white elephant" would have come in if we had continued to spend the money, which we are now spending on a small efficient navy, by keeping these old obsolete ships at Halifax and Esquimalt. Therefore, while some hon. members think the naval question may be of political advantage throughout the country, I want to make it very clear this afternoon that we are carrying out the policy that was put on the statute book in 1910. We are not increasing the naval expenditure by one dollar. We have accepted, as a free gift from the Mother Country—and we thank her for it—the splendid new modern ships that she has given us. While our navy is small, and while I think we are spending a sufficient amount of money at the present time on the Naval Service, this Parliament and the people have the satisfaction of knowing that what we have is a credit to the country and efficient in every way, and that instead of our having a "white elephant" on our hands by accepting these ships, the reverse is the case. We would have had a "white elephant" on our hands had we carried on the inefficient, poor service that we had and the obsolete ships that were lying at the docks of Halifax and Esquimalt.

I will refer just for a moment to our Agrarian friends—I prefer the name "Agrarian"; I do not favour calling hon. members opposite the Farmers' party, because we are aware that the large majority of farmers in this country from coast to coast do not share the radical ideas of hon. members of that party who sit in this House. Therefore, any remarks that I have to make this afternoon, I want it very clearly understood, apply to the radical Agrarian group that is in this House and the people, especially in the western provinces, who follow that group. The large majority of farmers of this country want stable government; they want a moderate policy of protection, and hon. members will ascertain that in a more convincing way when the general elections take place.

Mr. CAHILL: When will they take place?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I know the hon. member is not in any hurry for the elections.

Mr. CAHILL: Yes, I am.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience, I will promise him an election probably in the year 1923, and possibly in the fall of 1922.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in his seat. I always read his speeches with a great deal of interest and I entertain a very high regard for him. I have the famous policy of the Agrarian party in my hand, and I read there a severe condemnation of the protective tariff. The leader of the Agrarian party, of course, wants to wipe out the tariff; but for the information of hon. members and of the country, because the farmers of this country are taking a keen interest in public affairs now, and while they know what policy this party to the right of the Speaker stands for, they are anxious to know how the hon. member for Marquette proposes to make up the revenue of $163,000,000 that we now derive from customs duty, after he has wiped away every vestige of protection, I hope, when he speaks on the Budget in this House, he will explain how he proposes to raise that amount of revenue. It is only a business proposition that I am putting up to him that he should give the House that information. I recognize that, a couple of years ago, he had some ways and means that he has now discarded entirely. We do not hear any more from the hon. member for Marquette about a land tax, neither do we hear anything from him about succession dues. Therefore, when he rises to speak, as he surely will, on this Budget, I know that he will endeavour to tell the House how he proposes to get the revenue to take care of the expenditure of the country, and particularly the revenue of $163,000,000 at present derived from the customs tariff. When the hon. member for Marquette was speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I heard him make a very extraordinary statement. He said that to his mind there was no reason why the manufacturers of Canada in like business should not compete with the manufacturers of the United States. Being a business man like himself, I was interested and somewhat surprised to hear him make that most extraordinary statement. The hon. member knows that if we had in this country a market of 110,000,000 people, if our turnover was as great as the turnover of similar industries in the United States, of course, Canadians would be able to compete successfully with our American neighbours. But the hon. member for Marquette must know that when an industry is in operation, the cost of production depends upon the turnover. Therefore, it is a very unfair statement to make that Canadian manufacturers, with a limited market, with keen competition, in a country with a population of less than 9,000,000 people and an output so much smaller than that of our American friends, should be able to compete with American manufacturers on even terms. The tariff policy for Canada is the one enunciated by the right hon. the Prime Minister. We want to maintain a moderate protective tariff. The United States since the Civil War has maintained, not a moderate protective tariff, but a very high protective tariff. On this side of the House we are not in favour of a high tariff, but we believe that to make Canada great, in agriculture, in mining, in finance, in manufacturing, and all the other vocations of life, we must maintain a moderate protective tariff in this country. That tariff is not intended solely for, and does not serve only, those who are engaged in dustrial life; it serves equally every citizen of Canada, no matter what his vocation in life may be.

I pass from our Agrarian friends to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have heard enunciated on more than one occasion the fiscal policy on which the hon. gentleman was elected leader of his party at the National Liberal Convention in this city in August, 1919, but for the sake of continuity in my remarks I crave the indulgence of the House while I place that fiscal policy on the pages of Hansard. It is as follows:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of Customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, milling, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from Customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.
> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.
> And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

I think it is only fair that when the hon. leader of the Opposition rises in his place in this House to speak on the Budget, he should tell us in very clear terms that he absolutely stands behind this platform on which he was elected. On this side of the House we also expect hon. gentlemen opposite to get up in turn and say that they stand for this fiscal policy that I have just read. Let us for a moment just look at what would happen if such a misfortune occurred as hon. gentlemen opposite being returned to power. Business is extremely depressed at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am glad, in a way, to hear my hon. friends say, "hear, hear." There is a special reason for business being depressed at the present time. All business men know that we are now in this year 1921, for the first time in the readjustment period for business since the war. Every manufacturer, every wholesaler, every retailer, throughout this country has large stocks of raw material and finished goods on hand. These goods could be replaced to-day at half their original cost, and consequently business men are not going to make very much profit, if any at all, this year. Then the stocks which had become depleted throughout the world have been replenished, and as a consequence Canada, in common with all other nations of the world, feels the depression through which we are passing at the present time. But we have this consolation in this country. Canada is standing this period of depression better than any other country that I know of. The United States is feeling it even more than Canada; the United Kingdom and all the other countries of Europe are feeling it more than we are. In this period of depression my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and those who sit behind him say: We solemnly pledge that if we are returned to power we will do two things immediately—there will be a general revision of the present tariff, and we will increase the British preference from 33⅓ to 50 per cent. I wonder how my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is going to square himself with his electors on that policy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Don't worry.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The constituency of Quebec East, which my hon. friend represents in this House, is teeming with boot and shoe factories. Now, one of the planks of the platform of the Liberal party which I have just read is that there shall be substantial reductions in the duties on footwear. Therefore, the boot and shoe manufacturers of Quebec East, along with the boot and shoe manufacturers of the rest of Canada, who are already suffering so much from business depression, would not only be placed in a very much worse position if hon. gentlemen opposite should reach the seats of power, but in my judgment, they would be put completely out of business.

Then, how would our great woollen and cotton manufacturers in the province of Quebec and the other provinces of Canada fare with a sweeping reduction of the present tariff and an increase in the British preference from 33⅓ to 50 per cent? When the leader of the Opposition went down to the city of Montreal, the commercial metropolis of Canada, he never said a word about this fiscal policy of his; I read his speech very, very carefully. He went down to a love-feast there, at which a great banquet was tendered to the ex-Prime Minister of Quebec, Sir Lomer Gouin, and all that the leader of the Opposition had to say on the tariff question was this—that he wanted a new representation in the House of Commons. I would have expected my hon. friend, speaking in the great manufacturing and commercial city of Montreal, to have said that the policy of the National Liberal and Conservative party of moderate protection was a false one, and that the policy which I have read, which was adopted by the Liberal party in convention in this city in 1919, was the policy for this country. I would have expected him to say: When we get into power we will make sweeping reductions in the tariff, and increase the British preference to 50 per cent, and I will show you how that will increase the population of the city of Montreal and benefit the great manufacturing and commercial institutions of this city. But my hon. friend had nothing whatever to say about the tariff, except what I have stated. However, when he got to the sunny slopes of the Pacific he made quite a different speech. Speaking in the city of Victoria, on September 27, 1920, he said:

> That brings me to the policy of the Liberal party as respects the revision of the tariff. We believe that the time has come, indeed, that it is already long passed, when a downward revision of the tariff is necessary. In this revision we believe should be substantial reductions of the duties on the necessities of life. In other words, on these articles which go to make the food, the clothing, the shelter of the Canadian people; that certain specific articles required for the purpose of consumption, and other articles essential to production, should be placed upon the free list.

That is the speech of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he was out in the West touring the Prairie Provinces, but it was not the speech which he delivered on the tariff question in the Peterborough election, or when he was in the city of Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask from what paper my hon. friend is quoting?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I have not the name of the paper from which I have read this extract, but I can quote another journal. My hon. friend wrote an article for Maclean's Magazine, published on January 15, 1921, stating the same views in pretty nearly the same words. Now, I think it is only fair that my protectionist friends from the province of Quebec should tell their constituencies and this House whether or not they endorse the new fiscal policy which is now proclaimed by the Liberal party. The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Euler), went down to my city a few weeks ago, and in speaking before the Reform club, he came out flat-footed for the policy of protection; and, I believe, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), was down there last year and also delivered a protectionist speech. The hon. member for Maisonneuve —Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), also makes protectionist speeches. In view of these facts, I think it is only fair to their leader, and to the loyalty which I am sure they all bear him, that they should give him their united support on this policy and declare that they believe, not in the Laurier fiscal policy, but in the King policy; and in all their constituencies throughout the province of Quebec they should state what they are going to do in regard to the tariff. In this connection, I desire to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh, but I want to say for the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville that he is more of a true Laurier Liberal than any of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: He stands by the principles of that great statesman, not only on matters of fiscal policy, but also on questions connected with all the other old and well-known policies of the Liberal party. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, I say, is more of a true Laurier Liberal than hon. gentlemen who occupy seats opposite me now under their new leader. Why did the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville leave his party? The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), using his great imaginative powers, suggested that I had been fishing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Well, let me say that I would have considered 4 p.m. it an honour had I been able to land such a splendid fish as the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friends opposite know perfectly well that the hon. member in question left them because he did not believe in this new fiscal policy. He knew that it was not the policy of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier; he knew that it was not the policy of the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), who had been Minister of Finance for fifteen years. The member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, in his own eloquent way, informed us that when this celebrated convention was held in Ottawa in August, 1919, he disapproved of and dissented from the policy then laid down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am quite prepared to accept the words of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville. That hon. gentleman left the present Liberal party because its fiscal policy is not the fiscal policy of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier; it is a teetotally different policy, not only in regard to the tariff, but in a great many other ways; and if an hon. member in this House is conscientiously of the opinion that his old associates have renounced the policy upon which they were elected, and to which they adhered for fifteen years, while they were in power, surely in this free Parliament and country, no one can find fault with him for leaving the party, and taking up his stand in No Man's Land.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am glad to find my hon. friends in such a jovial frame of mind. Now, for the first time since 1917, owing to the regrettable death of the late member for Yamaska, there is a vancancy in Quebec, that county is open. For the first time since 1917 the electors of the county of Yamaska, in the province of Quebec, are going to show what they think of the hon. leader of the Opposition and those who are behind him. They are going to register their votes as to whether or not they agree with that party's fiscal policy. I do not claim to be very much of a prophet—

Mr. DUFF: No, that it right.

Mr. BALLANTYNE:—but I venture the assertion that on May 29—and I trust that the House will be in session at least until that time—hon. members opposite will not be as jubilant as they are to-day, unless all the information that reaches me is absolutely wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: You are premature.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If my hon. friends will just possess their souls in patience—

Mr. DUFF: Why do not you?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Any hon. member who desires to interrupt the hon. member will please do the House the courtesy of rising in his place and asking permission to put any question he wishes to have answered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is there a candidate in the county of Yamaska representing the Government?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Certainly, Mr. Mondou is the Government's candidate. Now, I know that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) does not like to hear these truths about the province of Quebec. I have the honour to represent the province of Quebec in this House—

Mr. DUFF: You do not do any such thing; you do not represent Quebec.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If at this late date the member for Lunenburg does not know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and myself, two ministers of the Crown, represent in this House the entire province of Quebec—

Mr. DUFF: No, sir; oh, no.

Mr. BALLANTYNE:—and not only the province of Quebec but the Dominion of Canada at large—

Mr. DUFF: Is that so?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend seems to think that cabinet ministers are elected to represent merely the constituencies that return them to the House.

Mr. DUFF: Certainly.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not at all; every minister of the Crown represents the Dominion as a whole, and if my hon. friend does not know that, I am very glad indeed to inform him now.

Mr. DUFF: The province of Quebec, then, is poorly represented.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member can only ask a question with the permission of the member who has the floor, any other utterances is an infringement of the rules of the House.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to say that although I speak the English tongue and my good friends opposite, who represent the province of Quebec in this House, speak the French language—

Mr. BUREAU: We speak the English language also.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: —nevertheless, I have the same privileges on the floor of the House as they have, and when I come here I speak for the province of Quebec, which I have the honour to represent in this House. Hon. members from the province of Quebec have talked a great deal about the isolation of that province—they say the Government is isolated by reason of there being no representation from Quebec in the Cabinet. Well, I want to say, with a fairly good knowledge of the province, that the people of Quebec do not display any antagonism towards this Government and do not wish to isolate it. The only isolation that does exist is the political isolation, that exists here, the political "bloc" that now represents the province in this House. All the efforts of my hon. friends opposite are going to be concentrated on the maintenance of that "bloc." Read the speeches of hon. gentleman opposite who have been in Yamaska county recently. Not a word shall we find there about the fiscal policy, or the railway policy, or any of the big problems that are confronting Canada at the present time. No, their efforts are concentrated, as we all knew they would be, on the maintenance of the present "Liberal bloc." I will not read to the House what these hon. gentlemen are saying. I have always been opposed to saying anything that would hurt the feelings of any race or creed in Canada, and I am going to continue that policy. I admire the French people, I admire their language and their religion, and while I am in public life I will never make a speech, either in this House or out of it, on racial or religious questions. If this Government cannot carry Yamaska county without raising the ghost of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and talking about racial and religious questions then, as far as I am concerned, we are prepared to lose that county. But I want to say, Sir, that Quebec does not want any condition of isolation. The people of Quebec want their full representation in this Government and, using the words of the Prime Minister, when he went to Sherbrooke and the city of Montreal on a recent occasion. "We all hope that the day is near at hand when the old province of Quebec will have her full and her complete French representation in the Government of Canada."

Mr. VIEN: After a general election.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The feeling in Quebec is changing, and my hon. friends opposite know it.

An hon. MEMBER: So you say.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I had the honour of making a political tour with the Prime Minister through the beautiful Eastern Townships. He was enthusiastically received by huge crowds of people in every town he visited, including the city of Sherbrooke. Not only that, but the French-Canadian mayors of the various towns visited, in accordance with the customary courtesy of the French people, not only gave him a most enthusiastic welcome but, everywhere he went, presented him with illuminated addresses in both English and French. In the drill hall in the city of Sherbrooke the Prime Minister was welcomed by a crowd of something like 7,000 people—the building was packed to the doors. Leaving that city and coming to my own city of Montreal a banquet was there tendered to the Prime Minister by the citizens generally of that commercial metropolis, and not by the members of any political party. Over 700 people crowded into the banqueting hall on that occasion, there was not even standing room left, and it was most gratifying to the Prime Minister and myself that the large majority of those in attendance were of the French-Canadian race. What does that mean? That means that any unfortunate feeling that may have been created during the stress of war has passed away. In the province of Quebec there are, of course, large numbers of Conservatives. The people of Quebec are a protectionist people, they do not believe in free trade, they do not believe in increasing the British preference to fifty per cent. They are intensely interested in stable government. They have a distinct leaning towards the party in power that stands for the policy of moderate protection; and difficult as the task may be in that province I can say, in all friendliness to my hon. friends opposite, that when the next general election is over there will be no repetition of the results of 1917—that out of 65 seats 62 Liberals were elected and only 3 members on this side of the House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Let us have an election, then.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend from Chambly-Vercheres will get an election in due time, and when that election is over there will be very much larger representation of good French Canadians from the province of Quebec on this side of the House than there is at the present time. To use the words of the hon. member for Red Deer my hon. friends opposite from the province of Quebec are something like Admiral Nelson—they always put the glass to the blind eye. They fraternize one with the other and can see nothing but victory ahead for themselves—they can see nothing but the maintenance of this "Quebec bloc." One of the sheep has jumped over the walls of the pen and is wandering loose at the present time; in spite of that however they are confident they can maintain the "Quebec bloc." As to that let me quote from the greatest French Canadian paper in the province of Quebec, a journal that is published and printed in my own city, La Presse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What was the price of the sale?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very much gratified to hear the derisive remarks that now come from hon. gentlemen opposite. For years and years nothing they could say was too good for La Presse. They now think we have bought that paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Let me say to my hon. friends that such has not occurred. No influence, direct, or indirect has been brought to bear upon La Presse. On the contrary the astute proprietor of that journal sees the unfortunate condition of the province of Quebec resulting from the maintenance of the policy of stupid isolation that my hon. friends opposite would like to see maintained, and so La Presse, with a daily circulation of over 140,000, represents the true expression of opinion of the French Canadian people in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will not read the whole of the editorial to which I have reference. Doubtless, as my hon. friends opposite used to take such great pleasure in reading La Presse in the fighting times when it was standing up for the Liberal party, I am sure they would like me to read the whole of the editorial. Now this is what La Presse says:

> In view of these facts there can be but one logical conclusion:—
> Let us preserve an economic regime which has proved itself so splendidly beneficial, and let us continue protection which is the basis of that regime.
> "La Presse" which, ever since its foundation, has never ceased to be the convinced and determined champion of the principle of protection, in the presence of such evident confirmation of the justness of its attitude, remains more than ever convinced that it is essential for the future of Canada to maintain this principle of protection as the basis of our tariff policy.
> It is not at this time, when, owing to the universal upheaval caused by the war in the economic field, any error may have disastrous consequences for Canada, that one can reasonably think of abandoning a principle which offers such guarantees for the future. Let us not abandon realities for dreams.

Those opinions are the opinions of the majority of the people from the province from which I come—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: —and I want to say to hon. members who come from other parts of Canada that I am glad of this opportunity to exhibit to them this other picture from the province of Quebec, and to tell them something about Quebec which hon. members opposite would not deem it to be in their best interests to tell.

Mr. TRAHAN: What was the date of the article from which the minister quoted?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I can give that, I have it here.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it in French.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I can do that, too, if the hon. member wishes. The date of the issue of La Presse in which that editorial appeared was January 29, 1921.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have only to state that I shall certainly register my vote against the milk-and-water amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and I am sure all my colleagues will have very great pleasure in also voting against it. Let me repeat, the party to your right, Sir, has a clearly defined fiscal policy of moderate protection. And I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will tell the House that they stand behind their leader and will support the fiscal policy on which he was elected.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like on rising to re-echo very emphatically and very sincerely the words of my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Ballantyne) when I understood him to express the hope that we may carry on our fiscal and other controversies without mixing them up with echoes of the war or with those very much more detestable controversies that have been connected with our race and creed. I will not follow my hon. friend in his piscatorial exploits, neither will I follow him in his prophesy on by-elections. Personally I feel on much safer ground in thinking of the by-elections that are just over than I do in dwelling on the problematical result of those that are yet to come. I may refer to two or three points that my hon. friend has raised in regard to the real fiscal controversies that gather around the Budget, and I hope he will excuse me if I do not follow the general run of his speech.

Mr. Speaker, I think the country is to be congratulated upon the fact that the Budget of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and the amendment that has been moved by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) raised a very clear and unmistakable issue for Parliament and the country. Nothing has amused me more from time to time in this House than when some hon. members opposite have seemed to assume that in following the economic doctrines of Adam Smith, Bright and Cobden I have been presenting in my humble way to this House and the country something of an ancient date, while protection is of comparatively modern origin. Now, I should like any hon. gentlemen opposite who labour under that delusion to allow me to remind them that quite casually in the Wealth of Nations, which was published in 1776, Adam Smith remarks that the term "customs" is in all probability derived from the fact that tariffs have been the customary method of raising revenue from time immemorial. So that tariffs were very old one hundred and fifty years ago. I do not know whether my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is aware that, equally casually, Adam Smith in his great work remarks that the manufacturers of Holland had been ruined in his day by taxes on the necessaries of life. With this little piece of history I am led to observe that a Tory minister in an ultra-Tory administration therefore is quite properly occupied when he adopts these ancient devices as his mainstays, throws every pretense to the winds and arrays himself in the fiscal rags of pure, unadulterated Toryism.

The country was prepared in some measure for this attitude on the part of my hon. friend by what I hope I may venture, without offence, to term the pristine innocence of his fiscal mind as revealed in some addresses he gave to the ladies of Toronto and Montreal. He made the inquiry in both of those addresses, I think: What is the matter with Canadian strawberries? Well, if I had been in the audience I should have said: There is nothing the matter with Canadian strawberries, except that they resemble my hon. friend's Budget in being a little late in making their appearance. He backed up his first question to the ladies by asking: Cannot you wait? That query, Mr. Speaker, would have been all right before the invention of the locomotive. But the locomotive has been in use for 109 years, and the simple reason why the ladies should not wait, let me tell my hon. friend, is that the locomotive, so to speak, beats the sun. We can use the locomotive to get American strawberries before the sun gives enough heat in this part of the world, which is farther north, to bring our strawberries to ripeness. And honestly I cannot undestand the frame of mind of my hon. friend. Certainly it was not benevolent towards the ladies when they come out of the long winter to want them to cut off from themselves the refreshing and succulent berry that they can get a little earlier from the United States than in our own climate.

I do not know whether my hon. friend is aware that last autumn the reverse process took place. Does he know that Americans then bought whole vineyards of Canadian grapes? I do not know why their purchases were so extensive unless under prohibition they were establishing private stills to a very great extent down there. In any case, the fact is as I state. Now, would my hon. friend repeat that argument about strawberries in this House? The international boundary is punctured at over thirty points by railways running from one country to the other. Would he have the $70,000,000 deficit on the railways wait also? I think it is a much more sensible business to carry the strawberries north in the spring and the grapes back in the fall. It is a perfect illustration of the benefits of reciprocity, and incidentaly points to a method of dealing with your railway deficit. I submit that you will not deal very well with your railroad problem by making your railroads wait for freight until the sun ripens our berries.

As I say, these are very ancient doctrines, but they have this merit, that they are an honest presentation of an old-fashioned policy, and, if anybody doubted that, he only needed to note the interesting and beatific expression on the faces of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) as they drank the pure mediaeval milk from the neophyte of fiscal paganism. My hon. friend not only nailed antediluvian Toryism in the matter of fiscal policy to the mast, so to speak, but he made it clear that there has been a final submission on the part of the party opposite to the vested protectionist interests of this country. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister made his submission a year ago. I do not want to refer further to the speech which he delivered upon that occasion except to quote a single figure to bring his education in regard to the fiscal condition of Britain up to date. Facts have been very severe with him since he made that famous speech in the Budget debate of last year. I note from the Board of Trade returns in England that British exports in the year 1919 were represented by the figure £798,-638,000. In the year 1920 they were represented by the figure £1,335,569,000. In other words, the exports of Great Britain in her last fiscal year nearly doubled those of 1919, the year in the middle of which the Prime Minister droned a solemn requiem over the supposed departed commercial glories of Great Britain. Well, I think that fact is well worth bringing out in this connection.

The Finance Minister, I say, now bends his neck to the yoke under which my right hon. friend put his neck a year ago. Both the hon. gentleman and the right hon. gentleman suffer from a fiscal disease which, for the want of a better name, I might call importophobia; they have got American exports to this country on their brains. Now, I have said again and again in this House that there is a method of preventing what is called the "adverse balance of trade" in our commerce with the United States. If we want to prevent that we must stop borrowing from the United States and we must discourage the investment of American capital in this country, because the two processes account for the adverse balance of trade, so-called. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many hon. gentlemen in this House noticed the other day a paragraph in a newspaper which informed us that Americans controlled 95 per cent of mining investments in Canada; 100 per cent of the pulp and paper investments in Western Canada; 75 per cent of the lumber industries and 75 per cent of the fisheries. The fact of the matter is that in the last ten years, under a government which came into power on the cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees," this country has been rapidly passing into the maw of American capital, and it is American capital invested in our industries that constitutes a large measure of the so-called adverse balance of trade. And my hon. friend the Finance Minister is not tired of the process, because in his Budget speech he said: We must have foreign capital. I cannot understand his attitude upon that question. He understands the economics of the question just as well as I do, and I cannot understand his position when at one time he mourns the excess of American imports and at another time says that we must have the foreign capital, which can only come into this country in the form of the imports which he mourns.

Well, what is the problem with which the nation is confronted at the present time? Briefly it is this: that after what my hon. friends opposite assert to have been well on to half a century of the so-called National Policy, in a country of unparalleled resources in extent and value, with only three people to the square mile, we are face to face with a national debt of $2,350,000,000—largely due to the war, let me admit with the utmost frankness; it need not have been so big if the previous Finance Minister had taxed as my hon. friend is doing, but it is largely owing to the war, nevertheless;—we have a national railway system which showed a deficit of $70,000,000 last year; we have what I am afraid is an utterly unprofitable and losing mercantile marine which has swallowed millions upon millions of the money of the people of this country; our cities are crowded with unemployed, and they are most numerous in Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto, where the shipbuilding escapades of the Government were undertaken to cure unemployment; farm products have already declined to a non-paying basis; and our foreign commerce at the moment as well as our internal trade is declining at an alarming rate. That is the condition of the country, and it is a condition that should give all thoughtful citizens pause. But there is no pause to the Government, for their cure is "more National Policy," as I shall show in a minute. Well, on the ground of ordinary common sense, I should say that if a patient has had a certain treatment for forty-three years and at the end of that period shows this lamentable condition according to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, the country would be well advised in doing what I am quite sure it is going to do at the first opportunity—try a change of doctor and a change of medicine. I repeat that the prescription of hon. gentlemen opposite for this condition is more National Policy. It is true that ostensibly the Budget presents but few tariff changes. We are told that this is no time for a tariff revision. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) laboured this point very hard yesterday. I must confess that I could not see very much in the reasons he urged for this action. A simple answer to all he said would be: If it be not an afterthought to state that the tariff is not being revised because of the unstable conditions the world over, why did you have a tariff commission going from the Atlantic to the Pacific last year?—why the waste of money? If there was to be no tariff revision there surely should not have been a tariff commission last year. That is a simple answer, and I am very much afraid that the failure to revise the tariff at this session would get a truer, as it certainly would get a better, defence if my hon. friends based it not on the instability of conditions throughout the world but on the well-recognized instability of the Government and its majority.

But is it true that we have no revision? Mr. Speaker, I think not. The Budget gives a revision of the tariff, and a very serious revision upwards. In the first place, what does the one per cent extra on all imports amount to but a raising of the tariff? It is the same operation; call it what you like, it is an increase of the import duties on goods coming into the country, and on almost all goods. There are exceptions, but it relegates quite a large number of articles to the past, as regards the free list. It is an immense increase of the tariff burdens of the people of this country. In the second place, for all practical purposes, the revision, in accordance with exchange rates, in the method of collecting of duties is also a very substantial revision of the tariff upwards. Therefore, it is not a fact to say that we have no revision of the tariff in this Budget, we have a great increase of the tariff. Whether you call these taxes tariff or sales taxes, what the people of this country are concerned to know is the real nature of these taxes and their effect upon the national disease, as I call it, which I venture to describe to this House in simple terms which no one can contradict. Whatever we may call the taxes upon which my hon. friend relies largely for his revenue, they are all taxes upon consumable commodities used by the people in this country. Let there be no mistake about that; that whether they are what are commonly called tariffs, or an increase of import sales taxes, or sales taxes imposed upon goods manufactured in the country, they are all of them taxes upon consumable commodities.

I think that a fourth-form school boy cannot fail to follow the simple process of reasoning by which the inevitable and undoubted effect of these taxes can be worked out. What is the effect of taxes upon consumable commodities? Its first and immediate effect is to raise the price of the commodity. But if it raises the price, what must of necessity be its next effect? Supposing the article in question to be a suit of clothes; supposing that before these taxes are imposed, the money that any given consumer has to spend on suits of clothes is $100—that that is what his personal Budget will allow him to spend upon clothes. If clothes could be bought for $33 a suit, clearly he could buy three suits with the $100; but if the price were by any chance raised to $50, and he had only $100 to spend upon suits, just as clearly he could buy only two suits. Therefore, the first effect of a tax upon consumable commodities for people of limited income—and that means the vast majority of the people of this country—is to increase the price; and the second, inevitably, is to limit the consumption. These are the elements of political economy which have been taught by these supposedly "obsolete" teachers for at least a century and a half. What follows inevitably on decreased consumption is decreased production. Increase the price of the consumable commodity and you decrease the consumption; decrease the consumption and you decrease the production; and if you decrease the production, you lessen the work of the workmen of the country, you increase unemployment. That is what my hon. friend confessed, in the middle of the fiscal year, that his taxes of a year ago did; it was what he was told at the time they would do, and to that extent the Government of the day in this country, where our economic problem is so simple, are, on account of their fiscal policy, as responsible for a large measure of unemployment as if they had ordered a lockout of the workmen. That is the nature of all these taxes, and that is the method of their operation.

I want to go a little further in my opposition to them and to say that taxes of this kind, whether they are tariff taxes or sales taxes, break the three main principles of taxation which all political economists of note have given their adherence to as sound principles. Taxes, in the first place, should be collected as much as possible in proportion to the ability of the taxpayer to pay. That is simple common sense. Any one who thinks for a moment will come inevitably to the conclusion that a workman who has to calculate very carefully with his wife on a Saturday night how his week's wages will provide the absolute necessaries of life for himself, his wife and his children, is not a very fit subject for heavy taxes. But these taxes place just as big a burden upon a navvy as they do upon a millionaire. They put a bigger burden upon the navvy than upon the millionaire along many lines, because the navvy wants more clothes in the hard work that he does than the millionaire. As a rule, the navvy has a bigger family than the millionaire, and he is taxed upon the articles of clothing worn not only by himself but by every member of his family down to the baby in its long clothes and its little woollen boots.

The second principle of taxation is that all taxes should be certain, and not arbitrary. If you have an income and pay an income tax, the tax is certain as to time, amount and place, according to the size of your income. But these indirect taxes are absolutely arbitrary. If you buy, you pay, and if you do not buy, you do not pay. In other words, the open-handed, free spender pays taxation; the stingy man who puts his money in the bank gets off paying taxes as regards indirect taxation to the extent that he is stingy. I do not object to any man saving, but I think we ought to have a method of taxation that takes a fair proportion of his savings for the state. Taxes ought to take out and keep out of the pockets of the taxpayer as little as possible beyond what is necessary to carry on the government of the country. In the case of all direct taxation, that is the result; for every dollar collected by income tax or succession duties goes to the Government except a few cents for expenditure in connection with the collection. But in the case of a tariff, we take two, three, four times as much from the taxpayers as the Government gets, the two hundred or three hundred extra per cent going into the pockets of those who are protected under a tariff. That, briefly, is what I have to say about the defects of the Budget so far as I see them.

I have said that a clear issue is raised by the Budget, on the one hand, and the amendment on the other. I notice that my hon friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is a little doubtful about the kind of support the amendment is likely to get on this side of the House. I think he expressed a doubt as to how far my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) and I could sail in the same boat. Well, in regard to that, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say that we sailed in the same boat on reciprocity ten years ago, and we shall sail in the same boat on this amendment. I do not care to speculate any further than the present moment in my history and the history of my hon. friend. But why should the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce see such a difficulty in reconciling what he considers moderate divergencies of opinion? I recall that ten years ago this spring, he delivered a speech in the reciprocity debate, and was immediately followed, in a contrary sense, by the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie); but they now seem to sit very comfortably in the same Cabinet so far as their personal relations are concerned, though I am bound to say that external evidences from time to time show that they are both afflicted with a similar apprehension as to the results in an election which now cannot long be postponed. A more recent case of reconciliation than that occurs to me. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, with what I am sure is a grim sense of humour which he manages to hide most of the time—for he is a very serious-minded man—when he went west took with him my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and he took him west for the very specific purpose of making him toe the line on tariff matters—and he did some line toeing, all right. No doubt it was not difficult, because he saw a light, either before the journey or on the journey. The Prime Minister got the truth into him, and he toed the mark. I have an opinion, Mr. Speaker, that he did not see much light. What really happened to him was that he was led into a swamp by a fire-fly. But the fact that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization met with an accident of that kind furnishes a very small obstacle in the way of an energetic Highland Scotchman nimbly jumping into the light of the sun; and while I cannot congratulate the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, I congratulate myself and my friend hon. (Mr. McKenzie) that for the moment at any rate we are getting along all right. This is a first-rate amendment, and I think the betting is good that my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria will support it.

Now I want to examine the amendment just a little, because with the Budget it raises, as I say, a very distinct issue for the people of this country. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, with a courage and honesty which I think has done a great service to the public life of Canada, has left the people in no doubt as to where he stands on fiscal matters. He stands on the principle of protection. With equal benefit to honest politics in this country, an amendment has been produced on this Budget which is in disagreement with the principle of protection. It challenges the principle of protection.

Mr. CURRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no "hear, hears" opposite.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): But the amendment is there, and it challenges the principle of protection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wait till you hear what they say.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): It cannot be otherwise coming from an Opposition to this Government, because, as I said in a previous debate this session, the principle of protection is typical Toryism. What is the principle of protection? Stated briefly, it is that the consumers of the country without exception should be taxed for the building up in a specific case of a single industry. That is most specific Toryism, according to the whole history of the creed. Why, when the name Liberal was first introduced into the politics of the Old Country, what were the political conflicts of the time? It was about the year 1828 when the term was first applied to the party of progress in the Old Country. And what was happening at that time? The Tory party was engaged in its congenial occupation of defending the privileges of the few and resisting the rights of the many. In the year 1828 the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. These Acts, which had stood for generations upon the statute books of Great Britain, declared that men should not be members of corporations or attend the public universities unless they were members of a given church, and that church the Church of England. But progressive thought said: You have no right to put disabilities upon the great masses of people who do not think with you religiously. And the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. In the next year the fight was on Catholic Emancipation. It is well to go back to the old history books occasionally just to know what the fight has been for progress in this world. In 1829 Catholic Emancipation was carried in the Old Country. It is difficult to believe that before that time, less than one hundred years ago, the people of the dominant church and the dominant party had said that no man who was a Catholic should have civil rights in Great Britain.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is Toryism.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That was Toryism in 1829.

Mr. CURRIE: It was a Tory Government that repealed that Act. Yes, it was. What are you talking about?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): It was a Tory leader that repealed the Corn laws against the votes of his own party. If my hon. friend wants to stand on that ground, he will take political kudos out of the fact that he himself was elected in the year 1911 for refusing free wheat, because afterwards his leader gave free wheat. The people who carry reforms are not the people who come in at the finish when popular opinion can no longer be resisted, but the people from generation to generation who fight for them against the Tories. Before the year 1832 there were boroughs in England with five people electing two members to Parliament, at the dictation of a duke. Liberal and progressive thought said: This is an iniquity; we will have a Reform Bill. And they carried a Reform Bill against the Tories of that day. In 1846, it is true, Sir Robert Peel carried the repeal of the Corn laws, but in doing it he paid a tribute to Cobden, which I put on Hansard two years ago, as magnificent as a magnanimous man can pay to the real reformer in the case. I do not know whether such a magnanimous tribute is lost or not on my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). In 1867, against the determined resistance of Toryism, or rather of a Tory leader, the workingmen in the boroughs of England were given the vote. Again, my hon. friend would claim that in history it was the Tories that fought for it. Every one knows that the opposite is the truth; but that is the general character of my hon. friend's beliefs. In 1885, the franchise was extended to people of the counties, through the same progressive and liberal influences; and in 1892, incomparably the greatest statesman of the nineteenth century would have saved us from the horrors we meet with in reading our papers morning by morning, in connection with Ireland, by giving a moderate degree of Home Rule to that distracted land. That the policy was right is conceded to-day by those who opposed it at the time. There has been no finer tribute to a dead statesman than was uttered by Lord Curzon, a blue blood of the blue bloods, a Tory of the Tories, when he rose the other day in his place in the House of Lords and said: "I am afraid Your Lordships' House was not wise in regard to previous Home Rule Bills." There is something pathetic about historic Toryism, Mr. Speaker. It is always dying in the last ditch for a forlorn hope, and that is what is being done, I am sorry to say, by one who should be broader at his time of life in regard to this principle of extreme protection in Canada. This is regrettable; it is pathetic to see an antediluvian at 45 years of age. I have said this much in illustration of what Toryism is, and what Protection is; they are interchangeable so far as fiscal matters are concerned. Toryism is always looking after God's chosen few—and they are the few. On the tariff, your typical Tory in Canada says: "Wheat, of course, is the article you produce in abundance, and it would pay the national debt; but in my riding they grow tomatoes." And even my hon. friend the Minister of Finance gave an illustration of Toryism. He said that butter was the thing. But we shall not pay our national debt by exports of butter and tomatoes; we cannot pay the national debt with surplus tomatoes and surplus butter. Yet that is the attitude of Toryism; look after the tomatoes, never mind the abundant wealth of wheat and cattle produced on your boundless acres in Western Canada.

There are three great needs, in my judgment, for this country at the present time,—and I am avoiding, I think every one will admit who listens to me, the party talk that has somewhat prominently characterized the speeches which I have heard in this debate since the first two were delivered. The first great and urgent need of this country at the present moment is to increase its trade. Now, I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has said that a big trade is not always characterized by prosperity, or words to that effect. I do not want to misrepresent him. He said he would not base too strong an argument for the profitableness of trade merely on its bulk. Well, I think my hon. friend is wrong in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, and I am not sure that the hundredth would not be doubtful. May I give my hon. friend a simple illustration of the point? Why were we prosperous in this country during the war? Not because men were killing one another. We were prosperous because we had a big international trade; that was undoubtedly the source of our prosperity. We were producing tremendous surpluses under the extreme pressure of the needs of the war, and we had a big international trade and were prosperous, beyond the dreams of avarice in some cases. And so it has always been. Does my hon. friend contend that little business is a sign of prosperity, whether it be a firm or a nation in question? As a rule, big business means great prosperity, and we like business to be good. Why, the manufacturers of Eastern Canada at this moment know which side their bread is buttered on, and they are looking now to the West and wondering how much acreage is going to be placed under cultivation this year. Why? Because they know that a big production, followed by a big sale of western wheat, means prosperity for the whole country. And there is no gainsaying that, as a general principle. So that, as I say, increased trade, and especially increased foreign trade, is the first great need of Canada at the present time.

5 p.m.

Now, my hon. friend mentioned the home market in that connection; that was where he got the butter argument. He told us about our eating most of our butter at home. Well, if we had no market abroad, poverty would accompany our efforts, and not prosperity. What is the use of talking to the farmers of Canada about the home market? We produce in Western Canada, some years, 300,000,000 bushels of wheat, of which we consume 60,000,000. What would you do with the surplus 240,000,000 bushels if you had no foreign market? How would you dispose of that surplus if you did not take proper steps to get it into the markets of the world? In New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island they grow the finest potatoes in the world, but they use only five per cent of their own product, and even the people of York-Sunbury cannot get up in the night and eat potatoes when they are electioneering. These provinces use only five per cent of their own product, and it is absolutely vital to their interests that ever possible step should be taken to get the markets of New England for their surplus potatoes. That is common sense. Over the rest of Canada, nearly everywhere, the people grow potatoes for their own use, and that is not a particularly difficult trick. Even I, who am a very "mixed farmer" to begin with, made a success of potato growing from the start, and I grow a surplus every year to seed the garden with the next year. But in these provinces they grow largely in excess of their consumption and their prosperity depends absolutely upon disposing profitably of that surplus. And that is another excellent illustration of the value of the reciprocity pact upon which we voted the other day. I do not want to labour that point further.

Mr. CURRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: But in regard to some of my hearers, it might be possible to get a simple figure into their heads, and I should like to tell my hon. friend from North Simcoe that if he is not, I am, alarmed by the fact that in the month of March our foreign trade declined in this country by nearly $100,000,000. Now, it makes a very great difference to this nation at the present moment, in the face of a fact like that, whether our policy is directed to increasing our foreign trade or decreasing it. I have proved, by quotations from the fathers that appeal to the common sense of every man who gives an unbiased attention to what I said, that the effect of the Government's taxes is to decrease consumption, to decrease production, and they will inevitably decrease foreign trade also; and I shall support the amendment because in my humble judgment it points the road to an exactly opposite line of policy.

The second great need of our people at the present time is to reduce the cost of living—we are all agreed about that. I know my hon. friend the Minister of Militia said, in what I think was a weak moment the other night, that a cheap country is not a good country to live in. Well that is all very well—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did my hon. friend, in giving his figures of the reduction of the March trade, mean to say that our trade in March this year was one hundred millions less than our trade last year?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is aware that our duty this year is 7½ per cent less than it was last year.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The duty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The tariff is 7½ per cent less this year than last year.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): What has that to do with the case? I was not talking about duties, I was talking about the total trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not indicate that we would not increase our trade by reducing the tariff still further?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Of course the reduction of a tariff is not an act of magic. It takes a little time to go into operation, it takes a little time to have effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has been in operation a year.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well my hon. friend can take what consolation he likes from that fact. Would he argue that the raising of a tariff increases foreign trade?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will argue that point when I get up, but in the meantime I would like to hear how the hon. gentleman explains his argument?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): It is so simple of explanation that I should not think my hon. friend requires any further statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well, if my right hon. friend really wants information upon this subject—and he did most sadly a year ago—will he seriously contend that the commercial position of Great Britain at the present moment is to be compared with the commercial position of Canada in regard to foreign commerce?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to that—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Let me finish my point, my right hon. friend will have a chance to speak later.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought my hon. friend asked me a question.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): If I asked a question I apologize to the Speaker for breaking the rules of the House, because when my right hon. friend gets up to answer the question he is out of order. It is a common form of debate, however, to put a question that does not require an immediate answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): If my right hon. friend wants information in the form of a statement, instead of in the form of a question, let me tell him that I am examining into the effects of a tariff upon the foreign trade of a nation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, what about the British tariff?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Last year Britain's trade doubled the trade of the year before. In the month of March Canada's trade fell by $100,000,000 or nearly so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the British tariff was higher than it was the year before.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That is not the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the case.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My right hon. friend is extremely fond of splitting hairs—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer):—and handing the other fellow the smaller part of the hair. He is so fond of the operation that he occasionally expends an enormous amount of strength in bringing his knife down where there is not a hair at all. If my right hon. friend wants further arguments about Britain he can have them to his heart's content; but I am here to say that the facts of history prove that a lower tariff makes for increased trade, other things being equal. My right hon. friend in his interruption is prepared to set up on a smaller scale exactly the class of argument which got him the laughter and derision of every trained economist in Britain last summer. He founded his case upon the figures of the war and the period immediately after it, and he stood before the world declaring that Britain's fiscal policy had broken down and she had lost her supremacy. She exported just about double last year that she did the year before—just about double. Is that a sign of lost supremacy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Compare with other countries.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Compare her with other countries? Canada's trade in the last month of the same fiscal year dropped by $100,000,000, and it is notorious that the United States is going back in the same ratio and at the same extent. Everybody knows that United States exports are falling off by leaps and bounds.

Mr. CURRIE: What about the present British exports?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That is a fact, and there is no gainsaying the fact.

Mr. CURRIE: Let me ask my hon. friend a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: What about the drop in British exports?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well, really—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman please now compare British exports for March this year with British exports for March a year ago?

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is fair.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My right hon. friend must take such figures as I have before me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh,

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does my right hon. friend wish to contradict the figures I have given him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I will give my hon. friend this: Our exports—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CURRIE: Let us have the figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Oh, it is an excellent method, the Socratic method, and I have no reason to fear it at all. However superior my right hon. friend may be as a debater he is so much inferior in his case he is sure to lose it.

Mr. CURRIE: Give us the British figures.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I think possibly a good position to leave it at the present moment is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): A good position to leave it at the present moment is just this, where I left my right hon. friend last summer: I left him up against the facts for nine months and his case went out from beneath him. And if I understand him as indicating a wish to contradict my statement—when I say that a lower tariff will make for higher trade and that his policy will decrease trade—then I would advise him to wait for the figures nine months hence. I trust, for the sake of our common country, I am wrong; but if there was any betting in the case I am afraid that, month by month, my right hon. friend will repent his present attitude. A tariff restricts trade. Why, his nearest neighbour in the House (Sir George Foster) who is nearly twice his age and has studied economics all his life—said here once, with the accord of everybody in the chamber, "Of course a tariff—every tariff—must to a certain extent restrict trade." That is what it is put on for. It is to keep the other stuff out so, that the few protected individuals inside the tariff wall can rook the consumer. If a protective tariff did not restrict trade and prevent imports what would be the earthly good of it for building up industries?

Now, I was proceeding, when we had this diversion, to say that the next great need of the moment is to decrease the cost of living. I had got so far as quoting my hon. friend the Minister of Militia as one of the few people who do not believe that, because he said in this House the other evening, that a cheap country is not a good country to live in: Well, I am perfectly persuaded that nine out of ten people in Canada at the present time could do if Canada was just a little cheaper country to live in than it is. If I am not right in that supposition, why have we heard so much about the high cost of living in the past seven years? Why have we carefully scanned the paragraphs in our papers which tell us that it has gone up by a small percentage or down by a small percentage? I will tell my hon. friend the Minister of Militia why those figures have been scanned by the rank and file of the people of this country with earnestness and anxiety: they have been scanned in this way because nine out of ten of the people have felt the cost of living so badly that they have had to calculate very carefully to make ends meet and to get the necessities of life for those who are near and dear to them. It is abject nonsense to say that a dear country is a good country to live in. We have all been wanting to reduce the cost of living. It is absolutely as certain as anything can be—and again my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be my authority—that a tariff increases the price of an article to just about the amount of the tariff. As the amendment proposes to reduce the tariff, in my judgment and in the judgment of every considerable economist who ever lived, you would by reducing the tariff reduce the price of commodities. On this ground also I shall vote for the amendment.

Now I come to the third point. The great need of this country is to build up its industries, and on the principles laid down so eloquently and so lucidly by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's, I shall support the amendment, because, little as hon. gentlemen opposite may think so, the amendment's policy will build up the general industry of Canada much faster than the policy of the Government. I see smiles of some doubt when I make a statement of that kind. A great deal of nonsense passes for sense in this world. Binder twine has been free in this country for twenty-three years. That is something the Liberal Government did, anyway. What was the effect upon the industry in Canada? Within that twenty-three years a successful binder twine factory has been established in Welland by an American firm.

Mr. CURRIE: An American trust.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend can call it just what he likes. I call it a firm. It is a branch of an American firm which has established at Welland under absolute free trade a successful binder twine factory. Let me just pause at this point to intimate that that single fact casts grave doubt upon the only argument that had a semblance of strength in it that I ever heard of for a protective tariff as against the States,—that the tariff is what pulls, so to speak, the factories over—from America to this side. It could not be the tariff in the binder twine case at Welland because there has not been a tariff on binder twine since that factory was founded there. There is another factory making binder twine in which I am more interested as a good Canadian than I am in the Welland factory.

Mr. HAY: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: He has a right to ask a question.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): In Brantford there is a firm called the Brantford Cordage Company. It makes rope, upon which there is a duty, but it also makes binder twine. I take more interest in that firm than in the other on purely national and patriotic grounds. The manager is a born Canadian, and he has established a splendid business there. When the gentleman from whom I get my information visited the factory the other day they were engaged in filling an order for Dublin, in Ireland. This firm, operating without a protective tariff so far as binder twine goes, has sent shipments to the United States, to the Argentine, to Tunis in North Africa, to South Africa and to Siberia. Now, if that happened in regard to binder twine there, the onus of proving that industries are built up by a tariff is entirely on the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite. There are industries and industries in this country.

Mr. HAY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have been interrupted a good deal and I have very great consideration for whoever is to follow me. However, as my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Hay) has risen I will be very glad to hear what se says.

Mr. HAY: The question I should like to ask the hon. gentleman is this: Has the establishment of an American binder twine factory in Welland cheapened binder twine to the farmers of Canada?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend's question is really an argument, Mr. Speaker. I am discussing the effect of a tariff upon the building up of industries. My hon. friend understands that. I think that binder twine has been cheapened to the farmer. But that is not what I am dealing with. My hon. friend asks the question for the obvious purpose of making an argument. That sort of question is not permissible in ordinary parliamentary debate. There is nothing in the question. My hon. friend possibly is getting information that he did not have before on the question which I am raising, that the industries of a country generally are not built up by tariffs, but are retarded. What is meant by "industries"? Are railways "industries"? Has the National railway proceeded to enormous success under the protective tariff? It has been under the National Policy. What has that policy done for the railways of this country? What has it done for our shipbuilding?—is not that an "industry"? What has it done for the farming industry? Obviously nothing, because in their great bulk farmers cannot be protected. There is the iniquity and the injustice of the wohle thing as applied to the farming population. Protection is money help; and when you help one industry with money it is a very simple conclusion that the money must come from somewhere, and agriculture bears the entire burden.

Mr. CURRIE: What about the Canadian Pacific railway, then?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The Canadian Pacific railway was given the earth to build itself with. I am going to give my hon. friend, if I may be allowed to pursue my argument, some more facts about Canada. I was talking with a publicist the other day, a journalist of great repute, who knew Almonte very well in 1868. They have some woollen manufactures in Almonte. My friend, who knew it then and knows it now, and is a man with acute powers of observation, tells me that the woollen factories of Almonte were more prosperous in 1868 than they are to-day. I had confirmation of that from a gentleman who called on me recently to speak at Almonte. I asked him: How are your woollen factories? He answered: Very depressed. I was talking to a New Brunswicker of the highest intelligence and with a splendid memory, who told me that over forty years ago there were in the city of St. John thriving boot and shoe industries; there is not a boot or shoe made there to-day. What has the National Policy done for the boot and shoe industries of St. John? The onus of proof about this industry building all rests upon the shoulders of gentlemen opposite. What is the condition of your manufactures to-day? How many of them are depending on banks at this moment to hold them up? That is not the kind of industry you want to build up. Build them under freedom and they will stand on their own feet and be their own strength the way agriculture is bound to do. I have frequently given the figures as to Britain's manufactures. The broad truth is that Britain neved had any manufactures worth the name until she adopted free trade, her figures in manufacturing exports were infinitesimal; to-day they are the wonder of the world. These are the facts about Canada and the facts about the Old Country. For years hon. gentlemen did not mind my talking in this way, when I was the only man in the country who believed it, but when they know that there will be more believing it than not believing it at the next general election they commence to show a little temper in this business. I am very glad to see it, though what this country wants even more than the things I am dealing with is a change of government.

We have for forty years—

Mr. CURRIE: Why not free trade?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I will tell my hon. friend about free trade in a minute. We have for over forty years pursued an absolutely wrong policy in Canada in regard to the building of industries and in regard to the building of anything else. There was a Chinaman called Mencius who lived four hundred years before Christ. He was the grandson of Confucius, and he brought a simple figure before his fellow countrymen which only needs to be repeated to impress itself upon the intellect on any hon. gentleman in this House. Mencius said that the industries of a country may be likened to a tree of which agriculture is the stem or bole and the other industries of the country the branches. Now, that old Chink knew more about political economy than all the gentlemen opposite put together.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I will finish my sentence. For the benefit of my hon. friend I will repeat the first part of it—that old Chink knew more about political economy than my hon. friend—

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, I object—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: Well, he said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) must know the rule which requires a member to take his seat when the Speaker rises.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is asking a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Red Deer has already indicated that he does not desire to be interrupted.

Mr. CURRIE: Doesn't he want an answer?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend is wrong in thinking that I asked him a question; there are some quarters to which I would never go for lessons in political economy. I was saying there was a Chinaman called Mencius who said that the industries of a country might be compared to a tree of which agriculture is the stem or bole and of which the other industries are the branches. Every Canadian on the land and almost every Canadian outside the benches opposite knows that that is true, because our forefathers were all farmers.

Mr. CURRIE: We do not want the Chinese.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer: I am quite accustomed to somewhat disorderly proceedings on the part of my hon. friend. For an old parliamentarian he really ought to try to practice that self-control which parliamentary institutions are meant to instil. One of the greatest parliamentary accomplishments is to be able to listen with courtesy to the person who happens for the moment to be speaking. In private life my hon. friend would not in ordinary conversation deal with his friends as he is dealing with me. He is wasting the time of the speaker who is to follow me, because I have no desire to give him a lecture on deportment—only on political economy.

I was proceeding to say that this famous Chinaman whom I have quoted knew more about political economy than hon. gentlemen opposite, because they and their forebears have for forty odd years been trying to build up the industries of the country represented by that tree by constricting the stem and manuring the branches. Well, that is the most curious kind of arboriculture that ever was gone in for by intelligent men.

Now, I have indicated the grounds upon which I shall support the amendment. I believe that they are sound; I think the amendment more than the Budget policy would increase the trade of the country, reduce the cost of living, and in the long run build up faster the industries of the country.

I very much agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) when he says that the income tax might very well have been increased. I have not given up my belief in the possibilities of a succession duty for Federal Canada, and I certainly have not given up my belief in the taxation of land values. I want to say here that I offer my very sincere congratulations to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the way he has collected the income tax. He has gone after it in right manly fashion and has demonstrated, to the very great benefit of the country, what direct taxation will do if it is pursued in a thorough and an earnest manner. I want to give him full credit for that. There has been a vast improvement in the department in that particular respect since he took office there. I hope he will continue his good work and that he will not be deterred in his duty in this connection by the action of men, if there are such—and I hope they are few in Canada—who profiteered when others were dying and now want to skulk away when others are paying. There never was a more squalid and more sordid scene than on the morrow of the Republican victory in the United States when the leaders of the Republican party met in serious conclave to consider how they could raise three billions by tariff duties. It was an ignominious attempt on the part of the rich men in that conclave to wriggle out of doing their duty, and I trust and believe there are few such men in Canada. For my part, if I were to be allowed to give a moral tonic to this nation, whatever the government we have in power, I would say that we ought in common decency, in remembrance of our sixty thousand dead, to show at least as much heroism in the handling of our purses in the next seven years as they showed on the field of battle during the four and a quarter years of war. If that word helps my hon. friend to get on in his course in this connection, I shall be more than glad that I have spoken it. I speak it for a serious purpose. I speak it to lead to an indication of my belief that the record of Canada up to date in the economic field is by no means equal to the military achievements of our men.

I have a standing quarrel with the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on this question of income tax. He was a member of this Government from its inception, he was a member of Parliament under this Government from its inception; and for three and one-half years he followed and supported a Minister of Finance who did not have the courage, or did not think it wise, to impose an income tax at all. My right hon. friend has shown the enthusiasm of all converts, because in his recent tour of this country, he made his boast—I do not want to use the word offensively—that on certain incomes we have taxed more heavily in Canada than they have done in Great Britain. I want the country and the House to know the exact facts about that. My right hon. friend mentioned the figure $200,000 as the figure at which we began to tax more heavily than they did in Britain. Some weeks ago, I put on the Order Paper a question as to how many people were taxed in the last fiscal year on an income of $200,000 or over and the answer was: Eleven. I do not think that upon eleven taxpayers my right hon. friend can build a very successful case for his energy in collecting direct taxation. There is between $2,000 and $200,000 a large margin upon which it appears to me that the benefits of the income tax could be extended, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) indicated. I have a little sympathy with those eleven gentlemen, for my right hon. friend has dragged those victims, so to speak, throughout the whole country and has trotted them out on every platform as evidences of his fiscal earnestness along the line of direct taxation.

Let me give a single figure more if I may, in support of my contention that our record in the economic field is not equal to the sacrifices of our soldiers. Great Britain raised last year, largely by direct taxation, $7,250,000,000. Canada raised, in round figures, $432,000,000. A simple calculation will reveal that, in this country, one-fifth of the population of Britain raised only one-seventeenth of the revenue that was raised in Britain. That going does not make me very proud as a Canadian. The word we all used in the war was: "We are out to fight Germany to the last man and the last dollar." The last man was forthcoming, voluntarily, in most cases, and he gave not only his last dollar but himself. But we are far from collecting the last dollar or as many dollars as we should do by direct taxation in this country. Let me put that figure in another way. If my hon. friend had gathered, in proportion to population, from the people of Canada as much revenue as was gathered in Great Britain last year, his revenue would be $1,200,000,000. That would make him a little more comfortable about the future than he is at the present moment, in spite of the showing that he has made. My hon. friend could cut a third off that revenue and he would still have a revenue of $800,000,000. He could then meet all the national responsibilities fully and freely and set aside a substantial portion of his income for immediately dealing with the national debt. I have yet to learn that a Canadian is only two-thirds of a Britisher. Why, in every respect in which he has been tested, he is a little over one hundred per cent. Our people in war, in giving, were magnificent. Look at the huge sums that have been left in the hands of the Patriotic Fund and the Red Cross Society for revenue. I speak earnestly on this subject, because, I repeat, we have a great record to live up to, we have a great record of sacrifice and service that we ought to reproduce in our civil life until we have qualified for the moral companionship of those who have died for the country.

I am opposed to this Budget, because its extra burdens, like all its burdens, will fall, not chiefly upon the rich and the well-to-do, but upon the great masses of the people who have enough to do to make ends meet. The burden of this Budget will fall, first and foremost, upon the returned men. It will fall especially upon returned men who have taken advantage of the Soldier Settlement Act to settle upon the land. I told my right hon. friend when he was taking the Soldier Settlement Act through this House that if he settled thousands of returned men upon the land and did not alter his fiscal policy in such a manner as to make it more profitable to farm, what he was doing amounted to a national crime. That is what has come about. There are in Western Canada returned men who, a little over a year ago, gave $1.25 a bushel for seed oats, and in some districts they cannot sell the product to-day at ten cents a bushel.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), in the speech which he delivered this afternoon, talked about boots and shoes, and evidently, he wanted to arouse a little danger to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) on the part of the boot and shoe industry. What does my hon. friend think of the hide industry? I heard from a farmer, a near relative of mine, the other day, that he sold, in Western Canada, two hides weighing 129 pounds, and he took home the magnificent sum of $1.29; he got a cent a pound for the hides. You cannot get a pair of boots under ten dollars,—I am sorry to say that I am standing in a ten-dollar pair at this moment, and on my farm I would need to skin sixteen full-sized cattle to buy these boots with the hides. I was telling this story to a number of Britishers, and some of them good free traders, in St. Thomas a week ago Sunday, and they said: "It is worse than that here; there was a farmer who brought a hide in the other day, and he could buy only a pair of laces with the proceeds. Yet my hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne), who is a good stalwart Canadian in many ways and for whom I have a great admiration,—if he had only kept out of politics and especially out of a merchant marine, he was all right—pleads in this House for a duty to help manufacturers of boots and shoes who can get hides for next to nothing and can surely get the leather made out of hides for almost next to nothing, especially when he knows that for the last eight years the boot and shoe industries of Canada have had, not only a huge protection in their home market, but a free entrance into the United States, because since Mr. Wilson came into power, there has been no duty on boots and shoes in that country.

This burden will fall upon the returned men; it will fall mainly upon the labouring men of the country, the men who always have to calculate carefully to make their income cover their expenditure; it will fall upon the farmers of this country, and it will fall upon the women of the country who sewed and knitted in the war until their eyes were sore with sewing and knitting at one time and with weeping for their lost ones at another. That is why I object to this Budget, because its tariff burdens fall in the main on the rank and file, on the toiling masses, male and female, of this country, and not where they should fall, upon the shoulders of the wealthy who are best able to bear them. Consumption is not the proper thing to tax; consumable commodities are not the proper things to tax. The proper thing to tax is wealth. Wealth is what should be taxed; it is the one place you are sure to get money, and every just and righteous principle demands that sooner or later we shall bring down direct and not indirect taxation.

This is a reactionary Budget. But I have faith in Canada, absolute faith in Canada. She will look after her fiscal matters, and all her other matters. Her record in the war is one which cannot be blotted out. Her history up to date is a glorious one, and her possibilities are practically unlimited. When I stand on my western farm, Mr. Speaker, I sometimes look, as I can look, to the white-topped Rockies, emblems of strength and beauty, and my imagination goes beyond them to the shores of the Pacific, kissed with the warm western winds and lapped with the warm western waves, and I think of the possibilities of almost unlimited commerce with the Orient. Then I look east across the prairies, where we can grow unlimited golden grain, down to Ontario and Quebec with their magnificent material equipment, their history, their traditions—and their feuds, too often unworthy, and would to God that where they are unworthy they should die;—across these I look, and across the Maritime Provinces to the Atlantic where we have a chance of trading with the Old World, and I have unlimited confidence in Canada. There is one obstacle at the present moment in the way of her making a progress which has never been equalled in the world before, and that obstacle she will remove herself when she gets the opportunity, by doing away with the obsolete policies of what I am afraid is a weary, and I am certain is a moribund Administration.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great disadvantage to an ordinary member of Parliament like myself to follow such a speaker as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Clark). He is always so eloquent and so interesting that it is difficult for an ordinary member to follow him. At the same time one must admit that the hon. gentleman is always consistent, as he showed in his very fine peroration to-day, in arguing for the free trade policy for which he has fought in the Parliament of Canada for very many years. Sometimes in that eloquence and that consistency he stretches a point almost beyond its elasticity to prove his argument. For example, he pointed out a few moments ago that these taxes which are being imposed by the hon. Minister of Finance will particularly hit the returned men. That is news to me. I do not see how they will hit the returned men more than any other class of people in this country, and I presume that the returned men will be as willing to pay their share of taxation as they were to make greater sacrifices when the war was on.

My hon. friend also stretched a point, a little earlier in his speech, when he was criticizing the Minister of Finance for having advised the ladies of Toronto that they should not import the luscious strawberry out of season, paying for it by exporting the juicy grape, and he pointed out as a reason against giving advice against importation that one of the ways by which we can wipe out the $70,000,000 deficit on the national railways is by such things as importing strawberries into the country and exporting grapes out of it. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would take considerable fruit to wipe out that $70,000,000 deficit.

Another statement which the hon. gentleman made was that the unemployment situation in this country was very severe. I admit that; no one can dispute it. There is a business depression throughout the world, but at any rate the unemployment situation in protectionist Canada is not quite so bad as it is in free trade England, where the Prime Minister a short time ago suggested that the unemployed of that country should emigrate to the colonies.

Then my hon. friend also pointed out another interesting thing. I believe he quoted Adam Smith as saying that Holland had ruined herself by taxing the necessaries of life.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I correct my hon. friend? I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent me. I quoted Adam Smith as saying that in his day the manufacturers of Holland had been ruined. Everybody knows that Holland to-day is not ruined but is a thriving country.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I misquoted my hon. friend; I had no intention of doing so. The correction, however, does not affect my argument. The point I was going to make was this, that if the taxing necessaries of life by customs duties—and this is what I understood my hon. friend to mean—leads to the ruin even of the manufacturers of a nation, it should be remembered that the United Kingdom imposes customs duties on necessaries, to a vast extent. I think I would be correct in saying that the customs duties imposed by the United Kingdom are as high per capita as the customs duties in Canada; that is, there is as much per capita collected by that means in the United Kingdom. The strange part of it is that all these customs duties in the United Kingdom are upon the necessaries of life; they are upon products which are not produced in the United Kingdom; upon tea, sugar, tobacco, (which after all is more or less a necessary of life), coffee and cocoa, and gasoline, I am reminded by an hon. member; that is a point worth remembering in regard to the taxation of the United Kingdom.

Another point that always strikes me in listening to the arguments of hon. gentlemen who advocate a free trade policy is that they nearly always criticise every form of taxation. They seem to be under the impression that no money needs to be raised. They do not suggest any other method whereby the necessary revenue can be raised.

I would like to say that I was rather surprised to find that my hon. friend from Red Deer is going to support the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). It seems rather peculiar to find an out-and-out free trader like the hon. member for Red Deer, sailing in the same boat, to use his own expression, with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, who is the same kind of moderate protectionist that I am and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It made me feel that perhaps amendments like platforms are things to get in on, and not to stand on, as some one said.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at 6 o'clock I was discussing the speech of the hon. gentleman who had preceded me, the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and was pointing out the difference between his policy and that of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I was struck by the peculiar fact that during the hon. gentleman's speech my hon. friends on the other side, that is to say, the regular Liberal Opposition, cheered the member for Red Deer to the echo on many occasions when he was voicing free trade principles which certainly the Liberal party had never upheld or put into practice when in office to any greater extent than had the party on this side of the House. In this connection, the remarks of my hon. friend from Red Deer brought to my mind the fact that when the member for Shelburne and Queen's was speaking the other day he stated that while he was not advocating a protectionist policy, neither was he propounding free trade principles. He was quite emphatic on that point, and he went so far as to say that nobody in this country was upholding a free trade policy. He declared that the Liberal party was not upholding such a policy, nor was the Agrarian party, nor any other body of men. When I heard the hon. and eloquent member for Red Deer addressing the House this afternoon I could not help thinking that the member for Shelburne and Queen's, as he also listened to the hon. gentleman, must have felt that perhaps he had covered too much territory in the statement which he made the other day. It reminded me of an incident which I once witnessed. A man who was somewhat the worse for whisky was standing in a room, and he boasted that he was better than any man in the company present. No one heeded the remark, and he then declared that he was better than any man in the city. Emboldened by the silence with which this boast was received, he went a step further and said that he was better than any man in the country, and some one walked up to him and knocked him down. As he got up he said: "I know what is the matter with me; I have covered too much territory." As I say, when I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer, I thought that the member for Shelburne and Queen's must have felt that he, too, had covered too much territory in saying that nobody was upholding a free trade policy in this country.

Last year, when I spoke on the Budget, I gave many facts dealing with the question of free trade and protection, as they apply to Canada, and in doing so I had occasion to make comparisons between protectionist countries, such as Germany and the United States, and a free trade country such as the United Kingdom. In support of my contentions, I submitted facts rather than theories; because, after all, a theory may be as plausible and logical as you wish, but before it can be accepted, it must stand the test of facts. All who have studied history know that there were theories propounded by Aristotle which had been accepted for many centuries but which finally when tested had to be renounced because they were no longer tenable. In this connection, I trust my hon. friend from Red Deer will not demur to my going back so far in history, because he himself went back four centuries beyond Confucius. Many of the theories of Aristotle which had been accepted by the world for centuries were in the end disproven and shown to be fallacious; and yet it is a peculiar fact that those who uphold a theory on mere theoretical grounds, refusing to subject their reasoning to correction in the light of facts, very often, when they find others opposing them are inclined to describe those with whom they cannot agree as heretics. In so many words, they say: if the facts do not square with our theories, well, so much the worse for the facts.

I do admit, Mr. Speaker, that the theory espoused by my hon. friend for Red Deer is an easy one upon which to base an argument; it sounds plausible and logical enough. But even if it were generally accepted to-day in the economic world, the so-called free trade policy, as it has worked out in the United Kingdom, is not necessarily the best policy for our country. Even assuming that it were accepted as a truism that free trade is the best policy for the United Kingdom, that would not prove it to be the best policy to apply to this country. Why do I say that? The United Kingdom is a country of small area, immensely developed manufacturing plants, highly developed capital, and fully developed natural resources; and certain other attributes which do not exist in Canada. On the other hand, Canada has an immense area, very great, but undeveloped natural resources, little accumulated capital, and little developed manufacturing plants. So that a theory or a policy that might apply with the utmost satisfaction to the United Kingdom might be highly unsatisfactory to Canada. In referring to free trade in connection with the United Kingdom, I purposely used the qualifying expression "so-called," because it has been fairly logically established that the so-called free trade of the United Kingdom is not, as a matter of fact, free trade, but an almost unlimited free import. Free trade should embrace two parties; and as a matter of fact, the United Kingdom is the only country of any importance which has put this policy into practice. So that the United Kingdom, while it has given free import to other countries, has really not participated in the mutual advantages that should characterize free trade.

In my speech of last year, which I shall summarize briefly, so that I may not repeat any arguments I then used, I took up the foreign commerce of some of the different important countries of the world, because foreign commerce is one of the things which those who support the free trade policy boast very loudly of as being one of the prominent assets of Great Britain. I pointed out in that speech that between 1890 and 1913, Germany and the United States, two well known protectionist countries, were making much more rapid progress in their foreign commerce than was the United Kingdom. I pointed out further—and I shall repeat the facts again to-night,—that in many of the European markets Germany was selling more than free trade United Kingdom. I showed that Germany had been outselling the United Kingdom in ten important countries before the war. Just here I may say that most of the facts which I submit in this connection have reference to the pre-war period, because it is hardly fair to base argument on conditions as they are to-day, in view of the unsettled state of world affairs. I pointed out that the national debt, per capita, in Great Britain was greater than in the United States or Germany; and in regard to the general welfare of the people of the United Kingdom and other countries, I proved that conditions were not as good in the United Kingdom as in some other places, so far as those conditions could be judged from such facts as deposits in the savings banks, immigration and unemployment statistics as given by the trade unions of the various countries concerned. Upon these facts, and upon the authority of various writers whom I quoted, I think I showed that the conditions of the ordinary people in the United States were better certainly than in the United Kingdom, and even in Germany they were probably as good as, if not better than, conditions in Great Britain.

Then I touched on railways—a question to which my hon. friend from Red Deer referred this afternoon—and I showed that the United Kingdom had the highest capitalization of any country in the world, and what was very much more important, that the railway rates in the United Kingdom were higher than the rates in Germany, or France, or Austria and a number of other European countries, and about double the rates of the United States or Canada. I touched on pauperism and I gave statistics from the Statesman's Year Book to show that pauperism in the United Kingdom was certainly as great as in Germany, and perhaps greater, and certainly much greater than in the United States. Finally, I touched upon agriculture which my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) covered so completely last night. I pointed out at that time that agriculture in the United Kingdom had practically been wiped out under free frade. When I say "practically wiped out" it had been reduced by about fifty per cent under free trade; that while the United Kingdom imported a very great proportion of her food, none of the other countries in Europe imported so much food as the United Kingdom. Take, for example, the growing of wheat. I pointed out that the United Kingdom was greatly surpassed by France, by Germany, by Austria, by Italy, even by Spain—that Spain doubled in 1913—I think that was the year I gave—the wheat production of the United Kingdom. Then I contrasted with that, the development of agriculture in the United States, where it had gone ahead by leaps and bounds, and I pointed out by figures the extent of the development of the natural resources in that country. That is a resumé, in brief, of the speech which I made; and I may say that while a number of speakers who followed me took up the theories I expounded and the conclusion to which I came, none of them disputed the facts, so I thought I could come to the conclusion that my facts were pretty correct. Indeed I am quite positive they were because most of them were taken from official sources.

Now, Sir, I submit that this question of a tariff policy for Canada is still a very vital one to be decided in the best interests of the country. That is the only interest that I have at heart, because I am neither a farmer on the one hand nor a manufacturer on the other. Since then I have looked over the question more thoroughly I have looked over the records of many English writers and while to-day there are many who still uphold free trade as a theory, there is an increasing number of writers in the United Kingdom who are coming to the conclusion that the United Kingdom has been too generous to its trade rivals in opening its markets freely to them, and there are many who have come completely to the conclusion that the United Kingdom should adopt an entire reversal of policy. Let me mention the name of one writer whose works I found very interesting, John Holt Schooling, a well-known writer in the United Kingdom. He has written a book, entitled "The British Trade Book." It is a remarkable work, composed for the greater part of statistics, showing the trade of the United Kingdom in its various branches. This writer comes to absolutely the same conclusions which I came to, only he gives many more arguments and reasons in support of them—he covers the ground in a much more elaborate way. I had not seen the book at the time of my investigations last year although it was written some time before. He points out that although the first edition was issued some six years before the one which I read the facts had never been disputed, and he had come to the conclusion, in brief, that free trade was a brain-spun doctrinaire theory, not based upon facts, and that it was not applicable to any country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to allude to a few of the statements of other speakers —not in this debate but in speeches delivered throughout the country—and first I wish to touch just for a moment on the speech of my hon. friend, the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who, in one of his speeches, made the statement that anybody who mixed up the question of revenue with the question of protection was not only inconsistent but was attempting to mislead the country. Those were the words the hon. member used himself—that a man who did that was inconsistent and was attempting to mislead the country. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had said the higher the custom tariff the lower the revenue I would say he was perfectly correct; but to imply, as he implied, that if you have a protective tariff you cannot get any revenue from it, is going very much beyond the fact. I regret that my hon. friend from Marquette is not in the chamber at the present moment; however, that is not my fault. But I should like to point out to him; what he will no doubt admit, that Canada is a protectionist country. I know he has stated that the protectionist policy which has prevailed in Canada ever since 1878 is harmful to this country. He will therefore admit that Canada is under a protective tariff and yet Canada has raised millions of dollars —yes, hundreds of millions of dollars— by that tariff. Then he will no doubt also admit that the United States is a protective country. Before the war the United States had the highest protective tariff in the world and by that protective tariff it raised a revenue exceeding that of any other country. So I think these two facts absolutely refute the statement of my hon. friend that a protective tariff cannot give revenue. In making the statement which he did my hon. friend is simply mixing up prohibition—I mean prohibition of customs—with protection; because if you put a tariff of, say, 100 per cent on a certain line of goods none of these goods come in and therefore there will be no revenue; but a moderate tariff will give a certain amount of protection and a certain amount of revenue. He was mixing moderate duties and restraints on trade, just as in the United Kingdom certain people mix up free trade with free imports. It is another case of theory versus fact.

It recalls to my mind an incident which occurred in the House last year during the debate on oleomargarine. The Minister of Agriculture introduced a Bill on the subject and my hon. friend from Red Deer got up and spoke. He advocated the free trade theory, in the eloquent manner so easy with him, and he pointed out that if Canada had a free trade policy we would have butter at reasonable prices and there would be no need to bother about oleomargarine. That is a synopsis of what he said. Well, out of curiosity I sent out to the reading room and got a copy of the London Times. There I looked up the price of butter in London and found that the price in free trade England, the wholesale price, was higher than the retail price of butter in protectionist Canada. That is another instance of theory versus fact.

Now I wish to touch upon the subject of immigration. My hon friend from Red Deer referred to that subject last year— and he said (opposing the right hon. leader of the Government) that emigration from the United Kingdom had increased after 1846, because protection had made the people so poor they could not emigrate previously. Then my hon. friend from Red Deer made this statement—That people do emigrate most when they are most prosperous. My hon. friend is usually very logical and very plausible but it is almost too much of a strain upon our imagination to think that people who are living prosperously in their own country will pack up and go out to practically a foreign country and there perhaps cut a home for themselves out of the woods.

My hon. friend in the same speech said that he wanted cheap goods and he cared not whence they came—speaking I believe at that time on the subject of tobacco. That is a very common free trade argument, and I should like to point out to my hon. friend, that there are countries in the world which are very cheap countries to live in—at least so far as buying things is concerned—and yet they are sometimes the most poverty ridden countries to be found. For example take the case of China and India. I believe there are no countries in the world where labour is so cheap—and labour is a good criterion of the price of other commodities in those countries—yet in China we have recently seen thirty-five millions of people brought to starvation, and in India from time to time there have been famines which could hardly be overcome.

I might point out also, Mr. Speaker, that the year before the war I had the pleasure of travelling in Southern Italy, and I well remember when visiting Naples I would hire a carriage for the afternoon and after driving around for two or three hours I would ask my cocher how much I owed him, and he would probably say, "Two lire," which would be about forty cents in Canadian currency. I used to feel ashamed to pay him such a small sum even with a tip added. I point that out because Naples at that time was an exceedingly cheap city to live in, and yet was one of the most poverty-stricken centres I have ever seen.

Real desirable cheapness depends more upon competition and large production than upon free imports. An English writer, Sir Guilford Molesworth, in giving the United States prices of steel rails states that in 1867 they cost $150 a ton. The duty was increased and in 1872 they were down to $112; in 1874 to $49; in 1876 to $39; in 1885 to $27, and that was about the price I believe before the war. Those are the figures quoted by this writer and no doubt they are correct. The same writer says that between 1861 and 1883 under protection cotton and woollen prices decreased 25 per cent, and he gives a list of 214 articles showing the same result under protection with home manufacture. I should like to supplement that by saying that large home production with plenty of work and wages is very much more important to any country than cheap importation. We all remember the story of the man in New York who, when told that the price of a certain article was a dollar said, "I could buy that in the Old Country for a shilling." Somebody asked him, "Why did you not stay there and buy it?" To which he replied, "I did not have the shilling." That is often the trouble in a cheap country where importation helps to make things cheap, while killing its home industries, with the result that the people living there have not the money with which to buy those cheap goods.

Then there is another statement regarding the policy of members on this side of the House—because a majority of my colleagues do take the same stand on a moderate tariff policy, just as my hon. friends on the other side really in their hearts support that policy. That is the statement which has been made in the press, and some times by hon. gentlemen opposite, that we on this side of the House are inconsistent when we state that we stand for a moderate tariff policy and then, like my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) last night, show that the tariff under which we are living to-day is lower than the tariff of the Liberal party between 1896 and 1911. We are told that we are proving ourselves protectionists by showing our leaning towards free trade. To my mind there is nothing inconsistent in that. We believe in a moderate tariff; we know when we have had enough; we are not gluttonous; and therefore we limit the tariff. The inconsistency, it seems to me, comes from the other side of the House where they said before 1896 that they were free traders, and at the present time they say they are a low tariff party. And yet while in power they had a higher tariff than the one our party puts in force when it is in power. I may say that I am not a high tariff advocate and never have been, and I do not think that I ever shall be. I believe in a moderate tariff which will give a certain amount of protection and at the same time provide a certain amount of revenue. And I believe that is the opinion of 95 per cent of hon. gentlemen in this House.

The hon. member for Red Deer—and the reason I take up his argument is because he is after all the most able advocate of free trade in this country—stated in another speech that before the war Great Britain did the carrying trade of the world. If he had said that Great Britain did a large proportion of that carrying trade he would have been correct. According to Lloyd's Register in 1914 the total merchant shipping of the world was 49,000,000 gross tons. Of that the United Kingdom owned 19,000,000 gross tons, or two-fifths, and it must be that the other three-fifths did some of the shipping of the world. Before the war the steam and sailing vessels entering and leaving the ports of the United Kingdom were 93,000,000 tons British and 71,000,000 tons foreign; that is, two-fifths of the carrying trade in and out of the ports of the United Kingdom—and I am quoting official statistics—was handled in foreign ships. So that the statement that Great Britain before the war did the carrying trade of the world can hardly be sustained by the facts.

In speaking of the "invisible" exports which my hon. friend and others used to explain what is called the adverse balance of trade of the United Kingdom—that is, the fact that the United Kingdom imports a great deal more than it exports—my hon. friend said that that adverse balance was explained to a great extent because Great Britain did the carrying trade of the world and also because of interest on the money which Great Britain had loaned abroad. That is more or less correct. But the adverse balance cannot all be explained, thus, because much of the carrying trade even of the United Kingdom is done in foreign vessels. In other words, the invisible exports from the United Kingdom must be balanced against a certain proportion of invisible imports into the United Kingdom in the form of the carrying trade done for her by foreign steam and sailing vessels. It might also be pointed out in that connection that Canada at any rate has no invisible exports to pay off any of her imports and although the argument does apply partially to England it can not to Canada, we having no earnings either from foreign investments or from ships.

The British writer whom I quoted before, John Holt Schooling takes up this question and states that the carrying trade of the United Kingdom and the interest on her foreign loans does not pay her total imports, but that 7 per cent of those imports is paid for by a very small transfer of British capital which is invested abroad. In other words, the British have a very large amount of capital invested in foreign countries, and only a minute quantity of that would need to be transferred to pay for 7 per cent of her imports. He is supported by another writer a Mr. Byng, a manufacturer—and it will be remembered that the manufacturers of England in 1846 supported free trade, Cobden himself being a manufacturer—a Mr. Byng, who wrote a book in 1901 opposing free trade, and also by Sir Guilford Molesworth, whom I have already cited as an authority. Then the United Kingdom pays for 17 per cent of her imports by the export of coal. Now, while they have vast quantities of coal in England, it is in a sense national capital, especially for such a country, and the coal exports of the United Kingdom are increasing much more rapidly than the exports of manufactured goods. In 1913 her coal exports amounted to $270,000,000; in 1910 they took third place only to cotton and iron and steel manufactures. So that the United Kingdom is not upholding, according to this writer Schooling, many of the manufactures which she held for so many years. The large manufactures of the United Kingdom consist of iron and steel, cotton, wool, ships, machinery, coal and agriculture, and of those Mr. Schooling says the only three which are paying in exports as high a proportion as they paid in 1880 for imports are ships, machinery and coal; and only ships and machinery could be stated to be manufactures, because coal, as we all know, is a natural product. The actual figures, I admit do show a gradual increase, not very great, in the exports of those other lines, but at the same time the only three that are upholding their proportion are as I have stated.

Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer in another of his speeches mentioned hardware and cutlery, and I think he mentioned them again this afternoon. He said: "If you put a duty on iron and steel, what would become of the cutlery trade of Sheffield?" Well, let us look at what has become of that trade without putting a duty on iron and steel. We find that in 1880 the United Kingdom exported $17,000,000 worth of cutlery and hardware and in 1909, twenty-nine years later, only $11,000,000 worth, a drop of about fifty per cent—and that was without the duty on iron and steel that was suggested by my hon. friend and despite the increase in population. It is another case, Mr. Speaker, of theory versus facts.

Then, let us take cotton, the basis of one of the most important industries in the United Kingdom. We find that in cotton the United States surpassed the United Kingdom before the war and that Germany was gaining very rapidly. In pig iron and steel the United States and Germany far surpassed the United Kingdom in 1910, Germany producing twice as much iron and steel as the United Kingdom, and the United States three times.

As for wool, before the war Germany had gained an almost equal position with that of the United Kingdom, and the United States consumption of wool was more than that of the United Kingdom.

As for agriculture, we have had statements at various times, which cannot be denied, that agriculture in the United Kingdom is rapidly declining. The United Kingdom imports a larger percentage of her food than almost any other country in the world. In 1910 her imports of food were valued at £258,000,000. It is admitted to-day in the United Kingdom that the injury done to agriculture by the fiscal policy followed there has been a great national blunder. In 1910 the number of agriculturists in the United Kingdom per one thousand of population was less than in France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Italy, or the United States. The city and town population of the United States in the average year between 1901 and 1910 was 35 per cent of the whole, in Germany 58 per cent and in the United Kingdom 74 per cent, showing the extent of the actual injury to agriculture in the United Kingdom. All will admit that agriculture is one of the most important and vital industries of a country. The agriculturists of the United Kingdom have either emigrated or gone to the cities or gone into the coal mines. The number of coal miners in the United Kingdom increased from 193,000 in 1851 to 649,000 in 1913, or over three times, a much greater increase than the increase would have been if in proportion to population. The authority whom I have already quoted, Byng, said in 1901 that no important industry had been developed by the United Kingdom in twenty years. He blamed free trade for what he called at that time the depressed condition of the United Kingdom. In other words, he said they were buying and selling rather than producing.

Between 1851 and 1901 the number of cotton workers increased slightly in the United Kingdom; the number of wool workers decreased; the workers in iron and steel, machinery and ships increased. But the whole analysis shows a great increase in the number of coal miners, middlemen, bankers, merchants and traders. With the exception of the coal miners, all of these belong to the non-producing classes.

Let us look at the United States figures; I shall quote only a few of them. The value of the iron and steel products of the United States in 1880 was $296,000,000 and in 1913, $1,236,000,000, nearly five times as much as in 1880. The steel production in 1880 was 1,247,000 tons and in 1913 31,000,000, an increase of about twenty-five times. In tin plates the production in 1890 was 2,000,000 pounds and in 1913 2,000,000,000 pounds. In cotton manufactures, the value in 1880 was $192,000,000 and in 1913, $700,000,000. Exports of cotton manufactures in 1880 were valued at $10,000,000 and in 1913 at $54,000,000. The value of wool products was $240,000,000 in 1880, and $507,000,000 in 1909. These are only a few of the industries for which similar figures could be given; almost any line of industry could be taken, the line of farming and agriculture particularly, to show that the United States has been progressing very favourably under a protective policy.

Now, in the matter of shipping the United States has not the same record except on the Great Lakes, where in 1914 they had four times the shipping they had in 1870. But shipping has had no protection of any kind. But British shipping has had protection, according to Sir Guilford Molesworth, the eminent English author whom I have quoted. Speaking of British shipping, he says:

> Taxes were abolished, fees reduced, restrictions removed, and draw-backs allowed on ships' supplies. In addition to this, the enormous subsidies paid for mail contracts, the Naval Reserve subvention policy, and the protection given to vessels* * * * afford immense advantages to our shipping. Moreover, Lloyd's regulations, British insurance discriminating against foreign ships, and our tonnage rules, all tell against American shipping. The annual subsidies and payments for postal services by the British Government in 1906 amounted to £1,248,000, as compared with £268,000 paid for similar services by the Government of the United States.

And he continues:

> It is evident, therefore, that the decline of American shipping has not been caused by protection, but by exclusion from the protective policy under which the home industries of the United States have made such marvellous progress.

[Mr. Manion.]

May I direct attention to another fact pointing in the same direction? The United Kingdom's imports of manufactured goods in the average year between 1900 and 1910 was much greater than that of the United States or Germany. Germany, with the larger population, imported less than half the amount of manufactured goods that the United Kingdom imported; and the United States with a population of about two and one-half times as large, imported about two-thirds of the amount of the manufactured goods that the United Kingdom imported. The United Kingdom's imports of manufactured goods are increasing more than her exports of the same goods.

Then, it is worth while looking at the matter of the trade of the United Kingdom as a seller to foreign countries. First, as a seller to Germany. In 1880 the United States sold to Germany less than one-third of what the United Kingdom sold to that country; but in 1909 the United States sold twice as much to Germany as the United Kingdom did. Then, as a seller to the United States, Germany doubled her sales between 1880 and 1909, almost reaching the figures of the United Kingdom, which had remained practically stationary during that period. France doubled her imports from Germany, but remained almost stationary in her imports from the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom gaining only slightly in French trade while Germany was gaining very rapidly. That was due, to my mind, largely to the power of France and Germany and United States to bargain and negotiate with each other. Russia in 1909 bought two and one-half times as much from Germany as she bought from the United Kingdom, and that is probably explained by the existence of the Russo-German Trade Treaty of 1904. Before the war Germany surpassed the United Kingdom as a seller of goods in Holland, Belgium, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Roumania—ten important countries. The question why the United Kingdom permitted Germany to surpass her in this respect is one for the free trader to answer, it seems to me.

Then, from the figures of sales by the United Kingdom to her twelve colonies and possessions, it is evident that other countries were overtaking the United Kingdom as a seller in those markets. In 1880 the United Kingdom sold to the twelve important colonies and possessions £106,000,000 worth of goods; in 1909, £163,000,000 worth, an increase of a little over fifty per cent. In 1880; the colonies bought from all other countries £66,000,000 worth, and in 1909 £165,000,000 of goods. In other words, the other countries had surpassed the United Kingdom as a seller in her own colonies and possessions although the United Kingdom had started with nearly double the sales in 1880.

Then, there is another point. The net emigration from the United Kingdom was amounting before the war to many thousands a year while the net emigration from Germany before the war was practically nil.

These facts point to the conclusion, as I have said, that Germany and the United States before the war were rapidly overtaking the United Kingdom as a manufacturing nation. There is no doubt that if the Cobden theories had prevailed and his prediction had been fulfilled that within ten years all other countries in the world would adopt free trade policies, then matters would have been different and the United States would in all probability have remained more or less an agricultural country, getting all her manufactures from the United Kingdom.

The reasons why the United Kingdom is suffering under a free trade policy are as follows: The first reason is that the cost of manufacture depends more upon the quantities produced than upon any other consideration touching manufacture. In other words, the manufacturer who produces for a large market has a great advantage over the manufacturer who produces for a small market. The United Kingdom has 45,000,000 people, and that population is not protected, as a market, for the manufactures of the United Kingdom. In other words, the manufacturer of the United Kingdom has no market which he can really call his own. Germany has 65,000,000 people of her own to manufacture for, a market which is protected against the manufacturers of Great Britain and other countries. In addition to that, she has 45,000,000 people of the United Kingdom to manufacture for in a free market. In other words, she has a market of 110,000,000 people, as opposed to the market of 45,000,000 people that the manufacturers of the United Kingdom have. In the United States the difference is much more marked. The manufacturers of that country have 110,000,000 people of their own to manufacture for, a market which is protected by a high tariff, and the 45,000,000 people of the United Kingdom constitute an additional market which is open for their surplus products. That is of inestimable advantage to the manufacturers of Germany and the United States. That is one reason. The second reason is that the United Kingdom has thrown away the bargaining, negotiating power which she would possess under a protective tariff. The Russo-German Treaty was made in 1904, and Russia in 1910 was bying two and one-half times as much from Germany as from the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom has thrown that bargaining power away.

It must be remembered that international trade is based, not upon friendship or sentiment, but upon hard-headed bargaining power, the ability to fight in the markets of the world. Nobody will assert that the United Kingdom buys wheat from Canada or Australia because those two countries are part of the British Empire. She buys her wheat in the markets of the world where she can buy the best wheat at the cheapest price. There is very little sentiment in business. Germany and the United States have the advantage of being able to hold their own market with the British market thrown open, while the British manufacturer has no such advantage.

It might be well to point out that the Reciprocity Bill of 1911, which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and I myself supported, and which I have never had any particular regrets for supporting, was based upon that very negotiating and bargaining power which the United Kingdom has thrown away. We could not otherwise have had reciprocity with the United States. The Fordney Bill, which has just been put through the House of Representatives of the United States and which will shortly be injuring the farmers of this country, could not be fought under a free trade policy. We cannot fight a protective policy with a free trade policy. But under our policy, Canada can show to the United States that ultimately the United States will do more harm to themselves by the Fordney Bill than to the people of Canada. The only way in which Canada can show that is by limiting some of the imports of the United States to Canada. In other words, Canada retains that bargaining power which the United Kingdom has thrown away. The farmers of the West should remember this, that a permanent or perpetual free trade policy is a permanent or perpetual turning of the other cheek to your opponent, and the ordinary business man smiles delightedly when he sees his opponent turning the other cheek.

Another statement which is worthy of consideration is that the consumer always pays the duty. There are two mistakes in that one statement. One is that it implies that the consumer and the producer are two different people. As a matter of fact, all consumers are producers, with the exception of children, very old people and people in jails and asylums throughout the country. The second thing is that the statement is not correct. The consumer does not always pay the duty, and I will give this argument in support of my contention. Supposing a United States manufacturer is endeavouring to sell goods in the markets of Canada, and Canadian manufactured goods are as cheap as the manufactured goods of the American manufacturer. The only way in which the American or outside manufacturer can sell in the markets of Canada is by cutting his goods down to such a price that he pays the duty. It must be obvious that that is the only way in which he can compete. In England the consumer does pay the duty because in that country they put the duties entirely upon goods which are not produced there; they put the duties upon such things as tea, coffee, sugar and various other articles, that is, upon articles that are not manufactured in the United Kingdom. Therefore, in England, the consumer really pays the duty. It might be well to point out that England in the year before the war, collected by customs and excise duties more than Germany collected. Free Trade England collected, in 1913, by customs and excise duties, £71,500,000, while Germany collected £70,000,000 in the same year under a protective tariff, and in Britain all those duties are collected upon the necessaries of life. The United Kingdom, in 1913, collected, in customs duties alone, $170,000,000 and, in 1919-1920, $750,000,000. These vast amounts were collected on sugar. tobacco, tea—those are the three biggest items—cocoa, coffee, other foods, wines and liquors. There is an immense excise tariff on beer, and anybody who has lived in England, as I have, knows that the workingman looks on his beer as being just as much a necessary of life as tea. In 1918-19, the United Kingdom collected, in customs and excise taxes, on sugar, tea, tobacco, beer and matches, all, in a sense, necessaries of life, $585,000,000. As regards those articles, the workingman's family is hit just as much as the family of the manufacturer or the financier. If the United Kingdom were to impose a tariff upon manufactured goods and luxuries coming into that country, that is, shift those duties to suit herself and put them where they should be put, they would fall more upon the rich man and less upon the workingman and his family. Then in the United Kingdom, they have stringent trade union rules and factory legislation; yet they throw their markets open to countries which do not possess similar rules and regulations.

Sir Guilford Molesworth said that, in 1908, the per capita tax in Germany was only one-half what it was in the United Kingdom.

I have touched only a few of the items which I could have touched, but I have taken up sufficient time. In closing, I should like to say that, even if the free trade policy of England were admitted to be the best policy for England—and that is certainly doubtful according to the facts which I have laid before the House and which others have laid before the House on other occasions—that does not prove that it would be the best policy for Canada under her different conditions which I pointed out earlier in my remarks. I submit that absolute free trade would kill all our industries; it would drive out the different manufactures of our country. If the Fordney Bill is any criterion, if we perpetually turn the other cheek, the United States would kill not only our manufactures, but our agriculture as well. Germany and the United States are proof that countries can progress very rapidly under a protectionist policy.

I might point out one more fact, and that is this, that Canada gains many industries simply because of her protective policy. I took the trouble the other day to write the Department of Trade and Commerce asking how many American firms had established branches in Canada, and no doubt many of these have been established here because of the tariff; for instance, the Ford plant near Windsor would not have been established were it not for our protective tariff, but that plant has been established just across the river from Detroit, and many other United States firms have had to do the same thing. I received a reply covering sixteen closely typewritten pages of American firms that had opened branches in Canada. There were so many that I did not count them, but I estimated that there were somewhere between 400 and 600 plants, and no doubt many of them were established in this country because of the tariff preventing them competing in the Canadian market. In addition, Canada gains by a moderate tariff policy a bargaining or negotiating power, a larger industrial life, greater markets for her products, more opportunities for the youth of the land, greater development of our natural resources, a broader national life and a greater development of a national Canadian spirit.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I shall not trespass too long on the valuable time of the House. First of all, let me congratulate my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) upon the magnificent address that he has delivered. I regret that we lost him in 1917, because I am sure that with his eloquence and his youth he would have been quite an addition to the Liberal forces in this Parliament. I hope, however, that the young sinner will repent and that some day he will find his way across the chamber.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the Budget speech delivered by my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I think that on the whole it must be conceded that the hon. gentleman was courageous and frank, and that he is entitled to the sympathy not only of this Parliament but of the whole country in view of the appalling situation in which Canada finds herself today. There will be regret expressed all over the land, however, because of the fact that the hon. gentleman failed to implement the promise which his predecessor made on several occasions on the floor of the House, and which he himself reiterated last year when he delivered his first Budget, that there would be a revision of the tariff. When one speaks of the revision of the tariff, one naturally thinks of a revision downwards. I have, Sir, expressed the opinion that there is regret abroad that there is no revision of the tariff, but I believe that when the Budget speech is read from one end of the country to the other, the country may perhaps be satisfied with the one presentment made by the hon. gentleman, because, though there is no revision in the duties downwards, one can certainly see by glancing over the resolutions introduced by my hon. friend the day before yesterday, that there is at least some revision upwards in the tax bill. I am not at all surprised at what has happened. I have never myself believed that there would be a revision downwards by the hon. Minister of Finance or his associates in the Government.

The Commission of Inquiry which roamed across the continent from ocean to ocean last fall was an object lesson to every Canadian who followed the events of the day. As my hon. friend passed from town to town, from city to city, from province to province he met delegation after delegation, of farmers, fishermen, manufacturers, labourers, miners, indeed of all classes. I followed very closely the evidence placed before the commission, more particularly in the province from which I come. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance listened complacently to the representations made by the high tariff people, but with some nervousness to the many representations that were made to him by those who favoured a reduction in the tariff. Not only did he show some nervousness on those occasions, but he even took issue with those who dared advocate a reduction in the tariff. As my hon. friend was thus pursuing his inquiry, his leader, the present Prime Minister, nailed to the mast the colours of his party and of the Government. He preached high protection from one province to another and so I lost confidence in the revision-to-be, and it is just as well that there has been no revision at all this year, because one may conjecture what a real revision means. Mr. Speaker, there is amongst the men of my faith an accepted maxim that when Rome has spoken the case is closed—Roma locuta est, causa finita est. The Minister of Finance and the leader of the Government have spoken without equivocation on the question of the tariff, and for the Canadian people the case is now closed. Canada will have high protection; she will have a high tariff, and I am sure that that will suit my genial friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the special class which he represents.

I listened with great attention to the able speech of my young friend the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River. I am not going to join issue with him, because, indeed, he has proven too much. He has proven that John Bull is very miserable under his abominable free trade policy. That is too much for me. It is true that the evidence which my hon friend adduced in support of his theory is what I might call bookish evidence. It is not based on facts, but on theories propounded by doctrinaires who would be only too happy if the whole world was commercially at war.

Yes, my hon. friend has proven too much, and I do not propose to accept his challenge.

I am not going to discuss here the respective merits of free trade and protection. The Parliament of Canada is not an academy. The Parliament of Canada is a forum, and the people of Canada represented by the Government and by His Majesty's loyal Opposition have to face problems as they are, not as they would have them. I have read in the almanac published a century ago by Benjamin Franklin, the quaint old saying that you must take men and events as they are, not as they should be. I claim to be a practical man, and as a practical man I must face conditions, and not a theory. Living as we do under a regime of protection, and standing as I do for a moderate measure of protection, mind you, for a reasonable measure of protection, nevertheless I cannot help saying that I regret that free trade is not the trade policy of this civilized world. I wish that Canada, if it were possible, but it is not, could have free trade as they have it in England. Free trade, I need not say, is a landmark in the history of the United Kingdom; but not only that, the introduction of free trade during the last century was a distinct landmark in the history of modern civilization.

I cannot but smile when I hear such a student as the right hon. member who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen) hint that free trade has made England a poor country. Last year he told us, in so many words, that under free trade, England had become a nation of remittance men. A nation of remittance men! Free trade England, Sir, during the last war, the greatest of all conflicts that have ever perturbed this wide world, showed of what mettle she was made. During that war, free trade England financed herself, first of all, to the extent of thirty-five billion dollars, and then she financed many of the Allied nations to the extent of eight billion dollars; and free trade England, which suffered and bled during those four years, is to-day paying off her debts to the tune of one billion dollars per year. I wish that my country, Canada, could follow the lead given by that nation of remittance men. But, as I said a moment ago, Canada is not England. Canada is Canada, and in spite of the misrepresentations of the Tory press, in spite of some of the speeches which are at times delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, Canada never had a free trade policy embalmed in her statute books. And why? Because Canada, relatively speaking, is a new country, with immense territory extending from ocean to ocean, and over that vast space she has but a very sparse population, and the cost of government, civil and otherwise, is very heavy. Therefore, of necessity, the raising of revenue is a constant problem for this country.

How shall you raise your revenue? How shall you pay for the cost of your Government? There are but two ways of meeting the exigencies of revenue: indirect taxation, customs duty and excise, and direct taxation, that is, income tax. I am pleased that the Canadian people have at last learned how the revenue is raised. So long as Canada had only recourse to indirect taxation to meet her national obligations and the cost of government, and so long as she enjoyed relatively prosperous times, she did not fully realize what it was to raise a revenue. But, Sir, in Parliament, during the war, as the expenditure was growing from year to year, and reaching enormous proportions, it became imperative that recourse should be had to other sources of taxation, and I was one of the first, from my place in the House, to advocate the income tax. The income tax exists in the old countries; it has existed in France for many years. It is the most practical form of taxation, because thereby, the people feel that they have to pay, and they therefore look to their governments for the proper application of the moneys which are taken from them. Canada, therefore, has two systems of taxation, and with the customs, the instrument of taxation is, of course, the tariff. I regret that my brilliant friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) extolled to the seventh heaven, such a barbarous system, because, after all, it is a barbarous system. My hon. friend, who is very fond of history, will find in the elements of political economy, that the origin of the word "Tariff" is traced to the name of a little port in Spain, a country which he compared a moment ago to England. He will find that in Spain in the old days, when the buccaneers roved the ocean, watching for the ships laden with the goods of this world, they would leave the little port of Tarifa and then levy sums of money on the legitimate traders from Britain, France, and other countries. Hence the origin of the word tariff; Tarifa was the home of the tariff, notwithstanding that it may now obtain in Canada, America, Germany, or elsewhere.

9 p.m.

Mr. MANION: May I say that I was not lauding the tariff? My position was exactly the position of my hon. friend; I was taking necessities into account.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Now, the war is over, and the glamour of war has vanished; and my hon. friend who, as he said a moment ago, supported in 1911 the infamous Reciprocity Pact, might come across to this side, for there is no shackle that should keep him where he is at present, unless it be that his hopes are exalted, and that he anticipates finding himself some day seated next to the Minister of Finance as one of the Cabinet ministers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would be a pretty short stay.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, we in Canada are, of necessity, a protection-given people; but there are different ways of applying that policy. It is alleged in the press and in the House, by way of a taunt to us, that the Liberal party and the party opposite are alike, and that there is no real difference between hon. members on your right, Mr. Speaker, and those on your left, the only difference being as between the party angularly opposite the Minister of Finance, and the rest of the House. Well, Sir, parties in this country must be judged by their methods, by their records, by their accomplishments. Let us eliminate the war period, which I admit was an abnormal one, a period that required of this Parliament, and of the country, more sacrifices than ordinarily in the matter of taxation and expenditure.

Let us take two normal periods of recent history. Surely the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, will not disown the period which saw the birth of the National Policy, from 1879 to 1896. For our part we to your left, Mr. Speaker, are proud of the period that extends from 1896 to 1911. We are proud of the gentleman who, because he was the Finance Minister, personified that golden era which he described last year and yesterday in such eloquent language. Consider the series of deficits which mark the administration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) from 1883 until 1896—deficits which in 1896-1897 amounted to $519,000. We can compare those deficits with the surpluses which mark the Liberal administration. Thus, the year 1896-97, the last fiscal year for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was responsible, was marked by a deficit of more than half a million dollars, and the year 1911-1912 the last fiscal year for which the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was responsible, was marked by a surplus of over $37,000,000. Mr. Speaker, I say that I can compare with pride the years when I had the honour to be associated with the Laurier-Fielding administration.

To listen to hon. gentlemen opposite one would imagine that prosperity was non-existent during that period and that we should forget all about it. It is by reading history and by remembering the past that we may guide ourselves for the future. From 1878 until 1896 no less than one million Canadians drifted to the Republic to the south of us. The population of Canada in 1878 was only 4,078,000. In 1896 it had increased to 5,086,000 in round figures. In 1901, under the Liberal Government, the population of Canada was 5,403,000 and in 1911 it had grown to 7,158,000. The deposits in chartered banks and savings banks in 1878 were a little over $79,000,000. In 1896 they amounted to a little over $245,000,000. In 1911, thanks to that wave of prosperity which had passed over this country, there was in the savings banks and in the chartered banks the enormous sum of $968,183,000. The total exports of Canadian produce in 1878 were $68,000,000 in round figures; in 1896, $110,000,000; and in 1911, $274,316,000 in round figures. The total export of agricultural products in 1878 was $18,000,000; in 1896, $40,000,000; and in 1911, $82,601,000. Of manufactured products there were exported in 1878, $4,127,000; in 1896, $9,365,000; and in 1911, after the Laurier government had been in office for fifteen years the exports of manufactured products amounted to $35,283,000. I say, Mr. Speaker, that with the same basic policy, but administered by different methods and different men, the Liberal party gave Canada prosperity, whilst hon. gentlemen opposite gave Canada adversity.

Last year, and again yesterday, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's explained how he applied in 1896 the principles that were so successful. He held an inquiry from ocean to ocean. He received the farmer, the fisherman, the miner, the manufacturer, the labourer. Did he insist that those who came before his colleagues and himself should be satisfied with either a high tariff, or a low tariff, or no tariff at all? He listened, and having listened, he returned to Ottawa and framed a tariff policy which was given effect to in the session of 1897. The Liberal and Conservative policies are alike, we are told, and it is even asserted that the duties were higher under the Fielding tariff than they are under the Drayton tariff. Yesterday the member for Shelburne and Queen's explained fully and to the entire satisfaction of any unbiased mind, that there was a revision downward under his tariff reform, 47 articles were added to the free list, and there was a substantial reduction in 147 other articles. In 1907, ten years later—following the policy which my hon. friend (Mr Fielding) had adopted of revising the tariff every decade—he held another inquiry from ocean to ocean and as a result there was a further revision downward, and 253 articles were put on the free list.

Even my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance will agree with me, I think, that the establishment of the British preference was a splendid stroke of policy —a policy which was acclaimed not only by the Canadian people but by the people of the United Kingdom. It was then that Canada became known throughout the whole world. In order to make that policy effective the right hon. the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), the then Minister of Finance, obtained from the Mother Country renunciation of the Belgian and German treaties. The establishment of the British preference is a landmark in the fiscal history of Canada. First it was 12 per cent, then it was raised to 25 per cent, and finally to 33⅓ per cent.

What were the results of that policy? We are told by some of the die-hards of the Tory party that the aim of the Liberal fiscal policy, if carried out to its full intent, would be the destruction of our industries. I am glad to see my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) in his seat, for he is one of the beneficiaries of the wise Liberal policy of 1897. If he ever became the business man he is—and every one will admit that he is a good business man —it is because of the policy which was carried out under the direction of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. We were told that the industries of this country would be wiped out, and my hon. friend cited yesterday the classical phrase of the late leader of the Conservative party, Sir Charles Tupper. Well, 'et us see what happened. In 1890 the capital invested in our manufacturing industries was in round figures $331,635,100; in 1900, three years after the Fielding policy, the capital invested had reached the figure of $446,916,000; and in 1910, the year which preceded the defeat of the Liberal Government, that capital investment amounted to $1,247,583,000. Salaries and wages paid in 1890 amounted in round figures to $79,000,000; in 1900 to $113,000,000; in 1910 to $241,000,000. The value of products in 1890 in round figures represented $368,000,000; in 1900 $418,000,000; in 1910 $1,165,975,000. Those are the results of the sane application of a policy by statesmen who had regard not only to the manufacturers but to the labourers and the consumers at large.

The British preference, Mr. Speaker, was one of the mainstays of the Liberal fiscal policy of 1897. That edifice of the hon. then Minister of Finance was crowned by the reciprocity pact which he negotiated with the American Government without going on his knees to Washington but at the invitation of the President himself, while during many years before under the Dingley and McKinley tariffs,—which practically prevented Canada from trading with the United States—our statesmen from both parties had been annual pilgrims to Washington.

I for one deeply regret the present attitude taken by the U.S. Congress. These are sad forebodings—the Fordney Bill, replaced the other day by the Young Bill. That measure speaks a language which will create in many Canadian homes sincere regrets that the country went wrong in 1911. As the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's stated yesterday, with a sob of emotion in his voice, Canada could complain before 1911, but after the attitude of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) and his Government and associates, she cannot complain now because she has officially declined to accept the offer made to her. Sir, it is essential that as between Canada and the great American Republic there should be the most cordial relations. As I stated once before, the two countries speak the same language and are governed by practically the same laws, they practise the same religion and share the same ideals. The peoples of the two countries are liberty lovers and God fearing. Although we have a long boundary line between us, it is entirely unfortified and there is no cloud of misunderstanding. We have given a worthy lead to the nations of the world by settling our differences amicably, and I hope there will never be fired a shot in anger by either of the two countries. Since the war of 1812 forty-three questions between the two countries have been settled by arbitration, and because the Treaty of Ghent has been adhered to by Great Britain on the one hand and the United States on the other there has never been a ripple to speak of in the relations between both countries.

But, as the British ambassador stated in Ottawa last fall, speaking before the Canadian Club, great wars between nations are generally if not always preceded by commercial quarrels. Why should we in Canada or they in the United States pick a quarrel in respect to matters affecting our mutual trade relations? I hope, that common sense will prevail. I do not know why our friends of the Tory party are so faint hearted that they will not prosper alongside the United States by exchanging goods with them. I hope that the leader of the Government who is a staunch Britisher, can answer for the loyalty of the Tory party. I know that the leader of the Liberal party and the respected member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), whose devotion to British ideals is well recognized, can answer for the loyalty of the Reformers.

I have, I think, demonstrated, to the satisfaction of this side of the House at all events, that if it is the same basic principle which is followed of necessity—the principle of protection—at least the methods persued are different. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the methods differ. You have only to think of the period between the years 1896 and 1911. Were there any bread lines during those years? Were there any unemployed? I will not say 150,000, because that is the number of unemployed at present in Canada. I will not say 35,000, the number of unemployed in the city of Toronto alone. Were there at any time during those fifteen years 10,000, even 5,000 unemployed persons? There was no unemployment; the country was busy, almost feverish in its activities. But to-day, what a serious condition of unemployment. Then, there is the decrease in the rural population. I have not the figures for each province but I know that in the banner province of Ontario there has been a marked decrease in the rural population, and there is a loud complaint from rural constituencies that this state of things is demoralizing. The population, is decreasing in rural centres and increasing abnormally in urban centres. Did you find that state of affairs during the Liberal regime? Sir, one must judge of a policy by its results. Do you think, for instance, that during the administration of the Finance Department by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's you would have seen any coquetting with the sugar refiners of Canada one evening and the next morning a quick order given to the Board of Commerce—the Prime Minister's own creation—to force the Canadian consumer to pay 21 cents a pound for refined sugar at a time when that sugar was being sold at 11, 12 and 13 cents—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that my hon. friend is referring to me?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, no; my hon. friend is too good a soul, too humane to practice such methods. But he will not deny that all of a sudden last fall the Canadian people realized what protection by the Tory party meant. Here was a case where the Canadian consumers were forced to pay 21 cents, forced to buy from the Canadian refiner only, when across the line that same sugar could be bought at 11, 12 and 13 cents. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Government for having given to the consumers that object leason of what protection is as administered by a Tory Government.

Mr. Speaker, one must judge of a policy by its results. Who will deny that during the fifteen years of Liberal administration the vast prairies of the west became the subject of peaceful invasion on the part of sound and healthy immigrants? I have many quarrels to settle as a member of the Laurier Government, as a Canadian and, shall I say, as a French Canadian, with the ex-Minister of the Interior, Sir Clifford Sifton. But simple truth compels me to say that as Minister of the Interior he had a full grasp of the problem of immigration. I have to admit, Sir, that no Minister of the Interior ever did as much for the Canadian West as Sir Clifford Sifton did. Compare the administration of that regime with that of the present incumbent, and his immediate predecessor, and what is the spectacle that you have? The figures were given by the genial member from Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) as taken from the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration of the United States for 1920. For the year 1918-19 the total number of immigrants coming into Canada from the United States was 44,003 and for the year 1919-20, 48,624. But here is a regrettable statement to make: In 1918-19, 96,075 Canadians left Canada and drifted to the United States. Worse still, in 1919-1920, 143,843 Canadians left Canada for the United States. The net loss to Canada in 1918-1919 was 52,072 and, in 1919-20, 95,219. I say again that the two policies cannot be the same; because they are so far apart in their results. Under the Liberal regime, the West became a vast expanse of smiling fields, whilst to-day certain sections of the West, if I am correctly informed, are being desolated by this plague of emigration. Surely, Sir, it is not the same policy, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) proved that beyond peradventure yesterday as he quoted the famous comment of the late Sir Charles Tupper. For the veterans of the House who remember the kind and genial gentleman who once represented the county of Halton, and was honoured by his political friends with an appointment to the Privy Council, I might quote the late Mr. Henderson, who, speaking in 1902 on the fiscal policy of the Liberal party, used this language:

> It was said in the early days of the present tariff that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. What is being said now? I have never said so and I do not consider that they have done anything of the kind. I am only sorry that they did not, for it would have been better if they had. Their tariff is instead, just the antipodes of ours.

There you have the confession of faith of the leaders of the Conservative party that the two policies are not the same; they are applied differently, and in my judgment, applied with success by the Liberal party. This, however, is past history. What of the future? The situation is fraught and freighted with heavy responsibilities indeed. It is true that the Canadian people are tendered candid advice on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Last year, after looking at the rows of figures which constitute our national debt, our deficits, our total taxation, the right hon. gentleman said: "Oh, well, we must practise economy." These are his very words:

> Stop wasting. Go to work. Produce. Stop grouching and grumbling and we will soon get back to an atmosphere that is bright and happy and hopeful.

Fine words that butter no parsnips. The right hon. gentleman comes back this year, and he is again a spectator of that enormous row of figures, marshalled in his presence, so to speak, like an army, billions of national debt, millions of deficits, millions of taxes, and this time he says: "Oh, it was the war. During war time, the slogan was: more money, more munitions and more clothing." The right hon. gentleman should not forget that three years ago on November next, the armistice was signed. The glamour of war has passed away, and under the fierce light of criticism, this veneer of a pretext disappears completely. During the war my right hon. friend knows that money was easy to get, because the people were determined to win the war; they were enthusiastic, and they were ready to make all necessary sacrifices in order to reach the goal of victory. But that glamour has passed away and Canada must now face realities. The right hon. gentleman cannot lure the people any longer with fine rhetoric. During the war rivers of gold, of course, were flowing with such extravagant loans as were launched by my hon. friend's predecessor through the medium of untaxable victory bonds which have created in this country a monied aristocracy. I commend the courage and patriotism of the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). The war was over; he launched his loan, and trusted the patriotism of the people. The bonds were not as before, untaxable. Not only have we to face an enormous debt of $2,350,000,000; not only have we to raise this year $435,360,000 on an estimated revenue, according to present legislation, of $372,600,000; but what the people of this country must realize is that besides this enormous Dominion debt, there are provincial debts and municipal debts as well, so that the taxpayer is burdened with a very heavy taxation bill. I had prepared by the Dominion statistician some figures which are very eloquent. The Dominion Government per capita debt in 1920 was $300, in round figures, while the Dominion Government per capita debt, in 1914, was only $43. As regards the provincial per capita debt, I regret the figures do no go beyond 1919, but the figures of this year are certainly greater than those of 1919. Prince Edward Island has a per capita debt of $15.59; Nova Scotia, $29.56; New Brunswick, $64.95; Quebec, $18.90; Ontario, $34.59; Manitoba, $75.30; Saskatchewan, $43; Alberta, $75.83; British Columbia, $52.13. You must add this provincial per capita debt to the Dominion Government per capita debt. Besides that, you have the municipal debts all over Canada. Unfortunately the rural municipalities and the towns do not all send in their statistics to the Dominion statistician, but I have here the figures for a few of the largest cities in Canada, showing the municipal per capita debt: Montreal, $176.62; Toronto, $219.70; Winnipeg, $230.61; Vancouver, $236.21; Calgary, $371.33; Halifax, $109.94; St. John, $85.25; Regina, $291.90; Charlottetown, $59.90.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these gross or net debts?

Mr. LEMIEUX: These are net debts, but gross or net, they make an alarmingly large figure when added together. This country is taxed to the limit, and overtaxed. I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on behalf of the taxpayers of this Dominion. I know that my appeal will reach his ears, and I hope his heart too. I could read him letters by the score, from rich men, from people of the middle classes, and from the labouring classes, showing a great deal of anxiety as to how they can face the tax bills of the municipal, provincial and Dominion governments combined. I solemnly ask my hon. friend to live up to his oath of office, as I know he will. Let there be a substantial reduction in the expenditure of the Government, and a policy of retrenchment inaugurated under his regime. In view of this alarming situation, it seems to me that we should concentrate all our efforts on Canada, our country. How should we proceed? I believe in the doctrine which is expressed in the old saying "first things first." How can this Parliament concentrate all its attention and all its efforts on the welfare of Canada?

First, we should revert to responsible Government. This Parliament is not representative of the people of Canada. How can you otherwise account for the lack of interest taken in the proceedings of this House? I have sat in the House of Commons now for 25 years, when Canada never had to face problems such as she is facing now, but, Sir, in no past Parliament have I witnessed such a lack of interest in its proceedings. Yesterday I expressed my surprise to my hon. friend who sits at my right, the able and eloquent member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), that during the address delivered by the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, admittedly one of the great orators of this country, a man of very wide experience indeed, there should be only a handful of members on his own side to listen to him. Quick as a flash came the answer from my hon. friend, "Because this Parliament is not representative of the people. It is an abnormal Parliament which only fills a gap. The people of Canada are intent on having an election."

This Government has no mandate, and why should any party sail under false colours? I can quite understand that under the stress of war a coalition Government might be formed, although the history of all coalitions both in England and in Canada is a sad one indeed, but why should a party continue to sail under false colours? Mr. Speaker, this is a British country; we have British ideals of government. There is a Liberal party, an historic party; there is a Conservative party, an historic party. Each represents a tradition. Why should a party absorb the names of all the parties, Conservative, Liberal and National? The name of the party opposite is a misnomer. Let the Tories show their true colours; let the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) who is associated with such a great Liberal statesman, let my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy river and other hon. gentlemen who in a moment of weakness joined the Tory party return to the fold. Let me at this point quote what was said not long ago by Mr. Asquith:

> My counsel to you is to keep faithful to your old traditions, to safeguard and vivify your organization and never lose sight of that saving quality which alone makes politics a reputable profession for honourable men, that a party exists not to keep power, not to acquire power, but it exists for the promotion of great and worthy ideals.
> Just think, in a situation such as this, what would have been the attitude of men like Mr. Gladstone? Do you think they would have allowed themselves to be scared by the bogey of bolshevism—

One would almost think that Mr. Asquith was speaking in answer to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen):

> —into furling the old flag and marching, with bowed head and reversed arms, horse, foot and artillery, into the camp of the enemy?

Mr. Speaker, let us have a return to the fold on the part of those who in their heart of hearts, in their inner consciousness, feel to-day that they are untrue to their life-long principles.

Second, let us have a free press. Is there anything more degrading than the correspondence which has been published recently showing that one of the heads of the Manufacturers' Association of Canada has been summoning editors to his office and then making terms with them? The vast majority of them, I dare say, were true to their convictions and refused to become time servers to the high tariff association. But is there anything more degrading in public life than the realization that in this young country, with such a great future ahead of it, those whose mission is to inform the constituencies should be under the whip of a representative of the big interests, and who will go the length of poisoning the wells of public opinion? Sir, this very day, in the city of Montreal, there is a case pending before the courts in which Lord Atholstan is suing the editor of La Patrie for the recovery of a very large sum of money which is alleged to have been paid to secure the support of that paper during the elections of 1911; and according to the press, the defendants are summoning as their witnesses the ex-Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden), and the ex-Minister of Public Works. I have no doubt that both of these gentlemen will appear before the court at Montreal and will leave that tribunal with clean hands; but if it were proven that a party raised from big interests $50,000 or $60,000 to control one paper and one paper only during one campaign, then I say that one must despair of the future of this young country.

Having secured free Parliament and a free press, let us banish patronage forever from the public life of this country. It was said in 1911, Mr. Speaker, that at last the voice of Toronto would be heard during the elections. Will my hon. friend the Minister of Finance listen for one second to the voice of Toronto? As he lives in Ottawa, the civil servants in the capital might shout, perhaps, too loudly, and my hon. friend might be deafened by the uproar; but the voice of Toronto has time to mellow before reaching his ears. Here is what I read from the Civil Service Association of Toronto, in regard to Bill No. 122, as drafted and introduced by that dear old gentleman, the minister without portfolio (Mr. Spinney), who is astray in a field in which he does not belong. The Civil Service Association of Toronto states:

> The Bill as drafted will provide for:
> First: The substitution of political influence instead of merit in the most important appointments to the public service.
>
> Second: The substitution of political influence instead of merit in promotions.
>
> Third: The repeal of the present preference to returned soldiers in the most important appointments.
> Fourth: The nullification of the work of classification and reorganization.
> Fifth: The introduction of political partisanship, political influence and inefficiency into the public service of Canada,— > from which it will be seen that all incentive to ambition and efficiency in the service is removed and servants of the public are again placed at the mercy of patronage mongers.

I may not be in order in discussing a Bill which is now under consideration, but I am only inferentially referring to it, and I say that if you revive patronage, you work against what I think is and should be the aim of the Minister of Finance, namely, the practice of economy and retrenchment.

10 p.m.

I said a moment ago that we should concentrate all our efforts on Canada. In the name of common sense, let us not embark upon Imperial ventures. The last war was fought for the purpose of ending all wars, and the madness of armaments has gone for ever, I trust. The sabre-rattling business has been consigned to the junk heap. Let us call a holiday in connection with armaments once and for all. There is no necessity at the present time for Canada to spend the millions which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intends to devote to the naval service. The hon. gentleman can well do with at least one half of that amount. For the pride of carrying out, as he said this afternoon,—and no one on the other side seemed to evince any nervousness upon the statement—the Laurier naval policy, I am quite willing to spend about half the amount which my hon. friend has put in the Estimates, although I do not suppose that for this year or next year, or for the next five years to come, it will be necessary to spend any money at all. But it can patrol the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, and we can have our naval academies and yards open; but it is unnecessary to spend this large initial amount. The trouble with my hon. friend the Minister of Marine is that he has developed an enormous appetite, he has been diving into millions and millions since the war began, and since he has been in the Government, and he cannot stop. Let me tell him in all sincerity we accept his statement that he has brought his political associates to time, he has made them accept the once abhorred naval policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the principle of autonomy upon which that policy rests, but he should call a halt to more naval expenditure. Mr. Speaker, we should cut the frills of the Militia Department. There is no necessity for the Militia Department spending twenty millions this year. We can certainly do with twenty-five per cent at most of the amount placed in the Estimates under that head. As regards the mounted police I would send them into our western territories. I say to the Government "Practise economy and retrenchment not by word of mouth but by actual deeds." This Washington Embassy outlay—well, it is better to write it off. Nobody believes in it and it is $100,000 net loss to the country; or perhaps it is $100,000 to pick up a quarrel with the Mother Country under the shelter of the British Embassy at Washington. The mercantile marine is too costly a toy. Fifty millions spent on that mercantile marine!

Mr. DUFF: Seventy millions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Seventy millions spent on that mercantile marine under present circumstances is nothing short of a scandal. The best authority in this country on shipping is, I presume, a gentleman whom my hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne), well knows, the Chairman of the Canadian Ocean Services, Mr. Bosworth. Speaking at Vancouver not so very long ago that gentleman said:

"I could get all the ships I want, enough to fill your whole harbour (Vancouver) here for from $50 to $75 a ton" Therefore, considering this tonnage shrinkage, there has not only been experienced an actual loss in operation, but a serious depreciation in capital as well. Last year every ship in operation could have been disposed of for what they cost; to-day it is doubtful whether they could be sold for two-thirds of their cost for this condition, four things are responsible:

(1) An unlooked-for surplus of ships. (There are 16,000,000 more tons of shipping in the world to-day than at the beginning of the war);

(2) A decline in ocean freight rates. (On some commodities it has been as much as 65 per cent);

(3) Smaller cargoes; and

(4) An increase in operation costs; supplies and wages having advanced from between 100 and 300 per cent.

I commend these words to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. He must substantially reduce the expenditure and retrench if he hopes to restore the credit of Canada. As was said the other day Canada, for many years to come, will be a borrowing nation. But, Sir, the lending nation will always look at the balance sheet of Canada, and when it sees such a rash programme as the one propounded by the Minister of Marine if it loans Canada at all it will be at such rates that we may well call them exorbitant.

The railway problem has to be met and it is indeed an appalling one. I shall not discuss this subject this evening, but I may have something to say upon it at a later date in the session. The only means I know of to meet this emergency is for the Government to inaugurate a vigorous policy of immigration and of land settlement. I am told that there are in the far West twenty-five million acres of unoccupied agricultural lands, within twenty-five miles of existing railways. No later than yesterday I read from Canadian Finance the following:

The settlement of 20,000,000 acres of lands in Western Canada during the next few years will have far-reaching effects. Divided into approximately 100,000 farms it would mean an influx of 100,000 farmers with their families. The average family numbering five—we would, therefore, have 500,000 persons added to our agricultural population. It is found that the agricultural population of a country needs an equal population in industrial life which means an addition of 500,000 to the population of the cities, towns and villages of Western Canada.

The increases in national wealth which would result from the accomplishment of the aim of the Western Canada Colonization Association may be summarized as follows:

New wealth brought in by settlers
New wealth brought in by settlers.	$ 150,000,000
Net worth of new farm production in perpetuity	1,875,000,000
New capital attracted from abroad for industrial undertakings	75,000,000
Worth of new wealth resulting from profits on handling new farm production	500,000,000
Total	$2,600,000,000

This vigorous land policy would increase the production of our farmers, and would thereby increase the freight available for our railway system, thus reducing the deficit.

The great asset of Canada is her soil, the great asset of Canada is the natural resources of her vast territory. After all who shall pay this debt, this enormous debt, of ours? No doubt the revenue raised by means of taxation will pay a part of that national debt but it is through the farmer and the export of the produce of the farm, through the miner and the export of the produce of our mines, that the national debt of Canada will eventually be paid.

On this point may I call the attention of the Government to the little encouragement which is given to the mining industry. The prospecting, the proving, the developing and the operating of the mines are the four great stages of this industry. In the first three departments money is constantly expended, a very large proportion of it yielding not only no profit but no return whatever—the money is lost. Does it not appear reasonable that those who thus risk their money should be entitled to a square deal and be enabled to purchase such diversified machinery as may be required, selecting the market where the best can be purchased and where the expenditure will go the farthest. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I would like the Government in their fiscal policy to consider the case of the miner and the prospector, as I would like the Government to consider the case of the farmer in the way of cheap agricultural implements. It must not be forgotten that producers of minerals have, in the majority of cases, to compete against the world. Hence they should be safeguarded against enhancement in the cost of the necessary preliminary and experimental operations, and also against an enhanced cost of development.

Now, let me turn my attention to another subject. I have listened with a great deal of attention this afternoon to the remarks of my good friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He has been very complimentary to his native province. He has repeated what we have read in the press for the past year, that Quebec is a sane, sober-minded province, that her people are liberty-loving, law-abiding and God-fearing. I accept those compliments, Mr. Speaker. I regret that my hon. friend during the election of 1917, when he delivered a speech at Hamilton, was not so complimentary about the men from Quebec. Pardon me if I am a litle personal—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If my hon. friend will allow me, I never made a speech at Hamilton during the election.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At London?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At London.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, really they are not very far apart. At any rate I accept the correction.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I wish also to inform my hon. friend, without knowing what he is going to say, that never at London or any other place did I utter one word against the province of Quebec, either when its citizens were in the uniform of the King or otherwise; quite the contrary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has a poor memory.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I know what I said.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He has been figuring in so many millions respecting his ships and drydocks, that he forgets easily his rhetoric on that occasion, but I cannot forget his words—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I know what I said.

Mr. LEMIEUX:—because he said on that occasion: "I do not take my Liberalism from the Lauriers, the Lemieux, the Bourassas and the Lavergnes." What did he mean when he said that, especially about Sir Wilfrid Laurier—and, if I may also ask, about myself? Did he mean that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had no interest in the war which brought the hon. gentleman to the Conservative party? Did he mean that I had no interest in the war? Can he explain what he meant? I will accept his explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend by that speech made what I would call in law an innuendo against my loyalty, and I resent that because, as my hon. friend said this afternoon, if in the province of Quebec racially we are French—and we are proud of our ancestry—politically we are British. Then what was the meaning of that speech about Sir Wilfrid Laurier, his old and trusted leader, who said in 1914 that his heart was in the great conflict, and who proved true to the words he then uttered? During his whole life, including the war period, my revered leader, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was loyal through and through. And I was loyal, too. But I do not boast of my loyalty; my loyalty does not spring from the lips, it is in my heart.

My hon. friend said that we, the Liberal members on this side of the House, were satisfied at the isolation of our province. First of all, I would remind him that our province is not isolated. The Government is isolated, and my hon. friend is isolated in the aforesaid province. He promised that he would do his best to dissolve what he calls the bloc. Well, he can begin to-morrow or next week in the old riding of Yamaska. I and my friends accept the challenge. I know that my hon. friend will be given a cordial and courteous reception if he comes into the county of Yamaska. I will be there on Saturday next, nomination day, with my good friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). I invite the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, his colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and his other colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) to be present on the platform. My hon. friend may say, "But I cannot deliver a speech in French." I will speak in English; my hon. friend will do likewise. I invite the whole press of Canada to send representatives. Our language there will not differ from our language here.

My hon. friend made a false step this afternoon. I could see by the attitude of the right hon. Prime Minister that he felt quite uneasy. When asked by the hon. member for Quebec East if the Government had a candidate in Yamaska, my hon. friend at once answered, "Yes, Mr. Mondou is the Government candidate in Yamaska." My hon. friend says so still, I understand. Well, if Mr. Mondou is the Government candidate, it is well that the House should know what he thinks of the Government, and what is his opinion of the Prime Minister whose candidate he also is, if one accepts the principle of ministerial solidarity. The right hon. gentleman became Prime Minister last summer after a caucus, not after an appeal to the Canadian electorate. Mr. Mondou was just back from Europe at that time, and that great paper, La Presse, which was quoted with such pride this afternoon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, despatched one of its reporters to get from Mr. Mondou his opinion of the new Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, I have crossed swords on many occasions with the right hon. leader of the Government. I differ toto coelo from him. His principles and my principles cannot agree; his policy and my policy are as far apart as night from day. But, Mr. Speaker, I would never for the life of me dare express about the Prime Minister of Canada—who, after all, is the first citizen of the country—the opinion expressed by his candidate in the present election of Yamaska. Now my hon. friend will see what a false step he made. Remember that Mr. Mondou, in the county of Yamaska, says that he is the Mondou candidate, not the Government candidate, and will have no Government supporters around him. This, of course, is the old trick of 1911. Here is the text of the interview. On July 8, 1920, one of the reporters of La Presse interviewed Mr. A. A. Mondou, ex-Dominion member for the county of Yamaska, and here is that gentleman's appreciation of the Prime Minister:

> The selection of the Hon. Mr. Arthur Meighen is the worst that could have been made. Do they take the Canadian people for a lot of imbeciles, since they will impose that narrow-minded man as the head of the Government of this country? He is the most bigoted politician who sits at Ottawa, and with all that, as a minister, an undiluted chauvinist. He sees nothing but the West.

My hon. friends from the prairies will be very much surprised to hear that.

> He has not the breath of mind necessary to enable him to become a Prime Minister. He may represent the West, but not the true sentiment of the West. If one takes into account the public sentiment in the various provinces, I do not believe that he could have one of his ministers re-elected. With a Prime Minister like Mr. Meighen the province of Quebec can expect nothing—not only nothing reasonable, but nothing fair. It is an open secret that he has been the High Executioner of the Government during the war period. Consult the public records: the thirty five millions—he is the one who got them from Parliament. The gag—he is the inventor of the gag. In Borden—

I quote ipsissima verba.

> —the Canadian people lose an indifferent being, but in Meighen they take a hangman and an autocrat. That man represents the quintessence of ultra-Toryism. Sir Thomas White would have accepted the task of forming a Government, but he exacted in advance the sanction of a general election, and then he would have made peace with the province of Quebec. But the hon. Mr. Meighen snaps his fingers at Quebec and will treat our province during peace time as he treated her during war time. I am convinced that we shall have elections, but come what may, I will be a candidate in Yamaska.

Now, having read this to the House—and I assume my hon. friend will accept my English version of it—I again ask him if Mr. Mondou is still the candidate of the Government in Yamaska.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very glad Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has given me this opportunity to answer this question. The article that he has just read is, of course, quite familiar to me and to all members, especially those from the province of Quebec. My hon. friend takes everything that he has just read as the gospel truth.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But it is from La Presse.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Quite so, but my hon. friend has lived long enough to know that he must not take for gospel everything that he reads even in the daily newspapers of the city of Montreal. Mr. Mondou will make his reply in good time. I am happy to say that he is the Government candidate in Yamaska.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Gaspé invited the answer to his question, and now that the Minister of Marine has spoken I trust that the hon. member will not expect replies to further questions on the subject, as that would be entirely out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The question, Mr. Speaker, was put by the member for Gaspé, and now the member for Maisonneuve will address the House.

In conclusion, let me say to my hon. friend who has charge of the Yamaska election and of the Government candidate in that election that Quebec is as sane to-day as she was yesterday and so she will be to-morrow. Let me remind my hon. friend that Quebec is as adamant to flattery as she has been to insults, and as she is to corruption and bribery. My hon. friend spoke somewhat lightly about the representation in this House from the province of Quebec; he seemed to treat my fellow members with very scant consideration. It is strange, however, that he and his friends have been systematically poaching on the Liberal preserves of late. We may be bad fellows indeed, but if perchance we would join hands with him and betray our Liberal faith, perhaps we might be regarded as rather good accomplices. In the elections of 1917 Quebec elected 62 Liberal members out of a total representation of 65. It was Edmund Burke, I think, who said, speaking about the American rebels, that you could not draw up a bill of indictment against a whole people. If Quebec was wrong—well, as it is said of the Pope of Rome, when he speaks ex cathedra, she was in my judgment, infallibly right at the last election. Quebec, Sir, elected 62 Liberal members out of 65, against the Government and the faction which my hon. friend represents. Quebec to-day is just as much opposed to the Government as she was then. My province is entitled to choose her own associates, her own political partners. We live in a free country. If my hon. friend reads the history of the French Canadian race since it has been blessed with responsible government he will realize that my fellowmen have some regard for honour in public life. A man may become "honourable" by law—that is one thing, but to remain honourable is another thing. Hon. gentlemen on this side do not wish to become honourable only by law; they prefer to remain honourable purely and simply.

In the province of Quebec the people read history; they have some education. They remember that at the beginning of the last century Castlereagh was able to bribe a whole party, even a whole Parliament. But they know also that it was the cause of all the miseries, agitations, contentions, which have since desolated Ireland. Quebec will not be reduced to servitude as the Irish were under the corrupt agencies of Castlereagh. Quebec knows that liberties once lost are never recovered; that honour unsullied, fidelity never wavering, loyalty to political ideals, is, after all, the background of self-respect. To my hon. friend I say in all earnestness: Quebec is not for sale.

Mr E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I will not pretend to follow my hon. friend nor to criticise his argument to any extent, for the simple reason, that the best part of his argument at least was a resumé of the Liberal regime from 1896 to 1911. As I happened to be a supporter of the Liberal Government at that time, it would look very inconsistent on my part, I am sure, to disagree with the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). I quite agree with what he said regarding the progress of the country during that period. He criticised the Government, however for the price of sugar being kept at 21 cents per pound when sugar was selling in the United States at 11 cents per pound. I was never in favour of the appointment of the Board of Commerce, as any hon. member who has sat in the House with me perhaps, knows. But I will say for the board that when sugar was selling at 30 cents per pound in the United States, they kept the price down in Canada to 23½ cents per pound by the hundred pounds. I know very well that when sugar was selling at 30 cents per pound in Detroit, it was selling in our town at 23½ cents, and that was the case for some time. They promised, I understand, or it was so stated, that when the price of sugar declined, they would give the refiners in this country an opportunity to make good what they had lost during the time that the board had kept the refiners down to a losing price when the price of raws was 18½ to 21 cents, and they were selling to the public refined sugar at 23½ cents.

The hon. member also said that there was a lack of interest in this Parliament, and that the reason for that was, as has been stated so many times during this session, that Parliament had not the confidence of the country. In ordinary representative bodies such as municipal councils, where a municipal council is not criticised by the public, that is generally because it has the confidence of the people and the people are perfectly satisfied. I take it for granted that the same thing is true in proportion as the sphere of representation grows wider. Therefore, I imagine that the reason why there is not more interest in what is going on in Parliament is that the people of Canada are perfectly satisfied that Parliament will carry on the affairs of the country properly. I therefore cannot agree with my hon. friend in his contention in that regard.

My hon. friend cited some figures with regard to immigration and the settlement of land in the West. In a very short space of time by those figures he not only settled the West, but paid off the national debt. This reminds me of the story of the fellow who invented an eye wash which he was trying to sell at fifty cents a bottle. He sat down and calculated that in the United States there were 50,000,000 people and that at fifty cents a bottle he would have an estimated profit of $25,000,000, because the eye wash was costing him nothing but the cost of the bottle. I am reminded of that story because the hon. member was going to fill up the West and pay off the national debt in a short time, according to the figures of the theorist who had compiled them.

I must congratulate the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) upon the Budget that he has presented to the House. In the first place he has increased the sales' tax. I know, by certain letters that I received and by other letters, that a good deal of pressure was brought to bear upon the minister to impose what is called a turnover tax which would have gone down all the way to the retailer. He has refused to impose that tax, and he has confined the sales tax to the manufacturer, the wholesaler and the importer. I congratulate him upon that because I think he is wise in so acting. It would be a most expensive matter to collect a turnover tax from the retailer. There are so many retailers in the country who do not keep proper books that it would have been absolutely impossible to collect the tax and to trace it up properly.

I also congratulate the minister upon dropping the business profits tax. I would have preferred to see the business profits tax dropped at least a year ago, because that tax took away from the manufacturer the money that he should have put in reserve for a rainy day, for the very times that are on us now. Last winter, if the business people and manufacturers of the country had been allowed to retain the profits they made during the last three or four years, they could have continued to employ labour to a much greater extent than they were able to employ it, because they would have had a reserve upon which they could have worked. As it was, some of them had even to borrow money to pay the taxes to which they were exposed. Unfortunately, banks, like other institutions, have a limit to the amount they can lend to allow manufacturers to pile up goods with the prospect of selling them at some time in the future. Therefore that increased, to a large extent, unemployment this winter throughout the manufacturing sections of Canada.

I congratulate the minister also on not increasing the income tax. It was feared by a good many people that if the business profits tax was taken off the income tax would be increased. As a matter of fact, in my judgment, the minister did not lose anything by doing away with the business profits tax this year, because I doubt if there will be a very great profit in the ordinary manufacturing or commercial business this year. I think he will get a great deal more revenue from the income tax as it stands now than he would have got from the business profits tax. Therefore, he showed wisdom in doing away with the business profits tax and retaining the income tax. Many people find fault with the income tax on corporations. Not so much fault is found with the income tax on individuals; but on corporations the income tax is exacted before there is any distribution to the people who make up the corporation, that is, the shareholders. Afterwards, the shareholders also pay income tax. They are allowed, of course, the normal tax on dividends; at least, I presume they will be, as they were in the case of the business profits tax.

Our taxes have to be paid; we have to pay our way, no matter who has to pay the taxes, and again I congratulate the Minister of Finance on his wisdom in seeing, to the best of his ability, that we do pay our way. I think we should have done so during the war more than we did. That brings me to the question of the tariff.

I doubt if the whole people of any country would ever agree on the question of the tariff. There are so many different views expressed with regard to it. It is true that the Minister of Finance travelled from ocean to ocean getting the views of various classes of people on the tariff, but I doubt if he was very much wiser when he got through than when he started as to what would be best in the interests of the country, because every class of people that came before him, and almost every individual, had a different view as to what the tariff should be. It is true that a good many people expected a revision of the tariff. It is also true that a good many items in the present tariff might quite properly have been reduced. It is equally true that a moderate increase could have been made to a good many items without hurting materially the people who bought the goods. The Minister decided, however, that it was not wise owing to world trade conditions to make a general revision of the tariff this year, and I cannot help but think that he was right. If there was any one thing that popularized the late Laurier Government in this country, and gave honour to the Minister of Finance in that Government, the present member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) it was the stability that he lent to the tariff during those fifteen years. The business world knew where they were, and on account of that stability that the ex-Minister of Finance lent to the tariff, his name is honoured by the business men of this country to this day. I therefore think that until the Minister of Finance can better size up the trade situation of the world, it is wise to postpone a general revision of the tariff, and I am pleased that he has done so.

Speaking of the tariff itself, I said a moment ago that everybody has his own views as to what the tariff should be. Naturally the people who have protection on the goods they manufacture are pleased with that part of the tariff. The fellow that has to pay the increased cost is not so pleased; that is also natural. But we have to raise the money, and let me say right here that there is no customs tariff than can be put on that does not carry with it the protective principle. A tariff, no matter how low it is, has to carry the protective principle to that extent. Therefore, those of us who are in favour of a tariff, whether it be moderate or high, are in favour of protection to that extent. Personally, I am in favour of a moderate tariff. A man who is manufacturing goods, no matter of what kind, if he has a high tariff and is a little greedy, will take advantage of the tariff, and it gets him into a slovenly way of doing business; he does not get down to hard pan; he does not cut out the non-essentials and get down to the essentials, and do business as a first-class business man has to do in order to succeed. That is why I am opposed to a high tariff on any class of goods, but I am very much in favour of a moderate tariff and a reasonable protection.

Some people talk of a tariff for revenue only. I wonder if they really consider what that really means. So far as I can work it out, a tariff for revenue only means that the Minister of Finance would have a snap so far as the tariff is concerned. All he would have to do would be to sit down and see what the imports were for the year before, and then figure out how much revenue he wanted to raise; then, if the imports for the year before amounted to $1,000,000,000, let us say, and he wants to raise $200,000,000, he puts a tariff of 20 per cent on everything. That is a revenue tariff. Would the people of this country be satisfied with that kind of a tariff? Or would they prefer a tariff that exempts from its operation the things that are in daily use, the so-called necessaries of life? I know some very fine business men in this country who are in favour of a so-called revenue tariff, that is, the same amount of tariff on everything, raw material and finished goods.

Speaking of reciprocity, I was in favour of reciprocity. I am pleased to say that I was one of the very few Liberals in Ontario that came back after the reciprocity campaign. I was strongly in favour of reciprocity, but to say that reciprocity was free trade is preposterous. That arrangement touched only very slightly the manufactures of this country. As a matter of fact, the goods that were mainly affected by reciprocity, such as foodstuffs and agricultural implements, have been made cheaper since 1911 than they would have been under the reciprocity agreement. I am just as strongly in favour of reciprocity to-day, because as I said a moment ago it hardly had a perceptible effect on the manufacturing industries of this country. I still give my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's very great credit for the effort he made at that time to make a satisfactory arrangement with the United States.

I should not like anyone in this House to run away with the idea that the American people are going to base their tariff in any shape or form upon sympathy with or goodwill for Canada. The Yankee is out for himself first, last, and all the time, and he is going to do whatever he thinks is in the best interests of his own country, no matter whether it hurts us or England, or any other country. From the financial standpoint he knows what he is doing most of the time, even if he is catering to politics to a certain extent, as some other countries do some of the time.

Now, listening to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) one would almost think that England was a free trade country. It is most astonishing to me to hear the hon. gentleman advance the argument that England has a free trade policy. He said this afternoon, in support of his free trade argument, that the exports of Canada had fallen off in March by some $100,000,000. As a matter of fact, the exports of Canada did not fall in March in proportion to the decline that took place in England. Indeed, England was very much exercised over the decline in her exports in March; but it had nothing more to do with free trade and tariff than I have to do with the Government of China.

It is all nonsense to talk about England being a free trade country. The duty paid on imports into the United Kingdom in 1919 was £141,908.81. If you take that and take the population of England at 43,000,000, and the population of Canada at 9,000,000, you will find that, approximately, England paid $16.30 per capita, and Canada $18 per capita. So that England was not much more of a free trade country than Canada; but the worst of it is that England's large collections were on what we would call necessities; at least that is the case with some of her large collections. For instance, sugar refined and unrefined, paid £35,000,000, and tea, £17,000,000—I am speaking in round figures. We would call these articles necessities, and I imagine that they do in England. At any rate, I know that there is an awful lot said in the papers when they raise duty on these things.

Mr. CALDER: Will the hon. member please repeat the per capita figures which he gave I think there must be some mistake; they should be ten times what he stated.

Mr. NESBITT: Perhaps they are; I only worked it out in my mind. Perhaps it is $16.30 and $18.

Mr. CALDER: That is, no doubt, right.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes; I put the decimals in the wrong place. Now, I should like to say a word to the Minister of Finance, in regard to the income tax collections. I am not in favour of the system of income tax collections which he has put into force, because it is going to cause a great deal of bother and ill feeling, and in my judgment there will be too many unnecessary fines. It would have been much better to have collected the income tax as he did before, sending the tax sheets to those who should pay and giving them notice that they must have their return in by a certain date. If he did that, then I would be in perfect agreement with him if he fined those who did not pay any attention to the notice. No fine is levied, of course, for any error in addition, but if you make an error in any other respect you are subject to a fine, and it will cause a great deal of confusion if the present system is continued. I trust the minister will see his way clear to readjust matters in some way. Besides that, the papers are too technical at present for farmers. My office at home is continually making out reports for farmers. There is nothing in it for us, but we cannot very well object to making these returns for them because they do not really understand how to do it, and naturally they come to us for help. I say, the papers are too technical for farmers. I am not much of a mathematician, nor an accountant, but I certainly could devise a much simpler form for farmers to make their returns upon, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance cannot find anyone else to assist him in this respect, I will do so without charge.

Now, coming to the revenue. This, roughly speaking, is in the neighbourhood of $400,000,000; my hon. friend gives it at $372,600,000, but we will say $400,000,000. The Estimates already tabled, amount to over $582,000,000, and some $9,000,000 extra, altogether over $590,000,000, or nearly $600,000,000. Of course, a good portion of this is treated as loans to the railways. I know that it is no sinecure for the Minister of Finance to finance this country at the present time without criticism from anyone. Personally, I am not going to criticise him, but I will ask some of the other ministers to help him out a bit, because I do not see any other way in which he can make the finances balance than by economy, and I am certainly opposed, as he is, to any more borrowing. Last year income and expenditure did not balance. The Minister of Finance had left over from the year before some $101,000,000 and, as he stated frankly, he utilized that so that he wound up with a small surplus. .Nearly all, or at least a great many of the Estimates have passed, and in my judgment a great deal of this money can be saved without doing the country a bit of harm this year. I know that there is a great attack on the Government for expenditures all over the country. It is a mistake for members to want expenditures in their own sections merely because they desire improvements immediately. Our great public works, of course, will have to go on to a certain extent for the purpose of engaging the unemployed. But take the Department of Railways and Canals, and I am sorry the minister (Mr. Reid), is not here; he can easily save that $300,000, or whatever the vote was that was passed the other night for extending the Trent Valley Canal over to Georgian bay. With all deference to the hon. gentleman, I suggest that it is not worth half a dollar to transportation after it is built. Talk about carrying grain on it! Well, you might carry it in your pocket and sail in the boat. That money could be saved this year. The building of the Welland canal is, in my judgment, a different proposition altogether, because there you have a great transportation system. It is part of what will be one day the greatest transportation system in the world for carrying the grain of the West, both American and Canadian. However, I do not think it will be necessary to spend $5,000,000 because, unless the system is being built under contract, there ought to be a reduction in the cost of the work before next Fall, and there certainly ought to be a material reduction in the price of labour. You cannot tell me that the cost of living is not coming down. The other day our local paper interviewed the grocers of the town with respect to the price of various commodities, and I have here an excerpt from that paper giving the results of inquiry. If hon. gentlemen will kindly listen I will tell them what those prices are and they will see how much the cost of living has been reduced within the last year. I have not the same faith in the figures compiled and issued by the Department of Labour that other people seem to have, because I have seen those figures analysed, item by item, and they give a very false impression in my opinion about the cost of living—that is if one wishes to live reasonably and we must all live according to our means. These are the figures in question:

	A Year Ago	Now
Granulated sugar	$23.00	$11.25
Flour	7.50	5.00
Lard	35	.16
Shortening	.33	.14
Laundry Soaps	.12½	.08⅓
Corn syrup (2 lb. tins)	.35	.25
Rolled Oats	.07	.05
Best grade rice	.22	.11
Oleomargarine	.42	.30
Potatoes, per bag	7.50	.90
Pure Jams, 4 lb. tins	1.40	.83
Beans	.12	.07
Tapioca	.20	.09
Prunes	.25	.15
Eggs	.50	.29
Cornstarch	.12	.12

That will give an idea of the reduction in the cost of living in the town that I come from, and the prices there, so far as I know, are practically the same as they are in the cities throughout Ontario.

Mr. DECHENE: To what figure has butter been reduced in the hon. member's district.

Mr. NESBITT: It has been reduced from about sixty cents down to forty or thirty-five cents.

Mr. DECHENE: May I tell the hon. member that butter is selling in Montreal at twenty-six cents this week.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. NESBITT: That is all right; it is a reduction. It hurts the fellow that is selling the butter a little, but still the price is coming down. I say that prices are coming down, and that the cost of building the Welland canal should also be lowered, unless the work is under contract at a certain price, because the cost of labour should be reduced.

Now I am going to speak for a moment about the railways. You cannot tell me that the loss on railway operation cannot be cut if the management of our railways take the bit in their teeth, as it were, and cut off the service where traffic does not warrant that service. Let the railway management call a conference of the heads of the various labour departments and tell them frankly that the wages under the McAdoo award, and as adopted by the Chicago Board, ought to be adjusted. By putting up a bold front and doing as every one of us would do in our own private business we could reduce the losses on these railways this year by $25,000,000 at the lowest calculation. We have to do it, and we have to save these moneys in the various departments. Why? Because the Minister of Finance will find that the revenue from Income Tax will not this year amount to anything like the sum that it did last year. As for the revenue from sales tax I could name firm after firm that are not selling to-day fifty per cent of what they were selling at this time last year. It will not be the fault of the Minister of Finance if the revenue falls off; it will be the fault of all of us, and we should back him up in trying to cut down any expenditure that could possibly be avoided during the coming year. The ministers too must recognize that fact.

I want to talk to the Minister of Immigration for a minute or two. There is nothing that we want more in this country, in my judgment, to build up Canada and help to pay the national debt than immigration. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve was talking about that a few minutes ago but only you cannot do it in the sleight of hand manner that he suggested. We want immigration but we want the right kind. At present we are not going about getting it in the right way. In the first place our agents in the Old Country are too glowing in their statements and our advertising is altogether too roseate. You bring a man out to this country who has, we will say, a thousand pounds, that is $5,000, and you make him believe that he can buy up the north-west territories for that. Well he cannot. If he buys 160 acres of land, and it is anyway decent it will cost him $20 an acre—that will take $3,200. If he buys implements, and then a reasonable span of horses, and a cow, it will cost him another $1,000. There is $4,200 gone. And what kind of a shack will he be able to build with the balance? He could not build a structure very much better than a dog-house. All his money is gone, and there is no way of his getting a dollar back the first year. Therefore every man that comes to this country with a little money should be induced—no matter whether he is going to settle in the West or not—to work for somebody else for a year until he gets on his feet and learns the conditions. In the first place, the Interior Department should re-survey all the land in the West and select the areas on which a man can successfully conduct farming operations, and not allow some unfortunate immigrant to come into Canada and be immediately correlled by some land agent who will sell him a stretch of sandy soil where he cannot produce anything, or locate him in some section of the country where nothing ever grows. I think that in place of these immigrants being brought to the country, dumped down in Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, or whereever it may be, and allowed to wander off like lost sheep, the Immigration Department should have somebody they could absolutely depend on to take charge of these people the very moment they land, supervise their movements until they are on their feet, and see that they are not robbed of any little means they may have. It is a difficult thing for a man coming to a strange country, no matter how capable he may be, to become acclimatized, as it were, the moment he arrives, and to get to know the ways of the people. Unfortunately up in the West, as in Ontario, when the new arrival get to know the ways of the people he has no means left. I would not allow that. If a man is coming to Ontario to settle, I would very strongly advise him to put his money in the bank and work for a year going around to the threshing bees and the silo fillings in order to learn something about the ways of this county before he invests his money. I would strongly advise the Minister of Immigration to let his agents so instruct those men in the Old Country before they come here. We do not want artisans here.

Mr. CALDER: If my hon. friend will allow me, during three days last week some 8,000 people landed at Quebec from five ships. I wonder what sort of machine we should have and what the cost would be to take care of those people for a year.

Mr. NESBITT: I would not let them come in flocks of that size. That is because your immigration agents induce those people to come here by holding out to them glowing prospects. That is what they tell me, anyway, and I have discussed this matter with people who have come to this country and then cut their eye teeth and got a little wisdom, and every one of them will tell you the same thing. I would only allow people to come here in such numbers that you can take care of them. Where are those unfortunate 8,000 to-night? I bet a good many of them are sorry they ever came. Not that this country is not one of the best in the world—I believe it is the best country—but at the same time there is reason in all things, and we want only such a number of people to come here each year as we can assimilate by putting them on the land or into business. I have no objection to their going into business if they have the money and they are ready to lose it, because they will certainly lose it if they do go into business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have got all the evil thoughts out of my mind that I had accumulated for some time, and as I am busy on committees I thought I would take this opportunity of telling the Minister of Immigration what I thought his policy should be. I hope that that policy will be so improved that we will get only the sort of immigrants that we want. He knows —there is nobody wiser than he in this country—just what we want, he knows right well just how to handle those who come, and if he has not the means to handle them right, I am sure this House will vote him the means, for we want to handle our immigration as a man would manage his business. It is no use his sitting there smiling at me. He knows just as well as I do, a good deal better in fact, just how it should be done, and it ought to be done.

Referring to the Budget, I think the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) did remarkably well last year, and if all his colleagues will help him as they should this year, although revenues are bound to fall, he will come out ahead next year. But he must have the assistance of every member of the Cabinet; he cannot do it all alone. The only way that I know of is for him to put the money in a safe and stand over it with a gun. But I am quite sure the Cabinet will help him in every way, and I hope that the present stagnation of trade will be relieved by next September.

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) commented this afternoon on what the Minister of Finance had said to the effect that we wanted big business, but that it was not necessarily paying business. He is quite right. My hon. friend from Red Deer took him up and said that business during war time in this country was a big and a paying business. Nobody denies that, for it was a remarkable time. You could buy anything and sell it for more than you gave generally speaking; but the reverse is the case to-day.

My hon. friend from Red Deer also said that Great Britain had doubled her trade in 1920. Well, more strength to her elbow. I have a very loyal feeling for old Great Britain and her business people. Sometimes we meet Englishmen who come out to this country and we wonder how in the world she has been the pioneer in trade, but when we meet others we begin to understand. I am glad that Great Britain doubled her trade in 1920, but she doubled it not on account of her free trade, but because she still has the greatest carrying power of any country in the world. She also did business, not with the United States her great competitor—but with the European countries where her money was at par and with her colonies. We increased our business with Great Britain nearly double what it was the year before. During the war and until after the armistice in 1918 Great Britain's exports had declined to almost nothing, and even if she did double her export trade in 1920 over that of 1919 she would not have done a very large business. But my argument is that it was not owing to her free trade that she did this business, but because she gave credit to European countries that had to have her goods and where the pound sterling was worth 100 cents on the dollar, as it were, and sometimes was even at a premium. There is where she tried to do business, and in that respect she was wise. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said this afternoon that our unfavourable balance of trade in respect to the United States was largely owing to our borrowings in that country and to the investment of American capital in Canada. As a matter of fact, the figures with respect to the balance of trade as between Canada and the United States as given by the Finance Minister did not take into account our borrowings or the investments of American people in Canadian industries; they took into account simply the actual trade in goods. My honourable friend makes fun of the Minister of Finance for warning the ladies not to buy unnecessarily in the United States, but I think that his advice is good. I have no ill-feeling against the United States—none whatever. There are certain goods that we have to buy in that country. I personally am interested in one or two businesses which have to buy their raw material in the United States, for the simple reason that they cannot get it anywhere else, and it hurts very much when we have to pay that 15 per cent rate of exchange. I would advise, then, just as strongly as the Minister of Finance does, that we buy nothing that we can possibly avoid buying until our dollar is worth 100 cents in that country.

We have to have a tariff; what is the use of discussing free trade at this time? Even if it were a proper policy I do not see that we could derive any benefit from it. In speaking on the Budget in 1919, I think it was, I gave a list of farm implements required on a farm of 100 acres in Ontario including tools, machinery, harness, and all necessary equipment. I estimated the life of this equipment at ten years; if implements are properly taken care of they will last that long, some of them longer. The duty on this equipment spread over a period of ten years would be $28 a year, or less than one cent a bushel on the grain that the farmer would raise on that 100 acres. So that it is not the tariff that keeps the farmer from succeeding. During these last few years it has been chiefly the high cost of labour. Speaking of unemployment, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) pointed out that there was no unemployment between 1896 and 1911, under the Liberal regime. Thank heaven we did not have very much unemployment at that time, but conditions were different then. Governments are not responsible for these changes in the commercial life of the world; the war was responsible. Europe cannot buy from us, no matter how willing we are to sell, except on long-term credit, and we cannot afford to sell on long-term credit. Therefore there has been a very substantial fall in the prices of our grains, our cattle, horses, wool, sheep, everything we raise on the farm, practically speaking, even to eggs, and as my hon. friend over there said a minute ago, butter. The prices of these articles have fallen because there is not the export demand for them that there would be if Europe could buy. But that is not in the slightest degree the fault of the tariff, so far as the sale of goods in Europe is concerned. As to the price of butter, we are again competing with Denmark, Belgium in England itself. New Zealand lately came into the market very strongly gainst us. Why, last winter New Zealand was exporting butter to Toronto, and so was Venezuela. So that the world, as soon as it hears of a higher market, brings the stuff into that market and we have to compete with the world—unfortunately for us, perhaps, in the effect upon the prices of our goods. But these things will, in my judgment, rectify themselves inside of another year. I do not think we should make up our minds that we are ruined.

I do think that those men who are unemployed in the country should be given an opportunity to work. I would not pay one dollar for the upkeep of any sound man who refuses to work. It is all nonsense to say that he cannot work at his trade. Perhaps he is like the fellow who is a good woodchopper in the summer and a great harvesthand in the winter, but who does not live up to either when the proper time comes. You need not tell me that these men who are unemployed and who have common intelligence cannot go out on the farm and earn fair pay if they are willing to work. On my farms I have frequently taken young fellows from the cities who never had been on a farm before, and inside a month they were as handy as any of the rest of the men on the farm. So that I speak from experience when I say that it is all nonsense to contend that these men, if they have the opportunity, cannot learn to work on the farm and do it inside a month, thus earning their living in place of being kept by the Government or by somebody else. Of course I am not speaking of disabled men who were at the war; the country owes them all it can possibly do for them. But I do say that the able-bodied man has just as much right to work as any of us have; I would give him the opportunity to work and if he did not take it I would not keep him any longer. I would like just once more to say that the Minister of Finance was very wise in postponing a general revision of the tariff for this year, on account of the unsettled condition of the trade of the world. He has shown excellent business capacity in the other taxes that he has imposed, and I hope we will get enough revenue to pay our way.

On motion of Mr. Davis the debate was adjourned.

LEAVE FOR MR. CRERAR TO ATTEND SENATE COMMITTEE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees to the request of the Senate to give leave to the Honourable Thomas Alexander Crerar, M.P., to attend and give evidence before the special committee of the Senate apointed to inquire into and report at this session upon the conditions which are responsible for the large portion of our export trade (more especially the products of the West) being routed via American instead of Canadian ports.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This motion, of course, requires unanimous consent as no notice has been given.

Mr. FIELDING: It is understood that the hon. member desires to be present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that this is entirely formal. The request has been granted. Personally I am sorry that I cannot give the assurance the hon. member desires to attend, but I understand that to be the fact.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Thursday, May 12, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS

Sixth report of the select standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills—Mr. Steele.

Seventh report of the select standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines—Mr. Armstrong (Lambton).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CIVIL SERVICE AND RETURNED SOLDIERS

Mr. BOURASSA:

Why does the Government establish a difference, in the granting of a position, between the veterans who went over to Europe and those who were sent to Bermuda, by military authority, during the great war?

Hon. Mr. CALDER:

The Government is bound by the statute under which only members of the C.E.F. who have had active service overseas are entitled to the benefits of Section 39 of the Civil Service Act.

INCOME TAX

Mr. McMASTER:

1. What portion of the Income Tax received during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1919, was received in respect of taxes upon income for the calendar year 1917, or for the year of any corporation ending within said calendar year?

2. What amount was received in respect of taxes upon income for the calendar year 1918, or for the fiscal year of any corporation ending within that calendar year?

3. What was the total Income Tax revenue for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920?

4. Of this sum, what amount was collected in respect of taxes upon income for the calendar year 1917, or for the fiscal year of any corporation ending within said calendar year (1917)?

5. What amount was collected in respect of taxes upon income for the calendar year 1918, or for the fiscal year of any corporation ending within that calendar year (1918)?

6. What amount was collected in respect of taxes upon income for the calendar year 1919 or for the fiscal year of any corporation ending within that calendar year (1919)?

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. $9,350,209.72.

2. None. The date for mailing assessments covering income realized during 1918 was October 31, 1919, which date was several months after the close of the 1919 fiscal year.

3. $20,264,242.43.

4. $4,717,303.84 under Income War Tax Act, 1917.

5. $14,988,510.91 under Income War Tax Act, 1917.

6. Returns under Income War Tax Act, 1917, covering income realized during calendar year 1919 were due to be filed on May 31, 1920, or two months after the close of the 1920 fiscal year. At the request of a number of taxpayers who were anxious to obtain receipted assessments previous to March 15, 1920, assessments covering calendar year 1919, which amounted to $558,427.68 were levied and paid.

CENSUS APPOINTMENTS

Mr. MacNUTT:

1. By whom were the Census Commissioners appointed?

2. By whom are the Census Enumerators being appointed?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

2. The Census Commissioners, subject to the approval of the Dominion Statistician.

Mr. W. D. STAPLES

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. Is W. D. Staples a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners of Canada?

2. Has the same W. D. Staples been recently appointed one of the Commission of Inquiry to investigate the handling of the Grain Trade of Canada?

3. If so, has the appointment been made in accordance with Sec. 6 of the Canada Grain Act?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER.

The answer to the first question is, yes.

The answer to the second question is, yes.

The answer to the third question is that it is not thought that such an appointment contravenes the section mentioned.

IMAGINARY LETTERS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. SPEAKER: In the course of debate during the sitting of May 10, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) read a letter which he said was purely imaginary. The letter in question was addressed to Hon. F. B. McCurdy, Minister of Public Works, and signed by C. C. Ballantyne. A point or order was raised by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Hay) as to whether it was competent to attach a member's name to an imaginary letter.

The situation was somewhat baffling and difficult to deal with at the moment, inasmuch as the question was without precedent so far as I have been able to ascertain, and, in view of the specific statement of the hon. member for Brome that the letter was purely imaginary, I did not at the time rule the proceeding out of order. Upon careful and mature reflection I am of opinion that if this incident is to stand, and a precedent thus established, a door would be opened for a grave abuse of the rules of the House and the general principles which govern debate.

There are several objections to this method of procedure. It is contrary to the rules to refer to an hon. member by name —and, in this connection, I desire to direct the attention of the House to the fact that there has been of late an increasing tendency to violate this most important rule.

Furthermore, the matter contained in a letter of this character, although said to be purely imaginary, cannot fail to convey a meaning and be capable of an interpretation which the hon. member affected cannot effectively deny, being precluded by the very nature of the letter; thus in effect an hon. member would be enabled by this indirect method to convey a meaning or impression which he would be precluded from doing by direct assertion.

There is still another very grave objection to this method, an objection which, to my mind, is sufficient in itself, namely, that the use of this method in argument will call for similar letters in reprisal, and thus the door would be opened to a method of debate which it would require no effort of the imagination to realize would affect most injuriously decorum in debate and the dignity of the House.

It is therefore in my judgment of great importance that the incident in question should not be construed as a precedent, and in order the more effectively to carry out this intention, I have issued instructions that the letter in question be not printed in the revised edition of Hansard. In justice to the hon. member for Brome, I desire to make it clear that he was most explicit in his statement that the letter was not only purely imaginary, but that it was not to be construed as having any personal reference to any member of the House. In this connection I quote the hon. member's words:

> They are absolutely imaginary; there is no intention in my mind to assert for a moment that it is possible for the man, who is supposed to have written this imaginary letter to have really written it—I want that distinctly understood.

Indeed, I am happy to add that I have no doubt the hon. member for Brome had no ulterior motive in using the letter in question. This, however, in my judgment, only serves to strengthen the objection as to the danger inherent in such a course to which I have given expression.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the ruling you have given might not in the future be regarded as a precedent that would be open to discussion if on another occasion something somewhat similar were to arise, not with reference to, say, an imaginary letter, but with reference to some other subject which might be the occasion of a ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that I quite apprehend the purport of the hon. member's question; perhaps he would put it in other words. What particular point has he in mind?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Well, I had not any particular point in mind at the moment, except this, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the ruling which your Honour gave is susceptible of such wide application that the occasion might arise when, without there being any such reason for the ruling as there may be in the present instance, another ruling might be given and matter deleted from Hansard without the opportunity of debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The objection that the hon. member has in mind is so general in its terms that it hardly requires an additional ruling, if I may use the term, because the ruling which I have given would refer only to an incident similar in character to that with which it deals. Of course, it is open to the incumbent of the Chair from time to time to give his ruling as particular incidents may arise, subject always, of course, to its meeting with the approval of the House. If the hon. member has more particular reference to the circumstance of the Speaker ruling that a certain letter be deleted from the revised edition of Hansard, I may say that there are already precedents not only in the Canadian House of Commons but in the British House which give that authority to the Speaker.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. ROBB

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Châteauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first time in twelve years' parliamentary experience that I have risen to a question of privilege. In debate yesterday, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), used this sentence as found in Hansard, page 3321:

> To use the words of the hon. member for Red Deer my hon. friends opposite from the province of Quebec are something like Admiral Nelson—they always put the glass to the blind eye. They fraternize one with the other and can see nothing but victory ahead for themselves—they can see nothing but the maintenance of this "Quebec bloc." One of the sheep has jumped over the walls of the pen and is wandering loose at the present time;

Mr. Speaker, as a member from Quebec I resent the implication of being called a sheep. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, perhaps unintentionally, conveyed an insult to the members from the province of Quebec, which he himself may regret. I wish that he would withdraw the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remark was not heard by me, but I am sure, from the nature of the remark as quoted by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), that the reference was purely by way of illustration and was not intended to be construed as any reflection upon any hon. member of this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, was it meant to be a black sheep, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MICHAUD: Perhaps it was "entirely imaginary".

Mr. MURPHY: Probably it is the lamb of the member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) grown up.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 11, the debate on the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the Budget I wish to assure the Finance Minister of my sympathy with his difficulties on this occasion and to express also a realization of the fact that these difficulties are not of his making, many of them having arisen under a finance minister's administration with which I was not at all in agreement.

A year of falling prices; of appalling railway deficits after equally appalling freight-rate increases; of large unemployment, destined to grow worse; of one hundred millions of deficits; of expenditure in excess of revenue, lies behind us. And ahead of us seems to lie a year wherein all these will be aggravated. Last year $432,000,000 was raised by way of taxation, but this, the largest taxation we have ever collected, has not availed to make things meet. The ensuing year cannot be expected to yield like revenues, but will call for similar expenditures. The minister places the figures which should be paid out of current revenues this year at $435,000,000, to which should be added about $155,000,000 of expenditure on railways and upon active investments, so that we shall have a deficit, apparently, of about that amount after applying the ten millions of cash which we have in hand.

For the relief of some whose appetite for tariff discussion is satiated, I will say here that I am not going to discuss the tariff at length. In postponing action the minister, perhaps, is displaying discretion, taking that word in both its good and its bad sense. A party of Liberals and Conservatives that has not been through the fire of an election might prove uncertain under such a strain. I found myself in sympathy last night with most of the remarks of my friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). But, as he told us that England was not a free trade country, I thought he should discuss that matter with our friends from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and from Fort William (Mr. Manion) who seemed to hold other views upon that question. In the better sense of that word "discretion" I think the minister would have displayed more, had he framed and arranged classifications in the tariff schedule and knocked off even a few excrescences just to show the country that the commission had not been entirely a waste of time. After the remarks in the West of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, (Mr. Calder), there was felt to be need for such a demonstration. Nevertheless, in the state of trade, in the condition of United States legislation on tariff questions, and in view of our own political condition, the postponement has much to justify it, not the least being that the prospect is that quite different persons and quite different ideas will shape our next Budget.

I also agree with the elimination of the business profits tax. The time was ripe for that, as business has generally been experiencing a cutting down, a wiping out of values, which would certainly have affected collections under that tax. But the Finance Minister imposes a sales' tax. I think this is no time to show too great friendliness or consideration for the big interests of this country, and I should like to make a suggestion with regard to the corporations' income tax. A corporation is treated under the fiction that it is a person, and after $2,000 exemption is allowed, 10½ per cent practically is levied upon its yield. We have in this country many one-man corporations and these men may have very large revenues from such corporations. Under Section 3, subsection 4, of the Income Tax Act, the minister, unless he is satisfied that there is a need for retaining these funds in the hands of the corporation, may force them out—at least that is the course that he has chosen to pursue—into the hands of the shareholders. But I would point out that with the business profits tax eliminated, the machinery is now defective for his doing that. That is, having before him the earnings of a corporation and the names of the shareholders, he may allot a tax upon the amount which they should have received, had the profits been divided. I believe the question has never been settled whether he has a right to make such an assessment upon funds which the shareholders have not received. Under the income tax as it stands now, firms and partnerships must pay the full amount of the income tax, whether it has been realized in cash or not. No account is taken of the needs of a firm or partnership to extend its business, and I cannot, therefore, see why account should be taken of the needs of a corporation to extend its business and use its reserve in that way. I grant at once that the minister could hardly make exceptions among firms or partnerships, but he should line up the corporations with the firms and and the partnerships, and I want to point out to him a method whereby that may be done. We have a 10½ per cent tax upon a corporation as an income tax. Supposing that tax were levied as a minimum tax provided that the dividends of the corporation were distributed within three months of the end of the company year, and a further surtax were imposed upon the corporation if they did not so divide. The result would be certainly to force a distribution of the dividends, and the shears of the income tax would then catch these sums in the hands of the individual shareholders. Perhaps, even, it would be advisable to do this; still recognizing the corporation as an individual, to provide that no income tax shall be assessed if the dividends are distributed within a very limited time, but that a very heavy income tax shall be levied if the dividends are not distributed within that time. Then you will have these funds forced into the hands of the shareholders and thus brought under the income tax requirements. The objection may be raised that corporations need money to extend their businesses. The one-man corporation can meet that, because, having received the whole amount of the dividends, having paid his tax, he can put his money back into the corporation which is his property. If it is a company of the ordinary description, if its shares are above par, it may offer its shares at a discount or at par, thus making a right in the shares which would be of value. Or, if the shares are at or below par, it may offer preferred stock at advantage and these rights could be sold. Therefore, there will not be that difficulty, which has been one of the objections to the business profits tax, that money for further expansion will not be available.

With regard to our shipping, I think it is deplorable that we had not a Lord Inchcape in Canada to sell our ships at the end of the war. Hon. members know that Lord Inchcape practically took 200 vessels over from the British Government and himself disposed of them. If England, the greatest shipping country in the world, saw fit to do that, surely some one in our Government should have been alert to what was good policy for the very "mistress of the seas" and been apt and eager to follow that example.

I shall not now discuss our railways, because there will be a future occasion for that. I want, however, to point out that the railway situation perhaps affects our western provinces—and I believe in this case the charity begins at home—in a most acute form. We have to pay very heavy freight rates at any time to get our goods to the markets of the world, and we have to pay heavy rates to get goods into that country. As an example of what has taken place in the way of change in prices in the last year, let this illustrate. The farmer in the West—and this was in the week before this session began—was selling his steers at 30¾ per cent decrease, his cows at 30 per cent decrease, his stockers at 38 per cent decrease, his hogs at 23½ per cent decrease, and his sheep at 44 per cent decrease. He was selling his wheat then at 15½ per cent decrease, his oats at 48 per cent decrease, his barley at 42 per cent decrease, and his flax at 66 per cent decrease. The freight situation had much to do with these large decreases. But on the other hand the farmer had to pay more for everything that he was buying in the way of machinery and equipment. I have in my hand, a list which includes buggy, democrat, wagon gear, grain tanks, trucks, gang ploughs, breaking ploughs, hay rakes, mowers, binders, blacksmiths' forges, and certain gasoline engines; and the total of these at the 1920 price is $1,775.20. In the catalogue of the week ending February 12, 1921, the retail price is $2,154.10, an increase of 21.31 per cent. Compare that with the decreases which he is obliged to accept, and you will see that he is facing very grave difficulties; and I say that these difficulties bear more heavily upon him because of the freight situation; hence there is even more necessity for a re-scaling of rates and an improvement in our whole railway situation. I should in justice, perhaps, point out that in one line of articles, harness—and I am sure my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) will appreciate this, after telling us that he has had to sell hides at 1 cent a pound—the price is down a little from $193.25, to $169, a decrease of 12.39 per cent. With these figures before the House I think it can realize somewhat of the dissatisfaction that rests in the farmer's mind when he sees that he still has to pay large tariff taxation, as well as contributing in the measure he does to freight taxation. As an instance of how and where the freights come from in this country, it is general public knowledge that $33,000,000 was the surplus for all purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway last year. I want to tell the House, what perhaps it does not know, that of that surplus, $21,000,000 was produced upon western lines in the last four months of the year 1920; that is, practically two-thirds of the whole surplus was earned on the western lines of the Canadian Pacific in those four months.

A good deal has been said from time to time as to our grave adverse balance of trade with the United States. I would like to produce some comparative figures here to show that the situation is not nearly so grave as has been stated. In 1921 we exported to the United States $542,000,000 of goods, and we bought from them $856,000,000 of goods; that is, our imports were equal to 155 per cent of our exports. In the year 1920, they were 173 per cent; in 1919, 164 per cent. During the war conditions were disturbed so that it is not fair to make comparisons with those years. The figures were less for three years of the war, and then going back to 1915, our imports were twice our exports, and the same is true of 1914. They were 2.64 per cent in 1913, and in 1912 they were three-fold. To reduce to proper values of the present, for our money in 1921 as compared with our money in 1912 is practically at an appreciation of 100 per cent, you would have to divide the figures of 1921 to get a fair comparison; that is, in those terms, the exports would have been $271,000,000 as against $428,000,000. Now, in 1915 that $428,000,000 is the amount of our imports, and in that year our exports were only $215,000,000 of goods. Consequently, I think that the situation is really improving, and that there is not such a need for fear as to the situation as has been very widely expressed.

A matter which should, perhaps, give us more concern is the question of exchange. We are now paying a premium of around 12½ per cent upon American funds, and in our present situation this is really serious, especially when you take into consideration a matter to which I shall refer later on, that is the question of our loans. But this is to be remembered: that while a balance of trade against us would throw the rate of exchange against us, it would not account for the amount of that rate. What really accounts for the amount of the rate is the disparity between the purchasing power of our money and theirs. Compare wheat of the United States with that of Canada. Our wheat has been consistently quoted at a higher level than that of the United States. That is a commodity which is in world-wide demand, and until the Young Bill, which passed the United States Senate yesterday, began to affect the situation, it was in no way affected by governmental regulations. Now, the fact is that it takes about $9 of our money to buy what $8 will buy in the United States, and that is the real cause, and the basic fact, to take into account in connection with our exchange. We have to-day to compare the purchasing power parities of money to know what we are doing in any trade. It is no use any longer following mint parities. Indeed, even the exchange is a misleading guide, because, during the war, exchange was kept up by the governments and was above the purchasing power of the moneys of the several countries; to-day, because of the disturbance of conditions, it is below the purchasing power of the moneys. If any one cares to follow that question up, I would refer him to the May number of the Commerce Monthly, issued by the National Bank of Commerce of New York, where he will get a bird's-eye view of the whole situation.

In consequence of this, I have to criticise the minister's proposition to limit the exchange variation to 50 per cent. With regard to some countries that is justifiable, particularly with regard to Germany, and if it were pointed straight at Germany I would support it. But as regards France, for example, we have recently entered into a treaty with France to give her certain advantages. Now, by this arrangement of exchange, we reach behind their backs and take away those advantages. At present the French exchange is around 8.14 cents, but the purchasing power of French money is above that point, and that, after all, is what counts in the question of exchange. Indeed, keeping in mind the functions of exchange, when we adopt a policy of this sort, we are providing means which carry us only half way in the complete circle of trade. We take it from French goods into currency, but it has to go the rest of the way, from currency into Canadian consumption, before you have the transaction complete; and in that case we take account of the purchasing power of the money and no injustice is done to us. Where England imposes a duty of 33⅓ per cent in cases of this sort for the same purpose, the London Economist has this to say:

> The exchange section of the resolution is still more fatuous; insofar as it is effective it will inevitably retard the recovery of central Europe, on the need for which our rulers have so often and eloquently declaimed.

Our trade does not equal that of Great Britain with Europe, and so has not the pervading effect that such a restriction must have in English trade; but it has its effect, and it is a distinctly unfriendly act on our part to put upon the currencies of Europe such a limit. In dealing with this question, and in order that it may be understood, I propose to read some extracts from an address delivered by the Swedish economist, Cassel, delivered before the Brussels Financial Conference:

> The part of the currency which has been exported to foreign countries is in some cases very important. The actual circulation within Germany is, e.g., much lower than the total mass issue, the rest being held in foreign countries. This must be taken into account if we wish to have an idea of the active circulation within Germany. In some cases it is necessary to have regard to an increase or a decrease of geographical area within which the currency is used. In the case of Germany, e.g., the present active circulation should strictly be compared with the pre-war circulation within the present boundaries of the country.

Now, Germany has been forcing her marks upon foreign countries, and this has amounted to floating a demand loan. The consequence has been disastrous to her own trade. Let me quote from page 47 of the same report:

> As instances of such depressing tendencies we can quote: a distrust in the future of a monetary standard, leading to a discounting of an anticipated fall of the internal value of the money; operations of speculators, etc. By far the most important of these depressing factors is, however, the practice of selling out the currency of a country abroad. This practice has, during the last year, reached such proportions and become such a prominent factor in the international monetary situation that it is necessary to devote special attention to it.
> The whole operation can best be studied in the case of Germany. German marks have been sold out abroad on an enormous scale, and at almost any price they would fetch. As the central Government, local bodies, banks, and business enterprises were in absolute need of foreign means of payment, and these did not seem to be procurable in any other way, the country was driven to this selling out of its currency. The process must be looked upon as a substitute—a bad substitute indeed—for the more regular device of securing foreign loans. As lenders could not be found, Germany turned to a new class of investors, the speculators in currency, and offered them, instead of a high rate of interest, the inducement of an extraordinary low rate of exchange. Of course, the speculators suffered heavy losses as the exchange went down step by step. But new ranks of speculators were always ready to believe that "the bottom has been reached"; as a mantter of fact the last of them have made enormous profits. The selling out of marks is said to have been considerably increased by the endeavours to evade in this way an exorbitant taxation.

In considering the proposals of this year's Budget, there is one lamentable omission. This is the third Budget presented to the people of Canada since the war. In it, as in its two predecessors, there is no enunciation of general policy such as all circumstances demand. Parliament has, during this session, considered such proposals as the development of the St. Lawrence, involving an expenditure of half a billion dollars, as cheerfully as if in the last seven years we had not incurred a debt of two billions of dollars, changed our price levels more than commonly occurs in centuries of time, wasted a very large portion of our capital in waging war, and raised problems which cannot be settled by short views such as these last three Budgets have contained, but which must be met by some measure of vision and a policy having consistency and continuity for at least one generation.

Of our old obligations of nearly $300,000,000 about $25,000,000 falls due within the next four years, and of our new obligations of nearly two billions and a quarter, within the next four years, 25.7 per cent falls due. We have paid this year $25,000,000. Next year we have to pay $195,000,000; in 1923 the same sum; in 1924, $105,000,000, and in 1925, $43,000,000. That we may get this all before us, let us put it on record:

In 1926 we have to pay	$ 25,000,000
In 1927 we have to pay	66,000,000
In 1928 we have to pay	2,000,000
In 1929 we have to pay	60,000,000
In 1931 we have to pay	79,000,000
In 1933 we have to pay	483,000,000
In 1934 we have to pay	481,000,000
In 1935 we have to pay a little over	1,000,000
In 1937 we have to pay	345,000,000
In 1938 we have to pay	52,000,000
In 1945 we have to pay	65,000,000
In 1947 we have to pay nearly	5,000,000

To recapitulate:

Between 1921 and 1925 we must pay 25.7 per cent.

Between 1921 and 1931 we must pay 10.3 per cent.

Between 1932 and 1935 we must pay 43.3 per cent.

Between 1937 and 1938 we must pay 17.7 per cent.

Between 1945 and 1947 we must pay 3 per cent.

It is not within the contemplation of any one that we shall pay these debts as they come due, but large refunding operations must be carried through. It is wise, therefore, that we should keep these before us and prepare for them. We are in the third year away from the war, and no Budget has yet made reference to them. Let us look at some features of the situation. The United States is our greatest competitor, not only in trading but in obtaining increase in population. It is generally recognized by our statesmen that their conditions have a direct effect and influence on our own. To obtain the growth in population we desire we must offer to our own people and to immigrants a similar standard of living, a comparatively decent rate of taxation, similar wages, and cost of doing business. At present I shall leave out of any such comparison the effects of a protection policy in which we collect about $20 per head in duties and they collect about $3, and endeavour to deal with other factors of the situation.

The United States floated its loans for about four and one-quarter per cent. We have had to pay rather more than five and one-half per cent. In the present and prospective dearth of capital, we shall do well indeed if we can refund our present indebtedness at the rate of 6 to 6½ per cent, being one-quarter to one-third higher than the United States is paying for funds for the same purpose. This is one of the great reasons why, at present, we should adopt the four recommendations made by the Brussels Conference—balance all recurrent expenditure with taxation; cut down all military expenditure; abandon all unproductive extraordinary expenditure; and restrict to the very minimum even productive extraordinary expenditure. The United States is the only prospective market for such refunding operations, and our money is at a discount of about twelve and a hallf per cent with theirs, so that if we borrow from them we must pay this difference upon the principal sums, and so long as we permit the difference in purchasing power parities of our and their currencies we must pay such premium upon the interest upon the sums borrowed.

Now let me quote from the New York Times financial edition:

As it is, leading financial experts believe that Canada will experience so much difficulty in taking care of the maturities prior to 1933 that there will be little if any opportunity for building for the future—

That is, making preparation for taking care of these maturities.

—and in those years, or just before them, Canada is likely to make another big entry into the New York market. During the past year or so Canadian securities have been going better in the American market than ever before. A very considerable amount of provincial and municipal bonds and other securities have been sold here and, in addition, nearly $85,000,000 in Canadian railway issues, representing properties which are to be merged into the Canadian National Railways, have been disposed of to American investors. The discount on Canadian funds in the exchange market has been a factor, allowing American investors an immediate discount of 9 per cent to 14 per cent on the purchase price with the chance that this will be entirely made up within the next few years and long before the maturity of these securities.

Now, that is a situation that we must face with regard to having our money on a disparity with theirs. If we borrow from them we must pay the difference, and so long as we suffer a difference in purchasing power on our money we must pay the difference in exchange upon United States interest.

I think it was the duty of the Government therefore, to lay this situation before Parliament and the country for its consideration, and to announce a policy and to devise ways and means for carrying out that policy. Under the circumstances, the obvious policy is first of all to put our currency on a par with United States currency as we are only about twelve and a half per cent from such par. And as experts hold that Great Britain which is twenty per cent from par. and France which is thirty-five per cent from par, are able to, and should, bring their currency to par, the conclusion is inescapable that for us it is more attainable and more essential. Were it not mentioned, it might be overlooked that we are already borrowing over $200,000,000 a year from the United States, authorities stating that last year we borrowed $214,000,000, and the rates have been above six per cent. Provincial governments, municipalities and business firms have all been forced to the United States market for needed funds, and where, as is the rule, they are made repayable in the United States, so long as we permit our moneys to remain at a discount, we pay about one-eighth more interest and are repaying one-eighth more principal to cancel the debt. Surely this means that our business is at a disadvantage with United States business and that the way to correct this is to bring our money to a parity. My own small town is paying $1,500 a year to make up the difference of exchange. They borrowed $100,000, from a firm in Toledo some years ago and there are some other maturities they have in the United States. and they are paying $1,500 a year in exchange. This means very nearly one dollar a head of its population and a material increase in its taxation. Hence, I conclude that the Government's first duty is to balance its expenditure with taxation and secure surpluses with which to bring our money to equality with the United States money. The effect will be to cheapen money throughout Canada, and materially reduce the cost of carrying our debt in the future.

But with this must be coupled the necessity for establishing sinking funds, and we cannot establish sinking funds while we continue to expend; as the Finance Minister says, during the past year he has expended $100,000,000 more than the taxation has yielded him. Neither would any sensible person demand the establishment of sinking funds forthwith; but surely a Government conscious of its obligations would take the country into its confidence and say when it thinks such sinking funds should and can be started. This may be seven to ten years ahead, but a government which has determined upon the establishment of sinking funds and set a date for their establishment and shaped its expenditure and taxation to carry out that operation within that time, will be able to borrow money on much better terms than a government which is proceeding as this present Government is without an expressed realization of the situation or any declared determination to effect these purposes. Such sinking funds could be begun in time to have a most material effect upon the refunding operations at our second period of maturities in the early thirties. Such a detailed policy no future Government would dare to depart from, and with such a policy Parliament and the country would have a corrective and a tonic principle for its future guidance, and that is one of the great lacks in our present fiscal policy. Retrenchment of our expenditure would necessarily follow upon such a policy and Parliament would relegate to the future any scheme for expenditure which would conflict with such a dominating policy and principle.

The peroration of the Finance Minister, although it contains words of faith and confidence, does not appeal particularly to me; but had a policy been announced—such as I have tried here to outline—then I would say that faith and confidence in the Government, and in the future of Canada, is to be entertained. Unless such a policy is established it cannot be entertained.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House for a short time upon the motion now before the Chair, I feel that I should join with those who have preceded me in tendering to my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of Finance, the congratulations to which he is entitled upon the splendid showing that he has been able to make in regard to the finances of this country, despite the fact that Canada has admittedly passed through the most distressing period in her history—a period not only distressing to Canada financially but distressing throughout the whole world. It is a splendid tribute to the ability and care of the Finance Minister that after such an experience he can come before Parliament at the close of the financial year and announce that he has been able to meet all the ordinary outlay in respect of government out of the ordinary revenue and at the same time bring down a statement which shows what we call a surplus, amounting to something over $69,000,000. He is able to say in addition that not only has he paid all the ordinary expenses out of ordinary revenue, but he has been able likewise to pay as he went along no less a sum in round figures than $36,000,000 of capital expenditure, and a further sum of war expenditure amounting to $20,000,000, both of which large sums he has paid out of that surplus and still there remains over the handsome amount, having regard to the times in which we live, of $12,428,000 to the credit of the country. That, I submit, Mr. Speaker, is a wonderful financial showing made under exceedingly difficult conditions. I have been in this House a number of years, and I know in years gone by—ten, fifteen or twenty years ago—it was considered a very great triumph on the part of the Finance Minister to announce a surplus at the end of the fiscal year. I am aware there is a difference of opinion as to whether the surpluses that for many years have been announced in this House can be considered as real or more or less imaginary, but I believe that from Confederation down to the present time it has always been considered a privilege for the Minister of Finance to announce a surplus at the end of the financial year's operations when his ordinary expenditure was less than his ordinary revenue, notwithstanding the fact that during the same year it had become necessary to increase the national debt. On the one hand, on the annual operations we had saved some money, while, on the other hand, by way of capital expenditure we had increased the net debt. But notwithstanding the increase in the net debt, it has always been the privilege of the Finance Minister to claim as surplus anything he has been able to lay aside on the year's operations as between ordinary revenue and ordinary expenditure.

The most outstanding fact at the present time, I think, is that during the past twelve months the Finance Minister has found it possible to declare a surplus under the conditions which have existed in this country. I believe that for a good many years past, omitting the war years, annual surpluses have been rather the regular thing than the exception; while I think I am also within the mark when I say that during the past twenty years additions to the net debt of Canada have been the rule rather than the exception, even during those years when our largest surpluses were produced. I have a few figures on the subject culled from the public accounts, and I find that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) who for fifteen years was Finance Minister, namely, from 1896 to 1911, was able by good and careful management during many years of that period to come to Parliament and announce a surplus. But I find that during those fifteen years my hon. friend as Finance Minister could only in four years of the fifteen say to Parliament, "I have made no additions to the net debt of Canada." During eleven of those fifteen years out net debt was considerably increased, while, in many of those same years surpluses were announced and cheered in the House and congratulations were tendered to my hon. friend. But I find that the net result of those fifteen years was that notwithstanding the surpluses the national debt was not reduced but as a matter of fact was increased to the tune of about $82,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my object in going into this matter as I have done at this moment is to lay a foundation for the course which I intend to pursue during the rest of my remarks. I do not know that I should have ventured upon the Budget discussion at all were it not that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's—who appeared this week in the role of the chief financial critic of the official Opposition and delivered a speech in reply to the speech of my hon. friend the Finance Minister in presenting his Budget—at the very opening of his remarks extended to me something like an invitation, or perhaps I might term it a challenge, by direct reference to certain recommendations which were made at the International Financial Conference last September at the city of Brussels, particularly to those in regard to naval and military expenditures, and which conference I attended as a representative of Canada. My hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister quoted from those recommendations, and his quotation will be found at page 3251 of unrevised Hansard in these words:

> The President: The third part of the resolution says: It is imperative that every Government should, as the first social and financial reform, take the following steps:
> (a) Restrict its ordinary re-current expenditure, including the service of its debt, to such an amount as can be covered by its ordinary revenue.
> (b) Rigidly reduce all expenditures in armaments in so far as such reduction is compatible with the preservation of national security.
> (c) Abandon all unproductive extraordinary expenditure.
> (d) Restrict even productive extraordinary expenditure to the lowest possible amount.

Such was the language of one of the resolutions passed by the Brussels Conference. In regard to it my hon. friend commented as follows:

> This resolution was carried unanimuosly, and approved by the Government of Canada through the Minister of Militia who, as I have said, was present. I deeply regret to say that though the Government of Canada supported that excellent proposal at Brussels, they do not seem to be willing to support it at Ottawa.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that in every particular the Government of Canada has lived up to the Brussels recommendations. I do not need to dwell upon paragraphs (a), (b) or (c), but I do intend to dwell upon paragraph (d), the recommendation of which was in the following language:

> Rigidly reduce all expenditures in armaments in so far as the reduction is compatible with the preservation of national security.

I do so more particularly, Mr. Speaker, because I find that not only in the House of Commons but also on the part of the press of the country there exists what I believe to be a thoroughly uninformed, thoroughly misinformed, thoroughly ignorant condition of the public mind in regard to the militia, naval and air expenditure of Canada. My desire, in the statement which I make to the House to-day, is to give the House and, if possible, the country, if my remarks reach so far, an accurate statement of the situation, and let the House and the people judge of it for itself or for themselves.

I know there is a vast amount of misinformation on this subject. I know it from statements made in this House from day to day. During the course of the present debate two hon. members opposite have challenged the militia expenditure of this country at the sum of $20,000,000. Pretty high, I assure you—but seven or eight millions over the mark; an increase of 70 or 80 per cent over the actual expenditure. I have seen it stated in the newspapers throughout Canada that the military expenditure of the country has reached $30,000,000. I have heard criticisms in this House from my friends of the Agrarian group which had no foundation whatever in fact, and I am sure that if hon. members sitting in the Agrarian group knew the facts they would not make the statements that they have made. I have had requests from labour bodies throughout Canada, from deputations, asking me to state particularly what the expenditure was and to what it applied. I am able to-day, I think, to give the House fairly full information upon that subject. But I am going to say this—and I am sorry that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is not present: had my hon. friend carefully perused the report of the Brussels Conference, which he had before him, he would have found in volume 4 of that report most abundant refutation of every criticism he made, and most complete justification of the position of Canada and of the Government of Canada in connection with the recommendations of the Brussels Conference.

Now, I do not care what viewpoint the House may adopt in examining the military expenditure; I do not care through which avenue they may approach it. I make this challenge: that viewing it from any angle you like, approaching it from any avenue of criticism you like, the position of Canada in regard to military expenditure is unassailable. It is superior to that of any other country in the civilized world to-day, and is so immeasurably superior that one can hardly make comparisons. I go further; I would say to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's, were he here, that Canada of all the nations who attended the Brussels conference is perhaps the one nation which has sought successfully to carry out the recommendations of that conference. I propose to prove this by our own accounts, by our own Estimates, and by the figures of the Brussels conference which my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's had before him when he spoke.

Ever since Confederation we have had military expenditure in Canada. I could take you year by year from Confederation to the present, but there would not be much advantage in going back to that early period. If we merely make a comparison of the figures as between to-day and ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, we shall not gain very much valuable knowledge from the mere comparison of figures unless we start out with something like equality of conditions. In making any comparison as between to-day and ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, we must always bear in mind, first, the purchasing power of our money as between now and then; second, the wealth of our country; third, the population of our country, and fourth, the necessity of guarding or securing the wealth of the country—what it was then and what it is to-day. These conditions, I say, must be present in the mind if we are to make any useful comparison for the purpose of finding out whether our proposals of to-day are to be deemed extravagant or thoroughly economical.

The most important condition to observe in this connection is the comparison so far as the money value of goods is concerned. What I state now I stated during the debate on the military Estimates: namely, that it takes just two dollars to-day to procure for the militia what it took one dollar to procure in pre-war years. In saying this I am sure that I am well within the mark. We have to buy a great deal of clothing; clothing has advanced more than 100 per cent. We have to buy a great deal of food for the Permanent Force and for our militia in the camps; food has advanced more than 100 per cent. The pay of our men in the militia has advanced from 50 or 60 cents, as it was in pre-war days, to $1.25, the minimum to-day. The pay of our Permanent Force has advanced from 80 to 90 cents in pre-war days to $1.70, the minimum to-day. Our railway transport has advanced, not 100 per cent, but almost that, I am told. I am therefore, well within the mark when I say that prices as between pre-war days and to-day have advanced 100 per cent for all the requirements of the militia of Canada. Now, what does it mean? It means that the vote which we ask from Parliament to-day to carry on the militia of Canada, about $11,800,000 odd, would represent in pre-war days a vote of about $5,900,000 odd. Now, is that not stating the matter fairly? Bearing that in mind; having regard to the purchasing power of our dollar to-day compared with what it was before the war, we are brought back to the basis of the military expenditure of this country in the year 1905, which amounted to $5,678,000. To say that we have merely gone back to pre-war expenditures is stating less than half the fact. We are back to the basis of 1905. I have a tabulation of our expenditure in pre-war years. I have included in that statement only the ten years prior to the war and excluded the year 1914, as during that year, after the month of August, our expenditure was a war expenditure. But beginning with the year 1904 and ending with the year 1913, both inclusive, I can make a comparison, and I propose to make it as a record on Hansard. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that in giving these tabulations, which involve a great many figures, I be permitted merely to comment on them and to give the general result, and that the complete statement be placed on the pages of Hansard?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: A list of figures which has not been actually read in the House can only be inserted in Hansard by unanimous consent. I feel sure, however, that under the circumstances that consent will be given. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the figures referred to by the hon. minister be inserted in Hansard without being read in their entirety? Carried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thank the House for the permission which it has given me. My object, of course, is to have the record on Hansard so that it will be available to hon. members of the House and to those out of the House who desire to consult it:

COMPARISON for 10 years, 1904–1913, of consolidated Revenue Receipts and Expenditure on Militia and Defence.

		Average for 10 years.....		" 7½ "

It will be observed that in the year 1904 the consolidated revenue of this country was, in round figures, $70,000,000 and that the militia expenditure alone was $3,900,000; in other words, that we spent just about five and one-half per cent of our total revenue on militia. In 1905 the revenue rose to $71,000,000 odd and the expenditure on militia to $5,678,000 odd, about eight per cent of our total revenue being spent on militia. I will not read amounts for all the intervening years. I come down to the year 1910 when our revenue had risen to the sum of $101,000,000 odd and our militia expenditure to $7,026,000, or just about 7 per cent of our total revenue. The year 1911 was an important year because in that year we branched out upon a policy of naval expenditure. In 1910, our naval expenditure was only in its beginning; it was a mere nothing. In 1911, we had a revenue of $117,000,000; we spent on our militia $8,000,000 odd, and our naval expenditure for that year amounted to $1,790,000 odd making an expenditure on defence, both military and naval for that year a total of $9,834,000 or about 9½ per cent of our total revenue. It may be said—it is sometimes said: "Oh, we could spend that amount in that year because we had a large surplus." I admit that there was a surplus of ordinary revenue over ordinary expenditure in 1911 but nothing like the surplus which the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) can announce to-day upon the same account. In the year 1911, while there was a surplus of about thirty million, there was also a substantial increase in the public debt. I notice that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) last night announced in his speech that the surplus in 1911 was $37,000,000. According to the public accounts, I make the surplus only $30,000,000, but, perhaps, the statement of my hon. friend is a misprint or a clerical error. Certainly there was a substantial surplus, and there was also a substantial increase in the public debt. But I take the ten years which are set out year by year on the statement which I asked to be printed on Hansard, and I find that the average expenditure for military purposes from 1904 to 1910 represented roughly about 7½ per cent of our total revenue for this period. In 1911, we launched into a naval expenditure for the first time, and if we add the military and naval expenditures together, we find that in 1911 we then expended about 9½ per cent of our whole revenue for military and naval purposes. In other words, while the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance, he spent annually for military and naval purposes on an average 7½ per cent of the total revenue of this country. What is the proportion to-day? It is less than 3½ per cent of the revenue of this country, and we live in a time of unsettlement and of unrest when there is some real need for watchfulness and for security, whereas my hon. friend's expenditure for those purposes was during those fifteen years of prosperity, those fifteen golden years of peace and harmony as he has described them, when not a cloud blotted the horizon and not a disturbance took place within our own borders. Yet my hon. friend found it proper and necessary—and in doing so he was supported in the Government of that day by four or five hon. members who now sit opposite to me in this House—in ten years to make an average expenditure, for military and naval purposes of 7½ per cent of his whole revenue and that in times of absolute peace, without a cloud in the sky, without a danger or an anxiety; and to-day we spend only 3½ per cent of our revenue for the same purpose, during this period of unrest and unsettlement.

I am going to make a second comparison from another point of view. I am going to make a comparison on a per capita basis, in order to let the House see what all our defence expenditure is costing us. I use the term "defence expenditure," which includes all our military expenditure, all our naval expenditure, all the Canadian Air Force expenditure, because the term "defence expenditure" is the term adopted at the Brussels Conference to include all similar expenditure and it applies to each nation which filed its report at that conference.

Mr. McKENZIE KING: What about the Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I exclude in all my calculations the North West Mounted Police. In all my calculations and statements for the last ten years under Liberal regime, I excluded the Mounted Police. Had I included them, the proportion would have been considerably higher. I have likewise excluded the Mounted Police in my second calculation, for the reason that the Mounted Police Force has been maintained in this country from its inception to the present time as a non-military force, as a police force. The provinces maintain police forces; so do the municipalities, and we do not look on them, we have never treated nor considered them, as a military force in any sense of the term. The Mounted Police Force is not in any way under military control; it is not under the Department of Militia and Defence. What have I included for the purpose of my statement? I have taken the whole proposed militia expenditure as shown at page 31 of the Estimates, $11,890,000. I will generalize on this statement in the same way as before and ask that I be permitted to place it on Hansard.

(a) Estimated. (b) Exclusive of expenditure by individual States on State Militias (National Guard).
(c) Exclusive of $18,852,556 budgetted for military activities in Morocco.
(d) Includes one-sixth of a building programme of $50,000,000 to be spread over six years.
(e) Includes Special Expenditure for Defence amounting to $33,923,739.
(f) Includes Special Expenditure for Defence amounting to $5,534,030.
Normal figures for France are not available.

The average expenditure, per capita, for the above-named countries, exclusive of Canada, works out at $6.98.

*Estimating population at 8,500,000 expenditure per capita equals $1.79.
" " 8,000,000 " " " $1.89.

This statement covers so many figures that I would only weary the House by reading them all. I have included the whole item of militia expenditure. I do not deduct from the militia expenditure, and I might well deduct from it $350,000 for the Royal Military College, an educational institution for a civilian education to a much greater extent than for a military education. I do not deduct from the amount, and I might well deduct from it $450,000 for physical training of our high school cadets. I do not deduct from the amount, and I might well deduct from it $45,000 for topographic survey, which is thoroughly civilian in character, because all the departments and many municipalities get our maps and very few of our military officers use them. These three items aggregate about $840,000. Then I take the whole of the cost of Naval Service appropriation, $2,500,000, as shown on page 48 of the Estimates, and the whole of the Canadian Air Force appropriation as shown on page 61 of the Estimates, $825,000. I do not take the Civil Aviation appropriation, because that is purely civil. Therefore, the total amount for defence purposes which this Government proposes to expend is $15,215,000. What is our population?—because I am going to put this proposed expenditure to a per capita test. What is it fair to place our population at? The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, took it at 9,000,000 persons. We will take it at that figure first; and at 9,000,000 persons, the result is that the total proposed expenditure for all defence purposes in this country is the comparatively insignificant sum of $1.69 per capita. If it be thought that 9,000,000 is too high a figure to place upon our population—and we will not know the census returns until after June—cut it down; take it at 8,500,000 people. That would make the per capita expenditure $1.79. It may be that also is too high. Take it then, at 8,000,000 people, and surely we are justified in that assumption. The per capita expenditure then, for the whole defence of Canada, military, naval and air, would be only $1.89, an insignificant amount surely. But if some one insists that we should add to that the Mounted Police expenditure, add $3,500,000 for the Mounted Police, or 45 cents per capita. I object to the Mounted Police expenditure being added as "military" expenditure; but if we are warranted in adding it, do so, and we shall still have a smaller per capita expenditure than any other country in the civilized world. How are we going to establish whether we are spending too much or too little on the defence of our country? Would it be fair to look around and see what other countries are doing; would it be fair to look around and see what the other British dominions are doing? That might be a fair comparison to make, and if we make it, what do we find? The figures contained in the statement which I have placed on Hansard have been compiled from records in the Militia Department by very expert officers, from information which comes through the Intelligence Branch of the department, and I think the figures are both reliable and up to date.

For comparison I go first to Australia. The estimate of population in Australia today is 5,000,000. Expenditure for militia $13,800,000 odd, just about $2,000,000 above us; naval expenditure is $14,000,000, about $11,500,000 above us; air force in Australia, $2,700,000, as against $825,000 for Canada; or a total defence expenditure in Australia of $30,637,000, equal to $6.13 per head of population, as against only $1.69 per head in the Dominion of Canada.

Now let us take New Zealand. New Zealand has a population estimated at 1,200,000. Military expenditure stands at $2,876,000; naval expenditure, $1,688,000; no air force; total for defence $4,565,000, equal to $3.80 per head in little New Zealand as compared with only $1.69 per head in the great Dominion of Canada.

Next let us compare the expenditure in the Union of South Africa. The only estimate of population given for South Africa contains a note, that it represents the whites only. It does not take into account the tremendous native African population. The white population is estimated at 1,276,242. The figures show no naval expenditure; no air expenditure; military expenditure $7,089,000, equal to $5.55 per head of white population as compared with only $1.69 per head in Canada. These are our three great sister Dominions, and Canada in comparison with them occupies a wonderfully satisfactory position, in regard to military and naval expenditure.

If you take the per capita basis as a fair basis of comparison—I do not think it is, in every respect, because when I read down the list I find that other countries, Brazil, for instance, with a tremendous native South American Indian population, have a very low per capita charge, but I am going to give these figures, in the first instance upon this basis.

In the United Kingdom the figures are somewhat alarming. The United Kingdom has an estimated population of 40,000,000. Military expenditure calls for $447,000,000; naval expenditure $371,000,000; air expenditure $85,000,000, or a total of $933,000,000, odd, equal to $23.35 per head of population.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not question the figures given by my hon. friend, but there is justification for the figures in the case of South Africa; I know whereof I speak. There is a constant danger there of a native revolt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would rather not be interrupted now. If my hon. friend will let me finish, he can then make his statement. There may be special reasons which can be urged in every country in the world, but there is this to be said: no matter how you view it, Canada has still the lowest expenditure in the world.

I have given the figures for the British Dominions and the Mother Land, save India. I have not got the figures for India upon a per capita basis, because I have nothing reliable in regard to her population. I have the expenditure of India upon another basis, in another statement which I propose to submit.

Coming back to North America, I may say that there are no Mexican figures available that are of any value. Nor have I included in the statements the small Central American states around the canal zone, because I have not been able to obtain information which is reliable as to them; I do not think there is any regular military or naval organization at all in some of these small states. I come now to the United States. The United States has a tremendous programme for the immediate future. The estimate of population is placed at 105,000,000. The proposed expenditure by the Federal Government on its army is $639,250,000; navy, $644,250,000; air force, $95,000,000—$10,000,000 more than Great Britain. The total expenditure is $1,378,000,000, equal to $13.13 per head of population, and this huge sum excludes the tremendous expenditure that is made in the United States by the various states themselves for the maintenance of what they call the State National Guards. Exclusive of state expenditure the per capita charge is $13.13 per head in the neighbouring republic as compared with $1.69 per head in the Dominion of Canada.

Next let us turn to South America. The Argentine is a great republic. Its population is estimated at 8,279,000 odd; army expenditure stands at $13,500,000; naval, $9,000,000; it has no air force. Total expenditure, $22,500,000 odd or $2.72 per head of population, or $1.03 per head more than Canada. Brazil's per capita expenditure is reduced very much by reason of her large native population. She claims a population of 27,000,000; military expenditure calls for $36,846,000; naval expenditure, $17,000,000; no air expenditure. Total expenditure for defence nearly $60,000,000, yet on the per capita basis it is only a little over $2.

Chile comes next with a population of 3,900,000; army expenditure, $14,000,000 odd; navy, $6,000,000; or a per capita expenditure of $5.06. These are the only South American countries for which I have statistics. Several other South American republics submitted their returns to the Brussels Conference and these are printed in the report, but these returns do not give the military and naval expenditures of many of the South American countries. Let us next go over to Europe. Denmark with a population of 2,900,000 spends on its navy, $8,000,000; army, $21,250,000. It has just started an air force with an expenditure of $12,500; its per capita expenditure is $10.10.

Holland, with a population of 6,778,000, spends $16,000,000 odd on its army, $17,000,000 on its navy and air force—the figures are not separated—or about $4.88 per head of population.

Norway, with a population of 2,632,000, spends on its army and navy about $12,000,000, or $4.76 per head of population.

Portugal, with a population of 5,900,000, spent $44,000,000 on its army, and $12,000,000 on its navy, or a per capita expenditure of $9.58.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For what year are these figures?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a revolution in Portugal practically every month.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I fancy that accounts for their heavy expenditure. Spain claims a population of 20,719,000. It spent $29,000,000 on its army, and $20,500,000 on its navy; no air expenditure. By reason of its large population its per capita expenditure is only $2.43 while its total expenditure for defence runs over $50,000,000.

Sweden, with a population of 5,800,000, has an expenditure of $67,000,000 odd on its army, and $14,000,000 on its navy, or a per capita expenditure of $14.03.

Switzerland, with a population of 3,937,000, spent on its army, $8,600,000 odd; no naval expenditure—it has no navy—and no air expenditure. Its per capita expenditure is $2.20. This per capita statement does not give the figures for other European countries.

The reason for that is apparent I think. The other countries, or most of them, are hardly yet reduced to what one might call a peace basis. Reliable figures were not furnished at the conference from Germany, from Hungary, from Poland, from Finland, from Greece, from Lithuania, or any of the other central European countries, and Russia was not represented at all. But I have given the House now a statement on a per capita basis, of all European countries which are more or less restored to a peace basis; and taking that whole list of countries in Europe, as well as those of North America, South America, the British dominions and the Mother Land, Canada is so far below the per capita expenditure of any other country, in the world as to make the other countries, by comparison, look extremely extravagant in regard to military and naval expenditures. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the per capita test is not always the safest or fairest test. It is not in the case of Brazil, nor would it be in the case of India. I do not know that I should like to adopt it as the only test in regard to the Dominion of Canada; but so well am I borne out in my contention by the actual figures that I am prepared to adopt any test which the House may ask me to apply, and still Canada's position will be pre-eminent. Now, the test which I adopted as applicable to the regime of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), when he was Minister of Finance, was to ascertain the proportion paid for military expenditures, having regard to the total revenue of the country from year to year. The ordinary annual revenue of a country forms a fair indication of the wealth of a country, although I admit it is not in any sense a conclusive test. However, it is some indication of a country's position and not a bad test to apply when you are making comparisons in matters of national expenditure. When you settle your military programme, you have regard to the number of people in the country and their condition; you have regard to the wealth of the community, to the actual and potential wealth of the country, and, as well, to all other matters which should influence the decision of a government in establishing a military or defensive system in any country and providing the money therefor. Consequently, I take the annual revenue as a reasonable basis and apply the test, and applying such a test I find that last year the ordinary revenues in this country, as announced in the House last week, were $432,000,000. I then take the Estimates of this session and find that the expenditure proposed for this year for military, naval and air purposes is $15,215,000, or just 3.5 per cent of the revenue. In other words, out of every $100 which will come into the treasury in ordinary revenue this year, based on last year's figures, we shall spend $3.50 for the whole defence of the country, while in the year 1911, when my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's presided over the treasury of the country, of every $100 that came into the treasury $9.50 was spent for defensive purposes. What troubled my hon. friend in his criticism of military expenditure was lack of information; what troubled him also—and we can excuse it—was lack of industry. Had he fully read the report of the Brussels conference he would have found the figures and all the information which I now propose to give to the House. He evidently perused only part of the report; he had not concluded his perusal before he made his speech. I now beg to submit to the House another comparative statement which I desire, for the information of hon. members, to place on Hansard. I will only summarize it. This statement, I may remark parenthetically, is given in the current coin of the respective countries; it is not necessary that it should be reduced into the dollar currency. These figures are for the year 1920-21 as supplied to the Brussels conference, and I have placed, for ready reference, opposite the name of each country, the page in the report of the conference where the figures appear.

From this table it appears that Australia with a revenue of £49,905,000, spent £3,795,000 for all defensive purposes, or 7.6 per cent of its whole revenue while Canada spends only 3.5 per cent. New Zealand, with a revenue of £27,000,000 odd, spent £3,968,000, or 14.4 per cent of the whole income of that country was devoted to military and naval expenditures as against Canada's 3.5 per cent. South Africa, with a revenue of £27,967,000, spent £1,386,000, or 4.9 per cent of the total revenue. Now we come to another great Dominion. India, with a revenue of £134,000,000 spent £36,000,000 for defensive purposes, or 28 per cent of the total revenue of the Indian Empire. The figures I give for Canada, I may say, are based on the revenue for the year ending March 31 last, and the figures in regard to our expenditures are in the Estimates now before the House.

Now, I propose to examine the expenditure of some of the European countries on the same basis. The United Kingdom, with a revenue of £1,418,000,000, spent £230,429,000, or 16.3 per cent of her total revenue for defence purposes. Italy spent 20.1 per cent, for purposes of defence; France, 20.7 per cent; Belgium, 7.9 per cent; Holland, 11.6 per cent. Spain, with its small per capita expenditure, expended on her army and navy 38.4 per cent of her total revenue; while Switzerland, on last year's figures spent 49 per cent of her revenue to maintain her army; she has no navy. This, I may say, does not take into account the Cantons of Switzerland, but merely the Federation. Sweden, with an income of 929,400,000 kronens, spent 197,942,000 kronens on her army and navy, or 21.3 per cent. Norway spent 8.1 per cent; Denmark, 15 per cent on defensive purposes.

Take the nations of Europe, running from the lowest, 7.9 per cent, to the highest, 49 per cent of the total revenues of those countries are expended on armaments for the maintenance of armies and navies. Is it any wonder that the conference of Brussels made a recommendation on the question of further expenditures on armaments?

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But compared with these vast expenditures, the modest 3.5 per cent of our revenue which we expend for similar purposes makes the position of Canada, I think, pre-eminent. It may be said—and quite probably it will—that I have dealt only with the warring nations of Europe and that some of them are not yet restored to a peace basis. Well, some of the nations I have mentioned were never in the war and were never off a peace basis, but these nations also have large expenditures for military purposes. Let me turn next to South America, a part of the globe that was as far removed from the zone of war as could possibly be. (I cannot give the figures for the United States because the United States was not represented officially at the Brussels Conference and did not submit any statistics of defence expenditure. The figures I gave in regard to that country in my per capita statement, were, however, obtained from reliable sources. I obtained these figures only on a per capita basis, and could not divide the expenditure because I do not know what their revenues were in order to find the percentage. I have therefore omitted the United States from this comparison, but the percentage in the United States will be high enough when the facts are published.) But let us take South America. In the Argentine Republic it takes $14.07 out of every $100 of the revenue to maintain the army and navy. In Brazil the army and navy consume $22.06 out of every $100 of revenue, and in Chile, it takes $32.09 of every $100, of the total revenue to meet military and naval expenditures. These are the only countries in South America which furnished particulars to the Brussels Conference. But I can refer the House to several countries of Asia. The interesting country of Japan, with a total income, on the basis of 1920, of over 1,000,000,064 yen, expended for defensive purposes 544,000,000 yen, or 51 per cent of the total income. China's currency is given in dollars. China had a revenue in 1919—not 1920—of $490,000,000, and a defence expenditure of $207,000,000; 42.4 per cent of the total revenue of China went in defence expenditure. Now, take little Siam. Siam had a revenue of 72½ millions ticals, and an expenditure of 17,920,000 ticals—24.7 per cent of the revenue of Siam was spent for defence purposes. Mr. Speaker, these are interesting tables and they establish the fact that I have tried to emphasize in this House on many occasions, that the expenditure of Canada for military, naval and air purposes is positively at the lowest point consistent with the public safety and national dignity. It is not extravagant, it has been pared down to the bone. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's approves the proposal of some military expenditure, of some armed force for the preservation of the dignity of Canada, and the maintenance of peace within our own borders. What I submit to the House is, you cannot reduce this expenditure any further and at the same time maintain even a small and efficient force. If you go below the line of safety you will simply waste your money—you may spend your money so sparingly that you may have nothing useful or practical to show for it in the end. We have come pretty close to the margin of safety now, if we have not actually gone beyond it. I have got another illustration and I may as well give it to the House now. Some one may suggest that the comparative statement I have just cited is not a fair test because some countries have more revenue than others as a result of higher taxation. Very well then, establish a test upon the basis of the expenditure of each country. Apply that test. I ask permission to print another statement which will afford a comparison of the expenditure for defence purposes of most of the leading countries of the world in relation to the total expenditure for all purposes in such countries. I now beg to lay such a statement before the House:

COMPARATIVE Statement of Expenditure for Defence and Total Expenditure of various Countries based on Reports furnished to International Financial Conference, for 1920–21.

*Canada figures taken from Estimates of 1921–22.

Canada's expenditure for defence purposes is two and a half per cent of the total expenditure of this country accepting the statement in the Budget of $591,000,000 as Canada's total expenditure. If the actual expenditure is more, the percentage will be less; but taking it at that figure the expenditure for the army, the navy and the air force is two and a half per cent of our total expenditure. In Australia the expenditure for these purposes is 7.5 per cent; New Zealand 11.7 per cent; South Africa 3.5 per cent; India, 27.5 per cent of total expenditure. Now let me take the countries of Europe: in the United Kingdom 16.8 per cent of the whole expenditure of the country is for purposes of defence; in Holland, 11.7 per cent; in Spain, 34.3 per cent; in Switzerland, 34.3 per cent; in Sweden, 22.2 per cent; in Norway, 10.6 per cent; in Denmark, 10 per cent; in Belgium, 8.6 per cent; in France for 1920, 11.8 per cent; in Italy for 1920-21, 23.8 per cent. These are all the European countries in regard to which I am able to furnish figures. For South America: in the Argentine Republic 15.6 per cent of the whole expenditure is for the army and navy; in Brazil 26 per cent of the whole expenditure is for defence; in Chili, 43 per cent of the expenditure is for defence; and in Uruguay, 17.7 pr cent. Now let us take Asia: in China, 41.9 per cent of the total expenditure is for the army and navy; in Japan 47.9 per cent of the total expenditure; and in Siam, 20 per cent of her whole expenditure.

We have wended our way through North America and South America, through Europe, through Asia, we have touched on Africa, and we have looked in upon the larger islands of the 5 p.m. Pacific ocean in our search for comparisons. Make what comparison you deem proper, frame it from any viewpoint you desire, in every instance the position of Canada upon the question of military and naval expenditure is so outstanding, so pronounced and so satisfactory it should silence all criticism on the subject. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I need deal further with that question.

I had the honour of attending the Brussels Conference in September last, and I was a party to the resolution which my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's has laid before the House. I came home from the conference imbued with the idea that one of the greatest curses in the world to-day was military expenditure. I came home as fully determined as possible to plunge the knife into the military expenditure of this country so long as I did not go below the line of safety. I am disclosing no secret information which I should not make known when I inform the House that when the Estimates of the Militia Department for the present year and for the present requirements of this country were submitted to me in the first instance—Estimates not prepared extravagantly or elaborately, but merely providing for what in ordinary times one might call the absolutely necessary military requirements of Canada—when all the various branches of the department had made their requests, the aggregate was almost $17,000,000. This was the amount we should have had to ask for to keep up just the ordinary, pre-war, peace-time military establishment. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's expended for this purpose away back in the year 1905 the sum of $5,678,000 upon the militia. If the purchasing power of the dollar in 1905 was upon the basis of the dollar to-day it would have required an expenditure of over $11,000,000 to carry out the modest programme of 1905.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Are my hon. friend's calculations based on the existing rate of exchange in the European and Asiatic countries?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They were prepared by very expert officials, but I cannot give my hon. friend the information he seeks. I can tell him this however—the figures presented at the Brussels Conference are the figures which each nation furnished from its own Treasury Department, and in all these calculations I have given the figures in the currency of each country, making the comparison by percentages which absolutely avoids the question of exchange.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not think my hon. friend understood my question. Take the case of Great Britain, a pound in Great Britain is worth approximately $4.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I gave the figures for Great Britain in pounds sterling.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is the calculation based upon what the pound is worth to-day or on $4.86, the normal rate of exchange?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my hon. friend must have misunderstood me. The tota expenditure of the United Kingdom is one billion and some odd pounds. Its army and navy expenditure is 230 million odd pounds. The ratio is 16.8 per cent; it does not affect the question of exchange.

Mr. KING: What about a per capita basis?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In that instance the figures are upon a dollar basis. The figures are given in the currency of each country in the second and third statements dealing with percentages.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is the per capita basis that I have reference to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I could get that information, but I do not happen to have it under my hand now. However, the point I make is this: That I have resolutely endeavoured to cut down military expenditure in Canada. I was impressed with what I heard, and with what I saw at the Brussels Conference, and I deliberately determined to cut down this expenditure in every reasonable way. Not only was it my own determination to do so but it was by positive instructions from my leader the right hon. Prime Minister. I had little alternative in that respect; I not only cut the expenditure down because it was in accord with my own judgment, but also because I was positively instructed to do so. A serious question is, have I cut it below what I should have done? I do not desire to say anything unkind about certain criticisms which are offered in this House from time to time in regard to military expenditure, although I do think much of this criticism arises very largely through a lack of information on the subject. I have heard motions put in committee to reduce the vote for the annual drill of the militia from $1,500,000 to $750,000. Why, you might just as well cut that expenditure out altogether. If you are going to have a militia you will have to drill it, otherwise you had better not have a force at all. The actual figures required this year for the training of militia units, the volunteers, was $2,700,000, but we cut the figures down to 1½ millions. This sum will only allow us to drill eighty per cent of the militia units at sixty-five per cent of their strength, allow them only six days' annual training instead of, as formerly, twelve days. That is a very substantial cut. If you go below that amount you might as well wipe the expenditure out altogether. I express the earnest hope that next year sufficient money may be voted by the House to enable all the militia units in Canada to perform their annual training at full strength and for full time. It will require at least $1,200,000 additional to do this, but it will be money well spent by the country. Another hon. member criticised the amount asked for in the Estimates for the permanent force, and moved to reduce the vote by $2,000,000. The Permanent Force is at rock bottom at the present moment, and every dollar in the Estimates is absolutely necessary to maintain this small force. We will not come out even this year unless we suffer from a few desertions this summer as we usually do at that season, so close have we cut those figures. I think there was one other item in the Estimates against which a motion was made this session. It was to cut out the pay and allowances to officers—the little allowance which the commanding officer of a unit has for the purpose of paying the incidental expenses of the unit, the little outgoings that otherwise he has to pay out of his own pocket. Does the House not know that the band of loyal men who command our militia units give their time practically for nothing, that every man of them is a loser from the financial point of view, to say nothing of the loss of time. The money they draw does not as a rule come to them, it is funded for the purposes of the regiment. The expenses in far too many cases have to come out of the pocket of the commanding officer. There is absolutely no financial gain for any man in the militia. It is loyal, patriotic work on the part of the men who command these units, and I would be sorry indeed that the day should come when this House should cut out these trifling allowances to men who so freely give their services, their time and their money.

May I make just one more reference to the attitude of my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's and also to the attitude of my hon. friend the official leader of the Opposition in regard to the Militia of Canada. The former in his speech on Tuesday stated, used this language—and the passage will be found at page 3252 of Hansard:

> Now come, if you will, to the question of naval and military expenditures. If anybody says that in this country we have no need of any naval or military expenditures—once in a while I hear some suggestion of the kind—I do not wish to be included among the list of people who entertain such views. A self-resepcting country must have a small standing army, a nucleus that would be available when an emergency arises, and it must have, in a moderate degree, even some naval organization.

But this is the part to which I wish to draw particular attention:

> But, I do humbly submit, this is not the time for these things. My hon. friend the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), himself a gallant returned soldier, the other day reminded us of an important fact. We have 400,000 trained soldiers in Canada to-day—the best material for fighting that the world has ever produced. These men can be called upon if any emergency arises. Why we should anticipate any emergency at this time is not easy for anybody to conjecture. If there ever was a time when we had need of but little military expenditure it is to-day, and I believe the men who will be most ready to confirm that view will be the returned soldiers themselves. They have had all the war they want—

Mark those words:

> —they want a chance to get back to the arts of peace. And so I say that the military expenditure might well have been curtailed in the present year in larger measure than has been attempted by my hon. friends opposite.

My hon. friend the member for South Quebec during the passing of the Militia Estimates made an exactly similar statement. Last year when the Militia Estimates were under discussion my hon. friend the official leader of the Opposition made another very similar statement, which will be found at page 3675 of Hansard:

> I would point out that we have in this county at the present time an army of experienced men who need no drilling, men who have been through the war and have suffered its hardships. No amount of drilling in the world will make them more efficient than they are to-day, and until we are through with the work of demobilization we can well afford to dispense altogether with annual drills.

What do these statements mean, Mr. Speaker? They mean simply this, that we have in Canada at this moment about 400,000 of the most highly trained soldiers that the world has ever seen, men who have gone through the worst grilling in battle that the world has ever known. They have bared their breasts to the shot and shell of the enemy, they have taken their chances, they have done much to secure us who stayed at home in our lives, our homes and our liberties. And the message to those brave lads from the leader of the Opposition, from his chief lieutenant who sits beside him, and from the hon. member for South Quebec means, if it means anything: We will be so penurious and so miserly that we will not spend any further money for military training, but if trouble comes in the future we will call again on those brave souls to protect us. Surely, in the name of God, these men have earned some measure of relief, surely under high heaven one may honestly declare that these men have done their bit, their full bit, and are entitled to rest and to immunity while others are in training to take their places. I want every returned soldier—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (rising)—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will not be interrupted for the moment. I want every returned soldier to know the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite upon this question. To my mind it is the most unjust, the most unreasonable and the most ungrateful attitude that could be assumed by any body of men in this or any other country in regard to those gallant men who served their country during those long and awful years of war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are told, on the other hand, that there will be no more war, and the cry is in some quarters: Wipe out all military expenditure. That cry is popular, very popular among some elements in this and every other country. It is particularly pleasant to the ear of the Bolshevist, to the ear of the Red and to the crowd which gathers around the soap-box orator at the street corners in our big cities. They like it, they talk it, they write it in their newspapers. Cut out all military expenditure, is their demand. We reply: No. Reduce the military expenditure to the line of safety and do not go below that line. We have reduced far below the pre-war basis—it was pretty high the year before the war, $11,000,000 and over—we have come back to the same basis we had in 1905, 1906 and 1907. We have adopted the recommendation or rather the suggestion, of the Brussels Conference, and we have carried it into effect to a greater extent than has any other country in the civilized world. I know there are those who believe that the millennium is at hand. I know there are those who believe the League of Nations is going to solve all the difficulties of this world. God grant that it may be so. If the League of Nations shall succeed in maintaining peace among the nations of the world, if it shall succeed in removing from the minds of men the fear of war, and the burden of war from the backs of weary multitudes, it will have accomplished the greatest thing which has transpired in this world since Christ was born in Bethlehem. Let it go on with its good work and it will have our God speed. Let it prosper. But I am inclined to think that the better judgment in this country and throughout the world at this moment is that the time has not yet come when "men will beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks," and until that day does come we, as trustees of the people and of this country, have this clear duty imposed on us, which we have always carried out in the past and will carry it out in the future—the duty of maintaining a sufficient military and naval defensive force to preserve law and order within our own boundaries, to preserve the life and property and homes of our own people, and to keep the shores of this beloved country inviolate, no matter who shall be the aggressor.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak on the subject of the Budget. I must say at once that I do not pose as a military critic, nor did I have any expectation that we were going to fight the war over again, and that all the breeze and enthusiasm and eloquence which during the war served their purpose for the Government were to be rehashed and revamped this afternoon by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie). Let me assure the minister that if there is any patriotic assistance necessary for any soldiers in this country, the Opposition is just as anxious as he is to meet their views and their just demands. Can anything be more ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, than the idea that this vote of eleven odd millions which is in the Estimates for the purposes of militia is going to be a godsend to the wives and children and homes of the soldiers of this country? It is not the intention of the vote; such an end cannot possibly be accomplished by it. Now, what judgment are we to pass upon the speech of the hon. Minister of Militia? It is not necessary for the purposes of the militia vote; it has nothing to do with it. It is simply an attempt to throw dust into the eyes of the returned soldiers and make them believe that the Government is in the right while the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the leader of the Opposition are proceeding in the opposite direction. But nothing of the kind has happened so far as hon. members on this side are concerned as regards assistance to the returned soldier. Let hon. gentlemen opposite read the resolutions that are being sent to them from time to time by returned soldiers, resolutions that are being passed by associations of war veterans all over the country. The last resolution of that kind was passed, I think, by the veterans' organization for the whole of Canada, met in conference in some central city—a resolution calling upon the Government to resign and to let competent men administer the country's affairs. I suppose this strong speech this afternoon is for the purpose of telling the returned soldiers who are passing these resolutions that there is still some kick in the old horse and that something is going to be done.

I do not propose to follow the enthusiastic eloquence of the hon. minister. But could anything be more absurd than for sane men, men who are of age, to be sitting in this House on this beautiful May afternoon discussing expenditures upon war material and war operations in Canada as compared with those of the republics of South America, for instance? Could anything be more ridiculous? We are not an independent nation. We are not defending ourselves against the outside world. Is the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia prepared to say that we are going to start an expenditure in this country for the purpose of defending ourselves against our neighbours to the south? Will nine millions of people arm themselves to protect their country against 110,000,000 or 120,000,000 people? Is that what we are called upon to do? Nobody would think for one moment of such a thing. Does the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia think that the fact that we live alongside a splendid, civilized, God-fearing, law-abiding nation counts for nothing at all? Must me make the same expenditure on armaments, take the same steps for the purpose of protecting our homes, as if we lived down among the Hottentots, in the wilds of South Africa? If that is the theory that is put forward by the Minister of Militia, I assure him that the sound, sensible people of Canada think differently. They are going to take advantage of the fact that they live alongside the class of people that I have just described. We have lived in peace alongside the United States for more than a hundred years, and we want to continue that situation. We do not want to start any trouble between ourselves and our friends across the line or elsewhere by showing that we are spending millions every year upon armaments. Will any member of the Government say that our military expenditures and our military preparations are anything but supplemental to those of the Mother Country and the other dominions? That is the attitude which we have always taken; that is the attitude which we take to-day. When the Mother Country is in danger, when she declares war, we are with her, just as Australia, New Zealand and South Africa and all parts of this great Empire are with her. It is not my understanding of the sentiments of the people of this country that we are to keep up an army and a navy so far as that will make us an independent nation and enable us to fight against our neighbour to the south of us —if such a ridiculous and absurd condition could possibly be conceived. Sir, when the people of this country look for cheaper food, cheaper clothing, cheaper supplies for the maintenance of their families; when they crave for work to enable them to earn the moneys that they require, the Minister of Militia tells them: "We have nothing to offer to you; we have no public works for you; the factories are closed. You who have no bread for your children; you who need clothing for the members of your families; you who cannot sleep at night because of the troubles which beset you—you must bear in mind that the percentage of the cost of armaments to revenue in Canada is less than it is in Brazil. That is what you may feed your children with; that is the consolation the Government has to give you." Sir, it is not necessary to argue that the people of Canada to-day are thinking more of the necessities of life than they are of military matters. I do not think I should occupy any further time in following up these comparisons. Our idea is to get clear of expenditures of this kind so far as we possibly can. Only a few days ago the ex-Prime Minister, the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) delivered an address in this House on constitutional law and constitutional history, on the relations which should exist between one country and another, and on some of the effects of war. And what did he say? He rebuked the Government by saying that the aim should be to drop all appearances of keeping up a military force in this country; that we should come back to peace and harmony and brotherhood. That, I imagine, should be a sufficient answer to the Government for the policy which they are pursuing in military matters. The right hon. member for King's was in charge of the country's affairs during the war and was familiar with all its phases and all the relations which it brought about as between nations—more familiar with them, perhaps, than either the present Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia. We on this side may not always be willing to follow the right hon. member for King's, but I think this is one case in which the people are quite willing to accept his advice. Let us live as peaceably as we can; let us make as little military expenditure as we can; let us get back as quickly as possible to the happy times of pre-war days. Why did thousands of our boys lay down their lives upon the battlefields of France and Flanders if not to establish peace and harmony in this country and forever to down the dragon of war?

If we are to keep up this warlike spirit after the war is over, if no fruit is to be obtained as a result of those sacrifices, we have, to my mind, largely in vain sacrificed the lives of our boys. Nobody need preach to me any higher ideals of our soldiers than I have; and if the day comes, if ever it comes, when it is necessary for this House to give proper recognition to the way in which it appreciates and values the services of those men, I am sure hon. gentlemen on this side will not be found lacking in expressing in a tangible way the manner in which they understand their responsibilities and duties in that regard. I do not take kindly to the lecture which was handed out to us this afternoon by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), as if it was necessary to preach a gospel of that kind to hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House.

Leaving the military business at that, I wish to refer briefly to the first part of the speech of the minister in connection with the Budget. He pointed out the same old fallacy, which has been preached to us for the last number of years, that the Government has a surplus. Can anything be more absurd than to say that we have a deficit of nearly $200,000,000, and at the same time to tell us that we have a surplus? I do not know, nor can I understand, where that surplus comes from. On the face of the figures, which are as plain as they can be, we have a deficit of nearly $200,000,000, but at the same time we are told by the Minister of Militia that we have a surplus.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. member would take the figures of total revenue and total expenditure and just subtract one from the other, and see how his arithmetic is improving.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a statement of that kind which I will come to in a moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the hon. member does not do so.

Mr. McKENZIE: I claim the same right as a private member of this House that ministers of the Crown claim.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. McKENZIE: While I am speaking, I have the same rights as they. The Minister of Militia and Defence scouted the idea of anybody interfering with him; I claim the same right even of the Prime Minister. I am long enough in this House to know what my rights are and I am going to insist upon them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I can amuse or entertain hon. gentlemen opposite, that does not cost me anything and they are welcome to any amusement they can get out of my remarks.

What I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, is this, that you gave a ruling this afternoon, that anything which was given as imaginary should not be entered upon the revised edition of Hansard. I would suggest that when you come to deal with to-day's Hansard, you issue instructions that the speech of the Minister of Militia and Defence, so far as it has reference to this surplus, shall not be entered upon the revised Hansard, because it is certainly of the most imaginary character.

The hon. gentleman speaks about the ordinary expenditure and the ordinary revenue, but he does not tell us what the ordinary revenue is, nor what the ordinary expenditure is. The ordinary revenues of this country are revenues similar to those which were collected before the war, before extraordinary taxes were imposed upon the people of Canada. If you are going to compare ordinary expenditure with ordinary revenue, you have to deal with the ordinary revenue and the ordinary expenditure of this country as we understand such revenues and expenditures. What are the extraordinary revenues that we have collected since the war? According to the figures given by the Minister of Finance, we have a right to say that one-third of the revenue collected by the Post Office Department is extraordinary, because the tax of two cents on a letter was raised to three cents. Therefore, about $9,000,000 of extraordinary revenue was collected in that way. I will give the figures from Hansard itself so that there will be no possibility of mistake about the matter. The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in his speech the other day, gave the different classes of revenue. He said that the revenue of the Post Office Department was $26,000,000. I claim that one-third of that was extraordinary revenue. The amount of $40,000,000 was collected under the business profits war tax, an entirely new tax. The amount of $46,500,000 was collected under the income tax, an entirely new tax. The amount of $79,050,000 was collected under the Inland Revenue war tax, an absolutely new tax. Other war taxes amounted to $2,355,000. These extraordinary taxes amounted altogether to $176,905,000. If the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Militia will deduct that amount of $176,905,000 from the ordinary revenue of the country, and then compare ordinary revenue with ordinary expenditure, there is some justification in the comparison; but if he leaves that amount in the ordinary revenue and makes the comparison in that way, it is not a fair comparison. There might be some justification if the comparison were used for the first time; but it has been used several times during the war; the same criticism was made, and still they keep talking as if moneys collected in this way comprise merely ordinary collections and they had a right to use such moneys as the ordinary revenues of the country.

I do not propose to follow the speech of the Minister of Militia and Defence any further. I wish to dismiss it by saying, for the reasons that I have stated, that he has not dealt at all fairly with the question whether there is a surplus or not, and the question, on which he spent a whole afternoon, trying to show us that this country is not spending on war as much as some of the smaller republics and small countries in the world which are absolutely independent nations and must defend themselves against other nations that are ready and apt to make war upon them at any minute, is not such a matter as should engage the time of this House for a single minute.

Coming down to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and the presentment of the case which he has made to the House, I can only say that as sane, fair people would approach a question of this kind according to the facts as they present themselves, so would I approach the discussion of this question. I do not for one minute presume that anything which I can say will add to the most illuminating speeches that have been made by hon. gentlemen from this side of the House. The speeches made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and by my desk mate, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), are of the most illuminating and noteworthy character, and if it was merely a case of resting upon a clear-cut answer to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Finance, it would not be necessary for this side of the House to say very much more, if indeed anything more upon the subject.

It was also most noticeable that the speeches made on the other side of the House came from Liberals, or Liberal proselytes, if you choose. There does not seem to be anybody left at all of the Old Guard who knows anything whatever about questions of this kind. I see I have stirred up my good friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan). He is not at all prepared to take a back seat; he is not willing to admit that all the learning and all the knowledge and all the capacity necessary to discuss public questions rests with the Jews who have gone across over there from this side of the House. He believes that among the Gentiles also there are men who know something about public questions. We also had a very excellent speech from a one-time strong Liberal, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne). He still tries to keep some shred, perhaps only a smell, of the garment of Liberalism around him whenever he makes his speeches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has had the garment fumigated.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sure that fumigation would be required for anybody to live on the other side of the House. I was simply referring in the most complimentary way to the speeches of my hon. friend.

Then what did we have in the speech that we have just listened to from my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie)? As I heard him speak, I was trying to figure out whether we were listening to Saul of Tarsus or Paul the Apostle. The transition was very striking indeed. I could not help thinking as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was making his speech that his friend who was sitting alongside of him, the Minister without portfolio, the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Spinney), was very uncomfortable. I was looking at him from my position of vantage here, and I could see that while the Minister of Marine was pounding his desk, emphasizing his high-as-Haman's-gallows protection, my good friend from Yarmouth was doing a lot of thinking about a speech of his last year. When the tariff walls were being raised higher and higher, and hon. gentlemen opposite were pounding their desks the harder, the higher the walls of high protection were to be raised in this country, I could not help thinking of what my hon. friend from Yarmouth said last year:

> I can only say that I regret that at this stage my hon. friend found it necessary to introduce this amendment which comes at a very inopportune time. It has for its purpose, as I assume, the downfall of the Union Government, or their return to the country to get a fresh mandate from the people. I must point out this fact, that since they have been in power I have followed them as a free trade, or rather as a revenue tariff liberal. I am that to-day, but I do not believe that any tariff for other than revenue purposes could be satisfactorily dealt with in this country at the present time.

That is the gospiel of my good friend from Yarmouth—revenue tariff or free trade, if you please. I would say to him that it was time indeed when he heard that strong, loud speech from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which left no doubt at all as to the attitude of the Government, to take up his bed and walk, and say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce as he passed out of the door: "Fare thee well, and if forever, then forever, fare thee well,"—because there appears to be nothing in common between the views, or the protestations at least, of the hon. minister without portfolio and the statements of the rest of the Cabinet. I presume that, like most other things, he will disappear and the place that knew will will know him no more forever. I think it can be said that as far as representing the fair county of Yarmouth is concerned, he has finished his work. There may be a crown for him somewhere, but not in the county of Yarmouth.

I have referred to the speeches on the other side of the House from men who were formerly on this side. I am proud of those speeches. It is some satisfaction to know that the men who have gone away from here, but without whom we can get along so splendidly, because we have such excellent talent on this side of the House—surplus as they were with us, and easily as we could spare them, the other side of the House must needs seize them and put them in the very forefront, as evidently they have nobody else to put up. That is some satisfaction to us on this side of the House, and that is the reason I have alluded to those speeches. I had forgotten to mention in this connection my good friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). No man deserves better at the hands of this side of the House to-day than my hon. friend, for the very scathing criticism that he handed out to the Government yesterday. Of course, I did not receive that criticism with any very great acclaim, because I know my hon. friend from North Oxford so well. There is some nigger in the fence; there was something in that speech of his last night by which he is to advantage himself. I have not been able to discover just what it was, but before the general election is over it will be very clear on every barnside in the county of North Oxford just what his purpose was. However, speaking for myself, we expect to get along to some extent with the assistance he gave us last night, but let me assure him that we are not at all deceived as to the real genuine purpose of that speech, and the real spirit of it will come to the fore before many months.

Mr. NESBITT: Tell us what you think the purpose was?

Mr. McKENZIE: I told my hon. friend that I had not reached a conclusion. There are so many things it might be. But there were so many barn doors to it that it would be difficult to reach any clear conclusion as to what it meant. However, of one thing I am perfectly clear, and that is that it is not all intended for us; that is one sure thing.

As I was saying, Sir, if the minister's statement were that of a business concern, it would not be found very satisfactory. The financial condition of any institution is the best index to its strength and stability, and the condition of this country at present is not satisfactory, financially or otherwise, if we are to judge by the figures presented by the minister. I do not think it can be said that Canada, financially speaking, is in a very healthy condition. The minister tells us that for the ensuing year, the revenue will be $432,000,000; but the prospective expenditure—not the $500,000,000 which has been spoken of—is $613,000,000. In other words, there is a deficit, according to my subtraction, of $181,000,000. Per capita, this is $21, and for a family of, say, six, it represents a burden of $126. The national debt has increased from $350,000,000 to $2,350,236,700, an advance of $2,000,236,700. This shows an increase per annum, during the ten years my hon. friends have been in power, of $200,023,670, or a per capita debt of about $260, which, for a family of six, means $1,560. Now, the per capita tax in 1911, the year the Liberal party gave up the reins of power, was about $43, or, for a family of six, $258. At the present time it is $1,560, showing an alarming increase. That in itself speaks volumes for what is being done in the country to-day as compared with the record of our day, and the result is altogether attributable to the difference in policy between the two parties.

In the House a few minutes ago I saw my good friend from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Nicholson). It will be remembered that he declared in this House some years ago—I think, indeed, the first year he was in the House—after associating for a while with hon. gentlemen on the other side, and conversing with them, that the policy of the Tory party was to dash away and spend the money; and he is a good business man who has a knowledge of financial matters. Now, following out that programme, hon. gentlemen have certainly spent the people's money to such an extent that to-day there is hardly anything left with which to carry on the public affairs. The expenditure to-day is $613,000,000, as compared with an expenditure in the year 1911, the year of the election, of $87,000,000 or $88,000,000. It will be recalled that the right hon. gentleman who to-day represents the county of King's, Nova Scotia, and who was at that time leader of the Opposition, stated, either in the House, or in his manifesto, that that annual expenditure of between $87,000,000 and $88,000,000 was in itself prima facie evidence of reckless and corrupt expenditure on the part of the Liberal Government, and proof that the party then in power deserved to be turned out of office, and the charge of public affairs handed over to other people. What does the right hon. gentleman say to-day when he finds that, for practically the same purposes, apart from war expenditures, we are spending not $87,000,000, or $88,000,000, but over $600,000,000, of the people's money? If the expenditure of our day was evidence of bad management and lack of judgment, how much more condemnatory is the present scale of expenditures under this Government?

The Minister of Finance—I am sorry he is not in his place—has shown favouritism to the millionaires, the trusts, and the combines in this country, and, as usual, he has kept a heavy hand upon the poor people. Last year there was a great ado in this House in regard to the tax on luxuries. We were told that the Minister of Finance had at last awakened to the gravity of the situation, and was determined to tax those who could afford silks, satins, and all the other luxuries that money can buy. He was going to lay a firm hand on such people and make them contribute to the taxes of the country to pay the costs of the war. There was considerable talk about this, and quite a discussion, and at last this tax was put into operation. Well, what has happened? I see the Minister of Finance in his place now and I am glad of the fact. The hon. gentleman soon caught on to the disposition of the company in which he found himself as a member of the Government; became a friend of the millionaire and of the profiteer, and now things are reversed and he lays a heavy hand upon the ordinary man, who should be helped and for whom living conditions should be made as easy as possible. While he abolished the luxury tax, the only weapon by which he could reach those who are able to travel and who can revel in luxuries, he retains the means for making things uncomfortable for the poor man and of taking from him practically that which he has not. He allows to escape the ladies with the diamonds and sumptuous furs, the silks and the satins; he lets go the Queen of Sheba, while he chases the little boy with the twenty-five pound bag of flour under his arm. I told a former Minister of Finance in this House when a tax was put on apples that they were taxing the fruit of the poor man. That tax is in force yet. I told him when they put a tax on oil that they were taxing the light of the poor man. They put on the apple tax to please their supporters, and millionaire supporters at that, from the great province of British Columbia. On the occasion referred to, I told the former Minister of Finance that by what he had done he had knocked the apple out of the baby's hand and sent him to bed in the dark. Now I am telling the present Finance Minister that while he lets the Queen of Sheba go by in swell array he is having a tax collector stand on the corner, stick in hand, to knock down the poor fellow that has not paid the tax on his twenty-five pounds of flour. All these things constitute evidence that the poor man is visited with the scourge of taxation, while those who can better afford to pay such taxes are allowed to go scot free.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was pointing out the unfairness of the distribution of taxation as presented by the policy of the present Administration and as applied by the Minister of Finance. I was pointing out that the class of people who were supposed to be living in luxury and capable of enjoying the fruits of wealth are allowed to escape under the Budget, whereas the poorer classes are visited with taxation. I was pointing out that the man who can buy on a large scale escapes, in some places and under certain circumstancese, the taxation which falls on the poor man whose means will not permit him to buy on such a scale.

I wish to point out further, Sir, that ever since we got into war habits of expenditure this Government has always permitted the barons and profiteers of the Tory party to make millions, whereas no like opportunity has been given to the rank and file of our people. I wish to point out now, as I pointed out before, the very serious mistake made by the then Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and by his successor, the present minister, in adopting his policy, in lending money to the tune of millions of dollars, money that in a sense we did not have—borrowed money, to foreign countries without security and without very much prospect of ever getting it back. In fact, it is more in the nature of a gift than a loan. What was it given for, Mr. Speaker? There is no record in Parliament of any request having come from those foreign countries for loans. Nor is there any record, so far as any member of the Government has ever disclosed, that any proper provision was made by any of the governments of those foreign countries to furnish business-like security. And those moneys were advanced out of borrowed funds which might have been applied to much better purpose at home.

How were those moneys to be spent? One would suppose that the plenipotentiaries of those foreign countries would come here and make proper arrangements with our Minister of Finance, but there is no record of anything of the kind. As a matter of fact, those loans really were provided so that a coterie of supporters of the Government, manufacturers of Ontario and other parts of Canada, might dispose of the immense stores of material, such as clothing, harness, boots and shoes, and of foodstuffs, such as butter, cheese, flour, potatoes, pork, mutton and beef, which they had gathered up all over the country for the purposes of the war in the expectation that it would continue longer than it did. When peace suddenly came those men were simply overstocked. Those multi-millionaires, those profiteers—and I do not use this term in any improper sense in this connection—men who during the whole course of the war were piling up millions of dollars, and who could very well bear some of the losses consequent upon peace, could very properly have been left to shift for themselves. But what happened, Sir? A commission was formed and some of the members of this House were appointed to divide these millions of dollars among our multi-millionaires who had those goods to sell. The foreign countries evidently had nothing to say about it. The commission decided among themselves how the money was to be applied for the disposal of the huge quantities of goods stored everywhere throughout the country. Those goods were sold and sent to those foreign countries, and their owners got their money clean cut and easy —Government cheques were passed out, and they were through with the transaction. But the Minister of Finance is still looking for his principal and interest, and, so far as we on this side of the House can learn, there is nothing yet in sight.

What fault do I find with those foreign loans, Mr. Speaker? First, I find this fault, that this was not a business transaction, that we did not have the money to spare, and that we might have utilized it to much better purpose in developing our own country, and thus spending the money with the maximum of profit to our own people. Further, I find fault in that the loans have not been properly secured. But the worst feature of all is that the poor people of this country, who during the war and at the time of this transaction were paying enormously high prices for the goods they needed for their families, were denied the opportunity of participating in the advantages which would have accrued had those goods been sold here at the market prices. Instead of that, they were taxed to furnish money to enable others to buy these goods as against themselves, in other words, to compete with them in the markets of this country for goods which the people needed but could not buy by reason of the high prices which were maintained in order that these very goods might be sent to those foreign countries at our expense. I submit, Sir, that that transaction alone is enough to condemn any administration which had to do with it.

If we had not at the proper time directed the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to these things and found fault concerning them, they might well on some subsequent occasion ask why we had not raised the question at the proper time. The records of this House, Sir, will show that I and other hon. gentlemen on this side opposed this transaction as strongly and as vigorously as we could. But the majority opposite feel that they are serving their country, serving the purposes for which they were sent here, by voting down, through the exercise of brute force, any ideas of business principles that emanate from this side. That is the treatment which was handed out to us in connection with this transaction, and it is only in line with the procedure followed by my hon. friends opposite in all matters of like importance since they took office. I point this out as one of the things which the Government have done contrary to the interests of the people, and one of the things which give evidence of a lack of conception on the part of the Government as to how the business of the country should be handled. The people of Canada cannot be fully awake to the enormity of this political crime, the placing of one hundred millions of the people's money in the hands of a commission for the buying of goods out of storehouses in Canada which could have been sold here at a low price and to the advantage of the people, and the carrying of those goods out of the country at our expense. We do not get a cent of the money back and the probabilities are that we never will. I repeat that this is simply in line with the policy of this Administration and with the manner in which they have carried on the business of the country.

We have on our hands the old Mackenzie and Mann railway system, the Canadian Northern. We own it; we have paid for it three or four times over, and we are running it. It is still known to the world as the system of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. When the Government want to borrow money for the running of this railway one would think that any sane Minister of Finance or Minister of Railways would regard the credit of Canada as better than the credit of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. But the Government do not proceed in this way; they borrow money in the name of this defunct and bankrupt corporation—a corporation which, while it was moving or had any life in it, never had the reputation of paying its bills, never had any proper standing in the financial world. Why should we continue to carry on business under the name and standing of that corporation? I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will tell me that I am dreaming. Sir, I am not dreaming; that is the way this Government is carrying on business to-dav. They borrow money in the name of the Canadian Northern. No person questions the credit of this country. I may find fault with the Minister of Finance; I may find fault, and deservedly so, with the Government generally; I may find fault with the policy of hon. gentlemen who are supporting the Government, but I have not the slightest doubt of the sufficiency and the solidity of the credit of this country. If money is to be borrowed we should go into the market as a country with the reputation that we have as business people and borrow it on the strength of our own credit without playing upon the credit of a bankrupt concern such as the Mackenzie and Mann-Canadian Northern Company. I have in my hand, Sir, a record from the other House which sets forth certain inquiries with regard to the borrowing of money by the Government for the purposes of the railway which I have mentioned. These are the questions that were asked:

1. Has the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian National Railways or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway placed any loan in the United States during the last twelve months.
2. If so, with what firms or persons were these placed?
3. Were there any commissions paid or other disbursements of any sort in connection with these loans.
4. If so, to whom were these commissions or other moneys paid?
5. What were the rates of interest?
6. What were the net proceeds of these loans?

The Hon. Sir James Lougheed answers, on the first day of March, 1921, as follows:

1. Loans have been placed in the United States during the last twelve months by the Canadian National Railways and by the Grand Trunk Railway, as follows:

Canadian Northern Railway Company—

7 per cent equipment trust, series "E" 1920, certificates (Canadian National Rolling Stock, Ltd.), $15,000,000. Dated May 1, 1920; matures May 1, 1935. Issued through Dillon, Read & Co., New York. Net price to Railway Coy., 95. Net proceeds, $14,250,000.

In other words, the bonds or stocks, whichever they were, of this great country can only be sold at 95 when we are selling under the very inviting name and business stamp of the old Canadian Northern. The friends of the old Mackenzie and Mann concern are taking advantage of this opportunity of having another haul out of the Canadian people. Apparently, on the surface, the Government has nothing to do with the matter; it is money that is borrowed by the Canadian Northern, and the old friends of the old Canadian Northern who used to handle the business,—their solicitors, their agents, their brokers, the same people are there doing business at the old stand. The answer continues:

Expenses:

Printing, American Bank Note Co.	$3,475
Signing certificates, Signature Company.	150

Expenses:

It appears that we have not enough civil servants to do this little bit of business; $150 must be paid for the mere signing of these certificates.

Then there are the following expenses:

Trustees' fees, Girard Trust Co.	$ 7,567 46
Legal costs, Duane, Morris & Heckscher and J. H. Barnes, Philadelphia	5,376 39
	$16,568 85

In all, $16,568.85 for expenses, because Canada, forsooth, is borrowing $15,000,000.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Canada, with all the machinery and all the credit of the Government, with all the banks that ought to be and that are willing to lend us money, has to spend in New York and elsewhere $16,568.85 in order to borrow $15,000,000, which, to the Canadian Government and to this country, ought to be a very small transaction. But this is the record handed out to this country by the Government itself through the leader of the Government in the Senate.

There is a second loan:

7 per cent twenty year sinking fund bonds, guaranteed by the Dominion Government, $25,000,000. Dated December 1, 1920; matures December 1, 1940. Issued through Dillon, Read & Co., New York. Price to Railway Co., 96.20.

Then again is displayed to the world how strong a country we are when we do business in another person's name. You will sometimes find a defunct man, a bankrupt, who is no good, who cannot get his head above water, doing business in his wife's name. The Canadian people seem to be unable to do business in their own name and must do business through this old wife, the Mackenzie and Mann concern. Here they are with a credit of $96.20 on $100 they ought to be selling their securities at a premium. What is the result of this $25,000,000 loan? This netted to us, not to Mackenzie and Mann—they did not care what it brought; we must face the music and pay the piper—$24,050,000. No accounts have yet been rendered for expenses. Then there is another loan:

Grand Trunk Railway—

$25,000,000 twenty-year 7 per cent Sinking Fund Gold Debenture Bonds, at 94½ net, including commission and cost of distribution.

$25,000,000 at 94½	23,625,000 00
Less expenses	29,794 69
	$23,595,205 31

Expenses:

Cadwalader, Wiskersham & Taft, New York	$15,166 69
Larkin, Rathbone & Perry, New York	504 55
Mr. Miller Lash, Toronto	5,000 00

It seems to me that we have heard the name "Lash" before in connection with unprofitable transactions for the Canadian people:

The Evening Post Job Printing office, New York	$ 708 45
British American Bank Note Company, Ottawa	8,415 00
	$29,794 69

Then there is another loan to the same company:

$12,000,000 fifteen-year 6½ per cent Equipment Trust Certificates, on Philadelphia plan, price 91.65.

Of course, the longer we continue to do business in our wife's name, the worse our credit gets. It is now down to $91.65 on the $100. The expenses are not given; the bills are not sent in; but we must suppose that they will be, at all events, proportionately the same expenses as in the other case. I work it out roughly that our expenses in this connection are nearly $57,000. If that is a sample of the way in which the finances of this country are looked after, it is loud notice to the people of Canada that we cannot any longer leave our business in the hands of the present firm, that is, this Government, and that we must serve notice upon our esteemed friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) that we will give him three months' notice; that he must look for a job somewhere else and find somebody else who is doing business in his wife's name, as we propose to do business in our own name henceforward.

I happened to notice some loans going through in the province of Nova Scotia just about the same time that those loans are reported to have gone through in connection with the Government of Canada at Ottawa. One would suppose that the credit of the whole of Canada should be very much better than the credit of the little province of Nova Scotia, but such is not the case. I hold in my hand a letter from the Deputy Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia under date of Halifax, March 12, 1921. I saw in the newspapers something about their loans; I did not know exactly how they worked out, and I wrote to the Deputy Provincial Secretary to ask him how their loans sold. He tells me that there is one loan, $2,500,000, five-year, 6 per cent, which sold a premium of $1.19; that is, it sold at $101.19 per $100, whereas we are selling at $91.65 up to $96.20, which seems to be the best we can get. On the 5th November, 1920, the province of Nova Scotia sold bonds for another $2,000,000, a ten-year, 6 per cent loan, at $102.02. That is business. On the one hand you have the little province of Nova Scotia with a population of only 500,000 people or thereabouts handling its provincial business, and on the other you have the Dominion of Canada with its great wealth. The people of Nova Scotia go into the open money market of the world, the city of New York or elsewhere and they present the securities of that little province. The Canadian people, doing business in their wife's name, present the security of the big people of Canada and the wealth of this nation. The monied people in New York will buy the little bond of the province of Nova Scotia at $102.02 in the one case and at $101.19 in the other. Our brilliant friend, the Minister of Finance, goes down to New York with his hat in his hand. Of course, he has to tell the monied men there at once, for he is an honest man and he would not deceive them, that he is a bankrupt himself, but that his wife is all right and he is doing business in his wife's name. He presents his security. They say: "We do not like that kind of business; we do not need to do business with a bankrupt, a man who has failed and who must do business in somebody else's name. If we take your bond at all, Mr. Minister of Finance, it will be with a big slice off it. If you care to accept $91.65 for your bond, we will buy it. We are not anxious for the business at all." They told him "you must take Canadian funds; we will not give you good American money for it," and the Minister of Finance had to say: "I have been hawking these bonds all over from Dan to Beersheba, and I must sell them somewhere. Take them; it is the best I can do."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend say that it is a fact that the payment was in Canadian funds?

Mr. McKENZIE: I want to be absolutely honest with the minister. Somebody suggested that to me. It is bad enough for my purposes, whichever way it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a good deal of difference between American funds and Canadian funds. Is the hon. gentleman quite sure that the quotations he makes as to New York loans are not, in the one case, in American funds, and in the other case, in Canadian funds?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not at all particular as to the difference. I have the answers given by the colleague of my hon. friend, the leader of the Government in the Senate, and I regard those answers as sufficiently condemnatory of this Government as they stand, putting the very best possible construction upon them. If the Minister of Finance does not know the facts himself, his colleague will tell him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is in the shape of a question, I do know. On the one hand, we have the American funds, the figures used here; on the other hand, the quotations as to Nova Scotia are in Canadian funds. There is a difference of 15 points between them.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I said before, I am not going to do any cheese-paring with the minister. I say it is absolutely bad financing. It is a scandal on the credit of Canada, that with all our resources we should have to sell our securities at $91.25.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend know that at these figures the credit of Canada stood higher than that of any other country in the world in the New York market?

Mr. McKENZIE: All I have to say is that the comparison is sufficient to bring out the negligent manner in which the business of this country is handled. Here we have a Canadian Government bond at 7 per cent, selling for $91.25, while the 6 per cent bond of the little province down by the sea sells at $102.02. That is my answer to the Minister of Finance, and I do not think there is any explanation that he can give that will restore his standing as a financier, and that will put the credit of this country, at all events in connection with this transaction, upon the high footing which it should have, and which we should always endeavour to maintain.

As I said before, I say again now, that the business of the country is badly handled; there are shortcomings and short-sightedness on every hand in the management of the country's business, but the most glaring piece of negligence and of want of judgment is in doing business in the name of this defunct and bankrupt concern. The people of Canada have too high a reputation and credit in the world to hide under the cover of a bankrupt institution of this kind. Does the Minister of Finance think that we do not suffer when we do business in the name of a concern that has no reputation in the financial world? For my part I cannot see the necessity or the wisdom or desirability of continuing to do business in this way, when we have our own name and our own reputation as a country to go upon, and when we have all the responsibilities in connection with this concern. Why not come out from under cover like a man and do business straightforwardly in the name of the Government, for the Government, and with the Government's money, depending on the people's credit and giving the advantage to the people of this country? I do sincerely trust that never again will any Senator or any member of this or any other House be obliged, when he has to tell the truth, to record a transaction of that kind in connection with the financial business of this country. I think that in connection with the Budget and the handling of the business affairs of this country, it is the duty of an Opposition member like myself, particularly when I have the record from the mouths of the Government themselves, to point out to this House and to the country the nature and character of these transactions, to warn the Government and the country, and to express the hope that the Government will profit by being told what they should be told, how badly they compare with other institutions of much less strength than themselves in the same country, and under the same flag.

I pass from this borrowing episode to say a word or two, now that railway matters have been brought up, upon our connection with the Canadian Northern. I do not hold the Minister of Finance individually responsible for the transactions as a result of which we became burdened with the Canadian Northern Railway, but I do hold the Government of which he is a member, and himself as a member of that Government, responsible for the ill-advised, arbitrary and injudicious manner in which they have plunged this country into an abyss of debt in connection with this railway. I tell him and hon. gentlemen opposite who were here at that time, and who know all about it, that we on this side of the House protested with all our vigour and brought forward all the arguments that could be adduced against taking over this road and burdening the country with that debt; but we were laughed at. Hon. gentlemen on the benches opposite thought it was great sport to see us voted down by the force of numbers on the other side, and with glee, as if they were doing something grand for the Canadian people, they grasped to their hearts this awful holocaust which was forced upon them by Mackenzie and Mann, and their associates. The people of Canada have got this railway now and there is not such a laugh over it as there was at the time it was taken over, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in such a gleeful mood over the fact that they were voting down the Liberals. This nightmare is now upon the shoulders of the people of this country. They told us at the time that the road required a complement, that the Canadian Northern was not paying, that the Grand Trunk Pacific was not paying, that the Transcontinental was not paying, and that they could not pay until they found an abundant avenue of strength and wealth in the shape of the Grand Trunk Railway, which they were going to splice on to these other roads. In the expiring days of a second session in the year 1919 this road was also forced upon us. We thought that probably we were mistaken and that possibly some profit might accrue from the taking over of these roads. But what do we find to-day? Instead of a profit, the loss is greater on the other roads, and we have a deficit of $25,000,000 in connection with this bonanza which was going to put us on our feet. Is that good business? Is it any credit to the Government or those supporting the Government? The Government, heedless of reason or argument, forced the thing upon the House and upon the country and now the Canadian people must make the best of a bad situation.

We have poured out money like water in Canada to open up avenues at Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, St. John, and elsewhere to provide eastern outlets to the Atlantic for the wealth of the country, so that we might increase our own business. I do not begrude the money that has been spent in that way. We have deeped the river St. Lawrence, provided facilities at Halifax, Montreal, and St. John, and altogether we have spent large sums of money for the purpose of doing business on our own ground. Sane people would urge that we direct the traffic of the country to these avenues, via the river St. Lawrence in the summer, and, when that river is closed, through the other ports that have been equipped for the purpose. According to the first figures given, we have spent $35,000,000 to fix up the terminals at Halifax, and probably double that expenditure at the harbour of St. John, on which we have expended large sums from time to time. All this money, Mr. Speaker, we are practically throwing to the winds, and we are buying an outlet for our Canadian produce at Portland in a foreign country. Is there anything more unsound than that? What are we going to do with that terminal? No one on the other side has yet admitted that we are going to do business at Portland. Hon. gentlemen try to escape responsibility in the matter, but if they are not going to do business at Portland, what are the terminals for? Why are we about to pay money for this outlet if it is not to be utilized? Are we going to close it and let the money go to waste? The idea of buying a road to Portland is entirely opposed to every sound business principle from the standpoint of true Canadianism, and I charge the Government with having wasted the money of this country. After having expended large sums on the river St. Lawrence, and at Halifax, St. John, and elsewhere, these expenditures will have been utterly futile if we are to switch our business off to some foreign port.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that our railway business is poorly managed; we are losing money every day and the prospects are becoming increasingly worse. I am advised that, so far as western traffic is concerned, our railways are a laughing stock and a discredit to the Government and those responsible for their management. I was informed to-day by a responsible western man that nobody bothers with the Canadian National Railways, because they do not handle business properly and cannot be relied upon. People cannot afford to do business with them and consequently traffic is passing into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who manage their affairs properly and in an up-to-date manner. This, Sir, is not gossip; it came to me just this afternoon from a responsible public man of the West who declared that, as a good business man, he had to give up doing business with the Canadian National Railways because he could not wait for them, and they had no system in their management. He was obliged to go where he could get business properly handled. This seems to me to be conclusive evidence that government-owned railways are not capable of competing with privately-owned roads; and if we want proper enterprise in this country, if we want to have our business well attended to, we must have proper regulations and restrictions in our management of the railways, and must see that no advantage is taken of the people. Private enterprise and private ambition and foresight are, after all, the best guarantees of proper management. There is nothing about the western government management but slipshod indifference; we have only half dead, half alive men who have neither the ambition nor the desire to secure business and promote the welfare of the concern for which they are responsible. They have not the some enterprise, initiative and interest in the business as private owners and managers would have, and consequently they fail to get the prize when it is in sight.

That is all I intended to say in regard to the borrowing of the Government, and the way in which they are handling the railway business. There is a great desire on the part of the Government to draw us into an open fight in connection with the tariff, questions of policy, and that sort of thing. Let me assure the Minister of Finance, that there are greater things before the minds of the Canadian people today than the question as to whether the tariff is high or low. When the people consider the fact that the country is being ruined by mismanagement on the part of the Government, when they come to talk about the building of ships, and the continuance of the insane policy of literally throwing money into the sea, their nerves are strung more highly, and their passions are more strongly roused, than they can be by any question as to whether we have an old tariff or a new. We have not had in Canada any great upheaval in connection with the tariff since the year 1878. There have been changes up and down, but whichever Government has been in power, there has been no startling upheaval one way or the other; and I suppose that, whichever party comes into power after the next election, the necessities of the people and the vested rights of interest, will have to be considered carefully, judiciously and wisely, as they have been in the past. I say, Sir, that the people of this country are not so much concerned about the battle of the tariff as the Minister of Finance and his Government may think. But they are greatly concerned about other things.

We were told last night that the superintendent of shipping for the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. Bosworth, delivered an address at Vancouver the other day, in the course of which he said that they can buy first-class ships, built last year, at the rate of $50 per ton. Now I take it for granted that the superintendent of shipping for the Canadian Pacific Railway knows what he is talking about. He is a business man, he is in the public eye, the glare of public opinion is upon him as well as upon every other high official in the service of that institution—I take it that he would not assume the responsibility of saying that he could buy ships at $50 a ton if that were not the case. However, the statement was made in this chamber last night and nobody seems to have taken exception to it. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, what is happening here? Under the force of closure this session the Minister of Marine, and the Government behind him, forced through the House a vote of $20,000,000 to be used in the building of ships at the price of $191.98 a dead weight ton. Those are the figures that the minister gave us in the early stages of the session. I ask again, what is happening? That practically seventy-five per cent of that money is being lost when it is converted into ships. That is, you build a ship that is costing you practically $200 a ton and when you put it into the market, according to the statement of the authority that I have referred to, you only get $50 a ton for that ship. And here we are voting millions for the purpose of continuing such a policy. We have voted $20,000,000 to build ships at a price of practically $200 a ton for which we would only get $50 a ton if we came to sell them. Those are the things which come home to the minds, the hearts, and the purses of the people of this country, and about which they are more concerned than whether the duty will be twenty-five or thirty per cent on a pair of boots. Those are the things that impress the people of this country. Upon such issues we invite battle and will meet the Government, and we are not to be side-tracked into a fight purely on tariff lines. Our hon. friends opposite can battle among themselves to their hearts content; we will fight them on the tariff and on bigger things as well, and we will give the people of Canada an opportunity of passing judgment upon this Administration and the hon. gentlemen who support it. No wonder the Government is desirous of fighting simply on the tariff issue. It wants to draft its own indictment. It wants to select its own judge to preside at the trial, and to draw and empanel its own jury, so that the whole thing will be in its own hands. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the jury are now ready "to come in" as they say in the courts. In this case their verdict is "guilty" and as one says, so say they all. Now we are not going to allow the Minister of Finance to draw his own indictment—it would be defective, and bad, and should be set aside. We are not going to give him his own judge or his own jury; he must squarely face the issue before the people of this country and give a real account of "the deeds done in the body" whether they be good or whether they be evil—and evil they continuously are in this case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ten years in the penitentiary.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would be glad to give them a ticket of leave myself. Now those are some of the things that should be discussed by the people of this country. Let me say this further on the question of the tariff, and I want the Minister of Finance to listen to me seriously. The real authors of what is regarded as the National Policy in this country were the late Sir John A.

Macdonald and the late Sir Charles Tupper, and their speeches are still on record with respect to that policy. What did Sir John A. Macdonald say about protection? He said: It is not our idea that goods will be dearer. Our idea will be that the goods will be manufactured in our own country, and that local competition between the manufacturers in this country will keep prices at a proper level. That was the idea of Sir John A. Macdonald in connection with the so-called policy of protection. He was not a protectionist; he adopted protection for the purpose, as he thought, of forcing America into reciprocity. That was his idea, although later on he gave a little more adhesion to the principle of protection. If what was in the mind of that great statesman had panned out it would not be so bad. If the price of shoes would be just as low in Canada as in the United States, and the only effect on the tariff was to keep out the American shoe, and by competition keep down the price in this country it would not be so bad. But that is not what is happening; and I want to bring it home to the minister—and I say it on my responsibility as a member of this House—that there is no honest competition in trade in this country at all. There are combines in everything—combines in shoes, combines in rubber boots, combines in every single earthly thing you can think of from the food on the table to what you wear on your person; and no grocer in Canada to-day is permitted to sell a pound of tea, a pound of candy, or a pound of butter except in accordance with the price of the combines.

9 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend is aware that the Government of Ontario—in whose hands the administration of the law is—entered an indictment against a so-called grocers' combine in Ontario and that judgment in the case is reserved? I wonder too if my hon. friend could tell me whether the Government of Nova Scotia has taken similar proceedings against the combine he has been speaking about in the steel industry?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not talking about any particular combine.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: The cackling of geese saved Rome, but I do not know whether the cackling of my hon. friends opposite will save the present Government. All I have to say is this: I do not look to the municipal councils, or to the local governments, for the administration of the law governing matters of this kind. We have a federal law dealing with trusts and combines—but perhaps my hon. friends opposite repealed that law.

An hon. MEMBER: Of course, they did.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, worse and worse and more of it. We have a law dealing with combines which was passed during the reign of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was a good law, but I am sorry to find that it has been repealed. During the war we were told that anybody could lay information before a magistrate in the town of North Sydney against this steel trust to which reference has been made. Could anything be more absurd than to imagine that any man is going to bear the burden of carrying through the various courts a case against a combine, with the support of all the other combines in the land behind it, and nothing on the other side but an ordinary man who found that he was charged too much for a pair of boots, a keg of nails, or something else he bought from that combine? The best legal talent of the land would be arrayed against him, and counsel's fees would be running up into so many hundreds of thousands of dollars that the poor man would be frightened out of his boots and would get in a hole as quick as he could, thankful that he had saved his life.

I thank my good friend from York, Mr. Maclean—pardon me for mentioning his name, but I wish to show him my appreciation—for standing up in this House and stating that there should be a public prosecutor to deal with these cases. I agree with him. Until that is done and the Government have a secret service from one end of the country to the other, and the combines realize that there is power behind the prosecutor, we will have the governing of prices just to suit these combines and trusts. What can be more ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, than that in my home town a grocer cannot sell a pound of tea or butter or a keg of nails except according to schedule prices? And those prices are the same all over the country. If that grocer undertakes to sell a little cheaper he is immediately advised: "Nobody will sell to you. You can sell what you have on hand, but that is the end of you."

Unfortunately, there is no machinery to look after conditions of this kind. We had the late lamented Board of Commerce. Perhaps it was not as successful as it might have been, but that was because it had no sympathy or support from this Government. It was like a baby which the mother refuses to feed and keep clean; that baby would soon die. That is what happened to this baby of the Government. They would not countenance it at all; it was a sort of illegitimate child that nobody would acknowledge. What is the result? The "combinster," the profiteer, the darling of this Government, has full sway again now that this infant which he feared might grow up and usurp his power is dead. And the Government says to its darling: "Don't be concerned; we knew it would die. Now be happy and contented, for we have carried out our promise to you. We were always behind you, and we will continue to be behind you, and you will have things absolutely your own way, except of course that, for appearance sake, we must ask the attorneys general in some of the provinces to do something, but we know there is nothing they can do." I bring this charge home to the Government that we have combines in this country. And I assert that the central Government is the proper authority to look after them, and if it has not the power it should obtain the necessary power from this Parliament, and so assure the people that these combines cannot continue to oppress them with impunuty.

We heard a splendid speech from the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Casselman) the other night in which he claimed all the virtues for this Government—that there was nothing wrong with it and that it was entirely clear of scandal. While he was speaking I was thinking of certain procedure that we come across in the courts once in a while, when a particular class of people are being tried and the clerk of the court asks for their record. I remember one fellow who was asked, "What sort of record have you?" And he said, "Well, I don't take snuff, but you can charge me with everything else." That is about the situation of this Government. I do not know that they are very great "snuffers," but if there is any other crime in the calendar that they are not guilty of I know nothing about it. The member for Dundas claimed that there was nothing to be said against this Government. Well, the Minister of Finance was not in the House at the time, but it was while the right hon. gentleman, now member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden) was leading his Government that two men were read out of the House for grafting in connection with war supplies. Possibly my hon. friend never heard of it, but there are scores of members on both sides of the House who are aware that for stealing public money in connection with the purchase of remounts and of medicine for our soldiers two members from among hon. gentlemen of the other side were driven out of the House by the then Prime Minister. Yet we have members who will stand up and say that there is no scandal against this Government or anybody belonging to it. There is nothing that could be mentioned in connection with war supplies, such as binoculars, boots and shoes, medicine, horses, guns and munitions that were not directly or indirectly the subject of scandal by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; but the good innocent peace-loving gentleman from Dundas in the simplicity of his heart says that the Government is absolutely immaculate and there is nothing wrong with it. I will do him the credit for saying that the scandals I have referred to happened in 1914, 1915 and 1916 when possibly he was not a member. I have an idea that he came into this House in 1917, and therefore possibly he is innocent of any knowledge of those scandals. But he will not sin any more, I am sure, in claiming all the virtues, at all events for his friends of the old days.

Now, I think the Administration should give the people a chance to live, and see to it that combines shall be powerless to take advantage of them. I am sorry that we have only one minister present, and that therefore I cannot very well submit to him questions that do not appertain to his department, but I wish to put my case on record so that possibly the day may come when some notice will be taken of these matters. It is put up to us, Mr. Speaker, that we do not look after our part of the country, that we are not so solicitous about getting contracts from the Government for rails and coal for our national railways as we should be, and that as a result our people are suffering from the negligence of the Government or of their representatives.

I submit that there should be a fair share of national feeling in this country, and that even if our coal is to-day slightly dearer than the product of a foreign country, other things being taken into consideration, we should give our own product the preference. I do not know that I can better express the idea I have in mind than by reading a letter—not an imaginary one this time, but a communication which I addressed to the president of the Canadian National Railways on August 9, 1919. This letter will be found among the records of the president of the road, and that which I shall read is an exact copy. He was then refusing to buy our coal and our steel, being on the lookout all the while for lower prices. I do not blame him; he was trying to do business the best way he could, but I wanted to convince him that something more than hard and fast business was to be taken into consideration; that regard should be had to our national undertakings and to the welfare of the men who abandoned their work in order that they might defend our country in the trenches at the front. The letter was as follows:

I have your recent letter and that of your assistant, Mr. Vaughan, and note the reasons given why further or increased orders cannot, in your judgment, be given to the coal mines of the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness. The reasons to me are not sufficient or satisfactory in view of the conditions which have brought about the present situation in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness.

You will at once realize the soundness of the principle that the nation should together share the burdens, responsibilities and consequential effects and results of the recent war. That being admitted, the rest of Canada should share with the county of Cape Breton and county of Inverness the natural results of the frightful war that so recently and so successfully to the Allies has been brought to a close.

Present conditions in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness are attributable entirely to war conditions, war demands and war necessities. In the first place, when war was declared thousands of the loyal and sturdy miners in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness threw down their tools and in the shortest possible time found their way to the trenches in France and Flanders where they valiantly fought till the very last shot was fired and the glorious victory won.

By reason of those qualified, trained and efficient miners being withdrawn from the production of coal, the output fell most materially and the companies operating the Cape Breton county and Inverness county mines could not fill the contracts into which they had entered before war was declared. Consequently they lost these customers who had to look elsewhere, across the border in many cases, for their coal supplies.

In the second place, the fleet of steamers which was in the service of the companies operating in the county of Cape Breton conveying coal to the ports of Montreal, Quebec and other ports on the St. Lawrence River and other parts of the world was commandeered by the King's authority for purposes of war, thus rendering the coal companies above mentioned absolutely helpless in carrying out their engagements for the supplying of coal where their largest contracts were made, and where for many years the major part of their output was sold. This again caused a most serious loss of custom and rendered it necessary for those who in the past purchased Cape Breton coal to look elsewhere and in most cases to the American coal mines for their necessary supplies. In that way the Cape Breton mines have lost their hold on the Canadian market.

And now that these brave soldiers who had gone to the front are back and willing to work, although many of them will never be back, having sacrificed their lives in the interest of their country,—those who have returned are anxious and willing to work but there is no market for the coal; consequently the men cannot get work and they and their families are suffering privations and becoming the victims of conditions that men of their standing should not suffer nor fear.

I must with all respect, and yet with insistency, impress upon you the necessity of coming to the assistance of these men by purchasing the article which they produce, whether or not it may be more expensive than the same article imported from a foreign country.

As I stated above, this is not only a national question but it is also an Imperial one, as the conditions which now exist in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness were brought about as above stated, not only in the interest of our own nation, but in the interest of the Empire and the Allies at large.

When you will look at your letter to me, I think you will realize that in the light of the foregoing facts the reasons you give for not buying more of our coal do not measure up to the gravity of the situation involved.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Sir Robert L. Borden, G.C.M.G., and I trust that he will be of assistance to you in bringing about better conditions among the deserving and worthy miners in the counties of Cape Breton and Inverness.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd) D. D. McKENZIE.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? I take it from the correspondence that the price of local coal was higher than that of the imported product. Am I right?

Mr. McKENZIE: It was contended that American coal was cheaper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman think that the American coal should not be allowed in; or does he think that the higher price ought to be paid for the Canadian coal?

Mr. McKENZIE: I say that before the war we were not beholden to anybody; we had the market and we were able to supply it. But our ships were taken from us and our men volunteered for service overseas; therefore it now devolves upon the nation to do all it can to help these people to get on their feet again until they get their ships back and regain control of the markets, even if the coal cost the nation more than a similar product from across the line. That is what I say, and that is what I contended for then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. gentleman will permit me—he has asked me to take the matter up with the Cabinet. I intend to do it, and of course I want to understand his case. I understand his case to be that as a result of the war the coal mine operators of Nova Scotia have lost their markets and that those markets are now occupied by the output of American collieries. What I want to find out from my hon. friend is this: does he desire that the markets should be conserved for the Canadian coal, or does he desire that we should pay a premium price to the Canadian coal mine operators? If the latter, how much does he say that premium price should be?

Mr. McKENZIE: During the war, Mr. Speaker, we had a system of fuel control under which it was not open to the mine operator to sell his coal at whatever price he pleased. The fuel controller went fully into the figures; he ascertained what it was costing to produce the coal, and he fixed a price and said: You must sell your coal to the national railways at this figure. Now, it was quite possible that the Government could get coal at a price even lower than that fixed by the fuel controller, but we contended that in order to maintain our men, in order to enable the returned soldier to work who was willing to do so—who was only looking for an opportunity to swing his pick as he did before he went overseas—we contended that the people in Ontario, Manitoba and the other parts of Canada should be willing to suffer a slight disadvantage in the price of coal. That is what we are after, and if it is necessary to give a little higher price, I say: give a little higher price; let the officers and the experts of the Government in connection with coal fix what that price should be within fair lmits, and let the preference be given to Canadian coal and steel as against the coal and steel of foreigners who have a bigger market, bigger capital and bigger production than we have. I am bound to mention that not only were the ships of those Canadian companies taken away, but they were kept for a year or eighteen months after the war was over. Just when the war was over, they were sent off to Australia and they were kept away from us, because they had been hired out to other companies at a low rate, and at that time the charterers could get higher rates elsewhere and they sent them off. Our companies were obliged to bring suits in the Supreme Court in England in order to get an order to compel those other companies to give us back our ships, and after the cases were tried, we got our ships. During all this time, however, we were absolutely helpless; we could not get a pound of coal up the St. Lawrence while American coal poured in in every direction, capturing our market. The result was that we had to start all over again as if we were beginning to mine coal for the first time in our lives, having to make new connections because our old customers had gone. We are now making splendid progress, and with some sympathetic support from the Government and the Government railways in connection with steel rails and coal, we shall be able to get on our feet again. When we are on our feet and in a position to hold our own, we should be able to fight our battle without looking for any particular favour from the Government or any one else, except that I always take the stand, that from the national standpoint in the purchase of such national commodities as steel and coal, which are the very backbone and basic foundation of the wealth of any nation, and particularly of our nation, the national Government and the national industries should give preference to the national product as against that of another country. I take that position and I think it can be very well maintained. Although our coal may be a few cents higher in price, when you consider that our railroads will be carrying our own goods, and that directly and indirectly it is to the advantage of our own people that the Government and the Government railways should use our own coal, it will pay the Government to give the preference to the product of their own country. If they buy coal from the American, he gets his money, he puts it in his pocket, and he goes out of the country. Further than that he has no truck nor trade with my hon. friend. But if they buy coal from a Canadian, he gets the money and it goes from one hand to another, building up the trade and industry of the country and supporting the families of the Canadian people. That is the true national policy. I do not know whether some people would agree with it or not; but I break away from every tie when I have thousands of sturdy, strong men who threw down their picks and went to the war, and who on their return, find their families requiring their support while their pay from the war is stopped. I would like to see anyone who would stop me from trying to help them.

That is the position in which I am now in connection with those men.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had rather thought that my hon. friend was accusing me of being a friend of the big interests. He seems now to be scolding me because I am an enemy of the big interests. In which capacity does he wish me to take up this question of coal and steel?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is not the big interests in connection with coal and steel that are worrying me at all; it is the thousands and tens of thousands of men and women who must get the bite that goes into their mouths from what they earn from those interests. Those are the people about whom I am concerned, and incidentally, of course, benefits will come to capital, because we must not kill the goose that lays the golden egg. That is the position. The big interests are, as a rule, able to look after themselves; they usually have some money, and they can afford to bide their time until the psychological moment. The man who has five or six little ones waiting for what their father brings home to pay for their breakfast, cannot afford to wait. Those are the people about whom I am concerned and whom I would like to see the Government help. If I had written that letter to-day, the minister might have said that I was trying to make a case; but that letter was written in August, 1918. It gave my views then and it gives my views now. I am pleased that the minister has given me such a sympathetic hearing, and after all, I am beginning to believe that he has some touch of humanity and human kindness. Nevertheless, there is the fact that, in the earlier part of the evening, I charged him truthfully with holding up a litlte boy who was carrying home a 25-pound bag of flour, until he paid tribute to Cæsar, and the minister was Cæsar himself. I am willing to modify that to some extent provided that some good results will come from the discussion that we have had this evening.

I hope that, by some accident or otherwise, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) when he comes back to the House, will read the few words that I am now going to say. I represent one of the oldest constituencies in Canada. The county of Victoria is as old and as well civilized a district as any on the continent of North America. The shores of Cabot strait, of which we have all heard, are in my county, and Cabot is supposed to have landed at a place called Cape North in my county. Settlers came to that district in times far back, and they have been living in and developing the county of Victoria. The shores of Cabot strait, of which I speak, are 125 miles from the nearest railway. One would hardly believe that during all those years, there has been in the county of Victoria a settlement 125 miles from the nearest railway. Ever since I came into this House, in Opposition or as supporting a government, I have been trying to get railway facilities for those good, honest people. My one earnest desire before I leave public life is to see to it, if I can, that those people are brought into touch with outside civilization by means of a railway. I came very near by objective, because in 1911 we got a vote to start this railway; a contract was let, and the work was practically under way when, unfortunately for us, a change of Government took place and everything went up in the air. Three railways were about to be built in Nova Scotia at that time, one in Halifax county, one in Guysborough county and one in my county. The then Prime Minister, I am sorry to say, built his own road in Halifax county; but like the man in the dream in olden days, he remembered not Joseph when he was in favour with the king. He did not build the Guysborough road, and he did not build my road. That part of the country has an abundance of fish; it is the most magnificent fishing ground in the world; there are also large quantities of pulpwood, which is now beginning to be very valuable; it is also a splendid agricultural country; but it has no railway, and I do hope that before very long something will be done to supply this great need. I am sure the road would not be a drag or deadweight if it was once built.

I am going to bring to the minister's attention what took place in the House in 1918 in connection with this matter. I have in my hand the journals of the House for 1919, and at page 97 I read this:

> The House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed Resolution of Mr. McKenzie,—whereas on the 16th of March, A.D., 1914, this Honourable House passed the following Resolution which was accepted by the Government.

You will note that the resolution in connection with the road was accepted by this Government, not by the Laurier Government.

> Mr. McKenzie moved that, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into the non-railway sections of the Maritime Provinces within reasonable range of the said railway.

That was the resolution that had already been accepted by the Government in 1914. Then on October 14, 1919, the Government accepted this resolution.

Be it therefore resolved that, in the opinion of this House, the proposals of the said Resolution of the 16th of March, A.D., 1914, should be carried forward to completion at the earliest possible date.

And the question being put on the said motion; it was resolved in the affirmative.

The proposition for building this railway has therefore been twice accepted by the Government, in 1914, and again in 1919. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House that there is no public undertaking in Canada in the same position as this road into the county of Victoria. The contract was let and the road practically started by a former government. In March, 1914, this House led by the right hon. the present member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) accepted my proposition that this road should be built. In 1919 I brought the matter up again, and the Government again renewed and accepted the proposition of 1914. It stands on the records of this House as having been accepted by the Government as a necessary and desirable undertaking to assume. I have already pointed out to you the splendid natural advantages of that section of the country; we have splendid fishermen, splendid farmers, capable men, but they are under the tremendous disadvantage of being such a distance from a railway. As the Government have already twice accepted this proposition, in 1914, and again in 1919, it is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that I should take advantage of this opportunity of bringing this matter to the notice of this Administration in connection with other matters.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken more of the time of the House than I expected, but some of the things I have brought to the notice of the House, particularly in the latter part of my speech, are of such great concern to the people I represent that I felt it was my duty to do so, and to tell the Government that this railway in Victoria county is a business proposition, that it is in the interests of the county to undertake. We find no fault with the development of the West, with its railway building and settlement for the purpose of getting the advantages which these progressive movements will bring. Are we going to say to the descendants of the man who nearly two hundred years ago settled on the shores of Victoria county, and who, axe in hand, started to cut down the trees and make a home for himself, and whose descendants to the third and fourth and fifth generation have lived on these shores, honest, straightforward, God-fearing, law-abiding citizens—are we going to say to them that they are not entitled to the same privileges that are accorded to the men in the West, in the Centre, and in the East of this country? I would be lax in my duty if I did not bring to the notice of the minister a good businesss proposition such as this, a proposition that has enough humanity in it and enough promise of national development to deserve the consideration of the Government and of the Minister of Finance. I have brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance, in the hope that he may bring it before the Minister of Railways, and, of course, the record is there in the Journals of this House to speak for itself.

I have pointed out the sins of ommission and the sins of commission on the part of the Government. Having done all these things, I think that the responsibility of doing better in the future in connection with the ordinary business of the country, as well as in this special business that concerns the county I have the honour to represent, falls absolutely upon the shoulders of the Minister of Finance himself, and he will have no excuse in the last day unless he does what is right in connection with this matter. I conclude with the hope that he, and the Government of which he is a member, will, during the short time at their disposal, do better in the future than they have done in the past.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in rising to occupy the time of the House for a very short time in this debate, I do so almost exclusively for one specific purpose, and that is to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to that part of the Budget statement referring to the obligations of the country in connection with the Canadian National Railways. I want first, however, to refer briefly to just one or two statements made by the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), who has just preceded me, and incidentally I might say that in the main they have reference in one way or another to the whole railway question.

I would refer first to his statement in regard to the floatation of Canadian National Railway bonds in the city of New York, to which transaction he took very strong exception, and upon which he made some very definite statements. One was to the effect that while the province of Nova Scotia could float its bonds in New York at 102, the Canadian National Railways, or, as he said, the partner of the Government, were floating their bonds at 91, 95 and 96. The facts are these. The province of Nova Scotia floated its bonds at 102 payable in Canadian funds in New York, which meant to the province of Nova Scotia 87 cents on the dollar. The Canadian National Railways, having to liquidate a block of bonds falling due in the city of London, bonds that were issued years ago when the Canadian Northern Railway was financing and operating its own business, went to the city of New York and floated these bonds at 91, 95 and 96, not in Canadian funds, but in New York exchange against London exchange, and thereby saved to the people of Canada, through the National Railways, the sum of $6,000,000. In other words, for bonds at par, sufficient to retire the bonds that will mature in London in the month of August this year, the Canadian National Railways sold a block of bonds which they had in their treasury, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, at a sum that just simply reduced the liability by $6,000,000. And that is the transaction to which my hon. friend takes such direct exception, and for which he so roundly condemns the Minister of Finance.

The hon. member, speaking with regard to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, referred to a statement made by Mr. Bosworth in the city of Vancouver, that it was possible to buy shipping at the present time on a gross ton basis of $50 per ton. He did not tell us, at the same time, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, just as the Canadian Government, have ships on the stocks under construction, which will be completed this year, costing them very close to $200 per ton, the Canadian Pacific Railway having entered into these contracts at a time when the price of shipping in all parts of the world was at that figure. The fact that tonnage has now gone down does not relieve the Canadian Pacific Railway, however, of their obligations in connection with these contracts, any more than it relieves the Government of theirs.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Are they the same kind of ships?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Steel ships. Now, one other matter to which I wish to refer is the right-about-face which my hon. friend took on the subject of trusts, in an effort to make a case against the Government. The hon. gentleman said that in the city of Sydney, I think, or at all events in his own city, there was a steel and coal trust, who were squeezing the very life out of the Canadian people by the extortionate prices they were charging for their goods. In the very next breath, however, he tries to make a case against the Government because they had not forced the Canadian National Railways to pay this trust a price for its goods higher than the price at which they could buy the same goods in other places. But that is on a par with the hon. gentleman's arguments with regard to the management of the Canadian National railways. He condemns the Canadian National Railways for not adopting business management, and then he immediately turns round and censures them because they do not pay any attention the importunities of a member of Parliament to buy goods in his constituency when they can buy the like goods at a less price in other parts of the country.

The hon. gentleman bases a very plausible case on the fact that there are men in the city of Sydney who are out of employment. Well, there are men out of employment in Ottawa, in Montreal, in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Vancouver,—men who could be put to work building locomotives and cars, laying tracks and building bridges, and doing works of this kind for the Canadian National Railways, if the Government would furnish the money to meet exorbitant rates. Would it be good business management on the part of the Canadian National Railways to embark on a policy of that kind? If the efforts of the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria can influence the management of the Canadian National railways in any one case, where will it end?

My hon. friend made the statement that it matters not how hard the Government may try—I think these were his words—"we are not going to be drawn into a contest on the tariff." He says: "We will fight you on shipping, we will fight you on the railway question, we will fight you on anything else; but we had a convention in the city of Ottawa in 1919, and we drew up a platform and laid down a set of political principles which we claim to be identical with those of our friends immediately alongside of us, and you cannot draw us into a political contest on that platform; nothing doing. We are going to get away from that platform,"—just as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's got away from it by moving the amendment which he proposed to the resolution to the Minister of Finance.

The hon. member found fault because the Government of Canada had granted credits to European countries to enable them to buy Canadian goods. Let me express my personal opinion on that subject. I think that if it were possible for Canada to continue granting credits to European countries to enable us to sell our goods to those countries, Canada would not be passing through the period of depression which she is experiencing at the present time. As I say, that is merely my own opinion. The hon. member said that if it had not been for these credits, and for the fact that thereby an avenue had been opened up through which Canada could export pork, beef, butter, cheese, etc., the prices of these commodities would have been depressed down to a point that would have made it very much easier for the Canadian people to buy these things. I wonder what my hon. friends of the Progressive party think of a policy of that kind. The hon. member would make it so difficult to export the surplus products of this country that those products would be dumped on the market in such volumes that the Canadian people could buy at prices below value. Now, that is a sample of my hon. friend's political opinions.

Coming to the theme upon which I wish particularly to address the House for a few moments, namely, the Canadian National railways, I desire to make, first of all, a brief statement by way of introduction. I believe I have the support of the House and of the country when I say that there is perhaps no more difficult question before the Canadian people to-day than the railway situation. I doubt whether there has ever been before this Parliament a civil question of greater difficulty or of a more complex character than the proper solution of the railway problem as it presents itself at the present moment. I am not going to go into the history of the railway question; I shall not refer to the way in which we got into this position. I do not believe we should get very far if we entered into any discussion of that kind. In my opinion, the only solution of the problem will be found in facing the situation as it is and in endeavouring if we can to find a solution for it. One of the things which, I think, are making it more difficult to solve the problem is the tendency throughout the country to exaggerate the real situation. I do not know of any matter that has ever been so manifestly misunderstood, and in connection with which there seemed to have been, on the part of some persons at least, so great a desire to misrepresent things and to create in the minds of the people the impression that the whole affair was absolutely insoluble—in other words, to break down the morale of the people on the whole question. Why that is I do not know, but as indicating the truth of this statement and the extent to which people go in that regard, I wish to quote some figures published in the Montreal Star of March 19, and issued by Mr. J. L. Payne, at one time statistician of the Railway Department. I have no idea what induced him to issue the statement he did. He may have issued it out of a desire to state the facts as they were before the people. But be that as it may, the statements are so exaggerated that one can only reach the conclusion that they were published with the intent of leading the public to believe the situation was something entirely foreign to what it is. Mr. Payne sets out that the total liability the people of Canada are carrying on account of the Canadian National Railways is $2,274,125,057, made up as follows:

Intercolonial	$563,000,000
Canadian Northern	624,000,000
Transcontinental	250,000,000
Grand Trunk Pacific	279,000,000
Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines	17,000,000
Grand Trunk Railway of Canada	464,000,000
Canadian Northern branch lines	10,000,000
Quebec and Saguenay	8,146,189
Quebec Bridge	22,000,000
Canadian Northern System	35,000,000

In order to arrive at these figures Mr Payne puts the original cost of the Intercolonial railway and its branches at $152,300,044 and he brought that up, on a compound interest basis, to the present figure of $563,218,701. Now, as I said a moment ago, if I can understand the figures at all, they were put forward with the object of leading the people of Canada to believe that they were carrying these obligations because of having launched on a system of publicly-owned railways. But let us look at the figures for a moment and when we do so we find that the liability on account of government-projected lines, the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, amounts to $813,218,701 which if taken from Mr. Payne's total leaves $1,460,906,316. Carrying this calculation a little further we find that according to the last statistical report at present available, and prepared by Mr. Payne himself, the bonuses granted to privately-owned railways amounted to $161,598,696, to which is to be added guarantees earned of $344,672,933, and the proceeds from the sale of 44,648,123 acres of land which, put at $2.25 per acre, gives $100,343,276 making a total of $606,504,905. Applying to these the same method of calculation as Mr. Payne applied to the Intercolonial, and compounding the interest afterwards, we find that it makes a total liability on account of subsidies to privately-owned railways of $2,426,019,620. Add this to the liabilities given by Mr. Payne himself on account of the Canadian Northern, and Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific railways and the grand total is $3,832,925,936 for which, on the basis of Mr. Payne's calculation, the people of Canada would be responsible on account of their direct assistance to privately-owned railways, as against $813,218,701 on account of publicly-projected railways. But from the last figure we should take $250,000,000 on account of the National Transcontinental Railway, which arose out of a contract entered into by a privately-owned railway, the Grand Trunk. This reduces the amount to $563,218,701 on account of publicly-owned railways as against $4,082,925,936 on account of privately-owned railways. If we wish to pursue this method of financial calculation to its logical conclusion and take in the moneys we have spent on canals, river improvements, wharves, and all that kind of thing we would find we have an amount equal to all that has been spent on railways, and it would bring the total liability on account of our transportation systems up to a figure between seven and eight billions of dollars.

Now, Mr Speaker, my only object in presenting these figures at all is to show the length to which one can go in exaggerating a situation such as this, and also, if possible, to show the desirability of finding out ourselves, if we can, what the actual position is. It may be true that worked out on a strict basis of financial calculation, or a book-keeping basis, from the time of Confederation up, our liability on account of the Intercolonial railway is what Mr. Payne has stated it to be; but the same thing applies, in an equal degree to our canal system, our river improvements and everything else of that kind that we have.

In this connection what seems to me to be a vital point is that it is 10 p.m. not fair to the Canadian National Railways, that the situation should be so exaggerated. What we want to know is what our actual obligations are in connection with these railway systems and what they must earn annually to pay their way, confining ourselves strictly to what properly belongs to the railway, and then from that standpoint endeavour to work out a plan by which we can make railways carry their own obligations. The fact is that we have these railways, approximately 22,000 miles in extent, projected into every part of this country from the Atlantic ocean to the Pacific—railways that are absolutely necessary to the industrial life of this country and railways, in very many cases, without which we cannot possibly get along. It may be difficult but let the load be as heavy as it may be, we have to carry it. We have to operate these railways, we cannot get away from it, and the question simply narrows down to this: what does the whole thing mean in dollars and cents and is there a solution for the difficulty.

Starting from that point let us see what the annual obligations are for which we are responsible in connection with these railways. I take first the Grand Trunk, and just let me say briefly that my reason for taking the Grand Trunk is that I look upon it as an absolutely essential that the Grand Trunk shall ultimately become part of the Canadian National Railway system no matter what scheme we may later develop for its operation. On five per cent Grand Trunk debenture stock the obligation is $1,694,409; four per cent Grand Trunk debenture stock, $4,845,104; four per cent guaranteed stock, $2,430,000; on the first, second and third preference and common stock, the value of which is being arbitrated, $2,570,000; total $11,540,320. Which for the purposes of reasonable calculation should be reduced by $1,285,000 which is equal to one-half the amount of the possible award under the arbitration, leaving a net balance of fixed charges against the Grand Trunk Railway, of $10,255,320. On the Canadian Northern—as per statement of the Minister of Railways to be found on page 1052 of Hansard—$24,155,988; Grand Trunk Pacific $9,332,776, less the amount which should properly be written off on account of over-capitalization, $7,228,600, leaving the amount properly chargeable on account of that railway at $2,104,176. I want to say a word with regard to that. It will be noted that I have mentioned an amount of $7,228,600 annually that should be written off on account of ever-capitalization on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. My reason for doing that is, that we should never expect the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to earn interest on money that did not actually go into the railway, and no man who gives the question even the slightest degree of study whatever will undertake to argue that the total amount of liability charged against the Grand Trunk Pacific ever went into the legitimate construction of a railway.

Now, let us take the National Transcontinental Railway and the liability on this line means a carrying charge of $12,500,000. From that again we should write off $7,150,000 for identically the same reason, leaving the annual charge $5,350,000. For purposes of operation, however, the amounts set against the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental should be eliminated for at least a period of ten years. As a railway proposition neither one of them can be expected to earn its operating costs and fixed charges for at least a period of ten years, and if the Canadian people entered upon an enterprise of that character they have a right to carry the load without expecting the railways to earn it. That leaves the net amount properly chargeable to the operation of the railways at $35,696,309.08 on account of present obligations. To this should be added the carrying charges on the operating deficit for 1920 on the Canadian National railways, amounting to $36,842,970.17 and the deficit in fixed charges on the Grand Trunk of $6,563,091.33, making a capital charge of $43,406,061.50, which means an annual charge of $2,387,333.37.

Then comes the question of completing and equipping the lines, for which approximately the sum of $250,000,000 will be required, upon which there will be an annual charge in round figures of $13,750,000, making the total annual fixed charges on all of these 22,000 miles of railway $51,833,642.45.

This year we have deficits in operation of $36,842,970.17, made up as follows:

Canadian Northern..	$16,258,579 80
Canadian Government.. ..	10,449,876 43
Grand Trunk Pacific..	10,134,513 94

In making up this statement of carrying costs it will be noted that there has been included an annual charge on the sum of $250,000,000, estimated as required to bring the lines up to standard. In putting in that figure and making that statement I do so for the reason that I am convinced that the sooner the Canadian people get to know what is the exact situation the better for them and the better for the railways themselves. I will come to the details in regard to that a little later.

In the meantime the question is: Is this financial obligation of such a character as to cause us to feel that it is greater than the Canadian people can legitimately face in connection with these transportation systems? Let us get the matter clearly in our minds. We have 22,000 miles of railway, and the problem is to make these railways earn their operating costs and a capital charge of $51,833,642.45. Again the problem is, can we do it? My personal opinion is that we can. The experience of the past two years would indicate that we cannot, but the question is: Has that experience been of such a character as to convince us that these railways are destined to be a failure? Again I say my personal opinion is that not only do I believe that the railways will not be a failure, but I believe that, properly co-ordinated, properly organized and efficiently operated, thew will ultimately prove to be a very great asset to this country.

In looking for an answer to that, however, we might first ascertain what our situation is in regard to railway mileage. It has been freely stated from time to time in this House and by the press of this country that the railway mileage in Canada is entirely out of proportion to the population—to some degree that may be true—and that certain of that railway mileage should be eliminated. Just here let me say briefly that in the co-ordination and organization of our Canadian National railway lines there are duplicate lines that should be wholly eliminated, situations where two lines of railway owned by the Canadian people are running so close together that you can throw a stone from one train to the other. The point, however, is, have we reached the place where our railway mileage bears such a proportion to the business that the railways have to do that it cannot be expected that they can earn their operating costs and fixed charges and at the same time give adequate service at reasonable rates.

On the subject of railway mileage in proportion to our population, frequent reference is made to the mileage of our railways as compared to that of other countries. We must always bear this in mind, however, that with the same mileage of railway you cannot serve people scattered over a country the size of the Dominion that would serve the same number of people if they were situated on the island of Montreal. And yet if all the people of Canada were living on the island of Montreal they would bear a relation to our railway systems that the same number of people do who live in the cities of Liverpool and Manchester. It is true that our railways may have been projected a little too soon, but comparing Canada with the United States it will be found that we require to less than double our population before our railway mileage in proportion to population will be just about equal to the railway mileage of the United States in proportion to the population of that country. I do not think that we are anticipating the future to too great an extent when we say that the time is not far distant when our population will be doubled.

But making a comparison with conditions in Canada before the lines of the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were projected, on the basis of the traffic producing possibilities of the country, it will be found that the comparison of freight tonnage available for all Canadian railways is as follows:

In 1900 total number of ton of freight handled	35,946,183
1905	50,793,957
1910	74,482,866
1915	87,204,833
1919	116,699,572

Or an increase just about three and a half times within the period.

The number of passengers carried in 1910 was 2,466,729,664; in 1919 that number had increased to 3,074,664,369. The gross earnings of all Canadian railways in 1910 were $173,956,217; in 1919 they had grown to $382,976,901, or nearly two and a quarter times. Speaking on this subject a short time ago the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) told this House that we did not handle as many passengers on our railways in 1920 as we did in 1919, and on the strength of that statement he built up an argument to show that we had gone over the peak, so to speak, and that our railway business was now declining. The explanation is very simple. During 1919 our army was brought back to Canada and demobilized and the men were sent to their homes, making a tremendous increase in the number of passengers carried. From those figures it will be seen that we have more tonnage and more passengers per mile of railway than we had before the Canadian National railways were projected.

Let me give one other comparison. In 1895 the earnings of all the railways in the territory now served by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental were in round figures $38,000,000. The earnings of the railways in the same territory in 1920 were $297,745,297.76, an advance of almost eight times. I am pointing these things out because I feel that the situation has not been understood, and, as I stated a moment ago I think the sooner the people get to know just what the situation is the easier it will be for us to find a solution.

All this, however, does not get us away from the fact that there are deficits, and serious deficits, and for these we have to seek a remedy. In looking for an explanation one naturally turns to the report of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways submitted to Parliament by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid): I may say that I was personally very much disappointed when that statement was presented by the Minister of Railways as the report of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways to the Government and to Parliament. Faced with such a serious situation in connection with this railway problem, it seemed to me that the Board of Directors should have made a complete survey of the conditions and should have stated to the Government and to Parliament in plain terms just what their opinion was as to the solution of the difficulty, if they could suggest any. If they could not suggest a solution, they should have come forward and said frankly that they looked upon the successful and economical operation of the Canadian National Railways as an impossibility. But when you scan the statement from end to end you find but two references to the deficits or to any possible solution of the difficulty, to any possible remedy for these deficits. One is the statement to be found at page 1053 of unrevised Hansard, in which the hon. minister stated that the management figured on considerable reduction in the deficits on operation owing to the curtailment of train services, reduction of maintenance forces, and other economies. He went on to say that they also expected a readjustment in the price of materials and in the wage schedules and working conditions. Again, on page 1055, the minister states that the solution of the problem is one which will require joint action by the management and employees. With the exception of the reference to the curtailment of train services, these statements referring to prices for materials, wages paid to employees, as the result of the several McAdoo awards, etc., do not in my judgment present that comprehensive review of the whole situation which I think the Government and the House had a right to expect from the Board of Directors of the National Railways, faced as they are and we are with present conditions.

As to the added cost of material and the increased wages paid to employees, as I view the situation these are merely details in connection with the whole problem which will naturally and essentially work themselves out. If excessive rates are in effect, if there are inequalities in services, I am confident that the common sense of the men and of the operating officials will, if the problem is properly taken hold of, work out an adjustment which will be satisfactory to all parties. The whole record of the relations existing between railway operators and railway employees during the last thirty years is of a character to justify the conclusion on the part of any one who studies the question that railway employees will not and do not ask anything unreasonable.

Just here, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to what I consider to be a campaign of unjust misrepresentation which is going on from one end of the country to the other with regard to the railway employees of Canada, not only on the Canadian National railways but on all railways. A systematic effort has been made in this House, through the press and by statements given out by certain railway officials to create the impression that the employees on the Canadian railways as a mass are receiving a base rate of wage out of proportion to that received by any other class of workingmen in this country. I wish to say, Sir, that such is not the fact. You will find that the base rate of remuneration paid to a railway conductor, a train despatcher, a machinist or a locomotive engineer on the Canadian railways is not as high as the base rate paid to bricklayers in the city of Toronto, not as high as the base rate paid to stonemasons working on the tower of this building. These men—railway conductors, locomotive engineers and train despatchers, are charged with the most responsible duties that any class of men can be charged with in this country. Let me just give you one little illustration: go to the train despatcher's office in either of the railway terminals in this city, the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific, and what do you find? You find a man going on duty to-night at twelve o'clock and sitting down before a train sheet having to do with thirty, thirty-five, forty, perhaps fifty trains running in each direction on the section of line over which he has control. It is his business to keep these trains clear of each other, and if he makes a mistake of one single word, —yes, in many cases of one single letter in a train order, he not only loses his position but he renders himself liable to prosecution before the courts on a charge of manslaughter. Many of these cases are happening from one end of the country to the other; yet we find the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners going from coast to coast creating the false impression that these men are paid at exorbitant rates. I say again that the base rate upon which their remuneration is calculated is not as high as the base rate upon which is calculated the remuneration of bricklayers in Toronto.

Returning to the other matter referred to, namely, the curtailment of train services, an analysis of the operating results on the several parts of the Canadian National railways leads to the conclusion that when the Board of Directors stated that they expected to reduce the operating deficit because they did not expect to handle so many trains and because they expected to effect certain economies in that regard they were speaking from actual experience If the whole operating statement of the railways is taken into account and analysed it will be found that the more traffic they handled the worse off they were; that on the parts of the line where they had the heaviest traffic they sustained the heaviest deficits. If you carry that to its logical conclusion you will say at once that if you reduced the whole National Canadian Railway system to impotence, to a point where it would have no traffic at all, you would thereby reduce the annual deficits. There is something in that; I expect you would, on the basis of the statements that have been made.

In that connection I would like to refer briefly to what the operating figures really are. The Canadian Northern operating revenue for 1920 was $6,764 per mile; operating cost, $8,414, a deficit of $1,650 per mile. On the Grand Trunk Pacific the operating revenue was $5,278 per mile, the operating cost $8,993 and the operating deficit $3,715. On the Canadian Government Railways the operating revenue was $10,536 per mile, the operating cost, $13,-135, and the operating deficit $2,559. In making up the returns of operating revenue the report does not give the revenues of the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental separately, but it does give the operating deficits separately. Working it out on a mileage basis—and I would like to emphasize this point, the result is as follows: the operating deficit on the Intercolonial was $4,325 a mile, and on the Transcontinental—that part of the line running from Moncton to Winnipeg, the leanest part of the whole system—$1,386 a mile, bearing out the statement of the directors themselves that by reducing the number of trains—by doing less business, if you will—they hoped to reduce the deficit.

Let us make a further comparison. The figures given in the statistical report of the Railway Department for 1919 show that the operating revenue of the Intercolonial Railway was $16,776 a mile, the operating cost $18,842, showing a deficit on the Intercolonial for that year of $2,066. Compare this with the operating revenue and operating cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. For the same year it will be seen that, with an operating revenue of $13,156 a mile, the Canadian Pacific had an operating cost of $9,731 a mile. Just let me repeat that. While the Intercolonial, with an operating revenue of $16,776 a mile had an operating deficit of $2,066 a mile, the Canadian Pacific, with an operating revenue of only $13,156 a mile, had an operating surplus of $2,421 a mile.

What seems to me to be an illuminating comparison, can be drawn between the operating cost of the Canadian Pacific and the operating cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In 1919, the last year for which a statistical report is out, the operating cost of the Canadian Pacific was $9,731 a mile. In 1920, the operating cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific was $8,993 a mile, or a difference of only $738 a mile. When you turn to the operating revenue, you find that, with an operating cost of $9,731 a mile, the Canadian Pacific earned $12,152, as against $5,278 earned by the Grand Trunk Pacific with an operating cost of $8,993 a mile. If those reports mean anything, they mean that, as the system is operated at present, the more traffic the lines handle, the greater the deficits that we are going to have. Is the conclusion, however, that the only way to reduce the deficits on those lines is to reduce the business, an inevitable one? Is it wholly unavoidable that we must, of necessity, pay more for carrying a ton of freight a mile than we receive for carrying that ton of freight a mile? All the figures so far presented would bear out the contention that that is the situation. But let us examine the matter just a little closer in order to see whether these figures are wholly justified. Let us take the mileage earnings for 1919 and 1920 on the Intercolonial, Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific. In 1920, the Intercolonial had an operating revenue of $16,776, the Grand Trunk, $19,942 and the Canadian Pacific, $13,156 a mile. Hon. members will note that both the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial had greater operating revenue per mile of their line than the Canadian Pacific had. In 1920 the operating revenue of the Intercolonial increased to $19,629, that of the Grand Trunk to $23,528 and that of the Canadian Pacific to $16,164 per mile. That shows that, in 1919, the mileage earning of the Intercolonial was 22 per cent more than that of the Canadian Pacific and that the mileage earning of the Grand Trunk was 34 per cent more than that of the Canadian Pacific. In 1920, the comparisons were 18 per cent for the Intercolonial and 31 per cent for the Grand Trunk higher than the mileage revenue of the Canadian Pacific. If the ratio of operating cost to operating revenue had been the same on the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk as it was on the Canadian Pacific, the net result would mean a profit on the Grand Trunk of $12,800,000, and a profit on the Intercolonial of $9,056,495, or a total net revenue, instead of deficits, of $21,856,495. If we take this figure of $21,856,495, the operating revenue that we might reasonably have expected from the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial, it would reduce the fixed charges to be provided by the people of this country through Parliament to the sum of $29,977,147, provided always, of course, that the other portions of the lines had earned their operating costs. In any case, it would reduce the operating deficit by the sum of $6,549,629.48, the amount of the deficit on the Intercolonial alone.

My point in connection with this is as follows: Is there any good reason why the Intercolonial railway and the Grand Trunk, projected and built as they were, equipped as they are, running through a densely populated country with a traffic averaging 20 per cent greater than that which the Canadian Pacific has on the whole of its mileage, should not be able to earn their operating costs and fixed charges? I say at once that there does not seem to be any good reason why they should not earn their operating costs and fixed charges. Right there is where I believe we touch the vital point. Bring the operating efficiency of the Canadian National railways up to standard, and our deficits will be automatically wiped out. I do not wish to take a harsh position. Every one must recognize that the organization of a railway system such as the Canadian National railways is not a simple matter, and we have no right to expect that these railways should earn their operating costs and fixed charges, as a whole, in the first few years of their existence. But there does not seem to me to be any good reason why two lines such as the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk, should not earn their operating costs and fixed charges, if nothing more.

Just one other illustration. What was accomplished on the National Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg last year, which is as I said before, recognized as the leanest part of the whole Canadian National system, where the operating deficit was brought down to a little more than a thousand dollars a mile, is evidence of the fact that the application of efficient operating methods on all parts of the system, should, at least, make those lines maintain their operating costs and gradually work up to the point where they could earn their fixed charges. I am aware that it is easy to make abstract statements and say what ought to be done, when it may not be so easy to say how it could be done; but there are certain general principles underlying this whole question that are applicable, and I believe a study of the whole operating figures will convince any one, at all familiar with the matter, that it is possible to bring those railways up to such a state of efficiency that they will earn their operating costs and all of their fixed charges, including interest on the capitalized deficits that may occur on parts of the line during the next five to ten years.

In a statement given to the press by the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways a short time ago, it was stated that this whole matter was a financial one. It is a financial one in this regard: either the railways must either earn the money with which to pay their operating costs and fixed charges, or the people of Canada will have to pay that money out of their pockets. But in the final analysis, the problem resolves itself into nothing more and less than the proper co-ordination of a great national system of railways and their efficient and economical management. The question is: Can those railways be so organized? I believe they can; but they can be organized only if, as I said at the beginning, we face the issue fairly and squarely and set our minds determinedly to find the right solution.

At the beginning of my remarks I gave a figure of $250,000,000 as the sum that would be required to put the whole Canadian National railway system into such a state of efficiency as would make it possible to operate it economically. That is a large figure. I mentioned that to a gentleman a few days ago, and he said: "If you went out and told the Canadian people that they would be expected to spend an additional $250,000,000, on the Canadian National Railways, they would say: "Scrap the whole outfit." We are faced with one or two alternatives. Either we shall have to spend the money, or we might just as well scrap the whole outfit. You cannot run a railway any more than a business, if it is not properly equipped. Before you can operate a railway you must have the railway itself. You cannot simply run a railway along a barbed wire fence, or on a trail that you may trace out through the bush. You must have a proper road-bed to run it on; you must have proper equipment, proper terminal facilities, round-houses and everything else that goes into a railway. After all, if we could get away from the situation we are faced with in 1921 of putting $70,000,000 into the Canadian National railways to wipe out the deficit on the roads, by spending enough money to bring the railways up to a point where they can be operated efficiently, would it be good business to do that, or would it not? Take the case of any other business you like. Give a man 1,000 acres in Western Canada; let him spend money on it, fence it, and erect buildings on it, and get it all ready for cultivation. After he has done all that, if he only has machinery and equipment enough to cultivate one-tenth of his land he would not very easily earn his operating costs and fixed charges on that 1,000 acres, but if he spends money enough to equip himself with the proper machinery there is a possibility that he will make the thing a success—and the same thing applies to the organization and operation of the Canadian National railways.

In 1918, when the subject of the Canadian National railways was before the House, I took the liberty of making a statement with regard to the then existing conditions on the group of railways comprised in the Canadian National railways and the Grand Trunk, and I gave the estimated cost of bringing these roads up to standard. That will be found in the Hansard of that year, from pages 2041 to 2051. I have given the situation further study and I have reached the conclusion that the statement that I made at that time was as close to being correct as it possibly could be. I at least have found no reason to change the estimate that I made at that time, and in making that estimate I had the assistance of men who know something of the railways of this country. It is difficult to make an absolutely accurate estimate of the present position for the reason that very considerable sums of money have been expended both on the Canadian National and Grand Trunk railways, the details of which are not available. There are, however, certain facts manifest to any one who will study the reports at hand and the situation generally, that enable us to reach a fairly accurate conclusion. To furnish the lines at present under the management of the Canadian National railways with freight cars will take approximately $75,000,000, and for passenger cars $20,925,000. This would provide approximately 20,000 standard freight cars, 1,500 flat cars, 1,000 stock cars, 1,000 coal cars, 1,000 refrigerator cars, 2,500 miscellaneous and road cars, and 150 tank cars, and others; I need not go into the details.

For locomotives, the sum of approximately $40,000,000 would be required, and this would provide 550 modern passenger and freight locomotives of the different types required, and from 200 to 225 switch engines, making a total for rolling stock alone of $135,000,000.

In 1919 I put the sum required to bring the Canadian National railways up to standard in road-bed, intermediate and terminal facilities, round-houses and water services at $75,000,000, the sum required for the same services in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific at $25,000,000, and for the Transcontinental $22,000,000. Since that time very considerable and substantial improvements have been made on these lines, and the merging of the Grand Trunk with the Canadian National railways will reduce by a very considerable sum the amount necessary for terminals for the Canadian National railways. At present I believe that a close estimate of what will be required to bring the road-bed, and all the facilities that go into what you might call the road-bed itself, up to standard, will be from $65,000,000 to $75,000,000, making the total for the Canadian Northern, Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific in the close vicinity of $200,000,000 to $225,000,000.

The situation with regard to the Grand Trunk proper, both in relation to its cost and the sums required to bring it up to standard, were set forth in the statement I gave in 1918, and here again, after examining that statement closely, I have no reason to change the estimate I then gave. As with the Canadian National railways, however, there have been expended in the meantime considerable sums on capital account, and the Government itself has paid directly for a considerable number of locomotives, cars, etc. The road bed and general equipment of the Grand Trunk including terminals is admitted to be in really good condition. Some improvements are necessary, but the extent of them is not yet known. Economic operation, however, will make necessary the expenditure of a very considerable sum of money in the purchase of motive power and rolling stock. In 1919, at the time the Grand Trunk question was before the House, I put the figure for motive power alone, in order to bring it up to an economic standard, at $35,000,000; I do not wish to weary the House by going into all the details. As a matter of fact, the officers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company have themselves made the statement before the Drayton-Acworth Commission that they required $50,000,000 to bring their rolling stock and general rolling stock equipment up to the standard, they requiring 200 locomotives and 10,000 box cars. While there have no doubt been additions in the meantime, it can nevertheless be taken for granted that there is required to-day, or will be when the Grand Trunk is co-ordinated with the Canadian National Railways, a sum approximating to $50,000,000 to bring that part of the Canadian National railways to a point where it can be operated economically and efficiently.

The question is, can the country face this expenditure and face the problem of operating these railways? The answer to that is that we have the railways, and whether the task is easy or difficult, we have to operate them; we cannot get away from that. The industry of the country demands that we should find a way to operate these roads economically, and in that connection might I say one word with regard to the statements that have been issued so many times about the operating deficits being due to excessive wages and excessive material costs? I have no doubt that these things will work themselves out, but I think I am in the judgment of the House when I say that there are a lot of people in this country looking forward anxiously to the time when freight and passenger rates will be reduced as a result of the operating cost of the railways being lowered; but if we are to accept the statements that are being given to us from time to time, it would look as though we were going to be loaded with the present freight and passenger rates for all time. I believe that any one who studies the situation that this country is faced with will agree with me when I say that we must find some way of organizing and operating our railways so as to bring the cost of transportation down, as well as to wipe out the deficit. I have already stated my belief that our railways can be co-ordinated, can be organized, and can be operated, without these constantly recurring deficits, and operated so that they will earn their fixed charges. But the question is, how is this to be done? It is very easy to make academic statements as to what ought to be done, but it is not so easy to suggest a way by which it should be done. Now, there have been very many suggestions put before the Canadian people in one form or another as to what the solution of the railway problem is and how we should operate the lines so that they may be successful and that the Canadian people may be relieved of the present burden in connection with the railways. If the House will bear with me I will refer briefly to a few of these suggestions. The first suggestion is to turn all the lines back to private control.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: An hon. member opposite says, "hear, hear;" well, that is a very easy thing to say. I should like some one, however, who says that we should turn back the railways to private control, to show me a group of men who would be willing to undertake to operate these railways economically and efficiently, and give the people satisfactory service. It is a very simple thing to say, turn the railways back to private control; and it was equally easy to say in 1917, 1918, and 1919 that we should have left them under private control. If we had talked that way in 1903, 1904, and 1905, there might have been some reason in such suggestions. But faced with the present problem, I should like any man to show me the means by which we can turn these lines back to private control with a reasonable guarantee for efficient operation.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: What do you think of transferring the railways to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was just coming to that. The second suggestion one hears is that we should merge all the railways of Canada into one great system. There are two schools of thought in regard to that suggestion. One school advocates putting all these lines into one great system and operating them as one publicly-controlled concern; another schoolool says that we should combine them all into one system and operate them privately. And in that connection we have the suggestion, in a letter to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), from Lord Shaughnessy, to turn them over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Any statement made by Lord Shaughnessy on the railway question in this country must be given some consideration, because—and I do not believe I am overstating the fact—he is one of the most outstanding railway organizers and operators that the American continent has ever produced.

I shall deal with this question of merging all the Canadian railways into one great system, both from the aspect of public ownership and from that of private control. The country, Mr. Speaker, requires something more than the mere earning of operating costs by its railways; it requires service. Service means as much to the Canadian people in connection with the operation of the railways as does the wiping out of the deficits on the Canadian National railways. Unless we can be assured satisfactory service, I have very grave doubts as to whether we should gain very much by reducing the deficit. Now, I just put this question: What has made the Canadian Pacific Railway the success which every one looks upon it as being today? You say at once that it is the efficient management and operation which it has had. Well, I agree absolutely with that. And what was it that produced that efficient organization? It was the stern, determined competition which the Canadian Pacific railway encountered right from its inception, and which made it absolutely necessary that it should develop just that kind of organization; otherwise it could not have carried on successfully. The question is, if you put the whole of the railways of Canada into one great merger and operate them, either under private control, or under public management—private control, with dividends to the stockholders guaranteed for all time to come,—is it reasonable to expect that we are going to get that type of service which we should receive as a result of the competition that at present exists? My personal judgment, so far as that is concerned, is that while it may be ideal—there are a great many things that are ideal, but are not practical—that all these railways should be put into one great system and be operated under either private or government control, it is wholly impracticable, and if it were done the Canadian Pacific Railway would deteriorate and ultimately become what the Canadian National Railways are to-day.

Another suggestion is that a new company be formed and given a block of stock in the Canadian National railways, and that the operation be under private control. Well, if some one will find a group of practical railroad men anywhere who will be willing to pledge forty, or fifty, or sixty millions of their own money in this enterprise, and undertake to operate the Canadian National railways as co-partners with the people of Canada, risking some of their own money in the venture, then, so far as I am personally concerned, I would have no great objection to the experiment. But I have great doubt as to whether it would be possible to find such a group of men.

Another suggestion is that we abandon the Grand Trunk altogether, leaving it just where it is; that we retain the Canadian National railways as they are and endeavour to operate them as we are doing at present. My position with regard to that is simply this: The Canadian people have been betrayed a great many times in connection with railway problems in this country, but I would look upon it as the greatest possible betrayal of the public in connection with railway matters if we left the Grand Trunk in the hands of the present owners, relieving them of all obligations in connection with the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, allowing the shareholders of the Grand Trunk to retain that portion of their lines that has some potential advantage, while the Canadian people have foisted upon them those parts with their terminals so to speak, up in the air, and without any prospect of efficient operation. Any one who will look the situation in the face at all, cannot escape the conclusion that as a railway project the Canadian National railways, the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern cannot be operated without the eastern connections. Why should the Canadian people be asked to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in producing these connections and let the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, who at least were partners with the Canadian people in bringing about this situation, get away with all the advantages while we carry the load? I say again, I would look upon that as the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people that has ever been perpetrated in connection with the whole railway situation; and that is saying a good deal.

Now, the last proposition is the co-ordination of all the present lines of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental and the Intercolonial into one system operated under government control. Whatever my personal opinion may be on the merits or demerits of government control of railways, I say, what I have said a good many times, I see no other possible solution than this last proposition. I do not believe it would be possible to bring about a merger with the Canadian Pacific railway such as Lord Shaughnessy suggests, even supposing such were accepted as the solution. I believe the only solution is the proper co-ordination and organization of these systems. Get the Grand Trunk linked up with the Canadian National railways just as quickly as possible and organize the whole system efficiently.

I am not going to criticise any individual or any group of individuals; I am not in a position to do so. I do not know what the exact situation is. I have not had the opportunity, and would not have the capacity if I did have the opportunity, of determining what the facts are. I am confident, however, that there is something wrong somewhere, and I say to the Government, with all frankness, that the time has come when they should find out what that difficulty is: I do not believe that there is any reasonable justification for the operating deficits that we have had in the last year, and previous years, on the Canadian National Railways. And just incidental to that I would refer briefly to something said by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway when he remarked that a gentleman from Western Canada had told him nobody would use that railway.

Let me tell my hon. friend that in accepting that statement he is too easily imposed upon. I have every reason to believe that the Canadian Northern Railway handled fifty-one per cent of the western wheat crop of 1920, and handled more than fifty per cent of all the stock passing through the city of Winnipeg during the same year. Now these are facts and, such being the case, why is it that railway cannot earn its operating cost at least? Another point is: Why should we go to the end of the financial year before the Government, or anyone else, is able to ascertain that these railways are not paying their way? Simply because there is something wrong somewhere in connection with the organization, and I say that without, as I said a moment ago, finding any fault with anybody, or with any particular individual or group of individauls. I believe that there are on the Canadian National Railways just as capable railway operators as there are in Canada or in the United States, but there is something the matter with their organization—there is something the matter with their equipment—there is something the matter somewhere, or they would make a different showing from what they are doing; and it is up to this Parliament to see to it that some means is found to bring about an organization that will make this economical operation of our railways possible, and that will get us out of the difficulties that we are in at the present time. I have every confidence that this can be done, but somebody has to take hold of the job with both hands.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the Finance Minister has brought forward a new Budget. He has clothed it in robes of flowery eloquence, and has held it up with pride to the admiring gaze of his supporters. It plainly belongs to the old protectionist family—though it may be a more lusty child—as did his last Budget, only its weight is greater from a protectionist standpoint. The minister is careful to tell us the tariff will not be revised this session, and he apparently wishes to have it impressed upon us that the duties have not been materially increased. Notwithstanding that, however, he has taken care to give the tariff a canny hoist in ways that he thinks will not be very much noticed. Apparently in the future the price paid for the article imported will not be the basis on which the customs duty will be paid; the duty will be based on the value placed on the article by the officials under the minister—a very convenient method which will give the customs tariff a hoist under cover. Then my hon. friend provides that the sales tax on all imported articles shall be higher than on home manufactured articles—another substantial hoist to the tariff. He also advocates a further change in the valuation of goods imported from foreign countries whose currencies have greatly depreciated and he adds:

> Under the law, valuations are made in the currency of the country of export and this value has under customs ruling been adjusted to the basis of exchange prices. The increased cost of production in the foreign market does not, however, bear a direct inverse relation to the extent of the depreciation of the currency, more particularly so having regard to countries where currencies are depreciated to a greater extent than 50 per cent. It is therefore proposed to provide that any depreciation of a foreign currency greater than 50 per cent shall be disregarded, and that the lowest valuation which can be made will be arrived at by a depreciation of 50 per cent.

It seems to me that in many cases this will have the effect of another considerable increase in our customs tariff. In many of the European countries the depreciation in currency is very much more than 50 per cent. In some cases the value of currency, in comparison with the gold standard, would be not more than one-tenth of the value of our currency. The effect of this, it seems to me, will be that if a Canadian imports from such a country goods which in that country are worth $100 in our currency, the value of such goods in native currency will be $1,000 and by reason of only 50 per cent depreciation being allowed they will be valued at $500 if the policy described is followed out by the Customs Department. If the customs duty of these goods is 20 per cent the importer will therefore have to pay five times the amount which would be $100, or 100 per cent customs duty. One hundred per cent customs duty will be a pretty fair protection and, in my opinion will place us at a great disadvantage in comparison with our American neighbours, where a different plan is adopted. Worse than that it is continuing by artificial means the inflated prices of manufactured goods, while I do not notice that the minister is taking any steps to retain the artificial prices of what the farmer sells. While the Minister takes care that the inflated prices of manufactured goods shall be retained by artificial means, he does not take any such pains in regard to what the farmer produces. The products of the farmer must be sold in fierce competition with other countries and no relief is provided; the minister does not seem to consider that any relief is necessary. In my opinion it would not be necessary to give any relief if the minister treated the farmers fairly as compared with the customs duties placed on manufactured goods. These plans of the minister while nominally not increasing the tariff will, in effect, increase it to a very great extent. The minister evidently recognizes that tariff increases are not popular, and adopts this plan of increasing the protection enjoyed by his manufacturing friends when nominally there is no increase at all. While apparently the protection on imported dutiable goods is 20 per cent, I am satisfied these changes will have the effect of increasing it to at least 25 per cent or more. This is an excellent system of camouflage, but camouflage is very popular with the manufacturing and protectionist friends of my hon. friend.

The platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture has attracted wide-spread attention. Generally Canadian proposals regarding the tariff have been from interested classes asking for increases in the customs tariff on what they produce and want to sell, or for decreases on what they buy. The Canadian manufacturers have pulled both those strings with vigour. They call lustily for a high protective duty on all they wish to sell, and they call almost as lustily for free trade on what they want to buy. The representatives of the farmers who framed the platform of the Progressives adopted a different plan. They evidently recognized that the people were getting tired of these selfish appeals, and instead of asking for protection they actually insisted that everything they themselves produced should be placed on the free list, while they agree that on many things they purchase the custom duty should be retained for a time at least.

This was so entirely different in spirit from the appeals of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that it attracted considerable attention and caused something of a panic in that association. Although the association would not for a moment consider the adoption by themselves of any unselfish political policy, they seem to have known enough of human nature to see that those unselfish proposals of the Progressives alongside their essentially selfish and class proposals and appeals would capture the heart of the Canadian people. So like the German when he found his opponents getting too strong for him, and like the minister when he wants to give the tariff a hoist without attracting too much attention, they adopted a policy of camouflage. They adopted a new name, the pleasing and high sounding name of the "Canadian Reconstruction Association", and under that name they flooded the country with literature. No doubt this literature costs a lot of money, but possibly the association passes it on, like the sales tax, to the customer. That association does not make much use of the terms "protection" and "customs tariff"; its promoters prefer to boom those things by indirect means. They cover their actions under the Canadian flag. They lay great stress on the danger of buying from abroad and profess great reverence for the British flag, but when it comes to a question of trade they have no more use for that flag than they have for an old gunnysack. Trade with Great Britain is to them "foreign" trade, and for trading purposes the Union Jack is a "foreign" flag. They make great efforts to show that it is the patriotic duty of every Canadian to buy only Canadian-made goods. One would infer from their literature that Canadians who are buying foreign goods are disloyal. They especially condemn the farmers' organizations for buying their implements from foreign countries rather than at home, and the Minister of Militia enthusiastically joins in that condemnation, ignoring all the time the very evident fact that the reason why the farmers' organizations are doing that is because our manufacturers have refused to sell to them. It is the old cry over again, "you shall and you sha'n't, you will and you won't; you will be damned if you do, and you will be doubly damned if you don't."

But, after all, who are the Canadians who are buying such great quantities of American goods? I know of no official statistics that show the amount of goods imported by the different classes of our people, but I find that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920 the last fiscal year of which we have complete trade returns, Canada purchased goods from the United States to the value of over $301,000,000, which were duty-free goods. I have gone somewhat carefully into those free lists, and judging by the returns I am quite sure that the great bulk of those free goods were imported by our manufacturers—these people who say we should not import anything from the United States. Besides this, I find that our manufacturers have been given, during the same year over $15,500,000 by way of drawback on customs duty. This possibly represents over another $75,000,000 worth of goods imported by them. If it is a sin to import from other countries, our manufacturers are undoubtedly the greatest sinners in that line at least. They are not satisfied with a free list that gives them so great an advantage over all other Canadians, they are not satisfied with the fact that nearly one-third of the items on our free list are free of duty only when imported by manufacturers, while other Canadians must pay the full duty, but they also insist that on other things not on the free list they shall get a drawback when they are the importers. Still, they are the people who talk to us about class movements and class legislation. Our customs tariff is gross class legislation for the benefit of the manufacturing classes—the grossest piece of class legislation we have ever had on the statute books—and the Minister of Finance has made it a little worse this year.

But why do we import goods from other countries? Assuming that Canadians are a sane and sensible people, the natural answer is that we can buy them cheaper from other sources. This is, no doubt, why our manufacturers import such vast quantities and it is the reason why others do the same. Then what is the remedy? It is quite simple. The manufacturers should sell to us more cheaply than we can buy from outside. They can easily do that with the tremendous advantage the tariff has given them in the past, even without the additional hoist which the minister is giving them this year. If they fail to do that, their failure shows what a dismal failure the protective tariff has been. It becomes plain that our manufacturers must be put up sharply against the world's competition, otherwise they will never develop their natural abilities or make proper use of their natural advantages, nor will they ever so fully overcome whatever natural disadvantages they are exposed to as they would were they exposed to world competition. Our manufacturers, in producing war supplies, faced the competition of the world and made good, but they have not made good in the matter of producing goods for home consumption at proper prices because they have always depended on government pap instead of on their own initiative and exertions.

The protective policy begets fear, cowardice and selfishness. The fear that they cannot compete with others is one of the most degrading things to which any people can be exposed. My hon. friend from Frontenac seems to have the same fear for the farmers of Canada. He seems to think that because certain residents of the United States live in warm climates and do not have to go to such great expense in erecting dwellings, barns or other buildings and in feeding their stock it is impossible for us to compete with them in an open market. If that is the case we should all go south, and those of us who have gone further north have surely made a terrible mistake. But we do not think it was a mistake. We do not admit for one moment that the southern States are any better than our country; we do not admit that our country is not just as good as any part of the United States. We are too loyal to join the hon member for Frontenac in his cry. We claim that we are able to meet the farmers of the southern states or the farmers of any other part of the world on the principle of a fair field and no favours. That we ask and we ask no more.

But to return to our manufacturing friends. If American manufacturers seem to have developed more initiative than ours, I believe it is cheiefly because every American manufacturer has to face thirteen times the competition in his home market than is faced by the Canadian manufacturer. They have been placed in a more strenuous position, so to speak, so far as competition is concerned, and as a general rule they have profited by it. It is time our manufacturers should cease appealing to the instincts of patriotism and loyalty in the Canadian people to serve their own selfish purposes—for that is the only reason why they are appealing to our patriotism and loyalty. A victim of the French Revolution is said to have exclaimed: "Oh liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" But the future Canadian historian, writing of the protectionists of our day, may well say: "Oh loyalty, what crimes are committed in thy name".

The literature of the Canadian Reconstruction Association is very interesting. I have before me one of their circulars frantically urging the people of Canada to buy Canadian products, and claiming that, among other advantages, the exclusive buying of home products will lower prices. They do not, however, explain how that will be done. They also claim that buying in the home market will increase the national revenue; they do not say how that will be done, either, and they make that claim in the face of the fact that buying home manufactured goods instead of imported goods necessarily means a decreased instead of an increased revenue, because of the decrease in the customs duties collected. They also state that buying in the home market will reduce taxes, whereas, on the contrary, it means increasing the taxes, so long as we have to pay to the home manufacturer on what we buy from him an amount practically equal to the duty which we would have to pay were we to buy American or British goods. This amount so paid does not go into the revenue of the country, and we must make up the shortage by additional taxes raised in some other way. Buying at home, therefore, will increase our taxation rather than reduce it. Then, they say that the carrying out of the policy which they advocate will attract outside capital. Well, outside capital usually comes in in the form of imported goods, which they look upon as an unmitigated evil. They also say:

> Canadian goods need no apology. Generally they represent better value than imported products.

Even if this were true, which we do not admit, is this all that is required of Canadian goods? We say it is not: they should represent 20 or 25 per cent more value than imported goods, if the Canadian manufacturers are dealing fairly with us. Then they tell us that if 25 per cent of the goods imported into Canada last year had been supplied from Canadian sources, direct employment would have been provided for some 65,000 additional workers. But how would that work out? We paid in customs duties last year $163,000,000. If we produced at home one quarter of the goods represented by those duties, the country would lose one quarter of that revenue, but our opinion is that we would have to pay it all the same, though it would be paid to the manufacturer instead of into the treasury of the country. That is, in order to have these 65,000 additional workers we would pay a bonus to the manufacturers of $40,750,000, or $627 per head for the additional employees. According to the Government Year Book, Canadian manufacturers employed during the year 1910, 515,203 persons, who were paid in wages and salaries $241,008,416, or $467.65 per head. Well they ask us to give them a bonus of $627 per head on these workmen whom they employ; in other words, they want us to give them a bigger bonus than the amount they pay the men in wages and salaries. That might suit the manufacturers all right, but it would not suit the rest of us at all.

Speaking of bonuses, I am satisfied that under the proposed tariff we shall be practically paying a bonus to the manufacturers of $500,000,000 a year. But what are they doing in order to justify their receiving that amount? They say they are giving employment to many people. Well, they sometimes give employment, but not always. It seems to me that having regard to the tremendous bonus we are paying them, they should so manage their business that there would be no serious unemployment in the country. When they receive a bonus like that they should at least do that much for the workingmen.

Mr. CURRIE: How can they run their factories when you will not buy their goods?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I think I have already dealt with that. The Grain Growers' organization do not buy from the Canadian manufacturers because the Canadian manufacturers will not sell to them. That is an assertion which is not denied in this House, and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) when we attempted to put it up to him during the course of his speech, refused to allow any interruptions because he knew that was coming. He would allow interruptions from any one except from cross-benchers but he was careful not to allow them to interrupt because he knew what was coming. I repeat that the Grain Growers' organization did not buy from the Canadian manufacturers because the Canadian manufacturers would not sell to them.

Mr. CURRIE: Not true.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I believe some of them now are willing.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Yes, you had better say so.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CURRIE: I have been doing business with the western farmers for twelve years, and will sell to any of them who want to buy a carload of stuff. I have never refused them if they had the money.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): It is true that they have bought some things, though my hon. friend contradicts completely the Minister of Militia in his statement. But the reason why they did not buy more is because the manufacturers refused to sell to them.

Mr. CURRIE: There is no truth in that.

Mr. COWAN: What manufacturers?

An hon. MEMBER: All manufacturers.

Mr. COWAN: What manufacturers? I just want to ask that question.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): My hon. friend is not entitled to interrupt me unless I give him permission to do so. However I refer him for an answer to the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar).

Mr. COWAN: You are making assertions that you cannot prove.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I am making assertions on the basis of what I have been told by thoroughly reliable people, and that is all the assertion that my hon. friend can make at any time. In fact, he is often ready to make assertions when he has no such authority.

Mr. COWAN: The hon. gentleman cannot answer the question.

An hon. MEMBER: He has answered it a dozen times.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I say that under the present tariff we shall be paying to the manufacturers of Canada a bonus equal to $500,000,000 a year.

Mr. CURRIE: That is not true. You are paying no bonus.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): My hon. friend is not entitled to stand up in this House and tell me that I am saying was it not true.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member knows very well that he is not telling what is true.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): My hon. friend knows very well, if he has studied the question at all, that what I am telling is the truth. In receiving such bonuses as this, they should see that they give steady employment to their men.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member does not help any unemployment.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): That is a duty in which they have lamentably failed. I must say that the present Budget is not to my liking at all. It not only, in effect, makes a great increase in the protective tariff, but provides for the dropping of the business profits tax and replaces that with an addition to the Sales tax. Taxes may be divided into classes in various ways. We may class some as direct taxes and some as indirect taxes. If it true that both the tax dropped and the additional tax are direct taxes and, therefore, they are preferable to indirect taxes such as the customs duties. We may also, however, divide taxes into those that are based on the expenditure of the person who pays them and, on the other hand, those that are based on his income. I believe the taxes should, as far as possible, be levied on those best able to pay them, and in order to make the persons best able to pay do their part, only one course is possible and that is to base our taxes, as largely as possible, on income rather than on expenditure. That is something that we should always keep in mind. The poor man expends all his income and, according to the system of taxation which has obtained in the past, he must pay a tax on all of his income, while the rich, who do not need to pay out all of their income, escape taxation on the part of their income which they do not need to spend on their living. The Minister of Finance is apparently anxious to get back to the old system. His predecessor somewhat reluctantly adopted the plan of levying part of his taxes on income, in other words, taxing those who were best able to pay; but the present minister seems anxious to depart from that principle, when he drops the business profits tax, which is chargeable against income, and adopts in its place taxes of another description which are based upon the expenditure of the person paying. Therefore, it is plain that he is relieving the rich men of the country at the expense of the poor.

The United States Secretary of the Treasury has recommended to Congress the repeal of the excess profits tax, but he also advocates that the excess profits tax should not merely be repealed but be replaced by some other tax upon corporate profits. He wants to keep the tax still against income instead of expenditure.

Mr. HAROLD: Does the hon. member not know that under present regulations all business profits are taxed 10½ per cent with an exemption of only $2,000 on each company's profits?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I am not discussing that point.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member is dodging it.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I am dealing with the fact that the Minister of Finance is dropping a tax on income and is putting in its place a tax on expenditure. I am trying to produce some arguments in favour of taxing income rather than expenditure. I am not dealing with the point that my hon. friend is dealing with at all. I was referring to the recommendation made to Congress by the United States Secretary of the Treasury. I notice that he makes another recommendation which I think might be taken to heart by the minister. He says that the nation cannot continue to spend at "this shocking rate." In his opinion, the proposed expenditure for the coming year of $37 per capita is expenditure at a shocking rate. I wonder what he would say of our per capita expenditure of $60 to $70.

We have before us not only the Budget, but an amendment with which I propose to deal very briefly. I might say that the amendment that I should like to see adopted in this case would set out the fiscal policy laid down in the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I think it would be much better than the proposed amendment; but according to our Canadian rulings, we can have only one amendment, and we have to deal alone with that. In some respects, this amendment is better than that presented to us last year. It expresses regret that the Government has made no proposals for any reductions in the tariff, and I thoroughly agree with that. It also regrets that the tariff is based upon the principle of protection, and I also agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in that regret. The amendment claims that the aim of legislation should be to make taxes as light as circumstances will permit, and it also claims that encouragement should be given to industries that may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises giving promise of success. That is one of the most important things which we must keep in mind in dealing with our fiscal legislation. We have been trying to pamper and pap-feed industries which never should have been established in this country. If we had adopted the principle laid down by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, we would stop that sort of thing and we would encourage industries that the Almighty intended to be carried on in this country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has referred to pap-fed, improper industries, industries that never should have been started in this country. Would he be kind enough to give the House the names of the industries to which he refers?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I have not undertaken to give the names of the industries. My hon. friend should be very much better posted than I am in that regard. I will say this, that any industry that asks my hon. friend for a protection of 25 or 30 per cent should never have been established. My hon. friend should tell them to get out That is the best test I can give to him. Let him find any industries willing to work on a 10 or 12 per cent customs tariff and let him encourage such industries in any way he can. He will then be encouraging industries that can be carried on successfully in Canada and that the Almighty intended to be carried on in Canada. That is the best answer I can give to my hon. friend, and I hope he will take it to heart.

The amendment further advocates such legislation as will reduce the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion. That is also a very good point, and the best way to reduce the cost of those implements, and amongst them agricultural implements, is to put them on the free list. In that way the chances of the farmer to make a living in these serious times will be very much increased. On the whole I think it is an amendment that should be accepted by me although it does not go as far as I would wish.

Some of my hon. friends opposite have had a great deal to say about free trade and free traders in this House during the last few years. The term "free trade" has been used rather loosely in this country. I can remember, as no doubt can other hon. gentlemen something of the old election campaigns in this country in 1876 and 1878, when the National Policy came before us for the first time. We remember that those who supported a tariff of an average of 12 and 13 per cent were called free traders, while those who wanted 20 per cent all around were called protectionists. That is how the term first came to be used, and it still hangs on to some extent. We apply the term "free trader" to those who want free trade or a low tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite are now trying to create the impression that even the Progressives are rather indefinite on this question of free trade, and are rather undecided as to what their attitude on the question should be. I do not think that is so; I think there is no justification for that criticism. Let me give my own position on the question of free trade, if you will, or low tariff, and I believe that my position is one that has been generally accepted by the Progressive party. My ideas along that line are well set out in the fiscal plank of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. No one need have the least doubt where the Progressive party stands on that question. No party that ever existed has made its position so clear when out of office as the Progressive party has done with regard to that particular plank, and any one who wants to know where the Progressive group stands can look up that plank and find out without any trouble at all. If any one does not know, there is no excuse for his ignorance; it is simply unjustifiable and inexcusable.

We have heard a great deal about the Liberal platform of 1893, and particularly about one thing that was suggested at that time, namely, that the goal of the Liberal party was free trade as they have it in England. I think that was a very good goal, and that we should do well always to keep a goal of that kind before our minds. I am sorry that the Liberal party did not make greater exertions to reach that goal more quickly. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek to leave the impresion that we are divided in our views on this question on this side of the House—that many of us would like to retain a certain amount of customs tariff, while others want the whole thing abolished at once. I have never heard any member of the Progressive group suggest that we should do away entirely, at one fell swoop, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has put it, with the customs tariff. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has frequently directed attention to the fact that it took some twenty years in England to accomplish actual free trade, and I have always heard him advocate in this House that we must proceed along these lines gradually, although always keeping the goal in view. It may be necessary for a time to retain some customs duties on certain lines of manufactures, but I do not think there is any such need as our hon. friends opposite would have us believe. As a matter of fact, we know that in at least four particular lines of goods used generally throughout the country we have adopted the policy of free trade, not by any agreement with our manufacturing friends, but in answer to a great clamour from the public and in the face of tremendous opposition by the manufacturers. Those four lines to which I refer are cream separators, binder twine, barbed wire and flour. I shall not take up the time of the House to repeat what was predicted at that time, but we all remember how ruination was predicted. In every one of those lines we are not only manufacturing goods for Canadians in Canada, but we are exporting to a very large extent, even barbed wire, though not to such a great extent as in the other lines.

While it may be true that it would not be wise to do away at once with all customs duties, I say that in so far as agricultural implements are concerned there is not one bit of justification for retaining a single jot of customs tariff on any of them. I think in all our leading lines of agricultural implements our manufacturers are not only able to supply our home demands, but are exporting largely in competition with the world, and if they can face the competition of the world outside of Canada, why cannot they face competition inside Canada?

I want to repeat what I said in answer to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on a previous occasion, that an industry that cannot thrive on a 10 or a 12, or at the outside a 15 per cent tariff, is not suited to this country, should never have been established in this country, and is a curse instead of a benefit to this country. I believe that our experience has shown that those industries which it was predicted could not possibly thrive under free trade, have thriven. The first and most important thing we demand is that food stuffs and the agricultural implements necessary to produce those food stuffs shall be freed.

I think more might be done in the way of looking after wider markets for the things we produce. I have said something in this House before as to the necessity of having trade agents in the United States and elsewhere, to do something in the way of finding markets for our agricultural as well as our manufactured products. We export more agricultural than manufactured products, and I think they should receive more attention than they have in the past.

We have had a serious situation in Canada for some time on account of the ending of the war. We have been passing from war to peace, and we are experiencing a period of depression. We have no objection to bearing our share of these trying times, but we feel that the farmers of Canada have had to bear more than their share, and that the manufacturers, who have been bonussed so extensively by the treasury, have not done anything like their share. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has drawn attention to the fact that one of his constituents sold two cattle hides weighing 129 pounds at 1 cent a pound; that he got $1.29 for them.

I know of a worse case than that. I saw a report in the paper the other day about a farmer at Melita who shipped two hides to Brandon and received in return, after paying freight and commission the magnificent sum of 16 cents—just a little more than enough to buy a pair of shoe-laces. It would take about 100 or 150 of these beef hides at that price to buy a pair of boots for the farmer made out of just one little corner of one of the hides. Is there any justification for that?

I have known of worse cases than that, where people sent in hides and there was not enough received from them to pay the commission and freight. I have known of cases where people were compelled to sell cattle this fall—good canners—because of the shortage of food. They shipped the cattle to Winnipeg on commission and did not get enough to pay the commission and freight. But we have not seen any wonderful reduction in the price of canned goods, or any wonderful reduction in the price of boots and harness. It is unfair that it should take from 100 to 150 hides to buy a pair of boots, and from 400 to 500 cow hides to buy a set of harness, but that is about the position in which the farmers of Canada are placed because the Canadian manufacturers refuse to do their share in restoring rational conditions.

Without wishing to take up very much more time, I might refer briefly to one or two suggestions in regard to the raising of revenue. My hon. friends say that we should not only criticise the present system of taxation, but that we should suggest some other means of raising money, because we all admit that large sums of money are necessary. Well, it is quite true that a tremendous sum of money must be raised, but we must get that money in such a way as will ensure, as far as possible, that every dollar shall go into the revenue of the country, and not, as under the present system of customs tariff, have one dollar out of every four go into the treasury, the other three finding their way into the manufacturers' pockets. That is not the way to raise a revenue, especially when we are so heavily taxed.

Now, we have made some suggestions as to new methods of taxation, and they have been adopted after a tremendous amount of kicking on the part of the Government. But we have made other suggestions that have not yet been adopted, and I am glad to see the Minister of Finance in his place again. Perhaps he will try to take them into consideration. For instance, we have suggested an inheritance or death tax, or whatever you like to call it. That would no doubt bring in a great deal of money, and, it seems to me, it would be a much fairer way of raising revenue than our customs tariff. The suggestion is also made that there should be a tax on the unimproved value of lands. Our protectionist friends are very anxious to scare the farmers on this question. I do not know whether the minister has tried to intimidate them or not, but I have seen a great many scare headlines on the question, and I have heard a great many arguments advanced to frighten the farmers into believing that this tax would operate entirely against them. Surely it is a queer system of taxation that would apply only to farm lands. We could assuredly adopt some fair system of taxation on the unimproved value of lands, a system that would be fair to every one. If any one should ask me, as my hon. friends just now seem to be very fond of putting questions, I am not in a position to say just what the unimproved value of lands in the city of Winnipeg would be in comparison with the unimproved value of farm lands in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. CURRIE: Are you in favour of a tax on improved lands?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Stand up, please, when you ask a question.

Mr. THOMSON: I am not talking about that; I am suggesting a tax on the unimproved value of lands.

Mr. CURRIE: You do not want a tax on improved lands?

Mr. THOMSON: I do not suggest a special tax on improvements of land, neither do I suggest any special tax on the fine house which I presume my hon. friend has on his city lot; but I want to tax the unimproved values of land.

Mr. COWAN: There has been a great deal of misunderstanding on that point. Is your proposed system the Henry George system of single tax?

Mr. THOMSON: I do not care what you call it; you had better wait and see what I advocate, before interrupting me.

Mr. COWAN: I want to get—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COWAN: Just a minute. I want my hon. friend to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COWAN: If you are scared, all right.

Mr. THOMSON: If the Henry George system is a fair system, then take it.

Mr. COWAN: Why do you not answer my question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THOMSON: Be patient; wait and see whether I am in favour of the system or not.

Mr. COWAN: You are scared of being caught.

Mr. THOMSON: I am not very much in fear of the hon. gentleman's ability to catch me; it would take a better man than he to do so. I was discussing the suggestion of taxation on unimproved values of land, and I have not yet said whether or not I am in favour of it. So that my hon. friend, before he starts to criticize me, had better wait until he knows what my views are on the question. Let me say, for the first time, I believe the system is one that must be adopted some time or other in our country. Whether the present time is opportune, in view of the very unsettled conditions in real estate in our cities and towns, is a question that should receive some consideration before the system is adopted. But we should at once take steps, at any rate, to put a tax on unoccupied and unused lands.

Mr. CURRIE: What about farm lands?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THOMSON: I say, we should tax unoccupied lands, and there are many reasons why that should be done. I do not propose to take up the time of the House discussing them, but I might mention one reason, and that is the railway situation. I think that the adoption of this tax would relieve the railway situation to a considerable extent. It is my opinion that every owner of unoccupied land, whether in city or country, should be obliged to put a value on that land, and the land should be taxed on such valuation by the Federal Government. And the owner should be compelled to sell the land at that value whenever he gets a chance. This system would have the effect of locating settlers, who come to the country, nearer the railroads. I think my hon. friend from Regina will agree with that.

Mr. COWAN: I do not.

Mr. THOMSON: At any rate, it would undoubtedly cause the settlers to settle near the railway tracks. In this connection, I do not think it would be a bad idea to do away entirely with free homesteads. If we compelled the owners of unoccupied lands to sell, on their own valuation, at a reasonable price whenever the opportunity offered—and if you put a heavy enough tax on such lands the owners would have to sell at a reasonable price—we should then have, near the railway tracks, settlers who would produce traffic instead of rushing to outside localities and continually clamouring for branch lines, thus compelling us to increase our expenditures. I think we might well adopt this principle and put a heavy tax on all unoccupied and unused lands; and by some means or other we should compel all owners of those lands to put a fixed price upon them and to sell them, whenever they get the opportunity, upon reasonable terms, either to private persons or to the Government. I believe we could get considerable revenue under that system, and the railway situation would be very much improved thereby. At least, the suggestion is worth trying. Now, there are other means of taxation which have been suggested from time to time, but I do not propose to suggest any more at the present time.

Mr. COWAN: You had better not. Why not start a new party of your own?

Mr. THOMSON: My objection to the Budget is that it greatly increases the customs tariff and in place of putting a tax on income provides for further taxation on expenditure. I will support the amendment because I believe it is in the right direction while the Budget is in the wrong direction.

On the motion of Mr. Lang the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen the House adjourned at 12 midnight.

Friday, May 13, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 156, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

He said: The purpose of the Bill is to make a very slight amendment in the matter of procedure. It is to substitute a delay of seven days for the delay presently fixed in the statute, of ten days, which must elapse between the production or communication of documents intended to be used upon a trial and the day of the trial itself. It is asked for by persons interested in the administration of justice, particularly in cases with regard to offences against morality, etc., the reason being simply this: that there cannot be a remand for more than eight days, and wherever documentary evidence is to be used—inasmuch as under the present law the documents have to be produced or communicated ten days before the trial—it is necessary to have a second remand. In other words, it is impossible to comply with the requirement of ten days in time to proceed at the end of the first remand. The substitution of "seven" for "ten" seems to operate no injustice to anybody; it is an ample delay, and makes it possible to proceed after the first remand.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 157, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

He said: Three amendments are proposed by this Bill. The first is for the purpose of raising from sixteen to eighteen years the limit of the age at which a delinquent may be treated as a child and dealt with under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The House will remember that the other day we made similar amendments in the Prisons and Reformatories Act. The clause which makes this provision raising the age is suspended for the same reason for which the analogous clause was suspended in the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and the provision is that it shall come into force accordingly as it is proclaimed in the different provinces. The reason is as I mentioned the other day: it is represented that the provinces are not presently prepared to deal with the situation that would be created by this increase in age; that their institutions are in large measure organized to deal with children only up to sixteen years of age, and it is not desirable that this change should go into practical operation until suitable arrangements have been made.

The second amendment is to confer a power of postponement on the juvenile courts which apparently does not exist at the present time. This suggestion was made by a judge as the result of an inquiry which he was charged to make into the operations of these prosecutions, and it is thought that the proposed amendment will effect a very substantial improvement.

The third amendment is to increase the possible penalty of persons contributing to the delinquency of young children from one year to two years and likewise to make persons liable to that penalty without its being necessary to prove that they have actually succeeded in their attempt to contribute to the delinquency. This is effected by adding the words: "or likely to make any child a juvenile delinquent." This amendment follows upon a judgment recently entered in a case where a very young child was brought together with an older girl child by a couple of men who indulged in an orgy in the presence of this child—a most degrading and certainly a most contaminating thing. But as it was not established that the men had had any relations of any kind with this young child, notwithstanding its having been present at this orgy, it was held that they should not be convicted as having contributed to make the young child a delinquent. The purpose of the additional words is to cover cases of attempts of that kind, even if they do not involve the perpetration of an actual offence which might be said to make a child absolutely a delinquent.

The fourth and final amendment is to provide a penalty for persons who attempt to induce children to desert from the persons or families in whose custody or charge they are placed under the Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXTRADITION TREATY

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 158, respecting a Supplementary Extradition Convention with the United States of America.

He said: This Bill has already been explained. It is a treaty for the purpose of adding, as between Canada and the United States, the offence of wife desertion to the extraditable offences.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT

HAY AND STRAW INSPECTION

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 159, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Hay and Straw inspection).

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): I should like to call the attention of the Government to a despatch which appeared in the press of yesterday, stating that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) was to go alone to the Imperial Conference in June; that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) was going to start for London on June 2 from New York on a private business trip, but that he would probably attend the conference. Is there any truth in the report that the Prime Minister is to go direct to the conference, and that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is to go to it in a roundabout way?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I do not really know whether the hon. gentleman expects an answer or whether he merely wanted to draw attention to the report.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I should like to have an answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I expect to attend the conference. No arrangement as yet has been made as regards any other minister.

On the Orders of the Day:

BOARD OF TRADE REPORTS—BLANK FORMS IN FRENCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny): Some little time ago I inquired from the Prime Minister if I could get a blank form in French for the report of the Montmagny Board of Trade. Some representatives of the Department of the Secretary of State came to my office and inquired what kind of blanks were required. I showed them the blank forms in English, and I asked them for blank forms in French. There is a heavy fine for delay in making the report required. The Prime Minister said the other day that he would make inquiries and let me know. Since then I have had no answer and I have not received any blank forms in French. I should like to know when we are going to get them.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I remember the hon. member making the inquiry, and at the time I requested my secretary to see that the matter was looked after. I have not had a report yet, but I will promise the hon. gentleman to speak on the subject to-morrow.

On the Orders of the Day:

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Verchères): I should like to call the attention of the House to what I may call either a direct disobedience of the Orders of the House or a gross neglect on the part of the Government regarding Orders passed by the House. I would first call the attention of the Government to an Order passed on October 20, 1919, regarding the names of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk as they appeared on the books of the company on October 9, 1919. I called the attention of the House on November 10, 1919, to the order for this list, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) replied that the list was being prepared. On June 10 last, I again called the attention of the House to the matter, and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) told me that it would take seven or eight months to get the list. Those seven or eight months have now elapsed. On June 26 last, I again called the attention of the Government to the matter, and I did not get the list. The list has not yet been filed or brought down. So much for the list of Grand Trunk shareholders.

On April 19, 1920, an Order was passed for a statement showing the number of farmers who enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. On April 21, 1920, another Order was passed for a statement showing fines collected under the Inland Revenue Act for 1919 and amounts paid for collecting such fines. On April 26, 1920, another Order was passed for a statement showing the quantity of liquor imported into Canada by provinces since 1913. No returns have been made as regards these orders, although some of them are more than a year old. Is the Government still persisting in its desire to withhold information on these matters?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): As regards the first order, an order for the names of all the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, that order was passed. There did not seem to be any reason that could be advanced why it should not be passed if it was the desire of the House to approve. But this just illustrates what may be done under the present rules. The Government has no means in the world of getting the names of those shareholders except by grace of the Grand Trunk Railway. We immediately set to work to get them, and since that time the Grand Trunk officials have been reminded time and time again that we desire those names. I do not know of any obligation they are under to give them to us, nor do I know of any way in which we can enforce the request. I am still more at a loss to understand what earthly good the information would be when it comes here. It will likely cost a very great deal of money and the cost will have to be borne by the country. All the Government can do is to request the information, and keep on requesting it, and that the Government has done.

As to the second, the return showing the number of farmers who enlisted, I presume that that requires going through the whole list of several hundred thousand of the men who enlisted, and possibly it involves inquiry as to different men as respects whom no occupation is given. I can quite conceive that months and months of work would be required for that, and I am again at a loss to understand what value the information will be when received, because many a man, though not a farmer on the day he enlisted, may have been one just a short time before that. Consequently, the information can be of no value. But the preparation of the statement called for will be of great expense, and necessarily means a matter of very great delay. I cannot give particulars as to just what progress has been made towards filling that order, but I have no doubt that every progress possible has been made.

As to the others, I do not know of any reason at the moment why they should not be down. I will make inquiry as to them. I do not recall attention having been called to them since the orders were passed.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Of course, under the rules I am precluded at this stage from answering the arguments of the Prime Minister, but I would like to suggest that there be brought down the correspondence requesting the Grand Trunk management to make that list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether there is anything to be brought down or not. I remember speaking to Mr. Bell, the Deputy Minister of Railways, who said that he had requested the list just a short time before I spoke to him, and was continuing to request it. Whether there were letters or not, I do not know.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My right hon. friend just said that there were many written requests.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman knows that he is not within his rights in cross-examining at this stage.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Steam rolling!

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY NEGOTIATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): I should like to ask the Prime Minister what progress he is making in the negotiations with the Grand Trunk, and if there is any fair chance of getting through the session without any further legislation in connection with that matter.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Government received yesterday, through the High Commissioner for Canada, a notification that the Grand Trunk shareholders had authorized the directors to accept the terms fixed by this Parliament in the Bill already passed. Consequently, the next duty is to have the agreement which has been prepared, and, I think, in the main assented to—I am not very sure whether all the terms were approved or not—executed by the two parties. When that is done the agreement will be brought down, and, if it is desired, any subsequent correspondence that may have passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Thursday, May 12, the debate on the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the Budget speech was delivered on Monday last, sufficient time has elapsed to enable us to ascertain with what measure of approval it has been received generally throughout this country. Everyone of intelligence knows of course, that in common with every other country in the world Canada is just now passing through a period of readjustment, a process of deflation of values and of currency, and consequently, a process of diminishing trade and of financial difficulty; and, therefore, every one knows that the task confronting the Finance Minister was abnormal and in every sense greater than it would be in ordinary times. It therefore is surely a matter of gratification to us all as citizens of this country to know—because I submit with confidence that eyeryone in his heart does know—that on the whole the Budget statement of our financial conditions, of the condition of our trade, of the results of our taxation, of our proposed expenditure and taxation, has been well received throughout this country. I have been interested in public life for many years, and for some number of years now, too many perhaps, I have been a member of this House, and I do not think that in all that time I have witnessed a Budget statement received with such general approval as has been that of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance this year. The communications, whether direct or indirect, whether through the press or by letter that have reached the Government have been almost uniformly favourable, nor has any one outside of this House, and I think I shall show in a moment any one inside of this House, seriously challenged any fundamental article of policy in the Government proposals or seriously challenged the general trend of the financial administration which the Budget speech covers and expounds.

Although we are passing through a period of the character I have described, and although such processes are necessarily painful processes for a country and its people, it is surely something we ought to reflect on with pride that in the year covered by the Budget, our trade taken in total has actually advanced over the total of the year before; that our figures represent an annual trade of $125,000,000 odd more than they represented in the year that ended on March 31, 1920. Our imports have gone up by some $175,000,000, our exports have gone down by some $50,000,000. Our imports indeed are relatively too high. The figures as to the diminution of exports are relatively small considering the period we have passed through and the totals are gratifying to every man who understands even superficially trade conditions throughout the world.

Our general financial position too is reassuring. The revenue returns from taxation are better than anticipated in the Budget of a year ago, and we find ourselves at the end of the year having discharged all ordinary expenditure out of ordinary revenue, with a surplus left over as between those two items of some $69,000,000—$69,000,000 of a surplus, calculated in precisely the same way that surpluses in Budget speeches have been calculated throughout the whole history of this country.

But the best feature is the fact that our revenue has been sufficient to take care, not only of ordinary expenditure but, as well, of capital and ordinary war expenditure, and to leave a surplus of some $12,000,000. It is only when we take into account investments, some of an active and some of a presently inactive character, but which nevertheless are investments, in the newer responsibilities into which we had to enter—I refer to the railways—that we find we have not been able to discharge the complete requirements of the fiscal year. The interest-bearing investments we have made are mainly on behalf of our soldiers, and others are to take care of the railway responsibilities, which were not of our creation but were a heritage that we could not avoid. It is only when we take those into account that we find there was any necessity for increasing the debt at all. That, surely, under the conditions that obtain to-day, is a reassuring statement, and I can safely say that, compared with any other country, it is the best statement of any of the considerable nations of the world. I am aware that in the Budget speech recently delivered in Great Britain they have been able to show that there has been, this year, a diminution of the debt by a very large sum, amounting to about £230,000,000: But in that connection it must be recalled that the sum is secured, and more than secured, by the sale of war supplies, and the like by a different system of book-keeping, a different method of dealing with war supplies from that which this country adopted, and that if the same method adopted by Canada had been followed there, the balance would have been entirely on the other side. If hon. gentlemen will read a book recently published in London in which a sketch appears of the war work, in connection with war supplies, of Lord Inverforth—the name of the author is not given—they will find that under the charge of that distinguished man Great Britain had sold war supplies to the extent of £800,000,000 up to October last, which amount is credited against expenditure; and, no doubt, in a very great degree due to that is the favourable financial statement which that country is now able to present. In our country, as everyone knows, we did not provide war supplies on the same system as they did. Our soldiers were supplied on the per capita basis, supplies being furnished by Great Britain overseas, we paying so much per day. Consequently, we ended the war with much less in the way of war supplies than they did; in fact, our supplies were almost negligible as compared with theirs, and, such as they were, they were placed against balances overseas. Consequently, our debt did not reach the total it would have reached if we had followed their method, and necessarily we did not have war supplies to place against expenditure, to the reduction of the debt, as did they. I mention that only to show that, in respect of the British Budget, although their appears a diminution in the debt, it is owing to the sale of supplies, and is represented, on the other hand, by an increase of debt due to the purchase of those supplies, which increase of debt we did not have, and consequently there could be no diminution here, from any corresponding sale, to set off against the debt.

I do not intend to pursue the financial phase of the Budget speech further at the present time. I want to address myself mainly, and with such brevity as is possible, to a discussion of the amendment, the challenge to the Budget, if you may call it that—although the word has a virility and masculinity that makes it wholly inapplicable to this amendment. Perhaps, in seeking to analyse the amendment, the most useful reflection at the commencement would be this: What is it that you do not find in this amendment? I will examine later what you do find; that is a much more difficult task. It must have struck every hon. member of the House, when the amendment was presented, that what we might well have looked for in it is not there. We have been promised time and time again, directly, and we have had intimations indirectly from hon. gentlemen opposite of both camps, that when we came to discuss the Budget we should find one of their tariff platforms in the amendment they would present. Well, where in the amendment, is the tariff platform of hon. gentlemen opposite? Does this amendment represent their position in respect of fiscal matters in this country? Is this the platform of the Liberal Opposition to-day? Is it the platform upon which they are going to the country? Is it the platform upon which the Agrarian Opposition is going to the country? If either supposition is correct, has the Liberal party abandoned its convention platform of 1919 and got a new one? Why have they not presented, as an amendment to the Budget to-day, the platform adopted at their convention in 1919? Has no one an answer to that? Is the 1919 platform on the scrap heap?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not had an explanation in this debate, although it has lasted a week, and it is not that hon. gentlemen have not thought of the matter; it is not that they have not been reminded of it. Speaking in the Budget debate a year ago on this question, I asked them then why they did not move their tariff platform by way of amendment, instead of cutting off the main body and moving merely a section. But I was told that it would come later. I questioned hon. gentlemen angularly opposite, the Farmers' party, as to why they had not moved their platform all these years in amendment to the Budget or in amendment to the motion to go into Supply. After struggling hard to get a reason I succeeded in getting a promise from the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), who told me that they would move their platform all right, and asked me just to wait and be patient. Well, I have waited another year. We are nearly at the end of another session, but no Farmers' platform has yet been moved in the House. Has the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), abandoned the Farmers' platform of November 1918? If he has not abandoned it, why does he not seek the judgment of the House upon it? Why does he not espouse it in this Parliament by acts as well as words? Why does he not seek to put his colleagues and his semi-colleagues on record upon it? Why does he not let the people of the country know just how every member in this House stands as regards that platform? I hope I shall succeed in prodding him up to move it. I have tried long and often. I have been told year after year just to wait for the Budget and I should get their platform. I had one explanation, I think three years ago, from the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). After an amendment to the Budget had been moved, he came forward in a dramatic manner into Parliament and moved something pretty close to the Farmers' platform. But he found, of course, that there could be only one amendment to the Budget, and so in tears he had to withdraw his motion, lamenting the fact that the rules of the House forbade him to move a second amendment. But what about all the years since? Why did he not at least once get up and move his amendment before some one else intervened? Surely his colleagues directly opposite me are not so discourteous to him—so discourteous that they insist on being the first every year for four years running—that he cannot get his amendment moved at all; and if they are why does he not move an amendment to Supply? We know that my hon. friends opposite have been struggling hard to find amendments to Supply. They have raked all the ash heaps and the garbage barrels of politics—; everything in the way of political shoddy you could think of has been moved in this House in amendment to Supply—everything except their platform. Last night I listened all the time I could to the Chief Whip of the Agrarian party. I heard him pronouncing what the party wanted and what they demanded to have. He said: We demand free food, we demand free cement, we demand free implements of production. The fact is that is precisely what they do not demand, although in their official platform they have been preaching it for four years. Where do we find free implements in this amendment? Where do we find free food in this amendment? Where do we find free cement? Where do we find a demand for a reduction of duties on boots and shoes in this amendment, where do we find any single thing that is in the Farmers' platform of November, 1918? But the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) says: We are in the same boat with hon. gentlemen of the official Opposition.

I would like to have been present when this amendment was being fixed up. I would like to have been around when the pruning, and the sandpapering, and the varnishing, were being applied to the verbiage in order to get the amendment in such shape that they could all get in on the vote.

I went through Western Canada last fall. On many platforms I informed the people there of the game the Farmer leaders—all incorrigible party men—were playing. The great number of the audiences were farmers, a great many of them were followers of my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), no doubt in the world about that. They know what they want out there, they know they want precisely what I said they wanted in the city of Sherbrooke in the speech criticised so severely by the the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). They know they want free trade and want it mighty soon; they know they want the Farmers' platform adopted and adopted right away. They were astonished at every meeting, and I was often questioned after I was through whether what I said was really correct—that not one of their representatives in this House had ever had the courage to move their platform here. Now what is the explanation?

Mr. EDWARDS: Practical politics.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, of course, practical politics,—a desire to get "in the same boat" with the official Opposition. For that reason they have made themselves a political annex to that party—servile tools and minions of the official Opposition, ready to do whatever they are bid to do. If these Farmer leaders take a stand on a certain question one day they are ready to change it the next day if the official Opposition say so—they have done that very thing this session. These leaders are the tools, I say, of the official Opposition—an adjunct, an annex, and a dilapidated annex at that. If the official Opposition say, "We do not want you to run a candidate here," there is no candidate run. If the official Opposition say, "We think we can run a candidate in that county better than you can because you dare not say anything against protection there, let us have that constituency, and you keep out; our flag is better there than yours,"—in such a case as that the leaders of the Farmers' party obey. But if the official Opposition say, "We cannot get anywhere down in such-and-such a constituency"—for example, in York and Sunbury—"we cannot do a thing there for the life of us. They know us too well. Won't you run a candidate down in York and Sunbury?" Then of course the Farmers run a candidate, and it is the free trade flag and the Farmers' platform flag and the 1918 platform that are used in York and Sunbury.

Mr. HALBERT: What about North York?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why North York is represented in this House by an hon. member who does credit to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Come again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want so to disconcert hon. gentlemen that they lose their bearings altogether.

Mr. HALBERT: What about putting Burnaby in the field against the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is plenty of time to fix that up yet. The hon. gentleman knows, of course, that the leader of the Opposition has been struggling hard to get that matter fixed up and I do not doubt myself that he will succeed. Perhaps, of course, the play will be continued for the sake of appearances. But what I say to hon. gentlemen opposite is this: Why not throw the mask away? Why not join right up? Am I to be told that I am anxious to keep these people divided? I was paid that compliment by the leader of the Opposition last session. "Oh," he said, "you would like to divide us. We are the forces of 'progress.' The farmers may be going one way and we moving the other, but we are all 'progressing'; you want to divide us." I do not want to divide them. I think if I did that is just what would unite them. Why do they not unite? I do not care whether they divide or unite if they will really and finally say where they stand and remain there. If they want to unite let them do so. Let them then throw away both platforms and frame one on which they can both stand and then remain on it; but do not let them say that one is still back on the 1918 platform and the other on the 1919 platform, when, as a matter of fact, each of them has in this House discarded them both.

Think of the 1919 platform. Do hon. gentlemen opposite remember that convention? Do they remember the solemn words of its tariff platform, a definite real commitment? Let me see—it is not two years old yet, it is a little over a year and a half old. There were eighteen articles that were to be free. It is true eleven of them were free when the resolution was passed.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, but they did not know that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They had to have padding as well as substance so they said all these articles were to be free. Then there was to be a big reduction in the tariff all round. There was to be "reduction of the tariff whereby substantial reductions would be effected in the cost of wearing apparel and other articles of general consumption, other than luxuries, as well as on raw materials entering into the same." Then the British preference was to be increased to 50 per cent. But here is the solemn affirmation with which the platform ends:

—"and the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power."

Pledges itself to implement that resolution when returned to power. Well, why do they not stand by it in between? Where has it gone? Why has it not been moved this session? Why was it not moved last session? Why was it not moved the session before? Why have they each session patched up something new? Now, if I do not get an answer to anything else, may I get an answer to that before this debate is over?

An hon. MEMBER: You never will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That interjection comes from opposite, and the man who says it speaks the truth. I wonder if hon. gentlemen really think that there is any single human being in this country who does not understand the game they are trying to play? Does any hon. gentleman think that any one is so dull that he cannot see the whole process of hocus-pocusing that is going on? Does any one believe that the farmers of Western Canada, who felt that they were deceived in 1896 by promises that never were fulfilled, and who as a consequence commenced the organization which to-day supports hon. gentlemen diagonally across the way,—does any one imagine that they do not understand what is doing at this time? Does any one think for a minute that they are going to be deceived by this amendment put up in this debate, and by the running away from their platform on the part of hon. gentlemen of the Agrarian party in this House? They are not deceived. They who accepted a straight and direct pledge in 1893, and who know that that pledge was not carried out—and I for one say that the country was the gainer because it was not—they who accepted then a pledge that they could all understand, are not very likely to be deceived by this circuitous sinuosity that none of them can understand.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some one says "order." They know that in 1893 and 1896 they were not represented by any special party in this House; they know they are to-day; and I think they know that if that party has not the courage to put its pledge before Parliament while in opposition it is not likely to have the courage to put that pledge into effect if returned to power.

Now, let me speak for a moment—

Mr. RINFRET: It is about time.

An hon. MEMBER: You are getting nailed up to the mast.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will have lots of time, but I am afraid that time will not help my hon. friend. We have had already the assertion from a colleague very close beside the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) that we will not have any reasons why they abandoned his platform.

Mr. RINFRET: I think we will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He differs from his party friend. There seems to be three divisions now. Well, to abandon a platform is bad enough, but to fail to furnish a reason for its abandonment is worse, and I will give credit to my hon. friend from St. James that he, at least, having abandoned his platform, is ready to give a reason for the apostasy.

Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in a speech expounding the cause that he has consistently espoused in this House, but the incarnation of which in a platform even he has never dared to move, was received with cheers on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite me, although they knew that what they were going to vote for had not the remotest family connection with the cause which he was expounding, and that they themselves had no sympathy whatever with the opinions which he was expressing. The hon. member for Red Deer brought into the discussion some 4 p.m. incidents and figures to which I should like very briefly to refer. I think it is a compliment to him that he is able to evoke applause even from those who differ from him. That is because of the peculiar talents for debate that he possesses. He referred to a speech I made on the Budget a year ago, a speech of which he had a very poor opinion at the time—and I had not any very good one myself, any one in office will find that his time cannot be very much devoted to preparation of speeches—but nothwithstanding his very poor opinion of that speech he has done me the compliment of answering it repeatedly for the past twelve months. The organs of my hon. friends have been answering it too. I remember one paper in particular, published in the city of Winnipeg, which did me the very great kindness of having a lengthy reply to that speech by a gentleman called Mr. Hull, and in the same issue a very long reply by a professor from Scotland—I forget his name at the moment—and a two-column editorial as well in rebuke of what I said, ending with the statement, that the speech was not any good anyway. Well, I have nothing to say as to the remarks of the professor. They seemed to me to be charged mainly with a lot of unnecessary and unsupported sarcasm and to be perfumed with an aroma of omniscient complacency that those who profess to be trained economists only too often exhibit. But the case presented by the other gentleman, whom I do not know, did make an attempt to present something that really was material. I believe I can use the argument he put forward in respect of one phase of the subject, which I think was again referred to in this debate by the hon. member for Red Deer. I think I can use Mr. Hull's reply to illustrate just where the inherent weakness of his case comes in. The examination of this will disclose also what folly it would be on the part of a country situated such as we are to follow the trail blazed by the hon. member for Red Deer.

I refer—and I do not need to go any further, because this is really emblematic of the entire reply—I refer to the exception taken to certain remarks of mine as respects the tin plate industry of Wales and its history as compared with the tin plate industry of the United States and its history. I had stated in my address, basing my facts upon the report of a body of business experts appointed by the Government of Mr. Asquith, that the tin plate industry in Wales suffered a very severe reverse in the last decade of the last century, and that that reverse was due to the policy adopted in respect of tin plate by the United States in 1891. I showed that in 1891 the tin plate of the United States was supplied from Wales and as a consequence that country was importing some 680,000,000 pounds a year; that after the imposition of the duty the importations went down to 28,000,000 pounds; that at the time of the imposition of the duty the production of tin plate in the United States was only 2,000,000 pounds; and that as a consequence of the duty in the course of a few years not only did imports go down from 680,000,000 pounds to 28,000,000 pounds, but the production in the United States went up from 2,000,000 pounds to 2,000,000,000 pounds. Now, it might have been expected that such a reduction of imports would be reflected in a curtailment of the total trade figures of the United States, but, instead of being a loss to the United States, that reduction of imports was an advantage. The money that would otherwise have gone out was kept within the country. There was at the same time almost a collapse of the tin plate industry of Wales; a collapse that it took it at least twenty years to recover from; a collapse, which, indeed it has not wholly recovered from yet. While that was going on there was extreme suffering among the miners of Wales, and the industries related to the tin plate industry suffered as well. On the one hand, while in England, where there was no tariff and where the home market was invaded by those who kept their own markets to themselves—while in England there was continued suffering, continued depression, continued loss of trade, there was on the part of the United States a multiplied production, a multiplied increase in trade and a multiplied prosperity.

Now, I was answered by Mr. Hull to this effect: Yes, it is true; tin plate production went up from two million to two billion pounds—went up by a thousand fold. But oh, what it cost them, he said. Why, the amount paid the first year, an amount which did not go into the treasury at all, was some $6,000,000, and the price of tin plate increased so enormously that severe injury resulted to the canning industry of the United States. The people had to pay so much for cans that the fruit rotted and vegetables rotted, and consequently it did more harm than good. That was Mr. Hull's argument. Now, let us examine with just the same care what were the facts.

Yes, there was an increase but a trifling increase in the price of tin plate. There was no increase as compared with the year 1891. I have the figures here, taken from the Metal Record official report, which will show very quickly just what were the results. In 1890 the price of tin plate, Bessemer coke per 108 pounds was $4.80; in 1891, $5.34; in 1892, $5.30; in 1893, $5.37; 1894, $4.89; 1895, $3.87; 1896, $3.63; 1897, $3.20; 1898—the last year given here —$2.99. That is to say, tin plate went up from 1891, when the duty was imposed—it went into effect in 1892—from $5.34 to $5.37 in 1893. It went up from $4.80 in 1890 to $5.30 in 1892; that is the most favourable comparison which can be taken from the point of view of Mr. Hull. Now, what does that amount to? It amounts to less than one-half cent a pound; it would add to the price of a can for the purposes of the canning industry one-eighth of one cent. That is the total amount of the increase, and one-eighth of one cent to a can is said by Mr. Hull to have been so high that it injured the canning industry of the United States. Could anything be more absurd? But what happened? It is a fact that the canning industry of the United States suffered from depression in 1891 and 1892 like almost everything else did, through over production. That is quite true, but it suffered nothing at all from the one-eighth of one cent to a tin. In the course of seven years, instead of an increase in the price of that product that they were making at home, there was a decrease from $5.34 to $2.99, or little more than half of what it was when the duty was put on. Does not that pretty well close the argument? Does it not show that in addition to securing a business which Britain had before and increasing the tin plate production from two million to two billion pounds; in addition to getting all the advantages accruing to a country from maintaining that tremendous industry at home; the advantage accruing from not sending the money outside in the purchase of the goods elsewhere; in addition to the advantage accruing to the cognate industries depending upon and getting benefit from the tin plate industry; in addition to all that they actually secured in time, by manufacturing in their own country on a tremendous scale, a very substantial reduction in the price of tin plate itself. I do not need to pursue this subject further. The same result on a lesser scale has happened in our country in relation to many articles; the same can be shown in relation to one industry after another, but I have covered this one alone.

The hon. member from Red Deer says: We have had excellent results here; in the case of industries that had no protection I can show you, he says, just as good results from industries that have had to suffer from free trade conditions. I want to examine that statement for a moment.

Between 1896, when the Liberal party came into power, and 1911, they placed three important articles on the free list—I think I am safe in saying only three. There have been far more important articles put on the free list since, if that fact amounts to anything in the way of argument. They placed three articles on the free list: barbed wire, cream separators and binder twine. As the hon. member for Red Deer told us in such graphic fashion two years ago, he had to satisfy himself with those three articles on the free list; he kept turning the cream separator on platform after platform; he kept fraying the binder twine until his fingers were sore; and kept pulling at the barbed wire until he was badly mutilated in the process. Now he comes and tells us in this House that the binder twine industry has prospered; that instead of being an injury the wiping away of the duty was a benefit to the binder twine industry. Well, the immediate answer would be this: if such is the case, why was not the same thing done with other articles? Why did they not keep right on putting things on the free list? The fact is precisely the opposite—and I may say that I would be only too glad to be interrupted if any hon. gentleman has any fault to find with the figures that I am now going to give; only too glad in this relation as in any other in the course of my address. As regards the binder twine industry, there was a 12½ per cent duty up to 1897. It was reduced to 10 between 1897 and 1898, and then it was abolished. But what happened? We have had in the last twenty-five years 25 industries in that business, and of these 25, some large and some small, 12 have gone into liquidation, 7 have been dismantled and have had to quit business; 3 were burned down and only 3 remain, one of them, I think, the plant mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer. I do not know that as regards any industry you are going to exterminate it wholly by putting its product on the free list, but if you had results in all industries such as have followed in this case, what condition would the industrial life of this country be in to-day? We maintain a very moderate duty on farm implements; it averages only 14.6 per cent to-day, and we have not 3 but 63 plants in that industry. But what about the 3 binder twine industries which remain? All credit to them for surviving. One, the industry mentioned by my hon. friend, I think, has a factory in Halifax and there is another in Montreal. These plants are engaged mainly in the production of other material which is covered by a duty, the binder twine being manufactured as a partial product. These facts I have from one who, I think, may be looked upon as an authority. There is another of these factories in Brantford; it is excellently managed and has been a fair success. But I think, if the hon gentleman will inquire, he will find that the reasons for that success are most unusual reasons. He will find that there have been large purchases of raw material on an ascending market and sales at an advance as a result. He will find as well, as regards one, if not two of those that survive, that the sworn testimony of the management in the case—I think it is Storey versus—I do not remember who was the defendant, in 1905—was to the effect that they could not have made a dollar under existing conditions in this country, had they not been fortunate enough to make profits in purchases of the raw material. In none have the dividends been continuous; all have had a hard struggle; and one, if not two, are engaged now chiefly in the production of other material. That is the position to-day. Because of what was done and on account, as it was stated then, of the United States giving special advantages to their manufacturers because of their relations with the Philipines, the Government of my hon. friends opposite in 1903 put a bounty on the production of binder twine, and those mills existed up to 1913 because the bounty was on. That bounty, which was paid out of the treasury of Canada, was paid, not, surely, in accordance with free trade principles. It was paid though, in order that those industries might survive. Such is the record. And all the while the wholesale price of binder twine has gone up from 7 cents to about 21 cents a pound. In this connection I should like to read an article on this subject published by a man who claims to be something of an authority and who certainly is an observer of affairs in Canada, an author for whom I have respect. The article states:

Last year—

I think this article was written in 1912 or 1913. The House should remember that the binder twine industry like many another, had advantages from the war. During the war, their American competitors were over supplied with orders. American railways were not managed as well as ours were in the way of traffic, and they were blocked. Great advantages accrued to our industries as a result. But as regards the situation up to the beginning of the war, this is what this authority has said who has made a special study of the subject. I will give his name if I am requested to do so.

> Last year, over 527 million bushels of grain were tied up in sheaves in Canada. This means that, soon binder twine will be used in this country every year for the harvesting of a billion bushels of grain. When one thinks of the vast acreage in the West still unbroken, it is impossible even to guess at the volume of binder twine to be consumed in Canada in the years to come. Yet, with the existence of such a market, comparatively little of the product is made here.

I may say that at the time the duty was taken off, we imported only about 20 per cent of our consumption; but the last year for which I have the figures, we imported over 50 per cent, and one year lately we imported 80 per cent of our consumption. The article continues:

> Our needs are really supplied by the United States. Tons and tons of flax fibre, which some day will be perfected as a raw material for the manufacture of binder twine, are going to waste on the prairies every season, all because no one can make profitable use of it in Canada. There is not even the inducement to save this raw material for the purposes of manufacturing.
> Such a condition exists chiefly because of an unequal competition in the binder twine trade between Canada and the United States. The advantages are with the latter country, whose larger and older and more powerful industries have not only absolutely free access to the Canadian market, but also practically monopolize the valuable supplies of raw materials in the Philippine islands. Time was, when the greater part of the binder twine business of Canada was carried on by Canadian manufacturers. To-day, an overwhelmingly large share of this business is in the hands of the so-called Harvester Trust, which does not make a pound of twine in Canada, but sends it from mills located across the line.

I could go on reading the article in which the tariff history is given, and what little success has been achieved by the surviving industries is, in this article, attributed to bounties paid out of the treasury of this country.

Mr. CRERAR: Who is the author of the article?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Norman P. Lambert, now secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I could pass from one of those classes of goods made free to another; but if I do, this speech will be much longer than it ought to be in a Budget debate.

My hon. friend frequently refers to the cream separator business. After the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) had ceased turning the cream separator, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) took up the task. On platform after platform he has been turning away at those separators. I cannot understand—in fact I am pretty well convinced that the contrary is the fact—what benefit in the world has accrued from taking the duty off cream separators. One can scarcely produce any better evidence than that furnished in an article that appeared some time ago in the Regina Leader. If the hon. member for Marquette wants to know what the Regina Leader is, I can tell him that too. That journal deputed one of its staff to find out what the differences in price were between implements in the United States and in Canada. He investigated. Every one knows that you can take a place just to suit you, on the one side of the line or on the other, and you can in that way make a difference in price in favour of whichever country you like. The best case that I have seen presented by way of comparison was presented by Mr. Findley, manager of the Massey Harris Company. It seemed to be most complete, and I believe it made an impression throughout the West. His figures showed the points where the freight rates were equal and, consequently, the comparison was the fairest that could be made. Well this servant of that newspaper went over, and he brought back figures to show what difference there was between the price a farmer had to pay in Canada and that paid by his more fortunate neighbour, as they put it, across the border. He gave a list of, I think, six or seven articles and he showed the difference in price between the two countries. Will any hon. gentleman in this House be bold enough to suggest what the article was upon which the percentage of difference was the biggest of the whole seven? Well, it was cream separators. The writer apparently did not know that cream separators had been on the free list for many years, so he included them in the list, and he showed that we were paying in this country some $80 for a cream separator which the Americans paid $60 for, or, perhaps, the prices are $90 and $70 respectively. At all events, the biggest margin of difference proportionate to cost, was in the case of cream separators. That would not indicate that we were very much the better off in point of price, to say nothing of the condition which the industry is in, because of what was done as to the duty on separators.

Mr. ROBB: Was this man giving figures for the same make of cream separator in each case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he were not, he was a bad representative of the Regina Leader, and I do not think the Regina Leader would be so unfair as to quote figures for one make in one country and another make in another country. Hon. gentlemen of the Farmers' party can see how suspicious hon. gentlemen opposite are toward their newspaper champions in the West.

There is only one more reference that I want to make to the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I am sorry I cannot engage his interest. If one cannot admire the logic of the hon. member he is bound at least to have high regard for his enthusiasm. I never knew so fertile an intellect in finding arguments for free trade. He can find one north, south, east or west, up above, down below, or wherever he looks. No matter what is the fact that presents itself to him, it is an argument for free trade. If it rains, if it shines, if it is light, if it is dark, everything is an argument for free trade. He will take any figures at all, and upside down or downside up they will show that the country with a protective tariff is going to the dogs, and that the one country that he says has a free trade tariff is prosperous. He told us that Great Britain was going strongly ahead now, and that we, unfortunately, were in a bad position. Why, he said, last March our trade went down by $100,000,000 and his hair almost turned white at the prospect before this country. I asked him later for the corresponding figures for Great Britain, and also asked him to state how our entire year's figures compared with those of the year before, and how our trade for the year compared in its progress with the progress of trade in Britain. But he told me that I would have to take whatever figures he had.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Well now, our trade in March did not go down $100,000,000. Our trade did go down in the month of March as compared with March of the year before; I do not know a country in the world whose trade did not, and everything in this world is relative. Our trade went down by $78,000,000 odd in March, export and imports added together. But what was the falling off in British trade? British trade in the month of March last went down from £307,000,000 in the March previous to £169,000,000; that is to say, by £138,000,000, or about $600,000,000 in one month. Of course, their trade is larger than ours, they are a bigger country than we are; but while their trade went down by 42 per cent, ours went down by only 32 per cent. And the hon. gentleman finds in our loss of 32 per cent in March a reason for dismay and despair and a reversal of policy, and in the British loss of 42 per cent he finds nothing but cause for good cheer.

I desire now to devote a little time to this amendment presented by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. He has not been in the House very much since he moved the amendment—I am not sure that we ought to criticize his judgment in that regard. One is at least interested to know, if he cannot ascertain why the Liberal tariff policy is not moved, why at least the amendment of last year is not here. Was it the debate that took place in caucus that resulted in hon. gentlemen opposite throwing over last year's amendment? What was the fight about? What was wrong with it? Surely they could stay with an amendment for twelve months! Or is twelve months too long to abide by a policy? Last year's amendment called for a reduction of duties. It demanded that we cut down duties in order to get lower living costs, and in order to get cheaper instruments of production. Well, here is an amendment that does not call for any reduction at all. I wonder if the hon. members of the Agrarian party really saw that?—that after it had been trimmed and varnished up by hon. gentlemen opposite, they had been lined up behind an amendment that did not call for a reduction on anything. They were told they had to be satisfied with that, and must tell the farmers that that was all they could get. Last year's amendment did call for a reduction. This year all they do is to express regret that the Government did not propose reductions. Well, I suppose they do regret it; they know what would happen any government that did; they know the spirit of this country towards any tearing down of its tariff barriers at this time. They know the whole volume of wisdom there would be, in advance of American legislation, in the face of French legislation, in the face of Belgian legislation, in the face of Italian legislation, in the face of Australian legislation, in the face of British legislation, all raising tariff barriers against this country—they know what the country would think of us if under these circumstances we started to tear our tariff barriers down. Therefore, because they would like to be here instead of us, they "regret" very much that we did not do so. But they took good care not to call for it; they took good care not to commit themselves to doing it; they took good care to be able to go anywhere in this country where it would pay them to do so and say: Don't you see there is not one word there that commits us to reduction of duty on a single article—not one? And there is not. Let us read the amendment. I have read the first clause. I now come to what I will call the tax clause:

That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax—

The tariff is a tax, mind you.

—and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit.

Just keep that in mind. "We recognize that for good reasons we have to have a tariff, but it should not be protective at all. It should not be based on protection, because the tariff is a mere tax." See how that fits in with the next paragraph:

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries—

Now may I ask the hon. member for Red Deer, which clause is he voting for? Did the hon. member ever hear about encouraging industries by taxing them? The tariff is a mere tax, just for the sake of raising money on account of our financial conditions, but the fiscal policy of the country should be the encouragement of industries. Now if there is any human being that can put those two clauses together and get his mind on the same side of the both of them, supporting them or opposing them, that is, if he is honest with his mind, I would like to see the specimen produced. The amendment goes on:

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises giving promise of enduring success.

That is good enough for any party. But if such is the case, how is it that the tariff is a mere tax, to be made as light as possible? Let me go into that for a moment. The aim should be "the encouragement of industries" based on the natural resources of the country. Now what are those industries? The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's told us; he gave us the key to the whole thing. The industries I would encourage by a tariff tax, he says, are those, the raw materials of which are in this country. That would be one class, and he mentioned steel; steel was very appropriate, very appropriate indeed. Why, of course, he would protect the steel industry. Such an industry would be one based on our natural resources. But hundreds of industries in this country get the bulk of their raw materials in Canada, and the purpose of a tariff, in so far as its protective effect goes, is to develop the natural resources of a country. He says further that those are based on our natural resources that get their fuel in this country. That is coal. You see where the hon. gentleman comes in. So far as coal and steel are concerned, he can go to Nova Scotia and say: "I stand up for protection to these industries." But he went further than that; he said that if an industry were based on water-power, he would protect it. He says: "If they are using water-power, why, then, that is a natural resource, and I would 'encourage' that too." And in case he should accidentally leave anything out, and thereby get into trouble anywhere, he included another class. He said: "You may have industries built up only upon the brains of the promotors of such industries"! and he gave us a beautiful illustration. He said there was a man in Scotland, in Glasgow, I think,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dundee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, Dundee. He said that, though there were no oranges growing in Scotland, and there was no sugar made there, a certain man had found a way to make marmalade, and having done so had established an industry based on one of the natural resources of the country. And after he got through with that classification he declared: "That is the kind of industry I would encourage"; adding the very comforting assurance that such industries would not need "very much protection." Now, I should like to know how those words accord with the declaration that a tariff should not be based on the principle of protection. What industry in the world would not come in under the class named by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)? And he says that the tariff should be such as to protect these industries! He declares, in one clause, that the tariff should not be based on the principle of protection, and in another clause he says "the encouragement of industry" is just what it ought to be based on. Let me ask my hon. friends opposite a very plain and simple question: Is the tariff in effect in this country to-day based on the principle of protection, or is it not? Now, I should like to get an answer, even a nod, I do not care whether vertical or horizontal. But I cannot get either one. I venture to say that there is not one gentleman opposite who will tell us in this debate whether the present tariff is based on the principle of protection or not. Why, if they say no, the immediate answer is: What then do you want? If they say yes, then the answer is: Why, this is your own tariff. There have been substantial reductions since their day, but the principle of protection is in the tariff now and it must have been there before the reductions were made. The tariff of this country to-day, in every essential feature, save reduction, is the tariff prepared by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's himself, which he lauded to the skies year after year as complying with every requirement of protection. He tells this House that he has never given adherence to the principle of protection. I tell my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's that he has given adherence to that principle in every Budget speech which he delivered during the course of fifteen years in power. He gave adherence to the principle of protection in every Budget he ever brought down, and in every tariff he framed; and not only did he do so, but he admitted the fact in Budget speech after Budget speech, and I have them before me. Let us see how the hon. member did obeisance to the principle of protection. I will take first a speech he made—

An hon. MEMBER: What year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not matter what year; I will read from any speech he desires, delivered by the hon. gentleman during the whole fifteen years. Here is one from the speech of April 16, 1903.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Having said that you can possibly be too protectionist, and that it is possible to go too far, he explained the kind of protection he was opposed to, doing so in such a way that he could go to any city in Canada and stand by selections from his words. He says: The protection that I am opposed to is the kind of policy that would protect the growing of tea in British Columbia or of icicles in the north. Well, what man outside of an asylum would suggest any such thing? No one ever did that I heard of. We want protection in this country the same as every other country in the world has it to-day, except Great Britain, and Great Britain has been getting there pretty fast, especially in the last week. We do not want anything in the way of insanity in protection. You can be extreme and abuse anything; we all know that. But when one says that he is opposed to such a process, and takes that as an excuse for saying in one paragraph of a heterogeneous amendment that he is opposed to the principle of protection, the thing is too absurd to admit of discussion. The hon. member said, in that speech, that there may be extremes. Undoubtedly. But are there extremes in the present tariff? If so, he is the father of them. He says:

> Then there are extremes on the other side. There are people who, relying upon the sound principles of free trade sound enough in their proper place—

He has never yet told us where that "place" is.

> —are disposed to carry them to a point which takes no account of the conditions. They seem to adopt a theory, and they say: You must carry out that theory regardless of what may be done elsewhere: Fix your own tariff policy, and never mind what is done elsewhere. Well, I am sure we cannot go as far as that. Commercial questions are every day occupying more attention in the field of public affairs. There is great rivalry among the nations; nay, there is commercial war, and in a contest of that character, it is not enough to have a good old theory; you must understand the methods whereby your opponent plays the game, so that you may be able, if necessary, to modify your views.

Does any one suggest that that is not an admission of the protective principle? What in the world does it mean? If other nations put up tariffs and we have to do the same, then is it merely to secure revenue? What difference does it make to us, as regards our revenue, whether they put up their tariffs or not? If they put up their tariffs we have to do the same to protect the industries of this country, for if we did not those countries would have the advantage over us. There is as plain an admission, in the hon. gentleman's speech, of protection as human lips could utter,—unless perhaps a plainer admission was uttered by the hon. member himself. Later on, he said:

We have endeavoured to give the country a tariff of stability,

Every year it was a question of "stability", as if there was any need of having stable taxes:

—a tariff which, in so far as a tariff has any relation to prosperity, has been an important factor in the development of Canada the last few years.

The tariff an important factor in the development of Canada! Is a tax an important factor in a country's development? Why is the tariff an important factor in development if it is not by reason of its protective effect? This speech is an admission of the principle of protection. On June 7, 1904, he said:

This tariff has included a considerable measure of incidental protection,—

As I remarked last year, what in the world is the difference what adjective you ascribe to protection if you have the duty? What in the world is the difference what you call it?

—and in that respect it will command the admiration perhaps of some hon. gentlemen opposite who are more anxious for protection than some of us on this side of the House, I think. As to whether or not it is adequate protection—

Just listen to this.

—we have some evidence of a gratifying character that the tariff, without being excessive, is high enough to bring some American industries across the line.

Gratifying? Not sorry as he is now; not holding up his hands in warning to them to stay away if they think they need protection. Gratifying? In those days he endeavoured to bring American industries across the line——and a tariff which is able to bring those industries into Canada looks very much like a tariff which affords adequate protection.

It certainly did. Now does the hon. gentleman want to say that it is not an admission of the principle of protection? Everybody knows it is. Everybody knows from the experience of fifteen years that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's believes in the principle of protection. If he does not believe in it how can any one account for his record during those fifteen years? He then expressed belief in it on platform after platform, and I have given credit to him for adhering to it still, notwithstanding the fact that he said he and his friends would follow an entirely different principle if returned to power. I have given him credit for it because I say it was far better for his party to break a political pledge, dishonourable though it be, than to bring the industrial fabric of this country into ruin or semi-ruin. But the hon. gentleman went on:

If my hon. friends opposite wish to see some of the good results—

Good results mind you!

—of the tariff let them go up to the city of Hamilton.

This is very interesting.

—let them go to the city of Hamilton and look at the vast industries which have been established there by American capitalists who have come across the line under the operation of this tariff, and who are now engaged in carrying on very large businesses. Let them go to the city of Toronto and they will find similar organizations of American capital starting in the manufacturing business.

Starting under the tariff that he put on. How does that compare with my hon. friend's assertion now that if any company thinks it is going to get a tariff in this country to keep it going it had better stay out of Canada? And yet my hon. friend boasted when he was in office that by the tariff he had imposed, which he said was not only a protective tariff, but an adequately protective tariff—he had induced companies to come to Hamilton, Toronto and other places.

So, we are able to say that not only has the tariff been a great revenue tariff, but one which has afforded a reasonable degree of incidental protection and one which has brought about, as far as these industries are concerned, very gratifying results.

Continuing he said:

This Government can be relied upon,—

And it could all right.

—while guarding against monopolies, trusts, and combines to give reasonable aid to the legitimate industries of the country,—

Now, did they give reasonable aid by taxation or by a protective tariff?

—and to adopt a tariff policy, which will not only be a policy for the benefit of the manufacturers—

This is the hon. gentleman who says he has never admitted the protective principle.

—but a policy which, while giving them all due consideration, will have regard also to the interests of every class and section of the people and of every province in this great Dominion.

I could go further, I could go from speech to speech, but I want particularly to refer to a speech that the hon. gentleman made when he introduced the increased woollen duties into this country.

An hon. MEMBER: What year was that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that was in 1904. The Finance Minister of that day had said some woollen firms were not well managed. He went on to say that the woollen industry of the country was in a very difficult position, that it was struggling because of the advantages that competitors in other countries had over it. He said he thought something ought to be done to help the woollen manufacturers, otherwise they could not get along. Then he made this statement:

The complaint is made very largely by our woollen manufacturers and by various public men who sympathize with them that although on the better grades of goods they can fairly compete with all persons, even the British manufacturer, a very large proportion of the imports of British woollen goods coming into Canada are really shoddy goods of an inferior character, against which we ought to legislate;—

Bear that in mind—ought to legislate—

—and it is alleged that any increase which we might make in the woollen duties would have the effect of shutting out, not the purer woollen goods, but the shoddy goods. That is argued with much force, and I am inclined to believe that there is something in it.

That is, of course, very consistent with the idea that a tariff duty is only a tax to get money.

However, we propose to deal with the matter in this way: Our present duty on the class of goods which I may describe as cloths, tweeds, overcoatings, wearing apparel and goods of that character—

These are the goods he increased the tariff on. Now just watch——is 35 per cent, subject to the preference, which brings the duty on British goods down to 23½ per cent. We do not propose to increase the general tariff,—

It was 35 per cent.

—but we propose to put a limit on the extent to which the preference shall apply to these goods. We propose to fix a minimum tariff of 30 per cent on this class of goods coming in under the preferential tariff. This change will apply to all woollen goods mentioned in the tariff item 394 with the exception of blankets, flannels, bed conforters, and counterpanes, which are placed in a group by themselves.

Raising the duty on woollen goods from Great Britain—and in the case of every other country it was 35 per cent—from 23½ to 30 per cent because the woollen industry could not survive unless he did. And still he says now he has never admitted the principle of protection. He did the same in the case of twine and cordage, not binder twine—he raised the duties from 16⅔ per cent up to 20 per cent because otherwise the industry could not survive. Now surely I have driven enough extracts home to show that not only in speech but in practice, in every single budget effort of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's during the whole fifteen years he was in office he adhered consistently and determinedly to the protective principle. After he went out of office he made the same profession. Why he made it last year. He tells us now that while he would protect existing industries based on the natural resources—as he defined them in his speech—he would say to any industry that was going to start up, "If you are depending on protection, my advice is keep away, I would not have anything to do with you. But as to those that are here I do not object to protecting them because they will not want much protection." Does the House know that last year he stated precisely the opposite? Last year he intimated that as far as a new industry was concerned he would not mind it getting protection at all, but that as regards one that had become an industry of long standing he would not give it any. Where the infant had grown up, he said, and was beating the old man round the House, he would let it take care of itself. He said he never did object to the protection being supplied to infant industries. The hon. gentleman went further and he said this last year:

I do not want to insist that these departures from free trade are absolutely right, but I put them before my friends who are extreme free traders, facts which I believe can be sustained.

He says here this week there are none talking free trade at all, and he seemed about to spring across the table of the House at my throat because I had suggested at Sherbrooke that there really was an issue against free trade in this country. Nobody, he says, is a free trader now.

I believe they justify a departure from free trade principles under certain conditions. If those conditions can be limited, if we can get anybody to start any new industry—

Just listen to this.

—under the circumstances under which these were started,—

That is, the ones he started, as he explained in the previous part of his speech.

—if we can get anybody to start any new industry under the circumstances under which these were started, then I think myself that would justify a departure from the abstract principle of free trade.

So last year he told us that such circumstances would justify a departure. This year he says as to new industries "I will have nothing to do with them, but I will continue to support those which are already in the country."

Now, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's tried to make out that because he effected in some microscopic way, to use the language of the hon. member for Red Deer, the tariff that he found in force in 1897 when he came into power, and reduced the average tariff only from 29.9 to 29.2, or .7 of one per cent, "nevertheless," he says, "the changes were a great relief to the consumers of this country because what we did was this: We lowered on the necessaries of life, the things that the people had to have, and by doing that, although we did not reduce the general level very much, there was a marked relief to the consumers of Canada." Well, I have a list here of the goods on which he reduced the tariff. This is a sheet from the campaign literature of the Liberal party in 1904, and I want to analyse for a moment the results of these strenuous efforts of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's to reduce the tariff on the necessaries of life and thereby afford great "relief", as he puts it, to the Canadian people. This pamphlet says:

5 p.m.

Here is a list of articles that formerly were subject to duty and that now are free.

Now, will hon. members listen to these "necessaries of life." Mind you, you can always refer to barbed wire, binder twine and cream separators, as the hon. member for Red Deer does, but outside of those three let any hon. member go through this list and see where any duties on the necessaries of life have been cut down. The first is:

Degras oleostearine—

Has any hon. member ever heard of that? The next are:

Florists stock, as follows:—corns, tubers rhizones, auracaria, spiræa:
Indian Corn,
Seed beans from Britain,
Rape seed—sowing,
Mushroom spawn,
Artificial limbs,
Asphaltum (refined),
Religious tracts,
Clay crucibles,
Cyanogen.

And another one, if any hon. member can pronounce it: Q-u-e-b-r-a-c-h.

An hon. MEMBER: Sandpaper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then follows:

Extract of nut galls; Fashion plates,—

I went through the entire list, and outside of the three that I have named I admit I found one that I think in this age of decay might fairly be described as a necessary of life, and that was—false teeth.

But the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's said that he had reduced the duty on a certain kind of cloth that the common people wore which he found taxed in every way one could think of. This cloth was subject to a duty of so much a piece, of so much a dozen, and then on that a percentage ad valorem, and he claimed that he had remedied all that and had cut down the duty to a moderate figure 20, 25 or 30 per cent. I went through the whole list to find what in the world he referred to, because I had never heard of the fact before, and the only thing that I can find in this list published by the Liberal party that would answer his description is cotton shirts. Now, what is the history of his treatment of cotton shirts? The only cotton shirts he touched were those costing more than $3 per dozen. The only duty was $1 a dozen and 25 per cent ad valorem. That, the pamphlet says, made a total of 37 per cent ad valorem, computed on the basis of the 1896 imports. Now then, will the delighted and relieved consumers be ready for announcement of the reduction that he actually made? He reduced the duty from 37 to 35 per cent.

What is the use of talking? The hon. member found a protective tariff in effect, and he kept it in effect—he scarcely changed it at all. Any change he made one could scarcely see with a microscope. When he went out of power the tariff averaged 26.7 per cent, and was in all essentials, except the three I have mentioned—and, as I say, there have been more important reductions since then than there were in the whole fifteen years he was in power—just as he found it. The tariff that he left at that figure in the fiscal year that has just passed averages precisely 21.2 per cent. Now, he says: "The tariff is a tax and you should make it just as light as you can." That is what he says in the tax paragraph of the amendment. Well, if it is a tax you can make it light in proportion to your needs I suppose; that is the only thing that will enable you to do so. What were his needs when he reduced the tariff from 29.9 to 29.2? They were $37,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year. His needs when he went out of office and was making the tariff 26.7 per cent on dutiable goods were about $120,000,000. The tariff, remember, is a tax, and to-day this country needs, as every hon. gentleman knows, $435,000,000, and we are maintaining the tariff at 21.2 per cent. Yet the hon. gentle man challenges us in this House, and says "the main charge I have against the Government of the day is that the tariff is too high." If that is not his charge, what is it? True he has taken good care not to say it in this amendment, but if that is not his charge will he let us know what it is? If hon. gentlemen want something reduced, why does not their amendment say so? In a word, why does it not state, express and reflect the tariff programme to which they are pledged?

I proceed with this amendment. Here is the third clause:

That such changes should be made in the customs duties as may be expected—

"Such changes"—did any one notice that the word "reducion" was not there? It was there last year; it was in the Liberal platform, but so great was the strength of hon. gentlemen around him that they succeeded in getting the word "changes" substitued for the word "reduction." I continue the reading of the paragraph:

Such changes should be made in the customs duties as may be expected to reduce the high cost of living.

"May be expected to." The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's may say in his county that the cost of living can be reduced by raising the tariff. Indeed he indicated as much in this House when he spoke of what he had done for the coal and steel of Nova Scotia. Did he not say then that his policy had reduced the price of the product?

Mr. RINFRET: What about that clause?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This clause? Will the hon. gentleman say whether it means "reduction" or "increase"? The hon. gentleman does not answer.

Mr. RINFRET: The Prime Minister says that the word "reduction" is not in the amendment, but he has read it twice. The word is there twice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is only there once, so far as I have been able to see. They regret that no reductions have been made, but they do not say they will do anything to bring a reduction about. Where is the other reference to a reduction? Does my hon. friend refer to that part of the clause which says "may be expected to reduce the cost of living"? Well, that is just where the joker comes in. The hon. member took care that he would be able to go to his constituency and preach the very same doctrine as that on which he was elected—the doctrine of protection.

Mr. RINFRET: How does the right hon. gentleman know? His Government has no candidate there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, there is no election there, but there is an election in the county of York-Sunbury and the hon. gentleman has no candidate there.

Mr. RINFRET: I made no statement about York-Sunbury, and I do not expect my right hon. friend to make any statement about St. James when he does not know anything about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unfortunately, I do know something about my hon. friend. I know the tariff platform upon which he contested his seat. I have read his speeches.

Mr. RINFRET: How do you know?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read the speeches and I have read some of his newspaper articles.

Mr. RINFRET: Did my hon. friend approve of my speeches?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the tariff platform his speeches were very good, because they advocated precisely the tariff platform of this Government. All that is the matter with the hon. gentleman is partisanship; if he could get away from that he would be all right.

Mr. RINFRET: Unlike the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he would stand up for those who frankly say they are with him in tariff matters, but he and those who think with him go before their constituents and say: Why, we do not propose to reduce a single item of the tariff; we can reduce the cost of living by seeing to it that we make more things in this country; by seeing to it that we get a scale of production which will enable manufacturers to reduce the cost; by seeing to it that by competition developed through a protective tariff we bring about a reduction of prices to the consumer of Canada. That will be my hon. friend's position in the county of St. James.

Mr. RINFRET: I ask again, how does the Prime Minister know?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a pretty safe conjecture because that is what the amendment enables him to do. What my hon. friend is going to do I have no means of knowing except by what he did before; I presume he will adopt the same tariff platform the next time that he adopted on the former occasion. I know that his journals all through the province of Quebec—including his own journal, the one to which he sends most astounding reports from this House—are continually assuring the manufacturers and the workingman of that province not to fear anything should the Liberal party get into power. They say: "We are protectionists the same as you are; do not be afraid of us Liberals if we get into power." That is what the Quebec journals are saying, and saying repeatedly. Did the hon. gentleman ever see those sentiments in the press.

Mr. RINFRET: Do not connect me with La Presse.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, Le Canada, we will try that one. Did the hon. gentleman ever see in his journal any article denouncing the principle of protection? Has he ever published any such article? I read that paper occasionally, and I have never seen anything of the kind. I do not know myself of a single Liberal journal in the province of Quebec, either French-Canadian or English-Canadian, which takes any such attitude. And what about the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler)? He is a gentleman of strong views; there are not many cobwebs in his brain; he talks pretty clearly. He made a speech the other day before the Reform club of Montreal, and I have a copy of that speech before me. Will he go back to his county and say that he voted against protection? Will he go back and say that he is against the principle of protection? Is he going to vote that way in this House? Which clause of this amendment is he going to support? Here is what he said in Montreal:

I would say that he is a bold man—

"Bold man," remember.

—who declares that one who believes that Canada should have a moderate tariff for revenue, or protection of industries and employment, was not a good Liberal.

Does it not look as if the hon. member for Waterloo could be a Liberal and at the same time a protectionist? Will the hon. gentleman vote for this amendment and still be a protectionist? I cannot get a nod from him, either; there is no reply. Of course there is a clause in the amendment to fit his case—there is one to fit every case.

Mr. EULER: The Prime Minister has the floor now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I want my hon. friend to explain his vote. I want him to explain which clause he will have in mind, which he is voting for and which he is voting against, when he supports the amendment—if he does; I still have some confidence that he will not support it. Listen to this protectionist doctrine as propounded by the hon. member for Waterloo:

One matter which people had to think of today was the labour question. Canadian workmen had become used to a good standard of living, and he believed—

That is, the hon. member for North Waterloo.

—that this standard should be kept up, though, perhaps, in some instances they had gone too far.

Referring, I suppose, to the workingmen.

To keep up these standards for the working people it was essential that there should not be unfair competition with countries where the standard of living was lower. Much better it would be if the standard of living in these countries were raised to the standard of that of Canada. Mr. Euler instanced the manufacture of buttons, of which article Kitchener made the total Canadian product.

I have not the least doubt that when the hon. member goes back to Kitchener his platform will be much the same as that of the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Gordon); it will be a case of "Kitchener first."

And what about the hon. member for West Peterborough himself, who was elected upon a declaration that he stood "for the protection of industries and for the protection of labour?" What about the hon. gentleman's denunciation of me as an interloper and shameless intruder because I dared to say that the tariff had anything at all to do with that election. By the way, what did the hon. member for Red Deer mean when he stated that we ought to draw a lesson from the election in Peterborough? Why, the only candidate there who came anywhere near to standing on his platform—the only one who supported a policy resembling his in the remotest degree was a man who got approximately one-quarter of the votes. The successful candidate was elected on a protectionist platform; the leader of the Opposition went there in order to see that his candidate might be returned on a platform of protection. Why, he said, this Parliament has no right to touch the tariff, and even if I were Prime Minister I would not alter one word, one schedule or one item of the tariff until we had another appeal to the people. But he since submitted an amendment in this House—and in support of it he got the vote of the hon. member for West Peterborough—the object of which was to change the tariff duties on from one hundred to two hundred articles at this session of the House. What will be the position of the hon. member for West Peterborough if he votes for this amendment? Is he, who was elected because he declared he was a protectionist; is he who was elected because he pinned his faith to protection—is he going to go back to his constituents and say: I have voted against the principle of protection? I will tell you what he is going to say: "I voted for the protection of industry based upon the natural resources of the country; I voted for paragraph 3 of the amendment.

The House will remember that the third last paragraph refers to such changes "as may be expected to reduce the cost of living." Then the second last paragraph says:

> That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind—

Just keeping it "in mind."

> —the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade.

Does the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) say that in readjusting a tariff, you should have regard to existing conditions of trade? Does the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) say that? He says that he is going to vote for that; the hon. member for Red Deer is going to vote for it; but they voted already this session for something that they said they did not believe in at all, and I suppose they can do so again—anything to get in the same boat with hon. gentlemen opposite.

> Regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

That is a new translation of the phrase that was used with admirable regularity by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in many speeches that he has been delivering. He said: "Do not worry; when I amend the tariff, I will have regard to the needs of industry." Having overworked that phase, which was a clear declaration for protection, they change it, and they say that they will "have regard to existing conditions of trade" and see that there is no "disturbance of business." All that they will do in connection with these "changes" that may be made, "expecting to reduce the cost of living," will be to keep them "in mind." That is what the resolution says.

There is no doubt where the Government stand. There is no measure of doubt through this country. The hon. member for Red Deer, the hon. member for Marquette, everyone, so far as I know, who has spoken, clearly stated that the country could not fail to understand where the Government stood on tariff matters. It is not where the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) says it stands, in the speech which he delivered and which contained many a sentence for which he had no warrant in the world. He said: "This Government stands for high protection." I wish he were in the chamber, so that I might ask him upon what authority he made that statement. Can he find any sentence or utterance of mine to justify him? Can he find any act of this Government or any schedule of the tariff to justify him in it, unless he admits that he himself is a high protectionist too? Upon what authority then does he make that assertion? He makes it upon no authority at all. This Government stands for the tariff that is in existence to-day, and in any adjustment that will be made we will admit the principle of protection and we will apply it, but only to the extent that we have applied it during our term of office here, namely, to the extent essential to ensure production in this country and to enable producers to compete with similar businesses in other countries. Have we ever done more than that? I ask again: What warrant have hon. gentlemen opposite, time after time, without a reference, without a single quotation from anything, without even pointing the finger at an item of the tariff, to keep continually asserting, through the press and upon platforms in this country, that this Government is a high protectionist Government? That is a misrepresentation. This indeed is their own tariff reduced.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) accused me of misrepresentation when I told the people of Sherbrooke that there was an issue to-day between free trade and protection. I did not use those exact words, but I will not quarrel with them. Let me discuss that question now that my hon. friend has arrived in the chamber, and we will see whether there is an issue between free trade and protection. He says that nobody is talking about free trade now. What kind of individual is the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark)? What kind of individuals are the whole rank and file of the Farmers' party through Western Canada? Does my hon. friend believe that they are not talking about free trade? Does he believe that they do not mean to have it? I should like him to take a trip through that western country. If he does, he will see the authority upon which these hon. gentlemen of the Farmers' party are in this House. He will see the determination that is there. That party was bred out of resentment, because they felt that they were deceived in 1896 and 1897 by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) himself. Resentment is what gave rise to that party, and they have since been nourished upon those doctrines of free trade through their press by hon. gentlemen over there, by the hon. member for Marquette in speech after speech, in which he preached the gospel of free trade. Is he nobody? I know that, in latter months, now that the marriage is being celebrated little by little with the official Opposition, he has got upon the "easy stages'" course; but, as he says, it is free trade that he is heading for. He believes in free trade, and for the life of him, he cannot give a sound reason why, if free trade is as good as he says it is, he would not have it at once. The only real reason is that he wants to help his friends of the Opposition. This is what I said at Sherbrooke; I am going to read it and I commend it to the attention of hon. members of this House, to the attention of the province of Quebec and to the attention of the people of every province in Canada:

> There may be some who say that even this Farmers' party is hedging on the question of free trade yet, I know when they are seeking votes in Eastern Canada, they take pretty long chances on that subject and they hedge rather clumsily, it is true, but they try to convince those whose votes they want that they are not quite as bad as they have been painted.

This is the shorthand report of my speech.

> The policy and intent of a party can be read from several things. I would think, first, it could be read from the declarations of its acknowledged leader; I would think next, it could be read from the definite stipulations of its platform; and next, that it could be read in the minds and utterances of the great body of its rank and file. Now, let me appeal to these sources. Here is what Mr. Crerar, who leads this party, to which I am directing attention, said only about four or five months ago:
> "The policy of Canada for the last forty years has not been an enlightened policy."

Did that apply to the fifteen years during which the Liberal party were in power? Were not those fifteen years a part of the forty? He does not say that there are two policies; he says that there is one, but that it has not been an enlightened policy. I continue my quotation of Mr. Crerar's remarks:

> "Its purpose has been to favour certain people to the damage of the rest of the nation. This has been done through protection, or what was known as the tariff. The tariff increased the price of commodities of every kind for the Canadians. The proper way to tax the people is by direct and not indirect taxation."

And again:

> "The burden of Mr. Crerar's speech was a eulogy of the doctrine of free trade and an attack of the present fiscal policy of protection. Protection, he said, is a special privilege whereby certain men enjoy advantages that others in the community do not have."
>
> A definite free trade commitment, and that is Mr. Crerar's belief, and I know it. Speaking at Woodstock, N.B., on the 10th December last, he said—and let very man, woman and child, who depends on the industries of Sherbrooke listen to this:
> "If we cannot make shoes as cheaply here as they can make them in the United States, then we have not reached the time when we should be making shoes."

Where is the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who is in the "same boat" with the hon. member for Marquette? The hon. member says that we should not be making shoes unless we can make them as cheaply as they can be made in the United States. If we carried out that principle, we would have scarcely an industry in this country:

> "We should be making the things which we can produce the cheapest and trade on that basis."
>
> The man who believes that, believes in the whole abolition of the protective tariff. Again, at Brandon, on the 18th November last, here were his words ringing clear:
>
> "The policy of protection is the greatest curse and drawback we could have in Canada."

Does the hon. member see much resemblance between that and the amendment which he is voting for to-day:

> Now, you do not wonder that a sort of sub-lieutenant of Mr. Crerar's was not listened to very much in the county of Colchester, when he told the good people there that, after all, they did not want free trade. Why free trade is the very heart and soul of the whole Farmer movement and platform.

Now isn't it? Is not the cry, "On to Ottawa for free trade?" Is not that the great prompting motive and battle cry of the farmers' movement in the West? There is no question about it:

Practically every recital in their written platform brought out on the 18th November, 1918, denounces protection as a curse in this Dominion, as an unmitigated curse in this country, and implies that the Farmers' party will not rest until protection is gone; then they declare that immediately they must have free trade in all foods, and food stuffs in this Dominion, free trade with England in five years, free trade in vehicles, including automobiles, and in cement, fertilizers, everything all down the list, leaving only a few nondescript articles that could temporarily be taxed.

Because they have a plank also which virtually calls for free trade in the necessaries of life, which, if you enact, you might just as well have free trade:

A platform that declares for that is a free trade platform.

Does the hon. gentleman deny it? I say that free trade in those things means free trade all round in so far as goods produced in this country are concerned ,and that is what free trade means. You can have a tariff and have free trade; that is to say, you can have a tariff and have no protection. Great Britain had it for 60 years. She has not it now, and when her Safeguarding the Industries Bill goes into effect they will have a protection that along with other devices employed will compare with that now existing in the United States. I think my hon. friend from Red Deer had better go back home if he wants to propagate his doctrine where it is most needed if it is of any value.

It is no information to the people of Sherbrooke to be told that this whole movement was born of the Western Prairies.

I repeat that, and I emphasize it, and I ask hon. gentlemen to repeat it anywhere they like.

This whole movement was born of the Western Prairies, the prairies from which I come, and in which I have fought the movement from my earliest days in politics, and in which I will fight it to my last day in political life. There it took its birth, there where you have the largest proportion anywhere in this Dominion—

This is important.

—composed of recent immigrants from many countries, chiefly from the United States of America. There this movement took its birth. Out of that soil it grew, and living there, as I have, for twenty-two years I tell you what I know when I say that the spirit of the movement and the intent of its leaders and founders, the determined intent of the rank and file right through the Prairies is free trade, nothing more and nothing less. Now men who want that, we know where they are. We know exactly what principle they stand for, and we are able to argue with them. We respect them, whether we differ or not, so long as they are manly and frank and tell us the principle to which they adhere.

I think I should have added "and vote for the principle to which they adhere." Such was my authority for saying that we had a free trade issue in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: Do I understand my hon. friend is alleging that I misquoted him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot find in the speech the exact words, but I do not quarrel; the intent was the same. I did give expression to that meaning, but I cannot find the exact words. I do not accuse the hon. member of misrepresenting me, but I do accuse him of stating that I misrepresented the issue in this country, when I did not misrepresent the issue at all. I know the hon. gentleman is not declaring for free trade. I know what he is doing. I know that he is circling all round the subject, pursued by the protectionist battalions around him, and held in leash on the end of a string by the indignant free traders of the West. That is what the hon. gentleman is doing; that is the exercise he is engaged in now. It is as a consequence of that, that we are met in this House now not by the platform of the Liberal party, not by the platform of the Agrarian party, but by a sort of tautological compound that you can read anything into you like, and read anything out of you like. Such is the device to which hon. gentlemen have been compelled to resort in order to get into the same boat for the purpose of a vote in Parliament. I say again, that may work all right in this House, but I do say this: it is not making any impression on the people of this country. Its object is fully understood. Go where you will in this Dominion, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find that they have earned the reputation of refusing to be frank on the great tariff issue. I say to the leader of the Opposition that, unfortunately, such reputation particularly attaches to him. I do not know that I blame him any more than the rest. I know that he is surrounded by different opinions. I know the difficulties he is in, but I think it would be better for him to get on one side of the principle and stay on it, and take the consequences, whatever they may be. Does he now tell this House he will vote to say the tariff should not be based on the principle of protection? The hon. gentleman who moves the amendment says all that means they are not going to put a tariff on everything on earth, to protect tea in British Columbia, and icycles in Greenland, or the growing of bananas, I suppose, on the shores of Baffin's bay. Is that to be all that the leader of the Opposition means when he votes that tariff should not be based on the principle of protection? Let him tell this House plainly that if he gets into power he will not have protection in Canada, that he will not practice protection in this Dominion. I ask him when he speaks in this debate to tell us whether he will or will not afford protection to the industries of Canada. Let him say that he will afford protection to the industries of Canada based on the natural resources, if he likes, and he can change the definition of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's if he wants to. Let him say definitely what he will do. Will he abandon protection or will he adhere to it? I do not care a bit about the adjective he uses—not a particle. Let him tell this country whether he intends to practice protection or whether he does not. I asked, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was out of the chamber, and I appealed only for a nod, but I could not get even that from those who were in front of me, whether the present tariff of this country was based on the principle of protection. I ask my hon. friend now. There is not even a nod from him. May I ask the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). I want to tell him that if I read his speech aright he is as sound a protectionist as ever stood in this or any other Parliament. In the speech he made last night he told us that it was the duty of this country to take care of the workmen's families down in the province of Nova Scotia, and to see to it that the price we paid for coal was high enough, even if it was higher than we could buy coal from anywhere else, that these men might be employed and that their children who to-day are without food can get bread. That is pretty good protectionist doctrine. The hon. member says he will stand for that; he supports it, and he is going to fight for that in this House. I do not blame him, nor do I find fault with him for frankly saying in that speech that he does favour the protective principle. He has said so over and over again. How is he going to vote when the amendment comes up for decision?

Now, I have delayed the House, I had almost said unconscionably longer than I intended, probably much longer than is my due share. I have stated where the Government stands on the issue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have tried also to state where hon. gentlemen of both factions of the Opposition have said they stand on the issue. I repeat, I do not care whether they get together or whether they maintain this ostensible separation. All that I appeal to them for is this: that they tell us where they stand upon this question, and that they adhere definitely, and consistently to their position in the House and out of it, both by vote and by speech. If they can get together and stand on a common footing, submitting something which they can say is what they all agree to and will perform; if they will say: "This is our platform, and we will carry this out", very well; that would be frank and honest. But let this game cease that has been played for the last two years. It is not doing any good; it is not deceiving any one; it is not doing any credit to the politics of Canada.

The manifest course for this country to pursue—and I venture to say that 75 per cent of the people of this Dominion in their hearts approve—is a policy of moderate protection in Canada. Anything also under existing world conditions would be madness itself. I have uttered these words in terms no stronger than would be used in conversation by many hon. gentlemen opposite, and I believe that it is the opinion of 75 per cent of the people of this country at the present time. Such is the policy this Government intends to pursue.

On the very eve and under the shades of the impending revision, which I fear is to be drastic, of the tariff of the United States, who is there that suggests that we at this time, should undertake to make a revision in this country? The United States, by reason of its tremendous size and industrial potency, exercises inevitably a very great influence over our commercial conditions and destiny, and we must have regard to what it does, regard ten times greater than any concern they need have for us. We are merely one factor, and a relatively small factor compared with the whole, in the considerations that determine their policy. But they are a mighty factor in the computation of conditions that determine ours. Sixty-nine per cent of our imports we buy from them. Oh, it is suggested—and really I hardly know what language I could use to describe the suggestion—that the present tariff which the United States is about to institute has been brought about, because foresooth, we did not accept the Reciprocity proposal of 1911. A more childish suggestion could not be addressed to the intelligence of the Canadian people than to imply that this is penalizing legislation on the part of the United States the result of our rejection of reciprocity. May I enquire first of all how is it that they are penalizing every other country as well? The tariff which is now about to go into effect in the United States applies everywhere else, the same as here. What was the offence of these other countries? Later, they offered us wheat and products of wheat free if we would do the same for them. We accepted that proposal, and now shortly after our acceptance goes into effect the present Bill provides 35 or 40 cents duty on wheat, and 25 per cent duty on flour. Are we being punished because we accepted their offer in that respect? Why are not those duties left out of their impending tariff? They also offered us free potatoes if we reciprocated, and we accepted that offer. But the present tariff has 25 cents a bushel on potatoes. In both these instances the tariff is almost prohibitive; again I ask are we being punished for accepting the reciprocal offers as to these commodities. I pass on. We are selling the United States $542,000,000 worth of goods and buying from them $856,000,000 per year. Are we penalized because the advantage to them is not greater? Is that the case? Have we not treated them fairly? The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) says this tariff is all our fault. Let me ask, in the name of Canada, what would be right treatment on our part to the United States? If conditions that enable them to sell us $856,000,000 worth a year, and buy from us only $542,000,000, are too onerous for them and too good for us, what does my hon. friend suggest? If their mind is to penalize us, if this tariff is the consequence of any resentment on their part, one would have thought that they would have acted sooner. But, on the contrary, they acted the other way. In 1913, under the Underwood Tariff, two years after reciprocity was defeated. the United States threw down the bars very largely on most of the goods included in the Reciprocity Agreement. That is the way they acted then. Why? Because they wanted to favour us? Not at all; it was because they thought it was good policy for the United States. They thought they could handle the products of Canada and become, in respect of those goods, the great distributing agents and could make a profit on the distribution. And so they did. The time has come now, however, when, by reason of conditions clearly stated in their own speeches in their House, they cannot do this any longer. They have a plethora of these goods and the farmers of the United States have demanded that as against these foreign products they be given due protection. That demand is being conceded. Hon. gentlemen suggest that if reciprocity had been accepted, and the plethora from this country had been still greater, then the United States would not take the step they seem about to take. Could anything be more utterly absurd? The conditions that brought about this change of policy in the United States would undoubtedly have been worse under reciprocity, if the reciprocity had any effect at all. And hon. gentlemen say that if the conditions had been worse the remedy would have been postponed! Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is to be the policy of the United States, they have a right to choose their path. If they so direct their steps, then it will be for Canada, under the conditions that will be forced upon us, to determine what is our course, having regard to the interests of Canada and to the interests of Canada alone.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 109, for the relief of John Edward Kelly.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 110, for the relief of Annie Belle Westbeare.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 111, for the relief of Christina Wilson Stephens.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 112, for the relief of Alice Andrews.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 113, for the relief of Esther Annie Vanzant.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 114, for the relief of Werden Grant Parker.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 115, for the relief of James Edward Nixon.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 123, for the relief of Joseph Sorton.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 124, for the relief of Gladys Frances Annie Wheeler Bernard.—Mr. McQuarrie.

Bill No. 125, for the relief of William Carr.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 126, for the relief of Ida Florence Keenan.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 127, for the relief of Gertrude May Turner.—Mr. Ross.

Bill No. 128, for the relief of James Henry Bigrow.—Mr. Harrison.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Emelina Dunsmore.—Mr. Morphy.

Bill No. 131, for the relief of Alfred William Wells.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 133, for the relief of Elizabeth Gertrude Conner.—Mr. Copp.

Bill No. 134, for the relief of Louise Sullivan.—Mr. McMaster.

Bill No. 142, for the relief of Lily Appleton.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 143, for the relief of Harry Hirshenbain.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 144, for the relief of Percy Christopher Paul.—Mr. Harrison.

Bill No. 145, for the relief of John Graham.—Mr. Smith.

Bill No. 132, respecting the Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

LA COMPAGNIE DE TELEPHONE QUEBEC UNION ELECTRIQUE

Bill No. 38 to incorporate La Compagnie de Telephone Quebec Union Electrique (The Quebec Union Electric Telephone Company). Mr. Power, considered in committee and reported.

On the motion of Mr. Copp for the third reading:

Mr. BELAND: What is this Bill, may I ask, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a telephone Bill.

Mr. BELAND: It never went into committee.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Oh yes, it was read by the Chairman clause by clause.

Mr. SPEAKER: This Bill has been reported from Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BELAND: When did it pass the committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: To-night.

Mr. BELAND: The clauses were not called.

Mr. MORPHY: Oh yes, they were.

Mr. BELAND: They were not read.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I was present this evening when the clauses were called, and they were all called.

An hon. MEMBER: But not read.

Mr. BELAND: They were not read.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): All the clauses were not read, but all the headings were read.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is too late now to make objection to the method in which the Bill proceeded in committee. The fact is I have a report from Committee of the Whole that this Bill has been passed, and we are now concerned with the third reading. If the hon. member desires to debate the third reading, it is competent for him to do so; otherwise the third reading will have to take place.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would it be in order to move that we postpone the third reading until the hon. member who has introduced the Bill is present?

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume there is no objection to allowing the third reading to stand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Speaker, if I might be allowed as chairman of the Railway Committee, this Bill has been thoroughly discussed in the Railway Committee, having taken up several days of the time of the members of that committee. I understand that Mr. Power is now—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Quebec South is in hospital and not likely to be out for several days.

Mr. SPEAKER: The third reading will stand.

WESTERN DOMINION RAILWAY COMPANY

On motion of Mr. H. B. Morphy (North Perth) the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 44 respecting the Western Dominion Railway Company was read the first and second times and concurred in.

THE BUDGET

Debate resumed on the annual statement presented by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. L. T. PACAUD (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) who preceded me this afternoon will not, I am sure, find me discourteous if I do not follow him closely in the remarks which he uttered. He has given to this House as leader of the Government, with all the authority that goes with the title, his views on the important issues now before the country. May I be permitted, Sir, in return, as a private member of this House, to express my own views on these important questions, which, I add immediately, differ materially from the views held by the right hon. gentleman?

Were I tempted to go a little further to search for a reason to justify my course I would find it in the very speech of the right hon. gentleman. I followed him this afternoon closely and attentively, and I noticed that for the greater portion of the time he cited quotations from the speeches of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—which were the most eloquent parts of his own address—and then he directed his attention to the progressive party to settle with them a quarrel —whether it be real or imaginary I do not know—on fiscal matters. But, Sir, important as may be this quarrel, eloquent as may have been that portion of the right hon. gentleman's remarks embodying the quotations from the speeches of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, delivered twenty years ago, for my part I submit—and I feel, that this is the view which the people will take that more important than all these are the problems which face Canada to-day, problems which are left unsolved as the result of the lack of decision, lack of foresight and lack of policy on the part of this present Government.

The Budget delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, (Sir Henry Drayton) has brought once more to our attention, in a form far less encouraging than might have been expected, the very serious condition of our national finances—a condition which confronts every citizen of this Dominion. Well founded, Sir, as may be our optimism concerning the recuperative powers of our country, having in mind, as we do, the wealth and variety of its immense resources coupled with the stirring qualities of its people, we cannot, nevertheless refrain from a justifiable feeling of anxiety and of bewilderment when we stop to realize the perilous position in which we find ourselves to-day, with the evident weakness of this Government, constituted as it is, to cope with problems of such magnitude.

To have, Sir, a true appreciation of the very great importance of this debate, it is well to recall what we all know, that Budgets in this House are not distinct entities independent of each other, financial statements which can be easily discarded and forgotten so soon as a vote is taken upon them in the House. They are, on the contrary, linked together, interwoven one with the other, to such an extent that the deficit which marks his year's Budget will survive this passing parliamentary discussion and flow into Budgets that are to follow, adding to our already enormous public debt and rendering still more difficult and more remote a final adjustment of our public finances. Does not this elementary truth, Sir, in view of the precarious position in which we find ourselves to-day, justify our asserting that the very future of this Dominion depends on the decisions we take to-day, on the policies which we may adopt and follow, on the strength or weakness of the Government which will be called upon to execute the will of the Canadian people? What we affirm at the very outset is that this Government has not a sufficiently clear mandate to justify its undertaking such a grave responsibility. What we affirm is that if we are to make any headway in the great work of national reconstruction which lies ahead of us and which has been held too long in abeyance, we cannot forget, Sir, that our first task, a task which supersedes all others is to clear our decks for action, to open up a new chapter in our national history, and to put in office a strong Government, fresh from a popular victory, with a clear mandate from the Canadian people to put in force the policies—but only the policies—which have been discussed and accepted by the Canadian people.

Sir, the strength of a government is not to be tested only by the character and the talents of the men who compose it. Efficient and able as may be some of those who to-day occupy Government benches, they appear to the people as usurpers of power. We claim, Sir, that the indignation and the anger which the inefficiency of this Administration, their political methods and their policies, have aroused throughout the country have had their origin primarily in the fact that the Government have lost all control of the people; that they are no longer in touch with the people. Their holding office against all precedents and in contradiction of their own solemn pledges is a direct challenge to the people to exercise their right to choose their own representatives and their own government. But, Mr. Speaker, in this direction the Government refuse to move. Barricaded within the walls of the old stronghold of Toryism, fearing the storm and unable to muster sufficient strength and courage to face the popular will, they prefer to remain in shelter, to cling to office and to impose on an unwilling people Tory rule and Tory methods of government.

The speech of the Finance Minister brings home to us still more forcibly the disastrous consequences to the country of this attitude, both selfish and mercenary. Let us observe, Sir, the larger aspects and considerations which impress us with the greatest force. We are called upon to raise annually about $500,000,000 by way of taxation in order that we may meet our various obligations—the interest on our public debt of $2,275,000,000, growing greater year by year through deficits which mark so regularly and so conspicuously the Budgets of the Finance Minister; the payment of our pensions; the extending of assistance to our disabled soldiers, and, in general, the defraying of the expenses of administration. But, Sir, above all, we are required to pay for the expensive luxury of keeping in power a government which has never been surpassed by any other administration for its waste, for its extravagance, and for its political blunders. This we can proclaim without fear of contradiction: the Government cannot escape its responsibility for having brought about in large measure, through their methods al administration, the conditions which to-day confront the Canadian people. Laying aside all expenditures prudently and honestly made for the carrying on of the great war, in respect of which never will rhere be a word of condemnation uttered by me, we still have Sir, the nefarious record of a government which during the last ten years has accumulated scandal upon scandal, each of which has been thoroughly sifted to the bottom and exposed to the people of Canada; which has drained the public treasury, and which has instituted a shipbuilding venture and a disastrous railway policy—its two most recent exploits.

Not only have this Government largely brought about these conditions under which we now live, but they have aggravated them still more, day in and day out, through their lack of discretion, lack of policy and lack of decision. We see ahead of us, unless we immediately change our course, the unhappy prospect of having to face a long and tedious line of enormous deficits with more and more taxation rapidly and swiftly following upon their track. What the people of Canada are demanding to-day above all is a reduction of our public debt. England has reduced her public debt this year by £156,000,000. Can Canada, a chip off the old block, do as well? What the people of Canada are demanding to-day is the wiping out of our annual deficit, the strengthening by that means of our national credit, a vigorous policy of immigration to help the Government of this country and to lower our per capita burden of debt and taxation, a recognition of the ever-increasing necessity for stimulating production in all lines of activity, and, above all, the opening of new avenues, new opportunities, for example, the development of our great national resources to help the many thousands of unemployed who are roaming the streets of our cities at the very moment that I am addressing this House. If the pursuance of such a policy should be our aim and purpose, should we not ask ourselves what are the conditions necessary to attain this ultimate success?

There is one word that comes naturally to my lips, a word that should be the very key-note of Government policy to-day, a word that has been dealt with somewhat too lightly by members of this Government. I mean the simple word "economy" in our public expenditures, without which economy all our hopes of rapid recovery would be quickly shattered. By economy,—retrenchment,—I do not mean the reduction here and there of a few thousands of dollars, as that would mean very little in the face of our present huge deficit. What I mean by economy—retrenchment as a policy—is the example of economy that a Government should give to the people, by the firm determination, that in all expenditures of public money there should be elimination even of those expenditures which in ordinary times might be considered legitimate, but which should be discarded to-day or deferred at all costs. Why? The better to relieve the taxpayers of Canada.

To prove how far this Government has drifted from this safe and sound course, to prove how little importance they seem to attach to this important phase of our economic situation, let me recall to the House two illustrations of their political methods, which have come to our notice during the course of the present session. On the one hand, we had a vote of $8,000,000 for the shipbuilding programme of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne). On the other, we had a call from the Government to vote $71,000,000 of interim supply, representing one-sixth of the total Estimates. In the first place, the Opposition fought for information which the minister refused to give. In the second place, the Opposition requested that, faithful to tradition, faithful to the best procedure in this House, the leaders of both parties should get together, so that in the expenditures of such large appropriations of money, the best interests of Canada should be maintained and safeguarded. What was the result? The better to shut out debate, to eliminate all danger of having to give the information which was sought of them, the Government immediately imposed the closure, making of this Parliament a mere tool of the Government, handing to the few men who happen to be ministers of the Crown to-day, $80,000,000 of the people's money without proper or full discussion by the representatives of the people. To pass their Estimates with the least resistance, the Government uses a double weapon; they sharply curtail discussion through closure, and they rely on all-night sittings of the House, the better to achieve the end which they have in view. This high-handed method of procedure, to my mind, at least, is no mere parliamentary incident which can be easily discarded and forgotten. It is the sapping, at its very basis, of the first function of a parliament, the control of the purse, the control of the expenditure of the people's money.

May I show this House, by an example, the great benefits that may be derived when this control of Parliament of these expenditures of the public money is maintained, respected and safeguarded by the Government? Let us turn to France. Nobody in this House would like to minimize the record of France, whether it be in time of peace or in time of war. Her strength lies in her patriotism—patriotism that places country ever before party. Let us take her Budget of 1921. It will be to us a lesson which it would be well for us never to forget. The Finance Minister of France was confronted with the figures presented to him by the various departments of the French Government. He, unhesitatingly, began his work of elimination. Estimates comprising many millions of francs were cut out, and he confidently presented to the French Parliament his revised esti mates for their perusal and consideration. What happened? The two Budget commissions of both branches of the French Parliament, with the freedom of action that was denied to us in this House under the circumstances which I related, began in turn to scrutinize the whole range of national expenditure, and as a result of their labours—labours unhampered as were ours in this House—there was a reduction in their estimates of three billion francs, accepted by the French Parliament, by the French Government and by the French people. Does this example not show us the dangerous course that we have been following? Does it not show what we have never ceased to claim that it is high time to return to constitutional practice, to put aside these autocratic methods of government which are flourishing to-day as they have never flourished before in the history of this country? Is it not fair to ask that if the Government had given this Parliament the same freedom in the voting of large appropriations of money—a freedom that ought to be guaranteed by our constitution, a freedom for which our soldiers fought and for which 60,000 are now lying in France to protest against the autocracy of Germany—should we not, like France, have been able to reduce our Estimates by many millions of dollars, and would not that have been a benefit to the taxpayers of Canada?

There is another question intimately connected with retrenchment and economy. Every member of this House will agree with me, I am sure, as to the necessity of stimulating production in every branch of industry as a means, if for no other reason, of improving our present financial position. But, Sir, to achieve this end, to reach the results which we have in view, is it not evident that every producer in Canada, if you wish him to respond to this call, should at least feel and know that no partiality will be displayed to any one section of the community to the detriment of any other section, but that all the producers of Canada will be placed on the same footing with equal opportunities.

Sir, let us watch this Government. Let us see to what extent they measure up to this standard without which their policy becomes a mere sham and an outrageous mockery. They start off on a nation-wide campaign, with a great flourish of trumpets, to instil into the hearts and minds of Canadians the necessity for work, and more work, and they couple with that advice a warning to economize—something which the Government never practice themselves—as the one and only means of improving conditions in Canada. The patriotism of the Canadian people, so severely put to the test during the years of high deeds and noble sacrifices, again asserted itself in unmistakable tones. They took the Government at their word and responded loyally to their appeals. The Government, recognizing that production without markets in which to dispose of your products would be like a body without a soul, launched out into their new policy of granting loans and credits to foreign countries. But here, Sir, the scene changes. We find that this Government, appearing to us as preaching giants, are in reality but pigmies at work.

May I illustrate by an example that I have in mind? Let us take the credit of $25,000,000 to Belgium. I do not wish to discuss the question of the advisability or otherwise of this Government granting credits to foreign countries. That is a question to my mind intimately connected with the tariff, and would draw me away from the only point I wish to make. I might say, however, that in my view it might be a dangerous form of helping the producer, because you might hurt very considerably the whole body of consumers unless you lowered the duties on the articles affected by such credits; but whether this view be right or wrong, once the Government had decided on such a policy, what I do affirm is that there was no country in the world in which Canada could have found greater security than Belgium, a nation to which the whole allied world owes to-day such a deep debt of gratitude. We have in Belgium, Mr. Speaker, a manufacturing country, which did not need our manufacturers' goods, but wished to avail herself of this loan to secure our Canadian hard wheat. What did this Government do? They made an agreement dated March 21, 1919, by which only one-fourth of this loan to Belgium could be available for the purchase of food stuffs, thus forcing the Belgium Government against their will to purchase manufactured goods and raw materials of manufacture to the extent of four-fifths of the entire loan. What was the result? Just what was to be expected. With the exception of $1,500,000—$277,000 in food stuffs, $185,000 of which was for bacon, an article of food which made a name for itself during the war, and the balance for manufactured goods and raw materials—the credit was cancelled and the Belgium Government had to go to American bankers to secure our Canadian wheat, which they wanted to get from Canada, but which they could not get in Canada due to the partiality exercised by this Government in enforcing on a manufacturing country this agreement whereby four-fifths of the loan had to be used for the purchase of manufactured products or raw materials. To throw more light on this subject, and to establish more clearly the case that I have in view, may I be permitted to read a letter which I have received from a correspondent in the West:

REGINA, March 1, 1921.

Dear Mr. PACAUD,

I beg to inform you that I have just returned from an extensive trip in Europe. As you know I have been interested for the last ten years in grain growing in Saskatchewan, and took great pains whilst in Belgium to find out about the market conditions and possibilities for the placing of our Canadian wheat in Belgium.

Unfortunately, I have found out that millions of bushels of Canadian hard wheat have been bought in the United States because no credit could be obtained from our Government in Canada, the $25,000,000 credit which had been granted to Belgium only being available for the purchase of manufactured goods, which were not needed in an industrial country. To-day on account of lack of credit in Canada the Belgian Government is unable to fill its requirements in Canada, and would at present place its orders here, which amounts to, between 20,000 and 30,000 tons monthly, if credit could be obtained.

I believe it would be to the advantage of the whole of Canada, to do anything possible in this line, in order to secure that market and it is with that object in view that I have exposed this situation.

I hold this information from high authorities in Belgium and would apreciate it if you kept me posted by wire upon any development in this line, to enable me to inform my friends in Belgium.

I hereby authorize you to make use of this letter whenever required.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) G. POOTMANS.

In this letter we have not only the evidence of partiality, not only an indication of the enormous commissions made by foreign bankers which should have gone into the pockets of our Canadian farmers, but we note above all what we have never ceased to proclaim, that this Government is nothing more or less than the willing instrument of a few citizens of Canada who have contributed to their political success and who are to-day reaping their reward and inspiring and directing the policies of the Government. This Government is to-day on trial before the people of Canada. Its whole record since 1911 is before the people of this country, and the Government is tottering to its fall. We trust that the day of reckoning is not very far distant, and we await with confidence, when that day does come, the verdict of our fellow countrymen.

Before concluding, I desire to say a word on the amendment presented to the House by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). That amendment meets with my approval because it asserts the principle of Liberalism on fiscal matters. It instantaneously brings before my eyes a double picture: On one side, the present fiscal policy of the Government, which is drawing the country to the verge of bankruptcy, and, on the other side, the picture of the Liberal policy inaugurated in 1896 and kept in force for fifteen years, the policy that brought to the citizens of this country happiness and prosperity, and created harmony between province and province, and between race and race,—that harmony which, in my opinion, is needed to instil into the hearts and minds of all Canadians the one thought that we should all have, namely, the common good of our common country.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): The speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), this afternoon so clearly answered all the arguments that have been, and can be, advanced by the Opposition that I hardly think it necessary to make any reply to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Pacaud). His arguments were all answered in anticipation. Now, this House listened with more than ordinary interest to the Budget speech delivered on Monday, and the House and the country are both taking an increasing interest in budget speeches. The present Budget speech, I think, was awaited with more than ordinary interest by the country at large, in view of the investigations made by the Tariff Commission which, it was expected, would result in some revision of the tariff. During the past few months there has been a very decided change in public opinion on this question, and the feeling has been rapidly growing that the time is most inopportune for any drastic changes in our customs duties. I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), in his investigations during his tour across the country came to the same conclusion, and I wish to congratulate him on his masterful presentation of the financial affairs of the country. May I also compliment him on the success he has had during the past year in making revenue and expenditure meet.

We have a huge debt of $2,350,000,000, largely incurred in the defence of the country, and I am sure that every citizen will agree that the safety of Canada is well worth the expenditure of that money. While we do regret the fact that our 9 p.m. debt is so tremendous, still I do not believe any one would criticise the expenditures that were necessary for our participation in the war. Every citizen of this country shares equally in the blessings of peace and liberty, purchased by the blood of our sons and the money which we spent, and every citizen therefore owes it to the state cheerfully to shoulder his fair share of the burdens that come to us after having won the war. We need a revenue many times greater than was necessary in pre-war days, and I think this fact is readily conceded by both sides of the House. The only question in dispute is as regards the method by which we should raise that revenue. The ordinary citizen will defend his pocket almost as fiercely as he would his life, and any injustice in the matter of taxation, whether fancied or real, is a cause of resentment and dissatisfaction. But the people of this country, if they are properly informed, are perfectly willing to pay their taxes, and if the country is to remain solvent, it must pay its debts. Now, the Government has but one way of raising money, that is, by means of taxes from the people themselves. One of the essentials of taxation is that the method be as simple as possible, in order that the average citizen may be made fully to realize his duty and to appreciate his personal responsibility to the country's obligations.

The task of raising revenue for this country in pre-war days was a very simple one compared with the same task to-day. If the Minister of Finance were required to raise to-day, as in 1897, only $42,000,000, he would consider it a holiday. He would attend to the matter before breakfast and go golfing in the afternoon, leaving the details of such a Budget as that of 1897 to his office boy. The growth of Canada's expenditures since the year 1867 has been steady, and to show what it is to-day, as compared with former periods, I shall give the figures at the end of each decennial period.

Year	Form of Expenditure		Total Expenditure
1868			$ 14,071,000
1877			32,507,000
1887			41,504,000
1897			42,972,000
1913			144,556,000
1917	Ordinary.	$191,815,000
	War	306,488,000	498,303,000
1920	Ordinary.	397,843,000
	War	345,920,000	743,763,000

Thus it will be seen that the expenditure of 1920 was five times as great as that of 1913, and seventeen times as great as that of 1897, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was Minister of Finance. This shows a huge increase in public expenditure since Confederation, and it demonstrates the increasing difficulties which the Minister of Finance to-day encounters in raising the necessary revenue. The sum of $42,000,000 in 1897, and $144,000,000 in 1913 look small compared with $743,000,000 in 1920. In view of these facts, every citizen in the country should cheerfully do his best to help the Minister of Finance to cope with the difficulties of the situation. The minister's task is a stupendous one which requires a big man, and I compliment the country on having the right man in the right place.

The peak has been safely passed; Canada is able to meet all her obligations, and is in better financial position to-day than most of the Allied powers. We can look forward to a material decrease in our annual expenditures, but our funded debt will remain to remind us of the strenuous years through which we have passed. Although our expenditure has increased in such measure since 1867 we have grown in other ways to meet it, and this shows the wonderful progress and the indomitable spirit of the Canadian people. In this regard we emulate the spirit of our soldiers, their prowess, their courage and their self-reliance which enabled them to fill the breach at the battle of Ypres and saved the day for the civilized powers.

A short glimpse of our increase in trade and commerce since 1867 is very interesting. I will give it in decades.

Year	Total Trade Exports & Imports	Increase amount	Increase per cent
1868.....	$119,500,000
1878.....	169,500,000	$50,000,000	42
1888.....	190,500,000	21,000,000	12
1898.....	286,000,000	96,000,000	50
1908.....	615,000,000	329,000,000	115
1918.....	2,548,000,000	1,633,000,000	312

Taking the whole period from 1867 to 1920 the increase was $119,500,000 to $2,351,000,000, an increase of 2,000 per cent. Taking the period from 1900 to 1920, the first twenty years of the present century, our trade increased 600 per cent. Now when we compare these increases with the trade growth of our two most progressive competitors in the commercial world, England and the United States, we find we make a very favourable showing. As I have already mentioned Canada's increase of trade in the first twenty years of this century was 600 per cent. In the same period England had increased 200 per cent , and the United States 473 per cent. Now with regard to England that comparison is possibly not quite fair, because England was at war and her trade and commerce was very much interfered with; but if we take Canada and the United States the comparison is really against the neighbouring republic because they had a better opportunity to progress. They were three years later in entering the war than the Dominion of Canada, and yet during that period we have a very comfortable margin of 121 per cent of increase during the first period of the twentieth century. If we compare Canada and the United States for the whole period from confederation to the present time, when the two countries were working under similar conditions, we find that we have still a very confortable lead. From 1868 to 1920 the increase of trade in Canada amounted to 2,000 per cent; during the same period the increase of trade in United States, was 1,700 per cent. We therefore lead them in this respect also by 300 per cent. Surely the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who tried to establish the other day that our trade was not increasing to as great a degree as that of these other nations can hardly get over those figures. If he looks up the Canadian Almanac he will find the figures substantially correct; he will also find them in the census returns for the Dominion of Canada.

Now let us take Canadian manufactures during the same period. We find that in 1871 we had capital invested to the amount of $77,964,000. In 1881 the capital invested amounted to $164,957,000, an increase of 111 per cent. In 1891 the capital invested amounted to $331,635,000, an increase of 101 per cent. In 1901 it amounted to $446,916,000, an increase of 34 per cent. In 1911 it had become $1,247,000,000, an increase of 179.15 per cent; while in 1917 it had become $2,786,000,000, an increase of 123 per cent. In 1900 there were 14,650 manufacturers in Canada. In 1917 the number had grown to 34,392, a good deal more than an increase of 100 per cent. These figures surely demonstrate that Canada has been progressing since Confederation to a very marked degree.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we examine our increases in population since Confederation, and compare them with the same two countries, we find that our showing is very favourable. The comparison is set forth in the following figures:

	Population 1861	1901	Increase per cent
Canada.....	3,090,000	5,371,000	73%
England.....	28,907,000	41,450,000	30%
United-States.	38,558,000	75,994,000	97%

This will show that the whole period since 1861 Canada has maintained her position in growth of population with these two countries.

You have frequently heard the expression that the nineteenth century belonged to the United States but the twentieth century would belong to Canada. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that in the first decade of this century Canada has fulfilled that prophecy.

Comparing the population of these same countries between 1901 and 1911, we find:

	1911
Canada,	7,206,000, an increase in 10 years of 34.17%.
England,	45,221,000, an increase in 10 years of 8.7%.
United States,	91,972,000, an increase in 10 years of 21. %.

This shows that in the first ten years of this century Canada leads the United States in increase of population by 13 per cent. According to the report of the census commissioners of 1911, our increase of 34.17 per cent was the largest percentage of increase in population of any country in the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am endeavouring to show that our increase in trade and the important increase in the number of manufacturing concerns, the capital invested and the value of the output was far in excess of our growth in population and cannot be ascribed to that source.

As I have shown, our trade increased 2,000 per cent since 1868 while the manufacturing industry increased from a few industries in 1867 and a capital of $77,000,000 in 1871 to the respectable showing of 34,392 concerns, having a capital of $2,786,649,000 in 1917. The fact that our population increased during the same period by 101 per cent clearly shows that we must look to other causes than the increase in population for an explanation of the rapid rise of Canada in the economic and industrial world. It is not a question of mere numbers.

We may very reasonably, I think, find some of the causes in the country itself. There are several factors, to my mind, that can reasonably be regarded as contributory causes of our growth,—first, the country itself; second, the character of the people; third, our fiscal policy and fourth, the extraordinary events of the last six years.

Canada of course is the greatest factor in our growth. Without natural resources to produce wealth no people could progress. You cannot trade with other nations unless you have something they need and want. Canada has the territory, the soil, the natural resources, the raw material, the products of which other people want and in that respect she is the richest nation, per capita, in the world.

Our people are energetic, self-reliant, and progressive and are awakening to a sense of nationhood. The fiscal policy pursued since 1878 has done much to develop that sentiment. It has fostered our manufacturing industries, stimulated agriculture and produced a spirit of commercial independence and self-reliance that is beginning to give results—indeed, has given results.

The Great War with its imperative demands for extraordinary effort to meet the exigencies of a perilous situation spurred our people to superhuman efforts in all lines of industry that had been established largely through the protective policy pursued during the last forty-three years. Germany was preparing during all that time for the Great War and apparently Canada was too—the one intentionally the other unconciously.

Had our agricultural and manufacturing industries not been fostered our war effort, of which we are so justly proud, would have been impossible. Our manufacturing plants were soon changed to a war basis for the making of munitions and our agricultural industry was stimulated to make up the deficiency in food due to wastage and lessened production in other lands. We were thus enabled to take advantage of the extraordinary world conditions, and our trade increased enormously. With the impetus given and the prestige acheived we have been able to increase our trade and advance our position in the world to a very marked degree. Canada has all the elements of greatness in a superlative degree. We have a vast extent of territory to be settled by immigrants from the British Isles and the teeming centres of Europe. I am not in sympathy with those who would shut our doors in the face of the newcomer. Population doubled in the next quarter of a century is the solution for our national debt and our railway problem. I believe in stimulating immigration from the British Isles and northern Europe. I believe in admitting only those who are physically fit and mentally sound so far as a rigid medical examination at the ports of entry can ascertain. I believe in having a standard of education for the immigrant before giving him full citizenship rights, and I would not give him those rights until he had resided here for five or ten years. Our climatic conditions are such that they will attract the most virile races from northern Europe, and I feel every confidence that we can develop on this part of the North American continent a nation that will be able to hold its own with the best in the world.

So far as the future of Canada is concerned, I am a consistent full time optimist. We have a great variety of natural resources to be conserved for future generations of Canadians. I believe that our raw materials should be manufactured here in order that we may be able to build up a self-sustaining independent nation, so far as it is possible to be independent having regard to our international obligations. I would not carry out any selfish policy in this regard. I believe that we cannot shut ourselves off from the rest of the world, and that we should have due regard for the needs of civilization. We have transportation facilities furnished by nature which reach to the very centre of the Dominion. The Hudson bay and our Great Lakes, assisted by engineering skill, will some day settle the question of getting the produce from our great Prairie Provinces cheaply and expeditiously to the markets of the world. Our natural resources in land, forest, stream and mine are so multifarious that they lend themselves to all kinds of human effort, and they should be developed as a whole the one assisting the other. A one-sided development would be fatal. The manufacturing industry and agriculture should go together. To be independently great, a country must be able to minister to the wants of its people, not only with regard to the necessities of life but also the comforts of life, and this Canada will be able to do if our natural resources are developed on truly progressive lines. This is one of the lessons taught us by the great war. When we were cut off from the manufactured products of Europe we realized that we were using many manufactured articles which we could produce at home. Although our basic industry is agriculture—and it should be stimulated to its highest perfection— we should not lose sight of the fact that a prosperous agricultural community depends upon the growth of our manufacturing industries to absorb the products of its soil and minister to its wants. We should also remember that prosperous manufacturing industries depend on the prosperity of the agricultural community. Although foreign market is absolutely necessary for our surplus products, the home market is indispensable. It is always here, and it is regulated by supply and demand. And I might say that I am not in favour of Government control of prices. The ill-fated Board of Commerce in its short career—and it was none too short—demonstrated absolutely the futility of regulating prices by Government control. Government control of the prices of selected commodities, while others are left free, is an abuse of authority and creates discontent. I believe the Board of Commerce will not be revived, and I hope that it will not be. These are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why Canada has kept pace with other countries and maintained and improved her position, and they are the reasons which will cause us to forge ahead in the future, if we are wise enough to abstain from the free trade heresies of the Opposition.

With regard to protection, that is the policy which I believe will make us independent. I am not a high protectionist; I believe in moderate protection which, as the Prime Minister has said, will enable our industries to maintain their position and not be put out of business by foreign concerns. The fact that this policy has been kept in force by both the great parties while they have been in office since 1878 ought to be evidence to any person that it is the best policy for Canada. During that time it has been endorsed by the people every five years, showing that the majority of the electorate are in favour of a protective policy. But as experience has not convinced some members opposite, I am going to give a few extracts from speeches of prominent Liberals in years gone by, who in certain measure at all events were in favour of protection. In looking for some of these extracts I naturally went back to the time when the now famous National Policy was introduced. I read some of the speeches made between 1876 and 1879, and curiously enough in a speech delivered by the late Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright I came upon a passage which I consider a very good argument in favour of protection, although he gave it as an argument in opposition to it. This passage will be found at page 446 of Hansard of 1879. It was delivered by Sir Richard Cartwright in reply to the Budget speech of the late Sir Leonard Tilley in the first Parliament after the initiation of the National Policy. Sir Richard said:

> This tariff assuredly cannot stand.

In the light of forty-three years' experience hon. members opposite will be able to see how great a prophet Sir Richard Cartwright was. He continues:

Manufacturers will obtain no permanent relief from it.

That, too, in the light of forty-three years' experience indicates again what kind of a prophet Sir Richard was. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not agree with that. They have been saying for a number of years, particularly the years when they were in opposition, that the manufacturers were receiving too much permanent relief from the tariff. They have been talking a great deal about the "big interests," and I notice the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Pacaud) also gave them his attention. It is a notable fact that hon. members opposite had nothing to say about the big interests when they were in power. Evidently it makes quite a difference whether they are in opposition or in power. Sir Richard continues:

For one, two or three years they—the manufacturers—may succeed in making considerable profit out of the operations of the tariff, but in the end they will find that it was the greatest misfortune to encourage the undue home competition which will inevitably take the place of the foreign competition of which they complain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that that is a very good argument in favour of protection. In fact, it was the reason given by the late Sir John Macdonald for the introduction of the National Policy. He claimed, as members on this side of the House still claim, that protection would bring the foreign manufacturers to Canada and induce them to establish their plants here, which would give employment to our artisans and create a market for our farm products. That is exactly what has been done in the past and what it is claimed will be done to-day, and yet Sir Richard Cartwright gave it as an argument against protection. Surely, he was in error when he said that undue competition created at home would put our manufacturers out of business. I should say that any manufacturing concern, which in the same country and under the same conditions, could not compete with its neighbour, should go out of business; there is something wrong with it. Either there is inefficient management, or they are turning out an inferior product, one which the people will not buy.

Sir Richard Cartwright certainly was no protectionist. In order that hon. gentlemen may not think he was a protectionist I will read to you what he said in 1890.

[Mr. Anderson.]

Sir Richard Cartwright was afterwards Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said:

I stand by the declaration I have made that protection is nothing more than deliberate, legalized and organized robbery.

That shows that Sir Richard Cartwright was no protectionist. On page 110 of Hansard of 1876 the Hon. Mr. Paterson made certain remarks with regard to protection. Hon. gentlemen know who Mr. Paterson was; I believe he was in the Cabinet formed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896 and he it was who, with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, negotiated the Reciprocity Pact in 1911. Mr. Paterson said:

I am not a protectionist. . . . but I must admit I am in favour of a defensive policy.

That is very interesting at this time, when it is obvious that we should initiate a defensive policy against the principles enunciated by the Young Bill which has been introduced into the House of Representatives in the United States, embodying the policy of increasing the tariff duties against Canada. I assume that if the Hon. Mr. Paterson were alive to-day he would advocate an increase in our tariff duties. When in 1876 he made the statement to which I have referred, Canada was in the midst of the most serious trade depression which she has ever experienced. So great was it that Parliament gave it special consideration, and in 1875 a resolution was introduced into the House and a committee appointed "to inquire into the causes of the present depression in the manufacturing, mining, commercial, shipping, lumbering, and fishing interests." The report of that committee can be found in the journals of the House for the session of 1876. In that report it was stated that "the causes of the depression are quite beyond legislative control in this country." Sir Richard Cartwright, although in favour of a defensive policy, sat in the House at that time, with the report of that committee before him, and made no effort in a legislative way to remove the trade depression in Canada. At that time the farmers were receiving about eight cents a dozen for their eggs and ten cents a pound for their butter. But Mr. Paterson continued, page 111 of Hansard of 1876, as follows:

The Administration should protect our agricultural interests. . . . The other year the Finance Minister in revising the tariff gave some encouragement to an industry which we never had before. The result was that a thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany were literally transported, by the change in the tariff, to Canada and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit.

Surely that is a splendid argument in favour of protection. The probability of bringing to this country from Germany a whole manufacturing industry, with its employees, their wives and families—perhaps five thousand people in all—creating a market for our home produce and not increasing the price of the article in question, is the strongest argument you could use in favour of protection.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that manufactures which are suited to the country, in respect of which we have the raw material to be turned into the finished product, should be protected. It is in our own interests that these manufactures should be protected. Protection is of use to the manufacturer, but unless it can be proved that it is of use to the whole country as well it is untenable as a policy. I do not support protection simply in the interests of the manufacturers; I support it in the interests of the whole country, those of the farming community included. It certainly can be established that the farming interests of this country are in favour of protection. I know that the farmers in my own county, whether engaged in mixed farming, fruit growing, or dairying, are largely in favour of protection. Those engaged in the fruit growing industry are, I think, without exception, in favour of protection. I have had many conferences with them, and they have so expressed themselves. The experience of the Tariff Commission as it passed through the farming communities certainly goes to show that the farmers are alive to the benefits and advantages of protection.

Now, in 1854 Canada had a reciprocity treaty with the United States. It was to operate for a period of ten years and was renewable, but could be abrogated by either party giving one year's notice. From 1861 to 1864 the United States was in the throes of civil war, and in 1864 they notified Canada that they intended to abrogate that treaty, which they did in January, 1865. The reasons which they put forth for abrogating the treaty can be found in the Congressional Globe of 1863; they were presented during the course of the debates that took place in the House of Representatives of the United States by several members who spoke to the resolution in favour of the abrogation of the treaty. One of the first reasons given for the abrogation of the treaty was that the United States needed more revenue to meet the excessive cost of the war, and in order that they might be able to meet the extraordinary expenses and the great need for revenue, the duties which had been taken away by the reciprocity treaty should be restored. Surely that argument suits Canada to-day. We have recently emerged victorious from a great war. We have a great expenditure, a large debt to meet, a large revenue to raise; consequently we need the taxes and we need the revenue. If in 1865 the United States, with 40,000,000 people, needed protection against a country of three and one half millions—which was the population of Canada at that time—surely in 1921 the people of Canada, numbering eight millions, need protection against a people of 110,000,000. We are in a worse position to-day than the United States was in 1865; and yet that was the attitude they took.

The second reason given by the American Congress for the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty was that they wanted to check the flow of imports and increase their own exports in order that the American dollar might be brought back to pre-war value as soon as possible. Surely that argument is applicable to Canada's position to-day. Exchange was running high against the United States in 1865; I believe the value of their dollar depreciated to about 60 cents—worse than ours at the present time. Accordingly, the means they adopted to bring their dollar back to its pre-war value was to raise their tariff against imports, thus excluding imports and increasing the revenue. Exchange is running high against us to-day; we need to check the flow of imports into Canada.

The other reason given by the Americans was that they considered it a wise policy and in the interests of the country that they should take every means to build up American industries in order to keep American labour and American money in their own country and thus provide a market for the production of their farmers and employment for their people. That is another argument which applies to Canada to-day. We need to practise the same policy; we need to build up our manufacturing industries, to have a market for our farm produce and to keep our people at home.

I submit that members of the Opposition who vote for the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) are necessarily supporting the view that we can get along with less revenue. The amendment sets forth no means of furnishing the revenue which would be taken away through the removal of customs duties. The hon. leader of the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar) says that he would put a tax on land values throughout Canada and thus make up the loss in revenue occasioned by the reduction in duties. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) fails to state by what means he would make up that loss.

I have mentioned casually the home market, and I believe the home market is indispensable to the Canadian farmer. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) would do away with our home market; he would practically put it out of existence for the Canadian farmer by introducing free trade. The other day he mentioned that he would remove the tariff duty on fruit and that, by that means, he would assist in paying the deficit on the Canadian National Railways. He would aid the Canadian National Railways by having them bring in the strawberry in the spring and take back the juicy grape in the fall. The hon. member for Red Deer would actually ask the fruit growers of the Dominion of Canada to pay the deficit on our National Railways. I think the hon. gentleman would not be well received if he preached that doctrine in the fruit-growing sections anywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If that policy were brought into effect, the fruit-growing sections of the Maritime Provinces, Ontario and British Columbia would be ruined. The hon. member's vision of the extent of this country is limited by the horizon which is revealed to him as he looks across the undulating prairies, and in that way he views the fruit sections of this country. The home market was indispensable in the opinion of John Charlton who, in 1876, said, as reported on page 313 of Hansard of that year:

> I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be salable if the market were 3,000 miles away.

Surely, that is good argument in favour of the home market. The constituency which I represent is interested in mixed farming and fruit-growing. The fruit-growing industry is in close proximity to our Ontario cities. Fruit, especially small fruit, is a perishable product and it must be marketable quickly to ensure full returns. Most of it is sold in the cities of Hamilton, Toronto or Montreal, and without these cities the fruit business would languish and die. Large quantities are also sold to the canning companies in the county as well as those in the neighbouring cities.

I am sorry that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) is not in his seat. These fruit growers are badly handicapped on account of lack of railway transportation, and, apparently, the railways do not cater to this trade. These fruit growers need refrigerator cars to enable them to get their fruit into the cities and larger towns of northern Ontario, and I hope the Minister of Railways and Canals will take the matter into consideration when he gets hold of the Grand Trunk and will see that these people have better facilities in this regard.

The whole southern section of the county of Halton, stretching along the shore of lake Ontario, is the finest fruit-growing district in America. All kinds of fruits and vegetables are grown and sold in the nearby cities and without these cities the fruit-growing industry in Halton would be nil. For these industries the home market is the only market as they could not compete in the American market with American producers on account of the increased cost of production and the following reasons, namely:—

(1) The American fruit is two or three weeks earlier on the market, and the cream of the prices is gone before our fruit is ready for sale.

(2) The cost of production is less in the United States on account of climatic conditions—less labour is necessary to protect the tender plants from frost in the winter and spring. The Canadian grower must provide himself with frame-yard room and sash and fertilizer to grow his seedling plants and protect them from the chilling winds of spring. This is not necessary or as expensive in a warmer climate.

(3) Top dressing with straw, involving time and labour, is absolutely essential in this country and not necessary in the United States. The Canadian producer must also employ his help longer in the year on account of these extra precautions, and that adds materially to the cost of the article as compared with the cost in North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee and New York.

If we open our markets to American fruit, the early market of the spring would be entirely in the hands of the American fruit-grower and by the time our fruit came in, the cream of the prices would be reaped by the American producer. The first fruit in the spring is always the sweetest and the people will buy at prices that would not tempt them in another two or three weeks, when the appetite has become sated. Take off the duty on fruits and allow our market to be flooded in early May, and you will ruin the small fruit industry, not only in Ontario, but for that matter in the Dominion of Canada.

The section of Ontario along the shore of lake Ontario from Toronto to Hamilton, and including the whole Niagara peninsula is a veritable Garden of Eden, not surpassed in beauty and prosperity and in sturdy citizenship anywhere in the British Empire. In ruining the fruit industry in this section, you will strike a deadly blow at the future of the cities and towns in western Ontario, and throw out of employment thousands of persons engaged in the industry. Bound up in the fruit industry is the future of the canning industries of western Ontario. They buy the raw material from the gardeners in their vicinity, give employment to many hands, and get the perishable product of the gardener into the foreign market many months after it is picked. But for this, the gardener would be compelled to produce less or allow his product to spoil in the fields. Some of the gardeners in the southern section of the county of Halton sold as high as $10,000 worth of fruit to these canning industries in one year. The fruit business is their principal industry and to destroy the market for their produce would be a very decisive blow to something over three thousand people who are producing the raw material for these industries.

There are forty-two canning plants in Canada with an approximate output of $16,000,000 per annum, employing in the busy season, three thousand people and buying raw material from approximately five thousand farmers. Fully one-half of these fruit-canning plants are products of the war, when the British manufacturer was compelled by war conditions to withdraw his product from our market. The increase in six years in the canning industry in Canada is a marked indication of the benefit a proper system of protection is to the building up of industry in this country.

In the county of Halton the agricultural interests have something like $22,000,000 invested in farms; farm buildings and implements. In 1919, the total product of the farms, that is of grain, cattle and dairy products, amounted to $7,984,431. This does not include fruit, vegetables and a large variety of other products which the farmers sell, which would bring the total up to approximately $10,000,000. Our manufacturing establishments in that county number 119, the capital invested is $7,711,441, the number of employees is 1,657; the salaries paid, $1,448,814; the value of the raw material used, $4,810,281 and the value of the finished products, $8,781,804.

If you take away protection from this country, a deadly blow will be dealt to these industries. I sent out questionnaires to most of them, and in not a single instance did I receive a reply that any of them wanted the protective duties reduced. They all said that they were satisfied with the protective tariff as it was to-day.

With regard to protection, where do hon. members opposite stand? We have heard a great deal about the policy of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and it is very hard to make out what that policy is. The leader of the Agrarian or Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) is more definite in his statements; he is frankly a free trader. He has said so on many occasions, and I do not believe that he wishes to get away from his statements. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) when, as Finance Minister in 1897, he delivered his first Budget speech, placed on Hansard, this "resolution." He said:

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people and we declare our conviction that any tariff which is based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

That was placed on Hansard on April 22, 1897. I believe the hon. member was speaking not only for himself but for his party. That was a direct, definite statement that he was opposed to protection; yet he remained as Minister of Finance of this country for fifteen years, and during all that period he made not one effort to put his policy into effect. I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman really meant. He certainly could not have been sincere, and I often wonder if he is sincere to-day in the amendment which he has introduced into this House. I cannot, nor can anybody else, blame the people of this country if they look with a good deal of suspicion upon the policy presented by the hon. gentleman. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1893, after the convention at Ottawa, said:

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection is removed from the soil of Canada.

Yet he remained in power fifteen years and during that time did not bring in any measure of free trade or give any relief from the protective duties which he claimed were hurting the country. In 1911 his Government went out of power, and speaking in Hamilton shortly afterwards on November 26, 1913, he said:

The policy I give you at this moment, the policy I believe every patriot in Canada ought to support, and the policy I believe it to be the duty of the Government to immediately inaugurate, is a policy of absolutely free food—free from customs duties.

That is what he said less than two years after he had gone out of power. Yet he had been in power fifteen years and had not made the slightest effort to put that policy into effect. I do not charge him with insincerity; possibly he had a change of heart after he left Ottawa as Prime Minister of this country.

The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) takes a peculiar stand on the policy of protection. The fact is nobody knows what his policy is. Judging by his speeches in this House and outside it is absolutely impossible to come to any definite decision as to what he wants. Speaking in Toronto on August 16, 1920, he is reported in the Toronto Globe as saying:

It is not a question of free trade or protection.

You will notice that he made no explanation of what he really did mean. It was not a policy of free trade or protection, at all events. Further on he said:

But such a tariff as may be necessary in this connection will be under Liberal policy a tariff for consumers and producers and not a tariff to further the interests of combines, monopolies or any special or priviliged classes.

The hon. gentlman, now that he is in Opposition, speaks a lot of the special and privileged classes, but he forgot those classes when he was in power at Ottawa. I do not think the leader of the Opposition can blame the people of this country if they do not support him and his policy, and if they fail to understand it, for apparently he cannot explain it himself. He will find that the people of this country are not so easily deceived by a policy which tells them nothing, and I believe that when the time comes for the people to express their opinion at the polls they will express their dissatisfaction with the hon. gentleman in that respect.

[Mr. Anderson.]

The hon. leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in speaking in different places in Canada, has had something to say on the tariff issue. Speaking at Brandon on November 29, 1919, he is reported by the Canadian Countryman to have said:

The policy of protection is the greatest curse and drawback we could have in Canada.

I think the hon. member must have been reading one of the speeches of Mr. Davies, now Sir Louis Davies, who used a very similar expression in 1893 when speaking on the protective policy. Speaking in Massey Hall, Toronto, on December 17, and 18, at the Convention of the United Farmers of Ontario, the hon. member for Marquette is quoted in the Canadian Farms as saying:

The protection tariff confers privileges upon those who are beneficiaries of it, and for that reason the organized farmers of Canada are opposed to the principle of protection in our tariff.

The organized farmer of Canada in the mind of the hon. leader of the Agrarian party are evidently the United Grain Growers of Western Canada. The leader of the Agrarian party is certainly a free trader. He cannot get away from the statements that he has made on free trade in various parts of the country, and if he is elected to power at the next general election, he will be expectd to carry his policy into effect. If he does not do so, he will be betraying the farmers of Western Canada, who honestly believe in free trade and are supporting him on that issue. If he becomes the Prime Minister of this country I am satisfied that he will introduce a certain measure of free trade.

I have before me the Farmers' platform, as announcd by the Canadian Council of Agriculture at Winnipeg on November 29, 1918. It contains a good many planks but I shall read only those or sections of those that deal with the tariff issue. Speaking of the tariff it says:

Our tariff laws should be amended as follows: (a) by an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff; (b) by reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

That surely is a free trade policy. It cannot be considered as anything else, and the hon. leader of the Agrarian party will certainly try to implement that platform if he has any influence in this Parliament after the next election.

Now I desire to draw attention to some circumstances in connection with the United Grain Growers' Grain Company. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) made some mention of this company a few days ago. I shall make some further mention of it, and in one instance, at least, I shall disagree with what the hon. member for Frontenac said.

The United Grain Growers Limited was formed in September, 1917, by an amalgamation between the Grain Growers Grain Corporation and the Alberta Farmers Co-operative Elevator Company, with an authorized capital of $5,000,000, with shares of par value of $25, and no member allowed to have more than 100 shares, the average holdings being 10 shares, amounting to $250.

At the end of 1918 they had a paid up capital of $2,159,763, subscribed capital $2,891,050, reserves and undistributed profits, $1,872,746, making a total of capital and reserves at the end of 1918 of $4,032,509.

The officers of the company are T. A. Crerar, M.P., President, Cecil Rice-Jones, Manager and First Vice-President, J. R. Murray, Winnipeg, and E. S. McRory, Calgary, District Managers.

The Company has under its control and ownership several subsidiary companies, namely:

I. The Grain Growers Export Company of New York.

II. The Grain Growers Export Company of Winnipeg.

III. The U.G.G. Sawmills Ltd. & Timber Limits, B.C.

IV. The U.G.G. of New Westminster, B.C. (Feed Business).

V. The U.G.G. Securities Corporation.

VI. Live Stock Dept.

VII. Educational and Legislative organization comprising: (a) The Public Press, Ltd., Winnipeg, Job Printing, (b) The Grain Growers Guide.

The Company has 35,000 shareholders, divided into 350 clubs, having approximately 100 members each, scattered over the Canadian West. These shareholders pay this money into the Company, and receive stock certificates drawing 10 per cent on the par value of the stock.

I have copied these statements from the sworn evidence given by Mr. Cecil Rice-Jones before the High Cost of Living Committee in Room 318 of the House of Commons, on Friday, June 27, 1919. This company engages in a large number of businesses, under the name of the principal company, such as the implement business, the flour business, coal, lumber, apples, and other supplies, including binder twine, barbed wire, wire fencing, salt, hay. I believe they are also engaged in the insurance business.

I disagree with the statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac a few days ago with regard to the Export Company of New York. The hon. member for Frontenac said—I believe he took his figures from the sworn testimony of Mr. Cecil Rice-Jones—that on a capital of $100,000 this company had made a profit of something over 500 per cent. Now in looking over the company's annual report for 1915, I find that there was a $50,000 investment in the export company, and that the company made a profit in 1915 of 531,000, which amounted to 1060 per cent on the total paid up capital. In 1916, they put into the capital of the export company a certain amount of earnings from the year 1915, increasing the capital to $250,000 and in that year they made a profit of 130 per cent. In the next year, 1917, they made a profit of 66 per cent. Now that is pretty good for one of the subsidiary companies, but I would not object to these profits were it not for the statements made by hon. members opposite in this House.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Will you be kind enough to tell the House what amount of money was borrowed from the Bank of New York to conduct the business with?

Mr. ANDERSON: I was not in communication with the Bank of New York, and as the annual report does not give that statement, I cannot inform the hon. member. He should have seen that it appeared in the Annual Report of 1915; if it were in the report I should be glad to read it to him. The Grain Growers' Company, the parent company, the owner of all the subsidiary companies, according to the sworn testimony of Mr. Cecil Rice-Jones, vice-president and manager, given before a committee of this House, made profits in the year 1916 of 66.2 per cent on paid-up capital. The hon. member for Frontenac, said it was 62.6 per cent, but the difference is small in any event, and either of us may be wrong. In 1917, according to the same testimony, they made profits amounting to 44.92 per cent on paid-up capital, and in 1918, 19.7 per cent on paid-up capital.

I would not object to these profits, Mr. Speaker, but for the statements made by members of the Agrarian party. In 1920, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), in answer to a question asked by a member on this side of the House, said he considered that any company that made over 30 per cent profit on capital was profiteering. The hon. member for Assiniboia, I think, is a shareholder in this company, although he may not be a director, and I should like to know what he thinks of these profits of 66 per cent, 44 per cent, and 130 per cent in his own company. In 1912, the company had a capital of $586,000, and, so far as I can ascertain, they had no reserve. But in 1918, the capital was more than $2,159,000. The reserve in that year was $1,898,282. During this period of six years the company paid to the Farmers' Organization for political propaganda purposes the sum of $82,200, and invested, in the export company, dividends to the extent of $375,000, thus making total earnings, above expenses, and 10 per cent on capital of some $2,355,982, which is more than 100 per cent on their capital of 1918, and 325 per cent on the original capital of 1912.

That is a very good showing, and proves that the company is a very successful concern. But these items represent surplus earnings during these six years which have been taken out of the pockets of the people who do business with them. The people who do business with the company are not all shareholders and do not participate in the 10 per cent dividend, and the company is not what it claims to be, a philanthropic concern doing business for the benefit of the people of the country, because they are taking out of the pockets of the people more than is necessary to run their business. I think, strictly speaking, this surplus belongs to the shareholders of the company but it is held by the directors, and cannot be paid out unless the company is wound up.

Now, Sir, I think it is obvious that this company is a cold business corporation doing business for profit in competition with other corporations and individuals in this country, and is by no means a philanthropic concern as hon. members on the other side claim. Their operations may have the effect of reducing the cost of living to a certain extent, but, if they do, it is in the same way as any other corporation in the open market may be said to reduce the cost of living to the consumer as a result of competition. The organization department consists of the 10 p.m. United Farmers of Alberta, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, and the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association which, in the words of Mr. Rice-Jones, "is the educational and legislative end of the farmers' end of the association." The Grain Growers' Guide is the mouthpiece of this organization department and is the medium used to educate the people. Grants amounting to $82,500, were made to these different branches during the years preceding and including 1917.

I wish to draw attention to another circumstance. Some years ago the company conceived the idea, which was a very useful one, of organizing what is called the Canadian Council of Agriculture for the purpose of bringing all these various associations and joint stock companies into one organized body for the purpose of increasing the benefits to themselves, of getting better markets for their grain, and of getting legislation through the parliaments of the western provinces of the Dominion, favourable to themselves. I do not quarrel with that. They had a perfect right to do so, and if the farmers by such an organization could improve their conditions, I am in favour of it. This Canadian Council of Agriculture is composed of executive officers and the following associations: The United Farmers of Alberta, the Alberta Co-operative Elevator Company, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association, the Grain Growers' Grain Company, the Grain Growers' Guide, and the United Farmers of Ontario, the United Farmers' Co-operative Company, of Ontario, representing 65,000 farmers distributed over the Canadian West and Ontario. The executive officers of these various companies and associations form the Canadian Council of Agriculture, which drafted the farmers' platform. The Canadian Council of Agriculture is the executive of the United Farmers' or Progressive party. I am not taking exception to that organization being the executive of their party. The leader of the Farmers' party (Mr. Crerar), is president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company. He is in the House as representative of the Independent Farmers' party and as representative of the Grain Growers' Grain Company. On March 25, 1919, the Council of Agriculture discussed the question whether or not they should enter into politics. This matter must have been discussed on various occasions, but I refer to the year 1918, and a report of that discussion will be found in their annual report for that year. I might explain that apparently the company had sent a delegation to the United States to inquire into the farmer organizations there to see how they were getting along with their political work, and they were making a report I presume to the company. The report says:

> One of the main reasons given by the officers of the organization in several of the states was that in our Canadian organization we have not mixed in politics but have used our strength to influence legislation that was in the interests of the farmer and the people of Canada in general, while they state in most of their organizations in the United States there has been an inclination to organize their associations into political associations taking an active part in politics. This fact has been more responsible for wrecking the farming organizations in the United States than anything else.

Then they go on to state:

> In spite of the efforts of the organization to the south of us in the political field we can safely state that more legislation favourable to farmers and in the interest of the people of Canada has been passed in the three western provinces than all the twelve states we visited.

That was the opinion of the Canadian Council of Agriculture in the fall of 1918; they came to the decision they had better not enter into politics. Yet in spite of that decision what have we witnessed? On March 25, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) introduced an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply which proposed the acceptance of the Reciprocity Pact with the United States providing for free trade in foods, in natural products, and in agricultural implements. In speaking to that amendment the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar)—then the Minister of Agriculture in the Union Government—said this:

> "If the amendment were accepted it would mean the overthrow of the Government and a general election, with all the necessary turmoil that would ensue. I say that it would mean the launching of this country into a general election, and that is not desirable at this stage. It is wholly undesirable for several reasons, which I do not need to enumerate. This amendment is introduced for no other reason than to embarrass the Government in carrying on the business of the country."

The hon member supported the Government at that time and voted against the amendment in order to prevent the Government from being defeated. If we examine the situation then we will see that the country had just come through the war, the demobilization of the army was well under way, reconstruction was well advanced, the country was at peace and everything was favourable. The Government was in a strong position, it had a large majority in the House and apparently it was not the desire of the hon. member to oppose the Government and attempt to defeat it. But what do we find a couple of months later? On June 9, of the same year, the hon. member for Brome introduced his amendment of March 25, as an amendment to the Budget then brought down by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White.) But at that time the hon. member for Marquette was no longer a member of the Government and he voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Brome that he had voted against two months previously, in order that the country might be thrown into the turmoil of a general election, which he had stated, only two months before, was wholly undesirable.

The propositions introduced in that Budget went further in reducing the tariff on agricultural implements than the Fielding tariff had gone in fifteen years. It remitted seventeen and a half millions of customs taxation and imposed taxes on the wealthy; yet the hon. member for Marquette opposed all this and tried to force the country into a general election.

Now I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the coincidence of the resignation of the honourable member as Minister of Agriculture, the appearance of the Farmers' political party and the Winnipeg strike.

On May 15 a sympathetic strike involving ninety-five unions was called in the city of Winnipeg, resulting in a complete tie-up of business, a declaration of control over civic affairs and an effort to control provincial and federal employees. The object of the strikers was to control municipal government in the city of Winnipeg when sympathetic strikers in various cities of the Canadian West would take control of the Provincial Governments. The condition became so serious that revolution was threatened and the future of Canada was imperilled.

So serious was the situation on June 2 that a resolution was moved in the House of Commons by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the strikes in Winnipeg and other Canadian cities. The hon. member for Kamouraska, in speaking to this resolution, said:

> "This debate is one of the most extreme urgency. We have been criticised for not having already discussed in the House this alarming situation."

The honourable member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) in speaking upon the same resolution, said this:

"We have the spectre of a revolution which first became apparent two weeks ago, appearing like a hydra-headed monster in a dozen Canadian cities."—Hansard, page 3029.

The honourable the Minister of the Interior, at page 3039, is quoted as saying:

"It was essential that the greater issue raised by the assumption of Soviet authority, and it was nothing less on the part of those in control of the strike in the city of Winnipeg, should be once and for all decided and decisively beaten down."

This statement made in this House was a reflection of what was appearing in the daily press and showed that Canada was passing through the greatest crisis in its history. At no time during the period of the war was there a greater menace to the peace of the country.

Yet on June 4, two days after this discussion the honourable the Minister of Agriculture resigned his portfolio, took his place on the cross-benches and announced his decision to withdraw his support from the Government and became the leader of a new political party with the object of defeating the Government and throwing this country into the turmoil of a general election. Had he succeeded, could any one imagine the result? No one could predict what might have happened if the country had been hurled into the turmoil of a general election with an incipient revolution on its hands. The honourable member comes from the West and cannot plead ignorance of the conditions which existed, but as a member of the Government he had a more accurate knowledge of what was transpiring than private members, and had the added advantage of a perfect familiarity with conditions in his home province. This strike took place in the city of Winnipeg where the head office of his company and the offices of the newspapers which he controls were situated, and he must have had inside information on the conditions. I do not charge the honourable member with any sinister motives in timing his resignation to suit these events, neither do I wish to charge him with expecting to ride into power on the wave of revolution which might have resulted, but I do charge him with a decided lack of that foresight and those statesmanlike qualities which are essential to the leader of a political party aspiring to the premiership. The honourable member must have known, had he given the consideration to the national situation which every public man should, that the time was most inopportune for any attempt to gain a decision at the poles by a political party; yet he took the plunge, either as a result of ignorance, or from a spirit of bravado, and was only saved by the superior foresight and wisdom of western members, who, seeing eye to eye with him on the tariff issue, yet had a more statesmanlike grasp of the national situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read the following taken from the Grain Growers' Guide of July 23, 1919:

Trial by Jury Abolished

Your civil rights are in danger because the Government at Ottawa has passed a vicious amendment to the Immigration Act under which citizens not born in Canada may be arrested; tried behind closed doors by a committee appointed by the Government; denied the right of facing their accusers; denied the right of trial by jury; and deported without the formality of a civil trial. To-day labour men are arrested. To-morrow it may be farmers. To-day men not born in Canada are suffering. To-morrow it may be the Canadian-born. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. If you were accused of a crime how much would you give for the right to be tried by a jury of your peers? Your right is bound up with that of the labour men who have been arrested in Winnipeg. Do unto others as you would be done unto. Help these men to get a fair trial by sending a donation to

JAMES LAW, Secretary,

Defence Committee, Room 12, Labour Temple, Winnipeg.

This article appeared in the Grain Growers' Guide of July 23, 1919, appealing to the farmers of Western Canada for aid in support of the accused and imprisoned strikers in the city of Winnipeg, on the assumption that the strikers had been denied the right of trial by jury. No other meaning can be taken from the appeal.

It was purposely worded so as to create that impression. Note the words "Denied the right of trial by jury. To-day labor men are arrested, tomorrow it may be farmers." A more vile appeal has never been made in any newspaper in this country. These men had not been denied any right to which they were entitled as Canadian citizens.

This was known to the managers of the Grain Growers' Guide. They were in close touch with all the events of the strike and knew absolutely the true situation, and yet this newspaper, owned and controlled by the political corporation of which the hon. member for Marquette is president, gave it the sanction of what approval it could get by appearing in that paper, and sent it broadcast to the sixty thousand readers and subscribers of the paper. Why was this done? Surely the money paid for such an advertisement was hardly sufficient to induce any newspaper to print it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not deny the right of a political party having a newspaper to place its ideals before the people and expound the gospel of its particular political faith, but I do deny the right of a powerful commercial corporation, entering the field as a political party, to attempt to seize the reins of Government to further its own commercial interests. I claim that the attempt of the United Grain Growers' Company to corral the farmers of Western Canada, and use them for political purposes is a subversion of the principles of responsible Government. It is indeed the most daring attempt ever made by a political party in this country to destroy democracy and place in its stead corporate, autocratic rule. The irony of the attempt, the irony of the whole political farce is that it is being done in the name of democracy.

I observed, Mr. Speaker, during the war that those who shouted loudest in the name of democracy were themselves autocrats at heart. Suppose, for instance, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is one of the most powerful corporations on the North American continent, decided to go into politics, and succeeded in electing their president, and some of their officials to this House and eventually obtained control of the Government, and the president became Prime Minister. Would the hon. leader of the Agrarian party or the hon. member for Red Deer think that that was right? I am quite satisfied that they would think it was absolutely wrong. And yet that is practically what their party is doing to-day. I shall leave these thoughts with the hon. leader of what shall we call it—the Farmers' party? No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a Farmers' party. The sympathy of the great mass of the farmers of Canada is not with the hon. gentleman and his political methods, nor do they follow him on his platform of free trade and class rule.

The hon. member for Marquette made some references a year ago to the depopulation of rural sections of Ontario. Between 1901 and 1911 the rural population of Ontario decreased about 59,000, but the rural population over the whole of Canada increased. During that period the urban population has gradually increased until in 1911 it exceeded the rural population, but that is bound to occur in any country which develops along all lines of manufacturing industry. The following table will be interesting as showing the gradual increase of the urban with a corresponding decrease of the rural percentage of population in the Dominion and in Ontario for the decades from 1871 to 1911:

	Rural Per cent	Urban Per cent
Canada—
1971	81.2	18.8
1881	78.9	21.1
1891	71.3	28.9
1901	62.4	37.6
1911	54.4	45.6
Ontario—
1871	80.6	19.4
1881	77.2	22.8
1891	66.8	33.2
1901	59.3	40.7
1911	47.8	52.2

In 1911 it will be seen that the urban population of Ontario was 52.2 per cent, and yet although the farmers claim they have not proper representation in Parliament, they rule in that province. The Hon. Mr. Drury in speaking to the farmers of the county of Halton last fall said to them that they were a minority, and that minority rule is autocratic rule, and that they would have to be satisfied to see their policy carried to fruition by all the people of the Dominion representing all classes.

In connection with this increased ration of urban as against rural population, I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for Marquette to one of its results. Since 1867 in direct proportion as the cities' population has increased the price of commodities sold from the farm has increased with it. I have here a few figures taken from the Globe of 1867, 1901, and 1921:

Place	Commodity	February 1867	February 1901	May 1921
Toronto—	Wheat	$ 1.80	$ .66½	$ 1.98
	Oats	.32	.28½	.49¾
	Barley	.59	.42	.90
	Hay	13.00	14.50	30.00
	Hogs	5.25	8.50	20.00
	Beef	6.00	8.50	18.00
	Lamb	3.50 each	.07½ lb.	.15 lb.
	Butter	.12 lb.	.20 lb.	.61
	Eggs	.16	.22	.33
	Chickens	.40 pair	.60 pr.	.35 lb.
	Apples	None	2.25 bbl.	10.00 bbl.
	Potatoes	"	.35 bag	.85

It will be seen that with the exception of the first three items, every one has increased materially in price since 1867, showing that the increase of urban population has been conducive to the advantage of the farmer by increasing his home market and giving him a better chance to sell his products. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking up so much of the time of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ANDERSON: I hope the hon. member who says "hear, hear" will take up as much time to answer some of these questions, which I am sure the people of this country will be very glad to have answered.

Mr. J. A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before entering into a discussion of the Budget I wish first to direct a few remarks to the address delivered this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), and also a passing remark to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anderson) who has just preceded me. The Prime Minister gave us a somewhat lengthy address, chiefly in an attempt to ridicule the two parties, as he described them, on the Opposition side of the House, and to create in the minds of the people the idea that there is an amalgamation between the two groups on this side of the House. He made a further attempt, in which he was very successful to win applause from his supporters by his very complete and splendid system of ridicule and sarcasm. I should have paid no attention whatever to my right hon. friend's reference in this regard had he dealt with the matter fairly. A few months ago the Prime Minister took part in an election in the eastern part of Canada and there he started a campaign of misrepresentation. According to my recollection the campaign of misrepresentation on the part of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was exceeded only by that of the Prime Minister himself in opening his campaign during the by-election to which I have referred. In his attempt here this afternoon the hon. gentleman undertook to ridicule the progressive group for not placing their platform before the House. I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman was present at one of the sessions of this House three years ago, when that platform was placed before the House in its entirety. It is on Hansard, and may be seen by any one who wishes to refer to it. I observe that my hon. friend is indulging in another of his sardonic, satirical and cynical smiles, directed toward this group.

[Mr. Anderson.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that my hon. friends had no platform. What I said was that it had never been moved and the judgment of the House obtained upon it.

Mr. MAHARG: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the Government have ever moved their platform in the House? Has the hon. gentleman ever moved his platform?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly. Our platform is in the Budget and a vote on the Budget is a vote on the platform.

Mr. MAHARG: Well, if my hon. friend can find his platform in the Budget I would like him to draw our attention to it; so far as I am concerned I have not been able to find it. My hon. friend and his supporters have not drawn attention to it and cannot do so, for the simple reason that it is not there. With all his talk, what did my hon. friend say about his platform? He said that the platform of his party was one which would give adequate protection to the industries of Canada—as meaningless a statement as could possibly be made. Who is going to say what is adequate protection to the industries of Canada? Evidently some one is saying it for the hon. gentleman and those who support him on that side of the House.

Now, Sir, I want to go just a little further. The hon. gentleman made some very uncomplimentary remarks with regard to the Progressive party this afternoon. He described them as the tools of the Opposition, as a dilapidated annex, and so on. Well, as to whether or not the Progressive party is in a dilapidated condition, if the hon. Prime Minister will just be good enough to give the country an opportunity to decide that question we shall be perfectly satisfied with the result.

In dealing with the amendment this afternoon the Prime Minister described it as a circuitous sinuosity. It is pretty strong language; but, Sir, if you can find anything more in the nature of circuitous sinuosity than the Prime Minister's address this afternoon—well, you simply could not do so, I would yield the palm to the Prime Minister in that respect now and for all time.

The Prime Minister this afternoon indulged in his usual habit of laying traps, and he succeeded in dropping out bait which was picked up by an hon. member on this side. I am very glad he did, Mr. Speaker, because it gives me an opportunity to have a little to say in that respect to-night. The hon. gentleman read from a pamphlet; he was not going to tell us just at the moment who the author of the pamphlet was, though, of course he would have done so later had some one not asked the question. He told the House that the author of the pamphlet was Mr. Norman P. Lambert—which, of course, was a sweet morsel under the tongues of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, following his usual custom, he did not go so far as to explain to the House just why that pamphlet was published. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the House to-night just why that pamphlet was published. It was published some time ago. Several pamphlets were prepared by the same gentleman, for those in whose employ he was at that particular time? He was a young man, a journalist starting out in this country. I observe that the Prime Minister is finding great difficulty to keep his seat this evening while I am speaking, just as he did when the hon. member for Red Deer was addressing the House. I hope he will be good enough to let me proceed; I did not interrupt him this afternoon. I simply want to explain how these pamphlets came about. Mr. Lambert, was a young man in the employ of a protectionist newspaper in the city of Toronto, and he had instructions to compile pamphlets having for their purpose the discouragement of any "truck or trade with the Yankees," as it was described at that time. He was a very capable young man, a very good prospect in the journalistic world. He succeeded in carrying out the instruction of his employers and these pamphlets were issued. But, Sir, this young man came to maturity later on and he decided that he would no longer sell his services; that he would write things as he saw them, and he has done that. The great difference between the Prime Minister and Mr. Norman P. Lambert is that Mr. Norman P. Lambert refused to sell his services and sacrifice his principles for the manufacturing and big interests of Canada, while the Prime Minister was representing them at that time, is representing them to-day, and, from all appearances, intends to continue to represent them for all time. Mr. Lambert comes from a family who always, so far as I know, gave very strong support to the Conservative party. He, like a great many others in Western Canada—thousands of them, myself included— commenced to see that there were two sides to these questions, and, as they did, got away from the old environment and changed their ideas. At present this young man is working in the interests of the general public; he is not giving himself over to the wishes, the demands, the exactions of those who undertake to carry on a campaign on behalf of the interests to which I have referred.

Mr. HAY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. MAHARG: Yes, I welcome questions from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HAY: By whom is M. Lambert now employed?

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Lambert is employed by an institution which believes in absolute freedom to all who have ideas to express. He is working for that institution at this particular time.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the name of it?

Mr. MAHARG: I will give the name. I invite the closest scrutiny of all or any of the articles published by Mr. Lambert since he has come into the employ of that institution. No one can point the finger of derision at or criticise any of those articles. The institution he is working for is the Central Organization of the farmers of Western Canada and of all Canada.

Mr. HAY: Is he paid for it now?

Mr. MAHARG: Certainly he is paid for it. We are not "cheap guys"; we pay our way as we go. We are not financed by such institutions as are financing the so-called Murray campaign.

Mr. HAY: Was he paid for it when he wrote that tract?

Mr. MAHARG: No doubt he was. I do not know who paid him, I am sure, but I imagine that he was paid; otherwise how could he exist? I will say this, Mr. Speaker: he was not paid out of the funds of the organized farmers of Canada.

Mr. HAY: He evidently writes anything that he is paid to write.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is not a question.

Mr. MAHARG: If the hon. gentleman wishes to ask questions, I shall be only too glad to answer them, but I am not going to permit the hon. gentleman or any other hon. gentleman to put words into my mouth. I reserve that right to myself.

I want to go just a little further before I leave the remarks made this afternoon by the Prime Minister. In describing the amendment this afternoon, the Prime Minister, from his words, would indicate that he considered it a protectionist amendment. He cited case after case to show that there was nothing in the amendment to lead one to believe that there would be any reduction in the tariff. Evidently, he is of opinion that it is a protectionist document. A couple of days ago, when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) was speaking in this House, he viewed the amendment with alarm; he claimed that it would put our industries out of business. It would be very wise for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to get together before they start contradicting one another on the floor of the House.

The Prime Minister also gave us another illustration this afternoon in connection with cream separators. He dealt with this particular matter when he was on his tour of Western Canada, and I remember very well, in listening to him at one of the meetings, when he took up the question of cream separators, that he took his favourite pose, he turned to the chairman and he said, "Cream separators, Mr. chairman," as though the name "cream separators," or the manufacture of them, was a joke. Speaking in this House on the Address in reply to the speech from His Excellency, the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) undertook to talk about cream separators. He was holding forth on a tirade against the United Grain Growers for purchasing their machinery requirements largely in the United States. Amongst other things he illustrated the cream separator industry. He was holding the United Grain Growers up as buying from the United States articles which they could secure in this country. The Prime Minister, in his western tour, told the people of that section of Canada that practically no cream separators were manufactured in this country. As he said, even the United Grain Growers had to go to the United States to secure cream separators. The Prime Minister wanted to leave the impression in the West that, because cream separators were on the free list, no cream separators were manufactured in Canada. The Minister of Militia and Defence undertook to prove to the House that there was an abundance of them manufactured in Canada, and he scored the Farmers' organization for not purchasing Canadian made goods when it was possible for them to do so. That is another illustration why they should get together. We want to look into this matter a little further in order to see what there really was in the statement of the Prime Minister in the West, when the most that he would admit was that there were a few assembling plants in Canada. In 1910, we had four establishments manufacturing cream separators, and the value of their output in that year was $639,656. In 1919, nine years later, we had seven cream separator plants working in Canada, and the value of their output had increased from $639,656 to $2,030,093. That does not look as though the cream separator business had been hurt very much in Canada because cream separators were on the free list. This is another case in which it would be wise for the Prime Minister to inform himself.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does that include any assembling of imported parts?

Mr. MAHARG: This is the total value of the output of the cream separator manufacturing plants.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think my hon. friend misunderstands me. I am asking for information. Does that output include anything for the assembling of imported parts, parts imported into the country and assembled here?

Mr. MAHARG: These figures are taken from statistics compiled by the Government, and I assume that they are correct. No separation is made between assembling and manufacturing. If assembling was done, it is included, I presume. The point is that, instead of four industries, we have seven, and instead of an output of $639,656, we have $2,030,093. That is the important feature of the situation.

Mr. EDWARDS: Most of that is imported.

Mr. MAHARG: I would take it for granted that the hon. gentleman would be able to distinguish between $600,000 odd and $2,000,000 odd, and that he would draw his conclusions as to which was the most important.

The Prime Minister undertook to give us quite a little discourse this afternoon on tin plates manufactured in the United States. He showed that there had been a tremendous increase, which is no doubt perfectly true. But he might have gone a little further and given us another illustration or two to show the great benefit that had come to the people of the United States through protection. They have now in the State of California, a plant for manufacturing borax. For a number of years the United States purchased all their borax. They had in that country no plants manufacturing this product. An agitation was commenced because of a borax discovery in the State of California. Prior to the time that this institution was established, the United States had purchased their borax for $50 a ton. This industry was started, and from that time on the United States paid $150 a ton for this article. If you can show to the people that protection has helped them in this case, then I fail to understand protection, if the people of the United States are benefited by having to pay $150 a ton for their borax when prior to the time that the protection was given to this industry they could purchase it for the sum of $50 a ton. I fail to see it. This is another illustration where only one-half of a story is told.

The Prime Minister referred to protection in Great Britain to-day. He told us that it would be only a matter of time until Great Britain would be a protectionist country; at least he used words to that effect. In the Citizen of to-day and also in the Montreal Gazette of May 13, an article is published, and I want to read a few extracts from it. It is in connection with the banking interests of Great Britain and their attitude towards protection in England. It says:

A manifesto signed by a score of leading bankers, was published here to-day, protesting against any legislative or administrative measures to check the free exchange of goods with foreign countries and declaring the policy of trying to exclude foreign commodities to be a mistaken one.

The following is a quotation:

We cannot limit imports without limiting our export trade, and striking a grave blow at world-wide commerce on which this Kingdom principally depends.

Further on it says:

We desire to enter a respectful protest against every restrictive regulation of trade which tends to diminish the resources of the State.

The signers include Lord Avebury, partner in Coutts and Co.; Lord Chalmers, former joint secretary of the Treasury; Frederick C. Goodenough, chairman of Barclay's Bank, Limited; Sir Everard A. Hambro, a director of the Bank of England; Lord Inchcape, senior partner in Mackinnon, Mackenzie and Co.; the Right Hon. Frederick Huth Jackson, director of the Bank of England; Sir Robert Kindersley, director of the Bank of England; Walter Leaf, chairman of the London County Westminster and Parr's Bank, and Reginald McKenna, director of the London City and Midland Bank, and former Chancellor of the Exchequer.

It goes on to say this action threatens to cripple the country's resources and impair its credit abroad. A further quotation from this manifesto is as follows:

We have to build up the markets we need by encouraging continental nations to export to us, for it is only by exports that they can re-establish their credits and provide funds for the payment of their debts.

I shall not burden the record with further quotations. I give these just to show that the banking interests of Great Britain are alarmed at the possibility of the principle of protection being introduced into that country again.

When speaking of the twine industry I omitted to give the figures. As I said, when the Prime Minister was on his western tour he told the people in one of our cities how the twine industry had gone to pieces since it was placed on the free list. He stated that in 1890 practically 80 per cent of the twine used in Canada was of Canadian manufacture, while at the present time the amount of twine supplied by Canadian manufacturers was only 25 per cent of the total consumption in Canada. The Prime Minister undertook to give us a little history of the twine industry this afternoon, but he forgot to give us the figures as well. In 1890 the total value of the output was 1,723,534: in 1900, $2,212,263. There is a gradual increase in 1910, 1915, 1917, and up until 1919, the latest year for which reports are available from the Statistical Branch here in Ottawa, and the total value in that year is $9,810,449. That does not look as though there had been much of a decrease. The increase in output would figure out at a very high percentage.

I wish now to direct attention for a few moments to the Budget. My first observation would be that I am of the opinion that the Finance Minister has been possibly a little too courageous and has gone just a little too far. I think you will find that this Budget will be more than protective; I am of opinion that it will be prohibitive in some respects, and possibly in many respects. However, I shall not quarrel with the Minister of Finance if it does prohibit some of the things that are heavily taxed in the Budget, for there are some things that we can get along very nicely without, particularly beverages, and drugs containing a very high percentage of alcohol.

If he can shut these out, I will have no fault to find with him. But with respect to some other items, I am afraid that the Budget will act detrimentally, because of its prohibitive nature. I shall not dwell on that particular point at this time, but I would like to give to the House my opinion as to the point we have reached in this matter of protection.

My own candid opinion is that protection has reached the point where it does not protect; where it does not give employment, and also the point where it does not prevent the goods that are taxed from entering this country. We have only to dwell for a very short time on our trade relations with one of the countries with whom we do the largest business, and that is the United States. We are one of her best customers, and she is one of ours. To prove that protection does not protect, there is at the present time on certain commodities, in fact on everything that we import from the United States, a protection. I imagine that some hon. members will say that that is not so, that a great many articles are on the free list. That is quite true, but we have an adverse rate of exchange which operates exactly the same as does a protective tariff. This adverse exchange operates on every article we import from the United States, and it has run as high as 19 per cent, but on the average has been between 14 and 15 per cent, I would say. If we add that amount to the protective tariff, which we have every right to do, as it operates exactly the same, we shall find that we have all the way from 25 to 50 per cent of a protection against goods coming in from the United States. Now our exports from the United States last year, I think, must prove conclusively that protection does not protect. What the reason is, it is difficult to know; it has been ascribed to several different causes. However, the fact remains that the tariff does not protect although we have as high as 50 per cent of a duty to contend with in some cases, and that is operating continuously. The other evening while the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was speaking, he addressed a question to this corner of the House to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), I believe. He asked where would we get the necessary revenue if we reduced the tariff. I think I would be quite in order if I were to answer the hon. gentleman if he were in the House by asking another question: Where would the revenue come from if we followed the advice of the Government and its supporters and bought our goods in Canada, and not from the United States? They tell us we can secure practically everything in our own country. Well, if we did not import from the United States, where would the revenue come from? We imported from the United States goods last year to the amount of $856,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in support of their argument that they have reduced the tariff since they came into power, stated that the average tariff on dutiable and free goods was now 16.5 per cent. I take it that that is correct. Now if you collect 16.5 per cent on all the imports from the United States, you will find you have approximately $140,000,000. Our total revenue received from the tariff last year was $165,000,000. Now where would your revenue come from if you did not import those goods? You would have reduced younr revenue from tariff to about $25,000,000. I think the $856,000,000 of goods imported from the United States under these adverse conditions—the duty and the exchange rate—proves conclusively that we have reached a point where protection does not protect. There must be something wrong somewhere. Another argument they have given us for not doing business with the United States is that it will improve the adverse rate of exchange. They told us that the one and only cause for the adverse exchange rate with the United States was our adverse balance of trade with them. That argument has been heralded all over the country and was made use of throughout Western Canada when the Prime Minister was touring that part of the Dominion. Now, I desire to investigate this adverse balance of trade for a few years back so that we may find out just what the facts are. Let me state the facts in the following table. In order to save time, I shall give the figures in round numbers:

Exports 1913-14	$176,000,000
Imports 1913-14	395,000,000
Adverse balance of trade	219,000,000 or 55 per cent
Exports 1914-15	186,000,000
Imports 1914-15	296,000,000
Adverse balance of trade	110,000,000 or 37 per cent
Exports 1915-16	216,000,000
Imports 1915-16	370 000,000
Adverse balance of trade	154,000,000 or 42 per cent
Exports 1916-17	290,000,000
Imports 1916-17	664,000,000
Adverse balance of trade	374,000,000 or 129 per cent

Exports 1917-18..	440,000,000
Imports 1917-18..	791,000,000
Adverse balance of trade.. ..	351,000,000
	or 45 per cent
Exports 1918-19..	447,000,000
Imports 1918-19..	746,000,000
Adverse balance of trade.. ..	269,000,000
	or 36 per cent
Exports 1919-20..	501,000,000
Imports 1919-20..	801,000,000
Adverse balance of trade.. ..	300,000,000
	or 38 per cent
Exports 1920-21..	574,000,000
Imports 1920-21..	856,000,000
Adverse balance of trade.. ..	282,000,000
	or 34 per cent

It will be seen very clearly from this statement that the year in which we had an adverse exchange rate is the year that we had the very lowest percentage of imports ever exports, and that must surely prove to the House that the argument that has been advanced by the Government and their supporters is absolutely fallacious. As we see here, in one year the percentage of imports over exports was 129 per cent, yet we had no adverse exchange rate against us then. I think the Government will need to look around for some further reason to advance for the adverse exchange which we have against us at the present time.

During last February I had occasion to visit a merchant in Western Canada, and we engaged in conversation as to the cost of textiles. At that particular time they were making inquiry for their supply of textiles for the coming year, and I asked him what the prospects were for his securing his textile requirements in Canada. He showed me his figures and allowed me to make the comparisons for myself, and those figures and his statements showed that he could go into the United States and purchase his textiles there, pay the adverse exchange rate, pay the duty on textiles, which ranges from 14 to 35 per cent, pay exchange and freight to his home town, and then undersell the Dominion textile manufacturers' price by 20 per cent. It is no wonder, Sir, that American goods are coming into our country, if that is the state of affairs that exists. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), speaking on the Budget a few days ago, stated that it was impossible for us to escape the burdens of war. With this I quite agree, and I do not think that any one has any thought of attempting to escape those burdens at this time. Certainly we had no thought of escaping the burdens of and responsibilities of war when war was on. With the sentiment expressed by the minister I agree fully. But my complaint is that while the burdens of war were being placed on the shoulders of the people, that was the time we should have taken steps to relieve them as far as possible on the financial side. At that time we advocated to the then Minister of Finance the imposition of direct taxation, but our advice was not accepted. However, since the close of the war, and now that unemployment is rife throughout the country, as it has been for the last two years, the Government, in view of the unfavourable conditions that exist, finds itself compelled to impose such taxation. It has been stated publicly that we have some 200,000 unemployed men in the country, to say nothing of the unemployed female labour which we have. To my mind, it would have been much better had the Minister of Finance at that time, when everybody was busy in the country and had plenty of money, introduced direct taxation in some form or other. But it was only when the grim necessities of war confronted him that he was compelled to do so. Now, this is one of the planks in our platform which the hon. member undertook to quote from to-night. He did not go very far with it, however. He just used sufficient of it to serve his purpose, and I shall touch upon that a little later. But in that platform, if the hon. member had read it to the House, he would have found that the very methods which the Minister of Finance very reluctantly put into operation were advocated. Several of the things advocated in that platform the Government have had to do because of the grim necessities of war; and I contend that the grim necessity of economy will force whatever Government may be in power in the near future to go on accepting the provisions of that platform, if we are to escape bankruptcy. I should have liked the hon. gentleman to have gone a little further into the platform while h ewas reading it. He gave two quotations to prove to the House that it was a free trade platform. What were they? They were these: He said the platform proposed an all round and substantial reduction in the tariff, and that it advocated free trade. That was one of his arguments. His other argument was that the platform stated we should gradually increase the British preference until within five years we would have complete free trade with England. Now, Sir, these are the two arguments he advanced in support of his statement that the platform in question was a free trade platform. I leave it to the House and the country to judge just to what extent the hon. gentleman succeeded in proving his contention. I would have liked him to have gone on and told what that platform proposes to do for the consumers of this country, but the hon. gentleman took very good care not to refer to that point. He did not state to the consumers of this country that that platform proposed to give them a free market in which to buy all their foodstuffs, and he was not particularly anxious that they should know that. That might suit the consumers possibly, but that is not what the Government wants. My hon. friend might have gone a little further and found additional arguments along that line. However I will not dwell any longer on the subject at this particular time.

Now let me return to some of the statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). He gave us certain reasons for not reducing the tariff at this particular time, but the same reasons have been brought forward for a number of years past. I remember very well that the first reason advanced for delay in this matter was that demobilization was in progress—that we must not interfere with matters of trade while demobilization was going on. Time passed and the "existing unrest" was cited as a reason for making the excuse a little stronger. Then later on the Minister of Agriculture, who comes from the western coast, stated that we must have protection to preserve us from the competition of cheap Oriental labour. Now, Sir, during the by-election which followed the acceptance of a portfolio by the Minister of Agriculture promises were made with respect to providing a dry dock at the Pacific coast which, it seems to me, created a most ridiculous situation. On the one hand we have a tariff which is designed to prevent imports from coming into that port which is to have the dry dock, and on the other hand the dry dock itself, is intended for the repair of the ships that presumably—if the policy of the Government and its supporters was carried out—would come in empty. It seems very inconsistent to spend millions of dollars in building a dry dock to accommodate shipping, and on the other hand enforcing a tariff which will prevent those ships from finding any business.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Some Government.

Mr. MAHARG: This year another excuse has been advanced for the failure to enter upon tariff revision and that is the Fordney Bill—that was one of the excuses presented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day. He declared that the Fordney Bill is now before Congress, and we should not interfere with the tariff in this country until we know what is to be done with that measure. The statement is made that we must not trade with our neighbours to the south. If we are not to trade with the Americans why worry about the Fordney Bill? If we are not going to import goods from the United States, we certainly cannot expect to send exports to that country, and therefore we need entertain no apprehensions on the score of the Fordney Bill. But, Sir, the Fordney Bill is only an emergency measure; it is not intended to be permanent legislation. It is admittedly legislation intended to meet a condition which prevails in the United States at the present time.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to our interchange of wheat with the United States, and I believe he made the remark in Montreal that the United States consumer would have to pay the duty and not the Canadian people. That is perfectly true, and it is an admission that I scarcely expected to get from him. However, if I remember correctly, he discussed the matter a little further and referred to our wheat being milled in bond over there to escape the tariff, as though that were something new. Now, Mr. Speaker, up to the time that we had free interchange of wheat and wheat products with the United States our wheat was being continuously shipped to that country and milled in bond there. To put the matter plainly camouflage has been resorted to in connection with this matter; and the agitation raised in the United States at the present time in connection with this privilege of milling wheat in bond is only for the purpose of beclouding the issue. It is only intended as a palliative to the consumers of that country in the effort of trying to make them believe, by roundabout means, that what is proposed will not increase the price of their bread. Personally, I doubt very much whether the consumers of the United States will permit themselves to be led astray by any such argument. The big financiers and the milling interests over there know very well that they have got to have Canadian wheat. It does not matter what the United States tariff against Canadian wheat is, American millers have got to have Canadian wheat to blend with their own, otherwise they cannot sell their flour on the world's markets. It is absolutely impossible for them to dispose of their flour unless sufficient Canadian hard wheat has been mixed with it so as to give it that quality that will permit of its finding a market. So that as regards wheat we do not need to worry very much. But wheat is only one of the products of Canada. I often wonder where the livestock man is going to land if the Fordney Bill goes into operation, because that legislation will make it very awkward for him to market his stock, especially when we consider the restrictions on the export of cattle to the Old Country. That legislation will likewise be a handicap to other producers as well as to livestock men. The argument has been advanced that if the Fordney Bill becomes effective we will have to enact retaliatory measures. I doubt very much whether any country benefits by resorting to such measures. The retaliatory principle is one that does not get you very far, and I am doubtful myself whether it will prove of very much benefit in the present instance. Sir, I am wondering what the excuse for not revising the tariff will be next year. We hear considerable these days, not about the Fordney Bill altogether, but respecting a gentleman who is, we are told, perfecting a system of manufacturing milk without the cow. Now I imagine that next year instead of the Fordney Bill being assigned as an excuse for maintaining the tariff at its present level, it will possibly be the prospect of "Fordney milk." Doubtless it would be a very serious thing if we were obliged to discard the meek and gentle old cow, and I have no doubt this Government will give that fact serious consideration in an attempt to use it as an excuse for retaining the present tariff.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Anderson) dealt with the value of the home market to the people of Canada. We have been told in the West that Eastern Canada furnishes a home market for our products. I would like to inquire for what class of products Eastern Canada provides a home market? Let us take the province of Ontario for the purpose of illustration. The two chief products from Western Canada that Ontario uses are wheat and oats. In Ontario they use the wheat for blending purposes to bring up the standard of their flour, and they use the oats for milling operations to prepare the different oatmeals. But, Sir, Ontario is a producer of wheat as well as Western Canada, and she produces annually anywhere from twelve to fifteen million bushels. Now if you take the per capita consumption of the province of Ontario I venture to say that it will run between four and five bushels. That is considered a high consumption, and I doubt, in view of the fact that very many substitutes are produced in that province, whether the consumtpion will run to four bushels per head. However, we will put it at four bushels per head, and we will take the population of the province as being between two and a half and three million—I believe that 2,600,000 are about the right figures. But we will take it at two and a half millions of a population. At four bushels per capita that would mean 10,000,000 bushels. Now, you will see that they have a surplus of anywhere from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels, which will provide liberally for seed and other contingencies. So that in reality while in Ontario purchases a certain quantity of our hard wheat; she also has a surplus of her own wheat which takes the place of her purchases from Western Canada, whatever they may be. Therefore, in that case the market provided in Eastern Canada in so far as our western wheat is concerned is very very small indeed. There is a considerable amount of oats purchased from Western Canada for milling purposes, but on the other hand we are very often importers of oats from Ontario. Hundreds of thousands of bushels were imported a few years ago, and almost every year when there is a short crop of oats in the West we import from Ontario. So far as the home market for the produce of Western Canada is concerned, to all intents and purposes it does not exist.

But what about the market provided in Western Canada for the products of Eastern Canada? That is a very different matter. Western Canada does not produce the variety of articles produced in Eastern Canada, and practically all our requirements are purchased either in Eastern Canada and the country to the south or from overseas. But the fact remains that instead of the East furnishing a market for Western Canada the opposite is the case. As an illustration, take fresh fruits. Millions of dollars worth are imported into Western Canada, in addition to canned fruits and vegetables. Our fresh tomatoes are largely purchased from Eastern Canada. There is no manufacture of cheese worth speaking of anywhere in Western Canada, so that we have to buy practically all our cheese. We also get from the East all our leather goods, machinery, tools of all kinds, binder twine, rope, furniture, barbed wire, clothing, boots and shoes, and a multitude of other articles, so that instead of Eastern Canada furnishing a market for the West, we are continuously purchasing from Eastern Canada. I have no fault whatever to find with this condition of affairs other than the misrepresentation that we are subjected to, and I think in all fairness both sides of the case should be presented.

There are one or two matters that affect Western Canada particularly, and, incidentally, all Canada that I should like to refer to, and they have got to be regulated in some way or other, otherwise not only the prosperity of Western Canada but of the whole Dominion will be seriously interfered with. First, I refer to freight rates. Last fall a new schedule of freight rates was put into operation. Values of products in Western Canada were fairly good at that time and the increased rates did not seem so serious, but things have changed, and apart from wheat, which has retained a fair measure of the value that it had, other products of the West have reached a point where it is practically impossible to ship them any distance and receive any return. Now, this is a condition of affairs that cannot be permitted to continue if we are going to prosper not only in the West but in the East, as I do not think there is any doubt but that the prosperity of Eastern Canada depends on the prosperity of the West, and as the prosperity of the West increases so will the prosperity of the East keep pace with it.

Take oats as an illustration. At the present time it does not matter how close a man lives to the market, he may be in the province of Manitoba, but at the present prices paid for oats at the local point, after the shipper has paid his threshing bill and his freight to the head of the lakes in nine cases out of ten he has a debit balance. But when you get farther west what is the condition? We have cases by the score of actual loss, and I want to give the House one particular case of a carload of oats shipped from Northern Alberta. When the freight and commission charges had been paid—in fact, the commission charges had not been paid—a debit account was received by the shipper of those oats for $38 and some cents. In other words, he had $38 less than nothing for his carload of oats shipped from Northern Alberta. This, of course, is an extreme case, but nevertheless it is an indication of what we can expect in so far as the effect of freight rates upon Western Canada is concerned. Take livestock, at the present time the ranchers are laying their plans on the basis of $4 beef next fall. Now, Sir, if any one thinks that under the present high cost of production in the West the ranchers can hope to break even on a price of $4 per hundred for their beef, well, Sir, he will have to figure it out again, for it will be an absolute impossibility. Then, take hides, I know of a case that happened a few months ago, in fact, I was in the office of a large hide concern in our own city to whom had been shipped a first-class hide from a point only about forty miles from the city of Moosejaw, and the actual net return that was being sent to the shipper was forty cents.

An hon. MEMBER: He was lucky.

Mr. MAHARG: Yes. He was a lot luckier than some others who did not get any return. I merely mention these few instances to show what we can expect unless something is done to reduce freight rates on our railroads.

But those are not the only rates that require attention, and I have a suggestion or two to make to the Government tonight which I hope they will act on. For a number of years the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) has brought before this House a Bill to place the shipping on our inland waters under the control of our Railway Commission. Year after year he has introduced that Bill with a persistency that only he is capable of, but it has been repeatedly defeated. However, he is not daunted yet, and he is going to keep at it, and eventually, unless some other measure is adopted, his Bill will be accepted by this House. At the present time an inquiry is being held in the Senate through a committee appointed to inquire into the question of why so large a quantity of our western grain goes through American ports.

I will give you one reason why. They do not need to hold an inquiry there; they do not need to summon anyone to appear before them. All they need to do is to get the figures as to the lake freights charged, and they will have the answer. We have been endeavouring to bring the lake shipping under the control of the Railway Board, but we have been unable to do that. There is only one way in which the Government can accomplish this purpose without doing that, and it is by abolishing our coastal laws so far as inland shipping is concerned. I was talking to a prominent gentleman the other day when I was in Montreal with other hon. members, and the question came up why a greater proportion of our products were not shipped through the port of Montreal. I do not wish to mention names; the gentleman to whom I put the question has probably more to do than any other man with the regulating of the port of Montreal. I inquired whether it was a matter of facilities or of rates on the lakes, and the answer was that it was almost entirely a question of rates. The freight rate from the head of the lakes to the Georgian bay ports is almost invariably as high as the rate from the head of the lakes to Buffalo, almost double the distance. If you examine the map of Canada you will see what a circuitous route the grain has to take after it leaves the Georgian bay ports before it gets to Buffalo.

Now, there is the reason. The grain from Georgian bay ports has either to come around the lakes to Montreal in small boats or has to pay the overland freight haul. The grain is landed in Buffalo as cheaply as it is landed in the Georgian bay ports. I say that the only way to remedy that condition—that is, if the shipping on the lakes is not to be brought under the Railway Commission——is to abolish our coastal laws. Under our coastal shipping regulations a vessel loading at a Canadian port must unload at an American port, and vice versa, consequently our vessels going to the head of the lakes to take their load on at Canadian ports cannot unload at Buffalo; they must go to Georgian bay ports or other Canadian ports. The result is that the rates to the Georgian bay ports are pratically the same as the rates to Buffalo, practically twice the distance. American boats carry tremendous quantities of our grain, and whether they wish it or not they have to unload at American ports and the result is that they go on to Buffalo. There argument is this—and there is something in it—that they get a full return cargo from Buffalo which they cannot get from the Georgian bay ports. But why should we permit that condition to continue when it is so detrimental to our own interests? We have one of the finest ports for grain handling in the world. I think I have visited most of the shipping points in the United States, and I can say that they have nothing to equal Montreal. Why, New York is antediluvian compared with Montreal in the handling of grain. At the port of Montreal the grain can be conveyed for many miles. I do not know how many miles of belting they have now, but several years ago they had over four miles of overhead belting which enabled them to run the grain almost over the whole harbour and load it in boats almost anywhere at that port. They have not those facilities at United States ports on the Atlantic coast to the same extent. The only reason why so much of our grain can be handled at United States ports is because they have so many of them—Portland, Newport News, New York, Philadelphia, and so on. If all our grain had to go through New York, they simply could not handle it. Why, I ask, should we permit this condition to exist, when it is practically threatening the prosperity of our country? Something must be done at once to prevent these people from jumping their rates in the way they have done. It is not only the farmers of the West who are affected by this condition; the consumers of Eastern Canada are equally affected, because they have to pay their share as there is the long haul both ways. Why, then, should the consumers of this country have to pay double price for having their products carried across the lake? What excuse can there be for allowing this condition to prevail? In 1920 the rates on wheat from the head of the Lakes were practically double what they were in 1919. The sooner the Government takes this matter into consideration the better it will be for everybody concerned. It is true that the crop is only now being sown, but in a matter of three or four months it will be harvested and on its way again. Consequently if any action is to be taken in this matter it should be taken very soon, otherwise the purchasing power of Western Canada will be very limited—and we know what that means. We had a very severe lesson in that regard in 1913 and 1914, just as we have had this year. In 1913-14 the crops in Western Canada were very light, and everything became stagnant. This is not an after-war condition; we had it prior to the war. I make this statement that had we had the freight rates to pay in 1914 that we have to pay now, the condition would have been much more serious than it was; the purchasing power of the West would have been almost entirely eliminated. Unless we can remedy this condition in some way we cannot expect the purchasing power of Western Canada to be very great; indeed, it will be so restricted that the effect will be very serious upon the industries of the East. Up to the time of the drop in wheat in Western Canada business was flourishing all over the country, but it was only a matter of three or four weeks after that drop in price that those industries were curtailing their output, employees were being laid off, and eventually some of them were closed down. The reason for that can very clearly be traced to the loss of purchasing power in Western Canada.

Statements have appeared in the press recently with regard to the closing down of implement manufacturing concerns. Well, there is a reason for that. The farmers of the West have been purchasing only what it was absolutely necessary for them to purchase—and by the way, I have a little criticism to offer against the manufacturers of farm implements in Eastern Canada; perhaps it applies to others as well. Why should they refuse to accept their share of the loss occasioned by the reduced value of goods? Everybody else has had to do it; the farmers of Western Canada have had to do it. In fact, the western farmers are to-day accepting a loss of about 500 per cent in many cases by reason of the drop in prices. But what do we find? We find that, on the other hand, if we go to buy implements in the West, they have been increased in price all the way from 10 to 20 per cent. Why should the manufacturers not be prepared to accept a portion of this loss? They will accept it eventually; they are accepting it now, because their warehouses throughout the country are piled to the roof with implements, and there is an overhead charge going on which they will have to stand whether they wish to do so or not. It would have been good business for them to accept their share of the loss instead of increasing their price. I am not speaking from hearsay in regard to increases in price, because I had a personal illustration of this in the month of February before I came here for the session. I required an implement, and I called up a large distributing firm in the city of Moose Jaw which distribute everything in the line of farm implements. I asked the manager for a price on this special article, and he quoted a price to me, but he said: "Wait a minute; I do not know whether this has advanced in price or not; if it has not advanced, it is the only article that we sell that has not advanced in price from 10 to 20 per cent." He looked up his invoices, and he said that this particular article had not advanced, but that it was the only implement which they sold that had not advanced from 10 to 20 per cent. Their argument—and there is something to it, I suppose—is that the trade purchase their requirements of raw materials one year ahead. But they say that they have always been doing that, so that evidently they must have secured the advantage of the increase in the price of raw materials when they were advancing, because we know very well that implements advanced very rapidly until at the present time an article that we used to buy for $80 to $85 is costing us $220, $225, or $230 now. We used to be able to buy binders for $145 to $150; last year we paid $289 cash for them, and this year we shall have to pay $339 for them. How long can we continue in this business if this is the way in which things are going to increase in price? I bring these matters to the attention of the Government and of the people of Eastern Canada to show that any measures that tend to increase cost of production in Western Canada must react on Eastern Canada as well. It is impossible to escape that result, and unless the fullest co-operation is given in order to reduce the cost of production, I do not know just how it is going to be done and it certainly will not be done by increasing the cost of importations.

If I might be permitted to make a further reference to the Budget, the statement has been made that it is not a people's Budget; that it is a Budget for the manufacturing industry. I should like to draw the attention of the House to one item in the Budget, and to me it can be nothing more nor less than an attempt to compel everybody to use the middleman, as it were. Where goods are imported by wholesalers or others, the total tax that they will have to pay—the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will correct me if I am not right—is 3 per cent; but if a retailer or an individual or a group of individuals undertake to reduce the cost of living by purchasing his or their own requirements and importing them, the tax is 4 per cent. I do not know just what the argument is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. gentleman would like the exact rate, the tax to the manufacturer and the jobber on the local sale is 1½ per cent; the tax to the jobber on the imported article is 2½ per cent; the tax on the local sale from the manufacturer to the retailer is 3 per cent, and the tax on the sale from the importer to the retailer is 3 per cent. It does not make any difference in the cost whether it is imported by the retailer direct or whether it is imported through the jobber.

Mr. MAHARG: Why has the retailer, if he imports direct, to pay 4 per cent?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman does not get the point. The taxation on the article in Canada is 3 per cent. It makes no difference whether it goes direct or whether it goes through the middleman. The taxation on the article imported, by reason of the fact that the raw material entering into the article has not paid a sales tax, is 4 per cent. In any case, it does not make any difference whether the article is imported directly or indirectly, the tax is the same.

Mr. MAHARG: I fail to see the point in the minister's argument, for it states very clearly in Hansard that when a retailer or an individual imports, he has to pay 4 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. MAHARG: But if he purchases from a wholesaler, he pays only 3 per cent. If I can read the figures, that is the way in which the thing works out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the article goes to the wholesaler, the tax is 2½ per cent. If the wholesaler turns around and sells, as he must, to the retailer, the tax to the retailer is 1½ per cent. Two and a half per cent and one and a half per cent, the hon. gentleman sees, make four.

Mr. MAHARG: What is the object of imposing a tax of 1½ per cent on the jobber when an article is sold to him? You are compelling the wholesaler to buy from the jobber and the retailer to buy from the wholesaler.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. The terms "wholesaler" and "jobber" are used interchangeably. There are only the two sets of taxes in this case—to the manufacturer and to the wholesaler or jobber as the case may be.

Mr. MAHARG: I fail to see the point. In the one instance the retailer pays only 3 per cent, and in the other he pays, according to the minister's admission, 4 per cent. The minister shakes his head, but 3 and 4 are two distinct and different figures and that is what is in the resolution.

One other question, that I wish to bring to the attention of the House to-night and which affects Western Canada very seriously, is the railway situation in certain sections of the country. We have had the question of immigration before the House on two or three different occasions. We spent a good deal of time, and we are spending a great deal of money in connection with it; but as regards Western Canada, the sum total of your efforts will amount to nil unless something is done. The other day the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) gave some figures to show that, instead of increasing our population through immigration, we were losing it as far as the United States were concerned. That condition is more acute to-day than it was at the time those figures were compiled. We have in the West large areas where people have to draw their products anywhere from 40 to 60 miles over a country that is almost impassable. Rivers and streams have to be forded, and sand hills and other obstacles have to be surmounted in order that they may deliver their products to the market. We have in the Estimates in the neighbourhood of $800,000 for canals. When that Estimate was before the House, I said a few words in connection with it, and I intimated that a portion of that could very profitably be used, instead of in canals that would give us no immediate benefit whatever, and which could give us benefit only by the expenditure of hundreds of millions more, in the extension of branch lines in Western Canada. One of the reasons which the minister gave us was that we had to spend this money in order to save a monetary loss; that the works would crumble and decay if this money was not expended. That is a serious matter; but we have a greater and much more important loss going on continuously in Western Canada as a result of lack of railway communication into those several districts and that is this. We are losing our settlers continually from day to day. I have scores of letters to that effect from southwestern Saskatchewan and the conditions throughout the southern portion of Saskatchewan are similar. People are leaving the country by the score; there is not a district where people are not moving out, and the reason is because they can get no satisfaction whatever as to any prospect of relief in the shape of railroad facilities. But that is not the worst feature. There is a loss of life continually; there is a lack of education continually. You cannot expect school teachers to isolate themselves miles away from a railroad. Many of them are doing it, but there are many districts where school teachers cannot be secured. The parents of the children will stand these conditions for a time, but eventually they will move out, for the welfare of their children is much more to them than any monetary consideration. We have also in that country a lack of medical attendance. Doctors are miles away, and in some districts days away, from cases where they are wanted. The situation simply has to be dealt with, or it will become more and more serious every day. Why should we be spending all this money in Eastern Canada on canals, docks, harbours, and such like, when we are not spending a dollar to give relief to these people? The situation is such that unless some assurance of relief is given to these people you may as well stop your immigration so far as Western Canada is concerned. Further immigration would only increase the difficulty. You cannot secure land near the railways unless you have the money to purchase at a high price; you have to go to portions far distant from a railway. If money was spent in providing relief for these people in Western Canada, instead of spending these immense sums on works in the East which are not necessary at the present time, and which can only be available for use with the expenditure of hundreds of millions more, the results to Canada would be much more beneficial. It would be better to shut off immigration work altogether and use the hundreds of thousands of dollars you are spending on it to provide for the people you have here at the present time. I remember when the Prime Minister was in charge of the soldier settlement Bill, I made the statement that it was much better to hold in the country the returned men who had an interest in the country, than it was to assist those who had no such interest in the country. I said that it was all very well to assist them all, but a distinction should not be drawn between the two.

We are not only losing people from this country, but the infant mortality rate in the West is also very serious. Taking these two factors into consideration—the people who are moving out from day to day, and the high infant mortality rate—I am of the opinion that they will offset your immigration unless something is done to relieve the situation, and the last state will be worse than the first.

[Mr. Maharg.]

The expenditure on the Trent Valley canal was referred to by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) a day or so ago. He stated that this work was absolutely unnecessary at this time and that there was absolutely nothing to be gained by going on with it and spending the sum of $300,000. I could draw a nice picture of a tourist trade growing up along the Trent canal, and also of conditions in the West, that would furnish food for thought, and would be very illuminating, but I shall not take the time now.

With regard to the Welland canal, the Minister of Railways attempted to show to the House the other day that it had been of great benefit to the West in the reduction of freight rates, but he had to go back some thirty years to make his comparison. I would like to know how much wheat was shipped from Western Canada and went through the port of Montreal thirty years ago. I have been in the West over thirty years, and there was a very small amount being shipped out at that time. We did not have the railway system then that we have now, otherwise we would not have had to pay the rates that the minister claimed had to be paid in bringing the grain across the lakes. He stated that we had paid 20 cents a bushel thirty years ago for bringing grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal. At the present time the rail rates from the head of the lakes to Montreal is only 25 cents a bushel, and that is after we have had practically 100 per cent of an increase in the rates. We have had an increase of 15 per cent, another of 25 per cent, and another of 35 per cent. That goes to show that we have not received the benefit from the Welland canal that the minister would have us believe, and that the minister's figures were very misleading to the House. However, $500,000 has been voted for the Welland canal. I think that at least a portion of that money could have very well been spent in Western Canada, and I am sure it would have given much better results.

I have already detained the House too long. As a final word I would say to the Government that the situation in Western Canada demands serious consideration at the hands of the Government, and unless they have the interests of Canada as a whole at heart, and have a kindly feeling for our people, I can assure them that they will find the progress in Western Canada will be very, very slow. I make this statement, that the fewer immigrants you bring into Canada under present conditions, the better off Canada will be for some years to come.

On the motion of Mr. Cowan (Regina) the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Saturday, May 14, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

BOARD OF TRADE REPORTS

BLANK FORMS IN FRENCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on May 2, and again yesterday, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Déchène) asked that certain forms to be used by Boards of Trade in making returns should be printed in French for those who so desired them. I promised that I would make a statement on the matter to-day. I find that immediately after he brought the matter to the attention of the Government on May 2, orders were given for the printing in French of those forms. On inquiry to-day from the Under-Secretary of State, I find that he has been pressing for the completion of the orders for the finishing of the printing, but they were not ready, at least yesterday; he could not get an answer to his telephone message to-day, but these forms are expected at any time.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, May 13, the debate on the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I was exceedingly surprised and very much pleased. I was surprised because when I left Ottawa a year ago, I was in grave doubt whether or not it would be possible for the Dominion of Canada to provide the money necessary to meet the expenditures that we had provided for in the Estimates. On Monday, therefore, when the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) made his statement showing that we had a very substantial surplus over ordinary expenditure, that came to me as a very pleasing surprise. Next to that, what pleased me most as regards his statement and the subsequent statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), was the definiteness with which they laid their policy before the people of Canada. I am always pleased with public men who are clear-cut and definite. That is one reason why I have always admired the manner in which the Prime Minister has submitted his case to the Canadian people. I also notice that those of the official Opposition who have so far spoken in this debate, were definite in that they definitely showed that they had deliberately decided upon continuing their policy of indefiniteness. The manner in which they threw their two wings into the debate proves to me conclusively that they have entered upon this policy which has been all along a policy of duplicity and deception, for the purpose of continuing it as part of the game. First, they threw the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), leader of the protectionist wing, into the debate, and he led it exceedingly well. Immediately following him, they threw in the hon member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) leader of the free trade platoon. The part, however, about the leader of the protectionist wing that caught my eye the quickest, that appealed to me the most, was the manner in which he began to flirt with the Agrarian party. It was quite evident to me and, I think, to the whole House, that he was laying his plans to form a union as between the Agrarian party and his own, and in doing so he was simply following up the line of policy laid down by the leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) especially on his trip into Western Canada, where, day after day and week after week, he laboured to try to lead the people to believe that the two parties should be united. I came to the conclusion, I think very properly, that the leader of the Opposition had commissioned the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's to proceed immediately to Marquette and there negotiate another reciprocity pact. The hon. gentleman is well qualified to fill that role. He, as we all know, in 1911 was commissioned by the party to which he belongs to proceed to Washington and there to negotiate such a pact, and to conclude the treaty which would make Canada an adjunct of the United States. I fancy that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, when he reaches Marquette, will try also to complete a treaty which will make the Agrarian party an adjunct of the present Liberal Opposition. The question is whether he will succeed or not. I know of no man better qualified to do that work than he. I will say, without any hesitancy, that no man in the Liberal party stands higher in the estimation of the Western Canadian people than does the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. He is held in the highest respect, notwithstanding on some things many of them differ from him. A year or so ago, when the Liberal convention was held and it was found that he had not been chosen as leader of the party, I will say that about ninety per cent or more of the Liberals in Western Canada were disappointed, because they believed that he would be a very proper person to undertake such a task.

What are the chances of such a treaty being consummated? We know that our friends of the Agrarian party have always been free traders, and those who to-day are trying to make out that free trade is not a policy of any party in Canada, really do not know what the West thinks. I have lived amongst the grain growers out in the West long before such a thing as the Grain Growers' organization was started, and I know whereof I speak when I say that, after all those years amongst them, I know that they talk free trade, morning, noon and night. It is the only thing they talk about; it is the centre of their whole political platform. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) said, the other night, quite distinctly that while they might for a short time graciously permit protection to continue, yet free trade was their goal and at that goal they were aiming. In 1911, this same party existed and at that time their policy was to permit truck and trade with anybody, free from all hindrances whatsoever. I fancy my hon. friend would not have any trouble in forming such an alliance with them on that basis at the present time. He must remember that he can not wrap up his negotiations in any way with the Union Jack. He must not permit sentiment in any shape or form to enter into them. He must not permit good Canadianism to be of any consideration at all. It is simply a question with them of truck and trade, with profit as the only principle upon which the arrangement can be consummated. Has he any other ground for thinking that such an arrangement could be made, that such an alliance could be formed? Let us look at what has happened in the last three weeks. My hon. friend who preceded me in this debate last night, the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), has for many, many years been the president of the grain growers' organization of our province, and during the whole of that time he has talked of independence, and of nothing but independence. That was the only thing he believed in. Everywhere he went, and everywhere that the members of the party he belongs to went, they insisted that both political parties have been a failure. Independence was what he always advocated. He has consistently and persistently denounced everybody who in any way favoured party government. Party government, in his view, was a thing that must be abolished, but strange to say, some two or three weeks ago a peculiar thing happened. As I sat here one day and looked up into the gallery, I saw a very familiar face, that of a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect and admiration, the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan. I chatted with him up there for a while, and was very pleased to have the opportunity of doing so. A few days afterwards the hon. member for Maple Creek took the train for Regina, and strange to say a conversion must have taken place on that train, because when he landed there he evidently had forgotten that all along he had been denouncing party government, for he there and then immediately agreed to become a member of a party government —of the Liberal government of the province of Saskatchewan. These several conversions are indeed strange. The Prime Minister yesterday made reference to a gentleman named Lambert, who had written some very strong articles denunciatory of the policy of the present Agrarian party. He too was converted on call. As soon as another salary was obtainable in a different sphere, he immediately became converted. My hon. friend from Maple Creek also was evidently converted on the train that took him to Regina. Shortly afterwards, he boarded the train back to Ottawa, and on that train he evidently got converted back to his old condition, for he now appears in this House in the role of a first-class Independent. Last night he got quite indignant over the fact that somebody, to use his own word, had talked about an amalgamation between the Liberal party and the Agrarian party. As I watched him, however, I observed that his words were not half so bitter as the expression on his face; you had to see him to realize how bitter he felt over that suggested amalgamation between the Liberal and Agrarian parties. It seemed very strange to me how this gentleman could at one and the same time become a member of a Liberal government in one part of Canada, and then here in this House wax indignant at the very suggestion that he and his party should become allied with the Liberal party in this House of Commons. I fully expect that as soon as this House prorogues and we go back home, the hon. gentleman will again board the train for Regina, and if he travels on that same car he will get converted again; when he gets to Regina he will be as thorough-paced a Liberal as one could possibly be, he will assist a party government in carrying on the affairs of the province; there is no doubt at all that that is what will happen.

What does all this mean? It means that a basis is there laid for the work which evidently has been assigned to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's will certainly now be able to say: Here is one member of this Agrarian party, a very prominent member of it—and certainly of all its members he has been the most aggressive in the province of Saskatchewan—who is susceptible to those influences which led him into the Liberal fold and into a party government, so why not all the rest of them? That is what I say,—why not all the rest of them. If the hon. member for Maple Creek will go, they will all go; there is no question about that. They will follow him, because since he came back I have not seen any sign of his colleagues in the Agrarian party ignoring him, or slighting or snubbing him, or in any way indicating that they resent the course which he has pursued. Therefore, I think it would be just as well for my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's to continue his adjunctivism—to call it so—and probably in time he will succeed in forming the alliance he desires.

Yesterday I was rather surprised, in fact, shocked, at statements made in the House by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Pacaud). I had never heard him speak in the House before, and I was rather pleased with the style of his address, but a letter which he read to the House came as a very distinct surprise to me. It was a letter signed by Mr. Pootmans, who lives in the city of Regina, where I live, and whom I have always regarded and who has always been known there as the Vice-Consul for Belgium. The statements which the hon. member made in that connection last night were quite contrary to the facts, and did not convey to the House a true impression of the actual conditions. Before I read what he said, let me say that I thoroughly approve of that $25,000,000 loan to Belgium. We had been associated with Belgium in the war; we knew what the courage of the Belgian people was; we saw them stand four-square against the German hordes at a time when their stand meant everything to the British Empire and the Canadian people. We saw that, and if for no other reason than that the loan would be of assistance to Belgium in rehabilitating that country to something like the state it was in formerly, I would have been exceedingly pleased to have had that loan made; but apart from that, of course, there was the consideration of the trade which might come to the Dominion of Canada as a result of the loan. Well, the loan was made, and the hon. member for Megantic, speaking of it last night, used this extraordinary language:

> They made an agreement dated March 21, 1919, by which only one-fourth of this loan to Belgium could be available for the purchase of food stuffs, thus forcing the Belgian Government against their will to purchase manufactured goods and raw materials of manufacture to the extent of four-fifths of the entire loan. What was the result? Just what was to be expected.

Force the Belgian Government against their will to purchase manufactured goods? I would like to know if there is any power in Canada that could force Belgium to enter into an arrangement that it did not want to enter into—Belgium, which opposed her little army against sixty or seventy million men, the finest trained military force in the world. Would Belgium yield to a demand at the hands of the Canadian people? Could Belgium be forced to do something against her will by the Canadian Government? There is absolutely no truth in the suggestion,—you could not force Belgium; I have never yet seen the power in this world that could force Belgium to do anything she did not want to do. She preferred annihiliation to being forced to do something against her will. The Canadian Government had no such intention as forcing the Belgian Government. The Belgian Government is quite capable of taking care of itself. The agreement was made between the Prime Minister of Belgium, representing that country, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada (Sir George Foster), on behalf of this country. At that time Belgium was in such a position that she was in dire need of a great many things, one of her greatest needs being foodstuffs. We all know that while the war was on and for a short time afterwards, the people of Canada were constantly told that the people of Belgium had no shoes to wear, that they were going about barefooted, that they lacked proper clothing, and so forth; and I can quite understand that the Belgian representatives, in the face of these conditions, would be anxious to buy food, clothing and other necessaries as rapidly as they could be procured. Consequently they entered into this agreement of their own free will. Let me read further from the hon. member's speech:

> What was the result? Just what was to be expected. With the exception of $1,500,000—$277,000 in foodstuffs, $185,000 of which was for bacon, an article of food which made a name for itself during the war, and the balance for manufactured goods and raw materials—the credit was cancelled and the Belgian Government had to go to American bankers to secure our Canadian wheat.

This statement is wrong; it is untrue. The facts are that the Belgian Government entered into the agreement with the full understanding that it was good for a certain period, and a date was fixed in the agreement by which it was automatically cancelled. The Dominion Government did not have to cancel the agreement at all. The Government of Canada, had the Belgian Government so requested, could have renewed the agreement and extended it for a further period, but the undoubted fact is that the agreement automatically cancelled itself; and if during the whole time that it was in force the Belgian Government did not see fit to use the credit that was given them, then it was their own affair. As a matter of fact, they did use a certain portion of it, as follows:

[Mr. Cowan.]

Foodstuffs		$ 277,744 47
Steel rails		561,601 99
General manufactures:
Boots	$385,466 50
Underwear	184,096 00
Sweaters	112,716 00
Socks	213,851 50
		896,130 00
Total		$1,735,476 46

There is not a single article in that list of which the Belgian people were not in absolute need at the close of the war and for a considerable time afterward; but that left a substantial balance to the credit of that country. For foodstuffs there was used only $277,000 odd, and Belgium required for all her purposes, out of this credit of $25,000,000, only $1,735,476. So that the actual facts are a startling contrast to the statements submitted to the House. The fact is that the balance lay unused. It could have been used by the Government of Belgium had they seen fit so to do; but they did not, because—as I am pleased to state, and I know the House is equally pleased to know the fact—that country picked herself up with remarkable rapidity. The conditions that obtained at the close of the war were quickly overcome, and it is pleasing to reflect that the Belgian people and their Government were so active and energetic that they could soon recover from the effects of the war. Of course, we should have been pleased to supply them with goods, extending the credit, but the fact is that they did not need those supplies, and there is no reason whatever why anyone should denounce this Government because the Belgian authorities did not see fit to make use of the credit Canada gave them. The letter to which I have referred is one which, I must confess, I do not like. The concluding paragraph is rather significant, coming as it does from the Belgian Vice-Consul. That gentleman states:

> I hold this information from high authorities in Belgium, and would appreciate it if you kept me posted by wire upon any development in this line, to enable me to inform my friends in Belgium.

Now, there may not be any collusion to which my hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Pacaud), is a party, but there is certainly a suggestion of collusion on the part of men in high authority, and it does not look well for a member of the Canadian Parliament to be asked to keep this gentleman posted by wire—> —upon any development in this line, to enable me to inform my friends in Belgium.

What does it mean? I think the hon. member for Megantic should demand an explanation from the writer in order that he may be freed from the suspicion which the letter naturally casts upon him.

Mr. BELAND: Is Mr. G. Pootmans the Vice-Consul of Belgium at Regina? I understood he was not.

Mr. COWAN: I know that Mr. Pootmans has been Vice-Consul as long as I can remember him being in Regina. During the war he acted as Vice-Consul of Belgium, collecting money for the Belgian people from the citizens of Regina, who subscribed generously through him to the assistance of that country. He is known to the people of Regina as the Vice-Consul for Belgium, and unless he has resigned within the last few days, or has been dismissed, I am inclined to think that he still holds the office.

Mr. BELAND: A Mr. Pootmans is Vice-Consul of Belgium in Regina, but there is another gentleman by the name of Pootmans, and I understood that it was he who wrote the letter.

Mr. COWAN: I do not know of two men named Pootmans in Regina; this gentleman is the only man of that name of whom I know. Of course, I do not definitely state that it may not be a relative of his who has written this letter.

Mr. BELAND: That is my information.

Mr. COWAN: I know of only one Pootmans who holds the position of Vice-Consul in Regina. In any event, this concluding paragraph strikes me as one that ought not to be allowed to pass unchallenged. However, I leave that point.

Mr. BELAND: Can my hon. friend state whether the Belgian Government did not make an effort to get the Canadian Government to extend the period of credit?

Mr. COWAN: I am not in a position to make any such statement. I am simply stating what has happened, and I point out that this money lay there unused until the period of credit had expired. I do not know whether or not they made application to have the credit extended. The Government can answer that question; I am not in its confidence. I am giving the facts as they are, and that is all I pretend to do.

Now, my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), yesterday undertook to prove a lot of things in regard to the tariff. As I said before, the tariff is about the only thing those hon. gentlemen can really centre upon. It does not matter what happens, if it be vile, or bad, or injurious, the tariff is blamed for it. That is their policy all through. Yesterday he complained about the increase in the price of binders and, of course, the tariff was to blame for it; there is no question about that. These are the words he used:

> We used to be able to buy binders for $145 to $150; last year we paid $289 cash for them, and this year we shall have to pay $339 for them.

Well, we will assume that his words are correct; I do not know. I have reason to believe that the price of agricultural machinery, in keeping practically with the prices of everything else has gone up of late.. Assuming that what the hon. gentleman said is correct, the increase for that year, the first year mentioned, was 92.7 per cent. Again assuming that those figures are correct the increase for this year, the higher cost, will be 126 per cent. Let us grant all that. The question then is, what is responsible? Let me say to the hon. member for Maple Creek that nobody regrets the increase in the prices more than I do. I would like to see the farmers of Western Canada get their implements at a much lower price than they are doing, but I am not going to shut my eyes to facts and say that the tariff is to blame for that increase if it is not responsible. Why should we concentrate an agitation upon the tariff, to reduce the duties and bring down prices, if the tariff is not responsible for these prices? Did my hon. friend yesterday say that the tariff is responsible? In that case let me look at the increases in some other countries. For example take Australia, where they also use a great many binders. Quoting now from the Australian Budget speech of April last I find that the price in Australia for binders one year ago was £32, and the price this season is £120, an actual increase of 275 per cent—that is to say the price of a binder in Canada has increased by 126 per cent, whereas in Australia it has increased by 275 per cent. Well, if we are to follow out the reasoning of the hon. gentleman and blame the tariff for this high price and this increase, then they must have a very high tariff in Australia, because the cost of binders has increased there twice as much as in the Dominion of Canada. But what are the facts? The facts are that there is no tariff at all in the Commonwealth of Australia—absolutely none. So it is quite certain that the tariff cannot be responsible for that high figure, and that great increase. Will my hon. friend from Maple Creek now come forward and tell us that as there has been such a great increase in the price of this particular implement in the Commonwealth of Australia—the one he himself selected and as to which the increase has been more than doubled as compared with Canada—that because free trade prevails in that country therefore free trade is responsible for the increase and ought to be wiped out? It is the logical conclusion to come to, it is the only thing to do, if the tariff is responsible for that result. But let hon. gentlemen mark this: The increase is due to other causes than the tariff; the increases in prices in Canada have been just as great on goods imported into this country free of duty as on goods upon which a duty was collected. Let us, therefore, not concentrate our attention upon something that will not be of any avail. Let us rather direct our efforts to lines along which we can move definitely, and in a way which will be of some advantage to the people of this country.

The free trade wing of the official Opposition, and all the Agrarians, invariably insist that the duty increases the price of commodities. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said the other night "We cannot raise duty without raising the price to the consumer". The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) was even more definite. He took up the assertion which has been made, and is being repeated on practically every platform in Western Canada, that for every dollar that is paid into the treasury of Canada by way of customs, $3 goes into the pocket of the manufacturer. My hon. friends make no attempt to prove that statement and it is absolutely untrue. They simply make the bold assertion and let it go at that, and they have repeated it so often that they have actually come to believe it themselves. That is the position in which they are at the present time. As a matter of fact many instances can be cited to prove conclusively that the duty has lowered the prices in Canada to the Canadian consumer—there is no question about it at all. Why, my hon. friend from Brome declared the other night that in the United States they only paid three hundred odd millions in duties—a great big nation of 110 millions of people—whereas Canada, with a population of only 9,000,000 of people pays 165 milions. Therefore the conclusion is, according to his reasoning, that the tariff is much higher in Canada than in the United States. That again is incorrect. It is quite true that is the amounts the Americans paid, but why? Simply and solely because the tariff in the United States was so high that it compelled the establishment of manufactures in that country until to-day it is the greatest industrial nation in the world. They can, and do, produce everything they consume, the result being that the internal competition has so reduced prices that the consumers there have no reason to purchase from foreign countries. That is the exact position in the United States. Their tariff is higher than ours, a good deal higher, but there is the result; and the tariff of Canada, if continued and scientifically arranged, will probably have exactly the same effect in this country.

Now, I wish to give my hon. friends an illustration—I have already given two or three—just to prove what I say. I am glad to see my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle in the chamber and I would like him to take notice of the illustration I am about to give, in view of his statement that for every dollar paid in customs duty, $3 went into the pants pocket of the manufacturer. I am going now to cite some evidence that was submitted from my own constituency to the Tariff Commission when they went through the West last summer. In the city of Regina we have several manufacturing establishments,—and here, let me say incidentally, that while a lot of you hon. gentlemen believe that we have probably nothing but free traders in Western Canada, there are a great many people out there who entertain a different belief. In the city of Regina fully one-third of the people there are dependent for their living upon industrial establishments which could not exist if it were not for the protective tariff, so that we have a direct personal interest in this matter. I am going to speak now of an establishment which manufactures doors, sashes, etc., and employs 80 or 100 men—quite a large establishment for a western city. I was there when the managers of this industry submitted their statement to the Tariff Commission. What they did was this,—and they proved their case absolutely and conclusively—they submitted to the commission a printed price list and many of those present were customers of theirs who had purchased goods from them, and the firm knew that these customers would check them up if their price list was not correct. Well, their printed price list was submitted. Their nearest competitors in the United States are in Minneapolis and St. Paul, and they also presented the printed price of those competitors giving the figures respecting sashes, doors, etc., of the same size and quality that they themselves turned out, the comparison showing that the goods manufactured by the Canadian firm were sold in the city of Regina at a lower price than similar goods in the city of Minneapolis notwithstanding the 25 per cent duty, or protection as it is called. What does it mean? It means that the firm in question, by reason of the protection accorded, were able to build up an industry in the city of Regina which reduced the prices of these goods to the consumer, not only in the city of Regina but in such distant points as Winnipeg, and Lethbridge, right down to the international boundary. I know the argument will be advanced: Well, if they can manufacture these goods at a lower price than American firms what need is there for any duty? That is the stock argument of my hon. friends opposite. As to that I will read a few quotations from the evidence because it puts the facts in a clearer and more concise manner than I could do. I will therefore quote from the evidence and let it go on Hansard:

We manufacture doors etc., Generally speaking our protection is about 25 per cent, nevertheless our prices are usually on a par, and sometimes less than the prices of our United States competitors.

Minneapolis may be looked upon as our main point of competition. With the object of giving concrete comparisons between our prices and those of our American competitors I may say that a 24 x 24 window, two lights, which is an article on which a proper comparison can be made, was selling by our American competitors on March 1, 1920, f.o.b. Minneapolis at $5.35 subject to a trade discount of 35 per cent; on the same date we were selling a similar window for $5.15—

Note the figures, $5.35 and $5.15.

—subject to a 35 per cent trade discount with freight allowed to Swift Current, Saskatoon or Winnipeg, or where shipments were beyond those points with freight allowed to the places mentioned. On the same date the quotation of the same competitors for moulding was 50 per cent higher than ours and on April 9, 1920, mouldings which were sold by our American competitors at $1.50 sold by us at Regina at $1.20. A stock cross panel, or four panel door 2′ 8″ x 6′ 8″ x 1¾″ sold on March 1st by our competitors at $7.85, subject to a 20 per cent trade discount, was sold by us at $7.00 subject to a 25 per cent discount.

You will notice there a very substantial difference in favour of the Canadian manufacturer.

We desire to assure the Commission most sincerely that in fixing our prices we pay no attention whatever to the tariff or to the prices of our competitors, but do so on the basis of cost plus what we consider a fair profit.

And yet it is the regular assertion of hon. gentlemen opposite, reiterated day after day, that the Canadian manufacturers fix their prices by adding thereto the tariff. Here is a concrete case to the contrary, and I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to disprove it. The proof was submitted to the Tariff Commission, and I know it is absolutely correct.

Under the tariff as it at present stands only a very small quantity of American goods enter into competition with my output, and nevertheless as shown, the Canadian consumer is in no way penalized by the protection which I enjoy.

He is speaking as manager of the company.

Our prices are kept at their present low level—

Mark this, for it is the crux of the whole thing.

—owing to the large proportion of the market which we enjoy in the district served by us. Were the tariff to be removed Minneapolis firms would enter into competition with us, especially in Southern Saskatchewan and Southern Alberta where their rail haul would be about as short and their freight rates about as low as those with which we have to contend. Owing to the size of our competitors, their large output, and their large home-market, they would at once enter into competition with us at least in the district where the rail haul was favourable to them. If they succeeded, as they almost certainly would, in taking away some of our customers, our output would be correspondingly lessened and our overhead expenditure correspondingly increased, which would necessitate an increase in the price of our goods, which increase would make it all the easier for our competitors to cut farther into our field.

Under free trade we feel that we would have great difficulty in surviving. Under the competition which now exists among a large number of Canadian firms making goods of the same class as manufactured by my firm the consumer is amply guarded against unduly high prices, and we feel that to change the fiscal system of the country, thereby endangering the capital invested in businesses such as ours, and likewise endangering the employment of those who work for us, would be a mistake.

Now, I want to say to hon. gentlemen of the Agrarian party that the hundred men employed in the factory with their families are not only a benefit to the other residents of the city but to the farmers of the surrounding country. Many of those farmers to-day are making anywhere from $50 to $150 a month supplying milk and cream to these people who are earning their living manufacturing these goods which are protected, and which certainly would not be manufactured to the same extent if protection was removed.

Upon what grounds do my hon. friends of the Agrarian party insist that this tariff should be removed? They say most unhesitatingly that under protection there is no competition, that by removing protection you get competition and in that way you lower prices, that being the reason why they advocate the removal of the tariff. Well, let us take binder twine. I must ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) to forgive me for referring to it again after he so completely dealt with it yesterday, but I would like to submit a little statement to supplement what he said, and which I think is rather conclusive proof of what the actual condition is. It is also proof that removing the tariff does not lower prices, does not promote competition, does not smash combines or rings, and does not prevent gentlemen's agreements. And I am going to take one of their own party to confirm what I say. Most hon. members know the gentleman as well as I do—his name is J. B. Musselman, and his home at present is in Regina. To those who do not know the gentleman, I may say that he is the brains of the Agrarian party in Saskatchewan. On the streets of the cities and towns in that province the general assertion is "that the rest of them talk and he does the thinking," and that is about the truth. The whole organization in the province of Saskatchewan, revolves around J. B. Musselman. His particular duty for some time back has been to handle the binder twine end of their business. I will not say that he has made a financial success of it, I am pretty credibly informed that last year's operations showed a loss of $60,000, and the year before a loss of nearly $50,000, and I think those figures are pretty near the mark. Anyhow, he appeared before the Tariff Commission and this is the press report of what he said. The question was asked him by the chairman:

But why is it, with no tariff on binder twine, it is more expensive by twenty-five per cent, in Canada than the States. He couldn't say, but Musselman supplied the information and in an interesting sidelight he said the International Harvester Co., of Chicago, the largest manufacturers of twine in the world, set the price. Twine for this section comes from Brantford, but it was explained that they follow the price set by Chicago and in this case the difference is about the difference in exchange. Drayton wanted to know if the Brantford Twine Co. was a flourishing company, and Musselman said it was. "Well," said the chairman, "they said they couldn't pay the one-cent sales tax on the materials entering into their product so close was their margin of profit."

Now, mark what follows:

Musselman said they paid handsome dividends, anyway.

[Mr. Cowan.]

He must have been mighty close to the inside to find that out. He said:

I speak from personal knowledge.

Yes, he speaks from personal knowledge. And he was the gentleman who after the Hon. George Longley and others appeared before the Tariff Commission cautioned them against making such extravagant statements and advised them to keep to the truth. As he gave them that excellent advice, I fancy he is keeping to the truth himself.

"I speak from personal knowledge when I say that the Brantford company held this year that the price of binder twine was too high." "Then why didn't they reduce it?" queried Sir Henry.

Then I commend the following to those who say that free trade smashes combines and prevents gentlemen's agreements.

Musselman ventured the suggestion that the Ontario company did not want to offend the big International.

What does that mean? It means one of two things: Either there was a "gentleman's agreement" between this Brantford concern and the International Harvester Company, or the Brantford company was subject to intimidation at the hands of its big competitor. You have got to make your choice. Personally, I would rather submit myself to a gentleman's agreement, for in that way you would be robbed with a velvet-gloved hand, but in the other way you would be robbed with a bludgeon,—although either way they get your money just the same. That is why they have a higher price for binder twine under free trade than they ever had under protection. What does this mean? It means on the evidence of their own party that combines have not been smashed. The only difference is that now the combine is located in the United States. Well, while I do not like combines, no matter where they are located, I would rather see one in Canada where it would be subject to some Canadian control, than one in the United States or in any other foreign country which we cannot reach at all. But the fact is that the combine does exist. The fact is, that there has been no competition in prices and that this industry has been practically ruined. What good has free trade done? What benefit has come to us from it? I cannot see that we have benefited by it; on the other hand we have lost thousands of men who could have been engaged in the manufacturing of binder twine in Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people,—and certainly the Canadian consumers would have been no worse off than they are at present. So much for the grounds upon which the Agrarian party contend that the removal of the tariff would result in benefit to the Canadian people. I could cite many similar instances but I have not time.

However, I am going to devote a few moments to the free trade platoon of the official Opposition and see if they can give us any evidence as to the benefit of free trade in the way of smashing combines and so on. I am going to ask this platoon to take a trip across to England for a little while. I fancy that my hon. friend from Red Deer would be quite willing to go along with them, especially when he realizes the company in which he would go —because I am going to take this little platoon for the time being out of the control of the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and put it under the command of a man known all over Canada for his extreme Liberalism—his splendid Liberalism, I should say, his real, pure, genuine, honest, righteous Liberalism—a gentleman by the name of W. T. R. Preston. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have ever heard of him before; anyway no one, I am sure, will deny his Liberalism. I am not very well acquainted with the gentleman's history, but as I understand it he was sent over to England in some official capacity, he came back to Canada, and, according to a press report—I am taking this from a farmer's paper under date of March 9, last—at the last session of the legislature of Ontario he appeared before the Farmer Government of that province in connection with some inquiry that was being held, and gave evidence. Before I read the evidence which he gave on that occasion I should like to remind the House that the hon. member for Red Deer has day in and day out for years back been insisting that free trade was established in Great Britain to get cheap food for the British people—so that goods could be cheaply manufactured by cheaply paid workmen living on cheap food, and sent out into the markets of the world to compete with the products of other nations. That is his line of reasoning; that is the argument he has been propounding all along. Remembering that, let us see what Mr. W. T. R. Preston has to say in the evidence to which I have referred:

Mr. W. T. R. Preston appeared before a Special Committee of the Ontario House and advocated the establishment of apple warehouses in England for Ontario apples. He said:

"Losses of millions of dollars are sustained annually by Ontario because of the operations of a price-fixing ring in Britain." Mr. Preston charged that British consumers paid $25,000,000 annually for Canadian apples, the cost of which f.o.b. Liverpool was not more than $6,000,000.

"Free trade and no combines!" "Free trade and no rings!" "Free trade and cheap goods!" Yet this free-trade Liberal, a Liberal of the same school as my hon. friend from Red Deer, says that the operations of these people in England have resulted in their obtaining a profit of $19,000,000 out of every $25,000,000 worth of Canadian apples supplied to the British people.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Will my hon. friend oblige me with the date of that report?

Mr. COWAN: Yes, March 9 last.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That is, since the war.

Mr. COWAN: March 9 last, yes. At least, I think the war was over before that; I would not be sure—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): But it is still affecting prices.

Mr. COWAN: There is no doubt of that. But while it may be affecting prices it certainly is not affecting that ring over in Great Britain; they are still carrying on their operations in Great Britain and free trade exists in fact just as it did before the war. So that my hon. friend's argument in that regard does not amount to any more than his arguments usually do.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The hon. gentleman will have to ask the Prime Minister about that; he says the opposite.

Mr. COWAN: The Prime Minister is always able to take care of himself; I wish the hon. member for Red Deer could do the same for himself. What always amuses me is the strange inconsistency of these gentlemen opposite, who are always wanting free trade to help themselves and always wanting protection to help themselves. Just in parenthesis, I should like to remind my hon. friends of the Agrarian party who come from Saskatchewan of a little incident which occurred about three years ago when fifteen of us met in the city of Regina. All the members from Saskatchewan were there, the only one absent being the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder). At that meeting a certain request was made by the manager of the Saskatchewan Creameries, an institution subsidized to the extent of over fifty or sixty per cent of its capitalization by having that amount guaranteed by the Provincial Government. The Provincial Legislature of Saskatchewan has year after year passed resolutions demanding a reduction in the tariff. I do not blame them for that at all, although I think they do go beyond their province. But at that meeting the manager of the Saskatchewan Creameries came to us and stated that he wanted us to place an absolute embargo upon the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine. We asked him why; was oleomargarine unhealthful? No, he said, that was not the reason at all; if the embargo was put on, he pointed out, it would give him protection and would enable him to pay a higher price to the farmers for the cream that he was buying from them. So here we have the extraordinary spectacle of the manager of a creamery company subsidized by the Provincial Government, in a province which year after year passes resolutions in favour of a reduction of the tariff, asking us to assist him in the placing of an embargo, an absolutely prohibitive embargo, upon this article of manufacture.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Would the hon. member give me that gentleman's name?

Mr. COWAN: The manager of the Saskatchewan Creameries. The hon. gentleman was there; he knows him as well as I do.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I deny that; I was not there.

Mr. COWAN: There was not a man from Saskatchewan absent except the one I have mentioned. They were all there, the whole fifteen of us, and the hon. gentleman was there with the rest.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Does the hon. member not know the name of the gentleman he speaks of as manager of this creamery company?

Mr. COWAN: I just forget the name, but it was the manager of the co-operative creamery in Saskatchewan. There is only one manager, so there could be no mistaking him. We were all there, the whole bunch of us, so that there are plenty of witnesses.

Mr. LONG: May I ask whether the principle embodied in that request was endorsed at the meeting?

Mr. COWAN: No, certainly not. I simply wanted to bring out the point of the request that this manager was making; we did not endorse it.

Now, I am afraid I have far more material here than I can possibly deal with. I take this position, clearly, definitely and distinctly: that Western Canada has reached the point in its development where a protective tariff can be of benefit to it. I am prepared to admit that some time ago we paid the penalty for the benefit derived from the tariff by the rest of Canada. We have now reached the point where a very substantial industrial development is due in Western Canada, and I am not going to turn round and throw down the tariff just at the time when we need it most. There are many lines of industry which can be established in Western Canada, lots of them. Last night the member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) told us about the scores of people who were leaving southwestern Saskatchewan, his own district. That is probably true. But ever since I came into this House I have been drawing attention to what can be done in that district in the way of establishing a great industry. Has the member for Maple Creek ever given the slightest assistance to any movement which would result in populating that district with industrial people? Not a bit of it. I have never heard him offer a resolution on the subject. He can talk about wheat and I have no objection to his talking about that as much as he likes, because wheat is a very good thing to raise and I hope we shall do everything we can to assist the wheat growers —but there are other things which require attention, which can be developed, and I want to see those things looked after. I wish to place this article on Hansard, because I believe in posting the people of this country just as much as I can. This article relates to the constituency from which the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) comes more than any other, although it has reference also to two other constituencies. It is from the Regina Leader of April 30:

4 p.m.

When one considers that in Saskatchewan alone brick and tile buildings to the value of $8,375,744 were erected during 1920 and that only about $300,000 worth of brick and tile was manufactured locally, despite the fact that we have such large and valuable deposits of clays must convince anyone that this particular resource is in need of study and development.

It is not generally known that such articles as jam pots, milk jugs, bean jars, mixing bowls, and other lines of crockery are now being made of Saskatchewan clays and are finding a ready market in Eastern Canada.

I want those raw clays, not only mined in Saskatchewan, but manufactured in that province, and I want such duties imposed as will assist in having those raw clays manufactured there. The hon. member for Maple Creek, however, has never, so far as I can remember, raised a finger in support of any suggestion:

> The raw clay is mined in this province and shipped out for manufacture. If such products can be marketed successfully as far East as Montreal, then it is reasonable to expect that a local concern properly organized and with adequate capital might in a few years secure a fair proportion of at least the western market. This particular market alone is well worth capturing. In 1920 Western Canada used well over $28,000,000 worth of clay products in addition to its share of $41,000,000 worth of crockery imported from the United States.
> "With facts such as these" said Mr. Dunning, "we feel the department would fail in its duty were we not to devote some special effort towards the assistance of those clay plants already in existence as well as the development on a broader scale of such a valuable resource. Why should we be importing building materials at great expense when the very best of such materials are undeveloped at our very doors.

Those clays are all located in southern Saskatchewan, the very district that, the hon. gentleman deplored, the people are leaving. Why not give every assistance that we can to build up this industry in that district and thus keep those people there, instead of taking a course which is driving them out of our country? It may be interesting to my hon. friend to know that this was an interview given to the press by a gentleman who is his colleague now in the Saskatchewan Government, Hon. Charles Dunning, and I rather commend him for the last lines of it:

> Why should we be importing building materials at great expense when the very best of such materials are undeveloped at our very doors?

That is an excellent sentiment, and I am glad to see that the Liberal Government of Saskatchewan is getting that view. It will be of great benefit to Western Canada if the grain growers' organizations will get the same view, and I am glad to say that some of them are coming to that view. Just a short time ago, the farmers of Alberta met, and they passed this resolution instructing their executive to make inquiries:

> The convention asked the association executive to investigate possibilities of manufacturing leather and cotton products in the province and so avoid the long railway pull east and west.

In my candid opinion, in the two lines of that resolution, there is more development, more enterprise, more Canadianism and more good business than is contained in all the speeches delivered by members of the Agrarian party since I came into the House. That is real business; that is doing something in our country. Why should we not do it? As regards those clay products, my suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), before he brought down his Budget, was a very definite one, and I do not care who knows it. I am sorry that he did not act upon it. I asked him so to arrange his tariff that we might have a larger capital invested in those industries in Western Canada, especially when we consider that, in Saskatchewan alone, brick and tile buildings to the value of over $8,000,000 were erected in 1920, and that only about $300,000 worth of brick and tile was manufactured locally, and that in 1920 Western Canada used well over $28,000,000 worth of clay products, with only a comparatively small quantity manufactured in Saskatchewan. We must get away from the idea that the only thing we can do in Western Canada is to raise wheat. I am glad to say that we can raise wheat; raising wheat is a splendid thing to do, and wheat growers should be given every possible encouragement. But at the same time we want established in Canada every industry that can be established and I am going to bend all my efforts in that direction.

In a recent debate the hon. member for Maple Creek read a few lines from a pamphlet which I had issued once upon a time with a very lurid heading, and as I had no right to reply, I should like to state my views now. I will not refer to that debate, because I might be out of order, so hon. members must not consider that I am quoting from that debate at all. The hon. member quoted something that apparently showed that I had some objection to manufacturers. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is this, that I see a difference in the manner in which various Canadian manufacturers are dealing with the western markets. There is a big difference in the views with which they look upon the policy of protection. The policy of protection, as I understand it, as enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald, has for its principle the establishment of industry in Canada so that our people will be able to develop their natural resources and thereby give work to thousands of men. The idea of protection is that Canadian manufacturers will manufacture so as to supply the Canadian market. The idea is not that a manufacturer shall manufacture a very small quantity and get a very high price for it, making his profits in that way. Probably there are in Canada a few manufacturers who are doing that; but the great bulk of them are playing the game squarely, and I want to differentiate between the two. When I find a manufacturer playing the game according to the spirit and intent of protection, I give him all the consideration that I posibly can. If I find a manufacturer who is not doing so, he must take the consequences. I do not think I have any reason to regret the course which I took, speaking in that way.

Let us look at the situation in Western Canada. We find that many lines of goods are coming into that part of the country. Our people are a music-loving people; indeed, I fancy there is not another part of the American continent in which the homes of the people are better supplied with musical instruments than Western Canada. Go where you will, you will almost always find a piano in the home. Of what make? I have not seen more than two or three American-made pianos in Western Canada, and I never saw one of English make. Practically every one of them is of Canadian manufacture, and although there is a duty of 25 or 30 per cent on pianos, I have never heard anybody in the West complaining of the duty on pianos. That means that manufacturers of pianos in Eastern Canada have grasped the spirit and intent of protection, and they are carrying on their factories to the limit, employing as they do, thousands of men, as many as the Canadian market will warrant them in employing, the result being that they are not only supplying us, but keeping thousands of men in employment, giving a direct return to me, for every one of those men is assisting me in my duties of contributing to the treasury of this country and carrying on Governmental affairs. There is not a man in Canada at work but is a benefit to me, even though he lives 2,000 miles away in another part of Canada.

Practically the same thing is true as regards stoves. A few may be found in Canada that are manufactured in Chicago or in other parts of the United States, but the great bulk of our stoves and furnaces are manufactured in Canada. Let me commend the spirit of these eastern manufacturers; they are living up to the spirit and intent of the protective tariff, and they are manufacturing for the whole of the Canadian market.

[Mr. Cowan.]

The same thing may be said of boots and shoes. I fancy that ninety per cent of our boots and shoes come from Eastern Canada; in Quebec hundreds and thousands of people are making their living by supplying us with boots and shoes, and they are supplying them just as good and cheaply as boots and shoes can be bought on the American side. I know this, because I have bought them recently in both countries. If there is a little bit of extra cost, if the compensation is there I am quite prepared to pay the price.

But when we come to some other lines I must say that we find a very great difference. It may be that the difference is due to the tariff on the three lines I have mentioned. The duty has been about 25 or 30 per cent. But when we come to agricultural implements we find that the duty has been only from 12 to 15 per cent. And what has been the result? You can go into the city of Regina, which is said to be the largest distributing centre of agricultural implements in the world, and from now until late in the season you will find the warehouses full of agricultural implements, and not only the warehouses full to the doors, but acres and acres of land covered with agricultural implements. You can go through those warehouses and over those acres of land covered with agricultural implements and you scarcely find a Canadian-made machine. You will see separators by the hundreds from the United States, and binders and everything else. I regret that that is the case. Why is it that in agricultural implements our Canadian manufacturers have lost the western market, while in other lines they have been able to hold that market? Is it due to the business management of the companies? Let us take the Massey-Harris Company, for example. I venture to say that the Massey-Harris binder is as good a binder as you can get anywhere; it gives just as good satisfaction as any other make, and our farmers would be glad to buy it if they could always buy it, but they cannot. Let me give an illustration. Three years ago a man came into my office from a town about one hundred miles from Regina, and he was very wrathy. He told me that he dealt in these agricultural implements, and this was his story. Following their usual custom the farmers out there had come into town and told the dealer that provided their crop ripened they would require a binder. That is the usual practice, and I cannot blame the farmers for that, because there may be a hail storm or a blight and the whole crop is gone, or once in a while—but very rarely now, I am pleased to say—a frost will come along and the whole crop will be destroyed, and the farmer, of course, would then not need a binder, so they take the precaution of giving a conditional order. Well, this dealer had received sixteen orders for binders, and when the crop ripened the farmers all demanded their binders at the same time, because the crop ripens about the same time. They came in for their sixteen binders, and the agent was able to supply them with only one. The rest had to go across the street and buy American binders. All I have to say is this: There must be something wrong in the business management of that concern. Perhaps this agent was not financially able to carry these binders; I do not know enough of the financial arrangements as between the company and their agents to say, but I do know that the Americans have their machines there when they are wanted, while the Canadian manufacturers have not theirs there, and the result is that they canot sell them.

I was very much interested in the evidence given by the representative of the Massey-Harris Company before the Tariff Commission. There is one part of his evidence which indicates to me just where they have fallen down, and where I think probably some other Canadian manufacturers have fallen down. This man gives some very good evidence. He says:

> Two political parties have placed "free agricultural implements" in their platform, and I come before you on the defensive, for reasons to be touched upon later. I submit that there is considerable public opinion, particularly among the farmers of Western Canada, in favor of free trade in farm implements, but I submit, and will endeavour to prove, that this opinion has been based upon false promises, due to a political and newspaper campaign over the past fifteen years or more, which has systematically misrepresented the position of the agricultural implement makers of this country. So persistent have been the false statements made that they have long ago been accepted by a large number of people as facts. We have not endeavored in the past, to any large extent, to meet the allegations sown broadcast, because, in the first place, they seem too grotesque to be accepted.

They have not made any attempt. Well, who on earth did they expect was going to get up and defend this firm against their rivals? Did they expect their rivals to do it for them? Did they expect the municipal councils to meet and pass resolutions in favour of the Massey-Harris Company? Did they expect this Government to do it for them? I say that this firm has fallen down in salesmanship. They have not had their men there to sell their machines, and the result is that they have to a large extent lost that market, just as other manufacturers of other lines of goods have lost it. The hon. member for Maple Creek takes the ground that as some company in the East in years gone by refused to sell their machines, the only thing for the farmers to do was to buy them in a foreign market. There I differ with him. When I see a defect in the Canadian trade system, I want to find out just what that defect is, and remedy it. That is where he and I differ. He says: I will jump the country altogether; I will not having anything to do with Canadian manufacturers or Canadian-made goods; I will buy my goods in a foreign market. That is a mighty unpatriotic thing to do, and shows a mighty un-Canadian spirit; that is what I believe, and I have no hesitation in saying it.

I have spoken of the acres and acres of land out around Regina that are covered with American-made agricultural implements. Take that army of unemployed that the hon. member for Maple Creek spoke of yesterday—he said there were 200,000; I do not know whether that is correct—or take our returned soldiers who are to-day out of employment, and there are a number of them, I am sorry to say, and show them this host of machines and tell them that they were made in the United States;—what do you think they would say? They would say: Why not let us manufacture some of them? I want to know why our own men in Canada should not be manufacturing these goods. If they were, we would not have a single idle man in Canada to-day. My opinion is that we should adopt in all lines of goods a policy as a government, and also as a people in favour of purchasing Canadian-made goods. That is what I buy whenever I can, and I have done so for the last twenty-five years.

In closing, I want to refer to a campaign that is being carried on regularly and persistently by my friends of the Agrarian party. Wherever they go they make this assertion—I have heard it from a hundred platforms: Both political parties in Canada have been an absolute failure; wipe out both of these parties and put us in power. The hon. leader of the Agrarian party varies that just a little bit. I noticed not very long ago, in MacLean's Magazine, he said this:

> A Government can rarely rise above the source from which it derives its origin and though many able and disinterested men freely gave their talents and energies to public life, the level of our governments in both the Federal and Provincial spheres has been deplorably low and their efficiency and foresight have often left much to be desired.

I want to say to my hon. friend, as I have said many times at many different gatherings—and I have addressed many young men's and young women's clubs—in politics, as in business, never to try to succeed by tramping on the neck of your enemy. Try to succeed by your merits, and by your own merits alone. I pass that suggestion on to my hon. friend. When he tries to succeed by denouncing and condemning everybody else in Canada, I do not think he is doing himself any credit at all. What is the position? What is a "failure?" How do we judge it? I would say, by the results. What have been the results of the two-party system in the Dominion of Canada. As long as I can remember, long before Confederation, we have had two parties in this country; we have never had anything else except party government in Canada—either a party government, or a union of the two. In provincial and federal politics that has been the rule. We can therefore say that Canada as it is to-day is a result of the efforts of these two parties. Our educational system in the various provinces of Canada to-day, whatever it may be, is due to the efforts of these two parties; our judicial system, our whole Canadian citizenship as it stands to-day, is the result of the efforts of these two parties. And I challenge any of my hon. friends in the Agrarian party to rise in his place in this House or anywhere else and say that he would exchange his Canadian citizenship for citizenship in any other country in the world. They dare not do it. I challenge them to do it. To-day Canadian citizenship stands high simply because we have had the dual party system in this country, the system that has produced such men as Gladstone, Disraeli, Lloyd George, Washington, and Abraham Lincoln. I say, Sir, that we have a splendid Canadian citizenship because we have had two parties, and it ill becomes the hon. gentleman to say that both parties have been a failure. The condition of Canada to-day speaks for itself, and is ample evidence of the beneficent effects of the two-party system. Now, Sir, I am sorry to have delayed the House so long. Much of what I had intended to say I have omitted owing to pressure of time, but I thank hon. members for bearing with me in the remarks I have made.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): The hon. member who represents the constituency of Regina (Mr. Cowan), has made some very bold statements, but I must remind him of the fact that a mere assertion does not prove his case. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman has ever used any binding cord; I do not think so.

Mr. COWAN: Of course. I was born and brought up on a farm.

Mr. REID: I will take the hon. gentleman's word for that, but quite evidently he knew enough to get away from the farm where the drudgery was to be found. He made a statement in regard to the tariff which I will deal with later; I will not refer to it just now. He gave to Mr. Musselman, the secretary of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, a very high recommendation; in fact, he said that that gentleman was the brains of that organization.

Mr. COWAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID: I am glad to know that there is one man in the city of Regina whom the hon. gentleman is prepared to put nearly on a parity with himself. In speaking about binding cord, the hon. member tried to prove that this article was dearer under free trade conditions than under protection. I know a little about the price of binding cord, having bought it for many years, both under protection and under free trade. During the war—I am speaking from memory, but I am pretty sure that I am nearly within the mark—the highest price paid, at the peak of conditions in war times, was 25 cents per pound, and the highest price in normal times—under protection—was 22 cents per pound. Now, let us take a low figure in normal times under free trade conditions. Has my hon. friend any idea what the price of binding cord was in normal times, before the war, under free trade conditions?

Mr. COWAN: Will the hon. member please repeat the question, I was not listening.

Mr. REID: I know my hon. friend cannot answer the question, anyway. He also made the statement that at a certain meeting in Regina the manager of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Creameries was present and asked us to back up protective measures so as to help out the creameries in Saskatchewan. My hon. friend could not give the name of that gentleman, but I should like very much to get it.

The hon. member, since he came to Ottawa, I observe has undergone a change of heart in regard to the Canadian manufacturers. I know very well, and I am sure he will not deny this, that before coming to Ottawa and falling under the subtle influence of the party to which he belongs, what he had to say was very different from his opinions now. I shall read from a pamphlet issued by my hon. friend, a copy of which he was kind enough to send me. I will not record on Hansard the title of the pamphlet; I will respect my hon. friend to that extent. He said:

Go over to the North side of Regina and in half an hour you will see what a wrong conception the Canadian manufacturer has of the Canadian tariff. Acre after acre with foreign made goods; here and there a Canadian made machine—that exception amply testifying to the small soul and narrow vision of the manufacturer who made it.

Can we give employment to our returned men when that condition prevails? Can we be considered industrially alive when that is the established order? We Canadians have time after time declared our faith in a protective tariff, and I am a protectionist yet, but I would be darned well ashamed of myself were I a manufacturer enjoying 35 per cent tariff and still see foreigners running off with most of my preserve. There is something wrong with the Canadian manufacturer; he wants a jolt; a head-on collision, as a matter of fact something that will knock him clean out of his state room into the day coach where he can get some idea of what surrounds him. Grit or Tory or Unionist has no objection to being decent to him as long as he is alive; but we are tired carrying a corpse. These dead men who imagine they are going to feed returned men on tariff are a menace to our country to-day.

If they will but shut up and get busy and make goods—

Mr. COWAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID: I am reading the hon. member's words.

Mr. COWAN: That is just what I said.

—selling them at a reasonable profit, so that they will sell them, and thereby make more goods, thus employing returned and other men, we could forgive them. But if they start any more of this doling out tariff from their measly little shops where tariff and profit are the chief things they manufacture (except nerve), then they had better quit, for our country is in no mood to tolerate their unprogressiveness and lack of enterprise. Western Canada at least will tolerate a tariff more willingly than they will manufacturing sloth. If the tariff is designed to increase manufacture, and thus give employment, then it must do what it is designed to do, or cease to exist. A market big enough to keep every returned soldier employed exists and it is not proposed that the tariff beneficiaries shall by means of that interpretation of the tariff which yields big profits on a small output rather than small profits on a big output, prevent our returned men from engaging in the supply of that market. The contracted conception of his duty as a manufacturer enjoying exceptional privileges,—

Mr. REID: I want the hon. member for Regina to hear this:

—which our manufacturers have, is the biggest stumbling block to-day in the way of getting employment for our returned men. If our manufacturers are to get the profits of a protective tariff then they must at least make an attempt to supply the goods that the tariff protects. Otherwise the tariff has no virtue. Who in Canada will say that our manufacturers have been equal to our Canadian market? Go into our stores and buy Canadian goods if you can, and there get your answer. Our warehouses the same. Wake up manufacturers, and make your factories Canadian size. If you don't the Government will be justified in wiping out every vestige of protection you have."

This is the reason why I say that the hon. member for Regina has evidently experienced a change of heart, no doubt due to some influence that has been brought to bear upon him of which I am not aware.

I listened yesterday, Mr. Speaker, with considerable concern, to the tirade of abuse which the Prime Minister directed against this little group of Progressives. He tried to make out that we were allied with the Liberal party, or that the Liberal party was cooing and wooing us and that we were flirting with them. I believe the Prime Minister, in a moment of weakness, forgot himself when he indulged in statements of that kind. I was not aware of the existence of any such cooing and wooing; but when the right hon. gentleman ventured the assertion I exercised my mind in order to see if I had ever felt that thrill,—that thrill almost unexplainable,—which you experience when you are being courted. After indulging in that mental exercise for a considerable time I recalled the fact that I had been wooed a little, and cooed at a little, and flirted with a little, but it was when I occupied a seat on the Government side. Now the Prime Minister in his imagination professes to think we are married to the Liberal party. His peroration, however, reminded me of a story which I read long years ago in my school books. It was of a certain fox who was very fond of grapes and had got into a vineyard. He saw a most beautiful bunch of grapes hanging up and he said "I must have those grapes." He endeavoured, time after time, to seize those grapes but they were beyond his reach and finally coming to the conclusion that they were unattainable he declared "I do not want those grapes, they are sour anyway." So the Prime Minister in a moment of weakness, said "I will fling the Progressives into the ranks of the Liberals and let them stay there." But, Mr. Speaker, the Progressives are still on the cross-benches; we are still there unhampered by any party ties other than our own. We have been wooed by my good friends opposite, who are the supporters of high protection and special privilege, but we stand to-day in the middle of the road.

The hon. and gallant member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) in his very excellent and illuminating speech made one outstanding statement that I cannot agree with, and I am sure that it must have been based upon an error in calculation. My good friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) also said that the United States tariff is much higher than ours. I have his actual words here; he said: "A good deal higher than the Canadian tariff." Let me make this reply to both hon. gentlemen: I find that our customs tariff taxation per capita last year was $22.55, whereas the United States tariff taxation per capita was $3.15. If my good friend from Regina was a labouring man and had to support a family of five children on wages that amounted to only $500 or $600 yearly what would this mean? That in Canada the average family of five would have to pay a tax, from which they could not possibly escape, of $112.75, whereas the same-sized family in the United States would only have to pay $15.75. It should also be remembered that to that taxation we are adding a sales tax which will represent a total payment in the case of the average Canadian family of $147.75. I would like my hon. friends opposite to try and put themselves in the position of the average labouring man, of the navvy if you like,—the cheapest class of labour. These men generally have the largest families to raise; they have Israel's blessing.

Mr. LALOR: On what does my hon. friend base his statement that there is a per capita payment of $147?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I say that our customs tariff taxation per family of five is $112.75, taking our population at nine millions; and if you add the sales tax to that you will get $147.75. My hon. friends opposite can work it out at their leisure; if they make the amount less it will be all the better for the people of Canada.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That must be per family, it cannot relate to the individual?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): For the purposes of my calculation I took a family of five; my hon. friend could not have been listening to my remarks.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I was, and I took the statement down.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then your pencil is crooked.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) for whom I have a high regard because he is a pretty level-headed man, gave utterance to one statement that I agree with entirely. He said that a great deal of the Estimates voted could be saved especially in regard to the Trent Valley canal. I am not going to dwell on the subject of the Trent Valley canal, we have had enough of that; but I agree with the member for North Oxford, that this Government is spending money at the present time that could well be saved. The works upon which this money is being expended might well stand until our financial position is better. With all due respect to the Government it has got into the habit of spending millions during war time, it has become extravagant; and I am sorry to say that although we on this side of the House held the Administration up for two nights trying to persuade it to curtail the expenditure we did not succeed. What happened? By resorting to the closure, and by the aid of a majority vote, the large appropriations in question were put through. The works on the Welland canal could also wait until our financial position has improved. By exercising economy we could save millions of dollars, and thereby reduce the taxation which is bearing so heavily on our people to-day. With another statement that my good friend from North Oxford made I cannot agree; I do not think he had seriously considered what it meant. It was that we should not buy goods in the United States until they accept our dollar at par. That sounds very well, but there is a "but." Supposing Great Britain were to say to us, "We will not buy your products until you take our pound sterling at par," where would we be? I think my hon. friend will be rather sorry that he made such a statement.

Now, in regard to the tariff, my hon. friend from North Oxford says that he has figured out very carefully just what the tariff on agricultural implements means to a farmer producing grain. I do not know whether his figures apply to an Ontario farmer or to a Western Canada farmer. But he says that the tariff on agricultural implements means a toll of one cent on every bushel of grain which the farmer raises. To save time, I am not going to contest his figures, although my own opinion is that the toll amounts to very much more than a cent a bushel; for the sake of argument we will assume that he is right. Taking his own figure it would give the manufacturer $8,653,600. Of that total Western Canada would pay $6,967,546. Now, Sir, I should like my hon. friend from North Oxford or any other hon. gentleman to show me how the manufacturer justifies himself in taking this toll out of my grain. He does not ask me whether I am willing or not, but he takes that toll. What do I get in return? The days of toll gates are long gone by, and yet our manufacturers persistently take this toll from my grain and from every other farmer's grain, according to the hon. member for North Oxford.

But, Mr. Speaker, the tariff on agricultural implements is only one of the items which we say are unjust. Why should the necessary articles of food and clothing be taxed? Do we never think of the poorer labouring class, the navvy for instance, perhaps the lowest paid of any class of labour? Do we never think of their children going about poorly clad and shivering for the want of warm woollen clothing to protect them against our cold winters? While our manufacturers of textiles are enjoying a tariff of 35 per cent, I am told on very good authority that their capital stock is very heavily watered, and that they are making huge dividends even on that watered stock. It is unthinkable, Sir, that any government should protect such an industry and penalize the great masses of the people, who, unlike the wealthy, cannot take a jaunt to a foreign country to buy expensive goods and smuggle them into Canada.

My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Casselman) in his speech, bewailed the fact that the farmers' organizations, as he called us, were making such rapid strides, but he admitted that we were entitled to representation in Parliament, although he thinks we have no right to try to get control of the government. Well, it naturally works out that those who are entitled to representation have, of course, a chance of getting control of the government. Then he made reference to the Government of the province of Ontario. It seems to me that the people of that province are quite satisfied with the government which they have to-day. But while my hon. friend was decrying that government I wondered: Are there any other timber limits left in his province for the Farmers' Government to graft? It seems to me that nearly all the timber limits have already been given away.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Does my hon. friend know how many square miles of timber limits the present Government of Ontario have given away, and how those grants compare with grants made by former governments of the province?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Is my hon. friend able to tell me how much grafting was indulged in by the late Conservative Government in that province, of which he is a consistent follower?

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): There was not any.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Is not my hon. friend aware that the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario at the present time has a reputation which the less said about the better? In fact, it was so besmirched that his party had to dip him into a barrel of whitewash. Then what did they do? They made him their leader and patted him on the back, saying, "Well done, old fellow; go and get some more graft."

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Will the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): You will have your chance later on.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): What have we to do with that government anyway? You should be in the local house.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) the other evening made a vicious attack—and it is quite common at the present time in this House—on the Progressive party. He was especially severe on our leader, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and it seemed to me that he was happiest when he was slinging the greatest possible amount of mud. He reminded me of a story which I have heard told of the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. During a political campaign he was walking past an orchard with one of his colleagues, who drew his attention to two magnificent apple trees quite close to the fence underneath one of which were a large number of stones, brickbats and sticks, and he asked Sir John: "What accounts for all those things under that tree?" "Oh," said Sir John, "that is easily explained. The boys know the tree with the good apples on it." And my hon. friend from Frontenac knows that the hon. member for Marquette is our leader, and that is why he hurls all his thunder at him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I purpose to examine into the workings of this Government. I have read in the good old Book, "By their works ye shall know them"—my friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) will correct me if my quotation is not right.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I have made the statement that this is a high-protectionist Government, a Government that is supported by high-protectionists, and in my humble way I am going to show that many of the Government's actions demonstrate this. Take, for instance, the personnel of the directorate of the Canadian National railways. Is organized labour or organized agriculture represented on that board? I am sorry to say it is not. One of the directors appeared before a committee of this House appointed to inquire into matters affecting the Canadian National railways and shipping. I shall not mention this gentleman's name; he is a Western man and a good business man for whom I have a great deal of respect. But the point I want to make is this: mistakes are liable to happen through not having on that board of directors a representative of labour and a representative of agriculture. Speaking before this committee, my good friend of whom I have spoken said that in his opinion passenger rates should be reduced because passenger travel was voluntary, while freight rates should not be reduced. Present freight rates are altogether too high—so high that grain cannot be produced in Western Canada to-day at a profit; in fact, the balance will be on the wrong side of the ledger. Prior to the war, in normal times, the rate per 100 pounds for bulk grain by the carload from my point of shipment, in Yorkton district to Fort William was 17 cents. Now, on 100 pounds; last fall I paid 30½ cents for the same quantity, very nearly double what it was before. Subsequently it dropped one cent, and it stands to-day 29½ cents. Then, take the rate from Saskatoon, a central point in Saskatchewan. The rate on 100 pounds of bulk grain from Saskatoon is 36½ cents, giving us a rate on wheat per bushel of 21.19 cents. From the Prince Albert district we find we have a charge per 100 pounds of 37½ cents, or, by the bushel, 22.50 cents. As you get further west the rate is prohibitive; from Calgary it is as high as 24.30 cents per bushel.

5 p.m.

About twelve years ago, I think it was, the Government of Saskatchewan appointed a royal commission to inquire into the cost of producing a bushel each of wheat, barley and oats. The commission travelled throughout the length and breadth of the province; farmers were asked to give figures as to the cost of production; and the average amount stated by old-time farmers as the cost of producing a bushel of wheat was 66 cents, and, in the case of oats, 26½ cents, over a period of ten years. I doubt very much whether we could produce wheat to-day at a cost of less than $1 a bushel, because since the time that the commission made its inquiry wages have gone up almost one hundred per cent and freight rates have nearly doubled. As to the cost of machinery the hon. member for Maple Creek gave the figures last night. We used to buy a seven-foot binder for $145 or $150; this year our binders have gone up 20 per cent above what they were last year, and they are now costing us over $300. Now, I am not speaking for the farmers alone. The condition in Western Canada is serious enough to make our Government sit up seven nights in the week, and even at that they would still have some thinking to do. The condition affects not only the agriculturists; it affects the merchants and business men. If the farmer cannot sell his products he cannot pay his debts, the merchant cannot pay his debts to the banks, and the banks cannot get their money. I believe I am well within the mark when I say that in some of the districts in Saskatchewan—some of its very best districts—more mortgages were put on farms last fall for the purpose of raising money to pay debts than were put on in any ten years prior to that time. It simply amounts to this: that Western Canada is getting very near to the verge of bankruptcy. In a word, Mr. Speaker we are living in the midst of plenty and we are starving to death.

Ever since the session of 1918 we have been promised a tariff revision, but session after session we have been put off with one excuse or another. Some of the reasons given, I admit, were quite reasonable, but they are not going to satisfy the people for all time. I have said that we were promised tariff revision. One hon. gentleman who was sitting with the Government not very long ago got tired of waiting for the fulfilment of this promise, so he came over to the cross benches. He was big enough to leave the Government because he saw no prospect of that promise being fulfilled.

Now, we have had a tariff commission; it has been referred to as a perambulating commission travelling from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I understand that they did their work well, but we have not heard a word as to what report they have submitted, nor has the House been informed, so far as I am aware, what was the cost to the people of Canada of this commission of inquiry. Surely the House is entitled to know at least what the results are and what the cost is going to be.

As to the intention of the Government to make a tariff revision, I have before me a booklet containing the report of a speech delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) in Montreal. It is somewhat lengthy; I wish to read only two extracts from it. He said on that occasion:

> To get money to pay as we go, new taxes have been imposed, and the principles we have followed are these: We have taken the broadest possible basis of taxation, aiming first to have all, or nearly all, contribute a little. Only in that way is it a possibility to obtain the volume of revenue required. But secondly, and more important: we have shifted the burden to the utmost extent on those most able to pay.

This statement, Mr. Speaker, was made before the sales tax was increased. We will find, and the people of Canada will find, that the sales tax is shifted not on those who are most able to pay, but very largely on those who are least able to pay. Here is another extract from the same speech:

> We maintain to-day a protective tariff by no means high, the lowest, indeed, in all these forty years. Under present circumstances the same general level as well as the same general principle should continue to apply. The schedules of our tariff need revision; they need revision to meet the altered conditions and currents of trade that thirteen years have brought about. That revision is due, and that revision by the most careful investigation we have prepared ourselves to make.

I think I am justified in claiming that there was in the mind of the Government, at least in that of the Prime Minister, that we were to have a tariff revision. This House should know what intervened between February 4, and the date at which the Budget was prepared. Something must have happened that the right hon. gentleman had to change his mind and postpone the tariff revision. Is it possible that it is put off for a purpose, that it will help to hold some more followers until a general election comes round? No doubt, another promise and another bait to keep a few more risky, shaky followers on the string.

The Prime Minister told us the other day that he was out in Western Canada last fall, and I am quite well aware that the right hon. gentleman was out in the West. I have in my hand an extract from the Saskatoon Star and my purpose in reading it is this. The Saskatoon Star is one of our leading dailies in Saskatchewan. It voices very largely the sentiments of the majority of the people in that province. It has a very large circulation; it is very widely read. This is from the Star:

> Mr. Drury classifies things much more accurately than Mr. Meighen; surprisingly so in view of his occupation. A farmer—one, that is, who foregathers with revolutionaries, seeks to wreck our good old British institutions and goes around with an axe looking for things to destroy—is not usually credited with being more logical than a trained lawyer and especially one so cogent and convincing in argument as Mr. Meighen.
>
> Yet Mr. Meighen came to the West, told the people how anxious he was to foster "industry" of all kinds, and said never a word about agriculture or how the agricultural industry would be fostered under "adequate protection." He was supremely unconscious that agriculture has any claim to be regarded as an industry, much less to be fostered by fiscal or any other provisions.
>
> Mr. Drury, on the other hand, says that "farming, like lumbering, is one of the country's natural industries." He sees very clearly what Mr. Meighen appears utterly incapable of grasping. He realizes that when a country neglects its natural industries in order to build up and expand artificial and exotic industries it is trying to build the pyramid on its apex. To abstract gradually the materials forming the base in order to enlarge the superstructure until the apex is underneath is to create an unnatural condition which produces its logical result when the whole edifice collapses in ruins.
> When our natural industries are established and organized on a proper basis the secondary industries will necessarily grow and expand. The structure will be a pyramid able to withstand the wear and tear of centuries; the more so since it will be a natural growth instead of the artificial product of a wasteful expenditure of economic strength and national energy.

I wish to show the attitude of the Prime Minister to the tariff question when he was not the right honourable Prime Minister, but a private member of the party to which he belongs and sitting in opposition. I will read an extract from the Grain Growers' Guide. I see my good friend across the way smiles. Who does not love the Grain Growers' Guide? It is a magnificent medium for information. I read from the Grain Growers' Guide of August 12, 1919. I have no quarrel with the Massey-Harris Company, but the name of the Massey-Harris Company is used here:

> The publication of the letter from the Massey-Harris Company two weeks ago has brought some further information to hand on the same subject. The Massey-Harris Company quoted Finance Minister White as saying that the cost of producing a binder at Brantford was either $7 or $9 higher than the cost of producing the same binder in Chicago. In reply to this, we wish to quote Hon. Arthur Meighen, a colleague of Mr. White's in the Cabinet.

Mr. Meighen, when he was in the Opposition, was very strongly in favour of lower tariff on agricultural implements. In fact, on January 18, 1911, he delivered the ablest speech in favour of lower tariff on agricultural implements that has ever been delivered in the House of Commons. The following is an extract from his speech:

"Let me give you a few figures to show that the conditions of manufacture at the present time do not warrant a very material duty of any kind, particularly as respects the articles manufactured by the International Harvester Company, binders, mowers and reapers. I wish I could extend it more, but my proof extends to that, and I gathered my proof from what may be called the very camp of the enemy himself; I go to the officers of the International Harvester Company, and I take the very evidence of an official, Mr. Metcalfe, before the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives last year, and I think I will convince the House that there is very little, if any, difference in the cost of production of these machines on this side of the border and in the United States. At pages 7323-4 of the Tariff Hearings of the United States I read the following. Mr. Metcalfe was the representative there for the purpose of giving evidence on behalf of the International Harvester Company:

"'Mr. Cumpacker: Do you manufacture any cheaper in Canada than in the United States?

"'Mr. Metcalfe: They do not.

"'Mr. Cumpacker: As cheaply?

"'Mr. Metcalfe: Comparatively.

"'Mr. Cumpacker: Can you manufacture cheaper than the English manufacturer or the German manufacturer?

"'Mr. Metcalfe: I think they can, otherwise they could not compete with them in Germany and England.'

"So that Mr. Metcalfe is on record in admitting that there is comparatively no difference in the cost of manufacturing on the other side of the line and on this. He further admitted that the relative cost of manufacturing on this side of the line and in England and France is in favour of Canada, so that from that point of view there is little to be said in favour of an increase at all events in the duty on these agricultural implements. Mr. Metcalfe is further on record as stating, in the plainest language, that they produce in this country for export abroad, and it is only reasonable to argue that it is just as cheap to produce those articles on this side as on the other, as otherwise they would manufacture for foreign export on the other side and not on this, since they have factories on both."

I repeat that:

Mr. Metcalfe is further on record as stating, in the plainest language, that they produce in this country for export abroad, and it is only reasonable to argue that it is just as cheap to produce those articles on this side as on the other, as otherwise they would manufacture for foreign export on the other side and not on this, since they have factories on both. On page 738 of those tariff hearings, Mr. Metcalfe answered the chairman as follows:

[Mr. J. F. Reid.]

"The Chairman: The International Harvester Company has a plant at Hamilton, Ontario?

"Mr. Metcalfe: They have one there.

"The Chairman: Are you exporting from Canada?

"Mr. Metcalfe: They are.

"The Chairman: To what countries?

"Mr. Metcalfe: All the foreign countries and particularly to France. We are very much interested at the present time in the treaty between Canada and France.

"So that the proof is absolute that if there be any difference in the conditions of manufacturing between this side of the line and the other in relation to these articles, that difference is almost inappreciable."

It will be seen that Mr. Meighen gives the sworn evidence of one of the officials of the International Harvester Company to the effect that the cost of manufacture in Brantford is as low as it is in Chicago. This is better evidence than Mr. White produced in the House of Commons, and may be taken, as Mr. Meighen says, as absolute proof that there is no difference in the cost of manufacture of agricultural implements in Canada and the United States. It is equally safe to assume that the Massey-Harris Company can manufacture as cheaply in Toronto as the International Harvester in Hamilton, so that, from the standpoint of cost, there is absolutely no reason why there should be any tariff protection for agricultural implements in Canada.

It is quite evident that the thought in the mind of the right hon. the Prime Minister at that time was that there should be a downward revision of the tariff in agricultural implements. In fact, if my memory serves me correctly, when he was first elected for Portage la Prairie it was with the avowed intention that he would do all in his power to have agricultural implements placed on the free list. But the Prime Minister in office takes a different attitude. He is quoted as making the statement—and again I am speaking from memory—"The tariff never was oppressive on the agriculturist."

Mr. LALOR: Have not the duties on agricultural implements been reduced by the Prime Minister since that speech was made?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Very slightly, but they are not on the free list yet.

Mr. WHITE: Is it not a fact that the price of binders and mowers and every other agricultural implement has been nearly doubled, so that even with the reduction in duty we are now paying double the duty that we paid then?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Of course, in view of the advance in price of the machines the amount paid in duty is very much increased, in spite of any reduction in rate of duty. A duty of 12½ per cent on a machine costing $150 is equivalent to a duty of 25 per cent on a machine costing only half that price. This all adds to the burden, and we know that it is the last straw that breaks the camel's back.

I wish now to continue further my argument in regard to the attitude of this Government towards the big interests as compared with their attitude towards the great consuming classes of Canada—the labouring classes, and the agricultural classes. Take the sugar episode. Consider for a minute what this Government tried to do to protect the sugar refiners in Canada from a loss on their manufactured article. The Government certainly endeavoured to come to their rescue, but public opinion was so strong against the order that it had to be countermanded, and I understand that that was done overnight.

Take the question of freight rates. A drastic advance was made in freight rates last year by the Board of Railway Commissioners. In my opinion that order of the board should have been at once countermanded by the Government. The Government had power to do that, and they should have exercised their power. The high freight rates are one of the reasons why the western farmers have not been able to dispose of their products at a reasonable profit.

Take the question of the personnel of the Grain Commission of Inquiry that has recently been appointed, and which is going to perambulate all through the Dominion, I presume, at a huge cost to the people. Is organized agriculture represented on that board? Is organized labour represented on that board? Not for one minute. These two great classes of people in our Dominion are entirely ignored by the Government.

Again, when the Minister of Finance was busy preparing his Budget, whom did he call in to advise with him? I saw an item in one of the Ottawa newspapers to the effect that the Wholesale Merchants' Association and the Retail Merchants' Association, and the Manufacturers' Association had been in conference with the Finance Minister as to what system of taxation should be imposed. Again I ask, was organized labour consulted? Was organized agriculture consulted? No, Sir, they were entirely ignored.

I have here a short extract from an Ontario paper which has come into my hands:

> The week's happenings have been distinguished by one or two developments of interest and importance. Whether the marking down by the U. S. Steel Corporation of its prices to levels on a par with the "Independents" will lead to a resumption of activity remains to be seen, but one significant development following the announcement is the decision of the International Harvester Company to make a 10 per cent reduction effective next year on products in which steel is the principal raw material. The reduction on steel came after one year's product had been provided for, it is explained by the company, and will have no bearing on the cost of machines sold this year. Implement manufacturers generally contend that no immediate price reduction is possible, owing to the fact that materials are bought a year in advance and the stocks now on hand have been purchased at a time when peak prices were prevailing.

I have every sympathy with our manufacturers in that respect. No doubt they must order their raw materials a year ahead. They say: We must have our price, or we shall lose money. They not only say that, but they say they must also raise the price of their manufactured product as high as 22 per cent for 1921 or they will lose money. I have reference now to the manufacturers of agricultural implements. To whom are they selling their goods? To the agriculturists, the farmers, the grain raisers principally, and what is it that they are doing? I have made it plain that the price of grain has dropped from the high peak. Wheat selling at one time, f.o.b. Calgary, at $3.25, is worth to-day, at the head of the lakes, about $1.75.

Mr. BRISTOL: It was $1.84 yesterday.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Thanks for the correction.

Mr. WHITE: It is $1.38 at Calgary now.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): The hon. member who represents Victoria in the province of Alberta, will perhaps tell the House that he tried to sell oats by the carload, and with what result. I know that last year's crop of oats in northern Alberta was a first-class product; but what is it worth to-day to my hon. friend who represents Victoria? He inquired of a friend of his who runs a big pulp concern in northern Ontario to whom he thought he would ship some oats, as to what the freight rate would be, and my hon. friend was told that before he could sell his oats, shipping them to this point in northern Ontario, he would have to pay the freight part of the way and his friend would take the oats.

An hon. MEMBER: For nothing.

Mr. REID: For nothing. I made the statement that oats could not be produced to-day for 26½ cents. I do not think they can be produced for 35 cents, and they are worth at the point of shipment from 10 to 15 cents, Fort William basis. Still, the manufacturers say that they buy their raw material at high prices and that therefore the producers must pay them the prices they demand. The manufacturer is in the happy position of being able to pass on his price, whatever he may charge, to the consumer; but the unfortunate and unhappy producer is between the upper and the nether millstones. He cannot pass on his costs, and he must take what is offered him for what he has to sell and pay the price demanded of him for what he wants to buy. It must appeal to hon. gentlemen, I think, that there is something wrong, and I repeat again that if present conditions are continued it will mean bankruptcy to Western Canada.

Now, let us look at the Budget for a moment. This Budget, Sir, I claim, has all the ear marks of the protectionist artificer. I have read that protection is a good thing, that it taxes the poor, who do not realize what it means and hence make no fuss. Now, I saw a little extract the other day in regard to protection, and I think it might be well to place on Hansard the gist of that statement. It was to the effect that protection always has to borrow some rags of respectability to cover its nakedness. I want my hon. friends to note that; it is a good thing to remember.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the sales tax as imposed in this Budget, is high protection in disguise. What will it cost the consumer? Will it be 4 per cent that the consumer will have to pay? I am told by business men who know what they are talking about that this sales tax of 4 per cent will be pyramided at least 2½ times before the consumer finally pays it. I have not figured this out, but I have no doubt that some hon. member on this side of the House will place the exact facts on Hansard as to just what this 4 per cent sales tax will amount to when it is paid by the consumer.

As I said before, the sales tax and the customs tax fall on the labouring classes and on those people in Canada who can least afford to bear them. Canada wants immigrants, and the people in Western Canada, who raise the largest families, the people who come from Europe, in a very short time adapt themselves to the country, and their children, born in Canada, after a while become just as good Canadians as any we have in this country. I therefore say that it is a cruel burden to heap upon these poor people this sales tax which is an additional tariff tax. The average family to-day, if we calculate on the basis of this 4 per cent customs tax, will pay around $147.75 under this tax; they cannot avoid it. This tax will simply mean a restriction of consumption. The people will not be able to buy as much goods as they have been buying, because, when you take $147 from the labouring man's earnings, you do not leave him very much for his family, and the consequence will be that you will stunt and particularly starve the children of the poor. They will suffer cold and hunger to some extent, whole our good friends the textile manufacturers will reap a handsome profit by the 37½ per cent protection.

I understand that our Canadian manufacturers deny that they are benefited financially by a protective tariff. We, on the other hand, claim that while the Government receives $1 from the customs revenue tax, our good friends, the manufacturers, receive $3. If this is not correct, I am sure my good friends sitting opposite will show me that it is not so. If this protective tariff were necessary, if our manufacturers really required that tariff, I would be the last man in the Dominion to do anything to harm the manufacturers; but I am of the opinion, after what I have read, and the statements and arguments that have been made by one of the ablest debaters in the Dominion of Canada, the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), that our manufacturers could do with considerably less in the way of protection. If they do require a protective tariff I would suggest that we put on a countervailing excise tax. If there is a protective tariff of, say, 15 per cent, I would say, the Government must have two-thirds of this 15 per cent; and still the manufacturers would have protection. I think that is a fair proposition.

Now, I shall bring my remarks to a close, but I want to make one reference more to the tariff. In the Budget I notice the following, as will be seen at page 3228 of Hansard:

> materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships; ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade.

These materials are exempt from the 4 per cent sales tax. Now, I wonder why the Minister of Finance exempted materials for use in the construction, equipment and repair of ships licensed to engage in the coasting trade.

I am of the opinion that the operation of Canadian ships has yielded substantial returns. Take, for instance, the Canada Steamship Lines; they made very handsome profits and paid very handsome dividends last year. I have here a newspaper clipping in which the President, Mr. Norcross, is reported as having made the statement that in the freight carrying trade on the inland waters, and more particularly in the carriage of grain, these ships have made a handsome profit, more than sufficient, in fact, to make up for some of the losses sustained on ocean freights on the Atlantic. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this is another evidence that the present Government is a friend of the big interests, and that it is forgetting the needs of the great mass of the common people.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on the Budget. Few Budgets in this Parliament since Confederation have been anticipated with greater anxiety, inasmuch as we are passing through a transition period, a period of instability in commerce, of extravagance in buying, and of deflation. These, and a hundred and one other circumstances, have rendered the financial outlook and the trade conditions of our country very uncertain and such as to be regarded with some degree of uneasiness. Under the circumstances it is a source of extreme satisfaction that the Minister of Finance was able to give us such a favourable exposition of the trade conditions and financial position of Canada. I think, Sir, that the Finance Minister, as well as the country, deserves to be congratulated upon the excellent presentation that has been made. Our trade has been well sustained, and the expenditure and revenue have been brought together to an extent that is wonderful considering all the circumstances.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. McISAAC: Just before recess I was referring to the Budget that had been presented to this House and country by the Minister of Finance, and I took occasion to observe that in my humble judgment it was an admirable presentation of our financial position. It was a business-like Budget—I should say, a model Budget, and so far as I have been able to observe, it has met with almost universal favour. Any comments concerning it in the public press have been for the most part favourable to it; very little adverse criticism has been offered. This is a matter of congratulation to the minister, to the Government, and to Canada as well, having regard to present conditions. All countries have been passing through a period of transition, a time of upheaval in commerce and dislocation of trade, a time of deflation and extravagance, a time of unfavourable financial, commercial and economic outlook. It is evident from the admirable statement rendered by the Finance Minister that Canada's position is an enviable one among the nations of the world; she stands second to no other country in the matter of her economic operations for the year that has passed. This is indeed a great tribute to Canada. Nations, like individuals, benefit by their youth. The blood of national youth courses through the arteries of our country. Canada has all the energy, all the ambition of youth, and we have firm ground for our faith in her great future.

According to the figures presented by the Finance Minister, Canada's trade for the past fiscal year exceeded that of the previous fiscal year by $125,000,000, in round figures, indicating a remarkable advance in trade in the face of unfavourable conditions. Our greatest trade is, of course, with the United States and Great Britain. The balance of trade as between Canada and the United States is against us; that is to say, we purchase more from the United States than we sell to them. That is an unfortunate condition of things, and one which it is difficult to overcome, though it is hoped that before very long it will be considerably improved. It would seem, however, that the legislation recently brought into effect in the United States is not favourable to that end. The Young Bill which has been passed by both Houses of Congress puts up against Canada as well as against other countries very strong barriers in the way of trade. It is to be presumed that this matter will be dealt with later by our Government and such action taken as is deemed expedient. Of course, that is a matter for the future. The balance of trade as against Canada for the last year and in favour of the United States amounted to $296,000,000. On the other hand, our trade with the Mother Country has been more favourable. The balance of trade in our favour in respect of our trade with Great Britain in the fiscal year 1919-20 amounted to $369,000,000, in round figures. The balance has since shown a tendency to swing against us, but that condition may adjust itself. The trade balance in our favour in respect of trade with the Mother Country for the last year was reduced to $100,295,402, according to the figures of the Minister of Finance. Our total foreign trade per capita during the calendar year 1920 was $293.30 as against a per capita trade on the part of the United States of $127.78. In connection with our trade relations with the Mother Country, it is worth while noting that according to press despatches the Government of Great Britain are taking steps which indicate a wide departure from the policy of free trade. A Bill has been introduced in the British House of Commons—it may be passed by this time—placing a high preferential tariff on the key industries of the country. If that Bill becomes law, certainly a great step will have been taken by Great Britain in the direction of a protective tariff.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word or two with reference to the financial position of our country. The figures disclosed in the financial statement of the minister show that the revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, amounted to $432,000,000 as against $349,746,334 for the year 1920. The estimated expenditure for 1920-21 amounts to $533,368,077. Let me say a word regarding how the money raised was spent and the condition of the balance sheet when the revenues and expenditures had been compared and the bills for the year had been paid. Let us see what a favourable showing was presented to the House in the annual statement of the Minister of Finance. As I have just said, it is shown in the financial statement that the revenues amounted to approximately $432,000,000. Expenditures on consolidated fund, that is to say, current expenditures, strictly speaking, for the operations of the fiscal year, amounted to $362,600,000; but in addition to this amount, there was a capital expenditure of $36,972,000 and an expenditure on demobilization of $20,130,000, making a total payment under the head of expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund of $419,702,000. This presents to us a satisfactory condition of the revenue as compared with the expenditure, showing that after payments made strictly speaking on consolidated fund or ordinary expenditures were met, there was left a balance of $69,400,000. Moreover, after those two items, that is the capital expenditure of $36,972,000 and the demobilization expenditure of $20,130,000, to which I have referred, were paid, there was left, over and above all these payments, a balance of $12,298,000.

In the ordinary language, the authorized language that has been invariably used in connection with our financial operations in Canada since Confederation, this amount of $12,298,000 is a surplus. That is how all these balances have been denominated or described by every Government that has existed in Canada since Confederation. It may be said that there were capital expenditures that would very much exceed that balance. Such has nearly always been the case. There are not many years; indeed, there are very few, when there has been an actual surplus; but in the language of finance used in this conection all down through Canadian history, this amount may be and is properly called a surplus. Therefore, there is no reason this year why we should depart from the usual language and call this amount by any other name.

Another exceedingly gratifying feature in connection with our finances for the year that has passed has been presented to us by the Minister of Finance, and that is that out of available cash at their disposal, the Government have acquired tax exempt bonds aggregating $89,288,300. These are bonds which were issued by the Government to the people and on which money was secured to carry on the war and other necessary expenditures. Bonds to that amount have been taken off the market; they have been bought in by the Government with the cash at their disposal, and they will be cancelled. Thus, there will be that amount removed from the debt of Canada. That is a very fine condition of affairs, and it is highly to the credit of the Government, that, at this stage, so early in the life-time of these bonds, the Government have been able to take off the market and cancel so many of these promises to pay that, in the ordinary course, would stand against the Government until the term of the bonds expired. No doubt from year to year, as the Government will find that they have cash at their disposal, they will continue this method of reducing the financial obligations of Canada by acquiring a number of these bonds, removing them from the market and cancelling them, so that they will no longer form part of the debt of this country.

Another feature that has been presented in the fiscal statement of the Minister of Finance, is, I think, worthy of consideration, inasmuch as it shows what part of the debt created by the war, which, of course, was a debt that was unavoidable and to which no estimated bounds could be placed, has been taken care of out of the current revenues of the country from 1914 up to the present time. This statement is to be found in the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance—and it is important to note it—that notwithstanding the largely increased cost of government, apart altogether from the war—and the expenses of the Government were much increased during these years—the country's war activities have been financed to a certain extent out of current revenue. The net result of financial operations in this country from 1914-15 up to and including 1920-21, a period of six years, shows that war obligations, current and capital, have been met and paid to the extent of $698,809,700. That, I think, is a most gratifying feature of our present financial operations. It is one that, perhaps, we would not be disposed to take very much note of; but it is one deserving of the greatest possible consideration; it is one that shows how carefully our finances have been guarded; how carefully every phase of our public business and fiscal operations have been taken care of by the Government and the Minister of Finance.

With regard to the financial operations of last year, no new loans have been issued, and I think that is a matter for congratulation. I think it is also a matter for congratulation that in view of the world-wide trade conditions Canada has come through this trying period with a better showing than most other countries. Our position in comparison with other countries of the world is really an enviable one.

Turning to the current year upon which we have just entered, the uncertainty is no doubt greater even than last year, especially as to the revenues of the country. There are many reasons for this. In the first place, the Finance Minister finds it very difficult accurately to forecast what the probable revenues may be. This uncertainty is due to several causes. He feels satisfied, however, that the revenue from customs taxation will be somewhat diminished. Again, we have to take into account the tariff legislation which has just been passed by the United States. It is difficult to see just what the future holds in store in that direction; there may be some further legislation in this Parliament which may ameliorate present conditions, but so far as we can size up the present situation a diminished customs revenue is expected, and we have the Young Tariff Bill imposed against us as well as other countries by the United States; so the situation this year presents considerable difficulty for the Finance Minister.

From ordinary sources the Finance Minister expects to raise, unless all signs fail, a minimum of $373,600,000. The Main Estimates for the year have already been tabled; there may be, however, some Supplementary Estimates brought down. Altogether, the Finance Minister calculates that a total revenue should be raised this year of at least $435,360,971. The outlook, it must be confessed, is not the most encouraging, but I am satisfied that from the taxes which the Finance Minister is imposing, together with the revenue we expect to derive from one or two other sources, we shall raise sufficient to enable us to make up the difference between our expenditure and our ordinary revenue.

There is, for instance, the new sales tax. There is no doubt at all that the revenue from that will be very much increased this year over last. Then there is the increase in the liquor duties, from $5 to $10 per gallon. Probably we shall not have any liquor in Canada at all now, because there is prohibition in nearly all of the provinces. However, if any liquor is obtainable, those who drink will have to pay the price, and I suppose that is only right. Most people will agree that liquor is a luxury, and the man who wishes to indulge in that luxury must be prepared to pay the tax. I imagine only the wealthy will be able to indulge in this luxury in view of this new taxation. I think from these two sources alone the Finance Minister will be able to derive quite a large amount of money.

I do not wish to say very much about the income tax, as that has already been referred to by a great many other speakers in this debate. It is noticeable, however, that the revenue derived from income taxation last year was very much in excess of the amount received in previous years, and I have no doubt that there will be a still further increase this year. Some criticism has been offered as to the form in which the returns have to be made out. It is said that it is a little difficult for the ordinary man to make out an income tax return. That may be so. The Minister of Finance will no doubt be able to remedy that, and I understand that he intends to do so. So far as I am concerned, I have always been able to make out my return for the little amount I have to pay to the treasury, and I think most ordinary mortals with a little assistance are able to make out a return in a manner that will be understood by the officials of the department.

There is another source of revenue. We have a credit with Great Britain of $150,000,000. That is the amount they owe us, and it is possible that within the coming year some portion of that may find its way into the Dominion treasury. I think from these three sources alone we shall derive a sufficient amount to enable the Finance Minister to meet the expenditures of the country, and perhaps leave a surplus over at the end of the present fiscal year. I appreciate the fact that mere figures are not very interesting, but in a Budget debate one can hardly avoid dealing with figures to some extent.

However, I shall now take up another phase of the Budget which I shall endeavour, if possible, to render somewhat more interesting. The tariff is a subject that is very much discussed at the present time, and a good deal of fault has been found with the Government by our friends opposite because no general revision of the tariff is contemplated immediately. There are many reasons why a tariff revision at this juncture would be inopportune. I have already referred to the adverse legislation which is about to become operative in the United States and which may necessitate very radical and far-reaching changes in our present fiscal arrangement in order that we may properly protect Canada's interests from the injurious forces of the Act which is going through Congress at Washington. Under the circumstances, every one who gives any thought to the subject must concede that it is only the part of wisdom that the Canadian Government should be circumspect at the present time and make no great changes in our tariff until we know how the adverse legislation of the United States will affect us in every respect. I do not intend to say very much more on that question, but I think that the tariff which we shall have in this country, after the United States tariff becomes operative, should be framed in such a way as to protect Canadian interests as far as possible. Of our total imports last year, amounting to a sum very considerably over $1,000,000,000, there came from the United States goods valued at $856,000,000 odd, or 69 per cent of our whole import trade. That fact in itself constitutes a sufficient reason why we should be very deliberate and careful in any changes we make to our tariff; we must of necessity, in our own interests, wait until we see how the adverse legislation at Washington is going to affect us. Although no extensive revision of the tariff is being made, however, there are some changes, due to one cause or another, particularly in respect of the trade agreement with the West Indies which was recently ratified by both Houses.

In reference to the subject of taxation, the principal changes are the abolition of the business profits war tax, the removal of the so-called luxury tax, and the increase in the rate of the sales tax, matters which will come up for consideration when the House is in Committee of Ways and Means. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is all I shall say on the subject of expenditure and taxation.

I might properly refer, before going further, to some of the statements that have been made, and the attitude that has been assumed in this debate, by our friends on the Opposition side. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), a former Minister of Finance, has voiced some rather strong free trade sentiments. Now, as everyone is perfectly aware, our Opposition friends have not been very consistent on the important question of the tariff. From time to time, while in Opposition, they have strongly advocated free trade, but while in office they were unquestionably protectionist. Throughout the fifteen years the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was Minister of Finance he was a consistent protectionist; he presented to the House every year a protectionist budget. He made no essential change in the tariff which the National party had had in force up to the time his Government took office. While hon. gentlemen opposite were in office they had a protective tariff amounting to an average of nearly 27 per cent; at the present time, this Government, whom they are pleased to describe as high protectionists, are carrying on the public affairs under a tariff which is about 5 per cent less than that,—a trifle over 22 per cent. In the face of that, how can hon. gentlemen opposite talk free trade? A year ago, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was discussing the budget, he was inclined to the view that free trade was not practicable; that there was no such thing as free trade. I shall quote his words in a moment or two, and endeavour to show the contrast between his opinions then and those which he expresses now. Last year he did not seem anxious to fraternize with his friends to the left of him, the Agrarians; he rather gave them the cold shoulder. This year, however, it would appear, he is disposed to get closer to them, or have them draw closer to him. He evidently wants the two sides to coalesce and work together. Well, as a matter of fact, that is just what they are doing, conceal it as they may, endeavour to hide it as they will. Their object is to impede the Government, no matter what their assumed attitude may seem to be. One member on the other side gets up and utters some protective views, and another talks free trade. It is a drama; they are all actors, and each member of the dramatis personae has his own little part to perform. But the tout ensemble is a campaign against the Government. What is the drama they are acting? A tangled web of political deception. Their object is to deceive the people with the ultimate end in view of getting into power. They want to throw dust in the eyes of the people; they are trying to pull the wool over their eyes. While they are ostensibly preaching free trade for the benefit of the public, they go round secretly and whisper confidentially into the ears of their friends, the manufacturers, that everything, from their viewpoint, is safe and sound. They tell these people: "Don't be afraid of us. You know we did nothing to you before. Don't mind our talking this way about free trade; you know it means nothing. Let us say this and that about free trade for the sake of effect; you know what we will do when we get in." That is the way they have been acting, Mr. Speaker, and in order that I may be able to convict them I shall quote from Hansard. I desire to read from the statements of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, quoting Hansard.

I will now read from Hansard of 1920 to show what the hon. gentleman's views were last year and I will then contrast these views with what the hon. gentleman has stated during the present debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. McISAAC: Let my hon. friends opposite prick up their ears. If they want me to read loud I will read it so sonorously that it will be heard from one end of this country to the other. My hon. friends need not be alarmed, I will read it loud enough for them. At page 2503 of the Hansard of May 18, 1920, the hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> While it is true that at all times for many years all our tariff discussions have been more or less tinged with the question of free trade, there has of late been a revival of what I may call the free trade movement, and the free trade question is now thrust to the front of our tariff discussions in a larger way than it has been in recent years. That, I take it for granted, is because our farmer friends—

Now listen to this:

> Our farmer friends attach so much importance to the matter and have pushed it into their platform.

This is how he treated them last year:

> With all due respect to them, I take the view that free trade is not a practical question in our tariff discussions of to-day.

He went on to say:

> There are some things that we would do well to remember. In the first place, it may be well simply to remember that there never has been in the Dominion of Canada such a thing as free trade. There is not anything of the kind now, and with all due respect to those who may be described as extreme free traders, I think it is no wild guess to assert that there will be no absolute free trade in Canada within the life time of any man who sits in this House to-day. It is not practicable—

I would like to know what it is that induced the hon. member to change his views since last year. In order to show the nature of that change I will read a quotation from the hon. member's speech on May 10, inst. I do so in order that hon. gentlemen may see for themselves that it is quite a change—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McISAAC: I am glad my hon. friends opposite like it so well. It is a matter of deception, it is only a little change in the way of putting the question before the people. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's said on May 10, inst:

> If there are any people in Canada who are contemplating the establishment of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary, I do them a friendly service when I say: "Don't do it"—

He is dead against any protection this year, but he was rather inclined towards it a year ago.

> —because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection, again, I advise him not to come.

What does this mean? If we take this statement at its face value the ex-Minister of Finance of Canada gives his country a black eye because he says: If there is anybody coming here with the hope that he may have a chance of advancing, progressing and building up a business under the present tariff, let him stay away; we do not want anybody to come. In effect he declares: The country should be ostracized so that nobody will come here. Such is the patriotic sentiment expressed by this hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALOR: It is the members of the Farmers' party that are applauding.

Mr. McISAAC: If that is so I am glad to know where they stand. Now let me read what was said by another hon. gentleman in the ranks of the official Opposition. I wish to do so in order to corroborate the statement I made a moment ago that it does not matter just what they say here in Parliament; they understand one another; they are acting a part; they are all actors in this little agreement to deceive the people, and practise political deception in order that they may possibly gain some political advantage therefrom.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McISAAC: I am pleased to know that this exposure is so pleasing to my hon. friends opposite. It may not be so amusing when they come to the realization of what this deception means. The hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) also spoke upon the tariff question. He is one of the front benchers on the Opposition side.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the ex-leader.

Mr. McISAAC: Yes, he is an ex-leader. He was a temporary leader but he is now ex-temporary leader. He was what they call a locum tenens. That is, he was holding the place of a leader; he is now an ex-locum tenens of a leader. When it comes to the matter of coal and steel, products peculiar to his own province, my hon. friend is a protectionist; he does not deny it, and he says:

I say—

Speaking of coal.

—give a little higher price; let the officers and the experts of the Government in connection with coal fix what that price should be within fair limits, and let the preference be given to Canadian coal as against the coal and steel of foreigners who have a bigger market, bigger capital and bigger production than we have.

He goes on to say:

I take that position and I think it can be very well maintained. Although our coal may be a few cents higher in price, when you consider that our railroads will be carrying our own goods, and that directly and indirectly it is to the advantage of our own people that the Government and the Government railways should use our own coal, it will pay the Government to give the preference to the product of their own country.

A little further on he says:

But if they buy coal from a Canadian, he gets the money and it goes from one hand to another, building up the trade and industry of the country and supporting the families of the Canadian people.

That is good protectionist doctrine. I do not know just exactly how he is going to vote on the amendment.

There is another protectionist in the group whom I should like to quote, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) —Maisonneuve and Gaspé I think is the proper title. In the course of his speech denouncing the Government he made this remark:

Standing as I do for a moderate measure of protection, mind you, for a reasonable measure of protection, nevertheless I cannot help saying that I regret that free trade is not the trade policy of the civilized world.

There may be others as well as he who entertain similar regrets. But he says that he is a moderate protectionist. So then we have straight protectionists, moderate protectionists, free traders, and all the rest of them in this drama.

There is another protectionist on the other side whom I wish to quote briefly—the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson). He is the last man in the world one would expect to be a protectionist. Indeed I do not believe he is a protectionist, but in the course of his speech on Thursday he said something about protectionists. He said something that reflects upon every hon. gentleman of the official Opposition who was either a supporter or a member of the Liberal Government during the fifteen years they were in power, The hon. member from Qu'Appelle coolly gets up in this House and berates and condemns the system which that Government carried on during what they are pleased to call the "Golden Age." Of course, there can be no doubt that the hon. member supported that system, but what does he say? At page 3418 of Hansard of May 12 the following passage will be found:

The protective policy begets fear, cowardice and selfishness. The fear that they cannot compete with others is one of the most degrading things to which any people can be exposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McISAAC: The Farmers applaud that statement because they are opportunists. But this is a condemnation of every hon.

gentleman of the official Opposition, and I observe there is no applause from that quarter. They say they had a golden age for fifteen years. Well, whether it was a golden age, a silver age or a bronze age, it was an age when a higher protective tariff was in force than we have now. And yet they call that the golden age of Canada's prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER: The stone age.

Mr. McISAAC: It simply goes to prove that protection is the only tariff system under which Canada can live and thrive. Every hon. member on the other side of the House knows that and practises it when his party is in power, but in opposition it is convenient for hon. gentlemen opposite to shout free trade.

Before I deal with the amendment I wish to refer to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and I am sorry he is not in his seat. Last year there seemed to be some antagonism between him and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. As we all know, the hon. member for Brome proclaimed himself to be a simon-pure, unadulterated and anti-purgatorial free trader. So I suppose when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was drafting his amendment he thought it advisable to effect a reconciliation between the political Pilate and the political Herod. But the contribution of the hon. member for Brome to the discussion did not add dignity to the debating style of this House. His contribution was not so much to determine whether this country should have free trade or protection, but took the form of producing and reading imaginary letters that were intended to have some ulterior political effect at a later day. I should like to know by what process of reasoning the hon. member lays the flattering unction to his soul that he has the right to constitute himself the censor of political morals or the arbiter of the conduct of ministers of the Crown. What legislation has he placed on the statute books to entitle him to assume such an outstanding and altogether unusual position among hon. members? What services did he offer to his country when she was struggling in the great war that would entitle him to arrogate to himself such precedence? I wish the hon. member was in his seat that I might say a great deal more to him. In my view his conduct was beneath contempt, and I take this occasion to condemn it in the strongest words of which I am capable.

Now I come to the amendment, which is in this form:

That all the words after the word "that, to the end of the question, be omitted, and the following inserted instead thereof:

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. McISAAC: I know why the hon. gentlemen exclaims "dispense": he is ashamed of this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McISAAC: Yes, ashamed of it. But to proceed with the amendment:

The House regrets that, after repeated assurances by the Government of an intention to have a revision of the Customs tariff, and after a protracted inquiry extending from ocean to ocean by a committee of cabinet ministers, the Government have made no proposals for any reduction of the tariff;

That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises giving promise of enduring success;

That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;

That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

That the House, while recognizing that the obligations arising from the war must be met, and declaring its readiness to make all necessary provision for that purpose, regrets that the financial proposals of the Government are not made with due regard to the economy that is so urgently needed, and expresses the opinion that, before resorting to new taxation, the Government should make a substantial reduction in the proposed expenditure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult for anyone to extract any meaning out of that amendment. It does not embody the platform of the Liberal party as adopted by them in 1919. It does not embody the platform of their friends the Agrarians, whom they are so anxious to get into the same boat with themselves. It does not embody the platform of any party, any person, or anything under the sun. It is the most marvellous hodge-podge that anyone could conceive; it means nothing and is intended to mean nothing. But any member of either of these parties who votes for this amendment will be able to carry it in his pocket and go about the country saying: I am in favour of this clause, or I am in favour of that clause, and so on—a matter of deceiving the people through and through. But that does not surprise us, because it is part of the tactics of the Opposition.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House much longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. McISAAC: Our friends opposite are very hilarious. I am of the opinion, however that the hilarity is merely on the surface and that they are not enjoying themselves quite as much as they pretend. Perhaps they realize that the truth is coming home to them in a very homely but very pointed way, and I am sure they would gladly be relieved of the tension. I shall not, therefore, keep hon. gentlemen any longer in suspense; I know they are anxious to get relief, so I shall be generous to them in that respect. I thank you, Mr. Speaker and hon. members of the House for the attention which has been given to my remarks.

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, congratulations have been extended to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) by the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. Some hon. gentlemen have congratulated him upon the very able manner in which he has administered the affairs of his department, others upon the very clear and lucid financial statement which he has presented. But I desire to congratulate the hon. gentleman upon his courage, because I believe it takes real courage for a minister to stand up and read to the House and to the country a statement showing that the result of the year's financial operations is a deficit of $101,000,000 and that to-day the annual net debt of the country is $2,350,000,000. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, the only remedy my hon. friend has to propose for the difficulty involved in the ever-increasing load of interest on indebtedness is taxation and more taxation. The statement was no very great surprise to me, Sir. It was a statement not only in respect of the year immediately closed, but also of the years immediately preceding it, a statement which disclosed what we knew to be the case: that in years immediately gone by there had been recklessness and indiscriminate borrowings and expenditure that was gross and extravagant to a degree.

I believe that the duties of a Minister of Finance are threefold: to think out means of raising revenue, to exact taxation, and to see that his confreres exercise care in the expenditure of public money. I can say without fear of contradiction that no man could sit and listen to the Estimates that have gone through this House without being struck by the fact that millions of dollars were being voted for expenditures which, in view of the financial condition of the country, could very well have been dispensed with. I am glad to see the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) in his place tonight. I had the pleasure of listening the other afternoon to his explanation of the votes that had been passed on account of his department, and it struck me that his explanation was very far afield. Surely, Sir, in view of the fact that we are just emerging from a world war, with all the expenses incidental thereto—pensions, allowances, soldier's settlement, and so on—we could have cut down our military expenditures this year. I have the greatest admiration for the militia of this country. I know what our militiamen have done and how valuable they are to us; I know that there are men in the militia who have given their time and their energy to making the militia what it has been and what it is. But notwithstanding that, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that we could very well have dispensed this year with the annual drill, involving an expenditure of $1,500,000. There was no suggestion that if we did not send the militia out for their annual drill we would have to send the returned men. There was no occasion for the heroics indulged in by the Minister of Militia with regard to the deeds of our men across the sea; we realize and appreciate that as much as he does. Nor was there any occasion for flag-waving in that connection. And just here I want to say this to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia: personally I have the greatest regard andrespect for a good old-line Tory:—there is one thing about him; you always know where to find him. But I am ashamed of the Tories in this House—ashamed of them that they should sit still and allow so recent a recruit as the Minister of Militia to give such an exhibition of flag-waving and to leave them so far behind in that respect.

Mr. LALOR: We are proud of him over here.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Well, the minister has nothing on my hon. friend, because he is at it all the time. Now, if the question of this annual drill were left to the men composing the militia; if it had been pointed out to them that the expenditure involved, $1,500,000, was to come by way of taxation out of the pockets of the people of this country and that the returned men would have to pay their share of it in the shoes and clothing they wore and in the food they ate, then, Sir, I believe that the militiamen themselves would be the first to say: We will dispense with the annual drill; we do not want to add further burdens to those already borne by the returned men. If my hon. friend had been so solicitous about the returned men—and I do not gainsay that he is sincere in his statement—it would have been more to the point had be dispensed with this proposed expenditure of $1,500,000, and handed the money over to the returned men who are to-day out of employment and whose families are in need of help.

Further, I believe that there might well have been some reduction in the appropriation of $6,250,000 in connection with the Permanent Force. It is true that we have a Permanent Force of 3,800 men, but it seems to me that the expenditure in connection with that force is out of all proportion to the number of men. I appreciate the fact that there is a headquarters staff to be kept up and that that is, perhaps, expensive; but at a time like this, we might readily have dispensed with some of the headquarters staff. It came out during the discussion of the Estimates that we have in this country at the present time 19 generals and, I think, 42 colonels and lieutenant-colonels on the pay-roll. I realize that these men are engagd in connection with, not only the Permanent Force, but the militia, but we could do without so many generals in Canada. There must be ten or twelve generals on the headquarters staff at Ottawa and, perhaps, one-half of them could be dispensed with, without any real loss to the militia, to the Permanent Force or to the people of Canada. Such action may be hard on the Minister of Militia, who seems to have an eye for generals; but the country could stand the reduction, and it would be a move in the right direction.

There is another matter about which I want to say just a word or two. The subject has been thoroughly discussed, perhaps over-discussed in some respects in this House, but nevertheless I feel that I should say a word with reference to it. I refer to the mercantile marine. I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) is not in the chamber, because I should like to have had an opportunity of saying to him personally what I propose to say. The hon. gentleman has stated in this House on more than one occasion during this session that the vote was practically unanimous in favour of the appropriation of $20,000,000 last year; that there was very little opposition to it in the House. When that vote was before the House last year, I did not hesitate to rise in my place and oppose it. I opposed it because I did not believe that it was good business; that it was in the interest of the country, or that we were justified in expending any more money for ships during 1920. Notwithstanding the advice given by men in this House who are in the shipping business, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries went ahead and laid the keels for new boats, and in addition to that he incurred further expenditure. On March 23, 1920, when this proposed appropriation of $20,000,000 was under discussion in the House, I made these observations. The minister had presented his statement, and in discussing that statement, I said:

> I believe the statement by the hon. gentleman showed that we were making money out of the steamship business but I think he will agree with me that conditions are abnormal. He cannot expect that freights will continue where they are to-day. He knows, and nobody knows better than he, that it is only a matter of a short time until freights will decrease in volume; there will not be so many cargoes to carry, some of the ships will probably have difficulty in securing business, and we will consequently operate at a loss.

Further along, I said to the minister:

> The hon. the Minister of Marine would not put his own money into a prospect if he thought that it would be unsuccessful with a possible loss within a few years; and if that is the case why should he put the money of the people into this enterprise now?

I opposed the appropriation then; I said that it was a poor business investment for the people of this country, and I say so to-day. I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries brought into the House the statement he did. That statement rather surprised me. The minister stated that our profits in connection with the mercantile marine during the year were $770,000 odd; but when you analyze that statement, you find he allowed only 2 per cent for depreciation on the ships. Any man in the shipping business, I do not care who he is or on what side of the House he may be, will tell you that in any well-regulated, well-managed shipping concern, an allowance of 5 per cent per annum is made for depreciation. In addition to that, not a five cent piece was allowed for interest on the $50,000,000 borrowed to be put into the enterprise, and further, no depreciation was allowed for the liquid assets. I do not believe this was a fair statement to present, nor that the minister should have presented such a statement to the House, because, as a matter of fact, it was a reflection upon the intelligence of hon. members and, indeed, upon the intelligence of the people of Canada. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will give us a fair and clear financial statement of the operation of his vessels for the incoming year, he will find that, allowing 5 per cent for depreciation on the boats, allowing interest on borrowed capital, allowing for depreciation of the liquid assets, we will not operate the mercantile marine for this year without a loss of $6,000,000. I have no hesitation in going on record on that to-night. A sum of $6.000,000 may not mean much to hon. gentlemen opposite who have got into the habit of speaking of hundreds of milions; but it represents 6 per cent on $100,000,000, which might easily be taken as being added to our national debt. Moreover, the Government cannot escape responsibility in connection with the action of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; they are equally responsible with the minister; they cannot permit a minister, no matter what department he presides over, to engage in a hazardous enterprise without assuming the responsibility. For months and months, and indeed for years to come, the people of this country will be paying interest for the folly of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

In the course of the session which is now drawing to a close, we have had many interesting discussions in this House; but there was, perhaps, none that attracted more attention throughout the country and that was of more interest to the people of Canada than the discussion with reference to the railways. I should like to say just a word or two in connection with the railway situation. Much has been said with reference to the failure of public ownership. We know that the Canadian Pacific, assuming, perhaps naturally, that the people are dissatisfied with the conditions that obtain to-day, made an offer. We know further that to-day there is a committee of this House dealing with the railway problem. My hope is that they will find some way out of our difficulties; but in the meantime, I personally do not see how this affects the question of public ownership one way or the other. I do not propose to-night to discuss the merits of public versus private ownership, but if public ownership is ever to be a success, it must have back of it the confidence of the people of the country.

I say that so far as the men at the head of the government railways are concerned, and so far as the question of political interference by this Government with the directorate is concerned, these men have not the confidence of the people. I say this advisedly, because I believe that when the Government took over the Canadian Northern, and amalgamated the different systems, they made a grievous mistake, so far as obtaining the confidence of the public is concerned, when they appointed Mr. D. B. Hanna president of the National railways. It is true that the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) has said that Mr. Hanna is a first-class railway operator and a first-class railway man in every respect. That may be so; I hope it is; but for one who is an expert operator, for one who knows his business thoroughly, Mr. Hanna has been singularly unfortunate in the roads he has been connected with. As a matter of fact, those who gave the matter any thought at all said, when Mr. D. B. Hanna came in as president and general manager of the National Railway system; it is the old Canadian Northern crowd again, and the only difference is that they will be dictating the policy, and the Government will be paying the bills. That was the thought of the public. It was impossible to disassociate in the public mind Mr. Hanna from the Canadian Northern, and he must of necessity accept the responsibility for his twenty years association with that road.

Anybody who knows the history of the Canadian Northern knows that the men who were the alleged owners of the road never attempted or even thought of making money out of the operation of the road. That was too slow a method. Their money was to be made out of the building of the road. They were railroad builders, not railroad operators. From one end of the country to the other where the Canadian Northern was built and operated, there were subsidiary companies, and these subsidiary companies did not leave much of the parent company when it was turned over to the Government. As I said before, if the Government want to make a success of the National railways, the very first thing they must do, in my opinion, is to place a man in charge who will have the confidence of the public, and I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Hanna, irrespective of whatever ability he may possess, does not and will not have the confidence of the public on account of his past associations.

The Minister of Railways has asked for suggestions from the House. I give him mine for what they are worth. I have no doubt at all that he will not accept them, but that does not matter. Early this session I asked a question of the Government with reference to the directors of the Canadian Government railways. I took the position that the responsibility of appointing the directors was the Government's. Here were men to whom we were turning over every year approximately $200,000,000 of the people's money to expend. The very first thing the Government should have seen to was that the men who occupied these responsible positions, if they were real directors, not dummy directors, were competent responsible men who were not tied up to or allied with any other interest that might conflict with that of the railway. Having that in mind, I asked the following questions of the Government, which will be found in Hansard of March 21, 1921:

1. What are the names of the gentlemen who compose the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways?
2. What is the salary of each, and what amount did each receive as expenses during the past year?
3. Are any of these gentlemen also directors of joint stock companies doing business in Canada?
4. If so, of what company or companies are they respectively directors?

Hon. Mr. Reid, (Grenville):

1. D. B. Hanna, A. J. Mitchell, R. T. Riley, R. Hobson, Major G. A. Bell, Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Col. Thomas Cantley, A. P. Barnhill, E. R. Wood.
2. Director's fees, $2,000 each, and travelling expenses to and from their homes.
3. The Government has no information.
4. Answered by No. 3.

So here we have the Government stating in the House that they have handed over the railways of this country to certain gentlemen to direct for the people and have authorized them to spend every year approximately $200,000,000 of the people's money although the Government have no knowledge of their previous associations or affiliations. Surely, that is not good business. Surely that is not exercising the ordinary business caution of men who are trustees, as the Government are trustees for the people, in a matter so important as this. If the Government does not know what the interests and affiliations of these gentlemen are there are books published that will tell them. If they will look in the Directory of Directors they will find that these gentlemen have belonged to a great many companies. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) on one occasion in the House this session read out a list of the companies they were associated with, and one could not help being struck by the fact that these gentlemen are directors in many companies which are doing millions of dollars worth of business each year with the national railways. I do hope, that in making purchases for the Canadian National Railways these gentlemen get the lowest possible price, I have no doubt they do but that is not the question. I say it is highly improper for men who are directors and presidents of companies which are doing millions of dollars worth of business with the national railways to be also acting as directors of the railways. Let me explain what I mean. We have in the list of directors the name of Mr. Robert Hobson. Mr. Hobson is president of the Canada Steel Company. Now the Canada Steel Company does quite a business with the Canadian National Railways. As I said before, if Mr. Hobson is a real director, with all the responsibilities of a director, when the purchasing agent comes in with his requisition for the directors to pass upon, what does Mr. Hobson do when the tenders are opened from the Canada Steel Company? Does he say: The prices are too high. He is the president of that company, remember. Or does he—he probably does—refuse to sit on the board while the matter is being discussed? Let me give another example. This same gentleman is a director of the Canadian Locomotive Works. What does he do when the tenders from that firm for locomotives are being considered? Does he say that the prices quoted by that firm are too high, and that the national railways should not deal with that firm for locomotives, or does he refuse to sit on the board and look out of the window while the matter is being discussed? I might also take the case of Colonel Cantley, who is a director of the Eastern Car Company, and of the Nova Scotia Steel Company. What does he do when tenders from these companies are being opened by the Board of Directors? I might go on down the list. The point I make is that these gentlemen are occupying an anomalous position. They have no right to be buyers and sellers at the same time, and if their own sense of propriety does not dictate that to them the Government should step in and see that the men who are in charge of the National Railway System as directors should not be associated with companies which are doing millions of dollars worth of business with the National Railway System annually. Let me tell you that the people of this country who know anything about the railway situation appreciate that point. You will hear it everywhere. How does the Government expect to make public ownership a success under these conditions?

They must first have the confidence of the public, and they will never get it unless they do what should be done. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid), is looking for suggestions. Let me give him two: First, ask for the resignation of the president; second, ask for the resignation from the directorate of men who are associated or affiliated with other companies doing business with the railways. If he does this he will go a long way towards restoring public confidence in the enterprise, and in that way he would help largely to wipe out the annually increasing deficit.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, has been delivering a good many addresses outside of this House, and once or twice in the House, with reference to the adverse balance of trade. I should like to say a word or two bearing upon that important subject. I do not care what views any hon. gentleman in this House may hold with reference to the tariff. I do not think that anyone will gainsay the fact that our manufacturing industries in Canada have done much to develop the country. I have no hesitation in saying that; nor have I any desire to minimize the effect of what they have done. In my opinion, however, the manufacturers of the country to-day are not fully alive to their responsibilities. I believe they have been paying too much attention to the home market of 9,000,000 people, and not giving enough attention to the markets of our sister Dominions comprising in all over 400,000,000. There are two alternatives when a business man or a manufacturing concern is threatened with competition. In the first place, if it is a question of price, the business man sits down, looks the situation over carefully, and realizes that one way of improving matters is to increase the volume of business, decrease his overhead, and thus reduce the price of his finished product so that he may meet competition. There is another way, and it is one which I think has been more in vogue during the past few years than is really good for the country, and that is, for the manufacturer to come to Ottawa, and ask for more protection so as absolutely to shut out competition. When that is done, so far as he is concerned, he is through; and many of the manufacturers, I am afraid, have pursued this line of least resistance. I know that the Minister of Finance is always frank; but, if he were perfectly willing, I have no doubt he could tell us to-night that during the past few weeks there have been many hundreds of manufacturers from various parts of the Dominion calling at his office and asking for protection, and more protection. So far as this Budget itself is concerned, there are no tariff increases; but I am not so sure that in connection with the legislation enacted by my hon. friend, extending the anti-dumping clause, there is not room for some of our manufacturing friends to be well taken care of. As a matter of fact, this new law will give the Minister of Customs almost arbitrary authority in regard to fixing the price at which goods may be entered, although of course, I do not say that will be done: Within a year we shall learn whether it is or not; but there is ample room there for a good deal of protection, probably more than 5 or 10 per cent of a direct rise in the schedule would be.

As I have remarked, I think the manufacturers of this country have been paying too much attention to the home market to the neglect of foreign markets. Recently a campaign has been put on to buy goods made in Canada, and in connection with that compaign, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made a tour of the principal cities in Ontario. This gentleman not only addressed encouraging remarks to the business men to buy goods made in Canada, but he also delivered addresses on pretty nearly every question under the sun. In one place, I notice, he warned them against the evils of an early election. He said: "If you have an election now it will interfere with business and unsettle the minds of the people of the country." An election interfere with business to-day, when one-half of the factories are shut down and the other half running on half-time! An election unsettle the minds of the people, when the great majority of the Canadian people are only waiting for an opportunity to get their minds settled by turning out this Government! Why, sir, the unsettling factor in the country to-day is, that the people are not given the opportunity to state their minds; and if my hon. friends opposite have any doubt about that, let them put it to the test, and they will soon find out.

Now, my hon. friend, the president of the Manufacturers' Association, was kind to my Agrarian friends. I do not know whether it was at Peterborough or at some other place he suggested that it might be advisable to allow a rebate of income tax so far as the farmers were concerned. Well, that would make for a very friendly feeling, as he said, between the farmers and the manufacturers; but I do not know why he simply limited his proposal to the farmers. Why did he not suggest taking the income tax off everybody and thus have everybody cheering for the Manufacturers' Association? It would have appealed to a good many of us, I know.

These gentlemen are not paying sufficient attention to foreign trade. Recently I had the opportunity of listening to an address delivered by Mr. A. N. Lawrence, the general sales manager of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, who had just returned from abroad after having travelled for over sixteen months throughout the sister Dominions, and having covered 64,000 miles. What does he say with reference to the enterprise and initiative of our Canadian manufacturers? This is what he says:

> During my entire sixteen months abroad, I never met a single representative of any Canadian enterprise. On the other hand, the activity of American representatives in these same countries is so decidedly marked that one could safely say that to-day American industries are invading the whole of the British overseas possessions.

That is the statement of the sales agent of a Canadian concern. He spent sixteen months in the British Dominions, including India, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, and the Straits Settlement, representing a total population of some 400,000,000: in some of these Dominions we have a preferential tariff; nevertheless, these places are all over-run by Americans, while there are no representatives of Canadian firms in any one of these countries. What does this gentleman say? In every city he visited the Americans were selling their goods and buying raw materials, and those same raw materials they subsequently sold in New York to Canadian manufacturers. Is there any wonder there is a balance of trade against us? It is not the fault of the consumers whom my hon. friend has been lecturing; it is largely the fault of those who supply the consumer.

Sir, I have some figures here in regard to last year's trade imports; they are taken from the statistics supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and cover the imports for the fiscal years ending March 31, last. They disclose that furs and skins to the value of $10,878,924 were imported from the United States. Why send our raw furs to the United States and bring back the finished product? Of leather and manufactures of leather we imported $15,742,091. Surely such an extensive importation as that constitutes an indictment against those who are in the leather and shoe business in this country. Then of copper and its products we imported $8,477,403 worth. Now, there is no country in the world in which there is more copper available than Canada. Why then should we import over $8,000,000 worth of copper and its products from the United States? Then of electric and gas apparatus we imported $10,780,775. We have concerns in Canada who are manufacturing these very articles under protection. In that case why should our people have to go to the United States and buy $10,000,000 worth? There is something radically wrong when such importations are made, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance should lecture the Canadian manufacturers in that connection. He should tell them to make what the people of this country want and there will be no difficulty at all in getting the Canadian consumers to buy Canadian products.

Apropos of the addresses that have been delivered by my hon. friend, I notice that he has been lecturing the ladies on the wearing apparel which they obtain in the United States and elsewhere. I have not sufficient knowledge to determine where that wearing apparel comes from, but I assume that my hon. friend knows what he is talking about. Speaking more particularly of the women of my home city—Windsor—they do not go across the Detroit river and pay ferry fare, car fare, and the exchange on Canadian money, and then duties on the goods they bring back, just for the privilege of purchasing clothing in the United States; they go there simply because they cannot obtain what they need from our local stores. That is not the fault of the local merchants, it is because the manufacturers in Canada are not giving them the desired style and quality. Just as soon as they provide these requisites there will be no need to lecture the consumers on the necessity of buying home products. Nobody wants to buy any goods made outside of Canada; everybody that I know of wishes to help Canadian trade by buying Canadian goods. All want to do their part in that regard, but let the Canadian manufacturers give them value for their money. I agree that the slogan "Buy goods made in Canada" is a good one, and I heartily approve of it, but I would add these words to that slogan "Just as long as you get equal value for your money." I do not believe it is right to penalize the consumers in this country in order to keep Canadian manufacturers in business who are not able to meet proper competition.

I have nothing more to say except a word or two in reference to the amendment. I need hardly say, Sir, that I propose to vote for the amendment. I shall do so for several reasons: In the first place, it emanates from the Liberal party, and the Liberal party and its policy have always appealed to me. The Liberal party was the party that made this country prosperous, and I am perfectly satisfied that if it is again returned to power, prosperity will once more return to this country. That is one reason why I am going to vote for the amendment. Another reason is this: I believe that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is absolutely proceeding along the right line when he says the kind of manufactures that should be encouraged in Canada are those that will avail themselves of our raw materials. I have no hesitation in supporting that. I likewise believe in the statement contained in the amendment that any change in the tariff should be one that will lower the burden which the consumers of this country are carrying today.

10 p.m.

Mr. SAMUEL CHARTERS (Peel): I was very much surprised at the tone of the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kennedy, Essex) who has just taken his seat. Most young men now-a-days are cheerful in their utterances, but the hon. member was very doleful—he sees nothing around him that is good. He complains of what he calls "the flag waving" of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie). My hon. friend will not be accused of anything of that kind. Let me say that the Minister of Militia, though he may be sneered at by hon. gentlemen opposite who are not in sympathy with him, stands high in the affections of the people of this country because of the position he took three or four years ago when it meant a very great deal for him to take the stand he did.

The complaint is also made that we have too many generals. Surely my hon. friend knows that the generals were not the product of any action on the part of the Government; they were the product of the war. These officers won their generalships by sacrifices and by services to their country, and had other gentlemen acted similarly they might have also been promoted.

My hon. friend from Essex has complained in regard to everything. Judging by his speech, if he had his way the militia would not be needed, the naval service would be discontinued, and the railway situation might be regarded as settled. Many years ago we were accustomed to what were called "blue ruin" speeches, but not much has been heard of them of late. Now we have had a resurrection of those sentiments by my hon. friend from Essex. However, such views are not very generally entertained by members on either side of the House. I do not think my hon. friend will strengthen himself in the town of Windsor by the position which he takes in relation to the manufacturers of the country. He tells us that a number of manufacturers visited the Minister of Finance before the Budget was brought down —that they came to Ottawa, looking for more protection. Surely my hon. friend did not expect the Minister of Finance to intimate to them that they must not come. My hon. friend adds, however, with respect to the interview "They did not get it." If that is the position surely there can be no complaint on that score.

Then my hon. friend said that half the factories in the country are closed and the other half are not operating on full time. All they want, he says, is an election in order to have a chance to turn the Government out. Then, I suppose, they will go full steam ahead.

My hon. friend tells us we should buy goods from the United States if the value of the goods is just a little bit better than the value we can obtain at home. I do not think that is a good policy myself, and I am satisfied that the people of this country, to a very large degree, do not believe so either although I think we have a right to give them every advantage so far as we can do so.

I do not know that I would be wise in attempting to follow any further the statements that have been made by the hon. gentleman. They will be read throughout the country with very great surprise by those who had expected from the young, cheerful, coming and expectant Finance Minister something more encouraging and hopeful.

In this, as in every other Budget debate, it is contended that the policy of protection works injury to those engaged in agriculture. Protection, we are told, has made for the abandonment of farming, for rural depopulation, for decreased production, and for unequal and burdensome taxation. If that charge could be proven I do not think the farmers of Canada would have supported the policy for so many years. They would have abolished it. But the conditions that obtain in the province of Ontario—that is where any rural depopulation or shifting of population is most pronounced—are practically the same as they are elsewhere.

For instance, in Michigan it was officially reported that there were no fewer than 18,132 farms abandoned in last year, that 1,700,000 acres were undeveloped, that 30,000 farm houses were vacant, and that 46,000 persons left farms in three years and 10,000 in one year. The same conditions prevail in the state of Indiana. According to a statement made in April last by the Wall street journal, 255,000 farmers left the land in one year in that state, 24,000 vacant farm houses were reported in New York State, and only 300,000 farmers remained on the land in that state. So if there has been some shifting of population in this province, the same condition exists in the states across the line. The protective tariff, which is higher there, has not kept the people on the land; nor has the free trade, or near free trade policy had that effect in England, because the same condition exists there.

What are conditions in the province of Ontario? We have been told over and over again during the past forty years that 3,500 people had left the farms every year and had gone to the cities and towns or elsewhere, and it has been contended that the Government, or the National Policy, is responsible for this so-called rural depopulation. If the policy of the government is to blame, then one side is just as responsible as the other, because for fifteen years the Liberals were in power in the Dominion and for twenty-five years in the province, and if it was possible to remedy that condition of affairs by legislation they would have done so. But the statements are not quite borne out by the facts. For instance, those who left the rural parts of the province were not by any means all farmers. In almost every part of old Ontario there are many unincorporated villages, the inhabitants of which are classed as rural residents. Because of the changed conditions these villages have been practically wiped out in some places and the people have gone elsewhere. But they were not all farmers; there were the corner tavern keeper, the grocer, blacksmith, the wagon maker, and the others employed in different lines of trade; they have gone, and in that way there has been a reduction in population. But in addition to that we have other causes that I need not refer to here, one of them being the exceedingly low birth-rate in certain rural parts of the province.

But if those people have left the province in any considerable numbers—and undoubtedly they have—they have not been lost to Canada, because they have gone to one or other of the western provinces and are now assisting in developing the country in the various capacities in which they are engaged. That is borne out by the fact that in this House 33 members representing western constituencies were born in the province of Ontario, and I think that should be regarded as a recommendation in favour of those members.

But whatever may have been the conditions in the past, the changing of population has ceased. There is no longer a decrease in the rural population of the province of Ontario. The population of 1919 is greater than that of 1918 and the population of 1920 is greater than that of 1919. The figures are:

1918	996,228
1919	998,597
1920	999,910

The increase is not very large, it is true, but there is an increase, and it is about equal to half of the decrease in the years referred to. Then, on the other side, instead of a further increase in the population of the towns and villages there has been a decrease. The decrease last year compared with 1919 was 8,255, or two and a half times as great as the decrease in the rural population in the years immediately preceding. This, I think, furnishes very good evidence that the so-called exodus from the land, in so far at least as the province of Ontario is concerned, has practically ceased; and is evidence also that the people in the towns and villages are seeking employment in the country, a condition of affairs which will be generally agreeable to all those who are interested in the progress of the country.

But while there has been that decrease in population in those years, production has not decreased. Improved machinery, improved methods, improved conditions have made possible increased production with the decreased labour. Many millions of dollars, as everybody knows, have been expended in the construction of good roads, and this has made possible the easier marketing of farm products. To-day a man can drive a distance of fifteen, twenty or twenty-five miles with half the time, labour and expense that were occasioned in days gone by. Millions of dollars have also been expended in establishing the rural mail service, which has been another convenience to the people in every part of the Dominion, perhaps more especially so to those in the older portions of Ontario. Then, too there has been invested in telephones in the province of Ontario no less a sum than $50,000,000, with 360,000 telephones in use, or one for every seven persons. I mention these things for the purpose of indicating the changes that have taken place and also the improvements that were possible because of those changes.

Let me give an illustration furnished by the Department of Agriculture a short time ago. In 1850 it took one man 39 hours to produce an acre of corn; to-day it requires only 18 hours. In 1850 it took a man 61 hours to produce an acre of wheat; now it takes only ten hours. In 1850 it took a man 21 hours to harvest an acre of hay; to-day it takes only 8 hours. In Belgium one man works five acres of land; in England, 10 acres; in Ontario, 40 acres. That is, Ontario's production per man is very much higher than in those two countries, although their yield per acre is very much greater than ours.

As to our field crops and other farm produce during the years that have been complained about, taking the years prior to the war, the following statement will be interesting as applying to Ontario:

	1883	1913
Field crops..	$114,000,000	$160,000,000
Farm buildings ..	163,000,000	345,000,000
Live stock..	99,000,000	237,000,000

This is not an indication that agriculture was going back in that province. The same applies to the Dominion. The total farm products of Canada in 1900 amounted to $364,000,000; in 1910, $663,000,000; in 1919, $1,197,000,000.

If there have been abandoned farms, as is contended—and there were some, but they are very few in so far as that part of the country is concerned—there were also abandoned factories. It is sometimes contended that every farmer is a man who is suffering, and that every manufacturer is a man who is prospering; but in the ten years 4,500 failures of manufacturing concerns have taken place in Canada. And, let me say that rural depopulation has ceased to exist in Ontario, if it ever did exist. Abandoned farms are few where the land is good and reasonably certain for cultivation.

It cannot be denied, however, that there is still a shortage of farm labour, and nobody has been able to suggest a remedy that can be adopted to provide against that shortage. Everybody knows that there is very considerable unemployment in the cities, while the farmers require hired men. The reason that those idle men in the cities are not employed in the country is because the farmers are unable to pay the wages demanded, and those who are out of employment refuse to accept the wages the farmer is able to pay. If any one can devise means by which the two can be brought together, he will be doing a good service to his country, but so far nobody has proposed legislation or any other remedy that will accomplish that end.

While everybody is anxious to see as many people as possible working on the land, it would not be well for everybody, or even nearly everybody, to be a farmer. It is a fact that those countries in which farming is the chief occupation of the people are not countries which we look upon as examples, so to speak. In Mexico nearly all the people are on the land. In Russia 85 per cent of the people are still engaged in farming, and in India the proportion is equally large. An hon. gentleman referred the other day to a native of China, a grandson of Confucius, as giving valuable instruction to the people of this and other countries. In China the people are largely on the land, and Canadians, supposed to be downtrodden and taxed to death, are subscribing money to keep the Chinese people from starving in the famine districts. I mention these things because in recent years it has been a common practice on many platforms to assert that the farmers all over Canada, particularly those in Ontario, are suffering because of the policy of protection. It is a fact, however, that under the policy of protection the farmers of Canada have prospered as they never prospered before, and they are prospering to-day much more than they would have done had the policy of free trade which is advocated in some quarters been adopted.

Another complaint we frequently hear is that the farmers are subjected to unfair taxation. There is no doubt that the farmers are able and willing to bear their fair share of the burden of taxation, and the complaint that they are unduly taxed is not justified by the facts. One complaint that is heard very frequently is that the duty on farm implements is a heavy burden upon those engaged in agriculture. But those who have made a careful study of the situation say otherwise. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), himself a farmer, is an example. He showed the other night that $28 per annum was the amount paid in customs taxes by the farmer on the ordinary 100 acres of land. If that is true—and I have no doubt that it is—surely there is not much ground for complaint on that score.

Then there is the other argument that the tariff increases the price of farm implements, and that if the duty were removed, if we had free trade, prices would come down. But the experiences of the past have not shown that to be the case either. The question of binder twine has been before the country for many years. There is no tax on binder twine, and if the arguments of free traders hold good that article should be just as cheap in Canada as it is in the United States. But the facts are that this year in Ontario—and I have no doubt in the western provinces as well—the price of binder twine was from 20 to 21½ cents per pound, while in the United States—Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois—the price was 16½ cents. This is an instance of what we might expect if the duty on other articles was removed.

Then, there is the other article about which so much has been said, the cream separator. Mr. Findley gave a very exhaustive statement on this subject last fall. He pointed out that a cream separator sells for $105, no duty being imposed, but that a mower, in which there is very much more material and the construction of which involves more labour, sells for $97 although it is subject to a duty of 12½ per cent. These are sample cases; I am sure that instances of this kind could be multiplied indefinitely.

The question has been raised whether the burden is too heavy in other directions. Does the income tax bear too heavily upon the farmers of Canada? Everybody knows that it does not. Answering a question in the House of Commons a few weeks ago the Finance Minister said that the amount collected in income tax up to February 28, 1921 was $62,687,258 and that of this amount the farmers had paid in 1917 and 1918—the returns for 1919 being not then complete—$957,980. This shows that the income tax is being carried by those who are best able to pay and is evidence of the wisdom of the Finance Minister in imposing it as he has done.

We hear a good deal this afternoon about the sales tax. I said at the beginning of my remarks that the member for Essex was in a doleful mood; I do not think he was any more doleful, however, than our usually cheerful friend the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid): The sales tax, according to him, was everything that was bad. The hon. member estimated that the sales tax would amount to $147.50 per family.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I wish to correct my hon. friend; I did not make any such statement. What I did say was that the customs tax plus the sales tax would amount to $147.50.

Mr. CHARTERS: Well, at $147.50 per family the hon. member would have a revenue of $295,000,000; if it is only half of that, according to the way he puts it now, then it would be nearly $150,000,000, three times as great as the amount expected by the Ottawa correspondent of the Farmers' Sun, who, I understand, is a sort of guide, philosopher and friend of the Farmers' party. I am sure that the Finance Minister will be very well satisfied if he gets a much smaller sum than that mentioned in the somewhat extravagant statements which are being made here and elsewhere throughout the country. Whatever the sales tax may be it will not bear heavily upon the poor man; it will, as in the case of the income tax, be borne very largely by those who are in the best position to spend money and to make many and heavy purchases. I would remind the House also that this is the only business tax being levied, and surely the amount to be collected under this head, even if it be the larger sum estimated, would not be considered very great in view of the necessity for discharging our debts in connection with the war.

Perhaps hon. gentlemen have an idea that this is the only country in which customs taxation is levied. According to a statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the British House of Commons on April 19, 1920, up to March 31 of that year, the sum of £149,360,000 had been collected in customs duties imposed on goods imported into the United Kingdom. In other words, the average amount paid by the residents of the United Kingdom, represented as a free trade country, by way of customs tariff tax last year was $16, only $3.50 per head less than that collected in Canada, which is supposed to be a high tariff country. The amount paid in England per family, therefore, would be about $80 per family.

The hon. gentleman, who complains about the sales tax, the customs tax and almost every other tax, subscribes to the doctrine that there should be freedom from taxation and free trade everywhere. That view, of course, he has the right to hold and to advance as far as he is able. But surely he must forget that we require $450,000,000 of revenue during the next year. Where are we going to get it? If he wipes out $100,000,000 or thereabouts in customs duties, the portion of the sales tax with which he is dissatisfied, and other items dealt with in the platform which he supports, we shall have very great difficulty in securing the money or in providing other means of taxation. As to a land tax, I venture to say that it would not be very acceptable to the farmers of this country.

Let us keep in mind that there must be industrial centres and the question is whether they will be in Canada or in a foreign country. Every shoe factory that is now in operation, every woollen industry, every foundry, every factory of any kind, gives considerable employment, increases the purchasing power of the community, and adds to the prosperity of the people. Seven hundred thousand men are now engaged in the factories of the country and are supporting no less than 2,000,000 of the people in this Dominion. In that number 75,000 are engaged in branch factories of American concerns that have been established in this country because of the tariff, and that are established only because the tariff has been imposed. These people are receiving from those factories no less a sum than $80,000,000 in wages annually. Surely, we are not anxious that that should be reduced in any way, and I am quite satisfied that if the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite is put into effect, there will be very few, if any, of those factories remaining in Canada five years hence.

We are anxious also to interest outside capital. We cannot interest outside capital by the method adopted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who speaks for the Opposition as a financial critic. That hon. gentleman the other day gave this warning:

> If there are any people in Canada who are contemplating the establishment of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary, I do them a friendly service when I say: "Don't do it," because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection, again, I advise him not to come.

That is not good advice to those who are contemplating coming to Canada. It is not good advice to those who are here; but as the hon. gentleman and his friends will not have an opportunity for many years to come of putting their views into practice, I do not know that we need pay much attention to it. The National Policy has met with the approval of the people; the policy that has made Canada great during forty years will continue to make Canada greater and greater in the years that are immediately before us.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, while I have been listening to the different contributions to this debate during the last few days, there have presented themselves to my mind several thoughts which I venture to place before the House. In the first place, the one outstanding feature of the Budget, as I see it, is that while an effort is made by my genial friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) to raise the necessary funds to meet what are, in some cases, unnecessary expenditures, a very different policy is followed this year from what was repeatedly announced last year as being the policy of the Government, that is that while last year the policy of direct taxation was placarded all over the luxury taxes of unhappy memory, this year the Government has changed its mind and adopted its old policy of indirect taxation and, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has pointed out, these taxes actualy place a heavier burden upon the workingman than upon the millionaire. In this regard, I would point out that in the United States while they are repealing the excess profits tax, they at the same time propose to replace it by a tax upon corporate profits, so that this tax may be adjusted according to ability to pay. But under our Budget scheme, the business profits tax is repealed, and the burden is shifted on to the shoulders of the consuming public in the shape of a 50 per cent increase in the sales tax.

A good deal has been said about expenditure in other countries in comparison with Canada, and a few days ago the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) gave us bushels of figures along this line, but then he did not give the whole story. I find that the Secretary of the Treasury in the United States announced, in his estimate of expenditure for this year, a reduction of $1,000,000,000 from that of last year, or in other words, a reduction in round numbers from $5,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000. This expenditure of $4,000,000,000 which is proposed for this year works out at $37 per capita, while ours in Canada of $591,000,000 on an estimate of our population of 8,500,000, is just around $70 for each man, woman and child in the Dominion. That is to say, $37 per capita in the United States and $70 per capita in Canada, or almost double that in the United States. The Minister of Militia and Defence, however, showed us that the militia and defence expenditure in Canada is only $1.69 per capita, while in the United States he showed it to be $13.13 per capita. This would leave an expenditure for everything outside of defence of $23.87 per capita in the United States as against $68.31 per capita in Canada, or practically three times as much.

I am reminded of another famous speech by the Minister of Militia and Defence in which he criticises the farmers of the Dominion for purchasing machinery made in the United States. I would draw his attention to a statement of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), that last year Canada imported 2,000,000 pounds of strawberries and 4,000,000 pounds of out of season tomatoes from the United States, and I would ask him: Does he think these were purchased by the farmers?

While the expenditure of the United States is being cut down by $1,000,000,000 and is only $37 per capita as against our $70, the Secretary of the Treasury is evidently convinced that it is still too high, and in his message to the Committee on Ways and Means he has this to say about it, which might well be considered here:

> The nation cannot continue to spend at this shocking rate. As the President said in his message, the burden is unbearable and there are two avenues of relief. "One is rigid resistance in appropriation and the other is utmost economy in administration." This is no time for extravagance or for entering upon new fields of expenditure. The nation's finances are sound and its credit is the best in the world, but it cannot afford reckless or wasteful expenditure. New or large expenditures cannot be financed without increased taxes or new loans. Expenditures should not even be permitted to continue at the present rate.

Mr. GLASS: Could my hon. friend tell the House what are the per capita imports of the United States and the per capita imports of Canada? They would have a material bearing on this question.

Mr. KNOX: I am speaking about the per capita expenditures, and I think the quotations given should be quite satisfactory to prove my argument.

In regard to our estimates of expenditure for this year, I would point out that there are many items, some very large items, which might well be eliminated in view of the strenuous times through which we are passing, and in view of the fact that to meet these expenditures it is necessary to resort to further taxation of the great masses of the common people who are already indirectly taxed to the limit on almost everything they purchase, outside of some foodstuffs. Why should the workingman of the city of Prince Albert, or the homesteader or farmer of northern Saskatchewan have to pay an increased tax for the purpose of spending millions of dollars on the Welland and Trent Valley canals, which can give no immediate returns, while they are denied the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, knowing as they do that the difference between the transportation charges by the present route and the Hudson bay route would mean the difference between success and failure for them?

Mr. Speaker, I was particularly pleased to hear the hon. member for Oxford North (Mr. Nesbitt) as a supporter of the Government, criticise in no milk and water fashion the wanton expenditures that are taking place, particularly that connected with the Trent Valley canal. I am sure that many hon. members supporting the Government, if they really spoke out their minds, would speak in the same way. The argument has been made that these expenditures are merely for the purpose of giving employment. If that is the case, I can easily mention a number of ways in which employment can be given with much more beneficial effect than by this expenditure on canals and dry docks. One way in particular that commends itself to me, and that would certainly have the advantage of benefiting a class of men well deserving of it, would be a loan to the returned man, so that he might build a house for himself and thus help to re-establish himself in the country. If the same amount were expended in this way it would give a great deal more employment than if expended on canals and dry docks; secondly, it would be spread over the whole Dominion more equally; thirdly, the money would eventually find its way back to the treasury; and fourthly, and most important of all, you would have the satisfaction of knowing that you were doing something for the man who really deserved it. Many of these men have come back with the full intention of marrying and settling down, but in view of the present housing situation, this is impossible. In many of the towns and cities rents are practically beyond reach, and very few returned men are in a position to build without assistance. I ask the Government seriously to consider this proposal.

Speaking of northern Saskatchewan, I would point out that the people there are naturally optimistic if they are only given a chance. They feel that they have an unequalled heritage both in soil and climatic conditions. It is now more than fifty years since the first settlement was made in the Prince Albert constituency, and during that time we have never had a crop failure. We have untold undeveloped natural resources in the northern part of the constituency, but vast areas are handicapped for want of transportation facilities. Speaking of transportation facilities, I was gratified to hear the Minister of Railways announce a few days ago, when giving the programme of branch lines on which steel would be laid this year, that steel would be laid on the Paddockwood line north of Prince Albert, and on the line running north-east from Melford. I have here a copy of the Prince Albert Daily Herald, published since then, making reference to this construction, and I wish to quote a short extract to show that the people there are mindful of the situation, and appreciate what it is proposed to do:

> Much gratification is naturally felt in the city and district over the announcement from Ottawa that the Paddockwood railway line is on the program for rails this year, which means that trains may be running north from this city before the snow flies again. Operation of this branch will at the outset open up a rich territory but the importance of the new line lies not so much in the first twenty miles as in later extensions which will put a vast area possessing wonderful natural resources into touch with Prince Albert.
> Laying of steel on the north line will be most gladly welcomed by the prosperous soldier settlement which has gone in around Paddockwood. It is possibly largely on account of promises made to this settlement that the Government has decided to proceed with this line in a year when only a small mileage of steel laying will be attempted.
> In view of the plan of the Government it will be necessary that the grading work on this line be rushed to completion so that there will be no reason to be advanced on that score why the steel cannot be laid in late summer and fall.

The contract was let and the grading partly completed last year. The balance is being rushed now, so as to be ready for the steel.

I must admit that I can see a slight ray of light, possibly a slight indication of penitence, in the fact that the Minister of Finance has exempted from the sales tax foodstuffs in their natural state, as well as the first product of the fisheries, mines and forests. If the Government would only extend this exemption to apply to customs tariffs on the implements of production used in these same lines, I would be forced to the conclusion that they had at last repented, though it might be only death-bed repentance. I am sorry, however, that there are no indications of any such thing.

As the platform of the Progressive party calls for the free admission of the implements of production and the amendment now before the House also calls for that, I shall certainly vote for the amendment.

The present Government has announced its policy as a policy of protection. We know where they stand in that regard. We also know where the Manufacturers' Association stands with regard to the Government. But what is this protection going to do for the farmer of this country? It is going to increase the price of everything he has to buy without any corresponding increase for what he has to sell, and it is going to increase the cost of living for the public generally. Here is what the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour once said about protection, speaking in Edinburgh:

> A protective policy is a policy which aims at supporting or creating home industries by raising home prices. The raising of prices is a necessary step towards the encouragement of an industry under a protective system. The object of protection is to encourage home industries. The means whereby it attains that object is by the manipulation of a fiscal system to raise home prices. If the home prices are not raised, the industry is not encouraged. If the industry is encouraged, it is by the raising of prices.

I think that that coming from a man like Mr. Balfour, shows that it is a recognized thing that protection does increase prices. A few days ago I had a letter from a western farmer who gives a good deal of thought and study to economic and public questions, and one paragraph coincided so closely with my own views on the subject that I venture to quote it here.

> To make our railroads profitable we must have production along their lines; to have production we must have people; to have people producing we must create such economic conditions surrounding production that they can reasonably hope to make that production profitable.

I would ask, in all fairness, if there is any indication on the part of the present Government, or one jot or tittle of evidence in their policy, to show that they are making the least attempt to create such economic conditions surrounding production of the natural products that those engaged therein may reasonably expect to make that production profitable. If there is, I have been unable to find it.

A great deal has been said about a Board of Inquiry to inquire into the grain trade. If anything can be done to improve conditions in that trade, it will certainly be appreciated by the people of the West, but permit me, Sir, to inform this House that there is a strong feeling throughout the West at present that this board has been appointed for a very different purpose than to improve conditions in the grain trade. This feeling is gaining ground, not only among the opponents of the Government, but also among those who are, or possibly I would be more correct in saying, who were, supporters of the Government. I have before me a copy of an article written by a gentleman of the latter class, and published recently in western papers over his own signature. He is Mr. E. N. Hopkins, a prominent citizen of the city of Moosejaw, a most highly respected man, who for some years held the high and honourable position of President of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, and who still is honorary president of that association. He was always known as a staunch and loyal supporter of the Conservative party, and as proof of that I would point out that he was appointed by that party some six or eight years ago as a member of the Economic Development Commission, so there need be no mistake as to this gentleman's political standing. I shall not read the whole article. After dealing with certain matters connected with the grain trade and the Board of Grain Commissioners, Mr. Hopkins has this to say:

> If I were to give the Government a little friendly advice—unsolicited—I would say that the farmers have been wondering for some time if a farmers' government would not be a distinct improvement, and they are now beginning to feel confident that it could not be worse than the present regime. The first thought is dangerous, but the second will be fatal to the Government once the farmer realizes the absolute justness of the case and the utter weakness and unfairness of the shallow arguments advanced by the Grain Commission. The present Government would be well advised to take time by the forelock and make as many as possible of the "faithful" safe and comfortable by placing them in that political graveyard known as the Canadian Senate, for, unless they mend their ways, their days are numbered, and we would have them know that the mal-administration of the Grain Act has played no small part in their downfall. The farmers of the West have very little use for governments that "break faith" and for commissions that prove false to the trust reposed in them.

Appeasing Farmers' Wrath

> Since writing the foregoing word has come to hand that the Government has appointed a commission to investigate the whole grain trade. By this means it is hoped to appease the wrath of the farmers and give the Government time to go over the same ground, bring down more legislation, and entrust the administration of same to three or four more of their incompetent but very faithful henchmen. But this will only bring us back to where we started. There is no need for any investigation into the grain trade, no need for any further legislation, but there is very real need of the present Board of Grain Commissioners being fired and replaced by men who are not only thoroughly conversant with the grain trade, but are also known to be sympathetic in their attitude towards the act which they are required to administer. The whole difficulty is that we have a Grain Commission which is not in sympathy with the Grain Act, and which, therefore, makes no effort to administer the Act in the spirit in which it was conceived. To suggest an enquiry into the grain trade and to take one of the grain commissioners and place him on the board of enquiry is a most extraordinary procedure—especially when it is borne in mind that the activities of the Grain Commissioners will come in for close examination during the investigation. With a grain commissioner on the board of enquiry it is safe to assume that anything reflecting on the Grain Commissioners will be ruled outside the terms of reference, and the unfortunate farmer will once again find himself the goat in another piece of political strategy.
> What may we expect from a commissioner who has been unable to interpret the spirit or intent of an Act he has administered for years?

I might add Mr. Speaker, that the people of the West are anxious, if any investigation is to take place, that it be carried out in such a way that the members of the Board of Grain Commissioners be called upon to appear as witnesses and not as judges. I commend this thought to the Government.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, several sittings of this House have been taken up by the debate on the Budget. Such as it is, this speech is open to a good deal of criticism, as well as the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance. To my mind some statements have been made which should not go unchallenged. Although the discussion concerning the financial and economic aspect of the question has been dragging on for quite a while, I feel it my duty to submit a few remarks to your indulgent attention. The most to be deplored in the present Budget is to my mind the regrettable state of our finances. Indeed any one who has followed so far this debate, is forced to recognize that the burden of our taxes is ever increasing; that the extent of our liabilities is now boundless. Following on this dismal picture, it is painful to note the deplorable lack of a progressive tariff policy which might relieve the general uneasiness in the country by bringing on a revival in production and trade which might take us back to the much regretted happiness and prosperity of former years.

Our finances, as every one admits, are in a deplorable condition, and yet the Government does nothing to remedy it. I understood that after the great war, we should have had a painful burden of debt to bear. Had it been only that, we could by necessary sacrifices effectually meet our liabilitites, however heavy. No, I do not refer here to the encumbrances, the necessary consequence of our participation in the war. These we regard as a debt of honour; let us put aside the consideration of the causes which brought them on; besides the people understand that the sacrifices represented by taxes to be paid in money, can never equal our greater and nobler sacrifices in blood. No, I shall not speak here of the burdens created by the war; but I wonder, in connection with these heavy sacrifices, which some were ready to offer to "the last dollar and the last man," how the Government can be exonerated for the unwarranted expenditure of these last years. Can the Government ever be forgiven for the millions of dollars sunk in the acquisition of bankrupt railways, in the creation of a merchant marine, in the maintenance of public services, such as those of health and road building, which undoubtedly belong to the Provincial Governments, a policy which involves a constant menace of an unconstitutional encroachment upon the autonomy of the provinces?

Are the Government justifiable in spending millions annually for the creation of a permanent army after the enormous cost of our participation in the war? This is to my mind the grossest inconsistency on the part of our ministers; this is something which clearly demonstrates the incapacity and lack of foresight of the Government; this is, in a word, a most manifest example of the antinational and unpatriotic policy of our rulers.

The hon. Minister of Militia, in the wake of the right hon. Minister of Commerce, has thought proper to take a hand in this debate in defence of the expenditure of his department. He stated that his military expenditure was low in view of the present revenue of the country, and that they did not amount to the contributions made for that object by countries comparable to ours in population and resources. I may answer that it must not be forgotten that our revenue cannot serve as a point of comparison in connection with military expenditures, past, present or future, for this revenue has been artificially swollen with all kinds of possible provisional taxes with a view to meet liabilities incurred in the war. As to other countries, it is immaterial to us whether they engage in militarism and misconceive the needs of the day. They are, however, not to be justified for ignoring the pacific spirit which should prevail in the League of Nations. As we cannot boast of an independence which might in another country justify the maintenance of an army, we are not called upon to follow their example and we should not forget that after all we are but a colony. I shall now proceed to communicate to this House an important statement which the predecessor of the present Prime Minister made to the press indicating a stand which his successor was wrong in not adopting. This statement was made in January, 1921, in reply to a request from an American newspaper leading a crusade in favour of general disarmament.

Sir Robert's view on disarmament

In reply to a request from the New York World, which is conducting a crusade for a general disarmament by Great Britain, United States and Japan, Sir Robert Borden has sent the following statement to the World. "I sympathise most deeply and earnestly with every reasonable proposal for the reduction of armaments." Untold sacrifices endured in the Great War will have been wholly in vain if the nations are still to compete in a mad struggle for supremacy in the power of destruction. The economic folly of such a policy is too manifest to be gainsaid. Is there not a sorrowful and bitter protest from millions on the verge of starvation in Europe and Asia which must ring in the ears of every thoughtful man? Continued competition in armaments assuredly brings the nations to the path that leads to the ultimate disintegration of existing civilization the foundations of which have already been rudely shaken. How can it be otherwise: To those who ask for bread civilization gives armaments. In the boundary between Canada and the United States, unfortified for more than a century save by the common trust which has never been violated and in the intimate friendship which that just confidence has maintained and strengthened, we have given to humanity a lesson which ought never to be forgotten in the determination of this supreme question.

R. L. BORDEN.

By one of their authorized spokesmen (the right hon. Minister of Commerce) the Government has defended the large appropriations of the Budget for the creation and maintenance of an army. Our military organization is to be retained; our military spirit is to be preserved. It is alleged on the Government side that peace is not permanently established in the world, and that as long as the Central Powers have not abided by their obligations under the treaties, we must, as the other allies, have an army on land and sea, which must cost enormously.

These are but pretenses suggested by the Government as a justification for most absurd expenditures which are condemned by the people. Let us examine the situation, and let us try to find out whether there is any real need for such military expenditure in order to insure the carrying out of the Peace Treaty or the defence of our country against all possible aggression.

To begin with, we have won the war, and our enemies, vanquished and crushed, have on their knees begged for peace from the Allies. In order that this peace be genuine, arms were surrendered and the Imperial armies disbanded. I do not know that any of the allied countries has found it necessary to organize its army and to increase its war budget, with the sole object of forestalling a sudden attack from the disarmed common enemy, nor that it ever was, since the armistice, the desire of the Supreme Council of the League of Nations to henceforth cover Europe with permanent military camps. Was it not the object of the war to crush the monster of militarism? Hear the memorable words of a thinker: "This war is going to kill war."

Have we already forgotten how England rose in its might, in 1914, to protect Belgium's neutrality which Germany despised and would have cast to the winds as she would a scrap of paper; to disarm the Germans and protect the smaller Christian nations against the brutal axiom: "Might is right."

When victory came, the allied nations wished by a memorial, to commemorate in a permanent way the re-establishment of a long-lived peace, and with this end in view the League of Nations was formed. Our young country has the honour of sending representatives to the conference of this League of Nations; Canada will be represented as a nation alongside of our Mother Country, her voice is heard; she is listened to with respect. Does she not speak in favour of a reduction of armaments. It is important that the military policy of the Government should permit them to say that the Dominion of Canada is in favour of disarmament. Do not the great sacrifices, both in men and in money, which Canada has made for the war, call imperiously on her administrators to secure peace throughout the world by means of disarmament and by the compulsory arbitration of all disputes which may arise between nations?

It is Canada's duty to reduce as much as possible her expenditure for armies, both on land and sea. It is equally Canada's duty, as the oldest and most powerful British colony, she who is recognized as a nation, to declare herself by word and deed in favour of disarmament, the abolishment of the military system, the respect due to small nations, to minorities and proclaim the triumph of civilization and right. After all, why should we have an army? Were we an independent nation, had we any aspirations towards playing a part in the world, I understand that our national dignity would require that we make the necessary sacrifices for the maintenance of an army. But, we are only a British colony, and though we enjoy, it is true, a beneficent autonomy, we are nevertheless gloriously held by the colonial bond.

An independent nation may have to maintain an army for three reasons: First, to protect her independence; secondly, to assure her national development; thirdly, for the maintenance of order and peace.

During this debate some one suggested that an army would be needed to defend our territory. It is assuredly not when we are celebrating the centenary of our friendly relations with our good neighbours of the American Republic, that we will think of erecting forts near the 45th parallel. Moreover, these militia expenditures which are totally unwarrantable for the very reasons which I have just mentioned, could not be undertaken on account of our financial situation.

The Minister of Finance has admitted that the national debt now amounted to $2,350,236,700. Last year, when he presented his financial Budget, he assured the House and the country that not only would the debt not be increased but that it would be reduced. Yet, the present year has seen an increase of $101,368,077 in our national debt. If we consider the reasons for this increase in our national indebtedness we come to the conclusion that it is due to the administration of a Government which, under several names, have been in power since 1911, and more particularly to their policy of participation in the European war and their railway policy. Let us subtract from the expenditure for the last fiscal year $212,000,000, which represent our war outlay and $13,000,000, representing our railway expenses, and we shall have a surplus.

What will be our financial position next year? It is easy to foresee, as does the Minister of Finance, that we shall still have a larger deficit. There are no new taxes to fill in the ever increasing gap in our Budget. Last year, we had to pay $140,000,000 interest on a revenue of $432,000,000. This year, we shall have to pay the same interest on a revenue which has been reduced to $372,000,000. The expenditure shall be $600,000,000 approximately. How can we meet such a deficit?

I would like to conclude these remarks which have been suggested to me by the sad position in which we are placed financially, by quoting a writer of the present time:

> The speech delivered by the Minister of Finance is anything but encouraging. We should not be astonished. Are we not governed at present by Mr. Meighen, he who was ready during the war to lead the country into bankruptcy? It was also our Prime Minister, and one must not forget it, who, by a stroke of the hand, purchased the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk. It is then but fair that Mr. Meighen be in charge of public affairs at the present moment so that he may witness the effects of his policy. In 1914, our debt amounted to $335,996,850; to-day after these seven years of a Borden-Meighen administration, the debt has increased to $2,350,236,700.

Mr. Meighen's desire has been nearly realized, our finances are in a pitiful state and were it not for the inexhaustible resources of our young country, Canada would be on the verge of bankruptcy. Ever since 1914, we have run from one deficit to another: when shall we see the end? The economists are right when they say that the most powerful weapon given to statesman to repel the disastrous and repeated raids on the public treasury and prevent the disorganization of a country's finances, is the tariff. It is with a view to bringing back confidence among a large section of partisans of the Government and among the people who have at heart the country's interest, that the Government kept on promising for the last few years a general revision of the tariff, so much so, that as soon as the war was over, western members supporting the Government thought it was time to talk about the tariff so as to bring reduction on duties tending more or less to free trade. What was the Government's answer? That they would not revise the tariff? No, but they stated that a general revision would take place as soon as a full enquiry was made throughout the country so as to discover what new needs have arisen from the war. The enquiry took place; the opening of the session was even postponed in order to allow the Minister of Finance to hold meetings in all cities. Now that the Government have all this information, when it is obvious that the majority of the people are in favour of lowering the tariff in the sense recommended by the Liberal party, the Government imbued, as they have always been, with the Conservative and Tory spirit, refuse to grant this popular demand and to revise our fiscal policy. The Government have no right to delay unfairly a revision which they admitted themselves to be necessary. What the people want now is a downward revision of the tariff as recommended by the continuous and traditional policy of the Liberal party. The Government know it too well and this explains why, in this House as well as in their party organs they refuse to discuss this question on its merits. They delight in falsely representing to the country at large that the Liberal party are in favour of free trade, thus seeking to make the electors believe that the discussion is based on free trade versus protection. As regards this last complaint against the Government my conclusion is this: After the solemn promise given the farmers last year; after the commissioners' report to the Minister of Finance on the opinion of the people touching the tariff, notwithstanding the clever but less substantial spech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) I am bound to conclude that the Government is bringing dishonour upon themselves by refusing to revise the tariff in the course of the present session; the dishonour lies in the fact that the Government refuse to keep their word. I join with the farmers in so stigmatizing them.

I am most happy to give my sincere support to the amendment presented by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). It represents faithfully the views of Liberal members of this House, it would receive the whole-hearted support of the majority of the electors, should an election take place, and it is in accord with the best traditions of the Liberal party. Since the large convention of 1893 which took place but a few years before the Liberals came into power, up to the conference of 1919, which will be followed by a similar victory at the next general election, the Liberal policy as regards the tariff has always been the same, unceasingly this policy has been directed towards a downward revision of the tariff so as to help the consumers while it amply provided for revenue. During a period of fifteen years the Liberals have made their country happy and prosperous. To-day I am glad to once more endorse this policy recommended by my party and I shall do so by voting for the amendment.

On motion of Mr. Armstrong (Lambton) the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

LA COMPAGNIE DE TELEPHONE QUEBEC UNION ELECTRIQUE.

On motion of Mr. Steele for the third reading of Bill No. 38 to incorporate La Compagnie de Téléphone Quebec Union Electrique (The Quebec Union Electric Telephone Company)—Mr. Power.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) told me this afternoon that he desired to move a very slight amendment to one of the clauses of this Bill. He is not yet in his seat, and under the circumstances I would ask that the Bill stand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member for Beauce given notice of the amendment? If not, the Bill should not be allowed to stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The notice required by Rule 112 has not been given. The motion for third reading has been made in the regular way. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Carried on division.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE MEETINGS IN GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. McDONALD:

1. Has any action been taken by the Government during the past year to forbid meetings of Civil Servants in Government offices after working hours?

2. If so, why was said action taken?

3. Has the ruling, if any, been applied impartially to all Civil Service organizations and groups?

4. Have any representations been made to the Government by any Civil Service organization that this privilege of meeting in Government offices be restored to the Service?

5. Is it the intention of the Government to restore this privilege? If not, why?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. Meetings of organizations of a general character have never been authorized. The practice has, however, grown up in different departments of employees of the department remaining after office hours to discuss matters of interest mutually to such departmental employees. This practice has not been interfered with.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

4 and 5. There cannot be any question of restoring an alleged privilege which has never been authorized.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—VANCOUVER ISLAND

Hon. Mr. REID (Mackenzie):

1. How many miles of railway have the Government built in the Island of Vancouver, B.C., (as an extension of the Canadian National Railway), during the last three years?

2. How many miles of steel have been laid on the same railway in the last three years?

3. What is the total cost of the above extension?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. No grading done during this period.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Saturday, May 14, the debate on the motion of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton, Minister of Finance, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): Mr. Speaker, representing, as I do, a constituency in Western Ontario, and after listening to the doleful tale of woe which was told by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), on Saturday last, I feel it is my duty to participate in this debate and to show, to some extent at least, the need of supporting a policy such as that proposed by this Government. If you will draw a line through Toronto, north to lake Simcoe, you will find that west of that demarkation there are constituencies represented in this House by forty-two hon. members. Fifteen hundred thousand people live in that locality, the assessed value of their property amounts to over one thousand millions of dollars. More industries are there located than are to be found in all the rest of the Dominion of Canada put together. In western Ontario we have not only a large number of manufacturing plants, but an intensive farming industry. In no place on this continent, is intensive farming carried to the extent that it is in the southwestern part of the province of Ontario. The hon. member for North Essex, who, I regret, is not in his seat, was rather pessimistic in his views as to what we might expect if the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), were carried into effect. That hon. gentleman (Mr. W. C. Kennedy) represents the city of Windsor and the surrounding districts. There are 206 manufacturing plants in his constituency, and yet he is prepared to back up the Liberal policy that would wipe out practically half of those industries if it were put into operation. Let me read a letter which I received from the secretary of the Board of Commerce in that city, so that I may convey to the members of the House some idea of the enormous development in that territory. The following communication reached me on March 11, 1921:

> In reply to your esteemed favour of the 8th, we now have two hundred and seven operating industries at these border municipalities. Forty-four of these came in during 1919, and over thirty last year. Practically all of them represent American capital and enterprise. When running full swing these industries employ nearly twenty thousand workers. As to the development of these communities,—we might say that in the spring of 1918 our collective population was estimated at about forty thousand. As some indication of the phenomenal increase that has taken place since then, we might mention that over thirteen thousand copies are now being delivered daily by the local newspaper to the homes of the Border Cities; and when one remembers the acute housing shortage from which we suffer, it seems fairly safe to adopt the ordinarily accepted average of five people to a home. This will enable you to form your own conclusions as to our present population; and it must be remembered, of course, that our paper is not going to every home, although it does go to most of them. If there is any further information that you may desire, be good enough to let us know.
> Yours faithfully,
>
> F. Maclure Sclanders,
> Commissioner.

On the basis of five persons to a family, it will be seen that if 13,000 copies of this newspaper are distributed, the population is some 65,000. This Chamber of Commerce has published and distributed a pamphlet from which I desire to quote an extract. The article appears under the caption: "Rediscovered by American Manufacturers" and is in part as follows:

> Further, business with many British possessions could be more advantageously conducted from Canada than from the United States, owing—among other things—to tariff preferentials granted Canadian products. There were also many other sound and even compelling reasons for the establishment of American branch factories in Canada,—and, especially, at the Border Cities, which are so conveniently close to many very important industrial centres in the neighbouring states. And, so it was that in an astonishingly short time, the string of stagnant hamlets took upon themselves the aspect of a thriving, throbbing centre of extraordinary industrial activity. New factories literally streamed in. For instance, no fewer than 48 of such—large and small—located during 1919; while, for the first seven months of this year, others have established at an average rate of almost one per week. To-day, we have a total of 206 manufacturing concerns, practically all of which represent American capital and enterprise.

The foregoing has reference to the district represented by the hon. member for North Essex. Two hundred and six industries operate in that district by American capital, and yet the hon. member supports the Liberal policy as propounded by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), in the statement which that hon. gentleman made, warning Americans, who might desire to come to Canada to locate and establish factories, thus assisting in the development of Canadian industry, that it would not be to their interests to come here, for, if they did, they might expect little support from any Government in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Did I hear some one say "hear, hear" in reference to that statement? Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that any Government that might come into power in Canada would dare to tear down the tariff wall and wipe out industries that have been so successful in developing our natural resources and the trade of our land. The hon. member for North Essex, however, not only takes that position; he objects to this Government taking into consideration the fact that the anti-dumping clause will protect the manufacturers and further their interests. He says that there is unemployment in his city, some of the factories being shut down. I wonder whether he reflects that a great deal of that unemployment may be due to the fact that manufactured goods are coming into Canada from other countries which are turning out their products and shipping them into this country at below the actual cost of production. I wonder whether that hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that millions of dollars' worth of manufactured goods have been shipped into Canada during the last few months, below the actual cost of production, in the countries from which they come, despite the anti-dumping clause. This anti-dumping policy is worthy of the support of every member of the House, and of the member for North Essex in particular.

Then my hon. friend found fault with the exchange situation as it affects Canada. What about the exchange? Do we want, as a people, to allow manufactured goods to come into this country from Germany, where the mark that was worth twenty-three cents before the war is to-day worth only one and a half cents, and where they are paying their labour on that basis? Does he want goods to come in from Italy, where the lire, worth twenty cents before the war to-day is only worth five or six cents? Does he want goods to come in from France where the franc has fallen in value, or from Great Britain where the sovereign has depreciated? In those countries they are manufacturing goods at the lowest possible cost, and it is up to the Finance Minister of Canada to see to it that the interest of the manufacturers of this country are considered in connection with the question of exchange. Now I claim that when we are looking after the interest of the Canadian manufacturers we are helping to develop our cities and towns, and our home market. In turn the people of Canada will be able to consume a large portion, at least, of the products of our farmers.

The hon. member for North Essex pointed the finger of scorn at the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) and called attention to the fact that he left the Liberal party and joined this Government in 1917. There is not a member on this side but feels proud and glad to know that the hon. member for South Wellington joined this Government, and assisted in carrying on the affairs of Canada in the able manner in which he has. The question is, did the Minister of Militia do right or did he do wrong in 1917? Is there any question but that he took the right position? All honour to the men who came out boldly and manfully at that time, who left their party and joined the ranks of the Union Government in order that the affairs of the country might be properly administered. I regret indeed that any hon. member should have taken the position which my hon. friend from North Essex took in that regard.

We have in this House another gentleman from western Ontario who represents the county of Kent (Mr. McCoig) in which the beautiful city of Chatham, filled with industries, is situated. That hon. gentleman, along with the hon. member for North Essex, and other members for Ontario, attended the Liberal Convention in 1919, and helped to support the planks in the Liberal platform that would wipe out hundreds of industries in western Ontario—not a doubt about it. One of the planks of that platform is that the principal articles of food shall be placed on the free list. That platform also calls for free trade in agricultural implements. Let us look at the constituency represented by the hon. member for Kent. We find there two large sugar refineries in which are invested nearly $3,000,000. These refineries manufacture the raw material that is grown by the farmers in the western part of the province into the finished product and sell it to the people of Canada. That fact is surely worthy of some consideration. Yet the hon. member for Kent supports the policy of free trade in the principal articles of food, among which sugar surely must be included—he would support such a policy as that. These hon. gentlemen also advocate free trade in agricultural implements. Now there is a large implement factory in the city of Chatham. What would become of that industry if we had free trade in agricultural implements? The Dort Motor Company also have a large factory located in Chatham—are they in favour of free trade in agricultural implements and machinery, which would include everything they manufac-
