6 ELIZABETH II

ON THE FOURTEENTH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1957, HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DELIVERED THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE OPENING THE TWENTY-THIRD PARLIAMENT, WHICH WAS DISSOLVED ON THE FIRST DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1958.

VOLUME III, 1957-58

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TENTH DAY OF DECEMBER, 1957 TO THE TENTH DAY OF JANUARY, 1958, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 10, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADJOURNMENT OVER HOLIDAY SEASON

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) asked me what the general plans were with regard to the holiday adjournment. Naturally the desire of the government was to expedite to the limit the business of the house with a view to completion before Christmas, and that was made apparent on a number of occasions. I am not going to enter into the reasons why that now cannot reasonably be anticipated or expected.

Because of that fact, and in order to enable hon. members to make their arrangements accordingly, it is my intention to move that at the conclusion of the day on December 21, at six p.m., the house be adjourned and that it return on Friday, the 3rd day of January, at eleven a.m.

There may be some question raised as to the reason we should not have that entire week, but the position of affairs is such that it will be necessary to move for further interim supply at that time, and any further extension would place the financial situation in a position that is not to be desired. I thought the house should have the information respecting the intention of the government at the earliest possible date, so all members would be able to spend Christmas and New Year's at home.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the Prime Minister is having the notice that appeared in Votes and Proceedings of last night corrected?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should have explained that. It was originally intended to have the house recalled on January 2, but it was brought to my attention that many hon. members desire to have their New Year's day free for their celebrations. I am speaking of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec in particular, although the practice is carried into western Canada, who set New Year's day aside above many others, and for that reason the alteration is to be made.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I have the privilege of asking the Prime Minister a question arising out of his statement. What consideration has been given to members from British Columbia who, leaving on the day suggested for adjournment, can only get home by Christmas day? Could not the date be advanced in view of the position of those members? If not, will the government make provision that members who live so far away can fly home and have their expenses covered by a vote of the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realized that argument would be advanced and should be met. Provision will be made in a vote to be placed before parliament to cover all proper transportation costs.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE PRICE SPREADS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to make an announcement in regard to the royal commission on price spreads. With leave of the house I will table the order in council after reading from the appropriate sections.

The chairman will be Dr. Andrew Stewart of Edmonton, president of the University of Alberta, formerly lecturer in agricultural economics at the University of Manitoba and dean of business affairs at the University of Alberta. The other members of the commission will be Mrs. W. R. Walton Jr., of Toronto, a member of the board of directors of the Canadian Association of Consumers since its inception in 1947; Dr. W. M. Drummond of Bristol, Quebec, and Guelph, Ontario, head of the department of agricultural economics of the Ontario Agricultural College; Mr. Howard MacKichan of Halifax, Mr. Romeo Martin of Montreal, Mr. Bernard Couvrette of Montreal and Mr. Cleve Kidd of Toronto.

The commission is appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act, their powers being to inquire into the extent and the causes of the spread between the prices received by producers of food products of agricultural and fisheries origin and the prices paid by consumers therefor; to determine whether or not such price spreads in general or in particular cases are fair and reasonable or are excessive, in relation to the services rendered; to make such recommendations as they deem appropriate if any such price spreads are found to be excessive, and to examine the adequacy of price information currently available.

I think I should also refer to the other members of the commission whose names I have placed before the house and give something of their background and present occupations. Mr. Romeo Martin of Montreal is a graduate of the Oka Institute and is secretary general of the co-operative federation of Quebec; Mr. Howard MacKichan, general manager of the united maritimes fishermen's co-operative; Mr. Bernard Couvrette, of Montreal, who has his own wholesale grocery firm and is a past president of the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association; Mr. Cleve Kidd, Toronto, president of the Ontario federation of labour and formerly general economic adviser of the united steel workers.

I mention the personnel, sir, to indicate the high standard of those who have undertaken, at personal sacrifice, to discharge the important responsibilities which will fall on them.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I gather that the order in council to which the Prime Minister has referred is a short one. Would he give consideration to publishing it in Hansard?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that is agreeable to the house, certainly. It is not a long order in council.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that permission be given for this order in council to be printed in Hansard?

[For text of order in council, see appendix, page 2171.]

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): According to the Prime Minister's statement this commission has been set up to inquire into the difference between the price levels paid to agricultural producers and those charged to consumers. Does the Prime Minister not believe it would have been more in keeping with this feature to have arranged for some representation for organized agriculture? My question is, is there a representative on this commission representing the main farm organizations of this country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, Dr. Drummond is the head of the department of agricultural economics. Another member of the commission is the secretary general of the co-operative federation of Quebec. I am sure my hon. friend will regard both these men as properly representing agriculture on that commission. Certainly it is impossible to cover every facet.

I must say, in this regard, we have one representative of business, two professors connected with agricultural economics, two who have been concerned with agricultural co-operatives, one representative of labour and one of consumers' organizations. I think it is very comprehensive. I might add, though this is not applicable to the question asked by my hon. friend, there is also the general manager of the maritime fisheries co-operative, who is also a member of the fisheries council of Canada.

I feel sure that each one of these gentlemen will properly represent the views of all. Certainly consideration was given to covering every interest, but that is impossible. I am sure no one will say this commission is one that will not fairly deal with this serious problem.

Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister say whether or not the farmers' unions and wheat pools were asked to submit the name of a person who might be suitable as a member of this commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My information is that it was not.

THE SENATE

REFERENCE TO ADDRESS OF SPEAKER AT QUEBEC MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Is the Mark Drouin to whom he entrusted the reading of his message at the convention of the young Conservatives in Quebec city on Saturday last, as reported in the press, the same person the Prime Minister recommended to His Excellency the Governor General to be Speaker of the other house? Does the Prime Minister think this action is tantamount to restoring parliament to its former greatness?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think parliament is being restored since the change of government. I see nothing in what my hon. friend has referred to that in any way detracts from the course that is leading to the achievement once more of parliamentary supremacy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question addressed to the right hon. gentleman who, by virtue of his office, is the leader of parliament. Does he think it is the proper thing for the Speaker of either house to take part in a political meeting?

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say to that is that I do not think it was a political meeting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO PUBLICATION "CANADA AND THE UNITED NATIONS, 1956-1957"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a printed note in the document "Canada and the United Nations, 1956-1957", copies of which have just recently been distributed. Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that in this special foreword which is over the signature "J. G. Diefenbaker" there appears this sentence, "I am anxious that this record should be available to Canadians because my government believes firmly—", and so on. Is "my government" the correct usage? Should it not be "the government" or "the government of Canada" or "Her Majesty's Government"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I must say that I did not notice the exact wording, but my recollection is that it is proper in either alternative. As a matter of fact I might not personally choose one or the other, but I see nothing at all that is necessary to be referred to derogatorily or otherwise or to be answered apologetically in that connection.

REQUEST FOR CORRECTION IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I would request a correction relating to a debate that took place a week ago, at the time the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) moved that the house adjourn to consider a matter of vital importance. On that occasion he forgot to make the motion, as established by the debate reported on pages 1735 to 1737 inclusive of Hansard for December 2. The note in Votes and Proceedings covering that day, December 2, reads in part as follows:

Mr. Martin (Essex East) moved—That the house do now adjourn.

I would request that this note either be deleted or possibly enlarged to indicate what actually happened, and to bring it into line with the Hansard report.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member suggest what change he would ask the house to approve?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I would suggest that it either be deleted or revised to show what subsequently happened.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of what my hon. friend has pointed out, if a correction is going to be made it should be noted that as a result of the motion which he says was not technically put, the government, four days later, was forced to take some kind of action.

Mr. Speaker: I consider that last statement to be highly improper, and by leave of the house I would ask that it be expunged from Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, it is arguable whether or not the observation was in order, but there certainly is no jurisdiction, within that authority exercised by Your Honour, to expunge a remark no matter how valid or invalid it may be. I suggest that Your Honour perhaps is correct in saying I should not have made that observation; but once having made it, it must stay as a matter of record.

Mr. Speaker: I agree that there is no authority to expunge, except on an order of the house, but my point was that I considered the hon. member's remark quite out of place at that time, because we were discussing an amendment to Votes and Proceedings. He was making an argument or drawing a conclusion to the disadvantage of the government, as I understand it, and it seems to me that the rules of the house should permit a response to be made where something is improperly put on Hansard. Otherwise one side of the argument is presented and, if it is out of order, the other side has no opportunity of correcting the statement. That was the reason I made perhaps the rather hasty suggestion that it might be expunged. But I would ask the hon. member not to indulge in such remarks. Otherwise I shall be obliged to hear correcting remarks on a question of privilege or otherwise.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say at once that the remark was utterly untrue.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: We now have had two objectionable statements, and I am going to cancel them one against the other and ask hon. members not to pursue the matter further.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): That is my suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas)—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes; the hon. member for Middlesex West asked that the official record of this house, namely Votes and Proceedings, be corrected. I submit that is asking Your Honour to change the records of the house which are published over your signature.

I would draw your attention to the fact that as reported at page 1726 of Hansard of December 2, 1957, Your Honour asked the house whether the hon. gentleman had leave to put the question and, more than 20 members having risen, Your Honour gave him leave to do so. I submit that this is in keeping with the practice of the house, and that that having been done it is taken as read that the hon. member, having been given leave, has moved the adjournment of the house. I submit that the record in Votes and Proceedings for that date as published over Your Honour's signature is correct.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): If I may, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I have heard both the point of order and the comment on it. As hon. members will recall, the motion was not actually put formally and the debate continued to a point where objection was taken that it had not been put. I ruled that the house had proceeded as though it had been put. In order to keep the record clear there must be some note of what we were discussing; and in order to keep the Speaker honest, we must have a record of what took place indicating that we were discussing some question before the house.

If any hon. member wishes to have it expressed otherwise than as the Clerk has put it and as I have endorsed it, I shall be glad to consider an alternative expression. Otherwise I think we might consider the matter closed.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): I would request that an alternative statement be used.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): This is the usual practice of the house. The hon. gentleman is a new member. I think since I have been here I have known of someone to rise and ask permission to move the adjournment of the house and have permission granted; and I do not remember, except on very few occasions, that the member when he began his speech said, "I move the adjournment of the house". I think this is the usual practice. It may be a rather slipshod practice, but we indulge in it as we do in some other slipshod practices.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, to the parliamentary assistant. Could the minister tell the house of any developments in the United States tariff commission hearings relative to proposed increases in the tariff on lead and zinc? What official of the department or member of the government, if any, is representing the government at this hearing?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): The United States tariff commission has recently completed its public hearings on lead and zinc. It is understood that when they have completed their studies they will make a report to the President of the United States.

Representatives of the Canadian mining and smelting industries appeared before the United States tariff commission to present their case. The Canadian government did not take part in the proceedings of the United States tariff commission, but makes its representations directly to the United States government. I understand that strong representations on this subject were made to the United States government very soon after the present Canadian government assumed office and that the matter was later discussed during the visit of Canadian cabinet ministers to Washington in early October.

Mr. Byrne: I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether these governmental negotiations are being carried on at the present time? Are they following the matter up to the very last in order that this drastic action may not be taken?

Mr. Macdonnell: I have given a considerable amount of detail as to what took place. If the hon. gentleman wishes to carry the matter down to the present moment I think I shall have to take his question as notice and give him further information later.

REPORTED PURCHASES BY ROUMANIAN AGRICULTURAL DELEGATON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence possibly his parliamentary assistant could take it as notice. The question arises out of a news report in the Montreal Gazette of December 9. The article indicates that a Roumanian agricultural delegation held talks with federal authorities last week and announced plans to purchase $500,000 worth of Canadian goods; also that an invitation was extended to Canada to send an agricultural mission to eastern Europe next year.

What Canadian products were purchased, and has the invitation been accepted? If so, what will the mission attempt to buy or sell?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Would the hon. gentleman repeat his question, please?

Mr. Olson: Perhaps I should send the minister notice, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED EXPANSION OF CANADIAN SALES BY ROLLS-ROYCE COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence probably I can direct it to my good friend the acting minister, who I am sure needs no notice. It is noted in the Globe and Mail of December 6 that the Rolls-Royce Motor Car Company plans to triple its sales target in Canada in the coming year. Is this a result of the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom, at a time when there is much unemployment in the automobile industry in Canada?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am flattered that the hon. member thinks I could answer that question now. I believe I must take it as notice.

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—INQUIRY AS TO C.N.R. REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the buying mission in Great Britain and the membership of Mr. E. A. Bromley, vice president of purchasing for Canadian National Railways. Can the minister advise the house if it is the intention of the Canadian National to buy rolling stock in Great Britain?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have no knowledge of any such intention.

Mr. Henderson: May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister have any knowledge as to what the vice president in charge of purchasing for the Canadian National might be buying for the Canadian National in Great Britain?

Mr. Hees: The answer is no.

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION PROVIDING HUMANE METHODS OF SLAUGHTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. McGee (York-Scarborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I have given the minister verbal notice of my intention to ask this question. Has the minister anything to announce concerning the matter of humane slaughter of animals in abattoirs?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I should say that I also have notice of a somewhat similar question from the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Christian), and I thank that hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

As hon. members know, there has been a very considerable agitation in connection with the subject of humane slaughter, and a very understandable one. Shortly after we assumed office we understood that a committee was being formed at the request of the Ontario S.P.C.A. and the meat packers' council to see whether a workable scheme of humane slaughter in the packing houses could be devised. The government made available to that committee, on a continuing basis, the service of some of its experts in the field and, at the request and with the understanding of the committee, the government did not take any further action in this matter because we understood that the committee wished to be left free to pursue its inquiries.

Some three weeks or a month ago, as I recall it, the committee said that it felt its inquiries could not continue to serve any useful purpose and, in effect, referred the matter back to the government. About three weeks ago I met with representatives of that committee and with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), at which time the matter was fully discussed.

I mention that background, Mr. Speaker, because I think it should be clearly understood that any suggestion of delay or lack of action in this matter cannot in any sense be fairly laid at the door of this government. Since that meeting, and since it has become clear that the committee felt it had no final solution to offer, we have been working on the matter consistently and vigorously, and I hope shortly to be able to recommend certain action to my colleagues.

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Did the minister advise the British Columbia branch of the S.P.C.A. to write to their federal members rather than to their provincial members on the question of humane slaughter of livestock, on the grounds that only the federal government has jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, as far as I recall I have had no conversations on the subject with any member of the British Columbia S.P.C.A. I am speaking here from recollection, but I have had conversations with the president of the British Columbia humane slaughter society and it was, as I understood it, in that capacity that I was speaking to him.

As I said a moment ago, this question of humane slaughter has been a matter of concern for some time. I have not had a chance to check my personal files, but my recollection is that a year or so ago I was discussing the matter with the president of the British Columbia humane slaughter society. He came down here and discussed with me, as a private member, what steps might be taken to deal with the matter and my recollection is that he asked whether I felt it would be appropriate for him to write to members of parliament. At that time I told him I saw no reason whatsoever why letters, on a matter of this importance, should not be addressed to federal members, private members as well as members of the government.

That was, as I say, according to my recollection about a year ago, and I do not believe I had any further conversations with him until the end of last week, when he again came to Ottawa and visited me in my capacity as Minister of Justice. At that time, as a result of other suggestions and of the public interest in the matter, it was already a fact that private members as well as members of this government were receiving a large volume of correspondence.

Mr. Sinclair: May I ask a further supplementary question. Did the minister on either of these two occasions suggest to him that it was the federal government and not the provincial government which had jurisdiction in this field.

Mr. Fulton: From my recollection of the conversation—and I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I am bound to report conversations that I had as a private individual—I can say that I indicated that this is another of those cases in which there is a measure of divided responsibility, which makes the subject a more difficult one to deal with. But that is not to say it is incapable of solution and, as I said a moment ago, I expect to be able to make a specific recommendation to my colleagues in the very near future.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF ISSUING BILINGUAL GOVERNMENT CHEQUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. My question is, could the Minister of Finance, according to existing laws, give instructions for the issuing of bilingual cheques by his department everywhere in Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The answer to the question would depend upon the interpretation of the statutes and, as I understand the practice of this house, questions involving the giving of a legal opinion are not asked or answered in the house.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I believe he has received notice of my intention to ask it. Has any consideration been given by the government to increasing or restoring the purchasing power of the superannuation allowances granted to civil servants who have been retired on account of ill health? If so, what consideration has been given to this matter?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I draw his attention to the fact that this matter, or the broader matter of all pensions paid to superannuated civil servants, has been the subject of a number of questions which have been asked during this session and answered by the Prime Minister. There is nothing that can now be added to the information which the Prime Minister has given to the house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister yet read the representations with regard to this matter submitted to him by the civil service association of Ottawa?

Mr. Fleming: The minister has read a vast quantity of material, and this, together with other information, is being digested and reviewed.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): A supplementary question. Will the minister remember that we will have a resolution on this matter before the house next Monday, when the whole question may be fully discussed?

Mr. Fleming: I can tell the hon. gentlemen that I doubt whether the material which is being gathered on this subject can be complete before next Monday. Perhaps hon. members do not fully appreciate the amount of work which is being expended in the gathering of statistical material on this subject. It is not ready yet, although a great deal of work is being expended on it.

IMMIGRATION

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—REPORTED CONDUCT WHILE AWAITING RETURN TO EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I like asking him questions because he usually gives sequential answers. Has his attention been drawn to press reports of the antics of a number of so-called Hungarian freedom fighters near Montreal who are in desperate haste to return to tyranny?

Second, can the minister give the house any information on this incident and demonstration of ingratitude in response to Canadian generosity?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I thank the hon. gentleman for his kind words, and for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question.

My attention has been drawn, by reports in the press and reports from the department, to the incidents which have been described in such picturesque language by the hon. member in his question. In answer I can only say that it seems to me that the entirely unwarranted and unreasonable conduct of these particular malcontents indicates the soundness of the decision to return this group as soon as possible to the country from which they came.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to supplement with some factual information the answer I gave to the hon. member for Kootenay West, which I overlooked when I was on my feet earlier. I should make it clear that the actions I referred to in my answer a moment ago were the actions of only a portion of the group totalling, I am told, 163 altogether, who have been gathered together in Montreal for the purpose of being returned to Hungary.

This, I am sure the house will agree, is in total a very satisfactorily small percentage of the total number of Hungarian refugees who have come to this country and to whose successful settlement in Canada as future Canadian citizens we look forward. I think in fairness to the total group it should be pointed out that it is a very small percentage who have indicated a desire to return, and an infinitesimally small percentage who behave in this manner.

WATER POLLUTION

RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION RESPECTING BOUNDARY WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on December 4, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) addressed a question to me and he inquired if the government would direct to the international joint commission the pollution of the waters of lake St. Louis, in the same manner as the complaint concerning lake St. Francis was referred to the commission.

Before I answer, I thank the hon. member for Laurier for having provided clarification of his question, which appeared somewhat obscure to us. I understand now that the real point of his question is that because of lower water levels in lake St. Louis there has been an aggravation of the problem of sewage and waste disposal, and therefore my hon. friend has asked whether the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers would be asked to inquire into the matter.

In answer may I say that the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers could only take action, of course, if there were a diminution of the flow of water into lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis in consequence of construction work in the international rapids section. I have now received the monthly return made by the international St. Lawrence river board of control to the international joint commission for the month of November, 1957. It shows the mean monthly discharge at the international rapids section as 218,000 cubic feet per second, and further shows that this is identical with the flow to be expected under pre-project conditions.

Accordingly I am informed that the construction work in the international rapids section is not in any way diminishing the levels of water in lake St. Louis.

OTTAWA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister has listened to the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the pollution of the St. Lawrence river, and having himself seen city of Ottawa sewage pipes dumping raw sewage into the Ottawa river, is it his intention to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code which would make it a criminal offence to pollute interprovincial waters?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been enough complaints already about the length of the session and the amount of legislation still to be brought before parliament. I think hon. members generally will be satisfied if at this session we cover the items of which notice has already been given. At a subsequent session the matter in question will certainly deserve consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDONESIA—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REPORTED THREAT TO PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to respond to a question that was addressed to me and accepted by the leader of the house on December 7. The question was asked by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) and reads in part as follows:

> . . . whether the government will consider making representations to the Indonesian government, perhaps through diplomatic channels, in regard to the . . . action being taken in Indonesia against Netherlands nationals and Netherlands interests.

In reply, Mr. Speaker, may I say very emphatically that the Canadian government is much disturbed over the actions which are reported as taking place in Indonesia and which might, if they are not checked, disturb the peace and stability of the area. We are deeply conscious of the human problems involved and of the possible unfortunate consequences to all parties concerned. It is our earnest hope that counsels of moderation will prevail, and that the Indonesian government will exercise restraint on those extremist elements who seem to have been responsible for the worst excesses and who seem to have got out of hand as far as the Indonesian government is concerned.

The matter is under discussion in the NATO council, and I am also expressing our concern to the Indonesian government through its ambassador here. The house may be assured that we shall do whatever we can to encourage them toward moderate courses in this unhappy instance.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether or not he has given special consideration, in view of events in Indonesia, to the appointment of an ambassador at the earliest possible date to replace the ambassador who recently relinquished his duties at Jakarta?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): That matter is under consideration, and we shall have an ambassador there as soon as possible.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION EXTENDING "VICTIMS POLICY" TO REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what consideration, if any, has his government given to passing legislation granting relief from confiscation of the Canadian assets of victims of nazi persecution in Roumania, Hungary, Poland and other countries during world war II by extending the so-called "victims policy" to Roumanians, Hungarians, Poles and others who have escaped from those countries and are now in the free countries of the world and in dire need of financial assistance?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answer that question very simply and say that as yet no consideration has been given to that matter. The question raised by the hon. gentleman is one that has a natural appeal to those who believe that wherever freedom is upheld the victims of the persecution to which my hon. friend has referred should certainly receive every consideration. I very much appreciate the question and the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

NATO—REPORTED DRAFT FINAL COMMUNIQUE PREPARED BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is the minister aware of the draft final communique prepared by the United States for the forthcoming NATO meeting, and does this mean that we can expect failure from this most important meeting?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the existence of the draft; therefore I have not seen it.

ALLEGED BREAKING OF CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC CODE BY VENEZUELA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the minister is yet in a position to make a report on the alleged breaking of the Canadian diplomatic code by the security police of Venezuela? In other words, has any report been received in response to the request the minister said was sent out a week ago last Friday?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have not yet received any report in the department.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT FOR CANADIAN WORKERS IN MAINE AND NEW HAMPSHIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Landry (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister tell the house whether conferences on Canadian-American relations took place in Ottawa at the beginning of December between members of the United States house foreign affairs committee and officials of the Canadian labour department, as was announced in a Washington paper on November 20? If so, will the minister tell the house whether or not the officials attending this meeting discussed the question of a reciprocal agreement on unemployment compensation for our Canadian workers, both in Maine and New Hampshire? Could the minister advise the house of the progress made in this matter?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have checked with the officials of my department, and neither they nor I are aware of any such conference as that indicated in the question of the hon. member.

As to the progress of this matter, Mr. Speaker, I have been recently in communication with the governors of both states with a view to negotiating upon this matter, and I hope they will reply favourably.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED TIGHTER SURVEILLANCE OF PRIVATELY OWNED STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that according to a report which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation plans tighter surveillance of the operators of privately owned radio and television stations? If so, I should like to know whether this is in accordance with the government's policies?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that the hon. member for Dollard reads the same newspaper each morning that I do, and I hope he profits from his reading. My knowledge of this matter is confined to the story I saw in the Gazette this morning. I have no further knowledge about it other than that which was contained in the news story.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation works within the framework of an act which was passed several years ago. Under that act it has power to make regulations, and it is the policy of this government to allow the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation independent action within the framework of that act and the regulations which were drawn up long ago.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF LETTER FROM MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER-BURRARD TO PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister now received the five-page letter from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor), proposing immediate action to remedy the serious unemployment in Vancouver? If so, in view of the fact that the hon. member made his letter public, will the Prime Minister also make his reply public so the people of Vancouver will know what action he intends to take on these sensible proposals?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whatever action is taken or has been taken will be communicated to parliament, and in that way the information will be available to the public.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister report any progress on the negotiations for keeping Britannia mines in operation?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to make any statement, beyond saying it has now been arranged that a meeting will take place in my office on Thursday afternoon, at which time we hope a final decision one way or the other will be reached.

Mr. Sinclair: There will be a question Friday morning, then.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO ISSUE OF PERMIT FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of which I gave him notice yesterday. Will he advise this house whether or not a permit would be issued by his department for a company to proceed with a power development project on the Columbia river in British Columbia before the question of downstream benefits covering this international river has been settled with the United States authorities?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure what the minister thinks about the question, but it seems to me to be hypothetical and one that should not take the time of the house.

[Later:]

Mr. McLeod: I have now revamped my question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government of British Columbia the right to proceed with a power development project on the Columbia river before the question of downstream benefits has been settled with United States authorities?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member is still asking a question which is not permitted by the practice of the house. It seems to me it is a question that asks for a legal opinion, and I do not think a minister can be expected to give a legal opinion to the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a correct supplemental question following the incorrect question put to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. Is it not in Canada's interests that the question of downstream benefits on the Columbia river be decided before any major construction of dams be permitted on that river?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I would suggest that is a subject on which we all have opinions. In fact I have mine, and they will be made known in due course.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

POSTAGE STAMPS—INQUIRY AS TO ELIMINATION OF PLATE BLOCKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I sent to the Postmaster General a dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, December 7, concerning the elimination of plate number blocks from postage stamps, or sheets of postage stamps. I should like to ask him whether the reason given in the press for the discontinuance of the rather popular practice of printing the plate number is well founded. In order to make the question clear I should like to read just a very short paragraph.

> Reason given for the Post Office Department action was that some postmasters were selling "plate blocks" at over face value to dealers and collectors.

I should like to ask the Postmaster General if that is a correct statement of the attitude adopted by his department with regard to this matter.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I thank the hon. member for sending me a copy of this clipping. The house will remember that the particular stamp issue in question was discussed here about 10 days ago, at which time I pointed out that arrangements for this stamp issue had been made by the preceding administration. Having said that, may I say that the motivation of the previous administration in dropping the plate blocks is not completely clear to me. However, in discussing the matter with my departmental officials I find that while no direct charge of selling plate blocks at over face value to dealers and collectors was made, the department has certainly had considerable experience in post offices with difficulty arising from collectors who attempted to obtain these plate blocks over the counter.

Perhaps I should say that departmental instructions do not allow the clerk at the wicket to extract a special plate block from other than the top sheet. However, collectors would come up to clerks and press them to do so. They would engage in discussion with them, and very often people who were there for the regular purpose of purchasing stamps were caused delay and annoyance by these tactics. Basically the departmental practice of handling issues of stamps has changed somewhat, and that has led to the elimination of the plate blocks.

Mr. Marler: I wonder whether the Postmaster General realizes not only that this practice is very popular with collectors, but is universal in countries other than Canada, and that the elimination of these plate numbers would account for a substantial drop in revenue of his philatelic agency?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have always had tremendous respect for the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount as a philatelic expert. He is renowned in that field and has written books on the subject. Therefore I am surprised to find him referring to the practice of including plate block numbers as being universal, because I think if he will search further he will find it is not universal and that certain other countries have abolished the practice of including plate block numbers. As I say, I am surprised at that lapse.

I feel regret, and I know the officials of the department do also, that we cannot continue this practice, which has provided considerable interest to a small group of collectors. I do want to tell the house that I am very grateful to other important collectors in Canada and officials of some organizations who have gone to the trouble of getting in touch with the department and commending the officials on the action that has been taken.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General, inasmuch as the subject of stamps has been brought up today. Can he say when the department started to use Roman numerals to indicate the month of the year in marking cancellation of stamps instead of a letter abbreviation for the month. For example, they are using "X-II" in making cancellations. I have not sent notice of the question to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member did not give me any notice of his question, but I will be delighted to get him this vitally important and interesting information as quickly as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL LAW

CAPITAL AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret that I have not given him notice, but I feel certain he will know the answer. In view of the fact that no consideration has yet been given by the House of Commons to the report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital punishment, has the Minister of Justice, under whose jurisdiction comes the remission service which reports to the Solicitor General on capital cases, given thought to recommending the commutation of existing death penalties? Can he advise the house when an opportunity is going to be given for consideration of the report of the joint committee and the entire question of capital punishment?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question I should say that the report of the committee has been carefully considered in the department and from time to time comes up for further consideration, but there is no present intention of action along the lines that he has suggested.

With regard to the second part of the question, as to when an opportunity will be given for discussion of that report, I would venture to suggest that the first and most favourable opportunity is in the discussion of the estimates of the department, but just when that will be will be determined largely, I suppose, by the developments of the session and in consultation with the leader of the house.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate what the minister has said. Do we have his assurance that when his estimates come up the whole matter can be discussed without any snide remarks or interference by the Minister of Finance, who tries to stop us from doing that sort of thing?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I regret that in the terms in which the question was framed it would be quite improper, as well as unnecessary, for me to answer.

INCOME TAX

OMISSION OF LOGGERS AND LUMBERJACKS FROM PROPOSED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Was it an oversight that loggers and lumberjacks were not mentioned in his announcement of proposed changes in the Income Tax Act affecting construction workers?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

MIRAMICHI—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PORT WARDEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a communication from the Newcastle, New Brunswick, board of trade to the effect that a survey shows that local shippers were unanimous in their opinion that the appointment of a port warden for the port of Miramichi is not necessary, as all duties have been satisfactorily performed in the past by the harbourmasters and wharfingers?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I did not myself receive such a letter but my department received one from the secretary, Newcastle, New Brunswick, board of trade to the effect that the opinion of several local shippers had been obtained on the proposed tariff of port warden's fees. The local shippers apparently feel that shipmasters are competent to see that loading is carried out in accordance with the Canada Shipping Act, and that this makes the services of a port warden unnecessary.

The secretary stated that the board of trade as a body had arrived at no definite opinion, but submitted the above as the opinion of shippers who had been written to or interviewed.

My department has replied explaining that section 628 of the Canada Shipping Act requires that no officer of customs shall grant a clearance to any ship loaded with concentrates consigned to any place outside of Canada and not being within the limits of an inland voyage unless the master of such ship produces to him a certificate signed by the port warden.

Thus the appointment of a port warden and the establishment of a tariff of fees for his services has been made legally necessary by the shipping of concentrates from Miramichi bay.

Mr. McWilliam: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the schedule of rates been arrived at as yet?

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Hees: I am not sure whether or not they have, but I shall check on that.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF HEALTH GRANTS TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I regret that I did not have the opportunity to send him notice. Is it the intention of his department to discontinue present health grants to the provinces when the health plan is set in operation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is certainly not the intention to discontinue health grants. There may be some overlapping, which would have to be examined and studied.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

ATTITUDE OF OFFICIAL OPPOSITION ON SUPPLY MOTIONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would permit me to clarify the situation before we proceed. As I understand it, it is with the unanimous consent of the house that we are entering on this debate at this time, and the vote will be taken at ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Green: At 8.15.

Mr. Speaker: At 8.15. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: If there is an amendment.

Mr. Speaker: On the amendment, if any, at 8.15 and on the final motion at ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hahn: The understanding is that the final vote shall be taken at 8.15 in order to permit grievances to be stated after 8.15.

Mr. Lesage: No. The vote on the main motion is at ten o'clock.

Mr. Hahn: I understand. I am sorry.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house leader would indicate what the understanding is so we may proceed knowing when we shall have a vote.

Mr. Green: It was my understanding that if an amendment is moved it would be voted on at 8.15, and that then we would go on with any individual grievances, and the motion to go into supply would be voted on at ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I want to repeat something about the attitude of the official opposition which I said when the first motion to go into committee of supply was made on November 18. I stated then what would be the attitude of the official opposition on that and the succeeding similar motions that are provided for by the rules of the house. I said we felt that the time of the house, under the rules of the house on motions to go into committee of supply, might in this short session be more profitably used in discussing the individual items in supply than in a general discussion on the motion to go into committee and supply.

For that reason and others which I gave when I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I said the official opposition did not intend to move any amendment nor to support any amendment that may come from any other quarter of the house. That, of course, was a statement I made for all these motions that might be submitted. At that time I reserved until a later date the right to have one of these motions stand, with one or two departments still to go into committee of supply, so that if anything out of the ordinary required debate on that kind of motion there would be one that would have to be made.

We noted with satisfaction that in announcing last night the business for today and tomorrow the leader of the house mentioned as the item to follow immediately the disposition of this one would be that having to do with the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities, which all parties of the house have been pressing to have brought forward at the earliest possible moment.

We feel that at this session it would be difficult, in spite of the arrangement that has been made for the Christmas recess, to dispose after satisfactory consideration of all the important matters that are of interest to the Canadian public. Because of that fact we are prepared to forgo some of the opportunities for general debate on more or less academic questions that might be available to private members, and to give such cooperation as is within our power to bring about consideration of the estimates themselves and these items of legislation which are of interest to the general public.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—MOTION FOR PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there are some time-honoured customs in parliament which I think we should very carefully preserve. We have forgone a number of opportunities during this session when hon. members of this house might have raised matters which they consider to be of vital interest, either to their constituents or to the country. I offer no apologies this afternoon, therefore, for moving an amendment to the motion to go into supply. I want to say immediately that it is not an academic problem with which I am going to deal, but a problem which I believe to be of very vital concern to the entire Canadian people and one upon which this house should express its opinion.

Consequently, at the beginning of my remarks I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That all of the words after the word "That" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking the necessary steps to bring the trans-Canada natural gas pipe line under public ownership so as to preserve this important public utility for the benefit of the Canadian people and to make sure that the profits from this venture will accrue to the nation as a whole rather than to a few privileged individuals, and further this house is of the opinion that the government should take the responsibility for recommending policies to parliament regarding Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited instead of evading such responsibility by referring matters in relation thereto to a royal commission.

That is the amendment I wish to move this afternoon and it is one, of course, which implies that the people of Canada expect the government to fulfil the obligations concerning the Trans-Canada pipe line which it definitely undertook when in opposition.

The Conservatives at that time did not suggest that this matter be referred to a royal commission which, so far as I know, has not even yet begun to sit. It may take months to investigate and still more months to make a report, not only on Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, which should be separated from its report of inquiry on the development of—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the house would try to give the hon. member who has the floor an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Coldwell: I can imagine that my hon. friends in the Liberal party are disturbed at this matter being raised once again—

Mr. McIlraith: You need not blame it on us.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines

Mr. Coldwell: It will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that on February 27, 1951, which is almost seven years ago, when the incorporation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was originally introduced in the house by Mr. Decore, the then Liberal member for Vegreville, he told us that it was planned to use an all-Canadian route, and with the total amount of gas consumed in Canada complete control would be assured to this country. From the outset we of the C.C.F. wanted this pipe line and other gas and oil lines in Canada to be built under public ownership and control so these great resources, their transportation, and provision for their use, might be entirely under the ownership and control of the people of Canada through this parliament of Canada.

However, the house decided that the bill should go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and on March 6, 1951, Mr. Frank A. Schultz, representing the company, appeared before the committee. At page 10 of the minutes and proceedings of the committee for that day we find Mr. Schultz said this:

> The second consideration was that it should be an all-Canadian project with the total Canadian gas transported over all-Canadian lines and that 100 per cent of the consumption would be in Canadian cities.

He gave other evidence to indicate that the project would run into no difficulties in attaining the necessary finances.

The only two points I make at this juncture are, first, that it was to be all-Canadian; all gas would be available to Canadian consumers, and there would be no difficulty in financing the line. We do not know where the government stands as far as permission to export gas by this company is concerned. The minister of trade and commerce of the day, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, also had no doubt with respect to the financing of the project.

On March 18, 1955, after certain extensions of time had been granted to the company—several extensions having already been granted—he wrote a letter which was tabled in this house, in which he said:

> All studies indicate that the line is capable of being financed privately and it has been decided to defer construction for one year and let matters take their course.

In March, 1956, the company was back again, and this time there was under discussion a proposal from the minister of trade and commerce, as hon. members who were here at the time will recollect, for the formation of a crown corporation to build the northern Ontario or unproductive section of an all-Canadian pipe line under terms which he indicated, which would be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for its sole use.

I say this to the hon. members of the government. That proposal was very severely and very harshly criticized by the then leader of the opposition, Hon. George Drew. He stated, and I am using his own words, that parliament was being asked—> —to set up a crown corporation which will use public funds to assist financial interests in the United States in establishing effective control over one of our major resources. I doubt if there is any precedent for such a proposal.

Now, that was the situation when the pipeline bill was approved later last year and it is the situation today, which the people of Canada believed the Conservative party, if elected to power, would rectify. Giant United States interests were and are behind this particular project. They were put on record by the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, and by others on many occasions during the debates which followed. Those of us who were here will have very vivid recollections of that, and they are still the powers behind Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

May I remind the government of the words of Sir John A. Macdonald as reported on page 494 of volume 1 of the debates of 1880 to 1881. I am making one change in reading Sir John's words; I shall change the word "railways", as I did two years ago, to the words "gas companies" in this quotation. Otherwise it will be a verbatim statement of Sir John A. Macdonald made in parliament when discussing the building of the transcontinental railway. This is what he said:

> I can trust to the intelligence of this house—

I wish, incidentally, that I could do likewise.

> I can trust to the intelligence of this house and the patriotism of this country, I can trust not only to the patriotism but to the commonsense of this country to carry out an arrangement which will give us all we want, which will satisfy all the loyal, legitimate aspirations, which will give us a great, a united, a rich, an improving, a developing Canada, instead of making us tributary to American laws, to American "gas companies", to American bondage, to American tolls, to American freights, to all the little tricks and big tricks that American "gas companies" are addicted to.

And who is there among us who has read the record right through from the days of the Teapot Dome scandals right down to the present day who is unaware of the tricks which the American gas and oil companies have been guilty of from time to time?

I think we should still remember those words, because the major interests behind Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are still powerful United States corporations which from time to time have been the subject of criticism and investigation in the United States because of anti-social practices. It was in line with their tradition that the Conservative party participated in the debates which culminated in the passage, under closure of course, of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill in June, 1956. As far as we are concerned, we have been quite consistent throughout, consistent in our demand that this line should be built by the government of Canada, not for the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company but for the people of Canada; not, as is now the case, for the use and benefit, ultimately of a private corporation.

A moment ago I spoke of the traditions of the Conservative party, and I said we expected them to live up to those traditions upon which, in part, their opposition to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill was, as they themselves said, largely based. Sir John A. Macdonald staked his whole public career on the principle of Canadian control of the fundamentals of Canadian economic existence. He fought in season and out of season and often against what seemed to be hopeless odds to prevent United States companies gaining control of our first trans-continental railway. As early as 1871, according to Professor Creighton's very excellent biography, Macdonald wrote, and I quote him again:

> Allan has joined himself with a number of American capitalists and they are applying to the Canadian government to be allowed to build our Pacific railway.

I could just change that a bit and say that certain people of Canada have joined themselves to American capitalists to build a pipe line across Canada with the financial support of the Conservative government of Canada. I will go on with the quotation:

> The government, of course, is glad to receive all such applications, as they show an interest in the undertaking and indicate its value, but as yet we have come to no conclusion with respect to it.

Then he adds this:

> You may depend upon it—we shall see that Canadian interests are sufficiently protected and no America ring will be allowed to get control over it.

Well, now we have another Conservative government in office with power to prevent what they called a nefarious deal in the summer of 1956, with men whom the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself described as "Texan adventurers and buccaneers". But instead of acting as the people of Canada expect them to act, they are shelving the matter by referring it to a royal commission. A royal commission like, sometimes, a committee, is a very convenient way of shelving an awkward problem.

Mr. Broome: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Broome: What would you do? These shares have changed hands; they have been built up in value—

Mr. Coldwell: Very simple. We know exactly what it cost to build the pipe line from the Alberta border to Winnipeg; we are building a pipe line across northern Ontario now and we know exactly what it costs and we own it now. We have the legal means, with appropriate compensation, of expropriating that line that we do not now own for the public good.

Mr. Broome: The people who own these shares are not the original people.

Mr. Coldwell: I have answered the question, that is exactly what I would do, and that is what I think the government should do.

The Conservative party is abdicating both its principles and its responsibility. When buccaneers were raiding their victims in the old days, the ancient authorities did not allow them to plunder their victims in times of peace, but that is exactly what the government of Canada is doing now.

The government has already received a very comprehensive report made for the use of the Borden commission by Mr. John Davis entitled "Canadian Energy Prospects". With this, and the information available to the Department of Trade and Commerce, the government has enough information before it to enable it to act.

A United States commission set up some time ago to lay the basis for the United States federal power commission took four years to make its report. Now, a royal commission may be justifiable in some respects, but long-term energy prospects and control are surely one thing which deserves investigation; but policies with regard to pipe line companies and profiteers are quite another and, again, I may add that it is quite proper to ask the question where Mr. Borden the chairman of the commission is at the present time, and why the commission has not met.

I can also point out that there was no suggestion in the speeches made by members of the Conservative party in 1956 that a royal commission was necessary to review the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill. Never at any time was that suggestion made in the hectic and heated debates of May and June, 1956, nor, am I reminded, was any such suggestion made during the entire general election. Powerful United States companies still retain a considerable amount of control over the Trans-Canada pipe line. We do not know what the government's position is now regarding the export of gas as a result of tying Trans-Canada to its associates in the United States. It is likely we shall find the same situation as exists on the Pacific coast, where Westcoast Transmission, which is United States controlled financially, has agreed to sell gas to United States distributors on a 20-year contract at 10 cents per thousand cubic feet less than the price being presently charged to distributors in the province of British Columbia.

Such deals mean that United States industry could grow fat at the expense of Canadian industry with the help of cheaper Canadian gas. The repetition of such agreements would be a sell-out of the Canadian consumer, and label the whole thing as a gigantic give-away of priceless and irreplaceable natural resources. That this may happen is greatly indicated in the Congressional Record of August 27, 1957.

The Congressional Record is, of course, the United States Hansard. I have the record of Tuesday, August 27 before me. Congressman Saylor was speaking. I may say that if you read the whole of this congressman's speech you will find that he has a very excellent grasp of what happened in this country in May and June of 1956. I think he summarizes it well in the speech he made, in the course of which he said this:

> Through some strange manoeuvers Midwestern Gas Transmission Company whose application to import Canadian gas in one of the cases is now before the federal power commission, has contracted to pay an average of 27.76 cents per thousand cubic feet for Canadian gas during the 25-year period of its contract.

This is the congressman speaking:

> At the same time the Winnipeg and Central Gas Company, which is actually closer to the source of production, would be required to pay 35.68 cents per thousand cubic feet for the same fuel during the period of its contract. These figures are based on the contracted minimum load factors, but even under 100 per cent load factors Midwestern will still have a decided advantage throughout the 25-year period.

Apparently, the government has not yet decided as to what its attitude will be in this regard, but they have already refused to act according to their speeches during the hectic debate of May and June, 1956. Therefore, I think I have the right to express my suspicions and my doubts as to their integrity and sincerity in respect of this policy.

However that may be, it is certain that if the government does not end the agreement which the Minister of Public Works, who I am glad to see in his seat, described as "the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation", Trans-Canada will be able, when it has collected sufficient funds from the Canadian gas consumers, to purchase the northern Ontario section of the pipe line by paying the cost price plus some interest on the public money advanced.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

There is no doubt that at some time it will exercise this option if the deal stands, and at that time the line will be far more valuable than its cost price and Trans-Canada will get another bargain at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian consumer. There is no doubt, too, that if this line which we are now building —and I say "we" advisedly, because it is Canada which is building the line across northern Ontario; it was Canada which put up the money as a loan to the company to build the first leg from the Alberta boundary to Winnipeg—could remain under public ownership and be operated by a crown company as a public utility the construction of the line would be cheaper because the government could raise the capital required at lower interest rates than a private corporation could do, and the public enterprise would be relieved of certain tax burdens, both federal and provincial.

Moreover, instead of the company planning to set aside out of the rates charged against consumers of natural gas an amount sufficient to purchase the line in 20 years the government could amortize the cost of the line over a much longer period, say 40 years instead of 20 years. As a result, the carrying charges would be one-half of what they would be in 20 years. This means, of course, that the Ontario and Quebec consumer would enjoy lower rates and would reap greater benefits, if not at once, in due time.

Now, it will be recalled that in the debate of June 4, 1956, Mr. Drew said that there were three alternatives, but that if the government forced through the bill to provide by way of loans, means for the financing of the first leg of the trans-Canada pipe line, and then undertook to build the line across northern Ontario, the only alternative, if that were done, would be for the government,— and I quote him:—

> —build the whole pipe line, and not just part of it, and have control over the whole line.

That was Mr. Drew's statement in this house. Now, may I quote the present Prime Minister again at page 4032 of Hansard of May 17, 1956? It is obvious that both the deal itself and the manner of its making appeared to be repugnant to him. He said;

> The perquisites here are that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should abdicate his belief in democratic principles and deny those in opposition the right to advance their arguments and to educate public opinion or to find out why there is such solicitude on the part of the members of this government. For five long years this pampered pet,—

Said the then member for Prince Albert, now the Prime Minister:

> —Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, by deviation, by change of direction, by protestation, by alteration in course, has postponed that estimable end of securing a market for Alberta gas and the making available to other parts of Canada of that necessary form of energy. I ask the Prime Minister today to tell this house why he is so fearful of the facts; why he was afraid to allow the true facts of this nefarious scheme to be elucidated?

I ask why he found it necessary, and the members of his government found it necessary, to muzzle the representatives of the people in advance of anything in the nature of a filibuster or an interference on the part of the opposition with the policy and program of the government. I ask him to explain that today, for certainly the day of silence is past. Are they afraid of the truth over there?

This is the present Prime Minister speaking.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Oh that mine enemy would write a book!

Mr. Coldwell: I continue:

Is that why they hide behind the caricature of parliament which they have substituted by the adoption of the parliamentary form of closure in a way that it has never been adopted before?

He called the company a pampered pet of the Liberal party. He accused it of having been devious in its dealings with parliament. He said that in order to put through this nefarious deal, as he called it, they had found it necessary to make a caricature of parliament itself. As for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I want to remind him just before he leaves the house—

Mr. Fleming: I will be back.

Mr. Coldwell: That is fine. I want to remind him of what he said on June 5, 1956. Oh, what wonderful quotations one can dig up from the Minister of Finance if one does not mind taking too much time in reading them back to him. He said this:

Well, sir, it seems now we are narrowed down to a choice between two courses, the government's iniquitous proposal to hand over to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited great sums of public money to help them out and public construction of the entire line.

Then, he called it an iniquitous proposal to hand over great sums of public money to help the company and to provide, as recommended, public construction of the line. Now, the Minister of Finance is in an entirely different position. He is no longer sitting on the opposition side. Now he is an important member of the government because, after all, the Minister of Finance is an important colleague of the Prime Minister at all times and I am quite sure that he will agree with me that he is a very important figure in the government of Canada.

Mr. Fleming: No. A very modest one.

Mr. Coldwell: The Minister of Finance is in the position where he himself is proceeding to carry out this iniquitous proposal and is, in effect, handing over great sums of public money for the construction of the entire line, not one part of it. The present Prime Minister asked the government at the time:

What have you been doing for five long years, playing around with this corporation, with these adventurers from Texas and New York, trading away Canada's resources at the expense of the Canadian people?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): And they are doing it.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? What have he and his government been doing during the past six months since they took office? Have they been playing around with these adventurers from Texas and New York in continuing to finance the pipe line proposal? Let them read the words I quoted of Sir John A. Macdonald, whom they like to think of as the founder of the Conservative party in Canada.

I want to say something else to the Prime Minister. He has the reputation of being a successful court lawyer. I think he deserves that reputation. He has won a number of important cases. When he appeared in a jury trial was he not very careful regarding the personnel of the jury to which the case was to be submitted? He has now appointed what is in effect a jury to report, among other things, on the Trans-Canada pipe line deal. Let us look at some of the gentlemen whom he has appointed to that jury or, as we call it, royal commission.

Let me say immediately that I have no doubt that, like some jurymen I am sure my hon. friend has challenged from time to time, every one of these gentlemen is a man of high personal integrity. I do not propose to attack any of them personally but I think I would fail in my duty if I did not point out that some of their associations would lead me to question their ability to achieve complete neutrality in this matter. The chairman of the commission is Mr. Henry Borden, again a very estimable citizen. Who is Mr. Borden? He is chairman of Brazilian Traction, one of the most powerful privately-owned public utilities in the world. In addition to his great electrical and other interests he is engaged in the distribution of gas in Brazil. On occasion he has expressed himself freely as a believer in private enterprise generally and in the private ownership of public utilities. It would, I submit, be unreasonable to expect a gentleman who has been associated throughout a successful career with the ownership of great private utilities to be entirely impartial in his approach to the Trans-Canada pipe line and other aspects of the development of Canadian energy resources concerning which he will be called upon to express an opinion.

Then too, an issue referred to the commission is that of foreign control. I have always understood the government to be very interested in eliminating foreign control over Canadian corporations to the extent that they are able to do so. This gentleman can scarcely disapprove of foreign control in Canada when the companies which it is his duty to safeguard are foreign companies operating in Brazil where, as indicated by a bill we passed a few days ago respecting the transfer of Brazilian utilities to Brazilian statutory control and supervision, public opinion must be very strong against foreign domination.

Then we have Mr. Levesque, another member of the royal commission and probably a very estimable gentleman, but he is president of a company which distributed stock of the Quebec Natural Gas Company. I am informed that he was one of the promoters of Trans-Canada stock in the province of Quebec and was closely associated with the Trans-Canada pipe line deal. I say that when the Prime Minister was appearing in court he made it as abundantly clear as he could that he wanted a jury from which all jurymen regarding whom there might be the remotest suspicion of their being prejudiced would be eliminated. He carefully looked over his jury panel. I say that has not been done in this case.

The government should not abdicate its responsibility by referring the Trans-Canada pipe line matter to a review by any royal commission. Any royal commission established to inquire into the energy resources of Canada generally, and personally I think that is all right, should not be required to make any recommendation regarding the suitability of public or private development. That should be the function of the parliament of Canada because such a question is a political question to be decided by the representatives of the people in their city councils, their legislatures and in this parliament. The royal commission should not be asked to make what is by its very nature a political recommendation. The Prime Minister has a motion on the order paper for the abolition of closure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman go on and read the name of George Britnell? Does he object to him?

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was appointed to a royal commission in Saskatchewan. Gordon Cushing?

Mr. Coldwell: No. I want to tell the Prime Minister that when he looked at a jury he did not object to all the jurymen. He only objected to the men on the panel who might be prejudiced. That is exactly what I am doing today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coldwell: Hon. gentlemen may laugh but you cannot laugh this off. You have loaded this jury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the old game.

Mr. Coldwell: You know all about this old game anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask my hon. friend this question. In the opinion of the hon. gentleman are the other four members of the commission unprejudiced in every way according to his fine standards?

Mr. Coldwell: I have answered that quite fully. As far as I know, the other four gentlemen are. But I say to my hon. friend that when he chose a panel of jurymen he saw to it that not one of the twelve he chose would be prejudiced against his side if he could eliminate him from that jury. I say that in this case he has appointed a jury, the chairman of which is a very estimable gentleman but who, from his very nature, experience and economic associations, must be prejudiced in favour of one side in this particular matter. I was just going to say that the Prime Minister has on the order paper a motion for the abolition of closure. I am not going to discuss that now except to say that we criticized the former government's abuse of it, for such it was, as vehemently as did the Conservative party. It was noteworthy that the Prime Minister denounced closure from Halifax to Vancouver in his election speeches. We did too, but we did more than that. We denounced what in this house the Prime Minister called buccaneers and their piratical profits made, as he said, by adventurers from New York and Texas.

To abolish closure is one thing but it will not restore any of the buccaneers'—the Prime Minister's own description—loot to the people of Canada. I do not know what the reason for this is. I am going to ask a question. Can it be that the Conservative party's wealthy backers want the Prime Minister and his government to forget their gains? Do they want him to bury the matter in a royal commission of inquiry lasting a year or two so that by the end of that time the Canadian people may perhaps forget or, what is more, forget it during the election campaign which the Prime Minister says is coming pretty soon?

Oh, it is before a royal commission. What other people say, of course, does not matter; the royal commission will judge. It is out of the campaign, although we do not intend that it should be kept out of the campaign when that campaign comes. Could it be, as we suggested, that the Conservative party criticism of one group of promoters was merely because they favoured another group headed by a gentleman named Mr. McMahon? Mr. McMahon is undoubtedly associated with another group of powerful United States oil and gas companies. His operations in Westcoast Transmission do not differ from the operation of Messrs. Tanner and Coates in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Tanner and Coates got options below the cost of their sales to Canadian investors and made hundreds of thousands of dollars. So did Mr. McMahon.

Perhaps I should make a distinction. Tanner and Coates made hundreds of thousands of dollars and McMahon made millions. He did better than Messrs. Tanner and Coates. Before I say anything about that, let us take a look at the profits that have been made by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines promoters because this parliament put up the money to build the first leg of the line from Alberta to Winnipeg and pledged our money to build the northern Ontario leg. How did they fare? Well, of course, in July when stock prices were very much higher than today, the capital gains they would have made between February and September upon any of the stock that they sold on the open market would have been higher than the gains they would make if they held their options and marketed them yesterday at the comparatively low present market price on December 9. Trans-Canada stock yesterday was worth $22.50, and in July it was worth over $31.

Now, I am going to take a look at the operation. Supposing that these gentlemen kept all their options until yesterday when they might have unloaded them. Mr. Tanner, and his United States colleague Mr. Coates could, of course, have made a real killing even yesterday. Mr. Tanner was given 60,000 options at $8 and if he had sold them yesterday at $22.50 he could have made a gain of $870,000. Mr. Coates had 50,000 which he was allowed to get at $8, and his capital gain yesterday would have been $725,000. Other options, also at $8, were given to directors, 25,000 of them, and their capital gain would be $360,000. On the stock issued to the public in February of 3,760,000 shares, for which the public paid not $8 but $10, the capital gain would be $47 million, at least that is what a quick calculation seems to give.

Amongst the companies holding shares recorded as of May, 1956, the original shareholders, we find Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, a company with a good Canadian name but a very large amount of United States interest and control in it. They got 327,789 shares, at $8 per share and their capital gain at yesterday's prices would be $4,750,000. Then, there is Canadian Gulf Oil Company, with 327,790 shares, and their capital gain would be the same, $4,750,000. Then Tennessee Gas Transmission had the same number of shares and therefore the same capital gain, $4,750,000. The Canadian Delhi Oil Company had 497,000 shares and their capital gain would be $7,200,000. Other original shareholders held shares amounting to 447,774 and their capital gain would be $4,700,000. The gains of these companies together would be $26,150,000. Taking all these shares together, the capital gains would have amounted in total, at yesterday's prices, to $75,105,000.

Let me repeat that many of these shares changed hands at very much higher prices than yesterday's prices and therefore, in reality, the capital gains probably were much higher than those I have outlined. Now these gains, of course, are free from taxes and illustrate why we have said over and over again that our government should introduce an amendment to provide for a capital gains tax to recover something, at least, for the people of Canada. A month ago the Hamilton Spectator carried a very interesting article regarding one of the original shareholders in Trans-Canada. I would like to read the newspaper report which is dated October 16, 1957:

> When the royal commission on energy gets down to studying stock options, it will hear some interesting evidence on how million dollar profits are made.
> Just a week ago, hearings before the U.S. federal power commission in Washington established that Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, one of the principal shareholders in the Trans-Canada Pipelines, recouped most of its investment in Trans-Canada by selling off a chunk of its Trans-Canada stock.

I believe it was sold to Home Oil, but I am not sure of that.

> The evidence showed that Tennessee had made more than $2 million profit on 100,000 shares of Trans-Canada which it bought at the pre-issue price of $8 and sold last July at $31.71.
> This profit was almost sufficient to pay the original cost of Tennessee's entire investment in Trans-Canada, given as 327,790 shares of common stock bought for $2,625,213.
> The Washington hearing also referred to 38,563 shares granted under option to unnamed persons. The witness for Tennessee did not know to whom this option was granted or the price at which it could be exercised.

That is an article from the Hamilton Spectator dated October 16 of this year. I have looked at Mr. Coates and Mr. Tanner for a moment and some of their associates, so let us look at Mr. McMahon for a moment.

He seems to have been the chosen instrument of the Conservative party when they were participating in the pipe line debate of last year. He was put forward by the Conservatives in this house as a suitable person to whom the building of the trans-Canada pipe line project might be entrusted.

Mr. McMahon, as an insider in the Westcoast Transmission Company, was able to obtain stock in this company at a price of only 5 cents a share for stock that was offered to the public at $5 a share and which today is selling at around $27 per share. For every dollar Mr. McMahon put in he was assured of more than $500. Does the general public benefit from this? It does not benefit at all. It is an exploitation of the consumers of natural gas, and the producers of natural gas, and a practice that should no longer be tolerated. Mr. McMahon bought 155,000 shares at that price, namely 5 cents, and they cost him about $7,700. He acquired for that $7,700 an equity of over $4 million, a fantastic and amazing figure. These facts do not come out of my own imagination. They are from the prospectus of the company itself filed here in Ottawa with the Department of the Secretary of State.

But that is not all. The same gentleman was granted an option to buy 200,000 additional shares at a special price—a higher price it is true, but still a special price—so that today while the small investor would have to pay $27.50 for West Coast Transmission Company shares, Mr. McMahon, if he has held those 200,000 shares, would need to pay only $6 for them. In other words, if he exercised his option, he could make another $4 million at the public's expense, making a total to this one man of $8 million in capital gains that have come from no other source than eventually from the consumers of natural gas, and that means the people in every part of Canada where this gas will be distributed, particularly in the province of British Columbia, among whom will be workers, old age pensioners, unemployed and so on having to pay higher rates so that this gentleman may make $500 for every $1 he initially put into Westcoast Transmission Company.

I have singled out this one man purely as an example, purely as an instance of what is going on. Let me say he is doing nothing illegal. He is doing something widely approved by large corporations, particularly in the pipe line field. But I want to say that it is wrong and I think that most people would agree it is wrong and that it is time to bring this kind of thing, legal or otherwise, to an end. For example, a corporation shareholder in the same company, namely the Westcoast Transmission Company, a huge United States pipe line company, was able to realize a tax-free capital gain of over $25 million. Hence this is not an academic matter, Mr. Speaker. This is not a small matter. This is not a hypothetical case.

It is a real problem which this government in 1956 gave the people of Canada the opinion that it would face courageously if it were elected. Today they are in power; they have been in power for six months, and they have done nothing except to set up a royal commission which has not yet met and which, as I said this afternoon, I think is open to criticism because of some of the personnel.

I say that it is not a small matter. It is a question that is at the core of Canadian government policy with regard to the development of our natural resources and our utilities. There can be no adequate national development policy as long as our government permits these—and again I use the Prime Minister's own words—nefarious practices to continue.

We are urging the necessity for the public development of the great trans-Canada pipe line project. We are urging the necessity for a capital gains tax on huge speculative profits. We are urging the need for protection of the people generally from those whom the Prime Minister described as buccaneers while he was in opposition; those who, as he said, reaped piratical profits without any danger to themselves. These are words we who have been in the house for several years heard echoed and re-echoed up and down this chamber less than two years ago.

We believe, of course, that there should be a policy of national development for Canada. We believe that policy should be a planned development, a development planned by and through the elected representatives of the people, controlled by this parliament and developed in the interests of the people of Canada as we may well develop those resources under such a plan.

We say that the government has all the power necessary to restore to the Canadian people the ownership of the entire line from Alberta to northern Ontario which the people of Canada have almost entirely financed. As a matter of fact, as to the line across northern Ontario that is being built, the government provided the funds for the crown company that has built it not for the people of Canada but for the Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company. As was said by Hon. George Drew, echoed by the Minister of Finance, the Canadian people should own the entire line. That is what we are putting before the house today.

Oh, yes; we have done it previously. We did it seven years ago when the proposal first came before this parliament. We did it again and again when the pipe line bills came before this house. We are doing it again today. In 1956 when I made a speech like the one I made this afternoon there was thunderous applause not only from my own friends around me but from the hon. gentlemen who today sit opposite me. Today their silence speaks louder than their words.

I want to say that if the government fails to carry out in a practical way the sentiments which the Conservative party when in opposition expressed, that will be, in the words of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation. What disturbs me even more is that the governments failure to act undermines once more the faith of the people of Canada in this parliamentary institution which, in my opinion, is the best instrument man has yet devised for expressing himself collectively and for governing himself. Every time a government takes office, having before they took office expressed an opinion along certain lines, and then when they get into office do quite the opposite of what they were expected to do from the prior sentiments they expressed, parliament is undermined.

This parliamentary institution has enough critics and enough enemies today. When I remember the words of the Prime Minister in this house and across the country, that the supremacy of parliament must be restored, that the Liberals have made this house a caricature of parliament, I tell him today that if he fails to do the things he should do, he will not only be making a caricature of this parliament, he will not only be denying the supremacy of this parliament, he will be undermining it in a manner in which no other prime minister or government has undermined this institution since confederation.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The amendment before the house today, Mr. Speaker, and the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) illustrate clearly two of the methods of approach of the C.C.F. party which he leads in Canada today. The first is that this amendment advocates outright socialism.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but the other day I made an error which I do not want to repeat today in not reading the motion so that we had it properly before the house. I should now like to put the motion. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), moves an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply as follows:

> That all of the words after the word "That" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking the necessary steps to bring the trans-Canada natural gas pipe-line under public ownership so as to preserve this important public utility for the benefit of the Canadian people and to make sure that the profits from this venture will accrue to the nation as a whole rather than to a few privileged individuals, and further this house is of the opinion that the government should take the responsibility for recommending policies to parliament regarding Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited instead of evading such responsibility by referring matters in relation thereto to a royal commission."

I am sorry to have had to interrupt the hon. minister.

Mr. Green: As I had begun to point out, Mr. Speaker, this amendment today before the house and the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar illustrate two of the basic approaches of the C.C.F. party to the problems which face the Canadian people. The first approach is socialism; this amendment calls for outright socialism.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: They may deny it, but they are socialist in one place, half socialist in another and quarter socialist in a third. I find that fundamentally—and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), confirmed this at one of these big celebrations last week end—the main policy of the C.C.F. party still remains socialism as it appears today in this amendment and in the remarks made by the leader of that party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was Mr. Drew a socialist?

Mr. Green: Well the cold hard fact is this: the Canadian people do not believe in socialism. This country of all countries is one which has been developed by the initiative of the individual. Canada would not be what she is today if she had had a system of socialism since the year 1867 with everything being directed by a group of politicians sitting here in Ottawa and with all the business undergoing state direction.

An hon. Member: It would be way ahead.

Mr. Green: This is a nation and the Canadians are people who believe in free enterprise and in the initiative of the individual and, above all groups in the country, the group to whom that means the most is organized labour. Where would they be under a system of state direction?

An hon. Member: They would not be unemployed.

Mr. Green: I do not wonder that the hon. members in the C.C.F. party try to push their socialistic ideas under the rug when it is a little inconvenient to express them but nevertheless there they remain and that is one of the reasons why over the last 25 years they have never made any progress in Canada. Just last week they had, what was it—10 per cent of the popular vote across the country? So much for the first approach. I do not think there is any need for me to deal with it any further, but the second approach is a far more serious one.

This party down in the corner to your left, Mr. Speaker, time and time again have used a smear campaign as an approach. And we have seen that approach today in all its venom. We have heard charges that the members of the government are insincere, very suspicious and so on. We have heard the statement that their silence speaks louder than words and we have heard attacks on men like Henry Borden. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said he did not intend to attack anybody and that these men were all estimable men but he then went on to drop a few atom bombs on Henry Borden and Mr. Levesque and Frank McMahon. He tried to get the government all involved with Frank McMahon; he said this man was one whom the Conservatives, when in opposition, wanted to have take over the trans-Canada pipe lines.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did you not?

Mr. Green: The hon. member knows or should know that what we said in this house to the government of the day was "Why do you not consider the plan that Mr. McMahon is proposing; why do you restrict your dealings to the one group?" There was not the slightest justification for his insinuation today that we were aiming to get McMahon into this trans-Canada pipe line affair. These are smears unworthy of the hon. gentleman and I am amazed that he would use them today.

Then he charged we were not true to the policies of Sir John A. Macdonald and that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and all his supporters were a type of renegade Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Well, the hon. member's supporters laugh and jeer and bang their desks now when I make that statement and they have been doing that kind of thing on platforms all over Canada for many years past. It is just the smear approach. It always reminds me of a hound dog baying at the moon—completely impractical. They forget anything that has to do with the working out of this policy; that is no concern of theirs. They just make one big jump from here to there and leave out all the details of how you are going to get from one place to another. I do not suppose there has ever been a more impractical group of politicians under one flag than Canada has in the C.C.F. party.

In 1956 when we were having the pipe line debate there was a situation existing at that time, but my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar just ignores that situation; he ignores everything that has happened in the meantime and comes right down to today and accuses us of breaking faith and changing our policy and all this sort of nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Have you not?

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a great deal worse than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I express my thanks to the hon. minister. That is the finest compliment that has ever been paid to me in this house.

Mr. Green: We will hear plenty from the the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre between now and the end of the session, just as we have between now and the start of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has more lines in Hansard than any other one member.

Mr. Green: When this question of pipe lines first came up way back in 1949, it was the Conservative party or the Conservative members in this house who, true to the policies of Sir John A. Macdonald and the founders of this nation, advocated in season and out of season "a Canada first" policy; that Canadians should have the first opportunity to use their own Canadian gas and oil. That was our stand from the beginning; it has been our stand all the way through and it is our stand today.

When the debate took place in 1956 we criticized the government primarily because of that belief. We have always thought that Canadians should have the first opportunity to use their resources. The C.C.F. group criticized the proposal primarily because they wanted state ownership.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has on more than one occasion in this house quoted the last paragraph of a speech I made on May 15, 1956 and I believe he has also quoted it over the air. I told the government of that day and I repeat it now: I believe that this measure now proposed by the government is the greatest betrayal of the Canadian people since confederation. If the hon. member had taken the trouble to read my speech—

Mr. Coldwell: I did.

Mr. Green: —then he should in fairness have given the basis for that remark, and the basis was this: in the spring of 1956 the Liberal government came to parliament and asked for authority to lend $80 million to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to enable them to build a line from Alberta to Winnipeg, or it may have been to the Ontario border. I think it was to Winnipeg. At that time we believed—and I still believe this was the case—that the whole plan was a plan of the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. What they wanted was to get a pipe line from Alberta down to the United States, down into Minneapolis and St. Paul and into Chicago, and then they had another branch coming into Canada at Niagara. The plan was not designed for Canada first; it was designed for the benefit of the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company first. I went on to point that out in my speech, and it was on this basis that I made the charge contained in the last paragraph of my remarks. Similar attacks were made by other members of this party based fundamentally on the same complaint.

What has happened in the meantime? The company has not yet got permission to export gas to the United States. Work went on last year—and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar completely ignores these facts—work went on last summer, but at the time this debate took place in May, 1956, the pipe line had not been started. It started last summer and now I believe it is being laid from Winnipeg to the Ontario border.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With explosions every day or so.

Mr. Green: Well, we have explosions here every day or so from some hon. members in that quarter of the house. Here in the east the project is now drawing near completion, and that is the situation today; that was the situation which the new government faced when it took over in June. Furthermore, there had been a crown corporation set up by the statute which was passed in June of 1946. The province of Ontario was a partner of the federal government in that crown corporation, and the crown corporation was actually at work laying the pipe line in northern Ontario.

Now it is all very well for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to say he would at once have taken over the whole pipe line. He may or may not be wrong in adopting a policy of that kind, but surely he cannot accuse the present government of insincerity, or of bad faith, or of all those crimes of which he thinks we have been guilty. Surely he is going much too far in making accusations of that kind in the circumstances.

Once we took over we began a study of the situation, and the picture is a very complicated one. There are many different questions to be settled. The hon. member says very lightly today: you should have moved at once. He says in this amendment that instead of evading responsibility by referring these matters to a royal commission we should have taken more immediate action. But it would be interesting to see the C.C.F. group in power here just to see how quickly they would have changed their tune, just as they have changed a lot of tunes since they took power in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar should give some consideration to the duties placed on this commission. I am going to read them to the house this afternoon. These are the things into which the commission is to look and upon which it is to make recommendations:

(a) The policies which will best serve the national interest in relation to the export of energy and sources of energy from Canada.

Within the last few years this whole question of Canada's energy sources and what is to be done with them has become one of the most important problems before the country, and it is also one of the most difficult. It involves not only gas and oil but also power and uranium; all of those energy sources. No government is in position to adopt a long-range policy without having made a thorough investigation of the whole situation. I submit with all deference to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that we had a perfectly good and honest reason for setting up a commission of investigation with regard to this particular matter.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to be misunderstood. I actually said that there were some things which should be referred to a royal commission, but I added that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was not one of them.

Mr. Green: Well, the hon. member apparently admits that clause (a) of the instructions to the royal commission is all right. Now I will ask him to listen to clause (b) and see what he thinks of that.

(b) the problems involved in, and the policies which ought to be applied to, the regulation of the transmission of oil and natural gas between provinces or from Canada to another country, including, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the regulation of prices or rates to be charged or paid, the financial structure and control of pipe line corporations in relation to the setting of proper prices or charges, and all such other matters as it is necessary to enquire into and report upon, in order to ensure the efficient and economical operation of pipe lines in the national interest.

The hon. gentleman nods his head. I am sure he agrees we had perfectly good justification for asking that this commission investigate the matters referred to in paragraph (b).

Mr. Coldwell: I am not disputing that. What I am disputing is the propriety of the government to refer Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, about which they held such definite opinions, to this royal commission.

Mr. Green: I want to find out how much of this the hon. member agrees with and how much he does not. He has agreed to paragraphs (a) and (b). I am going to read each one because they are important. It just is not good enough to pick out one or two and proceed to belabour us about one of them and leave the inference that the whole commission is just eye-wash and that is what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did. I read paragraph (c):

The extent of authority that might best be conferred on a national energy board to administer, subject to the control and authority of parliament, such aspects of energy policy coming within the jurisdiction of parliament as it may be desirable to entrust to such a board, together with the character of administration and procedure that might best be established for such a board.

Now, the hon. gentleman apparently agrees with that function of the commission. May I point out to him that the present Prime Minister, other members of the Conservative party and myself, when in opposition, had advocated the setting up of a national energy board and we are very much in earnest about getting ahead with that policy. Surely, the practical way of doing it is to have an investigation made of the type which this commission is authorized to make. I now come to paragraph (d), and here I suppose is where the hon. member dissents. It reads:

Whether, in view of its special relationship to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and the nature of its financing and control, any special measures need to be taken in relation to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in order to safeguard the interests of Canadian producers or consumers of gas.

In his remarks the hon. member raved away about what we should be doing with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. He referred to Mr. Tanner and Mr. Coates, and what I am wondering is what he would have done to Mr. Tanner and Mr. Coates. Would he have put them in jail, or tried to put them in jail, without any evidence at all? Would he simply bring them before the bar of the house and then throw them into the basement? The hon. member shakes his head. It is one thing to malign men like Tanner and Coates in this house and it is another thing—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Who called them buccaneers?

Mr. Coldwell: That was not my word. I did not malign them. The Prime Minister called them buccaneers.

Mr. Green: What we are asking this commission to do in paragraph (d) is to go into the whole question of the relationship of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and, further, to go into the nature of the financing and control of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and into the question of whether there are any measures which should be taken by the government in order to safeguard the interests of Canadian producers or consumers of gas.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And make a report after the next election?

Mr. Green: Oh, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre just lives on and breathes suspicion. I sometimes wonder whether he has not got himself worked into the frame of mind where he believes that the only honest people in Canada are members of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Coldwell: Nonsense.

Mr. Green: These people down in the left-hand corner, Mr. Speaker, seem to believe that nobody in this house is trying to do anything for Canada but themselves. I am surprised that after 25 years down in that corner they have not learned that that is all completely wrong; that members here of all parties are trying to benefit the Canadian people in the way which seems to them to be the best way to do it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that this commission is just to get the Tories over the next election. May I point out to him that the Tories expect to be on the right side of the house for a long, long time.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Wishful thinking.

Mr. Green: We have set up this commission to help us solve these very difficult problems.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I thought you had them all solved.

Mr. Green: They can accuse us all they like of just trying to shelve the problem. That has not been our record since this house began. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) rose in his place the other day and said that never had a government moved so fast as the present government to deal with problems and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party, went out west and when he had a lot of good fresh western air in his lungs—I wish I had some now, Mr. Speaker—said that this Conservative government is doing things; there has never been a better government in Canada.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the leader of the Social Credit party never said any such thing. What he did say was that was what parliament did, and that is a different thing from saying it was the government that did it.

Mr. Green: Well, I am sure the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) never said any such thing, and I would not expect him to. He says a lot but he would not say anything like that.

This government, Mr. Speaker, has moved to deal with this question. A commission has been set up in good faith. The terms of the commission have been approved today by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, with the exception of this one reference to the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The personnel of the commission could not be improved upon, in spite of the slurring remarks he made about the chairman.

Mr. Coldwell: I made no slurring remarks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course not.

Mr. Coldwell: I said they were estimable gentlemen whose ideas, perhaps, might be influenced by their associations.

Mr. Green: Well, I am glad the hon. member is admitting that his party now believes in guilt by association.

Mr. Coldwell: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Green: Certainly, he had no right to attack these men.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not. I rise on a question of privilege. I attacked no one this afternoon. I simply said what their business connections were. When men have business connections they often influence their judgment in business matters and surely that is not an aspersion on a man's character. Is the hon. gentleman trying to make a fool of himself?

Mr. Green: What the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is insinuating, Mr. Speaker, is that Henry Borden cannot give an honest opinion on these questions. I leave that to the judgment of the house. He was very wise to stop when he did in reading the list of men who are to constitute this commission. I am sure he would not question Professor Britnell of Saskatchewan, or Gordon G. Cushing, one of the vice-presidents of the Canadian Labour Congress, or other members who are named on the commission.

We have set up a commission that will be holding its first meeting next week and I believe that these men will do a splendid job for Canada. But it is not very much help to them as they face these difficult problems to be attacked as they have been attacked in the House of Commons this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: Surely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will he say that he was smearing Mr. Tanner and Mr. Coates when in this house on February 25, 1957, as found at page 1617 of Hansard, he attacked them because of the profits they made out of the trans-Canada pipe line deal?

Mr. Green: If I made an attack such as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made this afternoon, then I was wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister attacked Mr. Murchison, too.

Mr. Green: But here we have this commission set up to do a job for Canada and the members are attacked on the floor of the House of Commons. Naturally the government cannot accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. We think it is not only unwise but also—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Embarrassing.

Mr. Green: —very unfair. Oh, we are not embarrassed by anything the C.C.F. party does in this parliament. They are such big, brave fellows when they know that the Liberals are not going to vote with them. If the C.C.F. thought for one minute that when they moved an amendment it might be carried they would not do half as much barking as they have been doing since the house opened. Finally, may I simply say that I am sure that not only the members on the government side of the house but also the members of the official opposition and the members of the Social Credit party on our right realize exactly what kind of amendment this is and will not hesitate to vote against it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. A. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words. It is a little bit difficult to speak on the resolution because of the very excellent, powerful and all-comprehensive remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I do not think that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), the house leader, seriously attempted to come to grips with the case presented. He used a great deal of his time on matters which indicated that he was not too keen to come to grips with the real question. He said that this amendment was socialism. If this is socialism, I suppose the public ownership of Canadian National Railways is socialism; I suppose the public ownership of Trans-Canada Air Lines is socialism and that the proposition put forward by his former leader, then leader of the opposition, for public ownership of the trans-Canada natural gas pipe lines was socialism. I do not think that argument can be treated seriously.

Whatever the long-term merits of socialism may be, they do not arise here any more than they arise in connection with some public project like the Ontario hydro where the Canadian people have been at pains to use social ownership as a means of controlling and keeping control of the vital lifelines of public existence. Undoubtedly gas pipe lines are just something else of the same nature. The government, by refusing to accept its responsibility to govern, is selling out the people of Canada. That is a strong statement but I want to show what I mean.

In the province of British Columbia one natural gas pipe line company, Westcoast Transmission, has piled up stock option profits amounting to $69 million already. The special tax free capital gains out of that company alone amounted to $69 million before the pipe line was opened. That company too, which is United States controlled, has turned around and under the control of its United States parents is selling gas to United States distributors for 10 cents less than the price to distributors in British Columbia. Westcoast Transmission Company is controlled by Sunray Midwestern Oil in the United States.

This is going on at the present time. There is no academic question here. That company has a 20-year contract to sell its gas to United States distributors at 22 cents per thousand cubic feet while at the present time it is charging Canadian industry and Canadian consumers in British Columbia 32 cents per thousand feet. What does that mean? It not only means that the Canadian consumer is being milked for these stock option gains —he is the one who will have to pay them off—it not only means he has to pay a higher price for his own gas than the United States consumer but it means that this is a sell-out of Canadian industry. United States industry using cheaper gas can compete very much better with Canadian industry.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is the price to the people of Rosetown-Biggar?

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I do not know that. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Ellis: Tell us the price in Winnipeg.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): My hon. friend may want to change the subject, but here is a case where Canadian consumers and Canadian industry are being sold down the river at the present time and the government, instead of proposing action to preserve vital Canadian interests, has proposed a royal commission which will certainly last for one year, two years, who knows how long?

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Because I know how long it took a similar commission on long-term energy prospects in the United States. I note that the commission set up by the government, and about which they were so serious, has not met and will not meet until next week although it was appointed some time early in October. Why this long delay when Canadian interests are being sold out by the supplying of our own gas to the United States at a cheaper rate?

Mr. Broome: I suppose you like the way the Indonesian government has just grabbed hold of everything.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): That may be Conservative policy. It is not ours.

Mr. Ellis: A bright question.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): There is another point that parliament should consider about this matter. Since the 14th of October when parliament opened we have been trying to do something for the retired citizens of our country, the disabled, the blind, our veterans. Think of how much we have provided for these people and how much has been reaped by a small band of speculators in our natural gas pipe lines, $69 million in British Columbia alone and, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, $75 million in connection with Trans-Canada. Then there is Quebec Natural Gas and the Northern Ontario pipe line. While we talk about setting up a commission to discuss the question, all that money is going tax free into the hands of a small band of speculators and it is more than parliament voted by way of increase for the senior citizens of the country. Yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), when he brought down his tax proposals the other night, continued to show that tender solicitude towards these interests in his policy of refusing to consider a capital gains tax. This parliament is not ready yet to tax these gains. Surely, that is not acting in the interests of those we were called together to help the old people, the blind, the disabled, the veterans, the people who have built up this country and made the wealth of this country as we know it today.

Nothing personal was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar about the chairman of the commission that the government proposes to set up. The hon. member showed that the chairman's interests absolutely committed him to take a line that was contrary to the policy adopted by the Conservative party in the debates of June, 1956. Mr. Borden is not just the president of Brazilian Traction, he is president of two subsidiary gas companies of Brazilian Traction. Here he is, the president of two gas companies in Brazil, committed by his life, his actions and his work to the defence of those interests. How would it appear if he decided that it was in the public interest in Canada that Trans-Canada should be a public utility, publicly-owned? Would that not redound immediately against the interests of his companies in Brazil? Of course it would. We know the pressure there is against foreign domination of the economy of Brazil, and such a finding would immediately become news in Brazil. How could Mr. Borden, the chairman, the most important man on the commission the government proposes to set up, take a position against foreign domination of this Canadian life line? Does he not have to make a case in Brazil for foreign ownership and control of Brazilian natural gas companies? Could he be expected to take the other side of the question here? The chairman of the commission is necessarily committed by his business connections to a policy which will not safeguard Canadian natural gas from foreign domination, a policy which cannot conceivably give to the consumers, the people of Canada generally, public ownership of that natural gas company.

In making his case, the Minister of Public Works was in error in suggesting that it was a personal thing. However, it is such a powerful case that the hon. member has made that even if the government has to continue this commission to investigate the long-term uses of energy in Canada and the ultimate regulation of those energies, gas, electricity, uranium and so forth, it should reconstitute that commission to make sure that none of the members, especially the chairman, is committed by business connections to taking a position which would not be in the interests of the Canadian people.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I think it is well that at this time some of us who have been interested in this question of gas and oil production in Canada for a long time should lay some of the facts before this house that will enable us all to see this thing in proper perspective. I might say, in my own case, that long before we heard from many people in this house about this question of the exploitation of producers and consumers there were voices raised in western Canada pointing out these facts. These facts are on the records of newspapers in western Canada and were there long before we heard from any of our friends who sit in one corner of this house.

Today I heard remarks passed about the sincerity of this government. I think before we measure this sincerity we had better learn to take a good look at ourselves. I refer particularly to a little episode in Saskatchewan which occurred not so long ago known to the Saskatchewan people as the Regina outdoor theatre. There were four men in that province, the Hon. Mr. Fines, the Hon. Mr. T. C. Douglas, a Mr. Bodneff and a Mr. Shumiatcher, who entered into association, and who put up approximately $4,000 in capital for equity shares in a theatre worth $150,000. Here we have an identical case to what has been happening in connection with this oil business. Here we have a group of men visualizing the possibility of capital gains. They have invested $4,000 in equity stock and then they go out and borrow $90,000 on debentures, allowing the profits to pay off their debentures. Then when they sold the theatre it would be worth the market value which, at one time, was approximately $150,000.

I was not one of those people in Saskatchewan who condemned these four men for doing what they did because that was one of the techniques used by businessmen to try to avoid paying income tax, to get a capital gain. I maintain that in any kind of transaction such as this, where we condemn one group of men for doing something, we should be equally fair and condemn other groups for doing the same thing. I think these facts put a different light on the words spoken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Where was he or any other member of his party in Saskatchewan when this matter was before the public of that province? Not one of them raised their voices but let the thing disappear from public interest gradually. Eventually these men sold out. As leader of my party in that province I took part in the discussion, but not in connection with this question of capital gain or this question of using equity stock to avoid paying income tax. I raised the essentially democratic issue of the right of two ministers of the crown to be associated in business with two other men doing business with the crown. It was on that point I raised my voice in Saskatchewan, but it was not heard.

I want to point out to this house that this is a case of record. The facts are there for the public to see. When people talk about sincerity I like to see that they apply the same rules of judgment in one case as they apply in another. I am not finished with this matter entirely, Mr. Speaker. I have to make some quotations from memory, but I challenge anybody in the house to question these quotations. We had the question of the development of oil and gas in our province under discussion. There was hesitation about accepting any investment from risk capital in our province. The province of Alberta began to move forward in oil and gas development. I was one of those in Saskatchewan who held that we should encourage these large investments of risk capital in our province. I was not the only one. Here is a statement from the provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Fines. This is just a rough statement corresponding to what he said, but I challenge any person in this house to question the accuracy of it.

He said that the government should not be engaged in risky natural resource development projects. He was backed up by a person called the premier of the province, Mr. T. C. Douglas, who made a statement along this line, that no government led by him would expropriate or take over gas and oil companies engaged in development of resources. These statements appeared in the oil magazines in western Canada as a guarantee of the leader of our government in Saskatchewan that, in these great risk enterprises for the development of our natural resources, there would be no interference, no socialism, no expropriation.

Mr. Ellis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. Ellis: Is it not a fact that all the pipe lines in Saskatchewan are publicly owned?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is a very profound observation from the hon. member for Regina City.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Ellis: I was just wondering if you knew about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am just simply putting on the record the statements by the leaders of the government of that province. Now we have a repudiation of the leaders of that province in this house by the members of the C.C.F. They are advocating a policy here which in effect is expropriation of a company.

Mr. Coldwell: For which we paid; we put up all the money.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): For which this parliament did contribute when it started. Now I want to lead on to this next point. We have found in Saskatchewan that we have to co-operate with the people who bring in risk capital. We have found it to be good business. The province of Alberta at the present time receives over 60 per cent of every dollar received from the oil and gas business. In the public documents of that province of Saskatchewan, you will find a statement that between 40 per cent and 60 per cent of every dollar coming from the oil and gas business in Saskatchewan will go into the treasury of the province of Saskatchewan. We in the west know that in this great oil and gas industry the people of Canada are the persons who will get the greater share and we will do all we can to let the thing develop on a sound economic basis.

This brings me to the question of the royal commission and the speeches made here today and this lack of dealing with the fundamental issue that is raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Macdonald). If you read this section (d) which is under dispute, you will find it states:

> (d) whether, in view of its special relationship to the Northern Ontario Pipeline Crown Corporation and the nature of its financing and control, any special measures need be taken in relation to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, Limited, in order to safeguard the interests of Canadian producers or consumers of gas;

Long ago it became clear in western Canada that there was a great pressure play being put on the producers of gas in our western provinces, particularly in Alberta. We heard of a company coming out there called Trans-Canada Pipe Lines offering our producers 10 cents a thousand in the centre of the field. My voice was raised in western Canada long before the voices of any members of the C.C.F. party were ever raised in this matter. For the last seven years I have tried to keep the public of Saskatchewan informed on our participation in the risks of this type of pressure being put on these producers because I knew the producers of gas and oil in the west were ourselves. We own from 40 per cent to 60 per cent of it. In their defence I fought steadily for the right to set up some form of regulatory body in Canada that would control the rates paid, and have some say in the rates paid to the producers and the rates charged by pipe lines carrying this product through the pipe lines to the consumers. In that particular industry it so happens that there is a community of interest between the producers of western Canada and the consumers of eastern Canada because gas is a fixed cost industry. If we can get firm sales in eastern Canada we can reduce the price to consumers and at the same time give more to the producers.

The very rightness of my judgment on this question of price is now borne out today by the fact that Trans-Canada cannot get new contracts signed at an increased price of 12 cents because anyone who knows economics and knows the situation in western Canada knows that the production cost is some place between 14 cents and 18 cents in the centre of the field.

What has this all got to do with this question we are debating here today? We have not in Canada today any body qualified to judge how much surplus gas we have, or the rates that should be paid to any transportation company carrying that gas from one part of Canada to the other; and certainly we have not any body qualified to judge on this very difficult matter of price structure.

I do not think there are too many members on the opposition side of the house who are at all qualified to stand up and say that we can act like the federal power commission in the United States with years of experience behind them. The great thing to remember is this. The action that this government has taken should have been taken five years ago. We are going to be in serious trouble for many months to come. We have on the statute books of this country an act called the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act. As all hon. members know, this statute says that no gas can be exported until there is a surplus of gas declared in Canada. What is the body that declares that surplus? In Alberta they have a conservation board which has done wonderful work in trying to establish the presently known gas reserves, the potential reserves and the probable reserves. We have nothing like that in Saskatchewan. We have nothing like that yet in British Columbia and I do not think they have yet got to that stage in Manitoba. How any person can stand up in this house and say that this can be followed through when there is no competent body of belief or opinion as to that question of conservation, I do not know. I think that person is evading the essential issue in our problem in Canada here today.

In that act there is also a regulation which says that no gas shall be exported out of Canada unless it is at a comparable price for the same kind of fuel in the country to which the gas is going. It is on this question that many of us in all sincerity wonder if the laws of Canada are being obeyed today. This is a question for judges to decide, people of judicial temperament. That is the place of this royal commission. We did our level best to try to get a group of people not directly connected with the oil and gas business in Canada to act as a body that would give us this judgment. That was one of the reasons why it was almost impossible to get a person in the business to go on that royal commission, because of their direct connections with and direct interest in it. It is almost impossible in the whole of Canada to get people who are not in some way indirectly connected with the oil and gas business.

I therefore point out, in concluding my remarks, that this royal commission was set up on October 15. The two secretaries have been working collecting information and I have been doing what I can in my own department, as a matter of fact, having my own department find all that we can. I do not know whether or not the royal commission will ask me for that information. But it just strikes me that if all these people who have been talking about this whole matter of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and Westcoast Transmission—and I am one of them—are sincere in what we have said, it is our duty to make sure that we have witnesses ready to go before that royal commission in order to present the viewpoint that we have. I am prepared to do my part and I trust that the hon. gentlemen who have spoken so much across the chamber will do the same. I cannot support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): It had not been my intention, Mr. Speaker, to say anything on this amendment but the remarks just made by the minister from my own province rather intrigued me. I was quite surprised at his admission that what he was going to read were, I believe he said, rough quotations of something that certain other gentlemen were supposed to have said in the province of Saskatchewan. I think perhaps the validity of the hon. member's statement can be judged from an instance of what occurred in the house on November 27 when, on the question of privilege, my colleague the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson) referred to a statement by the minister which had been reported in the press in Saskatchewan and to which the minister took some exception. The minister at that time made this statement:

C.C.F. members oppose the move as useless, although it was supported by farm organizations.

Then he went on to point out that one member had argued against the cash advances resolution. He was asked who it was, when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

Might I ask who was the hon. member concerned, because I have no recollection of this.

The minister replied:

I said one member, in his remarks in this house, had described it as useless.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, who was that? I have no recollection.

There was no answer. So on that occasion the minister was making reference to something which had gone on in this house, but he could not even give us the name of the individual who was supposed to have made this statement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Ellis: Certainly.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Do you honestly want to know who the member was to whom I was referring?

Mr. Ellis: You know now. You did not know then.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I knew then because I quoted from his remarks from page 517 of Hansard. When a member stands up in this house and says that a proposal is too little and too late and not only is inadequate but stupid I would assume that is somewhat comparable to the word "useless" and that he is opposed to the legislation.

Mr. Ellis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure we are all pleased that the minister in the interim has discovered who was the member concerned, because certainly at page 1555 of Hansard on November 27 he did not know.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member that I knew exactly at that time who was the person. I quoted from his remarks in Hansard and all I was doing at that time was avoiding the embarrassment of the member in front of his colleagues.

Mr. Ellis: I suggest the hon. member would have preferred being named because I am sure that having made the statement he would be quite capable of backing it up.

Some reference was made in the earlier part of the minister's remarks to private business in my own home city of Regina and, in some obscure manner, the minister tried to tie this in with the question of pipe lines. I think when the hon. member from Saskatchewan, who should know better and has listened over the years as I have listened to the type of remarks made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and other members of the Liberal party from Saskatchewan and who realizes how utterly ridiculous were those charges, should know better than to repeat this nonsense on the floor of the House of Commons.

I suggest to him that if he feels that every small business should be investigated and if he is opposed to the manner in which business is carried on in the country, that is his privilege but when we are dealing with pipe lines we are dealing first with a monopoly. A pipe line by its very nature is a monopoly. Furthermore, when we are dealing with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines we are dealing with a monopoly created through the use of public funds and I suggest there is absolutely no parallel between an ordinary business—whether it be a theatre or a grocery store or any other type of small business —and a public monopoly or a monopoly created out of the use of public funds.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Would the hon. member permit a question. Does the hon. member want to tell this house that a $150,000 business—either a theatre or a grocery store—is a small proposition?

Mr. Ellis: I do not think the minister really expects that hon. members in this house are going to become exercised over what they know to be a normal business procedure in all of the businesses in this country and I would think that, as a defender of free enterprise, he would be the last one in the world to allege that a businessman in the entertainment field or in business generally could in any way be compared to Mr. Tanner, Mr. Coates, Mr. Murchison, Mr. McMahon and others who were described by his own leader as buccaneers.

I would suggest that when reference is made to a smear attack on the personnel of the royal commission, as was made earlier, members on the government side should explain the evidence upon which the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in 1956 called Mr. Tanner and Mr. Coates buccaneers.

Apparently the hon. gentleman had sufficient evidence in his possession upon which to formulate his judgment and I suggest that because the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) places on the record of this house the business connections of certain gentlemen it does not constitute an attack or a smear. Now if the hon. gentlemen opposite want to consider that the placing on the record of a man's business connection constitutes a smear, then I suggest that is a very grave reflection upon the businessmen of this country. I say this because all the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did was to outline the business connections of these two gentlemen in order to indicate their difficulties in exercising impartial judgment.

Now I mentioned a moment ago the reference made by the minister in respect to my own province in connection with pipe lines and I asked the minister whether it was not a fact apart from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines of course which is interprovincial, the construction of all pipe lines in the province of Saskatchewan—outside of the main trunk line—is under the auspices of the Saskatchewan power corporation and that we in Saskatchewan are doing precisely what we want the government of Canada to do.

In Saskatchewan we are developing our gas pipe lines as a public utility in order that natural gas may be brought to the hon. member's home city of Saskatoon. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has natural gas in his home in Saskatoon but I know there are thousands of people in that city, as there are thousands of people in my own city, who are now benefiting as a result of the development of our resources and through the transmission of natural gas by the Saskatchewan power corporation into the cities, towns and villages of the province of Saskatchewan.

The hon. gentleman said something about risk capital. I think he ought to bear in mind that there is a distinct difference between capital invested in oil exploration and the building of a pipe line. Where, might I ask, is there any risk involved in the building of a pipe line? There has not been a pipe line built in North America which has not produced sizeable profits for its owners and there has not been a pipe line built in North America which has failed. Therefore, for the hon. gentleman to suggest there is any similarity between the risk capital involved in exploration for oil and the building of a pipe line to transport the gas resources in being from the producer to the consumer is, of course, to beg the question. I suggest that we in the C.C.F. have been thoroughly consistent in that over the years we have stated in this house that we believe the Canadian people will enjoy the greatest benefit from the natural resources of this country through the building of pipe lines by the government.

We have proven this to be the case in the province of Saskatchewan. We used to hear all sorts of references to gas prices; we do not hear them any more. As a matter of fact the right hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner), last year or two years ago, had a great deal to say about gas prices and prospective gas prices in Regina. We do not hear those comments any more because, as my hon. colleagues from Winnipeg will confirm, there has been a tremendous struggle going on in the city of Winnipeg over this matter and it has been proven that after making allowances for the extra distance involved in the pipe line between Regina and the city of Winnipeg, the people of Winnipeg, who are not getting the benefits of a publicly owned pipe line, are going to pay I believe 25 or 26 cents more per thousand cubic feet for gas than are the consumers in my own city of Regina. That, I think, illustrates the benefits which accrue to the gas consumers in this country through a policy of public ownership of pipe lines.

Hence the suggestions which we have made during the course of this and previous debates have been substantiated through actual performance in my own province. I suggest that what is being done there can be done with equal benefit to the people of this country through the adoption by this government of public construction and ownership of pipe lines.

Now some reference was also made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) to socialism. Well, it was rather strange that in 1956—read reports from the province of Ontario of speeches made by the then leader of the opposition—Mr. Drew suggested public ownership. Did that make Mr. Drew a socialist? Were the Tories who suggested that also socialists and are the supporters of the Ontario hydro socialists? The minister spoke also with respect to free enterprise and the fact that this country had been built by free enterprise. Might I ask whether the amendments to the National Housing Act were not brought about because of the failure of private enterprise to come up with some solution of our housing problem?

Time after time this parliament has had to bail out private enterprise and make use of public funds to cover up the failure of private enterprise through its failure to solve many of our major problems. Here is an instance with regard to which the Conservative party made a strong case in 1956, even going so far as to suggest public ownership, where the government is under a moral obligation to the people of this country who expected that as the result of the election there would be a reversal of the policy adopted by the previous government. The people of Canada have the right to expect that the government should take hold of the situation now, not refer it to a royal commission, and that it should take steps at once to bring Trans-Canada Pipe Lines under public ownership.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, one of the disadvantages in trying to attend both meetings of committees and the sittings of this house is the difficulty one is bound to experience in picking up the threads of a debate on a subject as complex and as broad as this, a debate which has brought out a somewhat tired skeleton from the closet for further examination.

In the very few minutes during which I propose to take part in this debate I do not intend to become any further involved in any discussion of the conflicting ideologies of private enterprise and socialism. This has been a source of disagreement for many years past and it will undoubtedly continue to be so in other centuries than this. But reference has been made to insincerity with regard to the establishment of a royal commission, and speaking only for myself and as someone who has made a living in this industry for some time I wish to make one point abundantly clear. I would be less than honest if I did not say that, naturally, the producers of this product would be somewhat concerned over any lengthy delay such as could result from protracted hearings before a royal commission, but having said that let me say with equal sincerity that the establishment of a body for the orderly regulation of the oil and gas industry, is something which not only consumers but producers also have been advocating for the past 20 years or so. Yes, the first request of this kind goes back to the days when the industry, in its infancy at that time, recommended that authority should be assumed by a federal board somewhat similar in constitution to what we know today as the federal power commission of the United States.

What could such a commission as is now being set up accomplish? The Minister for Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) has explained that one result could be an energy board which could clarify and determine the future course of the oil and gas industry as it is related not only to the producer but also to that equally important person in Canada, the consumer. If a question of sincerity is involved, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this was the first and prime objective in setting up the commission. This will unquestionably be accomplished if we can be patient enough to await the outcome.

But I should like to suggest to hon. members of this house that consideration of these matters by the commission will inevitably delay the growth of this industry whether the gas goes into the domestic market or into the foreign market, with serious effects upon a source of wealth which is as important to Canada as is the oil and gas industry. It is wrong for any member of this house to assume that it is possible to keep the product in the ground and have it available, as if by turning on a tap, when it is required for consumers in Canada alone. It is important to bear in mind that the known reserves of gas in Canada today amount to about 24 trillion cubic feet, and also to bear in mind that we are discovering new reserves at the rate of approximately two trillion feet per year, so that in the course of the next 25 years we may expect to have something like 74 trillion cubic feet of reserve capacity. With these figures in mind it is obvious that we as Canadians need have no concern that the domestic needs of this country, present and future cannot be met.

One result of the energy commission which could follow the setting up of this royal commission would be the determination of how best these reserves of gas could be used and for what purpose. As I have pointed out, even on the basis of the gas known to be available in Canada today we have a reserve capacity far greater than the Canadian demand. Therefore, in considering this question, which is so important to the economy of Alberta and Saskatchewan, it stands to reason that regardless of whether a pipe line is to be owned by individuals or publicly we must look to the export of natural gas. Now to take this one step further: what is the best procedure with regard to the export of this gas?

There are, admittedly, a few limited regulatory bodies in Canada. We have a lesson to be learned from the Alberta gas conservation board which is practising a philosophy generally accepted by both producers and consumers. We have a minister's conference which deals with these matters purely on an annual basis, and we have certain regulations in the three provinces. I believe that if this energy commission were to examine the history of this group of organizations together with representations made by consumer groups it could put together an interim study in the interest of both producers and consumers. The report which would then come forward would represent the first oil and gas policy for Canada.

I suggest that as it is now six o'clock we should adjourn at this point.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks before the adjournment I endeavoured to trace some of the history of the gas industry and the implications of that history in relation to export. I said it was not my intention to try to separate the long-standing differences which will continue to exist between the principles of free enterprise and socialism. Then I discussed the need as I saw it as an individual for a royal commission which could produce desirable results from the standpoint of both the consumer and the producer.

Following that I placed myself on record as best I could in recognizing the need of the export of this surplus gas reserve of our country. You may recall that I said a conservative—and for the record I might point out that I mean conservative with a small "c"—estimate of our reserves of natural gas has been placed at approximately 24 trillion cubic feet. I then went on to say that the estimated domestic demand for the next 25 years is something in the neighbourhood of 17 trillion cubic feet and that the estimated natural annual increase in the commodity based purely on present indications as a result of exploration is in excess of 2 trillion cubic feet.

I am not a mathematician but from those figures it will be clearly understood that taking into consideration our reserves of natural gas and the anticipated demand which has been arrived at at a number of hearings concerning domestic consumption, and also taking into consideration all the proposed plans for export, it is estimated that we will have a surplus based on present exploration and present rate of growth of over 47 trillion cubic feet. Therefore, I think that any of us regardless of where we may sit in this house can reach the conclusion that we are indeed blessed by nature in having vast quantities of this valuable commodity surplus to the requirements of the country.

It would seem, then, that a commission on energy which I had hoped would be established as a result of the resolution calling for the setting up of a royal commission would be faced with the problem of finding the best policy to follow in the exploitation of this commodity to the advantage of both the consumer and the producer. It was really on that point that I concluded when I said it is apparent to me that the request for the establishment of a royal commission has been made in all seriousness and sincerity because of the existence of a problem which hitherto fore we have not had to face, and also in recognition of the growing surplus of only one of Canada's many natural resources.

I am now going to go one step farther in stating that perhaps the first responsibility of this commission is to determine whether or not a delay in the development of this commodity would work to the detriment of the economy of Canada or, perhaps if we could forecast a conclusion which I assume would not be in order in this house, decide whether or not retaining the reserves of this commodity within Canada would be in the best interests of this nation.

As I said at the beginning the commission must face the question as to whether or not a delay in reaching a decision would in itself be desirable. In dealing with this question I do not intend to review it from the standpoint of the producer alone but I will also consider the position of the consumer in this regard. If I were a witness antagonistic as a consumer to the proposition of the export of natural gas I would say what is perhaps on the lips of every hon. member of this house that to export natural gas means to increase the price of that gas to the consumer. I do not intend to deny that fact, but having said that I would hasten to say that whether gas is used solely for the domestic market or exported the increase in demand will affect the cost of the gas to the consumer.

There is a serious dispute in my own city today as to whether or not gas prices in that city will be increased based on the export of this product. Those who must consider that problem will doubtless have to face the argument that whether or not it is used in the domestic or imported market, or whether it is kept in Canada or sold abroad, the cost of gas will be increased by general demand over the depressed price at which gas has sold during the past 20 years. I say that with the following in mind. When you look at those areas which have enjoyed the use of this resource for many years and obtained it when there was no other market for it due to the fact that there was no transmission system which could carry it from one place to another you will find that those communities had the privilege of enjoying the use of this excellent commodity at an extremely low rate. However, I am not going to limit myself purely to local areas of Canada.

Let us move on to a second question: what will the export of natural gas mean to the consumer? As I have said, when this royal commission sits they will first have to consider the problem of immediate concern as to whether or not to delay the use of that gas either on a domestic or import basis. Another consideration that will be placed before the commission will be the question of the effect on eastern Canada as a result of the export of gas into the United States. I subscribe to the idea that the presently existing Trans-Canada pipe line will find itself in the position, on the basis of the estimated demand for gas in eastern Canada, of concluding that the domestic transmission of gas will be theoretically sound economically speaking. That is based on their first application to the Alberta conservation board when they asked for a limited supply and, of course, it is not necessary to quote that figure in this house. I think you will agree that finding themselves in that position they will likely have to go back and make application for an additional volume of gas if export is granted. What does that mean to the eastern market in this country?

I suggest it may mean anywhere from 5 cents to 7 cents per thousand cubic feet based on the fact that the reduced sale at a lower contract wholesale price on an uninterruptible basis will, as it has done in past years, produce a lower price at the gates of Toronto or at other eastern points. That is the consideration with which the consumer is concerned.

In the early part of the debate one of our members came to me and said, "Well, what is the position of Canada and its future needs?" I have already stated that based on present reserves of gas, based on domestic requirements and based on the proposed export of gas into other areas of this continent, we still have for the next 25 years a reserve of 47 trillion cubic feet. But what I did not say, sir, is that we have not begun to search for gas in western Canada because until recently we have had no market for it. I am speaking, of course, of the relative situation up to the present time.

In actual fact the discovery rate of gas in relation to oil wells has been about eight to seven, and therefore I am certain it would be assumed by hon. members that if you found a gas well when you were looking for oil or conversely you would actually receive a bonus. The fact of the matter is that that has not been the case. If you drill an oil well that produces 10 barrels a day and a well that produces five barrels of oil and a relative amount of gas you will naturally receive less than half the price that the oil marketer has had in the past because of the lack of a market for our natural gas. The discovery of gas related to cost of discovery has in its very nature been a deterrent to the development of the petroleum industry in western Canada.

The next question would be this. That being the case, does it not mean that you can keep that supply in the ground and use it for some future need in the development of Canada? I think this is really the critical point where perhaps some of us may disagree. I suggest first of all that this house does not have any understanding of what our reserves are. I suggest also that in the orderly development of the reserves of resources in Canada you cannot turn the tap on or turn it off to suit conditions and orderly development must depend on exploration.

Mr. Speaker: It being 8.15 p.m., it is my duty, in accordance with the arrangement reached between all parties, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment before the house.

IMPROVED HARBOUR WORKS, LOWER MAINLAND, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the grievance I have this evening comes more directly under the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport. The question has to do with the job that was begun by the former Liberal administration some years ago and today remains an eyesore to the people of my constituency. It is a local problem, namely the breakwater at White Rock and a seawall in parts of Boundary Bay and Beach Grove. In order to give the house a complete picture of this problem I think it is necessary that we have the story of the geographical outline. We have the city of White Rock which is just north of the international boundary on the lower mainland of British Columbia. The geographic position of the city of White Rock—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Look up.

Mr. Hahn: Yes. I will look at the C.C.F. As I say, the geographic position of the city of White Rock is just north of the international boundary on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

An hon. Member: How are you doing?

Mr. Hahn: I am doing very well. I am getting a lot of enthusiastic help from the socialists over there who think there is only one problem in the country today.

An hon. Member: Get the breakwater in.

Mr. Hahn: I will get it in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are just feeling good because you had the Tories voting with you.

Mr. Hahn: Yes; I think we have a lot of sense. I think the pipeline case should have gone to the divorce court in the Senate possibly. May I say that this breakwater in White Rock, a city which is just north of the international boundary, has been an eyesore to the community for a number of years. Just prior to the election in 1953 a promise was apparently made by the former member to the effect that a breakwater would be given to them for the purpose of housing small boats and preventing their breakup in the event of high seas. The government kept that promise but the breakwater is of very little use. It is much too small and it is too short. The actual expenditure on the breakwater was something like $150,000.

The suggestion has been made by the department that it is not in the habit of spending money on creating a boat haven or a breakwater for small boats or river craft. In this instance I should like to point out that the city of White Rock itself is a summer resort. It is the best known summer resort on the lower mainland of British Columbia, in fact. There are some 7,000 or 8,000 people resident in the city and on a Sunday it is not at all uncommon to have as many as 30,000 people there. There is a continuous line of traffic from Vancouver, New Westminster and Burnaby into the region. A good number of these people naturally enough own boats. Those boats should be berthed at White Rock which is the natural area in which to spend summer vacations and Sundays. The fact that the former government recognized the need for and built a breakwater is an important factor. It is not an individual case of such action having been taken.

I understand that similar undertakings were to be carried out at Kelowna, Naramata and Penticton, so the residents of that city saw no reason why in this instance the government should have expended over $150,000 on a project which is proving rather worthless and they asked that they be given a proper boating basin. It might require the extension of the present one, or, on the other hand, it might be wise to build a complete new one. That of course would be the desirable thing because there is another location where a more appropriate boat basin could be constructed.

The boat owners in the area today have to harbour their craft across the international boundary at Blaine. Now the present government has indicated it wishes to have Canadians buy less from the United States. I know that the Minister of Public Works has many times suggested in this house that we are spending too many dollars in that country. This government, by continuing the policies as presented by the former government, is nevertheless forcing the people in my area to go to the United States to store their boats at this point and thereby making them partially resident of that area. They leave their cars in Blaine, they will then buy the materials they require for their boats, naturally enough, in that city and we are in fact doing the very thing to which the government of today is opposed.

It is quite understandable that the merchants of White Rock, the board of trade and other representatives of the area are very disturbed at the continuation of this policy. Other members from the lower mainland of British Columbia, particularly those members for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Irwin), are, I am sure, fully aware of the position in which the merchants in my area of White Rock find themselves today. They do find many and many a Canadian dollar being spent in the United States which they feel would be much better spent in the White Rock region. It angers the citizens of White Rock to find each morning, when looking out to sea, a fine seagull's roost—in fact a $150,000 one—and it is quite understandable that they would take a dim view of any suggestion that this money was well spent unless something is done to assist them or unless the government sees fit to make a better berth out of the present one. The fact is that the former government only three years ago recognized the need of the citizens of that area by replanking the pier and of course they had previously built the present White Rock breakwater.

Now these United States cousins of ours see the value of a breakwater. The Americans are shrewd businessmen. I very often find myself thinking that responsible individuals in this house are prone to criticize people who are in business and who do a good job of it by reason of the fact that they themselves are not capable or are not taking advantage of what we might term good business practices. We blame the Americans for seeing there is a need of good boating facilities in that section of the United States and Canada.

Might I say it has been drawn to my attention just exactly how forward-thinking are these Americans in respect to this matter; they are fully cognizant of the fact that tourists spend dollars and they only require one facility that is for boating purposes. They do not require schools; they do not require sewers, watermains or any of the other public utilities which we require in our municipalities. Therefore every tourist dollar spent on the United States side is just that much money in the pocket of the astute merchants there.

The merchants of Blaine and the government of the United States are fully aware of this situation, as I have already indicated, and I find in the Blaine Journal dated February 28, 1957 an article headed "Blaine Boat Haven Expansion to Begin About April 1 by Port". It goes on to say that the United States army engineers would open bids about May 8 for their part of the program and they would extend the existing rock breakwater 1,000 feet southeasterly from the end of the existing breakwater to a point 1,300 feet south of East street. It then goes on to explain about the sharing of these particular costs and just a few weeks later in the April 18 edition of the same publication I find another item entitled "Progress Being Made at Blaine Harbour". One of the important parts of that particular article has this to say:

> The date for opening bids for the federal government's part of the project at an estimated cost of $477,000 has been set for May 8, at 2.00 p.m. by Colonel R. J. B. Page, Seattle district engineer, corps of engineers.
> The work consists of 480,000 cubic yards of dredging for a small boat harbour; salvaging and reusing approximately 1,100 cubic yards of rock from the existing breakwater; reinforcement of timber and rock breakwater; and construction of 975 feet new breakwater easterly of the existing rock breakwater.
> When contract is awarded, contractor will have 150 calendar days to complete work.

This is a serious problem in the lower mainland of British Columbia; it is a problem of which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) should be fully aware. It is a problem which I know full well is probably also to some extent the responsibility of the people of the area. However, I would draw to the attention of the minister the following fact: this government has so frequently told us—I have always thought with sincerity, which is probably the case—that we should not spend too many dollars in the United States because every dollar so spent causes that much greater imbalance of trade between our two countries. I say if this government is completely sincere then it will see to it that we have the works in our own area to make it possible for the Canadian boat owners, pleasure craft owners and others to spend their money on the Canadian side. It is not merely that the people of White Rock are asking for something unusual—the former government recognized the need four or five years ago when they began the construction of the present breakwater.

It is a matter of fact, though, that this government is carrying out the same policy as the former administration carried on, and the people in my area feel, and rightly, that there is some insincerity here on the part of the present administration.

On the other side of the bay we have the Beach Grove area which is another area, used as a summer resort, and with all the facilities of such a resort, but requiring a seawall of some kind. Our American cousins, again, have recognized the need by building a sea wall on the Point Roberts side, but it is interesting to note that when you come from the United States at Point Roberts and wander up the beach you can find a line which marks specifically the point at which the Americans have quit work on the seawall. It is a wooden wall, but on the Canadian side we have the remnants of a wall, built some 50 years ago, which is quite useless. The swell of the sea sweeps across the vast sandy beach on to the lawns and into the new homes which have been built in that area. I sincerely ask the minister to have his departmental officials look once again into this question to discover whether it would be possible to do something to stop these homes being broken and to save the lawns and the fine shrubs in that district as well.

In so far as the breakwater is concerned there is in White Rock itself south of the Semiamhoo park a small stream, the Campbell river which lends itself beautifully to use as a boat haven. In fact, not so many years ago a private concern thought of building such a haven. All it requires today is a bit of dredging, some rock in the form of a breakwater and a float. It is not too much to ask that this government should see that something is done along these lines.

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of breakwaters I should like to indicate my interest in what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) has said. It is true my home is in White Rock but I represent Burnaby-Richmond, and in the Richmond section of my constituency, a breakwater was built some two or three years ago, at Steveston to form a fishing boat basin. When that was done it was said that this breakwater would be continued for at least another 200 feet to afford full protection to the basin. But that was never done, and the basin today is open to the full sea striking from the gulf of Georgia. This means that the boat basin at the present time is not giving the protection to fishing craft that it should, besides which the situation leads to a great deal of overcrowding of boats in that area. This makes it very difficult for the fishermen to move in and out at times. I would impress on the Minister for Public Works (Mr. Green) the necessity for finishing the job that was started some two or three years ago and giving the fishermen of that area a sufficient space in which to moor their boats for weekends and during the winter season.

This matter has now been outstanding for some time; a breakwater was not constructed until a long time after it was thought necessary, and now that it has been built it is essential that it be completed and that it should afford fishermen a reasonable chance to pursue their vocation and enjoy the protection they should have.

A great many fishermen there are not able to go to their homes at weekends and at various times merely because there is not sufficient space in the harbour and I therefore urge on the Minister of Public Works the importance of completing this work.

PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR STATUTORY VESTING OF RIGHTS

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the other day the house kindly gave consent to have the resolution No. 8 in my name removed from the order paper. I said then that I wanted to bring up at an earlier date the subject of the vesting of pension rights, and if it was on the order paper I might not be able to do so at this time.

I had in mind that most employees do not, in most cases, receive any vesting in their pension rights until they have been in employment with one company for a certain fixed number of years. This generally comes at retirement age. Most industrial pension plans in force in Canada are either non-contributory or are contributory in part, on the part of the employees.

I realize that in most cases the employee can recover his own contributions on the termination of his service with a company, but this does not in the main apply to the contributions paid into the pension fund on his behalf by his employer until his pension plan has reached maturity. Sometimes there are very definite hardships to be met by the employee in order to qualify to a certain rigid retirement age. Often it is impossible for him to work until that time.

The federal government has a very real stake in these pension funds, in that it foregoes the collection of any income tax on contributions paid into these funds. In recent years the income tax on corporations with net incomes over $20,000 has been in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent. This means that the federal government has an interest of almost 50 per cent in the corporations' contributions, and they have a lesser interest in the employees' contributions. The government would have no control over earlier vesting of pension rights except by disallowing, in whole or in part, the employers' right to deduct their contributions to pension plans under the Income Tax Act, where earlier vesting was not allowed.

I am concerned about those Canadians who by their work have built up an equity for later payment to themselves, and who are unable to meet the number of years of service required, or are unable to work to a certain chronological retiring age. I realize that pension plans were started by companies to provide an incentive for employees to remain in their employment for a number of years, and to reward them for a life time of service. Quite large sums of money are involved in all pension plans that mature.

As an example, a fully paid up pension of $100 a month for an employee at 65 years of age has a capitalized value of about $13,000. If an employee just misses or falls short of qualifying for this pension under a non-contributory plan he misses out on $13,000. If he is in a contributory plan he misses out on $13,000 less the amount that he can recover in respect of his own contributions.

I realize that the terms of many of these plans are definitely set out in contracts between management and labour but in other cases men are hired in a plant and they know simply that there is a pension scheme in force there. They are merely advised that they will have a pension in 20 years and often the unions know nothing about the terms of maturity of these plans.

There are various reasons why a workman might not be able to complete his service up to retirement age and thus qualify for a pension. I can think of various medical reasons why this might be so. First, coronary insufficiency of the heart which is quite common. I have seen many cases where a man with this condition might be able to continue at work for a number of years if he is assigned light work, but if he has to continue in a job that requires sudden expenditures of energy or rushing about it might bring on coronary pain and could even cause death. Unless he can obtain light work in the plant where he is employed such an employee has to give up work and forfeit any pension that has accrued in respect of his services.

I have seen cases of respiratory allergies develop in men working in plants where chemicals are used and where certain gases escape into the air. Often these allergies do not develop until after some years of employment or until new chemicals and gases are utilized in the plant production. Men so affected are often not actually sick but are too miserable while working in such surroundings to continue at work.

The personal element also might be a big factor in deciding whether an employee can continue working. He might have an altercation with his boss, for instance, and the events that ensue from the flare-up of tempers often result in discharge of the employee. Then, again, an employee might be free of asthma in another part of the country. Some of these reasons for termination of employment are beyond anything a workman may do. In other cases, it would be a distinct advantage to an employee to move to another location and follow similar work for personal, family or other reasons. For example, by a change in location he might be better able to give his family a more adequate education.

The government of Canada should, I feel, see to it that pension plans are put to the best possible use for all Canadians generally. Practically all the companies I know are generous with their employees in respect of the difficulties I have enumerated but the smaller companies that have pension plans cannot always be so generous because the jobs available are not sufficiently diversified to provide men who have certain disabilities with light work up to pensionable retiring age. If the government itself could handle these plans or enact some enabling legislation I feel it could accomplish three things. It could provide that in the event of the bankruptcy of a company pension funds would not be considered in the assets of the company. It could also provide that the employee would take his pension plan with him on changing his employment if he had adequate reason for doing so. Many of these terminations of employment come after the age of 45 and then it is generally too late for a man to secure other insurable employment. As a matter of fact, it is difficult for a man of 40 to find a job under present-day conditions. I think the pension plans themselves militate against a man of that age securing employment. Anything the government might do to remedy this condition would add to the economy of our country.

A third result of government action in this regard could be that some fractional interest in a pension plan might be made to accrue to an employee who is idle because of illness or other reasons after, let us say, 10 years of service and his equity in the plan would build up year by year until maturity.

I may say that I brought this matter up a year ago and many hon. members of this house entered into the discussion on that occasion. At that time the then minister of finance, Mr. Harris, as reported at page 6774 of Hansard, said that the government was looking forward to the general revision of the Income Tax Act and that the government would continue to study the pension side of that act particularly having in mind the booklet and the desire on the part of the government of that day to encourage employers and employees to get together on a pension plan for the benefit of both employees and employers.

I believe the department has prepared a new departmental booklet on this subject but I think there is some need for beneficial legislation and that is the reason why I brought this matter to the attention of the house. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will give this matter favourable consideration when he considers revisions in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Does any hon. member wish to continue the discussion of the grievance raised by the hon. member for Welland?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for about a minute and a half on the same subject. I support the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) as one who has brought this matter up in the house on several occasions because it is a subject which is of considerable interest to my constituents, particularly to those employed by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and by various lumber companies throughout the district, that is the question of establishing vesting rights with respect to pension plans which most employees working for these large corporations do not enjoy at the present time, not even by agreement.

Fortunately, so far as the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company is concerned its employees are in a somewhat preferred position because they enjoy a measure of vesting rights in their pension plan as a result of an agreement between the union and the company. While they appreciate that and it does give them a measure of stability that they did not enjoy with respect to pension rights prior to this arrangement there is a general feeling that all persons who come under industrial pension plans should enjoy vesting rights as outlined by the hon. member for Welland by law and by regulations flowing from the law.

There was a considerable demand for the previous government to deal with this question. The former minister of national revenue was questioned on a number of occasions and many speeches have been made on the subject but thus far without result. Also so far as I can see we have not had much success to date with the present government, because that famous blue book, the work of the previous minister of national revenue which he withdrew as improper reading for employees working for large corporations, has not been reproduced in any other form. We are expecting a new edition of that book which provides some form of vesting right. However, that is only a step in the direction of improving industrial pension plans in this country. So far as we in this group are concerned we believe that while vesting is a step that has to be taken to improve the present situation we really need some form of national contributory pension plan on a general basis so that from an early earning age until time of retirement people can look forward to a decent income during their retirement years. The difficulties I have mentioned demonstrate the need for a national contributory pension plan. I think that is necessary if we are going to provide the people of Canada, particularly industrial workers in the first instance, with the security, stability and mobility of employment to which they are entitled at this time.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a great need for the government to take part in an industrial pension scheme. As we know, there are a number of pension plans. Some of them that have been discussed previously are in effect today and they are not serving the need of the people for whom they were implemented. I suggest that some portion of the investment in such pension plans should be the responsibility of the federal government. In a number of industrial fields, particularly the mining and forest industries, there are a number of people who have no possibility of ever working for one company for the length of time necessary to establish a normal pension. For such people a pension plan should be put into effect on a compulsory, contributory basis whereby the employee and the employer would be compelled to contribute to a fund which would be administered by the federal government in a manner not inconsistent with the method used in dealing with unemployment insurance.

In the mining industry there is a great need for mobility. The needs of the Canadian people for metals vary from time to time and the worth of a particular type of metal changes. We have seen this happen in the case of silver, cobalt, gold, asbestos and iron. In these cases when certain developments take place miners have to leave an area and a particular company. If there is a pension plan in effect they lose all their rights under that plan when they leave.

Many companies in the lumbering and mining industries in my area do not last for 20 years which is considered to be the average length of time required for a pension plan to operate properly. I think it is time that these companies should not be allowed to hide behind the fact that they have a tendency to have a limited life. Companies may move into a bush area and only last for five, six or ten years with the result that a great deal of the pressure that would be brought to bear on them to put a pension plan into effect is eliminated.

In the pulpwood industry particularly we have in the north a great number of people who move from place to place continually. They move not only from one company to another but from one camp to another. They have been trying for some time to establish a satisfactory pension plan. I suggest it is time that the federal government took a look at the situation. We find it more and more difficult to look after our older people. As the cost of living continues to rise there will come a time when we will not be able to provide these people with a proper standard of living following the methods being used now. It seems reasonable to me and I think it seems reasonable to those people who would have to make payments that they should be making contributions over the years they are working towards a pension plan which will go with them, not only from bush camp to another bush camp, from one company to another or from one mine to another but from one industry to another during their working years. Then at the end of 20 years, if they have worked in six or seven different areas or even in different provinces, they will have a pension contribution book provided by the federal government under a plan supported and financed in some degree by the government. They will have this record of the contributions they have made during their lifetime while working in industry and they will be able to retire knowing that they have a vested interest in a pension and that that interest is being looked after by the federal government.

I suggest that the government should take a close look at the situation as it affects industry today. I am sure we will find that there are a great number of people who have been in a particular industry for some time. Automation may change that industry and their contribution would be much greater if they could move to some place where better use would be made of their talents and experience in the interest of the Canadian economy. I suggest that if the government would instigate a transferable industrial pension plan and administer such a plan great benefits would accrue to Canadian workers and also to the Canadian people as a whole.

PROTEST AGAINST PRESENT POLICY

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, before voicing my grievance to the house this evening, I want to congratulate your honour for the gentlemanly courtesy and ability you have shown in directing the debates in this house.

Having said this, I would like to take the opportunity afforded by the motion to go into committee of supply to express a grievance I am holding since June last, i.e. that we have a Progressive Conservative government in this country. I am sorry to have to voice this criticism, but my conscience would trouble me if I did not tell this house how concerned I am to see this country ruled by a minority government elected under false pretences and inconsiderate promises. Though aware that his party was a minority group in this house, the leader of the Progressive Conservatives, Mr. Diefenbaker did not hesitate to accept the offer of forming a government made to him in June, and so to become the Prime Minister of a minority government.

Having read the various speeches made in the House of Commons during the last parliament, I was very much surprised to see the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) accept the post of Minister of Finance in the Diefenbaker cabinet, after having said what he did say in this house on June 4, 1954. The estimates for the C.B.C. were being discussed, and, at some point during the debate, the hon. member who was then minister of national revenue (Mr. McCann) said this to the hon. member for Eglinton,—and I am quoting Hansard of 1953-54, volume V, page 5520:

> You would want the minority to rule.

And the hon. representative for Eglinton, who is now Minister of Finance replied:

> No, I have never advocated that the minority should rule. That is one reason I have said repeatedly that this government does not have any right to rule in the way it does because it does not represent a majority of the Canadian people. It was elected with 48 per cent of the votes of the Canadian people.

What are we to think of a man like the present Minister of Finance who used those words in 1954, and who today agrees to be part of a minority government which in the last election secured but about 41 per cent of the votes, while the Liberal party got about 45 per cent. And it is this man who is now Minister of Finance and who, in introducing changes in our tax structure, resorts to unusual means, to say the least.

After having heard, during the first two months of this session, the ministers contradict themselves, I am not surprised to see the hon. Minister of Finance contradicting himself before the whole nation in accepting a post in a minority cabinet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should present a specific complaint. He is now referring to policy in general. He should express a specific complaint.

Mr. Rouleau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a representative of the constituency of Dollard, I have always abided by the rules of the house, and I shall limit my remarks to a specific complaint. I should like to refer particularly to the policy of the C.B.C. Besides, I was about to return to the subject, but I could not help coming back on a matter which is dear to me, since it is of interest to the whole Canadian people.

To come back to the matter I just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity, in the last parliament to deliver in the house, on January 28, 1955, a speech about the policy of the C.B.C.

I said then:

> During the parliamentary recess I was often asked another question with regard to restrictions imposed by the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on privately-owned radio and television stations. Most of my fellow citizens whom I have met, not only in Dollard riding but also in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada, are opposed to the fact that this organization which competes directly with private enterprise should be at the same time the organization that controls and grants permits to private stations.
> We know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation through its radio and television networks renders a great service to our country, but we would prefer that it be treated on an equal footing, or nearly so, with stations belonging to private enterprise. Such a practice would be more consistent with the democratic principles of Liberalism, and furthermore it would comply with the resolutions passed by the advisory council of the national Liberal federation at its meeting held in Ottawa on the 27th and 28th of October, 1952, and also by the federaton of young Liberals of Canada during their bi-annual convention held in May, 1954.

As I was speaking, the Conservatives who at that time were sitting on this side of the house loudly applauded the former president of the young Liberals federation of Canada. I wonder, now that they are sitting on the other side of the house if, having heard the answers given by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to the questions I put to him on the C.B.C., they would be as ready to applaud the statements I am making today.

Mr. Speaker, I still am of the opinion the government should establish an agency to control broadcasting in all its forms in Canada, whether public or private. This point of view is by all means consonant with the views expressed on many occasions by the hon. member for Eglinton.

I do not wish to criticize the C.B.C. board of governors which has done an excellent job as far as the government radio service is concerned. But I am opposed to the principle of the thing and I have voiced my opposition on several occasions in this house. I have no use for a crown corporation monopoly on private enterprise. At this time we have C.B.C. television in Montreal, but the metropolis of Canada, a city like Montreal, could also have one or two private stations to compete with the C.B.C. This would provide an opportunity for the development of our own Canadian talent. At this stage Mr. Speaker, and in passing, I would like to point out that certain newspapers of Montreal and of the province of Quebec have claimed that there is discrimination within the C.B.C. The government might establish a commission of inquiry to determine the truth of the criticisms made by the newspapers of the city of Montreal and of the province. If such criticisms are found to be justified, it might then be advisable to remedy the situation and if they are not justified, the people will then know what to think of them and this would be in the greatest interest of the C.B.C.

As I said a while ago, the present Minister of Finance often requested the creation of the agency I just mentioned and I earnestly hope that the government will show its good faith in creating this agency. If it does not, the Liberal party, under whose banner I have been elected member for Dollard, could very well, following representations made by various Liberal associations, propose the creation of such an agency in the resolutions of its platform to be worked out at the coming January convention. If the national Liberal convention approves such a resolution, I am convinced that, as in the past, the Liberal party will fulfil its promises completely and not only in part as the Progressive Conservative government did in connection with the excise tax on automobiles.

The present Progressive Conservative government does not fulfil its promises. It merely indulges in window dressing and this reminds me of a report which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, December 3, 1957, which was signed by Mr. Stewart Alsop and read as follows:

(Text):

But there are, essentially, two kinds of politicians. The first kind of politician sees the purpose of politics as getting elected, by promising the voters anything they seem to want, and by using any means at hand to destroy the opposition.

(Translation):

That is precisely what we have at the present time, Mr. Speaker. As regards the second type of politicians, I quote again from the same report:

(Text):

The second kind of politician sees effective government, responsive to the realities of the domestic and world situation, as the best kind of politics in the long run.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Speaker, it took people 22 years to come to think that the time had come for a change from the Liberal administration. Now the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said the other day in this house that it was probably a change for the worse. Well, the present government has been in power for only six months, but the people of Canada already feel that it is again time for a change. Well, it will not be long before we do have a change, and I can assure the hon. member for Peace River that this time it will be for the better.

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) wish to speak on the same question, that is on the C.B.C.?

Mr. Ricard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has given rise to numerous requests from our people as well as to complaints of all sorts. I want therefore to deal with this question and to refute some of the arguments of my hon. friend from Dollard (Mr. Rouleau).

In the speech he has just delivered, he said that 45 per cent of the people were behind the Liberal party while the proportion favouring the Conservative party was but 41 per cent. However, a survey, made only a short time ago, shows that the Conservative party could now count upon 50 per cent of the votes, while the Liberal party has the support of 33 per cent only of our people.

Nothing is so remote from the truth in my opinion, as to assert that the Conservative party, which is now in office, is leading the nation to anarchy and disaster.

Mr. Chevrier: To unemployment!

Mr. Ricard: To hard times. As I have said, the Conservative party has been entrusted with the administration of this nation in a difficult situation; and, again in 1957, the same thing happens. We all realize that the nation is more or less distressed by the deeds of the Liberal party which formed the previous administration. The Conservative party has now been requested to administer the affairs of this country because our Liberal friends have failed to take the necessary steps to save our working and agricultural classes.

Within the next few days, the Conservative government will introduce measures which the house will have to pass. They will be up to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member must raise a specific grievance. I cannot allow him to discuss general politics.

Mr. Ricard: Then, Mr. Speaker, I will just say that the grievance brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Dollard will be corrected very shortly by the Conservative party, because this party knows how to keep up with the people.

BASE METALS, BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF INDUSTRY

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, while I do not intend to speak on pensions, the matter I have in mind is much more important, namely the spectre of unemployment that is hanging over the base metal industry. While it is not related to pensions directly, it certainly is related in one way, in that if we do not have jobs, we do not have pensions. The matter that I have in mind is, in my opinion, of such urgency that it should be discussed this evening.

The government, in my opinion, is not doing enough to bring before the authorities in the United States the serious situation that will develop in the base metal industry if they are to go forward with their plans; and from reports that I have received from Washington it appears that the United States tariff commission, when it has heard the evidence, is in all probability going to recommend to the president that the proposed tariffs be imposed. I know that there are other important matters to be dealt with such as the bill to provide for guaranteed prices for farm goods. But in my area alone, in Kootenay East and Kootenay West, if this proposed tariff goes on, the market for the farm produce in that area is going to be seriously affected. There is going to be a lay-off of perhaps one third of the employees in the base metal industry. That is a dire possibility and I think that it should be discussed here tonight.

The government should point out to the United States authorities that the lead and zinc industry is of major importance, that zinc production in Canada ranks second only to that of the United States and that in Canada lead production is fourth only to that of the U.S.S.R. Of the imports of lead and zinc to the United States, Canada supplies 25 per cent. The United States authorities do not dispute the fact that they must depend on our base metal industry for their industrial survival. Yet if this tariff is imposed they expect to keep us on a string and to have our mines shut down and be reopened when their necessity arises. The flow of base metals cannot be turned on and off like a tap. They are strategic metals and there must be assurance that there shall be no interruption in their production. This should be pointed out by representatives going to Washington at this time.

It should be pointed out that it is not only the base metal industry in the United States that is suffering under adverse prices at the present time. The prices of base metals are low all over the world and there has been a general reduction in the production throughout the world. The United States producers in many cases are operating uneconomic mines with low grade ores and in many cases inefficient mines. It must be pointed out that the Canadian industry should not be expected to subsidize them. In 1954 President Eisenhower decided to forgo an increase in customs duties and asked instead that the foreign suppliers of United States markets make an effort to reduce their production. Canada co-operated in every respect. I have here a submission by the Canadian Metal Mining Association to the United States tariff commission. At that time, when they appeared before the commission they pointed out:

> (2) Canada's exports of lead to the United States have been cut in half since 1953.
> (3) Canada's exports of zinc to the United States have remained reasonably steady and show a very slight increase from 1953 to 1956. The reason for this is two-fold. First, a substantial quantity of Canada's zinc exports to the United States is in the form of concentrates on which certain United States smelters are entirely dependent as the indispensable feed for their operations. Secondly, refined zinc is equally required to fill the demands of the United States market.

As I have pointed out, Canadian producers have curtailed their production. There has been a curtailment in the production of zinc of about 86,000 tons annually and in the production of lead of about 9,950 tons annually, or a 21 per cent reduction in the production of zinc and about a 5 per cent reduction in the production of lead.

What is the picture having regard to the employment question? The present closures have resulted in the layoff of 818 employees. The anticipated closures, should this measure be adopted in the United States, would result in the layoff of another 1,440 employees. I need not say that Kootenay East and Kootenay West, the largest producers of lead and zinc in Canada, would certainly be adversely affected. It has been said by some of the members of the industry in the United States that these imports are coming from countries with a low wage scale and for that reason result in unfair competition in their market. I should like to quote again from the brief presented by the mining industry. They have this to say with regard to wages:

> As regards wage rates we record that our principal Canadian producers pay miners $2.45 (Can.) per hour and smelter workers $2.12 (Can.) per hour. Each of these figures represents average gross earnings from January to June, 1957, excluding all fringe benefits. We understand that an average figure for miners in the lead and zinc industry in the United States is $2.30 (U.S.).

Now of course the Canadian figures include the fringe benefits and bonuses paid to miners. Nevertheless there is conclusive evidence that there is no question of low rates of pay having an unfair advantage over the United States system. Now the United States metal industry have requested the maximum tariff allowable under the president's orders and have suggested quotas. Such quotas would be discrimination of the rankest nature and would be very difficult to administer. I hope government officials will speak most strongly against any measures which may affect the situation and more particularly against the quota system.

I would like to quote from the submission of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers to the Canadian government in which they show the rates of tariff being suggested by the United States industry as follows:

> On lead if the United States price is 17 cents a pound or more there would be no tariff. Between 16 cents and 17 cents the tariff would be one cent; between 15 cents and 16 cents it would be two cents; when the prices falls below 15 cents it would be three cents.

Now the present price is below that, so that the maximum today would, in effect, be 3 cents per pound on lead and that is a 20 per cent increase in the tariffs. The quotation continues:

> On zinc, if the price is 14½ cents a pound or more, there would be no tariff. Between 13½ and 14½ cents the tariff would be half a cent; between 12½ cents and 13½ cents it would be one and a quarter cents; when the price falls below 12½ cents it would be two cents. With the price of zinc now at 10 cents a pound—

That was in August. The present rate of tariffs is 7/10ths of a cent so that the barrier existing in the new regulation would be another 20 per cent.

Now there have been various suggestions about remedies. I have some sympathy with the suggestion of the union, because in 1953 I made a similar suggestion in this House of Commons by means of a resolution. It would be a drastic measure but I hope this new government which does seem to feel that it is the champion of diplomacy, will be able to work this thing out without having to resort to such a drastic measure. It is this: Let the United States government be told that if tariffs proposed against lead and zinc are put into effect, Canada will for its part tax and place restriction on exports to the United States of metal, iron ore, asbestos and pulp and paper. I think it should be pointed out that if necessary we may have to take such drastic steps.

I was going on, Mr. Speaker, to speak on the effect this would have on our country and in particular the very grave effect it would have upon our export metal trade balance. However, I shall not take any more of the time of the house. Suffice it to say that it would have a very serious effect on our trade balance and an even more serious effect on the industry itself which might result in a large and spreading unemployment in the base metal industry. I hope the ministers will consider this matter more seriously than they have appeared to do in the past and will make earnest and strong representations. They might take some of the fifty businessmen who are now over in Britain on another tour down to the United States and really go to town in an effort to avoid this tariff and to start to sell some materials in that country.

INCOME TAX—OMISSION OF LOGGERS AND LUMBERJACKS FROM PROPOSED CHANGES

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance which has to do with the position of our lumberjacks or woodworkers in relation to the Income Tax Act and expense allowances allowed for living away from home. My reason for raising this grievance at this particular time is that there has been a certain anticipation of amendments and changes in the Income Tax Act which would extend these expense allowances to woodworkers, but we now know, as a result of the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and as a result of the draft bill, that the only extension will be that to construction workers.

Now, to appreciate the position in which the lumberjack finds himself and its comparison to the position of the construction worker, one needs to go into the economic setup of the pulp and paper industry of Ontario. This is a problem which of course extends to many parts of Canada but I can speak only for the pulp and paper regions of Ontario. It is worth remarking at this time that the pulp and paper industry is the most important industry, in terms of revenue, in the province of Ontario.

Pulp and paper companies are now operating on what might be called a very long-term scale. They have limits ranging up to 4,000 and 5,000 square miles in area and they are required to operate them under provincial law according to a kind of treble planning; a 5-year, 10-year and even a 50-year plan. Now with that type of planning you get a production and a location of the camps projected far into the future. For example, you can go to the limits of the Kimberley-Clark Corporation up at the Long Lac area and see camps designed to look after the board and room of the men for the next 50 years. In other words the industry has acquired a stability as a result of this long-term operation.

However, we must look at the sociological situation which is ahead of us in the bush country. We are not going to have what is considered the ideal social situation in that country, which is a genuine community where men and women and children have a chance to work and to lead a community life. Many of the companies, especially the Marathon Corporation and Ontario-Minnesota Paper Company, have made earnest efforts to provide family facilities in their camps but at the present time these efforts cover only a very small portion of the working force and the fact remains that now, and for many years to come, the man who cuts the pulp, which is the basis of our main industry, is going to be separated from his family. The families will live in the cities and towns of the areas and at the moment the scope of the pulp and paper operation is so large that it is inconceivable that men could get home regularly, except for perhaps the odd weekend.

I think of the Port Arthur community where the nearest large pulp and paper camps are anywhere from 40 to 75 miles away.

Now with this situation you can be sure that we are going to have married men working in our camps, enabling many companies to operate, but which companies cannot provide them with the facilities and they cannot provide themselves with the facilities to bring their families to live with them. So they are in the position of having to keep a household going in a city or in a town and also look after their own expenses. I would suggest that they are in an even more awkward position than the construction worker, because construction work by its very nature is much more shifting and there are opportunities for the construction worker to work, at least occasionally, near his home. But this very rarely happens to pulp and paper workers in northern Ontario.

In addition one has to look at the working force in the industry and realize that the backbone of the pulp and paper industry, in terms of national background, are Finnish and French speaking Canadians, both having devotion to bush work which shows itself in the way in which they head for work in these camps where they make the best of employees. And while they are doing this work in the bush they are supporting their families in the towns and cities of the area. Their numbers are fairly large. The largest local of the lumber and sawmill union is in northern Ontario and has over 9,000 members, that is, there are 9,000 bush workers in the camps west and east of Port Arthur. Of that 9,000, the estimate I have been given by the union is that about 1,500 are married men who must keep their families in the towns.

Now the working force engaged in this long-term operation is becoming more and more stable, exceptionally stable in comparison with the position a number of years ago when the pattern was that there would be a winter cut, a spring drive and then a spring booze-up in the town, after which the lumberjacks would be on the streets for a while until things got going again in the fall. That kind of pattern is gradually changing in many ways, attributable to the mechanised revolution which has taken place in the pulp and paper industry. It is no longer feasible to keep a lumberjack on just for a short time and then let him go back to the city while these companies have so much money tied up in high-priced equipment. We can now see the type of situation which is likely to exist in the camps for the next 20 or 30 years at least. We can see that there is going to be a proportion of men in these camps who must keep a family in the cities and we feel, as they feel and as they have informed me through the representatives of their trade unions, that the present section 5 of the Income Tax Act is not fair to them. We see no reason at all why the amendments which are going to be of advantage to the construction workers should not be applied to them.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is back in the house and I am also glad to find that I have an ally in the new hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) with regard to a matter I have been attempting to bring in in this house for several years. I completely fail to understand why the Minister of Finance, if he is going to introduce an amendment to section 5 of the Income Tax Act, should have seen fit to do it in the rather slaphappy fashion which apparently he has in mind.

This is a matter which I know has received considerable attention in his department over the past year. This was certainly indicated by the previous minister of finance shortly before the end of the last session, and I am very glad to support the representations made by the hon. member for Port Arthur who has outlined the pattern of activity in the pulp and paper industry in northern Ontario. This is very similar to the situation in the logging industry in British Columbia, as it has existed for a good many years, and I hope the Minister of Finance will give very careful consideration before the measure with which he proposes to proceed has advanced to any further stage to introducing an amendment which will be all-inclusive and non-discriminatory in its application to the working people of Canada. I think that if the minister fails to do that he will have quite a battle on his hands in this house. As far as I am concerned he will then be giving an indication to us that the government of which he is a member is prepared only to take up what it considers to be the odd popular issue here and there without giving any real consideration to amending acts which would apply in a non-discriminatory way to all the working people of this country who are affected by taxation provisions.

An hon. Member: Dix heures.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—
1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $628,277.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

185. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $787,053.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

249. Departmental administration, $1,303,859.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Would the leader of the house please tell us the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will begin with item No. 14 on the day's order paper which is the resolution preceding the introduction of a bill to establish a system of guaranteed prices for agricultural commodities. Then item No. 1, the house in committee on an act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. After this, item No. 12, second reading of Bill No. 231, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act; then item No. 13, second reading of an act to amend the Income Tax Act; and item No. 17, a resolution concerning a measure to authorize loans to the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the leader of the house could give us some indication as to what is likely to happen on the succeeding days, Thursday, Friday and Saturday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give that information.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could the minister say whether the resolution regarding the agricultural matter will be continued until it is completed, if it should have to go over until Thursday?

Mr. Green: No, I am afraid I cannot say that. I would hope that the resolution could go through tomorrow, and then the bill would be available for study by hon. members.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

UNEMPLOYMENT REGISTRATION, P.E.I.

Question No. 267—Mr. Murphy (Westmorland):

How many persons were registered unemployed in (a) Prince Edward Island; (b) Charlottetown; (c) Summerside; on (i) December 1, 1956; (ii) December 1, 1957?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

Offices of the unemployment insurance commission at Charlottetown and Summerside serve the province of Prince Edward Island. Data on the number of persons registered for employment at these offices would represent the total number of persons so registered within the province. Such data are not available for December 1, 1957. However, at November 28, 1957, the number of persons registered for employment at each of these offices was as follows:—

Charlottetown	1,185
Summerside	751

On the corresponding date in 1956, the figures were as follows:

Charlottetown	1,127
Summerside	501

APPENDIX

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTING ROYAL COMMISSION ON PRICE SPREADS

Drummond, Guelph, Ontario; Mr. Cleve Kidd, Toronto, Ontario, and Mr. Bernard Couvrette, Montreal, Quebec, be appointed commissioners under part I of the Inquiries Act, to:

(a) inquire into the extent and the causes of the spread between the prices received by producers of food products of agricultural and fisheries origin and the prices paid by consumers therefor;

(b) determine whether or not such price spreads in general or in particular cases are fair and reasonable, or are excessive, in relation to the services rendered;

(c) make such recommendations as they deem appropriate if any such price spreads are found to be excessive; and

(d) examine the adequacy of price information currently available.

The committee further advise:

1. That the commissioners be authorized to exercise all the powers set out in section 11 of the Inquiries Act;

4. That the commissioners be assisted to the fullest extent by government departments and agencies;

5. That the commissioners report to the governor in council;

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 11, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Eighth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Fraser.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT FOR CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEARS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Saturday, December 21 next, it shall stand adjourned until 11.00 a.m. on Thursday, January 2, 1958.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house I ask that the last line of this motion be changed to read "until 11.00 a.m. on Friday, January 3, 1958".

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to make this change in the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion as amended agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—FEDERAL ACTION ON PRICES

Question No. 22—Mr. Benidickson:

What steps, beyond the setting up of the Borden royal commission, is the government taking to assure, on an interim basis, that consumers will not be required to pay an inequitable price for natural gas from the Trans-Canada pipe line in areas where gas is already or is soon to be made available?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a major matter of concern, and it may be noted that in the powers given to the Borden commission the protection of the consumer as well as the producer is provided for, and that recommendations to the achievement of these ends are requested. The present situation is that any schedules covering costs that may be made applicable by the company will be filed with the board of transport commissioners, and immediate action will be taken in the event that anything of the nature feared by my hon. friend takes place.

I believe there is nothing further I can add at this time, except that I hope for an early recommendation in this connection by the Borden commission. The secretaries have been appointed. Mr. J. F. Parkinson of the Department of Finance and Major LaFrance of the Department of National Defence have been lent to the commission, and they have been working together in gathering the necessary information so that when the first of the sittings begins next week early recommendations in regard to these matters may be made.

POWER—PROVINCIAL REQUESTS FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 45—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. On what date did the government of New Brunswick first request financial aid for Beechwood from the present government of Canada?
2. What was the form of the request and what was the nature and scale of the assistance requested?
3. On what date did the government of Saskatchewan first request the present government to join with Saskatchewan in the South Saskatchewan project?
4. On what date did the government of British Columbia approach the present government regarding the development of the Columbia river?
5. Has any other provincial government made any request for assistance or co-operation in any power project?
6. If so, which provincial governments and in respect of what projects?

Mr. Speaker: Stand?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I rise on a question of privilege, sir. We are being asked, according to the program announced by the house leader last night, to debate the Beechwood project before starred questions will come up again. I wonder if it would not be possible for the government to give an answer to these questions?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the debate will take place I hope some day this week. Certainly every bit of information that is available then will be given to the hon. gentleman. He has dealt with three matters here, first the Beechwood matter and then the requests of the provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia. If my hon. friend will restrict his question to the first two parts at this time, I will see that an answer is given tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that the questions are very simple. They ask for dates only.

Mr. Speaker: I am doubtful if it is proper to ask for information about a matter pending for debate. I shall look into the matter and see whether or not I am correct in that impression.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know Your Honour is approaching your responsibilities with very great care and thoroughness, but upon reflection Your Honour may want to give consideration to that opinion. One of the reasons for asking questions prior to a debate is to enable members to have a clear idea as to the course they should pursue in the debate.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I could be of assistance on this point of order. There is on the order paper a resolution looking to the introduction of a bill to authorize the government of Canada to make a loan to the province of New Brunswick to cover the cost of financing the Beechwood project. It is hoped that the resolution will be before the house tomorrow. On that resolution, in keeping with the practice of the house, any information that is required and that is relevant will, of course, be forthcoming. When my friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) speaks about the need of having information before debate, he of course means debate on second reading of the bill to follow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; at any time.

Mr. Fleming: The purpose of having a resolution stage on such a measure is to provide whatever information the house requires in the later stages of the measure, and that information will be forthcoming on the resolution stage.

Mr. Speaker: I am speaking from memory, but it seems to me that there is a precedent for the statement I made that where a matter is pending on the order paper for debate it is not proper to take the time of the house to ask questions. However, I will look into the matter and not commit myself finally this morning.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: With respect to starred question 45, the Clerk has given me a citation which was the one I probably had in mind in the statement I made. It is citation No. 295 of Beauchesne, third edition, at page 119 and in part it is as follows:

A question oral or written must not—

Then you have a great many subheadings, and subheading (v) reads:

Anticipate an order of the day or other matters. [Mr. Pickersgill.]

So in so far as the question relates to Beechwood, which is an order of the day, I would think the citation is authority for the proposition that it is not in order.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE INCREASES

Question No. 46—Mr. Thompson (Edmonton-Strathcona):

1. Has the ceiling on war veterans allowances been increased sufficiently to give married veterans full advantage of the increase in old age security pensions?

2. If not, have steps been taken by the government to avoid reductions in war veterans allowances in such circumstances?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer to questions Nos. 1 and 2 is as follows. In no case does the income ceiling under the War Veterans' Allowance Act permit payment of the maximum war veterans allowance to a recipient of pension under the Old Age Security Act. The old age security pension is treated as income on the same basis as income from other sources —for instance, superannuation or disability pension. However, the recent amendments of the war veterans allowance income ceilings had the following results. In the case of a single veteran, the ceiling now permits an income of $1,080 a year or $90 per month, and in the case of a married veteran $1,740 a year or $145 per month. This is over and above exempted income or receipts from casual labour.

GROUNDING OF C.G.S. "BAFFIN"

Question No. 47—Mr. Fisher:

1. Was there a radar operator on duty aboard the C.G.S. Baffin when it grounded on Black rock?

2. If so, did the operator inform the captain that Black rock was ahead?

3. At what times did he inform the captain about the position of Black rock?

4. What time was the grounding?

5. At the time of the grounding, did the captain or the chief hydrographer have supreme control of the ship?

6. If the chief hydrographer was in control, was he given any message from the radar operator re the position of Black rock?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): This question is in six parts. The answers are as follows:

1. No; no one classified as such. Radar watch is maintained by the officer of the watch.

2. Yes; he informed him the rock was 20 degrees on the port bow.

3. Exact time not noted; approximately five minutes before grounding.

4. Exactly 1632 hours; that is 4.32 p.m.

5. The captain always has supreme control of the ship. The senior assistant hydrographer was directing the course of the ship on a sounding line, from the hydrographers' chart room.

6. The hydrographer directing the course was informed regarding the position of Black rock when it was estimated to be one and one-half miles, one mile and one-half mile distant.

As a further explanation I may add this. When the captain reached the bridge shortly before the grounding the officer of the watch informed him of the proximity of Black rock. The course the ship was steering at the time would have passed the rock in safety though it would have been dangerously close. The captain went at once to the chart room from which the course was being directed.

In the meantime instructions were given from the chart room to alter the course to 270 in order to proceed to the next line of sounding. This brought the rock directly ahead and the grounding took place before preventive action could have effect. It should be realized that this occurred during dense fog, and the information regarding the proximity of the rock was secured from the radar screen only.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys which in a sense arises out of the answer to starred question No. 47. Was it an oversight that the information given this morning on the grounding of the Baffin on Black rock was not included in his answers to questions raised in the house on November 11, as found on page 945 of Hansard, in answer to the larger of the two members from Halifax?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I think I gave every detail when my estimates were discussed. Furthermore, when the supplementary estimates are discussed I will table the report we already have in the department, and this was agreed when we were discussing my estimates. I do not think there are many other facts I could bring before the house on that matter. I do not know from what source such questions about the grounding of the Baffin come, but I am inclined to believe they come perhaps from some member of the S.A.C.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CAP DE LA MADELEINE AIRPORT

Question No. 152—Mr. Rochefort:

1. Is there an airport within the limits of the city of Cap de la Madeleine?
2. If so, who is the owner of the said airport and who operates it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

3. Does the federal government use such airport for public purposes? If so, since when?
4. How much money has the government spent on the improvements of this airport on construction of buildings, hangars, etc.?
5. Have engineers made reports condemning the same? If so, when?
6. What would be the cost of extending this airport so it could be used by commercial aircraft?
7. Is the government contemplating the construction of an airport in a neighbouring municipality and abandoning that of Cap de la Madeleine?
8. Will the city council and public bodies of the county of Champlain and the city of Cap de la Madeleine be invited to be represented at any investigation?

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—PERSONNEL

Question No. 241—Mr. Kirk:

1. What was the number of employees of the national harbours board, in the following categories, at the ports of Halifax, Saint John, Chicoutimi, Quebec city, Montreal and Vancouver, on September 1, 1957: (a) clerical and office staff; (b) labourers; (c) cleaners and sweepers; (d) painters; (e) carpenters; (f) other skilled trades?
2. How many employees, in each category, have been laid off at each of these national harbours since September 1, 1957, and up to November 15, 1957?
3. Are any further lay-offs foreseen at any of these ports?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON NEW RUSSIAN DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of which I have given him notice. In view of his observations last week as to the care which he thinks should be exercised in respect of proposals made by countries for the easing of international tension, and without commenting on the direct merits of his observations, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what comment he has to make on the reported proposal made by the premier of the Soviet union to the Prime Minister of India, which was also addressed to the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom? Furthermore, was such a proposal addressed to the government of Canada?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for the notice which he gave me a few moments ago. I would first state, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government has not received any communication in this regard. All we know has been gleaned from press reports.

I did say last week that we should not always dismiss out of hand every Soviet proposal, and a communication as important as that which the press report says has been sent to Mr. Nehru, Mr. Eisenhower, and Mr. Macmillan deserves careful study by the recipients and others. I can assure the house that the Canadian government will examine any proposal contained in these letters, if we see the official text. We will examine them with earnest care in the hope that they might provide or offer some prospect of advancement in this difficult and dangerous but essential endeavour to reach an agreement on the measures of disarmament.

We hope, as always we will hope, that the Russians will offer the west something of value. I am bound to say, however, that it will have to be something more solid than a renewal of the demand for simple cessation of nuclear tests. I find nothing, Mr. Speaker, in the press reports which would ensure such observance of such an undertaking, and I would point out to the house, moreover, that the banning of tests is only one part of the disarmament proposals endorsed a few months ago by the United Nations.

These proposals did include the banning of tests which would be effective immediately, but, in addition, that resolution proposed the cessation of the production of nuclear material for weapons purposes and the reduction of conventional armaments and other measures, all under a system of inspection and control which would assure all parties that all other parties were complying with their undertakings.

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON PRESS REPORT RESPECTING MR. DULLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to ask the minister of external affairs a question about a matter of considerable gravity. I wish to inquire if the minister would make a comment on the statement in the Vancouver Sun of December 4, 1957, a copy of which I have left with him, that Mr. John Foster Dulles has personally tongue-lashed the Canadian minister to Washington, the British ambassador, the French ambassador and several others.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Since I came into the house the hon. member sent me this clipping from the Vancouver Sun. I have not had an opportunity of reading it fully, but I would inform the house that it is a report from Washington, and the part that was underlined by someone here is to this effect:

> In addition to his myopic view of today's world, Mr. Dulles has done more to lose friends and antagonize people than any U.S. secretary of state in recent history.
> He has personally tongue-lashed the Canadian minister to Washington, a British ambassador, a French ambassador and several others.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

It is always difficult to assert a negative, and to assert a negative on behalf of someone else is even more difficult. I have been in close touch with our representative in Washington for the past four months. Indeed, on Saturday last in Ottawa we discussed his relationships with Mr. Dulles, and nothing Mr. Robertson said on that occasion or at earlier meetings between the two of us would indicate that his relations with the secretary of state of the United States have been anything but courteous, friendly and indeed cordial. I cannot for a moment give any credence to the validity of this report.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister inquire into this specific incident so we can ascertain whether or not it is so, because if it is so it is something we could not countenance.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I am not happy about carrying on an investigation in relation to matters concerning our communications through our representative with the secretary of state for another country and then reporting to the house but, subject to your ruling, I will inform the house if I find there is anything disturbing in it. I would put it that way.

NATO—POSITION OF CANADA AT FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will Canada at the forthcoming meeting of the NATO council press, and I hope with vigour, the point of view expressed this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the banning of nuclear tests? In other words, will Canada urge the west to put itself in the lead in the effort to find ways of banning these tests?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thought I made my statement very clear in that regard. I told the house that the government will look carefully at any proposal made at this time. I draw the attention of my hon. friend to the reservations, if you can call them that, which I made in my statement in answer to the earlier question.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs can tell the house whether Canada has lodged any proposals with the NATO secretariat for this conference; and is Canada going to take a position proposing the extension of economic assistance and strengthening of economic ties?

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Before the Prime Minister answers, may I ask a supplementary question; he could deal with them both at the same time. I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister. Has he received a copy of the four basic proposals to the North Atlantic treaty council deposited by the British government with the NATO secretariat? In particular I should like to ask whether, if he has received a copy of these proposals deposited with the NATO secretariat, which are purported to try to get NATO to evolve into more than a military alliance, a strong position will be taken in respect of item 2, which provides for increased economic interdependence in NATO?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia and amplified by the hon. member for Rosthern is one that over the years has had the attention of every nation within NATO, namely the realization that it is always very difficult to maintain a defensive organization based on military purposes and aims alone; for whenever there is any diminution in national fears there is an immediate weakening in the bonds that hold such organizations together.

Article 2 incorporated in the NATO declaration is one that has not received in the past that degree of implementation which many of us would like to see achieved. On the several occasions the NATO council have met, my understanding is that there has been a general discussion in this regard, but at no time has there been that degree of unanimity or indeed that degree of certainty as to the meaning of article 2. For that reason there has never been any material advance made in the implementation of the article.

I hope that article 2 will be one of those matters that will receive extraordinary attention on this occasion. As one of the representatives of Canada it will be my purpose to advance the need of a wider and more comprehensive implementation of that article, to the end that while maintaining our defences we shall co-operate in the economic fields that are available, to such an extent as to assure the strongest possible mortar to hold together the forces of freedom.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether Canada has deposited any documents with the secretariat setting out Canada's proposals?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should say only in a general way. There has not been that specific application that Britain and the United States have applied to the problem of NATO, for it will be remembered that this meeting of NATO stems directly from the meeting in Washington of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom with the President of the United States and their declaration of interdependence. It also rises from the realization that recent scientific advances on the part of the U.S.S.R. have called for an intensified examination of NATO and its principles to the end that it may advance to the future stronger than ever before in its purposes and its aims.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): What does the Prime Minister mean when he says they have deposited documents only in a general way? What does that mean exactly? Does it mean that we have deposited no documents which will have any bearing on the proposals that are being made by some other countries?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. What I say is this. Instead of being specific with regard to some of the matters, such as the four matters referred to in the British presentation, our purpose at the NATO meeting will be to enunciate general objectives—

Mr. Coldwell: Has that been done?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to the end that we will be able to discharge our responsibilities as a middle power in NATO and bring together those who today have their disagreements, all of which I think are generally known and require no elucidation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I take advantage of the statement by the Prime Minister to ask him a further question, particularly in view of the fact that this may be my last opportunity to do so. I think the house and the country will be very grateful for what the Prime Minister has just said in regard to seeking to give further effect to the implications of article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In view of what the Prime Minister has said, therefore, will he not now state that the general attitude taken by the former secretary of state for external affairs, as one of a committee of three who examined the potentialities of the North Atlantic treaty in terms of article 2, is one that now affords to the right hon. gentleman an opportunity of placing before the NATO council the very constructive attitude which he has now put before this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, over the years when we occupied the other side of the house we advanced most strongly our support of the intensification of the use of article 2. We pressed upon the then government the need of action is this regard. When the presentation of the three foreign ministers, to which the hon. member made reference, was made representations were made on behalf of Canada which had the support of members in every part of the country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In connection with article 2, I think, as one of the Canadian representatives, I will be able to speak with the assurance that every part of this house is in favour of a further extension of the application of that article.

ATOMIC ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY FOR CO-OPERATION IN PEACEFUL USES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I may make a statement. I desire to inform the house that there was signed earlier this morning an agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The terms provide that the agreement shall come into force upon an exchange of notes to that effect, an exchange which the government intends to carry out later this month. With the leave of the house I shall cause to be deposited with the Clerk copies of the agreement in English and in French.

I do not intend to go into details of this agreement, but I desire to make some comments on it. The agreement was negotiated during September of this year on the basis of a draft prepared by Canada. That draft has been made available to a number of other governments which have expressed an interest in the possibility of concluding an agreement of this nature with Canada. We hope there will be a number of such agreements concluded before long. In this connection I might add that negotiations have been carried on with the government of Switzerland, and we are hopeful that the outcome will be successful and that an agreement with Switzerland will soon be forthcoming and brought into effect.

The agreement with Germany which has now been signed will provide for co-operation between the two countries on a reciprocal basis. That is to say, it does not envisage a one-way traffic, but rather that each government will assist the other as appropriate and on a basis of equality. The co-operation involved may take a variety of forms, including the exchange of information, the supply of equipment and materials, and access to and use of facilities. In particular, the agreement will permit arrangements to be made for the supply of uranium from Canada to Germany.

In all cases the activities involved must be directed solely to peaceful ends, and there is provision for adequate safeguards to ensure that materials such as uranium, which are essential to an atomic energy program, shall not be diverted to any military use. I emphasize this point, Mr. Speaker, that adequate safeguards to this end are assured. The safeguards provisions, I may add, are modelled closely upon those of the international atomic energy agency of the United Nations.

I desire at this point to say a few words about the relationship between such bilateral agreements and that agency, of which both Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany are members. Canada wholeheartedly supports the newly established international atomic energy agency, which is designed to encourage, to complement and to assist the efforts of governments, individually or in co-operation on a bilateral or multilateral basis, to develop and apply the peaceful uses of atomic energy. It is quite possible that when the agency is fully operative, as it is not now, the supply of such material as uranium from one country to another will frequently be arranged through it.

As I informed you a moment ago, the statute provides also for bilateral agreements. Provision is made in the statute of the international agency for safeguards in the case of bilateral agreements. The present agreement makes no explicit reference to such an arrangement; neither the international atomic energy agency nor any other suitable international body is yet in a position to apply safeguards, but the possibility of transferring the safeguards functions for which provision is made in the agreement to a mutually acceptable international body is one which could be raised by either party at a later date.

With the leave of the house I am depositing a copy of the agreement with the Clerk of the house.

The terms of the agreement provide that it shall come into force upon an exchange of notes to that effect. As I have already informed the house, it is our intention that this exchange should take place this month. We are confident that this agreement and others like it which may be negotiated with other friendly governments will be supported by all members of the house. I think we can all agree that agreements of this kind, providing as they do for co-operation on a reciprocal basis, will come to play an important role in the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy with consequent benefit to our friends and ourselves, and that such agreements will provide an additional market for Canadian uranium.

Finally, these intergovernmental agreements will not in themselves constitute contracts for the export of uranium from Canada. Rather they will establish conditions satisfactory to the two governments concerned under which such contracts may be concluded on a commercial basis between the appropriate governmental agencies in each country. The governmental agencies which will be responsible for the detailed operation of this agreement between West Germany and Canada and the negotiation of any contracts arising under it report to parliament through my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the question addressed to me by the hon. member I am happy to make this statement in relation to the use of nuclear power for peaceful uses.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether or not requests have come in from at least three other friendly countries, not referred to in my hon. friend's statement, altogether apart from the possible arrangements made in Switzerland?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I know of two inquiries, and negotiations are going on. I ask permission of the house not to divulge the names of those countries. I can state, however, that there was hope that such an agreement might be negotiated with France, but they informed us that they were not interested in obtaining Canadian uranium on this basis.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Are there any negotiations between Canada and the Euratom group, as a unit, regarding this matter?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the Euratom group will become fully established for the first time on January 1, 1958.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO ISSUING OF BILINGUAL GOVERNMENT CHEQUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. My question is, have steps been taken by the Department of Finance to have bilingual cheques issued by the department in all parts of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance did not take advantage of the opportunity of answering my first question—

Mr. Fleming: I did answer the question plainly.

Mr. LaCroix: —my supplementary question is—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has another question he may put it. He began by commenting on the answer he received. He did have a reply, and he is not in a position to ask for more.

Mr. LaCroix: It is a supplementary question. Is it not true that the interpretation of the existing statutes has permitted, without passing a new act, the issuing of bilingual cheques by the Department of Finance in the province of Quebec? Are not these statutes the same for the other provinces of Canada?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I commented upon a similar question from the same hon. member two days ago. This question would involve a matter of legal opinion, and any answer I might give on that point would be clearly out of order.

Mr. LaCroix: Why didn't you answer my first question?

Mr. Fleming: I did answer the hon. member's first question. He should not be making statements of that kind, since they are quite untrue.

Mr. Speaker: I have already advised the hon. member to that effect.

TRADE

WHEAT—PROVISION OF CREDIT FOR POLAND AND SPAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice. My question is based on a press dispatch which appeared in this morning's paper entitled, "Wheat Sale Dependent Upon Credit". Can the minister inform the house what steps have been taken by the government to meet the credit requirements of Poland and Spain so the sale of a considerable quantity of wheat, estimated at between seven and ten million bushels, may materialize?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is hoped to sell wheat to various European countries. Hon. members will appreciate that under these conditions it would be inadvisable to give any information about the names of particular countries or the nature of the proposals. I think anyone who is really interested in selling wheat will realize the truth of what I have said.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I assume the matter is under active consideration by the government, and I think that is the important point.

LEAD AND ZINC—STATEMENT ON U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay East asked a question with regard to the hearings on lead and zinc before the United States tariff commission. In my reply I referred to strong representations having been made by the government of Canada, and the hon. member then asked a supplementary question as follows:

May I ask the minister whether these governmental negotiations are being carried on at the present time? Are they following the matter up to the very last in order that this drastic action may not be taken?

The answer is that the matter continues to be pursued with the United States authorities with the utmost vigour.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED PURCHASES BY ROUMANIAN AGRICULTURAL DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Medicine Hat directed a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with a Roumanian delegation which was in Canada for several weeks up to about 10 days ago. As reported at page 2127 of Hansard he asked specifically these questions:

What Canadian products were purchased, and has the invitation been accepted?

That is the invitation of the Roumanians to return this visit.

If so, what will the mission attempt to buy or sell?

This agricultural delegation from Roumania was headed by the minister of agriculture for Roumania. In view of the fact that the Department of Agriculture arranged their trip in Canada it is perhaps more appropriate that I should reply to the question than that the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce should do so.

This delegation was here for the purpose of seeing our methods of farming, and particularly to look into the types of the seeds, livestock and machinery which we have in this country and which might be suitable for use in Roumania. They travelled right across the country and formed a very favourable opinion. They were convinced of the fact that we had here in Canada a good many products which they could buy and make use of.

Whilst they were here they purchased a considerable quantity of hybrid seed corn. They had purchased some hybrid seed corn the year before, and had also purchased some from the United States. They found that our hybrid seed corn turned out better in Roumania than did the purchases they made from the United States. As a result, when they were here this year they purchased something like two and one-half times as much seed corn in Canada as they purchased in the United States on this trip.

They also purchased some hogs; in fact, they purchased a plane load of hogs which were immediately flown to Roumania. It is rather interesting in this connection that the ancestors of those particular hogs were secured from Sir Winston Churchill about four years ago. They also purchased some cattle, Herefords and Black Angus; some chickens and some machinery.

These are all in the nature of what you might call sample purchases. If they turn out to be satisfactory, as I am sure they will, the minister of agriculture for Roumania assured me that they would be back to make considerably larger purchases in future years.

As to the invitation which was issued for a similar delegation to go to Roumania, I assured him that we would consider the matter seriously, and I hope something along that line might be arranged.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

REMOVAL OF THRESHOLD PROVISIONS OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, and I am not sure whether it should be addressed to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has two parts. When is it proposed to introduce legislation to remove the threshold provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act of 1956? Have any advances been made to encourage the province of Ontario to accept the benefits of the said act, which will help municipalities in meeting the obligation to pay relief to unemployed persons?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just as soon as we get on with the disposition of those things which are on the order paper now.

[Later:]

Mr. Brown (Essex West): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister which is supplementary to a question I asked him earlier. Would he now care to answer the second part of that question, and tell us whether any advances have been made to the province of Ontario to encourage them to avail themselves of the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act, so the municipalities may be assisted in preparing their budgets in taking care of the relief of unemployed persons?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might contribute something in the way of an answer to the hon. member. The Prime Minister announced some days ago that the legislation to remove the so-called threshold from the Unemployment Assistance Act would be introduced at this session and that the legislation would become effective from January 1, 1958. It was discussed at the recent dominion-provincial conference, when a proposal was put forward on behalf of this government and was accepted with approval by all the provinces, including the province of Ontario. Obviously, no advances may be made until parliament authorizes them, unless they conform to the present terms of the act, with the threshold provisions still in effect.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—COVERAGE OF CONSTRUCTION START BY FILM BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who is responsible for the national film board, which has done a very fine job in recording for posterity great occasions in our country's history. Would he report to the house on the action taken by the national film board yesterday in recording another historic occasion, the start of construction of the South Saskatchewan dam, which the Prime Minister promised would be under way six months from the election? That six months expired yesterday, December 10.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to answer the question in a form which would be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman, but I can assure him that in accordance with the habit of the government of making good on its pledges the national film board will be able to record the commencement of construction under this government.

Mr. Sinclair: The pledge was for yesterday.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is another answer in that connection. It is that type of frivolous question that has used up 32 hours and 37 minutes so far this session.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I want to assert that members on this side do not regard questions on the South Saskatchewan dam as frivolous, nor did we regard the promises of the Prime Minister last spring as frivolous, frivolous though they have turned out to be now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. As I said a moment ago with regard to another question, I am sure all hon. members have great confidence in the way in which Your Honour has presided over our deliberations. What I am going to say now is in no way a reflection on the Speaker of the house, but I do suggest that the observation just made by the Prime Minister, the kind of observation which he has made repeatedly throughout this session, is wholly out of order. It is not up to any member of the house, including the Prime Minister, to lecture the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was not lecturing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: Respect of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Being natural.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —simply pointing out the fact that day by day, and I have the list here, my hon. friends have been cluttering the record with nonsensical questions facetiously asked for a purpose other than the purposes of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not up to you to judge them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am simply pointing out that fact. My hon. friends ask when we are going to do this and that. An average of almost one hour a day, Mr. Speaker, has been taken on questions that should not have taken more than 20 minutes if all that my hon. friends were asking for was information.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do, Mr. Speaker. A few moments ago Your Honour made it clear to the house that you are aware of citation 295 which begins on page 119 of Beauchesne's third edition. Amongst other things that citation says that questions, oral or written, must not be trivial, vague or meaningless, must not indulge in ridicule and so on. I say that the comment made by the Prime Minister, with all deference to that right hon. gentleman, is a reflection on Your Honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The comment made by the Prime Minister implies that Your Honour has been negligent in your duty so far as questions on the orders of the day are concerned. On the contrary, I state that Your Honour has properly stopped questions that have been out of order. On one or two occasions you have stopped me and I have accepted your ruling. On the other hand Your Honour, in a manner that I think is highly commendable, has recognized that questions on the orders of the day play an important part in the affairs of parliament and of the country, and far from the Prime Minister being permitted to say what he said today I think he should be rebuked by Your Honour for his reflection on your conduct as the presiding officer of this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wish also to speak to the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the discussion of the point has proceeded far enough, and I should like to make the brief comment I have to make on it. The question of whether or not any particular intervention during the question period is frivolous should, of course, be raised at the time, and it is not in order now to review or reflect on questions that have been permitted to be asked in the past.

I think it is appropriate at this stage of the day's proceedings to discuss arrangements respecting the business of the house. In that respect I consider that the Prime Minister is entitled to comment on the amount of time that is taken by questions, but not to raise the matter of the propriety of questions that have been asked in the past, only to deal with those that are before the house at the present time.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REPORTED RAISING OF RENTS OF RECIPIENTS OF OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have recognized the hon. member for Huron.

Mr. Cardiff: May I be permitted to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: After questions.

Mr. Byrne: Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare received reports and letters from senior citizens' associations indicating that landlords are raising the rents of old age security recipients progressively to take full advantage of the two recent increases in the pension? If so, would the minister consider making use of the facilities and personnel of the dominion bureau of statistics labour force survey to investigate this serious accusation and make their findings known to the appropriate provincial authority?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I want to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me notice of his intention to ask this question though in somewhat different form. He asked me today if I had received letters from groups of senior citizens. Frankly I do not recall such, although I have seen reports in the press and so on. In reply I would say, with regard to the dominion bureau of statistics labour force survey being used as he suggests, that I am informed this involves too small a sample to be of much value in substantiating the reports mentioned by the hon. member.

In any case, it seems to me that the accuracy of such reports will become increasingly apparent without any special survey being undertaken. I would suggest that the best way of alleviating this situation, if it exists, would be through public reaction against the practice.

TELEVISION

"VIEWPOINT"—USE OF PRESS GALLERY REPORTERS ON PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I address this question to the Minister of National Revenue in a spirit of good, clean, economy-minded fun.

Mr. Pickersgill: And frivolity.

Mr. McCleave: Is he aware that on the C.B.C. television program "Viewpoint" it sometimes happens that one member of the parliamentary press gallery interviews another member of the same press gallery, within the scope of a five-minute broadcast, and that this strange habit is spreading like wildfire, burning the taxpayers' dollars for other C.B.C. programs? Will the minister find out if both the reporter who interviews and the reporter who is interviewed are paid?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The minister has been so busy in his office that he has not had an opportunity to see the program, therefore he is not in a position to comment upon the accuracy of the question. However, he will consider the matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED TIGHTER SURVEILLANCE OF PRIVATELY OWNED STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. It is based on a Canadian Press dispatch in yesterday's Gazette under the headline "C.B.C. Plans Controls Tightening". It reads:

> The publicly owned C.B.C. today gave notice that it plans tighter surveillance of the operations of privately owned radio and television stations in line with recommendations by the Fowler royal commission on broadcasting.

My question is, does the government regard this as a move in the right direction, and would not tighter controls be a denial of the democratic right of freedom of the air and freedom of speech?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member for Dollard asked me a similar question yesterday and I commented on it then. I do not think I have anything more to add.

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Since the report of the recent royal commission on broadcasting has been available for government study for some seven months, and because of the widespread public interest in the future status of the C.B.C., would the minister indicate to the house whether it is the intention of the government to set up a parliamentary committee for the purpose of examining the present and proposed activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

LASQUETI ISLAND, B.C.—STATEMENT ON PROVISION OF EMERGENCY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on December 7 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni inquired regarding the possibility of restoring regular steamer service to Lasqueti island, and if the Department of Transport could provide the services of a steamer to take supplies to this island.

Regular service to Lasqueti island has been provided in the past on the basis of assurance of assistance from the provincial government. This service was discontinued when this assistance was not received. The federal government has not paid any subsidy for the service in this area for over seven years.

I am inclined to feel the problem is one of provincial responsibility. It might be met by a small ferry service of the type now undertaken by the province of British Columbia and by other provinces in similar cases.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport relating to the answer he gave earlier to my question with regard to the situation at Lasqueti island.

I would like to ask the minister if he would not agree that the emergency situation existing at Lasqueti island could be met in part if the federal government would exercise its jurisdiction by an amendment to the Transport Act which would bring the coastal shipping companies under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners in order to prevent the sudden cessation of established services which is bringing hardship to whole communities on the British Columbia coast.

Mr. Hees: The case which the hon. member brought to my attention is one that has been looked after by a shipping company on the understanding that it would be given assistance by the provincial government. As I explained this morning, the service was discontinued as of last Wednesday because the promised assistance was not forthcoming. I think the best way to overcome this present difficulty is for the provincial government to make good the promises which I am told it made to the shipping company.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Barnett: May I then ask a supplementary question. Will the Minister of Transport make representations to that effect to the government of British Columbia in order to see if the emergency situation can be dealt with?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think this is a provincial matter, and I would suggest that the people of Lasqueti island should get in touch with the provincial government, as they are reasonably close by and should make these representations themselves. They are the ones primarily affected.

MIRAMICHI—STATEMENT ON FEES CHARGEABLE BY PORT WARDEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I should like to reply to a supplementary question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. I would advise that it is intended to submit for the approval of the governor in council a schedule of fees chargeable by the port warden for the Miramichi bay district. The hon. member will recall that he was supplied with a copy of the proposed rates a few weeks ago by my department.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

SUMMERSIDE—REQUEST FOR EARLY START ON HANGAR CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of National Defence whether it is the intention to make an early start on the proposed hangars at the R.C.A.F. airport at Summerside, Prince Edward Island?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): That matter is under consideration. We hope that hangars will be available by the time new aircraft arrive at Summerside.

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF BILL L OF SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, might I address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the leader of the government in the other place this morning that Bill L, an act to amend the Territorial Lands Act, which was introduced in the Senate, is a bill sponsored by a minister of the crown but not by the government, would he assure this house that Bill L is in fact a government sponsored bill?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, might I point out to Your Honour that my recollection is that the rules make it quite clear that no reference may be made to a statement or discussion in the other place during the course of the same session. Since the hon. gentleman's question is founded on a statement alleged to have been made there, his question is out of order.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that the statement was made in the Senate committee on natural resources.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding of the practice is that this house does not refer to or comment upon any proceeding in the other house, although it is in order to read extracts from the debates of the other house. I would think that the question of the hon. member is not in order.

Mr. Lesage: Then might I ask this. Is the bill introduced in the Senate, an act to amend the Territorial Lands Act, a government sponsored bill?

Mr. Speaker: I think that is precisely the same question which the hon. member asked before, and it seems to me that it is not in order to ask that question of the ministry at that stage of a bill, where it is a proceeding of the other house.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON REPORTED FAILURE OF SUPPLIES TO REACH MISSIONARIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet referred on December 3 to a news item in the newspaper Le Devoir to the effect that certain missionaries were in distress in the Arctic because their supplies did not reach them this summer. He asked what action the government intended to take.

My answer includes a review of how this operates and then the action we are taking. Supplies for the communities of Igloolik, Repulse Bay and Pelly Bay are normally sent by ship from Churchill; supplies for Pelly Bay are taken overland from Repulse Bay to their destination. Unusual ice conditions in Roes Welcome sound this year prevented the Hudson's Bay Company vessel carrying the supplies from reaching either Repulse Bay or Igloolik; the goods, therefore, were left at Coral Harbour on Southampton island.

The failure of ships to arrive is a not uncommon occurrence, particularly at Igloolik, which in the past has sometimes been isolated for more than two years. It is, therefore, the custom in such communities to carry reserve stocks to prevent serious distress. There has been no distress either for those living in the community or for the Eskimos trading into them. There are adequate supplies of food and other household requirements.

When the ship failed to arrive, the Hudson's Bay Company arranged for aircraft to fly the supplies from Coral Harbour to Repulse Bay and Igloolik. When they did so they offered to make available space for mission supplies. The material for both the trading store and for the mission at Igloolik has already been delivered. The first load for Repulse Bay will be moved on December 18 and will include 500 pounds of supplies for the mission. The remainder of the store and mission supplies are to go on a second trip in January. As a result of these airlifts, all materials except unusually heavy or unessential goods have been, or shortly will be, delivered.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—SUPERVISION OF CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which has been sent to him. What steps has the minister taken to provide on the spot supervision of the obligations written into the contracts of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation as given in sessional paper 176(b)?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I can report that this matter has been receiving consideration, and it is the intention of the department to undertake an on the spot inspection of the manner in which the various clauses governing conditions of labour in these contracts are being observed. This will be done in the very near future.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—PRICE OFFERED SUBCONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which has been sent to him. Has the minister received any representations on the price offered subcontractors for clearing work on the right of way of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and if so, what is the subject matter of such representations?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there must be some misunderstanding. I have received no representations as far as I am aware or any question from the hon. member. I will take the question as notice, therefore, and make inquiries.

BROADCASTING

MONTREAL—SPOT ADVERTISING RATES CHARGED BY LOCAL STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): In view of the fact that the minister does not intend to set up a committee, would he now indicate whether he had drawn to the attention of the governors of the C.B.C. the matter of the discrimination in the rates charged as between them and private broadcasters, which I drew to his attention a few days ago; and, if so, what action has the board of governors taken?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Without admitting the validity of the suggestion that there was discrimination, I have drawn the purport of the hon. member's question to the attention of the chairman of the board of the C.B.C. for such action as the board may deem advisable.

Mr. Hahn: Will the minister assure the house that he will direct the officers of the C.B.C. to see to it that the rates charged by the C.B.C. are not less than those charged by private broadcasters?

Mr. Nowlan: I have no authority to direct the C.B.C. to do anything, and I do not propose to so direct.

Mr. Hahn: Will the minister advise the management of the C.B.C. that, if this practice continues, the $37 million we are to vote this year will not be given them?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has plied his question sufficiently, and has got all the answers he can reasonably expect.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

USE OF ROMAN NUMERALS IN CANCELLATION STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those are bright Liberal colours you are wearing.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; this is the hide of one of the Liberals we skinned at the last election.

Agricultural Products—Price Stabilization

Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough inquired regarding the cancellation stamp which appears on letters, and asked when the department began using Roman numerals to indicate the month of the year in marking cancellation of stamps instead of a written abbreviation for the month.

I wish to inform the hon. member that we have been in the process of doing this since 1948, at which time an announcement was made; and as stamps went out of use the new designation was introduced. I may say that the reason for introducing Roman numerals is that with international mail service many countries would find it difficult to read our letter abbreviations, whereas the Roman numerals are much more generally understood.

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED PRICES FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES, ETC.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities to be named therein and to provide that prices may be guaranteed for any other agricultural commodity or commodities as named from time to time by the governor in council, such measure to include: provisions for the establishment of a board and an advisory committee, the appointment of members thereof and employees and the payment of their salaries and expenses; provisions for the payment of administration costs and expenses; provisions establishing a revolving fund in the consolidated revenue fund and authorizing expenditures therefrom for the purposes of the proposed measure not exceeding in the aggregate two hundred and fifty million dollars in addition to the expenditure of the proceeds of sale of agricultural commodities and other revenues derived thereunder; and such further related and consequential provisions as may be necessary to give effect to the foregoing system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

Mr. Harkness: The resolution before us is one on which a bill will be based that is designed to put into effect our stated program of greater stability of income for agriculture. Its objective is to provide for flexible supports on agricultural products, and to guarantee minimum price levels on key products in relation to prices in a previous base period.

This is a far-reaching and important piece of legislation, perhaps the most important, in its implications, in its expected results for agriculture and its effect on the general economy, that has been considered by the Canadian parliament for many years. I believe this legislation will give to our farmers a much greater degree of security than they have ever enjoyed in our history, but I do not maintain that it is a cure-all for all the difficulties under which agriculture has laboured for the past several years. No one piece of legislation can be expected, at one stroke, to transform a complex industry, such as agriculture, from a depressed state to one of full and abounding health.

I do maintain that this is a very important step toward that goal. For many years there has been a demand on the part of agricultural organizations and by individual farmers for some form of parity price system in Canada. Exactly what was meant by parity has never been too clear, because its definition varied from organization to organization and from speaker to speaker who dealt with the matter. However, what was generally in mind was some sort of system such as that in effect in the United States, because our farmers were aware that men across the border in the same lines of production as themselves in many cases were receiving higher prices.

At the same time it was common knowledge amongst all who had studied the matter at all that the United States parity price system had led to difficulties of various kinds. It had resulted in the accumulation of vast surpluses of many agricultural products which had proven embarrassing to the United States agricultural economy and government, and the disposal of which has had serious effects on Canada and other nations. The United States system proved unworkable as far as some products were concerned. It produced anomalies and illogical situations in many cases, and it had constituted a heavy drain on the general taxpayer.

In view of all this, as a first step in attempting to devise a practical and workable agricultural prices stabilization bill for Canada I took a fairly close look at the United States system with a view to determining the defects in that system so we might avoid the difficulties which they have run into.

The first and most important defect, I believe, is the lack of flexibility and from this cause most of their troubles have developed. I have endeavoured in this legislation to provide for the greatest possible degree of flexibility so we will not be saddled with a program which inevitably acts as an incentive to produce burdensome and unsaleable surpluses. In arriving at the legislation now before you we studied several forms of parity formulae. At this point I should like to pay tribute to the officials of the prices support board, of the marketing service and of the economics division of the Department of Agriculture, all of whom put in a great deal of study and work on this matter. They studied five parity formulae in particular and prepared reports on them for me, together with supporting documents to show what the effect would have been for each had it been in operation during the past ten years.

From all this mass of material it appeared that the most suitable system for Canada would be one of a three-year moving average as a base period. Among the advantages of the moving average formula is the fact that it deals with the immediate price situation. There is no intermediate step involving the calculation and use of an index. It takes into account technological and other changes, in that the base period advances automatically each year and the base price is adjusted gradually to changing conditions. The base price will be calculated in advance and the prescribed price announced, so that producers will have early notice of the level of support for named commodities and can plan their operations accordingly. Price information is readily available.

The formula is simple and readily understood; and I think this is a matter of great importance, because every farmer in the country can understand the formula, know how it applies and in many cases calculate for himself what the base price is likely to be. Each commodity may be considered entirely independently. The relationship of the base price of one commodity to another is left to the determination of market conditions and is not based on the relationship in some previous period when conditions of supply, demand and methods of production may have been quite different.

The basic reason for recommending a three-year moving average as a base is that the shorter the base and the closer it is to the current market situation, the more accurately it reflects market changes. The three-year average does not perpetuate abnormal conditions for as long as an average calculated for a greater number of years, and affords the farmer more immediate relief.

The purposes of the moving average formula method of determining the base price are to assure stability of income to farmers by protecting them against a drastic decline in prices; to provide for gradual adjustment through prices due to changes in consumption habits, losses of export outlets and radical technological advances, and to provide flexibility so that prompt and desirable adjustments may be made as conditions warrant. This legislation provides that a base price for any agricultural commodity—and I would like to stress the word "any"—will be established by calculating the average price for that commodity at representative markets during the three years immediately preceding the year in which the base price is established.

I could perhaps make the matter clearer by citing an example. I would like to emphasize that this example and the figures employed in it bear no direct relationship to actual prices, and this is not to be considered as a prediction or anything of that kind on my part as to what might be done as far as the particular commodity used for the purpose of illustrating the point is concerned; nor is it to be considered as prophesying what might happen in the future with regard to this or any other commodity.

Let us say that the average wholesale price of eggs in 1954 was 45 cents a dozen. In 1955 it was 50 cents a dozen and in 1956 it was 55 cents a dozen. The base price for 1957 then would be the average of these, that is 50 cents a dozen. Then let us say that the average price in 1957 was 60 cents a dozen. The base price for 1958 would be the average of prices for 1955, 1956 and 1957, that is, of 50 cents, 55 cents and 60 cents respectively, which would give a base price for 1958 of 55 cents a dozen. I trust that this brief explanation will have made clear the formula to be employed, the three-year moving average, and will have shown how the base price will be arrived at for any commodity.

However, the formula employed in any system of stabilizing or supporting prices is not what the farmer is primarily interested in; what concerns him, really, are the results, and he wants two of these in particular. First, he wants prices for his products which will cover his cost of production and leave him enough to live on; and second, he desires a sense of security in his price structure, the removal of his long-time fear that prices will fall away to nothing while his crop is growing or his livestock developing to market size.

In this legislation we have attempted to meet these two demands, conditional on not providing a price for any commodity which will serve as a strong incentive to farmers and thus result in large unsaleable surpluses. Guaranteed prices, effective for the next 12 months in most cases, will be set for any agricultural product where the need for such a guaranteed price is shown to exist, except that wheat, oats and barley grown in the wheat board area will not be included.

The reason for this is not to interfere in any way with the operations of the wheat board, which the great majority of farmers in western Canada strongly support. Provision is made that the guaranteed price may be made effective by the board, which the act provides for, through it (a) purchasing the commodity, (b) paying deficiency payments and (c) making such other payments as the governor in council may direct. The legislation provides for the setting up of an advisory committee, representative of farm organizations, which will advise the minister and the board as to what commodities should be placed under price guarantee and what the level of the guarantee should be.

The procedure envisaged is as follows: As soon as possible after January 1 in each year the board will assemble the statistical information necessary and will determine the base price for each commodity under price guarantee, and for others in respect of which it seems likely that price guarantees will be required.

The advisory committee will meet with the board to make its recommendations, and the two will confer together. The board will then make its recommendations to the government as to what commodities should be under guarantee for the next 12 months and the percentage of the base price at which each should be supported. The final responsibility, of course, must rest with the government, which may accept the board's recommendation, alter it or reject it.

In addition to the flexible guaranteed prices which may be applied to any agricultural commodity and which will be the ones in general use, the legislation provides for that sense of security which farmers have asked for and which we believe they are entitled to by providing assured floor prices for certain key commodities. This is done by writing into the legislation a provision that these commodities must be supported under any circumstances at 80 per cent of the base price. It is not expected that these will be the guaranteed prices in effect. The guaranteed prices will be higher in most cases, but this provision is written into the legislation so the farmer will be absolutely assured that no matter how prices may slide he will at the very least receive 80 per cent of the base price.

An example will show how this will operate. Butter has been supported at 58 cents for some years now, and the prices board selling price has been at about that level. Thus the base price will be around that figure. For ease in figuring, let us say it is 60 cents. The guaranteed price for the next year would be 100 per cent of the base price; or if it was desired to raise this a little, which as it happens has been requested during the last month by the dairy producers, the guaranteed price might be 105 per cent of the base price.

At the same time the assured floor price would be 48 cents, so that even if there should be a catastrophe such as a change of government the farmer would be certain of his minimum of, in this case, 48 cents. So there will be no confusion with regard to the matter I have been talking about I should like to point out that the bill deals with three kinds of prices. There is a base price which is part of a formula arrived at by the use of the three year moving average. There is a guaranteed price which will be in effect for the following 12 months with respect to each of the commodities for which it may be required. Third, there is an assured floor price on certain basic commodities.

To summarize the main features of the legislation, they are: 1. It provides for the stabilization of agricultural prices on a three year moving average formula. 2. Every agricultural commodity, except wheat, oats and barley under the wheat board, is eligible for support. 3. Guaranteed prices will be set as a percentage of the base price in the early months of each year in most cases, and will continue in effect for 12 months after going into effect. The reason I say "in most cases" is that it might happen that in September, August or at some other time a demand would arise for the setting of a guaranteed price for an agricultural commodity which was not under a guaranteed price. In that case the guaranteed price would be set at that time and instead of being for the following 12 months it would be in effect until the next general period for the setting of prices, that is during the first three months of the calendar year. 4. In the case of certain key commodities a price floor of at least 80 per cent of the base price is mandatory under the act. 5. A price stabilization board is provided to carry on the operations of the program. 6. An advisory committee, representative of farm organizations, will be appointed to advise the minister and the board in regard to what commodities require guaranteed prices and the level at which these should be set. 7. A revolving fund of $250 million is available to finance the operations of the scheme.

I have given considerable detail in connection with this legislation, perhaps more than is customary at this stage, but I have done so in order that hon. members may be in no doubt as to what is proposed in the legislation. Further details, I think, should more properly be left for discussion until the bill is in the hands of members and they have had an opportunity to study it. I trust that we may get the resolution through without undue delay and proceed with the further stages of the legislation.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister a question before he sits down?

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question?

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I might ask a question.

Mr. Gardiner: I was just going to ask a question. I do not know whether I completely understood one position taken, and the misunderstanding arises in connection with the use of butter as an example. I take it from the general remarks made with regard to the matter that a base price would be established and that there would not be a support price of less than 80 per cent established. Is that correct, or must it be 80 per cent?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. I am afraid the right hon. gentleman has misunderstood. The base price is, as I said, part of the formula. It it arrived at by applying the three year moving average. Having arrived at that base price it is envisaged under the legislation that a guaranteed price will be set for any commodity for which it is required at whatever level is deemed appropriate and necessary in view of what the circumstances happen to be at the time. The amount set can be 90 per cent of the base price, 80 per cent of the base price or even 120 per cent or more of the base price. The base price is part of the formula, as I say, and it is particularly for the purpose of determining what guaranteed price will be set as a percentage of the base price.

In addition there is a provision which might be called a security provision, which provides that so far as certain key commodities are concerned the assured floor price to be set must not be less than 80 per cent of the base price.

Mr. Gardiner: But it could be less on others except those?

Mr. Harkness: The point I made was that the support price actually in effect for most commodities will be the guaranteed price I have spoken of, and in most cases it will be higher than the assured floor price. The assured floor price must not be less than 80 per cent of the base price. In other words, the legislation attempts to do two things and one of them it attempts to do in two ways. First of all it attempts to provide a means, by the use of a comparatively simple formula, whereby a guaranteed price may be set for any agricultural commodity, and such price would be set in view of all the various conditions existing at the time. Such conditions would include the farmers cost of production, the supply and demand position, the perishability of the commodity and so forth. All these factors have to be taken into consideration in setting the guaranteed price, and I will go into them in more detail at subsequent stages of the legislation. This price is to be set 12 months in advance. It is designed to give the farmers security and stability of income.

Then there is, in addition to that, an absolute guarantee written into the legislation so it cannot be changed by the government or by a change of government or anything else until parliament meets and wants to change it, that the farmer will get at the very minimum this floor price of 80 per cent of the base price.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might ask my question now. Can the minister say whether this absolute guaranteed floor is not, in fact, lower than the prevailing price for most agricultural commodities? The second question is, when this legislation comes into effect does the minister believe it will result in an immediate increase in the price of any agricultural product?

Mr. Harkness: These are questions, Mr. Chairman, which I do not think we should take time at this particular stage to discuss. The hon. gentleman is asking me really, to some extent, to make a prediction as to what the situation is going to be some time in the future. However, I will say this, as far as one question he has asked is concerned, whether the assured floor price would not, in many cases, be lower than the present price. That is correct; but I will say that the assured floor price will compare very favourably with the support prices which exist at the present time and have existed in the past. As I said, the purpose of that provision is to give some ultimate security that these assured floor prices are not the guaranteed prices which we expect are ordinarily going to be in use.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not feel that the explanation he has given to date of the legislation he is about to introduce indicates that the government has completely repudiated its campaign pledge to provide the farmers with parity prices?

Mr. Harkness: I believe absolutely nothing of the kind. I think this legislation will do everything we promised we would do so far as our campaign pledges are concerned. I believe the hon. member either does not understand the legislation, or if he does understand it he is deliberately attempting to misrepresent it.

Mr. Quelch: May I ask a supplementary question based on these two other questions. Can the minister say whether there is any anchor contained in the legislation which will guarantee that the average price for the base period will not get lower and lower and lower?

Mr. Harkness: I think it is quite apparent from what I said, if the hon. gentleman knows anything about the three year moving average, that the base price is going to vary up and down year by year as prices vary up and down.

Mr. Argue: There is no parity.

Mr. Quelch: There is no guarantee.

Mr. Harkness: During the course of my speech I outlined what the advantages are of the three year moving average as against the fixed parity which was in effect in the United States and which got them into considerable difficulty.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask the minister, merely for information, when the guaranteed price is established for the three year period, will there be any relation whatever between that price and the prices of other things which farmers have to buy? In other words, will there be any relationship between that guaranteed price based on the three year average and what we generally understand as parity prices or the cost of production plus a fair profit?

Mr. Harkness: There will certainly be a relationship. As I have indicated, we will have an advisory committee composed of representatives of the various farm organizations, and the whole purpose of this is to advise as to what commodities should be under price guarantee and the level of that guarantee. As I indicated in my speech, the whole purpose of putting these guarantees into effect is in order to give the producer a reasonable return, and as I indicated also there will be a relationship to the cost of production and various other factors that have to be taken into consideration so far as any particular product is concerned.

Mr. McCullough: It is certainly quite obvious, Mr. Chairman, that there are serious shortcomings in the proposed legislation. I should like to ask this question of the Minister of Agriculture. Does the government propose any method by which the guaranteed prices will be paid to the producer rather than to the trade, as the act presently provides? This seems to be a tremendous omission on the part of the government.

Mr. Harkness: I must immediately deny the preface put by the hon. member, that it is obvious there are severe defects in this legislation. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if hon. members opposite would spend as much time as I have in studying the very large number of parity price formulae which exist, some of them in actual operation in various countries and others which have been proposed, I think they would realize at once that no matter which of these formulae you adopted as a price stabilization basis in Canada there would be all kinds of people, such as those in that group, who would say you should have used another one; you should have used A instead of B or you should have used C instead of X.

As a matter of fact I shall, at a later date, put a certain amount of evidence on the record to indicate what the experience has been in the United States in regard to these matters. I believe this evidence will indicate quite clearly that they wish they had in that country a system more like this than the one they have.

In so far as the other question is concerned, whether or not payment would be made direct to producers, that depends entirely on the commodity. There are some commodities for which that can be done and some for which it is administratively impossible to do it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What are examples of those two?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, this is a measure for which the house has been waiting with some degree of eagerness since the opening of the session. I want, in the first place, to say to the Minister of Agriculture that from what he has said I am quite sure he has given a great deal of study to the question. In so doing he has arrived at certain conclusions. I am not going to agree with all the conclusions he has arrived at, but I am going to agree that he has put some time into studying these questions.

This is a question about which we on this side of the house should know something, because we studied it for some considerable time before 1944 when we brought the present act into being. We arrived at the same conclusion at that early time, comparatively speaking, at which the minister has arrived with regard to the United States system. The fact that we did arrive at that conclusion was the foundation for the principle involved in the act which has been on the statute books since 1944.

I am only going to say that after having had a full discussion of the matter, the minister has arrived at the same conclusion as we did at an earlier date. We have only the resolution before us at the moment, apart from the remarks that have been made by the minister, but when I read the resolution I was convinced that there was not very much difference in principle between the resolution which is on the order paper now and the resolution which was placed on the order paper in 1944, and which is of course available to every member of this house.

The resolution of 1944 went on to state that we were going to set up a board; and it went on beyond that to say that we were providing a system under the act which the board would put into operation. Then we went on to say that there would be $200 million of a revolving fund that the board would have at its disposal from year to year with which to operate.

As I understand it, the present resolution reverses the order a little and that is about all. It says that we are going to set up a system and that system is going to be paid for, as to administration, in the same way it was under the old act. Then it says we are going to set up a board to administer it, and then we are going to have an advisory committee. While I do not think the previous act compelled us to have an advisory committee, we always have had one. That committee has been composed of representatives from farm organizations, with the president of one of them always acting as the chairman. It has included representatives appointed by provincial departments of agriculture across Canada and representatives from the farm organizations themselves.

Those members of that committee were all nominated by either the provincial governments or the farm organizations. None of them were nominees of mine. The only provision in our operation of it was that I had to recommend them to council and council was responsible for their appointment. That procedure was followed in all cases. I did not change any nominee. So we have had an advisory committee running from about 16 I think up to 19 or 20 throughout the period in between, and we have discussed with that advisory committee all matters such as those that are going to be referred to the advisory committee now, and many other matters as well.

That is the situation in so far as the resolution makes it clear to us. In the speech which was made by the minister in introducing the resolution he referred to certain matters. He pointed out clearly the parity price proposals which had been followed in the United States and which were always under discussion in this house when dealing with parity, I think down to last year, both by the official opposition of that time and the other opposition parties of that time as something we should adopt here.

But the present Prime Minister made his position very clear at the time he moved a motion in this house a year ago, a motion which was somewhat different from that which he had moved upon two previous occasions, as to what his position was. On May 16, while he was in the election campaign, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press, speaking at Carman, he referred to the C.C.F. 100 per cent parity policy and after reading it said: "What nonsense; the people of Canada would not stand for it". Then he went on to deal with the ideas he had in mind to bring in. As one of the hon. members suggested in asking questions a few moments ago, he made definite undertakings as to what he was going to bring in. I am not going to try to repeat those at the moment. I have them all here, but I do not think it is necessary to read them all to the house. The house knows fairly well what those undertakings were.

It is true that he has carried out some of them. Only yesterday he announced as the usual means for delay that he was appointing a royal commission to investigate the price spread between farm consumers and farm producers. All I am going to say about that at the moment is that it is just a resurrection of one more of the devices employed by the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett when he was here years ago. He had the Stevens committee or commission of that time that held meetings all over Canada and then had meetings here in Ottawa at which these very problems were discussed fully.

I am not saying they should not be discussed now. I am only going to point out at this stage that there was a constant review of that situation on the part of the department during all the 22 years I was there as minister; that we had a review every month and every day, from day to day if I undertook to have it reviewed; and I did so whenever questions were raised in the house or otherwise about it. Surveys were made constantly in the different cities and various places across the country, through either the economics branch or the prices branch of the department in order to determine what these positions were.

This government are changing to the extent that they are going to have a commission that is outside the department itself, that has on it representation from certain places, that has on it some persons who can spend their time at that work and arrive at conclusions with regard to the matter. However, I do not see that it is going to be any more helpful than what we have had over the years, namely a constant review of that kind of thing.

Then in speaking on May 14, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune, the Prime Minister said he was going to stand up to the United States and halt the unjust and unfair dumping of United States surpluses. I have not seen any sign that he is dealing with that matter yet. Nevertheless he has been putting forth some suggestions as to what might be done.

The minister said the difference between this system and what was done in the United States was that these prices were going to be flexible. Unfortunately for the minister and others the United States two years ago, or further back than that, indicated to us that they were paying us the compliment of adopting flexible supports such as those we have had in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, just before lunch I had mentioned that in introducing the resolution the minister had referred to flexible supports, and I had suggested that the flexible support idea was first brought into being on this continent in 1944 by the Agricultural Prices Support Act which is now on the statute books. It does not set any definite formula, nor does it set any definite price, but it left to the board and to the government, the two of them working together, to establish a floor price which would be suitable to the conditions existing in the country at that time, as a matter of fact very much along the line of what the Prime Minister advocated when he was speaking throughout the country during the election campaign. At Brantford on May 9 he said:

> 2. Take action to improve the condition of agriculture so that the farm people may successfully re-establish their rightful position in our economy.
> 3. Maintain a flexible support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural products based on a fair price cost relationship.
> 4. Place a formula in the farm Agricultural Prices Support Act for arriving at support prices. It would allow for variation in production and demand for individual products.

Well, on that last point—a flexible price allowing for variation in production and demand for individual products—that is all provided for by the act as it is. The main provisions of the present act make it possible for such matters to be considered from month to month and from year to year as we go along. Furthermore, that of course is the meaning of the term flexible. We had all that in the agricultural support act of 1944, so there is nothing new in that regard being placed in the bill this resolution suggests. But I would say that the means by which it is to be arrived at in the present bill does not permit of very much flexibility to be exercised either by the board or the individuals who administer it. To that extent I think it will not be as serviceable as the legislation we already have.

There is one other thing to which reference has been made and which I think we should also consider. When one reads all the election promises made during the campaign one must agree it was, without doubt, anticipated that this act was going to have a much wider application so far as commodities were concerned. In the old act, however, it does provide that all farm commodities except wheat can be brought under the act, and many of them were from time to time, but this one provides that wheat, barley and oats cannot come under the act.

Mr. Harkness: No, it does not.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is what my hon. friend said this morning.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of clarification, wheat, barley and oats are definitely under the act except for those crops which are grown in the wheat board area and handled by the wheat board.

Mr. Argue: Well, that is almost all of it.

Mr. Gardiner: That is most of it; that grown off the prairies is sold from farmer to farmer or fed on the farm.

These are matters, of course, which will be of interest to members and will be discussed further after we have seen the bill, but I think it is necessary at this time to place on the record the position in connection with agriculture as it now stands. In placing the situation on the record I do not say it is as good as it ought to be or that it could not be improved upon; I am merely pointing out the situation, because there is no doubt in the minds of those who listened to political speeches during the campaign that those who were in opposition to the government of the time did have very definite ideas that they could improve the existing situation.

This, then, is the position as compared with what it was when we came into office. In 1935 the full value of all farm products—

Mr. Rea: Could we have the source of the right hon. gentleman's information?

Mr. Gardiner: The statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Sales of all farm products brought in a cash total of $536 million in 1935; the sale of all farm products in 1956 brought in $2,656,000,000. The cash value of exports of farm products in the year 1936, in round figures, was $200 million and in 1956 was $1,346 million.

Then turning to the capital value of the farmer's land, his building his equipment and livestock—because of course the cash he took in went into the improvement of his capital investment in land equipment and livestock of one kind or another—the farm buildings were valued in 1936 at $3¼ billion while in 1955 the valuation was $6.8 billion, or just over double. With respect to farm implements the value in 1936 was $475 million and in 1955 it was $1,800,000,000.

An hon. Member: What about inflation?

Mr. Gardiner: The total value of livestock on farms in 1936 was $594 million and in 1955 it was $1½ billion. The total in 1936 for the capital value of farms, equipment and livestock together was $4.7 billion and in 1955, after 22 years of Liberal rule, $10.1 billion, or again roughly double.

One might also call attention to the fact that back in 1936 the farmers purchased 5,000 tractors and in 1955 they purchased 38,000 tractors. Through sales of farm products farmers had been put into the position where they could buy equipment at greater cost. The prices of farm implements in general had doubled between 1935 and 1955. They, however, bought four times as many of them at a price which cost the farmers eight times as much money in 1955 as in 1935.

We come next to the debt on farms, which is a very important subject. In 1936, just after I came into the government of Canada from the province of Saskatchewan the debt on farms in Saskatchewan was over $600 million and in 1955, when I asked for the record for all Canada, the figure was $580 million. In other words the debt on farms in Saskatchewan alone at the beginning of the 22 years was considerably more than the debt on all the farms in Canada at the time we went out of office.

These are valuations which were created by what farmers did while we were in office, among which of course was the bringing in of this legislation having to do with price supports. To go one step further, the average value of farm land right across Canada in 1935 was $24 and in 1954 it was $50 per acre; again double. Therefore I am desirous of putting all these facts on the record in order that a little later on we will be able to take a look at them.

It is claimed that this piece of legislation is going to improve the position of the farmer. It is claimed that after we have this legislation in effect for a few years, maybe for a few months, the farmer is going to be better off. As I listened to the minister this morning and heard what he had in mind in connection with the setting of support prices, I was compelled to reach the conclusion that even in a very short period the farmer would not be so well off as he was before June 10 last, and when the time comes we will be able to use the figures I am placing on record now in order to support what I am maintaining at the present time.

I should like to quote one further figure. The farmers bought in 1936 some $19,300,000 worth of farm implements including tractors, and in 1955 they bought $155 million worth, or about eight times as much; they spent eight times as much on it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Ah, with that observation the right hon. gentleman makes it plainer; they spent that much on it. But they were different dollars.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they were different dollars, but they had to pay $155 million for four times as many items which cost them eight times as much, and that is just about double. Yet in spite of all this expenditure the debt carried on farm equipment and plant today is only a fraction of what it was 22 years ago.

As I said earlier this session, and as can be borne out by statistics, the previous government did many things to improve the position of farmers. We did not depend solely on this piece of legislation, though it was important. We tried other things, and one of them was to bring down at the very beginning of the first period of difficulty, at the end of the war, legislation which made it possible for farmers to borrow money to enable them to improve their capital position in connection with land, buildings, implements and everything else. And they did borrow $653 million with which to do that. If the farmers still owed that $653 million today, one could argue that none of the other measures taken had been effective. But I am told the record shows that 99.95 per cent of the debt has been paid back; in other words, scarcely any of this debt is charged against the farmers at the present time.

This is the experience the farmer has been going through, and it stands to reason that after he has spent so much money on changing over from horse-drawn equipment to mechanized equipment, he has not very much cash left with which to do other things, and that he has been experiencing great difficulty. But in spite of that the legislation we placed on the statute books has made it possible for him to improve his position, as the statistics I have quoted will bear me out and in paying for much of it.

There is another matter to which I think attention should be called. The minister said he did not expect that this legislation would cure all the farmers' troubles, but there has been a lot said out in the country which would indicate they did expect just that. Nevertheless, the late administration did not place reliance only on price support. We placed many pieces of legislation on the statute books in the past 22 years. The Agricultural Prices Support Act was one, and it dealt with a whole range of farm products, as the official records indicate. Then there was the Agricultural Products Board Act and the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. Some 130 organizations were set up across Canada which received support under the provisions of this measure. Then there was the Farm Improvement Loans Act and all the activities in connection with P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. and freight assistance which have been carried on in order to improve the farmers' position. And this list does not exhaust the measures which were enacted to this end.

Now, after having listened to what the minister had to say rather than judging from what is contained in the resolution itself, I have come to the conclusion that unless this bill is materially changed before it comes before this house it is not going to assist the farmer but, instead, is going to put him into greater difficulties.

I can tell the Minister of Agriculture that at this time we are not prepared to say whether or not we are going to support the bill when we see it. As far as I and other hon. members of this group are concerned, we are going to see the bill, and the only way to see it is to pass this resolution and make it possible for us to have a look at it. We are going to do that at least, but in so far as the minister has outlined the bill to us and indicated what it proposes to do, I would not anticipate that the farmers are going to obtain anything which would improve their position. There is the possibility that they may even lose if anything is taken away from them to which they were entitled under previous legislation.

If the government is going to say, "Instead of doing this, you may do something else", I may have to withdraw something of what I am saying, but in so far as the terms of the resolution and what the minister said this morning are concerned, I am inclined to think this legislation is going to be of no considerable help to the farmers of Canada.

We will go on with the discussion of the resolution and we hope that in due course, the sooner the better, we will have the bill in our hands, and at that point we will be able to discuss the matter in detail. So far as we are concerned, unless there are matters which require an answer and which are brought up in other parts of the house, we are inclined to get this legislation before us as soon as possible so that we may discuss the details and indicate our position on the bill itself.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I think on all other occasions when the government introduced a resolution on agriculture, and subsequently a bill, it has always been received throughout the country with a tremendous amount of interest, and certainly this resolution which has been on the order paper since October 25 is no exception. As a matter of fact I doubt whether ever in the history of the industry we have seen such a degree of expectancy on the part of farmers or as much concern with regard to the government's explanation of a resolution.

Certainly that is the only conclusion I can reach based on the large number of letters I have received from my constituents and others, and from conversations I have had with representatives of farm organizations who have been visiting here in Ottawa since the beginning of the session. It is understandable, Mr. Chairman, why there should be this degree of expectancy. It is born of despair and desperation; despair because in the past whenever farm delegations presented petitions to the former government their pleas were always shrugged off, and desperation because the plight of agriculture in this country is such that today there can be no thought of further failure.

Ever since the end of the war, and in particular in the last two or three years, in spite of the fact that when visiting Ottawa farm delegations have used the government's own figures to illustrate the plight in which agriculture now finds itself, the government has turned a deaf ear to their representations and pleas.

The three men most responsible in the past paid little or no attention to those pleas. The former minister of finance merely shrugged his shoulders and said, "The farmers never had it so good". The former minister of trade and commerce was of course always anxious to give us the benefit of his wide business experience. He told the farm delegations that if the farmers could not make a go of it on the farm they had better quit and move to town, but he neglected to say what they should do when they moved to town. The former minister of agriculture merely sat and said nothing.

The latter hon. gentleman, of course, had a plan. He knew there was going to be an election shortly and he realized that something had to be done. He had been diligently working out a plan that he hoped if carried out properly would re-elect a great many western Liberal members to this house. As the election drew closer he would revise his plan. The plight of the farmer gave him great pangs of remorse. Just before the election, after having jealously guarded this plan and nursed it very carefully, he launched his secret weapon. He put a floor price under old hens over five pounds.

That launching, like another launching of recent date, was also a failure; it fizzled out. I can imagine that the minister must have felt pretty sheepish when he returned to Ottawa following the election, because after all he had hit rock bottom.

Of course this is all past history now, and the agricultural producer is looking forward to this new government doing something for him. Certainly he has every reason to be optimistic that this government is going to do something on his behalf in view of what I propose to read from an official publication of the Conservative party, written over the signature of the Prime Minister, which definitely indicates that he understands the problem.

As a matter of fact western Canadian producers do not expect to receive preferential treatment from this government, but they do realize that the three men now most responsible in this connection come from western Canada, and certainly there can be no excuse for their not knowing the problems which confront western agriculturists. I refer, of course, to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. This is what the Prime Minister said in his booklet with regard to the problem facing the agricultural producer:

> The farmer is being squeezed between rising costs of production and falling farm prices. His markets have been lost or diminished because of the ineffective trade policies of the federal government, while, year after year, farm organizations have approached the government with briefs in which the plight of agriculture is set out in detail.
> In general, the government has failed to act and has quoted statistics. The farmer's share of the national income has gone down in the last eight years by some 6 per cent and the costs of goods and services that the farmer has to buy have increased by 20 per cent. Furthermore, there has been a continuing reduction in the farmer's share of the consumer dollar, from 59.3 cents of the dollar to approximately 50 cents today.

On the basis of what I have read the farmer realizes that the Prime Minister is well acquainted with current existing conditions in the industry, and he is very optimistic that the government is going to do something in this regard. Further to that I would like to read the government's pledge. In this same regard the Prime Minister said to the farmers across the country:

> My pledge to farmers in all parts of Canada is:—To assure that the farmer shall receive his fair share of the national income. My objectives will be:—Equality for farmers in Canada's economy. My desire is to correct the social inequity and the inferior economic position into which agriculture has been allowed to fall.

No wonder the farmer has been highly optimistic about the treatment he can expect to receive at the hands of this government; yet after examining this resolution and being both as optimistic and charitable as I can, the very best thing I can say about it is that it falls far short of the producer's expectations in regard to the fair deal he was promised prior to June 10. As far as I can see this resolution represents merely an extension of the present Agricultural Prices Support Act, and I doubt if it is even that good. Even if it were as good, I would point out that that act has been on the statute books since 1944 and has done very little in terms of stabilizing agricultural prices with the possible exception of the price of butter. Furthermore, I would remind hon. members that this act has been roundly condemned on every occasion by those who now form the government.

This morning we listened to the minister make a partial explanation of the resolution. Being as kind as possible to the minister, the best I can say for the explanation he gave is that it is the biggest load of garbage that has ever been dumped on the farmer's doorstep.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is saying a lot.

Mr. Bryson: Yes. Now, what does the minister hope this proposed legislation is going to do for the farmer? He hopes for a number of things. First of all he hopes it will give some price stability. His second hope is that it will not be an incentive for the farmer to produce agricultural products. His third hope is that it will protect the farmer against drastic declines in prices. He also indicated that when the need is demonstrated possibly other agricultural products will be taken into account in the legislation. The minister was dead sure of one thing; that under this proposed legislation the farmer will continue to starve, but the minister hopes with a little more dignity than he did under the former administration's legislation.

With all sincerity I say that time is running out on this government. If the bill that follows this resolution does not do more than was mentioned in the explanation given by the minister prior to the luncheon adjournment; if it does not attempt to grapple with the basic problems of Canadian agriculture, then the farmer can only conclude that all the promises made by the Conservatives prior to the election were indeed hollow and of little or no value.

What does the resolution propose? We are told it is going to accomplish a number of things but I say it must meet the following four tests. What products are going to be supported? Are these products going to be based on a fair cost-price relationship? Who is going to be supported? Certainly there was nothing in the explanation offered by the minister that would indicate whether the processor or the actual producer is going to be supported. Are these prices forward prices? These prices should be forward prices and certainly the minister gave no explanation as to whether we were going to have a truly forward pricing formula in the proposed legislation. No agricultural legislation can be comprehensive or of value unless it contains satisfactory answers to the four questions I posed.

If we can answer these questions in the affirmative, then surely we are at least halfway to establishing a comprehensive agricultural policy for Canada. Certainly we have to dispose of our wheat surplus and so on, but I maintain that if we have a basic policy such as I have outlined in the four questions I have posed, then we have gone a long way in building an agricultural policy in this country. We have a sort of blind spot with regard to the plight of agriculture relative to the sale of wheat. It is not a question altogether of getting rid of our wheat. If the farmers got rid of all of their wheat at present prices they would still find themselves in a disastrous position. At the wheat pool convention held recently in Regina Mr. J. H. Wesson made this statement:

> The farm problem has not arisen primarily from the fact that wheat is not being sold. In the period 1951-56 we sold 168 million bushels more annually than in the previous six year period, but in that period wheat prices dropped 40 cents per bushel or 21 per cent while farm costs rose by 46 per cent.

At the same meeting Mr. George McIvor had this to say:

> Last year alone, because of wider spreads in grade and currency exchange, wheat to the producer dropped 20 cents per bushel.

So it is not just a question of marketing our surplus wheat but a question of price, and that is the important factor. I am not going to attempt to put all the figures on the record, but from 1952 to 1956 farm net income all across Canada fell by 15 per cent. In Alberta it was down 27 per cent and in my own province 31 per cent. Farm prices in Saskatchewan have dropped 28 per cent while farm costs have risen over 49 per cent.

[Mr. Bryson.]

Last year average farm income in Saskatchewan per individual amounted to around $445. This year it is estimated that it will be almost cut in half and will be somewhere around $225.

That is not brought about by inefficiency but by low prices. We had certainly hoped that in the bill to be based on this resolution that factor would be taken into consideration. The last dominion bureau of statistics figures available show that since 1945 farm machinery has gone up over 94 per cent, other materials over 72 per cent, taxes and interest charges 55 per cent and freight rates 90 per cent. That is why we say we should have a parity price, a price that bears a fair relationship to the costs of production on the one hand and the prices received by agricultural producers on the other.

We also have not been told who is going to be supported under the legislation. Is it going to be the producer or is it going to be the processor? Surely the legislation will provide something better than the present Agricultural Prices Support Act. We know what happened in the case of hogs. When the price of hogs reached the floor the floor was lowered, and so we are looking for something better in this legislation.

I should like to ask the government this question. Has any consideration been given to a two-price system? There again I think many of the farmers' problems could be solved if we were to recognize the importance of introducing a two-price system. I have here a list of products, and out of 14 items there are nine in which we have no surplus whatsoever and two or three others have what is referred to as a manageable surplus. Here is a field in which the government could take action and would have jurisdiction to carry out its program. It would not penalize the consumer.

We should have parity prices for all agricultural products consumed in this country, and it is conceivable that by so doing it would not cost the treasury of the country one nickel. Certainly it would not penalize the consumer, because over the years many farm organizations have produced figures to show that a parity price for wheat, for instance, would simply mean that the increase in the price of a loaf of bread because of the wheat content would only represent 1 cent. I agree that the government would have to take action on the manufacturing level as well as on the producer level under such a program.

We also heard nothing this morning about deficiency payments. I am all in favour of deficiency payments. I realize that in the export field the government has little or no jurisdiction over the prices it receives for the things that are exported, but I maintain that even in the case of exports the producer should be paid a parity price, and the difference between that price and what the government is able to realize on the export market should be made up to the farmer in the form of a deficiency payment.

When we get the bill we will naturally be able to discuss more fully and intelligently the matters we find in it. With the very brief explanation the minister made this morning and the generalities of the resolution it is rather difficult to deal in detail with the matter. Finally, I simply say that the farmers are going to be keenly disappointed and they are in for a rude awakening if they thought the legislation presented this morning was going to do even a few of the things the government promised it would do prior to June 10.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I should like to say I was greatly disappointed with the resolution as explained to us by the minister this morning. I look upon the main essential of a support price program as the assuring to farmers of the maintenance of a fair relationship between the prices of farm products and the prices of other commodities. The present proposal appears to ignore that relationship entirely.

What does the legislation actually do? It merely guarantees that the average of the depressed prices of the past three years shall not deteriorate by more than 20 per cent in any one year. That is all it guarantees. It is true the minister stated that the government may decide to set a support price of 105 per cent or 120 per cent of the base price, but there is no guarantee that this will be done. In other words, farmers will have to depend upon the whims of the government in order to get a fair price. Under legislation of that kind you might expect there would be good prices in the year before an election and that the prices would be very poor right after the election. That would be the danger.

What we need is something in the legislation to assure farmers that they will be receiving fair support prices at all times. As to the number of products that will be covered if the legislation remains as it is, I do not think it will make very much difference; but on the other hand I believe the legislation should specify the products that will come under it. I suggest to the minister that the very best thing he could do would be to send a copy of a draft bill to the agriculture committee, call representatives of the farm organizations, let the committee work on a bill, send it back to the house and then introduce it. I do not think he should ask members of the house to give second reading to a bill of this kind merely for the purpose of getting it to the committee. I do not believe he has stated yet that the bill is to be sent to the committee, but I think the government is going to run into very serious criticism from farm organizations if the bill is not submitted to the agriculture committee for their consideration and the calling of witnesses from the various farm organizations.

As I say, all this bill does is guarantee that the average of the prices for the past three years shall not deteriorate by more than 20 per cent in any one year. If the past three years or five years had been good years that might not be too bad a provision; but when you consider that agriculture is a depressed industry—and members on all sides of the house have stressed that fact for a number of years—then to suggest that you are giving farmers adequate protection by assuring them you will not allow this situation to deteriorate by more than another 20 per cent is certainly not even beginning to meet the requirements of the situation.

When you consider that over the past 10 years farmers' costs have risen by 46 per cent while their prices have deteriorated by 7 per cent, it is easy to understand why agriculture today is a depressed industry. You find right across western Canada, and I believe the situation is the same in the east, that the young men are leaving the farms because they are not content to continue to work long hours and take the small remuneration they get as compared with the returns in other industries.

In western Canada you can go into many places and find the farms being operated by old men. The children have left for the city. These farmers find it practically impossible to get labour. This is the situation as we know it in western Canada. I am not saying that some farmers are not prosperous, because some are. There will always be exceptions to the general rule. We believe the immediate need is to introduce legislation that will help stabilize the prices of farm products so they shall bear a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities.

I know there are many people who oppose the idea of supporting farm prices at a fair level on the ground that it will create surpluses. The minister, in referring to the United States support program, said it had built up surpluses; and that is true. However, this was largely due to the fact they did not have a very efficient marketing system. Let the minister note this fact, that since the United States government adopted the surplus disposal program their surpluses are moving out at a faster rate than they are accumulating. The only trouble is they waited too long to adopt a realistic marketing policy. Had this policy been adopted earlier, these surpluses would not have accumulated in the way they have.

I am sure no one would suggest limiting production to the extent that it would merely satisfy our own needs. Any excess of our production should be made available to the nations that need it. Unfortunately that has not been the policy of this government in the past. We have said to other nations, "If you need our products you can have them provided you pay us in dollars. If you cannot, so far as we are concerned you can starve". Our surpluses of wheat are in excess of other nations' ability to buy with dollars, but they are not in excess of the needs of the people of other nations. Even in regard to wheat no one can say that the world surplus is too large. The world surplus of wheat only represents a few months' actual supply, and if the world suffered a series of crop failures we could easily have world-wide famine. Of course the trouble is that Canada holds too large a share of that surplus.

Now, this being the situation we feel that action must be taken to ensure that government agricultural policies encourage and maintain a high level of production of the desired type of products. Provision must be made for storing a reserve of certain farm products to guard against the danger of crop failures, and it is absolutely essential that steps be taken to see that that reserve of food be not allowed to force the prices of farm products below economic levels. Trade policies must be instituted to make it possible for Canada to make these surplus farm products available to nations that are not able to obtain them through the normal channels of trade.

Whenever the question of support prices is raised you will always find some people who criticize the proposal. You invariably find editorials in eastern newspapers, and unfortunately in some of the western newspapers, criticizing a policy of what they call giving the farmer a hand-out. We in this group have always maintained that the farmers have a right to demand support prices for their farm products. It will be recalled that in the latter years of the war the prime minister of that day, the late Mackenzie King, pointed out that at that time farmers were being compelled to accept less than the world price as a result of government policy. He said this was part of a stabilization program and they would guarantee, as part of the post-war policy, to stabilize the prices of farm products so they maintained a fair relationship with the prices of other commodities.

As a sign of good faith the Agricultural Prices Support Act was introduced. There is one serious deficiency in that act. The Prime Minister had promised to maintain the prices of the main farm products, yet for some reason or other wheat was not covered by the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Wheat is unquestionably one of the main farm products in Canada today. Had wheat been placed under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and had the formula that has been used under that act been applied to wheat to the full extent, then the price of wheat would have been $2.37 a bushel. That is a figure given by the bureau of statistics.

Let me say a few words about the Agricultural Prices Support Act as we have it at the present time. I have always supported the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I think it is a good act if it is used to the fullest extent possible. I recall that in January, 1951, I think it was, the former minister of agriculture spoke to a convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He was asked to define the formula for setting prices. I am not using his exact words, but I believe he said it was the intention to maintain the prices of farm products so they would bear the same relationship to the prices of other commodities as existed in the base period 1943 to 1945. Personally I think that was a good formula. My main quarrel with the government is that they have not lived up to that intention to the full extent. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture advocated the base period of 1925 to 1929, but actually the period 1943 to 1945 gives a 1 per cent advantage over 1925 to 1929.

Unfortunately the government have not maintained the prices of farm products today at 100 per cent of parity for the base period 1943-1945. As of January this year the support price on butter was 81 per cent of parity for that period; the support price on hogs was 80 per cent of parity for that period, and the support price on eggs was 54 per cent of parity. What will the new proposal given to us this morning mean? Well, these parity prices I have given are approximately the same for the past three years, so those would be the average prices for the past three years. Instead of the farmers getting 81 per cent of parity on butter they would only get 80 per cent of 81 per cent or only 64 per cent. Instead of getting 80 per cent of parity on hogs they would only get 80 per cent of 80 per cent or only 64 per cent. Instead of getting 54 per cent of parity on eggs they would get only approximately 43 per cent. So under the new formula the farmers will not be anything like as well off as they are under the present formula.

It is true that the present formula is not written into the act and the formula proposed by the minister is to be written in. But I would prefer to operate under an unwritten formula that is fairly satisfactory than to operate under a formula that is written into the act but that is far from being satisfactory. I suggest to the minister that this act should be sent to the agriculture committee before the house is asked to give it second reading, because when second reading is given members must endorse the principle of the act.

I do not like the principle of the act, because it does not guarantee to the farmers a fair relationship; and unless a support act can guarantee that fair relationship it is practically worthless. It raises the amount of the revolving fund from $200 million to $250 million. That does not appear to be very important, because although we have had a revolving fund of $200 million in the past the total costs up to date amount to $99 million, and $70 million of that amount was in connection with foot-and-mouth disease, so that in the period from 1944 to 1957 only $29 million has been used in so far as support prices are concerned. There is therefore no reason to assume that just because the revolving fund is raised from $200 million to $250 million it will mean that larger amounts will be paid out.

In western Canada many farmers felt that the government had committed a breach of faith on the question of support prices. They had been assured by the former prime minister that if they did not object too strongly to having to have a ceiling on their farm products during the war, they would be assured stabilized prices in the future. They assert, and I think rightly so, that that promise was not lived up to. As a consequence, the last election fairly well liquidated the Liberals in western Canada.

The Conservative party was very critical of the Liberals for failing to enable the farmers to obtain their fair share of the national income. That was one of their main election promises. The Prime Minister has stressed the urgency of raising the farm standard of living by a program of support prices, expansion of markets and the increasing of terminal storage. I would agree with the Minister of Agriculture that support prices alone cannot rectify the situation. All these three things are necessary. But I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the attitude of the Prime Minister on the question of support prices at the last session of parliament, when he moved a resolution as follows:

> In the opinion of this house consideration should be given to introducing during the present session of parliament legislation which will assure farmers support prices for agricultural products based on a fair price-cost relationship,—

And that amendment was then amended by adding the words:

> —thereby resulting in agriculture receiving its reasonable share of the national income based on parity.

The Prime Minister supported that resolution and the Conservative party voted in favour of it. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture would not suggest that the present legislation can in any way guarantee what the resolution of the Prime Minister was aimed at achieving.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the individual farm unions recently presented quite valuable briefs, in my opinion, to members of parliament, and in those briefs they have advocated support prices and deficiency payments to agriculture. I believe both these things have their part to play in any agricultural program.

First of all, support prices should be set early in advance of the year in which they are to become effective. This support price should be on the basis of parity so far as the domestic market is concerned. We believe that exports should be sold at the best prices obtainable on the world market, preferably under international agreement. Then to the extent that the aggregate of sales in domestic and export markets fails to provide to farmers their fair share of the national income, deficiency payments should be made.

That, of course, is a two-price system. Whilst it might take a little time to put a two-price system into operation so far as all agricultural products are concerned, it would be a comparatively easy or simple thing to apply the two-price system in so far as wheat is concerned, because all wheat is sold through the wheat board. The wheat sold through the wheat board in the domestic market would be sold at parity, and the rest would be sold at the world market price and the farmers would receive an average of the two in the final payment.

I know some people are critical of the idea of a two-price system, but after all if they are critical of agriculture for asking for the adoption of a two-price system, they should be critical of all the secondary industries which have operated under that system for as long back as I can remember. Secondary industries set their prices internally at a price that will give them the cost of production and a fair return on their investment.

Then to the extent that they have surplus products, they are exported abroad at the best price that can be obtained; and very often the prices obtained for the products exported abroad are considerably lower than the prices charged in the domestic market.

Agriculture unfortunately or, I might say, primary industry on the other hand has not been able to carry that policy into effect. As a matter of fact we have found that whilst about 94 per cent of all farm products apart from wheat are consumed in the domestic market, the small percentage of 6 per cent that is exported abroad has set the price for the 94 per cent that is consumed in Canada. In other words we allow the tail to wag the dog.

We believe that the most efficient way in which to operate that two-price system would be through marketing boards; and as I have already pointed out, it would be quite a simple operation in so far as the wheat board is concerned. In so far as marketing boards have been established on a provincial basis, it might be possible to apply the two-price system through those marketing boards, but it may be quite a while before the farmers throughout Canada are prepared to sell all their produce through marketing boards on the same basis as the wheat board. We therefore feel that in the meantime ways and means should be found of applying the two-price system without the operation of marketing boards. There are many ways in which the two-price system can be applied without waiting for marketing boards to be established.

To those people who have the idea that it would not be fair to charge the people in Canada a higher price than is charged externally, may I say this. Let them remember that when the farm organizations advocate a two-price system, and advocate that the price on the domestic market should be at parity, by parity they merely mean a price that bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities.

Is any member of this house going to say that the farmers in Canada are not entitled to receive for their products sold in Canada a price that bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities? That is all they are asking. Certainly they would like to have a parity price for all their farm products, but we have no control over the export market. We cannot control the prices in the export market, but we can control the price internally.

We are therefore urging upon the government the desirability of establishing a two-price system so that in the domestic market the prices on the different markets shall be such that it bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities, no higher and no less, and then get the best price we can in the world market. Then if at the end of operations for the year we found there was a serious disparity between the national income and the farmers' share of it, deficiency payments could be put into effect in order to remove that disparity.

I am not going to say any more at this time, Mr. Chairman. I think my time is fairly well up. I appreciate that this is not an easy problem to solve. I would therefore urge upon the minister the desirability of sending the bill to the agriculture committee in the form of a draft bill.

There are plenty of precedents for that. Back in 1945, when we drafted the veterans' charter the government sent those bills, before second reading, to the veterans committee and told it to work on those bills and redraft them in whatever shape the committee thought necessary. The committee did that; they made many changes in the bills and then the minister, meeting us in camera, told us to what extent he was prepared to meet the changes we had advocated. He went quite a long way in that regard.

Now that was a new procedure, I believe, at the time but every veteran member who has spoken in this house since then has praised that procedure because, as a result of it, we got a veterans' charter which is probably as good as any to be found in the world. I believe if the Minister of Agriculture would adopt that policy in regard to this bill we might have a bill which would meet and would earn the approval of all the farm organizations in this country.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words about the resolution under discussion at this time which provides for a considerable increase in the amounts appropriated for the administration of the agricultural prices support act.

This morning I followed rather attentively the remarks made by the Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). I must say that I was a little disappointed at the way in which the government plans to go about solving the problem of price support. That is why I hasten to submit a proposal which I believe constructive and which I commend to the minister's earnest attention. Here is what I have in mind. With certain products, it just will not do to announce only twelve months in advance at what level the price will be fixed. On several previous occasions I have pointed out that in so far as butter is concerned, more particularly, the producer should be able to rely on a fixed price for a long period ahead of time, so as to plan his production and determine how much he should spend on improving his stock, for example, without risking a dead loss.

To my mind that is a basic principle of sound farm management, one which indeed has been recognized in the past, for it was in 1953, I believe,—I did not have time to check—that the government fixed for three years in advance the support price for butter.

There is no doubt that, particularly since the end of 1955, it has been hard going for the farmers of this country. Recently the report of the Department of Agriculture mentioned that their gross income would be greater in 1957 than in 1956. However, their net income will be lower because of higher costs of production. The farmer's immediate prospects are therefore not very rosy.

Then, too, it is now recognized that the welfare of people generally, throughout Canada, is intimately bound up with the welfare of the farmer. In the constituency of Beauce more particularly I think it may safely be said that there is a very close relationship between the position of the farmer and that of the other groups, workers, employees, storekeepers and manufacturers, and that the prosperity of these people is largely dependent upon the revenue of the farmer.

Now, among the sources of revenue of farmers in the constituency of Beauce, the maple sugar industry stands out both in respect of the number of people who are engaged in it—42 per cent approximately—and of the revenue it provides, which equals that secured from all other forest products combined. It must be noted here that for the last two years this industry has been in a very depressed state. May I just say at this point that because this product is marketed largely outside the province that produces it, and especially outside Canada, I believe it is the federal government's duty to help solve the problem of marketing this product.

According to reliable surveys, it costs about 25 or 26 cents to produce a pound of maple syrup. Well, this year, the sale price has ranged between 15 and 22 cents a pound. Last year it was a little higher, but far from satisfactory. The situation is therefore intolerable and it is hardly surprising that, for two years now, many maple sugar producers did not even bother tapping their trees, and some producers even decided to chop them down. In my opinion, it is most undesirable to let an industry die out whose raw material, labour and equipment are distinctly Canadian. I do not believe I am overstating the case when I say that if the maple sugar industry ever disappears from the county of Beauce, nearly half our farmers will quit the farm.

I am glad to be able to say that maple syrup producers have tried and are still trying very hard to put up a solid front to the buyers. Some of them are members of the Société coopérative des producteurs de sucre (sugar producers' co-operative), an excellent organization. The Catholic Farmers' Union, for its part, has taken on a huge job, for which it deserves congratulations, in developing a joint marketing plan with the co-operation of the provincial marketing board. A new group, still not fully organized, the Syndicat des producteurs de sucre (sugar producers' union), has only recently entered the field but has already achieved creditable results which, though not spectacular, are undeniable.

Last summer, when the Société coopérative was able to pay 18 to 21 cents a pound, because of a guarantee provided by the federal government with the help of public funds, independent producers had to sell to dealers at 15 cents a pound, or risk having to keep their product indefinitely. I repeat here what I stated during the last electoral campaign: "This procedure constitutes, on the part of the government, serious discrimination against a considerable number of producers". And that is where the support price, to which I will come in a moment, would have provided equal opportunities to all. In the light of these facts, I felt it my duty to do all I could to help those unjustly treated producers by supporting the activity of the new union. They held out so firmly that dealers thought it wise to raise their prices gradually and I can say that, for two or three months, they are paying almost as much as does the Société coopérative itself. There is no doubt in my mind that this is largely the result of the unremitting efforts of the sugar producers' union.

However, in spite of the work and good will of all concerned, the problem is far from being solved and I urge the government to give us their co-operation.

On March 28 last, as well as before and after that date, through representations to ministers of agriculture, I asked here for the establishment of a support price, just as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Landry) did himself in this house on October 18 last. After having his departmental experts study my suggestion, the then minister of agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) advised me that it was not accepted. To be factual, I must say that, at the time, the parties concerned were by no means in perfect agreement.

I may add that for the past few months opinions have changed and that the great majority of producers I have met, and with whom I have discussed the problem, now think that the government should establish price support. The Catholic Farmers' Union itself, at its 33rd annual convention, recommended to the federal government the establishment of a support price of 25 cents a pound for maple syrup. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am on very good ground for renewing my request for a price support which, in my estimation, should be at least 25 cents.

Now then, if I come back now to what the Minister of Agriculture explained to the committee this morning, and if I take the average of prices paid in the last three years, namely 1955, 1956 and 1957, I get an average price of 26⅓ cents. On the other hand, if I take 80 per cent of that 26⅓ cents, the result is 21 cents a pound. And if I should be as optimistic as the minister was this morning, and take 105 per cent of this base price, I obtain a guaranteed price of 27.1 cents a pound. I would hesitate to believe that the minister will always be so enthusiastic and that he will set the base price at 105 per cent which, as I said, would represent, in the case of maple sugar, 26 cents for the three years. I doubt very much that this percentage would be granted the producer. It would set a guaranteed price of 27 cents a pound, which is just about what the producer of maple sugar and the Catholic Farmers' Union have been asking for. Some of those who are against this price support measure have argued that, to all intents and purposes, this support price would become a ceiling price. The answer to this objection is to be found in what has happened with the sale of pork. While the support price of this commodity was set at 23 cents, as hon. members know, its selling price this fall went up to 35 cents and, if I am not mistaken, even to 37 cents a pound.

A few words now on the problem of the price of butcher cattle and calves. In this field, unstable prices are very harmful to producers, and not only to those who specialize in raising this type of cattle, but also to owners of dairy cattle. Indeed with the increasingly careful selection practised nowadays, every dairy herd includes a large number of heads which are classified as substandard and must be slaughtered. And when you think of how much it costs today for feed —and the same could be said of fertilizers— you will easily understand that the raising of beef cattle is hardly a paying proposition for the dairy owner. It will often eat up any profit he might have made out of his dairy herd. The same is true of the production of butcher calves.

For those reasons, I strongly suggest to the hon. minister that he very carefully consider this problem, and that the experts who will make up the advisory committee, as provided in the resolution also give their most careful and early attention to my proposal of a support price in the case of butcher cattle and calves, as well as maple syrup.

And now I want to say a few words about other products already under a price support which, I feel, should be brought to a higher level. First, as far as butter is concerned, a support price of 58 cents might have been adequate around 1952 and the following years, but is obviously no longer so today, considering the increased costs of production. This problem, however, presents a new aspect which we cannot afford to overlook if not only the producer but the consumer as well are to be protected. Indeed, I believe that, as I have said many times in the past, if the price of butter to the consumer was held for several years at a reasonable level, it is because the government, through price support, has piled up huge stocks. This, I might say, is a constant threat to the speculators who might have been tempted to create an artificial shortage with consequent unjustified and unfair prices to the buyer, and, of course, without any profit to the producer either. Just remember what happened during the winter 1951-52. After just such a scandalous manoeuvre by speculators, the retail price soared to 85 and even 90 cents a pound, while the producer of course got nothing whatever out of this exorbitant increase.

Now, according to the figures given to the house by the hon. Minister of Agriculture on the 5th of this month, butter stocks have been dwindling steadily for the past three years. From 92 million pounds in 1955, they fell to 81 million pounds in 1956 and to 34 million pounds at the end of last November. Without being much of an economist, I think we just reached a danger point and that we are on the threshold of an early and serious shortage, which is bound to touch off an unfair rise of prices at the consumer level. To protect the buyer, butter stocks, in my opinion, should be built up, and I think that the only practical way to make this possible would be to raise the price support to 63 cents and even to 65 cents a pound.

And there again, if I refer to the hon. minister's report, and take as a basic rate the average price paid to farmers in the last three years, I find that this is not very hard to figure out. We have now 58 cents; if we take 80 per cent of 58 cents, we get a price of 46.4 cents a pound, which, as the hon. member who preceded me just read, is the only real guarantee now given by the hon. gentleman in the introductory resolution. If, on the other hand, you get all excited about the way the Department of Agriculture is going to establish this price, and if the basic rate is raised to 100 or 105 per cent, you get a ceiling price of 60.9 cents a pound. This is indeed far from the floor price requested by the Catholic Farmers' Union at their 33rd annual convention.

Knowing the minister's almost anxious hope that his bill will go through with the shortest possible delay, hon. members will understand that I am summarizing as much as possible a discussion that would call for far more explanations.

And finally, one last word to suggest that the support price for pork be raised at least to the level it had reached over the last few years, that is 26 cents for grade A.

I know that this year the prevailing price has been far above the support price. However, there are signs now of a declining trend and there is a possibility that sooner or later that trend will gain momentum and reach the floor price which, at the present time, is unquestionably inadequate. In the last few weeks, I have talked over this matter with several Beauce farmers, and all of them agree that, considering the cost of labour, of building piggeries, and especially the cost of feed, 23 cents is altogether inadequate.

Against a raise in support prices, it was claimed that too high a price would induce a lot of people to go into hog breeding, who have now no interest whatever in doing it.

As a matter of fact, experience has shown that industrialists, business men, merchants, and even lawyers and doctors have gone into hog raising and, incidentally helped prices to come down by causing a surplus on the market.

I would have a suggestion to offer to do away with this difficulty, and that would be to limit the number of heads which each breeder would be allowed to deliver to the board in a given period. The limit would be set by experts and could vary from year to year and even from district to district. Hon. members will please note that there would be no question of limiting production, but only the number of heads delivered to the board. This would certainly eliminate breeders who are not bona fide farmers, who do not need to raise hogs to earn a living and who are interested in this type of production only so long as they can organize it on a large scale, to reap considerable profits. This would hardly be possible with the system I am suggesting.

I will close on that remark while at the same time expressing the sincere wish that the measure under discussion may really prove helpful to the Canadian farmer and, at the same time protect the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I cannot resist commenting that I could not help but wonder as I looked at the benches opposite which are almost entirely empty with only one minister in his seat until a few minutes ago what must be the attitude of the members of the government toward this proposed legislation.

Mr. Cardiff: There happen to be two ministers present. If you cannot see any better than that you had better have your eyes tested.

Mr. Harkness: You are as inaccurate as usual.

Mr. Tucker: There are just two ministers present now and until just a few minutes ago, as I said, there was just one minister in his seat and that statement was quite correct. Now there are two.

Mr. Harkness: Until about four minutes ago there were others present. Two ministers just left their seats a few minutes ago.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Oh, do not bother.

Mr. Argue: One cannot blame them for leaving.

Mr. Hodgson: If that is the only election platform you have, you will be licked the next time, too.

Mr. Tucker: If they had left while I was speaking I would not have said anything about it but they were not here even before I started to speak. I could not help but wonder if this was indicative of the attitude of the government towards this resolution. Perhaps they may think there is nothing of significance in this legislation and they should not regard it as being important. If it is really the attitude of the government that this is not important legislation and it is just brought in for no real purpose but to create an effect, that the government is doing something then there is going to be a great deal of disappointment in the country about that.

Before I leave the question of the government paying little or no attention to the deliberations that take place in this chamber —all members of the cabinet and many other members being absent with the exception of the Minister of Agriculture and one other minister—I would remind hon. members of all that we were told about the intention of this government to restore parliament to its ancient glory and to pay more attention to parliament and its rights and all that sort of thing. After all when the government brings in a resolution of this kind which should be considered important and no member of the cabinet is here except the Minister of Agriculture and one other minister to pay attention to what might be said in the discussion at the resolution stage—this indicates to me that the government does not care very much about what may be said in this chamber.

Mr. Harkness: You are completely wrong. That is an absolutely unjustifiable statement.

Mr. Tucker: If this legislation is considered important, as it should be, I think there should be more of the cabinet here than the two ministers who are present.

Mr. Aiken: Look around you.

Mr. Hodgson: What, to listen to you?

Mr. Tucker: No, I said that if they had left while I was speaking I would not have said anything about it but they have not been here all afternoon.

Mr. Cardiff: Have you any idea what they are doing?

Mr. Tucker: The present Prime Minister said that the first job confronting the government is to restore the rights of parliament and that the Conservative government would do certain things in this regard. One of the things he said it would do would be to restore the power of parliamentary committees. In the first place the government is apparently taking the attitude that it does not care very much what is said in the House of Commons and there has been no suggestion made that it is going to make use of a parliamentary committee in this important matter. This is another violation of the promises about which we heard so much and all of which were supposed to be carried out.

Mr. Rowe: What are you reading from?

Mr. Tucker: This is a statement from a speech made by the Prime Minister on May 16, 1957. I am obliged to my hon. old friend across the way for asking me to cite the authority.

Mr. Rowe: How did it get that red cover on it?

Mr. Harkness: What is the name of that book?

Mr. Tucker: It is quoted from the Winnipeg Tribune which I do not think hon. members would suggest is an unreliable newspaper.

Mr. Harkness: What is the name of the book you are quoting from?

Mr. Tucker: Well, it may look like a big book but it is called—

Mr. Argue: Three pounds of Tory promises.

Mr. Aiken: The Liberal book of knowledge.

Mr. Tucker: This appears to be a very large book but I might point out that it contains some of the promises on which you were elected and I do not think you should feel too badly if I refer to it.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, if the hon. member proposes to start quoting from a book I suggest he should tell us the title of the book so we will know from what source his quotations come.

Mr. Tucker: It is called, "Diefenbaker's Promises—1957". I will hold the book up in plain sight for all to see.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask who is the author of that book?

Mr. Tucker: The National Liberal Federation.

Mr. Harkness: Oh yes, that is the Liberal interpretation.

Mr. Tucker: These are absolutely reliable quotations and hon. members can verify them. Hon. gentlemen opposite instead of being so uneasy about having these promises quoted to them should be glad to hear them.

Mr. Harkness: We are not uneasy but we want to know the source.

Mr. Tucker: I have given you the source and you can look it up.

Mr. Harkness: Still, that source is not very reliable.

Mr. Tucker: The Winnipeg Tribune?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: The source of that book is not reliable and I would say the book is not very reliable, either.

Mr. Tucker: That quotation was drawn from the Winnipeg Tribune.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I remind the hon. member that subsection 2 of standing order 59 says that speeches in committees of the whole house must be strictly relevent to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I am pointing out that the Prime Minister said he was going to restore parliament by among other things respecting parliamentary committees. Surely the question I am dealing with is appropriate because, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia, one way in which parliament can deal with such a matter effectively, as was also pointed out by the Prime Minister, in the excerpts from the report of his speech in the Winnipeg Tribune which I read, is to have a parliamentary committee given a chance to study the government's proposal. There has been no suggestion that is going to be done. As pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia, this should be one of the most important bills brought before parliament at this session and it should not be treated in the way it is being treated by hon. members opposite. There should be some suggestion that there is going to be some chance to examine it in a parliamentary committee but there has been no such suggestion.

Apparently the attitude is to have only enough people present to man the house, pay no attention to what hon. members say and go ahead as has already been decided by the government regardless of the ideas expressed in parliament. I just draw attention to that, Mr. Chairman.

In the light of the promises made by the Prime Minister when he was seeking the support of the country during the last election the country had a right to expect that worthwhile changes would be made when the government was elected to office with respect to the position of our farmers. For example, in his opening speech in the campaign the Prime Minister—

Mr. Hodgson: Back to the book.

Mr. Tucker: —as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle Herald of April 26, 1957, used these words:

> A flexible price support program for farm goods to ensure farmers adequate parity based on fair price-cost relationship.

In the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 26, 1957 the following appeared:

> Farmers would get their fair share of the national income, he added, through a flexible price support program.

Their fair share of the national income. That is exactly the point where the present government and its leader found fault with what had been done by the previous government. The Prime Minister said that the previous government had not assured farmers a fair share of the national income and the Conservatives were going to see that they were assured a fair share of the national income. The country fully expected that when this legislation was brought in it would provide for that. But it is far from providing for it. I have compared what the minister has said the proposed bill will provide with the Agricultural Prices Support Act and actually, if the minister has reported fairly on what the bill is going to do, it does not change the situation in any substantial way for the better.

Mr. Harkness: You have not understood the speech. You had better go and get a copy from Hansard and read it.

Mr. Tucker: I followed it very carefully and not only did I understand that the government is doing nothing but I think the country generally and the farmers will understand it. This sort of thing is not going to fool the farmer.

Mr. Harkness: I think the farmers will understand all right.

Mr. Tucker: You hoped they would be impressed by your bringing in this bill.

Mr. Cardiff: You hope they will be impressed by you.

Mr. Pickersgill: They certainly will not be impressed by the hon. member for Huron.

Mr. Tucker: I would hope that if we ever made any promises as explicit as these some attention would be paid to keeping them.

Mr. Hodgson: The Liberal party never fulfilled any promises at any time.

Mr. Tucker: If you would make a speech some time it would be a good thing.

Mr. Hodgson: I will make one right after you.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised that hon. members opposite do not want me to bring out the facts.

Mr. Cardiff: Why don't you go ahead and make your speech and not indulge in so much of this kind of criticism?

Mr. Tucker: The government is doing practically nothing and I suppose the reason why hon. members opposite do not want to speak and try to prevent others from being heard is that they are so ashamed of the legislation that they do not want to say anything in support of it. I would point out to the minister that section 9, subsection 1 of the Agriculture Prices Support Act is in these words:

—the board shall, subject to and in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council, have authority

(a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

Then, paragraph (c) of that subsection is in these words:

(c) to pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, as determined by the board, at which such product is sold in the market during a specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price.

That gives the right first of all for the government to permit the board to buy at prices which they think are proper under the act. It also gives the right to make deficiency payments directly to the producer. Then, subsection 2 of section 9 provides:

In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection (1), the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

That was the basis on which prices should be set. This act was made permanent in 1950, and in setting the price at which its agents would buy agricultural products—this applied to all products except wheat—the board was to bear in mind that the intention was to see that the farmer got a fair share of the national income and in order to do that the board was even empowered to make payments directly to the producer. A revolving fund of $200 million was to be set up for that purpose.

I followed what the minister said very carefully, and so far as I can see he is giving the board that he is setting up under the proposed bill no more powers than the agricultural prices support board already has.

Mr. McCullough: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Tucker: I would ask the hon. member to wait until I am through; I would like to finish my presentation and I only have 30 minutes. I do not want to ask for any more time because it holds other people back. I do not mind answering questions when I am through and I am not afraid to answer any questions, as hon. members who have been here before know very well.

Mr. Argue: It is safer here than on television.

Mr. Tucker: I am not afraid to appear on television either. I do not mind these interruptions as long as my time is not limited by them, but I would point out that I am not one who tries to prevent others from speaking in the house. That applies particularly to my friends of the C.C.F. and to two or three on the opposite side. Fortunately all members in the house are not like two or three who do not seem to want to make speeches themselves but who try to prevent others from making speeches that present a reasonable argument.

I was pointing out that all the powers the minister is providing for in the bill—if he can say otherwise I wish he would do so—are already included in the Agricultural Prices Support Act. There is an advisory committee operating under that act and the head of that advisory committee is the head of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Now then, in what way is the minister changing the situation?

Mr. Harkness: Read the section of the act about the advisory committee.

Mr. Tucker: An advisory committee has been operating under this act.

Mr. Harkness: Read the section of the act.

Mr. Gardiner: We have had one since 1944.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend wants me to read from this act. I suppose he thinks that while I am reading this I am not saying something else.

Mr. Harkness: No, no. You are always so suspicious, apparently.

Mr. Tucker: There is the agricultural prices support board, and then it provides that—

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member cannot find it because it is not there.

Mr. Gardiner: It is much easier to find the board.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member cannot find it because it is not there.

Mr. Gardiner: There is an advisory committee there, and always has been.

Mr. Tucker: I have here a copy of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture, signed by the present Minister of Agriculture. Here is what the report says concerning this advisory committee, and I will just read it:

The board—

That is the board itself.

—met on 30 occasions . . .

He goes on to say, at the bottom of page 149:

> The general advisory committee to the board, under the chairmanship of H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, held regular spring and fall meetings. The committee covered a wide field in its discussions and at the conclusion of each meeting submitted a limited number of carefully considered recommendations.

Here is the report of the Minister of Agriculture, over his own signature, mentioning that this board met over and over again, yet he tries to disrupt my speech by asking a question, is there any board. I would ask him, when he answers, to tell me whether or not there are any greater powers in the proposed bill to help producers than he already has. If he has no more power under the proposed bill than he explained this morning, then have not the people of this country the right to feel very disappointed and to ask why this legislation is being introduced if the government is actually doing nothing in this proposed bill.

The minister said that it was very difficult to fix high support prices to give the farmer a fair share of the national income. He said this would lead to surpluses, as it had in the United States; that it would be difficult to administer; that it would cost a lot of money. There were other reasons that he gave. These reasons applied when he was in opposition and the Liberals were administering the Agricultural Prices Support Act, yet the Conservatives promised, regardless of these difficulties, that they were going to go ahead and do something worth while for the farmer. The Prime Minister actually said, in a press conference, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of May 14:

> On agriculture, Mr. Diefenbaker promised flexible support prices similar to those instituted in the U.S. by the Eisenhower administration.

This is the basis upon which the members opposite got elected. Then the minister now gets up and tells us we cannot do the same as they did in the United States because of these difficulties.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order; the hon. member has been trying for the last three minutes to put words in my mouth which I did not utter. What I said was that the fixed parity price formula which had been in use in the United States, particularly before any change was made in it, had resulted in the building up of very large and unmanageable surpluses.

Mr. Tucker: As the minister knows, that is not a point of order. It is a matter of argument. I am saying the effect of what the minister said was to indicate that the reason he could not follow the policy of the United States under the Eisenhower administration was because of a lack of flexible—

Mr. Harkness: I must again protest the actions of the hon. member in putting words into my mouth which I did not utter. I particularly read this speech so I would have a defence against this kind of thing. I have a copy right here before me, and I never made any such statement.

Mr. Tucker: I wrote down what I heard the minister say, and I have it here in front of me. I am not, and I did not purport to quote from the minister. I said the effect of what he said was such and such, and the minister has no right to raise a point of order on that. I have a right to say what I consider the effect of his speech was. He knows, just as well as I do, that it is a phony point of order just the same as this legislation is phony legislation. I am not surprised—

Mr. Harkness: The only phony thing here is your speech.

Mr. Tucker: I am not surprised at all at this. With all the talk that has been put out in the country, on the basis of which the hon. members were elected, and all the hopes held out, and then the introduction of this measure which does not carry the legislation any farther forward than it was before, I am not surprised that they attempt to do everything to prevent these facts being brought out.

Somebody may say, well, you people had this legislation and why did you not raise the income of the farmer so it bore a fair relationship to the income received in other occupations as is provided for in the Agricultural Prices Support Act. One of the difficulties about raising the prices of agricultural products much higher than world prices was that if you did that you had then to impose strict import controls and practically bar the importation of agricultural products into Canada. It was realized, as the Prime Minister stated when he was leader of the opposition, that if you started doing that you were, in spirit in any event, going against the general agreement on tariffs and trade. If you start doing that, you can expect reprisals from other countries. The farmers themselves have always taken the attitude that we wanted to expand our trade; we did not want to get into a trade war. All our policies in trying to get the farmers' prices up as high as possible were instituted with the fact in mind that we could not start a tariff war.

I have here a copy of a statement of policy issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, adopted on January 26, 1956. This statement of policy frankly faces that situation. I am reading from page 7 of this statement of policy:

A country like Canada also has this special problem—that in the case of some commodities it attempts, for sound reasons of national policy, to maintain a domestic level of prices that is above the world level. At the same time it desires to look to the world market to dispose of limited quantities of those commodities that will not be absorbed at home at those higher-than-world levels. The United States also is in this position, with a scale of production and surpluses far in excess of Canada's.

It should be possible for Canada to export these commodities, in fairly limited quantities, in regular world markets and at world prices. But it must be recognized that this type of operation must be carried on with discretion, and with consideration for regular exporters of these products, and for our obligation under GATT.

The situation must also be looked at from the point of view of Canada's position as an actual and potential importer of farm products.

Where it is necessary to support the price of a product, it may sometimes be necessary at the same time to take steps to control imports.

Then, they go on to make recommendations, and two of their recommendations are:

1. Canada should continue to pursue a national policy aimed at achieving the freest possible flow of trade between nations.

4. The multilateral negotiation of agreements on tariffs and trade practices, as achieved under GATT is in principle sound and should be continued. Some formal organization for the administration of GATT and for facilitating international co-operation on trade problems is also desirable.

This was the attitude of this organized farm organization as they approached this great problem, so I presume it was the attitude of the advisory committee headed by Mr. Hannam. It did tend to keep prices from being raised higher than might otherwise have been the case under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture made a submission to the members of the government on July 31 of this year. This problem has come to be realized more and more by everyone including the farm organizations. If you want to expand trade, if you at the same time want to raise prices on farm products high enough to give the farmers a fair share of the national income, you will have to raise them a good deal higher than they actually are in international trade and that would mean that you would have to impose import controls. If you begin to bar out imports, then other countries will begin to bar out our exports. This was finally realized by many people who were thinking about this problem. This is something I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. I presume that he has studied this submission of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture very carefully. It was as I have said made to the government of which he is a member on July 31 of this year. I read from this brief because it indicates a realization that something more had to be done than had been done before and it asks for something more to be done. It seems to me that the government which promised to do more than had been done previously, should have paid some attention to this submission which I consider most reasonable. At page 3 of this submission to the government the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said this:

In January of 1955 a statement of policy was adopted by the federation of which the major features were:

1. That price supports should not create incentives to production which perpetuate surplus production problems and prevent necessary and desirable production adjustments being made. This is the most fundamental principle involved, next to that of providing for the producer due and reasonable safeguards against excessive loss of income.

2. That price supports should be calculated according to a known formula, embodied in legislation, which could be used as a guide, accepted by all concerned, for negotiating price supports.

3. That as a general rule between 70 and 85 per cent of a fair relationship or parity level, as calculated by the formula, would provide for a reasonable range of supports, with due regard for flexibility. With supports established at such moderate levels, it is recognized that market prices will usually prevail above support levels and sometimes substantially above them.

4. That deficiency payments as a method of price supports were not to be recommended in preference to market price supports—except with rapidly perishable products.

That was the position of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture up until practically this year, namely that deficiency payments should not be used and were not desirable except for rapidly perishable products. Then this brief of July 31 last goes on to say this:

The above remain the basic principles of C.F.A. price support policy except with respect to deficiency payments. The arguments against the use of deficiency payments unquestionably have a considerable degree of validity, and in a general way the federation prefers the market support technique where it is practicable. At the same time the advantages of supporting producer returns by means which do not involve maintaining market prices at the full support level are very real and since the beginning of this year a special national committee has been reviewing this particular aspect of price support policy.

Last week the board of directors of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture received the report of that committee—

They say "last week". That would be the last week of July of this year.

—and revised its statement of price support policy. After a thorough review of the question, it was decided that adjustment or deficiency payments as a method of supporting incomes of producers should be applied on individual products to correct income deficiencies under the following circumstances:

Here the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has said that they have changed their attitude towards deficiency payments and have submitted this new and most reasonable recommendation to the government. I expected that the government meant business when it said it was going to do something about this great problem. Here is what they said: that they should be used

(a) Where perishable products require this type of support in order to move the product and avoid waste.

(b) Where market price supports, though put at the best level feasible for this type of support, must be supplemented from the point of view of providing adequate producer returns.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Tucker: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that in committee I have a right to speak for 30 minutes from the time the last person who took the floor stopped speaking. The minister rose and made a statement in the middle of my speech. I therefore submit that I have a right to speak for 30 minutes from the time he took the floor.

Mr. Harkness: I did not make a statement. I just rose on a point of order.

Mr. Tucker: The minister said what he had said in his speech and undertook to correct my speech. I now point out—

Mr. Harkness: I raised a point of order.

Mr. Tucker: It was no point of order. You were correcting my speech. I pointed out at the time that it was not a point of order. The reason why I asked for this consideration in order to conclude is this—

The Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to assist me in fulfilling my duty. Standing order 59, paragraph (3) reads as follows:

No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, shall speak for more than thirty minutes at a time in any committee of the whole house.

Mr. Tucker: That paragraph states "shall speak for more than thirty minutes at a time". I was interrupted repeatedly. Others took the floor, particularly the minister and Your Honour must realize that he did so and that it was not on a point of order. It was an attempt to correct what I had said he had said in his speech.

Mr. Harkness: It was a point of order.

An hon. Member: What about the rules of parliament?

Mr. Tucker: The rules of parliament are something, I submit, we have a right to abide by. The rule certainly states "thirty minutes at a time". Can anyone say that I had had the floor for 30 minutes steadily when the minister took the floor from me?

The Chairman: I am bound by this standing order. I have no alternative. I must give the floor to another member.

Mr. Argue: Do it the next time around.

Mr. Mandziuk: Before I proceed with my remarks, Mr. Chairman, please permit me to congratulate Mr. Speaker and you as Deputy Speaker on your election to the important offices you hold. I also wish to commend you both for the kind, courteous and impartial manner in which you have steered the deliberations of this house. I wish to express the same sentiments towards the clerks and those that assist us in the house.

There is one misgiving which I feel I should share with you Mr. Chairman, and hon. members of this house and that is the difficult role I have to fill in representing the constituency of Marquette in Manitoba for the following reasons. My immediate predecessor representing this finest of Manitoba constituencies was Hon. Stuart S. Garson who, for nine years, distinguished himself as minister of justice in the late Liberal government. His predecessor was the late Senator James Allison Glen who for a number of years occupied the chair which you, sir, are now occupying. His predecessor was the late Senator Harry Mullins whom many of the oldtimers must remember. You will now believe me, Mr. Chairman, when I say that the mantle of these outstanding Canadians weighs heavily on my shoulders and I pray to the Almighty for ability, strength and vision to serve Marquette and Canada as ably as did my predecessors.

I want to make the definite statement that we are proud of the proposed legislation, as proud as we are of the legislation we have put on the books to date. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on his manner of presenting the principles of the bill to be introduced after the resolution passes, if it does so. He was concise, brief and to the point. He expressed the hope that this legislation would not be unduly delayed, and I share his hope. Consequently I am not going to take up too much time of this house as lengthy speeches will only result in delay. I hope that the bill which will soon be in our hands will contain, if not all at least most of that for which the farmers have been waiting for so many years.

I cannot resist expressing certain opinions and views on the resolution which introduces the price support legislation, which legislation is of such vital importance, not only to the primary producers of my own constituency but those of all other constituencies. Indeed, all the primary producers of Canada have desired price support legislation; the economy of the country requires it and I am sure all groups in this house agree with the principle behind it.

The farmers comprise one-sixth of our population, this one-sixth providing one-quarter of our exports. These are the farmers of Canada, whether they grow grain, raise hogs, poultry or cattle.

Labour, being well organized into unions, has been clamouring for and receiving increases in wages and other benefits while this one-sixth of our population, the men and women on the farms, were until this government came into power the all but forgotten group of this country. When they asked in years past for just such legislation as this they were told it was impossible; it could not be provided; that nature would take care of their surpluses by several years of crop failures and then eventually Canadians would eat up these surpluses.

If this has a familiar ring in the ears of some hon. members I hope they will not be too disturbed. The farmer never knows whether or not he will harvest a crop. If he does not harvest a crop he has nothing to sell and therefore has no income in the fall. If he has too big a crop the prices fall and so does his income, a surplus then being created. This situation applies to whatever type of farmer one might consider but even if he can sell his produce prices fluctuate and he can never budget for his needs in advance. For example, there was a fluctuation in hog prices last summer, with a difference of 10 to 12 cents in a period of a few short weeks. These are the reasons why farmers in the whole of Canada have been so anxious for so many years to see this legislation introduced.

Referring again to this one-sixth of our population, taking for the moment the farmer and his wife and leaving aside the children, these people work from dawn to dusk, at times during all hours of the night. Both husband and wife work seven days a week for 365 days a year, with a day extra in leap years. They have no holidays with or without pay. They never know in advance what they will receive for the fruits of their labour and this is why farmers sell out and our farm population is dwindling. The farmer goes into the industrial centre, increasing the labour force, and soon swells the ranks of the unemployed. Therefore, this one-sixth of our population must read with envy our debates in this house on the matter of the minimum wage of one dollar per hour. I submit that if the farmer, anywhere in Canada, billed his farm at the rate of one dollar per hour, at the end of the year he would have a bill to the tune of over $5,000. That is for both himself and his wife and I daresay there is not a farmer in my constituency or, for that matter, in any other constituency who clears that much money for his labour on 365 days a year. I say this because of the unstable prices and the surpluses which exist.

The farmer's wife cannot enjoy the finer things of life; she cannot have clothes as good as those of her sister in the city; she cannot have household appliances such as those owned by her sister in the city and she cannot enjoy all the conveniences enjoyed by her sister in the city, even though that sister may be the wife of a labourer. The farmer himself cannot afford to dress as well as his brother who is a labourer in the city. He wears the same suit for years—probably the suit in which he was married—and he may even be buried in the same suit. His products are priced at a certain figure; his surpluses cannot be sold and he has no ready cash. I therefore believe that the farmer certainly appreciates the cash advance legislation which we have already passed and will likewise appreciate the price support legislation we are about to pass.

The farmer cannot buy as good a car as his labourer brother who lives in the city. Who but the farmer still drives the old flivver of the 1940 or 1945 model? All this, in spite of the fact that they have lived through that great prosperity under the Liberal government. I could point out tens of hundreds of such old model cars in my own constituency. Do you know why we cannot afford to get new ones? Because there is not the money available and these old models are not valuable enough to be used as a trade-in. Now these are efficient farmers and a car in these days is a necessity and not a luxury.

I am just trying to give a picture of the farm situation today and I think all hon. members will understand why this legislation will be appreciated. This uncertainty as to prices is bad for the Canadian worker, although he may not realize it. It is bad for the manufacturer if one-sixth of our population has no buying power. A prosperous agricultural community would provide a substantial market. The implement industry for example has remained in a depressed state since 1949; that started in the good old days of the grand Liberal administration. The crisis in agriculture is also bad for the small town businessman in every constituency in Canada. It is bad for the grocer, the general merchant, the implement agent and the automobile dealer all of whom depend upon local patronage and the buying power of their customer—the farmer. It is bad for the wholesaler. If the retailer sells less, the wholesaler sells less then the manufacturer must reduce production in his factory and his workers are laid off. Then the hue and cry is raised: "What is the government going to do about it?" The legislation of this government is an important answer to this question.

An hon. Member: And how!

Mr. Mandziuk: I have heard that before—it is doing that which should have been done years ago. The primary producers have cried for such legislation; they have asked for it again and again over the years but their cry was a voice in the wilderness. I feel that the people whom I have the honour to represent will be pleased—no, much more than pleased,—they will be happy at the courage of this government in going ahead with the legislation, going ahead with what others said could not be done. My constituents consist of small farmers, small town businessmen and they will be looking forward to the benefits which are expected from this legislation. They will get those benefits in 1958.

I was glad to note that the government is acting like a servant of the people rather than like a master. I was very pleased with the support which hon. members representing constituencies in the east gave to legislation beneficial to the west alone, that is, to the measure providing for cash advances on farm-stored grain. We who come from the west did not have to convince the eastern representatives that this legislation was worth while; they felt that what was good for any one section of Canada should be supported by the whole of Canada. This government realizes the interdependence of every section of the country and this realization will, I am sure, result in a united and more prosperous Canada.

I promised to make my remarks brief, and I will keep my promise. In closing, I feel sure, sir, that this government will go down in history—

An hon. Member: Yes, go down.

Mr. Mandziuk: —as one which has lived up to its election promises. In the past, Canadians have become accustomed to seeing election promises made just to be broken. This government will go down in history as one of the most progressive governments Canada has ever had, and the name of our beloved leader, the Prime Minister, will go down in history as the father of the bill of rights for the farmer.

Mr. Schulz: Mr. Chairman, I must admit I am on the spot today perhaps more than I have ever been before. I had prepared a speech for this heavy occasion, this great occasion to which I have been looking forward for years, and now I cannot even use it because it would not fit. I expressed the hope that this would be the day which would save agriculture. And now, after listening to the Minister of Agriculture speak about this incredible and shocking proposal which has been revealed here, this speech of mine would look silly, coming after his.

An hon. Member: It does anyway.

Mr. Schulz: Just think if I had used my first sentence:

> I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this resolution which is the forerunner of legislation to bring greater stability to farm prices.

That is what I thought this was going to be. Now what is it? It is nothing. According to the minister's statement, the prices for the year will be based on the prices prevailing during the last three years, which were about—estimated conservatively—80 per cent of parity. Thus, he will base the new prices on 80 per cent of the 80 per cent. A joke. Just think if I were to read another sentence of my proposed speech:

> For a long time I have been waiting for this day when a government would recognize the problem of low farm prices and do something to stop this process which is crippling a basic Canadian industry.

Just think how silly that would sound. I do not even know with what to compare, or how to describe this thing which was revealed this morning because my vocabulary is too restricted. Perhaps the only thing I can do is to compare it with the United States sputnik which they tried to launch into the air a few days ago; the size of a cantaloupe, six point four inches in diameter, weighing three point four pounds. Never got off the ground. Exploded in their faces. It fizzled out, but it produced a shock wave right across this country unprecedented in history and this proposal, similarly, will create a feeling in the hearts of farmers of despair and chagrin. And this is what follows all the beautiful promises.

To think I have been one of those who advised my friends to vote for the Conservatives to get rid of the Liberals. Just think what they will do with me when I get home. What a spot a man can get into in life. I do not even know where I go from here. I cannot go on speaking freely; I must use a script, but the script I have prepared does not fit the occasion. If I do not use a script, what will happen to me? What, for example, will the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources do with me?

I never used a script in my life until I came to this house, but I use one now because I know that someone will be out to catch me. But I never thought the minister of northern affairs would do it. But that minister went out and distorted the truth and said I was the man who said that legislation for advance payments was useless. Why did he not read my speech before he made such a statement? Of course he said yesterday that I said it was stupid, and that that was just the same. Yes, it was "stupid" that appeared in Hansard, but I went up the next day and corrected it. When I said I had corrected the proof and did not use that word, what right had he to go out and say I had used it?

I have heard a lot in my time about the present minister of northern affairs. I have heard a lot of his statements, and most of them were so confused that I could make neither head nor tail of them. I have read a lot about him, too, I read an article the other day which, perhaps, fits the occasion, and I should like to quote it. It is taken from the Toronto Star of November 15 and, describing the minister of northern affairs, it says this:

> Among the minuses goes Alvin Hamilton from Saskatchewan, minister of northern affairs. This is a pity, since there were high hopes of promise in this freshman minister (who incidentally was just nosed out for a Rhodes scholarship by his own deputy minister, Gordon Robertson). But at question time Alvin Hamilton adopts the manner of a youthful prig—

That is spelled p-r-i-g.

> —rebuking his elders. But he is so new to the commons club that he may yet revise his manner and bring forward substantial material. Better hurry, though.

Yes, he had better hurry because if he does not history will count him with the group of people who leave as their footprints in the sands of time only the mark of a heel.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to protect myself against further distortions of the truth by making use of my script. I do it for another purpose as well. It was my main purpose today to describe the present condition of agriculture and perhaps there is still some hope that the Minister of Agriculture will listen to my remarks and go back and think them over. If he does, we will even forgive him his sins. However, I will not leave out, of course, all those hopeful expressions I have used.

During the years farmers have been faced with many problems and even crises which they have managed to overcome but low and unsuitable prices for farm products represent a problem they have been unable to solve. As a matter of fact, this problem has increased in proportion year after year and has now reached the point where farmers are helplessly caught in the iron jaws of the present rise in costs. It is a problem of such magnitude that it has brought the Canadian agricultural industry to the brink of collapse, something this country can ill afford.

Agriculture not only served this country well but it played an important role in its development. The dynamic expansion of agriculture provided investment opportunities and became a major drawing card of immigration and colonization. With the opening of the western farm region agriculture became the foundation of the Canadian nation. Today this foundation is threatened by falling farm prices and rising production costs which have reduced many farmers to bankruptcy in the midst of prosperity. Consequently Canada's basic industry has become the weak spot in our economy. The reason for this is that the Canadian farmer was not only ignored by those who planned the distribution of this country's wealth but became an object of abuse. While industry was protected by tariff walls and finance was supplied with cheap money the farmer was left as booty for the speculators and manipulators of trade and commerce. While other groups were protected, he was forced to sell his products on the open and unprotected market where he was taken advantage of in the most unscrupulous manner. Looted for years, this builder of yesterday was slowly reduced to the point where today he is becoming the most puzzling and pathetic contemporary figure. The man who had been the backbone of our country, the very prototype of Canada, finds himself at present on the social and economic fringe. While many Canadians prosper, he can scarcely make a living.

Since 1949 the farm price index—basis 1935-1939 equals 100—declined from a high of 255.4 to a low of 224.0 in April 1957, a drop of 31.4 points; but in the same time the composite index of prices of commodities and services used by farmers went up from 204.1 to 258.6, a rise of 54.5 points. Both rise and fall combined represent a total loss to the farmer of 85.9 points in a little more than six years. This is the day when our new Minister of Agriculture has announced that the government will offer price supports. The condition I have described is the product of social chaos and economic lawlessness which produced the imbalance in our economy, prosperity on one side and bankruptcy on the other. This is the way in which the farmers were cheated out of their livelihood. This is the manner in which this great prosperity of ours was built on the ruins of our basic industry. It is an unprecedented piece of economic chicanery.

If this kind of discrimination had occurred only in the last few years farmers would not be in their present bankrupt position; it takes much more time to bring them to their knees but this is a sort of nightmare the farmers have been living with for years. It would be interesting to know how many years but apparently there are figures available only since 1914. I paid a visit to the parliamentary library and there I found the Searle index of the cost of things prairie farmers have to buy for a living and production, together with some other indices and prices of interest. The index goes back to 1914 and provides a startling comparison for the next 25 years. The period 1913-14 equalling 100 was used as a basis for calculation.

It shows that in the first ten-year period the cost index of things farmers buy increased from 100 in 1914 to 163 in 1924, but in the same ten years the price index of wheat went up to only 124—a difference of 39 points. The index for hogs went down to 94; this is 69 points behind the cost index. The price index for cattle fell from 100 in 1914 to 78 in 1924, which is 85 points below the cost of production index.

Ten years later in 1934, at the time of the depression, the farmer's cost index had fallen to 124, but the price index for wheat went down to 72, close to half of the cost index. The hog index fell to 94, 30 points below the cost, and that of cattle dropped to 47, or 87 points behind the cost of production.

In 1939, the last year shown in the index, the farmer's cost was up to 132, but the price of wheat went down to 64 points, less than half of the farmer's cost. The price index of hogs stood at 105 and that of cattle at 91. That means that in 1935 the combined average price of the three main products which provide approximately 65 per cent of the prairie farmer's income was 45 points below his cost and 13 points lower than in 1914.

The full significance of these figures and the amount the farmers actually lost in those 25 years can only be seen in its full dimension when you compare it with what other groups have gained in the same time. According to the index, the hourly wage rate of industrial workers increased from 100 in 1914 to 188 points in 1935. This means that while farmers' prices went down 13 points in 25 years, industrial wages went up 88 points. It produces an imbalance between the two groups of 101 points. This figure represents the difference in living standards between industrial workers and farmers brought about in 25 years, and the industrial workers as a group by no means have the highest standard of living in this country.

Will the public in general ever recognize the tragedy embodied in these figures? This is an incredible testimony of discrimination and injustice. It should penetrate like a depth bomb into the hearts and souls of those who hear and read this manifestation of fraud. I hope it penetrates into the heart of the Minister of Agriculture. It is a gigantic social upheaval in its own right, covered up by beautiful phrases describing our unprecedented prosperity in the most glowing terms. But when this idol of prosperity is stripped to public gaze and its grisly secrets revealed it becomes a farce of the greatest magnitude.

Under a chaotic economic system, with no resemblance of order or balance, the tiller of the soil has been ravished and deprived of his labour for decades. There is something sinister about this age-old piracy which has left farmers helpless and hopeless. It degrades human dignity and what we have heard today degrades morality.

To stop—perhaps I should leave out this paragraph—this repellent suppression and correct the existing discrepancy, the government is now forced to introduce legislation to guarantee farmers prices by the law of the land. What a law!

Will hon. gentlemen support this new measure? I hope they will not. I have been one of those who tried very hard to give the government a chance. As a matter of fact, sometimes I have even disagreed with my own good friends here because I felt the people of the country expected us to give the government a chance. They have had their chance. I do not feel sorry for those on the treasury benches but I certainly feel sorry for those who sit behind them.

An hon. Member: You do not need to.

Mr. Cardiff: You had better feel sorry for yourself.

Mr. Schulz: Farmers in general are rugged men and know how to stand on their own roughshod feet. Their successful struggle with nature and the task of transforming a wilderness into a productive industry stands out in Canadian history as an epic of determination. They do not expect either a hand-out or something for nothing. All they want is a square deal, and I doubt whether they can ever expect to get it from this government unless the government has a change of heart.

I hope the figures I have produced so far will have some effect but if they do not and there are still some doubting Thomases who are still not quite sure as to the conditions that exist in agriculture today, I have here some more definite figures. A survey conducted by the economics division of the Department of Agriculture in west central Manitoba last year and published in the Economic Annalist of June, 1957, shows that farmers must receive assistance or they will all go bankrupt in the near future. The report states that the area in which the test was conducted reached from Neepawa west and north of Russell. That is the constituency of Marquette represented by the hon. member who spoke just before me. What did he say? He said that he was proud of this legislation.

Mr. Ellis: He will eat those words.

Mr. Schulz: The area surveyed included 82 farms of 2, 3 or 4 quarter sections. The report states further that the area is generally considered as a mixed farming area and is well suited climatically for common cereals. The average annual yield of wheat is about 25 bushels per acre. The net result of this investigation is contained in the last paragraph which reads as follows:

> The returns on two-thirds of these farms fell in the range from about $1,290 to $3,210. The average investment on the two quarter-section grain farms was $18,848 per farm, which at 5 per cent would earn, or cost, $942. This leaves a return of $1,117 for the operator for wages and management, family living expenditures and savings. Farm family living expenses were not enumerated in this survey, but data collected in earlier studies suggest that cash farm family living expenses for families on this size of farm would amount to about $1,550 per farm. On the average, these farm families, on this size of farm, would have to use some of their depreciation allowances, savings, or income from non-farm sources, such as family allowances to meet all costs of farming, including their living costs.

This is the measure of the farmer's plight, a net loss of $433 in one year. It really proves the falsehood of our prosperity, of which some people are so proud, especially when one considers that according to the report livestock products and meat consumed in the home were included as receipts and that the expense figures include cash expenses and depreciation but do not include cash expenses for machinery and equipment.

Furthermore, we must remember that this applies to the year 1955 and that according to a report recently published by the Manitoba department of agriculture the average net income of Manitoba farms in 1956 fell about $1,000 below that of 1955. This brings the total loss per farm to $1,433. Is there anyone anywhere who can tell me how these people can go on without going bankrupt? Can anybody figure out how they live when their expenses are greater than their income? I cannot do it and neither can anyone else.

Will the hon. member for Fort William—I should have said the Minister of Agriculture this time—be able to understand from now on what we mean when we talk about thousands of bankrupt farmers and ask for assistance? It is not only the farmers but whole communities that have been impoverished by the cost-price squeeze. Toiling under the most impossible conditions farmers and businessmen alike are struggling desperately to keep their heads above water.

Unfortunately, Canadians in general, and I think that applies to this house in general too, as well as some farmers and farm organizations, have so far failed to comprehend the extent of the depression existing in agriculture and the threatening danger it presents to our entire economic structure. While the nation's foundation is crumbling they build their castles in the clouds of prosperity. They have been brainwashed to the point where they really believe in this myth.

The only group really concerned about this problem and which has repeatedly stated so publicly is the Canadian Labour Congress. In the last brief this organization presented to the government it was made quite clear that the congress was alarmed by the drastic fall in farm income as that was bad for the economy in general. They assured the government of their full support for anything the government could do to restore the purchasing power of Canadian farmers.

This is not the first time organized labour has asked the government to recognize the farmers' difficulty and do something about it. Last year they combined their efforts with those of the interprovincial farm union council in a joint representation to the government asking for parity prices. However, there was no response from the former government. They acted like a group of people made of clay and tied in a bag that no one could undo.

But how much will this government do now to correct this situation? This is the $64 question to which farmers want an answer. I hope this government realizes that it was a Conservative government that laid the groundwork for the farmers' present dilemma. Back in 1879, a Conservative government designed the national policy of tariff protection which spelled doom for agriculture from the first day of its existence. The unprotected farmers have been forced for 78 years to compete with a protected home industry. Farmers realize today that they cannot expect any reduction in tariffs from a Conservative government, and therefore they are asking for protection too. Since coming into office this government has demonstrated that it is more interested in raising tariffs than in lowering them. Farmers know that the idea of free trade, promoted by them from the very beginning, is not acceptable to this government. This was proven conclusively when the offer of a free trade area made by Britain was greeted with silence and has been ignored ever since.

The organized farmers of today, therefore, have made up their minds to get equality with others, either by free trade for all or protection for all. They want protection of prices to the point where they have a fair relationship with other prices. They know that this is the only way in which they can get a fair share of the national income as promised in the speech from the throne. They are asking for the establishment of a price support program to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers as laid down in the government's national election policy. Farmers want parity prices as promised by the Prime Minister during the election campaign. They are asking for implementation of what they have been promised—no more or no less.

Farmers and farm organizations are looking forward with great expectation to this legislation. As far as they are concerned the government will stand or fall on its context. They want a degree of price protection equal to other prices. This means parity prices. Anything less will be rejected, not only by farmers but by labour and many others who know the difference between right and wrong.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Stefura: Mr. Chairman, it was with a certain amount of anxiety and with a great deal of expectation that I, too, have been waiting for the time when we would be able to have a thorough discussion of this farm problem. I, however, was not in the same position as the hon. member who preceded me because I, perhaps, remember too much of the thirties so I only had to throw out about half of my speech when the announcement was made.

The resolution introduced by the Minister of Agriculture today provides an opportunity for the agriculture industry to state its grievances, so far as farm prices are concerned, and to express views upon what they expect to see in the bill when it is introduced. As I mentioned during the throne speech debate, about 90 per cent of the people in my constituency are dependent, either directly or indirectly, on the agricultural industry. It is, therefore, of prime importance to them. The farm holdings are not large ones. The problems that face agriculture are not prevalent only in my constituency, these problems face the entire agricultural industry throughout this country to a greater or lesser degree. Perhaps at the outset I should state that I do not believe legislation, even though it might be a lot better than the measure proposed this morning, would cure all the ills of the agricultural industry.

I would say that the first thing we need is trade, and we need it badly. However, under the conditions in which farmers are now placed, and until such time as the government sees fit to inaugurate different trade policies, legislation to give support to agricultural prices should be introduced in order that the farmers may survive. I was very much interested when, just before six o'clock last Saturday, December 6, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the acceptance of local currencies for wheat may be adopted if it were a solution to getting our surplus to the hungry people of the world who need it.

I was very much interested in that because on October 23 I asked the Minister of Finance whether the government had given consideration to the acceptance of sterling in an effort to increase trade with Britain and other commonwealth countries. The minister answered that no such proposals were made to the Canadian government. There was a significant statement made by him when he was further questioned by other members of this group and by some members of the C.C.F. group. He said then he did not see any reason why we should go out proposing to take sterling; we were interested in a two-way flow of trade and payment by commodities that are being purchased from non-commonwealth sources. In other words, the Minister of Finance is prepared, I believe, to do a bit of bartering.

The sad part of the whole affair is that these statements come from the wrong minister. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is prepared to do business with soft currency countries, and that is the department of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance is prepared to do a little bartering, and that is within the Department of Trade and Commerce, but he will not have anything to do with sterling. If ever I or anyone else has seen a mixed up government I believe this is it.

I shall not go into this subject any further now because I intend to go into it more fully when the trade and commerce estimates are before the committee. I would suggest, however, to the Minister of Agriculture that he should get the two gentlemen together and get the whole matter straightened out. If that fails, perhaps he could convince the Prime Minister to have these gentlemen exchange portfolios. I believe both these ministers have expressed sound ideas, based on good common sense. I believe some of the old Social Credit members must derive some satisfaction from these statements because they have been hammering away at these ideas ever since the Bretton Woods agreement. If the Minister of Agriculture were to recommend that we accept foreign currencies, barter deals, extend credit to foreign countries, that would do more than any one single item of legislation we could possibly pass in this house to aid this farm industry.

Before I go too far with that, I shall come back to the resolution and deal directly with it. The problem that the farm people have of balancing their diminishing returns of income against their ever-increasing expenses is not only causing an endless amount of anxiety to the Canadian farmer but is becoming a subject of study to other groups and occupations.

The Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944-45 was supposed to have remedied the situation and it is very clearly stated in one of its clauses that the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

This is only fair and just. It is no more than any farm group or any farmer has ever asked for. Farm people do not want handouts but they do want and are entitled to their fair and just share of the national income. Whether it is the fault of the agricultural prices support board or whether it is the fault of the governor in council, I am not prepared to say. However, the blame must lay with those who were given the responsibility of seeing that the act was enforced.

The resolution introduced today calls for guaranteed prices on certain agricultural commodities, and others can be added as named from time to time by the governor in council. The wording may differ slightly. However, the ideas are identical with those we have had in the past. The amount of authorized expenditure from the consolidated revenue fund will be increased to $250 million, an increase of $50 million. We trust that the $50 million increase is not just so much eye-wash or that the government is not merely trying to pull the wool over the farmers' eyes but rather that the government really and sincerely is trying to aid the agricultural industry. I say that with justification.

The following question was placed on the order paper on November 19, 1957 by my colleague, the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose:

[Mr. Stefura.]

1. How much was paid out of the Agricultural Prices Support Act revolving fund for each of the years from 1946 to 1956 inclusive?
2. How much was paid out of the Agricultural Prices Support Act revolving fund from January 1, 1957 to October 31, 1957?
3. What products were supported in each of the years mentioned in 1 and 2, and what was the loss incurred for each of these products for each of these years?

I will not read the detailed reply. You will be able to find that in the December 2 issue of Hansard at page 1756. However, the total in round figures for the ten-year period or the better than ten-year period I believe will be of interest. The total cost up to October 31 since 1946 was $94 million. Of this amount the biggest loss occurred in 1952 when we had the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak, slashing returns to the producers. These figures do not take into consideration the value of goods still in storage such as eggs, butter and so on so that the total amount for the ten-year period is much below the $90 million, and much below what some of the former government members try to convince the farm people the aid actually was to the farmers. When we subtract that amount that we paid out in 1952 for the foot-and-mouth disease, it leaves about roughly $24 million for actual farm aid.

I have here the report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act as put out by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. The amount of assistance given to that industry is found at page 10 of that booklet:

The amount of money paid to gold mines in respect of the years 1948 to 1956, inclusive, under the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is $99,934,837.10 on a production during these years of 28,603,429.035 ounces.

When we consider what we are doing we find that we are digging the gold out of a hole in one place and placing it in a hole in another place, something which is of absolutely no value to the people of this country and for that we paid out $99 million. Yet when we take our farm commodities, what do we find? I am not going to argue the point as to how this was brought about because I was not here when this act was passed. I do not know very much about the gold mining industry and I am not going to say it should not be paid out. But I am just comparing the situations. In the one case we have this gold being taken out of one hole and put in another hole, and we have this amount of money being paid for something that benefits nobody.

Yet when it comes down to the agricultural industry, there is little or practically nothing done. The actual amount spent under the prices support act is about $24 million. The $200 million voted by the previous administration was nothing more than just a frill to the actual amount needed to carry out the obligations of the board or the actual amount spent. As to adding $50 million to the fund as proposed by this present administration, unless the guaranteed prices shall be such as will use up the money in this fund, and unless the board shall see that the prices are of benefit to the industry, it shall become nothing more than adding embroidery to the frills.

The previous administration did not carry out its duty in seeing that the prices support act was adhered to. As I mentioned previously, I will not lay blame on any particular body, but I do know that the farm people have the right to expect certain justice. When an act is passed, they expect it to be adhered to. I am not a lawyer so I shall not attempt to argue as to whose fault it was that it was not adhered to. I have no argument with any of the members of the board. I do not know them. I also believe—as the Minister of Agriculture said this morning, or something to this effect—that the men holding positions on this board are qualified and responsible men. However, if it was the fault of the board in not carrying out their responsibility, they should have been asked to apply for unemployment insurance.

I am not saying that is where the fault is. If it was the fault of the governor in council in not issuing a directive to the board members, I believe they should resign because they have not only failed the agricultural industry in that department that they should represent, they have also failed parliament. If the administration itself is at fault it can and will be dealt with as the former administration was dealt with last June. The only drawback is that the people of this country can deal with such injustices far too seldom to prevent a number of their group losing out entirely. I trust that the present administration will bring in this resolution with amendments as suggested by the hon. member for Acadia, and that it will not be just so much eyewash or just so much wool being pulled over the farmers' eyes but that it will contain real meat and be of benefit to the farm people and consequently eventually to the benefit of our entire economy.

It has been known for a long time by our economists that whenever a basic industry in any country becomes depressed it affects every other industry. It is also known that unless the basic industries are in a sound financial position, regardless of what is done to bolster subsidiary industries those measures eventually become futile in trying to stabilize the economy of the country. It is most unfortunate for the farmers of this country that agriculture, being a basic industry, is one of the first to be affected by adverse conditions. Agriculture is in the unfortunate position of most basic industries in a country in that when conditions become adverse it is not only the first to be crippled but is usually the one that bears the brunt of the blow. It is also unfortunate that when conditions improve the agricultural industry is usually the last to receive any benefits of any of these improvements. It therefore should be the aim of any government to see that the basic industries, the very foundation of the economy, should be in a sound financial position.

This however, has not been the position in the agricultural industry of this country. It has not been the position, furthermore, for the past several years. The decline in farm incomes during the period of rising costs has at the present time forced the agricultural industry into an extremely depressed condition. I have at hand letters from different farm people and farm organizations. I do not wish to take up the time of the house by reading them all but it is a similar story everywhere. Now I have letters from farm union locals in the Smoky Lake area, that is to say Barich, Smoky Lake, Victoria north bank, Pakan, Edward, North Kotzman, Wild Deer, South Kotzman and the Ruthenia, locals which resolved as follows:

> Resolved that we bring this matter before the House of Commons and bring prices up to a fair value.

The farm union local at Innisfree has this to say:

> Whereas the majority of farmers at the present time are operating at a loss and cannot continue to do so much longer, we resolve that some steps be taken to better the financial conditions of the western farmer.

Now I am afraid that the bill, as proposed in this resolution, will not do that. I can only hope that the bill will be amended and will be different from what is contained in this resolution.

An hon. Member: The bill is different.

Mr. Stefura: The bill is different. Well I certainly hope it is, because this resolution certainly does not contain very many prospects.

I have letters from different farm people and it is all basically the same story. They are all similar in nature and it does not matter whether the letters come from one area or another; whether they come from the Myrnam, Vilna or Redwater areas in the north, whether they come from the Tofield or Mannville areas in the south or whether they are from the Vegreville, Two Hills or Andrew areas in the centre. Some of these people get a little dividend from the Redwater area but it does not seem to help very much. In talking to these people as individuals, the story is very much the same in that we do need some remedial action.

Now this is not peculiar to my own constituency. Nor does it only apply to a particular section of Canada; it applies generally to the industry of the nation as a whole. It is not a situation which has developed overnight, but it has been one of progressive deterioration until, today, we have a primary industry, the resources of which have come to a point which is causing our farm people a great deal of anxiety. It should be given a great deal of consideration by this government.

Perhaps we should have a look at some of the figures. The net farm income for 1951 was $2,155 million. This is a decline to where, in 1954, we see a drop of 48 per cent to $1,125 million.

Now then, according to the brief presented to the former minister of agriculture by the interprovincial farm union council, the picture in western Canada was even worse. In 1951 the net income was $1,227 million; by 1954 it had declined to $376 million, or a drop in the net farm income of 66.6 per cent. The situation has since improved only slightly. Whereas in 1951 the farm people obtained 13.6 per cent of the national income, by 1954 this percentage had dropped to 6.8 per cent and by 1956 had only increased to 6.9 per cent.

Against this farm income there has been an ever-increasing rise in the farm family living costs. Whereas in 1946 the price index was 100, it has since then been rising almost constantly to a point where in 1956 it was 162.2, and it is still rising. The real income in terms of 1946 constant dollars has risen from $1674 in 1955 to $1686 in 1956—a rise of $12 for the average farm family. All the indications are that when the figures are available for 1957 there will be no appreciable change.

Now this resolution which was brought in this morning by the Minister of Agriculture is going to be based on a three year moving average and there is absolutely no hope that I can see where these people can get out of the situation which faces them today. If we take the three previous years, the net farm income, measured in constant dollars, was $1,674, $1,686 and $1,300 in 1954. So we can expect the average is going to be $1,600. Well it will not even be $1,600 for the farm family in agriculture. Now that is what is being proposed as a basis for prices for farm people in Canada today.

[Mr. Stefura.]

With the ever increasing prices and everything else which must be considered, what chance have the farm people? That is why I believe the Minister of Agriculture should give thought to the suggestions of the hon. member for Acadia in bringing this matter before the agricultural committee in order to consider some of these things thoroughly before the second reading of the bill, where it must be passed in principle.

Farm prices are now and have been over the last several years completely out of balance and unless that balance is restored as between farm prices and farm costs the diminishing buying power of the farmer will be reflected in the entire business life of the country and will contribute to the increasing labour problem to an even far greater degree than is evident today.

We recommended that grain be included among the products covered by the Agricultural Prices Support Act but the minister this morning mentioned that no such thing would be done. We further recommend the full application of section 9 of the present act so as to ensure that the support act will maintain the price of the farm product at a level which bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities.

I say this because the farmer today is not competing with the farmers of other lands; the Canadian farmer must compete with the treasuries of practically every other wheat producing country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned in the house a couple of weeks ago that Canadian wheat was selling for 11 cents a bushel more than was the wheat of any other country. It is interesting to note what our Canadian farmer receives for his superior quality wheat and what the farmers of other countries receive for their wheat. The following figures are extracted from the brief presented to the cabinet on March 9, 1957 by the Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta wheat pools:

Ireland, $2.06; United Kingdom, $2.31; Belgium, $2.56; Japan, $2.59; Austria, $2.63; United States of America approximately $2.08 (it was $2.24); Brazil, $2.85; Germany, $2.73; Italy, $3.05; Norway, $3.43; Switzerland, $4.03.

Those are the prices per bushel. Now with respect to Canada, the price is $1.40 and that is after the farmer has delivered it to Fort William.

Mr. Graham Spry, Saskatchewan's agent general to the United Kingdom, told the delegates of the Saskatchewan farmers union last Wednesday that the subsidy received by the farmers of France was greater than our Canadian sales price. How then can the Canadian farmer compete against such prices in the open market? How can the Canadian farmer compete against the treasuries of these different countries and against the treasury of the United States, without government support? I hope the minister will see fit to place grains under this act.

We recommend a two-price system; we advocate that support prices be maintained at 100 per cent of parity for farm products sold on the domestic market and that the surplus products be sold abroad for the best price available, preferably under some form of international agreement but covered, in any event, by a price support sufficient to meet the average costs of production.

I believe this has been partially covered by other members of our group but, in view of the fact that 94 per cent of all farm products, excluding wheat, are sold in Canada, it would mean that farmers would receive 100 per cent of parity for 94 per cent of their products, again of course excluding wheat.

In regard to wheat, approximately 80 per cent is sold abroad and 20 per cent in the domestic market. Therefore, 20 per cent at parity of $2.37 per bushel, which I believe was the figure mentioned, and 80 per cent at the ceiling of $1.95 per bushel—under the international wheat agreement—would give the farmer a support price of $2.01.

Those who believe such prices would create surpluses to an even greater degree than we have today—I believe something along this line was mentioned by the minister this morning—entirely miss the problems of agriculture.

The Food and Agricultural Organization, whose meetings the minister himself attended in Rome not too long ago, is on record as holding the opinion—though this statement has been made earlier—that surpluses exist only in relation to purchasing power and not in relation to the actual needs of human beings. The problem was in the distribution of these surpluses. Numerous people have expressed this idea, and if I have read the record correctly, hon. members in this group have done so in the house ever since 1935.

The latest person to express such a view was none other than the Prime Minister himself, as reported in the Wheat Pool Budget of August 16, 1957, when he said:

> To those who think that in agriculture we have arrived at a point where we need no longer expand I say to you this: I learned one lesson at the commonwealth conference in London. We must expand our agricultural development. With one quarter of the world's population going to bed hungry at night, methods must be found to enable the distribution of our surpluses to the end that happiness will come to the peoples of the world.

These are not the comments of a wheat pool delegate or an Alberta farm union official, they are the words of the present Prime Minister spoken to 11,000 people at the opening of the Saskatoon exhibition on July 22.

I should like to turn briefly, now, to a problem in relation to cattle about which I cannot agree with the Minister of Agriculture. On November 14, I addressed the following question to the minister, as recorded in Hansard at page 1106:

> In view of the drastic drop in livestock prices, has the government been in consultation with representative farm organizations to arrive at a definite formula for adequate price supports? If so, will such a formula be proposed for enactment this session? Is the minister aware of the urgency of such legislation, and does he intend to introduce such legislation without delay? And being aware that the small producers are planning their next year's production now, is the minister prepared to issue any directive to the farmers of Canada today?

When the minister gave me his answer that day I thought for a while that he was deliberately evading the issue, or maybe he was trying to make me sound a little silly, but after hearing today's resolution I realize that that was not the case.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member for Vegreville that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, some members of the committee will be rather surprised that I should rise to speak on this resolution which has to do with agriculture, because I do not pretend for a moment that agriculture is one of the important industries in my constituency though there are two of the more important agricultural settlements in Newfoundland in my riding. But I assume that the legislation which the Minister of Agriculture is proposing to introduce, based on this resolution, will replace the agricultural prices support legislation which was put on the statue books by the late Mr. Mackenzie King's government in the last years of the war, and I rise primarily to express the surprise of all those hon. members—in all parties, I am sure, though they are mostly, I am glad to say, still in ours—who represent fishing constituencies. Since this resolution was placed on the order paper I asked the Minister of Fisheries whether a similar resolution would appear on the order paper with regard to fisheries, and got the informative answer so characteristic of the present government that this was a matter of government policy which would be announced in due course.

An hon. Member: Wasn't that always your answer, too?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is quite clear that there is no intention on the part of this government of introducing legislation of a similar character having to do with the oldest of all the industries in Canada.

Mr. Mackenzie King—and I remember this situation very well, because I was one of the members of his staff at the time—insisted when the proposal for agricultural prices support was being considered by the Liberal government during the war that whatever was done for the farmers should be paralleled by something done for the fishermen, if the situation warranted it, and the fisheries prices support legislation was introduced and enacted by parliament at the same time. It is quite astonishing that this legislation should be introduced without that example being followed, or it would be quite astonishing if it did not seem to be rather characteristic of the attitude of the present government toward the fishing industry from the beginning.

I was sorry when I read in the St. John's News on July 8 of this year a report of the Prime Minister's famous, and I think I may say reckless, press conference when he came back from London before he went to see his colleagues, and I am sure some of his colleagues, such as the Minister of Agriculture, must wish he had seen them first. The Prime Minister was talking to the press at that time about the proposed European free trade area and he said according to this report—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. This has nothing to do with the resolution which we are discussing and I respectfully request that you prevent the hon. member from going on to a trade discussion and to a discussion of what the Prime Minister said in connection with trade or other matters of that kind and about the fisheries questions which have no connection with the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, I understand that this resolution is asking the house whether it is expedient—not dictating to the house, though that seems to be the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite—whether we are prepared to go along—hon. members on this side of the house were elected just as hon. members on the other side were elected—and give our approval—

Mr. MacInnis: Where did you get elected?

Mr. Pickersgill: When the hon. gentleman gets 87 votes out of 100 in his constituency he can ask questions like that of me.

Mr. MacInnis: Go back home and see what you get there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can tell the hon. member this—

Mr. Harkness: What is the point of order.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Agriculture is quite right. I will come back to the point of order. I should not have let myself be diverted. The point of order raised by the minister was that it is irrelevant to speak about fisheries on this resolution. I say it is not. It is relevant for any member to get up and say that if one particular course is going to be taken in this parliament, when leave is being asked to take that course, it is in order to ask that they should at the same time take another course. But I am willing to leave my argument there, and say it is quite obvious that the government is completely indifferent to the fishing industry.

There is one other thing I have to say about which, I think, the minister will raise no objection on a point of order. I should like to be very brief because I wish to finish before six o'clock.

If this resolution does not mean anything as the hon. member for Rosthern and other hon. members have suggested then there is no point in what I have previously said, but if it does mean anything then it means that something new is going to be done for the farmers that is not being done at the present time.

I am the first to admit that in an economy in which the secondary industries enjoy a considerable measure of protection even today the agricultural industry does deserve, did receive and should continue to receive some similar consideration, but the agricultural industry is only one of the primary industries of the country and I would hope that in any legislation that is brought forward and in the administration of that legislation an effort would be made to give that support in such a fashion that it does not result in putting higher charges upon other sections of the community. I am greatly impressed, in fact, by what the hon. member for Rosthern brought up from the federation of agriculture.

It seems to me that difficult though this suggestion about deficiency payments is it is nevertheless along the right lines because, as the Minister of Agriculture properly pointed out and I agree with him in this, if price supports are too high they do result in a discouragement of consumption and in the accumulation of surpluses for two reasons which I will not enter into now. Then you have overhanging the market these surpluses which tend to depress it.

If on the other hand another technique is used, if the price structure is not interfered with, you avoid two difficulties. I admit that you have a lot of other difficulties but you do avoid the difficulty of sending prices up so that consumption is discouraged with resulting surpluses and you also avoid the difficulty of having to stop imports because if the market is allowed to determine the price it will be possible to meet the competition from outside.

It seems to me that this is particularly important for those of us who represent constituencies like mine where the whole population depends on exports to world markets at world prices. It is most important that their costs should not be increased further at the expense of someone else. Milk powder is a very good example because there is practically no milk produced or available in my constituency and the only way in which almost everyone in my constituency can obtain milk is in the form of milk powder or canned milk. I recognize that there are times when milk powder does not bring a decent price to the farmers and I do not say that the farmers should have to suffer for it but if you put a price support on, what are you doing? If you send the price artificially high you are making the fishermen of my constituency and the primary producers of many other places who have to sell on the world market pay well above the world price for milk for their children.

Mr. Harkness: Who put this support on? It was you people who put milk under price support.

Mr. Pickersgill: I admit that and of course we had a lot of other supports but what I am saying is that if, on the other hand, a technique of using deficiency payments could be worked out so that the price of milk is not raised to other primary producers, what is produced will tend to be consumed more rapidly and there will not be the danger of surpluses and the farmer, if the deficiency payment is properly calculated, will be just as well off. It is primarily because of the interests of primary producers—and of course I could have cited forestry workers and other workers who are having a difficult time, some of them with smaller incomes even than the farmers—that I felt it was not inappropriate for me as the representative of a constituency in which there are really only two considerable occupations, fishing and logging, to say something about this resolution.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Barnett: I would like to ask the hon. member if he could tell us in a word what he thinks is lacking in the present fisheries price support legislation and the lines on which he thinks parliamentary action should be taken at this time?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. The Chair does not think that is a proper question to raise at this point.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Milligan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of making a few remarks in favour of this legislation. Many of those who are closely connected with agriculture have been waiting with much interest for this legislation to be presented to the house. I wish to express my appreciation and congratulations to the minister for the able manner in which he presented this legislation today. I think it was done very well. I feel, as many others do, that this is emergency legislation. Those engaged in agriculture find themselves in a squeeze between rising costs of production and lower prices for their products they have to sell and this puts them in a very difficult financial position.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the interprovincial farmers union and many of the commodity groups have been pressing the Minister of Agriculture as well as other members of parliament for greater assistance to agriculture. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture presented a brief to the cabinet in July and again on December 6. The interprovincial farmers union presented a brief in August as did the Ontario federation of agriculture on November 26 with representatives of all commodity groups in Ontario. These agricultural organizations are concerned about the future of the industry. I am sure they are waiting with great anticipation for this legislation.

The legislation we have had in the past, introduced by the former government, did not give us the security that we were looking for, and I am sure that farm people today will feel that a formula will be written into this legislation that will give them some security as to how floor prices are set. It has been my privilege as a member of delegations representing the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to appear before the former minister of agriculture on many occasions to ask for measures to improve conditions in the industry. Others have made presentations in more recent years with no greater results than in former years. I am sorry the hon. member for Melville is not in the house tonight. I have always respected the opinions of the hon. member, for he has always been closely connected with agriculture. I had the feeling that he was aware of the problems of agriculture and knew the measures that were required to correct them, but that without the support of his hon. colleagues he was unable to implement them. I had expected to see a complete change in the hon. gentleman in his approach to agricultural policy. I listened with much interest to his remarks this afternoon but most of them were simply the same old speech that I have listened to on so many occasions.

Mr. Gardiner: I usually say the same thing twice because it is right.

Mr. Milligan: Using gross income figures for agriculture gives a completely different picture from net income figures. When he uses figures indicating the return to agriculture in 1935 compared with 1955 it is most ridiculous because conditions in 1935 following a depression were quite different from 1955. This certainly misleads the public to believe that agriculture is in a very prosperous condition.

I should like to use some more recent figures I have here and I want to compare 1946 with 1956. The net income of farmers in 1946 was $1,139 million while in 1956 it was $1,573 million or an increase of about $400 million. In 1946 the price index was established at 100 but in 1956 the price index for the commodities farmers buy stood at 162.2. In other words, in 1946 the income per farm amounted to $1,677 while in 1956 it was $2,735. Taking the real income as represented by the buying power of the dollar, in 1946 it was $1,677 and in 1956 it was $1,686. So you see that having regard to the buying power of the dollar the return to agriculture has been slipping year by year.

I think the hon. member referred to the increase in the inventory of machinery, which is quite right. We certainly have a greater inventory of machinery today than we had in 1935 because 1935 followed a depression and conditions were quite different then from what they are today.

Mr. Gardiner: Following a Conservative government, you mean.

Mr. Milligan: Since that time we have been forced to buy implements to do our work because we were unable to compete with other industries in the labour field. The result is that there are fewer people on the farms today. The 1951 census listed 623,091 farms while the 1956 census listed 575,015 farms, a decline of 47,076 farms in that five year period or approximately equal to the total farm population of the province of Manitoba.

Agriculture is such a diversified industry in Canada that it is very difficult to adopt legislation applicable to all sections of the industry. Some of the better features of this legislation are that its flexible floor prices can be adjusted from time to time as the need for support of the different products becomes apparent.

It is obvious to all that agriculture has been the forgotten industry. Many thousands of farmers have been forced to supplement their incomes by finding jobs in industry. This in turn has taken many jobs away from others not engaged in agriculture and is partially responsible for the unemployment situation at the present time. I think I can safely say that in the province of Ontario 50 per cent of our farmers are supplementing their incomes by working in industry. The Canadian Labour Congress recognized the position of agriculture in their brief to the government, and I want to read one paragraph.

> We are alarmed by the drastic fall in farm income. This is bad for the farm people, most of whom are far from rich, and who still make up one-sixth of the Canadian population. It is bad for the economy generally . . . Canadian labour will fully support anything the government can do to restore the purchasing power of Canadian farmers.

This legislation probably is not as strong as many would like to have it but it certainly is the basis of the kind of policy for agriculture that will give the much needed support and security to which the farmers of Canada are so justly entitled. I would appeal to all members of the opposition to allow the legislation to pass the resolution stage as quickly as possible and without too much debate. This to me is emergency legislation. At this time we are not in a position to discuss it intelligently but if we pass the resolution stage we will be in a better position to discuss the very important issue in a much more intelligent manner. I believe this legislation is very important to the whole economy of Canada. I am not going to take any more time now as I hope to be able to take part in the debate at a later stage.

Mr. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Chairman, the last speaker said he thought this resolution should go through quickly and there should be no debate on it. I feel that is not the case. I think this problem needs a lot more discussion so that the government will know exactly what the farmers' situation is. The Prime Minister comes from an agricultural province and he promised, during the election campaign and for years before that, that if he ever got an opportunity the farmers would receive their fair share of the national income. I have carefully read the resolution which is before us, and I could read it again but I do not think that is necessary. It is quite lengthy but I might point out there is not a single word in it which indicates the farmer will get his fair share of the national income under this measure.

The resolution says, in part:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities—

What does that mean? These guaranteed prices could be away below parity. There is nothing that says they shall be up to the point where they will give the farmer his share of the national prosperity. I, for one, am greatly disappointed. When I left home in October to come down here a lot of people in my constituency said to me, "Give the government a chance; give John Diefenbaker a chance". On many occasions I have remained in my seat when I would have liked to take part in the discussion. I have been waiting and hoping that when this legislation, which was mentioned in the speech from the throne, was brought down we would have something that would give to our farmers what they have been looking for for many years. I have been fighting for a square deal for the farmers for 40 years. I fought the Liberals for a good many years. When we got them out of the way I thought we would have some hope with this new government because they would want to make themselves popular out in the country amongst the farming people. We hoped this government would bring forward legislation which would give to the farmers their share of the national income.

I feel very strongly about this. I feel so strongly, in fact, that if the Minister of Agriculture cannot persuade me, between now and the time we have to vote on this resolution, that the measure will be effective I feel inclined to vote against it right now. I cannot see a great deal of improvement in this measure over the old Agricultural Prices Support Act. As I said before, I am disappointed that the government has not seen fit to take steps which would give to our farmers a square deal. The hon. member who preceded me said there was no need for discussion. I might point out that I have lots of figures on my desk, but I am not going to go over them. Surely there have been enough figures put on the record today, during this session and last session and for the past five years, so that every member who has been here for any length of time knows what the problem is.

From 1951 to 1955 there were some 47,000 farmers who were forced to leave their farm homes. Since then there have been probably another 3,000 or 4,000. This means there have been over 50,000 farmers who have had to leave their farms during the last six years. What does that mean to our economy and to our farming districts?

I am more familiar with the situation in Saskatchewan than in the other parts of Canada. I have a very good friend who sits on the government benches, who is a farmer coming from Ontario. I have discussed the farm situation with him a good many times, and he has told me that there is hardly a young man left on the farms in Ontario. I have seen many vacant farms when I have been driving through this province.

There were two reasons why the farmers left the farms during the last six years, and one of them has been the cost-price squeeze. The other reason has been mechanization. The smaller farmers and even the middle-sized farmers have been forced out of business. If they had been getting fair prices they would have been in business now. What is the result of all this? Our country schools are closing down. In our own province some thousands of schools have been closed in the rural areas. This situation is spreading into the villages and towns today. There are many villages in my province in which the schools have had to be closed because there have not been enough children to support the schools. The children now are taken by bus 15 or 20 miles to a point where there is a school.

It is not only the farmers who are affected but the businessmen. What is happening to the small businessmen? I wish the Minister of Agriculture would take a little time off and drive through some of the little towns to see what is happening to the small businessmen. They are closing their doors, and there is hardly a village in western Canada today that has not some empty stores in which businesses had operated profitably for years. All at once the population disappears, and they have to go out of business. This is a serious problem. As I said before, I am disappointed that the government has not seen fit to introduce the legislation which they promised would give the farmer his share of the national income. Until the government does this, the government is not going to be supported by the farmers of this country.

Mr. McLeod: In speaking on this resolution, I am doing so on behalf of a very large agricultural section in my area. We have a district which covers a lot of the aspects of agriculture. We raise some grain, and in fact we raise more grain than is required by the area so we ship it out to different parts of British Columbia. We raise a considerable amount of hay for which, by the way, we have no market this year as the result of a heavy influx of the United States product. We have vegetables and fruit and of course everything that goes to make this one of the finest parts of Canada.

However, these people have their difficulties, and like many other farmers and growers from one side of this country to the other they paid a certain amount of attention to the promises that were made some months ago by those who now sit in the government. They were looking forward with a great deal of hope, and with considerable optimism, feeling secure in the knowledge that some of these promises would be kept. I think, too, the members of this house looked forward with a degree of optimism when we saw this resolution on the order paper and when we had been told continuously by leaders of the government that we should proceed with all haste and not waste the time of the house so that this great piece of legislation, this cure-all for the ailments of the farmer, could be presented. It was presented this morning. I am satisfied that every member of this house, except the most partisan, was keenly disappointed.

We listened to the words of the minister in explaining that resolution. I am going to say that this resolution looked quite good but the more he explained what actually was intended to follow, the worse it seemed to get. He used a couple of phrases that stuck in my mind. One of them was that this is most important in its implications. As far as implications are concerned, I do not think it is going to have any serious implications because it will in no way affect the price of the products and will in no way do what it is supposed to do, namely increase the amount of money which the farmers will receive for their products.

Of course it may have implications in a couple of the things which are proposed. One is a board and the other is an advisory committee. I am one who believes that the less the government interferes in the industrial life of a nation, the better that government is. Whenever I read about boards and advisory committees, I am just a little bit fearful. It reminds me of a statement that was made by a past president of the National Dairy Council of Canada who said that under various guises of assistance we are slowly being led more and more toward socialism and a socialistic state. The only implication which I see in this bill and upon which I look with a certain degree of fear is the appointment of boards and the appointment of advisory committees. Are we to assume that this advisory committee is going to tell the farmers what to plant, how much to plant and so on? That could be one of the implications. It could mean further regimentation of the farmers and I believe we have too much of that in this country at the present time.

Another thing which he said—and in this I agree with him 100 per cent—was "I do not maintain it is a cure". I do not think it is even a panacea that you could give any credit for in any way whatever or by any stretch of the imagination. Then he mentioned something about the base price for any commodity and he said, "I want to stress that word 'any' ". I note that the minister is not in the house but I should like attention to be given to this question. When he speaks of a base price for any commodity I cannot help but wonder what action would be taken with regard to perishable products that are raised to such a great extent in our area. I am thinking of tomatoes which must be picked at a certain time or else. I am thinking of peaches, cherries, small fruits and the like of that and many vegetables. What is the action of a government board going to be with regard to removing a surplus of those products from the channels of trade and to supporting the price for them? I am just curious. I should like to know how it is going to be worked out.

Then in the case of overproduction—and that is a very ticklish question—what is to happen? There are a great many ideas about overproduction. We hear that there can never be such a thing as overproduction so long as people are going to bed hungry; and of course that is perfectly right. Technically it is sound. But nevertheless I maintain that there is overproduction when you have produced more than the home market can absorb and, on top of that, more than can be sold in the international markets of the world and then more than the people of Canada can afford to finance for the use of those unable to buy their own supplies. When we have reached that stage we have reached overproduction. It is quite possible that such a thing could happen.

These are some of the things that made me wonder what is going to be the result of this legislation that is supposed to cure the farmers' problem. We know that the farmers have a problem. We know that agriculture needs the attention of the government. However, it is not temporary policies that are needed. We have waited for so long for a cure that I think we shall be well advised to take a little bit more time at this period and see that the legislation which is approved by this house is really a cure for the troubles that are facing agriculture today. I maintain that the only way in which that can be done is as has been suggested by so many who have spoken and as was so ably done by the hon. member for Acadia this afternoon, and that is to see that this legislation is presented to the committee on agriculture of this house and that that committee is given ample time—not just the time between now and Christmas but all the time that is necessary—to see that proper and thorough consideration is given to any plan that will, we hope, assist agriculture and put it on a sound footing for years to come.

I think we are all in agreement with some few words that I am going to read from a book written by Lauren Soth. It is called "Farm Trouble". It is quite a simple title, is it not? There is certainly a great deal of trouble on the farm and among the farmers of the world today. Lauren Soth was born in Sibley in the United States 47 years ago and studied agricultural journalism at Iowa State College. He has been an associate professor at Iowa State College and editor of The Agricultural Situation in the United States Department of Agriculture and has held various positions in that department. I am telling hon. members that just to give them confidence, as I have, in some of the statements which he has made. In his last paragraph in the book he says this:

Americans—

I think we can substitute "Canadians" and agree 100 per cent with the wording as it is here.

—want farming to be a healthy industry and a satisfactory way of life. They want farmers to be paid by society in proportion to their contribution to society, as urban workers are. The same amount of skill and productivity ought to command the same income whether in farming or in steel making. But Americans do not want to adopt rigid government controls aimed at achieving this equality if these should mean sacrificing the initiative, the independence, and the freedom of the farm family.

With these words, Mr. Chairman, I think we are all in complete agreement. I do not believe that there is in Canada any other class of people or any other individuals who are so proud of their individual initiative and so jealous of their rights as individuals in this free enterprise economy. I am sure that it would be a sorry day whenever any government tried to regiment and to control the farmers of this country in order to give them what they think might be some assistance. The author of this book also has this to say about assistance at page 193:

If farmers are to receive income supplements, beyond what they receive in the market, then those supplements should be direct and unrelated to particular commodities.

After reading that statement, it is my opinion that this man must have made quite a study of Social Credit policy because that sentence is a clear-cut statement agreeing with the whole Social Credit belief on national dividends. It is also a condemnation of direct subsidies and direct assistance in certain commodities that are put on the market for the nation. I am going to read that statement again:

If farmers are to receive income supplements, beyond what they receive in the market, then those supplements should be direct and unrelated to particular commodities.

This whole book is a very thorough review of what has taken place in the United States of America during the past 20 years and the various plans that have been adopted and tried out in order to improve the position of agriculture.

Now we are told after 20 years and after an expenditure of $6 billion that agriculture is in just as serious a position in the United States today. That is the plan to which the minister said this morning he had given such careful consideration—he had found some mistakes which he hoped to rectify. Well that is very good news, but according to this writer, who has made a very careful study of this whole situation, it has been just one series of mistakes after another.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time. I do not mean to interrupt him when he is developing his point, but did I understand him to state that the Social Credit policy is one which is opposed to direct subsidy on particular commodities?

Mr. McLeod: I am not saying that. I am agreeing with this, that the better way to give assistance is by means of a national dividend, and that is the only statement I make. I am not going to become involved in a discussion on Social Credit policy, but that is something in which we believe. I would like to say a few more words, however, on this question of the farming troubles at the present time. In the end, it is one way of seeing that those people whose incomes do not reach a certain level are provided with sufficient to guarantee them the necessities of life.

Now we go on to consider what is the duty of the government. I was quite interested in a little booklet the other day, put out by the Canadian chamber of commerce, and on page 4 therein we find this statement:

It believes—

Here it is speaking of the chamber—

—that the role of government in economic affairs should be to stimulate development, to ease the impacts of economic fluctuation and to prohibit anti-social excesses.

Now that is something with which we can thoroughly agree. Of course, we have at the present time a condition in agriculture which does deserve consideration and which results from the impacts of economic fluctuation. We believe the position in agriculture today is due to the policies of this and the preceding governments in not bringing about the proper development of agriculture in this country in comparison with other industries which are developing at the present time.

My memory goes back quite a few years ago to the very first election in Canada of which I was aware, and that was the great reciprocity election of 1911. At that time I was not old enough to vote but I had just finished high school and thought I knew it all. Despite the fact that I had been raised in a very strong Liberal household, on that occasion I disagreed with those policies and felt that the imposition of a tariff was the only way in which we could develop and foster industry in Canada.

That was, as I say, my belief at that time and I know that very serious debates were then taking place regarding trade with England, trade with the United States and so on. In fact, when you see what is going on today there is quite a parallel between that year of 1911 and 1957. Be that as it may, a tariff policy developed in this country over the years which gave support to industries in Canada, with the exception of agriculture. Furthermore, by giving support to these various other industries it also tended to increase the prices of many things which our farmers had to buy in order to carry on their production.

I am just putting this forward as a suggestion; we are all trying to find a solution, but I am just wondering if the mistake did not occur in those years when we gave protection to all other industry in Canada by means of a tariff, but failed to do so in the case of agriculture. I can see no difference between a factory which is turning out a commodity for the retail trade and for the use of the people of Canada and the farmer who is turning out, or manufacturing if you will, commodities also for the use of the people of Canada. We have on the one hand industry protected by tariffs and on the other hand we have the farmer without any such protection.

We are also in agreement with the idea that tariff restriction and trade barriers should be done away with just as quickly as possible, but I still think we have to be realistic about the situation so long as we are living in a nation and in a world where tariff barriers do exist and where they are likely to continue to exist for generations to come. I think this fact must be considered, and I therefore make the suggestion that, if this problem ever gets before the agricultural committee, would it not be well that this government and this parliament should consider some method by which assistance could be given to agriculture by way of tariff protection.

There are many instances which I could cite right in my own area. For instance, when the influx of soft fruit from across the line gets too serious we then have seasonal tariffs imposed. We deal with the case of vegetables in the same way. I am wondering if it would not be a good idea to have that kind of planning extended to give greater protection to other commodities.

As I said, we have these problems in other parts of the country. There is the question of hay. In my own area, which is the northern part of Okanagan, I understand according to word recently received, that we have 2,000 tons of hay for which the growers cannot find a market. This situation prevails at a time when hay is still coming into our Fraser valley area—the coast area of British Columbia—from the United States. It is being trucked across on large trailers and delivered direct to the farmer. They even have elevators which will put the bales up in the farmer's hay loft, and that hay, after paying a duty of $1.06 per ton is delivered right to the farmer's barn—

An hon. Member: Not to the barn; they will get there though.

Mr. McLeod: No we have not got that far yet. Here is what our growers in the northern Okanagan area are up against if they try to compete with that. I have the figures here, although I am not going to waste the time of the house by giving them in detail. It is estimated that, including the cost of baling and piling the bales in the barn—that is stored on the home farm or in the field—loading in the car if it is shipped, depreciation on irrigation equipment, and labour with respect to irrigating, land tax per acre, mowing and raking and the freight which is $11.40 per ton—just think of that, $11.40 a ton to take one ton of hay from Okanagan to the Fraser valley—the total cost of production is $25.75. If our growers are going to complete with the Americans and sell their hay for $31 per ton delivered —and that is just on the car; it is not put in the farmer's barn but delivered on a car at the railway station in the Fraser valley—they are going to have $5.25 per ton left. That $5.25 a ton does not include any charge for the farmer's overhead or any charge for the preparation of the land that has been seeded to hay, the cost of the seed and so on.

Then there is no allowance made for bad weather which we sometimes experience in the Okanagan, and so farmers lose their crops. This is what farmers are up against. There is a tariff of $1.06 a ton. Why can that tariff not be raised so that the farmers in the Okanagan can supply hay, and compete with the United States grower in the Fraser valley? I am throwing this suggestion out for consideration when this bill comes before the committee on agriculture.

There has been a lot of discussion about taking land out of production. We maintain that it is not humane to curtail the production of food as long as there is hunger in the world. Nevertheless, I am going to read part of an article I got from a newspaper yesterday. It appears under a Washington dateline, and it reads:

> The committee for economic development says more land and people in the United States need to be taken out of farming.
> Present price-depressing surpluses and the low level of income of many farmers reflect the existence of too much productive capacity, the CED said yesterday in a report prepared by one of its committees.

And this report goes on to say:

> The CED is a private research agency sponsored by 150 leading industrial leaders and educationists. Its declared purpose is to help boost United States productivity and standard of living. CED describes itself as a non-partisan non-profit organization.

There is some doubt with relation to the amount of land which should be under production, and it is the opinion of this committee that it should be curtailed. The problem arises: How are you going to do this and what means are you going to adopt? This is another subject which should be discussed and agreed on by the committee on agriculture before any legislation is presented for adoption.

So, Mr. Chairman, I make a strong plea that these matters should be considered in committee. We are now laying down plans which we hope will be permanent; we hope they will do the job which is necessary, and which it is intended they should do, that is to place the farmers of this country on a par with their neighbouring cousins in towns and cities, and on a par with the industrialists and manufacturers who are doing such a fine job in putting before us the necessities of life which we can produce in such abundance.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Chairman, in rising to support this resolution I must first express my pleasure that the government has deemed it advisable to introduce a measure designed to alleviate the distressed financial condition of our farmers, a situation which has developed through the neglect of the previous government during the past number of years. The farmers in my constituency work extremely long hours at difficult work and have considerable investment in their farms and equipment and I feel they are entitled to some financial security.

We have recently heard numerous speakers in this house discuss alleged lay-offs in certain industries. A great deal of this can be attributed to the low financial return received by the farmer in the past number of years. Every farmer who suffers a loss on his farm is a potential customer lost for the products of our factories. Therefore, I feel that each and every Canadian should share a desire to improve the income of our farmers. Farming involves two unknown factors; first, the uncertainty of crop yield; secondly, the uncertainty of a profit, and indeed worries concerning loss on the year's activities. I feel this was illustrated when a farmer recently told me that he required a new tractor but he hesitated to purchase it as it might require one-half of his year's profits, or it might even require his full financial return for the year. This, I think, indicates the need for universal support for farm prices.

However, in supporting this resolution, I wish to make it clear that the establishment of price supports is not a complete cure-all for the serious problems facing the farmers of the maritime provinces. Due to our geographical position which has placed us at a considerable distance from the markets of central Canada, improved and cheaper transportation is a necessity. The tremendous increase in freight rates since the end of the second world war has strangled our farmers both in the sale of their farm products and again in the purchase of the materials manufactured in central Canada. The farmers of Canada during the past few years suffered from the heavy importation of farm product from other countries, notably the United States. It required fourteen years of protests to persuade the former government to impose a tariff on potatoes entering Canada from the United States. I am pleased with the progress made by the present government in this respect, and urge the hon. ministers of agriculture and finance to keep this matter under constant surveillance.

A system of guaranteed prices is essential, due to the difficulty of obtaining loans in order to become properly established in the farming industry. We hear a great deal of talk of the impracticability of farming on small units. Yet it is impossible for most farmers to obtain loans to purchase equipment and additional farm lands. This government has provided additional money for housing with low down payments and long terms. Why not provide the same generous down payments and long term loans for farmers? The farm loan board needs a thorough house cleaning and revision. Too much delay is experienced in the processing of loans and no recognition is made of the fact that a farm being purchased by a son is more valuable if located close to his father's farm, thus enabling him to use much of his father's machinery.

Small farmers are instructed to remain on the farm and not engage in outside employment. This is often necessary in order to provide an adequate living. This summer I received a complaint from a farmer who was unfortunate enough to lose a large barn by fire. A loan of $400 was outstanding on the barn and buildings, and the farm loan board refused to release any insurance, even above the $400 loan. Instead the farmer was instructed to borrow money to rebuild his barn, the farm loan board would provide piecemeal repayments on the loan from the bank. Such high-handed bureaucracy has no place in this country.

Another difficulty in farming is that of obtaining farm help. I should like to see the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act extended to farmers on a voluntary basis. This would alleviate this difficulty to a certain extent.

I feel an adequate farm price support price policy should include the following points: one, cost of production plus a margin of profit; two, maintenance of the farmer's level of income, which would provide him with a purchasing power comparable to that of those engaged in industry and workmen; three, prevent prices falling to a ruinous level; four, the policy should be flexible; five, the funds should be readily available to the farmer.

I do not feel that the first three points require any elaboration or explanation. However, I should like to make a few remarks on the fourth and fifth points. Flexibility is essential, since this is a new experience for the government and the farmer. Great difficulty has been experienced in other countries which have tried similar legislation. Much of the difficulty has been due to the fact that the policy was a rigid one and did not readily permit of change. I am aware of and appreciate the long, arduous hours of work which cabinet ministers have spent on many subjects during their short term of office. Each and every one of the new members would like more time to study this problem. However, the previous government permitted the situation to deteriorate to such a serious level that immediate action is necessary. I cannot imagine any plan meeting with universal approval and, indeed, we may expect that some aspects of the program will require modifications in the future. Therefore I suggest that the legislation be of a flexible nature.

The fifth point is based on past legislation. A revolving fund was established by the previous government. However, it revolved in such a manner that very little of the fund was left circulating in the farm economy. Numerous requests and submissions were required to get consideration, let alone aid. A few years ago the potato producers of my province and the province of New Brunswick received some slight aid. When the request was again presented the previous government informed the potato producers that they had lost money on them, and made the new offer of assistance at such a low level that the offer was rejected by the producers. Mr. Chairman, money for assistance to the farmer serves no useful purpose in a showcase; it must be readily available to the farmer.

Farming in my constituency is based largely on the growing of potatoes. This is a perishable crop and cannot be stored and permitted to pile up as wheat has accumulated in the west. Therefore, special consideration for problems arising from the production of crops such as potatoes must be given by the advisory board. I feel a guaranteed substantial payment on limited production, that is, a specified number of bushels, which would leave the farmer free to grow as many potatoes as he wishes for export and home consumption, would be in order. This would provide greater assistance for the smaller farmer, and impose no restrictions on the growers, and it would prevent the accumulation of huge surpluses.

The potato industry is the main source of income in my province, and therefore I would urge the Minister of Agriculture to include a potato producer on the advisory board as provided for in the resolution.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in seeing that all segments of our Canadian population receive their proper share of our gross national income.

I listened to the minister very attentively and heard his definitions of moving base prices, floor or support prices and guaranteed prices. I surmise that this government will make use of the floor or support prices, just as they can now under present legislation. I listened to the hon. member who has just taken his seat when he spoke about the higher farm prices. I presume that that can only be done under this legislation by increasing the support prices. If I interpreted the minister rightly, I would think this legislation allows three further things to be done: first, to increase the revolving fund from $200 million to $250 million; second, to figure out a base price from the average price of farm commodities for the preceding three years; and from this base price establish a guaranteed price, that is, take 80 per cent of this base price and call it a guaranteed price.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. McMillan: Is that not right? That is my understanding.

Mr. Harkness: It could be any percentage.

Mr. McMillan: I see. In any case, after the bill receives second reading it should be referred to the committee on agriculture.

This evening I want to refer to fruits and vegetables. I come from the Niagara district where many fruits and vegetables are grown. In looking over the former legislation and former discussions in this house back over the years, I see that it has been the concern of many governments. I refer to the marketing troubles of the fruit and vegetable growers. I noticed in reading over old Hansards that the Hon. J. D. Chaplin, who was the member for Lincoln and the minister of trade and commerce in Mr. Meighen's administration, spoke at considerable length on fruit and vegetables. In the main, these producers were generally at a marked disadvantage against competition from similar fruits and vegetables from the United States where the season is always more advanced and consequently the fruits and vegetables from there reach the market sooner than ours.

Hon. Charles Dunning, in introducing his budget on May 1, 1930, said that seasonal tariffs alone were not applicable to Canada because of its extremes of distance, latitude and the climate. After a careful study at that time he decided to put on two duties, an ad valorem and specific duty. He hoped that this combination of duties would meet, first, the urgent need of the producers and help them to establish their prices at a time when they had an acute instability of price and, second, he hoped also that it would at the same time guarantee to the consumers that they would have these products at reasonable prices at all seasons of the year.

This combination of duties was intended to give our fruit and vegetable producers the greatest protection at the time of the harvest of their primary products. The time of application of the double duty was made to correspond with the Canadian harvest of the particular fruit or vegetable on which protection was meant to be given. As an example, if peaches ripened and were harvested over a nine weeks period the seasonal duty applied for nine weeks. This type of protection was given to different fruits and vegetables for a certain definite period for each and the beginning of a period was generally announced in advance by the government after consultation with the growers themselves.

These flexible periods of extra seasonal tariffs do not always work out to the advantage of the growers. We had an example of this last spring. Our asparagus was ready for harvesting before it was expected and much United States asparagus was being imported right up to the time our asparagus was ready for the market. I was told that the former minister of finance, Mr. Harris, made the seasonal tariff period correspond with that asked for by the growers themselves. But we had a particularly warm spell and our asparagus was ready early. Often our growers cannot be expected to foretell the beginning and duration of any particular harvest because of our weather which varies from year to year. For this and other reasons which I can best illustrate with the harvesting of peaches, the duration of the time of application by the government of the various seasonal tariffs on the different fruits and vegetables is not sufficiently long.

As I said earlier, peaches have a seasonal tariff period of nine weeks. This is not long enough, for two reasons. The first one is modern refrigeration. Because of adequate cold storage, peaches can be imported into Canada before ours are ripe and can be kept in cold storage and compete with our early varieties. At the end of the season peaches can be stored in cold storage in the state of New York and those peaches are subsidized. Often when there is a large crop there peaches are brought into Canada right after the seasonal tariff is removed. I have seen this happen. In past years I have seen our canners in the Niagara district canning United States peaches that were admitted into Canada right after our seasonal tariff was removed and our own superior peaches were left to rot on the ground.

Again, in recent years our own peach growers have developed new varieties and the peach crop ripens over a longer period than nine weeks. Cold storage has had the effect of contracting the nine weeks seasonal protection to six or seven weeks, and quite apart from the longer ripening season of the different varieties of peaches this makes the nine week period decided upon years ago seem quite unrealistic today. This same condition applies to some of our other fruits and vegetables.

Another matter that has been brought to my attention in connection with peaches is the question of grade. Our government inspectors at the border do not always seem to insist that the grades of import peaches should meet the requirements of similar grades in Canada. I have noticed lately in the stores in Ottawa that there are many New York state apples on sale and I think they are an inferior grade. They certainly do not seem to come up to the commercial grade as described in the booklet. I do not bring this up to embarrass the minister because I have seen this very thing happen in connection with peaches in the last few years. I certainly should like to see our inspectors at the border pay more attention to the grades of fruits that are admitted into Canada. I know that the question of fruits and vegetables has been referred to the tariff board and that the board has made a report but the matter depends upon action under GATT and on the action of the government.

In Welland county we have many general farmers who are interested in crops other than fruits and vegetables. At the time of the discussion on cash advances to western farmers I expressed the hope that these general farmers would be given consideration at the time this legislation was introduced. However, I do not see anything in it that will give them any further help unless there is something the minister has not disclosed at this time.

There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. The first has to do with putting $250 million into a revolving fund. I am not very impressed with that, particularly since there is $170 million in the present revolving fund and when some of our primary producers made application this fall to have support prices put under their products nothing was done by the government. I do not think the government is likely to give them any more consideration because the government has $250 million in such a fund rather than $170 million.

I do not know whether it is proposed to include fall wheat, but I know that in my area last year wheat as it was harvested sold around $1.20 a bushel and by last December the price had gone up to $1.85. However, most of the wheat was sold at the lower price and very little at $1.85. I should like to ask the minister how he would arrive at an average price for Ontario fall wheat last year.

I suppose the government proposes to support the price of butter at 60 cents. If they did not it would be possible under the formula announced for butter to fall to 48 cents, if I understood what the minister said. I know that the government has many problems irrespective of the promises it made. One promise was made, however, that it has always been hard for me to understand. How can the Canadian farmer enter the European market in order to sell his products?

I know that the Prime Minister said in Wallaceburg that Canada must make an active effort to regain its best markets in the commonwealth and at the same time protect its domestic markets for Canadian producers. It seems to me that in England and other parts of the commonwealth most products are cheaper than they are in Canada. I think our pork prices are the highest in the world. I should like the minister to tell us, for instance, how it would be possible for bacon to be sold on the London market.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, a great number of people in my riding have been waiting for some time for this resolution to be introduced. I think the minister probably gave a fuller explanation of the resolution than is normally done and I am assuming that he has pretty well explained what will be in the bill. A few weeks ago a crack was made about there not being any C.C.F. farm representatives from Ontario. There are three C.C.F. members now from Ontario and I should like to inform those unenlightened members that each of the three members has a large farming area in his constituency.

I represent the riding of Timiskaming. May I say, for the benefit of those who are unaware of the situation, that this riding contains a unique geographical phenomena called the little clay belt. This little clay belt contains about one million acres of farm land. Fifty or sixty years ago this land was covered with timber. The governments of the day put on a drive, as they did in the west, and invited pioneers to come in and homestead. This event occurred about the same time as it did in the west. My father, a very young man at the time, went into northern Ontario by steamer, since there were no roads or railroads. In 1898 these pioneers cleared that land and today there are about 300,000 taxable acres of farm land in Timiskaming.

This clay land is probably as good land as you have anywhere in the country. It is fairly flat, being the bottom of an old lake in an earlier geological age. There are approximately 105,000 acres of this land under active field cultivation, and about 25 per cent of the total area of the clay belt is now cleared. This clay belt is almost entirely in the riding of Timiskaming and it supports some 100,000 people on approximately 1,600 farms according to the last census. There are 400 farm families living on that land. About 1,000 of the farms, like the farms throughout Ontario and the rest of Canada, are lying idle. There are only 400 of these farms, as I said, that are supporting people who live by farming alone. There are others who are living on the farm and working elsewhere or deriving the majority of their income from other sources. I would suggest that this is an odd situation in a country which has the facility and the people. The people who went into my particular part of the country must have liked farming because they did go to the trouble of clearing the land in order to farm. They came there, worked and pioneered and now they are unable to derive sufficient income. I think it is about time the Canadian people took a look at the situation and wondered why these events have occurred.

We have a problem in Timiskaming that I think is the same as elsewhere. We have probably 25,000 head of cattle and a large beef section which sells between 4,000 and 5,000 head a year. This area supplies a large amount of fluid milk. We have a dairy industry, and the surprising thing about this dairy industry, to those who have never heard of Timiskaming, is that it produces half the amount of the butter that Canada exported last year. I do not say that all the butter that came from my area was exported, but we produced half of the total butter exported. We produced a large amount of cheese. We could easily have supplied all the butter and all the cheese that Canada exported. This is a surprising fact when one considers that it would come from one riding, and from a riding which many people did not know was a farming area. We have four butter factories, one each at Belle Vallee, Englehart, New Liskeard and Earlton. These four factories produce half of the amount exported according to the figures presented by the Ontario government in their statistical report.

We might wonder why people are leaving their farms. Farm organizations are continually making representations to the governments. The governments must be aware there is a farm problem. About 65 per cent of the members of this house are in this house because farmers elected them. It may be true, in fact it is true, that the farm population of Canada is small in numbers. It is true also that this farm population has the means of deciding through their elected representatives, upon the legislation affecting them to be passed by this house. I suggest that this government had better take a very close look at the situation because I do not think the proposed measure offers any solution.

One of the problems may be the fact that one farm organization, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, is headed by Mr. Hannam who has been president since its inception in 1939. He had previously been the vice-president of the chamber of agriculture which was formed in 1935. It is surprising, though it may be coincidental, that Mr. Gardiner, the former minister of agriculture, also came into federal politics at that time. It is not a coincidence, however, that these two spokesmen for agriculture over the past years have followed the same program. It is my opinion that neither Mr. Hannam nor the right hon. member for Melville have ever given leadership to the Canadian farmer or ever satisfied the basic needs of our rural population. It is not surprising that the representations made by Mr. Hannam to the present Minister of Agriculture are not satisfactory to any farm representatives or farmers to whom I have talked. I would caution the present Minister of Agriculture that he may have his political throat cut because of the representations that have been made to him. I would suggest that the organizations that comprise the federation have, on numerous occasions and in great numbers, made representations concerning the idea of full parity. This morning the minister mentioned the fact that he did not know what parity meant.

Mr. Harkness: He did not.

Mr. Ellis: It is obvious.

Mr. Peters: I would like to suggest that anyone who reads this resolution would realize that is a fact because parity prices simply mean equality between the cost of production and the price the producer receives. If we are going to have full parity, that only means that all the costs that go into producing a commodity are paid back to the producer by whoever buys the product.

Perhaps we in Ontario are more fortunate than others, because we have several commodities that are under full parity prices. I am not suggesting that they are satisfactory parity prices, because it all depends on where you set the base for that parity price. Before mentioning these commodities, however, I should like to point out that it was not long ago that the federation asked the Ontario government to set a skim milk powder floor price of from 13 cents to 16 cents. This representation is contained in their brief. It is very surprising that the federal government set a floor price of 17 cents, which was higher than that requested by the organization. I suggest we take a look at some of the representations made.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does that not prove that his previous statement was not correct that the federation and I always agreed?

Mr. Peters: It may only mean, Mr. Chairman, that one is a little smarter than the other. Frankly, I believe that a good look should be taken at this question of parity prices. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has just presented a document—I do not know whether or not you would call it a brief—addressed to the members of the House of Commons.

I presume it was also presented to the government. They ask for a level of farm supports and they go on to say that "they should not be set at less than 70 per cent of parity, as we calculate it by the formula which we have adopted". They do not include the formula that they adopted. If they did so, it would not make a hoot of difference because why should we take 70 per cent of parity when it means that you are going to have to find 30 per cent some place else in order to finance your operation? Any farmer who goes out and produces anything at any amount less than parity is going to have to subsidize it. How is he going to subsidize it? Is he going to get relief from his municipality? Is he going to have child labour? Is he going to make his kids work for nothing or is he going to work himself for nothing?

I suggest that one of the things the farmer has been doing for a great number of years has been living on his depreciation. He may not have known that he should have put it away but he has certainly been living on it. We can go right back to the hungry thirties and probably up to the time price control came on in 1940, when the farmer had lived on his depreciation. His machinery was falling apart, his buildings were falling down and his house had not had a coat of paint for many years. Times got a little better with price control and times got a little better just after the war, in fact, and continued up until 1951, and the farmer bought more machinery. He did put away a little bit of his depreciation.

But that certainly is not happening now. He has not been putting very much away since 1951 or else the farmer is giving me a poor story. As I understand it, most of them are not putting anything away, have taken out all that they have saved in what they considered to be the good years and it is time that we did something for those farmers. If this government wishes to stay in office, I think it had better do so now because 65 per cent of the members that are here are going to have to answer to those farmers.

There are some things that have been put under parity. I am sure that some of the members will say it has not been applied. It has been applied in Ontario by the one organization that I know of that has ever been very active on its own, in making its own presentation and making its own way in Ontario,—I refer to the Ontario whole milk producers league—particularly in the fluid milk field. They have a parity formula. I do not necessarily agree with this formula because I do not know whether or not they set their price originally high enough. But they make use of a number of indexes.

I suggest that the minister listen to this and maybe take a pattern off it. They have a wholesale index and that is 20 per cent. They have a weekly wages index and that is 20 per cent. They have a commodities and services used by farmers index and that is 30 per cent; price of butterfat index, 10 per cent; price of condensed products index, 10 per cent; price of cheese index, 10 per cent. These amount to a total of 100 per cent. It is 100 per cent of a number of indexes of the commodities that go to make up the production costs of the fluid milk product. They take this price. They put their base price over 100 times the amount and they come up with a figure. They say that they will use a three months' period for setting their price and if the formula increases, it will increase by 19 cents a hundred, calculated on a three months' period. I am not suggesting that this particular price is the right one. The original base was 1949 to 1952 and the price in Toronto was $4.13; in 1953 it was $4.63; in 1954 I believe it was $4.53; in 1956 it was $4.77. It can therefore be seen that it has some relationship. Whether or not it is the right relationship, it has some relationship to the cost of that product. They have a signed contract yearly, signed by the Ontario whole milk producers' league and by A. P. Clark, the secretary for the government. I suggest that there is no question about it but that this would solve the problem for agriculture.

One of the arguments continually used against using a formula price or a full parity price is the fact that we may have surpluses. Mr. Chairman, we may not have surpluses now but we certainly have a problem. Under the former government we were buying from other countries more than we were selling. I understand that we now have a $1 billion dollar deficit this year already. I suggest that we cannot overproduce all the products that are derived from agriculture. I say that because I have heard on numerous occasions outstanding speakers like C. H. Millard, who is with the I.C.F.T.U., say so. I have heard him on numerous occasions after returning from Asia, Africa and the countries of Europe tell of the need for food commodities in those countries. He told us of the children who never in their lifetime have ever had a full meal. I always thought we got these stomachs because we ate too much. It may be in some cases because we did not eat enough. Children are being born, are living a lifetime and are dying—very young—never having had a full meal in their lifetime. I suggest that we can do as much for peace by filling their hungry stomachs and bringing them to our way of thinking as we can by stockpiling arms in Canada or building radar units or doing the other silly things that we do for defence.

We have also heard that if we are going to have a decent price for agriculture we are going to end up in the same position as the United States. May I say that I think some of our farmers would be very happy tonight if they thought we were going to end up with as much money from farm products as they have in the United States.

Mr. Gardiner: We get more for most of them.

Mr. Peters: The former minister says we get more now for most of them than they do. That may be so but farmers certainly will not tell you that and the figures certainly do not prove it.

Mr. Gardiner: The figures do prove it.

Mr. Peters: I do not think we can have a surplus of food products while the world needs food.

Mr. Gardiner: We have not a surplus except in wheat.

Mr. Peters: We may not. We can and we should have the Department of Agriculture appointing a number of economic attaches to go out to these countries that need food and sell it. We cannot sit in our seats in the house here and say, "They may come to us to buy our wheat". We had an opportunity to sell wheat to Australia. The minister was given this information very early in the session and he tried to make a joke of our selling wheat to Australia. We should have had an attache down there trying to sell that wheat, taking whatever currency we could get, so that we can eliminate this deficit we have in trade and accumulate a little bit of a surplus. We are not finding our farmers very happy about the situation they have, where the surplus is being carried on their farms. I think it is time that the surplus was carried on the books of the government and used for international trade.

We have heard many times—I hear it from the benches across the aisle—that the people will not stand for this, that prices are going to go up. My hon. friend on the other side of the house tonight quoted from a book, "Memorandum to the Government of Canada" from the Canadian Labour Congress, an organization of which I am proud to be a member, and they had something to do with this in the past. He read a statement. I think that statement should be read again. It is as follows:

> We are alarmed by the drastic fall in farm income. This is bad for the farm people, most of whom are far from rich, and who still make up one-sixth of the Canadian population. It is bad for the economy generally, which is still heavily dependent on exports, of which farm products make up about one-quarter.

And I would add that they should be making up about three-quarters.

> It is also bad for Canadian workers, for whose products a prosperous agriculture would provide a substantial market.

Then it goes on to say this:

> Canadian labour will fully support anything the government can do to restore the purchasing power of Canadian farmers.

Well, now we know exactly what the workers think about increasing the prosperity of the farms, and let me tell you they are not doing it because they are completely unselfish, they are doing it because they know that the farmer is now getting less than 43 per cent of the consumer dollar. They know, furthermore, that sales of automobiles are dropping; that sales of farm machinery are dropping; they know that these problems exist and they are willing to help their friends in the rural areas who are in the agricultural field.

I say that the government, knowing that these people must have at least 2½ dependents like everybody else and that they represent a very large part of the economy of Canada, and in view of the fact that they have been given the green light, now have no reason for sitting still and saying that the people might not go for it. We have very many other problems in agriculture, apart from the fact that we have to supply these people who are producing the agricultural products with a decent income. I think that can be done by parity prices. I think we should get straight with regard to this business of parity prices and I do not think we should continually change the name. When I find the meaning of parity prices I am not too happy about the term being changed to deficiency payments and so on—I am quite sure that this viewpoint is shared by farm organizations and others—because then it means that they have to sit down and find out the meaning of deficiency payments.

However, as I say, there are other problems. For instance we have in my area a number of beef cattle and we ship these cattle to Toronto. I think this government should put in a grading station and an abattoir so that we will be able to supply good beef for the markets in that particular area, which is already consuming much more than we can produce. Yet while our local product is going on the Toronto market it is not going to local markets. Of course, other markets constitute another problem in which I think this government should also get involved. We hear such statements as: "Oh, packinghouses, they are wonderful things; they only make .4 per cent profit", or something of that nature. They make very little profit.

Now when we take one of the largest packinghouses, which incidentally sends me its financial statement, it looks just about as nice as the financial statements of the mining organizations in which I used to work. That was in the gold mining industry and the financial statement to which I have referred reminds me of that. They show shares valued at $1,438,284 and the dividend this year on that .4 per cent which they were supposed to be making was $1,050,000. Now, what we do not know is that the Canadian people have financed this organization to a great extent, because they already have the accumulated capital invested in the way of land, buildings, and so on, assets to the value of $62 million and something. They have another $62 million which they call current assets. Then they point out how you can only make a very little bit of profit in that business.

Now I am sure that we as workers and we as farmers know that this problem has been raised continually. It has been raised by local newspapers on the rural scene which we are sometimes foolish to read and which say the farmer is the enemy of labour and labour is the enemy of the farmer. Well labour, as I said, has said what they think about the farmer. They are willing to co-operate and in some ways they have done so. For instance, in connection with the setting up of the joint economic commission. They have co-operated and are getting along very well.

It is true that when I was a miner and I sent my wife down to the local store with $5, she could buy a very small roast. She would think that the father-in-law had a big farm with a big cow and so there must be a hundred of those $5 roasts in that big cow. So she was of the opinion that the farmer was doing darn good. Then, when it came to talking to—

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: —my brother-in-law or—

An hon. Member: Be quiet for a minute.

An hon. Member: He did not hear you.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Might I ask this question. Could he explain to me what his conversation has to do with support prices on agricultural products?

Mr. Peters: I would say it has been said many many times that one of the reasons why we cannot do anything about giving the farmer a fair deal is because the consumer will not pay for it, the consumer objects. I think the consumer has already paid for it.

I also know that when my wife bought that $5 roast the farmer did not get $5; he did not get $3. He got on an average for his expenditure of labour less than 43 per cent, so I think that he certainly was not getting value.

We should set up this committee which we have been kicking around for quite a while now and put on it some people who are representatives; we should include some workers and some farmers. Then throw in somebody from the agricultural colleges to handle the fine points of the law and such other things. We should make sure there are not more of those people than there are of the people who are going to be interested in this business.

We have heard that the Canadian Labour Congress, when they took a large size freezer around to the fall fairs—which are patronized, I might say, very heavily by the farmers in both northern and southern Ontario—asked of the people how much labour went into this particular freezer. I should explain that it was a big piece of equipment for frozen foods costing something in the neighbourhood of $470. This was the total labour cost, because obviously it is labour which is kicking the price of all our commodities up to a higher level. This was taken around and the farm people believed, because they had been told by their local politicians that this was so, that the labour was proportionately high. Hon. members may be surprised at the guesses which went as high as $375 for a $475 product. The woman who won the competition made a guess which was very close to $84 which was the actual total cost of cutting the lumber used in the manufacturing processes, the mining done to make the steel and the metal and all the other processes which went into the manufacture of the article. It all came to about $84, so labour was not getting such a lot out of it.

The Financial Times pointed out the other day that the labour production costs—that is not total cost but production cost—on an automobile selling for $2700 were about $75. In other words the workers of that plant who put it together got $75—

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we have had a very wide and general range of debate on agriculture today. I doubt whether a good deal of it was in order in a discussion of this resolution. However, I did not raise a point of order except when hon. members got onto fisheries or something along that line. However, we have heard speeches here today in connection with the question of tariffs, in connection with the financial setup of a certain company and in connection with all kinds of individual agricultural problems in particular areas or constituencies. A great deal of the content of the speeches has been concerned with the difficulties which exist in agriculture and with which farmers find themselves faced. Now I do not think there is any need for us to continue hearing speaker after speaker reiterating the difficult situation in agriculture today. I think most of us realize and have realized the situation for a considerable time, and one thing I can assure all hon. members of this house is that nobody realizes the situation as well as I do.

Mr. Lewry: Well then do something about it.

An hon. Member: Give us a chance.

Mr. Harkness: In the five or six months since I have been Minister of Agriculture I have had delegations from, I think, practically every producer group of any size and most of the smaller ones in this country. They have all come to me and told me their troubles, and as a result of that and of I do not know how many hundreds or thousands of letters from individuals and every conceivable organization, I think I do realize the situation in agriculture today and the difficulties involved, as to the industry on the whole right across Canada and as far as particular segments are concerned, as well as anybody else in this house.

Now the legislation which is presently before us is designed to try to improve that situation to some extent. When I spoke first this morning in introducing this resolution I tried to make it plain—and I should like to state again what I said then—that I did not look upon this as a cure-all for the many difficulties from which agriculture is suffering. I said at that time:

> I do not maintain that it is a cure-all for all the difficulties under which agriculture has laboured for the past several years. No one piece of legislation can be expected, at one stroke, to transform a complex industry, such as agriculture, from a depressed state to one of full and abounding health.

I realize the situation in this regard as well as anybody else does, but unfortunately most of the speeches we have heard here today have been along the line that by passing some piece of legislation we are going to wave a magic wand over the agricultural industry, and that as a result of waving this wand all the difficulties which confront it are going to disappear. That essentially has been the complaint of hon. members in the C.C.F. group and of some other hon. members who have spoken today. This legislation is not a cure-all. Nobody ever said it would be a cure-all, and nobody with any sense of realism as far as agriculture is concerned in this country can ever expect that any one piece of legislation would be a cure-all.

Mr. Chairman, in order to put agriculture on a sound basis and in order to give our farmers a reasonable standard of living we have to move forward on a considerable number of fronts. We are not confining action to this front alone.

An hon. Member: You are standing still now.

Mr. Harkness: We in this government are making every effort possible to move forward on a considerable number of fronts. I would just like to indicate some of the things we are engaged in doing which are necessary to restore agriculture to a sound position. First of all, we have to dispose of the big surplus of wheat which is hanging like a blanket over the price of agricultural products of all kinds in this country. That is one of the things, particularly, which has to be done before the agricultural industry in this country can be put on a sound basis, whether it is wheat raising or some type of agriculture in the maritimes. We are making every effort possible to dispose of this surplus of grain and, as indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day, and as I can assure hon. members now, we are making some progress in that regard and we hope to reduce this surplus to at least a reasonable extent during the coming six months.

The second way in which we are trying to attack this problem is through the royal commission on price spreads which was announced here yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: If you had paid any attention to what the hon. member of your party, who has just sat down said, you would not be laughing. He was making quite a point of the fact that the farmer was not getting anything like the proportion of the consumer dollar which he should have.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: Just wait until I have finished. As soon as I have finished you can ask questions.

Mr. Argue: Put some farmers on the royal commission.

Mr. Harkness: I trust that the result of the royal commission on price spreads will be to give the farmer a greater proportion of the consumer dollar than he is getting. That is the second way in which we are attempting to attack this problem.

The third front on which we have to move forward is in the matter of soil and water conservation measures. The South Saskatchewan dam is an example in this regard and we hope to proceed with it.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Harkness: Yet another is improved credit facilities for farmers. This is another front on which we hope to be able to make some advance and improve the situation. Considerable studies have been made with regard to this matter, and also with regard to another way in which we think help could be extended to farmers, that is with regard to a crop insurance plan.

These are only some of the ways in which progress has to be made before agriculture can be put on a reasonable basis. We realize that there are many other things to be done in addition to this before we can get this industry into the situation we would like to see it in, and in which, I know, every hon. member in this house would like to see it.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, of all the criticism which has been put forward here today, hardly any of it was constructive. All we have heard from speaker after speaker was the terrible situation the farmer is in. We know the situation has been bad, but scarcely one speaker has made any suggestion as to how it could be improved.

All those hon. gentlemen did was make general statements that we should have full parity of prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: They made statements along that line, but was there any suggestion as to how anything along this line was to be accomplished, or as to what they meant by this? These were just general statements; in other words merely destructive criticism which meant very little or nothing.

Further, Mr. Chairman, I would say that on the basis of most of the speeches I have heard from the other side of the house today a great majority of the people who spoke did not understand the legislation; they just have not grasped what it is going to do.

Mr. Tucker: They understand it too well.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Harkness: I have not time to go over all the points which were made by the various speakers on the other side of the house, but I will attempt to deal with a few of them. First, the right hon. member for Melville: most of what he said was a defence of what the Liberal administration, of which he was a member, had done in the past. I do not blame him a bit for that; I think it is quite natural. But there is one statement he made to which I must take exception, and that is there is not much difference between this legislation and the legislation which he sponsored—the resolution of 1944, as he called it, setting up the prices support board. There are very many material differences between that legislation and this legislation which is projected, and I should like to outline briefly what some of them are.

First, this legislation provides for a definite formula to be used in the fixing of guaranteed and floor prices. Secondly, it provides under the legislation for an advisory committee which must be set up representing farmer organizations for the purpose of giving advice to the minister and the government in regard to what commodities should be under price support and the level of support which should be provided for them.

Mr. Argue: Will you put any farmers on that committee?

Mr. Harkness: We shall put some farmers on, not pseudo-farmers.

The third difference is that this legislation provides for guaranteed prices on any agricultural products, which are set for a year in advance. In other words this meets the demand for forward pricing. Some people have said the measure contains nothing about forward pricing. This legislation provides for a price to be set, and it is to be in effect for a year from that time. Also, this legislation provides for floor prices guaranteed by the legislation itself.

An hon. Member: Twenty per cent under the Liberals.

Mr. Harkness: The uninformed cries coming from the C.C.F. party indicate that they just do not understand the legislation. All that they are concerned with is to try to howl the legislation down and howl me down for political advantage when I am trying to explain it. I have sufficient confidence in the farmers of this country to believe that when they see what this legislation is they will think it is a good, honest effort to assist them and to put them in a better position than they have ever been in before.

The right hon. member for Melville tried to maintain that farmers will not be as well off under this legislation as under the old scheme, the one we are under now, namely the prices support legislation; that they may lose money by it. There is not anything they could possibly lose by it, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Gardiner: I will tell you after a while.

Mr. Harkness: They never had very much under it.

Mr. Gardiner: They had $1,164 million.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Rosthern said there were no more powers under this act than there were under the old act, and so forth. I might say it is not only a matter of the powers that are there. I admit that there were sufficient powers under the old act to have done a great deal more than was done. What is required and what is necessary and what I am sure the farmers of Canada have confidence in, is that this government has the will and the determination to put guaranteed prices under the farm products where that is necessary in order to give them a reasonable standard of living.

As far as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort is concerned and the hon. member for Springfield, a good deal of what they said was in the way of what might be called general abuse. Therefore, I do not think it is worth while trying to say anything about what either of them said. The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort did have something to say about the two-price system, and two or three members of the Social Credit party also brought up the matter of a two-price system. Of course, that is a different question altogether from price support legislation, and it is not a question which I think one should try to introduce and mix up with this particular legislation which is designed to provide for guaranteed farm prices and for floor prices.

Mr. Ellis: You said you wanted suggestions.

An hon. Member: Would it help to call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Acadia said that the legislation ignores the relationship between the cost of goods bought and the prices received for agricultural products. That is absolutely not correct. I think the hon. member just did not understand the explanation that I gave, or he did not pay any attention to it. The bill is drawn up and the procedure as outlined is designed specifically so that the relationship between the cost of the goods bought by farmers and the farmers cost of production will be related to the guaranteed prices he will receive. These factors will be given due consideration and an attempt made to reach something reasonable in that regard.

I see that the time is going on, Mr. Chairman. There are a considerable number of other points that I should have liked to touch on but I have not the time to do it now. However, I would urge the members of the committee to let this resolution pass tonight so that the bill may be distributed and put into the hands of hon. members. After that has been done I feel quite sure that they will be in a much better position to discuss this measure on second reading and in the committee of the whole and that there will not be nearly the waste of time that we have had today which, I am convinced, has come about because people did not understand what they were talking about in many instances.

Furthermore, I might point out that unless this is done it just means further delay as far as getting ahead with this legislation and getting it through are concerned. As the house leader indicated last night and before, I think we are not going to be able to go ahead with this same legislation tomorrow, and I do think it would be a considerable advantage if we could pass the resolution and get the bill in hon. members hands and give them some time to study it.

The Chairman: Order. Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harrison: Will you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: With the consent of the house, shall I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Chevrier: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, I think somebody on the government side said, "Talk it out." There is about one minute to go, therefore it will not be too hard to do even by somebody who talks as little as I do. However, this is a rather important piece of legislation designed to do a very important job, and it affects my part of the country quite a lot. I have been waiting to get a chance to speak on this all day, and I do not make any apologies for speaking on it now. I hope I shall be able to conclude in a normal manner tomorrow.

In introducing the resolution this morning, my genial friend, the Minister of Agriculture, made one interesting remark that intrigued me more than anything else in his remarks.

That remark was that there would be no incentive supports supplied by this piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Harrison: I will go on with that further tomorrow. Another remark from the government benches by, I think, the hon. member for Marquette, was to the effect that this legislation made him proud. Well, I hope that the results make him a prophet in his own constituency, and I wish the government the best in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. Shall I rise and report progress?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 1 on today's order paper, the house in committee of the whole on an act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. Then we shall take item No. 10, which is the second reading of a bill respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company; then item No. 12,—

Mr. Argue: All emergency measures.

Mr. Green: —which is an act to amend the Excise Tax Act; then, item No. 13, an act to amend the Income Tax Act; then, item No. 17, which is a resolution preceding a bill to provide for loans to the province of New Brunswick; and item No. 11, second reading of an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the house leader able to indicate what the business will be for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give that tonight; I hope to have a better idea tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Can he say what will be done on Friday?

Mr. Green: No, I cannot say that. Friday is only the day after tomorrow. I will let the house know just as soon as possible.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the leader of the house give any indication as to when this resolution will be before the house again?

Mr. Green: We will get it on at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the minister not say whether Friday will be devoted to estimates or legislation?

Mr. Green: No, I cannot say that tonight, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is there anything the minister can say?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have been spoiling the three opposition parties. I have given them the plans much farther ahead than any house leader has ever given them before.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, WINNIPEG

Question No. 116—Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Is a progressive lay-off taking place in the Canadian National Railways shops in Winnipeg?
2. If so, how many men have been laid off by months since May 1, 1957?
3. Was there an undertaking by the government that a works program would be instituted by the Canadian National Railways to protect those threatened by unemployment?
4. If so, what is the present situation regarding this program?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. In a statement made in the house on behalf of the Canadian National Railways on November 4, 1957, at page 704 of Hansard in reply to questions by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other hon. members, the management dealt fully with the matter of adjustments in the number of employees on the system as a whole, and this statement is explanatory of the situation at Winnipeg.

2. The average level of employment in the Winnipeg area from May to September was as follows:

June	3,050
July	3,048
August	2,964
September	2,926

3. The government undertook to finance the cost of a special program of car repairs and other shop work as outlined in a press announcement issued from Ottawa by the Minister of Transport under date of July 12, 1957. The announcement also indicated that the Canadian National management would open conversations with union leaders to explore the adjustments in the existing seniority rules of the working groups affected which would be required to make the special program effective.

Questions

4. Under date of August 26, 1957, the following press release was issued in Montreal: "The special work program aimed at minimizing the effect of lay-offs in C.N.R. shops, and announced by the Minister of Transport on July 12, has not been put into effect, the railway said today. A company statement explained: Following discussions with representatives of the unions it was found that transfers of workers between shop groups could not be provided for under the seniority rules that are part of the wage agreements".

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES AND PENSIONS

1. How many individuals are in receipt of war veterans allowance?
2. How many receive a war veterans pension?
3. What was the total amount paid in each instance for 1956?

1. Awards to veterans, widows and orphans at September 30, 1957, 57,238.

2. Awards in respect of disability and of death at September 30, 1957, 192,144.

2. How much is the duty when we exceed the quarterly quota on cattle over 700 pounds?
3. How much is the duty, if any, on cattle under 700 pounds?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. 1½ cents per lb.

2. 2½ cents per lb.

3. Cattle weighing each: Under 200 pounds —1½ cents per lb. for not over 200,000 head entered in the 12-month period beginning April 1; 2½ cents per lb. for imports above the quota.

200 or more, but under 700 pounds—2½ cents per lb. on all imports.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 12, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTING OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Have tolls for the St. Lawrence seaway been established pursuant to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, and if not will he tell the house how it is that a member of the United States tolls committee announced in Washington recently that tolls had been fixed at 50 cents a ton for bulk commodities and $1.25 a ton for general cargo? What I should like to know is whether or not the Canadian seaway authority was consulted and agreed to this announcement?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. There has been no agreement as yet as to tolls as provided for in the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. The seaway authority is not aware of any official announcement from Washington as to the setting of seaway tolls, although references have been made recently in speeches by United States officials to evidence given at congressional hearings when the Wiley-Dondero act was under study. I can assure the house that in so far as the seaway authority is concerned, the quantum of the tolls is still under study. It is not anticipated that the studies can be completed for several months.

Mr. Chevrier: I hold in my hand a press statement announcing the amount of tolls in Washington. I simply ask this supplementary question. Does the minister not think that announcements of this character should be made jointly by the Canadian and United States committee on tolls appointed for this purpose?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I certainly do. I agree with the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWER TO STARRED QUESTION 48

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): There seemed to be some confusion about the answering of starred question No. 48 yesterday. Since that question requires an answer from several departments it is, of course, the responsibility of my colleague the Secretary of State. I know she intended yesterday, had she been here, to ask that it stand. Since it is not possible for her to be here today I thought I would give this explanation to the house.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DEFINITION OF OPTOMETRIST—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "CANADA'S HEALTH AND WELFARE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an article in the publication Canada's Health and Welfare, November issue, entitled "Myopia" written under the direction of J. H. Grove, M.D., in which the position of the optometrist is degraded? If so, does he feel that it is the responsibility of his department to promote one profession as against another?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The article on "Myopia" in Canada's Health and Welfare, November issue, has been drawn to my attention. I can assure the hon. member that the definition of "optometrist" given in this article is essentially the same as previous definitions given in pamphlets issued by the department in 1947, 1952 and 1955. These definitions were approved by optometrists and officials of associations of optometrists. It is not considered that optometrists have been degraded by these definitions, which are in accord with the facts; nor does this department promote the interests of one profession as against another.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WESTERN GERMANY—REARMING WITH ATOMIC WEAPONS AND GUIDED MISSILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since we have already agreed to supply Western Germany with uranium for peaceful purposes, does the minister believe it to be wise to support the rearming of Western Germany with atomic weapons, or more particularly the stockpiling of guided missiles in that area?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to take this question as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question supplementary to the previous question I asked. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he would take my question as notice, which notice I am sorry I did not have time to give him.

May I say this matter has been before the country for some time. Have the government therefore considered these two problems of atomic weapons for West Germany and the stockpiling of guided missiles, and have they come to any conclusion with regard to them in view of the serious nature of these questions?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): With respect to the placing of nuclear warheads in Western Germany, that matter has been under consideration but as yet we do not clearly know what the position will be at the NATO meeting in Paris. It would therefore be inadvisable and incorrect to make any conjecture as to what our stand would be at that time.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did I understand him to say the government could not conjecture what its position would be at NATO with regard to the important issue referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar? Does this mean that the Canadian delegation is going to the meeting at Paris without its mind made up on this issue?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I did not mean to give that impression. I had in mind that we have not all the papers, nor received all the representations and demands that will be made.

NATO—REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF MIDDLE EAST PROBLEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister at the forthcoming meeting of the NATO council include in Canada's general objectives and urge a re-examination of the Middle East problem?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question. There is going to be a re-examination of the Middle East problem, I hope, at the NATO council meeting. Naturally all problems that are concerned with the assurance of peace and its achievement will receive attention. I feel confident that I can assure my hon. friend that the Middle East problem will receive every consideration.

TRADE

PROPOSED U.S. TARIFF ON LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED REMOVAL OF NICKEL DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question of which I have sent him notice only since I came into the house, for which I sincerely apologize. A New York Times report indicates that the United States may remove the 1½ cents per pound tariff on nickel imports in order to mollify Canadians should the proposed lead and zinc tariff be recommended by the President. Will the Prime Minister inform the United States state department that this action could serve no other purpose than to assist the United States consumer, and would in no way compensate for discriminatory action against the base metal industry?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman said that he just sent the notice over to me. Attached to it is the press report in question. In reply to my hon. friend I should like to say that after the implications connected with this prospective step have been considered by the government, provided the step is to be taken, the necessary representations will be made to the United States government; and if in essence my hon. friend's conclusions are correct, they will certainly be brought to the attention of the government of the United States.

Mr. Byrne: I have a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister warn the state department of the United States that Canada may be compelled to take drastic retaliatory action if this discriminatory action is taken?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether that question is seeking a clarification of the answer which the hon. member has already had.

URANIUM—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT FOR SALE TO WEST GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am sorry I have not given him notice, but perhaps he could take this question as notice. The Gazette this morning carries a picture of the signing of the trade agreement which was referred to this morning by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The caption is:

German ambassador Hazzo von Etzdorf signs a 10-year agreement for the purchase of 500 tons of Canadian uranium to be used as fuel in nuclear power plants. External Affairs Minister Smith looks on.

I have two questions which I would like to ask. First, has this trade agreement been signed without first having been referred to parliament? Second—and this question is based on a contention I have had over the years that one department should not take the responsibility of another—is the Department of External Affairs assuming the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the general practice is concerned, the government assumes responsibility at all times for the affixing of signatures to trade agreements on behalf of the people of Canada, and that was the course followed in connection with the agreement in question. Any action taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs represents the opinion, as would naturally be the case, of the government of the day.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Prime Minister, will this agreement be submitted later on to parliament for approval?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that procedure represents the course that is generally followed, that parliament has an opportunity of giving the fullest consideration to any agreements entered into.

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO EXPORTS TO ASIAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I could probably direct my question to the genial acting minister. I do not expect an immediate answer, and perhaps he would take this as notice. Is there any prohibition on the export from Canada of automobiles of Canadian manufacture to communist China or to other Asian countries?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have taken that question as notice.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED EXPANSION OF CANADIAN SALES BY ROLLS-ROYCE COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on December 10 the hon. member for Essex West referred to an article in the Globe and Mail of December 6 reporting that the Rolls-Royce company planned to triple their sales target for Canada next year. He asked whether this was a result of the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom.

I have now had an opportunity to make some inquiries and to look at the article in question. I understand that the Rolls-Royce company started to intensify their North American sales efforts several months ago. According to the Globe and Mail story the total number of cars which the company hopes to sell in Canada next year is 100. In other words it would appear that they have been selling cars at the rate of about 33 a year. No automobile in this luxury class is manufactured or even assembled in Canada, though several types are imported from the United States. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has explained to the house on several occasions, the purpose of this mission is to find sources of supply in the United Kingdom for goods now imported from non-commonwealth sources.

To sum up, these plants of the Rolls-Royce company are not directly related to the trade mission, and even if carried out will not have the effect of reducing the production of Canadian-made automobiles to any appreciable extent but will replace imports from other countries.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FEDERAL AID TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT IN RESPECT OF MICA CREEK DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in my continuing search for explanation, inspiration and confirmation I address a question to the Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

In view of the recent statement of the British Columbia provincial leader of the Progressive Conservative party to the effect that the offer made by the federal government to aid British Columbia in the development of Mica creek still stands, would the minister confirm that this represents government policy?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have not seen the statement which is referred to

I am not in a very good position to make any comments upon it. I would, however, point out to the hon. member that when the government has an announcement of government policy to make it will be made here in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: On television.

Mr. Harkness: And not to confirm or deny newspaper reports.

Mr. Herridge: As the minister apparently wants time to meditate on the question, may I ask a supplementary question? Does he agree with the statement made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in British Columbia to the effect that if the Wenner-Gren development of the Peace river is realized it will be necessary to cast aside the development of the Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: I think if the hon. member wishes to ask for information as to government policy he ought to ask directly, rather than seek confirmation of a statement made by someone for whom the government has no responsibility.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, may I explain that I ask these questions because the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was also in the habit of making similar statements when he was a political Elijah wandering in the wilderness.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I disallowed the question, and I ask the minister not to deal with it.

AGRICULTURE

NORTHERN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO HARVEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I want to address this question to the Prime Minister, not that I wish to add to the burdens on his shoulders before he leaves for the NATO conference but because I want to ask him if he will deal with the matter before he leaves.

There is every indication that the inclement weather conditions have brought about a crop situation in the Peace river area which can be described in no other way than as disastrous. The farmers in the area are grateful for what the Department of Agriculture is doing to speed up inspections under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but it is now clear that P.F.A. payments will be far short of what will be required as even a minimum of assistance to prevent widespread suffering among the people this winter.

Will the government of Canada join with the province of Alberta in a speedy, thorough study of the facts of the situation with a view, possibly, to declaring the Peace river district a disaster area, so that adequate help may be advanced to prevent what looks now to be a threat of real want and suffering among the people?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The government fully realizes what the situation is in northern Alberta and the degree to which that situation has brought grave discomfort and even worse among those living in that area, and I can certainly give the hon. gentleman an assurance that a full investigation into the situation will be made in co-operation with the government of Alberta, to the end that as a result of such an investigation such action shall be taken as will be necessary to meet the position, consonant, of course, with federal responsibility for problems such as this.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Does this situation not obtain in the Peace river area of British Columbia as well?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was thinking of the Peace river area in general. In so far as the Peace river area in British Columbia is concerned, naturally the government of British Columbia will have to be consulted and its decisions given the fullest possible consideration.

PATENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State or, in her absence, to the leader of the house. May I ask when the report of the royal commission on patents, copyrights, trademarks and industrial design, relating to copyright only, will be available? I ask this in view of the fact that we were advised on October 28 it would be available in about two weeks, and because this is a matter of concern to some publishers.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Acting Secretary of State): I will take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

EDMONTON—LOSS OF HANGAR BY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister give information to the house with respect to the fire which destroyed No. 5 hangar at the Edmonton municipal airport

Tuesday evening, the extent of the loss, and what steps are being taken to investigate the cause?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a fire occurred at the municipal airport in Edmonton on December 9. The fire took place not in the hangar but in a building which was used by the air cadets. The building was completely destroyed in spite of the efforts made by the Edmonton fire brigade. There was no loss of life and no personal casualties, but a certain number of uniforms and training aids were lost. The building had been originally constructed by the United States air force during the war, and I understand it was a frame building. The amount of the loss has not yet been determined, but a board of inquiry has been set up.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—STATEMENT ON PRICE OFFERED SUBCONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked the following question:

> Has the minister received any representations on the price offered subcontractors for clearing work on the right of way of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and if so, what is the subject matter of such representations?

The answer is that I have received no representations myself, and I am informed that no approach has been made to the officials of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation on this subject. I also understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself has not received any representations regarding the matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED REFUSAL OF OFFICERS TO WORK SHIPS —RESUMPTION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I have not given him notice of the question, but I am sure he is so conversant with the topic that he will not need any notice in order to answer the question.

It was stated over the radio the other day that the officers in charge of the eight C.N.S. ships which are finding things difficult lately have refused to operate the ships if they are manned by scab crews. Will the minister make a statement and tell us exactly what is the situation now regarding those ships?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not the further newspaper report which appeared, I believe, the following morning under the heading of the Canadian Press, and which was completely opposite to the original report. It stated that those officers were quite willing to sail under foreign registry.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Transport a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Bow River. In view of the statement by the minister on November 11 that in transferring the flags of these ships from Canada to Trinidad, and in the consent which the government gave to the transfer, it was thought that would be the best method by which to administer the service to the West Indies, and in view of the fact it is over a month now since this has taken place, has the minister any idea as to when the service will be administered or restored?

Mr. Hees: The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

PENSIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister had an opportunity to read the letter he received from the Canadian National Railways veterans association of Vancouver concerning the need for an increase in the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees? Can the minister say whether his department is reviewing, digesting, studying and working on this material, in the same way the Minister of Finance said his department was working on the suggestion for an increase for retired civil servants?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have not yet received that letter, but I know the management of the Canadian National Railways is always studying any possibilities there are for bettering the rates of pay or pension conditions for their employees.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, in view of the fact that the chief justiceship of Ontario has been vacant now for a number of months, he is in position to say whether we may expect an announcement as to who shall occupy that position, and whether that announcement may be made at an early date?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will, I am sure, realize that appointments of chief justices are within the purview or prerogatives of the Prime Minister; therefore I cannot make any statement on that matter. Any definite statement must come from the Prime Minister; but I know I am safe in saying that the hon. gentleman and the house may expect that appointment to be made just as soon as possible.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I have not given notice, and he may wish to take this as notice. Has the minister received any requests from the government of any of the prairie provinces for an extension of the designated area under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act? If so, has the minister taken any action to meet such request?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that I have received any representations from any of the governments of the three prairie provinces in this regard. I have received requests in regard to it from various individuals, boards of trade and other organizations.

FINANCE

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUCCESSFUL CAMPAIGN AND WITHDRAWAL OF ISSUE

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Finance leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the house will be pleased indeed to know that the sale of Canada savings bonds in the twelfth Canada savings bonds series has reached by far an all-time record. Sales recorded up to the 10th day of December stood at $1,169,421,000. It has, therefore, been decided that the bonds should be withdrawn from sale on December 31. Applications for purchase made prior to that date on arrangements for deferred payment will not be affected by this withdrawal.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

An important part of the Canada savings bond sales and an increasingly important component of new cash sales arose from the operation of the payroll savings plan. Indeed, sales under the payroll savings plan in the present series, Mr. Speaker, reached an all time record. They now touch the figure of $215 million.

I wish to take this opportunity to acknowledge the service rendered by thousands of Canadian employers who provide the leadership and meet the accounting expenses involved in the pay deductions through sales to 700,000 Canadian employees. This all but unanimous support from business circles for Canada savings bonds reflects a high and far-sighted sense of community and national interest.

I wish to acknowledge also the energetic effort of investment dealers, banks, trust and loan companies and many other savings institutions in pushing series 12 sales to a new peak; and to newspapers and other mediums of information for their support of the campaign.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the minister a question. In view of the very satisfactory results nationally, would it be possible for him to give us a breakdown of these sales by provinces? This would give us, I think, some indication of the distribution of wealth in the country, and some idea of the strength of the economy in the various provinces of the dominion.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend would be content to leave that matter until the closing of the campaign on December 31. I shall be very glad then to furnish any information on breakdowns that may be available and that may be desired by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members may be interested in knowing, in this connection, that the employees of parliament have oversubscribed their objective.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could he tell us how much of the total he mentioned a moment ago as subscribed represents new money, and how much represents the proceeds from other Canada savings bonds that have been turned in for conversion?

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to give this figure precisely at the conclusion of the campaign. The present bond attracted, naturally, a substantial volume of trade-ins. There have always been trade-ins, and it is not always possible to segregate the particular amount because these trade-ins go on throughout the whole year. It is not possible, therefore, to segregate any amount and attribute it particularly to the new campaign. If my hon. friend would wish it, I could give a breakdown of that information at the conclusion of the campaign, giving the figures on trade-ins of the old series say for the last three months of the present calendar year.

Mr. Marler: I was hoping the minister might be able to give at least an approximate idea. Otherwise there would be a rather false impression created by the amount of sales he has just given, unless we knew approximately what was the proportion of conversions.

Mr. C. A. Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): May I ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Is it not a fact that the regulations concerning the sale of these bonds have been changed, and that the amount one individual can purchase has been increased? It seems to me I saw that somewhere.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I announced that in the house at the opening of the campaign. The maximum permissible subscription by any one individual was raised from $5,000, as in the last several campaigns, to $10,000.

Mr. Cannon: That probably had some influence on the fact that sales have increased?

Mr. Fleming: It may have. I do not believe anyone could give a categorical answer to that until we have a breakdown, at the conclusion of the campaign, of those subscriptions that were in excess of $5,000.

Mr. Cannon: Is the minister thinking of increasing the maximum amount to $20,000?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the minister is thinking of closing the present campaign.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR CONVERSION OF CAPITAL STOCK COMPANIES INTO MUTUAL COMPANIES, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 169, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Provisions applicable to all companies.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might say very briefly that on second reading in the house I explained the purposes of the bill. Following second reading the bill was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, where the clauses were reviewed in detail and the bill reported without any amendment. Before the committee the superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor, was present and answered questions of hon. members. Counsel was present for the life insurance companies, although he made no representations to the committee. I think I am correct in saying, Mr. Chairman, that the bill was reported by the committee with unanimous approval.

Mr. Benidickson: I made some comments with respect to this bill at the second reading stage, and those remarks can be found at page 1865 of Hansard for December 4. As the Minister of Finance has stated, I would say this bill was given careful consideration by the committee on banking and commerce, clause by clause. While the committee was sitting I asked the superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor, if the department had heard from the insurance companies with respect to the terms of this bill. He said, as reported at page 27 of the minutes and proceedings of evidence of the banking and commerce committee:

> My advice from the industry, Mr. Benidickson, is that they give this bill complete support, and I can say that we in the department have not received a single complaint either from a company or the industry as a whole, or anyone else.

The terms, as hon. members realize, are, with slight exception, permissive terms which permit a discretion with respect to changes in the law, and are not mandatory. There was no dissent in the banking and commerce committee, and I have no remarks to make beyond those I made on December 4.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CANADIAN MEMBERS, DESIGNATION OF AUTHORITY, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 194, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the house would probably wish to have a very brief word of explanation of the bill. I should like to stress in the first place that this is an urgent bill, it is not a routine bill by any means. The urgency arises out of the fact that under legislation of the state of New York the United States representation on the bridge authority will become five members effective as of January 1 next, that figure having been in effect a reduction from six under legislation that was introduced and passed in the legislature of the state of New York without reference to Canada.

Following representations that were made, further legislation was passed by the legislature of the state of New York reducing the United States appointees from six to five in number effective as of January 1, 1958. Canada has had three representatives on this authority up to this time, and it is necessary to enlarge Canadian representation from three to five in order to bring it into equal numbers with the United States representation on the authority. There are, of course, other provisions in the bill.

May I say also that it is my intention to propose that following second reading, the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

May I indicate to the house some of the circumstances which have led to the introduction of the bill. Briefly, it proposes to amend an act which was passed by parliament in 1934 concurrently with United States legislation to establish an authority to operate a bridge constructed in 1927 between Fort Erie and Buffalo, known as the Peace bridge. The 1934 legislation permitted refinancing, and provided that when the existing indebtedness was repaid that part of the bridge lying within the territory of Canada would revert to this country. A similar provision in the New York legislation provided for the reversion of the property in the United States to the state of New York.

Since 1934 this authority has had a highly favourable record in financial terms and in terms of service performed, and I think it can be said that there was considerable satisfaction, from the Canadian side at least, with the record and performance of the authority. However, by 1962 the retirement of the bonded indebtedness would, under the terms of the 1934 legislation, force the wind-up of the existing authority. Accordingly, some consideration of the future management of the bridge was bound to arise.

In addition, from the Canadian point of view, Canadian representation on the bridge authority was a minority position consisting of three members out of a total of nine. In the normal course of events these matters would not have been expected to arise until sometime in the 1960's, just prior to the normal expiration of the present arrangement. However, about 1955 the city of Buffalo and the adjoining counties were much concerned about the development of the port of Buffalo to take advantage of the increased shipping anticipated as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway development.

[Mr. Fleming.]

A scheme to apply the net profits of the bridge for Buffalo port expansion was proposed, and this resulted in enactment by the legislature of the state of New York in 1955 of a statute creating the Niagara frontier port authority. Of interest to Canada was the fact that this statute placed the Peace bridge and its revenue under this authority. The statute also provided that out of a 12-man authority three would be Canadians, with the right to participate in matters affecting the bridge only. Canada was not consulted concerning this enactment.

Almost immediately following this enactment this oversight was appreciated within the state of New York, and an opinion by the attorney general of the state was given to the effect that such changes could not be effected without the consent of congress and the parliament of Canada. This, of course, was also the position of the Canadian government.

Following this, representatives of the government of the state of New York and the city of Buffalo, with the support of the United States embassy, sought the approval of Canada for the proposed changes. It was stated that the port authority could not function unless it included the bridge project. It was also stated that the terms of the trust indemnity which accompanied the issue of the bridge bonds made it necessary that the bridge and the port be included under one authority if the New York share of the bridge revenues was to support the project.

This request was considered and, while there was a desire to maintain the tradition of co-operation between the two countries, the conclusion was reached that the New York state proposals, as embodied in the Niagara frontier port authority statute, were unacceptable. It was, however, recognized that the United States did have a half ownership interest in the bridge, and therefore had the right to request an alteration in the status of the bridge if they so wished. It was also recognized that because of the reversionary clause some new arrangements would have to be worked out for the period subsequent to 1962, as I mentioned earlier, and that Canada would want action to increase the Canadian representation on the authority from the present position of three members out of nine. Accordingly, the United States embassy was informed that while the proposal was unacceptable, Canada was prepared to discuss appropriate alternative arrangements for the future.

Discussions at the official level followed, and on November 23, 1956, in a further note to the United States embassy, Canada outlined certain principles which it felt should govern any future arrangements for the operation of the bridge. These were:

1. The control and management of the bridge should be vested in an international commission composed of equal representation from Canada and the United States, with the chairmanship alternating between Canada and the United States from within this membership.

2. The control and operation of the bridge should be kept separate from any other Canadian or United States interest.

3. The first charge on all revenues of the bridge must be the normal operating costs, the amount required annually for normal maintenance of the structure and its auxiliary buildings on both approaches, and the annual cost of such capital works as are required from time to time to accommodate the traffic seeking to use the facility.

Canada also stated its view that any excess or net revenue, after the charges referred to in (3) above had been met, should be divided equally as between the two countries, to be paid to agencies designated by the appropriate legislative bodies.

These principles were ultimately agreed upon, and it was further agreed to retain the existing authority, with suitable alterations, as the best means of implementing the principles. The most important alteration, from the Canadian point of view, was an increase in Canadian membership on the commission to five, or a position of equality, with the additional provision that the chairmanship would alternate annually between a Canadian and a United States member of the commission.

Other arrangements were to provide for the control of increases in tolls, in Canada to be subject to the authority of the board of transport commissioners, and the purposes for which tolls were to be levied. The current and future capital needs of the bridge were to be provided for by the creation of a capital improvements reserve fund into which would be paid a rising percentage of the gross receipts of the bridge up to 14 per cent per annum.

Finally, in accordance with the principles outlined earlier, it was agreed that it would be provided that any net revenues would be distributed in equal shares between Canada and the United States.

These agreed changes were embodied in amendments to the existing New York state act which created the Peace bridge authority. These were passed by the New York state legislature at its last session, and the first version of the Niagara frontier port authority act suitably amended to remove provisions touching on the Peace bridge. A concurring resolution approving the arrangements has been passed by the United States congress.

The bill before this house will, if enacted, complete Canada's part in the arrangements by amending the existing Canadian statute to provide for increased Canadian membership from three to five, for the receipt of 50 per cent of the net revenue from the operation of the bridge, and for extension of the life of the authority until January 1, 1992. This date will provide a period which, taking into account the time necessary for legislative passage and suitable terms of bond issue, and so forth, has been agreed as a suitable period to provide a reasonable life for the authority and yet provide an opportunity for review by both countries in the future.

This bridge, as members will appreciate, is important to Canada because of its role as an economic artery, as a link between Canada and the United States, and as an important customs port of entry. It is also, of course, of considerable direct importance locally as a large employment factor in the town of Fort Erie and surrounding municipalities, in addition to its transportation value.

In this connection the capital works program of the bridge is of considerable national and local importance. A number of important projects, on the Canadian side particularly, require completion. It will be the policy of the Canadian government, through its representatives on the authority, to ensure that the capital works required by the bridge are completed within a reasonable period of time. The capital improvements reserve fund, to which I have made reference, will ensure that not only these works but any others that might be required in the future can be financed either on a cash accrual basis, which has been the policy of the present authority up to now, or by a new loan in one form or another when the existing bond issue has been recalled, whichever in the opinion of the new authority members seems to be in the best interests of the bridge, taking all factors into account.

Finally, the 1934 statute, which this bill proposes to amend, provides in section 11 that the bridge and its real property in Canada shall be subject to assessment and taxation by local authorities. I understand that a satisfactory arrangement for taxation, worked out between the town and the bridge authority, has been in effect for several years and will run into 1962, when it is presumed new arrangements would be worked out. I am sure the house will be pleased to know that it is not proposed to disturb this situation, and nothing in the amending bill before us will limit or affect this liability to taxation. It has been provided, however, that an amount equal to any amount which may be paid in the way of taxes to a Canadian government entity will be paid to an entity designated by the state of New York.

I should like also, on this occasion, to comment on the spirit of co-operation exemplified by these arrangements. While there were earlier misunderstandings that might have produced more serious problems, these did not long survive once discussions between representatives of both countries took place. From that point on one cannot speak too highly of the attitude taken by the United States representatives, both at the federal and at the state level.

In conclusion, therefore, I would like to say that taking into account the international character of the situation, the arrangements for the future of the bridge appear to be reasonable and efficient and in the interests of Canada. If of course, any problems arise in the operation of the bridge when the new authority has been constituted and has taken office, those matters can be considered and discussed. Any that involve international negotiations can be considered in the light of the circumstances arising from time to time.

May I remind the house, Mr. Speaker, that following second reading it is proposed to refer the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I at the very outset compliment the Minister of Finance on his very fine presentation of the contents of this bill. I want also to say that last night, when the leader of the house announced the legislation which would confront us today, somebody said "important legislation!". The Minister of Finance very rightly answered that it was very important and as he has so correctly pointed out in his introductory remarks, it is particularly important because it goes into effect on January 1, 1958.

Naturally, as the member for that riding which represents Fort Erie in this house, I am vitally interested in this measure, so I hope hon. members will bear with me, as I am not a time waster, if I take at least a few minutes in making some remarks about this bill which is before us at the present time.

I would like first of all, Mr. Speaker, to say that because I am the member for this riding I have had many talks with the ministers of the previous government and of this government, especially the two ministers most vitally concerned, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the ministers of the Canadian government who dealt with the proposal to place the Peace bridge under the control of the Niagara frontier port authority.

When this port authority was set up, as the minister so rightly said, it was intended to go ahead with this measure without much consultation with the Canadian government, and I want to say that the action of the Canadian government has cemented the friendship which now exists between the state of New York and the province of Ontario and indeed between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

I have repeatedly seen reports in the press that the Canadian officials felt resentment over this proposal and the way it was raised, but I can assure the members of this house that this is not so. The Canadian ministers in the previous government and in this government as well, in addition to their officials, recognized the right and propriety, and if you like the duty, of the officials of the city of Buffalo and the state of New York to anticipate the day when the state of New York would obtain title to that portion of the Peace bridge which lies within New York territory. The approach of the Canadian ministers was one indeed of complete good will but, of course, being servants of the Canadian people, those officials had to bear in mind the requirements of public opinion in that part of Canada which is most closely affected.

Unrestricted good will could not, therefore, be their only consideration. May I say that plans for a bridge were made during the first great war, but in 1920 the United States congress appointed a commission to inquire into the possibility of building a bridge across the Niagara river. That commission found at that time that the bridge could not be financed by government appropriation, as the citizens' committee had originally hoped. Consequently a private company with a capital of $4 million was formed in New York in the year 1920 by an act of the state legislature to build such a bridge.

The parliament of Canada passed a similar bill in 1923 incorporating a Canadian private company with a capital of $3 million, and gave it permission to amalgamate with the New York company. In the discussions in parliament at that time Mr. McGiverin, who was one of the principal supporters of the bill, emphasized that the company was to be one of public enterprise, an enterprise undertaken by public-spirited citizens in both countries, with the idea that the state of New York and Canada would eventually take over the assets of the company.

As was anticipated when the legislation was passed, the two private companies did amalgamate in 1925 into one company with a total borrowing power of $6 million. Each of the directors subscribed to $50,000 of the capital stock of the amalgamated company, and the public bought about $5 million of bonds, which at that time were paying interest of 7 per cent and 8 per cent. This rate of interest naturally appears high at the present time but was presumably in accordance with the prevailing rates at that time.

The company experienced considerable difficulty in getting started. Its first plans calling for a low level bridge were not approved, and it had to prepare fresh plans to provide for clearance for shipping at the New York end. It then had to secure the consent of the international joint commission. This was given, and construction got under way in 1925. The bridge was opened for traffic on June 2, 1927, and was dedicated on August 8, 1927, by distinguished personages from each country; the vice president of the United States and the Prince of Wales.

During the great depression the bridge company began to run into financial difficulties and was unable to try to attract increased traffic by lowering its tolls because of the high rate of interest on its bonds. The company therefore sought new legislation in New York and Canada to create a public bridge authority which would take over the obligations and assets of the company, carry out a financial reorganization, and provide for the retirement of further debt. The legislature of New York passed such an act in 1933 and the parliament of Canada in 1934. The congress of the United States passed legislation required under the constitution of the United States, as it had done in 1923, to consent to what amounted to a compact between the state of New York and a foreign country.

This legislation of 1933-4 is the legislation under which the present Buffalo and Fort Erie public bridge authority operates today. It is therefore worth some examination. Six of the nine members of the authority are appointed by the governor of New York and three by the Canadian government. The legislation of 1933-4, like that of 1922-3, provides for the day when the indebtedness of the bridge shall have been paid off, by creating reversionary interests in the bridge for the state of New York and Canada respectively.

People in Canada have, by and large, been happy with the way the Buffalo and Fort Erie public bridge authority has carried out its duties. The gentlemen who have served on this authority during the last 22 years have served without salaries. They have maintained the bridge in first-class condition. They have improved the facilities tremendously, and are still carrying out improvements. They have refinanced the bridge at a very low rate of interest, and they have paid off all but a million dollars of debt.

I want to say now, Mr. Speaker, that a little less than a year and a half ago I accompanied a delegation from Ottawa of which the chairman was the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), the then parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance, along with officials from the Department of Finance and the Department of External Affairs, and I am sure they found their two days' visit to Fort Erie and the surrounding district pleasant beyond their expectations. I am also sure they found that the commission was carrying on the running of the bridge in a fine, orderly way, the way in which Fort Erie would wish it to be run, in the best interests of Canada. The delegation met at that time the chamber of commerce and other organizations vitally interested in the operation of the bridge. That committee left a very fine impression on the vicinity of Fort Erie.

Mr. Speaker, I should certainly at this time be remiss if I did not acknowledge a debt of gratitude to John MacDonald of the Department of Finance who, I think, did a tremendous job in conducting these talks between New York state and the Dominion of Canada. When dealing with international subjects one has to be very careful. I found that out myself, having burned my fingers a couple of times in dealing with this bill. But Mr. MacDonald was always most helpful and well informed, and I wish to say to his credit that he achieved practically everything we wanted as far as the Peace bridge is concerned, so that we in Fort Erie owe him a debt of gratitude. He carried out a difficult job in a fine manner, and we appreciate it.

If there has been any quarrel in Canada with the present bridge authority it has been the result of the improvement of the bridge's facilities. Many people have felt that less should have been put into improvements and more into retiring debt in order that the tolls on the bridge might be reduced or abolished.

When copies of the Niagara frontier port authority act were received in Ottawa, they were considered first by government officials. To consider the matter intelligently they had to dig into old files to learn the legislative history of the Peace bridge. They had to look into the circumstances surrounding the legislation. They had to try to understand the Niagara frontier authority act, which is written in a different style from Canadian laws and which contains many technical expressions which are not used in Canada. A deputation of officials, elected and otherwise, from New York state and the city of Buffalo visited Ottawa and at an informal meeting explained the act.

I referred earlier to the belief of some people that the present bridge authority ought to have concentrated on paying off the bridge's indebtedness rather than on improving its facilities. Certainly there are many people who would like to see the present scale of tolls reduced, and there would be virtually universal opposition to an increase in tolls. The possibility that tolls would be increased in certain circumstances if the bridge came under the control of an organization created for non-bridge purposes has been a source of worry to many organizations in Canada. The town of Fort Erie has been concerned in this regard, and so have trucking associations, to name only two.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we were concerned, as the Minister of Finance has said, about the buildings on this side of the bridge. Years ago we received many complaints about conditions on the United States side because they could not handle the traffic adequately. I have seen that bridge on many a day, especially at week ends and on holidays, so crowded that traffic was backed up for a mile or two in Fort Erie because of the inability of United States officials to handle the traffic as far as customs and immigration were concerned. Within the last two or three years the United States has spent $1,500,000 in correcting that situation, and we feel that in order to escape criticism which, indeed, would be justifiable criticism, we should go ahead to make necessary alterations on the Canadian side to enable traffic to be handled in the best possible way.

You will realize, Mr. Speaker, that when traffic has been tied up for an hour or two people get excited, and once they have succeeded in getting through the traffic they try to make up for lost time with the result that accidents often occur. I am sure that with the facilities and the protection provided by this bill we will be able to go ahead with the necessary alterations on the Canadian side. In fact some of the most important works are under way right now.

Hon. members may be inclined to ask what more the Canadian government could want than an equal voice in running the bridge, an equal share of the profits, and the knowledge that its expectation of future clear ownership of the portion of the bridge situated within Canadian territory is completely guaranteed by Canadian law.

There was, however, one additional factor which weighed, I think, very heavily. The present bridge authority is a corporation created by the laws of the state of New York and given certain powers and privileges—and, I might add, duties—within Canada by Canadian law. It is, however, essentially a private company and one which confines itself to providing an international service, namely a means of crossing the Niagara river through which the international boundary runs.

The Niagara frontier port authority, on the other hand, is a corporation created for a public purpose essentially of a municipal nature. It is designed to improve the port of Buffalo. This is a very worthy purpose, but it is not an international purpose.

The Canadian government considered that it would be unsuitable for it to appoint members to the governing board of a corporation which is designed to serve the municipal purposes of the city of Buffalo and neighbouring communities. The Canadian government clearly understood that the members it might appoint would be serving solely with respect to the Peace bridge, but the fact remained that they would in law be members of a corporation the purposes of which were municipal, not international.

I think it is hardly necessary to explain why the Canadian government was not prepared to agree that the Peace bridge as a whole should be managed and operated by the Niagara frontier port authority. The Canadian government would not have been able to explain to the Canadian people why it had abdicated its duty to protect Canadian interests in this important international facility.

From the foregoing review it would be reasonable to assume that when it had decided that it could not agree to the proposal to place the whole Peace bridge under the Niagara frontier port authority, the Canadian government might have been content to leave the present law to run its course. I am not in a position to interpret the laws of New York state, but I know the attorney general of the state of New York was of the opinion that the present status of the Peace bridge cannot be changed by action of the New York state legislature alone; action by the parliament of Canada and the congress of the United States is said to be required. I believe there is no doubt that under Canadian law the status of the bridge cannot be altered without fresh legislation by parliament. It would therefore have been possible in theory for the Canadian government to content itself with a negative answer.

In practice the Canadian government was not ready to do this, because it would have been an unneighbourly act. The city of Buffalo and surrounding municipalities have indicated their wish to create the Niagara frontier port authority. The state of New York, acting through its legislature and its governor, has approved their wish. Obviously if they want one thing and we want another we must as neighbours living side by side, reach some compromise which will permit them to have the essential part of what they want without substantially injuring Canadian municipalities to which the bridge means so much.

Consequently the Canadian government offered a compromise, as it said in its official reply, "in a spirit of co-operation". The Canadian government would probably have been content to let the law take its course and operate the bridge under some future agreement on a toll system designed to pay the cost of maintenance, operation, improvement, and replacement. It has expressed its readiness instead to co-operate with New York state in paying off the outstanding indebtedness of the bridge out of accumulated surpluses, in terminating the present bridge authority, if that turns out to be desirable, and in operating the bridge thereafter under either one of two systems. Either the bridge could be operated by a fresh bridge authority, or by some modified continuation of the present bridge authority, which would devote itself to the bridge but divide the profits equally between the two countries to use as they please, subject to the requirements of the bridge itself; or, and this might be less practicable, it could be operated on two halves under some sort of working agreement under which of course they would have control of their share of the profits for the maintenance of the bridge and other purposes.

Representing the riding I have the honour to represent, naturally I have had many talks and conferences not only with the chamber of commerce but with the Fort Erie council as well, who are vitally interested in this project and in this bill. I am very happy, as the Minister of Finance explained so well, that the new bill does provide for equality of members on the board. I believe this is provided in clause 1, subclauses 1 and 2.

I think it is only right that we should have equal representation. The Rainbow bridge, which is the bridge between Niagara Falls, New York and Niagara Falls, Ontario has a commission of six members, three of whom are from the state of New York and three from the province of Ontario. This has worked out exceptionally well since it inception. Since the opening of the Peace bridge in 1927 I felt strongly that it had been wrongly set up in having a commission of six members from the United States side and three from Canada.

Again I pay my respects to Mr. MacDonald, through whose wonderful diplomacy when conferences were taking place regarding equal representation on the commission we were able to get the New York state authorities to agree to the establishment of a commission consisting of ten members, five from either side of the border. By his splendid arguments before the New York state authority he was able to obtain an agreement that the chairmanship would alternate between the Canadian and United States sides every year. Ever since the inception of the Peace bridge we have had a permanent chairman from the United States and a vice chairman from Canada, whereas at the Rainbow bridge they have always alternated in drawing their chairmen from New York and Ontario. I am sure the arrangement under this new bill will work out very effectively not only for Fort Erie but for Canada as well, with the alternation of the chairman and vice chairman.

The Peace bridge in 1955 carried almost 4 million cars; almost 40,000 buses passed over the bridge, and 156,000 trucks. The capacity of the bridge is approximately 75,000 vehicles per 24-hour day, and during the tourist, race track and commuter season the bridge operates at about 55 per cent of its capacity. May I just add that one day last July we had an all-time record for traffic crossing the Peace bridge between Buffalo and Fort Erie of more than 43,000 vehicles during the 24-hour period.

I know the government will accept my next comment in the spirit in which it is made. The expansion program, designed to improve facilities and the capacity of the bridge, means the creation of more jobs for customs department men, immigration officers, bridge maintenance staff and allied customs brokerage firms and transport company men. This additional employment will be welcomed in Fort Erie.

Now just a word concerning the fact that this bill increases the membership representing Canada on the commission from three to five members. I definitely feel that the five Canadian appointees to the board should be strong personalities, closely identified with the economic welfare of the Peace bridge area in addition to the over-all Canadian interest in the Peace bridge. I well realize that the present government has the power to appoint these five commissioners, and when visiting my riding over the week ends I hear wild rumours as to who are to receive these appointments.

Might I say here, and I think I should say, that never once, at least to my recollection, did the Liberal party ever attempt to remove any man from the Peace bridge commission because he was not an adherent to our party. I think the present three commissioners, and

I will admit they are Liberals, are three strong men who have served for years without remuneration and have as well served to maintain for the Peace bridge a mighty fine reputation of fairness. It is a commission that has always done its best to handle traffic in the way it should be handled.

Years ago during the inception of the bridge a very strong Conservative from Welland was the solicitor; it is not my intention to mention any names. Upon his death another strong Conservative from Welland was appointed solicitor for the bridge, and upon the unfortunate death of this solicitor we then had appointed a solicitor from Niagara Falls who was known as an adherent of the Liberal party. However, the two former solicitors were very strong Conservatives, and no attempt was made to remove them before they had been called to their just reward. A very fine Conservative member of the Ontario legislature also served on that commission, and no attempt was made to remove him until he passed away. It is my firm belief that if this new government attempted to remove these three commissioners they would be starting a patronage machine in a field where the Bennett government, the King government and the previous Liberal administration never interfered.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I pay my respects to the previous government, to the officials of the previous government and to the officials of this government, the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant, for the very fine way they have handled an international subject of vast importance to Fort Erie. Because of that exceptionally fine handling they have increased that splendid spirit of good will which exists between our two countries.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 231, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill having for its purpose the reduction of the excise tax on automobiles generally from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. This gives me an opportunity to say a word with respect to this industry which is so vital to the economic and social life of Canada. Since 1925 the number of passenger cars manufactured in Canada has grown from 135,573 to 374,126 in 1956. I do not have the value of those cars for 1956, but I do have the 1955 figures, which indicate that 375,028 cars were manufactured having a value of $610,683,424.

In addition to the increase in the number of automobile passenger cars there were trucks and buses manufactured. They grew in number from 26,397 in 1925 to 96,548 in 1956. You will see, therefore, what effect this must have on the economy of the country. In addition to the original number of cars produced and the cost of the cars, there is the question of the maintenance of those cars, trucks and buses. In the year 1955 the industry produced parts and accessories to the value of $523,162,000, which has had an effect on a large segment of the economic life of the country. These were not all produced by the automobile industry but to a large extent by what we call feeder plants, small manufacturing concerns which are situated throughout the length and breadth of this country. They in turn draw upon the basic industries. The textile mills of Quebec and eastern Ontario, the mines of British Columbia and the mines of other parts of the country are called upon to produce raw material or manufactured material going into the manufacture of an automobile, a truck or bus.

The products made by the motor vehicle parts industry in the year 1955 amount to a value of $285,070,612. This consisted solely of metal auto parts. They were their chief products.

Besides the metal parts going into the automobile industry we have the tire production. In the year 1955—I have the figures for each year from 1946 to 1955—the total automobile tire production amounted to $155,463,273. It had grown from $58,810,985 in 1946. Then, of course, besides the tire production there is the production of tubes for automobile tires. In the year 1945 the total value of tube production was $4,544,563. I should say that applies to buses only. In 1955 the total was $3,658,204. For passenger cars it had grown from $2,949,991 in 1945 to $3,352,164 in 1955.

This manufacture resulted in sales which have increased over the years until in 1956 the sales of passenger cars, trucks and buses had reached the almost astronomical figure of $1,454,213,000. In this period, of course, there were sold in Canada not only cars produced in Canada but cars which had come from European sources. In 1925 some 22,165 passenger cars were imported from Europe, and in 1956 that figure had grown to 34,169. There were commercial vehicles as well, and I will give you the figures for 1956. They amounted to 3,845, and over the years that figure grew to a modest extent.

In addition to the cars manufactured in individual years, of course, we have the cars which are already on the market being used day by day and for which licences have been obtained. The registration of motor vehicles of various types has grown. In 1903 there were 220 passenger cars but no motor trucks or motor buses, that is none for which licences had been obtained. There were no other forms of motor vehicles in 1903. By 1956 the number of registered passenger cars had grown to 3,172,853, that is the number registered with provincial authorities throughout Canada. In addition there were 989,434 motor trucks, and motor buses numbered 13,129. The revenue derived from the operation of these motor vehicles is quite extensive. However, I shall not bore the house by giving these details, because they can be found in the statistics provided by the dominion bureau of statistics.

I should like, however, to refer to the income derived by persons employed in the automobile industry. In 1946 the total income of those receiving salaries and wages from the automobile industry amounted to $43,968,772. By 1956 the salaries and wages of these employees—I am speaking only of the automobile industry, and this does not include the feeder plants or allied industries such as textile mills, mines and smelters throughout the country—had grown to $170,836,920. In 1956 there were 40,253 employees on the payroll of the industry. You can see therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is of vital concern not only to the people who are engaged in the industry itself but to those associated with allied industries such as the textile mills and so on.

We felt this tax was something that might be eliminated. Before the election campaign we felt that something should be done about it. As a matter of fact we were pleased when the then leader of the opposition, who is now Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), made a laudable speech in Windsor in which he called this a scandalous tax. According to the Toronto Daily Star he told his audience, mostly automobile workers, of course, and some of them friends of mine:

> —auto (workers) were unemployed partly because of the Liberal government's discriminatory taxes on autos. Its unjust tax policies were pricing Canadian products out of the markets of the world, and shackling municipalities with a desperate lack of revenues. This condition, he warned, would eventually tax real estate "right out of existence" because municipalities had no other revenue source because municipalities had no other revenue sources.

Our own newspaper, the Windsor Daily Star, covered the meeting extensively and referred to the fact that the Prime Minister had stated this was an unjust and discriminatory tax. The Prime Minister said at that time that so far as he was concerned this 10 per cent excise tax was a luxury tax. It was discriminatory on the automobile producing centres, and its continuance brought unjustified unemployment. He said the tax should have been removed by the Liberal government at the last session of parliament. I am informed that he did say he would call a meeting of this parliament, not in the fall but in September, for the purpose of removing this tax.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. This is not the first time this matter has been raised in the house. It will be recalled that the same statement has been made—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: —and it will be recalled that when this statement was made in the house the Prime Minister rose in his place and denied he had said it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Fleming: He denied he had said the tax would be removed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member should not repeatedly attribute something to the Prime Minister which the Prime Minister has said he did not say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex West was speaking when the Minister of Finance said he had a point of order to raise. The minister made a statement, and it was not a point of order. It was a comment on what the hon. member for Essex West had said. I do not think he should have been allowed to make that statement.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): The Minister of Finance and I have one thing in common, in that neither of us was at the meeting and therefore we have to depend upon what other people tell us took place there. What I have said is what I have been told was said by the Prime Minister at the meeting.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the rule of this house is quite clear that the statement of an hon. member in this house as to what he said must be accepted. The Prime Minister has made a statement in this house as to what he said, and it is not open to the hon. member to question that statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would ask Your Honour to be very strict in this matter toward the Minister of Finance, who has no right—and he has done it the second time on the pretext of rising on a point of order—to make a comment on the speech made by the hon. member for Essex West. The suggestion he has made that an hon. member has not the right to refer to observations made by one other hon. member outside of this house is without any serious hope of being accepted by even the hon. gentleman himself.

The hon. member for Essex West was quoting what the Prime Minister is reported to have said during the course of the last election campaign, and it is not open to the Minister of Finance in any way to question the veracity of those reports. The Prime Minister himself can get to his feet in the house and say afterwards that he denies the reports that have been made. Then he will have to be confronted with the reports in the newspapers. But I suggest to you that the hon. member for Essex West, in making the quotations he is making from these various papers of what the Prime Minister said, is perfectly in order, and that the Minister of Finance should not seek to be intervening in this important statement that is being made by the hon. member for Essex West.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not grasped the point of order. The point of order is that this matter has already been dealt with in this house.

Mr. Sinclair: When?

Mr. Fleming: It was dealt with a week ago last Monday, I think it was, when this same statement the hon. member for Essex West is now making was made in the house and the Prime Minister made an emphatic assertion at the time that he did not make that statement. It is an order of the house that statements of an hon. member under these circumstances must be accepted. What we have now is, in my submission, a violation of an order of the house, when an hon. member now comes forward and seeks to repeat that statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Prime Minister has said in the house that he did not make the statement, we must accept the word of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, with great respect I would submit that that is not a ruling which, on reflection, Your Honour would want to make. The Prime Minister may say that a statement made on a certain day, as reported by a newspaper, is inaccurate. He may say that, but it is open to any hon. member to read those statements, as I propose to do when my turn comes. I suggest to you that the hon. member for Essex West is perfectly in order and that this ruling you have now made is one that would stifle debate in the most serious way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In 22 years in this house I have never heard that kind of ruling made. The Prime Minister has a right to say, "I did not say that".

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And his word must be accepted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Only in so far as things he said in this house are concerned. As to reported statements outside this house, any hon. member has the right to refer to those statements.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I think we may call the matter closed now, Mr. Speaker. The people of Windsor and the people of Canada, those who were in attendance at the meeting, know what was said. They recall what was said. I will leave it to their good judgment and that of hon. members.

That is as reported in the Windsor Daily Star. Then of course my friend the Prime Minister went on to Oshawa and made a similar speech. At each place he went the promise fitted the constituents. He made a promise there as reported in the Toronto Telegram, and I do not think my friends would question what appeared in that paper. According to the Toronto Telegram this is what he said:

> He told the automotive town audience his party would lift luxury taxes from cars because they are "an essential part of public and private transportation. There is no more justification for a luxury tax on automobiles than there would have been for one on the horse and buggy 50 years ago".

When those statements were made by the then leader of the opposition, who was the leader of the Conservative party during the last election campaign, we believed him. We felt that these statements made by the leader were sincere. We believed that he had an honest intention to be of assistance to the automobile industry. We believed he meant what he said, and that this was not showmanship to try to sway the multitude and to gain votes.

Then much to his surprise he became Prime Minister. Then we had scurrying to and fro and, as I recall it, the Minister of Finance made several comments on the promises that were made not only through the press but by radio and by television, to the effect—and he can contradict this if he likes—that these promises would be carried out and that they would be carried out expeditiously.

Mr. Fleming: I think my hon. friend will agree that that was a statement made with regard to all campaign promises. This particular matter of excise tax was not mentioned specifically.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): We are assuming that this is one.

Mr. Sinclair: On May 30.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I took my hon. friend's word when he indicated that the promises would be carried out. We had a session of parliament open not in September but in October. At that time, although it was rather unusual, in the throne speech as delivered by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen reference was made to financial matters. While it was most unusual, in the speech from the throne which had been prepared by the government of the day, which is the present government, this was said:

> Changes in certain of the taxing statutes will be submitted for your approval.

Then again, as hope springs eternal in the human breast, we looked forward with anticipation to the time when this industry would get some relief from this tax of 10 per cent, which had been a luxury tax, a scandalous, unjust tax, to quote the Prime Minister. But what happened? Instead of a "sputnik" or even a "muttnik" with a little meat in it, this tax reduction could be referred to, I presume, as the excise "dudnik" fired by the Minister of Finance. I say it is a "dudnik" because it had a great deal of publicity. There was a great deal of fire and smoke, but it just fell flat and the people of my constituency so considered it.

We think this measure is wholly insufficient. True, it is a crumb, but it is just a crumb. We feel that it is not at all sufficient, and that it will be of no help to the automobile industry. It will do nothing toward putting the thousands of unemployed back to work in that area or throughout other parts of Canada. We feel that it is an abortion in the excise field. It is of no value whatsoever. While, as I say, 2½ per cent is better than nothing, it is far short of the promise which we had believed in and the action which we had expected to come from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us has just one purpose, namely to implement the announcement which the Minister of Finance made on December 6 that the excise tax on automobiles would be reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. As the hon. member who spoke previously has indicated, even though this reduction is very slight at least it is in the right direction, and of course we shall therefore vote for the bill.

Nevertheless we confess that we were amazed, after all the fanfare that has gone on with respect to this matter, that the reduction proposed by the government is so small. As everyone knows, the total return from a tax of any kind is not necessarily in proportion to the rate of that tax. There are times when a tax at a lower rate will produce a greater return than if it were the other way around. We suggest that if this tax had been reduced a little more it might have resulted in a greater volume of sales and therefore a larger return. By reducing the tax a little more or by wiping it out altogether it could have resulted in an increase in employment, with resulting increases in revenue from other taxes, which would more than offset an apparent loss from reduction in the rate of the tax.

Frankly we do not quite know what prompted the minister to bother with so small an amount. We feel that if he was going to deal with this matter at all he should at least have gone to the 5 per cent figure, if not more, and we urge him even yet to consider the desirability of a lower rate. If it is because there were reports going around of what looked like leaks as to the reduction to 5 per cent and he felt, therefore, that he could not come down to that figure perhaps, after the house has pressed upon him the desirability of a lower rate, he might consider that rate being reduced to 5 per cent.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I might say just a word with respect to the context in which the minister announced this reduction last Friday evening. He made some general remarks leading up to the announcement, near the beginning of which he did me the honour of referring to something I had said at a meeting in Hamilton on Wednesday night, December 4, to which reference was made in the Toronto Telegram of December 5. I quote this paragraph from the minister's speech as recorded at page 2002 of Hansard for December 6, 1957:

> The Toronto Telegram on December 5 ascribes to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a statement made, I believe, in the city of Hamilton the previous night. The article says he accused the government of: "Hiding the books from parliament until after the next election." I doubt if any of the members of the audience who heard the hon. member make that statement, if he did make it, would be so gullible as to believe it. There will be an opportunity of judging shortly whether that is a responsible or an irresponsible statement.

I wish to assure the minister that I did make that statement, and that developments since then have indicated the responsibility of it. The minister in this bill and in other measures which he has presented to parliament has asked for tax changes in the same session in which parliament has agreed to increase expenditures. Yet we are not being given a proper balance sheet; we are not being shown the books of the country so we might ascertain the state of our national finances. The minister himself says he did not present a budget the other night, although we suggest it is a budget and should be treated in that manner. However, he comes back and says it is not a budget. The Minister of Justice on another occasion has said it is not necessary in proposing the reduction of a tax to present the whole ambit of the financial affairs of the country.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what is happening is that the minister is asking parliament to make a change here and a change there, but that the full impact of those changes on the finances of the country is being withheld from parliament. There have been some transfers of moneys back into consolidated revenue which had been credited to certain accounts. There are these tax changes, some of which are effective from December 7, like this one, and others which are not effective until January 1.

We have therefore no picture as to what these changes really do to the finances of this country. We have had no report as to any change that might have taken place in our gross national product. We have had no report on the revenues that flow from trade. In other words we simply have not got the picture, and it is my suspicion that we will not have such a picture before this country is called upon to have another federal election. Therefore what has been happening is exactly what I stated at Hamilton last Wednesday evening, and my comment at that time was a responsible statement, in contrast to the irresponsibility of the Minister of Finance in presenting budgetary changes without giving to this country a real and proper budget showing the state of our finances.

It is not too often that I find myself in complete agreement with a certain Liberal newspaper in my city, the Winnipeg Free Press, although we are very grateful for the help we receive because of the criticisms of that paper so far as we in this corner of the house are concerned. I am aware that the Free Press is critical of the present government, but I must say that I feel that its editorial on Monday, December 9, concerning the budget, in that it was notable for its dishonesty, is well put; because the Minister of Finance is not taking the house or the public into his conference so far as the financial situation is concerned.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the word "dishonesty" is of course clearly an unparliamentary word; and whether my hon. friend is coining it on his own behalf or quoting it as attributed to somebody else, under the rules of this house it cannot be uttered in this house concerning any hon. member, and I would ask that it be withdrawn.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not using the word dishonesty in any personal sense, Mr. Speaker. I am not suggesting that in his personal capacity the minister is doing anything which is subject to indictment in the courts of law, but I am suggesting that he is being unfair and dishonest with parliament when he does not give us the whole picture so far as our finances are concerned.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has used a word, no matter how he may seek to qualify it, which is an unparliamentary word. There is only one course open when an hon. member uses a word which is clearly and completely unparliamentary, and that is to withdraw it. I therefore ask that my hon. friend withdraw it; and if he is not prepared to do that I ask you to direct him to do so, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Before one o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to say a word, with the consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: No; it is one o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell: My point is this. I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if he considers what he has said, will withdraw the word "dishonest".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I feel the word is appropriate, and I think I have just as much right to use it as has the Winnipeg Free Press, with which publication I agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did intend to insult the Minister of Finance and, if he did so, I think he will drop his word "dishonesty".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to state that I have no intention of insulting the Minister of Finance and certainly, in using that word, there is no intention on my part of casting a personal reflection upon him in respect of what he did. The sense in which I used it is that it is unfair for the government to treat parliament or the people of Canada in this way, by giving them a budget which is not a complete picture.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not withdrawn the word. He can argue to his heart's content whatever he chooses to say about "unfair". That is not an unparliamentary word. But the word "dishonesty" and the word "dishonest" are both words which are clearly unparliamentary. They always were and they still are, and there is no way in which the hon. member can skate around and qualify and change the meaning of those words. Those words are unparliamentary. They cannot be used in this house under the rules of this house; therefore they must be withdrawn in their entirety, and if the hon. gentleman is not prepared to do so then I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to be good enough to instruct him to withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps we could both have the noon hour in which to look and see whether there is anything in the rule books about the word in question. It might be there; I have not been able to find it. But I was prepared to meet Your Honour's request to withdraw and remove completely any reflection on the honesty of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has changed the word "dishonest" to the word "unfair", and I will accept that.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member has done that? I did not understand him to withdraw the word "dishonest" in favour of the word "unfair". If he will do that it will be perfectly satisfactory, but he must withdraw the word, and I do not understand him to have done so.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, just before the adjournment at one o'clock—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I happened to be in my seat and not in the chair at the time and heard the discussion which occurred before the luncheon recess. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may have something to say which will clear up the objection taken by the minister, so perhaps we had better hear him first.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the luncheon recess I made it a point to read carefully the Hansard record of what I said when I was quoting the comment that had been made about the budget by the Winnipeg Free Press, and I found that I very carefully made no reference to the minister personally but rather expressed as my own view the opinion of the Winnipeg Free Press that the budget was characterized by one thing, namely its dishonesty.

I am the last man in this house to want to insult anyone. I thought I had made it clear before one o'clock that I cast no reflection on the honesty or personal integrity of the Minister of Finance, but that I used the word "dishonesty" in the same sense that the Free Press used it, in that the budget as presented to the house was misleading and did not give the complete picture or the full facts to the country. At the request of His Honour the Deputy Speaker who was in the chair at the time I withdrew—I think unnecessarily, because I had not made it—any reflection on the minister himself.

I would say that the only possibility of any reflection being there would be on the basis of what the minister read into my words. I did not intend it and if even my tone of voice implied such a reflection I readily withdraw any comment that might seem to reflect upon the personal integrity or straightforwardness of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming: I thank my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to express my appreciation of the withdrawal on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the attitude expressed by the member now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope what I now say will not be construed as reopening that question, because as far as I am concerned it is closed; but I must point out that some of us agree with the position taken by the Winnipeg Free Press and other newspapers in this country that the Minister of Finance in his budget, a portion of which we are now discussing, has failed to give us a picture of the present rates of taxation and the present rates of expenditure carried forward into a number of months ahead. The failure of the Minister of Finance to answer questions when he was interviewed as to what would be the financial situation at the end of a full year at the present tax and expenditure rates has been characterized by some newspapers as misleading, as spurious and as deceptive. These are not comments on the minister in his personal capacity, but they do characterize this budget in the terms in which it strikes some of us.

We feel that with a new government coming into power, with changes taking place in our economic and financial situation and with all the changes of expenditures and rates of taxation, it is unfair and misleading to the Canadian people for the Minister of Finance not to give us a full budget. I am not going over the argument now as to whether or not we should have had a full-dress debate on the motion to go into committee of ways and means with the Speaker in the chair. If we had done that we could have had a full statement on these matters. I wish to make the point that even yet, either on this bill or the next one, or on some one of these taxation measures, or on a motion to go into committee of supply or to go into committee of ways and means, the Minister of Finance should stand up and honestly tell the country what these changes of taxation rates, changes of expenditures, changes in the gross national product and in our foreign trade mean in terms of the nation's balance sheet.

It is in the light of that situation, that unfairness to the Canadian people on the part of this budget, that I made the statement which is now past and gone. I feel very strongly that this matter should be cleared up by a full and proper statement by the minister.

To get back to the bill that is before us, I urge the minister to reconsider the amount of the proposed tax reduction. I will not go over the argument he had with the hon. member for Essex West as to what the Prime Minister said in various places during the election campaign. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance finds points of order to raise in every speaker's remarks today, but surely he will recognize that even after the thought had been dispelled that the excise tax on automobiles would be wiped out altogether, there still remained a general belief in the country that it would be reduced to 5 per cent.

I still contend that we should have some explanation about those reports that looked like a leak as to the intention of the government in this respect. In any case if that is the reason, if it was because of those leaks that the minister felt he had to come down with some figure other than 5 per cent, I urge him to reconsider the matter now and do it if he wants to in response to a request made on the floor of the house.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, as we have already said this is a step in the right direction and therefore we shall support the bill. But we feel that the government should at least have measured up to the reports that were circulated a few days before this bill came in, that the tax would be reduced to 5 per cent.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of parliament in this house from a city where automobile production is the mainspring of the economic life, I naturally would be expected in a discussion of this sort to have something to say, and of course I seize the opportunity at once to do what I believe is my duty not only as a member of this house but more particularly as a member representing a portion of the city of Windsor, the constituency of Essex East.

I am sure we all listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Essex West, who outlined the position of the automobile industry not only with respect to our own community but with respect to the economic life of Canada generally. The automobile industry received its initial important impetus in that area of the United States and Canada from which we come and the progress that has been made in the automobile industry in both countries is such as to create in the mind of any government the realization that its policies, particularly its taxation and fiscal policies, must bear in mind the great potential growth of this industry and what it has meant to the economy of Canada in the past.

The hon. member for Essex West took advantage of the opportunity to point out not only what the industry means to the city of Windsor, or what I might add it means to the other major centre of production, the city of Oshawa, represented by my hon. friend the distinguished Minister of Labour, but also what it means to many other communities where there are assembling units, parts plants and a whole series of subsidiary industries in which thousands of Canadians make their livelihood. These are the direct corporate relatives, as it were, of the automobile industry.

In addition to that, of course, as we all recognize, through the interdependence of economic action there are literally thousands of other individuals and many hundreds of companies whose existence depends upon the existence and prosperity of the automobile industry itself. The construction of highways, the sale of gasoline, and other examples are so obvious as not to require extended emphasis on the part of any other hon. member. The fact is that the automobile industry, directly and indirectly, is now one of the major factors in the economic life of our society on this continent and, in this particular instance, as our concern is Canada, in Canada itself.

As the hon. member for Essex West pointed out the total dollar value of automobile wages and salaries in Canada in 1946 was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $43 million or $44 million. In 1956, as an evidence of the growth that had taken place, the figure reached $170 million; and I have had an estimate made which shows that as of today it would reach something close to $250 million. That does not take into account, as I say, all the indirect operations that flow from the automobile industry.

Therefore, for these and other reasons, this particular measure, this proposal by the Minister of Finance, must be regarded by the house as a matter of the greatest importance. But it is not only because it involves the integrity of the automobile industry that we are concerned. As the result of a number of circumstances, at the present time the unemployment situation in the automobile and related industries is such as to disturb us all. It involves the fact that thousands of men are out of work, thousands of Canadian citizens are denied the opportunity to work and receive income, which is an essential requisite in the maintenance of family and individual life. When we in this house deal with matters of policy in one form or another, when we quote figures, whether of dollar or another equivalent value, we sometimes possibly are inclined to overlook the social implications of what is involved.

I am sure the Minister of Finance, who is a very understanding human being, appreciates the consequences that flow from anyone being out of work in our country. The fact is that this particular industry at this moment is not in a prosperous condition. I cannot help but remember the incidents which attended the period between 1930 and 1935 in my own community. Anyone who went through that period will never forget the conditions when well over half the population of our community was on relief and out of work. The consequences of those days in the formation of political judgments of more than a partisan character are such as never to be freed from one's mind. If we ever reach the stage again where the unemployment rolls of our country are anything like what they were during that period, those of us who regard the particular economic and social system that we possess as the most desirable will find ourselves confronted with as serious a challenge in that particular as has confronted us in domestic matters since that time. Therefore the problem of unemployment in any aspect is something that gives us all the greatest concern.

I think it can be argued without much difficulty that one of the reasons—and I do not say it is the only reason—for the present situation in the automobile industry arises clearly out of the uncertainty of government policy in the matter of this particular tax. The government, and the Minister of Finance in particular, on whose shoulders rests the very difficult assignment, has come to the conclusion that the greatest reduction he could make in this tax was one of 2½ per cent.

As those who have preceded me have indicated, this reduction, apart altogether from whatever reasons the Minister of Finance may have had in his mind, has satisfied no one. It has satisfied none of the automobile manufacturers although, in that particular, I must be fair and say that the president of General Motors, Mr. Walker, has expressed some satisfaction with the reduction. The vice president in charge of production of the Ford Motor Company, the president of the Chrysler Corporation and others, but these two in particular, have expressed the greatest measure of dissatisfaction. Likewise, the community from which I come, through its municipal bodies and the men who work in these factories, has expressed its great disappointment and dissatisfaction. All over Canada, as the Minister of Finance well knows from editorial opinions that have been expressed, there has been the greatest dissatisfaction noted on the part of the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "no". He and I must read different papers. I would refer him to papers published right in his own city of Toronto, all three of them. I would refer him to the papers—

Mr. Fleming: They do not bear you out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that are published in western Canada. I would refer him to expressions in the Winnipeg Tribune, the Winnipeg Free Press, the Regina Leader Post, the Calgary Herald and the Vancouver papers. I would refer him to the Ottawa Journal, to La Presse, and to all those great journals in our country which reflect public opinion, and which have expressed not only dissatisfaction but, as the Albertan said, amazement at the announcement of the reduction from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent.

I realize the minister is handicapped in the particular situation in which he finds himself because he has not been able, for reasons best known and not yet disclosed by the government, to explain to the house and the country the reasons for this particular reduction. If, as my colleague from Coast-Capilano said last Friday, and as the member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, my hon. friend had preceded his act by an analysis of the economic state of the nation, he would be in a better position to justify to the country, and to the house, this particular reduction. But in the absence of a review of the economic affairs of the nation through the normal, traditional instrumentality of a budget, he has, on that account, been precluded from giving an explanation or a reason for this particular reduction.

Can there be any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen, can there be any doubt in the mind of any of us that, rightly or wrongly, long before the election on June 10 last we were led to believe that this 10 per cent excise tax on automobiles was going to be removed if the present government were entrusted, as it now has been, with the responsibility of directing the affairs of this nation? Reference has been made by the hon. member for Essex West, by the member for Coast-Capilano and by the member for Winnipeg North Centre to statements that justify my contention that the country was led to believe that if the present government were entrusted with the responsibility of office it would remove this scandalous tax, to use the words of the Prime Minister.

This question was very much in the mind of the preceding government. I know that because, coming from the city of Windsor as I do, I was naturally interested in making sure that we would do everything we could to further the prosperity of an industry that meant so much to the people of my city. This was a question that had concerned us not only within the last period but in 1951 and in 1955.

This particular bill provides an amendment to an act that came into being as a result of the necessity of Her Majesty's government receiving financial resources to carry on the very difficult prosecution of the war, and the obligations that existed in this country as a result of the war during the days of peace. At the beginning it was, admittedly, a war tax measure. The government, however, did effect a reduction in this tax, first from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, and later on the occasion of the last reduction in 1955 to 10 per cent. At the time this tax was reduced the understanding was that this reduction would be passed on to the consumer, the theory behind that action being that this kind of gesture would promote the sale of automobiles and thus contribute to a higher level of employment.

It is true that during the course of the last session of parliament, and indeed in the session, before in 1955, several hon. members on both sides of the house sought to impress the then minister of finance with the desirability of abolishing this tax. Amongst those who took this position was the present Minister of Finance who was, perhaps, louder than anyone else in his denunciation of the iniquity of this 10 per cent excise tax on automobiles.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What position did the hon. gentleman from Essex East take?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman has asked me what position I took. I was a member of the government. The hon. member knows that what is said in the cabinet is secret, but I am now out of the cabinet. I can say frankly that I took the position that if there were any evidence that the 10 per cent excise tax was in any way causing any unemployment—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Was it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will deal with that, but let us take one question at a time. Let us deal with the question of abolishing the tax. I might say that was the position taken by my colleague the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent). With the characteristic frankness and courage that have attended most of the things he has done in public life, when speaking in the city of Windsor about four or five days before the election he said that if he were satisfied the existence of the 10 per cent excise tax was in any way holding up or preventing a high level of employment in the automobile industry, he would see to it that consideration was given to the elimination of this tax. He did not use the word "reduction", but he would see to it that consideration would be given to the elimination of this tax. He was on very strong ground, because for the quarter preceding his statement the sales of automobiles in Canada, in 1957, were up 18 per cent. He was in a position of being able to argue, as he did in my own city four days before the election, that the evidence at that time did not demonstrate that the existence of the excise tax had resulted in a deterioration in automobile sales. The fact was that for the first quarter of the year sales were up.

However, that is not the situation now, and that is the important fact for the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and the minister to bear in mind. This was not the fact confronting the Minister of Finance on December 6. The fact confronting the Minister of Finance on December 6 was that sales of automobiles were down very considerably, in fact to a greater degree than they were up in the first quarter of 1957. In addition there was an increase in unemployment. We may argue whether or not my contention in this regard is valid, but the fact is that the government headed by the Leader of the Opposition at no time said it would eliminate the tax, except under the circumstances he mentioned.

This is not the situation confronting this government at the moment, and it is not the situation confronting the Minister of Finance in the very embarrassing position in which he appears to find himself at this moment. When he was on this side his voice, more than any other, was directed against the government for not eliminating the tax on automobiles. This, too, was the view of my old friend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who was amongst those who took a strong position with regard to this tax.

It is true also that many others who sit on your right at this moment, Mr. Speaker, charged the previous government with not having an appreciation of the problem because the government did not eliminate the tax. But whether that was or was not the case, the fact is that in addition to these requests, these demands, these denunciations against the government over the elimination of this tax, the leader of the government, at a time when he was making an appeal to the Canadian electorate for support, came into the city of Windsor on May 10; and whatever he may say now there is no doubt that as a result of his speech, to which I will make reference, the impression was left with the Canadian people and the citizens of Windsor that he was going to see that this tax was abolished. That was the impression. I want to be fair to the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister. In the report of that speech in the Windsor Daily Star he said this was a scandalous tax which he thought should be removed, and he would either eliminate it or see that it was removed. That I must say in fairness to him.

Mr. Fleming: Removed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. I am coming to that; would either be eliminated or removed. But while that was what he said in the city of Windsor, in other places, if the reports of his speeches are correct, he did not talk only of the elimination of the tax; he talked of abolition.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised this morning and, as you will recall, had also been raised previously. My hon. friend is not contenting himself now with stating that a particular remark was ascribed to the present Prime Minister in the speech or speeches to which reference is now being made. My hon. friend has gone further. He has now gone beyond saying what was the impression that some people formed. He has now gone further and said that the present Prime Minister on that occasion said the tax would either be eliminated or removed, both of which terms mean the same thing.

The Prime Minister, sir, when this question was raised on December 2, made a clear and categorical statement on that point; and with great respect I submit that it is not within the order of this house for any member now to make a statement contradictory of what the Prime Minister has stated in this house he said on the occasion in question. Let there be no doubt about what was said. At page 1738 of Hansard—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not mind my hon. friend raising a point of order or asking a question, but he has no right to speak.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the minister was speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fleming: The point of order is that when a member of this house makes a statement in the house as to what he said, that statement must be accepted. It cannot be challenged. That is the rule of the house. When this same matter was raised on an earlier occasion that is precisely the position the Prime Minister took. If you look at Hansard of December 2, at page 1738, you will find that this same remark was made attributing to the Prime Minister the statement that he proposed to eliminate the tax. As reported in the first column of that page the Prime Minister said this:

> That is not correct. At no time directly or indirectly, did I say that. What I said was—and I repeated it throughout the campaign—that this tax had an effect and that consideration should be given to its reduction in any event.

You will find a similar statement on the same day by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, as reported at pages 1727 and 1747 of Hansard. As reported at page 1727, the Prime Minister asked for the withdrawal of a similar remark because he had not made the statement that was then being attributed to him. Again as reported at page 1747, where the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was suggesting that the Prime Minister was saying he had been misquoted, as recorded at the top of the second column, the Prime Minister said:

> No, I did not say "misquoted". I said there was no statement that it would be removed wholly. I have never said that.

An hon. member of this house having made that statement, Mr. Speaker, it is a breach of the order of this house for any hon. member from that point on to proceed and say that the Prime Minister made a statement which the Prime Minister has said in this house he did not make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I regard this as an important matter, and I hope the Clerk or whoever looks after the time will have noted the interruption, to which I did not take exception, so I can be allowed to make an argument which I believe is very important to the people I represent in this house.

What I had said was this. I had been fair to the Prime Minister. I had said that in the city of Windsor he was not reported as having said that he would abolish the tax. I said that he was reported in Windsor, on May 11, with regard to the speech he made on May 10, as having said that he would either abolish or reduce the tax. That is what I said.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Fleming: No. That is a very different matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will come to that.

Mr. Speaker: If I may intervene here, although I do not wish to prevent the hon. member from continuing, may I say that my recollection is this. Perhaps he made an error in what he said about the Windsor statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Speaker: He said "Either eliminate or remove".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: He said it twice.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Essex East intended to say the other—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Speaker: I think he slipped and perhaps we can now take it that that was what he intended to say.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker. I think that Your Honour, who was preoccupied, did not follow me. I was very careful with regard to the Windsor statement to say that in fairness to the Prime Minister he did not say that he would abolish it. I said that he was reported as saying that he would either reduce or abolish the tax.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a point of order. My hon. friend did not say "eliminate or reduce"; he said "eliminate or remove". He said it twice.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Speaker: We had better let the hon. member for Essex East continue his statement. I interrupted him because that was my recollection of what he said, but he said he intended to say the other. If that is so, then we must accept that statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want any confusion on this matter. I am not agreeing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not agreeing for a moment with the point of order. I am simply stating that I am building my case bit by bit to establish what I believe is a very important situation in so far as political morality in this country is concerned.

I have said that in Windsor the Prime Minister made the two statements, but I am not agreeing that it is a valid point of order that any hon. member of this house should be precluded from referring to reported statements made outside of this house by any other hon. member. The rule is clear that any hon. member has the right to deny that he said in this house a particular thing, and that once the denial has been made the hon. gentleman who has made the charge must recognize the statement made by the objector. But no hon. member has the right to preclude another hon. member from referring to quoted statements made outside of this house. That is another point altogether. I have dealt with the situation in Windsor—

Mr. Speaker: I should like to say something on this point of order, because it is an important matter. The rule of the house is clear:

> A statement made by a member in his place is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

That is Beauchesne's third edition, citation 241. All hon. members are familiar with that rule. The question is what is the consequence of that rule with respect to debate. The hon. member for Essex East, in his remarks as I have followed them, is really seeking to challenge the statement made by the Prime Minister in his place that he did not promise that he would eliminate the tax in question, that the statement went only so far as promising a reduction of the tax.

I think the point of order is well taken that the hon. member should not, in debate, pursue a line which is challenging the statement made by the Prime Minister in his place on his honour. To that extent I think the hon. member has been out of order in pursuing this course of endeavouring to show that if the newspaper reports are correct, then the Prime Minister did not make a true statement. There is, of course, a way of challenging a member's statement or conduct, and that would be by substantive motion; but this is a debate, and the rule seems to me to apply to what is said in debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not going to question Your Honour because I have such great confidence in Your Honour's deliberations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members may not share that confidence in the Speaker, but I have that confidence.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We have confidence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not sure that on another occasion I will be prepared to accept such a ruling, but I am very anxious to establish my case and not to have my time run out while we are engaged in discussion in respect of these important points of order in themselves. But whether or not my hon. friend agrees, the fact is that the Prime Minister did make a statement in Windsor to which I have referred, and he has not denied the story.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, are we having a repetition of the very thing which you have ruled to be an offence against the order of the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has not denied the statement made in the Ottawa Journal on May 30, 1957. That is a journal that does not always support those of us who sit on this side of the house. It says:

> In Oshawa, a city of car production, Mr. Diefenbaker said that if he becomes prime minister a special fall session of parliament would be called to reduce taxes, including the 10 per cent excise tax on cars which would be removed in whole or in part.

That statement was made on May 30, and then there was a statement reported in the Toronto Telegram, also on May 30:

> He told the automotive town audience his party would lift luxury taxes from cars because they are "an essential part of public and private transportation. There is no more justification for a luxury tax on automobiles than there would have been for one on the horse and buggy 50 years ago."

And then in the Ottawa Citizen—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I submit that what the hon. member for Essex East in effect, is doing with respect to the last citation from the newspapers, is drawing statements from the press to contradict what the Prime Minister said in the house, and I consider that he is out of order in doing so. If he wants to read quotations which state that the Prime Minister promised to reduce this tax in whole or in part I do not object to that, but the quotation from the Telegram definitely seems to me to be a contradiction of the statement the Prime Minister made in the house and I do not think it is in accordance with the rules of debate to challenge a member's own statement in the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your observation, but I do feel that as the statements speak not of abolition but of an alternative of reduction or abolition, I am not out of order. Am I precluded, for instance, under the rules from referring to the story in the Ottawa Citizen of the same day?

Mr. Speaker: To make it clear, I do not object to the quotation from the Ottawa Citizen, but I do think the hon. member should not endeavour to cite in the house as true statements newspaper reports that the Prime Minister said he would abolish this tax. That is the point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but the Prime Minister did not deny that. He said he would at least offer to reduce or abolish. What he denied was that he said he would abolish the tax, and I think the Speaker agrees with me in that connection. The Ottawa Citizen says:

> John Diefenbaker last night promised that a Conservative government would abolish the excise tax on automobiles and eliminate "in the whole or in the main" all discriminatory excise levies.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is perfectly apparent that the hon. member is just seeking to ride roughshod over the ruling you have so clearly made. It is a most palpable and obvious attempt to defeat the ruling of the chair—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —when the Speaker rules the remark of an hon. member completely out of order and he then attempts to—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will leave it to the Speaker to decide as to whether my conduct in this house deserves the very generous and extravagant tribute just paid to it by the Minister of Finance. I would say to my old friend, and he is a very old friend, that if he would follow the same course in debate in this house he would not get himself, day after day, into such repeated difficulties. Surely it is clear that the Prime Minister did indicate to the Canadian people that he would at least reduce the tax. He went further than that according to these quotations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Again we are just seeing your ruling, Mr. Speaker, defeated in the most palpable way.

Mr. Speaker: We are all conscious of the problem which exists. I think the hon. member for Essex East is also aware of the situation, and until he finishes his statement I do not propose to intervene. He has gone part way and I take it he will observe my ruling.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to excite the Minister of Finance; I realize he has his problems. I should have thought, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano said in that very outstanding speech of his the other night, that if objections were to be taken to these statements, undoubtedly the Prime Minister during the course of the election, with the entourage of newspaper men with him, and his coach of newspaper comment, must have seen these articles. I would like him to have denied them at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would do well to pursue his argument, because the line he is following now is really an attempt to assert the truth of the newspaper articles which have been denied by the Prime Minister. I would ask him to be a little careful in pursuing his argument.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a distinct recollection of what these words of the Prime Minister meant to the people of my community, and I know what the people of Windsor think of this particular situation. They were given the impression at that time that there would be a reduction and then, shortly after he became Minister of Finance, my hon. friend who understandably was not too well acquainted with the techniques and outside relations was embarrassed by a statement attributed to him by the Canadian Press, when without referring to excise taxes specifically he did refer to the budgetary intentions of the government. He, too, in that statement, written by Mr. Harold Morrison of the Canadian Press, did give the Canadian public every reason to believe there was going to be a very important reduction in taxes, and indeed—

Some hon. Members: There has been.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then we had in the speech from the throne on October 14 last another statement in this connection. The reason there is this particular situation in the automobile industry is because of the uncertainty and the expectancy which was allowed to be dragged on from May 10 during the course of the summer, punctuated by this reference in the speech from the throne which says:

> Changes in certain of the taxing statutes will be submitted for your approval.

If anyone reads the press of October 15 he will see the big headlines which forecast reductions in certain taxes including the excise tax, all of which add up to this feeling of expectancy which existed in the country about the likelihood of a reduction in this particular tax. The reason we have heavy unemployment in the automobile industry and its subsidiary industries is the whole spirit of uncertainty which has prevailed since May 10, when the statement was made in the course of the election by the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh; the car dealers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know the hon. gentlemen do not like this, but it is our duty to state these things.

Mr. Fleming: It is most entertaining.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If they do not want to adopt an indirect form of closure all they have to do is listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A short while ago in the press of this country, including the Toronto Telegram, there were stories written right across the front pages which intimated, rightly or wrongly, that there was going to be a 50 per cent reduction in this tax. Under our system of government, certainly as practised in the United Kingdom, there is a clear duty on the part of the Minister of Finance under such circumstances. The minister denied that there was a leak. I am not saying there was a leak because I do not know—

Mr. Fleming: You had better not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I do know there were statements made by responsible newspaper writers in journals which have a status of importance in this country. Why, then, were there no denials of these statements from the Minister of Finance in the house the next day? Was there any denial in this house by the Minister of Finance the next day about this statement?

Mr. Fleming: There was.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman says there was. There was no denial made by the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister this question, and I am not speaking about him personally, because while I think sometimes he does make mistakes in his method of presentation, the last thing I would ever suggest is that he does not possess the fullest sense of responsibility. But I ask him this: Has he fully inquired into the reasons why these stories appeared in the papers? The hon. gentleman does not say anything; nevertheless I ask him whether he has fully investigated the reason and the provocation for these articles?

The Minister of Finance does not answer my question. Perhaps he wishes to reflect on it.

Mr. Fleming: No, he does not need to reflect on it. He will deal with it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before this session is over he will be asked to give a reply to this question, because that story created the uncertainty that existed, as well as the other statements which have appeared over the last four or five months. In our practice, if a story like that appears the Minister of Finance takes the responsibility at once of approving or denying the validity of the reports. That is the practice under our system of government. I will say no more about this aspect of the matter at this time, but I think upon reflection the hon. gentleman will recognize the validity of what I am saying.

Now the Minister of Finance has brought about a reduction of 2½ per cent which, admittedly, is not sufficient. It is regrettable that he cannot explain why it should be 2½ per cent. If he had given the house a budget statement he could have explained why, in the face of all the various obligations facing the government, the reduction could be no more than that figure. This 2½ per cent reduction will, I understand, amount to about $2½ million in this calendar year, and in the course of a full year to $20 million.

Does the hon. gentleman seriously suggest that this particular reduction is capable of stimulating automobile sales to the point where we will be able in the foreseeable months ahead to have a level of employment in the automobile industry consistent with what is undoubtedly one of the objects the minister had in mind? I can only say this to him; that he has done himself little justice in not prefacing this particular tax change by a statement which would outline to the country the economic position of the nation as the hon. gentleman sees it in terms of the additional social expenditures which have been made, in terms of possible expenditures that may be made, for instance, in hospital insurance, and so on.

Is it because the hon. gentleman has embarked upon a program that is away beyond what he considered possible that he found it difficult to take advantage of the traditional practice of prefacing tax statutes by a review of the financial state of the nation? Until the minister does that he will satisfy no one in this country that this particular reduction was the reduction the government really had in mind, and he will not remove the concern which many people feel as to why the reduction should be 2½ per cent and not complete abolition or at least a reduction of half the total amount.

The Minister of Finance has the opportunity now of giving us an explanation of this. He has the opportunity now of indicating why he could not, or did not, effect a greater reduction; and if he takes advantage of it he will be contributing in a very constructive way to the solution of a problem which affects thousands of people in my constituency and other constituencies in Canada, who as a result, in the main, of the policies of this government are out of work.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am intervening for a few moments in this debate only because of the fact that the hon. member for Essex East did me the honour of calling me as an involuntary witness to support his argument. I was very surprised when he stated that I had taken a vigorous part in debates on this excise tax earlier in the year, and while my memory is not infallible I thought he was wrong. I have since searched the Hansard index, but I could not find that I had anything to say on this subject.

I suppose when one is in difficulty any port in a storm will do and the minister's roving eye just caught me, as I say, as an involuntary witness; and I think I should just explain that I wish to be excused.

I should like now to say a word about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), for whom I have a very great respect and whose arguments I have always thought worthy of respect even while I disagreed with them. But today, if I understood the hon. member correctly, he advanced a proposition which seemed to me one of the most extraordinary ever advanced in this house, and certainly a very extraordinary one to come from him. If I understood him correctly, he practically said that because there had been a newspaper report saying there was to be a 5 per cent reduction, there was therefore an obligation on the government to do that very thing. That is all I could make out of what he said. He may correct me if I am in error, if he wishes to do so, but it seemed to me that was what he said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister permit a question? Did I not say that if this was because of newspaper reports, which some people regarded as having been leaked, that it was to be 5 per cent; if that was the reason the minister felt he could not give that figure and made it 7½ per cent, would he not—

Mr. Macdonnell: There we seem to have two things mixed up, one the newspaper report and the other the allegation of a leak. First may I say that I personally think there was no leak; and the suggestion that the government in trying to exercise sound discretion is to be considered responsible for a statement in the press which is alleged to be on the basis of a leak seems to me just as preposterous as what I commented on a few moments ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister permit a question on that point? Does he know whether there has been any investigation by the government to ascertain whether or not there was a leak?

Mr. Macdonnell: I know the government believes, and has reason to believe, there was no leak, and that is all I can say or anyone needs to say.

Now I wish to say a word on the merits of this matter. Of course we should have liked to wipe off the whole of this tax. We should like to wipe off all taxes tomorrow, but we had to consider, in somewhat limited circumstances, how much tax relief should be given. We should have liked to give far more. Incidentally, I would remind the house again that there was no reduction given last year.

Second, we have the hon. member for Essex East tossing about figures of unemployment and saying there were thousands and thousands of men unemployed. I notice he did not get down to details in his speech, and I hope and believe the figures are not as bad as he suggested.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ten thousand in Windsor.

Mr. Macdonnell: The figures given at the time in newspaper reports were tremendous, and I am inclined to think they were exaggerated. I hope when the final words are spoken we will find that the position is not as bad as the hon. member for Essex East appeared to think.

Another thing I wish to remark on is that he apparently attributed the present position very largely to uncertainty. Well, there is no uncertainty now. The tax reduction has been announced. I just wish to say that I think the hon. member for Essex East has tried in every way to make this appear as a tremendous disaster in the body politic, while I do not think it is.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I intend as usual to take only a few minutes in which to make a brief comment on this bill. Undoubtedly buyers of automobiles throughout the country will welcome the small amount of relief that is given in the reduction of excise tax but I think the very fact that this small reduction is welcome points up the economic position of a great many people in Canada. The few dollars represented by the reduction in this tax will be diminished by the reduction in trade-in value of the automobile which is traded in on the new vehicle. The amount of benefit through the reduction of the tax will be diminished according to the age of the particular automobile that will be traded in on the purchase of a new car.

I think we must consider the individual in the low-income bracket who sees little or no relief whatever in this reduction. I think I may properly question whether a reduction of 2½ per cent in the price of an automobile is going to have any effect on the employment situation. I say believing it to be true that the reduction of 2½ per cent will bring no relief to the unemployment situation to any degree that would be satisfactory to those in that industry.

I also think that if the government were sincere in trying to help those in the low-income bracket a reduction in the sales tax would have been a much more effective way of bringing about that relief. The present reduction is not going to help the people in the low-income bracket in any way and it is that group who would benefit most greatly by an increased reduction. I think we should have gone further and reduced the sales tax or not have bothered with a reduction at all.

As far as the situation regarding the comparison between the tax is concerned it is known that this tax does not affect the householder or the individual who has perhaps just married and is setting himself up in a home in that it offers them no relief whatever. The beneficial results from the present reduction are very meager indeed and will not really be considered by the people of this country as having any material effect upon their lives.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I believe that hon. members of this house and the public are trying to seriously assess just what it was that we had brought into this house last week. It has been described as a budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) strenuously denies it is. It has been described as a financial statement but as such, of course, it is quite incomplete. My own view is that the only thing we could call it is a "budgie" because it is strictly for the birds.

There has been some argument as to whether a resolution should have preceded this bill. I do not intend to rehash that argument because it has now been settled by a ruling but I would point out to you that on the very wording of the bill I think it can be very strongly argued that this is a measure to impose a tax rather than to eliminate or reduce the tax because if you will examine the bill it begins in clause 1 by saying that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that he is contravening the rules in two respects; one, he is challenging a ruling I have already made and, two, he is proceeding to examine the bill in detail when we are only at the second reading stage.

Mr. Zaplitny: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I will not pursue that argument any further but I wish that the Minister of Finance some time during the course of this debate or as we proceed with a clause by clause examination of the bill would give us some information as to whether the pledges made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) are being fulfilled by the statement the Minister of Finance made the other day.

Mr. Fleming: I can answer that right now. They are, yes.

Mr. Zaplitny: The Minister of Finance says they are. If that is his statement then he will have to repudiate a great deal of what the Prime Minister said during the election campaign and before. There has been some question as to what the Prime Minister did say but I have not heard this minister or the Prime Minister deny the widely reported statement made during the election campaign to the effect that it was the plan of the Prime Minister if his party was elected to power to call a session of parliament in September in order to reduce taxes. That is not being denied, as I understand it, and to that extent the minister certainly cannot claim that the government is fulfilling its pledges.

The Prime Minister then went on to say that the average Canadian family is overtaxed by $120 a year. Rough calculations would show that in dollars this would mean that in his opinion the public was overtaxed by an amount in the neighbourhood of $500 million per year. The results of the statement of the Minister of Finance to the house about tax changes would appear to add up to approximately $178 million. Again the pledges of the Prime Minister are falling short by something like $300 million. Surely in the face of that the Minister of Finance will not claim the government is fulfilling its pledges.

Before this debate concludes I would also like to have the minister give some information as to the reason for the singling out of this particular tax. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already made the case for a further reduction in this tax or the elimination of it but there are other articles on which there is an excise tax and I wonder if when he is replying at the end of this debate the minister would give us a list of the articles on which there is an excise tax comparable to that on automobiles and give us the reasons why this particular one was singled out.

It has been suggested, and again denied by the Minister of Finance, that the reason this particular tax was singled out for reduction, slight as it may be, was because the government was put on the spot by certain newspaper reports which made it appear as if some advance information had got out to the effect that there would be a reduction in this particular tax and as a result of that there were large-scale lay-offs in the automobile industry. The government has assured us that there has been no leak. Of course we can only surmise as to how this information got out and at the moment we have to accept the government's assurances that there was no leak, although there might have been a drip. I would like before this debate ends to have the minister point out to us why this tax was singled out for reduction and why other articles subject to excise tax were not referred to, touched upon or the tax not reduced. I would also like to have him explain why the sales tax was not considered for reduction.

I agree thoroughly with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) who has just taken his seat, that if it were the desire to spread the benefit of tax reduction as widely as possible among the Canadian people and to give the greatest measure of relief from taxation to those in the lowest income brackets, then certainly the proper way to do it, the proper place to begin, would have been with the sales tax which now stands at 10 per cent and applies to a great many articles which definitely could be classed as necessities or essentials.

I am not discounting the value of an automobile. To many people in Canada it is a necessity; but one must remember that there are still a great number of families in this country who are not in a position to drive an automobile, have not the finances with which to purchase or to maintain one, even if they could purchase one. If the proposal was to give tax relief on that level to incomes where there is the greatest need, —and that is the lowest level of income— certainly a cut in the sales tax would be much more equitable and effective than this particular bill which we are now considering.

I hope the minister will take advantage of the opportunity to inform the house on the thinking of the government which led them to believe that a tax cut of 2½ per cent on automobiles was a step toward fulfilling the pledge made by the Prime Minister, along with his thinking that the average Canadian family was being overtaxed by $120 a year, because this does not begin to fulfil that pledge and, in my opinion, it does not even begin in the proper place where it could have the most beneficial effect.

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, since I come from one of the ridings of Essex county, and from an area which is adversely affected by the drop in the production of automobiles in Canada, I would not want to overlook this opportunity to say a few words. As one who was formerly an employee in the automobile industry, I think I do have some knowledge of this situation. I might say that I was on the platform on May 10 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made his statement in the city of Windsor with regard to the policy of the present government and the way in which they were going to handle this matter of excise tax on automobiles.

I should like to assure the hon. members who are present here today that this government has given more than the Prime Minister told the citizens of Windsor on that particular day they would be given. Less than two weeks ago the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) assured the automobile dealers across Canada that they would not suffer any losses if there was a reduction in excise tax. He assured them in such a way that they could continue to carry on their business without having to worry about the consignment policy or the legislation which was brought in by the previous government some time ago, which was not practicable or acceptable to that industry. It did nothing for the dealers of Canada at that time.

It is well known to hon. members that the dealers in Canada did suffer substantial losses in the past as a result of reduction in the excise tax. I might say there is another matter that I should like to refer to, namely the fact that many dealers across the country have substantial inventories of used cars, and any substantial reduction in this tax, of course, would lead to a substantial loss on the part of those dealers. There would be no way in which to reimburse them for those losses that they would take on their used cars.

There is another matter to which I would like to refer. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) for whom I have a great deal of respect—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is mutual.

Mr. Thrasher: —made a suggestion here today. And I would like to suggest to the house that he was making a little bit of political hay because a week ago last Monday the hon. member referred to the fact that all that was necessary for the government to do was to make a statement concerning this tax and indicate their intention with regard to it and it would cure all the evils in the automobile industry. In view of what he said at that time I am sure all of us will recognize that his remarks here today were made for no other purpose than that of making political hay.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hay will spoil, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope he did.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to deal with some of the statements that have been made here today in the course of this debate.

One thing should not need to be made clear again but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) insists on referring to what I had to say in the house last Friday evening as the introduction of a budget. Let me make it quite clear that it was not a budget; it was a statement of the financial policies of the government and it was a statement of the financial position of the country. I had given the house on earlier occasions an undertaking to do that and that undertaking was fulfilled.

But we have this extraordinary proposition put forward by several speakers in the opposition that the country and the house were not given a financial statement. It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members making that statement have not taken the trouble to pay the slightest attention to what I had to say about the financial position as detailed at pages 2002 and 2003 of Hansard on Friday evening. I went over it in detail, pointing out that we were operating within the limits of the budget introduced by Mr. Harris on behalf of the former government last March and that within that limit we were assessing now the changes that were evident both in contemplated receipts and contemplated expenditures. I went into that in full detail, Mr. Speaker, and then I finished up by putting a table on Hansard.

Now, giving those hon. members opposite who have spoken in the way they have today full credit for intelligence and sincerity, I say that there can be only one inference and that is they did not listen to what was said on Friday night, and they have not taken the trouble to refer to Hansard since. What I said on this subject of the financial position, operating within the limits of Mr. Harris' budget, is this, as reported at page 2002 of Hansard:

My predecessor, in presenting the budget for the current fiscal year last March, forecast revenues of $5,170 million; expenditures of $5,018 million and a surplus of $152 million. We have now reasonably complete figures for eight months of the year and thus are able to make revised estimates which reflect both the changes in economic development and changes in government policies.

On the revenue side of the accounts I am prepared to accept the forecast which was presented to the house last March.

I went on to point out that there were some variations with respect to the yields of particular taxes that are evident now and I said:

At present it seems probable that receipts from income taxes will be somewhat above the forecast and revenues from customs duties and some commodity taxes will be somewhat below the earlier anticipations, but, on balance, I expect that the various increases and decreases will just about cancel each other out, leaving the total revenue figure unchanged at $5,170 million.

What more could be said about the revenue picture than that, Mr. Speaker? Then, I turned to the expenditure side and I said:

On the expenditures side of the accounts my predecessor had forecast a total of $5,018 million. Since then there have been substantial increases in expenditure arising in part out of changing economic developments and in part from new policies which we have recommended and which parliament has approved.

And, then, sir, I went on to catalogue in detail those changes and the amounts which were reflected in consequence in the balance of ways and means. I said:

For example, we are having to find an additional $25 million for interest and other charges on the public debt as a result of the sharp increase in interest rates which occurred during the spring and summer months.

The second change was this:

Then I am advised by the management of Canadian National Railways that reduction in the volume of rail traffic and higher costs of operation will mean that we shall have to meet a deficit in the railway's operation of about $28 million.

Then, the third change I pointed out was this:

On the policy side. hon. members will recall that increases in public service salaries and in the defence services pay and allowances have been approved in an amount which will total about $100 million for the 11 months of the fiscal year commencing May 1, including statutory matching payments into the superannuation account.

Then, I took the fourth matter:

The increase in old age pensions is responsible for most of the increased deficit in the old age security fund of $50 million.

Then, I took the fifth matter:

Increases in our contributions to old age assistance and to the blind and disabled persons allowances will cost the federal treasury an additional $1 million this year.

Then, I took the sixth matter:

Increases in veterans benefits will add a further $3 million to this year's expenditures,—

Here is the seventh matter:

—and the recent agreement with the provinces to eliminate the "threshold" on unemployment assistance will also cost us $3 million in this fiscal year.

There are seven matters referred to in detail, just as much detail as any minister of finance could give in bringing in a budget. Then, I tallied them up and said:

All these increases add up to $210 million.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would he tell us where he itemized what it will cost to make payments under the hospital insurance act, or under the agricultural legislation before parliament or under the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements?

Mr. Fleming: Those items are not here because they are not yet in effect. I dealt here with those that have been brought into effect by parliament on the recommendation of the government, and also that one which was specifically announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) recently. We are dealing here with expenditures up to next March 31, the next three and a half months.

Then I went on to deal with the way in which we were going to take care of the additional commitments which I had just catalogued. I pointed out that this figure of $210 million would be met, in large part, by three particular things that the government had chosen to do. I pointed out, first of all, we had achieved savings by reductions in estimate expenditures of $64 million. I also referred, sir, to our intention with respect to two items of $50 million each. Here, I read my remarks from page 2003 of Hansard of December 6, 1957:

Finally, I do not propose to adopt the practice of my predecessor to transfer large lump sums of $50 million each into what he called "the reserve against assets" and to reduce the unamortized deficit in the superannuation account. I consider it quite unnecessary to do so.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the strength of that statement talked about juggling and used other equally erroneous and misleading phrases. The hon. member has evidently forgotten, Mr. Speaker, the way in which Mr. Harris dealt with this matter in his budget on March 14. Here is what Mr. Harris had to say as recorded in Hansard of that date, page 2221:

> On the other hand, I propose for the coming year that a further $50 million be credited to the reserve against assets, bringing it up to about $600 million against total assets of about $8 billion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all that Mr. Harris had to say in a very lengthy budget presentation about his intention to credit $50 million to the reserve against assets. What did he say about the other $50 million item? This is all he said:

> I am also proposing to appropriate another $50 million to reduce the unamortized deficit in our superannuation account to $89 million.

That is all Mr. Harris had to say about the second $50 million. The way the former government brought these into the budget was not by way of an item in the estimates; far from it. What the minister of finance at that time, March 14, indicated it was his intention to do in this respect, following his own example in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957, so far as the first $50 million item is concerned, was simply by government decision to put that sum into the reserve against assets, an executive decision. As to the other $50 million, all he was indicating here was that he would ask parliament to appropriate $50 million for that purpose. We do not consider either of these items necessary or proper to transfer or to set up in the way in which the former government proposed to do, as items charged against the current year.

In this respect, sir, we have said nothing new so far as our position is concerned. When the former government proposed to secrete, to hide these items which otherwise would have gone to swell their surplus still further, we made our position abundantly clear. We disapproved of this way of hiding the extent of the overtaxation.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit me to make my speech, and I shall be only too happy to answer the questions when we are in committee of the whole later on.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: We were completely consistent on that. Those who are now talking about juggling or sleight of hand should actually direct those remarks to the methods of the former government which resorted to these expedients to hide the extent of the overtaxation.

Mr. Byrne: Would the hon. member permit a question on that point?

Mr. Fleming: We have given to the house a statement that we do not propose to follow the intentions of Mr. Harris in this regard. Mr. Harris had stated his intention to set up these two $50 million items, and presumably he would have done that some time during the course of the year. He had not yet done it, Mr. Speaker, when that government went out of office. We are not undoing something that was done; we are not taking something out of a reserve, but we are simply saying that what Mr. Harris said he was going to do and did not do, we are not going to do because we do not believe it is sound.

In saying what I said on this subject on Friday evening I believe we Progressive Conservatives are completely consistent with what we have said on this subject in the past. There could have been no surprise on the part of any member of this house who was aware of the facts or who had taken the slightest trouble to inform himself of the position of this party on this matter in times past. I would say if hon. members will read further in my speech they will find the amounts all set out in the tables. They were given a full statement of the effect upon the balance of ways and means of the changes we were inviting the house to make in the two bills that are now before the house, the present one and the one to follow to amend the Income Tax Act.

Having disposed, I trust, of that most misleading charge that was made against us and having shown that we have given a full accounting to the house of the financial position of this country, within the limits of the budget under which we have had to work, the budget of the former government, and having shown very clearly and precisely how the changes we are now inviting the house to approve will affect the balance of ways and means, let me now deal with some of the observations that have been made concerning the present measure and the reduction that it will effect in the excise tax on motor cars.

This tax, of course, has been in effect for a very long time. At the present time, the 10 per cent tax is yielding in revenue $80 million for a full year. The present reduction of 2½ per cent, which is a 25 per cent reduction in the existing rate of tax, will involve a loss of revenue to the treasury of $20 million in a full year and the sizeable amount of $8 million during the present year.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) did his ingenious best to persuade the house to believe, even in the face of the ruling by Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister had said something which the Prime Minister made it quite clear in this house he did not say. The Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear for all who recognize and observe the rules of this house that at no time did he say that the tax would be removed or that the tax would be eliminated. He did indicate, as we have done in years past, that we do not like this tax, that we do not like the way the sales tax has operated, that we do not like the way in which the full burden of many of the other taxes is operating. We have already effected a substantial reduction in taxation, infinitely more than hon. members opposite ever thought we would be able to do. I hope that if I hold this portfolio long enough I will have opportunities of proposing to this house other reductions in the burden of taxation. I have not at all forgotten—nor have I departed in thought or intent one iota from it—what I have had to say in times past about the burden of taxation upon the Canadian people and the dangers of that heavy burden blighting incentive in this country.

Therefore let it be quite understood, Mr. Speaker, within the limits in which the government had to operate—a partial year; a budget that had already been adopted; spending and taxation programs already committed on the part of the former government before it went out of office—that the wonder of it all is that we have been able to propose reductions as high as those we have proposed.

Never at any time in his references to the excise tax on motor cars in the election campaign did the Prime Minister mention any particular percentage of reduction. Never did he do that. We are giving fulfilment in the present bill to the Prime Minister's declared wish to bring about a reduction in this tax.

Mr. Speaker, I will not express surprise at some of those very irresponsible things that were said by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin): I will never express surprise at irresponsible statements coming from my hon. friend. In one of the series of innuendos with which he, with not too great courage, larded up Hansard today, there was one in which he sought to leave the impression that notwithstanding denials in this house on behalf of the government, there had been some leak with respect to the government's intention to reduce this tax. I say here today, Mr. Speaker, as I said in the house on December 3 in categorical terms, that there was no leak. I do not know how much more plainly I can put it than that. There was no leak.

Having made my statement last Friday night and having placed this bill before the house I can make some statements now that I was not free to make up until last Friday night. I can say that there could not possibly have been a leak because this matter had not been discussed with any of the officials up to that time. There were two men and two men alone in the government who had discussed what possibly might be done in that respect. They were the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and no one else. How could there be a leak?

An hon. Member: One-man government.

Mr. Fleming: No; it is not one-man government.

An hon. Member: Two-man government, then.

Mr. Fleming: In due time this matter was discussed and the appropriate decision arrived at and that decision is now placed before the house. But I am glad to be able to put that statement on the record, Mr. Speaker. I was not able to do it at that time because it would have given rise to more newspaper speculation, and speculation had already done a good deal of harm in the motor car industry. I was therefore not going to say anything in this house that could give any occasion whatever for speculation on the subject. The statements I made in this house from the time I was first asked a question on this matter by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) on November 28 adhere strictly to that responsible course of giving no countenance whatever to these speculative rumours; no countenance whatever.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On what date was the cabinet decision taken with regard to this matter?

Mr. Fleming: The decision was taken—

An hon. Member: By the minister.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Not the cabinet; two men.

Mr. Fleming: The decision was taken following, not before, this rash of rumours that came out.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Fleming: The government had no responsibility whatever for any such rumours. The government had no responsibility whatever for the speculation that was indulged in and which some hon. members in this house, with scant regard for the rights and interests of the automobile industry and those employed in it, chose to magnify and give currency to. On some occasions, Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre you would have thought that he measured his responsibility as a member of parliament in terms of the extent to which he could turn the House of Commons into a rumour factory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I disagree with the political philosophy of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and with many of the things that he does,—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, not so many.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but as a member of this house I will not agree that it is in order for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to make that kind of observation against the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Ellis: We consider where it comes from.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Essex East in another of his irresponsible statements this afternoon, undertook to say—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask what sort of language these two gentlemen would use against each other if they were not old friends?

Mr. Fleming: I will let my hon. friend in on an old secret. My friend the hon. member for Essex East and I first made the acquaintance of each other as freshmen students at the University of Toronto in 1921.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are still pretty fresh.

Mr. Fleming: It happened that on the curriculum for the honour matriculation in this province in the previous year there was in the German course a book entitled "Paule Poppenspaler". If my hon. friend would be interested in following the matter, as a term of endearment applying to my hon. friend opposite, I dubbed him by the English equivalent of that title, namely Paul, the puppet player. While we have strong differences in the house and I have no doubt will continue to do so—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What was your name?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: I suppose if I were not so fond of the hon. member for Essex East I would really sometime expose his irresponsibility in the house. It is only this deep affection that I have for him that imposes such a severe restriction on me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot take all this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: To come back to my hon. friend for Essex East, he had something to say this afternoon about unemployment and about dropping production in the motor car industry. The drop in production in the motor car industry in this country, as compared with 1956 figures, did not begin later than June. The turn in the trend came at the beginning of April this year. What kind of course would that have dictated on the part of a responsible government had there been a responsible government in office at that time? What course of conduct would that have dictated to the hon. member for Essex East, as a member of the government of that time? Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that his concern for that industry would have been reflected in something that he had to say or, better still, in something that he would have done? I have listened to a good many speeches by my hon. friend—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not enough.

Mr. Fleming: —but this is the first time that I recall hearing the hon. member for Essex East in this house advocating a reduction in the excise tax on motor cars. I think the best test of his earnestness in this respect is his record and, Mr. Speaker, that record is not only a record of utter silence on the subject, that record is a complete blank.

We do not even have to go back to former sessions for proof. When the hon. member was speaking in this house on this very subject but a few days ago—to be exact on the 2nd day of December, with the full knowledge of the harm that was being done to the automotive industry by the rash of rumours that was going about with reference to the supposed reduction of 5 per cent; and while steps were being taken in the face of withdrawal of orders to close and curtail operations in some of these industries—did the hon. member even then ask for reductions in income tax? No, he did not. Here are his words as recorded on page 1728 of Hansard in the second column—

Mr. Fleming: 1728.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The softness of voice.

Mr. Fleming: He said:

The Prime Minister knows that this situation of unemployment in the automobile industry can be cured tomorrow if this government would simply make an announcement one way or another as to the course it proposes to follow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fleming: One way or the other; either tax reduction or no tax reduction. He was not asking for a reduction in tax; all he was asking for was a statement on the part of the government as to whether they would or would not reduce the tax, because that is enough to meet the problem of unemployment in the light of the curtailment of production which had then been inaugurated by the motor car industry in the light of the rumours that were going about at that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has done me the honour of quoting my words perhaps he will also look at page 1728 where I said in answer to a question in the following words: "What matter?" the following:

The hon. member asks "what matter?" The matter of the elimination or reduction of excise tax on automobiles.

I regret that I have to announce to my hon. friend that I now have to leave to go to the city of Windsor because of the situation there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Which situation?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is only making things worse for himself, because he has indicated what he had in mind at that time. He has attempted to attribute various remarks to the Prime Minister—quite improperly I might say and without any foundation—but at that time the best thing he could call upon the government to do, having as he had full knowledge of the situation, was to say whether or not it was going to propose a tax cut—either one would be sufficient to put an end to unemployment in the industry in Windsor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend is bound under the rules to quote a member correctly. Because of the ruling of the Speaker up until that moment I had not referred to the excise tax. The Speaker had said that any direct reference to that subject at that time would be out of order. It was only because of the great help given to me by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) when he asked me this question:

What matter?

That I said, having been invited by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace to explain to what matter I was referring:

The matter of the elimination or reduction of excise tax on automobiles.

Those are my very words and that was the matter to which I referred. I was telling the Prime Minister, as I tell my hon. friend now, that the responsibility for tax policy is not upon the opposition but is upon my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, did you ever hear a more laboured explanation than that?

Mr. Lesage: What about your own?

Mr. Fleming: All the hon. gentleman does is to get himself in deeper and deeper. I have quoted his words and they will dog him to the end of his political days.

Now I was asked a question as to how it was that we chose this particular tax for a reduction. The answer is that we thought a fair tax—to the extent to which we were able to act—would be reflected by the 2½ per cent reduction. At this point, Mr. Speaker, may I wish good luck in his hopeless undertaking to my hon. friend the member for Essex East upon his departure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: There is no flag on his desk.

Mr. Fleming: I am afraid it is hopeless; I am going to give him my full backing, but I think he is going to need more than that.

An hon. Member: You can say that again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You should know.

Mr. Robichaud: You might once again say tomorrow that you did not say it.

Mr. Fleming: No, I have never denied having said anything that I did say, and I would commend that example to the member who has just interrupted me.

I say that we thought this was a suitable tax to be reduced to the extent to which we did reduce it. That is the position; we had to take a look at the whole field of taxation. We would have liked to have made other changes but we had to operate within the limits of a budget which had been bequeathed to us by the former government. In that respect may I remind hon. members that Mr. Harris last March, with the opportunity of a full 12-month year before him in which to make whatever changes he thought were warranted and justified, found it, within his charitable intent, and within the means of this country to bring about a reduction of $128 million. That was for a full 12-month period while we, I hope with a full sense of responsibility, have asked this house to put into effect reductions in taxes—on top of his reductions—which will bring about relief to the Canadian people for a similar 12-month period in the amount of $178 million.

Let it not be forgotten that we did one thing which ought to have been done by that former government when, two years ago, it proposed to this house a reduction in the tax from the then rate of 15 per cent to a rate of 10 per cent. They left the full burden of the tax to be paid on cars purchased before the date on which the reduction came into effect to be borne by the dealers of this country.

Hon. members who were in the house in 1955 will well remember that cases were put before the house—actual cases in the experience of dealers in Canada—where they suffered losses running into thousands of dollars just because of that callous action on the part of the party opposite when they were the government. We on the other hand have taken steps which that government said were impossible in order to guarantee to the dealers of Canada, who already have cars on their floors and in their stock upon which they have paid the tax, that they will be able to obtain a refund of tax already paid by them. None of them will, therefore, suffer a loss of a five cent piece as a result of this reduction in taxation. We have also put on record undertakings which we have received that the benefit of the reduction will be passed on forthwith and that the public will receive the benefit of it.

Mr. Speaker, we are growing accustomed to the sort of theatrical exhibition we have seen here today and which we saw here on Friday night. Hon. members opposite delight in delivering themselves of bitter denunciations. Mr. Speaker, in a leading Canadian newspaper last week there is a delightful cartoon. Here is a picture, Mr. Speaker, of a scene outside the front door of the parliament buildings, and here are two hon. gentlemen, obviously members of parliament, obviously members of the opposition, walking down the steps, and one of them is saying to the other: "That was a slashing attack you made on the government just before we voted unanimous confidence".

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have heard the slashing attacks. There will be opportunity now to determine whether there will be on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite a vote of unanimous confidence in the government, because I am telling them now that they will have the opportunity, after their slashing attacks, to vote on the second reading of this measure.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I close with some words which were uttered by Sir Winston Churchill. I think however apt they may have been as applied by him to the people to whom he intended they should apply at the time, he could not have foreseen how infinitely apt they would be as applied to hon. gentlemen opposite. Here are his words:

> So they go on in strange paradox—decided only to be undecided, resolved to be irresolute, adamant for drift, solid for fluidity, all-powerful to be impotent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question is on the main motion. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against, will please say nay.

I declare the motion carried.

Some hon. Members: The motion is carried.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I bring to your attention the fact that there are more than five members who have risen.

Some hon. Members: It has been carried.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Nobody rose.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, as is now very clear, there is unanimous support in this house for the proposal that the excise tax on automobiles should be reduced. It is also unanimous that it should be reduced at least as far down as to the rate of 7½ per cent. Some of us still feel that it should be reduced still further.

Mr. Benidickson: Try a vote on that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And I propose in a moment to make a motion to that effect.

Hon. members can see, if anyone questions the validity of my motion, that my desk is loaded with the authorities. There are those who might argue that this tax should be wiped out altogether and I think there is a good case to be made for the fact that automobiles are not today the luxury they used to be. They are, to a great many people such as farmers and workers, a necessity. Indeed, even to those who use them for pleasure, they are a necessary part of life as we live it today. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, we in this group feel, as has already been indicated by the hon. member for Dauphin as well as by others, that there are other places where a tax reduction should be effected. Therefore, we are at this moment proposing that the excise tax on automobiles be reduced to 5 per cent. We suggest that figure as a mark of responsibility. We also feel that it comes a lot closer to the figure that the government would like to have moved itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether it is necessary to speak at length to make a case for the reduction of this tax; therefore, I conclude my remarks by moving my amendment. I move that:

Clause 1 be amended by deleting from line 8 the words "seven and one-half" and by substituting therefor the word "five".

The clause would then read:

Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with seating capacity for not more than 10 persons each . . . five per cent; the tax on automobiles applies on the total price charged for such automobiles, which price shall include all charges for accessories, optional equipment, or any other charges contracted for at the time of sale, whether charged for separately or not; the tax does not apply to automobiles imported under Customs Tariff items 702, 705a, 706 and 707.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will accord to this further reduction of the excise tax on automobiles the same unanimity that we were happy to give to the proposal that was before us on second reading.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): All those in favour of the amendment—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I submit to you that the amendment is out of order and should be so ruled. This is an amendment introduced by a private member, which has the effect of increasing the proposed reduction in taxation and would thereby remove from the revenue of this country an additional $20 million in a full year and an additional $8 million in the remainder of the present fiscal year. In my respectful submission no amendment to that effect can be introduced by a private member.

The rule in this respect is clearly established, Mr. Chairman, and there is nothing in the ruling made by Mr. Speaker on Monday that reduces in any particular the full weight of the well-established rule which the present amendment seeks to violate. There are many authorities that can be pointed to. My hon. friend says he has his. I draw your attention to a passage in May's fifteenth edition, a well-known and standard work, which Mr. Speaker declared on Monday to be fully authoritative in relation to the rules of this parliament. There is a passage at page 683 which says:

> Hence, on the analogy of a financial resolution, but without the royal recommendation, the motion by which a tax is proposed in committee of ways and means is now treated as the effective expression of the financial initiative of the crown, and therefore as the standard in relation to which the admissibility of amendments is determined.

We are not in committee of ways and means, Mr. Chairman, but we are in committee of the whole, and in my respectful submission there is no difference.

This matter has been before our own house on previous occasions. On the 2nd day of March, 1936, there was before the house a motion by a private member in the following terms:

> That, in the opinion of this house, all rural telephone companies should be exempt from federal income tax.

In the journals of the house of March 2, 1936, volume 74, at page 90, you will find this paragraph:

> Mr. Speaker ruled the said proposed motion out of order for the reason that it is not framed in such abstract or general terms that it can be entertained by the house. The proposal made therein is for a special reduction in the public revenue. The item to be struck out is mentioned, namely, the income tax levied on rural telephone companies. Such a proposal can only be entertained in the committee of ways and means, and, as May says, page 544, "these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government and it must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year." True, the motion says that the exemption of the tax "should" and not "shall" be made, but even at that I think the proposal ought to be considered in the committee and not by the house, for it is essentially a ways and means resolution.

The fact that the present amendment is introduced in the committee of the whole does not in any sense take it out of the terms of the ruling there made by Mr. Speaker Casgrain. On that occasion he was saying that if the amendment is not one framed in abstract or general terms, but is one for a special reduction in the public revenue, then it must be ruled out because any such proposal must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government and it must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. It is quite obvious, judged by that, this present amendment is clearly out of order.

There is a more recent example, Mr. Chairman. On May 3, 1951, the house, in committee of ways and means, was dealing with the first in a series of resolutions. The first resolution proposed an increase in the sales tax from 8 per cent to 10 per cent and it was strenuously resisted by all parties in the opposition at that time. First of all, there was one amendment introduced by Mr. Thatcher in the following terms:

> That clause 4 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:
> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation on capital gains to the extent of $16 million so as to maintain the balance of ways and means.

The purpose of Mr. Thatcher in introducing the amendment in that form was to avoid interference with the balance of ways and means. It had been estimated that the result of carrying into effect the resolution then before the house would have been to increase the revenues by $16 million and therefore Mr. Thatcher, in seeking to eliminate that proposal, felt that in order to preserve the balance of ways and means he had to propose an alternative tax to yield revenue of an equal amount. This amendment was ruled out of order in committee, there was an appeal to the house and the ruling that the amendment was out of order was sustained in the house.

Then, there was a second amendment attempted. In this case, Mr. Shaw moved the following amendment in committee of ways and means:

> That clause 1 of the proposed amendment to the Excise Tax Act be deleted and the remaining clauses be renumbered accordingly.

This amendment was ruled out of order by the chairman. There was an appeal to the house and the ruling of the chairman was sustained. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment now submitted by the member for Winnipeg North Centre is absolutely on all fours, for the purpose of your determination, with the second amendment, the amendment of Mr. Shaw, because it has the effect which I have cited in May. The ruling that was then made was not popular with the opposition at that time, but it was nevertheless the ruling of the chairman of the committee of ways and means who was also chairman of the committee of the whole, and that ruling was sustained. It is, in my respectful submission, a binding precedent, and therefore I submit to you that this amendment, which would have the effect I have indicated, is clearly out of order and should be so ruled.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I appreciate the attention the Minister of Finance has given to the question as to whether or not this amendment is in order. I have taken notes of the points he has made and I shall answer each one of them. First of all, I should like to make the case for the validity of my amendment on the basis of my own study of this situation. May I point out that Mr. Speaker did make a very clear-cut ruling on Monday of this week. He ruled that the bill which we are now discussing did not come under the usual requirements regarding ways and means resolutions. He based that ruling on a citation in May's 11th edition, to the effect that when a bill seeks merely to reduce a tax it does not require the royal recommendation and the prior committee stage.

Now perhaps at this point I have to deal in part with what the Minister of Finance has said. On Monday Mr. Speaker put this bill in that section of the rule books that deals with exceptions to the requirement that there be the royal recommendation and the prior committee stage. I might say that the main citation from which the minister has read just now comes from those sections in May which deal with the kind of bills where the royal recommendation and prior committee stage are necessary. May distinctly separates the two kinds of bills. May says that when a bill does provide for the imposition of taxation or an increase in taxation, then it has to have the royal recommendation and the committee stage. There follows from that, on bills of that kind, the citations about the balance of ways and means which cannot, in those instances, be disturbed.

I tried my best, Mr. Chairman, both on Friday and Monday to persuade the government that in this instance they should not follow May for the reason that May is based on the practice of the British house, and also to get the government to follow the practices in this house which were followed, for example, last March and April by Mr. Harris when he introduced ways and means resolutions prior to the budgetary bills he brought in at that time, all of which made reductions in taxation.

I ask the Minister of Finance to follow me closely on this. On Monday Mr. Speaker, urged to do so by the Minister of Justice and others on that side, quoted from May at page 572, this sentence:

> Hence a bill for diminishing or repealing a tax or other public burthen, unless the imposition of a new tax is proposed by way of substitution, needs no royal recommendation or preliminary committee stage, and is brought in upon motion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one should take the trouble to look at May. May I draw your attention to the fact that beside that citation is a marginal note which says "Reduction of duties, see page 565; of charges, see page 601". I would think that anyone studying procedure, when he sees a note like that, would turn to those pages to see what they say. I will not take time to read what is said on page 565 because that page refers to duties and we are now on taxes, but I do draw the attention of the committee to page 601, as suggested by the marginal note on page 572, and here is what it says:

> Reduction of Charges.—Proposals to reduce a burthen upon the people may be made in the house or in committee, no special form of procedure being prescribed for such a motion, or for the introduction of bills which are strictly confined to the reduction of a tax or charge upon the people.

Now note this next sentence. This is what follows from the ruling made by Mr. Speaker on Monday. This is what follows from Mr. Speaker's use of the citation which I felt should not be used but which was used. This is what follows:

> It follows that amendments for the reduction of charges, such as of taxes, rates, salaries, tolls, and penalties, can be moved when a bill is considered upon report; and this has been permitted even when, by indirect effect, an amendment created a certain amount of charge.

That is the position in which the government has put this matter. The government asked the house to rely on May. The government asked the Speaker to rule in keeping with May that this was not the kind of bill requiring the royal recommendation, not the kind of bill requiring prior committee stage. The government having requested it to be done in that way, I submit that the government must be consistent and follow through.

In that sentence which I just read, where it says that an amendment can be made in a case like this for a further reduction, there is a reference to a footnote. The footnote at the bottom of page 601, namely footnote 3, refers one to the British House of Commons for a very interesting date, namely July 1, 1853. I have here the Hansard of the British House of Commons of July 1, 1853. I find that on that date the then chancellor of the exchequer, who at that time was the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, brought in a resolution for the reduction of a certain tax. The tax, oddly enough, was one on advertisements in newspapers and other periodicals upon which up to that time there had been a tax of one shilling and six pence. Mr. Gladstone moved that that tax be reduced to six pence.

I may say that I wondered a bit, when I first saw this citation at page 601 of May's 11th edition, whether this reduction that could be made by way of amendment in committee was one that could be made only by a minister of the crown or whether it could be made by a private member. The very first instance that I turned to, simply following through what May tells you to do, is this instance in which Mr. Gladstone was met by an amendment by a private member, Mr. Milner Gibson, who moved an amendment that the tax on advertisements in newspapers and periodicals be reduced from six pence to zero. There was debate. Mr. Gladstone opposed it vigorously, contending for his proposal that the tax should remain at six pence. There were two or three votes in line with the procedure that they have in the House of Commons at Westminster, at the end of which the amendment carried and the tax was wiped out altogether.

Mr. Chairman, the matter is just as clear as that. The citation Mr. Speaker read on Monday, on the basis of which he made his ruling, is clear—and it is the government's ground, not mine—that this was to be regarded as a bill not requiring royal assent, not requiring prior committee stage. May says that in such circumstances when we are in committee on the bill, an amendment can be moved reducing the tax still further; and the instance that May gives, as I say, was on July 1, 1853, in the British house where the government proposed a reduction of a tax and on a private member's amendment like unto the one that I have now moved the tax was reduced still further.

Mr. Maloney: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

Mr. Maloney: Would the hon. member inform the committee whether or not objection was taken by way of points of order in the case he cited in the house in Great Britain?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Objection was not taken in that case. I am glad the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour raised that point because that is exactly what I was coming to, namely another instance a few years later where objection was raised by way of a point of order. I came upon this instance by following through the citation which the Minister of Justice gave when he was speaking to his point of order on Monday. He read from a little later edition of May, namely the 15th edition, and he quoted from page 764. Hon. members will recall this sentence that he read;

> Provisions for the alleviation of taxation are not subject to the rules of financial procedure. The repeal or reduction of taxes, for instance, by the finance bill, is sometimes preceded by a specific ways and means resolution but this procedure is neither necessary nor usual. Thus, provisions for the repeal or reduction of taxation, the granting or extension of exemptions, the creation or increase of drawbacks, etc., may be presented in bills or inserted by amendment without the preliminary sanction of a ways and means committee.

What I will never understand, Mr. Chairman, is why the Minister of Justice stopped there. Surely in his study he must have noted that there was just one more sentence in that paragraph. He did not read it to us. He must have read it when he looked this up. That one more sentence says this:

> The effect of this principle on the power to move amendments to bills will be stated on page 777.

I would think that the Minister of Justice, with his knowledge of how you must follow these things in procedure through to their logical conclusion, would have looked over to page 777 in order to see where he was being taken by his insistence that in this house the government has the right, as in the parliament at Westminster, to introduce a bill such as this without a committee of ways and means resolution. If you do exactly what May says, namely turn over to page 777, you find this paragraph:

> Provisions Reducing Existing Charges
> The rule that the repeal or reduction of an existing tax, though it may be embodied in a ways and means resolution, is not subject to the rules of financial procedure, applies to the committee and also to the report stages of bills. Hence at these stages amendments are in order to reduce or omit drawbacks or other alleviations of existing taxes proposed by the bill.

There are more sentences in that paragraph but I am sure that I am not leaving out anything that is pertinent to the argument. The point is that at page 777 the logical conclusion to what the minister took from page 764 is stated, namely that if you are going to contend—and I did not take this ground; I wanted the government to do it the other way and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano wanted the government to do it the other way—or if you are going to take the ground that this is the kind of bill concerning which you do not need the royal recommendation or a prior committee stage resolution, then it follows that in committee on the bill amendments can be moved raising or lowering the taxes proposed in the bill.

In this instance at page 777, if one looks to the footnote that is referred to in that paragraph, he finds that he is taken to the House of Commons debates for 1917-18; and on that occasion he will find that there was a proposal to make provision for a reduction in the amount of abatement on the liquor tax levied under United Kingdom legislation. I may say to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour that points of order were raised as to the propriety of such an amendment being moved by a private member, but the chairman ruled that since this was the kind of bill that was being proceeded with outside of the financial regulations, since this was the kind of bill that was being proceeded with in committee of the whole without a prior ways and means resolution, it was appropriate for a private member to move an amendment reducing the tax or an amendment restoring a tax that was being reduced to a higher level, provided it was not made higher than it was originally.

I may say there was another instance which was referred to in these various notes which take you to the British Hansard, namely one in 1868 and on that occasion also the propriety of the motion was questioned by a member on the government side, but the chairman ruled—and as a matter of fact he referred back to the case in 1853—that this was in order so long as you were working, not within the framework of the kind of bill that requires royal approval and the prior committee stage, so long as you were working within the framework of the kind of bill which is merely for a reduction of a proposed tax.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking this house to be consistent. I am asking the house to do the same thing which was done on Monday, to treat this as a bill, not in the terms in which we wanted it to be treated, but in the terms of the Speaker's ruling, namely that it was the kind of bill that was only for a reduction and therefore did not require a ways and means committee resolution in advance.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, that was not my position, but when the Speaker ruled that way I accepted the ruling and I would like a ruling to be made today consistent with the ruling which was made on Monday. If you look at the citations in our own books which support the position I am now taking, you will find for example in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 502 which reads:

> A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

Now that refers to a ruling that was made by Mr. Speaker Lemieux on April 28, 1924, by a coincidence, on a motion by my predecessor, the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. It was a motion put when the Speaker was in the chair; it was not a proposal in committee, but Mr. Speaker Lemieux, despite the fact that there were strong objections to Mr. Woodsworth's amendment and having taken the matter under consideration over the week end and having come back with a lengthy ruling, ruled in part,—and I will only read a sentence or two of it, recorded at page 1533 of Hansard of April 28, 1924. After having quoted Mr. Speaker Rhodes he said:

> The private member's right to move for a reduction of taxation suffers no limitation under our parliamentary rules and usages.

Then Mr. Speaker Lemieux went on to quote May at page 469 and at page 506 and so on, and also to give an instance of something which Mr. Fielding had done—which gentleman he described as one of the oldest members of the house and as a very eminent authority on parliamentary procedure—with respect to the moving of an amendment on the motion for a committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker Lemieux then declared Mr. Woodsworth's amendment in order and it is on the basis of that ruling that Beauchesne wrote his citation 502 that a private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged. May I also draw your attention to citation No. 497 of Beauchesne's third edition as follows:

> No member other than a minister of the crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties.

That is clear, and no one is arguing otherwise.

> The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the house enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility.—

Now listen to this:

> —This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that citation No. 497 is a companion one to citation 484. We are all familiar with the terms of citation 484 which permits members to make motions reducing, in committee of supply, the amount of a grant. By the same token, citation 497 gives to members the right, in a committee on a taxation bill, to move the reduction of taxes levied by that bill.

Now I turn to some of the arguments advanced by the minister. He talked about the balance of ways and means, but the Minister of Justice the other day said that this is not a budget and we are not called upon to go through the whole ambit of the financial affairs of this country. This is just a reduction in taxes—it is as simple as that. The Minister of Finance also said today that this is not a budget; we are just working within the framework of the budget that was brought down by the former minister of finance, Mr. Harris.

Well, Mr. Chairman, what right has he to say that his tax changes do not represent a budget and yet to deny to us the right to propose a further tax reduction by saying that such a reduction might upset the balance of ways and means, or in other words upset the budget? Here we are, with reference to the minister's quotation from page 683 of May's 15th edition, in the position where the minister when quoting from this page is actually quoting from the section in May which deals with a proper budget or with bills that have had royal recommendation and have been preceded by a ways and means resolution.

When it is done that way it is a different proposition. If you look at page 683 you will see that it does come within the section on the financial procedure when bills are brought in under a proper budget, as we wanted this one to be brought in. If it is done that way then no one can move an amendment to those bills except a minister of the crown.

But the minister did not bring in this bill under that section. He brought it in under the provisions quoted by the Speaker, for example, at page 764. That is in the section of May headed "Matters not Requiring a Ways and Means Resolution". Now when you are dealing with matters not requiring a ways and means resolution you are under a separate set of rules which includes a clear-cut statement that a private member in committee on the bill can move to reduce the tax. It gives three examples, one which happened in the United Kingdom and which was passed and the other two, while they were not passed, neverthless were ruled in order, debated and voted upon.

So I say that is the answer to the attempt of the Minister of Finance to quote May's 15th edition at page 683. When he speaks about not upsetting the balance of ways and means he is quoting from that particular section which applies to a bill brought in in the proper way as a budget bill, with a ways and means resolution in advance of it. This bill has been brought in under the excepting paragraphs that apply to a bill which has the effect of only reducing taxes.

The Minister of Finance quoted the instance on March 2, 1936, where a motion to reduce or eliminate the taxation on rural telephones was proposed by a private member and ruled out of order by the Speaker. Of course it was out of order because the citation I read a moment ago from Beauchesne's third edition says that a private member cannot bring in a bill for the reduction of taxes but a private member can move for a reduction in a tax proposed by the government.

In the case of the motion on March 2, 1936, it was not an amendment to reduce a tax proposed by the government; it was a substantive motion by a private member and I agree it was out of order.

As for the other two instances to which the Minister of Finance referred—the one where Mr. Thatcher moved an amendment for a reduction in a tax and the other where the member for Red Deer moved a similar amendment—may I point out that in both of those cases those were amendments moved to taxes that had been brought before the house through the medium of going through the committee of ways and means. That brought those measures within the framework of the sections in May which deal with the proper and normal financial procedure.

Mr. Chairman, the government sought to take this out of the section having to do with normal financial procedures. The government asked the house to deal with this bill as one of these exceptions; one of those cases where because there is only a reduction in taxation one does not have to go through all that procedure. But we cannot have it both ways. You cannot take this outside the normal procedure and then try to get back to the normal procedure because it proves more convenient, or because my amendment creates an inconvenience.

I say to hon. members opposite very earnestly that they will remember certain things which happened in this house in days gone by. They will remember black Friday, June 1, 1956. I know that what made that day black was that as the hours went on members were denied the right to speak. What started it? What was the genesis of black Friday? It was that one decision was made on Thursday, May 31, and another decision, the reverse of it, was made on Friday, June 1. That change of decision was supported by the government which was in the majority at that time.

I recognize that this is different. In this case it is not the Speaker making his decision and reversing his decision the next day. But we had a clear cut ruling on Monday—and I did not challenge it—that this bill, since it only has the effect of reducing taxation, was not to be regarded as coming under the normal financial rules, but that it should be regarded as coming under that section of May which provides for exceptions. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we are not to have a ruling today that puts it back into those other sections; I hope we are not going to have one ruling when the government wants to bring in this bill in a way we do not think should be followed and an opposite ruling when a member of the opposition seeks to take advantage of the section under which we are operating, and moves an amendment.

I suggest that this is a very serious matter; I knew of this when I raised the point of order I did last Friday and when I raised it again on Monday. I thought then that the government was making a very serious mistake to bring in this bill without a prior ways and means resolution. I was prepared then to give ground on the argument that we had to have an eight day debate before getting into committee of ways and means, but at least for the sake of maintaining government control over financial policy, subject to approval by parliament, the government should have insisted on a ways and means resolution before this bill was brought before the house. The government chose to do it this way. The government chose this method of procedure, and opened the door to the right of private members to move amendments. That is set out clearly in Erskine May, 11th, 13th and 15th editions if hon. members will follow through these citations which have been read by speakers from the party opposite. Having done that, having opened that door of their own choice and obtained a ruling in their favour, I hope the government is not now going to press the point of order which was suggested by the Minister of Finance.

I submit to you, sir, that the case is eminently clear. We are operating under this special section and if the government had the right to bring in under this section a bill only reducing taxation and therefore not requiring a ways and means resolution, we have the right to move the kind of amendment I have placed before the committee, and I hope consideration will be given not only to the amendment now before you, Mr. Chairman, and to the question as to whether or not it is in order, but as to the seriousness of the whole position bearing in mind the need for maintaining the rule of law, and for not changing the rule in the middle of the game but carrying through once a decision has been made to a logical and consistent conclusion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would indeed be a difficult one for any one of us here to follow, and ask you to rule against, Mr. Chairman, were the position exactly as the hon. member has stated it to be. But I submit to you in all seriousness that he has not stated the position correctly. If we were asking Your Honour to do what the hon. member says we are asking you to do, then we would deserve a great deal of censure, but because he has, I submit, misunderstood the implication of what is meant by the committee of ways and means and the necessity for a committee of ways and means, and what is meant by the assertion that whether or not you have a committee of ways and means the initiative with respect to taxation rests with the government; because he has misapprehended the significance of this proposal he has been led into error and has imputed to us motives and conduct which are quite inapplicable.

As I say, the situation presents two distinct propositions. One is, that a budget requires a committee of ways and means and a ways and means resolution. It is accepted that when you have a bill based upon a ways and means resolution you cannot move amendments in the committee on the bill which go outside the terms of that resolution. Not even the government could do that. The government cannot move an amendment to a bill based on a ways and means resolution if that amendment departs from the terms of the resolution.

But there is another quite separate proposition applicable here, and that is that the initiative with respect to taxation rests with the crown and can only be set in motion by a minister of the crown, and that proposition applies whether or not you have had a ways and means resolution, in my submission.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not according to May.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to start with the authority for the proposition that only the government can make specific proposals with regard to taxation and altering the incidence of taxation or affecting a reduction of taxation. I admit at once that any hon. member can make a general proposal or move an amendment in general terms asserting the desirability of such a proposition, although I should say that even this process has been discouraged and is open to some question. But that is quite different from moving an amendment which would specifically reduce a particular tax, and I submit that no member except a minister of the crown can move such an amendment. I see that a Canadian authority, Bourinot's fourth edition, says this at page 432:

> Though there is no rule to prevent private members moving abstract resolutions proposing changes in the scheme or distribution of taxation, or the imposition of new duties, "yet they have been uniformly resisted by the government in the English House of Commons as inexpedient and impolitic".

This is a general statement of the proposition. I think there is a more specific statement of the proposition in the next sentence which I now read:

> All proposals for the imposition of taxes belong peculiarly to the crown, and custom, as well as sound policy, has long ago devolved upon ministers the duty of submitting such questions to the consideration of parliament.

I do not want to give words an improper meaning or weight, and I admit it says "All proposals for the imposition of taxes belong peculiarly to the crown," but I would submit that the words are wide enough to include proposals regarding the reduction of taxation, and it follows from that that the succeeding words, which I quote again, "and custom as well as sound policy has long ago devolved upon ministers the duty of submitting such questions to the consideration of parliament" support the proposition that only a minister of the government can make a specific proposal for the variation of the rates of taxation.

Then, Mr. Chairman I come at once to the question raised by the hon. member who suggested that I had not done my reading. I read May at page 777 which the hon. member quoted and I was not in the least put out by what I found there because it fits in perfectly with the argument I had in mind last Monday and that I now advance. The argument I made last Monday and which was upheld by the Speaker was that this is not the type of tax measure which requires a committee of ways and means and a ways and means resolution. That was the only point I made and it is perfectly consistent with the point I am making.

The point I am making is that this being a taxation measure and the bill now involving the rate of taxation, only a minister of the crown can move a specific amendment to alter that rate of taxation. It is true that here at page 777 May says:

Hence at these stages—

Referring to the committee stage which we are now in——amendments are in order to reduce or omit drawbacks or other alleviations of existing taxes proposed by the bill.

But May is silent upon the point, and I submit silent because the point is self-evident, as to who may move an amendment and my point is that only a minister of the crown may move such an amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Fulton: If I might just complete the point, this is again consistent with my argument that if this bill had been founded upon a ways and means resolution not even a minister of the crown could move an amendment because the bill and all parts of it and therefore all amendments must conform to the authority of the ways and means resolution. All that May is pointing out here is that where you do not have a bill based on a ways and means resolution then you can move amendments. That is all he is pointing out. He is not saying that private members can move amendments because earlier he said that the initiative with respect to taxation rests with the crown.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit a question at this point. Does he not agree that the point where he made the other statement earlier is in the section dealing with bills that come under normal financial procedure and will he not also agree that footnote (t) on page 777 refers one to the United Kingdom House of Commons Debates of 1917-18. If one looks up the reference to column 829 he will find that it was a private member who moved the amendment referred to in that citation just as it was a private member on July 1, 1853, and again in 1868?

It seems to me that what the minister is failing to realize is that May clearly differentiates between the two classes of bills. When it is a bill under the normal financial procedure it has to have a ways and means resolution and only a minister can move it or move amendments but when it is a bill not within the ordinary financial procedure, when it is a bill the purpose of which is to reduce taxation, May says you do not require a royal recommendation and in committee of the whole it can be amended up or down and he gives as an example private members having moved such amendments.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not fully accept the hon. member's argument because—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will you accept the facts?

Mr. Fulton: Well, the facts are incontrovertible but the point I am making is that the initiative of the crown with respect to taxation measures is separate and distinct from the proposition that bills based on ways and means resolutions cannot be altered unless they are submitted back to the committee of ways and means for the purpose of authorizing the alteration and although it is true that May at page 682 is dealing with the question of bills which do require ways and means resolutions nevertheless I think the passage relevant there in which he traces the relationship of the crown to the initiative in taxation is a general rather than a particular proposition and that passage which was the next one to which I was going to refer you, sir, does I submit establish as a general proposition that the crown has the exclusive initiative with regard to proposals for taxation.

I think I should read the whole paragraph:

The view which made the proposal of taxes dependent upon the demand for supply prevailed at the time when it became necessary to find a procedure which would protect the financial initiative of the Crown from being infringed by amendments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Quite.

Mr. Fulton: It continues:

It tended to connect the royal initiative exclusively with the amount of revenue which it was the object of a tax to raise. Hence, in early editions of this book it was stated that "the Crown has no concern in the nature or distribution of taxes" (t). Hence, also, amendments were at first permitted which proposed the substitution of a different tax for a tax proposed by the government (provided that both were estimated to yield an equivalent amount) on the ground that the necessity of new taxation to that extent had already been declared on behalf of the Crown (see page 769). In modern practice this view is regarded as incomplete, and as requiring to be supplemented by the view that the royal initiative in taxation implies the exclusive right to define the incidence as well as the amount of burdens to be placed upon the people, and that an amendment which transfers a burden to taxpayers not previously liable is an infringement of this initiative (see page 769).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But what happens in the case of an amendment which does not transfer a burden to the taxpayers?

Mr. Fulton: I submit that what I read is a general proposition. It is a general discussion which occurs in a section of the book it is true dealing with committees of ways and means and bills based on the resolutions of such committees but it is tracing the historical development. What I say is that the historical development makes it clear that the initiative with respect to taxation belongs to the crown and that the royal initiative in taxation implies the exclusive right to define the incidence as well as the amount of burden to be placed upon the people.

When we come down to our own practice, it is true that the hon. member has referred us to a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lemieux in 1924 where an amendment with regard to taxation was held to be in order but I would point out that as appears at page 175 of the Journals of the House of Commons for that year this proposed amendment was in completely general terms. It was resolved:

That the best interests of Canada will be served by an immediate and substantial reduction of the tariff on the necessaries of life including foodstuffs, clothing and building materials;—

There is not a rate stated. And again:

And further that it is desirable

(a) That the income tax should be readjusted as to bear more heavily on unearned incomes;

(b) That unimproved land values including all natural resources should not be exempt from taxation; and

(c) That a graduated inheritance tax on large estates should be considered.

There is not a specific proposal in the whole of that amendment and that is why that amendment was held to be in order but when we come to a case where an amendment would have had a specific effect, namely the amendment of 1951 moved by a then colleague of my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we find that that specific proposal was ruled to be out of order. Let me read again the proposed amendment as found at page 335 of the Journals of 1951:

Mr. Shaw moved the following amendment:

"That clause 1 of the proposed amendment to the Excise Tax Act be deleted and the remaining clauses be renumbered accordingly."

That amendment would have had a specific result. It would have reduced the tax and wiped out the provision in that clause for the imposition of that tax and being a specific proposal it was ruled out of order on the grounds and in line with the principle that the crown has the exclusive right—the government has the exclusive right—to initiate with respect to specific taxation proposals.

This leads me back to the proposition I made earlier, that there are two distinct branches which are being discussed and I submit with respect that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has confused them and has intermingled them in a way in which they should not be intermingled.

One is the question of ways and means resolutions on the occasions when a committee of ways and means is required and then it is clear that not even the government can bring in an amendment to a bill which goes outside the ambit of the resolution authorizing that bill. But in a case such as the present, where you have a bill which did not require a ways and means resolution, then you are left, on the basis of the other proposition, in the position that only the crown can initiate specific proposals with regard to taxation. I submit, to be consistent, that the minister could move an amendment, or have one of his colleagues move an amendment, because there was no ways and means resolution; but it is not open to a private member to assert the privilege or initiative which belongs exclusively to the crown in this field of making specific proposals with regard to taxation.

I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that the last time when such a matter came before the house in a conclusive manner was in 1951 when a specific amendment was rejected; whereas, in 1924, when the amendment was ruled to be in order, it was an amendment in general terms. If the hon. member had framed his motion in such general terms as it would be desirable to consider, without expressing a final opinion, I suggest that, apart from other matters of relevancy, it might be in order. Whether it would be relevant or not I express no opinion; but having made it as a specific proposal, which will have the effect of reducing the tax proposed by the government, I submit that it is out of order for a private member to do that on this or on any other taxation bill.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I am not a parliamentary lawyer but I do not think it is fair to ask you to rule on this question now. It has given me a great thrill to hear these two stalwarts, and I must say I have not heard anything to compare with the submission of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think you should have time to consider this and not be asked to give a decision now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say a word with respect to what the Minister of Justice has said? It seems to me that the Minister of Justice has to do more than just assert that the statements in the general rules of financial procedure in May's fifteen edition, starting at page 662, also apply when May gets to the portion of his book where he deals with matters which are not covered. All of the material the minister read from page 682 is in the chapter entitled "General Rules of Financial Procedure". Then, later on, starting at page 763, we have a chapter entitled "Matters, Akin to Charges Upon The People, Not Initiated By Ways and Means Resolutions". He says:

> The rules of financial procedure do not apply to the receipts of local authorities, when they form the subject of legislation, unless, of course, they are in the form of grants from the exchequer.

Then, he goes on to these other things, local loans, taxes payable to local funds, and finally he comes down to alleviation of taxation, the paragraph which was the whole basis of Mr. Speaker's ruling the other day. That paragraph leads to the further statement that when you are dealing with a bill which is not under the general rules of financial procedure it is open to any member in committee on the bill to move further amendments.

Mr. Fulton: He does not say that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He says it may be amended in committee. I do not know why the Minister of Justice tries to check me on this one.

Mr. Fulton: I am not, but you should reproduce it accurately.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He says on page 777 it is open to the committee to have amendments:

> —to reduce or omit drawbacks or other alleviations of existing taxes proposed by the bill.

There is in that sentence a footnote (t). The "t" is in italics inside parenthesis. If you refer to the footnote at the bottom of the page you find that it refers to the House of Commons debates, 1917-18, volume 95, column 829. And, on that page of Hansard, you have the case of a private member moving an amendment to a bill in committee. Now, if that is not May saying that a private member can do it, I do not understand the English language. Similarly, the footnote in May's eleventh edition, where he says that an amendment may be moved in committee on the bill, takes one to 1853 and 1868, two instances where private members moved amendments to proposals that had been brought in by the government.

Mr. Chairman, the same thing applies to the repeated reference of both ministers to an amendment made by the hon. member for Red Deer when we were in committee on the resolutions of the budget of 1951. That was a budget brought in under the general rules of financial procedure. It was preceded by a ways and means resolution. Of course, it was not open to a private member to move a specific change under those circumstances, but in the case that is now before us we are asked to operate at the request of the government outside of those general rules. We are being asked to operate under the terms of an exception. That exception has been clearly stated by May to be one under the terms of which we can move an amendment to a bill in committee, either reducing a tax or raising it, provided we do not raise it higher than the point at which it stood before.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the line of demarcation has been drawn clearly by May and that Mr. Speaker on Monday clearly accepted the proposition that what we have before us now is not a bill imposing a tax, but a bill of tax alleviation and therefore we operate under different rules.

The Minister of Justice likes to read and re-read page 682 of May's fifteenth edition because it is there we find the suggestion that this can be done only on behalf of the crown; but, Mr. Chairman, what is it that can be done only on behalf of the crown? It is the right of dealing with the incidence and the amount of burden to be placed upon the people. I quote as witnesses the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice and His Honour the Speaker, all of whom on Monday said that what we have here is not a bill imposing burdens, not a bill imposing taxation, but a bill taking taxes off.

This whole measure is so completely taken out of the general rules of financial procedure that I confess one wonders why it has to be argued. I have the greatest respect for the ruling the Speaker made on Monday. I accepted it because I think one should accept the Speaker's rulings if at all possible, but apart from that, I would say that there were arguments on both sides. I am not one of those who say that there is not an argument on the other side. Let us say the argument was 50-50 or 51-49. Take your choice. At any rate, Mr. Speaker was faced with the fact that the bills were printed; they were inscribed on the order paper. There would be the implication that somewhere along the line there had been advice, perhaps from the draftsmen in the Department of Finance; somewhere along the line there had been advice to the government that these bills were in order in this way. I think the Speaker, when he was faced with a very difficult decision, might have taken that as a consideration. In any case, the Speaker having ruled that this bill does not come under the general rules of financial procedure since it is not a bill imposing a burden, since it is not a bill imposing a tax, since it is a bill of relief that does not need a committee of ways and means, I say, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot possibly get away from these citations that follow that position and make it clear that it is in order for amendments to be made in committee and that the instances noted in the British house, on which all of this is based, make it clear that such amendments reducing a tax can be made by a private member.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I rather agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fort William, and probably you agree with it yourself, that if there are not others who wish to take part in the discussion you might like the supper hour to think about this point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I was going to make that suggestion. There are so many references here that it is difficult to read them and listen to what hon. members are saying. This is quite an important ruling, so I would like very much to go over it during the dinner hour and report back at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Unless anyone else wishes to speak, may I suggest we call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): When the committee rose at six o'clock there was a point of order before the Chair to the effect that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was not in order since it was not open to a private member to propose a reduction in a taxation bill. Meanwhile I have had the opportunity to read the comments of the hon. members who have participated in the debate on the point of order and also to read the authorities bearing on the point raised.

It is not my intention to deal at length with all the points raised. However, the Minister of Finance referred to two rulings, one known as the one in 1936 and the other in 1951. In checking the record of the one referred to in 1936 I find that the motion attempted to initiate in general terms a tax reduction but no bill was before the house. This was a private member's motion. In 1951 the amendment was moved in committee of ways and means and not in committee of the whole on a bill, and accordingly it is my opinion that these references are not in accord with the situation now before us. I should like to refer to Campion, page 280, which says in part as follows:

> The principle that taxation requires the sanction of the Crown applies not only to the imposition but also to the increase of taxation, and to any variation in its incidence. All such proposals can only be initiated in committee of ways and means and by a minister acting on behalf of the Crown. The proposals which must be so initiated include proposals:—
> (1) to impose a new tax;
> (2) to continue an expiring tax;
> (3) to increase a permanent tax;
> (4) to continue a temporary (and expiring) addition to a permanent tax; and
> (5) to pay any sums into the Exchequer—

I also want to refer to May's 15th edition which was read previously but which I should like to read in part now, at page 777:

> The rule that the repeal or reduction of an existing tax, though it may be embodied in a ways and means resolution, is not subject to the rules of financial procedure, applies to the committee and also to the report stages of bills. Hence at these stages amendments are in order to reduce or omit drawbacks or other alleviations of existing taxes proposed by the bill.

I may also refer to another one in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 497:

> 497. No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the house enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

In my opinion the amendment before us does not initiate the imposition of any taxation and in accordance with the authorities I have just cited. I must rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. McIvor: I congratulate you, Mr. Chairman, on your honesty. The two hon. members last year were on the same side of the house and they tried to prove that a thing that was wrong was right. It was my duty to show that they were both wrong last year.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I must ask the hon. member to direct his remarks to the amendment. Is the house ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fleming: I have a word to say on the amendment now that you have ruled it to be in order. It must be clear to all hon. members that if the government and the house are to proceed with some regard for the balance of ways and means, the government must take responsibility in reference to proposals that are made for variation in the rates of taxation. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend has said several times already in the course of this debate about needing more information, he has nevertheless chosen, with the information that he has, to move an increase in the reduction in this particular tax. The result would be to change the basis of the government's financial proposals as outlined last Friday night for the balance of this fiscal year. For that reason the government has no alternative but to oppose this amendment. If business is to be done in this way in the House of Commons, the effect could only be financial chaos.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 30; nays, 70.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. McMillan: I might say that I am in favour of this bill but I think as members of parliament it is only fair that we should have a clear financial picture of our position before voting to increase or decrease taxes at any time. I should like to ask the minister one question. How is it that the Minister of Finance reported a deficit of $50 million under the Old Age Security Act in his statement on Friday evening in view of the fact that the former minister of finance on March 14, as reported at page 2226 of Hansard of that date, reported that there would be a deficit of $50 million in that account to be voted in the 1957-58 estimates and when recent increases in benefit payments under that act, it seems to me, will add a further $40 million to $50 million to the fund by the end of next March?

Mr. Fleming: If my hon. friend will look at page 2003 of Hansard of December 6, he will see that the item of $50 million is the increase in the old age security fund deficit. It is the increase in the deficit over and above what was previously estimated and which arises from the increase in the pension payments that have been authorized by parliament.

Mr. McMillan: Is that the total increase for the year?

Mr. Fleming: For this fiscal year.

Mr. McMillan: The $6 and then the $9?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry but I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. McMillan: Did that include the $6 increase plus the $9 increase in November?

Mr. Fleming: It includes everything to March 31.

Mr. Denisetz: Mr. Chairman, I should like to state that I am in favour of the bill. However, I think the house should realize that the amendment which was proposed by the C.C.F. was strictly a political manoeuvre and it should be recognized as such.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must tell the hon. member that the amendment has been disposed of and therefore his remarks must not refer to it.

Mr. Denisetz: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. So far as the bill is concerned, I should like to point out that the reason I am in favour of it is that it is a restriction of tariffs and I believe we should always work towards the goal of free trade. It is for that reason I rise, so that my opinion on this matter will be on record.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Zaplitny: Before the clause carries there are two matters I should like to have the minister explain at this time. This reduction involves two matters to which the minister made reference this afternoon. One of them has to do with the arrangement announced last week whereby dealers in automobiles will not be penalized by the reduction in the tax. In other words, they will receive a refund of tax with respect to those automobiles they may have had on hand at the time the change went into effect. I should like the minister to explain what method and machinery are going to be used to administer any refunds that may be requested.

The second matter has to do with a statement the minister made this afternoon to the effect that the purchasers of automobiles will have the reduction in the tax passed on to them. I listened very carefully but the minister did not indicate in what manner the government is prepared to guarantee that the consumer will get the benefit of this tax reduction. Personally I do not see at the moment how the government is going to do it. The minister made the pledge today by way of a general statement that the government will see to it. I think the words he used were, "the government will see to it that the consumer receives the benefit of this tax reduction".

It is well known that we do not have a system of price control in this country any more, which would be the only way I can see whereby the government could make good on that statement. However, if the government has any other method in mind by which they are going to see to it, as the minister said they would, that the consumer gets the benefit of the tax reduction, I should like him to tell the committee how he intends to do it through governmental action.

I should like an explanation of both these points. First, how is the dealer to be compensated for any loss he may sustain as the result of this reduction? Second, how is the tax reduction going to be passed on to the consumer?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the matter of making refunds to the dealers will, of course, be handled through the Department of National Revenue and a system has been worked out by the customs and excise branch of that department whereby these refunds will be made on proof. I cannot now attempt to give the hon. member the full details of the method, but proof will be required. That involves some identification of the vehicle. That, we are given to understand, can be arranged without too great difficulty with the co-operation of the manufacturer and it is hoped that these refunds can be put through without long delay. It may take time in some cases where the checking of the identity of the vehicle has to be done in very remote localities, but the system devised by the officials of the Department of National Revenue is one that they are prepared now to stand by and apply to the entire situation.

As to the second question, I draw my hon. friend's attention to what I did say on this subject on Friday evening as found at page 2006 of Hansard:

> The government has received assurances given on behalf of all automobile manufacturers that the benefit of this reduction will immediately appear in the manufacturers' wholesale prices and suggested retail prices. The government will expect this tax reduction to be reflected at once in the price of new cars to the public.

The assurance to which I referred here was given on behalf of the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce by the secretary-treasurer of that organization which embraces all of the Canadian automobile manufacturers. Similar undertakings were given to the government or offered to the government last summer when the manufacturers, dealers and others first began making their representations to the government.

My hon. friend asks about enforcement. The government can give no guarantee as to what will happen in every case. It must be recognized at once that the undertaking given by the manufacturers applies to the wholesale prices and to the suggested retail prices. I think we can depend upon an interested and vigilant public to make very certain that the benefits of the tax deduction are actually reflected in the price that the consumer pays when he purchases his new car.

Mr. Zaplitny: I thank the minister for the explanation as to how the refunds are going to be handled. Although it is not too clear yet, I realize that perhaps the department does not have the machinery all set up for that purpose. But I want to make reference to the second question which the minister answered and with respect to which he now tells us that the only guarantee, if you can call it that, the only prospect of the tax reduction being passed on to the consumer is the undertaking given to the government. I am pretty sure I am quoting the minister correctly when I say that this afternoon the minister used these words—

Mr. Fleming: Could the hon. member speak up a bit?

Mr. Zaplitny: In taking part in the debate this afternoon the minister used the phrase, "We will see to it that this reduction is passed on to the consumer." The minister still has not told us how the government is going to see to it. It is one thing to have an undertaking on the part of the automobile manufacturers that they will pass on the reduction to the wholesaler and eventually to the consumer. It is another thing for the minister to say in the house that he will see to it that that is done. I think we need a further statement from the minister in order to inform the committee as to what the government is prepared to do if they find that the tax reduction is not being passed on to the consumer.

Second, when the minister speaks of the undertaking given by the automobile manufacturers I should like him to tell us to what extent that undertaking is valid. For what period of time was the undertaking given? Is it an undertaking which binds the automobile manufacturers for 30 days, 60 days, six months or one year? What is there to prevent the automobile manufacturers from increasing their prices three months from now to the extent of the tax reduction or more? I think we need a firmer statement on the part of the government as to what method they intend to use in order, to use the minister's own phrase, to see to it that the consumer gets the benefit of this tax reduction, because that is the statement which he made this afternoon.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first question asked by the hon. member, the forms of application for remission of excise tax have now been prepared in the Department of National Revenue to be signed by the dealers and a memorandum has gone out already to all the manufacturers acquainting them with the procedure to be followed in that respect.

On the second question, Mr. Chairman, I did not say this afternoon that the government would undertake to see to it that in every case the retailer would pass this tax remission on to the consumer. That would be going beyond the power of the government to supervise. What I indicated in this house this afternoon, in repetition of what I said on Friday night, was that we already had this complete assurance from the manufacturers, who are the people upon whom the tax is levied, this being a tax collected at manufacturers' level, that the reduction of the tax will be reflected at once, that is to say, from midnight on Friday night, by them in the wholesale prices charged to their dealers and also in the suggested retail prices, that is, the prices they suggest that the retail dealers should charge for the cars.

With some scores of thousands of cars being sold, I do not know how the hon. member could expect the government to see to it in every case, particularly in cases involving trade-ins, that it would be possible to measure precisely the values concerned, and see to it that in every case the reduction was passed on. We have gone as far as we can to see to it that the benefit is passed on. I believe it will be. If cases are found where it is not passed on I hope such cases will be brought to our attention, because I am sure the manufacturers, in the light of the undertaking they have given to the government, are not going to tolerate failure on the part of their dealers to pass on the benefit of the reduction to the consumer.

It is to be borne in mind also that we are speaking here of authorized dealers. These are all dealers who hold appointments from the manufacturers, and it seems to me that with such a relationship it is going to be very difficult for any dealer to refuse to pass on the benefit of this reduction to the consumer.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Now there is one other fact which I am sure will be in the mind of the hon. member. It is very difficult, where a person is trading in a car, to balance off whatever the effect of the price reduction on his car may be against the effect of the tax reduction on the price of the new car he is purchasing.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to ask a question of the minister. Is it not a fact that the only person who will benefit by this reduction in excise tax is the one buying a new car for the first time? In the case of another car being traded in, the amount would be deducted from the price of the secondhand car exactly in line with the deduction from the new car. I can see no problem there at all. The only person who can benefit from this reduction in excise tax is the person who is buying a new car for the first time, because in the case of a man trading in a used car the same reduction would be taken from the price of that car as would apply to the new car.

Mr. Fleming: The man who is making a cash purchase of a new car will obviously receive the full benefit of the reduction. I do not think the hon. member is right in saying that a man trading in a car will receive no benefit from the reduction in tax. It may be that the reduction in tax will have some effect on the trade-in, but he would still derive some benefit, I think, from the reduction of the tax on the new vehicle.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will not press this point, other than to say that if the automobile industry were to let it be known tomorrow that they were reducing the price of their new cars by $100 a car, a car being traded in would automatically be reduced in value by that same amount. If a secondhand car was worth $1,500 today, then after the manufacturer had reduced the price of his car by $100 the price of my car would automatically be reduced by the same extent.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Well, you don't have the same type of dealer in Oshawa, then, as in other parts of the country.

Mr. MacInnis: What are you worrying about, are you thinking of buying a new car yourself?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have one, but if I were to exchange it I would not feel I was getting any benefit under this reduction. I have listened to you yapping now for three or four weeks and one day someone is going to put you in your place. The first opportunity I get I will make every effort to put you in your place, because you are too noisy. Sit there and listen to someone else talk.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): The hon. member for Charlotte has the floor.

Mr. MacInnis: Better take advantage of it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will take advantage of it. I can take care of myself. I will say this and resume my seat: I still think that the only man who will benefit from this is the person buying a new car with no trade-in, since dealers trading in secondhand cars will naturally take full advantage of this reduction.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member will have his opinion on that point, and I will have mine. I do not think the man who trades in a car is going to receive no benefit. There may be some proportionate effect on the reduction of the value of his used car, but it is only a proportionate effect and he will undoubtedly have some benefit from the reduction when he buys a new car.

I wish to make quite clear what I said on this matter of the undertaking. I think that if the hon. member for Dauphin looks at what I said this afternoon he will find it was quite different from what he is attributing to me tonight. I said this afternoon that I wished to put on record the undertakings received that the benefit of the reduction would be passed on forthwith and that the public would receive the benefit from it, and that is precisely the undertaking which was given on behalf of the manufacturers to us, both individually, when they came to see us last summer, and jointly on their behalf by the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is the Minister of Finance now denying that he said this afternoon that the government will see to it that the benefit is passed on to the consumer?

Mr. Fleming: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Zaplitny: If he says that he did not, I will have to accept it, but I believe that is exactly the phrase he used.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to make it clear at once that I did not say that. What I did say this afternoon was in repetition to what I said on Friday—that I wished to put on record the undertakings given to the government that the benefit of the reduction would be passed on forthwith to the public.

Mr. Zaplitny: Well, I am not going to argue that point with the minister. I think a reference to Hansard tomorrow may show that at another point in his speech he did say what I think he said. However, I accept his version of it for the moment.

I wish now to bring up another matter. The Minister of Finance made two statements in reply to my question. First, he said that if any person felt he was not obtaining the benefit of this reduction as a consumer he should notify the government. And then he said that he feels sure that the manufacturing firms will not tolerate a situation in which the dealer would not pass on this tax reduction. But with regard to that, I should like to know why he wants the consumer to notify the government, because unless the government has some authority to do what it is undertaking to do I see no value whatever in the consumer getting in touch with the government.

If he feels the government does have some authority, that is precisely what I am trying to find out. What authority does the minister think he has to make sure that the benefit of this reduction will be passed on to the consumer?

Secondly, he stated that no automobile firm would tolerate having the dealer fail to pass on this price reduction to the consumer. I am afraid that involved in that statement is an invitation to break the law because the minister knows that in 1951 or previous to that year this house passed an act which prohibited price maintenance. He is now stating that no firm would tolerate a certain action on the part of a dealer. The law itself states that the manufacturing firm or the wholesale firm concerned has no right to interfere whatsoever in the price which the retailer or dealer as the case may be sets on the sale of his product. If the minister inferred that automobile manufacturing firms could order their dealers to do something then he is inviting the automobile firms to break a law passed by this house.

If he says that these firms will not tolerate something that the dealer may do or fail to do the inference is that the automobile companies are in a position to dictate to the dealer as to what he must do and they are specifically prohibited by law from doing that by the resale price maintenance act which prohibits the supplier from interfering in any shape or form with the person at the retail level in setting the price on the product they have supplied. This is the law of the land. The minister is now inferring that the automobile manufacturing firms are interfering with what the dealer does. He cannot have it both ways; either the government has the authority to do it—and if it has I would like to know what that authority is—or on the other hand if he is going to suggest that this authority be assumed by the automobile companies then he is inviting them to break an act passed by this house.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend is going to deal with my statements I wish he would quote them accurately. In the second place I have only this comment to make on his resale price maintenance argument. It is one thing for a manufacturer to attempt to impose the selling price at retail on his dealers but it is a very different thing for that manufacturer to indicate to his dealer that he has given an undertaking to the government so far as he is concerned to pass on the benefit of this reduction to the public and to expect the dealer to do as much. That certainly is no invitation to break the law.

Mr. Zaplitny: No, Mr. Chairman, the minister cannot get away with that. He may claim all he wants that he was misquoted but certainly he will not deny now that he did say only a few minutes ago that the automobile firms would not tolerate a situation where the retailer would not do what they have undertaken with the government to do. What is apparently meant by saying that the automobile companies would not tolerate a failure on the part of the dealers to pass on these benefits is that the companies are in a position to force their sale by the dealers at a reduced price. If it means anything else I say the minister should say so.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I am not at all happy that the minister did not supply an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin. The minister very clearly stated that the automobile companies would not tolerate the dealers not passing on these intended reductions to the consumers. The minister has not answered that question and the minister in the public eye now stands condemned as recognizing the fact that the wholesalers are able to dictate terms to the dealers in violation of the law passed by this house.

I agree with the hon. member for Charlotte and with the hon. member for Cariboo who said earlier that this reduction is going to mean a saving only to a man who purchases a new automobile and who presently has no automobile to trade in. All of us know the automobile market well enough to realize that when the price of a new car is reduced by $50 then the price of any older model which might be used as a trade-in is reduced by the same amount and therefore anybody who has a car to offer as a trade-in receives no benefit whatever. Nothing the minister might say is going to convince the general car-owning public that they will receive any benefit unless they are in the position of buying a new car with no old car to offer as a trade-in.

I wish to refer in particular to clause 1 which embodies the 7½ per cent reduction. I have not yet heard a logical explanation as to why it should not be 5 per cent or 2½ per cent.

Mr. Fleming: Order.

Mr. Regier: The minister did not see fit to offer an explanation to this house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. We are still discussing the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act and I must ask the hon. member to bring his remarks into line.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I was directing my remarks to clause 1. I take it that we are still on clause 1.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Clause 1 has been carried. We are now on clause 2.

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman, I humbly submit that the discussion that has occurred for some considerable time has all been directed to clause 1.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Clause 1 is carried.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question on this clause. Does he know what percentage of new cars purchased involve trade-ins and what percentage are new cars paid for by cash with no trade-in involved?

Mr. Fleming: I have no figures on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the minister would have no idea as to what proportion of the consuming public is going to benefit as the result of the reductions in the excise tax. I would venture to say that on an average there would not be one car in a thousand sold with no trade-in attached to the purchase. Even supposing that the ratio were one in 100—I am very conservative with a small "c"—that tax is not going to be as beneficial for the general consuming public as the minister would like us to believe. I am not saying that with a view to casting any reflection on the minister at all but it is a statement of fact that very few cars are bought today with no trade-in involved.

I can see that the minister's desire is to have this reduction passed on to the consumer but what assurance does he have from the automobile companies or the dealers, particularly where a trade-in is involved, that the benefit of this reduction will be passed on? If he has such an assurance, what proportion of the reduction does he estimate will be passed on? That is something I feel we should be concerned about. If we are going to attempt to lower the tax with a view to benefiting the consumer then certainly we should have some concrete idea as to what proportion of the consuming public will benefit as the result of the tax reduction. Otherwise it might be a greater service to the general public if he were to bring in a reduction in the sales tax in which case the consumer would receive a direct benefit. That is something for the minister to consider and I hope he will make some reply to my questions.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, by having given this bill second reading the house has expressed itself finally on the subject of whether there should or should not be this reduction in taxation, so the point raised by my hon. friend is, I am afraid, quite out of order now.

I do not know where the hon. member gets these estimates of his, one in 1,000 or one in 100 being a straight purchase of a new car without a trade-in. I do not suppose any member of this committee has figures on this but I would be very much surprised if that is not a very wild guess.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What would be your guess?

Mr. Fleming: My guess? I do not care to guess.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: It would be only a small fraction of the figure my friend is using. I think, if I may say so, in his approach to the question my hon. friend is making the same mistake that I undertook to say I found in the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte. It should not be assumed that it is only in the case of the purchase of a new car without any trade-in that any benefit flows from the reduction in tax to the consuming public. I believe that in all of these cases where there is a trade-in there will be benefit to the public.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is there any method or any way by which the minister can find out whether there is a share of this being passed on to the consuming public where there are trade-ins involved? I do not know whether he has at his disposal any way of checking that up for us or not.

Mr. Pickersgill: A Gallup poll.

Mr. Fleming: The newspapers these days are filled with advertisements of dealers indicating the reductions that they are making in their prices to the consuming public. I would think the public would very soon find out where any dealer is not passing on the benefit of the reduction. They are going to go to the dealer who is passing on the reduction.

Mr. Stefura: Is the minister aware of any increase in the 1958 models which came out this year just before this bill was introduced in the house? I refer to the increase over the 1957 model prices. In whatever increase has been put on these new models the companies have already taken advantage of any reduction that this tax will bring about. Is there any way the minister can furnish us with information on this?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, whatever were the prices in effect last Friday night are the prices upon which the manufacturers have agreed to reduce their prices to the extent of the reduction in tax.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say now applies to clause 2 as well as to clause 1. The minister told us some hours ago that there could not possibly have been any leak and the reason he gave that there could not be either a leak or a drip was that only two men, the Prime Minister and himself, were aware of these changes.

Mr. Fleming: I did not say that.

Mr. Regier: That rang an alarm bell in my mind. I wondered what kind of a government we have today. Does the minister mean to say that he—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Good government.

Mr. Regier: I hope the minister will teach some of his backbenchers a few of the things he had to say about trained seals about a year ago. Does the minister mean to say that only he and the Prime Minister made this decision, or is he willing to admit that this is the decision of the government? I should like to know exactly how it is the decision of the government if only he and the Prime Minister knew. And when I am saying this, Mr. Chairman, I am saying it in all honesty and in all sincerity because I do not lightly forget the reference the other day of the Prime Minister to his government. I always thought that this was Her Majesty's government and yet this very afternoon the Minister of Finance said there could not possibly have been a leak because other members of the government knew nothing about it. I would like him to explain that situation.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I wish my hon. friend would get his facts straight and follow accurately what is said in the house by hon. members before he undertakes to rise in his place and introduce a new version of what has been said. What I said this afternoon is a matter of record. It was that up to the time this matter became the subject of newspaper speculation it had not been discussed with officials; it had not been a matter of discussion within the government. There was no decision and no possibility of a decision on any rate of reduction. The decision of the government was taken subsequently.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, in that case would the minister care to comment on the report that this action, both with relation to clause 1 and clause 2, was forced upon the government by the automobile manufacturers in their dismissal of some 16,000 men immediately preceding his announcement and the vast newspaper publicity that somebody or other, heaven only seems to know who, was responsible for, and that these two factors combined were weighty enough to force the hand of the government and that, regardless of the economic soundness of it, they decided that they had to do it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the hand of the government was not forced by the manufacturers. The government took this decision in the light of all the circumstances and nobody forced the hand of the government.

My hon. friend, continuing the inaccuracies that he has been uttering, says that 16,000 employees of the automobile industry were dismissed. They were not dismissed. In the face of the results of the speculation that appeared a week ago Thursday in the newspapers there were some layoffs. Fortunately, those layoffs were very temporary, in most cases two days or, I think, at the very most, three days.

Mr. Regier: They were effective, though.

Mr. McCullough: Just one question; can the minister say whether or not 1957 model cars will be included in clause 2 of this bill?

Mr. Fleming: Any car that comes within the scope of the act will be subject to it. It is not a question of the model of the car; it is a question of the sale by the manufacturer, whether it is a 1957 or a 1958 model. In the case of the dealer who has on his lot or in his dealer's rooms cars on which he has paid the tax and which have not been sold, then if they are new cars he will be eligible to apply for the remission of the tax.

Mr. Aiken: I do not like to hold this up for long but I am one of those backbenchers who have just been referred to as trained seals.

Mr. Lesage: You will get used to it.

Mr. Aiken: I have sat here for a few minutes listening and I have never heard such a lot of nonsense as has come from the corner over there.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is the hon. member going to talk about Bill No. 231?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The point on which I wish to make a comment is this. There has been a suggestion that because the government has reduced the tax the people of Canada are too stupid to take advantage of it. The arguments that have been put forward are that the people will be taken in by the dealers. I think everyone knows there has been a reduction in the tax and if they are prepared to pay the same old price they paid before, then they are not being very bright. If the hon. members who spoke on that point talked to the dealers as much as they talk in the house they should not be taken in.

Mr. McCullough: I have one short statement. I wish to say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat that he certainly has shown quite a considerable amount of ignorance in respect of the retail sale of cars in this country.

Mr. Montgomery: Shame on you.

Mr. McCullough: In the first place he should know, as the Minister of Finance well knows, that there is a suggested price at which the dealer offers cars to the public. I want to say that there probably is no consumer in Canada who goes to buy a new car knowing the wholesale cost of that car. He knows the suggested price, but the relationship between that price and what the prospective customer pays for a new car is between him and the dealer. If there is a trade-in there is negotiation on the price of the trade-in and the price of the new car, and a deal is made between the prospective customer and the dealer. I want to say that we on this side of the house have been trying to find out by what mechanism the Minister of Finance is going to carry out the assurance he gave the public this afternoon, to which the hon. member for Dauphin and myself listened carefully, namely that the government would see that the consumer would benefit from this tax reduction.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Next sitting.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Nobody suffers as a result of laying it over for another day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Lesage: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fleming: I do not think any is required.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I am really sorry that the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) is prevented from participating in this debate because of acute laryngitis.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah.

Mr. Lesage: I am sure that the only people who are happy about this are the Tories, and especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). We are all disappointed, and everybody in this house should be disappointed. Certainly, sir, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano is disappointed. I shall try not to add too much to his disappointment because of my performance. The hon. member has been sitting in this house since eleven o'clock this morning,—I know he must have been suffering the tortures of death because he could not even make an interjection.

I was surprised that the minister did not make a statement on second reading. I was sure, knowing him pretty well, that he would take advantage of the occasion to boast about the great reductions in taxes he is offering the people of Canada through this bill. I was sure he would like to compare the promises that he and his colleagues of the Conservative party, especially his leader, had made during the last campaign about the famous reductions they were going to make in income taxes with the little things that he is offering the people of Canada at this time. Of course, I can understand why he would rather remain seated. He must feel like the elephant who has just given birth to a mouse. In his place I would remain seated.

An hon. Member: Is that the best you can do?

Mr. MacDonald (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is second hand.

Mr. Lesage: I never heard the hon. member, who is a parliamentary assistant, say anything that was not third hand. I shall use another phrase that is second hand. It was used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he said that this government and the Minister of Finance have a queer way of doing business. We did see some of the consequences of this queer way of doing business this afternoon and tonight on the other bill which has just been reported by the committee of the whole.

When we have a normal budget presentation we have a general debate in which it is possible to have a view of the over-all economic and financial situation in Canada. Hon. members from all parts of the country take part in the debate and we can ascertain the reactions of the country as a whole to the budgetary situation. It has happened often in the past that a Minister of Finance, with the consent of his government, has amended the resolutions he was proposing for tax changes after that general debate. Then in the normal course after the general debate we have a discussion of the resolutions in committee of ways and means. Again, this is very useful. This procedure offers an opportunity for more technical discussion, and it has happened that the bills that have been prepared have been changed by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues following the discussion that has taken place in the committee of ways and means.

There are very good reasons for following that procedure which has been followed every time in this house according to our practice. It is a useful procedure, not only for the various reasons I have just given, but for other reasons. We have these income tax proposals before us, and yet only four members of the house have participated in any kind of budget debate which occurred on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Finance. This debate will continue later, but what purpose will be served by that? These bills will have been passed. Only four members have participated in the general debate, so it will not be possible to secure from every corner of the house the reactions to the proposals of the minister. Again, I say this is a queer way of doing business, and it has led to some misunderstanding of the proposals the minister has made for tax cuts.

Previous ministers of finance made arrangements for the press to know in advance, but in secret, what the provisions of the budget were before they were announced in the house. This time the minister did not choose to make any arrangement of that kind. In the past ministers of finance had the courtesy to send copies of their speeches, when the speech was being delivered, to the leader of the official opposition and the leaders of the other parties. This time the minister did not extend such courtesy to the leaders of the various parties in the house, not even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent). This new way of doing business, this new method, has caused some misunderstanding. Even a good Tory paper like the Ottawa Journal could not understand the proposals made by the minister on Friday of last week. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of December 7:

> All businesses showing more than $25,000 profit will have their taxes reduced by $1,350. All under $25,000 will be exempt.

Note that "will be exempt".

> The previous minimum was $20,000.

This goes to show how wrong the approach of the Minister of Finance has been to the whole process, and how queer his way of dealing with budgetary matters is.

I believe that it is only fair now to study the amendments that are proposed in this bill in the light of the promises that were made by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign and even prior to that time. During the last election campaign and prior to that time the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister were all the time making the declaration that the previous government was overtaxing the people of Canada at the rate of half a billion dollars or $500 million. If there was overtaxation of $500 million, how is it that the tax reductions proposed for this year amount to the sum of $26 million only, 1/20 of the supposed overtaxation of the previous government?

Mr. Fleming: Would it not be fair to state the annual rate?

Mr. Lesage: Here is what the Halifax Chronicle Herald had to say about the matter, always comparing the action with the promises that were made. I quote from the editorial in the Halifax Chronicle Herald of December 9:

> The tax reductions which Canadians had been led to expect from the new federal administration have turned out to be little more than a nibble.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not even a mouse.

Mr. Lesage: No; not even a mouse. I mentioned a mouse a moment ago. This editorial is entitled, "Mr. Fleming's Nibble". The reduction can be expressed in terms of money—

Mr. Thrasher: Tell us what you did in 1956.

Mr. Lesage: I am not talking about what we did. What the previous government did—

An hon. Member: Was nothing.

Mr. Lesage: —was not as a result of any promise it had made; it was as a result of sound administration of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Lesage: What we did, we did because in our conscience, as administrators of the country responsible to the people of Canada, we believed that we were obliged to present the budget that we did present last spring. This administration said over and over again during the budget debate last year, in previous budget debates and during the election campaign that we were overtaxing the people. We have not said that; they have said that. Those who are now hollering must be the first ones who said in their own constituencies we were overtaxing by half a billion dollars a year.

An hon. Member: Weren't you?

Mr. Lesage: You made that promise and how far do you go to make it good? You go to the extent of 1/20 or $26 million reduction in taxes. To give an example of the importance of this $26 million reduction in taxation, I will use a device that was used by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) last spring when the old age security payments were increased by $6 a month. He never mentioned that this increase would cost the treasury $60 million a year; he just said that it meant two cups of coffee a day.

Mr. Hodgson: Sure.

Mr. Lesage: Sure; it meant only two cups of coffee a day. Tax cuts of $26 million to 16 million Canadians for the period from June 21, 1957 to March 31, 1958 work out to $1.60 per capita or a cup of coffee every 18 days. A cup of coffee every 18 days is a long way from $500 million reductions that were supposed to be made by the present administration. The Prime Minister during the election campaign repeatedly asserted that every Canadian family was overtaxed by a sum of $120 a year.

An hon. Member: By a Liberal government.

Mr. Lesage: Here is the gospel, and believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is a Conservative gospel.

An hon. Member: Liberal propaganda.

Mr. Lesage: It has turned a nice red colour, to the Liberals use and advantage and I am afraid that my friends will take note of that in the near future. As reported in the Vancouver Sun—

An hon. Member: You never read a better book.

Mr. Lesage: We all have one.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman predicting an election now?

Mr. Lesage: No. I have been listening to your predictions. As reported in the Vancouver Sun of May 23, 1957, the Prime Minister at Courtenay, British Columbia, on May 22, said this:

Every Canadian man, woman and child had their pockets picked by $30.

An hon. Member: A month?

Mr. Lesage: By $30 a year. Not only does the present Prime Minister's government continue picking the pockets of the 16 million people of Canada of $30 a year, according to his own words, but of course he consoles them by giving them a cup of coffee every 18 days.

Mr. Small: A wonderful analysis.

Mr. Lesage: It is an analysis that I have taken from the hon. member for York West of whom I am sure my hon. friend is extremely proud and I am sure he could not find words of praise high enough for him. I am just following his trend of thought.

An hon. Member: You will learn.

Mr. Lesage: I have learned. You will learn too.

May I deal more especially for a few moments with the personal income tax and remind my Tory friends opposite of a few promises.

Mr. Marler: Not all of them.

Mr. Lesage: No; only a few. It would take days to recall all of them. In 1949 the Tory platform was to raise the basic exemption from $1,000 to $1,250 and from $1,500 to $2,500. In 1953 they raised the ante—I believe that is the word you use—and then the proposition was to raise the basic exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 and from $1,500 to $3,000.

An hon. Member: What year was that?

Mr. Lesage: Or from $2,000 to $3,000. It is all right.

Mr. Marler: It was not carried out in one case any more than in the other.

Mr. Lesage: There is no proposal for a change in basic exemptions this time. After the ruling that we had this afternoon, I do not know how many private members will move amendments to this bill and of what nature they will be. But again the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Fleming: You will not support them, whatever they are.

Mr. Lesage: The minister can see what kind of bed he has prepared for himself. He will not be able to sleep because he will be kept awake by the difficulties.

An hon. Member: He works so hard he has no time to sleep.

Mr. Fleming: As long as I have my hon. friend's support in the votes I am not going to lose any sleep.

Mr. Lesage: There is nothing in the bill to raise the basic exemptions.

An hon. Member: Move an amendment.

Mr. Lesage: Well, sir, there is one thing I want to say—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are going to say something now.

Mr. Lesage: I am not like the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) who usually aligns his words to say nothing. There is one thing I want to say and I am sure I am going to get applause from the other side. I am sure the $100 increase in the exemption for children is most welcome. But, sir, may I say again that that is not where help is most needed so far as children are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Lesage: What is most needed for children is an increase in the family allowance because families who are too poor, who do not earn enough to pay income tax, would benefit also.

Mr. Brooks: Did they need it last spring?

Mr. Lesage: I can still hear the present Minister of Finance on February 18 of this year, with his great voice of the grand days, asking for the removal of the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses. Where is it in the bill? There is nothing about that. I read it again this afternoon and I can still hear him speaking with all his convictions and asking that in the list of exempt medical expenses there should be included spectacles, premiums for medical and hospital insurance and even provincial taxes paid for hospital insurance plans. But nothing is done in the bill either to remove the 3 per cent floor, according to the promise made, or to add to the list of things which should be included as deductible. The Minister of Finance complained in 1955—

Mr. Cardiff: Wind him up again, boys.

Mr. Lesage: Wind up the Minister of Finance? It does not take much. In 1955 the Minister of Finance said that the government of the day was abstracting—I like the word —almost half the profits of the corporations. Nothing is done in the bill to reduce the rate of income tax on corporations. There is only the increase from $20,000 to $25,000 with respect to the application of the lower rate but there is no reduction in the full rate about which the present Minister of Finance complained so bitterly. Nothing is done.

Now, let us go to the Prime Minister's promises.

An hon. Member: Get back to your gospel.

An hon. Member: Why don't you stay around and vote when there is an amendment?

An hon. Member: Why don't you shut up?

Mr. Hodgson: He stayed around; he was outside the curtains.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I cannot distinguish what member it is who is shouting all the time. I would certainly be glad if Your Honour would help me to identify him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet at the moment, and if the hon. member who is speaking will permit, may I say that I find it difficult to hear what is being shouted and I doubt whether hon. members can hear. There are so many engaged in this bypassing of the Chair that I feel rather isolated up here.

Mr. Fraser: It is very much like a television program. We cannot help but laugh.

Mr. Lesage: Well, sir, in Montreal on February 19, 1957, when speaking to the Montreal chamber of commerce, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had this to say about the alleged discrimination against Canadian companies under the Income Tax Act.

> Canadian companies are not asking for special advantages for foreign investment but have the right not to be discriminated against under Canadian taxation laws, which in several ways deny Canadian companies competition on equal terms with foreign corporations or their subsidiaries operating in Canada.
> The present tax laws in this country, which are restrictive when compared with the United States, the United Kingdom, France and other countries with which we must compete in world markets, prevent secondary industry in this country developing to the extent that our resources and ingenuity of the Canadian people warrant.

Where in this bill is there anything to take care of this alleged defect in our Income Tax Act? Nothing is done again. What about the other promise which was made with respect to oil taxation? On April 25, 1957, when speaking in Toronto the Prime Minister said:

> We believe that the discriminatory method of taxing Canadian oil companies should be changed so that Canadians are not at a disadvantage in competition with foreign investors.

There is nothing done in the bill to implement this promise of the Prime Minister. During his opening campaign speech at Massey Hall in Toronto he promised an incentive to Canadian investors. This was on April 25, 1957 and he said:

> We believe that there should be some incentive in the Income Tax Act for Canadians to invest in Canadian equity stocks.

This was promised so often by the Conservatives during the campaign. What is being done? Again nothing. On the same occasion, when opening his campaign at Massey Hall on April 25, the Prime Minister also promised tax deductions for research purposes. Here is what he said:

> We believe that tax deductions should be permitted in research in order to encourage Canadian research in every field.

But there is nothing in the bill. The Prime Minister also promised special tax inducements to firms to process raw materials in Canada. Here is what he said at Campbellton, New Brunswick, on May 4, 1957:

> And in order to persuade business firms that it is to their advantage to process our raw materials here in Canada, we must show them by tax and other inducements that they will save money by processing these materials here in Canada. And I say this to you that, if we form a government, we will introduce legislation which will provide such inducements for we intend to see that Canada shall become the great industrial nation which her raw materials make possible.

What do we have under this bill? Nothing. Nothing in the bill to meet these promises of the Prime Minister. Again, empty promises, unfulfilled promises; a government of words, of promises, of postponement.

Now, sir, we had a lot of promises. We had a promise that there would be an immedate session of parliament to reduce taxation. We had the promise of the Minister of Finance that there would be a budget.

Mr. Fleming: No such promise at all.

Mr. Lesage: We had that grave declaration by the Minister of Finance last June, and all that emerges in performance are the small changes in this bill regarding living costs to construction workers. By the way, if there is to be this change allowing a deduction with regard to construction workers' living expenses, why not do the same thing for our loggers, our wood cutters and our bush workers? Surely this would be only right if the government thinks it fair in the case of construction workers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lesage: Yes sir.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will he vote for an amendment to this effect if one is brought in.

Mr. Lesage: If the amendment is in order, and if it covers the bush workers and loggers to the same extent as it covers construction workers.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he take a few minutes out to explain why he and his colleagues are so sincere in voting for empty promises and empty legislation?

Mr. Lesage: When have we voted for empty promises? We voted for the very few things which have been done by this government which are of value; things which are only extensions of the measures which were brought forward under a Liberal government. There is nothing new in all that this government has done since it assumed office. It has only been carrying on an extension of the policies which have been put forward and initiated by the previous Liberal governments. Whenever they have a grave problem, whenever they have something important to cope with—such as unemployment or the rising prices—they have just sat there and done nothing. Whenever they have had to deal with other important problems they refer them to a royal commission. They do not take action themselves. As I said on the debate on the speech from the throne, they call conferences to prepare other conferences.

Mr. Hees: I can see Mike is going to have some competition.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) has always been one of my very good friends, and I thank him for that very high compliment he has just paid me, but I am too humble to accept it. I know too much my own value to accept it. But it is the compliment of a friend, and I appreciate it.

Mr. Stefura: Will the hon. member allow a question? He said that all the Conservative party is doing is carrying on the policies of the Liberals. But can he tell us what difference there is between Liberals and the Conservatives?

Mr. Lesage: Oh yes. Conservatism has always been based on the philosophy of privilege, while Liberalism has always been based on the philosophy of freedom, equality and unity.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize that the hon. member was speaking under the provocation of the question but he is wandering from the subject matter of this bill.

Mr. Lesage: Sir, I have to follow the wanderers over there, but unlike them I do not get lost.

The Canadian people have had their appetites whetted by so many election promises. They expected an immediate session of parliament to cut taxes by $30 per capita because the Prime Minister had said that the pockets of every citizen of Canada had been picked to the amount of $30 a year. What do we have? A figure of $26 million—$1.60 per year between June and March. This appetite which has been whetted by the Conservatives will not be satisfied with the present crumbs or the present nibble. Perhaps instead of saying crumbs and nibbles I should use the elegant statistical style employed by the hon. member for York West and say that the appetite of the Canadian voter will not be satisfied after he has been promised a cut of $500 million, with a cup of coffee every 18 days.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I think at this moment it is only right to turn to the memory of one of the patron saints of this house, Sir John A. Macdonald, to whom it always seems acceptable to refer, and to say that 103 years ago he began to forge the alliance of two parties known as the Liberal-Conservative party. And it seems to me that the speaker who has just sat down has fairly laid the background for a new alliance by proving there is little difference between the two. I wish to turn now to a point I first raised the other day, and one which has a specific connection with the bill now under discussion. I wish again to urge upon the government the desirability of extending these allowances beyond the construction workers to workers in the forestry industry.

The reasons why an extension has not been given to the forestry workers are not clear at the present time. It seems to me, looking at the matter from the outside, and not being able to understand the reasoning of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), that either there is too much revenue involved to enable this privilege to be extended to forestry workers; or that it would be too intricate and costly to check and document such an extension; or perhaps, and this is a more practical view, that there has not been strong enough pressure put forward by groups supporting the loggers and bush workers to make this matter become regarded as urgent.

Whatever may be the reason, the bush worker today is in an inferior position in relation to the railroad workers or, when this legislation comes into effect, the construction workers. The bush worker today must invariably provide himself wth a car and a power saw, the total cost of which is quite high. Moreover, today he operates within a framework which is strictly regulated by a union. The places where he can work are to a great extent fixed. There is no longer the situation in the logging industry, connected with the great and growing pulp and paper industry, which prevailed in the past; the bush worker is confined a great deal more to one area, and he no longer goes foot-loose from job to job.

The companies are not in a position—and this is understandable—to provide municipal facilities except in rare places where there might be an improvement district, though they locate their camps in places from which they plan to operate for many years.

The present state of the roads does not allow commuting between the communities and the actual bush operations except in extremely rare cases and so you have a situation where the very best of men in bush work, those who stay in the bush for a number of years, are penalized when it comes to having any family life. In addition to being penalized by having to have their families in town and having to educate their children away from where the parents are working they have no opportunity of taking advantage of the expense allowances that are extended to railway workers and now to construction workers.

It seems to me to be just a matter of fairness rather than a partisan attitude that the same privilege should be extended to bush workers. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) is going to refer to the situation as far as bush workers in the west are concerned but looking at the situation that prevails in Ontario and Quebec we can be sure that in the foreseeable future the bush workers will be in the invidious position of being unable to have their families with them where they work and having to keep their families in town. It is difficult to understand from the point of simple justice why they should not be granted the exemption that is now being extended to construction workers.

At the same time the point could be made that they should be allowed deductions for their expenses in connection with their power tools. A power saw does not represent a small expenditure and a conscientious bush worker spends a fair amount of money on the maintenance of his equipment during the year. Because of the services that have been extended in the bush camps in recent years it is quite easy to keep a record of the expenses in connection with the maintenance of power tools. In other words a bush worker could prove what he pays for a power saw and what he expends on repairs and new parts. There seems to be no valid reason why he should not be included in this exemption if it is being extended to other classes of workers. I am prepared to grant that the transportation costs of the bush worker in terms of travelling to visit his family would be practically impossible to keep track of fairly under the present circumstances because most of them have their own cars but the fact remains that the woods worker is in an inferior position in relation to the general railway and construction worker.

One other point in connection with income tax changes which I have always considered unjust relates to the fact that if I have a son going to university and I am paying part of his fees I can receive a deduction for those expenses—

Mr. Hansell: No you cannot.

Mr. Fisher: Yes, to a certain extent.

Mr. Hansell: No. I tried it.

Mr. Fisher: The point I wish to make is that if I decide to take a graduate course myself I am required to pay income tax on the money I spend in taking those courses because according to the theory of the department I am improving my ability to increase my income. That may be fine as a stand to be taken by the Department of National Revenue in approaching the problem but in so many cases you take courses that have no possible chance of improving your ability or opportunity to increase your income. It occurs to me that this is one section of the Income Tax Act in respect to which we could have looked forward to seeing some amendments made as well as an increase in the amount of money that may be earned by a dependant who attends university.

I wish now to deal with one other point touched upon by the previous speaker. Naturally I have looked at the speeches made by the present Minister of Finance in the past in relation to income tax matters. I am too frightened to quote them here for fear of being labeled absolutely or utterly incorrect and I do not wish to place myself in the position of having an accusation of that kind thrown at me. However, from my examination of his previous speeches on the subject it appears to me that the gist of several of his remarks in the past have been to the effect that deductions for medical expenses should be extended and that it is a pity that at the present time the allowance for drugs is extended only to five or six categories instead of to the whole field. Since these two points are known to have been close to the minister's heart, judging from his past comments, it occurred to me that he might have considered bringing in enabling legislation at this time but perhaps he is considering it for the future. We would certainly like to hear whether it is his plan to do this in the future.

With reference to the stand of organized labour in relation to the Income Tax Act I think it is worth while pointing out that while they looked forward to alleviations in terms of personal income tax exemptions the

In income taxation, 70 per cent of all income taxpayers will find their tax cuts quite considerable. Those in the first $1,000 bracket will have a tax cut of 15 per cent and those in the second $1,000 bracket will have a cut of 11 per cent.

brief presented by the Canadian Labour Congress stated that organized labour would like to have an increase in the basic taxation exemptions to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons. They would also like to see the exemptions for dependent children raised to $500 regardless of the family allowance. We readily concede that the minister has made a slight move in this direction but I thought it important to note that these are the requests of organized labour as contained in the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress.

In concluding my remarks I wish to return to the bush worker and to ask the minister and his assistants to give serious consideration to the question of extending the exemption to them or, failing that, to present a clear explanation as to why it is impossible to do so at the present time. I am not attempting to gain any advantage in asking this question and I would genuinely appreciate receiving some information which I could take back to these people who at the present time, especially in communities where railroad workers live adjacent to bush workers, the bush workers feel they are in an inferior position in relation to the other group in terms of this act.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this so-called budget has frequently been referred to as a small budget, a small mouse budget and a baby budget but after listening to the flaming fury and the pyrotechnics that occurred today I confess I am rather inclined to call it a flaming budget.

Mr. Hodgson: Did you see the red book?

Mr. Hahn: No, I did not see the red book but I was thinking of the hon. gentleman who introduced this bill. There are some significant features in the bill and I view each of them with considerable favour, I must admit. However, there are certain things the minister could very well have taken note of before he introduced this legislation in order to bring in some desirable changes.

The reduction of $100 for each dependant is very worth while indeed as is the reduction of the rate of taxation from 13 per cent to 11 per cent on the first $1,000 and from 15 per cent to 14 per cent on the next $1,000. However, I did note that in introducing the measure the minister said he recognized that every individual in Canada would not be affected by the changes in the act. It has been estimated that approximately 70 per cent of the population will be able to take advantage of the proposed changes. The Montreal Gazette of December 9 carried an editorial on the subject of tax changes which said in part:

I agree that this is a wonderful thing and highly desirable but I am interested in that 30 per cent of the population who pay no income tax and I would like to know exactly what benefit they will derive from this legislation. It is of no value whatsoever to the old age pensioner. It is of no value to the war veteran who is on an income of a fixed nature. It is of no particular value to the blind pensioner or the disability pensioner. It is also of no value in respect of anyone who is on a fixed income and has no means of getting any additional income, namely a person who receives an annuity or any other form of income of a like nature. I would say, sir, that these 30 per cent are possibly in the greatest need.

An hon. member just mentioned that we have increased the old age pension. That is quite true, but I do know the minister told us he was going to have a surplus of some $80 million. What is he going to do with the $80 million? He might as well pass that on and become a proper Santa Claus. This is Christmas time and it is the season when I am sure everyone would appreciate it.

The group in this country who require the greatest help and whose need is greatest are those who are not paying income tax. They are the ones who actually are in need of some assistance. There is absolutely nothing in this legislation which is of any particular value to them. I would say that the minister would have done the country a great deal more service if he had reduced the sales tax from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent. That reduction of 2½ per cent would mean a great deal more to the ordinary citizen of this country in this way. When I look at the budget, and I refer to the same one the minister is using in this instance, I find that on page 88 the sales tax collected in the country amounted to $725 million. That is the estimated tax for this year. Here again I am not too sure that that figure is the one that is to be used, because we have no budget to determine whether the minister has worked with a statement in respect of those figures, but I suppose we shall have to accept them.

Let us take this figure of $725 million. A reduction of 2½ per cent in the sales tax is a 25 per cent reduction. A 25 per cent reduction of $725 million is approximately $180 million. The minister announced that the total tax alleviation is $178 million. Give or take a couple of million and you have $180 million. Now, that $180 million, with the mark-up that the manufacturer gets on his commodity, plus what the distributor gets, plus what the wholesaler gets, plus what the retailer gets, will spiral the figure of $178 million to a total of $400 million or $420 million, as the case may be. That would be of a great deal more benefit to everybody in the country. Every man, woman or child would benefit from that particular change and it is the type of tax alleviation that the country requires, more so than this. I suppose if I had the gift of language that the Minister of Finance has I could find some adjective that would describe it better than a puny amount. But I am not as familiar with the language as is the minister. However, I would say, that this is the type of reduction the people of this country expect.

However, I recognize, as does every hon. member, that it is only by a direct change in taxation that the people become aware of the over-all picture. By changing the sales tax and bringing it down we would in effect also be reducing our cost of living by that same percentage, not possibly by the full 2½ per cent because I realize full well that all commodities are not subject to the sales tax. I know, in fact, that food does not come under the sales tax. It is a recognized fact that the people of this country have complained for the past several years about the increased cost of living. This suggested change might not be felt immediately but it would certainly be felt in the long run, and it would have a material effect upon the cost of living. The percentage cost which is published every so often would be materially reduced and instead of having $178 million left in the hands of the taxpayers in a year's time we would have a total of at least $400 million to $450 million, as the case may be.

That reduction in sales tax would have one other effect. The retail price being what it is, we would be able to take advantage of the reduction in the export of our goods by having our mark-up cost reduced by the 2½ per cent.

In British Columbia particularly we find ourselves in the position of having a surplus amount of lumber on our hands and we have difficulty in selling it. I am satisfied that if the lumber merchants of my province did not have to pay the full 10 per cent sales tax the effect might be such that they would not find it quite so difficult to get some of the foreign market.

Mr. Broome: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member not aware that export sales are not subject to sales tax?

Mr. Hahn: That is a very fine argument except that when we manufacture the lumber into furniture or some other commodity that we have to sell we do pay the sales tax on it.

[Mr. Hahn.]

If the sales tax were reduced it would make it possible for us to sell our manufactured products.

Mr. Broome: Not for export.

Mr. Hahn: It would reduce the price and assist our people. There are other products that go into the manufacture of commodities, the glue and all the other essentials that are required, and a reduction in the sales tax would make a difference.

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. members that we are dealing with the income tax bill and not with sales tax or excise tax bills. I really think it is out of order to suggest that the government should have included in this bill a sales tax remittance.

Mr. Hahn: I thank you, sir, for your ruling in that regard. I was using it as an example in trying to point out to the ministry how they might have saved the taxpayers the same amount of money, and it would have been a little more advantageous to the people and to the nation as a whole.

One of the other questions that is dealt with in this bill is the change in the corporation income tax to assist the small corporations. I fully agree with the ministry in this. For some years past I have been one who has been clamouring, I might say, for the government to give some alleviation and some assistance to the small corporations and business houses of the nation. I trust this will be of sufficient assistance to them to enable them to carry on an expansion program in the years to come to help them out.

Then, one other question is dealt with in this particular bill, namely the cost of living expenses of construction workers supporting dependants, which is to be allowed. I feel, as does the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), that this particular amendment should also be extended to include the loggers not just in my province or in his province but throughout the dominion. It is a fact that it is just as difficult for these people in the logging industry to carry on and get by. They have the same difficulty as construction workers and, in a sense, this might be termed as discriminatory in its nature. The same regulations and the same law should apply to each one in the various fields.

I refrain from making any further comments at this time, Mr. Speaker. I trust, though, the minister will in the future, in considering taxation, see what can be done to assist the taxpayers as a whole to a greater degree, as I said earlier, by introducing changes in the sales tax which I feel will assist the people of this nation more materially than the changes we have before us.

Mr. A. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I do have a few comments about the proposed changes in the Income Tax Act. I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage). While I cannot put too much stock in what we might have expected from a Liberal government had they continued in office I think that his criticisms were very cogent indeed. I do not know whether the smiles, the interjections and the concern exhibited by those on government benches when he was speaking were an indication that they realize just how serious the breach of faith with the Canadian people has been. Surely if there ever were income tax changes or a baby budget which could be characterized as one of great expectations and dashed hopes so far as the people of Canada are concerned, this is it.

The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet mentioned something which I recalled having happened during the campaign. He referred to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the effect that the pockets of every man, woman and child were being picked to the extent of $30. I recall, too, that the general impression throughout the country, as a result of Conservative electioneering, undoubtedly was that personal exemptions would be raised to $1,500 single and $3,000 married. That is what you have given out to the people of Canada.

Mr. Fleming: No, we did not.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): That is the impression they have had.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) at Gananoque on May 23.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): It is a great pleasure to be backstopped so thoroughly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Too often during election campaigns candidates and political leaders have given to the people of Canada words which promised much more than they actually contained. Sometimes they have proven themselves to be good lawyers by leaving themselves escape hatches. Perhaps that could be said as something that is true of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). There can be no doubt that during this campaign, and as a matter of fact continuing up to the time the Minister of Finance announced these changes, the people of Canada expected these personal exemptions to be raised, and their hopes have been dashed.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that these exemptions could have been raised. I believe that if the government will only reorganize the tax structure which has been set for so many years by Liberal governments and which could be expressed in the words, "taxation on the basis of the rich man's budget" and which could be characterized by the phrase "taxation policies where those who have too much pay too little and those who have too little pay too much", they would find that additional revenues are available. If the government would break away from that philosophy which is embodied in our taxation statutes they would find that additional revenues are available, not only to meet social security needs but to raise income tax exemptions.

I want to refer to some of the specific instances in the Income Tax Act where that could and should be done, and to methods whereby we could bring taxation in Canada back to a basis of fairness, equity and even-handedness, and where taxes would be really based on ability to pay. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact I was going on to three distinct proposals, may I call it ten o'clock and move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Marler: What will be the business of the house for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with the third reading of item No. 12 on today's order paper, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act; we will then continue with item No. 13, which is second reading of an act to amend the Income Tax Act; then take the resolution No. 16 on today's order paper concerning a measure to provide a loan to New Brunswick; then, item No. 11, an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act; then, item No. 21, which is the resolution concerning guaranteed prices for agricultural commodities.

Mr. Marler: Is it the intention to go on with the same program or so much of it as is unfinished on Saturday?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to say definitely this evening. We may go on with estimates on Saturday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—EXTENSION OF GOOD WISHES TO CANADIAN DELEGATES TO FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I take a moment or two at this time to express on behalf of all the members of the official opposition our good wishes to the Prime Minister and his colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence who, I believe, will be leaving early this evening to attend the extraordinary council meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Paris next week. I can assure the Prime Minister and his colleagues that these good wishes are very sincere and I have no doubt that they are shared by every member of this house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —regardless of party affiliations and generally by the people of Canada.

Of course these good wishes extend also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, I understand, had to leave a little earlier and who by this time has probably already reached his first destination.

Naturally these good wishes include the very hearty and confident hopes that the Prime Minister and the members of his party will have a comfortable and safe journey and will be back in our midst at the time fixed in their schedule. Those personal wishes come from the esteem and friendship which the members of this house have for the Prime Minister and his colleagues who will be representing Canada on this important occasion.

We all realize, of course, how important to the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is this special meeting and, as the Prime Minister reminded the house on Wednesday in the exchange of questions and answers recorded in Hansard of that day, the character of the meeting probably arises from the earlier meeting of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States a few weeks ago. The Prime Minister added:

> It also arises from the realization that the recent scientific advances on the part of the U.S.S.R. have called for an intensified examination of NATO and its principles, to the end that it may advance to the future stronger than ever before in its purposes and in its aims.

There are, no doubt, many difficult and complex problems which will be the object of consideration at this meeting. We understand the heads of the governments of most of the member countries will be present. I am not going to refer any more to these difficulties, because that would not serve any useful purpose at this time, but we have had an example of their number and complexity in these exchanges which have taken place from time to time in the House of Commons, and the Prime Minister said on Wednesday that as to the furtherance and extension of the application of article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty he felt he would be speaking with the approval of the members of the house.

I think I can say in a general but very sincere way that the Prime Minister may feel that he and his colleagues will have behind them the support of all the members of this house and of the public generally in their efforts to promote what has been the usual attitude of Canada as a middle power in its endeavours to smooth out the disagreements which are bound to arise from time to time between the leaders of countries engaged in a common pursuit, disagreements which are certainly overweighed by the general desire of all the members of the organization, their governments and peoples, to promote and try to secure peace in the world.

They will be doing this at a time when we are all reminded of the age-old promise of peace in the world to men of good will.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I join the Leader of the Opposition in expressing good wishes to the Prime Minister and the members of his party who are attending this very important conference in Paris. There are times when party differences are put aside and we can be unanimous in our good wishes, and this is especially so in connection with a conference of this nature.

I think in all probability this organization has never met with the eyes of so many people upon it as at the present time. I was very glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs say the other day that some way must be found of negotiating with those with whom we have been at variance over the years in order that the world may be protected from the threat of destruction which has been hanging over it for so long.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, I remember well, was first suggested at the United Nations by the Leader of the Opposition. I was a member of the Canadian delegation when that proposal was made at the United Nations assembly in 1946, and there is one feature of it which I hope the Prime Minister and his colleagues will stress, namely article 2, for economic co-operation. I believe more can be done to unite the western nations by article 2 than by any other means.

All we hope is that our delegation will be able to promote peace among the nations of the world, and I can assure the Prime Minister that we wish him and the delegation every success in the great undertaking in which they will be engaged next week. I know, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, that this feeling is shared not only by everyone in this House of Commons but by the people in every part of Canada.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will not require a multiplication of words to add my good wishes to the expressions of good will which the Prime Minister and his colleagues have received from all sides of the house on leaving to take part in this summit conference in Paris. I can only say that those speakers who have preceded me spoke words which are in my own heart and mind.

I should also like to say that the circumstances at this time are unusual. These are dangerous times, and it seems to me they will require an unusual amount of co-operation among the nations which are now called the free nations of the world. If this NATO meeting can result in an extension of the application of article 2 in such a manner as to bring about this unusual measure of co-operation, I think we can see some life at the other end of the tunnel. I believe representatives of the nations attending this meeting must go to unusual lengths in seeking ways of removing fear, because I believe that today fear is the greatest cause of world tension.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I believe the place to start is with ourselves and the way we work with other nations and treat other nations. I also believe that there is more reason today to play the game with the utmost honesty, in the first place, than ever before and if our delegation can give leadership at the NATO conference in that respect and on a high moral plane I am satisfied the results will be good. Our best wishes go with them.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need not say how deeply grateful I am to have the expression of the viewpoint of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. This is one of those times when in a spirit of unity the House of Commons demonstrates the true relationship between members of various political parties that is of the essence of parliamentary government and the preservation of freedom as we see it. Indeed, what has been said here this morning is indicative of the strength of our system, which permits strong and definite opinions being expressed regarding those matters which separate us while at the same time maintaining not only the amenities but the friendships that exist among those who although they represent different viewpoints are united in their common dedication to the worth-while things of life.

As I speak for my colleagues and myself, may I say how much what has been said here today will mean to us in the days that are ahead as we meet with the representatives of the other 14 countries composing NATO, not in an aggressive attitude, not in a belligerent attitude, but in a realization that only in the maintenance of our undivided unity and in dissolving those things that separate us from time to time will freedom truly be preserved.

When reference was made to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition first raised this question of unity in the free world it brought to me a feeling of pride as a Canadian that the idea and concept should have been first introduced at an international meeting by one of those within this parliament who still occupies a high position in the deliberations of our country. There is no one, I am sure, who realizes more than I that in recent months, indeed in the last year and a half or two years, certain profound differences have arisen among members of NATO.

There is nothing unhealthy or abnormal in that fact. Communist countries are able to deny the beneficial effect of criticism or disagreement. We know there have been difficulties and disagreements, and my hope is that this conference, playing as it does an important role in providing a forum for consultation, will achieve that unity of purpose to which I have already alluded, that rededication to principles upon which NATO had its beginnings, the redeclaration of its aims and purposes, so that we shall be able among the forces of freedom to advance into the sombre days of the future once again realizing that we have established a unity beneficial to the maintenance of peace. Indeed, without it peace cannot be assured.

We should not exaggerate our difficulties nor our problems. That we can meet at this time and that the heads of the various states will be able to meet indicates that the alliance retains its basic strength and vitality, that its principles still retain a basic similarity of point of view.

There is one thing that I think we must make clear, and that has been made clear this morning. NATO has no aggressive purpose. Mention was made of the need to dissipate fear in the world as a major element in preserving peace. At this meeting I hope it will again be made abundantly clear that this is a defence alliance; that the basic purpose of NATO is to deter aggression and to preserve peace. That is the attitude of this parliament as I see it today.

A prime minister's responsibility, and the responsibility of those associated with him, must always be so to speak as to convey to other nations what has been the traditional position of Canada, a middle power exerting its influence, as the Leader of the Opposition said, among other nations joined with us who have their disagreements—disagreements which are natural—and do those things which we believe are necessary.

My hope is that out of this NATO meeting will come that new spirit which is expected not only by the peoples of the free world, but also by men and women of good will everywhere. Our purpose will be to make the contribution, however small, that is available to us to bring about the achievement of what the Leader of the Opposition said, peace on earth to men of good will.

INDONESIA—STATEMENT AS TO POSITION OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As numbers of relatives of Canadians in Indonesia have been endeavouring through this department to secure information with regard to their relatives located there, I feel that a statement at this time might clarify the situation.

The information received from our various diplomatic missions abroad indicates that the position of Dutch nationals and Dutch interests in Indonesia has not yet been clarified, although it is evident that many Dutch nationals resident in Indonesia are being encouraged to leave. Our embassy in Djakarta has reported that there is no immediate threat to non-Dutch nationals or interests, as armed security enforcement by the Indonesian army remains reasonably good. One hundred and thirteen Canadians are registered with our embassy in Djakarta as residents of Indonesia. About 30 of these are with the United States oil companies in Sumatra, 30 with the embassy, Colombo plan and other foreign aid dispensing agencies, and the remainder are mostly missionaries. I should like to repeat that no measures have been taken against Canadian nationals and no evacuation of Canadians is now contemplated. However, if evacuation becomes necessary, emergency procedures to achieve this end have already been planned.

NATO—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF NEUTRAL ZONE FOR ATOMIC WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am going to try to put the question in such a way as not to embarrass him, and he will understand that I am not trying to embarrass him in any way. I will put it this way. May I hope that the Prime Minister and his delegation will give sympathetic consideration to the proposal for the establishment of a neutral zone, particularly for atomic weapons, as suggested by two countries, I believe, namely Poland and Czechoslovakia and which is somewhat in line with the proposal made by Sir Anthony Eden in 1955. May I express the hope that sympathetic consideration will be given to that matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the Canadian delegation will be to give the fullest consideration to every proposal which is made and which has as its purpose the amelioration of the present tensions. The suggestion of my hon. friend will certainly receive that sympathetic consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he inform us as to the negotiations respecting Britannia mines?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman is able to ask this question. A meeting was held yesterday of representatives of the company from New York, representatives of the men, the minister of mines of British Columbia, my colleague the Minister of Public Works and myself. It was a valuable and helpful meeting. Certain understandings in principle were arrived at which involve the various representatives reporting back to those to whom they are responsible. I hope to be able to make a fuller and perhaps a final statement on Monday or Tuesday.

AGRICULTURE

NORTHERN ALBERTA—STATEMENT ON INVESTIGATION INTO HARVEST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. member for Peace River asked for a report on the progress of P.F.A. inspections in the Peace river area, where disastrous crop conditions exist. Yesterday he asked the Prime Minister whether the government would make a full investigation. I think I should point out that the investigation currently being carried on, as will become clear when I make this statement, is perhaps as thorough an investigation into what the crop conditions are as could possibly be made.

Inspections are being carried out in the Peace river country and Athabasca districts of Alberta as speedily as possible, but the work is being delayed by extremely bad weather. In the Peace river area on December 9 there were 25 field inspectors working, and supervisory officers were contacting as many other qualified men as are available with a view to getting the inspection work completed in as short a time as possible. I might say we hope to have 50 men at work as soon as they can be secured, given their training and put into the field.

Checking offices have been opened at Sexsmith and Falher, and clerks have been hired to help process returns as they come in. A third office may be opened in the town of Peace River. It has been reported that four inches of snow and rain fell on December 8 and that road conditions are extremely bad, which is delaying the work. In several districts the inspectors can get around only on horseback.

Because of the bad weather and the inability of the field inspectors to report promptly, it is not possible to say how much of the work has been done to date. However, a close check is being kept and the supervisory officials who have been sent to the area are doing all they can to avoid any delays.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The hon. member for Athabasca said to me yesterday that the same conditions prevail there as in the Peace river country. I promised him that I would investigate that matter, and I have a report on it. In the Athabasca district about 70 townships have been applied for, and inspections are almost completed. While harvesting has been delayed in some parts by the weather, the situation does not compare with that in Peace river. There appears to be a problem in about ten townships, and the municipality of St. Paul has asked to meet with the district supervisor. A meeting has been arranged for December 16.

It appears that in this district, as in several others, there are some unthreshed crops that are salvageable; that is, it will be possible to thresh them this winter or in the spring. In such cases the inspection work will not be undertaken until harvesting is completed. In most of the Peace river area the unthreshed crops remaining in the fields are definitely not salvageable.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY REGULATION TO COVER PACIFIC COAST FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice until after coming into the house. Has the Minister of Labour received a further request on behalf of the salmon gill net and seine fishermen of British Columbia who are faced with a problem in connection with unemployment insurance because they have fewer than 15 contributions? If so, can he tell the house what steps are being taken by him or by the unemployment insurance commission to deal with the serious problem being faced by these fishermen?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question I wish to say that I have received representations from the united fishermen and allied workers' union in British Columbia as well as other representations with regard to relaxing the seasonal provisions of the unemployment insurance regulations further so that fishermen with fewer than 15 stamps might receive seasonal benefits.

This matter has been given very careful study with my officials, and the decision is that I do not feel a further relaxation of these provisions would be in order at this time. I am sure it will be appreciated that a relaxation of the requirements on behalf of one particular group would soon result in demands from other groups and individuals for a similar relaxation. To meet this demand would entail a further revision of the seasonal benefit regulations which have just recently been revised to provide a longer benefit season. Thus I am afraid I cannot see my way clear to recommend the further relaxation which has been requested in this case.

SHIPPING

C.G.S. "LABRADOR"—INQUIRY AS TO BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. Can the minister advise whether the Labrador will continue to be based in Halifax after completion of icebreaking duties in the St. Lawrence?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. The Labrador has been based in Halifax for quite some time and it is not the intention of the government to change these arrangements.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether tenders were called in connection with the refitting of the H.M.C.S. Labrador?

Mr. Hees: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I could not hear the hon. member's question. Would he speak a little louder?

Mr. Cardin: I was asking whether the minister could tell the house whether tenders were called for the refitting of the Labrador.

Mr. Hees: The work being done on the Labrador at the present time is under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. Perhaps the question could more appropriately be directed to my colleague.

Mr. Cardin: May I redirect my question to the Minister of National Defence.

An hon. Member: Pass the buck.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I could not say offhand whether or not tenders were called. If tenders were called they would be placed with the Minister of Defence Production.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh.

Mr. Cardin: May I ask the Minister of Defence Production whether tenders were called for the refitting of the Labrador?

An hon. Member: Who is next?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I thought that was coming. Unfortunately I cannot pass the question any further along the line. I shall have to make inquiries and let the hon. member have an answer in a day or two.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILES—STATEMENT ON EXPORTS TO ASIAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex West asked this question:

> Is there any prohibition on the export from Canada of automobiles of Canadian manufacture to communist China or to other Asian countries?

The answer is this. All shipments to communist China require an export permit. In the case of Canadian built passenger cars permits are granted, and hon. members may be interested to know that to date this year three automobiles have been exported to communist China. Permits are also required for Hong Kong, Macao, Outer Mongolia, North Korea, Sinkiang, Tibet and Indo-China.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): I have a supplementary question. Do I understand that three automobiles were exported to communist China?

Mr. Macdonnell: That is the answer.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Would export permits be granted for any number of automobiles that may be required by communist China from Canada?

Mr. Macdonnell: From the answer furnished me I cannot see that there would be any limit on the number. It says "All shipments to communist China require an export permit". An export permit is required, and that is the only requirement.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I have a further supplementary question. Is any consent of the government of the United States required for the export of automobiles from Canada to communist China?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell: I cannot believe that that is so, but in order to give a final positive answer I think I should take this as notice.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Under the existing Canadian-American defence agreements, could a United States company prevent one of its Canadian subsidiaries from accepting orders for non-strategic materials—for example, automobiles—from the republic of China? I hope the minister will take this question as notice.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will take that as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTED STATEMENT BY CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER TO UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Might I ask him whether the high commissioner of Canada to the United Kingdom was expressing government policy when he said this, according to this morning's Globe and Mail:

The things we have are needed for industrial production in the United Kingdom . . . Our raw materials are waiting to be taken and used.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the item. I intend to make no observation on an excerpt appearing in the press.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REPORTED REFUSAL OF OFFICERS TO WORK SHIPS —RESUMPTION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I asked the minister if he would give the house a statement with regard to the condition that now exists on the C.N.S. ships. His answer to me was in these words:

It—

That is the newspaper.

—stated that those officers were quite willing to sail under foreign registry.

I should like to suggest to the minister that just repeating what a newspaper had said is not a responsible statement to be made to this house. May I ask the minister if he would make a further investigation into this serious problem and give a statement to the house on his own responsibility as to the condition and the safety of these ships as they exist today. Maybe he is not prepared to give a statement today. Perhaps he would prefer to give it tomorrow or Monday, but I think we should have an up to date statement with regard to these ships. I wonder whether he would be good enough to do that.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The question asked by the hon. member yesterday was with regard to a statement which appeared in the press to the effect that officers manning these eight ships were not willing to sail under foreign registry.

My answer was that following the article to which he referred a further article—and as I said yesterday I believe it was a Canadian Press dispatch of the following morning—corrected the article to which he was referring and said that, contrary to the previous article, I believe all 65 officers on these eight ships had stated they were willing to sail under foreign registry. Seven of them, however, said that although they were willing to sail under foreign registry they would prefer to sail under Canadian registry.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, I had answered the hon. member's question in full. If he wants a further statement I will be glad to give it to him at this time. The eight ships are in Halifax harbour. The officers are on the ships; the ships are in good condition. I am afraid I can give the hon. member no information other than that.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I would like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Would he give the house the answer to the all-important question, which is, when will the service between Canada and the West Indies be restored?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier asked that same question yesterday. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare was in the house, and he heard my answer. It is the same today. I do not know.

Mr. Kirk: You still do not know?

Mr. Hees: That is right.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PRIMARY USE OF DAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or the acting minister, notice of which has been given. In connection with the South Saskatchewan river dam project, has the government given consideration as to whether the dam is to be primarily for the storage of water for irrigation purposes or for the generation of electric power, or for both purposes?

If so, what tentative or final decision has been reached with the government of Saskatchewan with respect to the use or uses of this project?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question should have been addressed to the Minister of Agriculture, who answers for the South Saskatchewan dam, so I shall answer it in that capacity. In connection with the first part, it has always been known that the dam was for irrigation and power purposes. The project has always been discussed from those two points of view. It is perhaps primarily for irrigation purposes, but the power feature also was important.

As to what tentative or final decision has been reached with the government of Saskatchewan, negotiations are still going on with that government in regard to the matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Minister of Agriculture another question with regard to the same matter. The statement has been made that this is primarily a dam and reservoir built for the purpose of providing irrigation. It has never been understood to be that. As a matter of fact it has been said many times that no one would build that dam for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation only; it would be too expensive. I would just like to ask the minister if he would not agree that the greatest possible use to which this dam could be put would be to supply water to an area that is at present the driest section of the drought area of western Canada, it being in the middle of that area. The supplying of water for—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: —other purposes, that is to say for farming, community and industrial purposes is most important, and not primarily irrigation.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not really understand why the hon. gentleman rose. I have stated in answer to the question I was asked that this dam was built for both irrigation—which was what I was asked—and for power purposes. Of course everybody understands and has known that in addition to the irrigation benefits which will come from the project, the fact that this large body of water will be collected as a result of the building of the dam or reservoir is going to raise the water table. The whole project will naturally have many beneficial results, merely from the fact that this large body of water has been brought into existence.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend suggests that he does not know why I rose. I rose because he had, in addition to giving an answer to the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I am explaining why I stood up at the time.

An hon. Member: We are not interested.

Mr. Gardiner: —in addition to giving that answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the right hon. gentleman proposes to ask another question—

Mr. Gardiner: No, I am not asking another question. This is a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question of privilege involved.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a question of privilege, when it is stated that I did so and so and I am suggesting I did not.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I do not agree with the right hon. gentleman.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT OF IMPOSITION OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Would the government give consideration to making a proper survey of the effect on our Canadian economy of proposed tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway? I ask this question having in mind that the tolls set should have no discriminatory effect against Canada or any industry in Canada.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will take that question as notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader whether it would be possible, either now or during the debate on the Beechwood resolution, to have answers given to starred question No. 45, which I put on the order paper in the hope of having answers before that debate took place.

Mr. Speaker: This is the question that relates to the Beechwood project?

Mr. Pickersgill: And other matters, sir, which while they do pertain to that motion are perhaps not strictly relevant.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. I have been considering that question following the ruling I made about the first two items in the question relating to Beechwood being out of order. The remainder of the question appeared to be in order, and is it to that part of the question which the hon. member directs his question?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is that part of the question to which I have directed my question to the house leader.

Mr. Speaker: To make it clear, I consider that items 1 and 2 of the question are out of order because they relate to the Beechwood project, which is on the order paper and shortly to be discussed. The remainder of the question referred to other matters and I see no objection to its being dealt with if the hon. minister wishes to do so.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): We will look into the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate that very much.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in continuation of the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I wonder if starred question No. 48 could be answered today. Evidently an answer was ready last Wednesday but through some inadvertence it was not delivered.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I think I can get even here. This is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: He denied it yesterday.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my department has advised me that since there are replies due from several departments with regard to this question, the Secretary of State is collecting these answers and will deal with the matter. I may be wrong, but that is what my departmental officials advise me.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter.

PENSIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister yet ascertained whether he has received the letter to which I made reference yesterday and which was written to him on November 15 by the Canadian National Railways veterans association at Vancouver, urging an increase in the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees? If the minister has not received the letter, may I have the privilege of sending over to him a copy of the letter which was sent to me, together with a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Donald Gordon, so the minister can study this important question?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will be very glad to receive it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 231, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from December 12, 1957, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming for the second reading of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Alex. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of this debate last night I was pointing out that the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act still leave that act as one which taxes some of those who should not be taxed and fails to tax some of those who should be taxed, with the result that we do not have sufficient revenue to provide sound taxation policies which would be fair to all people in Canada.

In particular, the amendments fail to do enough in the way of exemptions for children. Naturally I welcome the extension of the exemption in the case of dependent children from $150 to $250, but I think hon. members will agree that this is not nearly enough in view of the cost of living and, in particular, the cost of raising a child in the world today. I agree, too—and I think this statement was made by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) last night—that the better course to pursue would undoubtedly be to improve family allowances. I say that partly because we know that increasing income tax exemptions in respect of dependent children does not help those many Canadians who do not pay income tax at all. I say it also because too often in my law practice I have had experience with cases where it was most important that something be given to the mother in the family, as is the family allowance, rather than to the father because in broken homes or nearly broken homes, due to alcoholism or some other factor, the breadwinner was not capable of looking after his own family. The principle adopted under the family allowance regulations of sending the cheque directly to the mother is a beneficent one, and I regret that the government has not seen fit to improve family allowance at the present time.

In addition, of course, the present act, as I pointed out last night, does not begin to meet the legitimate expectations of the Canadian people for an increase in the amount of personal exemptions.

What are the proposals I have to make with a view to alternative revenues; because if we are going to increase personal exemptions and give a better break to the children of Canada, to give every one of them an equal chance of recreation, health, housing and educational advantages, where are we to find the alternative revenues? I wish to draw attention to three cases where we are failing to tax those who should be taxed, cases where special privilege is still enshrined as a principle in our income tax legislation.

The first I will deal with briefly, because it has already been dealt with in this house; that is, the iniquitous 2 per cent tax for the old age security fund. That 2 per cent, as hon. members of this house know, applies only upon the first $3,000 of taxable income; so the situation arises—and I say it is an iniquitous situation—where a man with $3,000 of taxable income pays $60; a man with $30,000 of taxable income pays the same sum, $60, and a man with $300,000 of taxable income still pays $60 only.

This is special privilege with a vengeance, and it is also poor husbandry on the part of the government, because there is an additional source of revenue were that 2 per cent not only to be extended throughout all income tax brackets but graduated, as it should be, to fall more heavily on large incomes.

The next example I wish to refer to is the privilege—I call it the special privilege—conferred under section 38 of the Income Tax Act; that is, the privilege of deducting from taxation 20 per cent of all dividends received from Canadian companies. This situation, grotesque in terms of fair taxation, was presented to the house by the hon. member for Nanaimo speaking on March 12 of this year, and I want to give the house again the example he then presented to the former minister of finance. I am referring to page 2471 of Hansard for 1957.

Here, as the hon. member pointed out, you can consider two cases, each concerning married men with no children. Each has a gross income of $11,133. In the case of the man who gets that $11,133 in dividends from Canadian companies, his income tax would be $1,877.24 before the rebate is given, plus a surtax of 4 per cent on investment income over $2,400, or $349, making the total tax $2,226.56. That man would get a tax credit of 20 per cent of $11,133, his gross income, which would amount to $2,226.60.

In the case of this unearned income, that special credit under section 38 entirely wipes out his tax and $60 only is paid into the old age security fund. In the case of the man who earns the income, he pays his full tax of $1,877.24.

With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is discrimination which still exists in our income tax legislation. It is a case where we are extending favours to income that comes from owning, not doing. We are extending a special favour to income that is begotten by wealth, not service, when in all fairness and simple justice it should of course be the other way around.

The next section to which I wish to turn for my third point is section 8, subsection 1 of the Income Tax Act. The general section provides that any income conferred upon a shareholder of a corporation is of course taxable, but the exception is this. Any advantage of benefit conferred on a shareholder is not taxable when it confers "on all holders of common shares in the capital of the corporation a right to buy additional common shares therein."

What are some of the consequences that flow from those very few words? Already in this session of parliament we have given attention to two bills, one to increase the capitalization of the British Columbia Telephone Company from $75 million to $150 million and the other the Bell Telephone Company bill. I am referring to these merely as examples of the millions of dollars which go completely untaxed in this country because of that particular little section. In the case of the British Columbia Telephone Company the spokesman for that company stated quite frankly in committee that their increased capitalization would be issued in the form of share rights. They said they had always followed that procedure, and with the approval of the board of transport commissioners they intended to follow it in the future. In other words they will grant to their existing shareholders the right to purchase the new stock issued at six or eight points below the market, as the spokesman said. In the case of the Bell Telephone Company the increased capitalization—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that I follow the connection of the hon. member's remarks with the bill before the house. This is an act to amend the Income Tax Act and it is relevant, as I understand the precedents, to discuss the sections of the Income Tax Act which are to be amended by this bill but not to review the act as a whole. I have allowed a certain amount of general discussion of taxation policies, but it seems to me that the hon. member is going pretty far afield. If other hon. members do the same this debate may reach no conclusion.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, with all deference may I state that my position is that we cannot weigh the advisability of approving the particular proposals with respect to revenues advanced by the government without considering alternative proposals.

Mr. Speaker: It is my view that the hon. member is out of order in discussing all the other provisions of the Income Tax Act which are not under review or subject to amendment in this bill. I would refer to a ruling of the Speaker in 1949 on that subject, to be found in the Journals of the House of Commons of the second session of 1949 at page 237, which reads:

> On the second reading of an amending bill—it is the principle of the amending bill and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration". The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill.

As I say, I allowed a certain amount of discussion of the principle of income tax which is proposed to be modified, but it seems to me that the hon. member is going out into other forms and aspects of taxation which are not before us.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to abide by your ruling though with regret, not quarrelling so much with the ruling, which of course I cannot and do not do, as with the manner in which the government has introduced these changes, which perhaps has already been the subject of enough debate and rulings in this house and I will not refer further to it.

In order that my remarks already on the record will make some sense, I will conclude by saying that I regret that the government has not opened up section 8 of the Income Tax Act, because I believe that many millions of dollars now accruing to Canadians as unearned income could and should be the subject of income tax legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member concludes his remarks I wonder if there is not a special consideration that Your Honour should think about in relation to the matter that is now before us. No one can deny the technical correctness of the position Your Honour has just taken. May I also say that I understand Your Honour is not bound by any commitment that a minister of the crown may have given, but you will recall that on Friday evening, December 6, the Minister of Finance had this to say as reported at page 2023 of Hansard:

> Again when the bills are introduced—the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act—hon. members will have their full opportunity to discuss the measures, offer suggestions and move whatever amendments they choose to offer—

Lest I be accused of omitting part of the sentence—perhaps I should omit it so as not to put these words of the minister on the record again—I will complete the sentence, which is as follows:

> —and to oppose those measures if they dare.

In view of the minister's statement, which the house accepted, that there would be full opportunity on the bill to amend the Income Tax Act and the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act to discuss the measures and offer suggestions, I wonder if you, sir, should not continue to allow the measure of latitude that you have allowed thus far in this debate. I think last night you allowed latitude to the first spokesman for the official opposition, which was quite proper, and you allowed it to others. It may be that the particular matter the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway got into seems too specific to come under this suggestion of the Minister of Finance, but I wonder just where we will get the general discussion which the house as a whole believed we would have following that statement by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming: There is nothing in the statement I made that would undertake to override the rules of debate. What I said was that we would have a full opportunity to discuss the measures. This is one of the measures now under discussion, and whatever is relevant and properly within the rules of the house can be said; but there is no suggestion in the remarks I made on Friday night that there is any right on this occasion to override the normal limits of debate under the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is perfectly true that the Minister of Finance did not say he was asking the house to set aside its rules, but I think it is known that there are times when suggestions like this are made, and it is assumed that unanimous consent has been given if there is no objection. The house operates that way on many occasions. If the house misunderstood the meaning of the Minister of Finance last Friday I suppose that is unfortunate, but it did seem to me that what the minister was saying at that time was that we should not worry about the loss of the eight-day budget debate because we would have an opportunity to discuss these matters. He did not use these words at that point, but somewhere he used the words "to their heart's content".

Where do we get that opportunity if we do not get it on the second reading of so general a bill as the bill to amend the Income Tax Act? For example, when we get into committee on this bill there is no question but that we are then limited strictly to the clauses of the bill, but at this point it would seem to me that you might continue to allow reasonable latitude.

Mr. Speaker: I do propose to allow reasonable latitude. As the hon. member has pointed out, I consider that general remarks and arguments about what other taxation reductions might have been undertaken, other than those which are in this bill, are a proper subject of discussion, in view of the way in which these matters come before the house; but the reason I rose was that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was getting into discussion of specific sections of the Income Tax Act which are unaffected by this bill. I do not want to preclude him from discussing income tax in principle in connection with this bill, as I did not interfere with other members doing that before, but it is a question of becoming too specific. If hon. members will endeavour to hold the balance there I shall not try to restrict them unduly.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will proceed and try not to trespass on your patience or your ruling. I shall try to speak in a very general way and bring my remarks to a conclusion.

The point I was making about share rights was simply this. That is a general way of financing private expansions in corporate financing. It results in great increments to the shareholders of the companies concerned. Sometimes they can realize that benefit by retaining the shares which are given to them at below the market price; sometimes they can realize the benefit by selling the share rights; but however it may be done, it is a source of great benefit to a relatively small group of Canadians, which is totally untaxed at the present time.

I am going to conclude now, Mr. Speaker, by requesting all members, when they consider these specific amendments that are being proposed by the government, to ponder seriously whether the government has gone nearly far enough. I would appeal particularly to the members of the Liberal party to my right when these questions come up, such as the allowance to construction workers which is not going to be given to loggers at the present time, such as the adequacy of the exemptions for children, to speak as they think and to vote as they speak. I appeal to the government to consider trying to embody in the Income Tax Act what Shakespeare called "this even-handed justice". I ask them to proceed in the direction of redressing the balance between those who pay too little on too much and those who pay too much on too little.

Unfortunately the amendments which have been proposed do not clearly mark out that direction at all, much less strike out boldly in the direction of that social equality which should be the first objective of a democracy.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, on second reading of this bill I should like to say just a word. This Social Credit group, which has been in this house for quite a number of years, has not taken as much time in the house as generally is taken on a good many measures which some people may think deserve some attention, but which at times we have thought did not require all the attention which had been given to them. But when it comes to matters under the Department of Finance, whether it is taxation, inflation, tight money—no matter what the subject might be within the confines of that department—we feel that we have been sent here with a sort of special mission, a mission that will propose that which is right and proper in monetary fields and condemn those monetary policies which we believe work to the disadvantage of the people.

We are now considering Bill No. 232, which has been brought in by the Minister of Finance, and which he himself has declared is brought in more or less as a substitute for his budget. It deals with a reduction in the income tax. I might say we support the bill partly by compliment and partly by condemnation. The reduction proposed in this bill is commendable but puny. I think all will recognize that any reduction in income tax must be acceptable because it leaves that much more spending power in the hands of the consuming public, yet we do believe that there is a class of people which this reduction in income tax does not touch at all.

I refer to the particular class of people who are so poor they do not even reach the bracket of income where they must pay any income tax. It does not affect them at all, and they are the people who are more in need of consideration than any other class of people in the country. They are the old age pensioners who have to live on that which they receive by way of their pensions; they are the recipients of war veterans allowances, war veterans pensions, and all those social service benefits that go to them through the social service acts. People who may have to live on just those amounts of money are not affected by this bill. In other words, those who need it most cannot get any benefit from the present government's taxation policy.

There are other people who should be considered when legislation is proposed for a reduction of income tax. For a good many years many of us have been advocating the inclusion of medical expenses as a justifiable exemption in matters of income tax. This bill does not touch that matter at all, yet if any consideration is given it should be given to those who are burdened by expenses because of illness over which perhaps they have no control at all.

Just the other day I received a letter from a man who is a cripple. He cannot walk to work; he must have transportation. He cannot even get on a bus; he must be driven to his work in a car. He can drive a car although he is unable to walk. Well, the department will not allow him anything for the expense of operating his car. They will not allow any exemption for that. Yet we find that an employee or the manager of a company or firm is in a different position.

Perhaps he does not even own his own car and does not need to, because he is in a position where he can use a company car. The company gets an exemption for the running expenses of that car, but the poor man does not get any recognition with regard to the expenses of running his car, and if he happens to be a cripple a car is an absolute necessity.

It seems to me that is unjust. I think a good deal of our taxation legislation is unjust by reason of the principle of taxation, but it certainly is unjust when the poor and the needy are forgotten in matters of taxation policy.

Yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur referred to the exemption of expenses of university students. I have brought up this matter at previous sessions. The university student works a little bit during the summer months to earn some money with which to go to university. During the time he is attending university his earning power is almost at a standstill. His father helps to finance him but the father gets no recognition for that except that the young man or young woman may be a dependant and the father gets the benefit of the $400 exemption allowance on income.

There are a lot of these cases that we could bring before the minister, but I am not going to labour this point. I do not want to get away from the actual principle of income tax. While the bill gives some relief to some taxpayers, it does not give relief to the very people who stand most in need of it.

In replying to certain discussion the other day the minister said that he was conscious of the evils of taxation. He suggested that this is something nobody likes, but somehow or other the government feels that it must continue to tax. Of course I am not saying there should not be some form of reasonable taxation, but while the minister says that taxation is an evil but which he apparently regards as necessary, I find that the government will never countenance any suggestion that will lead to a reduction of taxation without affecting income. That is an important point.

As far as this group are concerned, we believe that taxation could be very considerably reduced if it were not for the fact that the government knows very well that when it spends money it must get the money from somewhere to spend. You cannot have it both ways, according to present government policy, which is the policy that was pursued by the previous government. As a matter of fact, so far as actual monetary policy is concerned there is no difference between the preceding administration and the present government. There is absolutely none. As a matter of fact, as far as I can see it does not take any particular brains to run a finance department if it is a matter of balancing income with expenditure.

Mr. Argue: In that case even you might make it.

Mr. Hansell: In that case even I might make it, not that I want the job at all. The fact of the matter is that the finance minister is in an almost impossible position. He is trying to operate the finance department and determine financial policies under a financial system that does not work, that is not self-liquidating. Oh, I see Mr. Speaker rising.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to say anything, because the hon. member recognizes that we cannot enter into a general discussion of the economics of different financial systems.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I rather anticipated something like this. I am afraid my anticipation has been realized, and that a perfectly good speech is going to be seriously spoiled. I appreciate the comment on the point of order that was offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that we were given to understand by the finance minister that by reason of the fact he did not bring down a budget, the widest latitude would be given on this measure for the discussion of monetary matters.

An hon. Member: That was a Conservative promise.

Mr. Hansell: The finance minister is shaking his head. He is not nodding it; he is shaking it. Evidently he did not mean that.

Mr. Fleming: I did not say that.

Mr. Hansell: He did not say that but he left that impression with a good many of us. If he did not say it and if he does not mean it, then that is the reason he did not bring down a budget, because he does not want his monetary policy exposed. There has been a good deal of discussion here on the point of whether the Bank of Canada controls him or whether he has any influence or control over the Bank of Canada. I do not blame him for not wanting that matter discussed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss these matters on the estimates. I appreciate the point made by both members that this is the only opportunity of discussing the financial changes which the government is making at the present time, and for that reason I have allowed some latitude. However, I do not think this is the only opportunity, and I think we must keep within a reasonable distance of the bill, which is an income tax bill.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to agree with you on the point that when the minister's estimates come before us we will be able to discuss monetary policy on the first item. I am only sorry that his estimates did not come down a week ago, when the house leader indicated they would.

Mr. Fleming: The finance estimates were brought down. They were under discussion last Friday night, and we will be discussing them again.

Mr. Hansell: I think the house leader indicated that they would be brought back again on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Hansell: The minister shakes his head this way again. However, I do ask that the minister not leave the first item until the dying days of the session. May I say that this group have behaved pretty well in not occupying the time of the house unreasonably, but when it comes to matters of monetary policy that is the time we wish to make our voices heard.

With those remarks I am going to take my seat because I may as well put my speech in cold storage for a future occasion. Perhaps it will come out a little hotter when I make it. We are going to vote for this measure because it is commendable. It reduces income tax, but we do believe that after all the boasting in election speeches this is a pretty puny reduction in the tax.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity of putting before the house a few observations which I arrived at as a result of discussions with many of my constituents during the summer months concerning the tax changes which the people in my constituency thought they were going to get from the government in this first session of this parliament. I would preface my remarks by stating that the attitude which I and, I am sure, other C.C.F. members have taken with regard to the Income Tax Act is that it is part of a tax structure which is extremely unfair to the low income groups in Canada.

In my judgment the income tax was never intended as a tax to be levied against those on modest incomes. By its very nature the income tax was considered a means of taxing those on comfortable or high incomes. But over the years—and the war years gave an impetus to this downward movement—the exemptions under the income tax act in many countries have been pushed downward so that today there are many people in Canada who are required to pay income tax and who are earning salaries which place them at or near the subsistence level.

For example, we have minimum wage legislation in Canada. In my own province and in my own city that wage is $30 a week. I would suggest that the minimum wage is exactly what the name implies; it is the barest minimum on which a worker can be expected to live. Yet we have the strange situation that a single worker in Canada earning just over $20 a week—in other words $10 less than the minimum wage paid in the cities of Saskatchewan—is required to pay income tax. I suggest that the Income Tax Act in that respect is very unreasonable.

It is all very well to talk about inequities under the Income Tax Act, but I think over the years we in the C.C.F. group have suggested a means whereby we might remove from the income tax rolls at least a number of these people who are earning incomes so low that by no stretch of the imagination should they be considered to be earning enough to pay income tax. For many years we have advocated in this house that the exemption for income tax purposes for single taxpayers should be increased from $1,000 to $2,000 a year and for married taxpayers from $2,000 to $3,000.

I for one was highly elated last spring to find that the Conservative party, after many years, had finally arrived at the position where their policy was brought into line. Whether it was under the impetus of the election in the immediate future or for whatever reason, I do not know. Nevertheless they came out and suggested, declaimed, promised or pledged that if elected they would increase the exemption for single taxpayers from $1,000 to $1,500, and that for married taxpayers the exemption would be raised from $2,000 to $3,000. Where the statement was made through the press or on the public platform, as was done by the Minister of Transport in his Gananoque speech, I can say one thing of the government, namely that the publicity work done on behalf of the Conservative party must have been very effective, because the people in my constituency were definitely under the impression that the government was going to increase the exemptions under the Income Tax Act as outlined just a moment ago. The promise was given, and I do not think any responsible Conservative can deny that that pledge was made in various ways and so effectively that people throughout Canada expected this type of reform in the Income Tax Act.

What has happened? There has been no move whatever to increase the exemptions. Thus we find the situation continuing where, as I say, single workers earning over $20 a week, which is below the minimum wage paid in those provinces of Canada which have minimum wage legislation, are yet required to pay income tax.

It is true that there has been a move to increase the exemption per child under the terms of the Income Tax Act. Here again at the present time a family with four children earning less than $2,600 a year is not affected by this move at all. In other words, as far as tax reductions are concerned that family is receiving no benefit whatsoever. I would remind the government that their promises with regard to tax reductions were not merely specific pledges to increase the exemptions, but there was a blanket assurance on the part of the Conservative government that they would cut taxes.

Last evening reference was made to their frequent claim that the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers were being picked to a certain extent. In my constituency I was often stopped in the street in the months of August and September by constituents who said, "When are you going down to Ottawa? When is parliament opening? When are we going to get those tax reductions?" The man in the street had been led to believe, as indeed the Prime Minister pledged, that his government would call a September session in order to cut taxes.

Hon. members supporting the government have made frequent boasts during the course of this session, and we shall probably hear a great many more, that they have kept their pledges, and that they have done all the things they promised to do. Here is one specific instance in which they are a far cry from the action which was promised by the government prior to June 10.

With respect to the vast number of Canadian citizens who, notwithstanding the great claims of prosperity in this country, are earning incomes so low that they are never called upon to pay income tax, there is no measure of tax relief whatsoever from this government. The old age pensioner on his mere pittance is still paying the sales tax on the necessities of life and in some instances excise tax on things which are necessary to life. There is no tax reduction for the pensioners, for those living on annuities, or who have retired on modest savings and who are not paying income tax because their income is not high enough. There is no measure of tax relief for that group of Canadian people.

I therefore suggest that when hon. members opposite get to their feet, pat themselves on the back and boast about how they have reduced taxes, they should explain why they consider that the vast number of Canadian people who are earning very low incomes should be ignored in this fashion. I should like the Minister of Finance to explain to the house why, in conformity with the pledges made by the government prior to the election, there is no provision to increase the exemptions for single or married taxpayers under the terms of this act, and to suggest to the house how the government can claim to have reduced taxes and to have kept their pledges with respect to tax reductions as long as they have failed to take any action to reduce the taxes paid by the people with the lowest incomes in this country. Such tax reduction can only be brought about through reductions in the sales tax, a tax which is levied on the lowest paid worker, the recipient of the lowest income in this country.

My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested, with respect to the increase in the exemption, per child, that perhaps an even more effective way of granting assistance to family groups throughout this country would have been an increase in the family allowance. Such a move would certainly have extended benefits to all families in Canada, not merely to families which are earning incomes of over $2,600 a year. Whatever measure of tax relief is given, this legislation must be considered in terms of what the bill does not do and the vast number of Canadian people who are ignored under its terms.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that when we talk about further tax reductions we are always asked, "Well, where is the government going to get this money? What is the alternative form of revenue?". I think the Minister of Finance certainly has reason to expect suggestions as to how alternative forms of revenue can be obtained. I suggest however that, for one thing, the absence of a tax on capital gains is a pretty sad commentary on the tax structure in the country at the present time.

On former occasions members of this house have pointed out the part played by capital gains in the creation of large fortunes. As a matter of fact, if we were to go through the history of the large fortunes in Canada and the United States we would find that in the main the accumulation of that wealth was through capital gains and certainly not through salaries or wages, regardless of how large they might be. I think there might be some argument as to whether capital gains constitute income, but I believe the economists generally will agree that capital gains are income and, like other income, represent taxpaying ability.

That is the basis upon which taxes should be levied, on the ability of the individual to pay. Therefore the refusal of the government to face up to this problem and to tax Canadians on their ability to pay means that the greater part of the tax levied must be borne by the low-income groups who are living at the subsistance level. We find the incredible situation in Canada where Canadian workers, earning less than the minimum wage, are required to pay income tax.

As far as capital gains are concerned, the thing that must be borne in mind is that capital gains result from the sale of assets and that they are not too dissimilar from ordinary trading profits; but in any event the accumulation of wealth from capital gains represents on the part of the taxpayer the ability to pay, and that should be the basis upon which Canadians should be taxed.

There are a number of other matters with which I should certainly like to deal, but I would like to make some brief reference to the clause concerning the allowability of expenses to construction workers. This is something of course, in which I have been interested for some time. I come from a constituency—

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend is referring to a clause of the bill, which of course is not in order in a speech on second reading. If he could leave that matter until we go into the committee and deal with the clause then it would not raise any difficulties.

Mr. Ellis: Perhaps I gave a wrong impression, Mr. Speaker. It was not my intention to deal with that clause specifically, except to say that I do hope the government intends to apply the widest possible interpretation to this section because—

Mr. Fleming: That could be said in commitee.

Mr. Ellis: —as the minister will remember from past experience, we have had the buck passed between the former minister of national revenue and the former minister of finance regarding the application of that section. I would merely like to say this, that I am somewhat alarmed by the exclusion of loggers, which would seem to indicate that we have some reason for apprehension in that regard. However, I will make no further comment until we get into committee.

There are a number of other matters which I think should command the attention of the house in connection with this legislation. I note with some regret the failure of the government to take some steps to allow medical expenses, which is another matter with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other members of this group have been particularly concerned over the years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So was the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ellis: As my colleague points out, the Minister of Finance was very interested in this matter when he sat on the opposite side of the house.

Mr. Fleming: Do you think he is no longer interested in it?

Mr. Ellis: I regret that his interest has perhaps somewhat waned since he moved across the aisle. Perhaps the ability to pay is involved in the ceiling placed on tax paid with respect to old age security. I should have thought the principle of taxing people on their ability to pay could have been applied in this instance. However, the failure of the government to make any move to correct these obvious flaws in the act indicates that it is not too much concerned about bringing in an over-all change in the Income Tax Act.

Now, as in other matters, we have argued that there was really no change in the government last June 10; it was just a change of faces and a change of personalities. We find in this and other legislation that any changes are those involving minor parts of the act, changes involving amounts, but there is no indication on the part of the government that they are going to bring in substantial or far-reaching changes in the tax structure of the country. I do hope the Minister of Finance and his colleagues will not continue their practice of boasting of pledges kept, but will just refresh their memories with regard to their statements made last spring, particularly those with reference to increases in the exemption levels for single and married taxpayers.

Furthermore, having regard to the pledges made by the Prime Minister, members of the present cabinet and members of his party prior to the last election, I hope they will feel that they are under a solemn and moral obligation to the people of Canada to do a great deal more in so far as tax reduction is concerned than is outlined in the bill now before us.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say. In particular I want to raise a problem which I have raised on different occasions before Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Harris and now I should like to do so before the present Minister of Finance.

It may seem strange to members in this house that I should be asking for some protection for the farmer with respect to income tax, because it was only yesterday or the day before that we were pleading how poverty stricken was the farmer and how we needed some way of boosting his income. In fact the Minister of Agriculture appreciated the problem of the farmer, and I am hopeful that, while the farmer is the backbone of this country and while he is up against it financially at the present time, these days will change and he will come back into his own and receive a fair return for his produce.

Now I think the farmer gets a raw deal from the Minister of Finance. His whole family's earnings are taxed as the return for one individual. If the farmer has some boys under 16 years of age he cannot deduct anything for wages paid those boys. My own boy is a grown man now with his own farm, but I have some grandsons who can go out, at 11 and 12 years of age, and run a tractor or other farm machinery, thus saving their father the expense of hiring a man.

While that is going on the wife does a tremendous amount of work around the farm. She produces extra food for sale, such as eggs, poultry and chickens. All these things are sold in the name of the farmer. You have the wife and three or four children producing on the farm and all their work goes to make up the income of the farm, yet the whole thing is taxed as the earnings of one man.

I am going to appeal to the Minister of Finance, who always seems to me to be fair, to look into this. When I raised this question before it was answered in this way; that if this were done for the farmer's wife or family it would have to be done in the same way with regard to others. But if a thing is wrong, it is wrong; and it does not matter how many situations you have to look into. I do not want to labour the point. I think the farmer is getting a raw deal through being taxed as one person while other people help him to earn his income. There should be a reduction in the tax having regard to the services those other people render on the farm.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for Port Arthur I will not have to apologize when I return to my constituency for the small reduction which has been made in the income tax, because the people in my riding did not fall for all the promises that were made. The result was that the Conservative candidate lost his deposit and the other pie in the sky candidate ran third.

Mr. Sinclair: Which party was that?

Mr. Byrne: That was the C.C.F. party. I did not expect these promises would be carried out, because I felt that if we were to do more in providing for those who are unable to provide for themselves, in the way of further social legislation, it was inconceivable that the promises of tax reductions at the same time could be brought about.

But certainly we welcome the reductions, if they will have any effect in improving the living standards of the people across Canada. I doubt, however, whether they will. The Conservative party has now been in power for almost six months, and by the end of the fiscal year they will have been in power almost nine months. The tax reductions they have brought in amount to $26 million or $1.60 per capita. For a family of four people this works out to $6.40. If the maw of inflation is to be fed in any way by this minuscule reduction it is conceivable that the cost of living index may rise 1 per cent. A rise of 1 per cent in the cost of living index will represent, for the average family which spends about $2,500 on annual living expenses, about $24 in that period, so this small rise in the cost of living index could reduce the assistance given by more than four times. That is to say, these reductions would soon be eaten up by inflation.

We welcome the proposal that construction workers should benefit by being allowed to deduct their living expenses while away on construction jobs. I understand the former administration had some difficulty working out methods by which these contingencies could be taken care of. They felt that the cost of administration was such that it would outweigh the benefits that might be received, but this administration has apparently found that there is a workable arrangement which can be made.

If this is so I think the government should have gone further and included other groups of employees, such as lumber workers, who are of necessity required to maintain living quarters at a distance from their homes. Often these homes have been acquired at considerable cost, perhaps through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but in addition to the cost of maintaining these homes they are obliged to meet additional expense in maintaining themselves elsewhere. There are instances where miners and prospectors are required to go out and work on properties. They also should enjoy the benefit of this provision of the act.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Macleod mention those who are suffering from incapacity or ill health. The nature of the mining industry is such that many of the mines are located at high altitudes. Very often the wife of a miner or a member of his family is not able to live at such an altitude.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, just to bring this overcrowded house up to date with regard to what I was saying prior to the noon recess, I was speaking of the special circumstances surrounding employment in the mining industry, where because of the nature of the industry many of the mines are located at high altitudes where for a number of reasons in some cases the members of the family are unable to reside with the employee. I have reference to several personal acquaintances of mine who are in just such circumstances. They are required to maintain their families in homes at a lower altitude and maintain themselves at the site of the operation. This circumstance works a great hardship on them. I feel that they should also be included in the provision that has been introduced in this amendment.

There are other circumstances surrounding employment in the mining industry to which we might also give some consideration. By the nature of its undertakings mining is a particular hazardous occupation. Miners are required by law to provide themselves with protective equipment such as hard hats and hard-toed shoes. In many instances a pair of leather boots which are accepted as the best footgear to meet safety requirements may cost up to $24 a pair, and the miner may wear out two or three pairs of boots in one year. In some cases the mining company will pay a portion of the cost of this equipment by making deposits to the supplying retailer, but even when that has transpired a pair of leather shoes is said to last only six months at the most, and because of the acid content of the water to which they are exposed they deteriorate rapidly. The supplying of this equipment is a considerable expense for the miner, and this is another case where special consideration might be given.

The person who is employed on a wage or salary has no opportunity to make provision for any of these circumstances. In many instances a small businessman is given some latitude in determining what are actual expenses and what are not, and it may be that many of these small businesses are able to operate only because they are in a position to make these deductions from actual earnings. I think this is probably true in many cases, and there is still the basic difference between this group and those on salary that seems to discriminate against employees who work on a payroll basis.

For instance, an automobile is generally recognized as a necessity today. Business-men are able to make certain deductions which almost write off the cost of their automobiles, and in many instances they can deduct the cost of operating them. The cost of operating automobiles under normal circumstances would total approximately between $800 and $1,000 a year, and the value of the automobile is reduced by about $500 each year. We certainly cannot assume a cost of less than $1 a day for the maintenance of an automobile. This is an expense which must be met by those of us on wages and salaries who own cars, and we are given no consideration with respect to income tax deductions.

One hon. member mentioned earlier the question of the 2 per cent tax for old age security. I do not agree with the hon. member that this is irregular as he would seem to indicate, but I think there is room for some improvement here. The ceiling on old age security for income tax purposes could justifiably be increased. It would have the effect of bleeding off from those who are already in good financial circumstances and receiving the old age security pension a certain sum of money. It is generally understood they do not actually require the old age security payments, but for the purposes of administration everyone has been included in the act.

In addition to the parents of a university student I believe the student himself should be given special consideration in cases where he earns over $1,000 a year. He should be exempt from taxation, because in view of the high cost of education $1,000 is not going to provide him with a full year of university training.

That is all I have to say on this question. I hope the minister will see fit to give consideration to these matters, and more particularly that he will include other categories of employees for exemption when living apart from their families.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, before my hon. friend is called on I wonder if hon. gentlemen would permit me to say this. Far be it from me to wish to ask any hon. member to curtail his remarks in any way. I am, however, one of the ministers who expect to leave to attend the NATO council meeting by plane at seven o'clock tonight. I cannot leave until this bill is disposed of, and I simply ask the consideration of hon. members under these rather cramping circumstances.

Mr. McIvor: Short speeches, yes.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the minister in my opening sentence that I intend to be very brief indeed. However, this is a field in which I have taken some particular interest over a number of years, and I would not like to see the opportunity pass by without expressing my pleasure at being able to endorse the principle of the bill we now have before us. I think its effect will be much more widespread than that of the bill we dealt with yesterday. I feel that in a much more direct manner the purchasing power of that section of the Canadian people whose purchasing power ought to be enhanced at this time especially is going to be aided by the passage of the bill that is now before us.

I am pleased to note that quite contrary to my expectations the new government we now have, that is now amending the Income Tax Act, is following what I feel is a sounder course than the old government followed when they gave tax relief under the Income Tax Act. What I have in mind here again relates to the urgent need to keep at a maximum the purchasing power of our Canadian people, because we are threatened with an apparent overproduction of consumer goods all along the line. When the old government made its last amendment to the Income Tax Act, as I recall it, the awards were made on a percentage basis, and the wealthy people who did not actually need a reduction in taxation were able to obtain benefit away in excess of what the ordinary taxpayer received.

[Mr. Byrne.]

One of the underlying principles of the amendment before us, as I see it, is that more or less all taxpayers in the country—and this applies to all corporations—are receiving an even sum of money which, of course, means that under this bill much more in proportion is to be given to the poor than to the rich. I feel that is something that is very desirable.

I should like to call the minister's attention to one thing with respect to the principle of the bill. I notice that he recognizes the need to raise the exemption for dependants. In my opinion the raising of the exemption for dependants is a much more urgent and pressing matter than reducing the rate of taxation. I do not think anyone can argue that we can bring up a child these days on the annual exemption allowed in the Income Tax Act. I have always failed to see the reasons for granting an adult an exemption of $1,000 and only a few hundred dollars for a dependant. If this government wishes to help family life in our nation they might well consider at some future time extending the principle they have adopted in this bill, namely the principle that the exemptions for dependent children should be raised. I rather regret that the sum allowed for a child is not at least $500.

I also wish to pass on a thought in connection with what the previous speaker and other speakers have already referred to, namely the principle that a certain class of workers who have to live away from home should be given an extra concession. I should like to impress upon the minister my belief at least that there are tens of thousands of other people, not necessarily all manual labourers, who must earn their living away from home, and I feel that to begin to discriminate as between one class and another of our Canadian citizens in the Income Tax Act is a regrettable thing. While I do not intend to oppose the adoption of the principle which the amendment signifies, I do feel that it has in it an element of discrimination.

I should also like to call the minister's attention to another problem, and I regret that it is not being touched here. About a year or so ago, when we had the last amendment to the Income Tax Act, there was a provision to encourage the Canadian people to save more money. We were granted the right to deduct the premiums paid on certain types of insurance and annuity policies. I notice no mention of that here, and I regret that. I hope the minister will look very carefully at the regulations which his department has drawn up under the existing Income Tax Act in that regard, because I feel the limitations which are being imposed are much too severe. I am sure the intent of the former minister of finance is not being carried out by the very limiting restrictions which have been placed upon the types of insurance and annuity policies which are exempt.

The history of the Income Tax Act, Mr. Speaker, is that it was imposed during the first world war in order to help pay for the burden of that war. It was retained after the war, and the argument which has always been given for its retention rather than its abolition is that since a welfare program is under way in our Canadian life, the Income Tax Act is a useful instrument whereby the government might take from those who have more than enough in order to help, through various pieces of welfare legislation, those of our citizens who have less than enough.

At the present time we seem to have lost that intent of the Income Tax Act. While there is some recognition in the bill before us that the government seems to feel that we ought to return to the old intent of the Income Tax Act, and that they are prepared to grant some concessions, yet they have not changed the basic exemptions of the average worker. They remain at $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person. I realize the rates have been reduced, but the exemption has not been raised.

We have in our present economy a situation where we are levying an income tax on the below-average wage earner. I feel that this is putting a completely new purpose to the Income Tax Act, a purpose which I should like to see eliminated. I should like to see the day when exemptions are raised to the point where the average and below average wage earner are exempt from paying income tax.

Our proposal is that the exemptions should be raised to at least $1,500 for a single person and $3,000 for a man and his wife, with a dependant exemption of $500 for each child. I feel if that proposal were adopted the government would be going a long way toward making the Income Tax Act once again an income tax act and not a general measure of taxation of our people.

(Translation):

Mr. C. N. Barbes (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the riding of Chapleau, I would like to offer a few remarks in connection with Bill 232, amending the Income Tax Act.

Back in March, 1957, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) delighted in lambasting the Liberals, denouncing cyclical budgets and recommending numerous exemptions. But last week, after six months of hard work and just before Christmas he brought down in the house bits of half-measures, mere cracker bits.

I think that on the financial festive table to which he had invited Canadian taxpayers six months ago, there is very little to satisfy his guests, that is, the Canadian taxpayers.

Last May and June, Mr. Speaker, I urged the citizens of my own riding of Chapleau to leave the administration of this country in the hands of people who had had valuable experience and a remarkable record in overcoming difficulties through the many measures they had enacted since 1940.

Many thousands of electors were beguiled by the Conservatives and their enticing promises. At times they were even dazzled by the bright pictures of what the country would be like under a new Conservative government.

Thousands of electors felt that a tax-happy administration would be replaced by open-handed "exemption granters" who would abolish some of the taxes and promote new undertakings right across the board.

Well, after six months, it must now be realized that as far as the income tax, at least, is concerned, the new government is not giving as much as it had dangled before the eyes of large families or of plucky men who have to take jobs far from home and work hard at them but who find in this bill nothing but eye-wash, nothing but little tufts of straw—a meaningless electoral argument—compared to the promises made in the spring of 1957.

Apparently an exemption is granted for construction workers enabling them to include reasonable board and lodging expenses they have to pay when they cannot work in their ordinary place of residence.

In our area, numerous loggers, prospectors and miners travel 100, 200 and 300 miles from home for the purpose of getting work. Their travelling expenses should be taken into account.

Again, the government should provide advantages for workers in areas such as Abitibi, Gaspe, Lake St. John and others too, who have to leave their home and family and take a job far away.

An advantage is given to construction workers who are away for 36 hours; nothing is given to our workers who are away for 36 days and more.

On the other hand, the deduction for each child has been increased by $100. It is an improvement to a certain extent, although it falls far short of what families should receive, for the forthcoming year, from those who, last spring, promised so much to our children and who had accused the Liberals of holding on to 500 million dollars, allegedly the fruit of overtaxation by a tax-happy lot. But out of all this, we are given mere crumbs that cannot substantially relieve the burden of those who have a large family.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was indeed a more efficient way, which the government could have used, to bring relief to taxpayers most in need of it: raising family allowances. There again, the promise had been that these would be doubled whereas the matter is merely being considered. And all this time in hundreds of our homes, you will find thousands of people who, this fall, four months after the Conservative victory, do not earn enough to provide decent clothing or food for their children. Yet, those are the allowances the Conservatives had promised to double. Let us hope that they will do so before long, for an increase is sorely needed and it has been promised. What are you waiting for? If you cannot give us jobs, give us allowances, you who felt so mighty last June.

No, there has been as yet no increase in family allowances under the new government. It is true that in 1957, in the thick of the struggle in this House of Commons, neither the Conservative leader nor the Minister of Finance mentioned the matter. It was the Conservative candidates, like the one in Chapleau, for instance, who promised everything under the sun and described us as greedy "taxers".

Today, however, the new government will at least accept my telling its members that, especially in the light of those promises, and of increases in other respects, old age pensions and so on, the children in my riding, and all the others want family allowances that will make up for the loss in the buying power of the dollar since 1945.

The Conservative leaders in La Reine, Amos and elsewhere in my own riding of Chapleau, are quite right in admitting to each other that the Conservatives have always been unlucky when they come into power. In 1957 it's the same as in 1930, and if we did not already have social legislation, the situation would be disastrous. The truth of the matter is that the people are always unlucky when they call in the Conservatives to lighten their burden.

(Text):

On a different subject, Mr. Speaker, please allow me to offer my personal wishes to the Minister of Finance for Godspeed, bon voyage and a prompt return to Canada.

[Mr. Barbes.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on another bill the Minister of Finance chose not to make a speech in opening the debate on second reading but rather to make a speech at the conclusion of that debate. I note that today he did not avail himself of the opportunity to speak in moving the second reading of this bill, and I hope he will do as he did yesterday and make a speech closing the debate, so he may deal with some of the general points that have been raised. I make that plea to him because he knows that if he waits until we get into committee on the clauses of the bill it will not be possible for him to deal with some of the more general comments that Your Honour and the house have permitted members to make while we have been on the motion for second reading.

I shall not take the time of the house to repeat the arguments on some of the points that have been raised, but I should like to press the minister for a reply to the arguments advanced regarding the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes. As the minister knows, on at least two occasions this session, as recorded on page 248 of Hansard for October 22 and on page 1896 of Hansard for December 5, I asked the minister whether the government would be doing something about this matter in line with the position taken by the Minister of Finance himself during the days when he was with us on this side of the house. On both occasions he asked me to exercise a little patience and wait until his budgetary proposals were brought before us.

As a matter of fact, the day before those proposals were announced I put my question to him and, of course, I was told to look back to a previous answer. When I did so the statement was that I should wait until we got into committee of supply last Friday evening at eight o'clock. I must not try to allege that the minister promised me he would make a statement, but I thought when he asked me to wait until that time I could look forward to some remarks on this question. I listened in vain Friday night; no comment was made on this point.

I say to the minister that it will not be good enough for him to remind me of what all of us know, namely that an action of some sort regarding this matter was taken by the house in the budget of last spring. As the minister knows, neither he nor I was particularly happy about that action. It is now part of the law that a taxpayer can, without putting in any receipts, claim $100 blanket deductibility for medical expenses, charitable donations and trade union dues. Well, that is fine. To many people it does mean a slight increase in the deductibility to which they are entitled.

But I am sure the minister agrees with me now as he did last spring that in the main all that Mr. Harris did was to increase the basic exemption for everybody by $100. Surely that is not to be taken now as an implementation of this government's view that the exemption level should be raised to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons. It still stands that so far as over-all medical expenses are concerned, unless people have extremely heavy expenses they get no special consideration that is not accorded to every other taxpayer.

I remind the minister of the many debates we have had on this question and of how he and the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) in particular, plus other members of the Conservative party, supported strongly—and we appreciated their support—the motions I moved on this matter a number of times. The minister will recall that on one occasion the former Liberal government permitted a motion asking for consideration of the matter to be passed, and after that the present minister and others berated the former government for not having done any more in response to that motion than give it consideration that amounted to nothing.

It is still a serious matter. It is in our view still a matter of unfairness that persons with medical expenses are not allowed any special consideration for those expenses unless they get over that 3 per cent floor. It is still a matter of unfairness when eyeglasses, hearing aids and many more drugs than those listed in the schedule are not allowed.

My main purpose in speaking in the debate at this time, conscious as I am of the fact that the Minister of Finance must get away tonight to Paris, is to press him to make a statement on this matter at this time. He can assume, I take it, that when we get into committee on the bill there are some amendments that we shall probably move from this corner of the house. After the ruling of yesterday there is no doubt about that. But there is one amendment we cannot move. We cannot present any amendment having to do with medical expenses, because in the amending bill there is nothing which deals with that subject. That is my reason for urging the minister to speak on this matter when he closes the debate on second reading.

While I am on my feet, may I join with others in saying that I regret that the Conservative government has forgotten the statement made during the election campaign about the desirability of raising the basic exemption levels to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons. We also feel that the $100 increase in the dependants' exemption is not adequate. That, of course, is a matter that we can deal with when we get into committee on the bill, not only by speeches but by an appropriate amendment when we reach that clause of the bill.

When you take all these things into consideration, and when you bear in mind the comments that were made last night by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, it seems to me that there is justification for some of the criticisms that have been made about this budget to the effect that it is hardly the kind of generosiy the Minister of Finance would like us to believe it to be. As a matter of fact, I was quite interested in the concluding portion of the minister's speech yesterday when he, with great delight, held in his hand a cartoon depicting a couple of members walking out of the front door of the parliament buildings, obviously Liberal members—

Mr. Sinclair: Tut, tut.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I realize that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) has a voice that permits him to say little more than "tut, tut", and probably it is just as well. Underneath this cartoon is the caption, "That was a smashing attack you made on the government just before we voted unanimous confidence". I shared with the Minister of Finance his pleasure in describing that cartoon. I suggested at the time, but I note that my words did not reach Hansard, that he might ask the house for permission to have the cartoon placed on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not an impossibility. I realize that for the most part our Hansard is not an illustrated periodical, but it could be made to include a cartoon, and I think the minister's speech would be embellished if it were illustrated with the occasional cartoon such as the one to which he referred yesterday. If he would like to go along with my suggestion that that cartoon be placed on the record, I should be very happy to urge that the house give unanimous consent.

Perhaps when he has obtained that consent he might also be willing to ask the house to give unanimous consent to put another cartoon in the record. This one I should like to describe. It is in the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, December 10. I realize that I must be careful in quoting from the Winnipeg Free Press. I got into a little trouble yesterday by quoting from one of the editorials in this paper with which I happened to agree. However, this is an interesting cartoon. It is a picture of the Minister of Finance. He is shown there in tails and white tie, with a clean handkerchief in his pocket and a flower in his buttonhole. His face is well drawn. There is not a smile on it. He holds in his hand, upside down, a silk hat on which appears the word "Budget"; it is not "budgie" but "Budget". Underneath is a slogan, "Fleming the Magician Will Now Pull an Elephant out of his Magic Hat". What has the Minister of Finance in his hand which he has just pulled out of his magic hat? He has in his hand a little mouse. I should be glad if this cartoon, along with the other one, could be placed upon the pages of Hansard.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion, if my recollection serves me correctly, on which my hon. friend has invited me to make a speech. If my memory be faulty in that respect, it will certainly be the first occasion on which he has invited me to make a lengthy speech, when I fear I shall have to disappoint him.

There are many things I might, under ordinary circumstances, wish to say at this time, Mr. Speaker, but with the departure of the plane for Paris for this NATO meeting now only a matter of a few hours away I will ask the house to excuse me with only very brief comment on one or two points that have been raised.

Indeed, I think my comments should be of a general nature. Various suggestions have been put forward with regard to individual tax measures and tax reforms which are desirable in the view of those who have put them forward. Let me say in general that I came into this portfolio with an open mind on many of these questions, and also with the views I have already expressed on many of these questions in the past when a member of the opposition. I have not changed the views that were expressed then. I hope, given time and opportunity, to be able to carry further into effect some of the reforms that have been advocated by my colleagues and myself in times past.

But we cannot do it all in the first year. We cannot do it all in the first five months. We have gone as far as the limitations imposed upon us this year have permitted us to go. We simply had to accept the budget that was introduced last March on behalf of the previous government, and operate within that budget. That is my general comment with regard to the various matters that have been mentioned here in the course of debate.

As to views that have been expressed by my colleagues or myself on specific matters in times past, we have gone, we think, under the existing circumstances and limitations, a long way at this time, and we hope the house will view the present proposals in that light, namely the light of the limitations that we inherited. Our efforts in this respect are not going to end now. We are going to go on seeking to do what we can in fulfilment of a program of tax reform.

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me for a specific comment about the matter of the deduction of medical expenses. What I have just said applies to that matter. These and all other matters are going to receive continuing consideration. In my concluding remarks last Friday night I said something that evidently was taken up wrongly by those who followed me. I was trying to point out that the problems that have faced the government have been very heavy. We have done the best we could. We had a series of international conferences to prepare for and attend. We have done as much in this respect as I think flesh and blood can be expected to be equal to. We have not been able to do everything, but we are not going to stop our efforts now.

There are one or two matters that were touched upon that I think might more appropriately be dealt with in committee. I shall have a word to say there about this matter of the relief brought to construction workers, but I think those comments can more appropriately be made in the committee.

Mr. Hansell: I would like to ask the minister just one question. I understood him to say that he was soon leaving for the NATO conference, and I do not think we want to hold things up; but would he care to state when he expects his estimates will be proceeded with? Will we wait until he returns, or what is the program?

Mr. Fleming: The estimates of the Department of Finance cannot be called again in committee of supply until after we return from NATO, and the schedule calls for our being back, I think, just a matter of about three hours before the house adjourns for the Christmas recess.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Casselman in the chair.

On clause 1—Construction workers.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think I should offer the committee a brief statement on clause 1 in view of the fact that some hon. members in the debate on second reading raised questions about the extent of the tax relief provided by this clause.

As I indicated in an earlier statement, this clause is intended to provide a measure of relief for construction workers. I take it there is no issue as to the measure of tax relief afforded to construction workers, but questions were raised as to why they should be singled out for this particular consideration. Might I give the house a statement on that point, sir.

As I mentioned in my remarks last Friday night this is a new provision and, in its genesis, it goes back to a directive issued by the former government in the year 1956. Until that time there had been no attempt to include in the income of construction workers such allowances as are made to them by their employers for board and lodging when they were working away from home. That directive was confined to construction workers, and at no time in the consideration of this matter has any question been raised as to any other persons. The directive out of which the whole matter emanated related to construction workers and construction workers alone.

There was discussion of this matter in the house last spring, and at that time the former minister of finance said the new directive purported to treat from that point on, or gave notice that from that point on the government would treat such moneys as taxable income in the hands of construction workers. In the discussions in the house, and in face of protests from members of my party, the then minister of finance said the new directive would not be applied to income for the year 1956, but it would be applied as from January 1, 1957.

Shortly after coming into office we received representations on this point from both the construction industry and the Canadian Congress of Labour. These representations in every case have been confined to the construction worker. No representations have been made on behalf of any others.

I would not have the committee think this problem is free of difficulty. On the contrary, the whole matter is beset by some very serious administrative problems. We are, in a sense, opening a door and we will have to watch very closely the way this new provision works out, to see how the administrative problems are met. We are admittedly going a long way in this provision, but it was indicated to us that some firms—for instance, those engaged in construction on the D.E.W. line—had found it difficult to persuade construction workers to go to that area in the face of the directive that had been issued and the statement of the former minister of finance that the directive would be applied to all allowances accruing after January 1, 1957.

A question was raised about loggers. We have received no representations on that score, and the Canadian Congress of Labour in its submissions to us on more than one occasion put the case on behalf of the construction worker, and the construction worker alone.

Mr. Lesage: There is no union of loggers in our province; they appeal to their member for parliament.

Mr. Fleming: We have given to this plea of the construction workers very careful study and have brought forward this amendment, not without misgivings in regard to the difficulties of administration which might present themselves. I would, however, ask the committee to bear in mind that there has been no opportunity for giving consideration to the position of other workers who may consider that their tax position should be regarded as equivalent to that of the construction worker in the view embodied in the present clause.

Any attempt to deal with other groups would necessarily require the most careful study before any action could responsibly be taken. I am asking the committee therefore to approve the clause in this form, to give us an opportunity to watch—as we will watch very carefully—the application of the clause; and the matter will, I can assure the committee, be the subject of continuing study. I hope for that reason the committee will see fit to give us the opportunity to go forward with this clause, meeting as it does a problem, not of our creation, but a problem created by the directive of a year and a half ago; and will also give us the opportunity of seeing how this works out in operation and in administration before we are asked to revise it or to extend it.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to direct a question to the minister. I wonder if he could tell us whether in a case where a worker whose talents and knowledge are essentially required and who is shifted about the country, say in the construction of aeroplanes, from his ordinary residence to the location where construction is going on, the term "construction worker" would also be applied to that classification. Would the words "construction worker" also apply to this classification, because in reality they are construction workers. If a worker on the D.E.W. line is called a construction worker, then I think certainly an aeroplane construction worker might also be called a construction worker. Would the provisions of the bill also apply to those engineers who are summoned away from home for the purpose of helping in the construction of aeroplanes?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is asking me for an advance interpretation of expressions used in this clause. I can only say to him that the interpretation will be a matter for the Department of National Revenue, and having regard to the purpose of the clause I am quite satisfied that the department will endeavour to place a fair and ample interpretation upon it.

As to what type of construction is contemplated here, the hon. member is seeking, I take it, to draw a distinction between someone who is engaged in constructing buildings which will become fixtures, part of the real estate, and someone who is engaged in constructing a chattel. I think I can say to him in this respect that a man who is engaged in the construction of a factory, a canal, a bridge or a road is obviously a construction worker. When it comes to the matter of fabricating an aeroplane or some chattel I should think that process would be more properly described as manufacturing than as constructing, for this purpose.

Mr. Crestohl: May I point out that I have a particular reason for asking this question. These are men of special talent whose ability and scientific knowledge are required. As a result of their particular knowledge and talent they are often summoned from one place to another. Would the minister not think these people should be placed in a special category, and that they should be offered the relief which the bill intends to provide?

Mr. Fleming: I am quite sure the hon. member is aware a man who is on, shall we call it, a travel status for his employer, a man who is travelling about on behalf of his employer, is not assessed for whatever the employer lays out as part of his travelling expenses or living allowance while engaged in his travels on behalf of his employer.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance when he spoke on clause 1 of the bill. I am sure the proposal which it contains in so far as construction workers are concerned will be welcomed. The minister made reference to a directive on which we had considerable discussion in the house a year ago. As I understand it, the proposal for an amendment to the Income Tax Act which he is now bringing forward is in fact making legal something which, apparently, had been carried on as a practice in the industry over a number of years, a practice to which the Department of National Revenue has turned, more or less, a blind eye. I think that is obvious in the light of the directive we were discussing here last year under the name of bulletin No. 10.

Certainly I welcome the suggestion that discrimination against construction workers is to be eliminated. Nevertheless, from what the minister said in his opening statement it has become apparent that we will have to start all over again a wearing down process on the new Minister of Finance at a time when some of us felt we were beginning to penetrate the conscience of the former minister of finance to eliminate this kind of discrimination.

I must say that in listening to the Minister of Finance on the question of administrative problems I fail to follow his argument that because of administrative difficulties the broader provisions which some of us have been suggesting cannot be brought in at this time. Particular reference has been made to the situation of the loggers or bushworkers by a number of hon. members who have spoken earlier in this debate, and in pursuing the subject I should like to suggest that if the minister is thinking in terms of administrative problems he will really have a problem on his hands when he begins his attempt to determine whether or not certain workers are construction workers.

I would remind him that in some of the west coast logging camps where all the workers are organized in an industrial union there are probably a good many workers who are in construction classifications. The minister will find himself up against the peculiar difficulty of having to try to draw a fine dividing line between certain workers in these camps who can qualify as construction workers and certain others who, he will have the trouble of deciding, are not construction workers.

Earlier someone here was talking about a Pandora's box, and I think the minister, as a result of the approach he has made to this problem, has opened the way to a large number of administrative problems which he has not envisaged. The Minister of Finance has suggested that he has not had any representations on this matter of allowable deductions except on behalf of construction workers.

I quite agree with him that the Canadian Labour Congress has made a major point of this question of construction workers, because it was a problem which had arisen as a result of this bulletin of the Department of National Revenue. But when he says he has not received any other representations at all, I do not know whether or not he is referring to the situation as far as the Department of Finance is concerned only since he took office. I do know, however, that I have in my hand a letter dated December 9 of this year addressed to him from what is known in British Columbia as the loggers' local of the international woodworkers of America.

Mr. Donald Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Sir:

This is a copy of a letter which is addressed to the minister, copies of which were sent to me and some other people. The body of the letter states in part:

Based on press releases, it is my understanding that you proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act, to provide that construction workers will be entitled to use expenditures of transportation and board costs away from home as deductible from taxable earnings. It is also my understanding that legislation for this provision will be introduced in the near future and become effective for application on earnings during 1957.

We welcome this proposed change, as we have endeavoured for quite some time to get this type of legislation. However, we regret that it does not cover loggers who have identical problems. We have, over a period of years, made presentations to the federal government for this type of legislation, and in order to obtain support on this problem, our submissions have included requests for all workers with this type of problem.

I think that makes it clear that as far as the loggers are concerned they recognize the justice of the claim of the construction workers.

Mr. Fleming: What is the date of the letter my hon. friend read?

Mr. Barnett: December 9, 1957.

Mr. Fleming: I have not seen the original letter yet.

Mr. Barnett: I realize it is possible that this particular letter may not have come to the attention of the minister but I think he will have noted from the context as I read it that this particular local of the international woodworkers has made representations to the government, according to their statement, over a period of years. I might explain to the minister that this particular local which is known colloquially in British Columbia as the "loggers local" is the organization which represents the workers in the scattered logging camps along the coast of British Columbia from Vancouver to the Alaska border and because of the fact it is predominantly a loggers local it can be considered the spokesman of the loggers in the entire logging industry of British Columbia and Alberta. This is not a new problem at all nor one which has not had prior consideration within the Department of Finance.

I am going to turn for a few minutes to the debate which took place in this house last April when we were discussing the Income Tax Act. Following an extended discussion on the subject dealt with in clause 1 of this bill, as found at page 3035 of Hansard of April 3 last, I referred to statements that had been made by the then minister of finance and I said:

For some of the things the minister said I am inclined to hope that this may be a case of things having to get worse before they can get better.

I was referring to the minister's refusal to deal with the problem of bulletin No. 10. I suppose one could say that things are perhaps a little better at this moment than they were then as far as the stated intention of the government is concerned. I then went on to say:

I made reference to this matter in my budget speech. I said I thought this bulletin which is under discussion was extending the discrimination that I have been attempting to draw to the attention of the minister at the budget stage for the last several sessions.

I welcome the statement which the minister has made in part, because up until this year the only thing I have been able to get in the way of an answer from the opposite side of the house has been a few inconclusive words from the minister's parliamentary assistant on this subject. The one point to which I want to make reference, seeing that the discussion has gone this far, is this.

I agree in part with what the minister has been saying, namely that this problem is not something which is unique to the construction industry. As far as I am concerned, it applies equally, and as seriously, for example to the logging industry. In my opinion from the study I have made of the matter over the past several sessions, this whole question can be resolved only by a suitable amendment to the Income Tax Act—

Well, we now have an amendment to the Income Tax Act but the question as to whether it is a suitable one is open to debate. I went on to say:

—one that will remove what to me is a discrimination that now exists against the expenses that are incurred by those on wages and salaries in the course of earning a living.

As I said, I was referring at that time to some of the remarks that were made by the then minister of finance. I think I should point out that Mr. Harris made remarks which certainly should have come to the attention of the present minister if he has been giving any consideration to this problem. It will be found on page 3025 of Hansard of April 3, 1957, that Mr. Harris had this to say:

There is no question but that the construction industry is unusual in this field, yet it is not wholly unique. There are other industries in which allowances for board and lodging are given.

Later, on the same page, he said:

We have been doing our best to find a rule which would tax every one with the same kind of income unless there was a real case to be made for an exception. I think all hon. members of the committee would agree with me on that score, namely that if there are exceptions—if I am being taxed for one thing that some hon. gentleman opposite is not being taxed for—there must be great justification for that exception to be made.

Later, on the same page, he went on to say:

We want to see that all other workers who are in about the same kind of situation will have their cases considered on their merits and we will be able to know where to draw the line with respect to the exemption, whether it should be drawn just at the construction workers or whether it should be extended beyond that.

On page 3028 he continued with remarks to the effect that he thought it was clear that he had no fixed idea on this matter but, however, he did want a consistent tax law.

Some of us were inclined at that time to say, "All right, let us have a little more patience about this question and be prepared to wait a little longer so that we can have a consistent tax law." I suggest that we have now waited for some months and while it is perfectly true that there has been a change of government and that we have a new Minister of Finance nevertheless I think it is apparent from those remarks made by the previous minister of finance that this is something which has not suddenly come under review within the Department of Finance and I can see no real reason why the present minister should not have been able to proceed to bring in a proposal that would have been equitable as far as all the working people of Canada are concerned.

It is interesting, of course, to discover that apparently our present Minister of Finance is able to put forward one point of view in one particular situation in one place and to put forward a rather different point of view when he is speaking to a different audience on some occasions. I have in my hand a copy of the Ottawa Citizen of December 10 and on page 3 there is a story which is headed, "Fleming Blasts U.S. Subsidiaries Lacking Canadian Shareholders". The story goes on at some length to describe the remarks made by the minister to the audience to which he was speaking on that occasion. However, farther down in the article it is reported that the Minister of Finance:

Slightly changing the topic he suggested a few simple thoughts—

Well, I have heard it suggested on occasion—

[Mr. Barnett.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are on Bill 232 and I hope his remarks are going to come within the subject matter of this bill. I have been waiting to hear just how they are related to it but at the moment the Chair does not see in what way they are related.

Mr. Barnett: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I made reference to the headline of this article purely for the purpose of allowing the Minister of Finance to identify it. What I am about to refer to is directly related to the topic under discussion, as I see it. The paper reports with respect to the Minister of Finance:

Slightly changing the topic he suggested a few simple thoughts for ways in which tax laws should be devised, framed, interpreted and applied.

Then it lists under nine points the ways in which the Minister of Finance thought this would be done. Point No. 5, as reported in the paper, is this:

Taxes ought as a rule to be general in their application. The legislator should avoid discriminatory provisions.

When the Minister of Finance was making that statement he was, in effect, agreeing with some of the statements made in this chamber last year by his predecessor when we were discussing the point that we have under consideration in this clause of Bill No. 232.

Earlier in my remarks I made reference to the fact that, having looked into the matter for several sessions, I had come to the conclusion that the problem with which we are dealing can be dealt with only by a suitable amendment to section 5 of the Income Tax Act. Well, we have before us in the committee today a proposal for an addition to section 5 of the Income Tax Act but, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this is not a suitable amendment to the Income Tax Act because it is discriminatory and restrictive in its application. While, as I said earlier, it may be something that is welcomed by the construction workers at this time, nevertheless I am quite sure that they would be quite happy to see it applied to all other workers who find themselves in similar situations. Therefore, I should like to move:

That clause 1 be amended by deleting therefrom the word "construction" where it appears in lines 6, 12 and 13 on page 1, and in line 4 on page 2.

The clause as amended would then read:

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year from an office or employment, where the taxpayer was, during the year, employed as a worker, there shall not be included

(a) the value of, or an allowance (not in excess of a reasonable amount) in respect of expenses incurred by him for, board and lodging, received by him.

(i) in respect of, in the course of or by virtue his employment as a worker at a site from which, by reason of distance from the place where he maintained a self-contained domestic establishment (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as his "ordinary place of residence") in which he resided and actually supported a spouse or a person dependent upon him for support and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, he could not reasonably be expected to return daily to his ordinary place of residence, and

(ii) in respect of a period while he was required by his duties to be away, for a period of not less than 36 hours, from his ordinary place of residence; or

(b) the value of, or an allowance (not in excess of a reasonable amount) in respect of expenses incurred by him for, transportation between his ordinary place of residence and the site referred to in subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a), received by him

(i) in respect of, in the course of or by virtue of his employment described in subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a), and

(ii) in respect of a period described in subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a), during which he received board and lodging, or a reasonable allowance in respect of expenses incurred by him for board and lodging from his employer.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. On this amendment I want to point out that May, 16th edition, at page 554 says:

An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill.

The explanatory note of the bill reads:

This new subsection provides that a person employed as a construction worker at a construction site from which he cannot reasonably be expected to return daily to his ordinary place of residence where he maintains a home in which he lives with his wife or other dependant shall not be required to include in income the value of free board and lodging furnished during the period of necessary absence or free transportation furnished to or from the construction site, or a reasonable allowance paid to him to cover expenses of such board and lodging or transportation.

Now, it is strictly for the construction workers, and after reading the citation from May, at page 554, the Chair must rule the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, have you taken into consideration citation 502 of Beauchesne's 3rd edition, which reads:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

I suggest, sir, for your consideration the question whether my hon. friend's amendment is not a request that the scope of the exemption proposed by the government be enlarged.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I might also point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre citation 344 of Beauchesne's 3rd edition:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

This, in the opinion of the Chair, is enlarging the scope of the bill and therefore the Chair must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have sense enough to know that I am not able to say anything that would make the minister change his bill now, but I think he will take into consideration every suggestion that has been made. Since he wants to get away in a few minutes to bid farewell to his family, I say pass the bill and get it out of sight.

Mr. Christian: I will not take up much of the time of the committee, but I do wish to say this. Since the words "construction worker" have not been defined in the bill, that in itself will lead to a lot of confusion and dissatisfaction. I have two questions to ask the Minister of Finance. Why were not the words "construction worker" defined in this bill? Would a carpenter who goes from one logging camp to another to do carpentry work come within the definition of a construction worker?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to the second question is very clearly yes, he would be a construction worker under the conditions described by my hon. friend. As for asking for a statutory definition, I think we can leave the application of the words of this clause to the Department of National Revenue. It seems to me it is not a case for spelling out in detail lengthy definitions in this legislation. My hon. friend recalls that one of the purposes of the Income Tax Act when it was first introduced to replace the old income war tax act was to get away from the principle of a multiplicity of statutory definitions, many of which had given rise to a great deal of litigation in the courts.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, the phraseology and the general pattern of section 1 of this bill to amend the Income Tax Act are somewhat of a surprise to me. Indeed when I read the proposed subsection 2 of section 5 of the act, describing the class of workers who are to be allowed board, lodging and transportation expenses after an absence of more than 36 hours, I cannot help pointing out to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that this is too restrictive a clause.

You see, construction workers employed at a construction site make up a limited class of workers, especially in the riding I represent; in point of fact, it is a class which includes very few individuals.

In my opinion, the case of loggers and mine workers should have been particularly provided for.

About 50 per cent of workers in my riding have to go out and work in bush camps in the winter time. They often have to work 50, 75 and even 100 miles away from home, yet they are by no means provided for in section 1 of this bill.

Not far from my constituency there is at this time a very important project under way. The Aluminum Company of Canada is building a huge dam at des Passes falls employing for this purpose three to four thousand workers. About 90 per cent of these men have to live on the spot, travelling home only occasionally. I am sorry that they are not covered by this clause. I am certainly not surprised at the apparent generosity shown towards the end of that particular clause, which provides that the workers involved may be exempted for the year 1957. When I say I am not surprised, I mean that the number of workers thus exempt will be so small that the government can well afford to show itself very generous in this regard. It gives colour to the government's purpose, pretending to be granting a tax exemption whereas, in fact, all this is a mere show of words, a sham exemption wrapped up in involved phraseology.

I wish to go on record as protesting against that restrictive definition which discriminates against a large number of other categories of workers who would also have deserved to be tax exempt as regards food, board and transportation.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister several questions, one having to do with interpretation has already been brought up. In logging and especially in the pulp and paper industry there is a great deal of construction work involved and you cannot say that it is of a temporary nature because the whole course of the operation is towards permanency. I can think of actual highways that have been built. Some of our companies have constructed 200 to 300 miles of highways. For example, Marathon Corporation usually plans to construct up to 17 miles of highway a year and a number of bridges. So far as water works are concerned, they construct sluices, flumes, skidways and things like that which are permanent. If the company were to set up its bookkeeping operations in a suitable way, would it be possible to allow men detailed to that kind of work to have, instead of paying board and room, some adjustment of their wages to cover expenses in order that they may qualify under the construction clause of the act? That is my first question.

Second, the minister seemed to suggest that no studies have been made in relation to woods workers. I would remind him of an answer that was given to me and which can be found on page 938 of Hansard. I asked the following questions:

> Have any officials of the government made any studies and/or reports on the application and the possible effects of the extension of the expense deductions given to transport employees under subsection 7, section 11 of the Income Tax Act, to workers in either the woods or construction industry or both?

The answer was "yes". I realize that this is a slightly different section but I would infer from this that studies have been made with regard to woods workers. I should like to know the meaning of the statement the minister made in relation to that answer.

The third question I should like to ask has to do with the point the minister brought up about representation and strength of representation. I am sure we can all agree that when there is what one might call strong lobbying it is bound to bring something to the attention of the government, but just because the loggers and the bush workers have not been strong or vocal enough in presenting their case, whereas the railway workers and the construction workers have, surely should not mean that the one should have an advantage over the other when the similarities in their situations are so obvious. I should like to ask the minister whether he feels that strength of representation is more important than just the straight fairness of the position.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, to the first question I would say at once that if the particular individual concerned is substantially engaged in construction he would certainly be regarded by the Department of National Revenue as a construction worker in the interpretation of this clause. I cannot think of a clearer case of a man who is a construction worker than someone who is engaged in road construction.

As to the second question and the written answer given in reply to my hon. friend's question as found at page 938 of Hansard, I draw his attention to the fact that his question was put this way:

> Have any officials of the government made any studies and/or reports on the application and the possible effects of the extension of the expense deductions given to transport employees under subsection 7, section 11 of the Income Tax Act, to workers in either the woods or construction industry or both?

The answer was "yes". If my hon. friend expected a separate answer with regard to each of these categories he should have put his question in proper form for that purpose. The answer is quite correct because a study had been made with regard to construction workers, as my hon. friend can see.

On his third point, it is not a matter of the strength of the representation in terms of the number of those for whom the spokesman speaks. That is not the simple basis upon which the decision ought to be taken. It is a question of the equities and the fairness of the case that is put forward. What are the intrinsic merits of the case? In my view every case ought to be considered on its merits regardless of the number of those affected. If there is injustice to one or two people then, if the proposed expedient is sound, that should call for the exercise of a legislative remedy if the merits of the case justify it.

But the point I was making earlier was that the representations we received, and there were many of them, were all on behalf of workers engaged in construction. We made a study of that subject and we felt there was a good case. We saw and can still see administrative difficulties involved. I hope that no hon. member thinks that we underestimate the administrative difficulties that may be involved. But we thought that there was a good case there on its intrinsic merits and that we should ask the house to deal with that case.

Since I became minister we have not received any representations on behalf of other groups. What I tried to convey in my opening remarks on this clause was that every case would have to be considered and studied very carefully on its merits. Certainly I would not be in a position today to say that any other particular group should have similar legislative consideration extended to it.

We are prepared to look at any such case and assess it on its intrinsic merits. But here today, in the absence of such thorough-going study, I do not think my hon. friend would expect a snap decision or a commitment to be given by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fisher: Further to the answers that were given, may I say this. I have no desire to score on the minister and I am sure he has no desire to score on me in reference to the answer I read in Hansard. But it just points up the fact that the "yes" which I thought was all embracing only partially covered the question. I will see that in future my questions are more specific. But on the point of definition may I ask this question. If, as I plan to do as a result of the minister's remarks, I write to the pulp and paper companies in the region in which I am interested and inform them of the gist of the minister's statement and advise them to set up matters so that when people are on specific construction jobs the evidence of that fact will be very clear, would the minister see anything out of order in that or anything out of principle?

Mr. Fleming: It will be a matter to be decided in each individual case as to whether the particular taxpayer is a construction worker within the meaning of the clause; and that will be a matter of proof by evidence.

Mr. Ellis: There are a number of questions I should like to ask arising out of the minister's statement that the details would be left to the department officials to interpret. In view of the discussion we had in the house in the early part of April with regard to this matter, there are several things that I should like to clear up. The minister will recall that a great deal of the argument revolved around the question of whether a construction worker was a permanent employee or a temporary employee, and the former minister of finance argued that if a construction worker was not employed on a year round basis he would under no circumstances be able to claim exemption. I should like to ask the present minister whether any distinction is being made under this amendment as between temporary employees and permanent employees. In other words, if a construction worker takes a job with a firm which lasts through the winter months, just because that firm is not in a position to guarantee that he will be carried on the payroll throughout the following summer or the following winter, is this construction worker on that account going to be denied exemption under the present amendment?

Mr. Fleming: I think the answer to my hon. friend's question was given by me earlier in reply to an earlier question. Let us take the case of the permanent employee. The case was given earlier of an engineer who goes about on behalf of a construction firm engaged in overseeing construction projects. If that man is a permanent employee and is travelling on behalf of his employer I think you will find that in every case his travelling expenses are covered by his employer. There is no problem with regard to him. But let us take the case of that firm or that engineer hiring persons to go out on a particular job, we will say for a month, two months, three months or four months. That latter is the man on whose behalf this particular clause is introduced. As long as he receives that allowance for board and lodging within the terms of this clause, in his capacity as a construction worker, from his employer he will, in respect of that allowance so received by him, now receive exemption under this clause.

Mr. Ellis: The other question has to do again with an interpretation placed on this matter by the former minister of finance and which seemed to indicate that if a group of employees, in a desire to maintain employment for themselves during the winter months, were required to leave their normal place of residence in order to get work they would not be considered as employees entitled to exemption by virtue of the fact that they were not employed by a particular firm and were not travelling to the new place of employment on the orders of the company. My question is this. If during the winter months a group of carpenters find that there is no work in their own locality and if on their own, in order to maintain employment, in order to maintain their household in their normal place of residence, leave their home to take employment elsewhere, will they be entitled to the exemptions under this bill before us?

Mr. Fleming: I think it is clear from the clause that the worker in question, if he leaves home on his own in search of employment is in this position. We will say he goes from Ottawa to Aylmer in search of employment in the construction industry. The expense incurred by him in that respect does not come within the terms of this clause. But if, on obtaining employment in Aylmer, the nature of his employment is such as to bring him within the terms of the clause, then he will receive the benefit of the clause. In other words, every case has to be dealt with on its own facts. But if I correctly apprehend the example given by my hon. friend, namely, the man who goes away from home in search of work, if there is no more than that to the case it is not covered.

Mr. Ellis: The reason I asked the question is this. There are a number of workers in my own constituency who find work slack during the winter months. They are tradesmen. If they find that they can get employment in some other locality they leave. They cannot move their families; they cannot uproot their families and move to a new community on a temporary basis. Knowing that there is employment, or having good reason to believe that they can get employment in some neighbouring community, they leave and get work for a number of months. The thing I am concerned about is this. Just because they do not work for a particular construction company and travel to the new job on the orders or as employees of that company, I do not think they should be denied this exemption. I still feel that the workers in question should be entitled to deduct their expenses just as would the employees who work for a particular company and who move on instructions of the employer.

I have tried to make my point quite clear. As I say, it stems from the rather categorical statement made last year when we discussed this matter in the house by the then minister of finance, who argued point blank that if these people went on their own, unless they were ordered to do so by their employers they were not entitled to any consideration.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend will recall that this clause applies to allowances in respect of board and lodging or something equivalent paid by the employer to the employee. Obviously, in the case cited by my hon. friend the individual concerned is not receiving payment from the employer.

Mr. Ellis: That is the very point I was trying to lead up, namely the manner in which this amendment is limited. It is not a question of giving consideration to construction workers who must leave their normal place of residence. There are laid down in the amendment conditions which will deny to many construction and other workers who must leave their homes in order to provide their families with a pay cheque any benefit under the section which we are now considering. That was my point in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister. I feel that the section is not broad enough. Notwithstanding the worthy objectives outlined by the minister, there are still in my own constituency many who are not going to obtain any benefit at all under the provisions of this bill, even though, in order to provide for the needs of their families, they find it necessary to leave their normal place of residence.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to put one more question to the minister. Let us take the case of a group of, we will say, woodsmen, working for a pulp and paper company and engaged in the operation of cutting down pulpwood and so on. Suppose the pulp and paper mill decide they want to build a road and take a group of these men from the logging operation and put them at constructing a road. They clear a right of way for the road and probably work on it for one, two, three or four months or even a year or so on that kind of work. Where would it put them if they were allowed benefits for that time and then when they went back to their old jobs.

Mr. Fleming: I think in a case like that, the Department of National Revenue would have to examine the question very closely to see whether in essence, having regard to all the circumstances, the man is substantially a construction worker.

Mr. Hahn: I would like to raise one question on subsection (b) of clause 1. I note there it says:

The value of, or an allowance (not in excess of a reasonable amount)—

My question is, firstly, who decides the mode of transportation; is it the employee or the employer. Secondly, what is considered a reasonable amount? For example, how is it determined whether one should travel by air, by car or by bus and so on?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can lay down any hard and fast categorical rule as to the particular mode of transportation to be used. I suppose, if in any case a dispute arose as to whether an allowance had been extravagant, it would be necessary for the department to examine the allowance made for transportation as compared with the cost of transportation available to the worker in the circumstances and if it were to appear that the amount was in excess of what was the fare required in any acceptable and normal form of transportation then a question might be raised about it.

However, I think it is most unlikely that any serious problem will arise in determining a reasonable allowance for that purpose. If a man were, we will say, to hire a motor car or to use his own car and charge up at the rate of 50 cents a mile instead of the normal and usual charge made by employees of say nine or ten cents a mile, then that would be regarded as unreasonable and as an obvious attempt to pad. It is a question to be determined in every case in the light of all the circumstances.

Mr. Hahn: What I had in mind was whether the employee or the employer decides the method of transportation. For instance, if an employer says a man should be transferred from a job in the Kitimat area to one at Stewart for example, which is just a straight case of using such methods of transportation as are available—it might be transport by boat from one place to another and if the time element entered the picture it might be air—will the decision depend upon the method determined by the employer or will it be the one the employee chooses to take in the circumstances?

Mr. Fleming: This is not a new type of legislation, Mr. Chairman. The Department of National Revenue is dealing with these cases with respect to transportation allowances all the time and there will be no more difficulty in interpreting and applying this clause than there has been in the thousands of cases with which the department is now dealing.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the minister in clarification of a point raised by the hon. member for Regina City with respect to this matter of travelling expenses. As I read the clause, on the question of travelling expenses one has to refer to subclause (a) (i) which says in part:

—in the course or by virtue of his employment as a construction worker—

Now I think a question does arise there in view of what the minister has said about not going along with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Regina City as to what is going to be the interpretation of the point at which employment commences.

I would phrase my question in this way: If a construction worker is referred by the officers of the national employment service to do a job and the situation is such that there is no local hiring agency or office of the construction company at the place from which he leaves and the formalities with respect to his employment are not completed until he actually arrives at this job, in that case may it not be considered that by virtue of his employment he would be entitled to his travelling expenses in going to the job.

Mr. Fleming: Not unless the employer provided an allowance for the worker in those circumstances as a term of his employment.

Mr. Barnett: Well does the minister mean to say that if it is not the practice of a particular employer—as is sometimes the case in the logging industry—to advance fares before a man leaves his home and that man has to pay his own way to the job and is not reimbursed by the company, he will not be entitled to this exemption?

Mr. Fleming: My friend's question takes us into an entirely new field, entirely new and quite outside the scope of the present clause. He is raising the whole question of the definition of expenses under section 11 of the act, expenses laid out for the purpose of earning income. Now that does not arise under this clause at all; this is a clause dealing with allowances by an employer to an employee and my friend's question does not arise here at all. It takes us into the interpretation of an entirely different section of the act.

I might say that section 11 was put in the act a long time ago and has been the subject of constant interpretation. It is a matter of determination in every case under section 11, whether an expense is incurred or an expenditure is laid out for the purpose of earning the income. If a man goes to another place to look for work, I think the department in that case is not going to treat his expenses as being laid out for the purpose of earning the income. However, I must take the position that this question does not arise under this clause at all. We are entering a different field, a different part of the act entirely.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, on this point, the provisions under section 11 of the act, as I have always been led to believe in the discussions raised on this point, are provisions for expense allowances which are allowed to certain categories of people, such as travelling salesmen etc. Those on wages and salaries have been specifically denied these provisions under section 11 of the act because of the provisions of section 5 and my understanding is that the only way in which those in receipt of income from wages and salaries can qualify for any of these deductions enjoyed by other people is, as I suggested earlier, for a suitable amendment to be made to section 5 of the act which is a limiting section. As I understand it, those whose incomes come from wages and salaries can only deduct expenses for certain specific things. Now I fail to see that the question I have raised is not relevant to the proposal that the minister is bringing forward to provide an exemption for certain additional expenses under section 5 of the act.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the opening words of section 5 state:

> Income for a taxation year from an office or employment is the salary, wages and other remuneration, including gratuities, received by the taxpayer in the year plus > (a) the value of board, lodging and other benefits—

Of any kind whatsoever, and so on. The purpose of the amendment is to provide that in the cases defined by the clause now under debate the construction worker does not carry that allowance from the employer into his income upon which tax may be levied.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the coal miners cannot carry that expenditure into their income tax either. Why should it be that just one certain branch of industry is allowed this exemption? Why should not other workers be entitled to the benefit of its provisions? In the mining industry it often happens that the owner of a mine will transfer some of his help to another mine under his ownership, yet the men concerned are not allowed to make this deduction. A particular case occurs to me where men employed in a mine in Evansburg were moved to Drumheller, still employed by the same company. I think this is a case quite parallel to the conditions under which construction workers are employed. Thus we find that one group of workers are penalized because they do not receive the concession granted to another group. It seems hardly fair that while we are giving this assistance to one group of people, another group should not be receiving it. I think this provision should be made sufficiently broad to cover all industries where a similar situation exists.

Mr. Fleming: I gather that the hon. member was not in the committee earlier this afternoon when we were reviewing this subject. There was an extended discussion of this point.

Mr. Barnett: As hon. members of the committee realize, when earlier today I proposed an amendment which would have met the point so laudably raised by the hon. member for Bow River, you, Mr. Chairman, ruled that the amendment was out of order. The question of order was mentioned by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Your Honour may have realized that it was partly because of the impending departure of the Minister of Finance that he did not deal with this point of order more extensively than he did, and I should like to say this: in view of all the discussion which has taken place on this question, and in view of suggestions which he made, and to which I myself referred earlier, that amendments to the tax laws should be non-discriminatory in their application, the minister could leave for Paris with a much clearer conscience and expect to have a much happier reception on his return to Canada if he would consider accepting the amendment which I proposed, and moving it himself before he leaves on this important mission.

Mr. Fleming: I assure the hon. member that if we do not get on with this section I will not be getting to Paris anyway.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Partial Dependency.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on clause 2, I think the increase in the allowable exemptions to dependents was a good move by the minister when he introduced his baby budget, but I do feel that it falls far short of the campaign promises which were made by the Conservative party. It seems to me that to implement their campaign promises would require a much larger exemption on account of dependent children, and for that reason we in this group are proposing at this time that the $250 exemption be increased to $500 for a child of family allowance age, and that the exemption of $500 should be increased to $750 for a child beyond family allowance age.

During the recent election campaign the Conservative party made much of its statement that the previous government had overtaxed the people by $500 million. Time and time again throughout the campaign the Prime Minister made the statement that the average family was being overtaxed by $120 a year, or $10 a month. He put this statement in another way when he said that every Canadian man, woman and child had had their pockets picked by $30. The proposal I am about to make would, if followed, result in the government meeting and carrying out its own campaign statements to the effect that the average family is overtaxed by $120.

I have here an example of an income tax payer who has an income of $4,000, and who has two dependants of family allowance age. Under the Harris budget, with a taxable income of $1,700, this taxpayer would pay $235 in the course of a full year. Under the proposal I am suggesting, increasing the allowance to $500, this taxpayer would pay $110, representing a saving of $125. This, as I say, is in line with the Prime Minister's statement during the election campaign and it goes a good deal beyond the tax relief granted by the Minister of Finance in his budget.

There is an overlying reason why I have advocated such an increase. I feel that the previous government made a very drastic mistake when they did nothing over many years to prevent family allowances losing their purchasing power, and I have calculated that to restore family allowances to the purchasing power they had when they first became effective in 1945 will take an increase of 64 per cent on the basis of the amount set at that time. Proposals for an increase along these lines were not accepted by the previous government and they are not being accepted by this government, and I feel the suggestion I am now making is a realistic alternative to the suggestion that we in this group have made for so many years that family allowances should be increased by 60 per cent over the 1945 rate in order to restore their purchasing power.

Because of this argument—the desirability of giving the income tax earner something which would provide him with some real measure of relief—I move:

That clause 2 be amended by deleting the figure "$250" from lines 19, 25 and 32, and by substituting therefor the figure "$500", and also by deleting the figure "$500" from lines 20, 26 and 32 and by substituting therefor the figure "$750".

The government said during the election campaign that the public of this country had been overtaxed by $500 million and yet the Minister of Finance in his budget—his peanut budget—said that the total tax relief would amount to $146 million. If you add to that the amount the government is increasing expenditures from the national treasury in other fields you still arrive at a total that is far short of the $500 million tax relief that was so clearly a commitment made by the present government in the election campaign to the people of Canada. The motion I have moved on behalf of this group is certainly in line with the promises of the Conservative party and is directed toward seeing that the government fulfils its own election promises.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Green: May I submit to Your Honour that this amendment is out of order. It would involve the expenditure of additional sums running, I believe, into approximately $150 million. Under the rules of the house it was never contemplated that a private member could put forward an amendment of this kind. It makes a farce of the financial responsibility of the government and if this practice is to be followed then we will in effect no longer have responsible government in Canada. I submit to Your Honour that this wrenches any ruling that was made yesterday completely out of all recognition and I would ask Your Honour to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that I seem to have collected something of the voice of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, I would be prepared if necessary to argue this point of order at length. I am satisfied, however, that it is not necessary to do so. In fact, I wondered when the Minister of Public Works got up where he was yesterday.

This amendment is on all fours with the amendment that was moved yesterday. Yesterday it was an amendment in committee to a taxation bill which had not been preceded by a ways and means resolution and it was an amendment that proposed a further reduction in a tax which the government was asking parliament to reduce. Today we have exactly the same thing. Today we have a taxation bill which was not preceded by a ways and means resolution in which the government is asking for a reduction in a certain tax. This amendment seeks a further reduction in that same tax.

The Minister of Public Works seems to have added some new words to his vocabulary since he moved across the way. He now says this would be a farce. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any farce so far as the proceedings in connection with this budget are concerned they relate to the failure of the government to precede taxation measures with proper ways and means resolutions. I would like to take this opportunity, sir, of congratulating you on making a ruling at eight o'clock yesterday which was consistent with the ruling which Mr. Speaker made last Monday. I think everyone knows that I did not agree with the ruling which Mr. Speaker made on Monday but once he made it I accepted it and, having accepted it, my whole argument yesterday was that you, sir, should make a ruling consistent with the position that the Speaker took when he was in the chair and I do not think it is inappropriate for me to congratulate you on the ruling that you made and on its absolute consistency.

The Minister of Public Works said that if Your Honour did accept this amendment it would make a farce out of our financial proceedings. I say if there is any farce it is the government's own fault. I say to the Minister of Public Works, one who belongs to the Conservative party which a year ago wanted the rule of law to be preserved in this house, that he is asking Your Honour to make a farce out of procedure. He is urging you to make a ruling directly opposite to the ruling you made after due consideration at eight o'clock last evening. As I say, if hon. members on the government benches want to proceed with a procedural debate they can have it but relying on the consistency of the ruling that Your Honour made last night I do not think it is necessary.

Your Honour recognizes that I did not press the point with regard to the amendment that my colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni made to clause 1 of this bill. I must say I think Your Honour had a point in suggesting that perhaps there was something slightly irrelevant to what was before the committee in clause 1 but there is no irrelevance so far as this amendment to clause 2 is concerned. This amendment seeks to do exactly what was sought to be done by the amendment proposed yesterday, namely to ask for a reduction in a tax further to the reduction proposed by the government. All the citations we cited from May and the other authorities and the excellent citations you read from Campion all support the validity of the position you took yesterday, a position which I feel you have no alternative but to take again today.

I can see that the advantage of the ruling yesterday and the advantage of what is now happening may be that the government will not again make the mistake it made at this session in bringing in a budget without following the proper budget procedure but that is of their own making, even against our advice. In view of the present situation and in view of the ruling you made last night I trust you will make a proper and consistent ruling at this time and accept the amendment that has been moved on our behalf by my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): As all hon. members know, when this question arose yesterday I spent a considerable amount of time on it and went into every citation that was given and I gave my ruling last night. In looking at this amendment I still feel that this amendment seeks a reduction in taxes and therefore I will have to rule that it is in order.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, with great respect I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I never thought I would hear that from my hon. friend.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is restoring the ancient glory of parliament, I suppose.

An hon. Member: You had better think that over.

Mr. Pickersgill: Boy, oh boy, the dictatorial mentality certainly develops quickly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I point out that this is not only Friday the 13th, it is a black Friday the 13th.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unlucky Friday.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order while the Clerk is writing out the appeal.

Shall I rise and report to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, in committee of the whole, Bill No. 232, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, was being considered. Mr. Argue moved the following amendment:

"That clause 2 be amended by deleting the figure '$250' from lines 19, 25 and 32, and by substituting therefor the figure '$500', and also by deleting the figure '$500' from lines 20, 26 and 32 and by substituting therefor the figure '$750'."

Mr. Green raised a point of order to the effect that the amendment was out of order on the ground that it was not open to a private member to propose a reduction in a tax proposal submitted by the government. I ruled that, in my opinion, such an amendment was in order; whereupon Mr. Green appealed to the house from the ruling of the chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is the following. In committee of the whole, when Bill No. 232, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, was being considered, Mr. Argue moved the following amendment:

"That clause 2 be amended by deleting the figure '$250' from lines 19, 25 and 32, and by substituting therefor the figure '$500', and also by deleting the figure '$500' from lines 20, 26 and 32 and by substituting therefor the figure '$750'."

Mr. Green raised a point of order to the effect that the amendment was out of order on the ground that it was not open to a private member to propose a reduction in a tax proposal submitted by the government. The chairman ruled that in his opinion such an amendment was in order, whereupon Mr. Green appealed to the house from the ruling of the chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was not confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having priority.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and pay for work performed on statutory holidays.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I have had the privilege of presenting to the house on previous occasions. I hope that it may fare better in this parliament than it has in the past. As a matter of fact, I have had the privilege of presenting from time to time two bills which are companions to each other, one calling for annual holidays with pay, and this one calling for statutory holidays with pay.

It was something of a satisfaction when the speech from the throne was read at the opening of this parliament to discover that the new government had taken notice of at least one of these matters and promised that provision would be made for a bill to provide annual holidays with pay. That, of course, is another matter, and one which is under debate under two other orders but, as I say, it is good to note that by bringing these matters before parliament from time to time some progress is made.

I confess that just now when I looked at the speech from the throne to find the reference to the labour legislation that was to be introduced I happened to glance at another paragraph in that speech. I am afraid I would be out of order if I read it now, but it is my view that this particular paragraph—the second paragraph in the speech from the throne—has been blacked out by what happened here a little while ago.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who is calling order?

Mr. Speaker, it is readily recognized in this day and age that the time has come for workers in industry to have as a matter of right certain time off, not only annual vacations with pay but statutory holidays. Progress in this field in Canada has been very slow to date. As far as I can ascertain, only six provinces have any legislation regarding statutory holidays. Those six are Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—two in the east and the four in the west. Even the legislation which these provinces have is in most instances not very advanced. In the case of Newfoundland and British Columbia, according to the latest information I have been able to obtain, all the legislation does is to state that certain days are public holidays. No provision is made in the legislation of these two provinces for overtime rates of pay for those who work on those holidays, or for pay as a matter of right on those holidays to those who are let off from their regular work.

In the other four provinces, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the legislation goes one step further inasmuch as provision is made for certain statutory holidays and for those who work on them to be paid at rates set out either in legislation or in regulations made under the legislation. These rates of pay vary. In most cases the legislation provides for overtime rates to a varying extent.

In only one of the six provinces I have just named does the legislation go all the way. That one province is Saskatchewan, where in the matter of statutory holidays there is, first of all, provision for such holidays to be observed; where there is, in the second place, provision for an overtime rate of pay for those who are required to work on statutory holidays; and in the third place provision that all employees who are entitled to these holidays get paid for them at their regular rate of pay, without having to work on those days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to introduce that principle at the federal level. Everyone knows that labour legislation in this country is the subject of divided jurisdiction, that most of our workers come under provincial jurisdiction, leaving about 10 per cent of our workers under federal labour jurisdiction. Because of this situation it has been a matter of interest to those of us who follow these things that the federal authorities should take the lead so that this legislation should not only bring benefit to those workers who are under federal labour jurisdiction but in order that the provinces may be encouraged to follow suit.

In this instance, therefore, we are asking the federal government not just to do something which the provinces have done, because the provinces have not gone very far in this field; we are asking that the federal government should take the lead. Let it be perfectly clear that any law with regard to labour which the federal government may pass does not impose any legal obligation on the provinces. But it does have a moral effect in that the provinces feel that they have to pay some attention to it. It is on that basis that we are pressing this legislation now and placing it before the House of Commons.

Those who argue against this legislation—and I know what the arguments are because we have had this bill up before—contend sometimes that the federal government should not get too far ahead of the provinces. To me that argument seems so weak that it hardly calls for an answer although I have already answered it. Another argument used by those who would oppose this kind of legislation is that this is a matter to be left to collective bargaining. That is an argument we have had to meet all along the line as far as labour legislation is concerned. Everything, from hours of work, the number of days to be worked a week, wages, working conditions, everything on which labour has sought legislation has been met with the argument that this should be left to bargaining between employers and employees. In the early days it was not even collective bargaining, it was just a matter of leaving it to employers and employees, and in practical terms that meant leaving it to the employers.

Today we have reached the stage of collective bargaining and the tendency of those who are opposed to this kind of legislation is still to suggest that this should be left to machinery of this kind. We have had to face that argument in the House of Commons with regard to such matters as annual vacations with pay, yet this session there is not only my bill but a government bill on the order paper dealing with this matter. We have had to meet this same argument with regard to equal pay for equal work; we have had to meet it with regard to fair employment practices; we had to meet it a number of years ago with regard to the protection of pension rights. I remember raising this matter, seemingly times without number, and being told by the late Humphrey Mitchell and others that this was not a matter concerning which we should seek to enact legislation. But, ultimately, the house did enact legislation protecting pension rights against loss due to strikes or lockouts, along the lines I had proposed.

And so, step by step, it has been recognized that there are certain rules of the game, certain labour practices, which in all fairness should be regulated by legislation. There is no doubt in my mind but that sooner or later this one will be recognized as other matters have been so recognized. My plea is that it be sooner rather than later and so I present this bill to the house. As I say, it is the same bill that has been presented on previous occasions. It proposes that all the workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall be given certain holidays off work with full pay, those holidays being New Year's day, Good Friday, Victoria day, July 1, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day.

I might point out that these are the holidays that are observed for the most part in all parts of this country. There are some holidays that are observed only in certain areas such as the civic holiday that we observe in some areas on the first Monday in August and then there are holidays like St. Jean Baptiste day that are observed in the province of Quebec. My bill provides for a minimum of eight statutory holidays a year with pay leaving it to the possibility of provincial legislation extending it to some of those holidays that are observed locally if this is desired.

May I point out that my bill of necessity is one containing quite a few details. That is what devolves upon one when he presents a bill rather than a resolution. In a resolution one can ask for consideration of a general proposition and not have to take the responsibility of spelling out the details but these resolutions that state general propositions seem to take much longer to reach the statute books than an actual bill. It is also true that by means of a bill one can get debate in this hour from five to six that cannot be had in the case of resolutions. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I urge upon hon. members to realize that when we are dealing with the second reading of a bill we are dealing with its principle.

Now, if there are some details of the bill that some hon. members think go a little too far, or not far enough, or which they think should be changed, let it be clear that those changes could be considered and effected in the industrial relations committee to which, after second reading, I would move that this bill be referred. For example, I am sure there will be differences of opinion in this house as to the rate of overtime pay to be provided for those who are required to work on statutory holidays so as to keep essential services in operation. The rate I suggest is in the bill. At this moment I refrain even from mentioning it although I suppose I should not because it is a detail in one of the clauses but my main reason for refraining from mentioning it is to urge that hon. members not oppose the bill because they consider that this particular rate is too high or too low. That is one of the details that could be considered, discussed and amended if necessary in the committee. What is before us at this time on second reading is not the details of the bill but the broad general principle and that broad general principle is one that the Canadian Labour Congress has placed before the government in its submissions in October. It is a principle which I believe commends itself generally to members of this house and I hope the house will approve it. That principle is a very simple one, that the workers of this country who come under federal labour jurisdiction should be granted by legislation of this parliament at least eight statutory holidays a year with pay. I urge the house to adopt this bill.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be much disagreement with the principle of this bill as outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the granting of eight statutory holidays a year with pay to those who come under federal labour jurisdiction. It has been admitted by the hon. member who introduced the bill that there is a certain conflict of jurisdiction, perhaps an overlapping, between the governments of the provinces and the federal government but I think if one surveys the pertinent legislation on the statute books of the provinces from coast to coast one will find that the bill proposed by the hon. member does not interfere to any significant degree with the broad general principle laid down in this bill that there be at least eight statutory holidays in the year.

My personal feeling is that the suggested holidays are not spaced as well as they could be. In fact, I would go much further than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who suggested eight statutory holidays and I would propose that we endeavour to arrange to have one statutory holiday occur in each month of the year.

At the present time we have one in January and then there is a hiatus until we come to Good Friday. Then we have Victoria day and Dominion day. Many municipalities hold a civic holiday on the first Monday in August. After that we have Labour day followed by Thanksgiving day. We have made a provision for Remembrance day to be observed as a statutory holiday although it is very seldom observed. Finally, in the last month of the year, we have Christmas day.

Perhaps it could be arranged to have a statutory holiday occur in February and St. Valentine's day would probably be acceptable to everyone as a suggestion. We could also arrange to have one in March and probably my good friend who sits smiling on the other side of the house would agree that there is a certain day in March that would be highly acceptable to Irishmen. I am thinking, of course, of St. Patrick's day the patron saint of the Irish. This would serve to place a holiday in each month with the exception of June and I do not think there would be much difficulty involved in selecting a suitable holiday in that month.

An hon. Member: The 10th.

Mr. Lesage: The 24th, St. Jean Baptiste day.

Mr. Small: Yes, probably everyone would be agreeable to accepting St. Jean Baptiste day and surely no one could disagree if we were to find a day in July to honour the other group of Irishmen, the Orangemen, and transfer the holiday from July 1 to July 12 in order that they might be included in the picture. The civic holiday in August to which I have already referred would serve to round out the picture as far as observing a holiday in every month of the year is concerned. I think both labour and management would be satisfied to accept the principle I have outlined.

In my working days there never was any difficulty in securing these holidays off from work. We were always given these holidays whether or not we had a union but although it was recognized that we would have these statutory holidays we experienced difficulty in getting paid for them. When it was decided that we should be paid for them the question arose as to what basis of pay we would receive. In the first instance we received normal pay, then time and a quarter, then time and a half, and finally double time. At present if a statutory holiday occurs while you are enjoying a regular vacation with pay and you are required to work on that day you receive normal pay plus double time and in effect you receive three days' pay for one day's work. Some workers regardless of how genuine their identification with the union is are quite eager to work on a holiday in those circumstances where they can receive three days' pay for one day's work. That is the picture of statutory holidays in this country in the future as I see it. If we work toward that end I think we will attain it.

There is also the problem that we found during the war. There was a considerable abuse of statutory holidays. The problem was this. When you gave a statutory holiday and they are paid for it they want to take the following day off to finish up the celebration, or probably the day before. Then a rule was brought in at the suggestion of the union in an attempt to defeat absenteeism or prevent it. A rule was laid down that the employee would have to be at work the day before and the day after. There was not too much difficulty about it. When they got paid for the holiday I suppose they thought they could take one for themselves. When the war was on, absenteeism of that kind cut down production, and it was made part and parcel of the union agreement, and I think rightly so. Anyone who has had any dealings with the unions, as I have had for a good many years, knows that there has to be production in order to pay the wages. If we have a five-day week and a statutory holiday comes within that week, that reduces the week to four days, and if you have an employee who takes a holiday on his own, that cuts his week's work down to three days. That is all the work you will get out of him in that week. I think my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre would agree with me on that.

Paragraph (b) of section 2 reads:

"full time employee" means any employee who, in a week in which a statutory holiday occurs, works or is required to be at the disposal of his employer not less than 28 hours exclusive of overtime and any time the employee works or is required to be at the disposal of the employer on that holiday.

This paragraph can be interpreted in this way. The 28 hours that he has to work in a week could be four 7-hour days in that week, or it could be three 8-hour days and a half. If the latter were applied to statutory holidays it would defeat the purpose that the union had in mind that a man must work the day before or the day after. There is not too much trouble with that particular phase of it because most of the holidays are now arranged so that they come on Monday in order to give the employees a longer week-end. There is no difficulty with the day before the holiday. It is the day after that causes the difficulty. There has been quite a shemozzle over that one. If the employee does not turn up the day after he still thinks he should be paid for the holiday regardless of union agreement. An equitable arrangement was worked out whereby employees would be paid for the statutory holiday if they appeared the day after. In other words, if they appeared at nine or ten o'clock in the morning the day following, they would receive the same for the holiday. That was a compromise.

These are the difficulties that are encountered in ordinary industry, but probably they would not apply so much here with union employees because they are more or less on a contract basis and would turn up to work the next day. Nevertheless, industry as a whole has probably solved this. It is not what you might call a pressing problem with labour now because it is generally recognized by employers that employees get these statutory holidays and the other holidays such as Christmas day or New Year's day and probably July 1, which is Dominion day, would be problem ones. Those are movable holidays; they may come at the beginning, in the middle or at the end of the week. Holidays such as Good Friday create no difficulty whatever. Labour day is a holiday which comes on Monday and so does Thanksgiving day. The civic holiday in August is generally on a Monday. Therefore, what is involved here is the day after. There is no difficulty here. This bill is to take care of federal employees.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has advanced his arguments and is bringing this matter to the attention of those who work for the federal government. There are some difficulties involved in the arrangements for the taking of those holidays, and I have mentioned a very important one. It is going to create a certain amount of hardship in government work, and is something that should have been considered.

Industry all over the dominion has accepted the suggestions which have been put forward by the unions in this respect, but nurses and doctors who work in hospitals controlled by the government have no set time during which they shall work. They do not even have an 8-hour day. They are working on an extended program, and something along this line will be a Godsend to them. It is a very beneficial piece of legislation so far as they are concerned and will impose a further strain on the economy, whether it is the dominion government or the provincial government that is concerned because the hospitals are hard pressed now to get sufficient doctors and nurses.

If this bill becomes law, it will have a beneficial effect so far as they are concerned, there will have to be an arrangement under which they will get an 8-hour day and a 40-hour week in order to get the advantages which are long overdue. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre probably overlooked this. This is one of the benefits that will be derived from the statutory holidays, but it will also affect and be related to the 40-hour week.

There is also one other matter with regard to statutory holidays which is causing a little trouble in industry. When the statutory holiday falls on a Saturday the employees want Saturday to be considered as part of the week, and they want to get paid for that Saturday. Saturday has been a holiday down through the years. The employees have a 40-hour week and therefore they do not get paid for Saturday when the holiday falls on that day. They have just lost it. One of the difficulties we find with a Saturday holiday and also a statutory holiday is that in our business, particularly, where we have to go on lots where there is a lot of car parking, we find that the only time we can get on is a Saturday or a statutory holiday because there are no cars on the lot at that time. That is the only time they will let you work there. You have to pay a man triple pay for a job that you find yourself legislated into because of the demands of the union.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Small: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether he is aware of the fact that the question he raises about Saturdays is covered in my bill?

Mr. Small: Yes, it is covered in the hon. member's bill, but the way it is going to work it is going to cause a problem to the small man in business. It is all right for the big industry or the firm that hires a considerable number of employees, but the small man has to try to meet the labour conditions he is encountering. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member has it in the bill but I think there is a most glaring omission with regard to one important group that should be covered. I refer to nurses and other employees of hospitals as well as doctors who do not have a 40-hour week or the benefit of statutory holidays. The bill would place a strain on the supply of nurses and doctors.

I bring up these things because the general purpose of the bill is admirable but, as I pointed out, there are certain things I should like to see added to it. There are certain employees who should be covered by it and provision should be made to take care of those who work in hospitals performing very hard and essential work which in most cases is not appreciated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Those, of course, come under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Small: Sunnybrook hospital and all the other military hospitals come under federal jurisdiction. I think that the bill, having in mind the premise on which it is based, is a good and sound one but if these little things could be worked out I think it would make a better bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We can do that in committee.

[Mr. Small.]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has left me just about enough time to say that I am in favour of the principle of the bill and if it should pass I should certainly like to see it go to the commitee on industrial relations for further study. I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat has probably strained his imagination more than the bill would strain the economy. His arguments are arguments I have heard many years ago, of course.

Mr. Small: You are still hearing them, too.

Mr. Byrne: I have heard the argument about the strain on the economy and the related arguments that employers use when discussing this question. But the hon. member has overlooked the fact that particularly when these matters are being negotiated between labour unions and employers they are in the final result written into an over-all package agreement that is the net result of negotiations. The principle of having pay for statutory holidays involves recognition of the fact that almost 100 per cent of those who are on wages and salaries do their budgeting from month to month and the fact statutory holidays may dislocate their budget has resulted in the wage bill being spread more evenly and including statutory holidays.

Again, the principle of punitive pay for statutory holidays is to prevent employers using the services of employees on a statutory holiday and while it is necessary for certain categories to remain at work the purpose is to ensure that no persons are required to work on a day considered to be either a religious or national holiday in order that they may be free to enjoy the holiday with the rest of their fellow citizens. The punitive aspect was introduced for that purpose.

The hon. member was concerned that the punitive measures might be too harsh when workers pay is doubled. If the pay is only doubled it simply means that the employer may work an employee on a statutory holiday and it costs him no more than to work him on any other day because he must pay him in any case for the statutory holiday should he remain at home. Therefore, to be consistent, double time or triple time are the only figures that may be used.

I have made some inquiries about legislation in the provinces. I find that in Saskatchewan this fact is recognized but they also provide there for the payment of double time and a half for certain employees who are not required to work because of the public service which they perform while those in performance of public service receive double time or straight time and a day off.

Mr. Small: If the work is urgent they do not mind the triple pay.

Mr. Byrne: No, I think triple time should be paid. I had much more to say in favour of the legislation but I would not want to talk it out so I will take my seat.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to speak on the excellent bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I presume I now have 30 seconds left to speak on it before something happens and the house adjourns for supper. There is one point in the bill that I think should be looked into particularly by the hon. member when at some future time he brings it before the house. I refer to the obligation it places upon employees, that is, workingmen, to do certain things, that is, to be paid or in the alternative to face 30 days in jail or a fine of $200.

On motion of Mr. McCleave the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, last night I named the resolution preceding the bill to provide a loan to the province of New Brunswick as being called for today. It is not the intention of the government to go ahead with that today and I thought hon. members would like to know.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will we be going on with the income tax bill at eight o'clock?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May we inquire who will be piloting it tonight?

Mr. Green: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that we were denied the opportunity to test the committee by a vote on our contention as to what should be done with regard to these exemption levels, may I ask the minister if he will make a statement as to the consideration given to this matter by the government? Does he think that $250 is a sufficient exemption level for a child of school age in this day? Does he think that $500 is a sufficient exemption level for children 16 years and over, particularly when they are attending college or university? Is he prepared even now to suggest to the committee that these figures might be raised? After all, by the provision of the last subsection in this clause these changes do not become effective until the calendar year 1958. If that is the case, that they are put off until next year, would it not be possible to raise these figures to higher levels than those suggested in clause 2?

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend has asked me about the consideration that has been given to this matter. I can tell him that very careful consideration was given to the increase that the government is proposing in this clause in the amount of exemptions for dependents. I point out that the figure $150 for every child qualified for the family allowance has been in effect now for some years and the increase of $100 in that exemption which has been proposed by the government represents an increase of 66⅔ per cent in the existing exemption. In the case of dependents not eligible for the family allowance the government is proposing an increase from $400 to $500 in the exemption. The exemption of $400 has been in effect now for a good many years and the increase that the government is here proposing is an increase of 25 per cent in that exemption.

I have already informed the house that the cost to the treasury in loss of revenue by the flat increase of $100 for all dependents is $60 million per year. The fact is that looking at all our commitments and the budget requirements, it is the opinion of the government that this is as far as we can go in this direction under existing circumstances. It may be pleasant to conjecture what we might like to do in the way of increased exemptions. But the fact of the matter is that we have substantial other commitments.

I come back to the point that I have already stressed several times, namely that the government, coming into office in the middle of the year, faced with a situation not of its own creation, has had to make all its financial plans within the circumscribing limits of the existing budget approved by the house last spring. We consider that we have gone a long way in our proposals for a reduction of $178 million in the tax burden. We have concentrated it on the income tax, and in respect of the income tax we have concentrated the benefit on persons in the low income groups.

In the light of the amendment that was introduced by the official opposition to the last budget last March, this is in keeping with the position that we took at that time and the position that we have for years taken that there should be reductions in the income tax and that principally the benefit of those reductions should be concentrated in favour of persons in the low income bracket. That is what this proposal and the others contained in the present bill accomplish. I trust that the committee will see fit to give enthusiastic endorsement to the clause.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say we will give endorsement to the proposal, but it would be much more enthusiastic if the figures were more nearly related to what the minister asked for when he was on this side of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the Minister of Finance should be allowed to get away with the statement he has just made, namely that the government came into office in the middle of the year with everything set. Only three months of the fiscal year had gone by on June 21. A government with any real energy could have brought in new proposals if they had wanted to do so.

Mr. Barnett: There may very well be something in what has just been said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In the reply he has just given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the minister spoke about having to deal with existing conditions and said that this proposed amount was all that he felt those conditions warranted. A good many times in these discussions about financial proposals the minister has sought refuge in the fact that he was working within the framework of a budgetary pattern that was set by the previous administration. He has just done so. That contention might or might not have validity in respect of certain matters. But what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out is that this is a proposal that comes into effect in the next taxation year when we assume the minister, if he is still in office, will be giving us something in the nature of a real budget which will represent entirely his own thinking and the government's own thinking on this question. In view of that fact it seems to me that the argument he has been using in connection with the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre hardly applies in connection with this question. I think that is particularly true when we consider that we had no indication whatsoever from the government since it took office that it had intentions to increase the basic exemption of married and single persons without dependents with respect to the application of income tax.

Mr. Hahn: Before clause 2 carries may I ask the minister this question. Can the minister give us any idea how much it would have cost the treasury if they had doubled these figures to $500 and $1,000?

Mr. Fleming: Is my friend asking for double the proposed new rate or double the existing rate?

Mr. Hahn: The proposed new rate.

Mr. Fleming: That is to say, raising from $250 to $500 the exemption in respect of each child eligible for family allowance and raising from $500 to $1,000 the exemption in respect of each dependent not eligible for family allowance?

Mr. Hahn: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: I will have an answer in a moment. According to the best estimate we can make in reply to my hon. friend's question, it would probably cost in addition to the present increase between $200 million and $225 million per annum.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my disappointment with clause 2 of this bill whereby the government proposes to increase the dependant's exemption by only $100 which, moreover, will apply only to the taxation year 1958.

In the light of the Conservatives' glowing campaign promises, we are inevitably led to the conclusion that their Niagara of promises is being doled out through a medicine dropper.

What the people of Canada were expecting was a complete review of exemptions, one which would have meant substantial exemptions for the ordinary wage earner, for instance a basic exemption of $1,250 for single people and $2,500 or $3,000 for married people, over and above the normal exemptions for dependants, whether or not family allowances are received.

The best way to help large families share in the wealth of this country is to raise the rate of family allowances, as was done by the Liberal government but which the present Conservative administration, so far, has failed to do in its unawareness that human values are still our greatest asset.

A student of dentistry, whose parents live in my constituency, was telling me recently how hard it is for him to get by financially because of the income tax. It's all he can do to earn a wage which does not even cover his tuition fees, food and board, and though he passes up well-deserved holidays so as to keep his job, he has to pay out $200.00 a year in income tax. His parents, in poor circumstances, are unable to help put him through dental school. It seems to me it is high time that generous exemptions be allowed to students who find it so hard to pay for their tuition and where parents pay for a son or daughter's college education, special exemptions like these should be allowed so that children of parents of modest means will not be debarred from higher learning because of financial difficulties.

I know of this through personal experience of financial instability during my own university years, and you may rest assured, Mr. Chairman, that this group of students in modest circumstances, caught between a legitimate ideal and the dictates of primo viver, have my fullest sympathy.

I am making this suggestion while the bill is being introduced, hoping that the legislators may soon give consideration to students who are bleeding themselves white to pursue an ideal which will soon benefit society as a whole. It is therefore a duty for society to make it as easy as possible for these young people to reach their goal. There is no better way of brightening the future than by lessening today's burden.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Clause 3 of this bill is the clause that makes a change in the rates of taxation under the Income Tax Act. Let me point out at the outset that in making these changes the minister is doing something which I am happy to commend. He so seldom draws a commendation from me that he might put this one down in the book.

Mr. Hahn: You have not finished, have you?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No my hon. friend from New Westminster is right, I have not finished. I will come to the other aspects of the matter in due course. What is good about this change is that the minister made it in such a way that those in the upper brackets do not get a greater reduction than those in the lower brackets. Oftentimes when reductions in income tax have been made they have been effected on a percentage basis so that for the few crumbs which were handed to those in the lower brackets quite substantial reductions were given to those in the upper brackets. The way the minister has done it, by reducing the rate of taxation on the first $1,000 by 2 percentage points and on the second $1,000 by 1 percentage point and then carrying only that same reduction through to the upper levels, has meant that the result is that those in the higher brackets save only $30 a year under this provision and that is also the case with those in the lower brackets, except, of course, those who have no income beyond that in the first bracket. In their case they do not have quite so much.

Nevertheless, we think this is a poor substitute for the belief which this country had that the Conservative party would raise the exemption levels. As has already been pointed out, this was very definitely promised by the Minister of Transport in a speech made in Gananoque on May 23. It was argued in the House of Commons by the Conservatives in other sessions and, generally speaking, the country thought that was what the Conservative party stood for. Now the Minister of Finance comes before us with a budget, the provisions of which cover the calendar year 1958, and no change has been made in the exemptions.

Therefore, it seems to me that we have to try to improve the situation as best we can. This is a bill which proposes reductions in taxes and as was established by a ruling made in this house yesterday, a ruling made by the hon. gentleman who was in the chair this afternoon in pursuance of a ruling made by Mr. Speaker last Monday, we have the right to move amendments reducing still further any taxes which are reduced by this bill.

There is no way under the provisions of this bill whereby we can move any amendment raising the exemption levels of $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. If there were such a way we would avail ourselves of it. However, since there is no such way, we feel a move in that direction could be made by reducing still further the rate of tax that applies to the first $1,000 of taxable income. That is what I rise to suggest now. I shall do more than suggest it, I shall move an amendment to that effect.

Our suggestion is that the rate of tax on the first $1,000 of taxable income, which is at present 13 per cent and is a reduction from the 15 per cent at which it stood a few years ago and which the minister now seeks to reduce to 11 per cent, should be reduced to 8 per cent.

We do not suggest any other change of the tax rate under these various brackets. The minister's proposal was to reduce the first rate by 2 per cent and the rate on the second $1,000 by 1 per cent and that meant that for all of the brackets from there up there will be a reduction of $30. Our proposal for a further reduction in the first bracket of 3 per cent and no other reduction takes another $30 off each of the amounts of tax specified in the clauses of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Do you propose to save $30 for the millionaire?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, we give the millionaire another $30, the same $30 as is given to those in the lower brackets. My hon. friend will realize that $30 to a person with an income of $3,000 or $4,000 means a lot more than it would to his millionaire.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To achieve this change which we feel is desirable as a means of further relief to those in the lower income brackets I move, Mr. Chairman:

That clause 3 be amended by deleting the rate "11 per cent" from paragraph (a) and by substituting therefor the rate "8 per cent", also by deleting the figure "$110" from paragraph (b) and by substituting therefor the figure "$80" and also by reducing the corresponding figure in each paragraph from (c) to (p), both inclusive, by $30.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of this amendment which I move on behalf of this group is quite clear. It provides this further $30 reduction so far as the first thousand dollars of taxable income is concerned and provides the same $30, but no more, to each one of the taxpayers in all the other brackets. May I repeat, in view of the interjection of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that the millionaire will get a further $30 reduction as a result of this amendment but no more. The income tax payer whose taxable income is only $1,000 will also get the full $30 reduction proposed by this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if by any chance any point of order arises in respect of this amendment, I know the Minister of Finance, recalling what happened on May 24 and 25 and May 31 and June 1 of last year, will support my right to be heard on such point of order.

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you proposing to make a ruling?

The Chairman: I was reading the amendment.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought you had finished reading the amendment. If you have any thought of making a ruling, I ask to be heard first.

An hon. Member: Who is running the house?

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member will anticipate my ruling in this regard.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you sir for giving me the privilege to speak to the ruling which you suggest I may anticipate. As I indicated before I sat down after moving my amendment, I was sure that the Minister of Finance would support my right to be heard on this point of order.

I mentioned certain dates the significance of which I am sure will not be lost upon the minister. On May 24 of last year he had difficulty in being heard on a point of order. On May 25 he had difficulty in being heard on a point of procedure, and he knows what happened as a result of his insistence that he had the right to be heard. He knows how in due course he was led out of this house although we voted solidly against the course of action proposed at that time.

Mr. Benidickson: Was that with the Union Jack?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this amendment is on all fours with the amendment moved yesterday. Indeed, it is more closely akin to the one moved yesterday than it is to the one moved this afternoon, although there is a great similarity to that one. The amendment moved this afternoon which the hon. member for Spadina, who was then occupying the Chair, ruled in order sought to increase the level of exemptions in the case of allowances for dependants. This amendment is slightly different; it proposes directly a reduction in the rate of tax. That is exactly what the amendment did yesterday. It proposed a reduction in a rate of tax. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if the amendment yesterday was in order this amendment is also in order.

It is not necessary for me to go over the citations which we read yesterday going back a century or more to prove our right to move an amendment of this kind when there is before the house a bill reducing taxation prior to which there was no ways and means resolution. Mr. Speaker accepted that proposition so far as this bill is concerned under the ruling he made last Monday. The hon. member for Spadina accepted it yesterday, and he accepted it again this afternoon. The position is as clear as that. This is a bill which by the government's own action was brought in apart from the regular rules of financial procedure. Therefore it must be handled according to the provisions laid down in the chapter in May which has to do with bills that do not impose taxation. The hon. member for Spadina, when he ruled last night on yesterday's amendment, added to the citations which had already been placed on the record by giving an excellent one from Campion, and on the basis of Campion and May and the other authorities he ruled that that amendment was in order.

Mr. Chairman, I will take no further time to argue the right to put this amendment on the basis of all that has happened in the past because I imagine the problem which confronts you is what to do in view of the fact that the committee this afternoon by a vote of 72 to 60 set aside the ruling of the then occupant of the Chair that our amendment on clause 2 was in order.

On one occasion, Mr. Chairman, one who was occupying your position found himself in a similar situation. It was on May 24, 1956. The occupant of the chair at that time was confronted with the fact that he was being asked to rule on a matter concerning which in his opinion there had already been a ruling that day. We were dealing with Mr. Howe's closure within closure. We were dealing with Mr. Howe's desire that we not debate clause 1 of the pipe line bill but go on to clause 2 and then when we got to clause 2 he moved that further consideration be postponed and that we go on to clause 3. Those who were here will remember that incident.

Mr. McIvor: We do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When we raised the point of order against Mr. Howe's right to move that motion on clause 1 it was debated and a ruling was made. The ruling was appealed and the house sustained the ruling of the Chair. When we got to clause 2, and Mr. Howe sought to do the same thing over again we again raised a point of order. When I say "we" I admit it includes the member for Winnipeg North Centre but it also includes the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. We with others, the Minister of Justice, for example, contended that we had the right to bring in new evidence and to decide again as a committee whether or not Mr. Howe could apply this form of closure.

The chairman on that occasion endeavoured to say that he was bound by a ruling which had already been made that day. He stated no authority, no citation on which to base that contention. There was strong objection, and by whom? The hon. member for Eglinton, the present Minister of Finance, who insisted that there were new facts to be brought to light and that the former decision did not bind the Chair. Indeed, when the chairman cut off debate and reported the matter to the Speaker the then member for Eglinton asked that it be included in the report that he had been denied the right to speak to that point of order. That was not the day the hon. member for Eglinton was named but it was the beginning of the heat that developed and the next day in a similar situation having to do with a matter of privilege the hon. member for Eglinton again being denied the right to speak was named and put out of the house for the balance of that day.

Mr. Fleming: Not named, suspended on a government motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the Minister of Finance wants to have it on the record that he was not named but was suspended on a government motion he can have it that way if he wishes.

Mr. Benidickson: He would not obey the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My point is that the right of the house to review a decision, the right not to be be bound by a decision already taken the same day, was asserted last year on May 24 by no less a person than the minister who is now sponsoring the bill that is before the committee. We did have debate on that point of order and the Chair ruled against us. We again appealed the ruling; as a matter of fact, we went on doing it for several days as hon. members to my right will recall and will admit. We did the same thing on clause 3 and on clause 4 of the pipe-line bill.

In other words it has been established that a ruling made by the Chair appealed to the house and settled by the house does not preclude the house from reconsidering the whole matter. It is on the basis of what my hon. friends who are now on the government side did in that debate on May 24 and 25 of last year that I insist Your Honour must consider this point afresh.

May I also point out that the last time in my memory that a government member appealed a chairman's ruling was in 1948. The Honourable Senator Golding as he is now was then in the chair and, oddly enough, we were dealing with a taxation matter. Hon. members will recall that the issue arose because the opposition had out-voted the government on a taxation measure. The government, trying to get out of the difficulty, raised a point of order to the effect that the vote had been improperly taken. Mr. Golding stood his ground and ruled that he had properly put the question and that the vote was in order. The point of order raised by Mr. Abbott, supported by Mr. Mackenzie, was to the effect that it was not proper to deal with the individual paragraphs, of a ways and means resolution seriatim, that they had to be taken as one. The ruling of the chairman on that occasion was overruled by the majority of the house but I draw the attention of this committee to the fact that though although for a year or two the effect of that ruling bound the house in an iron-clad fashion so that we were required to discuss ways and means resolutions in their entirety, gradually the effect of that ruling made by a decision of the house has been worn down. Who helped to wear it down? The Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Benidickson: They now stand for might against right.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why don't you smile when you say that?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Time and time again when we got into committee of ways and means on the budget resolutions presented by the late Liberal government these gentlemen and others, and we too, insisted that we should apply common sense and deal with the paragraphs of the ways and means resolutions seriatim. The result is that by 1956 if one looks into the Hansard record of the debate on the ways and means resolutions he will find, thanks to the insistence of the hon. member for Greenwood and the Minister of Finance, that these resolutions were called paragraph by paragraph and the discussion carried on in an orderly way. In other words, despite the seemingly iron-clad nature of a vote of the house in 1948, common sense has prevailed. We have for all practical purposes got back to the same way of doing things that was in vogue before the government of 1948 appealed against a ruling of the chairman.

I submit with all deference, Mr. Chairman, that the house at this moment is still the master of its own proceedings. The house at this moment is still a group of intelligent members who have the right to decide what is a proper course of procedure.

I realize the difficult position in which you find yourself. You know of the ruling that Mr. Speaker made on Monday, you know of the ruling that the hon. member for Spadina made in the chair at eight o'clock last night and you know that to be consistent with those two rulings you have to rule that the amendment I have now placed before you is in order. What you are confronted with is the vote of the house this afternoon which seems to have the effect of changing the decision made by Mr. Speaker on Monday and the decision made by the hon. member for Spadina both last night at eight o'clock and this afternoon.

I know of nothing more damaging to the rule of law, nothing more destructive of the integrity of the Chair, nothing more crushing to an occupant of the Chair than to be called upon to make decisions that represent a change from decisions previously taken, to be called upon to make decisions not consistent with those already given.

Let me call a witness on this point. I turn to Hansard of June 7, 1956, at page 4796.

> Members have a right to know that the rules of the house will be observed and not be dependent upon the caprice of the majority. They have the right to know that the rules will not be reversed by the demands of expediency.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will not reverse Monday's decision and yesterday's decision by any demand of expediency such as I suggest we saw this afternoon. I continue:

> They have a right to ask that the decisions of today shall not be reversed tomorrow by the presiding officer, whatever the consequences may be to the majority in this house.

I realize that in the present house the government is not in the majority, but it seemed to muster a majority vote this afternoon. To all intents and purposes the government is in the same position as was the government to which this speaker was referring.

Mr. Broome: No; come off that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does anyone have any doubt as to whom I am quoting? I am quoting the then member for Prince Albert, now the Prime Minister. I continue with the quotation:

> They have a right to ask—

This is the Prime Minister speaking in the House of Commons on June 7, 1956.

Mr. Broome: We have no majority.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is something else you have not got as well.

> They have a right to ask that the decisions of today shall not be reversed tomorrow by the presiding officer, whatever the consequences may be to the majority in this house. We have the right to demand that in the future frustrated ministers—

Whether they be the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works or the Prime Minister—

—will think of the consequences to Mr. Speaker—

And I interject that no government has the right to crush the heart out of a Speaker by seeking to override his attempt to be fair and impartial, and that has been our experience at this session with all the occupants of the chair.

—if at any time by overt demand or subtle compulsion—

I hope you have not been put in that position, Mr. Chairman.

—they place him—

Mr. Broome: What insinuations are you making? I think you should be a bit more careful.

Mr. Coldwell: Talk about insinuations; this is what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Benidickson: A straight quotation.

Mr. Coldwell: The Prime Minister said this.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I continue:

> We have the right to demand that in the future frustrated ministers will think of the consequences to Mr. Speaker if at any time by overt demand or subtle compulsion they place him in a position where he must depart from what, on the basis of his wide experience, he had determined was the right course to follow. Sir, if the rules under which parliament operates, if the decisions of today in a deliberative, orderly assembly, are to be reversed tomorrow by the presiding officer who made an earlier decision, then we shall have chaos.

I agree that these were great words from the lips of the present Prime Minister when he was in the opposition. I go on with the quotation:

> If the accumulated usages and precedents of the past can be set aside when they are detrimental to the government of the day, then parliament will be placed where respect and dignity will be supplanted by disrespect and disorder.

Those are words from the then member for Prince Albert who, when he became Prime Minister, put these words into the mouth of Her Majesty the Queen:

> Parliamentary government has been fashioned by the wisdom of many centuries. Its justice, authority and dignity are cherished by men of good will. It will be the high purpose of my ministers not only to preserve these qualities but to take steps to make both houses of this parliament more effective in the discharge of their responsibilities to the people of Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: What a farce.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the government does not do that. The government does not achieve the dignity of parliament; the government does not achieve the maintenance of the rule of law; the government does not achieve respect and order, and all these things that the Prime Minister has so much to say about, when the first time it finds itself frustrated, faced with necessity, it appeals the decision of one of the presiding officers of the house after the officers as a group have tried, as they have during this session, to give impartial decisions.

The decision that was made yesterday, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Spadina was in the chair, I recognize was a difficult and important one for him to make. He made it properly; he made it in complete consistency with the decision taken by Mr. Speaker last Monday. I throw in only this sentence in parenthesis, that everyone knows that I did not agree with the ruling that Mr. Speaker made on Monday. But once he made it we accepted it, and it was our contention that we should stay on the ground which was established by that ruling. We stayed on it yesterday, we stayed on it this afternoon in the ruling that the member for Spadina made on the amendment to clause 2, moved by my friend the member for Assiniboia. But we got off that ground when the government, in utter disrespect for the integrity of the Chair,—

Mr. Benidickson: Their own chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The government seemingly forgot that cartoon in the Globe and Mail of 1956 about the destruction of the Chair. We got off that ground when the government, in utter disrespect for the integrity of the Chair, chose to appeal that ruling and forced him to come back into the chair and say: My ruling has been overruled; the amendment which I said was in order, on the basis of the great amount of study I gave to the matter, I must now declare to be out of order. Mr. Chairman, it was the immediate response of mine—and I know it is on Hansard—when the Minister of Public Works did what he did this afternoon: "I never thought I would hear that from my hon. friend", and that was the way I felt about it. I say this to the committee. We are witnessing today something every bit as serious as what took place during those tumultuous days of 1956. Does the rule of law mean anything, or does it not? Are we going to be consistent or not?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friends may groan over there if they wish.

Mr. Broome: Can you change the budget as you wish?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Wise guy.

Mr. Pickersgill: What budget?

Mr. Benidickson: Change the rules as you wish.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Vancouver South is here in this house—maybe the hon. gentleman whom he defeated is somewhere around this building, for that matter—because the country did not like the way the Liberal government set aside the rules of parliament during the pipe line debate. Now, tonight, he is sitting over there jeering at us for insisting on proper procedure in this house.

Mr. Broome: I am not jeering. We have a minority government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is jeering at us because we want the rule of law to be maintained. There is one point I want to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Broome: To maintain the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one point I want to make clear, Mr. Chairman. I never felt more strongly—

Mr. Broome: You never made anything clear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear some interjections over there but I will pay no attention to them. I never felt more strongly about a point of order than I feel about this one, and I felt pretty strongly about some of those that we had during the closure experience. Mr. Chairman, here we have not the chair running into difficulty because members of the opposition disagree with a decision that has been taken; we have the chair running into difficulty because the government is frustrated,—

Mr. Benidickson: Overruled by their own friends.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —because expediency requires that a ruling be set aside. I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I am making this appeal just as strongly as I can that you stand where the member for Spadina stood yesterday and today, that you stand where Mr. Speaker stood when he made his ruling last Monday. I say to you that if because of the difficulty of the position in which you find yourself, and this is up to you, sir, you find you have to rule against my amendment, I shall not do to you what the Minister of Public Works did to the member for Spadina this afternoon. You are not making a ruling under any threat of an appeal from this side of the house. So far as we are concerned, you are free to give this matter your best thought and to make the decision that you believe should be made.

But I submit to you that in view of the rulings on Monday, yesterday and today there is only one ruling that can now be made. I submit to you that the demands of those to your right in the last parliament—you, sir, were not here but you must know all about what happened in 1956—for reconsideration set aside any thought that this afternoon's vote of the house binds you now. Indeed, I submit that just as the Prime Minister used these words—

An hon. Member: Quit stalling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear some Conservative say "quit stalling". I think, Mr. Chairman, of how the Prime Minister has had so much to say about the rights and the supremacy of parliament, of how words to that effect grace the pages of this blue document that the Tories spread around the country in the last election, and then my hon. friends opposite say "quit stalling" when we are talking about this very issue. This is what the Prime Minister had to say on this matter when he was the private member for Prince Albert:

> To me, parliament and the maintenance of its supremacy, its authority, its dignity, are above the fortunes of a pipe line.

To us on this side of the house, Mr. Chairman, to us in this corner anyway, parliament and the maintenance of its supremacy, its authority, its dignity, are above the frustrations and the embarrassments of a government, of a minister who has failed to bring his legislation before us in the proper way and is now trying to have set aside fair and impartial rulings that have been made by those who occupy the chair of the house.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I have the highest regard and respect for those who have occupied the chair during this session, not only Mr. Speaker, but you, sir, and the deputy chairman of committees and the hon. member for Spadina who has taken your place so often. In my view the respect that we hold for you should not be attacked by the government by asking you to change your position but that just as we leave you free of any threat of appeal so the government should leave you free of any threat of appeal —how they can do it after what they did this afternoon I do not know—and leave you free of any notion that because you happen to be a member of the government party you are bound that way. You are the chairman of the house. The dignity, the supremacy of parliament rest in your hands as you make this decision.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, something of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just said requires a reply. I think my reply can be summarized by reminding the hon. member of the fact that there is no majority in control here. The appeal that was taken this afternoon was taken to the House of Commons in which there is no majority party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Taken by whom?

Mr. Fulton: Taken by the government, yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Why?

Mr. Fulton: Because we felt that the ruling that was made was wrong.

Mr. Benidickson: Against your own nominee.

Mr. Fulton: It was taken to the House of Commons and the appeal was upheld by the House of Commons in which there is no majority party. I heard some of my hon. friends of the Liberal party applauding statements and sentiments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as they are entitled to do, and applauding him particularly when he was critical of the vote taken this afternoon. But I remind them that among the majority who voted against the ruling this afternoon was every Liberal who voted here this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, sir, every Liberal who voted voted to sustain the Chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Your own nominee.

Mr. Fulton: I admit the correctness of what the hon. gentleman has said. I should have said, voted against the appeal.

An hon. Member: He is labouring now.

Mr. Fulton: No, I am not. My point is that had hon. members opposite felt that we were wrong this afternoon as strongly as they appear to feel it tonight they should all have been here and voted; because I remind them that no party has an absolute majority in the house, and we knew that when we took the appeal this afternoon. We took it because we believed that the position we had taken was correct, and we knew we were submitting it to the judgment of a house which could overrule us if the majority felt we were wrong.

Mr. Gardiner: You only had 72 votes here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: It is true that most of the members of the C.C.F. party were here and voted in support of what they said were their convictions and I respect them for it. But I think they should respect us for the fact that when we submitted this point to the judgment of the house we knew we were submiting it to a house in which we did not command a majority and we were prepared to abide by the results.

Mr. Gardiner: You wanted us to become the government, eh?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I remind the hon. member for Melville that that decision does not rest with us. It rested with the people and it will rest with the people again whenever that decision is sought.

This point of order is a question upon which there are honest divisions of opinion, and I wish we could deal with it on that basis because there is no majority here which can force its will upon others at all. Last night we made a submission and I argued in support of that submission. I argued sincerely on the basis that I felt it was not in order for a private member to make a specific motion with regard to the rates of taxation and I still hold that view tonight. What we have asked is recognition of the fact that that is one of the rules of parliament and that as a rule of parliament and, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre likes to put it that way, as a rule of law, it should be upheld. That is what we are asking.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been very incomplete, for him unusually incomplete, in his argument and his appeal to the principle of the rule of law because he forgets that the rule of law contemplates appeals.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why did you not appeal yesterday?

Mr. Fulton: I will come to that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You accepted that ruling.

Mr. Fulton: We appealed this afternoon. Is my hon. friend objecting because we appealed a little late? Is he saying that because we did not appeal last night we have no right to appeal ever? I do not think my hon. friend would say that. What we did this afternoon was to appeal on the basis of a rule which we felt should be sustained.

Mr. Pickersgill: What rule?

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend has not paid attention or perhaps has not been able to follow the arguments advanced, I am not going to repeat all the arguments made last night by the Minister of Finance and myself. We put those arguments forward and this afternoon we followed the rule of law which contemplates an appeal. It was not an easy matter for us to say that the member who was acting as chairman and was a member of the same party as ours had made a mistake.

But we felt that he had, and that the repetition of the mistake and the grafting of the precedent that would have been set by the ruling made, if that ruling had not been appealed, would have been damaging to parliament. As I submitted last night—

An hon. Member: What about yesterday?

Mr. Fulton: I am talking about yesterday. As I submitted last night, and as I state again now, it is an elementary rule of parliament that only the government can make specific submissions or motions with regard to the rates of taxation. We talk and properly so; we talk about the rule of law and the rules of the house and say that they must be maintained. So they must and in my submission the government is seeking to maintain an elementary rule. But in addition to the rules written into the rule book, I have always understood that we are governed by the rule of common sense and that the rules of parliament are themselves based on common sense. It is a common sense rule that no private member should be allowed to move specific amendments with regard to the rates of taxation. That is an elementary protection to other private members. What kind of a position would you be in, Mr. Chairman, if that were allowed? I should go back a moment in order to anticipate an objection I know will be made.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the common sense of having brought in a ways and means resolution?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend bases his position here on the fact that we ourselves said that we do not need a budget on this occasion and that we are bringing in a bill that does not require a ways and means resolution. That being the case and that procedure having been ruled to be in order by the Speaker, he therefore says all the ordinary rules of common sense and all the ordinary rules that govern the dealing with taxation measures are suspended and private members can make specific amendments. But, Mr. Chairman, what kind of position do you get into if you follow that argument? Last night or yesterday afternoon a relatively—and I use the word deliberately—minor amendment was moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia moved the one on the excise tax.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Fulton: Very well; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if he made that motion. That amendment would have involved a comparatively small amount.

An hon. Member: What is $20 million?

Mr. Fulton: It would have caused a comparatively small upset or readjustment in the taxation proposal submitted by the government, namely only $20 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is $20 million?

An hon. Member: What is a million?

Mr. Fulton: That is what my hon. friends are saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is $20 million, they say.

An hon. Member: You said that.

Mr. Fulton: It was comparatively small in the light of the fact that today we had an amendment moved that would have involved $150 million. That is exactly my point. Once you admit—and in my submission erroneously as was done by the ruling made last night—the right of a private member to move amendments which would involve reductions in taxation or variation in taxation, you open the door. Last night we had a $20 million amendment. This afternoon we had an amendment moved that would have involved a variation of $150 million. From there I know perfectly well that my hon. friends would take it further and say, "We could do that on the taxation bill in the fall of 1957. Why can we not do it in the budget bill in the spring of 1958?"

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you not going to bring in a budget in the proper way next year?

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly why the principle has been laid down and maintained that private members may not move specific amendments to the amounts of taxation, because it places other private members in an absolutely impossible position. That is the rule of common sense, reinforced by the rules of this house from the beginning of our procedures and the beginning of our rules. Yesterday evening the Chairman made a ruling that the amendment moved was in order. We did not believe that the chairman was correct but we were prepared to see whether my hon. friends would be reasonable as they asserted they were being. Today it became perfectly apparent that they were not being reasonable and that they were taking—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Advantage of our rights.

Mr. Fulton: —advantage of the opening made by the incorrect ruling last night to repeat what in our view was an error and one which, if left unchallenged, would graft upon the rules and procedure of this house a fundamentally wrong system.

Mr. Pickersgill: Started by the Minister of Finance in this so-called budget.

Mr. Fulton: I have heard my hon. friend previously but I have already heard him to worse effect than in the remark he has just now made.

An hon. Member: He can get worse than that.

Mr. Fulton: An appeal was taken this afternoon without any pleasure on the part of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was evident.

Mr. Fulton: That appeal was taken because we felt it was necessary to prevent repetition of the error made last night. That ruling was appealed to the house. The House of Commons, in which there is no party majority, upheld the appeal. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to my hon. friends opposite including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that it would be a violation of common sense, in the face of the decision of the house taken this afternoon, to ask you—as he is asking—to say, "I defy the House of Commons and, notwithstanding the decision of the House of Commons, I am going to agree that only the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can be right in this house".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Benidickson: Might does not make right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege. I am not asking you to say that only I am right; I am asking you to go by the precedents of 100 years.

Mr. Fulton: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member is asking you to go by his interpretations of the precedents of 100 years. We have placed before the house our interpretation of the precedents of 100 years and the House of Commons sustained us this afternoon. For the hon. member to compare the situation today with the situation in 1956 is for him to indulge in a type of argument that I have seldom known him to be guilty of previously.

An hon. Member: Guilty?

Mr. Fulton: Or perhaps I should say that I have seldom known him to partake in previously.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just wait a few minutes and you will get the answer to that.

Mr. Fulton: When the hon. member talks about black Friday and when he quotes what was said on the occasion of the pipe line debate, he forgets what was the substance of the complaint. The complaint then made by him and by us was against the abuse of the Chair by an absolute majority.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was there not a majority today?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Fulton: There was a majority in favour; a majority upheld the appeal against the ruling, yes. A majority upheld the appeal from the Chairman's ruling because the party of my hon. friend who just interrupted did not have the interest—or lacked some other quality—to vote for it; for there were—

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the 40 Tories?

Mr. Fulton: —only a very small scattering of that party in the house, and I am informed that there were others of them behind the curtains and in the lobby who deliberately stayed out.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is not an honest man on that side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend is so carried away by his embarrassment, which I perfectly understand, that I am going to overlook the impropriety of his remark and the resentment that I might otherwise feel because of it. On reflection I know that my hon. friend will realize that what he is saying is not only out of order but entirely unjustified. I therefore think, Mr. Chairman, that the matter must rest there. If the House of Commons, in which there is no party majority, does not agree with us in our submission and our interpretation of the rules, and does not agree with us that it is a sound principle that only members of the government should be able to move specific amendments with regard to the rates of taxation, then the remedy lies in the hands of the present house. But I must say, I think it ill-becomes an hon. member who says that he believes in the supremacy of this house to criticize a government which has submitted its judgment and its opinion to the hands of the house in which it does not command a majority.

Mr. Coldwell: Let me say first of all that the genesis of all this is because the government set aside the rules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: Because the government brought in what is, in effect, a budget in a manner which is not in accordance with the procedures and rules of this house and, having found themselves in a position where the members of the opposition could do that which they could not do if this measure had been brought in under the rules of the house, in a proper manner, when we took advantage of it and they were frustrated, what did they do?

An hon. Member: Used their common sense.

Mr. Coldwell: They endeavoured to set aside the rules under which we are operating, even as we are operating now. The Minister of Justice says that common sense must prevail. I think the experience of the ages written into our rule books was the experience brought about by the common sense of members of parliament throughout the ages.

Mr. Fulton: That is my whole point.

Mr. Coldwell: And in order to serve their hour and their minutes of power they have set aside the common sense, the accumulated common sense, of the ages. I felt badly in 1956 and I expressed myself very keenly about it; I feel just as badly tonight—just as badly—because I see a government in power tonight which during the campaign which resulted in their election went across this country denouncing what had been done in 1956 and telling us that if they were in power they would do two things, they would restore the supremacy of parliament and would restore respect to the Chair. And what have they done today?

Mr. Benidickson: Overruled the Chair.

Mr. Coldwell: We have a Speaker whom we all respect; we have chairmen who have given us what we consider to be fair rulings, and what have these people opposite done? They have undermined the Chair in this House of Commons at the very beginning of the first session of this parliament.

Yesterday we had a ruling; last Monday we had a ruling; that ruling is there. It was a black Friday in June 1956; this is Friday the 13th, another Friday. Might I quote something that was said at page 4856 of the debates of 1956:

> We saw the culmination of this thing on Friday morning when a decision arrived at the previous night—an important decision—was reversed in the most calculated, brutal and callous manner and under the most calculated, brutal and callous pressure.

Who said that?

Mr. Fulton: By a majority party.

Mr. Coldwell: The Minister of Justice said that, those are his words.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, by a majority party.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Coldwell: We say the same position—

Mr. Fulton: By a majority party in 1956.

An hon. Member: What is the difference?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was the same; it is dictation by the government.

Mr. Coldwell: You know, my hon. friends when they were on this side of the house and the followers of the government on that side stood up and voted, as they said, without knowing what they were doing or voting about as hon. members did today, they called them trained seals. I am not going to inflict that jibe on the members opposite.

Mr. Vivian: You had better not.

Mr. Coldwell: Who is telling me I had better not?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what they are, unless they are untrained seals.

Mr. Coldwell: I would say the gentlemen are so untrained that they did not know what they were doing this afternoon.

Mr. Broome: What about your own members?

Mr. Coldwell: I think this exhibition on the part of the government is something the people of Canada should know about and the people of Canada should remember and as far as I am concerned, just as I felt on that other night, that I should expose what I considered to be the wrongs done to parliament and to the chair by the late government when it was in power, so I shall do with this government to the very best of my ability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: I think this is nothing short of a disgrace. I say to the Minister of Finance, why did he not get the Secretary of State to bring in the flag tonight and hang it upside down?

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Coldwell: Upside down—a signal of distress or sorrow; that is the way it should be done tonight.

An hon. Member: Are you talking on a point of order?

Mr. Coldwell: I do not mind your interruptions; go ahead and interrupt all you like; it does not upset me a bit. I am just expressing some of the feelings I have in my heart tonight. I have respected this institution of parliament; I have respected the Chair, and I want to say that this afternoon I felt heartsick and I feel tonight just as I did 18 months ago. For the sake of expediency you brought in the measure in the wrong way; for the sake of expediency you did what you did this afternoon, and to boast that you got a majority in this house in the circumstances that existed here this afternoon—

Mr. Benidickson: Careful, they will throw you out and you will have to have your own flag.

Mr. Coldwell: —is no excuse at all for what is being done. I want to say to the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Public Works—I wish the Prime Minister were here,—to recall what they said about the undermining of parliament 18 months ago. They should read again their remarks because they have done in a different way precisely what was done in May and June of 1956.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the matter before the committee at present is a matter of order and that we have had decisions made by the chair on the point on two or three occasions within the last 48 hours. I understand further that those decisions have been in accordance with the practice of this house during the 25 sessions which I have attended and they have also been in accordance with the decisions made in 25 sessions of the legislature of the province which I attended before I came here. I have listened to some of the discussions earlier in this session and have even said to persons on this side of the house that the idea which has been expressed by the chairman of the committee in the last few days is in accordance with the long-time practice of an institution of this kind. That is, generally speaking, in dealing with matters having to do with money a private member has no right to stand up in his place and move for a further expenditure of money or for any action which might result in further expenditures of money, but he has a perfect right to get up and move that any expenditure of money which is proposed be cut down and reduced. Of course, one does not need to depend upon even the decisions of the chairmen in order to appreciate that that is true. I have here Hansard for July 26, 1956.

Now it is true it was the voting of money or the utilization of money that was under discussion, but the principle is the same no matter whether it has to do with that or whether it has to do with what we have been discussing. The present Minister of Finance, speaking as the private member for Eglinton, said this as reported at page 6487:

> I should like to point out that last year the department asked for and obtained a vote of $3,250,000 for this item. The minister reported yesterday that the department actually expended during the last fiscal year $2,084,615 on this item. It is quite clear, therefore, that the amount that was voted that was proven not to be necessary was over $6,150,000.

And then, going on down the page, and taking up the argument all the way he ends by moving an amendment:

> That item 87, be reduced by the sum of $5 million to $2,500,000.

Now there was some considerable discussion on the question between the present Minister of Finance and the former minister of trade and commerce since the item concerned defence production also under the minister of trade and commerce. The discussion went on for a page or so, and then the hon. member for Eglinton proposed to withdraw his motion and asked for the consent of the house to withdraw it. The house refused to give consent, and the vote was taken. The vote as finally recorded was: yeas, nil, and nays, 48.

In other words, it was demonstrated in this house at the time that when you are talking about a reduction of expenditure on the part of the government it is possible for a private member to move such a reduction; it always has been. It was on the basis of that principle, as I understand it, that decisions were given by the chairman in this committee within the last day or two. That is the matter which has been under discussion, and the committee has a perfect right to deal with a motion of that kind.

This was stated by the chairman when he ruled this afternoon that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was within his rights when he made the motion he did. The supporters of the government—those particularly concerned—had only one thing to do if they wanted to follow the practice of this house, and that was to allow the question then to go to a vote. If my hon. friends wished to know what hon. members on this side of the house thought with regard to the motion then all they had to do was let it go to a vote, and if it had gone to a vote, members on this side of the house would have voted in a certain way and demonstrated what they thought of the motion.

But when a minister of the government gets up and appeals the decision of the Chair —a chairman chosen from his own side of the house—and after the vote hon. members get up on the other side of the house and start finding fault with some members for staying out behind the curtains when the vote was taken, it should be borne in mind that it is the members of the government who are over-riding the long-standing practice of this house, and if they are not doing anything other than that, and if they were counting the members on this side of the house for the purpose of stirring up the kind of argument they are making tonight, they are doing it for political reasons and no other reasons.

The practice of the house has always been the practice which was upheld by the Chair this afternoon.

Mr. Harkness: Political reasons are the only ones you would understand. I know that.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that well enough to have been elected for 44 years to parliaments in this country. The people of this country do not vote for members 13 times in a row in any constituency because they believe that that particular candidate has only political reasons for what he does. They vote for him because they believe that whatever he may do he is capable of safeguarding the rights of parliament.

The Chairman: Order. I should like to ask the hon. member to discuss matters relevant to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, this is relevant to what the hon. member for Calgary North is saying.

Mr. Harkness: It is not relevant to the point of order.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, if Your Honour wants to call order he should have called it when the hon. member for Calgary North introduced the subject. There was no reason for him interjecting what he did interject, and since he has interjected it I have a perfect right to reply to what he said. After that, I may be out of order.

We have been discussing this question this afternoon, and out of this discussion have come a number of things which would be out or order were every hon. member to be held strictly to the matter before this committee at the present time. It was said, not very many minutes ago, that there was not a majority in this house. Well, there was not a majority of the members sitting behind the government, but ever since this discussion first took place with regard to consideration of the rules of the house the debate has always gone back to the pipe line debate.

What was the underlying principle in the pipe line debate? It was that some people said outside this house that they had the right to come in here and put on a filibuster to prevent this house passing a measure which was desired by the majority. They took that position outside the house, and came into the house to put it over. Certain things happened in connection with it—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I submit that the hon. member for Melville is not in order in following this line.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, two speakers who preceded me have discussed it, and two of the members who took a very prominent part on the other side of the question to the one I took at the time that debate was on have been allowed to speak with regard to it. I am quite satisfied to agree with the last speaker, who was not speaking any more eulogistically of what took place at that time than I am doing. As a matter of fact the position taken at that time was that a minority in this house were demanding the right to hold up the majority for an indefinite period of time in order to make it impossible for a certain piece of legislation to go through, and that the government at that time was obliged to utilize the only rules that were on the statute books—

An hon. Member: Before the debate even took place.

Mr. Gardiner: The government of that time—

The Chairman: I have listened to a lot of argument from both sides, and I can tell the committee that I am ready to make my ruling.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, you have not heard from this corner of the house. I have just a word to say.

The Chairman: I will listen briefly to you.

Mr. Gardiner: If Your Honour is not ready to put the question or make a ruling I have the floor. We have been discussing this question for some little time and I want to repeat that we have been twitted on this side of the house for not all being here in order to vote, and I want to say what has been repeated once or twice previously, that we had a very considerable number in the house, and if we had had a dozen more in the house it is true that the motion would not have carried—

Mr. Harkness: You had them right behind the curtain.

Mr. Gardiner: And we could have brought them in and trimmed you to a frazzle.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I am going to take only a few minutes—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, we have a right to be heard from this corner of the house. You have heard a spokesman from the Liberal party and the C.C.F. party and I strongly object to your trying to shut off any debate from this corner of the house at this time.

The Chairman: I will listen to you.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Chairman, I still have the floor.

The Chairman: Order. I will ask the hon. member to discuss matters relevant to the discussion.

Mr. Gardiner: I am discussing matters relevant to all that has been said here tonight.

The Chairman: I do not address that remark specifically to the hon. member for Melville. I am saying that to all hon. members.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It is a little late.

Mr. Gardiner: The matters that have been discussed in connection with this debate up to now are of course all relevant to the discussion which was permitted to take place and I think these things should be discussed to their logical conclusion. When hon. members opposite say to the group on this side of the house, "If you had had all your members in today we would have been defeated at this time," I must comment that I have never heard of a government wanting to be defeated in any house. Why did they want us to defeat them this afternoon?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will understand that he is not discussing a matter relevant to the discussion.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member for Kamloops discussed the same question for ten minutes only a few moments ago.

Mr. Argue: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: Since I am talking in favour of abiding by the Chairman's ruling I will accept his ruling and agree that, so long as he keeps the others in line in the same way in connection with this discussion I will have nothing more to say until we take the vote.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take much time this evening but I do think a point should be covered here from this corner of the house. In speaking to the point of order may I just point out that there is quite a difference in the debate on this point of order today and the debate that we have heard take place on similar points of order during the last session of parliament. The difference is this: The Minister of Justice, when he sat on the other side of the house, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seemed to be bosom pals.

Mr. Fulton: We still are.

Mr. Hansell: They argued points of order much more intricate than this one and they were in 100 per cent agreement. The change of position appears to have changed their attitude.

Mr. Ellis: You are bedfellows of the Liberals.

Mr. Hansell: Let me proceed. The Minister of Justice rose a little while ago and said that members of the government challenged the Chairman's ruling because they thought the ruling was wrong. That is their privilege, of course, but I would like to know why they did not do that yesterday. That is a question I cannot resolve in the realm of common sense which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has mentioned so frequently of late. Why was this not done yesterday? The arguments presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre this evening were the same arguments he raised yesterday and yet no protest was made at that time.

I want to compliment the Minister of Finance, however, on the way in which he handled this question yesterday. He rose in the house after the Chairman had made a ruling and explained that the government could not vote for the amendment, the reason being that if such an amendment were allowed to carry it would upset the balance of ways and means and it would only mean chaos as far as responsible government is concerned.

Mr. Lewry: Now we have irresponsible government.

Mr. Hansell: He explained that this was the way to look at it and so the government permitted the motion to be put and the motion was defeated on its merits. Why change the process today? Why change the process now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who made the decision?

Mr. Hansell: The same thing is happening now as happened yesterday. Why could the government not have permitted the motion to go before the house in the same way as the Minister of Finance permitted it to go before the house last night?

Mr. Ellis: They are opposed to the amendment.

Mr. Hansell: That would have been the solution to the problem; but no, they could not do that. I suspect they began to think the matter over and we can guess what it was they began to think over. They doubtless began to think that it was a bad political move to let these motions be put before the house because someone would go out in the country and say, "The Conservatives voted against a reduction in taxation." That is what someone surely would have said and knowing this the government brought the Chair into what I claim to be disrespect and in doing this they have done the very thing they accused the previous administration of doing just a few months ago.

The Chairman: As hon. members are aware, in this sitting on an appeal to the house from the decision of the Chairman of the committee of the whole this house decided that it was not in order for a private member to propose a reduction in taxation. As I am bound by that decision I must rule this amendment out of order for that reason. In due deference to the views expressed I do not believe I can ignore a decision of the house made in this regard earlier this day. I would like to quote Mr. Speaker Lemieux as recorded at page 632 of Beauchesne's third edition in these words:

> The best authority for the Speaker is the judgment of the house. The Speaker merely voices the opinion of the house. The house, having declared out of order an amendment framed precisely as the one now under discussion, I am bound, in accordance with that decision and irrespective of the authorities, to rule the present motion also out of order.

Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, will the minister comment further with regard to the rates set by clause 3 for the purposes of the Income Tax Act? He will recall that I expressed approval of the way in which this reduction, if it was the only reduction that could be made, was to be put into effect in that it does not pyramid into the upper brackets, but specifically was consideration given to the proposition which hon. members of the government party advanced from time to time that the exemption levels should be increased, for example to $1,500 for a single person and $3,000 for a married person?

As the minister knows these exemption levels were established a long time ago. The cost of living has gone up a great deal since these levels were established. Is it not time that these levels were raised? We all recognize when we are discussing income tax that it is the fairest method of obtaining revenue from the people of the country but it is also the basic principle of income tax that you should not start taxing those dollars that are absolutely essential to an ordinary existence.

We claim that that is what is happening. We oppose income tax on income just over $1,000 for a single person and just over $2,000 for a married person. It seems to me that is not a good substitute for the implementation of that other idea that the Conservatives have had. I should like to hear from the minister on this point.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister did not make any promise to the Canadian people in the campaign that if he were elected to office he would bring about a reduction in the tax through the medium of an increase of exemptions to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons. Mr. Chairman, nothing would please the present Minister of Finance more than to be able to introduce responsibly such a proposal; but I come back to the point I have made already several times, that we were under very severe limitations coming into office now and having to function within the scope of an existing budget. The fact is, sir, that to put into effect an increase to $1,500 in the basic exemption for single persons and $3,000 for married persons would cost the treasury of this country approximately $530 million, and that kind of money was not available in the balance of ways and means within the scope of the budget that was passed at the last session of the house before dissolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why did you say that during the election?

Mr. Fleming: We did not say that.

Mr. Pickersgill: You did, all over the country.

Mr. Fleming: We talked about the overtaxation in the last fiscal year. The hon. member for Billingsgate knows that, he knows it very well. He should not go on mouthing things that he knows were applied to last year in the face of the huge overtaxation last year. I do not intend to be turned aside by those senseless interruptions of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, sir, I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman was referring to me. If he was, he seems to have got the name of my constituency wrong. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he denies ever talking about $500 million surplus in the last election?

Mr. Lesage: Overtaxation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Overtaxation of half a billion dollars. Does he deny that?

The Chairman: Order. I ask the hon member to stay with the matter under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: He doesn't deny it.

Mr. Benidickson: Saved by the chair.

Mr. Fleming: May I proceed, Mr. Chairman? If the hon. member can just hold himself for only a moment he will get his answer.

The Chairman: Order. I would ask the minister to discuss the matter before the chair.

Mr. Fleming: That matter was discussed at the last session as applying to the last fiscal year, and a good deal was said about it, and a good deal more could be said about it yet.

Let me deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Chairman. I have pointed out what the proposal that he now inquires about would have cost in terms of loss of revenue to the treasury in a year and, faced with the limitations we were under, we looked about for a place where we thought reductions could be most effectively made. The conclusion we reached was that by concentrating our reduction on the income tax the two methods that would best achieve the concentration of the benefit of the reduction in income tax in favour of persons in the low income brackets were (a) an increase in the exemption now in respect of dependants; and (b) reductions in the rates in the lowest brackets of taxation.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, we have recommended to the house the reductions that appear in clause 3 of this bill, a reduction of two points from 13 per cent to 11 per cent on the first $1,000 of taxable income and a reduction of one point in the rate on the second $1,000 of taxable income. The net result of these two reductions is to reduce the load of income tax carried by the income taxpayers of Canada, 4½ million of them, by $146 million in a full year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I have not kept a record—I have not the secretarial staff to keep this the way the Prime Minister can in regard to time spent on questions—of the number of times the Minister of Finance has pleaded that his government cannot do certain things because they are working within the framework of the budget of the former government.

Mr. Chairman, there are several facts about the clause that we are now discussing. First of all, it relates to the calendar year 1958 and to that period only. Nine months of that calendar year will be in a period presumably to be covered by a budget that may yet be brought in by this government. Even the first three months are the last three months of a period of more than nine months out of this fiscal year that this government will have been in office. This government, its spokesmen, talked about the huge overtaxation, the huge surplus on the basis of which they would be able to implement their promises.

I have no defence of the former government, but it seems to me that this excuse has been worn thin, that the government has to keep telling us it cannot do the things it promised to do because of the limitations imposed upon it by Mr. Harris' budget. I repeat, these provisions are for the calendar year 1958, and if the Conservatives thought it was possible to do this kind of thing but now when they are on their own that they now find they cannot do them, why do they not honestly stand up and say they were wrong?

I recognize that even with such research as I have been able to carry on I have not been able to find a direct quotation that I can attribute to the Prime Minister to the effect that he would raise the exemption levels to $1,500 and $3,000. In fact, it is very interesting to go through the Prime Minister's speeches in the recent election campaign and see how he creates impressions, without putting things down in plain language. The Minister of Finance knows that in former years in this House of Commons in budget debates the members of the Progressive Conservative party did urge, and on occasion did move an amendment to the effect that the exemption levels should be raised. They created the impression, not just in the election campaign but across the years, that whereas the Liberals were stubborn and were unwilling to raise those exemption levels, the Conservatives would do it.

My contention is that clause 3, by the terms of subparagraph 2 thereof, relates to a period of time that is wholly within the control of this government. It relates to the calendar year 1958, the first three months of which are part of the present fiscal year and part of the nine months period that they will have been in office. The other nine months are entirely their own, if they are still there and if we do not have a change for the better in the meantime. In view of that, Mr. Chairman, the excuses given by the Minister of Finance are entirely inadequate.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this unprecedented budget advanced in committee on the estimates of the minister to me, I think, brings to the attention of the house the desirability of following some recommendations that the minister himself made when he was sitting on this side, namely that of allowing members of parliament to meet and question officials of the government and examine the questions as to ways and means.

I am sure in my mind that the reason we have not got a white paper, as we should have at this time having regard to the big changes brought about by the new administration, is that the minister is advancing to the house his own off the cuff financial estimate. He is not prepared to advance a white paper that would have behind it the authority of the large number of people in the Bank of Canada, in his department, and elsewhere in whom the country has a great deal of confidence.

In the almost six months that the government has been in office circumstances have changed and, as I said in my remarks last Friday, they have changed for the worse. But based on the new declining levels of prosperity I think the Minister of Finance is not being frank with the house when he brings forward in an off the cuff speech last Friday night a statement of estimates of income and outgo involving millions and millions of dollars. I do not think these estimates have the imprimatur of the official level of government in this country in which we have had reason to have confidence.

In my opinion, this is a prime example if there ever was one of justification for referring the estimates of the department of the new minister to an estimates committee so that we could examine, as he himself has so often asked, some of the major economists and experts in the Department of Finance who could give us some idea as to the likely balance of ways and means as the result of some of these new proposals this session.

Mr. Fleming: There is not one word of truth in the charge just made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Benidickson: Would my hon. friend, in the knowledge that the session will continue after the new year, not agree that there might be some advantage in allowing the estimates committee to examine the whole set-up of ways and means in so far as our finances are concerned?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member never was more mixed up in his life than he is in the statement he just made. Never did anybody suggest that the estimates committee should do anything more than review estimates. He is talking now about an estimates committee that will review financial proposals in relation to taxation. The hon. member is completely mixed up. It is unfortunate.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance chose the introduction of his own estimates to offer the equivalent of a new budget and there was much complaint that the usual procedures, traditional for more than 80 years, had not been utilized. I simply say to him, does that not justify more than ever directing to a committee of the house, and I think the estimates committee would be the proper one, estimates of the finance department so that we could have an opportunity to discuss with some of the senior officials of his department the opinions that they might have now as to the new levels of income and outgo of the government? No answer from the minister.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, earlier when the minister was discussing this clause he placed some emphasis on the idea that the intent of the government in these tax reduction proposals, even though he admitted they are relatively minor, was to give relief to those in the lower tax brackets. In view of the remarks he made about the limitations with which he was confronted in his efforts to reduce taxes, the question I should like to ask him relates to the fact that the reductions in taxes, as I understand the figures in the clause of the bill, carry through right up to the person whose taxable income is $400,000 a year or more.

The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I think I am correct in suggesting that for the people whose taxable income amounts to more than $2,000 right up to those whose taxable income is $400,000 or more the tax reduction amounts to $30 a year. I remember somebody suggesting earlier in the debate today that $30 a year to the person who is in receipt of an income of $400,000 is a good deal smaller consideration than it is to the person who comes barely within the tax level as far as income is concerned.

Can the minister indicate to us what the total amount will be which he does not expect to receive as the result of carrying out the $30 reduction in the case of all those who have a taxable income above the level suggested in subsections (a) and (b)? Those are the two sections in the lower income tax group for which he is suggesting a special reduction in rate. Has he any figures which will indicate to the committee the loss of revenue to the treasury as the result of providing the $30 reduction from that point right through to those in the highest income brackets?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, it would be an entirely new theory of progressive taxation to say that when you get above the level of $2,000 of taxable income you are not going to tax everybody in the same way on his initial $2,000 of taxable income. That would be an entirely new theory. You start everybody in the same way. The graduated rates apply to everybody and the reduction is uniform as to amount. That is because we have started in the lowest brackets.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. gentleman tell us what the business will be for tomorrow?

Business of the House

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with the bill having to do with the bridge over the Niagara. It was reported back from committee today. We will then continue with the debate on the amendments to the Income Tax Act; then we will take the Export Credits Insurance Act; then the resolution dealing with guaranteed prices for agricultural commodities; and then the estimates of the Department of Justice.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 14, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER STEPS TO MAKE PARLIAMENT MORE EFFECTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he could tell the house what steps, in addition to those taken yesterday, the government proposes to take at this session "to make both houses of this parliament more effective in the discharge of their duties to the people of Canada".

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the government has already taken quite a few actions—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the axe you wielded yesterday?

Mr. Green: —to make the business and the standing of parliament better during the present session, and the hon. member will just have to wait and see further developments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BULGANIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Acting Prime Minister. I would like to ask him if he has tabled or will now table a copy of the letter reported in the press this morning as having been received yesterday by the government, through the Prime Minister, from Mr. Bulganin of Russia, so the house may have the letter as well as the press information.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the letter addressed to the Prime Minister from Premier Bulganin was delivered yesterday afternoon by the Soviet ambassador. The letter was in Russian and was accompanied by what was described as an unofficial embassy translation. The note is now being translated and studied, and any comment by the government would have to await this careful examination.

The principal features of the note have been published in the papers this morning. For the most part it resembles the letters sent to President Eisenhower, Prime Minister Macmillan and others.

There are, however, a few passages specifically referring to Canada. The proposals in the note will undoubtedly be given careful consideration at the NATO council meeting in Paris, and I hope to be able to table the translation the first of the week.

Mr. Coldwell: I notice that the Prime Minister has already commented on the note. Could we receive the comment as well, since the note is characterized as propaganda by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Green: I think the comment must have been made on the basis of this unofficial translation by the Russian embassy. There has as yet been no official translation by the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Coldwell: Is this consistent with the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) that we should not always say no without proper examination?

PATENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alex B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State could give the house an indication of when the report of the royal commission on copyright will be available.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, apparently when I referred to this matter on October 28 with reference to the possibility of the tabling of this report I was overoptimistic. In any event the situation now is that the galley proofs are being checked for the English text, and even after they are ready the page proofs will still have to be checked. The hold-up is largely one of the mechanics of providing the printed copy. We expect now that it may be possible to get the English text through by the 17th or 18th of this month, but that again I cannot promise because I do not know just how long it will take to put this through the plant. Whether the French text will be ready at the same time is quite problematic. I should think not; maybe it will take another week or so after that. In any event I can assure the hon. member that we are most anxious to get this done as quickly as possible, and that every effort is being directed toward this end.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

WHITE BEAR RESERVE, CARLYLE, SASK.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister inform me when I may expect an answer to a question I asked which was made an order for return on November 20? The minister will recall that I brought this matter to his attention the other day.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did mention this matter to me two days ago, and I have asked the department to expedite the return. I will make further inquiries to ascertain when it will be ready.

HEALTH INSURANCE

LEGISLATION RESPECTING MENTAL AND TUBERCULAR HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Earlier in the session I asked the Prime Minister whether amendments would be brought in to the hospital insurance act to provide for the coverage of tuberculosis sanatoria and mental hospitals. His answer was yes, that such amendments would be brought in. Can the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to have this legislation brought in before the Christmas recess?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, it is not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister inform the house as to the date on which the government intends to have tuberculosis sanatoria and mental hospitals covered under the act?

Mr. Monteith: This whole matter is one of government policy. I do not think I can say anything further.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or his deputy, notice of which has been given. Has the federal government as yet received from the province of British Columbia a report relating to that province's studies of the hydro resources of the Columbia river? If not, when does the federal government expect to receive such a report?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. In answer to the second, I can only say that this depends on the progress of the studies by the province, which is a matter within the control of the provincial government. No definite date for the report has been indicated.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, and in his absence possibly the house leader would be prepared to answer. In view of the fact that no recommendations are being voiced from this house to the board of governors of the C.B.C. for their consideration, would the minister advise the house when it is expected to set up a special committee to study the actions of this hallowed corporation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and draw it to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government received any recent representations from joint western farm organizations requesting deficiency payments on the 1955-56 crop and, if so, will the government give them consideration rather than giving the kind of answer I received some time ago?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, representations in regard to deficiency payments on the 1956-57 crop have been received from a considerable number of agricultural organizations, some small and some large. We have looked into the matter, of course, and have given consideration to it.

Mr. McCullough: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister just what consideration has been given?

Mr. Harkness: Close attention was given to the proposal which was made.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May we take it from the minister's answer that at some time during the session the government will announce its policy in this regard?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we continue to announce our policy with regard to these matters as the occasion and the circumstances make it necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: In accordance with the T.V. schedules.

GOLD

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF EMERGENCY LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the house if an announcement will be forthcoming regarding the extension and amendment of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be possible to make an announcement on this subject at an early date, probably after parliament reconvenes in January.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REPORTED FAILURE OF B.C. RECIPIENTS TO RECEIVE INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I regret not having sent him notice of my intention to ask this question, but I have no doubt that he does not require notice. Will he explain to the house why the old age assistance people in British Columbia did not receive the $9 increase in their pension cheques at the end of November?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, I cannot at the moment, Mr. Speaker. I was not actually aware that they had not received it. I know we have had indications that many of the provinces have given the increase. In fact I signed agreements with several of the provinces to bring this $9 increase into effect, but I cannot tell the house exactly what the situation is in British Columbia.

Mr. Regier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government of British Columbia yet signed its agreement with the federal government in respect thereto?

Mr. Monteith: I cannot advise the house on that question, Mr. Speaker, without looking the matter up. I would be very glad to let the hon. member know.

[Later:]

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could he tell the house with which provinces he has signed agreements concerning increases in the Old Age Assistance Act?

Mr. Monteith: I would be happy to report that on Monday. I cannot say offhand.

Mr. Pickersgill: You cannot remember?

Mr. Monteith: I have as good a memory as the hon. member.

Mr. Lesage: Has Quebec signed?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF PRICE SUPPORT LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the press reports that the farm organizations have taken a very dim view of the proposed legislation for price supports for farm commodities, will the minister give serious consideration to amending the bill before it is brought before the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter is on the order paper for discussion today, and I do not think it is proper to engage in questions at this stage.

[Later:]

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, the answer to which might affect the course of the debate on the agricultural prices support resolution and the bill to follow. Is the minister in a position to say whether or not the government will accept the recommendations of farm organizations to have this legislation referred to the agriculture committee so these organizations may make representations to that committee?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not received or seen any recommendations along that line, so I am not in a position to make a statement about the matter.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED PURCHASE OF 1,500,000 BUSHELS BY AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question arising out of a news report in this morning's Gazette, which says that Australia will buy 1,500,000 bushels of Canadian wheat. Will the minister inform the house whether or not there are negotiations going on for the sale of larger quantities of wheat?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on a previous occasion I have explained that active negotiations are going on for the sale of wheat, but I think it is undesirable to give details in this house. As I have said previously, I think anyone who wants wheat sold will not want the details of the negotiations made public.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is the acting minister aware of the fact that, according to this press report, trade minister John McEwen of Australia has made such an announcement? Will the minister confirm the fact that such a deal has been made or is about to be made?

Mr. Macdonnell: When I have seen the report I will be prepared to comment on it.

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, now that I have sent a copy of the press story on the Australian wheat deal with Canada to the minister, is the minister in a position to confirm the report?

Mr. Macdonnell: I now have the newspaper report which says, "Australia Plans Big Wheat Order From Canada". I think the hon. member must give me time to find the exact stage of the negotiations. I certainly hope it will go through, but I think I must take the question as notice. At the moment I cannot express a definite opinion as to the exact situation.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate the answer of the minister, but I think in fairness to the house I should point out that he read the headline rather than reading the actual report, and the actual report is much more definite than the headline.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, I thought I had given a fair indication. Actually the first paragraph reads:

> Trade minister John McEwen said Australia will import 1,500,000 bushels of high protein Canadian wheat.

I think that is what the hon. member wished me to read. There again it expresses an intention on the part of the Australian government, which I certainly hope will be carried out. But at the moment I do not think I can give an absolute statement as to the situation. I do not want to say something definite, and then have to come back and correct it.

TRANSPORT

IRON ORE COMPANY—DIRECTIVE RESPECTING OFFICIAL LANGUAGE FOR RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, owing to the absence of the minister I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister approved of the directive issued by the Iron Ore Company of Canada to the effect that English will be the only official language used for railway operations on the railway from Seven Islands to Schefferville?

Mr. A. R. MacDonald (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question of the hon. member as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PAYMENTS TO QUALIFYING FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house when those farmers who qualify under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act may receive payments from the government?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, prairie farm assistance payments will begin this month.

PENSIONS

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS—REQUEST FOR DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister be stopping off at London either on his way to Paris or on his return? If so, will he discuss with the authorities there the way in which they have increased the pensions of retired civil servants, in the hope that he might suggest something comparable thereto on his return to Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the plans I had made for departure yesterday did contemplate that on my way back from Paris I would have a day and a half in London, which I had hoped to spend usefully in certain conferences. Whether I am able to go to the NATO council at all now depends upon whether this bill on which we are engaged is carried this morning. If I am able to go this afternoon I still hope to have some opportunity for conferences in London on the way back.

As to the particular matter my friend speaks of, I have indicated already on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, that this matter has been under very close study for some time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Twelve years.

Mr. Fleming: No. We are speaking of the new government. I cannot take any responsibility for what happened in that regard before we assumed office.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Were not the results of the former studies left behind in the minister's office?

Mr. Fleming: Whatever studies had been made certainly were not adequate for the purpose, and extensive studies have since been made. We have been gathering a great deal of statistical information, and that gathering of information has occupied much more time than I think my hon. friend may have realized would be necessary for the purpose.

So far as discussions with the United Kingdom are concerned, I do not think those are necessary. Among other things one may have the opportunity to ask some questions on this subject, but we know pretty well what has been the course of discussion on a similar subject in the parliament at Westminster, in the light of steps that were taken there.

Therefore whether or not I have an opportunity to discuss that subject in London on the way back from Paris, if I am able to go to Paris now, will not, I think, materially affect the government's program in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question. If the minister does get to Paris, and I am sure we all hope he will and we will do everything we can to facilitate him, and does stop in London on his return, will he be discussing with Mr. Thorneycroft the proposal for a free trade area?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I thank my hon. friend for his assurance. I do appreciate the co-operation of the house in trying to get this measure disposed of as quickly as may be. I hope on my return from Paris to have a conference with Mr. Thorneycroft in relation to the plans that are being made for the meetings of officials to lay plans for the commonwealth trade and economic conference to be held next year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman be willing to lay before the house the proposed agenda for that commonwealth conference, so all of us may have some idea what the Canadian government is proposing in the way of methods of increasing commonwealth trade?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, there is no agenda yet and there cannot be—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what I thought.

Mr. Fleming: —until after these preparatory conferences. The purpose of the preparatory conferences is not only to arrange matters in relation to date, time, place and physical arrangements, but also to take up the question of an agenda. This will be the subject of communications and discussions with the various governments of the commonwealth. I cannot say more than that at the present time in anticipation of what may occur at the preparatory conferences.

Mr. Chevrier: You have been preparing for several months.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us when he anticipates the conference will be held. I mean a possible date.

Mr. Fleming: Various communications have been exchanged on the subject, and there are the usual problems in arriving at a date that will be convenient to all countries of the commonwealth. One of the purposes of the first of the meetings of officials to be held in London early in the new year is to review these questions and arrive at a considered recommendation to submit to the commonwealth governments.

It is quite clear that there will be a conference in 1958, but the precise date has not been settled yet. Preferences have been expressed by various countries for dates running from the late summer into the autumn, and it is a matter of fitting in with plans, some of them involving political events, in the various countries. In other cases it is a matter of fitting them in with other international conferences involving finance ministers.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY PRECAUTIONS DURING TESTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Could the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house what safety precautions are planned during the testing of the Trans-Canada pipe line between Winnipeg and the lakehead to ensure that if an explosion takes place the residents along the route will be fully protected?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I must take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

C.G.S. "LABRADOR"—STATEMENT ON TENDERS FOR REPAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres asked me whether or not tenders were called for the refitting of the Labrador. The answer is that tenders were not called. In accordance with the standard practice for the repair and refitting of major naval vessels, the contract was allotted to Saint John Dry Dock Company Limited on the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission.

PUBLIC WORKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—POSSIBLE DAMAGE FROM EXPLOSION ON RIPPLE ROCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the announcement of an explosion on Ripple rock in British Columbia, which is now in the press, can the minister tell us if, in the event of damage many miles away to homes and private property, reparations are going to be made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that question is rather hypothetical at this stage. The hon. member might defer it until he ascertains whether or not there has been any damage.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CANADIAN MEMBERS, DESIGNATION OF AUTHORITY, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 194, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Appointment of Canadian members.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I could just say very briefly that this bill was given second reading in the house with explanatory statements on Thursday. It was passed without opposition. Indeed it was commended by the hon. member for Niagara Falls. Yesterday the bill was before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where it was further considered and was reported, I believe, unanimously by the committee.

Mr. McMillan: May I just say a word on this bill in the absence of the hon. member for Niagara Falls. Before the last redistribution bill Fort Erie was in my riding. I may say that at no time did I ever make a recommendation in connection with a change of the personnel of the commission on that bridge or on the Canadian legal counsel appointed by the government of the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I would like to say to the minister that we have three members of the bridge commission who are very efficient and highly regarded in their communities, and I would suggest that they be included in the new commission along with his two new appointees.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, before this bill is passed I wish the minister would satisfy me on a point which has been giving me some concern. I am sorry I am not a member of the committee and I have not yet received the minutes of that meeting.

We in our province are very much concerned with the subject of the bridges on which we have to pay tolls, and we have always been very anxious that the government or the bridge authority should make it very clear to us when we may expect to see the day when any particular bridge will be toll free, because we believe that basically tolls are a hindrance to progress.

I notice that the bill contains nothing which would indicate to the people most interested in this particular bridge, or in the use of that bridge, that the time may ever come when the bridge might be toll free. Even in the wording of the bill I see there is a listing of several dates and possibilities with respect to toll rates, and these words, "whichever is the later of the dates". What would happen in the case of the indebtedness being paid off before the year 1992? Have the people who are most concerned any reason to expect that they will ever have a toll free bridge?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer this question positively. This bridge was not originally built as a publicly owned bridge, but the money was obtained by the issuance of bonds which are held in private hands. There is provision in this bill for the eventual vesting of the bridge, but in the meantime the occasion has presented itself for submitting this bill to the house. Once again I cannot stress too strongly that it is a very urgent matter, since as of January 1, if we do not get this bill through and get the appointments made, the Canadian representation on the authority will be in a minority position. There is nothing in this bill that deals with the subject of tolls; that is a question for the future, and will have to await the vesting.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Friday, December 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 3.

Mr. Barnett: The minister will recall that when the house adjourned at ten o'clock last night I had asked him for some information in respect to the amount of the reduction in the receipts of the Department of National Revenue from income tax, as a result of carrying forward the $30 per year reduction to those in the higher income tax brackets. I wonder if the minister has been able to come up, in the interval, with a figure as to what the estimated amount would be in that connection.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, in round figures the number of taxpayers who pay income tax on the first $2,000 of taxable income only is approximately three million, and the number of persons paying tax on taxable income in excess of $2,000 is about one and a half million.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this is the clause which continues to leave a rate of taxation on the first $1,000 of income over the present exemption levels of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person. As the committee is well aware, we argued yesterday, and in fact we put it before the house in the form of a motion, that the least that should now be done would be for that rate to be diminished. It is still our view that the party now in power should carry out the policy which it had when it was on this side of the house, namely that there should be no income tax on the first $1,000 of income over the present exemption level; in other words that these exemption levels should be increased.

The minister has sought to dispel the idea that the Conservative party promised to raise the exemption levels. He made the statement last night, that the Prime Minister did not make such a promise, and every time it has been contended from this side of the house that this was the position of the party now in power, we have been given to understand that we were twisting the record. Well, I may say that I have gone through the record. I do not intend this morning to take the time of the house to quote all that I have found, but I may say that over the past number of years there have been repeated occasions when members of the Conservative party have stood up in this house and said they were in favour of raising the exemption levels to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons.

Some of those hon. members might now be described as backbenchers, who were not necessarily speaking for the party. I do not think, however, that their statements can be dismissed, especially when they were made by such persons as the former member for Hastings-Frontenac, now appointed to another place. I do not think the words of the present Secretary of State can be dismissed. She argued quite definitely on more than one occasion that the exemptions should be raised to $1,500 single and $3,000 married.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me quote from the record of Hansard the exact words of no less a person than the hon. member for Eglinton, now Minister of Finance. I am looking at page 474 of Hansard for January 24, 1956. Let it be perfectly clear, as it will be from the sentences I will read, that the present Minister of Finance was not just speaking for himself. He seldom did when he was on this side of the house. He always spoke for the party, and he made it clear on that occasion that that was what he was doing. He was speaking in the debate on the address on January 24, 1956. When he referred to the minister of finance he was, of course, referring to Mr. Walter Harris, who held the portfolio at that time. These were the words of the present Minister of Finance:

> If the Minister of Finance is not prepared to go as far as Conservative policy advocates—

The word "Conservative" is printed with a capital C, so it was not just an idea of the hon. member for Eglinton; he was telling us what was the policy of his party.

> If the Minister of Finance is not prepared to go as far as Conservative policy advocates in this respect, namely $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons without dependants, then at least we hope he will take a generous step in that direction.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a clear cut statement by the present Minister of Finance, when he was in opposition, as to where his party stood. Later in the same session—this was last year, 1956, on July 3—we were debating the amendments to the Income Tax Act, the very stage at which we now find ourselves, and the present Minister of Finance condemned Mr. Harris for not having done what he, the hon. member for Eglinton, had called upon him to do on January 24, namely for not having raised the exemption levels as had been demanded by representatives of the Progressive Conservative party. I may say that the words of the present Minister of Finance in that session were not uttered by him as one lone voice crying in the Conservative wilderness, but were supported by those whom I have already named, as well as by others.

Now, Mr. Chairman, anyone who takes the index to Hansard, looks up the Income Tax Act, and then looks down until he comes to the word "exemptions" can find there in the pages of Hansard across the years representatives of the Conservative party advocating that exemption levels should be raised and, in specific terms, that they should be raised to $1,500 single and $3,000 married.

When, against such a background, the leader of a party, particularly the hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister, goes into an election campaign and promises there will be tax cuts, promises that there will be given back to the people the $10 a month by which, he said, they were being overtaxed, I say the Canadian people had every right to believe that was the Prime Minister's way of saying that the Conservative policy indicated in the House of Commons by the present Minister of Finance would be implemented.

I am going to avoid making any reference to newspaper reports of what the Prime Minister said, because he is not here in this house to confirm or deny the accuracy of such reports, but I do want to read one or two quotations from statements he made over the C.B.C., in this case over a radio hook-up. He made similar statements on television as well. Speaking from Vancouver on May 24, 1957, the present Prime Minister said:

> We shall put an end to excessive overtaxation. We shall call a session of parliament in September to reduce taxes, and at that session, with $500 million of overtaxation last year, we will be able to increase old age pensions and other pensions to fair and reasonable amounts. The Liberals tell you it is not possible to lower taxes and increase pensions at the same time. Give us a chance—we will show you!

Some hon. Members: We have.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I paused for a moment, hoping there would be an interjection. The Prime Minister went on:

> Any party that cannot do this with that surplus does not deserve to be made responsible for public funds.

Hon. members opposite interjected that they have done what the Prime Minister said. Well, Mr. Chairman, in the same speech from Vancouver the Prime Minister used these words:

> We do not begrudge the government the money it needs to run the country, but couldn't you use the $10 a month which the government does not need but still takes from you?

Hon. gentlemen opposite say the government is implementing what the Prime Minister undertook to do. The Prime Minister promised that his party, if it was given a chance, would show us what it could do; that it would give back to the people of Canada the $10 a month which the Liberals were taking from them in overtaxation. We now have before us a clause of this bill which the Minister of Finance admitted a moment ago, in answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, provides not more than $20 a year reduction in income tax for three million income taxpayers—

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no; $30.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry. Did I misunderstand the minister? I thought he said there were three million who paid income tax only on $1,000 of taxable income—

Mr. Fleming: The first $2,000.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I accept the correction. There are three million taxpayers who pay tax on $2,000 of taxable income or less, and to those three million the saving by virtue of this clause is $30 a year or less, depending on the amount of their income. But $30 a year is the most that any of these three million people will save as a result of this proposal. Thirty dollars a year is $2.50 a month. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to call that the implementation of the Prime Minister's promise to give back $10 a month, they can try if they wish. The fact is that many of those three million people do not pay tax on $2,000 taxable income, so the saving effected by them is a lot less even than $2.50 a month.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is time something pretty straight was said about the political morality of a party which takes one stand when it is on one side of the house and another stand when it is on the other side. I think I could choose words of my own to express what people think about this kind of political morality, but I will forbear. I will quote instead a recognized authority, one that is certainly recognized by my hon. friends opposite in view of the ways in which they seem to be copying some of the things he did. I refer to the late Viscount Bennett, who at the time he made the remarks I shall now read was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative prime minister of Canada. He did not call himself a Progressive Conservative, he was just a straight Conservative. Some say he was a Liberal-Conservative, but I cannot keep track of all these changes in party names.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was nothing Liberal about him.

An hon. Member: He did not belong to the C.C.F. anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Someone said he did not belong to the C.C.F.; we know that.

Mr. Hodgson: I think he was a Liberal-C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, the same Mr. Bennett tried on his political deathbed to bring in some progressive legislation. We know what happened to it, and now when we try to bring back some of that progressive legislation you know what happens to it on the floor of this house.

These were the remarks of Mr. Bennett on the subject of the political morality of people changing their views when they move from one side of the house to the other. He was speaking on July 27, 1931, as reported at page 4200 of Hansard for that year. It is true that he was directing his fire at the Liberals for having changed their views on moving from the government side to the opposition side, but as hon. members will see Mr. Bennett's words apply with equal force to those who move from the opposition side to the government side. These were the words of Mr. Bennett:

> I must say that I do not believe the Canadian people think it is necessary for political leaders who one day are in power and the next day are in opposition to revile when in opposition all that they held most dear when they were in power, to change their ground, to shift their position and say, "That which I asked you to accept I now ask you to condemn; that which I told you I believed in then I no longer believe in. I misled you when I told you to do thus and so, not knowing whether I knew or not; I instructed you right then, but now, with changed conditions all that is wrong, all that is nonsense, all that is absurd. What I want to do now is to condemn this thing."

Those are Mr. Bennett's words, and I apply them directly to a party whose present Minister of Finance said in this house last year that it was Conservative policy to raise exemption levels to $1,500 single and $2,000 married, to a party whose leader in the election campaign said, "Give this party a chance and we will raise pensions and reduce taxes; we will put back into your pockets that $10 a month which the Liberals were overcharging you." This is a party that now having gone to the other side of the house, when we propose these things follows a course of action such as we have had in this house in the last day or so, of doing its best to avoid even having to face votes on amendments designed to implement the very things that members of that party said they stood for when they were in opposition and when they were out on the hustings.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian people do not like this sort of thing. It is most disillusioning. Some of the things that have happened here lately at the instigation of those who a year ago were talking about the dignity of parliament and respect for the chair are disillusioning to the people of this country. And what this minister is trying to do right now, in saying that his party did not promise to raise these exemption levels, and asking us to settle for these rates of tax that still apply to the low income people that the Conservatives condemned the Liberals for taxing, is the kind of political morality that merits the condemnation that Mr. Bennett indicated back in 1931 in those words I quoted. It is still the case under this clause that three million people, who in the words of the Conservatives have been overtaxed $10 a month, are on their own terms still being overtaxed at least $7.50 a month.

Those are not my words, and those are not my figures. That is the ground the present party in power chose for election purposes. That is the ground upon which we have the right to judge them in this house at the present time. Of course we welcome the reduction of $2.50 in the taxes on these three million people, but I say to the party opposite that they will be held to account not merely for the policies they bring into the house or fail to bring into the house, but will also be held to account for political morality of this type.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen will recognize, I am sure, that if I do not make extended reply to my hon. friend's remarks it is because of the pressure of the clock under the circumstances of this day. We have had this subject up before, and I must invite my hon. friend's attention to what I said on this subject on December 13, at page 2362 of Hansard, where I am recorded as saying:

> Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister did not make any promise to the Canadian people in the campaign that if he were elected to office he would bring about a reduction in the tax through the medium of an increase of exemptions to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons. Mr. Chairman, nothing would please the present Minister of Finance more than to be able to introduce responsibly such a proposal; but I come back to the point I have made already several times, that we were under very severe limitations coming into office now and having to function within the scope of an existing budget. The fact is, sir, that to put into effect an increase to $1,500 in the basic exemption for single persons and $3,000 for married persons would cost the treasury of this country approximately $530 million, and that kind of money was not available in the balance of ways and means within the scope of the budget that was passed at the last session of the house before dissolution.

I have said it there and there is no point in my attempting to repeat it now. That is the position; that is the fact, and having regard to what my hon. friend has said concerning views expressed by myself and other members of my party when in opposition, there has been no departure from those views.

We would like nothing better than to be in a position to proceed now to put such figures into effect but we have to accept the situation, and in this bill we have done what we asked the former government to do. In the language attributed to me on January 24, 1956, by the hon. gentleman, we have taken a generous step in the direction we asked the former government to take.

I remind my hon. friend that we have done a great many things this session; the increases in the various pensions, together with the increases in the—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman is in a hurry and we are anxious to facilitate his departure, but surely talking about other things done during this session is outside the ambit of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: He is filibustering.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I had one sentence on this subject to deal with the point raised by the hon. gentleman, when he said we had not carried out a particular promise to lower taxes and raise pensions.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is not a general debate.

Mr. Fleming: The point is that we have done both of those things. My hon. friend is not right in his figures. My hon. friend talks about a $30 reduction, and he is completely glossing over the fact that we have proposed increases in the exemptions for dependants. He has completely failed to make reference to that fact in the figures he has given. If he will look at the table I put on Hansard at page 2008 on December 6 he will see there the benefits that accrue to the kind of taxpayer he is referring to from the combined effect of the reduction in rates and the increase in the exemptions.

If he looks at the first column at the bottom of page 2008 he will see that to a married man with an income of $4,000, of which $2,000 is taxable, the net benefit in the reduction in rate and increase in exemption, where he has four dependent children qualified for family allowances; is $76 and that brings about a reduction of 43 per cent in the tax that he has hitherto been paying.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question. Can he give a similar figure for a taxpayer having a taxable income of $500 with—was it two dependants?

Mr. Fleming: No, this figure was for four.

Mr. Pickersgill: A taxpayer having four dependent children and a taxable income of $500?

Mr. Fleming: How many dependants?

Mr. Pickersgill: Four. I want to make it comparable, to be fair. I refer to a taxable income of $500.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend, I take it, is assuming that he has already received the benefit of the increase in exemption to arrive at the taxable income of $500. Before he arrives at that taxable income he will already have received the benefit of a total increase of $400 in his exemption for his dependants.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want the hon. gentleman to make it strictly comparable. He gave a figure for a taxpayer with a taxable income of $2,000. I would like the strictly comparable figure for a taxpayer with a taxable income of $500. I am very anxious that the conditions should be precisely similar.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has any particular case in mind, but it seems to me he should give the age of the dependants.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it makes any difference whether the children are above or below family allowance age; it is $100 anyway, as I understand it.

Mr. Fleming: In that case I am informed that the combined effect of the exemptions increase and reduction in rates would reduce that man's tax from $65 to $11.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would reduce it from $65 to $11?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I note that the Minister of Finance still follows the course of brushing aside his own promises by saying the Prime Minister did not promise to raise the exemption levels to $1,500 and $3,000; but may I point out that when the Minister of Finance made the statement he did in this house on January 24, 1956, he said it was Conservative policy. I would like to know if that policy has been rescinded by his party and, if so, when? Or is it that the Prime Minister has overruled the statement of Conservative policy which the Minister of Finance made?

Mr. Fleming: Neither the Prime Minister nor myself made any such promise in the campaign. The promise was to reduce taxes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance cannot deny that in this House of Commons the Conservatives argued for a raising of the exemption levels. One cannot collect all these statements that were made on the hustings, but it is a fact that the Minister of Transport repeated this promise at Gananoque on May 23. I submit that when the Prime Minister, on the background of what was said in the House of Commons by responsible members of the party such as the Minister of Finance, said that his party would bring in these grandiose tax reductions; when he said, "Give us a chance and we will show you", that was giving the Canadian people reason to believe that Tory policy would be carried out.

For the minister to stand up now and say that this government has carried out the statement he made on January 24, 1956, is a honey. He asked Mr. Harris to implement Conservative policy, namely $1,500 exemption for single persons and $3,000 for married persons, and then he said if he could not do it all "we hope he will take a generous step in that direction".

I can imagine how readily the Minister of Finance would have approved of any mere step which Mr. Harris might have taken in that direction. If he had not gone the whole way the minister would have said that was not enough. Now he comes along and says, even though he has not raised the exemption levels at all but has merely taken off those two percentage points, that he is implementing the alternative part of the suggestion he made to Mr. Harris in 1956. Surely, the whole point of that statement was that this was the Conservative policy. We now find that the Conservatives have gone to the other side of the house and have in effect rescinded their policy by their lack of action on this matter.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, in view of the minister's frequent statements that this was the best they could do because of the situation they found when they came into office, may I ask the minister to explain to the committee what material difference existed in the general financial picture in Canada as between the month of May of this year and, let us say, the month of September? In other words, last spring the minister was able to make certain demands for tax reduction. What did he find, after coming into office, that caused him to believe that the things he stated before the election the Conservatives were going to do cannot be done at the present time?

Mr. Fleming: These are the things, Mr. Chairman, that I reviewed in my statement a week ago last night. They have been repeated since. They are all set forth there, the effects on the revenues and the expenditures.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister this question. If he finds himself unable to give this promised tax reduction now, is he contemplating doing it in the next budget he introduces in this house?

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps my hon. friend will let me reserve any proposals that may be made at that time until I have the honour to bring down a budget.

Mr. Regier: The minister has gone some considerable length in emphasizing the things he found upon assuming office, yet these changes are to take effect only on January 1, 1958. I shall be filling out my income tax return for the year 1958 some time before April 1, 1959. Therefore the minister will not be getting very much money out of me in the first three months of the fiscal year 1958-59. I know there are such things as payroll deductions, and at the end of January of 1958 there will be some. That will be the first month in which anyone will receive any pay in 1958. However, the employer has a month in which to remit his collections to the department.

Can the minister inform the committee as to what will be the actual cash loss to the treasury before the end of the fiscal year on March 31, as a result of the reductions he is now proposing? How much actually in cash receipts is the treasury going to lose before midnight of March 31 next? As I understand it, it will only apply in the case of those where the tax payments are deducted from their pay and the money is actually in the hands of the government before the end of March.

Mr. Fleming: I gave all that information on December 6. My hon. friend will find the table on page 2009 of Hansard. As for the alleged deferment, the fact is that 70 per cent of all income taxes are paid on the deduction basis, and the benefits of the reductions will therefore be felt as early in the new calendar year as tables of deductions can be printed and circulated.

Mr. Regier: I was not asking whether or not people are going to feel the benefit in the first three months. I know that. I am very much aware that they will welcome any small relief they get. Were the figures the minister published based on three full months' returns, or were they based on the actual loss of cash revenue to the treasury?

Mr. Fleming: I gave all that information in detail. At page 2009 my friend will find the whole story as to what is the actual expected loss of revenue as of March 31, 1958.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is just one factual question I should like to ask the minister. Can he give a comparable figure to the one he gave recently for a taxpayer with a taxable income of $45,000 and four children for whom he enjoys the increased exemption?

Mr. Fleming: Four dependants?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not the same four children, but a similar four children.

Mr. Fleming: His tax reduction will be $242 on account of the increase in exemption for dependants and the decrease in the rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: $242?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: As opposed to $54 for the taxpayer with $500 taxable.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, because the benefit of the exemption, of course, is greater to the man paying a higher rate. Of course the percentage of reduction of tax to the man with the income, my hon. friend has just mentioned is only a very small fraction of the percentage of reduction to the man he spoke of earlier with the smaller taxable income.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that perfectly.

Mr. Benidickson: When the minister presented the tables he has referred to, as found on page 2009 of Hansard, I think he indicated that the reduction in tax revenues was estimated to be $17 million for the balance of the current year with respect to personal income tax, but I do not think he broke it down into the reduction that would be caused by reason of passing this clause and the subsequent clause. Can he give the committee some information on that division?

Mr. Fleming: If my friend will refer to page 2006 of Hansard he will see that the estimated loss of revenue to March 31 next on account of the increase in the exemption is $7 million, and I may say to him that the estimated loss of revenue to March 31 in respect of the decrease in rates is $10 million.

Bill reported.

Mr. Fleming moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, before the bill is given third reading there are one or two points that I believe should receive further consideration in the house. Earlier this morning I got an answer from the Minister of Finance with respect to what the bill will cost the treasury in respect of those in receipt of taxable incomes of over $2,000 per year. The minister stated, as I heard him, that there were approximately one and a half million taxpayers in this category. My arithmetic suggests that that figure multiplied by $30 comes to a total of $45 million per year. When the minister replied last night to my original question he had this to say, as found at page 2364 of Hansard.

> Mr. Chairman, it would be an entirely new theory of progressive taxation to say that when you get above the level of $2,000 of taxable income you are not going to tax everybody in the same way on his initial $2,000 of taxable income. That would be an entirely new theory.

Under most circumstances I probably would be quite willing to agree fully with that statement of the minister. However, I think we should realize that the effect of the bill, as the result of the consideration that has been given to it, falls far short of what the people of Canada were led to expect would be done by a Conservative administration, and that in the absence of a basic increase in the exemptions perhaps the consistency to which the minister refers is not as desirable as might have been the case under some other circumstances.

I think point is lent to the suggestion in the minister's statement that you tax everybody in the same way, by the features of the bill having to do with the rebate or allowance for board and lodging of construction workers. If the minister is going to hold himself out as championing the taxing of everybody in the same way in one clause of the bill, and then is going to ignore that principle completely in another clause of the bill, I think his consistency is very much open to question, to say the least. The minister has tried to suggest that the proposal with respect to construction workers is a new and radical departure in legislation. As found at page 2327 of Hansard he said:

. . . at no time in the consideration of this matter has any question been raised as to any other persons.

I do not believe the bill should be allowed to pass without the attention of the house again being drawn to the fact that the question of allowing exemptions for board, lodging and travelling expenses in the case of workers who, because of their employment, have to live away from their regular homes has been brought up and considered many times in the house. Consideration was given to that matter by the house long before the question of this administrative bulletin No. 10 of the Department of National Revenue was ever brought up.

It is true that a good deal of furore arose across the country because certain groups of people were having certain concessions taken away from them, but I hope the minister understands that people may be a lot more vocal in their objections when they suddenly have something taken away from them which they have enjoyed than if they are attempting to secure the removal of certain discriminations and given something which they have not enjoyed before. I hope the Minister of Finance is not going to allow this subject to get shoved into the back corner of his mind somewhere and forget about it. If the minister is going to use the words he used last night in discussing clause 3, to the effect that everyone would be taxed in the same way, then those words are not going to be forgotten.

In discussing clause 1 the minister had something to say about the interpretation that would be placed upon this clause. At page 2328 of Hansard for December 13, 1957, he said:

I can only say to him—

He was replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Cartier.

—that the interpretation will be a matter for the Department of National Revenue, and having regard to the purpose of the clause I am quite satisfied that the department will endeavour to place a fair and ample interpretation upon it.

Now, we are faced with the position that this legislation is going to pass out of the hands of the Minister of Finance, who is introducing it, and into the hands of another department. I hope the Minister of Finance will see to it that the Department of National Revenue understands the wording of this clause. For example, I would suggest that he make sure that the Department of National Revenue realizes that the words "construction worker" should not be interpreted in such a way as to apply only to employees of construction companies.

As I pointed out last night, there is a very real distinction there. I attempted to bring to the attention of the minister some of the administrative difficulties I foresee in this connection. Nevertheless, if this house passes this bill as it stands, then I hope the Minister of Finance will make it clear that all construction workers in Canada, no matter for whom they are working, are going to receive the benefits of this amendment if the circumstances of their employment bring them within the terms of the bill.

Then, too, if that is done I can foresee that this question is going to be one with which the minister will have to deal on a more consistent basis, and he will have to include those who work in logging camps, mining camps, on survey parties and all other workers whose conditions of employment are identical with those of the construction worker.

The whole matter is such that those of us who come from constituencies where workers, as a matter of course, have to go into isolated areas away from their families, cannot help but feel that the government is being shortsighted in taking this step to meet this discrimination and injustice against wage earners, and has not seen fit to go much further with this concession.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, owing to the fact that yesterday I was engaged in a most important missionary enterprise I lost the opportunity of saying a few words on clause 1 of this bill. However, I do want to express support for the arguments put forward by my colleagues, and to express our appreciation of the fact that construction workers are at last going to enjoy this benefit. I should like also to urge that there are many others, as the hon. member who preceded me has said, who work under similar conditions. For instance, there are timber cruisers, construction workers who are building highways and camps for logging companies, survey parties and even highway crews of the various provincial public works departments.

This amendment carries with it very wide implications. I do urge the minister to give consideration to this when he introduces his next budget, so that all those who work under the same conditions as construction workers will receive this reduction in taxation.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should allow this measure to receive third reading before I say a word or two. I have been fairly well satisfied with the presentation of the arguments by my colleagues, but I am somewhat concerned that the minister has not categorically given us a full interpretation of who might be construed as construction workers. I am particularly interested in this interpretation, Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that in my constituency I have a large number of floating employees who are engaged in the oil industry. I am concerned that if the administration of this bill goes out of the hands of the minister and is put into the hands of the Department of National Revenue, there may be a narrow interpretation of the words "construction worker", and many of these people in my constituency might not receive the benefit of this amendment.

Before this bill is given third reading I should like a further explanation from the minister and his assurance that people who are engaged not only in construction in the narrow sense, but people in industries such as mining and oil, will receive consideration. I wonder if the minister could give this assurance to the house.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am not so naive as to think our representations are going to have an immediate effect on this bill so far as logging and bush workers are concerned, but I believe it is in order for me to put on the record this letter that I received just today from a professional forester who is attached to one of the camps I cited as an example of the difficult position of bushworkers. This is from camp 226, Dorion, Ontario, the Abitibi Power and Paper Company. It is dated December 10, 1957, and is written by J. F. Adderley. He says:

—we the woods workers would like to know why—

Mr. Fleming: I take it my hon. friend is aware of the rule that private letters are not to be read into the record of this house without giving the full text of the letter including the name of the person who sent it. Can the hon. gentleman not state the effect of it without reading the letter?

Mr. Fisher: I gave the name of the writer, Mr. Speaker; is it not proper to give the contents? It is just a brief letter.

—we the woods workers would like to know why Mr. Fleming takes a single group of workers (construction) and states that travel and living expenses paid to construction workers living away from their homes and dependants will be exempt from income tax this year. Our camp is one of hundreds in which the employees live away from their families and yet have to pay tax on the value of free board and lodging. Why then does Mr. Fleming state only construction workers and not all workers who fall in this category?

[Mr. McCullough.]

Perhaps the newspaper has misquoted Mr. Fleming or we do not understand his meaning on the proposed amendment. Could you, Mr. Fisher, give us an answer on this vital question?

Respectfully yours,
Camp 226
J. F. Adderley

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister the right to speak? I do not think he has on third reading. Am I not right?

An hon. Member: Every inch a sailor.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to get the minister out of the country.

Mr. Fleming: This is one occasion when I do not mind.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE TOTAL OUTSTANDING LIABILITY

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 199, respecting the Export Credits Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the resolution stage gave a full explanation of the nature of this bill, and I do not think it is necessary for me to speak at any great length. I would, however, like to read the bill, which consists of only one clause. I would also like to read the explanatory note and then, quite briefly, I would like to read from the speech of the minister at the resolution stage, because I think it covers very concisely the points which hon. members would wish to have in their minds. Thereafter I would like to read also very briefly from an explanation with regard to the actual operation of the clause in question.

The single clause of Bill 199 says:

Subsection 3 of section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) The liability of the corporation under the contracts of insurance entered into under this section and outstanding shall not at any time exceed two hundred million dollars"—

That is the change; the section now reads $100 million and the proposed change is to make it $200 million.

—and shall not be included in the liability of the corporation for the purposes of section 14".

I might interject here section 14 is the section which provides for ordinary insurance contracts, and section 21 is to be considered quite separate from section 14. Now if I might read the explanatory note:

Contracts of insurance issued under section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act are those which are considered to be in the national interest, but which would impose upon the Export Credits Insurance Corporation a liability for a term or in an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, exporter, commodity or country.

Subsection 3 of section 21 of the act now reads as follows:

"(3) The liability of the corporation under the contracts of insurance entered into under this section and outstanding shall not at any time exceed one hundred million dollars and shall not be included in the liability of the corporation for the purposes of section 14."

Section 14 is the section which provides for the limitation on the amount of business which can be done in the ordinary course, and it provides that it shall be limited to ten times the subscribed capital and surplus of the corporation, which at the present time stands at $20 million. Therefore the business under that section is limited to $200 million.

The purpose of this amendment is to increase from one hundred million dollars to two hundred million dollars the total liability that the corporation may have outstanding at any time under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21.

I would now like to read briefly from section 21 before I refer to the remarks made by the minister. This is chapter 105 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, volume II:

Where the minister reports to the governor in council that

(a) the board—

That is the board of the company.

—having regard to the limitations imposed by section 14, is of opinion that a proposed contract of insurance will impose upon the corporation a liability for a term or in an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, exporter, commodity or country, and

(b) in the opinion of the minister it is in the national interest that the proposed contract be entered into, the governor in council may approve of and authorize the corporation to enter into the proposed contract of insurance.

I draw to the attention of the house the fact that there must be a recommendation from the minister and then the contract must be approved by the governor in council. I continue to read:

(2) All moneys required by the corporation to discharge its liabilities arising under any contract of insurance entered into under this section shall be paid to the corporation by the Minister of Finance out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

(3) The liability of the corporation under the contracts of insurance entered into under this section and outstanding shall not at any time exceed one hundred million dollars and shall not be included in the liability of the corporation for the purposes of section 14.

I draw the attention of the house to the fact that in section 14 there is a special limitation provided, and I would now like to read quite briefly from the speech of the minister, recalling to the minds of hon. members certain figures which he gave and which I think are very relevant.

Mr. Argue: On what page is that?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am reading now from page 1867 of Hansard:

The purpose of this amendment is to increase the effectiveness of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation by giving it the necessary authority to take on liabilities of an additional $100 million, under section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act. Contracts of insurance issued under section 21 of the act are those which are considered to be in the national interest but which, in the opinion of the board of directors of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, would impose upon the corporation a liability for a term or in an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, exporter, commodity or country. All moneys required by the corporation to discharge its liabilities arising under any contract of insurance entered into under this section are to be paid to the corporation by the Minister of Finance out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

Section 21 of the act as it now stands limits the corporation's liability to $100 million. At the present time, liabilities under policies of insurance actually written plus commitments currently outstanding total $98 million in the aggregate.

That I think makes perfectly clear the need for an extension and the amendment proposed.

It is obvious that in order to have this section of the act continue its effectiveness, and to allow the corporation to insure additional business, it must be authorized to assume further liabilities, and I am therefore proposing that the amount of such liabilities be established at $200 million.

I would just like to read a little more:

Through the operations of section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act an increasing amount of export trade has been insured, and a considerable portion of it would not have materialized had it not been possible to have it insured. One hundred and six policies of insurance have been issued under this section covering exports amounting to $206 million. Insured export shipments which have been concluded and paid in full amount to $97 million. Insurance premiums paid on this business have totalled $1,659,191, of which $1,245,488 has been turned over to the receiver general and the balance of $413,703 retained by the corporation to meet its expenses and overhead arising out of the contracts of insurance issued under section 21 of the act. I am pleased to report that as yet there have been no losses.

He is referring, of course, to the operation of section 21.

I should now like to conclude by reading a very short extract from a small booklet which has been written to explain the operation of the act, and I read from that part which deals with section 21 because I think the rest of the act has to do with the ordinary course of business. But under section 21 I read the following:

For business to be considered under section 21, the exporter makes his application to the corporation in the usual way and such application is referred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to arrange for a cabinet decision, and if the application is accepted an appropriate order in council is issued authorizing the corporation to insure.

Hon. members will observe the way in which the operation of this section is safeguarded, and it will be clear, I think, to anyone that under the act the power to insure in this way is quite essential to the operation.

I just repeat before I take my seat that under this act there have been 106 policies coverings exports amounting to $206 million; that there have been repayments of $97 million and that the outstanding amounts insured or committed are $98 million. So we are right up to the ceiling, and it is not only desirable that this bill should be passed but that it should be passed very promptly because, of course, it is hoped to continue operations under it, and at the present time the authority is urgently needed.

Mr. Stick: Do I understand that every application for an export loan must have cabinet approval?

Mr. Macdonnell: Under this section, yes. Let me repeat what I read "for business to be considered under section 21 the application is referred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to arrange for a cabinet decision."

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to deal to any extent in remarks respecting this bill at this stage. On December 4 I made some comment respecting it. I would hope that my friend the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce who is sponsoring this bill would, before ending the debate, explain to the house why despite his extensive objections to the amendments that were made to the act last spring relating to income tax liability, this bill does not reflect any of the recommendations which I would have expected him to have incorporated in it. The bill which is now before us simply changes one word and makes the liability under section 21 $200 million instead of $100 million.

I was pleased that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he spoke at the resolution stage on December 4, and the acting minister now both reported that with regard to insured export sales under this section loans had been insured, and therefore export trade assisted, in the amount of over $200 million. They both reported to the house that to date no liabilities have been incurred.

Mr. Macdonnell: No losses. The hon. member said "no liabilities"; I think he meant to say "no losses".

Mr. Benidickson: Quite correct. No losses have been incurred by the government under section 21. I just urge the new administration to administer this very useful section with equal wisdom, and I hope that under their administration the record will continue to be as splendid as it has been under the former administration. Hon. members probably do not realize that under the other regular sections of the bill, with regard to which the corporation itself makes decisions some $400 million worth of export sales have been insured and assisted. This special $200 million worth of export sales which have come within section 21 require specific cabinet approval. This is only what is before the house.

I did indicate to the house on December 4 that there was in some sections of the country some rather extravagant propaganda being spread as to the value of this particular amendment. I pointed out then that the maximum liability was being approached under an export insurance statute which had been introduced by a former Liberal administration and which had been on the statute books since 1944. This action is thus simply a routine matter to extend the maximum crown liability. I pointed out that the export sales assisted under this act which had been found very satisfactory to date, had been largely initiated by the former government.

I also pointed out that there seemed to be some conflict between the speeches which were made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) to Regina audiences with particular reference to the value of this amending bill. The two ministers spoke on succeeding days in Regina, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that his forecast of wheat sales for the current crop year was 300 million bushels. The responsible minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, gave that figure. On the following day, in Regina suggesting that this legislation would be responsible, the minister of northern affairs (Mr. Hamilton) upped that figure by 50 million bushels.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said to us, on December 4, when discussing this bill, that he saw no reason to reduce his estimate of wheat sales in the current crop year. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the records indicate that wheat is not the only commodity that is assisted by this legislation, which is aimed at increasing Canadian export sales. As a matter of fact a return was given to a question which I asked, question No. 207, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce reported to me and to the house that from January 1, 1957 to October 31, 1957 export sales amounting to $104 million had been assisted under section 21, which is being discussed and amended here today.

It just happens that out of this $104 million of export sales which received assistance to October 31 in 1957, some $80 million was in respect of aircraft and not wheat. So I simply draw attention again to this apparent confusion in the forecast of the value of this legislation, when two cabinet ministers on successive days report to the wheat growing areas of Canada in Saskatchewan differing estimates of the export sales which are likely to take place in the current crop year.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before us to extend the permitted liability under the Export Credit Insurance Act is something that we in this group are quite pleased to support. This has been an instrument of some benefit in maintaining exports of wheat in certain areas where countries lack a supply of dollars.

I do not think the government should be satisfied that the bill now before the house, coupled with any other policy that it has announced to date, will be in fact sufficient to do the job. The truth is that we have a vast surplus of grain in this country which is a burden to the nation. One reason is that money is being paid out of the consolidated revenue fund toward the cost of storage and interest charges, but it is also a burden on the country because producers have to keep large quantities of grain on their farms and they must maintain buildings to house that grain, which is an extremely expensive proposition for them.

There is great need, in fact there is urgent need, to increase by a vast amount Canada's exports of grain. If we are timid in our attitude and in our policies as a country, and if we allow these large surpluses to remain in Canada, it is only a matter of time until we will have lost the economic value of the grain itself. Various estimates could be made, but it costs anywhere from 15 to 20 cents a bushel to carry grain from one year to the next. So if we are going to allow the grain to stay in the country rather than following an aggressive policy of selling grain it will only be a matter of five or six years until we, as a nation, will have sustained the loss of the value of that grain, because the value will have been eaten up by the burdensome carrying charges and interest charges.

The Export Credits Insurance Act has been of some value in the past, but I do not think it can possibly be the answer. As a matter of fact I do not think it is the answer even in the restricted field to which it applies, because we know that under this act the government has provided for the advance of credit on a rather short-term basis. I believe the longest term has been three years. As I understand it the total amount that has been provided for wheat by way of insurance under this act has been for the export of some 55 million bushels to date. That is just a flea bite compared to the huge surplus of grain we have on hand. This act as it now stands simply will not do the job.

There is growing evidence and there are increasing reports that there are countries in the world that would like to take wheat from Canada in increased quantities, countries that have not recently been buying large quantities of wheat, if they could obtain the grain on a long-term credit basis. I have recently seen reports in the press to the effect that Poland and Spain have been interested in buying substantial quantities of wheat from Canada. I do not suppose it is possible or advisable for the minister to give information and details concerning negotiations that may still be in process, and I do not believe any hon. member of this house would want to say anything that would interfere in an adverse way with those negotiations, but I do think the minister owes it to the house to tell us what is the government's general attitude in the field of long-term credit.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that this is a very narrow bill in principle. The only principle involved is whether the bill should permit the increasing of liabilities from $100 million to $200 million. As I understand it, the issue before the house and the principle of the bill is how much more money is needed to achieve the purposes of section 21 of the bill. The hon. member has been dealing with other ways of meeting the problem, and I just put it to him that as I see it we are debating a rather narrow subject.

Mr. Argue: If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the government that instead of bringing forth a measure to put an additional $100 million into this act, it should bring forward a measure to put $500 million into it, because $100 million simply will not do the job. As Mr. Speaker has now said, this is a very narrow bill—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: —but he was not making any comment on the value of the legislation. Nevertheless we all realize it is a very narrow bill, so narrow that it will not achieve the desired result, and will not even do the job it was designed to do. I think it is in order to say that if this $100 million is confined to short-term credit or short-term insurance it should be made available for a longer period of time.

I certainly agree with the comments made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), that the ministers of this government are not agreed in their own minds as to what is the purpose of this bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who should know, he having initially sponsored this bill which is now being piloted through the house by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, said that with this measure it is hoped to increase exports of Canadian wheat to a total of 300 million bushels. But the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has become highly enthusiastic, and decided that his knowledge of the Department of Trade and Commerce exceeds that of the minister in charge. He says it is not a bill that is going to result in increased exports of 50 million bushels of wheat, but rather that it will result in total exports of 350 million bushels of wheat.

May I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was saying that if the government was determined to move the great surplus of grain we have in this country I felt something more should be done, and that even under this act a much larger sum of money, a much larger guarantee, should be provided for such a purpose.

I have in front of me the Winnipeg Free Press for Tuesday, December 10, and in it there is an article entitled, "Ottawa Steers Clear of Long-Term Deals". The report goes on to relate some of the countries that are interested in long-term deals. I do not wish to transgress the rules, Mr. Speaker, and I am therefore not going to get into a discussion of any possible long-term contracts, but I must say that in recent days I have gleaned from press reports, and I have heard others say, that indeed there are a large number of countries that are looking to Canada for purchase of wheat if credit can be made available to them.

For example, I understand that Spain has been making inquiries—I understand this, anyway—for, one report says, 20 million bushels. Another report said 7 million bushels a year for some years, which would add up, I take it, to anywhere from 50 million to 60 million bushels of wheat. Well, if Spain has been looking for, or is even interested in, such a large quantity of wheat, or Poland is interested in a large quantity of wheat, I think it is a fair question to ask whether the provisions of the bill that is now before us to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act are sufficient to enable those countries to buy the large quantities of wheat that it is reported they are interested in buying.

If this act is sufficient to enable them to buy such quantities of wheat, well and good. If the government is prepared to make such contracts, then the government is to be congratulated on making them. On the other hand, if the present act is not adequate in its terms to provide for the longer term credit that those countries may wish to obtain, then I think the government should tell the house that that is so; that it needs additional legislation or additional powers to sign such contracts. I am sure that if the government needs such authority parliament would be prepared to grant it because I think there is one thing the people of this country from coast to coast are agreed on, namely that it is economic nonsense to keep the wheat in Canada over an indefinite period and lose out entirely in an economic sense, even though we can physically see the wheat five or six years from now that it is far better to get something tangible—even if it is by an extension of credit—in the way of a guaranteed return over a period of years than it is to keep the grain at home.

We in this group are quite prepared to support this bill, but we feel that the government under this act and under other acts, is going to have to do much more if it is to meet the problem at hand.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask my hon. friend a question? With respect to prices, he is not advocating a fire sale?

Mr. Argue: Oh, no, not at all. I have not seen any suggestions anywhere, even by the countries that, according to the newspaper reports, are interested, that the price be decreased. As a matter of fact, I think the price is already too low. I do not think it is a question of price. To a country that has no dollars it does not matter too much whether you are asking $2.50, $2.00 or $1.50 for the wheat. If they have no dollars they cannot buy. The main problem is not prices. The main problem is to see that these countries obtain credit, or obtain the means to purchase our wheat.

Mr. Benidickson: Under this bill, yes.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Jacob Schulz (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this bill is a very important piece of legislation and therefore I should like to say a few words before it receives second reading. It is designed to expedite exports, which is a very important matter at this time. I read in the Gazette this morning that Canada now has a deficit of $1,170 million. This particular piece of legislation would help to increase exports, and particularly the export of wheat.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question. I am rather astounded by the last figure he gave of the Canadian deficit. When he uses the figure $1 billion, is he speaking about the trade deficit, or what?

Mr. Benidickson: Trade and services.

Mr. Schulz: Deficit in foreign trade. This legislation will be of particular importance with respect to the export of wheat. As I understand it, most of this money which is appropriated is intended to be used for extended credit to countries that want to buy Canadian wheat. We are confronted now with a billion bushels of wheat and I think it is very important that this legislation should be passed. But when you compare it with the size of the problem it is supposed to solve it is just too little.

I am again forced to express the same opinion that I expressed when we passed the bill having to do with cash advances to the farmers. I will vote for it under the assumption that something is better than nothing; but it is incredible that people should tackle one of our greatest problems in this country, which is publicly admitted to be the sale of our wheat, with such a limited measure which increases the liability under the act by another $100 million.

I think every hon. member has noticed in the press lately that many countries would like to buy wheat from Canada right now if they could get more credit and have the term extended. I just took a clipping out of the Winnipeg Free Press of December 10, and I should like to quote from it.

> Various European countries at one time or another have approached Canada seeking long-term credit arrangements to buy wheat. But the government has not wanted to take on such deals.
> Asking which countries would be interested in obtaining wheat under such deals one official said: United Kingdom, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany and Italy. There had been also tentative inquiries on occasion from Spain and Portugal.

Here is a whole list of countries that want our wheat and the only reason they cannot buy it is that they have not got the cash. Therefore I wish the government would approach this issue in a little more positive manner, increase the fund, as was mentioned before, to at least $500 million and at the same time extend the terms because according to the clipping to which I have referred it is evident that the terms are more important at this time than the amount. When we were at the resolution stage the other day I mentioned that I wished the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) would consider the proposal of extending the terms. Apparently nothing has been done in this regard. I am just a new member of the house and I do not know if something could be done now but I think it is such an important issue that we should discuss it more thoroughly and think it through before we pass the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and his going back a couple of years to a discussion in which I then participated with regard to a taxation feature of the measure. I do not propose to go back and review that again. In the first place, it is always possible I may have been wrong in what I said then.

Mr. Chevrier: That could not be.

Mr. Macdonnell: In the second place, we were discussing a question of taxation. The question was whether the provision then made was a deviation from the proposal made years before by the then minister of finance that those crown corporations that were engaged in ordinary competitive business should pay income tax in the ordinary way. The clause proposed a couple of years ago had reference to the fact that the Exports Credit Insurance Corporation could use its margin to increase its reserve and escape taxation in that way. But as the minister pointed out at that time it was possible to argue that the government got the money in one way or the other. If it did not get it by tax it got it in the other way as an operating margin, so I am not going back to review that.

I am grateful to the hon. member for his acquiescence in the measure. I do not propose to contravert what he said in praise of the operation of this measure by the preceding government. If we find any place where the preceding government has done well, we are only too glad to model ourselves on their action. I am not saying how often we find that—

Mr. Chevrier: You have done that pretty often now.

Mr. Macdonnell: —but I am admitting that we find it at times.

Mr. Benidickson: Most of this session you have just enlarged your predecessors' legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell: With regard to what the hon. member has said, I would merely add that we realize what we realized when we were in the opposition ourselves, that when a measure arises with which you are in full agreement it is sometimes a little difficult to find a great deal of a controversial nature in it.

I want to make some comments on what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I could not agree more with what he said about the need and the urgency of disposing of our immense supply of wheat, but I do not believe there is anyone in the world who is more conscious of that than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). He has been like a commuter across the Atlantic in the last two or three months. I am sorry the member is not in the house but I repeat that I think he can take it that the need and urgency are fully in the minds of the government and the minister. I would point out to him that we have what we believe to be competent and able people, both in the staff of the department and in the wheat board, people who are experienced salesmen, and we are, of course, guided by their advice.

It has been suggested by two members that what we are asking for is not enough. I would point out that the first $100 million did in fact last nearly ten years. It will be immediately objected that we did not have the situation we have now with our huge wheat surplus. I accept that but I also point out that we have and are thankful to have a considerable number of cash customers so that it is not wholly a question of giving credit to everybody. I do wish to say very earnestly that the government and the minister are fully seized of the necessity of moving this wheat.

Finally, in answer to the argument that this amount is not enough, I would say that if it is not enough we will be pleasantly surprised, and it is always possible to come back and ask the house to give us more credit if we need it. After weighing the situation the government has asked for $100 million. I gather that this will be gladly agreed to and I would point out that this represents the judgment of the government as to the amount to be asked for at the present time. I repeat that if it turns out to be too little there is nothing to prevent us asking for more.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

On clause 1—Liability under contracts outstanding.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in past discussion of this legislation there has been some reference to what we on the left side of the chair felt was an inadequate desire to approach and deal with governments who have been reported in the press recently as being possible purchasers of Canadian wheat. I refer to past debates this session on the Russian trade group approaches, and even yesterday and today we have had references to Australia's possible grain requirements. Then there are some new possibilities such as from Poland and Spain. I feel that in answers to members on this side of the house the ministry has not displayed a properly aggressive selling policy in this respect. I assume that most of these approaches would require credit insurance. I would appreciate it if the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce would say something about this matter.

I join with the hon. member for Assiniboia in saying that we do not want to embarrass current trade negotiations, but I think there has been a rather scandalous disregard displayed in answers given in this house on this very important matter relating to possible wheat sales. I think that we on this side have been fair and responsible. We have endeavoured to advance this legislation as rapidly as would normally be expected.

There is another question I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is there a maximum percentage related to total export sales volume up to which insurance would be provided by the crown corporation or even by order in council under section 21 applying to the Export Credits Insurance Act provisions?

Again, the hon. member for Assiniboia felt, and I agreed with him, that there was a new trend in the approach to such things as wheat sales which required credit over a longer term. Are there any regulations specifying the maximum term of credit with respect to government insurance of this kind? The final question to the acting minister would be, has he any comment to make with respect particularly to wheat as an export item? In answer to a question of mine, question No. 207, this session the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that in 1956 this section of the act had assisted the sale of 24 million bushels of wheat, and in the period of 10 months in 1957 to October 31, 1957 only 10 million bushels of wheat. Would the acting minister care to comment on the general prospects of export trade with respect to wheat?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I was a little sorry to hear my hon. friend, whose language is usually so restrained, speak of scandalous disregard on the part of the government. I can only ask him to believe what I said a moment ago, that we have competent and able people and certainly there has been the strongest feeling as to the need for urgency. More than that I do not think it is useful for me to say.

I should like to point out in passing, however, that when we talk of credit, and I think Russia was mentioned and Australia, we should remember that Russia bought for cash and we would expect Australia to buy for cash. We must not talk, therefore, as if this were wholly a credit matter.

The hon. member asked whether there were any regulations specifying the maximum term of credit. The answer to that is no. It is a matter of judgment. It is a difficult matter, but the best judgment that can be brought to bear on it is brought to bear. The hon. member asked also the percentage of insurance under section 21. It is possible for the insurance to be 100 per cent under section 21, and under the ordinary contracts which are made under the other parts of the act, the usual maximum is 85 per cent.

Mr. Stick: The acting minister has mentioned the fact that Russia paid cash for wheat and he expected Australia to do the same. I may have misunderstood him, but surely if Australia wanted credit from us, we would grant it. If we make grants of credit to Poland and Spain, then we should grant credit to Australia.

Mr. Macdonnell: The question does not arise because Australia has not asked for it.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I wonder if this amendment would now enable Poland and Spain, who have been asking for credit, to finalize their arrangements for the purchase of wheat? I do understand they want credit for these purchases.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have suggested before that members of parliament ought to have some confidence in those who are carrying on this business. As I say, they are able, experienced people who have been in the business a long time. I do request that I be not asked to diclose further details. I cannot see how it could help the situation, and I can see how it could hurt the situation.

Mr. Benidickson: I think I asked the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce a question as to the regulations that might prevail with respect to the percentage of insurance that might apply to total export sales. I recall that this morning I gave the house the information that we had sales in 1957, up to October 31 of this year, in volume amounting to $104 million that had been assisted and insured under the provisions of this section 21. It is my understanding that of that amount almost $80 million represented sales of aircraft, not agricultural or grain produce. I believe also that the liability of the government under section 21 was approximately $22 million, having regard to that sale of $80 million of aircraft.

I asked, is there a regulation in effect—I should know this but I do not recollect it; and the minister has an official in front of him—is there a maximum under the regulations with respect to this section on the insuring basis of crown liability that would apply vis a vis the total export sale value and maximum liability to the treasury?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am informed there is no regulation limiting the amount. In the case the hon. member mentioned, of $80 million of sales to Germany and the $22 million of insurance, I am advised that deliveries were so staggered that the company exporting had not more than $22 million at risk at any one time.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I quite appreciate the minister's reluctance to give out details of trade agreements under discussion. I am not asking him for details of trade agreements. However, I believe it is important that the countries of the world be acquainted with the fact that Canada, at least in principle, is agreeable to extending credit to countries who are in need of it. If this amendment will allow us to extend further credits to other countries, as for example to Poland and Spain, since they are currently in the news, I think it would be of considerable value to us in disposing of our grain.

Mr. Macdonnell: I must have been singularly unfortunate in my attempt to explain this act to the house, because I think the whole point of what we are doing is to put us in a position to extend credit in cases where we feel it desirable to do so. It seems to me that is the complete answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): At the same time, there has been very little indication, over the past number of years, that this act has been used extensively for wheat. It was pointed out in a return that $24 million was used—was it last year?

Mr. Benidickson: For 1957 it did not indicate appreciable credit for wheat, but in previous years it was mostly for wheat.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): In terms of the surplus supplies we have in Canada, it has been used to a small degree. The point I am trying to get across, Mr. Chairman, is that I believe the acting minister has indicated the dedication of the government to following these principles and I just want to assure him he certainly has my support and they can go to it with all the aggression they can muster.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am grateful to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who, I understand, assisted me in my answers. The amount of wheat insured so far under section 21 is $118 million. This is a fairly respectable amount and, as I said, at the moment we are now seeking the power to insure $100 million more. As I also said that I would assume from the temper of the house if we have to come back and ask for more authority we will get it. If we have made it too low no one will be more happy to confess it than we will and to come back and ask for more.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce will agree, however, that of the $107 million of insured export sales in 1957 up to October 31, 1957, under this section 21, practically all of it was under the administration of the former government. There is a slow-up in insured exports of wheat under this act since the new administration took over.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well I will not try to diminish the pleasure which the hon. gentleman gets from saying what he has said just now, but I would like to remind him that the very fact he has said so is the strongest reason for our coming and asking for more authority.

Mr. Argue: The minister says he will be quite happy if there is more demand for credit under the act than can be handled by the $100 million. It would seem to me whether the reports we are reading in the newspapers with regard to demand are right or not, there is interest in obtaining grain on credit in quantities that, even at the present time, would take up the whole $100 million. I am wondering if there is any other department of the government or any other act under which credit could be supplied to prospective customers for wheat, because it is obvious that the $100 million based on current prices for wheat, if you take into account the cost of shipment, is no more than enough to handle maybe 60 million bushels of wheat or something in that neighbourhood. If we could judge from the reports at all, we should all hope that much more could be considered on a credit basis than 60 million bushels and, as a matter of fact, I think that probably even the current situation is that countries are showing interest in obtaining wheat on credit in amounts that far exceed in total the $100 million that we have now under discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think perhaps I can usefully say in answer to that, that I should remind the hon. member we should all be back here, happily together, on January 3 and if this happy situation which he outlines should come about in the interval, we would no doubt be able to get any necessary further authority.

Mr. Argue: Well, Mr. Chairman, if I can get a satisfactory answer to this question I will be done for today with this particular measure. Will the minister assure the house that the government is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to requests for credit for periods in excess of three years—even for periods of time up to eight or ten years—or is it a fact that the government says "unless the credit periods are three years or less, we shall have nothing to do with it."

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I think I had better content myself with assuring the hon. gentleman of what I have already said, that we want to sell wheat; that we will do whatever we think is sensible in order to sell it, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow me to be relieved of the necessity of going any further and mentioning the terms and years such as he has done. He has got the evidence of what has happened over the years; he has my assurance of sympathetic consideration to any proposal for the selling of wheat, yes, but to go beyond that and specify years I think would be unwise. I think the hon. gentleman will have the good sense to know that if he were in my position that is what he would say.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there would be anything wrong, as a matter of fact I think it would be all to the good, if the minister would say that, based on the merit of the application or the request, the government of Canada was prepared to sell wheat on credit for periods greatly in excess of three years. But that is not what the minister has said. I have not the Winnipeg Free Press here at the moment, but they have a report on the front page from their Ottawa correspondent on December 10 which very strongly suggests that the government is most reluctant to consider advancing credit on a long-term basis such as that being defined as 10 years or in that neighbourhood. As I say, I am quoting from memory but I could bring the article into the house in a moment. However, I think I have given a fair analysis of it. If I have the assurance of the minister that the government will in fact give sympathetic consideration to a proposal—even if the proposal is for credit up to a 10-year period—I shall be quite satisfied.

Mr. Macdonnell: I always enjoy a conversation with the hon. member for Assiniboia, but I do not think I can usefully continue this conversation. I think all I should say is that I believe it would be very unwise in our negotiations with foreign countries to advise them in advance of our own views as to the lengths of credit.

Mr. Benidickson: I want to be sympathetic to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce; he was always courteous to me when we were on opposite sides of the house but when we asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce—when he was back in the house after one of these trade missions to the United Kingdom—he seemed to be uninformed with respect to the availability of possible purchases of grains from other countries whose trade missions were here in this country.

Would the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce assure this committee, without embarrassment to him on account of customers with whom we might be dealing, that he as acting minister is endeavouring to receive these trade missions and give them the best possible opportunities that may be available for wheat buying, even under this legislation.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think I can assure the committee that every trade mission and every inquiry of any kind is being received by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture with the greatest sympathy.

Mr. Quelch: I would like to ask the minister whether or not this is the only legislation under which loans might be made to a foreign country to buy our wheat? I ask this question because when we were discussing the first item of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the government was giving serious consideration to the possibility of making grain available to nations who are not able to pay for it in dollars by purchases under long-term loans or perhaps even the acceptance of their currency. I assume that if that action were taken it could not be done under this legislation but that there would have to be special legislation for this purpose.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well it would be possible, of course, for the government to introduce special legislation if it was thought desirable. I do not think that is a matter to be discussed today. It is quite true that the Minister of Trade and Commerce discussed a variety of possibilities in his speech which was, I think, made on December 7. But going back to the other question, there can be the most absolute assurance that everything which comes before the wheat board and the department is given the most serious consideration. There is nobody in the world more anxious to sell wheat than we are.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the acting minister just indicate to the house whether or not in his capacity as acting minister for some time now because of the long absences of the Minister of Trade and Commerce he has had any personal contact with possible purchasers of large consignments of Canadian grain.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, I think I can give that assurance; absolutely.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied that the government is in fact trying to do the things it says it is trying to do, namely to sell all the wheat that can possibly be sold. The reason I say that is this: Under this present measure—the $100 million being provided for credit—it would provide for the sale of only 50 or 60 million bushels of wheat.

The acting minister can state the number that it might be able to move if he wishes to. The reason, I believe, why they are thinking in terms of 50 or 60 million bushels of wheat is because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has himself stated that this is the amount by which they hope to increase sales this year as compared with last year up to a total of 300 million bushels, and also the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said some progress had been made in discussions with the United States, and suggested that the United States program of barter would probably curtail Canadian sales to the extent of 50 million bushels. Then the hon. member for Acadia asked whether this particular provision was the one which would cover the acceptance of local currency, as was inferred by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a week ago when he said the matter was under active consideration. It would seem to me that his reply suggested very definitely that this was the only act under which this idea could be considered.

If I am right in all these things, it comes to this—that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been saying that the government has under active consideration the acceptance of local currency, while the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has gone across the country saying that the government has a plan which may increase exports to 350 million bushels. Yet we cannot get from the government today a simple statement that the government is prepared to consider where necessary long term credit, that is, credit for periods in excess of three years, up to five years or ten years. I think this is a very simple request.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce made it perfectly clear in this house a week ago that there are certain countries in the world where increased sales on a cash basis are out of the question. He said that credit was required, and that the government was considering the matter. But it seems that all the present government has in mind is to carry on exactly the same policy as was carried on by the former administration, under exactly the same act and with the prospects of selling almost exactly the same quantity of wheat under its provisions, namely, 55 million bushels.

I say that the government has shown no imagination at all in the field of selling wheat, that it has shown no concrete results to date, and that the lack of explanation made on behalf of the administration today should be a matter of extreme concern to all those in this nation who derive their livelihood directly or indirectly from the movement of wheat to ports, terminals and so on, and an indication that the government is not doing any more in this field than the previous government did.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I have been concerned to some considerable extent with efforts to try to dispose of our surplus of wheat during the past few months, perhaps I can say a word or two on this and give the hon. member for Assiniboia and others in the house something in the way of an assurance.

I think I can say definitely that the amount provided in this particular bill will not limit the amount of wheat which we may sell or will sell if we can find proper markets and make proper deals for it. Some hon. members opposite seem to have in their minds that the amount of wheat we can sell is going to be limited by the upper limit of this bill, but that is not so. If we can find a market and make the sales, the amount provided in this bill is not going to prevent the sale of any of that wheat. That can and will be provided for by other means. I should like also to assure hon. members that we have been exploring every possible lead which has come to us as far as the possibility of selling wheat is concerned, and that we are following up in the most vigorous manner possible every indication we get from any direction as to where there may be a market for wheat. And we are ready to receive proposals from any source and to consider them in regard to the terms of sale, and everything else along that line.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to hear the minister say that we are not limited by the terms of this act in our efforts to sell wheat over and above the quantities which have been sold in the past, and that if there is a possibility of concluding a deal with any country for the sale of wheat which would need provisions in addition to this act, or outside this act, the government is prepared to take whatever steps may be necessary.

Would it not be a fact that if the government wished to sell wheat on a credit basis outside the provisions of this act the government would have to come to parliament for authority and for the necessary legislation? If that is not the case, perhaps the minister could tell us how such sales outside the present legislation could be financed.

Mr. Stick: I am rather confused. I know this country and, I think, the government, want to sell the wheat that we have in surplus, but when you have something to sell and you are going out to sell it you should have the terms under which you are going to sell ironed out before you ask the customer to buy.

It seems to me, from the course of the discussion so far, that you want to sell your wheat but you have not made up your minds under what terms you are going to sell it. I fully realize that when dealing with one country the terms may be different from those used in dealing with another country, but I believe that if the government is anxious to sell this wheat it should make up its mind under what terms it is going to sell —three years, five years, or ten years. You are out to sell wheat but you have not made up your mind on what terms you are going to sell it.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think I can assure the hon. member that there is nothing in that. We have experts—people who have been selling wheat around the world for many years—engaged in this work. They know their prices. They know what they want. What the hon. member says about wanting to sell wheat but not knowing under what terms they are going to sell it is quite wrong.

Mr. Stick: Can you tell us on what terms you are going to sell this wheat?

Mr. Macdonnell: There is a prevailing rate on the market. There are all kinds of considerations which enter into it. I am not here to give a lecture on the methods they use, but they sell hundreds of millions of bushels every year. They do not do that because they are ignorant of the terms under which they want to sell it.

Mr. Schulz: We hear a good deal about the willingness of the government to sell wheat. We hear that they are anxious to do it, but the fact still remains that sales have gone down since this government took office and they are still going down right now. What the government says is no comfort to anybody who must sit there and suffer.

I read a report in the Montreal Gazette this morning. It says that more ocean-going vessels called at Montreal during the season, that less general cargo was handled and that shipments of grain fell seriously.

If the government were only willing to tell this house what kind of measures they want to enact in order to increase these sales, some progress might be made; but the only measure they have brought out so far is this increase of $100 million, and I suggest this does not go far enough at this time.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the acting minister has said that the wheat board has been in this business of selling wheat for years and that they are the people who should be able to sell the wheat. Now we have a concrete proposal before us that $100 million should be made available under the Export Credits Insurance Act. Having said those two things, without there being any indication that the government is prepared to go beyond the terms of contracts signed by the previous government and realizing that the government has failed utterly to provide any further increases under the Colombo plan, or any further grants for gifts or of food to famine-stricken nations over and above those provided by the last administration, it seems to me that we are forced to arrive at this conclusion: At least as of today the government has no new policy, in fact it has not got a clue as to how it can increase sales and its hiding behind the work of the Canadian wheat board as it has functioned in the past is not adequate at all. The wheat board does not sell wheat outside the scope of government policy. The wheat board sells within the framework of government policy and that policy demands cash sales. Many countries do not have cash so we keep our wheat and the nations that require it cannot obtain it and when the question of credit for a long-term period is raised in this house the government has no answer.

According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the United States has taken 50 million bushels of wheat sales that otherwise should be ours through its barter deals but the minister's comment only explained 50 million bushels of the increased sales the United States had last year when it sold more than twice as much wheat as Canada sold, some 540 million bushels as compared with Canadian sales of 260 million bushels. This leads me to the conclusion that the United States success in selling more wheat, reducing its surplus by approximately 300 million bushels at a time when Canada's surplus has remained almost the same in spite of a very bad year, is attributable not to the barter policy to which this government has taken such great exception but rather to the fact that the United States sold wheat on a long-term credit basis. The United States gives up to 40 years in its credit provisions and this government cannot get beyond three years.

If we do not provide credit and fail to do anything to move the tremendous surplus of Canadian wheat I can only come to the conclusion I reached earlier today that we are in fact losing the total value of our surplus wheat because it is being eaten up by the burden of carrying charges and interest charges. The policy of allowing wheat to plug the terminal elevators, the country elevators and the farmer's bin is both shortsighted and inadequate. It is a policy of despair and defeat. As far as I am concerned that is the policy that exists today because the government has suggested no way of increasing our sales beyond 50 or 60 million bushels above the sales of last year.

Mr. Schulz: Mr. Chairman, the minister has pointed out to us that we have people in this country who are selling wheat. No doubt he meant the officials of the Canadian wheat board who are trying to do a good job. However, when we were discussing this measure at the resolution stage the other day I suggested to the minister that he should consider extending the term of credit. He replied that he had already considered doing that and had made proposals and discussed the question with the wheat board officials who turned it down. He said they thought it would not be the right thing to do. Who is the boss here? Is it the minister or the wheat board? Who is giving orders to whom? If what the minister said is not true the minister is engaging in a form of buck passing which I do not appreciate. If it is true, then it is even worse.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED PRICES FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 11, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Harkness—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities to be named therein and to provide that prices may be guaranteed for any other agricultural commodity or commodities as named from time to time by the governor in council, such measure to include: provisions for the establishment of a board and an advisory committee, the appointment of members thereof and employees and the payment of their salaries and expenses; provisions for the payment of administration costs and expenses; provisions establishing a revolving fund in the consolidated revenue fund and authorizing expenditures therefrom for the purposes of the proposed measure not exceeding in the aggregate two hundred and fifty million dollars in addition to the expenditure of the proceeds of sale of agricultural commodities and other revenues derived thereunder; and such further related and consequential provisions as may be necessary to give effect to the foregoing system.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, when ten o'clock came the other evening when we were discussing this resolution the hon. member for Meadow Lake had the floor. He is not here today and therefore I want to take the floor for a few minutes to state our position as we see it at the moment.

We had hoped that we might have been able to have the bill before us at the end of the previous sitting when we were discussing the resolution. We feel that it is almost impossible to discuss the resolution intelligently or even to discuss the system it proposes until we have seen the bill. Not having had an opportunity of examining the bill we do not feel inclined to carry this discussion any further unless something arises in connection with it which would make it necessary for us to do so. As far as this particular group is concerned we think we should get along with the adoption of the resolution at the earliest possible moment and have the bill distributed. If it is possible to distribute it immediately it would be most helpful but if it is not then we would hope to have it brought in at the earliest possible moment. If the minister could give us to understand that there is a possibility of having the bill distributed shortly it would shorten the discussion a great deal as far as this group is concerned. We do not intend to discuss the question further if we could have the bill brought down now.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I can give the assurance that as soon as the resolution stage is completed the bill will be brought down as soon as it is possible for the printers to print the date on the bill. It would then be distributed immediately, within a matter of a few hours. As a matter of fact, I could distribute some of the preliminary copies of which I have a few to the leaders of the various parties as soon as we complete the resolution stage.

I appeal to hon. members to follow the course of action which has been suggested by the right hon. member for Melville. I think it would be a great advantage if the bill were in the hands of hon. members, farm organizations, farmers and other interested parties so that all could study it and see what it contains. It would avoid a great deal of discussion on what you might call false trails if this were done.

It seems to me there is a lot of genuine misconception in the minds of many people as to what this bill proposes to do and what it contains. Therefore, the sooner it gets into the hands of people who are interested the sooner they will be in a position to assess what the bill actually contains and what it is possible to accomplish under it.

There are two basic misconceptions which I should perhaps mention. There seems to be the idea in the minds of many people that what I called the basic security feature of the bill, that is the provision that under no circumstances should the prices for certain key commodities be allowed to go below 80 per cent of the base price, was a provision that the only thing provided was 80 per cent of the average price which has prevailed during the preceding three years. I know a lot of people have seized on that as though it were the only feature in the bill, as though it were the only thing it contained and as though it were the main feature of the bill. It is not the main feature of the bill at all, Mr. Chairman, it is just an ultimate security measure written into the legislation so that farmers will never again be in the position such as they have been in the past where the prices fell to half of what they were, fell very rapidly to a fraction of what they had been or some other very drastic decline like that. That is the sole purpose of that part of the bill, the basic security feature of the bill.

The main part of the bill, actually the important part of the bill, is the provision to provide for a guaranteed yearly price on commodities as those prices may be required. Now I think a good deal of the criticism which has been made in the house and which as a result has got into the newspapers and I think given people incorrect ideas is that because a three-year moving average is used as a formula in the bill to determine the base price, and because of the fact that during the past three years the average prices have not been satisfactory as far as many farmers are concerned, this means that the yearly guaranteed prices as set out in the bill are going to be extremely low, and so on. That is not so at all. The base price, based on the three-year moving average, is the particular type of formula employed because it is the only formula under which you can have a really flexible price support program.

Any price support program which attempts to use as its formula a base period in the past and apply an index to it, and so forth, immediately gets you into a rigid formula. I think the experiences of all countries in the world demonstrate the fact that a rigid formula just does not work. In that connection I think perhaps it might be interesting to give a couple of paragraphs from a preliminary report on the food and agriculture meetings in Rome which were concluded only two or three weeks ago. I will just read this:—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, before the minister goes on, I wonder whether the loud speaker system in this house is working properly. This sounds to me like the voice of the former minister of agriculture, but it seems to be coming from the government side of the house.

An hon. Member: The hand of Gardiner.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has great difficulty in understanding anything that he does not want to understand and he has great ability to hear things which he wants to hear and not to hear things which he does not want to hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But what the minister is saying is the same line I have heard over the years.

Mr. Harkness: Let me read just two paragraphs from this report of the Food and Agriculture Organization conference in Rome.

Mr. Argue: Read your campaign speeches.

Mr. Harkness: I read:

> The most far reaching action on the part of the conference was the adoption of the resolution on agricultural support measures. The discussion preceding the presentation of the resolution centred on the factors contributing to the current surplus problems. Some of the delegations stated that in many instances support legislation, if not entirely responsible, contributed to the surplus problem.
> The originator of the resolution was Denmark. Canada and New Zealand contributed to the final phrasing. There was general agreement on the need for this type of action. The resolution calls for the spelling out of priciples to serve as guidelines for use by member governments in establishing or reviewing their agricultural price and income support policies. The purpose is to ensure that such policies will be effective in achieving the objectives of ensuring a reasonable level of income for farmers as compared with other sectors of the community, but, at the same time, will have minimum adverse repercussions on the pattern of production and trade of other countries.

I am told that one of the great concerns—and I found this out in the three days I was there—was the way in which support policies in some countries, and particularly that which had been in effect in the United States, had tended to disrupt international trade in agricultural products and had an adverse effect on the agricultural economy of a considerable number of other nations. I do not want to go on any longer at this point in regard to this matter, Mr. Chairman; but once again I would ask hon. members to consider the advisability of passing this resolution and thus enable the bill to be distributed.

Mr. Argue: If we act on this request and do that this afternoon can the minister give us the assurance that the bill will be referred to the agricultural committee so that it can be studied in all its details? The minister then will have full opportunity to demonstrate by hearing evidence from the farm organizations that they feel that this bill is in fact a good one.

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot give that assurance. If what the hon. member proposes was done this bill would not be through for months.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, if the bill were sent to the agricultural committee and we had there a full discussion of various types of what support policies might be put into effect and their advantages and disadvantages and so forth, it would certainly take weeks and, I am sure it would take months. The total effect would be that the bill itself would not be through and it would not be possible to put it into effect and the farmers of this country would not get the benefits of it.

The assurance I will be very glad to give the hon. member is this. I would be glad—and I think it is a thing that should be done—to have the agricultural committee make a study of price support systems and legislation as they exist in various countries, projected systems, and so forth—

Mr. Argue: We want it in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: —and, as a result of a study of that sort there would be much greater knowledge in regard to these matters. It would be a great advantage at the next session of parliament to devote several weeks of the time of the agriculture committee to a study of that kind because certainly this matter of support legislation is one of the matters on which there is perhaps more misinformation and lack of knowledge in regard to the situation which exists as far as systems which are in effect and have been in effect for years in various countries than there is on almost any other subject.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I have listened very attentively to the Minister of Agriculture and to his plea that nobody else should speak on this so that the bill could be brought in and distributed. I have been sitting here waiting to say something on this for quite a while—

Mr. Harkness: I should like to assure the hon. member I shall be glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Bryce: Thanks very much; the minister is very kind.

Mr. Harkness: I am always glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Bryce: What I am going to say has to do with the way I understand the resolution and is by way of offering a little criticism. I think the minister could have done a better job because when one compares this resolution with that introduced by the hon. member for Melville in 1944 there is not very much difference. They are practically the same. The only difference is that another $50 million has been added to the fund. Of course, that is only reasonable because everything is up about 25 per cent or more since 1944 and so more money is needed to carry out what you want to do.

The first thing that worries me about support measures is that floors immediately become ceilings and the only person who suffers is the farmer. If the minister is not going to make any more use of the legislation than his predecessor did I do not think there is much use in worrying about it. We used the other legislation at the time of the foot-and-mouth disease and although it was never meant for that it was a Godsend at that time. A good job was also done in maintaining the price of butter for the people who are milking cows. Other than that the legislation introduced by the minister's predecessor never served the purpose we thought it was going to serve.

The minister talks about guaranteed prices. The price for the next year is to be established on the basis of the average for the past three years, but the unkindest cut of all is that after the prices have been set the government is only going to pay 80 per cent of such prices.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: No, I have said fifty times that is not right.

Mr. Bryce: That is what you told us.

Mr. Harkness: No, I did not tell you that. I told you the opposite.

Mr. Ellis: That is all you are guaranteeing.

Mr. Argue: The rest will be a political price.

Mr. Bryce: If I am wrong and you are not going to pay 80 per cent of parity then I am delighted because I do not think 80 per cent of parity is fair at all.

Mr. Argue: It is 80 per cent of nothing.

Mr. Ellis: It is 80 per cent of a low price.

Mr. Bryce: Well, 80 per cent of a low price makes it worse still. The minister talks about forward prices and says that they are going to be set in the first three months of the year. I hope the minister is listening to me so that he can correct me. He says that forward prices are going to be set in the first three months of the year. What are you going to do about cattle? When a cow is bred the farmer should know what he is going to get for the calf three years hence or it is not a forward price. When he breeds the cow he will then know exactly what he will get for the steer or the heifer on the hoof at such and such a time. A year may be all right for sheep or hogs but when it comes to cattle it is no good whatever. You have got to have at least three years. I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

I have a lot of friends in the House of Commons and I talk to them about different things. Many of them are against controls. If you are going to bring in a workable support price policy there will have to be controls. I have never been against controls. During the war we had controls and our farmers got a better share of the national income than they got either before or since. The producer, the packer and the consumer all got a fair pound of flesh in turning the live animal into food.

Look at the beef we produce. Look at the hogs we produce. We did produce millions of pounds of pork and, may I say, the finest pork in the world today. There is nothing to beat Canadian bacon. That is the way I like controls. Everybody gets a square deal and, as I said, during the war our farmers got a better share of the national income than they have before or since.

I hope the minister will tell us what use he is going to make of the experimental farms in order to advise the farmer as to how much it should cost him to produce animals. That is their business. You do not need to grab something out of the air and say that the cost should be so many dollars. Let us get the facts and find out what it costs to produce a hog. If you will then allow the farmer his wages he will be satisfied because at the present time he sometimes does not get the price of the feed he puts into the animal.

I do not know what you are going to do about cattle. Today you have steers up to 1,000 pounds in choice, good, medium and common grades. You have steers over 1,000 pounds in choice, good, medium and common. You have heifers in good, medium and common. You have cows in good, medium and common and you also have canners and cutters. Then you have replacement cattle. You have calves. How are you going to set the prices for them? Are you going to establish a board of livestock commissioners like the board of grain commissioners in order to do that job and to see that the farmer gets a square deal under the price policy?

I have mentioned the various grades. The only thing that the housewife buys is beef. There are nine or ten grades of cattle and the only thing she buys is beef. There are nine grades of pork including "A" hogs, No. 1 sows, No. 2 sows, heavy and extra heavy. A housewife does not go into a butcher shop and ask for a piece of No. 1 sow or extra heavy. She asks for a leg of pork. The thing is ridiculous. I hope the minister is going to be able to straighten it out in a way that it has never been done before.

I have other friends in the House of Commons who say to me, "Scottie, if you got your way you would take away the independence of the farmer." My goodness, what independence has the farmer left today? When he sells his hogs what does he do? He gets hold of a trucker, loads the hogs on the truck and tells the trucker to take them to a certain packing company. What does the farmer do? He sits at home and waits until the cheque comes. When I first came to this country about 40 years ago the farmer had some say in the sale of his produce but today he has absolutely no say in what should be done. The hogs are taken to the packing plant, he never sees them again and he gets a cheque. If he is satisfied he is one of the lucky ones. If he is dissatisfied there is nothing he can do about it.

I read the minister's remarks in Hansard when he used eggs as an example. As found at page 2187 of Hansard of December 11, he said:

> Let us say that the average wholesale price of eggs in 1954 was 45 cents a dozen. In 1955 it was 50 cents a dozen and in 1956 it was 55 cents a dozen. The base price for 1957 then would be the average of these, that is 50 cents a dozen.
> Then let us say that the average price in 1957 was 60 cents a dozen. The base price for 1958 would be the average of prices for 1955, 1956 and 1957, that is, of 50 cents, 55 cents and 60 cents respectively, which would give a base price for 1958 of 55 cents a dozen.

The example which the minister gave us was a rising market, but if it had been a falling market just imagine where we would be. I have to do a lot of thinking about this 80 per cent of parity, but if eggs were 60 cents then, as I understand it, you would only get 80 per cent of that, so you would only get 48 cents a dozen for the eggs. There is no parity at all, but I am giving the minister the benefit of the doubt. I do not want to fall out with the man.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Do you expect to get a better price for those hogs?

Mr. Bryce: I should like to spend a couple of minutes discussing turkeys. I appealed to the right hon. member for Melville when he was minister of agriculture to do something about turkeys. He never took me seriously enough to do anything about them. The day is coming when something will have to be done about them. If a turkey producer belongs to a co-operative organization he has solved the problem by getting the best price he can under existing conditions. However, let us consider the position of a man who does not believe in co-operatives and who has to sell his own turkeys. I am going to give you an example of what happened to a neighbour of mine. I will not tell you his nationality, but he is one of these canny individuals who has never been known to sell a hen on a rainy day.

This neighbour had 50 turkeys to sell, so he took them to Winnipeg. Hon. members know what it is like to sell turkeys. The buyer says, "Lay them out", and you lay them out and he says you have 20 A's, 20 B's and 10 C's. This friend of mine, whose nationality I have not told you, said, I will leave the A's but not the rest because I would not like anybody to eat a B or a C turkey that I raised. He picked up the B's and C's and sold the A's. He took these turkeys to the next big produce outfit and said he had turkeys to sell. He spread them out and the fellow looked at them, you know how they do, and said, "You have 10 A's, 10 B's and 10 C's." This chap told the same story, that he would not like anybody to eat a B or a C turkey, and he would take them home. He had 20 turkeys left, so he did the same thing with the next buyer who told him he had 8 A's, 8 B's and 4 C's. He left the A's, and at this point he has got rid of all his turkeys, on a grade A basis, except 12.

Mr. Herridge: This is not by any chance the hon. member?

Mr. Bryce: I would never tell you if it was. He disposed of his turkeys at the best price he could get. He has made a study of it, and he has done the very best he can. Satisfied he has done the best he can, he returns home. He has played the marketing game as it is practised today.

This resolution in the name of the minister is very much like the act that is now on the statute books. It does not do enough for the farmer and the minister's promise of 80 per cent of something—I have to look that up—certainly will not meet with the approval of the farmers I represent in the constituency of Selkirk. I want to ask the minister to give serious consideration to bringing the farm organizations to the agriculture committee. I am sure that if this bill is half as good as the minister makes it out to be, the farmers will take it because they are like drowning men and will grab at a straw now.

Mr. Harkness: I must say that the hon. member for Selkirk was well worth listening to; I am sure we all enjoyed him. Quite a number of the points he mentioned are things which have nothing to do with a price support measure. They were marketing and grading problems and are not directly related to a measure of this kind.

Now, the only reason I am on my feet again, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. member has not understood my explanation. I must apologize for the fact the explanation was not clear as to the various types of prices mentioned by me in introducing this resolution. I should like to make the point that the base price is arrived at by taking the average of prices for three years previous, and is used the same as a foot rule is used in measuring length. In other words, it is a measuring device to a large extent and therefore one should not try to put a great deal of emphasis on the particular type of measuring device. In some other support price formulae you take a base period, we will say as it is in the United States, from 1910 to 1914, then you apply an index to it; you apply another index and so forth and eventually you arrive at something that not one farmer in a thousand is able to understand. While this system might appear complicated, I can assure you it is a marvel of simplicity in comparison with some of these support price formulae and plans. In any event, the purpose of that base price is really to serve as a measuring device, to give you something to which to relate the actual price set. In other words, just as you would use a foot rule to measure distance, you use the base price to a considerable extent and you arrive at it by applying the three-year moving average formula, as something to which to tie the other price.

Perhaps I could put it this way so the hon. member would understand it better. There are two types of support provided for at two different levels altogether. There is, as I said before, the ultimate security feature, the fact that written right into the measure is a provision that, so far as certain basic commodities are concerned, they must be supported at all times at 80 per cent of the base price. We have never said this base price was parity. I do not want any misconception in anyone's mind that I am trying to maintain the base price is a parity price. I have never said so. I have never attempted to convince anybody of that fact.

Mr. Ellis: We were promised parity prices.

Mr. Harkness: If hon. members would allow me to finish, it would be better. They seem to be concerned with trying to confuse the issue instead of trying to enable people who do not understand what the measure provides to get a clear picture in their minds. This is a mandatory floor price which is provided for right in the bill, and it must be in effect at all times, that is, 80 per cent of these base prices. As I say, that is what you might call the ultimate security measure in the bill. Then the bill provides for the setting of yearly guaranteed support prices. As I said a little while ago, that is really the important feature of the bill. I would hope hon. members would not continue to talk of this bill as though it provided for 80 per cent of the average of the last three years, and so forth, because that is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. Quelch: That is the only guarantee, is it not, the only absolute guarantee is the 80 per cent?

Mr. Harkness: It depends upon what the hon. member for Acadia means. It is the only absolute guarantee written into the legislation, yes, but the important thing is this, there is also the guarantee that the legislation provides, as I say, for the setting of these yearly prices, and that is the forward pricing feature which has been requested for many years. I would like to say further that you cannot have both your cake and eat it. If you want, and if the farmers want a rigid price support formula then they have to accept the fact that only a very limited number of products can be or will be supported.

That is the situation in the United States. They produce in that country 250 different farm commodities. How many of those commodities are under price support in the United States? I will tell you how many—thirteen, that is all. Thirteen commodities, plus dairy products and wool. That is the position this year. Of all the commodities which are produced in the United States only 13 are under price support. As a result of that rigid type of price support policy, four-fifths of all the money which is paid out for the price support program went to one-quarter of the farmers. Only one-quarter of the farmers secured four-fifths of all the money paid out.

Now if you attempt to apply a rigid price support program you immediately run into this difficulty, and it exists not only in the United States but in every other country which has tried it or which has it in effect. You can only support a very limited number of commodities. If you want a system under which you can support every farm commodity you must go to a flexible price support program, and that is what we have done as far as this is concerned.

We wanted to have a program under which you could have a support for every agricultural product produced in Canada and the only way in which you can do that is by means of a flexible program of this type or some other type of flexible thing, a program such as we are proposing to put into effect. As I say, if people talk and continue to talk about a fixed price formula—a rigid formula—it means they are actually talking about trying to support the prices of just a very few commodities. The only way in which you can support every commodity is under some flexible type of program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will these prices be set by order in council?

Mr. Stefura: I understand the basic price is developed and that the floor price will not go below that but, on the guaranteed prices, is the advisory board going to be working on a definite formula as to whether the rate arrived at will be 80 per cent, 90 per cent, 100 per cent, or 120 per cent of the basic price? Are they going to be working on any definite formula?

Mr. Harkness: Well, as I think I indicated when I introduced this measure, the procedure envisaged is this: during the first few months of each year, the first step would be for the agricultural prices stabilization board to assemble the statistical information from the last year and determine what the base price would be.

Mr. Stefura: But there is no definite formula?

Mr. Harkness: Well, yes. That, as I say, is on the three-year moving average formula. They establish a base price on that formula. All right, then the advisory committee is called in and they make their recommendations as to what commodities should be under the guarantee prices for the following year.

Mr. Stefura: There is no formula though?

Mr. Harkness: Now, just a minute—as to the level they should be under and the recommendations they make as to the level they should be under, that would be as a percentage of the base price and the percentage might be 90 per cent, 100 per cent, 110 per cent. It could be any percentage for that year except that for the basic or key commodities it must be more than 80 per cent.

Mr. Stefura: But there is no definite formula which they would use to arrive at whether it should be 80, 90, 100 or 110 per cent of the basic price?

Mr. Harkness: There is no rigid formula, no. You are getting back to this idea of a rigid formula again. There is no rigid formula which they must follow but here are the factors which they would use in arriving at this formula: (a) estimated cost of production on the average efficient farm; (b) supply of commodity; (c) prospective domestic and export outlets for it; (d) price levels at which other commodities are being supported. In other words we want to have some relation, which has not existed in the past, between the price support, say on hogs, and the price support on dried skimmed milk or anything else.

Then there are: (e) historical price information; (f) disposal and storage problems. In other words a commodity which is extremely perishable and for which there are no storage facilities you could not support at the same level at which you could support a commodity, such as butter, which can be stored quite readily for long periods and for which there are storage facilities. Then: (g) perishability of the commodity—another very important factor—(h) the length of production cycle—which is the matter the hon. member for Selkirk mentioned—(i) the availability of funds; (j) the number of producers affected. Of course with a commodity in which very few producers are affected, you could if you wanted to, support it at a very much higher level than you could support a commodity in which there were millions of producers, or it might be better to say hundreds of thousands of producers. Then, (k) the regional nature of the problem. You have a very big difference between the different regions of this country. Those are the factors which the advisory committee of the board and the government would consider in setting the level of the guaranteed price.

Mr. Quelch: Would the minister explain a statement of his which appears at page 2187 of Hansard as follows:

> Provision is made that the guaranteed price may be made effective by the board, which the act provides for, through it (a) purchasing the commodity, (b) paying deficiency payments and (c) making such other payments as the governor in council may direct.

He never explained just how those deficiency payments are going to be made.

Mr. Harkness: That would depend entirely on the commodity. Under the existing agricultural prices support board, there were two methods provided for supporting prices. One was by means of deficiency payments which was used during the first two years and I think was the only method used during the first two years when the board carried on operations in 1946 and 1947. I have forgotten upon which commodities it was used.

Mr. Gardiner: It was used on butter for the last two years right up until the time we went out.

Mr. Harkness: No, the right hon. gentleman says it was used on butter, but it is not used on butter.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not now but it was when you came in.

Mr. Harkness: No, it was not, and it has not been used on butter for many years—

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it was used in the last two years.

Mr. Harkness: —if it ever had been.

Mr. Gardiner: We will demonstrate that when the time comes.

Mr. Harkness: The method which has been used and developed under the Agricultural Prices Support Act has been the method of purchase in the market. That is what has been done with butter. The agricultural prices support board has had a standing offer to purchase butter at 58 cents per pound for the last three years approximately.

Mr. Gardiner: All through the period of seven years.

Mr. Harkness: It has been around that price for several years longer than that, but it has varied a little from the 58 cents at different times. Butter has been supported by that method, the method of purchase. Those are the two methods which have been used. We have added here a third provision —any other method which the governor in council may authorize—and we have added that purposely, because there are some commodities the prices of which you can support and a reasonable return can be given to the farmer only by some other method such as perhaps a flat payment.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to go along with the minister's suggestion that we get through this resolution stage as quickly as possible so that we may have a look at the bill. There are, however, a number of things I should like to say which could appropriately be said at this stage. Last Wednesday, was, I think, a sad day for the people of Canada who are dependent on agriculture for their livelihood. Many hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Acadia, clearly showed why the agricultural industry needs some solid, workable and helpful legislation now. I am not going to go over that ground again on this resolution stage. However, members from many parts of the house have indicated disappointment with the explanation of the resolution given by the Minister of Agriculture, or perhaps I should say not with the minister's explanation but with the contents of that explanation. I am afraid that individual farmers and farmer organizations are also feeling the pangs of disappointment. There is one thing I think we should remember, and that is that if we are disappointed now we had better brace ourselves for what is still to come. Only a few short weeks ago we had another resolution before us, and at that time, from the minister's explanation we thought we had a fairly good bill. I am speaking, of course, of the bill in regard to cash advances. But when the bill was brought in, what a disappointment it proved. It was tied up and tangled up with conditional regulations so that very little genuine assistance was provided for grain producers. In that regard I have a news report here from the Lethbridge Herald which is headlined: "No Rush in South for Cash Advances". If the bill which is to follow this resolution is to be a disappointment in relation to the resolution to the same degree as the bill following the cash advances resolution was, then, as I said, brace yourselves.

This resolution is in my opinion, not materially different in any way from what we have already in the statute book, and if anything it will be of even less help because it exempts things such as oats and barley which the prices support act in chapter 3 did not exempt. We will have to wait to see the bill, but if this is supposed to be part of the Conservative program to see that agriculture gets its fair share of the national income, then I think this legislation can be summed up in one sentence by saying that the Conservatives must be of the opinion that agriculture has already got too much.

This brings up the question of what we in the opposition should do about this legislation. I think we have several alternatives. In the first place, possibly, we should get this into law as soon as possible so that the farmers may be able to see and judge for themselves the weaknesses of this Conservative policy. On the other hand, we should try, possibly, to stop it or to delay as much as possible so that the government may not feel that it has discharged its obligation to agriculture. However, I think that in the interest of agriculture we should possibly try to prevent this from superseding what is already on the statute books, because weak as that agricultural bill is it appears to me that it is better than this one.

The minister has said we do not understand this measure but I am sure we understand it only too well. If it only provides 80 per cent of what is already too little, I see no advantage in passing it at all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says this is possibly another case of delayed action to get the Conservatives past the next election. Just for one minute I should like to make some comparisons between the minister's explanations of the resolution and what we already have on the statute books. In section 9 it says this under the heading "Powers of the Board":

> To prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

I should like the minister to explain to me whether that is materially different from what he has called forward prices. They already have the power to establish forward prices if they wish to do so. And further down, it reads:

> (c) To pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly, or through such agent as the board may determine, the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, as determined by the board, at which such product is sold in the market during a specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price.

It seems to me now that having brought in this three year formula, why, they could use a three year formula or a two year formula or any other which seemed desirable. They already have the power to set up prices on the basis of any formula they wish. But there is one thing in this act about which I have heard nothing from the minister, and that is the provision at the bottom which says:

> The board will endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

Perhaps I have not followed too closely, but I have not yet seen anything which the minister has indicated that it is going to have any relation to the gross national product or to the fair share of the national income.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I say once again that I do not wish to delay this bill. I think however, the time has come and if the Conservatives want to rattle their sabres about something which "will not be too long delayed" this might be a good measure on which to go to the people.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to exercise my parliamentary responsibility and express my views and the views of my constituents on this resolution.

Before doing so I should like to ask the government the cause of the delay between the time this legislation was placed on the order paper and the time we received it in the house. It was forecast in the speech from the throne nearly two months before the day on which it was brought down in spite of repeated requests by hon. members of this group for early action on this legislation.

This delay would have been unnecessary if the election promises made by the Conservative government that they would call a session in September to deal with this as a matter of urgency had been fulfilled. I think, Mr. Chairman there is a close analogy between this situation and the situation concerning the arrival of a circus in town. First, there is terrific advance press publicity. We had all that during the election campaign. The farmers were promised prices which would give them a fair share of the national income. Advertising was put out, and the prospects displayed on most attractive posters. After that, we had a resolution placed on the order paper which adds to the interest and to the expectation. And then, in addition, we had the spieler in the form of the Minister of Agriculture giving us the come-on. I was not as impressed by the come-on spiel as I was with the resolution, and I think the minister would have done better and would have drawn a bigger crowd if there had been no explanation at all, because it seems to me he gave away some of the secrets of the show, and some of us now might hesitate about buying a ticket to go in.

However, I think the problem facing us is the resolution rather than the explanation of the minister and it does promote considerable interest. There should be strong criticism levelled at the government for its delay in bringing in a measure to offer relief to the crisis in agriculture because of the present conditions. It is apparent that over the past number of years a similar charge of delay has been levelled at governments and I call as my witness the then hon. member for Lake Centre, the present Prime Minister, speaking on July 29, 1944, as reported at page 5599 of Hansard when the Agricultural Prices Support Act was introduced. He said:

> One observation I would make at the beginning is that it is passing strange that legislation as important as this should have been been brought down so late in the session.

Those are the views of the present Prime Minister. He continued:

> When one considers—that it is introduced on a Saturday in the dying days of the session when by reason of long hours of sitting during the week members are necessarily tired out and unable to give the bill as much attention as it should receive, it seems only right that protests should be made against this sort of procedure.

Mr. Chairman, do we not have a repetition of those same circumstances which were condemned by the Prime Minister on that occasion? I would like now to place on the record the words of the hon. member for Huron in the same debate in relation to the Agricultural Prices Support Act as reported at page 5598 of Hansard who said:

> If it is being brought in only for election purposes, of course it will do no good. If it is an honest attempt to do what it purports to do, then I support it wholeheartedly. Something of this kind is long past due.

Mr. Marler: A very intelligent observation.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Those are the words of the hon. member for Huron who is now the government whip speaking on legislation introduced by a former administration and I can see a very strong analogy between that occasion and the present circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was that his only speech?

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): It was not a very long one but I appreciate the thought that it involved.

The purpose of the debate on the resolution stage is to give the government the advice and the thinking of the house on the proposed legislation. The present Minister of Agriculture has declared himself to be an authority on this subject and to know just as much about it as any hon. member in the chamber but I think there are many hon. members who are not familiar with all agricultural conditions in Canada and in the hope that these views will be given consideration in the proposed bill I would like to make a review of agricultural conditions.

It has been stated in previous debates that agriculture finds itself in a depressed condition at the present time due to the reduction of the net farm income. It was pointed out that from 1952 to 1956 there has been a decline of the net farm income in Canada of 18 per cent and in my own province of Saskatchewan this decline has been 31 per cent. I think perhaps I should explain the term "net farm income". It is the money we as farmers have left after paying our costs of operation. We do not know yet what will be the net farm income for 1957 but there is every indication that it will be about half the net farm income for 1956. We can see indications of that because from January to June of this year there has been a decline of $8 million in cash farm income, which is the total receipts of farmers in Canada as a whole, and in Saskatchewan we find in that same period a decline of 10 per cent.

In the debate on cash advances on farm-stored grain when this problem was dealt with it was pointed out that it is necessary to give serious consideration to what is generally referred to as the cost-price squeeze. This refers to the tremendous increase in our costs of production and the decline in the prices we receive. In the last ten years there has been a decline in the wheat price of 21 per cent whereas the cost of production has gone up 46 per cent. I am certain that the same cost-price squeeze affects farmers in all parts of Canada whether they reside in Quebec, Ontario, the Atlantic provinces, British Columbia or in the western provinces. They are all plagued with the same problem.

I want to look more specifically at the problems of my own constituency of Kindersley and bring them to the attention of the committee because I feel they are representative of the problems in western Canada in particular. It is difficult to obtain authoritative evidence of the cost of production because there are no government publications which give an exact indication. However, the experimental farm service has surveyed wheat production costs and they provide some information which will be of interest to all hon. members. The Manitoba Co-operator of May 2, 1957, in reporting on the review of the experimental farm service says:

> In 1956, the average cost of producing wheat on summerfallow on 10 illustration station farms amounted to $23.22 per acre. The factors of production considered in this study, and the percentage (in brackets) each contributed to the total cost per acre are as follows: Rent of land, taxes and use of buildings $208 per acre (9.0 per cent); cost of summerfallow, plus interest $6.51 (28.0 per cent); seeding, preparation and cost of seed, $4.94 (21.3 per cent); fertilizer, spraying and hail insurance, $1.91 (8.3 per cent); harvesting operations, $4.89 (21.1 per cent); interest on net cost at 3 per cent on seed, fertilizer and labour $0.16 (0.7 per cent); general equipment charge, $0.51 (2.2 per cent); general farm expenses, $1.06 (4.4 per cent); and a management charge of $1.16 (5.0 per cent).

I believe it is important that these figures be given consideration because they reveal the tremendous increase in the cost of production over the years and should serve to give hon. members from every part of Canada an appreciation of the problems the wheat farmer is facing.

In that same connection I must express disappointment that in explaining the resolution the minister mentioned that wheat, oats and barley coming under the Canadian wheat board were specifically excluded from the operation of the system anticipated by this resolution. I was hoping in reading the original resolution that these commodities would be included since there is certainly a strong demand to have these basic commodities included.

To continue with evidence indicating the plight of farmers I would turn to the annual report of the Kindersley vocational agriculture farm management program. This is a program which works in connection with the larger school unit in that district and is based on a survey of 69 farms in the area. This annual report indicates that the cost of production per crop acre including no wage to the operator is $21 per acre as an average on all farms. Including a $3,000 operator wage, which is very moderate in this day and age, the cost would be $28 per acre as an average for all farms. We can readily see the impossible battle the western farmer is waging in meeting his cost of production when the Minister of Trade and Commerce has admitted that all we can expect this year is a six-bushel quota. On the basis of half summerfallow this would give 12 bushels per wheat acre provided you had no special crops which reduced the quota. This, at the very most, would give you a return of $15 a crop acre. I have already pointed out that the cost of production is $21 per acre.

It is more than evident that the farmers are having to live on the depreciation costs of their farm machinery. The Canadian Journal of Agricultural Economics, in a study of the depreciation charges per crop acre, pointed out that for a 320-acre farm the cost is $4.53; on a section farm it is $3.99; and on a 2-section farm, $3.07. Therefore, more than the depreciation which farmers should normally be allowed to put aside for the replacement of their equipment is being completely utilized in order to continue the operation of the farms. As a result of that, I noticed in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of November 28, 1957, an article entitled:

Bleak Outlook

Lloyd Barber, professor of commerce at the University of Saskatchewan, said Wednesday there was a bleak outlook for the farm implement retail business.

The article goes on to say:

In the next two decades it was possible that where three dealers were operating now there might be only business for one.

There, Mr. Chairman, is evidence which I think is irrefutable to give to hon. members a full appreciation of the agricultural conditions which are facing farmers in western Canada, and I maintain the same circumstances apply to farmers in other parts of Canada. It points out the need for action on the part of this government to forestall this trend. It is apparent that it is not just the farmer who is suffering because these circumstances apply to all those in the smaller communities and in the larger communities who have direct contact with the farmer.

I pointed out that the article indicates a very bleak future for the implement dealers. Those hon. members who have travelled through rural Canada will appreciate the number of implement dealers who will be put in jeopardy. It applies, of course, to all services to the farmer, to the municipalities and counties.

As I have pointed out, the rising costs are not being offset by the very low deliveries of grain from the farm. As of November 25, which are the latest figures available, it is indicated that there are 644 marketing points still on the unit quota. They are allowed to deliver only 300 bushels of wheat and a fixed proportion of other grains. There are 1,133 marketing points on a 1-bushel quota and only 263 marketing points on a 2-bushel quota. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is apparent that agriculture is facing a dilemma. The same situation certainly applies to those who are in other forms of enterprise.

It has been asked many times by those who have not been adequately informed: Why do you keep on growing wheat when there is obviously no market for it? Why do you not grow something else? In fact, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in that speech he made in Winnipeg implied the same thing. Well, we have the alternative of farmers transferring to other grains, and there has been a great transfer to the growing of durum, which has a very limited market. What will happen as we transfer from the growing of spring wheat to durum wheat is that we shall in turn glut that market.

The market for flax is a doubtful one although the seedings have gone up over 150 per cent from the previous year and it is questionable just how much the market can absorb. The third alternative which the farmers have been following is the growing of rape seed, and we find that we are confronted with an exorbitant freight rate and as yet the government has taken no action to dissallow the decision which was made by the board of transport commissioners granting the increase and thus give the farmers a fair deal on that, although they have the privilege and the responsibility. Here again the production of rape seed is limited. You cannot turn all of your acreage into the production of those other crops. I maintain that the farmers have co-operated because the acreage seeded to wheat has dropped in the province of Saskatchewan over a million acres in the last three years.

Well, we have another alternative, namely to transfer to livestock, and I think it is important that this be given consideration in discussing a resolution to provide stability to agriculture. In the first instance, the cash outlay to transfer to livestock from a grain operation is tremendous. I have a letter from a veteran in my constituency, Mr. Timothy McBride of Marengo, who found himself with a large surplus of wheat and who wanted to transfer to livestock. He is a settler under the Veterans' Land Act. He will not get title to his land until May 31, 1959. He would need $5,000 to buy a herd of cattle and to set up the buildings to house them, but he cannot get the money because in the first place he has no title to his land; but, more pointedly, there is no credit policy in Canada to give assistance to such a man who is trying to resolve this problem.

Of course, there are other problems related to the transfer to livestock. One that I would cite would be the shortage of feed and the shortage of water. I am quite familiar with this, Mr. Chairman, because on my own farm I have run a fairly large herd of cattle over the past number of years. I had at the start of this year 85 head of cattle and I found that because of the very meagre moisture supply that we had my pastures were drying up. I had to sell 20 head of those cattle and it was fortunate I did because in the course of the year my three dugouts dried up and the two wells which I have to supply those cattle with water are on the verge of going dry any day. Therefore, we have to give very serious consideration to the blanket suggestion that we should transfer to livestock.

In addition to this, members from eastern Canada should be aware of the impact which it would have on their economy if indeed the farmers of western Canada were to transfer to livestock in great numbers. The traditional tendency has been for the western feeder cattle to be transported to Ontario and Quebec where they are finished off for the large eastern market. In western Canada we have the cattle and we have the feed, and I would submit we would be transferring the problem to the eastern farmers if the farmers in western Canada were to go extensively into livestock.

Now, I should like to make some suggestions which would, in my opinion, resolve this basic problem and they should be given consideration in this resolution. It has been stated by the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool that the income of western farmers must be increased to meet the cost of production. I think we have an important point there which must be given consideration in this resolution.

In the remarks he made the minister indicated that there is no direct relationship between the cost of production and the base price established under this legislation. If that is the case, it is a very serious omission, indeed, because the cost of production and the prices must bear a relationship which will give the farmer a fair return.

One of the short-term proposals which I would suggest to resolve this lack of income would be the payment of a domestic parity price for wheat to the farmers of western Canada. It has been pointed out that over the years, particularly in the early war years, the farmers of western Canada subsidized all of the people in Canada by taking a low price for their wheat; and even today the farmers are getting much less than their cost of production of wheat. Therefore, it would naturally follow that the price of wheat should be increased to the farmer to bear some relationship to the cost of production. It would not increase the price of bread by an appreciable amount, since there is only three cents worth of wheat in a loaf of bread at the present time. On 50 million bushels, which is the amount consumed domestically, it would mean about $25 million to the farmers of western Canada which should be distributed to assist the smaller farmer.

In addition, other producers in Canada who are receiving a price less than their cost of production must receive a deficiency payment. This is not a subsidy. It is an economic technique which would provide those farmers with the money whereby they could meet their cost of production. If they do not meet their cost of production Canada will be confronted not only with an economic but a sociological problem because as farmers go bankrupt and have to move from the farm they in turn create other problems elsewhere in industry.

The proposal of deficiency payments has been advocated by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the interprovincial farm union council and is accepted by farmers. I am hopeful that the principle will be encompassed in the legislation although I am afraid the minister let the cat out of the bag in his explanation and that the principle will not be covered.

We must also give consideration to additional long-term policies which will solve the dilemma of agriculture. We must remove some of the shackles of trade barriers so that Canadian agricultural products can be exported. We must give further consideration to purchasing goods from the United Kingdom so that they in turn will be in a position to buy goods from us. We must face the problem of providing agricultural credit. At the turn of the century agriculture was an expanding industry and all of the policies of this country were geared to an expanding industry. We can think of the settlement policy whereby the government bet the farmer $10 against a quarter section of land that he could not last there for a year. The whole thing was aimed at expanding agriculture. But now that we have mechanization, now that we have $7,000 combines that can do more than several threshing outfits, it is necessary to give consideration to that fact in our agricultural policy and provide policies for readjustment so that farmers can in turn form themselves into an economic unit.

The minister admitted that the legislation was inadequate to meet many of these conditions. I think that admission is rather an indictment of the measure because surely to goodness on the basis of the election promises and the hopes that were raised in people's minds this measure should have solved at least some of the basic problems. In order to resolve the dilemma of agriculture the legislation must include a relationship between the cost of production and the prices paid.

The minister has made a great point of the flexibility of the legislation, how it can be moved about, but it looks to me like this flexibility is going to be a rubber hose with which the farmers will be beaten over the head. The flexibility is not related to any particular subject at all and the minister has complained about rigidity.

In addition, the minister has pointed out that the purpose of the legislation is to guarantee prices. For how long? For one year? A guaranteed price for one year is useless because it does not take into consideration the production cycles in certain industries. It would be all right if you were growing peas. You could plant them in the spring and harvest them in the fall and you would be assured of your price.

Mr. Herridge: And mushrooms.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): The hon. member for Kootenay West suggests mushrooms. That is something else to which help might be given in an effective way. A one-year guaranteed forward price is of no value to the poultryman because in his case there is a two-year production cycle. What about the man who decides to transfer to the production of hogs? In that case there is a three-year production cycle. Of what value is it to him to know that in one specific year he has a guaranteed price? What about the cattle producer? In that case there is a five-year production cycle. Is one year the best the government can do to provide stability for agriculture? We must have a forward price based on the production cycle if the farmer is going to be assured any degree of security and stability.

In addition, the agricultural program must ensure that agriculture receives a fair share of the national income. That is implied in the resolution but unfortunately in giving his explanation the minister indicated that this was something that would be in the discretion of the government. I think it should go beyond that. There are other measures that should accompany this one in order to meet the needs of Canadian agriculture.

As I mentioned, we must have adequate credit facilities to assist young farmers to become established because failing that and with the present cost-price squeeze they are drifting away from this useful and essential occupation to other occupations which they perhaps may not enjoy. We must have a crop insurance program to supplement this measure.

I have dealt in some detail with many of the problems confronting agriculture. I hope I have been able to convince hon. members of the extreme need that exists in Canada for a realistic agricultural policy to provide stability for the family farms. If the measure does not include recommendations to meet these problems, I suggest that the minister should whisk it back for redrafting and in any case he should refer it to the agriculture committee of the House of Commons so that farm organizations and members of the house may be able to make a workable proposition out of it.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I think one of the needs of the house is for some member to stand up and speak of the joys of the farm. I should like to do so but I do not want to take too much time on this resolution. However, may I suggest one or two. Look at the joy of exploring the mysteries of a farm, why a red cow will eat green grass and give white milk. Tell me why it is that taking two grains of wheat of the same size and the same weight one will germinate sooner than the other and one will produce two stalks and the other will produce three. Look at the little chicks, the lambs, the kids, the colts, the joy of experimenting and producing better potatoes.

The farmers of the Fort William district are not living in starvation. In our community we have the champion potato grower and there are others who are experimenting with oats. If we want to help the farmers, let us pass the resolution and get the bill.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, we are discussing a measure to provide guaranteed prices for certain commodities. I think this is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation—the Minister of Agriculture himself has said so—that has come before the house during this session at least. I think it would be wrong if members of the house did not avail themselves of the opportunity to do everything they could in order to make the legislation better than it now appears to be.

In discussing the measure the only thing we have on which to base our judgment is what the minister said in his speech and I must take it for granted that what the minister did say was based on the bill itself. True there are not too many who know anything about the bill. There has not been too much consultation with others in drafting the bill so we must rely on what the minister has told us. Therefore, I assume that what the minister said in his speech about the resolution is correct.

There have been a great many people throughout this country who have been quite concerned about this proposed measure. Within the last few days there has been a great deal of publicity given to it. Whether or not the government delayed the introduction of this measure in order to get this advance publicity, I cannot say, but certainly that was the result.

Within the last little while the minister has been urging us to pass this measure; hurry up and get it through. I do not believe the members of this house should rush a bill of this kind—

An hon. Member: A resolution.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —or a resolution, because it is something that is going to materially affect the economic condition, not only of the farmers in Canada but all of the people in Canada. The effects of it are going to last for a number of years. I am sure there is no farmer in this country who would not say to his member of parliament, do not rush this thing through; take all the time that is necessary and see if you cannot make some improvements on this otherwise unfavourable measure. The minister does not want to take too much for granted because there are a number of people in this country who are very concerned about this measure.

Mention has been made before during this debate, and I just recall it again to the minister's mind, that some very definite promises were made during the election campaign. There were some definite promises made by the Conservative candidate in my constituency, and by others who spoke over the radio and over the T.V. from Calgary, as to what would be done for the farmers if the Conservatives were elected.

I am not going to refer to newspaper clippings, but I want to refer to a resolution that was passed by one of the farm organizations in my constituency, a district in which some Conservatives spoke and in which the Prime Minister himself spoke. This is a resolution from the farmers' union of Alberta in Carbon, local 1005, and which was sent to me a short time ago. It is addressed to me, and reads:

> Whereas during his campaign, if he formed the government, the present Prime Minister J. G. Diefenbaker said, "We will assure the farmer of his fair share of the national income by maintaining a flexible price support program. I underline the word flexible—"

The Prime Minister is still speaking.

> "—to ensure an adequate parity for agricultural producers, based on a fair price-cost relationship—My pledge to farmers in all parts of Canada is: to assure that the farmer shall receive his fair share of the national income."

That is the end of the quotation from the Prime Minister, and then it goes on:

> Therefore, be it resolved that Mr. Charles E. Johnston, M.P., keep constantly in front of the Prime Minister and the government, the promises made by Mr. Diefenbaker prior to the last election, stressing the price support program, and of the farmer receiving his fair share of the national income.

Now Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what I am doing and what I intend to do. I believe that any member in this house, be he Conservative, Liberal, Social Credit or C.C.F., would not be serving his constituents if he neglected to keep that pledge in this house, and express here on the floor the same comments that he made out on the hustings. I believe there has been only one Conservative in this debate so far who has said he approves of this measure in its present form, and the bill which will follow.

Let me start now to discuss the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture the other day. He pointed out to us that this legislation implemented all their election promises. I do not want to take anything for granted, so I will turn to page 2816 of Hansard for December 11, 1957, and there I find he said this:

> The resolution before us is one on which a bill will be based that is designed to put into effect our stated program of greater stability of income for agriculture.

Then, he goes on:

> This is a far-reaching and important piece of legislation,—

It certainly is far-reaching.

> —perhaps the most important, in its implications,—

Again I agree with him.

> —in its expected results for agriculture and its effect on the general economy, that has been considered by the Canadian parliament for many years.

That is just what I am afraid of, that the effect this measure is going to have on the general economy of Canada is going to be very detrimental to agriculture. Then, again at page 2189 of Hansard, the minister has this to say:

> I think this legislation will do everything we promised we would do so far as our campaign pledges are concerned.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Conservatives have not kept any of their promises in this legislation, and I shall point out my reasons for making that statement. Let us see whether or not the government has kept its promises. I have a clipping here from yesterday's Ottawa Journal, December 13, and I am sure you will agree with me that in this instance the farmers do not think the government has kept the pledges it gave during the election campaign. The heading reads, "Farm Price Support Plan a Shock". Let us remember this is from Ontario, incidentally. This reads:

> An official of the Ontario farmers' union said Thursday Canadian farmers will receive the Conservative government's new farm price support program "with a shock". Albert D. Cormack honorary president of the O.F.U. was commenting on the program announced Wednesday in the Commons by agriculture minister Harkness.

I would take it from that that people do not believe the government has implemented its promises, although the Minister of Agriculture says they have completely filled all their promises. Down farther, this article says:

> He contended that supports set at 80 per cent of the prices paid farmers for the last three years "will cause a mass evacuation from the farms".
> Canada lost 48,000 farmers during the last five years, he said.

I am sure that Ontario agriculturists are not very enthused with this piece of legislation. During the election campaign it was stated that when this legislation was drawn up there would be consultations with farmers, farm organizations and those people who were interested in agriculture. But who drew up the bill? According to the minister it was the prices support board, the economic division of the Department of Agriculture and the marketing service. No assistance was requested from any agricultural organization in Canada in the drafting of this bill. There was not one Conservative backbencher consulted in the drafting of this bill. It was never brought up in their caucus, either.

Mr. Dinsdale: Prove that.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): If it was, then some Conservative member should get up and say so.

An hon. Member: We are trying to get the bill before us.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am told it was never discussed in caucus, and I think that is true.

Mr. Harkness: Who told you?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): There is not a Conservative member in this house, outside of the members of the cabinet, who knows anything about this measure. And yet, mind you, in the election campaign the Conservative candidates went around and said "Well now—

An hon. Member: It worked did it not?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —"Well now you elect me a Conservative and I will be sitting in at the caucus helping to direct the course of the construction of this agricultural program." What a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Dinsdale: What a lot of nonsense you are talking.

Mr. Cardiff: If there was no Hansard he would not be talking.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not hear that wise-crack.

Mr. Cardiff: I said a lot of you fellows would never be talking at all if there were no Hansard.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Well you know, it is a very good thing there is a Hansard, because now we can go back and read what the Minister of Agriculture has said and just see the inconsistency in that speech. I want to do that as we go along.

Now the Minister of Agriculture pointed out in his remarks that the advisory committee, made up of all farm organizations in Canada —and then he took the word "all" out; he must have thought "Gee, that is going too far, they are not going to believe that"—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): "I am going to take that, 'all', out." So he changed it and said "farm organizations".

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order. The hon. member, of course, has been attempting to misrepresent what I have said right along, but now he has come to an example where I got up in the house and corrected Hansard. I said that "all" should not have been there; it is not a matter of a change, I never said it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I said when I started, Mr. Chairman, that I could only go by what the minister had said in his speeches as recorded in Hansard and I read it word for word. I did say, also, that later on he changed that and took the word "all" out. He did not say some farm organizations, he just said farm organizations. Well that could be one. I certainly do not think we can conclude that the minister has consulted very many farm organizations because now we are getting letters from farm organizations all over the country who are very opposed to this. So certainly he cannot very well take that—

Mr. Dinsdale: You had better be careful—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): As for the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, the farmers in his area are not too enthused about all this either and he had better watch his step because when he goes home he is going to be asked "Why did you not implement these election promises?" He might have a little difficulty on his hands explaining this to his own farmers.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege; the hon. member referred to the volume of letters pouring into his office in connection with this legislation and in protest of this legislation at the resolution stage. Could he put one of those letters on the record please?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I have them up in my office and I will be pleased to send them to the hon. gentleman if he will send a messenger with a truck so that he can get all of them.

An hon. Member: Pretty small truck eh?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Now let us see what is this advisory committee and just what capacity it is going to have in formulating this legislation. This is what the Minister of Agriculture said so far as the effectiveness of the advisory committee is concerned. As recorded on page 2188 of Hansard he said:

> The advisory committee will meet with the board to make its recommendations, and the two will confer together. The board will then make its recommendations to the government as to what commodities should be under guarantee for the next 12 months and the percentage of the base price at which each should be supported. The final responsibility, of course, must rest with the government, which may accept the board's recommendation, alter it or reject it.

Now the point is that the Minister of Agriculture put great stress on the fact that this advisory committee is made up of representatives from farm organizations. But the advisory committee does not advise or talk this over with the Minister of Agriculture at all. The advisory committee meets with the board, and then after that consultation with the board, the board consults with the minister. Now that is a pretty indirect way of the minister saying that the agricultural organizations are going to be consulted when, as an actual matter of fact, he is side stepping them at every turn.

Now this bill itself is divided into three parts—I am not now speaking of the political propaganda which is in it—I mean the three main parts of the bill, the three divisions. First there is the base price. This is the formula which is established in the bill. The minister said the bill will reveal to us the base price which will be the average of the last three years. The cost-price relationship for the last three years has been the lowest since the war and even for a long time before that and so our base price for agricultural products is established on the lowest three year period he could have picked.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not correct.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The lowest period he could have picked—

Mr. Harkness: You do not know what you are talking about. I wish you would look at the statistics and then you would not make these terrible mistakes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is it established on the last three years or is it not?

Mr. Harkness: Certainly.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Look at the condition of agriculture, going down every year. All the prices indicate that the price for agricultural products has been continually declining—

Mr. Quelch: He admitted it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): As the member for Acadia says, the minister himself has admitted that. Now then each commodity is going to be considered independently and the price of that commodity will be influenced in this way. Let me quote the minister's own words because I do not want to misrepresent him at all; that is the last thing I would want to do.

Mr. Harkness: You have been doing absolutely nothing else throughout your whole speech which is entirely a matter of misrepresentation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I have been quoting you.

Mr. Harkness: And it shows a complete lack of knowledge of the scheme.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I have been quoting you. If there is any misrepresentation, you are the one who is guilty of it.

Mr. Harkness: You have been interpreting what I have said in your own way which is completely wrong.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, I have been quoting your own words so that there would be no possibility of misrepresentation and I am going to continue to quote. All right, let us see what the minister says now about this particular section.

> The relationship of the base price of one commodity to another is left to the determination of market conditions.

Do you mean to tell me there is any semblance of a parity in that? Could you tell me that there is any relationship in that price to the election promises that they were going to give the farmers a fair share of the national income?

Now the reason I have mentioned these fair prices and their relationship to the national income is that it is under this heading of base price that the minister himself used these arguments—not on the guaranteed price—on the base price. Then further down it says, "it reflects market changes". Well, when you come to study the base price on the average for the last three years that reflects market changes—all down—and you say there is a relationship between that and the farmers' fair share of the national income or a cost-plus—a fair profit? Then, he says in the next column:

> First, he wants prices for his products which will cover his cost of production and leave him enough to live on;

But in the statement which the minister has made there is certainly no basis whatever in fact for that statement because he has set the price so that it reflects the market changes. There is no attempt there to keep any of these election promises; in fact it is just the opposite. They have avoided every one of their election promises. Now in this next statement which I am about to make, and which I make on my own responsibility —the minister did not say this in effect, but I am going to prove to you that this is what he meant—I will tell the committee that one of the main purposes of this legislation is to curtail production at a time when we should be doing anything else rather than curtailing the production of this country. At a time when we have such great need for our products, such widespread unemployment and so many people in the world who are starving, this is what the government has in mind. Let us look at page 2186 of Hansard, and see what the minister says about it.

> I have endeavoured in this legislation to provide for the greatest possible degree of flexibility so we will not be saddled with a program which inevitably acts as an incentive to produce burdensome and unsaleable surpluses.

Is it not clear that one of the main purposes of this measure is to prevent these unsaleable surpluses? Of course it is. Now let us look at page 2187, where the minister says:

> The purposes of the moving average formula method of determining the base price are to ensure stability of income to farmers by protecting them against a drastic decline of prices; to provide for a gradual adjustment through prices due to changes in consumption habits, losses of export outlets—

And so on. Thus he is giving to the house a price formula along these lines in order to cut down production so that we will not be burdened by surpluses. Then, again, the minister goes on at page 2187—and he emphasized this at least in three different places when dealing with this legislation, so this must have been uppermost in his mind:

> In this legislation we have attempted to meet these two demands, conditional on not providing—

I underline the word "not"

> In this legislation we have attempted to meet these two demands, conditional on not providing a price for any commodity which will serve as a strong incentive to farmers and thus result in large unsaleable surpluses.

In three different important sections of his speech the minister stressed the point that the base price will be such as will not be an incentive to raise too much. If the minister had taken as many pains in drawing up this legislation to see that the farmers got parity, or to see that the farmers got their fair share of the national income, as he has in trying to do away with these burdensome surpluses, we might have had some different results from this bill.

The second part of the bill concerns the floor price. The minister said a moment ago that this was the most insignificant part of the whole thing. Well, this is a very important thing for agriculture though it may be insignificant to the minister. The floor price, or as he calls it the security provision, prescribes that the floor price is to be based on 80 per cent—not less than 80 per cent—of the base price. That means that the price which the farmer is guaranteed is going to be 20 per cent lower than the average price for the last three years, which has been the lowest for many years. That is some guarantee. The hope a farmer has, therefore, if things continue the way they are now with unemployment and our declining price structure; the only prospect a farmer has is that he is going to get as a floor price 20 per cent less every year. That is not a very bright prospect for the farmer, and it is not unnatural that the people across Canada are becoming alarmed at the implications of this bill.

And then this basic price, or this floor price, will only be on certain commodities,—key products. It is not going to apply to everything, but only to basic commodities. In fact, the floor price could be even lower than the present price in some cases. The minister says this on page 2189 of Hansard in answer to a question by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

> One question he asked is whether the assured floor price would not in many cases be lower than the present price. That is correct—

So the guaranteed price will in many cases be lower than the present price. And this bill, says the minister, is guaranteed to give the farmers their fair share of the national income. What an imagination that man has! He ought to join the movies. As a comedian, of course.

Now let us come to the guaranteed price, the third part of the bill. The guaranteed price may be—and I use that word "may" advisedly—the base price, that is, the average price over the last three years. It may be 80 per cent of that. That is the average price, too. The guaranteed price may be the floor price. It may be 90 per cent of the base price or it may be 100 per cent of the base price, that is, the base price itself. Or it may be 110, 120 or 150 per cent possibly depending on how close you are to an election. That very aspect of it, Mr. Chairman, seems to be—I will not use the word which comes to my tongue there—I will say unfortunate. That is about the mildest term I can think of at the moment. Why should you leave price setting to the minister himself, to the whim of the minister?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member for Bow River that his time has expired.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I have not finished yet, but I will finish before this resolution is out.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Chairman, and members of the House of Commons, I appreciate the fact that it is possibly the duty of the opposition to try to depict such measures as are now before the house in the blackest manner they can, but I do appreciate the opportunity of speaking at this time in support of the resolution.

I understand that this measure proposes to support and stabilize the products of agriculture. Such a measure, I believe, is necessary and in fact long overdue.

I have many and varied agricultural problems in my own constituency, perhaps more than in any part of Canada. I say this honestly because there are greater variations in the crops produced in Lambton-Kent and therefore there is a greater variety of problems in connection with those crops. I believe that our agricultural policy is unsound and unfair and has been so for a long period of time, and while it must be admitted that there have been times over the past number of years when agriculture has enjoyed a considerable degree of prosperity those times in the main have been brought about by luck rather than planning or management either on the part of the government or of the people.

When I say that these periods of prosperity have been brought about by luck I do not necessarily mean that they have come about as a result of good luck; rather, in large part, they have come about as a result of the worst kind of bad luck which could befall any people, namely war. Surely, Mr. Chairman, there is a better and less costly way of correcting the ills of agriculture than having to resort to war or having to wait for a war to correct them. I am sure we are all in agreement that a small part of the cost of defending ourselves in time of war would correct most of the ills of agriculture in peacetime; yet in wartime we accept the extra load of cost of food together with other costs because then and only then do the people seem to appreciate the vital need and the dependence they have upon agriculture for their very existence.

I have suggested that the position of the farm people appeared to have improved as a result of bad luck befalling the people of the country as a whole in the case of the nation being at war. However, I would like to state here that even that kind of luck has not always worked to the benefit of the farm people in the way they expected it would for I recall quite clearly that during the last war the government of the day saw fit to place price ceilings on agricultural commodities beyond which they could not go and this price ceiling structure had the effect of denying to people engaged in agriculture the opportunity which would have been afforded in the ordinary course of events to take advantage of a stronger market and at better prices.

Some time ago in speaking in the throne speech debate I mentioned that I had been a member of a delegation which had come to Ottawa asking for measures to protect the sugar beet growers and that we had been refused. Some time later, about the time of the conclusion of the last war, I was again a member of a group of wheat growers who came once more to Ottawa, asking for consideration in the matter of the raising of the price ceiling on wheat which had been set at around $1.12 per bushel. We were not refused on this occasion; in fact, we were well received. We presented our problem and it was gratifying to learn in a few days that the ceiling had been raised to $1.27.

As time passed and the war came to an end farm production costs had continued to rise and the wheat farmers of our area felt that it was unfair to be restricted by a price ceiling that prevented them from taking advantage of the opportunity a free market would have offered them and so another meeting was called and a delegation again came to Ottawa this time to ask that the ceiling be removed entirely and this request was also granted. Shortly after the price rose to the point where it ranged between $2 and $2.40 and where it remained for quite a period of time.

The fact I am endeavouring to point out to hon. members of this committee is that the farm people did carry a big share of the load, perhaps an unjustly large share of the load, in time of war; and if the people and the government feel they had the right to expect the farm people to carry that load in wartime then surely both the people and the government must recognize their responsibility for ensuring that the farmers will share in any measures which will help to keep them in a reasonably sound position in peacetime. I wish to quote from an article that appeared in the Almonte Gazette on November 21, 1957:

> We do know that the farmers have very real and obvious grievances. This is indicated by the lamentable trend away from the farms. We noticed in printing the voters' list for Ramsay, this year, that there were 25 fewer names than last year. There was a good reason for us being observant in this connection because printers are paid by the name for printing such lists. But the point is that the most highly assessed township in Lanark county is losing population and has been doing so for many years. There are vacant farms here and there and some of those farms which are still inhabited are being only partially worked, with the men holding down industrial jobs in nearby towns or cities.
> If agriculture were paid on a scale commensurate with certain other trades or professions, many of them less important, the situation we refer to would not exist. The farmer to a greater extent than any vocation we know of is a prey to weather conditions and many other factors over which he has no control.

I wish now to mention a few of the many other factors that have taken terrific tolls in my time in addition to the question of farm costs and the price of agricultural commodities. Some of these are foot-and-mouth disease in cattle; cholera in hogs; dysentery in poultry; blight and black root rot in sugar beets. Last year many thousands of bushels of white beans were lost on account of excessively wet weather. The wheat growers have to fight the plague of stem rusts, several kinds of smut and the hessian fly. In addition to these the farmer never knows when his crops will be damaged by cut worms, wire worms, army worms and grasshoppers. There are also the problems of excessive freezing and thawing; excessive heat to shrink the grain when ripening; excessive rainfall to prevent harvest, or the other extreme, the lack of rain, to promote growth; wind storms to lodge the grain so it is difficult to obtain, and hail storms that often do tremendous damage.

There is one other thought I wish to leave with hon. members of the committee. I feel that people in lines of business other than agriculture are becoming increasingly aware of the unfavourable position the farmer is placed in and in the main they are fair enough to admit that something should be done about it. They also in the main feel that by assisting agriculture they will indirectly be helping themselves. Therefore, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would emphasize that anything which is done to stabilize the business of agriculture will assist materially in bringing a greater measure of stability to the nation as a whole.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the matter before us is something like going to Killarney. You have to start somewhere and it does not matter where you are, the best place is to start from where you are and today that is here. I do not expect this bill is going to be a cure-all for all the ills of agriculture but I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that we should try to get the plan in operation; for I believe it does provide an avenue through which at least some of our problems can be solved. Therefore, I say, let us try to make an honest effort to solve the rest as we go along and meet up with them. Mr. Chairman, I have sufficient confidence in the proposals that are before us today to say that I intend to give my support to the bill and I would ask the support of the hon. members of the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think the most important thing that has come to light in this debate, if we can take the statement of the Minister of Agriculture as it is on the record, is the fact that the Conservative government has broken faith with the farmers and the people of this country as far as implementing its commitments, made time and time again during the election to provide a system of parity prices, is concerned. The Prime Minister made it abundantly clear at place after place where they stood in this regard. The Prime Minister went back and forth across this country saying that if he were elected the government would provide a system of parity price supports. I have in my hand a number of statements he made during the election campaign. Let me quote one which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post and which was made at Kipling, where he said that the price of wheat at $1.40 per bushel was too low and should be increased. Another one is a Canadian Press dispatch in the Ottawa Citizen of June 10, 1957, and is a quotation from a speech made in Saskatchewan on June 8. It reads as follows, referring to the Prime Minister:

> He promised them that if a Conservative government is elected he will call a September session of parliament to set up a system of floor prices for agricultural produce based on parity.

That was a very definite commitment which has been broken. According to the Regina Leader-Post of May 18, when speaking in Regina, he said this:

> I urged a system of parity prices in 1941 in a resolution in the house and asked for it two other times, but every Liberal member voted against it.

I think it is important at this time to quote the motion made by the Prime Minister in this house in 1941, and I quote from Hansard of April 8, 1941, at page 2280:

> That all the words after "that" in the motion be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor:
> it be resolved that the government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products in order to improve the condition of Canadian agriculture and in order that it may receive a just and fair return,—

That is the position taken by the Prime Minister; that is the commitment he made to the people of this country and yet in this legislation that is being discussed at this time, the guaranteed floor below which prices cannot fall is less than the very low prices prevailing at the current period. Conditions now, according to an index of the dominion bureau of statistics based on 1935-39, are worse than they were at that time. I have the Economic Annalist in my hand and it shows that in the three-year period on which these guaranteed prices are based, in 1955, prices of agricultural prices were 2 per cent less than the index of the cost of production. They were worse in 1955 than in the late 1930's. By 1956, this position had deteriorated until prices of farm products were 7 per cent worse in relation to costs than they were in the late 1930's. At April of this year the index was 11 per cent worse than it was in the late 1930's, and this is the period of prices on which the government is going to base its guarantee to the agricultural producers of this country, its absolute guarantee.

I have in my hand figures showing the average price of hogs at Moose Jaw for the years 1954, 1955 and 1956. It shows that the average price during that 3-year period was $23.28 a hundred. Eighty per cent of that figure is $18.62 a hundred. Although every hon. member will admit that hog prices at the present time are depressed, yet hog prices on the market at Moose Jaw are now in excess of $24 a hundred. The guranteed prices under this legislation are very much lower than the prices prevailing today. If the guaranteed prices, based on the 3-year average, 1954-56, were in effect today for good steers the guaranteed price on the Regina market would be $13.60 and yet the prevailing price is $16.75.

Grain is excluded from the legislation and therefore there is nothing in it for the grain producers of western Canada. The livestock producers find that as far as the floor in this legislation is concerned their position would be much worse than it is at the present time.

The Prime Minister's definite commitments to the people of this country have been broken and this legislation has been a shock to all those people in this country who are interested in the welfare of the farmer. Albert Cormack, who was president of the Ontario farmers union for a number of years, in his fight for parity prices accepted the word of the Conservative government that they meant what they said in the election and was himself, through his organization the farmers union, responsible for the election of a number of hon. members opposite and the defeat of a number of former members of the Liberal government, including the former minister of finance. What was his reaction to this legislation? Here was a man who, because he felt the Conservative party meant what they said, worked for them in the campaign. Mr. Cormack said he received the announcement with a shock, and that is the reaction of farm organizations all across this country. They wonder why the Prime Minister made these definite promises and has waited until almost Christmas time this session to do anything about them and, on the basis of the minister's statement, is introducing a bill in this house which is a complete violation of those very definite commitments.

Mr. Harkness: That is absolutely wrong. This legislation will live up to every commitment we made about price supports.

Mr. Argue: Except that there is no guarantee that price supports will bear a relationship to the cost of production. Prices in this legislation may be higher than the floor, that is true, but they will be political prices and they will be put up for one year at a time, and the thing next to the heart of the government is any form of legislation to get by the next few months, to get by the next election.

I can tell the Minister of Agriculture why there are no parity prices. I can tell his parliamentary assistant why the minister is against parity prices. If there is anything clear in the record of any hon. member of this house it is the minister's attitude and his record since he came into this house. At every turn he has opposed any suggestion that there should be adequate guarantees for agricultural prices and adequate guaranteed floors under prices.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, statements along this line are at absolute variance with the truth and I do not think the hon. member should be making them. I just cannot understand the hon. member making such statements.

Mr. Argue: I am willing to let the record stand. The trouble is the record is too clear. For instance, when we wanted to get oats and barley under the wheat board so as to have a guaranteed price the minister had this to say, as found at page 1696 of Hansard for February 27, 1948:

> I for one—and I know a large number of farmers who feel the same way—do not want to have the government set the price I am to get for oats and barley.

He does not want the government setting prices and the government has not done much in that regard under this legislation. That is the trouble with it. They are offering 80 per cent of the price over a very low, depressed period. In 1954 the hon. member for Mackenzie moved the following resolution, as found at page 4797 of Hansard of May 17:

> In the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to demonstrating its support of the principle of orderly marketing through livestock marketing boards by announcing floor prices with respect to cattle and hogs at levels not less than the average of the prices which prevailed during the period from January 1, 1951 to December 31, 1953.

That would have brought about a floor price for beef of $26.50 a hundredweight and a floor price for B-1 hogs at Toronto of $29.65 a hundredweight. This is what the present Minister of Agriculture said in that debate on May 17 as found at page 4806 of Hansard:

> In my opinion, if this resolution were put into effect it would be, more or less, complete socialization of the livestock industry.

He is against adequate support prices because he says it is socialism.

Mr. Harkness: That has got nothing to do with adequate prices.

Mr. Argue: He went on to say:

> Most livestock producers of whom I am aware do not want their industry socialized.

Mr. Harkness: That is a rigid price support program you wanted. You still want it and it is not workable. It is a rigid support price program you have been talking about and it is not workable.

Mr. Argue: The minister is against anything that is rigid.

Mr. Harkness: That is not so.

Mr. Argue: He does not want a rigid floor. He wants this depressed floor that will do what our friend, Albert Cormack of the farmers union, said it would, drive the farmers off the farms. To make sure that I am not misinterpreting the minister—

Mr. Hodgson: How about the national president of the farmers union?

Mr. Argue: —let me refer to what the minister had to say about an amendment moved by Mr. Bracken on May 6, 1946 with regard to prices of argicultural products. On May 15, 1946, the minister had this to say as found at page 1567 of Hansard:

> It is that artificial control of prices and arbitrary distribution of commodities are contrary to the conceptions of free trade and free enterprise—

The present government is against control of prices. This government is against adequate support prices. The minister himself has been the greatest opponent of adequate support prices since he came into the house in 1945.

Mr. Harkness: Again I say that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Argue: The record I have placed on Hansard at this time proves it.

Mr. Harkness: The record shows nothing of the kind. Nothing that you have read shows it.

Mr. Argue: The minister wants to deny it but the legislation before the house is proof positive that he is consistent, and that now he is in office he is doing exactly what he wanted to do when he was in opposition, to have as little to do as possible with government control. Never support adequate floor prices because it would socialize the agricultural industry, he said. The government is not for the agricultural producers of this country. The other day they established a royal commission to inquire into the spread in the prices of agricultural commodities between the price paid to the farmer and the retail price. They appointed a six-man commission and there is not a farmer on it. I asked the Prime Minister if he had discussed the question of submitting a name or a number of names with the farmers union and the wheat pool and the answer was no. It is an amazing thing that on a royal commission to decide why farmers are getting such low prices in relation to the retail prices of their products the government would not appoint a farmer.

Mr. Harkness: There are three representatives of agriculture.

Mr. Argue: There is no representation of the wheat pools, no representation of the farmers union. It was not even discussed with them. They were brushed aside. The Minister of Agriculture has made it very clear in his presentation to the house that the measure before us will not provide parity prices. It is not aimed at providing parity prices. I have in my hand a copy of a resolution directed to the federal government which reads as follows:

> —we urge immediate action by the federal government to implement policies along the lines indicated by the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life with particular reference to:
> 1. Price supports for all agricultural products based upon parity and utilizing deficiency payments.

That is the resolution, support prices for agricultural products based on parity and utilizing deficiency payments. Here are some of the organizations that supported this resolution: The Saskatchewan federation of agriculture, Saskatchewan farmers union, Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities, the urban municipalities association, the school trustees association, the co-operative union of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan federated co-operatives, the credit union league, the women's co-operative guild, the Saskatchewan agricultural societies association, the Saskatchewan federation of home and school clubs, the Saskatchewan teachers federation, the Saskatchewan home makers club, the rural-municipal secretary-treasurers association of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan school unit secretaries association, and the local government continuing committee.

An hon. Member: Everybody but the Saskatchewan Conservatives.

Mr. Argue: Somebody says, "Everybody but the Saskatchewan Conservatives."

Mr. Hodgson: And the Ontario C.C.F.

Mr. Argue: Following the lead of their party obviously the Saskatchewan Conservatives have abandoned any idea of a system of support prices based on parity. This telegram is a demonstration that Saskatchewan is united in its support of parity prices, that all of these organizations in Saskatchewan are disappointed with the government's legislation which does not provide a system of parity prices based on the cost of production.

Not long ago the Saskatchewan wheat pool passed a resolution at their convention, I understand unanimously, saying that they are prepared to organize a mass delegation to come to Ottawa to impress upon the government that there is a need to provide adequate guarantees to the agricultural industry. This support by all of these organizations in Saskatchewan shows that the day is coming when the people of the country will say to the government in a united way, "We expect and insist that you keep your election promises."

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief but I feel I must say something. A proper price support system for agricultural products based on the cost of production so as to give the farmer his fair share of the national income is a most important issue to the people of my part of the country. Not only is it important, it is vital to their very existence. The ability of this legislation to do that job will determine whether or not the family farm in Canada will continue to exist or will disappear.

For that reason we have welcomed the resolution on the order paper which says that it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities to be named therein and to provide that prices may be guaranteed for any other agricultural commodities.

We have supported this and have looked forward to the introduction of this measure. I will say we are very pleased to see the resolution on the order paper. We are rather surprised that the measure has not been bought forward earlier. We had some hope for the legislation until the minister got up the other day and explained one or two things to us with regard to the legislation, which dashed our hopes rather severely.

The first thing he said was that wheat, oats and barley were out; grains were out of the measure altogether. As Minister of Agriculture he knows how many producers in this country depend upon wheat, oats and barley for their incomes. If these products are beyond the scale of support prices, then how on earth can the minister give any guarantee that these people will get their share of the national income? The minister talked about the base price and the floor price which is 80 per cent of that base price, but that certainly means nothing. If that is all we are going to get as a guarantee, then I can say we look to the legislation with a great deal of scepticism. A great deal will depend upon whether the advisory committee which he sets up will or will not recommend to the government a guaranteed price on farm commodities. We have no assurance that that committee or board will do the job. We have no assurance that if they make a recommendation to the government, the government will carry it through. We are sceptical of measures such as this which say certain things and then they are not carried out.

I have been here long enough to see some of these things in operation. I should like to read to the minister one clause of a bill which was passed in 1945, which was to guarantee farmers against a drop in prices. The minister will know this measure which is called Agricultural Prices Support Act, for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace. Section 9, subsection 2 of that act reads:

> In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection (1) the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

How much that sounds like the measure we have before us today. How completely that measure failed in its application to do exactly what it was said it would do. Agriculture, in the past number of years has gone down and is in a very depressed condition, not only in the west but in the east as well. Reports from farm areas in Ontario indicate that farmers are unable to carry on their business, even in this province, and make a living. Reports indicate that 50 per cent of the farmers in Ontario are forced to go to industry to supplement their earnings, leaving a wife or a boy at home to try to make the farm pay.

Under the proposed measure arrangements are made for an advisory committee to advise the government as to what it should do. The annual report of the agricultural prices support board contains a repetition each year as to what the board is doing. In each one of the reports the reference to the advisory committee is identical, and I have checked the reports for 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955, 1956 and 1957. The paragraph reads:

> The general advisory committee to the board, under the chairmanship of H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, held regular spring and fall meetings. The committee covered a wide field in its discussions and at the conclusion of each meeting submitted a limited number of carefully considered recommendations.

The same recommendations were made, but nothing was done. There was $200 million set aside for a support price program, but they have never used $100 million of it. It costs about $70,000 a year to maintain this board, for salaries and so forth. The money was never used, and that is the reason agriculture is sceptical about this legislation. The government might add another $50,000 to this amount, but if it is not used it does not do much good.

I am not going to say very much more, Mr. Chairman, except that we would like to see the bill. Perhaps the bill will give us more hope than the minister's statement has. Until that time comes, I shall reserve any further comments I have. My confrere, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, says the bill could give little less. We reserve further judgment until the bill is brought down. I can say that if the bill does not mean any more than the minister has indicated in his speech, then we are going to have to fight it because this is a fight for whether or not we will maintain the family farm as part of the Canadian economy.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harkness thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 237, to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Before I ask about the business of the house, could the house leader give any indication as to when we might receive a copy of the bill so we might look at it over the week end?

Mr. Harkness: I can get a copy for the hon. member right after the house adjourns from my office.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the house leader give some assurance that all the members of the house will receive a copy of the bill because unless members get copies it will not be possible for them to read the bill over the week end.

Mr. Harkness: The bill, of course, will be distributed as rapidly as possible. The hon. member knows the bill has to be dated and so forth, as to when it was given first reading, and it will be distributed as soon as that is done.

Mr. Chevrier: When is that going to be done? Would it be possible to put copies of the bill in the mail boxes tonight?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know whether that can be done. This being Saturday night, I do not believe the printing bureau is working on Saturday night.

Mr. Chevrier: What will be the business for Monday?

Mr. Green: On Monday we shall commence with the third reading of the act—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is not Monday private members' day?

Mr. Green: I am sorry, Monday is private members' day. I was giving the hon. member more information than he deserved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was going to ask about Tuesday.

Mr. Green: On Tuesday the first item will be the third reading of an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act; then item No. 16 on today's order paper, a resolution preceding an amendment to the National Housing Act; then a resolution which appears in Votes and Proceedings today, preceding a measure to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act; then item No. 1 on today's order paper, the house in committee on a bill respecting a branch line of Canadian National Railways; then item No. 2, house in committee on a bill respecting Hamilton harbour commissioners; then item No. 3, house in committee on a bill to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. Those have all been passed and reported back by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Then we shall take item No. 9, an act to amend the Pension Act; then item No. 7, a bill to provide for annual vacations with pay.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader if he is able to give a further indication as to what will happen on the other days of next week?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give that information tonight. I will give it to the different parties as soon as possible.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FLOOD LOSSES, MEGANTIC AND BEAUCE—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 89—Mr. Lafontaine:

1. Since the beginning of the month of August, 1957, has the federal government received from the government of the province of Quebec any observations on or requests for financial assistance to the numerous persons who have suffered heavy losses, due to the flood of last August 3, in the counties of Megantic and Beauce?
2. If so, was such request considered, was a decision taken, and what was the decision?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

CHATHAM-ESCUMINAC TELEPHONE SERVICE

Question No. 175—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has the government considered restoring the former hours of service on the dominion government Chatham-Escuminac telephone line?
2. If so, what considerations were given and what was the decision arrived at?
3. Has the government made any attempts to dispose of this telephone line to the New Brunswick Telephone Company?
4. If so, where does the matter now stand?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. Yes.
2. The following methods were considered: (a) Construction of additional lines was explored with a view of establishing night connections by way of the switchboard at Bransfield; (b) employment of a part time operator.

A decision was taken in favour of (b).

3. Yes.

4. The department is awaiting a reply to a letter to the New Brunswick Telephone Company about their acquisition of departmental lines in the area.

INDIAN AGENCY COAL TENDERS

Question No. 252—Mr. Bryce:

1. Have tenders, 17643 and 17624 for coal, called by the Indian agencies for Fairford and Gypsumville been let?
2. If so, to whom, and at what prices?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes.
2. (a) 17643—Ashern Supply, Ashern, Manitoba—$244.20; (b) 17624—Ashern Supply, Ashern, Manitoba—$1,953.50.

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AUTOMOTIVE SPARE PARTS

Question No. 262—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Was an order for automotive spares, totalling $57,000, recently placed with the Chrysler Corporation of Canada?
2. If so, what is the description of these parts?
3. Can the Minister of National Defence say whether these automotive spares will be made in Canada or imported from the United States?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Minister of Defence Production):

1. Yes, on August 29, 1957.
2. 71 items of spares required for the maintenance of truck, $\frac{3}{4}$-ton, Dodge, military pattern vehicles as detailed on attached list.
3. The vehicles for which these spares are required were originally built in Canada to United States military specification, using Canadian-made components where practical. In this order for spare parts, the items for which a U.S. source is shown represent vehicle parts for which Canadian production was not undertaken because the cost of tooling up for the small quantities involved was considered to be prohibitive.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 16, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BULGANIN

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I was asked to table a copy of a letter addressed to the Prime Minister on December 13 by the chairman of the council of ministers of the Soviet union, Mr. Bulganin. As I reported at that time, this letter was in Russian and was accompanied by what was described as an unofficial translation. Over the week end the Soviet embassy printed an English translation in its official news bulletin. This translation has been checked by the Department of External Affairs and found to be a satisfactory rendition of the Russian language letter. I should therefore like to table the text of this translation.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the agricultural prices support board has been authorized to support the price of sugar beets grown in 1957 on the basis of $13 per ton for sugar beets with 17 per cent sugar content. Arrangements will be made in each producing area with growers' groups to make payments if necessary. It is intended that current grower contracts with sugar beet factories should continue to operate, and any payments which may be made will go direct to producers as a deficiency payment if the average returns to growers on 1957 sugar beets fall below the price level indicated.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the announcement he has just made, but perhaps I should wait till the question period.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): There is none today.

Some hon. Members: Ask it now.

Mr. Hansell: May I ask the minister if the price support is going to be uniform throughout all of Canada, or will the price support board take into consideration the peculiar interests of sugar beet growers in western Canada?

Mr. Harkness: This price will be uniform throughout Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture a question. Would this in any way be affected by the resolution that was discussed on Saturday, the agricultural prices stabilization bill?

Mr. Harkness: The order was passed to cover sugar beets grown in 1957, so whatever level of price support is put on sugar beets for the following year would then be announced in the spring or early winter period, in other words the January-February-March period.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In that event would the last three years be taken as an average, or just one year?

Mr. Harkness: In this particular case the provisions of the legislation which is now before the house have not entered in at all. This is the same sort of ad hoc price which has always been established and used under the price support legislation which we have at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is based on the previous act introduced by the Liberals?

Mr. Harkness: It is under the present act; it has to be, of course.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture in respect to the announcement he made concerning sugar beets. Has the announcement he has made taken into consideration the brief that was presented to the minister a few days ago by the sugar beet growers of western Canada?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker; and I might say that the brief was not presented by the sugar beet growers of western Canada but rather by the growers in all sugar beet producing areas in Canada.

LIVESTOCK

HOGS—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INCREASE IN FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether in the light of the announcement he has now made it is not clear that anything that can be done under the proposed new bill can be done under the existing act and, if that is so, will the minister consider action to increase the price on hogs that is currently at a disastrously low level?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that is not a question so much to elicit information with respect to the statement the minister made as one relating to a matter on the order paper for discussion later.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question I would just like to say that this announcement bears no relationship to what is in the bill now before the house. There is no question of how much more that bill can do than the present act does.

Mr. Argue: Then my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is this. Is the minister giving consideration to an immediate floor price on hogs under the present act?

Mr. Cardiff: One thing at a time.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, we in the department are giving constant consideration to the necessity for and the level of floor prices as far as any agricultural product is concerned, but at the present time it does not appear necessary to change the floor level as far as hogs are concerned. It may become necessary in the future weeks, but hog prices have been on the way up in the last couple of weeks.

Mr. Argue: They are still very low.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO REMOVE THRESHOLD PROVISION FROM AGREEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Assistance Act so as to remove the threshold provision from the agreements that have been concluded or that may be entered into hereafter; and to make certain changes for the better administration of the act through the deletion of a number of obsolete provisions.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

NEW BRONSON AVENUE BRIDGE, OTTAWA

Motion No. 46—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal district commission and the city of Ottawa, since June 10, 1957, concerning the proposed new Bronson avenue bridge over the Rideau canal.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): There is no objection to the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Argue.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS AND MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to increase the pensions of civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were retired, after long service, when salaries were low, so as to bring their pensions in line with those of the present.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity of moving this resolution, because I do not think there is a hardship in Canada today that would compare with what the retired civil servants of this country are suffering. I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not in his seat. I see the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) is here, and I expect to hear him step on it and just go because he is convinced, as I am, that this resolution is right.

I am not going to spend any time quoting the outstanding speeches which were made last year by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance, or the outstanding speech which was made by the former leader of the opposition. To me this resolution indicates an outstanding need. I have come to the place where I do not care very much which party grants this increase in pension to our former civil servants. Whether it is the Liberal party, the Conservative party or the party which is not as good as either, it does not matter very much so long as we get this increase. I have been at this for a number of years but that does not matter now. We are at it now and we mean what we say.

There are two reasons why I bring forth this resolution. The first is the justice of it, and the second, the need for it. Every member of this house will realize, Mr. Speaker, that there is one petition in the prayer given by our Divine Leader, namely that the government may have truth and justice, religion and piety. I am emphasizing truth and justice now, and my first argument is justice. This increase in pensions is absolutely just. Therefore if it is not granted the government will be doing an injustice to the retired civil servants.

I should like to quote just a little bit of the speech of the Minister of Public Works: "The clear understanding was that the basis of this superannuation itself when it was first introduced was that they receive a stated percentage of their pay when they retired which would be sufficient for them to maintain approximately the same standard of living they had received before they retired." The law of this country is a guarantee to the civil servant when he enters the service that when he retires he will have a pension that will help him maintain the standard of living he had before. If the government does not do that, then it is not practising truth and justice.

Another reason it is just is that these people themselves contributed to their pensions during all the years they were working, and they are not getting a square deal. Many of them worked ten hours a day six days a week. Those doing the same jobs now only work eight hours a day and five days a week. Therefore I say that if retired civil servants do not get a pension in proportion to the salaries being paid now they are not being treated justly.

Other countries like New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain have increased civil service pensions. Great Britain has made six increases. The United States has kept up to date but poor Canada cannot afford to pay retired civil servants the pensions they were promised by law. I read the local Ottawa newspapers fairly regularly. In the Ottawa Citizen of December 12 there was an article by J. A. Hume with the heading, "Civil Service Superannuation Fund Up." In that article he stated:

> At the end of the last fiscal year on March 31, the public service superannuation fund had a balance of $918,943,986 to its credit on the government's books. This represented an increase of $114,707,703 on the year's operations.

Therefore I say that if the government keeps piling up the superannuation fund and does not pay the pensions it promised by law it is not acting justly. If anybody can suggest stronger language to use I will be very glad to use it. I say the government is not acting justly toward retired civil servants in not granting an increase in their superannuation.

There is a need. I and other hon. members have received a submission by the civil service association of Ottawa in which some cases of need are outlined. The association tells us about a man who had to give up his apartment because his rent went up from $30 a month to $83. Another person had to leave his apartment, and others have had to cut down on clothes and recreation.

But the association did not give all the outstanding needs. I know a man in Fort William who, as I stated last year, had to give up his pipe. When a man has smoked for 40 or 50 years and has to give up his pipe so his wife can have a few more of the luxuries of life he is being hard hit, and it is not fair. If some of you had to give up your pipes you would be rooting around like wild men. I know when our hired man did not have his pipe we were advised to keep out of the way of his big boots, because he was not normal. When a man has to give up his pipe because the government does not pay him the pension he should have I say the government is not acting justly. I think that is strong enough language.

Some people say this country is hard up. I have listened to the members of the C.C.F. and Social Credit groups, who tell us how hard up the farmers are. I tell you their condition would not compare with that of the retired civil servants. If one compared the three meals a day which the farmers have with the two meals a day which our retired civil servants often have, then one would change his mind and be glad he was a farmer. I should like to prove the fact that this country is not hard up. I have here a report from the dominion bureau of statistics which proves that the people of this country spend $512 million on tobacco and $965 million on liquor. This means that a total of $1,477 million goes up in smoke or down the drain. If these luxuries were taxed in a small way the revenue would pay for larger pensions of our retired civil servants.

I am not going to say very much more, because I intend to keep my reputation for not making long speeches. I do not think it is necessary to do so. As the Minister of Public Works said last year, a speech on this question is not necessary. I am just stating that because of these two things, the outstanding need of the civil servants and because of the law of the land, the government should grant an increase in these pensions. As I look at my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and think of the speeches he has made in the past 22 years and the co-operation he has given in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, I often feel he meant what he said. If he meant what he said we will have this increase in pensions. I cannot do better in closing than to quote the recommendations of this civil service association. They are as follows:

> (1) That the government increase the pensions of all those now on superannuation by restoring the full purchasing power of the original pension; and
> (2) That the government safeguard the future purchasing power of pensions by granting an increase in pension payments corresponding to the percentage of any general salary increase;
> (3) That the costs of the increases recommended be borne solely by the superannuation fund of the public service of Canada, without any increase in contribution rates.

Mr. Speaker, my last words are these. After I get my cheque and before I hand it over to somebody who knows more about spending it than I do, if somebody were to say to me "Hands up", and I handed over my salary you would call that highway robbery. But when the government say by law that you are going to get a pension according to your standard of living and then they fall down on it, what would you call that? I will not call it highway robbery, but if I were to use the language of the hon. member for Vancouver East I would use another word which I will not use here.

I appreciate your courtesy, Mr. Speaker, in listening to me for these 19 minutes.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for the warm-hearted and non-partisan manner in which the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has presented this important and significant resolution, I am sure all hon. members are deeply indebted. Perhaps it is appropriate that one who has announced his own retirement from the public service at the conclusion of this parliament should this day be championing, as he has in the past, the cause of those who have retired previously from other forms and aspects of public service; and that he should be championing them, as he always does, with such geniality and Irish charm of manner for which he is noted in this house.

This is an important and significant resolution, and one which deserves the best attention of all hon. members; because there are in it implications of far-reaching importance not only to the retired civil servants but to the public generally. I am sure it must be evident to all hon. members that the rights and conditions of employment of public servants have a direct and important bearing upon the quality of government which we receive. I confess that I belong to what might be called the model employer school, believing that it is the duty of government to provide conditions of employment and rights of ample retirement benefits to all civil servants which will serve as a model and an example to all other employers. Unless that be so we cannot continue to attract, as we must, the very best persons to the service of the state.

All hon. gentlemen will agree, I am sure, that the present civil service is a real credit to Canada. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, no other country in the world has a finer body of men and women serving the state. For diligence, for intelligent application, conscientious devotion to public duty and integrity, the Canadian civil service ranks as the very highest. The debate on this resolution I am sure will demonstrate that all hon. members have this high regard for our civil service, this admiration which I have expressed, and will demonstrate further the unanimous resolve of all hon. members that all aspects of civil service administration shall be kept out of politics, as well as the equally unanimous desire to assure that a civil service career shall be the highest and most satisfactory form of service, with adequate provision for comfort and leisure at the end of the road.

In reviewing previous debates which have taken place in the house on this subject I have been impressed by the fact that the exact nature of the problem has never been fully outlined by the government. It is for that reason that I should like to take some time today to present a comprehensive, factual, objective and, I assure you, wholly non-political review of the problem of civil service pension increases and of possible solutions.

The problem highlighted by the resolution moved by the hon. member for Fort William has been engaging the attention of this house, as was pointed out the other day, for a period of about 10 years. That the issue has not been effectively grappled with earlier is perhaps because its complexities have not been fully disclosed. Prior to the year 1947 the pensions of retired civil servants were generally very much better than those of other older Canadians with similar pensionable service, and the changes in the cost of living were such that there was no real occasion for any request for an increase in superannuation benefits.

Between the year 1947, however, and the present time three factors have intensified the problem year by year. The first, of course, is that the cost of living increase has destroyed the value of the pension for those who have retired. Conditions of inflation and the rapid decline of the value of the dollar have caused real suffering in many instances, and have severely reduced the standard of living of all superannuated civil servants and others who are on a fixed income basis. This was very well stated in the British House of Commons by the financial secretary to the treasury, Mr. Henry Brooke, in considering this matter on February 27, 1956. I should like, sir, to quote from the British Hansard of that date at page 589:

> First, the fall in the value of money since before the war has severely affected the standard of living of all pre-war pensioners, whether their pensions are above £550 a year or below. I know it could be said that only the people with smaller pensions suffer absolute hardship if nothing is done for them, but I put it to the house that it is not right to ignore the relative hardship which has now been endured for a long time by the older pensioners. Even those with larger pensions have had their standard of living eroded for many years. That is the view of the government, and I hope the house will endorse it.

The second feature has been the general salary increases for civil servants, increases brought about in consequence of the fall in the value of the dollar, and increases of which we in this house all approve. But those who retired some years ago have seen other civil servants retiring from positions junior to their own but receiving higher pensions as a result of the higher salaries which entered into the pension formula. The general salary increases which resulted from the fall in the value of money have served, therefore, to bring about discrimination between those retiring some years ago and those retiring later, a problem which successive increases have intensified.

The third factor is the number of persons who have retired after relatively short periods of service with the government. For a person with a lifetime of service as a civil servant our Public Service Superannuation Act is one of the most generous, if not the most generous, in Canada; and it compares most favourably with that of any other country. But under the act a pension is payable, in case of retirement due to age or disability, after five years' service, and a widow's pension is payable if the husband has served for five years. Consequently there may be pensions as low as 10 per cent of the average salary in the case of a civil servant or, in the case of a widow, as low as 5 per cent of the average salary of the deceased husband.

It is perhaps because of these facts that the statistics with regard to low pensions are somewhat deceptive. Most of those retiring with very low pensions are persons who have had a relatively short period of service in the civil service, persons who almost certainly were engaged in other employment before entering government service. The question which arises in this respect is, to what extent should government pensions be expected to provide for a lifetime of service given mostly to other employers?

Mr. Speaker, I have taken some time to detail these three factors which, principally, have caused the present problem, because I submit that the remedy in each case may well be different. What might meet the problem of a person with a short term of service might not meet the problem with respect to the other situations I have mentioned. What may meet one situation may well create injustice in others.

These factors are vividly set forth in a table prepared by the Department of Finance showing the status of pensions paid to retiring civil servants of moderate income in various years from 1939 to 1956, after taking into consideration lengths of service from 15 years to 35 years. Because of the significance of this table I would ask leave of the house to include it in Hansard at this point. As I have indicated, it is a table prepared by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to have this statement included in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The table is as follows:

C—Retiring with 35 years service.

*Astronomer 4 is a small group but it was difficult to follow back many of the classifications in this salary level. However, in recent years the salary levels of this classification are comparable with those of chemist 4, engineer 3, economist 4 and statistician 4.

Now, sir, there are other factors which make a simple solution of the problem impossible. Our whole pension scheme is almost incredibly complex. Some civil servants' pensions are computed on the basis of a five-year average of salary. Others, and indeed the great majority, are computed on a 10-year average. With two general salary increases in the last three years it is not difficult to see how much the pension rights of those civil servants on a five-year average are improved in comparison with those on a 10-year average.

Then there is the question of pensions paid to members of the armed forces. I notice, incidentally, that the resolution put forward by the hon. gentleman does not deal with the pensions of the armed forces. I assume that is purely an oversight, and that he intends us to consider them as well as the pensions of civil servants and members of the R.C.M.P., with which the resolution does deal.

I point out that pensions paid to members of the armed forces and of the R.C.M.P. are calculated on the basis of a higher formula than that used with respect to civil servants generally. The principal difference in the pensions arises out of the fact that they are payable immediately on retirement at an age which may be earlier than a civil servant's immediate pension age of 60; and the amount of the pension is based on average pay over, at the most, six years, instead of the usual 10 years now prevailing among civil servants generally.

I was surprised to learn that there are in fact six formulae for calculating the pensions of retired civil servants, varying from the use of the final salary in the case of long-term members of the armed forces, to three years, five years, six years and 10 years. The way in which these disparities complicate a just solution of the problem need scarcely be pointed out to the house. Those whose pension rights are based on salary for the shorter period of time obviously retire on pensions more closely related to the level of salaries at the time of retirement than do the 10-year average cases.

Then, sir, there is another group which I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will not let us forget; retired employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Having stated how the problem arises, and how it varies in degree and intensity, I want to turn to some of the proposals which have been made both in this country and in other countries.

Ministers of finance in the past, Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Harris, in refusing requested increases, appear to have justified their position on the ground that any increase would be favouritism to retired civil servants over other groups of older Canadians who were faced with the same difficulties due to the decreasing value of their pensions or retirement savings under inflationary conditions. It has been strongly argued that the government should not use general tax revenues to give additional benefits to one relatively small class of senior citizens, when many times their number who purchased annuities, insurance or Dominion of Canada bonds, or who otherwise provided for their retirement, benefit only from payments under the Old Age Security Act. Mr. Abbott, I think it was, argued in the house that the government had in fact fulfilled its contractual obligation to its employees, and that having done so it had no greater obligation to retired civil servants than to other needy pensioners.

In principle this is a serious argument. To what extent must the government of any country indemnify its citizens against the decreasing value of its currency? If it does so for one group, must it not do so for all?

Serious though this argument be in principle, I believe it is fallacious in practice. The practical, pragmatic approach to this problem, in my mind, requires a more humanitarian attitude, more of a reflection of what I have styled the model employer approach. With the attitude that there is no obligation to retired civil servants I most wholeheartedly disagree.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has given us some details as to how this problem is handled in other countries. I would like to take a few minutes to deal with the legislation and practice in other jurisdictions. I know this has been done on other occasions, and I realize there have been put on the record some rather detailed explanations as to the position in other countries, but for the benefit of those who are in the house for the first time I wish to take a few minutes to deal with what has been done elsewhere.

In the United Kingdom the policy of increasing pensions of retired civil servants has been accepted since 1920, although it is true that until the year 1956 the increases have been subject to what was in effect a means test. From the beginning of the second world war until the present there have been four acts, in 1944, 1947, 1953 and 1956, all providing increases in the pensions of those who have been retired. In the 1944 and 1947 legislation there were percentage increases in the lower pension groups with a declining rate of percentage the higher the pension. The increases were given only in the case of actual hardship prior to the enactment of the 1956 legislation, and it was consistently argued that the government's side of the contractual obligation had been represented by the payment of pension and only after a means test ought any additional pension be paid.

The augmentation of the pension provided for in the legislation of 1956 departed for the first time from this basic concept of the past. The increases provided under this latest amending act were in varying percentages up to 10 per cent depending on the length of service and subject to a ceiling, in other words a maximum increase of £100. However, it is significant to mention that this was not to apply to the full extent to those retiring subsequent to April 1, 1952, since it was argued and accepted that the higher salaries received since that time would be reflected in their pension calculations.

I have taken some time in which to review the debates in the British House of Commons and the press comments in respect of the 1956 act. There is no doubt that this legislation was regarded as a sharp break with the previous treasury approach in the United Kingdom, which had been firmly opposed to increasing pensions except in the case of hardship. There was some mention in the debates of the objections which certain sections of the public had made to the alleged unfairness in providing special treatment for this group of older persons, but apart from the recognition that this element of feeling did exist in the country all parties expressed approval of the measure, and there was no dissenting voice against the legislation for that reason.

Certainly the mother of parliaments has set a precedent in dealing with these matters, and I want to quote just one brief sentence from the speech of Sir Lionel Heald at page 609 of the British Hansard of February 23, 1956. I do so because it characterizes the debate in that House of Commons as I am sure it will characterize the debate in this house today:

> A question of this kind, which affects the rights and conditions of employment of public servants, is—mercifully—something which is high above all party considerations.

It may be of interest to the house when we are discussing pensions abroad to know that the French civil service retirement scheme provides for an automatic adjustment of pensions in line with general increases in salaries of active civil servants. The instability of the French franc and the inflationary conditions general in France would seem to make that wholly inevitable.

In the United States for a number of years there has been provision for augmentation of civil service pensions after retirement. I want to refer to public law No. 369 of the eighty-fourth congress approved on August 11, 1955, which contained the detailed formula for such increases. As I believe it is most significant in our consideration of this matter, I would ask leave of the house to insert in Hansard at this point a brief table taken from the act which contains the formula.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member such leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The table is as follows:

If annuity commences between—	Annuity not in excess of $1,500 shall be increased by—	Annuity in excess of of $1,500 shall be increased by—
August 20, 1920 and June 30, 1955	12 per centum	8 per centum
July 1, 1955 and December 31, 1955	10 per centum	7 per centum
January 1, 1956 and June 30, 1956	8 per centum	6 per centum
July 1, 1956 and December 31, 1956	6 per centum	4 per centum
January 1, 1957 and June 30, 1957	4 per centum	2 per centum
July 1, 1957 and December 31, 1957	2 per centum	1 per centum

The house will note from this table that the increases vary from 12 per cent upon the first $1,500 of pension income for those who retired before June 30, 1955, to only 2 per cent for those who retire from July 1, 1957, to December 31, 1957. In the legislation there is also a ceiling of $4,104, or in other words the increases will not apply to increase a pension beyond that amount. In congress there appears to have been little concern over what the public may have thought about these special provisions for retired civil servants, but perhaps this could be accounted for by the fact that it is now the accepted practice in that country to increase the benefits of recipients under their old age and survivors' insurance scheme after retirement without, of course, requiring any additional contribution. Actually the only real concern I was able to find voiced in congress was over the provision of funds to pay the increased pensions.

In this parliament I can find only one precedent for this type of action which is suggested, that being an amendment to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act in 1925 to provide an increase in pensions granted prior to July 7, 1919 so as to bring them up to the same pension level as if the pensioners were retiring on the effective date of the amendment but with the service which was to their credit at the date of actual retirement. There was a further amendment to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act in 1930 which resulted in a readjustment of pensions, but by a means not material to this discussion.

In the provinces so far as I have been able to ascertain there is no general pattern. Three provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland have some provision. The province of British Columbia pays $1 per month for each year of service from the date of retirement until age 70, when this additional payment stops on the ground that the pensioner then receives old age security. In the province of Saskatchewan, under an order in council a bonus is payable to retired civil servants between ages 65 and 70. The bonus is a maximum of $45 additional per month provided it does not bring the combined pension and bonus above $75. The bonus ceases at age 70 when old age security payments commence. Thus it would seem to me that the position taken in British Columbia and Saskatchewan and the technique employed there relates wholly to the so-called hardship cases and not to the general problem we are considering in the house today.

I have not been able to ascertain in detail the situation in Newfoundland. Apparently it is under an order in council, because I have not been able to find any legislative authority. The other provinces appear to have made no provision, although it should be said that in most provinces the pension is based on an average of the last three years of salary and therefore the pension bears a closer relationship to the retiring salary.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if the hon. gentleman would not like to give credit to the government of the province of Ontario for having done something in this field with respect to its retired teachers.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite correct. In the province of Ontario provision has been made in respect of retired teachers, although that provision has not been applied to retired civil servants generally as yet. With regard to private Canadian employers there are isolated instances of pension increases to former employees but no general pattern appears to have developed yet.

I have taken the time of the house to make this rather comprehensive review of the legislation and the practice in other jurisdictions in order to show two things.

First, there is no insuperable obstacle to a just and fair readjustment of civil service pensions. On the contrary, it is possible, it is feasible and it is just, and it has been so established elsewhere. Secondly, the techniques of adjustment, or perhaps I should say of readjustment, are not simple; and to establish a relative justice between all classes of retired civil servants requires the most detailed investigation and study which are now proceeding with the greatest possible rapidity.

I confess, sir, that when I first started to study this problem I believed that if the government were disposed to act, the best and the simplest solution would be an overall percentage increase. And I think, from my review of the debates in this house, that that has been the more usual approach to the problem. But I have reached the conclusion, I have to say, that such an approach would create more injustices than it could possibly cure. In this respect there is a most apt reference on a slightly different point by Mr. Henry Brooke, to whom I have already referred, the financial secretary to the treasury, in introducing the United Kingdom bill on February 23, 1956, and I quote from page 588 of the British Hansard of that day:

> Most unfortunately, the more one studies that seemingly attractive possibility, the more convinced one becomes that it would be impossible that way to do individual justice.
> What we have to do is to take into account a total body of about 600,000 pensioners, who have retired after different kinds of services, with different kinds of pension, at different times over the past 30 years and more. What matters is to do justice, as far as possible, among all those individuals. One has to discard the idea of a simple, new scheme as soon as one discovers that whatever scheme of that kind one can devise, it will do justice that is too rough to be called justice at all.
> There is another possible method of proceeding. This other method, which has weighty advocates, is to legislate to bring every old pension up to the amount which the individual concerned would be awarded as pension, if he were retiring today on the same record of service as he actually had. But, apart from any other considerations, this method, too, is seen to run into practical difficulties, which I am afraid are insuperable. We are concerned with more than a quarter of a century of turbulent, national history which has seen enormous changes in the organization of the various services with which we are dealing.

This quotation, sir, is all too true of our situation here. A flat percentage increase in all pensions to those retiring before a certain date would give a pensioner retiring just before that date an unjustifiable advantage over the person retiring just after that date, with the same service. In addition, even for those retiring at the same time there is the complication created by the fact that there are six different benefit formulae to be considered when determining what increase should be made in the pensions of the three groups which are under review, namely the civil servants, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the armed forces; because, depending upon the time at which the individual affected came under the relevant statute, he will have received a pension of 2 per cent of a certain salary, or average salary, over a certain period for each year of service up to 35 years.

As I have already indicated, the position is very much loaded in favour of the person who retires on the final salary or his last year's salary rather than on a salary under the 10-year average upon which most civil servants are at the present time. I think it will be agreed by the house that there is a strong argument for providing more than one series of adjustment factors. I think, Mr. Speaker, it should also be pointed out that this is one of several problems under the Public Service Superannuation Act for which consideration is now required.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and other hon. members have interested themselves in the problem of those who are under the retirement fund, who regrettably and foolishly declined to elect to come under the Public Service Superannuation Act. Consideration must be given by the house to what extent we are to give them another opportunity to rectify what always was and what now appears even to them to have been a major error in judgment.

I do not need to refer, sir, to the problem of the employees of the soldiers' settlement board or the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment who were not considered permanent, and therefore were not under the 5-year average when it was in effect and are now under the 10-year average, because many columns of Hansard, as hon. members know, have been devoted to that.

These, sir, are but indications—and I see my time is rapidly drawing to a close—of the problem with which the new government was faced when it took office not yet six months ago. Immediately the new government gave instructions that the fullest possible review of all these superannuation problems be made by officers of the Department of Finance, the department of insurance and the advisory committee under the Public Service Superannuation Act. That has been going on and is going on today. It is only partially complete. Preliminary reports only have been made, reports of such a nature that a final decision cannot yet be made by the government.

As the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have stated in this house, this statistical and actuarial review will be completed at the earliest possible date, and an announcement of the government's decision will be made immediately thereafter. This is the assurance I can give to the house. There will be no stall, no attempt to avoid the issue directly once the basic facts, upon which a wise decision can be made, are fully known.

I hope, sir, that the debate on this subject today will serve a useful purpose. I hope hon. members on all sides of the house will try to help the government to achieve a fair and equitable solution of this complex problem. That the government will welcome and will give earnest consideration to all constructive suggestions from hon. members I can give positive assurance.

The brief to which the hon. member for Fort William referred a few minutes ago was presented to the Minister of Finance on November 15 by the civil service association of Ottawa, and copies of it were sent earlier to all hon. members. That brief is a helpful and constructive document and personally I want to congratulate the association and its officers upon the excellence of their presentation.

Now, sir, specifically I invite hon. gentlemen to express opinions, which I say would be helpful, as to whether there ought to be a single formula for the pension adjustment if adjustment is to be made, or ought there to be different formulae, varying as to the types of pension one from the other. If there should be an increase, ought there to be a ceiling placed on the increases as in the United States or the United Kingdom; and if a ceiling, at what figure and why? These, sir, are questions upon which the opinions of hon. members in all parts of the house expressed today would be most helpful.

I want to close as I began, Mr. Speaker. Proper retirement benefits for all civil servants constitute an obligation of government. Once all the facts are known I do not believe this government will fail in its obligation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Fort William for having brought this resolution once again before the house. It cannot be said of the hon. member for Fort William that he is raising a subject, now that he is on the opposition side of the house, that he neglected to raise when he sat on the government side of the house; for, as the records make clear, the hon. member raised this question a number of times, supported it when others raised it, and in the session in the earlier part of this year moved a resolution almost identical to the one that is now before us. Indeed, the only difference between the resolution of March 4 and the resolution now before us is that the hon. member for Fort William has now included a reference to retired personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I believe it might be assumed, as the hon. member for Carleton has pointed out, that when we are discussing this matter we are indeed discussing retired civil servants generally, including members of the R.C.M.P. and of the armed services, and the hon. member for Carleton anticipated one of my points, namely that whatever is done in this field should also be done for retired employees of the Canadian National Railways.

I want also to extend a word of commendation to the hon. member for Carleton on the remarks he has made. It is to be noted that he speaks not only as the member for Carleton but as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, and that gives particular weight to the assurances he has given today. We might have hoped, with all the study that has been given to this matter in the Department of Finance over the past 10 years, that it would be possible for the present government to move a little faster on this question.

I can assure the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and the government generally that we will hold them to this assurance to move as rapidly as possible in connection with this important issue.

Before I get into the body of my remarks I think it might be pointed out that the members of the present government are indeed under a very real obligation to proceed with this matter as rapidly as they can, because no less a person than the hon. gentleman who is house leader has had a good deal to say about this question over the years. I find that, so far as I can ascertain by going into the records, the first question asked about superannuated civil servants was asked by the member for Winnipeg North Centre back in 1947. It is found on page 469 of Hansard for February 17 of that year:

> Has consideration been given by the government to increasing the pensions of superannuated federal civil servants by the addition of a cost of living bonus or other supplement?

Mr. Mayhew, then parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance, answered "Yes". Then I put this second question:

> If so, what is the result of such consideration? Is the matter receiving attention at the present time?

This was the answer I was given by the then parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance:

> This question is still receiving consideration and the government's policy will be announced in due course.

The hon. member for Carleton will realize that one of the reasons I have read these words is that there is a certain similarity of ring between them and the words the parliamentary assistant has given us today. The matter is being studied in the department and just as soon as the government has reached a decision an announcement will be made. Well, we waited 10 long years for the previous government to reach the end of that consideration and make an announcement which failed to come. As a matter of fact it was a real disappointment last spring, after the assurance of some sort that the former minister of finance gave the hon. member for Fort William at the end of the debate on a similar resolution, that nothing was done by that government before it went out of office.

As the Minister of Public Works knows, he has taken part in most of the debates on this question across the years. I find, for example, that on April 1, 1949, as found at page 2267 of Hansard he said:

> These people are now met with a greatly increased cost of living. There is no doubt whatever that many of them, certainly those receiving small amounts, are having a very difficult time.
>
> [Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Later on he said:

> I cannot understand why the minister should just brush these requests aside and refuse to have an investigation made of the plight of the superannuated federal civil servants.

This was the Minister of Public Works years ago supporting us in our contention that something simply had to be done for these people. I am not going to read from Hansard of every year, but let me give just one or two more quotations. I turn to April 16, 1953, page 3958 of Hansard, and I find the present Minister of Public Works saying this:

> Finally I should like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to retired civil servants. For a good many years he has been raising this point, and I believe I have supported him on each occasion.

That is correct; he did. I trust that he will still support us and that he will give strong support to this cause in the place where it counts, and that he will see to it that the action which has been indicated by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will not be long delayed. We come down to 1956, and again we find the Minister of Public Works having something to say in this matter, as found at page 5586 of Hansard of July 2:

> I believe the time has come when the government should take some action. I remember it being raised first in the session of 1949, I think it was, and every year since that time the same thing has been pointed out to the government. However, we have been brushed aside each year primarily with the argument that a contract had been made, that these civil servants knew what they were doing when they paid into the superannuation fund, and that the contract could not be changed now.

He went on to make it clear that that argument did not carry any weight with him, and I am glad the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has re-echoed that point of view today, in saying there are no insuperable barriers to dealing with this problem if the government of the day has the will to deal with it.

Last spring when we were debating a resolution similar to the one now before us, also on the motion of the hon. member for Fort William, the Minister of Public Works said, as found at page 1845 of Hansard of March 4:

> This is one case in which the government has been a long, long, long time meeting the need.

He referred to the debates across the years, and finally he said:

> This need should have been met a long time ago.

The Minister of Public Works was quite correct when he said last spring that the need should have been met a long, long, long time ago. Ten years ago it was under study in the department and the government of that day promised to announce its policy as soon as it was decided upon. I hope we are not going to have to go through another 10-year period before getting action out of the present government.

May I say one or two other things by way of the history of this matter. Something of what I might have said is now not necessary because of what the parliamentary assistant has done by way of referring to the practices in the United Kingdom and in some of the provinces of this country. He has also referred to what has been done by the federal government in the United States. He might also have referred to the fact that in some of the individual states improvements have been made in the pensions of those already retired. There are a few instances in private industry where it has been done, both in the United States and in Canada as well as in some other countries. It is also true that in New Zealand and Australia steps have been taken to improve the position of those already retired. We can take action here, and I hope the house will accept the invitation of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and make suggestions to the government so that action may be taken soon.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the main we have to divide this problem into two aspects. Perhaps they will have to be separated one from the other because the first one is more pressing. On the other hand there is the problem of the large number of people, retired civil servants and others, who are having to get by on very small pensions. Any attempt to build some new principle into the Public Service Superannuation Act to solve the problems that will arise in the future will not help those people who are on low pensions now.

I think the government is going to have to find some way to cut the Gordian knot and simply raise these pensions to a floor below which retired civil servants of the federal government should not be asked to live. So far as these people are concerned, I do not think the government should waste time trying to find some principle, some percentage formula. I suggest that there simply be established a floor below which no pension should fall so far as retired civil servants are concerned.

Perhaps at this point I might put some figures on the record. I shall read mine because there are very few of them. According to the last figures that we have obtained in the house, there were last spring still 393 retired civil servants drawing pensions of less than $20 a month. There was a total of 3,170, including the 393 to whom I just referred, drawing pensions of less than $50 per month. Similarly, there were 1,248 widows of retired civil servants drawing pensions of less than $20 a month, and a total of 4,395 widows of civil servants drawing pensions of less than $50 a month. In the case of civil servants, those on pensions of less than $50 a month constituted, last spring, 22 per cent of all those drawing civil service pensions, and in the case of the widows the 4,395 constituted 64 per cent of all of those drawing pensions as widows of retired civil servants.

Even after we have dealt with the problem of those who are drawing these low pensions, pensions upon which people cannot be expected to live, there is the problem in terms of justice of doing something to improve the pensions of those who have enough to stay alive but the value of whose pension payments have been reduced or destroyed as described by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, would he mind answering a question? In respect of such persons, does he believe the old age security provisions ought to be taken into consideration as has been done in some of the provinces?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my hon. friend maintains that some means test should be applied—is that what he is driving at?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No; some additional payment at age 65 to 70 and perhaps dropping off when the automatic old age security payments come in at age 70.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where some private employers have done that I have welcomed it as better than nothing, but I would not advocate it. To do that is to interfere with the basic principle with regard to old age security, that it is paid to everybody regardless of income, leaving it to the income tax to make any necessary adjustments. When you start taking into consideration old age security payments you create more problems than you solve.

I would prefer that what the hon. member has suggested not be done. There are other people with other kinds of income, people who are still working or who have investment income, whose private income is not interfered with by receipt of the old age security pension. We already have the case of the burnt out pensioner whose pension is interfered with because he receives old age security. I do not believe that should be the case, and I do not think we should extend that principle into this field of the pensions of retired civil servants. In my view the universality of the old age pension is a good idea, and I do not believe we should interfere with it. In my view, if an employer has an obligation, as I believe he has, to provide a decent pension for his retired employee, that obligation is not taken away because of a state pension such as that provided under the Old Age Security Act.

I was about to make the point, Mr. Speaker, that not only do we have to be humanitarian and meet the plight of retired civil servants whose pensions are now in the lower brackets, but we have to consider the just claim of retired employees whose pensions might have been at reasonable levels at the time they retired, and see to it that the value of those pensions is kept up.

People have a right to receive enough to keep up with the cost of living. We go farther than that. We say that people have a right to receive enough, by way of pension, to keep up with a rising standard of living. After all, when people are retired any changes that take place in the economic levels are partly the result of the work they did in their working years. We do not believe that people, in their period of retirement, should be called upon to see the general standard of living rising while they have to tighten their belts and have life become progressively little more than mere existence.

We feel, therefore, that the whole Public Service Superannuation Act has to be looked at with a view to finding some formula whereby pensions can automatically be adjusted upward after employees have gone on those pensions.

Perhaps I could take this other half of the problem, as I was dividing it in the first place, and divide it into two parts. On the one hand there are hundreds, thousands, of retired civil servants now on pension, who right at this time may be getting a pension that sounds not bad when compared with these $30 and $40 pensions, but who feel that the value of their pensions has deteriorated since they retired.

In addition, there is the plight that will face some of our civil servants in the future, in that pensions which now sound adequate in due course will become inadequate. I have taken a quick look at one of these tables the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance placed on Hansard. It shows that if a civil servant retires today, after 25 or 35 years of service, he has a pension that is not too bad. I accept that. But do we not all know that five or ten years after such a person goes on pension the cost of living may well have gone up? The standard of living, we hope, will have risen, and these people will find that the pension which sounded all right when they went on it will be inadequate.

I am going to come to this in a moment. I realize that this branches out into a much broader field than just the problem of civil service pensions, but for the moment let us deal with it in the field of civil service pensions. This seems to me to lend real support to the argument that has been advanced by some who have studied this matter that there should be built into the Public Service Superannuation Act a provision whereby once a person goes on pension at the rate determined by the formula in the act, that pension will rise automatically as the cost of living or the gross national product goes up across the years. I had a few things to say about this in one of the debates that took place on the matter in 1956. The suggestions I made, which I had gleaned through reading, of course, are to be found on pages 6107 and 6108 of Hansard for July 17, 1956.

I suggested, for example, that actuaries could ascertain, by studying the experience of the past, just how much the cost of living could be expected to rise during the period that a retired civil servant could be expected to live from the date of retirement to death. In other words, actuaries could ascertain in advance how much that pension should be increased year by year so the retired civil servant, during the years of his retirement, would have a fairly constant income in terms of its purchasing power in relation to the cost of living. This having been done, the government or parliament could make a decision as to whether those increases should be provided out of current revenue, year by year—and I think there is every justification for that—or the government and parliament might decide that what would be desirable would be a slight increase in the rate at which civil servants pay into the public service superannuation fund for the purpose of providing for these automatic increases in the years that lie ahead.

Another way, of course, is to have a separate fund altogether into which civil servants contribute so as to pay supplements to retired civil servants.

The quid pro quo in that case for civil servants being required to pay into such fund would be the knowledge that when they are retired, civil servants of that day would be contributing to a fund to increase the amount of their pensions at the time of their retirement.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these two main problems are of equal weight and equal importance. I refer to the immediate needs of those on low pensions on the one hand, and to adjustments to take care of future inflation, on the other. We must address ourselves to both of them. But I urge that the government not let the time it might take to solve the second problem delay action on the first problem. Here you have these hundreds or thousands of retired civil servants and civil servants' widows with pensions that are inadequate. The time it would take to work out a new formula to look after future retired civil servants is such that if the situation is allowed to go on, these people will suffer unduly.

I therefore urge that the two problems be separated and that something be done right now by way of establishing a floor for pensions of those in the lower brackets. When they have done that, let the government not think that ends the problem. I say again to the government that there is no use boasting about the fairly decent level of pensions that people can now retire on, and forgetting that in the course of time, unless something is done, these rates of pension will also become inadequate.

It seems to me that the only way this problem can be met is to build into the superannuation plan some arrangement for an automatic increase in the pension as the cost of living goes up, or as the standard of living goes up, or both. It appears that there are times when we look exclusively at the cost of living in relation to these matters. No one denies that old people should have sufficient pension to meet the rising cost of living; but I think in this age when we are becoming, I hope, a bit more humanitarian, we should learn that older people have not only the right to sufficient pension to meet the rising cost of living, but that they should have sufficient pension to enjoy or participate in a rising standard of living as well.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the argument we are advancing with regard to civil service pensions applies not only to those which come in that category, including the mounted police, the armed forces and the Canadian National Railways—let us bring them in as well—but it raises the whole question of the need for some rethinking about pensions generally. There is on the part of some a tendency to wage certain battles and then, after those battles have been won, to feel that nothing more needs to be done. There are some who feel that perhaps enough has been done in the field of pensions generally. I suggest that we are just moving into a time when we are going to have to face another whole problem with regard to pensions.

For a moment, if I may be permitted to do so, I am talking with regard to a field broader than just civil service pensions. There was a day, for example, when my predecessor, Mr. Woodsworth, had to stand up in this house and argue against terrific odds that there should be an old age pension. It was a long battle. Eventually that battle was won, and it became established that it was right for the state in certain cases to pay an old age pension. The battle moved on. In due course the issue became not just the paying of a pension but the paying of a pension without a means test. For the first number of years that some of us were arguing for the abolition of the means test we were met with the argument that this was ridiculous, that this could not be done, that this would break the treasury, and so on. Yet eventually that battle was won, and we have established the principle of a universal pension.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the problem we are discussing today brings to our attention the realization that we are moving into a new field, that the time has now come when we must not only pay pensions to our older citizens, not only pay them on a universal basis, but must provide for those pensions to be adjustable, for those pensions to increase automatically so that people generally can meet the rising cost of living and participate in the higher standard of living.

We hear this suggested by some who argue that the old age pension, for example, should be adjusted according to the rise in the cost of living. We contend that is not enough. We contend that you must meet these other factors, the rise in the gross national product and the rising standard of living, as well.

I appreciate the fact that you did not call me out of order, Mr. Speaker, because I got away from civil service pensions into this broader picture, but I was doing it because it seems to me that what we are dealing with today is an issue that is of concern not only to retired civil servants, but is of significance to the country as a whole. To the argument which the hon. member for Carleton has very properly dismissed—and I am glad he did so—by saying we cannot do this because it would be a matter of discrimination against other Canadians, the answer I would make in reply is that this would be a case of giving a lead in this other field. In other words, if in the field of civil service pensions we can first of all establish the principle of a floor below which no pension should be allowed to fall; and if, in the second place, we can provide for pensions to be increased automatically after retirement to meet changing conditions, that will be giving a lead in the field of pensions generally, and it may be that this will be the beginning of our moving into a better era in so far as pensions and retirement allowances are concerned.

It has been a long battle, both in this specific field of civil service pensions, and in the general field of pensions to get this principle of old age security established. It has been a long, hard battle. The victories have been won rather slowly, but we have made headway to this point. We contend that what we are discussing today is a very important aspect of the matter into which we are now moving, and that is the desirability of having all pensions put on such a basis that they will increase after retirement in order to enable people to meet the rising cost of living and participate in the rising standard of living that is made possible by the sweat and toil of our people, made possible indeed by what those now retired have contributed in their working years.

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to congratulate the hon. member for Fort William not only for his willingness but indeed his determination to stick to his resolution until he sees some daylight. I consider it a pleasure as well as a duty to speak to this resolution which the hon. member for Fort William has presented, and which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to increase the pensions of civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were retired, after long service, when salaries were low, so as to bring their pensions in line with those of the present.

I want to say that I think those pensioners, and a mighty fine class of people they are, deserve some consideration. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Carleton, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, for the fine way in which he presented the argument on behalf of the government. If my memory serves me correctly I think that was his maiden speech in this house. I congratulate him on it. He has a fine speaking voice, is clear in his explanations and presents a mighty good argument. However, if he were in the opposition I think perhaps he would have taken a more positive view of this resolution and would not have submitted so much in a negative attitude.

Outside of those representing constituencies in the city of Ottawa, I think perhaps I have more retired civil servants in my riding than any other member in this house. The thing I find is that these people are now finding it mighty difficult to get along, because their expenses are far beyond their income. As the other hon. members who have spoken have pointed out, namely the hon. member for

Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Carleton, the devaluation of the dollar has caused them quite a bit of concern.

I found out two or three things while visiting these homes, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, I found that these pensioners are not greedy; they do not have the attitude that the government owes them a living; they do not have this "gimme, gimme" spirit that some people have. But they take the attitude that they should at least receive some appreciation for work they performed under previous governments. As I say, these people are not greedy. I think the greatest characteristics of greed are devastating and conquering. I do not think these people showed these characteristics, at least not during my conversations with them. They are now finding themselves in a very serious situation as a result of having to meet an ever-increasing level of municipal taxation out of a fixed income.

I found, Mr. Speaker, that these people are living in continuing fear. Someone has well said that one of the greatest evils of fear is fear itself. These people fear today, tomorrow, next week and next month. I think this government could do nothing better than relieve this fear, because so much continual fear and worry is driving many of them into trouble, and putting many of them on their sick beds.

I found, while visiting these people, that they do not try to be aristocrats, although in my opinion a lot of them have earned the right to aristocracy because as fine civil servants they were a credit to the government for which they worked, a credit to their country and now a credit to the municipalities in which they live. They want to hold up their ends, if I may use that expression, in their municipalities, but they are limited, as I say, by their difficulty in keeping up with ever-rising levels of local taxation. Nevertheless, they want to make those municipalities better places in which to live, and I think their efforts deserve a wealth of consideration.

One civil servant to whom I spoke told me he had heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) express at different times the opinion that the pensioner should receive more as prices rose. Indeed, I listened to the Prime Minister speaking over the radio from Toronto when he said that a Conservative government would raise the amount to a figure high enough to meet the needs of recipients, with subsequent adjustments tied to the cost of living. Then again, in a television broadcast on May 22, he amended this proposal to make it more specific by this promise and I quote:

> We intend to fix a fair and reasonable amount for the old age pensioner and, indeed, for the other pensioners, and also to make provision for a formula whereby due allowance will be made in the future for the rising cost of living.

And I well remember listening to election speeches made by the Prime Minister during his campaign when he stated on different occasions that it was time to take the unrepentant tax masters off the backs of the Canadian people. Well, we now have an opportunity to do this and I hope the government will acquiesce in the resolution so well presented by the hon. member for Fort William urging us to do something with regard to this problem and certainly by voting for this resolution we would be showing a spirit of reciprocity in the light of the work these retired civil servants have done so well on behalf of the government.

Mr. Speaker, at this time of the year, with Christmas coming close, we all know that the spirit and the theme of Christmas are based on the words "Peace on earth, goodwill towards men", and I say this, regardless of the political affiliation of any member of this honourable house, I think it is the duty—and I am not a minister—of every one of us to remember in our prayers each day the deliberations now taking place in Paris, and pray that we may see peace and unity in the years to come.

I appeal to the government to carry out the second part of this Christmas theme—good will towards men—and I am sure that if they would do something with regard to this resolution it would certainly make these people very happy, remove fear and anxiety from their homes and make their declining years upon this earth far happier than they are at the present time by giving them some assurance that they could at least meet the rising cost of living. If we could approve of this resolution I think we could throw back our shoulders and thrust out our chests with justifiable pride because we would have helped at least one class of people who performed their duty very well in the past on behalf of the administration of Canada in this wonderful service.

Mr. Speaker, what a wonderful Christmas present it would be if the government would announce that they intended to do something immediately with regard to increasing pensions paid to retired civil servants. I hope the government will act soon and that it will not wait too long for the report which the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has mentioned. Action is needed right now, not tomorrow or next year. These people are suffering, and it is up to hon. members of this house to do something on their behalf. I hope every effort is made to relieve the conditions under which many of our retired civil servants are living at the present time.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, other hon. members who have already spoken have dealt in the main with the subject of pensions paid to retired civil servants but have not dealt at any length with pensions paid to former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and others. I should like to say a few words this afternoon in connection with the pensions paid to former members of the R.C.M.P.

I understand that this is the first time the subject of these pensions has been included in the resolution, and it gives me great pleasure to say something about it. When I began to do some research into this matter I thought the best place to begin would be by looking through the mounted police magazines and bulletins. The mounted police veterans association have a magazine, and most magazines of this type have columns and articles devoted to complaints or, at any rate, to drawing the attention of the public to various difficulties. I went to our splendid library and looked up a recent issue of Scarlet and Gold which is a publication of A division of the R.C.M.P. veterans association. I also looked at the R.C.M.P. Quarterly, and the commissioner's annual report because I thought that somewhere in these publications I would get a fairly good idea of the situation of the mounted police retired veterans. But in none of these publications I have mentioned—and I looked back over quite a number of years—did I find any complaint or article referring to pensions. I read of the historic deeds of members of the force in the early days; I read stories about the activities of the mounted police at the present time, crime detection methods, jokes on the police and so on, but nothing about pensions. The R.C.M.P. Quarterly also has an old-timers' column, which I read, and I found that all it contained was news about reunions, stories of the past and reminiscences.

Mr. Speaker, I could only conclude after going through all these articles that either there is nothing to complain about, or else the members of the force both present and retired are carrying on their great tradition of duty without complaint. After looking into the matter, I feel that the latter is the case—the R.C.M.P. is not going to air complaints in public. In fact, there is provision in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act forbidding the members of the force from laying complaints except through their own organization and superiors.

For that reason I have a great deal of pleasure in bringing to the attention of the house some of the problems relating to retired members of the R.C.M.P. and their dependants. While the mounted police themselves do not seem to be unduly preoccupied with the question of pensions an examination of the statute indicates that this house and those members of it who framed the original act were definitely concerned. The record of the service, the desire to attract able and qualified men as recruits and to maintain a high standard of service led to the establishment of a complete and complicated system of pension.

The act setting up the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and its pension scheme is found in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, chapter 241. In this act there are 115 sections and of these sections 43 deal with the establishment of the force itself and 72 deal with pension matters. The very distribution of the sections of the act seems to indicate that the original legislators were concerned with this question. Two-thirds of the act deals with pensions for officers, constables and their wives and orphans and if that was the intention at the time the act was set up and the force was established I believe it should be no less our intention and concern today.

I think it must be assumed that it has always been the desire of this house to provide the personnel of the mounted police with a certain freedom of mind as to their retirement and as to the care that will be given to their widows and children if they suffer accident or death in the service and sufficient funds for themselves upon retirement or injury. This well drafted provision has now become slightly out of touch with present day conditions. The basis of the difficulty is easy to locate and I think it is rather in the same line as the general pension plan of civil servants. The basis on which mounted police officers and constables are given a pension is the pay and allowance they receive during the last year of their service and therefore if they retired when service rates were considerably lower than they are now their pensions would be correspondingly lower.

I would like to mention at this point some of the provisions in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. Section 67 of the act provides for the pension of a constable on retirement in the following language:

(1) The pension of a constable on retirement shall be,

[Mr. Aiken.]

(a) if he has completed ten but less than 21 years' service, one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service for every year of service;

(b) if he has completed 21 but less than 25 years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service, with an addition of two-fiftieths of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above 20 years; or

(c) if he has completed 25 years' service an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances during the last year of his service with an addition of one-fiftieth of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above 25 years, but the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of such annual pay and allowances.

From this provision it is quite clear that the entire system is based upon his pay during the last year of service. This provision refers only to constables and section 44 of the act makes almost identical provision for officers of the force. The pension for widows and orphans is contained in another section of the act. This latter pension is somewhat different because while it is based on pay and allowances during the last year of service it is also made up partly of a contributory system. The constable during his service pays 5 per cent of his salary by way of deduction and the amount of the total accumulation of the deduction based upon his last year's pay and allowances forms the basis on which his widow and children are provided care. We can readily see from this that those retired members of the force who left the service some years ago and their widows and orphans are receiving pensions based upon rates of pay of perhaps five, ten or 15 years ago.

There was a general pay increase in 1956 at the same time the general civil service increases were granted. An examination of this pay rate indicates that it is a reasonable one and that the general pay and allowances of the mounted police, while they may leave something to be desired, are fair and equitable. This will work very well for those who are presently in the service and will be retiring following the granting of this increase but it will also work a hardship on those who are trying to get along on a pension based on what they made a few years ago. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has stated that the matter is receiving serious attention on the part of the government not only with regard to the services and the R.C.M.P. but all other classes coming within the general scheme.

As is the case with all classes of persons in receipt of pensions, those in receipt of mounted police pensions have problems which are not simple to deal with. The first thing is that widows and orphans' pensions are contributory and therefore the basis of payment is the basis of a contract. During his service a constable has paid into a fund, which has been set up, a percentage of his pay and when he retires from service or loses his life while in service the widow and children receive the amount which has accumulated and therefore this also raises difficulty with regard to other pensions. A contractual basis is there.

The government of Canada has agreed to assist R.C.M.P. veterans and they have agreed to accept such pay and the allowance as based on a contract. We have to consider to what extent the moneys of the general public should be used to increase an amount which was originally started off on a contractual basis. As pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton, other people who contributed to retirement allowances and similar schemes are not entitled by any stretch of the imagination to receive increases from the government merely because what they receive is lower than what is received by some one else. That is the first difficulty in meeting this particular problem.

The second matter which has to be considered is that many of the persons who are going to be particularly affected by an increase are those who retired some years ago. It would almost be safe to assume that most of those people would be within the old age pension bracket and we do know that at this session of parliament there has been at the public expense a general increase in pensions for all persons and those who come within the age 70 and older group have benefited as a result of those increases.

Then, there is also the 65 to 70 years of age group who may be receiving Royal Canadian Mounted Police veterans' allowances as well as old age assistance. There again, something is to be gained from a serious consideration and adjustment of the problem. There are also a number of people—and this is well known—who retired from the mounted police in what might be called the prime of life. If they entered the service when they were fairly young and served 20, 25 or 30 years and chose to retire, they did so with a reasonably good pension and they still have the opportunity of going into similar work. A good many of the chiefs of police in the smaller towns and persons of that kind are retired mounted police constables who gained a lot of experience in their service with the force. Those people have a regular income and probably they consider that their pension from the R.C.M.P. is in addition to that income and is something on which they can always fall back in case they lose their present income.

In Ontario and Quebec we have provincial police forces, but, except in those two provinces, the entire mounted police force do provincial duties as well as federal duties, which they were originally set up to do. Those who are relying mainly on their pension granted under the act referred to and who retired under the low rate are no doubt experiencing financial difficulty owing to the increase in the cost of living. Those are the people who must be considered. We must consider those who have no other source of income and who have suffered from the general increase in the cost of living.

I have not made any attempt to outline the great history and tradition of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and its predecessor the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, but in considering this matter we must remember that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are recognized the world over. They are a sort of badge of Canada. In addition to the maple leaf you see figures of the mounted police. In the minds of many people the world over they do represent Canada. Therefore, it is important—and it was the original intention —that the mounted police be kept on a high standard; that the pay and allowances be kept at a rate which will induce persons of high calibre to enter the force, and we should give them pension allowances which will remove from their minds any concern about their retirement. We must consider that they might take another position in life and probably earn a great deal more with a lot less hardship as an average citizen.

May I say just a few words about police duties generally. We all know, of course, that police duties are not the most pleasant in the world. In general, the police have the duty of carrying out the legislation which we pass in this house and which is passed in the legislatures of the provinces. Police duties involve those people who either wilfully or carelessly resist or ignore the laws of the land as they are established. At one time it was thought that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had to do only with policing the cold and vast hinterland of the north of Canada, and that their duties perhaps were not onerous except for the privations that they must endure and their obligation always to get their man throughout the snow-covered wastes of the northwest. Their duties have changed now. As I mentioned a minute ago, they carry out normal police duties in eight of the 10 provinces under arrangements with the various provinces.

We must consider this also in relation to the duties they must perform. The standard of conduct of the R.C.M.P. is very high. I mentioned a few moments ago the fact that a large number of sections of the act deal with the pension scheme of the R.C.M.P. and their dependants. In addition to that, one of the sections deals with no fewer than 24 offences which the R.C.M.P. constable may not commit and if he does commit them it may result either in his being arrested and fined or discharged from the service. These particular offences in the normal course of human existence in this country would not all be considered extremely serious; but the standard of service which is set in the act is high and the offences which they may not commit in service are very difficult to follow out.

In view of all these matters, Mr. Speaker, I do feel that very serious consideration should be given to the matter which is the subject of this resolution. I have not said anything about the civil service because it has already been very capably dealt with by hon. members who have made a serious study of the matter not only at the present time but over the years. The same rules should apply here as apply to the mounted police. This resolution is opportune and I think the mounted police pensions were well included. I am in favour of supporting this motion.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in view of the stand taken by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), I do not see that there is much to be gained by using up the time of the house on this resolution. However, in the light of his request for information, we may be able to dish out a couple of points which may be of use to him when he really gets down to the consideration of this resolution.

Of course, his address was in many respects quite negative. I followed it as closely as I could and I did get the general impression that he was in favour of the resolution but how actively in favour or how enthusiastically in favour, of course, is another matter. You can be in favour of something, but in a case of this kind the people are aging and dying off and you can keep giving consideration to it and being in favour of it until the problem has solved itself. The hon. member gave acceptance to this resolution in just about the only manner in which the government could because, I am sure, that in the face of the debate which took place in March of last year the reaction could not be otherwise.

It is true he did not present many figures as has been done by past ministers of finance and departmental heads, and perhaps that too is in accordance with the words of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), when speaking in the debate on March 4, 1957. As found at page 1856 of Hansard, he said:

> I do not believe this house will be satisfied with listening to a lot of figures the Minister of Finance will put on the record later, perhaps only to show that it is going to cost this country a geat deal of money.

In the face of that I think the hon. member did about all that could be expected. He did not talk too much about money. He talked about the difficulties of working out scales and he made one statement to the effect that he did not feel the taxpayers' money should be used to assist a small minority as it might be an act of discrimination against larger classes. I think that was the meaning of what he said. I agree that all pensions have got to be reasonable. I do not believe in discrimination. I believe in fair play to all. On the other hand, we are dealing with a particular problem here and I think we might ask ourselves this question. Must this small group of pensioners be left to struggle and suffer, because the employer, in this case the government of Canada, did not provide a scale of pensions to meet their needs, while a plan is being worked out that will avoid any semblance of discrimination?

There is also the fact that in dealing with this question we are dealing with human values, values on which a dollar price tag cannot be placed. As I said earlier, I cannot see any need to spend too much time in deliberation and consideration in order to work out a scheme that from the financial point of view will be absolutely fair and actuarially sound. I agree with the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that in the meantime, in order that we may get on and meet the needs of these people in some way, a pension floor could be established. Some amount of money could be set as the minimum that would be payable to these people and action should be taken immediately to raise their pensions to a floor which will guarantee them a reasonable standard of living. I am going to quote another authority in support of that suggestion in the person of the present Minister of National Defence. As found at page 1855 of Hansard of March 4, 1957, he said:

> If the government is not able to check inflation, then it seems to me only fair and just that the government must find some other means of helping those who are really the underprivileged class of the nation.

He is referring particularly to the deterioration in the purchasing power of the dollar. A few years ago $100 a month looked like a reasonable pension but we know how little the real value of that amount of money is today. Therefore I say that any floor that might be fixed as a matter of expediency and urgency should have regard to the cost of living at the present time. That would be in keeping with the view of the Minister of National Defence in the remarks to which I have just referred.

I was also pleased to hear the hon. member for Carleton say that an adjustment is possible and that the matter is being given consideration. But I should still like to know whether the government is going to vote for the resolution and whether the consideration is going to be prompt or whether the matter is going to be stalled along for many years. When the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) spoke in the debate on March 4, 1957, he said, as found at page 1860 of Hansard:

> —unless the government takes action, nothing will be done this year just as nothing has been done in previous years.

We know that nothing will be done this year but we would have felt much better if the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance had assured us that their studies of the problem had reached the stage where they could assure the house that legislation would be introduced at the next session of parliament. Time is running out. After years of trying to eke out an existence on ridiculously low pensions, these people are finding it more and more difficult to finance their daily living. They are finding that under the present government just as under the former government the purchasing power of the dollar is shrinking daily and the problem is growing more acute. There is also the fact that many of these people are reaching the last stage of their life expectancy and I think it is high time that the government improved the treatment it has been handing out to them and raised their pensions at once so that in the latter years of their lives they may know something about what a reasonable standard of living can do for them. Many of these people are passing out of the picture altogether and, as I said, the longer the government waits the smaller the problem becomes due to the decrease in their numbers. I hope that prompt action will be taken and something will be done before the problem solves itself in its own way by these aged pensioners passing completely out of the picture.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to commend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for the warmth with which he has brought forward this matter for discussion today. I refer to his warmth of feeling for a class of citizens who find themselves in some difficulty. I think I should also acknowledge and commend his persistence and his consistent arguments year after year on this subject.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, and there are some phases of it that I should like to refer to particularly. I notice that the resolution deals with increasing the pensions of civil servants and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and that in the course of the discussion of the resolution other matters have been raised with regard to finding a new method of dealing with the Civil Service Superannuation Act generally.

I think it is probably well that I do not digress into that field because, while that subject is quite interesting and I do not want my failure to deal with it to indicate lack of interest in it or support of it, the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) went a bit farther than the resolution and, indeed, form the subject matter of something that should be discussed separately when the Civil Service Superannuation Act is being discussed by itself.

In the early stages of his remarks, the hon. member for Carleton paid high tribute to the civil service, and indeed in doing that he was only being consistent with the views expressed by ministers who form the present government. It has been a very common practice for them to do that since this house opened, a practice which I indeed find very pleasing. I think it is a great tribute to the former government to have this government, which has so recently taken office, commenting on and commending the building up of the administrative arm of government which is held in such high esteem. I hope that will be the condition when governments change from time to time, as inevitably they will in the future. I hope that any new government coming in will be able to make the same remarks with as much conviction as they have been made in recent weeks by the present Conservative government.

I am one of the few members of the house who recalls the previous change of government, and who heard many of the speeches made in this chamber at that time. I was not a member of the house, but was occupying another part of the house and heard the speeches. The truth of the matter was that the civil service of Canada, at the time the new government of that day took over in 1935, had become so demoralized, so completely broken down in confidence and in ability by the wanton dismissals, if I may use that term, by the reductions in pay, the stopping of statutory increases and the stopping of promotions and reclassifications, that it was indeed a civil service about which the same remarks as were made by the hon. member for Carleton could not have been made.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why do we not keep politics out of this?

Mr. McIlraith: I want to express the hope that that condition will not arise in the future. I believe that the approach to these matters has very much improved in the intervening years, and I can only say that it is my very genuine wish that the views the hon. member for Carleton has expressed about the civil service today will prevail and that the views of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips), as reported in the Victoria Colonist, will not prevail. I hope that this hon. member's views do not represent any substantial body of opinion amongst the supporters of the government, and that is a very genuine remark on my part. I believe that the hon. member for Carleton would very strongly support me in such remarks.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member had better not say the same thing about Victoria, Ontario.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, has a little more judgment, and having had some contact with the civil service since his appointment as parliamentary assistant he will come to share my view on this matter.

Mr. Hodgson: The best there is; I mean my department.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, that is a pretty good compliment and just the way the civil service should be kept, in my view.

As to the hon. member's remarks about the government as a model employer if I turned up the references I could show the hon. member for Carleton remarks made in an earlier speech some years ago by one of his close neighbours in the house, where similar mention was made of the government being a model employer. The hon. member for Carleton's remarks along that line are ones that have been made previously in the house, and not by a supporter of the Conservative government. I was quite pleased with them.

I took it from his remarks that he was trying to approach this matter in an objective way, and not in a partisan way; that was the interpretation I placed on them. Indeed, I am looking forward with interest to getting the actual text of his remarks to see precisely what he did say on that point.

I should like to take him up on that, and to try to approach this problem from the point of view that may bring forward helpful considerations. I, for one, would like to see the matter voted upon by the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It would be unanimous.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: I hope it will not be talked out, and for that reason I will not spend as much time as I would like on developing the question of the need of certain civil servants and pensioned R.C.M.P. for assistance. I take it that case has been made. Certainly as I was looking at the remarks of some ministers of the crown, I take it that it should not be necessary to convince the present government of that need.

The matter is somewhat complicated. There is no doubt about that, and no useful purpose would be served by trying to make it appear a simple matter. One of the difficulties I always found in working on the problem was that the statistical tables showing the average amount of superannuation being drawn by civil servants could be misleading. In some of the groups of low payments you would find persons who were receiving very low payments because they were superannuated before the pay increases had been granted and were, therefore, receiving very low pay. These persons, even though they had long terms of service, were suffering real hardship. In the same set of statistics you will often find a few who had been superannuated when they were quite young because of the abolition of their positions or for some other reason. They received a small pension because they had only worked in the service the required ten years and had not made it their career. It is not quite good enough to just take the statistical figures as they stand, and argue the case from there.

The real hardship comes from the fact that there are many superannuated civil servants who were superannuated on the basis of earnings of the last ten years of their employment, but the date of whose retirement was prior to the date when pay increases became effective. For all practical purposes, pay increases in the civil service started about 1948. There were certain other increases, but for the purposes of this argument I shall ignore them. The pay increases started in 1948 and have continued during the years until now we have had two general increases in the last three years. This problem is not to be confused with problems relating to the superannuation rates that will be applicable to presently employed civil servants who will be superannuated in the future after having worked on the higher pay levels for the required ten years. This is a particular problem applicable to those civil servants who were superannuated on the basis of ten years' service before the pay increases were effective.

Because this problem arises in that way, it makes it somewhat difficult to find a general principle that will be applicable and that will bring the desired relief. So far as I am concerned, relief there must be. I am inclined to think that the practical method of working out relief for those persons is not through waiting to amend the superannuation act by tying superannuation to the cost of living, but rather by seeking to make some direct payment to those former civil servants who, for the reasons I have mentioned and other related reasons, find themselves now unable to live on their superannuation.

That may lead the government into having to deal with them on a separate basis outside the superannuation fund. If in the study of this matter they find that it is necessary to do that, I would urge them to do so. The civil service superannuation fund is now on a good basis. The whole act was well administered and it is a very effective act. Indeed, the hon. member for Carleton, unlike his minister, was quite modest about the claims he made for the superannuation act. Having regard to any acts that I could examine and with which I could compare it, I believe it is the best one that I have found. Certainly that was my experience, and over the years I have done a fair amount of work on it.

In seeking to cure this problem I would not want to have the government in any way weaken the act itself. On other occasions I may have something fairly sharp to say about the failure of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to support the civil service superannuation fund with the $50 million contribution proposed to be put in it by his immediate predecessor. However, I do not want to open up that subject now, other than to say that the civil service superannuation fund and the retirement funds that preceded it have been built up over the years. If you examine the history of them you will find that there were periods when they were in a very much weakened condition, or when they were not actuarially sound. As far as I am concerned, I want them to be brought on to a sound actuarial basis and kept there. A great deal has been done—and I think I can claim some credit for the former government for this—in putting that fund on a proper basis and indeed the whole superannuation legislation as it has developed since the superannuation act of 1924 and the basic amendments in 1944 and 1947. I think that is something for which the former government can claim a good deal of credit.

In meeting this problem, I hope it will be treated in such a way that the administration of the Civil Service Superannuation Act or the fund will not be impaired. But in saying that I want to make it clear that I am not in any way minimizing the need for action in accordance with this resolution. Action is desperately needed by a number of superannuated civil servants. I do not think the number can be determined just by taking the statistical tables that have been given from time to time in answer to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However, the number is substantial.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would he consider that it might be possible to meet this problem by putting an item in the estimates in the same way that the Intercolonial railway employees had their pensions increased, pending some statutory changes with regard to the other problem?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can give a perfectly dogmatic answer to that question. My whole point is that it must be met in that way. It seems to me that it must be met on the principle that it is a payment by the crown to former employees who had a long record of faithful service to the crown and in recognition of that service. It seems to me that that is a way in which to deal with it now.

I could deal with the mounted police aspect of the resolution. It arises somewhat differently because when you go into the history of the mounted police you find that the fund was not always a contributory fund on the same principle as was the civil service superannuation fund. There is quite an early history from the days when it was an arbitrary amount paid by the crown as an ex gratia payment and so on.

While the history is different, the need is just as great. As a matter of fact, the need for a more comprehensive piece of legislation with respect to the mounted police was probably greater than with respect to the civil service in the early days. In any event, there is this number of persons who served with the R.C.M.P., who were pensioned under the old provision and who are in real hardship today. Indeed, if you check into such places as the corps of commissionaires—that very splendid force so well known in many parts of Canada and very well known in Ottawa—you will find in the personnel some of these pensioners of the R.C.M.P. who are doing their duty now and doing it well. However, when you question them about their pension, it is just a shocking situation that you find. That situation must be met. I see no difficulty in meeting their case directly.

It does not do violence to any of the principles of the contract relationship at all because they were not always on a contributory basis. There is a case to be made there—a somewhat technical case, I may say—on that ground.

One point that troubled me a bit was that near the conclusion of his remarks the parliamentary assistant spoke about the fullest possible review of the facts being made, and he made reference to the advisory committee under the Civil Service Superannuation Act and so on. I hope that in dealing with this matter that did not mean that the R.C.M.P. part of the resolution was being neglected in any way. In other words, it would require some other body than that advisory committee to do the fact finding on the R.C.M.P. part of it, at least to supplement their work. I hope he will watch that matter as the work is being done in the department. As a matter of fact, I hope he will press this matter for this reason. I believe he will find that the Department of Finance officials have done a great deal of technical work on this matter and have a great mass of information already available. I hope that the delay is not a delay on the part of the government. I know something of what work the Department of Finance have done on this subject and I should think they are close to being able to give all the information asked for. An enormous amount of work has been done on the matter over the years.

I could go on. If you look at Hansard, you will find a great many remarks on this subject made by the present members of the cabinet when they were in opposition. I think it would be easy to pick them out and to embarrass them thoroughly with those remarks. However, I am going to refrain from that pleasure in the interests of getting the measure forward. I must say that the temptation is great. I have been looking at some of the remarks and I wonder at times how they came to be appointed ministers of the crown after being so—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks)—

Mr. McIlraith: —careless in their remarks. In any event, perhaps I had better let that subject drop. I want to get something done about this. But I hope the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will, privately, remember something of what they said, because if he does not get effective action taken on the matter I suspect he will find that the ministers of the government will be reminded of these remarks, and reminded many times.

The hon. member for Carleton, in concluding his remarks—and I have treated his remarks as if they were a statement of the government's position, although he did not say they were, and all sorts of technical arguments could be raised as to whether or not a parliamentary assistant can state the government's position—spoke, in particular about action "once all the facts are known". It seems to me that the whole matter turns on this phrase "once all the facts are known". I suggest to him that these facts are all known already, that they are all available. Then the hon. member went on to state a very strong belief in the government. I must say that I cannot share it, but that is another matter. As a matter of fact, I think a great many hon. members in this house, having watched the government's program over the weeks, may not share it either. But in any event I want to say that so far as I am concerned I will wait and see. I hope the hon. gentleman's speech meant what it appeared to mean, that is that the government intends to take action on this matter, and intends to take action on it right away. I take it the intention is to act once the facts are known and, as I say, the facts are all known and on record.

So I conclude my remarks with a hope that a vote will be taken on the resolution and that the vote will be followed quickly by action by the government to meet this problem.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with those who have congratulated the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for bringing this matter to the attention of the house, and to say to him at the same time—quickly, before I am ruled out of order—how much we on the back benches appreciate the many occasions on which he has walked across the floor to say hello to us and provide us with encouragement. We do, indeed, appreciate this, recognizing his interest is in the best traditions of this house without fear of being suspected of bi-partisanship.

I should also like to say that the area I will cover, very briefly, has already been dealt with, namely the question of the R.C.M.P. veterans. It was dealt with, first, by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who made a very comprehensive survey of the position, and then by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) who has just resumed his seat. My reason for making a comment or two is that I had the privilege some two and a half months ago of arranging for the presentation of a brief to the government by the R.C.M.P. Veterans' Association and I propose to fill in the background by making one or two remarks which may be relevant. Let me say, though, that it must not be assumed that because I am not dealing with the whole field of retirement pensions that I am not in sympathy with those comments which have been made on other aspects of this matter, such as the pensions paid to employees of the Canadian National Railways and the civil service. It would be mere repetition on my part to say that I agree with the sentiments so well expressed by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and that I welcome his assurance that some positive action by the government will be taken in the very near future.

I think, too, I can say that all hon. members who have participated thus far in the debate have resisted the temptation to make this a political issue, with perhaps the near exception of the hon. member for Ottawa West, which shows that the house feels it is in the best interest of these pensioners to proceed without conflict and see that some time in the New Year, or in the immediate future, some action will be taken.

It is not necessary for me to deal at length with the problem of the R.C.M.P. veterans and it is certainly not necessary for me to bring to the attention of a body of this nature the position which this group of veterans has occupied over the years, gained by their outstanding contribution to the development of Canada. I think we will all take for granted that this body of men, the veterans of the R.C.M.P., have done perhaps as much as any unit, or organization or body to contribute to the early growth of this country through the policing of vast areas of Canada in many difficult circumstances. We accept the fact, also, that they did this work at a time when they were surrounded by extreme hazard and at a time before hazard pay and allowances were known. We accept the fact that many of these men discharged their duty at extreme risk to themselves personally, and, of course, as many were career policemen made great personal sacrifices. I think I can say, in addition, that we will remember that the standard of pay which this country gave the force in those days was perhaps—and this may be the understatement of the year —not in keeping with the work which they were called upon to perform at that time.

Let us accept that all this is generally agreed, and let us look to see what has happened since that time. Like the hon. member for Ottawa West, my main concern in discussing this matter is that since pensions were first awarded many of these men now find themselves in a very serious financial position unless they are able to supplement their income by means of some other employment. It has been mentioned to us here that many of them do perform useful functions at the present time. In fact, I have heard this used as an argument why an increase in pensions should not be awarded to them, but I think hon. members will agree that this factor should not disqualify them from receiving an increase, or handicap them in any way, because if we are realistic we must realize that if a man has not enough to live on and pay his bills he is bound to take some other employment.

On one occasion a former minister of finance said, in justification of not awarding increase in the payment made to these veterans, that the pension was never intended to maintain them, but only to supplement their incomes. But I think the hon. gentleman who said this, if he was here today, would agree with us that in the light of the declining purchasing power of the dollar the value of the award should at least remain constant, and that these gentlemen should not be placed in an unfortunate position merely because they gave their service at a time when the rates of pay were not high. There has been a suggestion to the effect that any increase in the pensions might establish a precedent which would create problems for a government in the future. It is interesting to note that two increases were granted to them, one in 1927 and a second in 1930, but it is equally significant to observe that it has been 27 years since government consideration has been given to increasing pensions for this particular group of men.

It is important to remember that any lengthy delay in recognizing the need for increasing pensions for this group will result in many of these men being deprived of the increase through death. An examination of the figures indicates that there are very few men in this special group who are alive today. The cost of increasing pensions for this particular group who came under the old scheme will not be large by virtue of the fact that in approximately ten or 15 years, based on the mortality rates, many of these men will not be with us. It therefore seems imperative that we should act quickly in recognizing the service these men have given through increasing their pension without delay. As the hon. member for Ottawa West said, the need for increasing the pensions of this group is perhaps more urgent than that of any other group who are in receipt of pensions under consideration in this resolution.

The actual pay of R.C.M.P. officers has increased, I think, by something like 70 per cent over the last six years and I maintain that this is as it should be, but in view of these increases surely there should be a close relationship between the pay of the men in active service and those who served in years past and have now retired. The hon. member for Carleton has asked for some advice as to how this could be implemented and how actual income could be related to an increase in pension. It may be suggested to him, as it was suggested in the brief of R.C.M.P. veterans, that this income could be related to the salary of those presently serving as it goes up or down, but in any event it should be related to some formula that will be indicative of the actual cost of living.

I find it revealing to examine the rate of pay and allowance of a veteran who leaves the force today. It is a sad commentary on our system in the past years to observe that when a constable retires today he receives a greater pension than that of an inspector of the force who retired under the old rates of pay.

I have traced here for my own information a rather long list of representative groups who have since retired from the service and the discrepancies in the rates speak for themselves. I think this is the most forceful argument one can use for the need of an increase in their pensions. I am not going to continue to develop this particular aspect of my argument because I think a strong case has been made for the obvious and urgent need of recognizing the outstanding service provided by these men of the R.C.M.P. in developing our country. I think it is important that this government recognize as quickly as possible the urgent demand of this diminishing group who have made such a fine contribution and who unfortunately may not be with us for too many years to come.

In conclusion may I just say that I sympathize with the argument that we must give general over-all consideration to these problems so we will not bring into effect legislation, or increases in pensions to be more specific, which are going to have to be amended the day after the enactment of the bill. One factor which has contributed to the stability of employment in industry in the last few years is that practically all industries recognize that if they are going to maintain a standard of employment satisfactory to their production trend it is only going to be done if they provide those benefits which this modern social age expects of them. Certainly our retired civil servants, R.C.M.P. and C.N.R. employees should not be told that they are the exception to the rule. I take my seat believing that the government will act on its stated intention and give immediate consideration to this matter so that the needs of the people for whom I have made my case specifically can be attended to as urgent business.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this resolution I should like first of all to compliment the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for his perseverance and persistence in presenting this resolution year after year as he has done. I have supported it on previous occasions and I rise to do so again today. I should also like to compliment the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) not only for the very lucid explanation which he gave of the difficulties that would have to be overcome in implementing this resolution but also for the very sympathetic attitude he displayed toward it. The hon. member for Fort William rested his case on two arguments. One was that justice demands it and the second was that necessity requires it. To these I should like to add a third argument, the argument of the necessity of the government accepting the moral responsibility to live up to its contracts.

The hon. member for Carleton said that the government should be a model employer and I agree with him wholeheartedly in this. We all know that the predicament in which retired civil servants find themselves today is due mainly to two factors. One is that their pensions are low, and they are low because salaries at the time of their employment were low. I think it is well known that over the years civil service salaries generally have been much lower than those paid for the same services and responsibilities in comparable jobs in industry and commerce; but civil service salaries were low because the salary itself was only part of the contract. The other part was represented by security. When a civil servant became employed in service he did so with the understanding that his salary was going to be lower than what he would receive for comparable work in industry but on the other hand he was going to have a certain amount of security during his retirement years. The second factor is that that security has not been provided and it is the moral responsibility of the government to provide it as quickly as possible.

There are three reasons why civil service pensions are not adequate to meet the increasing needs of pensioners. One is that continued inflation has depreciated the value of the dollar almost continously over a great many years. The second reason is that the pension, at the time it was calculated, was geared to the living standards of that day and we all know that living standards have improved considerably every year and will continue to improve as the years go by. The third reason is that, along with rising standards of living, we have had a continued rise in the living costs.

The hon. member for Carleton solicited suggestions as to how this problem should be met. In my opinion these three factors must be taken into consideration when the solution is being worked out. Since the dollar has depreciated roughly at the rate of 3 per cent per year, to restore the purchasing power of the pension it should be increased by at least that amount, 3 per cent per year for the number of years the pensioner has been retired. Then, there should also be a clause to make sure that under no circumstances will the pension remain below the subsistence level. The third factor should be an extra bonus, included in the formula, to compensate for the increase in living standards over and above the living standards of the period to which the pension was geared.

During this session we have already taken action to alleviate the condition of our old age pensioners. We have treated them on an emergency basis on the assumption that the people concerned could not actually live without an increase in their pensions. We have justified the pension we have given to those old age pensioners, as a matter of right, on the basis of their contribution to the general economy of the country during their working years and on the assumption that today we are enjoying the fruits of their labour. We must remember that the civil servants also made their contributions to the economy of the country in the same way as every other worker did, and for that reason they are entitled to the same consideration as we would give to old age pensioners and other groups whom we have assisted with benefits during this session. But, on top of that, not only have they given their contribution to the economy, they have made a contribution to their retirement in two ways. One of the ways is by a direct contribution to the superannuation fund, but they made it in another way by accepting a much lower salary than they could have received outside of the civil service in comparable positions in industry and commerce. Therefore, they have a triple claim to our consideration and their case should be treated with the same urgency as we have treated other pensioners.

I would therefore suggest that action be taken at this session. I think a rough calculation can be made and the terms can be worked out afterwards. Some allocation should be included in the supplementary estimates at this session so that the government can discharge its moral obligation to those faithful old servants. Action on this obligation has already been too long delayed.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, once again a resolution comes before us for the consideration of the civil servant who is on pension and who perhaps was retired some years ago when the cost of living was considerably below what it is today. Once again we have heard some speeches similar to those we heard in days gone by. Once again I rise to support the resolution which stands in the name of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I do wish to pay the hon. member a compliment and I believe we all should. We should express our appreciation for his bringing this resolution before the house consistently year after year. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to increase the pensions of civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were retired, after long service, when salaries were low, so as to bring their pensions in line with those of the present.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government would see fit to pass this resolution and bring in legislation in the very near future, for I believe that if the hon. member for Fort William is to retire later on—we all hope he might return to the house—it would be a pleasant thing for him to be able to retire and know that in his honour perhaps—if I can put it that way—legislation had been passed to increase the pensions of civil servants. I think that would be something that would give him a good deal of satisfaction. Since he is a veteran of this house, it seems to me we could very well honour him in this respect. When a man retires it is pleasant for him to know that he has some sort of memorial that he can leave behind. In the case of the honourable member, a piece of legislation that has helped those who have been the unfortunate victims of policies that have not kept pace with the rising cost of living.

We support this resolution, Mr. Speaker, because we recognize it is just; we recognize it is fair; we recognize it is the thing to do. I do not think there can be any arguments against it. I should like to see it go much farther. Of course, governments have no responsibility in respect of the increase in pensions in other fields, but they do have responsibility for the amount of pension which is paid to civil servants. In the past I have talked with a number of people not civil servants who have had to retire on industrial pensions. I was out to the west coast a year or two ago and I happened to visit West Vancouver. It is a very fine community in which I found there were quite a number of retired people. I held one or two meetings while I was there and almost invariably some retired gentleman, mostly retired bankers, I must say, would come to me and ask if something could not be done about increasing their pensions. I mention this because it is apropos of the whole subject. A banker usually retires on what might be considered a fair pension. Banks have pension schemes and when bank managers retire they are supposed to retire with some considerable dignity, something that is commensurate with the position they held. Some of these old retired bankers find that their pensions have diminished in purchasing power far below what they ought to be and they cannot live in dignity any longer. That is something to be considered.

All this arises for one reason. The monetary policy of the country has been such that it has permitted the purchasing power of the dollar to become less and less as the years pass by. I have felt that perhaps it might be advisable to have some sort of escalator clause in all pension schemes whereby when an increase in the cost of living takes place the escalator clause will become operative. I am not prepared to say that it would be easy to write such a provision into a piece of legislation. I think it would require a terrific amount of research in order to accomplish it. However, under the present monetary policy that would be the fair thing to do because the combination of the depreciated dollar and the increased cost of living is something that is important to the living standards of the people of Canada who are on pension.

We who have been in public life for the last couple of decades recognize the importance of this matter. Civil servants who were retired some years ago were able to go to the grocery store and purchase enough groceries to make them feel that perhaps they had a fair pension. But when we consider the amount of their pensions in the light of the quantity of groceries they can buy today their pensions are pretty small because they will not buy very many groceries.

I had occasion at one of my meetings to have a chart indicating the amount of groceries that $10 would buy about 20 years ago compared with the amount of groceries of the same type that $10 will buy today. If you look at that picture it is a pretty grim one. Twenty years ago I suppose a man could buy a suit of clothes for $25 to $30, but go to your tailor or to a department store today and see how much you have to pay for a suit of clothes. A person is lucky if he can get a suit less than $65 and they run from there up to $100.

Take the matter of shoes. Some years ago a man could walk into a store and get a pretty good pair of shoes for about $4 to $6 but if you go into a store today and try to buy a pretty good pair of shoes what do you have to pay? You have to pay considerably more. I have a pair of shoes on my feet for which I paid $19, and I do not think they are particularly exceptional. Of course, being a small man I think I should get clothes and shoes cheaper than a bigger man because there is not as much leather goes into my shoes or cloth into my clothes as in the case of a bigger man, but I do not get any consideration in that respect. My clothes take about half as much wool cloth but I have to pay just as much for a suit.

When we think of the depreciated dollar and the cost of living for the pensioner today compared with a few years ago I say that that should give the government a terrific amount of concern. When the hon. member for Fort William introduced the resolution this afternoon he talked in terms of an allegory. He spoke of a shotgun hold-up. It is a good allegory indeed. If somebody should come up to you, stick a gun in your ribs and take half the contents of your pocketbook away from you you would say that was robbery and everybody would be out to catch the robber and put him in jail.

But let us follow the illustration further. Suppose a man now on pension was able to save a little stake during his working years which he thought he would be able to use in future years. Suppose he bought $5,000 worth of bonds or put $5,000 in the bank some years ago. Suppose he cached away in one form or another bonds or savings to the extent of $5,000 15 or 20 years ago. Suppose he takes the money out of the bank today and attempts to live on it. What do you suppose he is going to get for it? He is only going to get half what he would have got some years ago. In other words, the purchasing power of the money that he put away, whether in the form of savings, bonds or in a pension scheme, is only half as much today as it was before.

Somebody robbed him. Who was it who robbed him? He is not at present sitting on one of the front benches of this house. You cannot very well put him in jail, but certainly if somebody robbed with a gun you would put him in jail. That is where he belongs. He is a criminal. But what has happened? A financial policy which controls the amount of money in circulation and has an effect upon business—you can use what terminology you like; you can talk about inflation, deflation, or whatever you wish—has affected the cost of living. What has happened? The financial policy of the country has stolen half the pensioner's savings. That is a fact.

Who has been responsible for the financial policy of the country which has robbed the civil servant of half his income? Somebody is responsible for financial policy. The resolution advocates that mounted police pensions should be raised. I think we should bring in the mounted police for another purpose. We should bring them in to track down the real criminal so that we can put him in jail. If it happened to be the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) we would say to him, "Here, how is it that you have robbed the retired civil servant?" Oh, I know what he would say. He would say, "I have not robbed him of anything".

Somebody is in charge of the financial policy of the country. My hon. friend says, blame the Liberals. I think we could blame the Liberals because over the last 20 years they have been the ones who have been in charge of monetary policies. If they have not been in charge of the monetary policies of the country, then they had better say so. If the present finance minister is not in charge of the financial policies of the country, then he had better say so. If he says so, then we had better find out who is in charge of the financial policies of the country.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Hansell: I would not like to blame the parliamentary assistant for the monetary policy that has been pursued in Canada for the last 20 years. I will tell you what we will do, we will blame him if the financial policy of the country is not straightened out shortly. However, we cannot very well blame him for what has been happening over the past 20 years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter of monetary policy is something that you cannot ignore when you talk about this pension scheme. After all, you can raise the pension, but that does not solve the over-all problem. Who knows, if there is a continued rise in the cost of living over the next 10 years you will have to raise it again. On the other hand, if the cost of living should sink to a new low point, what are you going to do then? I do not believe anyone would want to take any money away from the pensioners. I say, therefore, what is needed is a financial policy that will create a steady level. I will not say it should be static, because I do not think you could have it static in the sense that you would have to have fixed prices and fixed controls throughout the country over a long period of time. I do not believe you could do it that way.

We believe we have a solution to this problem, and some day when we come to discuss actual monetary policy we hope to be able to suggest to the government how something can be done to remedy the situation of boom and bust, inflation and deflation. Then people who get an income in the future will know exactly where they stand. I had thought that perhaps something of that kind might be done at this session. At the opening of the session, therefore, I asked a question as the orders of the day were being called. I should like to read from page 17 of Hansard for October 15, 1957, the day after parliament opened. I rose and asked the following question:

> May I direct a question to the Prime Minister or the leader of the house. Would the government initiate a move to have a special parliamentary committee or even the banking and commerce committee meet to pursue a study of the reasons for the inflationary trend and the continued increase in the cost of living?
> Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this government, as always, will give consideration to anything for the benefit of the Canadian people.

Well, that is quite an answer, and of course I expected that there would be some applause forthcoming from our good Conservative friends.

An hon. Member: This is one of those frivolous questions.

Mr. Hansell: It is one of those frivolous answers, you mean. The question was a good one, because I asked it. This is followed in Hansard by something that is very significant. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) asked the following question:

> I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice. I should like to ask him, what is the difference between the attitude of the majority of your members now as compared to the attitude shown by the previous government and to which your members strenuously objected?
> Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not a question of attitude; it is a question of parliamentary rights.
>
> Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.
> Mr. Winch: As a supplementary question, may I ask the Prime Minister if he does not find there is a difference when the shoe is on the other foot?

I will not say anything about parliamentary rights because Mr. Speaker would be on his feet, but I would suggest that when you examine Hansard for the last two or three days you can see what has happened to parliamentary rights.

Mr. Winch: It was a good question.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, and I am glad my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver East, backed me up in that question to get something more from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The parliamentary assistant gave us a very excellent, well thought out speech this afternoon. He must have spent quite a bit of time in studying his subject, and we appreciate that. During his speech he referred to the previous finance minister and the attitude of that minister to the effect that you should not tax all the people to pay certain classes of pensioners who have been penalized by the decrease in the value of the dollar. Those are not his exact words, but that is the sentiment. I agree with that to some extent, but the irony of it is that the Minister of Finance, under whose department civil service pensions come, is the very man who sets the monetary policy of Canada which causes the value of the dollar to decrease. Now he turns around and says we should not tax everybody in Canada to pay one section of Canada's pensioners because they are unfortunate in the devaluation of the dollar.

However, the very government that is in charge of the civil service is also in charge of monetary policies throughout the country. The parliamentary assistant has stated that the government would give earnest consideration to all constructive suggestions. So far as I can see there are only two constructive suggestions. The first suggestion is to take the bull by the horns and raise the pension; that is about the best suggestion I could offer in view of present monetary policies. I am hoping the government will not delay taking action. Let us not have a lot of window dressing in this matter. Over the years we have heard a lot about the government being interested in anything that is for the benefit of the people of Canada. I know the government is because they are human like anyone else.

What we want is action now. The best assurance we can have of your sincerity and faith is that you take action now and not leave it for another ten years. This thing has been going along for a good many years now. We have been talking about this matter in this house for a good many years and it is time that some action was taken.

The other suggestion I have to make is this. Perhaps it would be a little bit more complicated, but I believe the government owes it to the people of Canada today to set up some sort of committee. I am not saying that they should set up a commission; this country is going to be burdened with commissions. I believe they should set up some sort of committee—we have a regularly constituted banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons—to go into a detailed study of the reason for the higher cost of living as it is reflected in monetary policy. By that I do not mean a committee or commission on price spreads. That is a very simple thing. It does not take into account the fact that there may be something wrong with monetary policy. Let the government have the banking and commerce committee go into a real study by calling in the bankers, the financial experts, the monetary reformers, the people who have any understanding of monetary policy whatsoever, with a sincere desire, not to protect a faulty policy, but to try to arrive at the reason why this present financial policy is not working.

I do not think I need to have anything more to say on that matter. I was talking with my colleague the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who is my desk-mate. He said to me, "You can raise the pension, something which would be a very good thing; but in the end it is only putting a patch on the old tire, because if you do not get to the root and the bottom of the trouble that is causing the tire to blow out, you will only have another blowout a little bit later on". Let us stop this patchwork business and let us get down to solid rock bottom in our effort to discover the reason why there is in the cost of living a fluctuation that is far too severe. Then we shall not have this repeated dog eat dog performance, because just as soon as you give some benefit to one, you have to give it to another and then some other organization comes along; everybody is out for his share, and there is not enough to go around under present monetary policy.

I will not say any more. The resolution should be passed. The problem should be solved. Since we now have a new government let us look forward in the hope that this new government is going to take some action to solve this problem, that it is going to be agreeable to the passing of this resolution and to hasten the legislation which will make the resolution effective.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. E. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain amount of deference that I venture to disagree with a member of such wide experience and broad humanity as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), but speaking for myself, I find that his resolution is too narrow in its proposed application, and that it is therefore inadequate.

In the course of my every day business I am constantly advising people—widows and dependants of those who are subject to inadequate pensions—and I might say, in particular, ministers of the cloth and preachers. I am certain there is no class of people in this country who are less well provided for in the matter of pensions than retired ministers and their dependants. These are people with whom everyone must have great sympathy. Their problems are great, and there is no one to whom they can turn for help. I think that when we are dealing with the matter of inadequate pensions, we should, however, look further into the causes in order to determine the reasons and remedy them.

One of the reasons why the pensions granted to civil servants some considerable time ago are low in the light of today's circumstances is that the government was at that time in the forefront in providing any pension at all for retiring civil servants, with the result that these pension schemes were very often set up without adequate contributions being made either from the employer or from the employee.

I know further that there are thousands of people in Canada contemporary with the civil servants with whom we are now dealing who have no provision for pension whatsoever, and also that there are many whose pensions are even less adequate than those of retired government civil servants. This, I think, is the first cause of the situation with which we are dealing now.

The second cause is the continual decline of the purchasing power of our money. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) suggested that this was a problem which had risen only in the last 30 years or so. Well, not many days ago I was reading a biography of Oliver Cromwell, and in that biography was a speech made by him some 300 years ago in the British House of Commons. The subject matter of that speech was the relationship of wheat prices to the purchasing power of the English currency at that time, and with a slight modernization of phraseology that speech could well have been made in this house last week.

There are many more people suffering from inadequate pensions than those covered by this resolution—teachers, librarians, municipal servants. In my own experience in municipal affairs I have many times had to deal with municipal employees pensions which were entirely inadequate to meet the need.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the present government and, indeed, the former government, have not been entirely unaware of this situation. Four times at least the problem of inadequate pensions and inadequate incomes resulting from the decreased purchasing power of our currency has been faced by the government. It was twice dealt with by the late government; first, when the universal old age pension without a means test was introduced and then later in 1957 when they increased the universal old age pension by $6. The situation has been twice faced by the present government; first, when the $9 increase in the universal old age pension was put into effect just recently and, secondly, in the undertaking by the present government to have a complete investigation made of a social security program for all our people based on need and the cost of living.

With all due deference to the hon. member for Fort William, I think that therein lies the real solution of the problem, because in my opinion, as the resolution stands, it is discriminatory. I think it is better to face the whole problem in a comprehensive fashion rather than to deal with one inadequacy and then to be faced with another.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate to this house the general sympathy which has been evoked by the motion of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). We were entertained in some way this afternoon by some of the statements he made in his rather powerful appeal to our emotions. I know that in the past the hon. member has had some rather harsh things to say about tobacco and its use, but this afternoon we were treated to some powerful words on just what sort of man we would have if he were deprived of his pipe. I feel the hon. member might have chosen some other thing of which to imagine a pensioner deprived rather than his pipe.

Seriously, the hon. member showed briefly but movingly some of the hardships which have fallen to the lot of some of our retired civil servants, but I feel that those observations would apply with equal force to others who have retired on pensions of any sort. I would ask: does this not also apply to people who have retired on savings, on rent from properties, or on annuities, even government annuities? They have seen their savings disappear as a result of inflation and other causes. I do not suggest we should say, as is said in the courts, that hard cases make bad law but I rather think that the problem of our retired people is oversimplified and overemphasized at times.

There is, it is true, a great deal of hardship, but I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. members of this house that the elderly people in Canada are not all in the same class. There are many people who have been frugal and who have saved, and they do not depend on pensions for subsistence. Indeed, if the conditions which have been indicated by the hon. member this afternoon were general, then this country would indeed be in a bad way because it would then appear that all our people who have reached the age of 65 or 70 have dissipated all they have ever earned in their productive years. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I know that that is not the case. We have groups of people, in varying percentages, who either because of circumstances beyond their control or because they have not been frugal enough or because they have been intemperate would now be faced with destitution if it were not for their pensions.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the general condition in this country and therefore I say that merely to emphasize the lot of these people and to point it up in eloquent terms such as we have heard may be somewhat misleading. We must deal with these particular cases. We have a responsibility and there I recognize the humanitarian interest of hon. members. We cannot let our neighbours be destitute. However, I am one of those who might take exception to what I consider to be somewhat of an oversimplification by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) when he spoke of the qualities of the ideal employer in that we are here singling out a particular group for treatment. There are many others in this position and I would suggest that the percentage of retired civil servants in this country who are dependent upon their pension as their sole means of subsistence is small compared to the rest of the retired population in this age group. What about those people who voluntarily put aside savings? What about those people who were not employed either by the civil service or in business where they might have been able to get a pension? What are we to do with them? They face the same problems.

I do not think it is right that we should consider only one group and consider all groups on a piecemeal basis. I feel we must give close attention to the entire question of retired civil servants, members of the police force and retired members of the armed services. Fortunately the number of retired service personnel is very few in number because before the war our regular armed forces were small in number. Nevertheless these people face the same problems. I cannot say that all find themselves in this position because some have been frugal and have been able to provide for themselves in their retirement years. Whenever it can be done people should be encouraged to make provision for their retirement years. We should be most careful not to lead our people to the point of view where upon reaching retirement age they say to their employer or to the state, "Here I am; now keep me." I think that is wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? Do I gather from what he is saying that he feels most people at age 65 or 70 who are in need are in that condition because they have not been frugal, not been temperate?

Mr. Lambert: Oh no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is he taking the same position with regard to pensions that was taken in another place by a couple of hon. gentlemen?

Mr. Lambert: Oh no, Mr. Speaker. I stated some time ago there may be circumstances completely beyond their control. I would say that the people who have not been frugal are probably the smallest number and fortunately so. I do not suggest for one moment that the people who are in need of their pensions today are in that position because they lacked frugality, but such people do exist. On the other hand there are people whose circumstances were such that they could not be expected to save to provide for their old age.

An hon. Member: Including retired civil servants.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then is the answer not universal pensions?

Mr. Lambert: No, Mr. Speaker, I feel the answer is not universal pensions. While the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Carleton must be given weight I also feel that the position I have stated must not be disregarded. It must be considered in the whole problem of determining pensions for various groups.

While the government of Canada may be considered in the position of an ideal employer yet an ideal employer in providing pensions for his employees does so from his own funds or the earnings of his business, be he an individual or be it a corporation. In either case they use their own funds to provide pensions. In the present instance we are discussing the utilization of public moneys for the benefit of a particular group of people and I say we must consider this in arriving at a solution to this problem. We have a responsibility not only to this particular group of people but to the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. McIvor: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, certainly.

Mr. McIvor: Do you think that the dominion government has any responsibility for civic pensions and teachers pensions? Do you not think we have dealt with the pensions for which the dominion government is responsible?

Mr. Lambert: At the moment I would not care to give the hon. member a categorical "yes" or "no" answer. I do not believe the question can be answered with a categorical "yes" or "no". However I agree to a large measure with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) who said that the low pensions we have today are in the main the result of low salaries that existed at the time these people were engaged and on which their pensions are based. I do not want hon. members to misunderstand me and conclude that I am opposed to the matter of inquiring into and increasing pensions where they are too low but I would like to draw the attention of the house to these factors which in my estimation must be considered in arriving at a just decision in these matters.

I would like hon. members to consider what might serve to alleviate some of the difficulties and remove the discrepancies which exist in the pensions which are the subject matter of this resolution and offer as a possible solution the suggestion of making a general change in the ten-year average by reducing it to a five-year average. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) indicated that there had been two rather substantial increases in pay in the civil service within the last two years. This has thrown the whole ten-year average scheme out of proportion. Those who retired over five years ago prior to these increases are now in receipt of the much lower pension because their base pay is proportionately lower. I feel there is true justification for inquiring into the situation prevailing in a particular group where there are discrepancies. You can readily understand that a civil servant who worked for 30 years received a pension of X dollars upon retirement ten years ago whereas a civil servant with the same number of years of service can retire today and receive X plus many dollars in the form of a pension. I do not think that is quite correct. I feel that the hon. member has a very good point in bringing the resolution forward at this time.

This proposal would certainly not take care of all the demands for increases in pensions of retired civil servants although, as I say, by removing some of the discrepancies and injustices within a particular group it would go to some considerable length in relieving the losses generally of those retired civil servants.

There are two particular items relating to retired civil servants about which I should like to speak. First of all, there is the subject which has been before this house on many occasions and, in particular, in 1953 when the superannuation act was under discussion here. It concerns a small group of civil servants who were members of the then department of soldiers civil re-establishment, the soldiers settlement board and treasury employees attached to the D.S.C.R. They are a small group of employees who are now in the main reaching retirement age. Because of some difficulties between government departments back in 1924 and 1925 agreement could not be reached that these veterans were permanent civil servants and they were still classified as temporary civil servants and were not able to elect as they should have been. Therefore, instead of being able to benefit from the 5-year average today they are unfortunately under the 10-year average. They never had a chance to elect through no fault of their own. I need not repeat the speeches that were made at that time by the Minister for Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks), the then leader of the opposition, the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), and many others on both sides of the house, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This is an anomalous condition which affects a number of men in my own riding and about whom I have made certain representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and I hope that with a new look at the problem these men who have given very valuable service to this country, and particularly to the returned men, will be able to benefit and enjoy the same rights that their confreres in other departments now enjoy.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to a matter arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the superannuation act. I have a constituent whose husband was a member of the mounted police back in 1922 when he transferred to the Alberta provincial police at its inception. One year later, during the discharge of his duty, he was shot down and died as a result of his wounds. There was then very meagre workmen's compensation legislation in our province. There were no pension provisions for members of the mounted police who died in the performance of their duties and this young widow had to fend for herself. For 32 years she has served as a special constable for the mounted police on escort duty under very arduous conditions. She has served as a matron particularly in the escort of mental patients, drunks, and what have you. This woman has been on call day and night over this period of 32 years. She is not on regular salary but is paid by the shift of so many hours per day's work. The mounted police authorities have been exceedingly kind and exceedingly considerate in keeping her employed in this way. Under workmen's compensation she drew the sum of $35 a month for many years. Now at the age of 67 she gets $60 a month.

However, last year, on her way to work one wintry night, she slipped and suffered severe injuries, breaking an arm or a shoulder. In any event, she has been incapacitated. Convalescence has been slow because of her age. She is not in condition really to discharge her duties as a police matron. After 32 years service there is at the present time no means of giving this exceedingly valorous and conscientious special constable, which she has been during all this time, a pension under the superannuation act. Mr. Speaker, I would humbly submit that such a case should deserve special consideration; that the people who are hired as special constables for a long period of time should somehow or other receive the same consideration as members of the force who are on a permanent basis.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that the principle of the resolution before us this evening is a good one, but I say that with this reservation. It covers a very small number of people, in fact, who actually are in dire necessity. I am not saying that a great number of people would not benefit by it and they would readily accept the benefit; but I say that when we are considering hardship cases we should not go from the particular to the general that because there are a limited number of cases we should apply the principle to the whole class. However, Mr. Speaker, I think the matter should be gone into as has been indicated by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). I again congratulate the hon. member for Fort William for having moved this resolution so that we can discuss it here tonight.

Mr. Jack Wratten (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time to take part in the debates of this house I should like to take this opportunity, although I know it is late, to congratulate you and your deputy on the fact that you have been elected to your high positions and also to extend congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on appointing a lady to the cabinet of this country. I know the ladies in my own riding were very pleased with the promise the Prime Minister made that if he formed the government there would be a lady in the cabinet. I know they are very happy over the selection of the lady member and we know she will do an excellent job.

The people of Brantford riding have sent many men to this house and we have to go back some few years to the last Conservative member who represented Brantford riding. I refer to Mr. Ryerson who, although he is now 85 years of age, still takes a very active interest in the happenings in and the debates of this house.

I hesitated to rise in my place and speak in this house because I learned a long time ago when I was first starting in municipal work that it is a good plan to sit back and listen to the other speakers and learn something about the rules and regulations governing the debates and the work of this house. In speaking to this resolution which we are debating tonight I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) for the very splendid address he made this afternoon. It was very comprehensive and was certainly well thought out.

I would like also to say a word to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I only wish I had his mind and could retain all the details of which he is capable and had his ability to get up and speak on as many subjects and as often as he does.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Wratten: I would like to speak for a few moments on the question of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, this force of men of whom we are very proud in this country and which we know constitutes one of the finest police forces in the world. We are all conscious of the glamour of their uniform and we all remember the stories we read as shall I say younger boys; we remember the stories written about the force by Ralph Connor, "Corporal Cameron", and "The Patrol of the Sundance Trail" in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are glorified. We all enjoyed those stories and the episodes recounted in them.

I was looking through the report of the commissioner today and I have seen that there are not many instances detailed therein of the work done by the force and of their bravery. I was, however, struck by one or two of the men mentioned by the commissioner. We have Constable Johnstone who entered a bank in response to an alarm and, after shooting three men, a fourth one came out and held up his hands. This constable was responsible for saving the money in that bank and preventing a hold-up. We also have another constable, Constable Ingalls, who received an award for saving a life in Gladstone, Manitoba. Then there is Sergeant Austin and Constable Ross who were highly commended for their excellent skill in aviation by taking an aircraft in flight and bringing it into Goose Bay, Labrador.

We have two more constables, McHale and Bowyer, who rescued a man from under tons of frozen gypsum and rocks at Windermere and also Constable Martin and Constable Millhouse who were commended for bravery they displayed during the flood operations in the Haney district of British Columbia.

It is therefore obvious that we still have men doing hazardous work in this force with very little publicity. The older men of the R.C.M.P. who did these valorous deeds in years gone by did not, of course, have the facilities of our men today. I am thinking of those men who used to be up north and who had to travel by dog team, by horse in winter and by canoe in the summer. Now we have modern equipment for them, airplanes, automobiles, helicopters. All of this is a far cry from the hardships which the older men endured when they looked after our far-flung borders in the north country.

I was fortunate enough to be able to procure information on half a dozen instances of the meagre pensions upon which some of these men had to retire. I have one instance before me of a man who gave 20 years service and who received a pension in 1937 of some $36 a month; another one who put in 14 years of service and received $34 a month; another constable who retired after giving 20 years service on a pension in 1929,—we all know, of course that 1929 was a peak year and had been for some considerable time, when wages were high,—but he was retired on less than $40 a month. Then we have another constable who gave 20 years service and in 1929 received a pension of $43; a sergeant who had put in 20 years service in 1928 was retired on $48 a month. Another staff-sergeant—somewhat higher in rank—having put in 20 years of service received $51 a month. So hon. members will see that a number of the older men who are still alive are today receiving these low pensions. They are certainly not burdened with a lot of money when it comes to pensions.

When considering the scale recently put forward for pensions payable in the R.C.M.P. under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act we notice that they have been considerably increased over the period from 1937 to 1957 and we agree that a constable or an officer of the R.C.M.P. who retires now is fortunate enough to receive a fairly adequate pension. He will receive one upon which he will be able to get along and look after himself, so I do feel that our older men should certainly receive the consideration of this house. They do deserve it and should be brought up to a point where they can live decently, without needing to go out and work after having given years of service on the hazardous work on which they have been engaged.

I know we are not discussing pensions other than those of the R.C.M.P. and the civil servants today but I wonder if I might be allowed to deviate for a moment. I am also concerned about the pensions in some of the industries in my home town. After all, these people of whom I am thinking are the ones who are paying the taxes in order to provide for the pensions we are discussing today. I mention in particular the textile workers in our city. These people belong to the poorest paid group in my city, due to the hard conditions under which the factories are running and the competition with which they are faced.

I am also concerned with the old age pensioners who, through no fault of their own, are living, and indeed have to live, strictly on the old age pension which we are paying today through the federal government, with the help of the Ontario government. In my experience in the municipal field I have had these old age pensioners come to me time after time wondering how they were going to pay their taxes, buy their groceries, pay for their fuel and live on the small amount available to them. Fortunately another promise of this government has been kept and they are now receiving a much better pension than they had a year ago or two years ago. It will certainly be a great help to them in order to enable them to buy the necessities of life.

The reason I mention these different groups is that no matter how much we reserve for these pensions for the civil service and the R.C.M.P. the money will have to come from one pocket only and that is the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer. No matter whether they are paying income tax, which we have been discussing recently, or not they still pay their share in other taxes such as sales tax, etc. I would suggest that thought and consideration be given by the government to these pensioners, bearing in mind that we all share in the cost thereof.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this house owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for having persevered in bringing forward this resolution year after year. I do hope that the government will bring in legislation to take care of increases in the pensions of civil servants and the R.C.M.P.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Broome: I can think of no finer tribute that could be paid to a grand old man who has well and truly served his country and this house.

When I was first elected, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter which reads as follows:

> When you go to Ottawa at the next session of parliament, I hope you will look into the plight of R.C.M.P. service pensioners—those who retired before the numerous increases were granted to serving members.
> In my own case, I retired in 1947 on a pension of $82.40 per month, which in those days was not bad but now increased costs of living have made the pension insignificant, and I feel that all R.C.M.P. service pensioners under $100 per month are due for revision upwards.

I did see the commissioner and discussed this with him and he gave me the address of the veterans' organization for the R.C.M.P. They sent me a brief. In my opinion, the R.C.M.P. pension scheme is perhaps the most unsatisfactory pension scheme in existence. Going back to this same case, it concerns a man who joined the force in 1925, became a corporal and retired in 1947. His pension is twenty-four fiftieths of his pay, that is one-fiftieth for each year of service. In 1947, the pay and allowances for a corporal in the R.C.M.P. amounted to $2,060 per year, and this resulted in the pension of $82.40 mentioned before. Since 1947 normal increases have come about which, the brief says, amounted to 70 per cent but according to the information I received from the commissioner amounted to more than that. Today a corporal would receive in pay and allowances $4,800 a year, as compared with the $2,060 in 1947. The job is the same, the risk is the same, the qualifications are the same, but the man who served at the time when wages were low suffers now because of the low pension he receives. He gets it going and coming.

Under the present wage scale the pension would appear to be adequate, but the pension for those who retired in the early years is totally inadequate. The thing which amazes me is that when these advances were made in wages of the R.C.M.P., the government of that day did not amend the pensions in a similar manner. It would appear that if you were to tie the pension to the going rate of pay you would automatically increase the pension when the pay was increased. The trouble, of course, is that in industry you have collective bargaining between employees and employers. There is a continuous pressure from the men for increases, and a withholding on the part of management to keep the increases at as reasonable a level as possible or as low as possible. In so far as civil servants and the R.C.M.P. are concerned, you do not have that force on the part of the men concerned because they are truly civil servants. They may submit briefs and so on, but they cannot take any more drastic action than that. It is, therefore, rather natural, although regrettable, that their wages lag behind the wages of other people across the country.

As I say, I think this illustration gives the picture in about as clear a manner as possible. When this man retired in 1947 the salary level was $2,000 and today people doing the same job are receiving $4,800. There is something wrong there. I was most interested when the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) was saying that there was no argument against this today. I would say there was no argument against it in previous years, either. I suffer from the handicap of not knowing what was said in previous sessions, so I do not know whether or not the previous governments took the fair minded attitude that has been taken by the government representative today, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The previous government promised to study the matter.

Mr. Broome: Well, I would say it was a very lengthy study and did not do very much for the pensioners concerned. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gave a few figures which struck me as being almost fantastic. He said there were 393 civil servants retired who would receive less than $20 per month pension and 4,395 widows who would receive less than $50 per month and that would represent 64 per cent of those who were pensioned. When you hear such figures as those, you know that the time is long past when this problem should be solved.

At the same time, however, one must remember that the government has had a very full program of legislation this session; that they have had a lot of work to do and a lot of getting used to, and you cannot expect, as the hon. member for Ottawa West seems to expect, that Rome can be built in a day or everything that is requested can be accomplished overnight. I sincerely believe that the government is considering this matter, and not with a view to bringing out a report but with a view to introducing legislation to correct this situation in a manner that will keep it corrected. How this will be done I do not know, but it can be done. I am quite confident that it will be done.

The sort of things that happen when you work for the government are peculiar to say the least. For instance, this brief contains a section which deals with the widows of R.C.M.P. veterans. If I may read from it, it says:

—permission is granted for the payment of a gratuity to the widow of a member who dies while serving with the force, said gratuity to be equal to two months pay, provided that the deceased member had two years' service in the R.C.M. Police or has that length of service to his credit for pension purposes under the R.C.M. Police Act—

Now, listen to this:

—and was married in accordance with the R.C.M. Police rules and regulations.

I do not know whether or not they are different from those for ordinary marriages, but this is one of the conditions. If a retired member of the force dies, the widow has an immediate stoppage of pension. For example, if the ex-member died on the 7th day of the month his widow would be required to refund the balance or 23 days pension payment previously received. Now, I contend that we have to watch and be strict guardians of the public money, but I do not think that the public asks us to guard their money that strictly. As I said, according to the present rates of pay the pensions are not too bad, but it is the position of the members who retired in the early days that is causing distress, and these men are getting older all the time.

I would hate to think that ex-civil servants or ex-members of the R.C.M.P. who between now and the time legislation will be brought in, may be suffering want and hardship because this matter has been delayed from year to year.

There is nothing political in this matter. It is simply a question of what is the fair thing to do, that is fair to the ex-members of the finest police force in the world and to the ex-members of an honest and honourable civil service, a civil service which has given this country wonderful service as minister after minister has testified. I am not talking about the top bracket civil servants. I am thinking of the chap who brings your mail and others all the way through. They are all fine people.

I have more sympathy for the man on the low income who has retired. I cannot find myself crying over the fact that a deputy minister's pension is not $2,000 more. I am thinking of these people who were mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, those on $20, $50 and $75. Those are the people that I think we should look after. We should give justice to the other people too but these people really need it and are entitled to it.

I would therefore say that this is not a political matter. It is simply a matter of how best to do it so that it is not a patchwork job, so that it is done with the interests of the recipients at heart, with due care for the financial costs as well and with the implementation of the way that the pension can be managed. I do not see anything that presents too great difficulty. I believe it can be done. I think it must be done carefully, but I think that it cannot be delayed. I think that work must be started on it as soon as possible. I hope that in the next session the government will be bringing forward legislation along the line indicated in this most admirable resolution.

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with those who have expressed their admiration for the persistence which is reflected in the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) in bringing forward year by year this resolution and at the same time to join with those who feel that in this wording the resolution probably was not wide enough and might have included, for example, employees of the C.N.R., another government agency. At the same time I am sure he must have experienced the same frustration that members on this side of the house have felt when they were sitting to the Speaker's left when they found that they could not nudge the past administration into doing something about this rather desperate situation that has been described to the house today with regard to our civil service and the R.C.M.P.

This is one occasion—and probably they will be rare in this house—when I find myself disposed to agree with my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who admires my constituency of Winnipeg South so much that he resides in it and is one of my constituents, so I understand. I would not suggest for a moment that he was disposed to vote for me. However, I have admired his demeanour in the house and his apparently inexhaustible knowledge of the rules which has been displayed to the extent of thousands of lines in Hansard in the last few days.

It is alarming to realize that as early as 1947 he started his inquiries on behalf of the civil service and was given the typical answer from the treasury bench to the effect that the matter was under consideration, and here we are 20 years later still looking at the same problem. The implication, of course, is that we on this side of the house, so many of us here for the first time, should endeavour to the best of our ability to see that this matter is remedied without too much further delay. I think we can be grateful to the hon. member for Fort William, particularly those of us who are sitting on the back benches and who are freshmen—indeed, one hon. member made his baptismal speech in this house this evening on this problem and did it extraordinarily well—for bringing to our attention at an early stage the desperate need of part of our R.C.M.P. and civil service.

I was interested in the brief which was submitted by the civil service association of Ottawa who, in a canvass of some of these civil servants, more particularly perhaps those 393 with a shocking pension of less than $20 a month, received letters by way of reply with such remarks as the following:

Forced to give up long term accommodation in apartment block when rent went from $30 to $83 a month.

Had to give up my apartment for two rooms in private home.

We have bought virtually no clothing since retirement and buy lower quality food.

By dint of frugal living and careful handling of our affairs, we manage to get by.

I cut on clothing and recreation, not food, which I consider necessary for my health.

When you get replies of that kind to a canvass of ex-government employees, it is apparent that there must be many of them who are caught between the ages of 65 and 70, with perhaps a homestead which provides them with sufficient assets to remove their eligibility for a pension between the ages of 65 and 70 by way of a means test, and so for those five years they are in a position where they must live on these very frugal pensions and look forward eagerly, I am sure, to the day when they reach the age of 70 and can become eligible to receive the old age pension.

If we look at the situation as it has developed over the past 20 years we can cite, for example, the fact that prices have doubled. The consumer price index has gone from 63.2 to 123.3. The price levels in 1957 are two-thirds higher than they were in 1945 and 25 per cent higher than they were in 1949. One hundred dollars in 1939 was worth $84.78 in 1945, $57.78 in 1950 and $52.12 in 1957. Those pensioners, that large group of over 4,000 receiving less than $50 a month, are actually receiving only something in the neighbourhood of $25 or $26 a month, which would make living almost impossible without supplementary income by way of savings or by way of individual initiative in developing income of their own by taking in roomers if they still have their homesteads or taking in nursing patients if they are eligible to do so under the bylaws of the municipality in which they live; and many of them do this.

At the same time many of them are not qualified by the nature of the employment they had in the civil service, and it is in the group of older people who had lower civil service incomes that I am sure there is the majority of the distress. If we take, for example, a clerk grade 3 we find that he would receive in 1939 a pension of $1,134. In 1945, that pension would be worth $955; in 1950 the same pension would be worth $696 per annum, and in 1957 a mere $581. How can this be regarded as a satisfactory annual pension after the recipient has put in long years of service to the government? It is quite obvious it would be impossible for any person to get by on such an amount, quite apart from the case of two persons who are married.

Only two provinces in Canada have done something to provide supplementary pensions for their employees, and those are the provinces of Saskatchewan and Newfoundland. However, even private enterprise has recognized the desperate need of some of its pensioners, and several large companies have reviewed their entire pension plan in recent years and made provision for awarding an across the board increase to those pensioners who had been longest on pension, yet who have given many years of loyal and faithful service to their companies, service which is being properly recognized by the award of an increase.

According to the brief submitted by the Ottawa civil service association, two steps may be taken. The first is to bring pensions into line with the cost of living, which they estimate would cost $3 million, and the second is to tie future increases to the increases in salaries of civil servants presently in the employ of the federal government. The association estimates that for every one per cent increase in the salaries of civil servants it would cost an additional $230,000 per year.

Now the other suggestion which is of interest to me because it would not disturb the existing legislation was the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that as an interim measure retired civil servants who are receiving very low pensions should be provided with a supplementary amount of money to bring them up to an absolute across the board basic minimum, as a fixed amount. If this were done by way of a supplementary estimate these retired civil servants would be provided with a measure of relief almost immediately which they would not otherwise receive if we went too deeply into the legislation itself and perhaps committed ourselves to a long period during which the matter would be under consideration, such as was the experience of the opposition over the period 1947-1957, those deliberations being, in the end, without success. Despite this, the brief of the civil service association of Ottawa does suggest that the actuarial balance of the fund might be maintained and I quote:

> In assessing the impact of such additional payments on the superannuation fund, it should be noted that $20.4 million was paid out in pensions in the fiscal year 1955-56. The proposed increase would therefore amount to about 15 per cent of present pension payments. Revenues of the fund amounted to $96 million in 1955-56, including $32.1 million in employee contributions, $32.5 million in employer contributions, and $30.9 million in interest. As a result, the year's surplus on operations of $70.7 million increased the superannuation fund to $804 million as of 1 April, 1956.

Then on page three, at appendix (b), they said, and I quote again:

> If the CSAO's first recommendation were implemented, it is estimated that the second recommendation would cost $230,000 a year for a one per cent general salary increase as far as those now on pension are concerned. The capitalized value of the sums involved for those now on pension might be about $2.3 million for a one per cent salary increase. An additional $1.8 million might be required to safeguard the real value of the pensions of those civil servants retiring within the next ten years.
> In view of the $70 million surplus on the superannuation fund's annual operations, as mentioned above, it would appear that the CSAO's first proposal, involving an additional $3 million, could well be implemented without increasing the 6 per cent contribution rate now in force. It would also appear that the second proposal—to safeguard future pension values—could be implemented without raising the contribution rates as long as the ratio of pensioners to employees, currently at about 1 to 11, does not drop below 1 to 6—a situation difficult to envisage.

The reason I put these quotations on record is because an actuarial analysis has apparently been made by the civil service, and from the contents of the brief it would appear that what they are seeking can be implemented without upsetting the actuarial balance of the present fund. It seems most unlikely to me that the ratio of pensioners to employees, one to eleven, at present, would ever drop below one to six. We know this is likely to be so because the number of civil servants required by the state is increasing every day. It is bound to increase with the increase in the population of our country, with the national defence situation as acute as it is at the present time, and with the increase in our social security measures. As an alternative to the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I would recommend that the suggestion of the civil service association of Ottawa be seriously examined.

We should never forget when discussing pension problems that we have the large numbers of people across the country who have been self-employed on moderate incomes all their working lives. Perhaps they have operated as the sole proprietors of small businesses and raised and educated families. In their twilight years they have looked into their bank accounts and safety deposit boxes to find that while they have been great contributors to the welfare of the nation over the years and indeed have provided employment for perhaps two or three other people they have not got on hand the assets to tap which in their youth they hoped to have when the sun began to set on their period of productivity. This is due in part to inflation and sometimes to medical or hospital expenses or a number of other things.

When I think of people in this position I think of fishermen, farmers and professional people. I cannot resist placing on record the admiration I have for the individuality, initiative and forward for Canada spirit they have displayed over the years and I sympathize with them. In some vocations such as fishing and farming it may not be possible at age 60 to do what can be done by those of comparable age in office jobs. Some of these people may have had to sell their farms or fishing boats and perhaps look to spending their declining years in a small cottage in the city and feeling self-satisfied that they have perhaps put aside a nest egg of $10,000. In this day and age regardless of how well it is invested a nest egg of this amount can never return sufficient supplementary income without encroaching on capital to provide them with an adequate living particularly between ages 65 and 70. Because they have put aside that nest egg by dint of hard work they will not be eligible for pension between 65 and 70 and in all likelihood before reaching age 70 will have exhausted these moneys and in many instances have to resort to a pension on the means tests which is something extremely disturbing to a man who has stood on his own feet throughout his lifetime.

When thinking of such people you can in your mind's eye travel into Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia to visualize the fisherman and you can in your mind's eye travel across the country to visualize the farmers and readily sympathize with their position and remember the fact that there is no government insurance plan providing for their later years; and while you can forward and support this resolution, as I do, I think it is essential that we keep these other people in mind at the same time.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate late in the day to make one or two observations and also to point out what must be apparent now to the reverend and hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). The crowning irony of his parliamentary career is that one of the things held dearest to him should have found more support among people whom he has opposed during his political career than it has apparently found among his ostensible friends.

I listened this afternoon to various members refer to the record of previous administrations in respect of the efficacy of increased pensions and superannuation payments to federal civil servants and other employees of the federal government. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will recall the answer he received on a previous occasion when discussing this subject and if not I will refresh his memory by referring him to page 469 of Hansard of February 17, 1947, ten years and ten months ago today—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I quoted that question this afternoon.

Mr. Morris: —on which occasion in response to the hon. member's question as to whether consideration had been given by the government to increasing the pensions of superannuated federal civil servants by the addition of a cost of living bonus or other supplement the then parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance said that the question was still receiving consideration and the government's policy would be announced in due course. I refer to the quotation this evening only to point out again to the hon. member for Fort William and to others in this house that this parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance ten years ago apparently had a somewhat different attitude toward this question than has the parliamentary assistant to the present Miniser of Finance who spoke this afternoon.

There have been many debates over the years on this problem. We on this side of the house and particularly the junior members feel that the former administration deliberately stalled on this question of increased payments to superannuated and pensioned federal civil servants. We believe this because we believe that when the gentleman who was the leader of the Liberal party at the time of the question to which I referred came into this house he set the example in Canada of someone seeking a political career from a place in the civil service. We notice that this habit has been followed in that party since that time and is likely to be followed again. Sir Wilfrid Laurier could hardly have guessed the consequences of appointing to the civil service a partisan at once so able and so ambitious who built up a personal power complex based on his affiliations in the civil service.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of the young and new members of the House of Commons who feel that we have a special moral responsibility to federal government employees. With all due respect to some of my colleagues who have expressed other opinions on the subject —we are all entitled to our private opinions as backbenchers in this party—I feel that we cannot exercise a strong position of moral suasion in respect of other pensions for other workers in Canada and we cannot advocate a greater justice for them if we deny by incaution or inactivity a greater justice for federal government employees.

What are the facts concerning retired federal civil servants? On February 13, 1957, just prior to the last debate in this house on this question which took place on March 4, the then minister of finance was asked what was the highest monthly pension paid by the government of Canada to which he replied $875. That was the highest pension paid on that date.

He was asked how many were receiving pensions of $1,000 a month or over. He replied, none. He was asked how many were receiving pensions between $500 and $999, and he replied, 28. He was asked how many were receiving pensions between $100 and $499 a month and he said, 7,067. He was asked how many were receiving pensions of between $40 and $99 a month and he said, 8,618. He was asked how many were receiving pensions of less than $40 a month and he said, 5,644.

When you look at the averages the case is even worse. The average of the 7,067 former federal civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Policemen receiving pensions of between $100 and $499 a month on February 13 last was not $499; it was $165.59. The average for the group receiving between $40 and $99 a month—that is the average for the 8,618 retired federal civil servants and retired R.C.M.P. receiving gross annual pensions of $480 to $1,088 a year—was only $67.61 a month. The average for the 5,644 getting less than $40 a month was $21.03 a month.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has been a long-time advocate of this resolution and who must now, I think, look forward with more expectation than he has in the past for some remedial action, took part in the debate on March 4, 1957, when this matter was last discussed. At that time he alluded to a table which appeared in Hansard on February 1, 1956, which I should like to read lest anyone think this is a political matter. Indeed, we on this side of the house feel that it may have been delayed in action because it was not notoriously a politically successful advocacy.

Eighteen months ago there were 79 retired civil servants in Newfoundland and 26 widows. In my province of Nova Scotia there were 487 retired civil servants and 241 widows. In Prince Edward Island there were 64 retired civil servants and 37 widows. In New Brunswick there were 307 retired civil servants and 199 widows. In Quebec there were 2,264 retired civil servants and 1,326 widows. In Ontario there were 5,830 retired civil servants and 3,030 widows. In Manitoba there were 616 retired civil servants and 275 widows. In Saskatchewan there were 324 retired civil servants and 121 widows. In Alberta there were 531 retired civil servants and 240 widows. In British Columbia there were 2,159 retired civil servants and 757 widows, and residing elsewhere than in those 10 stated provinces there were 341 retired civil servants and 206 widows. Therefore, the total of the population receiving superannuation payments in respect of federal government service is approximately 13,000 civil servants and 6,000 widows, spread almost evenly across the country in relation to population.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we must recall in this matter some factors which I have not heard mentioned so far during the debate today. As I remarked earlier, I believe we have a moral responsibility as legislators in a federal parliament to attend to the need of federal government employees before attempting to convince or persuade other persons that they should do better than we are. We must also remember, Mr. Speaker, that federal civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not have in years gone by and do not have today the same bargaining rights as other industrial and manufacturing employees. We must also recall that unless there is some assurance of some reasonable equation between purchasing powers in one year and purchasing powers in subsequent years, unless there is some reasonable assurance of some equity in purchasing powers, then all time contracts are going to be substantially meaningless and if we contract with a civil servant to pay him a superannuation based, for instance, upon a customs collector in 1937 receiving $2,620 a year from the civil service —now his salary is $5,200—if he retired at a wage of $2,620 averaged over a period immediately prior to his retirement, then his superannuation is certainly not going to be sufficient to keep him in the manner in which he expected it would when he retired on superannuation which he thought sufficient.

We do not think that this issue of pensions for retired civil servants and Royal Canadian Mounted Policemen can be or should be divorced from the whole area of the public service. What is it that the majority of us on this side of the house wish?

Mr. Peters: Talk the bill out.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is not a bill; it is a resolution.

Mr. Morris: I did not hear the interjection, but I hope the remark was "talk the bill out". I hasten to draw attention to the fact that it is not a bill at all; it is a resolution. But if we do this, it will be no different from what has been done in years gone by. The minister of finance talked it out the last time it was up.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought we had a change on June 10.

Mr. Morris: You have been given a reasonable assurance today, and surely you have seen it in the attitude of the Conservative backbenchers that an entirely different attitude obtains toward this question. You and I have both heard here in this House of Commons the Minister of Finance say that it would deserve an entirely different attitude, and today the parliamentary assistant said that it would get a different attitude.

Mr. Byrne: Let us vote on it, then.

Mr. Morris: We on the back benches of this party seek a civil service neither of rulers nor of party retainers. If we do not treat retired civil servants adequately it will affect the whole morale of the active public service. We seek a public service of educated, enlightened and above all disinterested advisers, not only disinterested from the Liberal party but disinterested from our party. We want them to be able to bring to bear upon the consideration of public questions the thought and the energy of cultivated men and women, free entirely of partisan zeal not only for our opponents but for us, and undisturbed by personal or political ambition. We do not want to see a premium put upon the civil service as a springboard, as Mr. Mackenzie King and some of his followers used it for political gain. We want, in short, a civil service which will be free from those two great perverters of mankind, fear and gain. If it is to be freed of gain then we think we should take action to relieve its retired members from fear.

(Translation):

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, so far nobody has spoken in French on so important a subject as the pension of civil servants and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As a Canadian of French origin and as a Conservative member, I am particularly pleased to speak on behalf of French-speaking citizens who are in the employ of the government to ask for a better deal for government pensioners.

I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity to speak on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). As a representative in the house of a riding made up for the most part of working people, I am in a position every day to see that many of them, in their declining years do not receive the fair reward which they are entitled to expect. I realize that it might be difficult for certain private firms to provide a fair pension for all their employees, but I honestly believe that in this respect, the government of Canada should set the example.

As a matter of fact, the government of Canada grants a pension to all its employees. What the former government has forgotten is that those pensions, when the standard of living rises, become inadequate. The Conservative government have shown, from the beginning of this session, that they intend to straighten the matter and allow government pensioners to enjoy a larger share of the income, thus placing them in a more adequate position in relation to our economy.

Older people, the disabled, the crippled and the veterans have now been given a substantial increase of pension. Our civil servants should receive the same treatment.

The civil servants who are now in the employ of the Canadian parliament draw a fair salary and are able, through appropriate deductions, to secure a reasonable pension for the future. It might be argued that the cost of living has reached such a high level under the former government that it can hardly get higher in the future.

However, the problem becomes crucial when it involves former civil servants and members of the R.C.M.P. These people have given long years of service to the state and retired at a time when salaries happened to be lower, and because deductions were necessarily less their pension is smaller too.

The rate of this pension might have seemed reasonable at the time these employees were retired, but the problem remains the same; the cost of living has gone up considerably and so have salaries, but the pensions of these civil servants and members of the R.C.M.P. have remained the same.

We, the younger members, know how useful civil servants can be to us. From the humblest messenger boy to the heads of departments, they all put themselves devotedly at our disposal. We are supported by conscientious employees who serve us regardless of our political affiliation and of our inexperience, and treat us all equally well. I am very pleased to pay this tribute to these gallant associates before the hon. members of this house. Even if I have not had the pleasure of working with the former civil servants, I know that they were always conscientious and did their utmost to be of service to the representatives of the people in this house.

Ever since the inception of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, its members have been known as men of great courage, with an upright conscience and devoted to the point of heroism.

The risks and hardships of their occupation have always existed. I daresay they were even greater fifty years ago than they are today because communications were more difficult, relations between various groups of the country were less friendly and facilities less developed. These brave constables have always worked hard at their duties, at tracking down criminals and at maintaining order in the heart of this country as well as in its most isolated areas.

Like everybody else they received a salary but, admittedly, at a rate which corresponded to the economic development of the country at the time.

Today these men are too old to work. They have left the force and taken their pension but they have to pay twice as much to buy the necessities of life. We should do more for those defenders of law and order. I am therefore happy to request on their behalf a revision of their pension scales.

The Conservative party has been among the defenders of the civil servant and consequently of the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who are also employees of the Canadian government. We have said so on more than one occasion and my predecessors, the Conservative members of this house, were always among the first, when they sat in opposition, to come to the help of government employees. I will not run counter to this policy, as I feel confident that the Conservative government will leave nothing undone to adjust those pensions, in fairness to these men and women who have spent long years of their life in the service of the government of their country and who richly deserve at this time that account be taken of their welfare.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, we are specifically dealing this evening with the victims of inflation who come directly under government control. I think we should also cast our eyes to wider and further horizons and should consider the matter of inflation as it affects other employees as well. Before I get into a couple of specific remedies which I would like to put to the house for its consideration, may I seize this opportunity, sir, of complimenting you and your deputies upon your election to preside over the affairs of this house. In the brief time this parliament has been in session, you have shown by your fairness, your courtesy and by that wonderful sense of humour, what a proper officer of parliament should be. I feel, sir, that you have kept the house reasonably free from the excesses of the maidens now sitting in opposition and who used to sit on the treasury benches and also, to be fair, from the excesses of the maidens who now sit on the treasury benches and who used to be in opposition.

I am sorry I was not in the house this afternoon to hear the beginning of this debate. We on the external affairs committee are keeping hours that are almost rivalling those maintained by this house. It seems to me the remedy that we consider should be considered in the light of the fact that government has two aspects. The first aspect of government to keep in mind in a debate like this is that the government is an employer, either itself or through the medium of crown corporations. The second aspect of government to bear in mind is the broader sense of the conduct of the affairs of the nation that touch on the lives of all Canadians. Now, could we solve the one problem, the lowered purchasing power of the civil servants and the retired mounted police officers, I ask, without being unfair to the others? Since I was not here, I do not know if any information was presented as to what industry has done to solve the problem for those who retired on pension during the years 1930 to 1940.

However, I believe we do have an immediate remedy at hand for those under our direct control, that is the civil servants and R.C.M.P. who have retired. I believe that was set forth this afternoon in the remarks, which unfortunately I did not hear, of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). Now, sir, inflation points out the need for some remedy which can adjust itself to the disease. The remedy needed is one which has, at least, the factor of growth. This evening we were told by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) that the dollar today is worth about 50 per cent of what it was 18 years ago. I draw a parallel between the loss of purchasing power of these pensions and the losses in other fields as a result of inflation. I think, for example, of insurance investment. The life insurance dollar has certainly not done the job we would like it to do and that is because inflation has knocked down its value. If $10 were invested in 1946, and that was the first touch the insurance agent made upon me, it is probably worth about $6 or $7 today.

The difficulty, as I see it, with pensions and with insurance investments is that those are the orthodox type of investments and subject to very strict dominion and provincial laws. These investments are restricted pretty well on the security side, that is things like bonds and mortgages, rather than the equity side, that is the ownership of shares. Shares, as we know, can adjust themselves as capital appreciates in value, and the shares will go up in value too. I should like to make this suggestion, if I may, so we can come to grips perhaps with the larger problem that confronts us, not only the one so ably put forward by the hon. members for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but the problem of the people outside who are not retired civil servants or R.C.M.P. Perhaps we should relax the present laws so that pensions may be related to appreciation or growth, or call it inflation if you will.

Another possible remedy, which might sound rather radical, and certainly one that would have to be given a great deal of consideration—I think of it offhand, and I am not particularly wedded to the idea—is a tie-in somewhere of rents to the matter of pensions. Rents will go up in good times. They are certainly a more correct barometer or index to financial growth, as anyone who has had his rent raised will appreciate, than the more orthodox type of investment to which pensions are now anchored. The solution may be to turn the pension fund into some form of housing development on the equity side. I thank the house for its consideration.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Dinsdale: —to sit in the house on a good many occasions when this resolution has been debated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not your maiden speech.

Mr. Dinsdale: As I rose to speak, I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) say that this is not my maiden speech. I would inform the hon. member that the reason I have been delayed in making my contribution today is because there were certain members anxious to make their maiden speeches on this very important subject. In former years I have not taken part in this discussion because I felt there was very little prospect of getting action on the matter under the former administration. I should like to assure the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who has sponsored this resolution, that I have always been heartily in favour of the sentiment contained therein.

I rise tonight, Mr. Speaker, because as I listened to the discussion, and I followed most of it today, I felt that for the first time it would appear that we are going to get somewhere in regard to the implementation of this resolution. I thought the contribution of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) was especially forthright and left no uncertainty at all concerning the attitude of the present administration to this difficult problem. I quite appreciate that it is a complex problem. He outlined the consideration that had been given already and indicated that rather than any delaying action the minister, the parliamentary assistant and the officials of the finance department are giving it the most urgent and anxious consideration possible.

The hon. member for Fort William and myself have often been allied in worthwhile causes of this kind and this was another reason for my desire to say a few words at this time, to vocally express my admiration for his contributions to the many topics discussed in this house during the long years he has sat here, and also to indicate my personal support for this particular recommendation.

This resolution refers only to two categories affected by the general problem of pensioners at this time. He refers to the civil servants and to the members of the R.C.M.P. I want to take this opportunity to mention another category of pensioner that is most severely affected by the inflationary trends of recent years. It is a group who come under the old militia pension act. It is not a large category. As a matter of fact, my special interest in this resolution arises from just a few cases of the kind that exist in my constituency.

I have had one or two former members of the permanent force retired under the old militia pension act who have been contacting me regularly with reference to this difficulty. I have made certain representations in writing to the minister of finance in years gone by. No action was taken because of the general tendency to postpone action on this problem. However, I am presenting this special aspect of the difficulty tonight, hoping that the comprehensive considerations that were outlined by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will be broad enough to extend to this category as well as the others. These people, while not so numerous as the civil servants generally or even the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are suffering under the same financial disability.

In reference to a problem of this kind there immediately arises the question as to where the necessary financial resources are coming from in order to implement this recommendation. The hon. member for Fort William, in his usual forthright manner presented the thought that perhaps a special tax on tobacco and liquor might solve the difficulty. It is true that those two particular commodities yield a substantial percentage of our tax returns. As a matter of fact, I remember that a former minister of finance—I refer to Hon. Douglas Abbott—who was a non-smoker himself when questioned on this point or whenever he was offered a cigarette, his invariable reply was, "I don't smoke 'em; I just tax 'em". It is true that tobacco as well as liquor has yielded a high rate of tax return.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Fort William that funds sufficient to meet the increased public expenditure required for bringing up the depressed position of civil servants and mounted police and the other categories into line with the prevailing cost of living could be derived from this one source. But after listening to the parliamentary assistant this afternoon, I am quite sure that he and his associates are dealing with the broader aspects in this regard and that they will be able to come up with a suitable solution.

I do not want to prolong this discussion unduly tonight, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two more minutes and you have done your job.

Mr. Dinsdale: As I have indicated, I have never had an opportunity previously to speak on this matter. There is only one further point that I should like to make at this time. The point has been made tonight that the unfortunate circumstances in which our retired civil servants find themselves are the result of inflationary trends. I feel that statement is only partially true. We have been beset with what is called creeping inflation where prices and wages, at least in the last 20 years, have been rising continuously whereas those on fixed incomes feel themselves to be remaining at the stationary level. In other words, it almost appears that management and labour today enjoy the benefits of an escalator provision in the economy. I know it is not put there in a formal way but the trend has been for labour and management, in terms of wages and prices, to be on a very exhilarating escalator ride whereas those on fixed incomes, such as those whom we are discussing tonight, find themselves in a static and relatively depressed position.

But that is not the only cause of the difficulty of those whom we have been discussing here today. It arises from the fact that they were retired in a period when wages and pensions were comparatively low. As a matter of fact, the whole idea of pensions in anticipation of future retirement and the natural needs of future retirement were only in the infancy of development. Today we have established systems of pensions in private enterprise, in government, in all the walks of life, that are actuarially sound,—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and assure the retired worker today that no matter what his vocation or pursuit in life his pension will be adequate for the years of retirement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Dinsdale: In supporting this resolution I think we have to take into consideration the fact that we are dealing not only with inflationary trends but with the fact that the pension scheme in the first instance was inadequate. I see that it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you surprised?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business of the house is tomorrow? But before the house leader rises, I wonder whether he would not give consideration to the fact that this is the last week of the session before the Christmas recess and that it is traditional, I understand, for the house leader on an occasion such as this to give to the house the business that is likely to take place during the rest of the week. I wonder whether he will not tell us that tonight.

Mr. Green: I doubt very much whether there is any such precedent as that which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has dangled in front of me this evening.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Harris always did it.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Harris never had the experience.

Mr. Green: The business tomorrow will be, first, item No. 18 on today's order paper, third reading of an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act; then item No. 32, a resolution dealing with the National Housing Act; then the item under government notices of motions, a resolution dealing with the Unemployment Assistance Act; then item No. 19, house in committee on a bill concerning a Canadian National Railways branch line; item No. 20, house in committee on a bill respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners; item No. 21, house in committee on a bill to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; item No. 25, second reading of an act to amend the Pension Act; and item No. 23, second reading of an act to provide for annual vacations with pay.

Mr. Chevrier: This looks like a week's business.

Mr. Green: I hope it will not take a week.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTINUED OPERATION OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to inform the house that an arrangement has been worked out under which the directors of the Howe Sound Mining Company have agreed to keep the Britannia mine open on a reduced operating basis for a further period, which it is hoped will be at least six months. The parties to the arrangement are the dominion government, the government of British Columbia, the company and the mine workers. I am informed that a telegram has accordingly been sent from New York this morning to the mine management at Britannia.

As the house knows, for some weeks we have been holding discussions with the company, the men and the provincial government to see what could be done to avoid a shutdown of the mine with the disastrous consequence which would follow for the 700 men and their families who would have been thrown out of work as a result. It should be emphasized in fairness to the company that at no time have they ever either directly or indirectly sought governmental assistance or intervention. They have, however, shown throughout a highly commendable readiness to postpone a shut-down which their own experts urged them to make in order to carry on discussions in an effort to arrive at a solution which will keep the men at work notwithstanding that they were and still are incurring substantial losses.

At the time these discussions commenced the hope was to keep all the men at work. However, on December 3 the company advised that a further recommendation had been received from their consultants, as a result of which their directors had no option but to decide that it would be in effect an abuse of their property and a breach of their responsibility as directors to continue full scale mining operations under present conditions. We were, therefore, faced with a decision of the company that, effective today, these operations would be discontinued.

They were prepared, however, to consider an arrangement to continue operating on a reduced scale if some assistance were forthcoming. This arrangement involves a complete reorganization of their operations, but will provide for the continued employment of between 350 and 400 personnel.

Although we were naturally disappointed that it was no longer possible to keep all the men at work, it was still most desirable to do everything possible to keep something over half of them in employment. I am very happy to be able to say that this has now been achieved.

The company has agreed, on the assurance that the assistance detailed later will be forthcoming, that it will reorganize its operations and continue work on the property in order to provide employment for between 350 and 400 personnel, thus avoiding a lay-off of the whole working force at a time of year when it would be virtually impossible for them to secure alternative work.

A substantial part of the company's operating cost is incurred in the expense of operation and maintenance of their townsite and the provision of services to the houses occupied by their employees, all of which are owned by the company. It is our thought, therefore, that the contribution of government should be founded on the basis of assistance in meeting these costs of supplying and servicing accommodation. On this basis, it has been agreed that if the two governments will provide a total of $20,000 per month for up to six months the company will continue its operations on the reduced scale referred to, and will continue to provide accommodation for the 350 to 400 personnel employed for such period as may be practicable.

As regards the amount of assistance to be provided by each government, it has been agreed that, if parliament approves, 80 per cent will be paid by the dominion government and 20 per cent by the government of British Columbia. I should say that the exact figure of percentage is subject to confirmation which we expect to receive very shortly, but it will be very close to the figure I have just mentioned. The men have already made, and will continue to make, a substantial contribution toward helping to solve this problem. The company will continue to incur substantial losses in the immediate future.

The government recognizes that what is proposed is unusual, but this is an unusual situation. Here is an industry in an isolated locality, all of whose workers live in a company-operated and company-owned town. If the mine were to close now, not only would the employees be unable at this time of year to secure alternative employment but they and their families would be without accommodation. It is true that the plan which is proposed to keep the mine open for a few months involves only about one-half the workers, but it may nevertheless be possible —and this has yet to be worked out—to find some method of providing winter accommodation during the remainder of these winter months for those who unfortunately will have to be released from work.

This plan will thus not only maintain men and their families in employment and accommodation over the winter months when there would otherwise be no hope of finding alternatives for either, but also marks a unique co-operative effort to find a solution to a pressing problem, with contributions being made from four sources; the two governments, the men and the company.

With regard to the company, I should like to emphasize that for the last several months the mine has been operating at a loss of between $60,000 and $80,000 a month. Even with the assistance now to be provided and work being continued on a reduced scale, losses will continue to be substantial. It seems to me that the board of directors and the management are due a sincere expression of gratitude for their contribution in agreeing to keep the mine open under these conditions.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, the government will in the very near future be submitting a specific proposal to parliament to authorize the payment of $16,000 a month, or such other proportionate amount as will finally be agreed to with the province of British Columbia, toward defraying a portion of the costs of keeping the Britannia mine open for a period of up to six months.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Are these payments contingent on the price of copper remaining at the same level, or will there be a provision that if the world price of copper rises then these payments from public funds will cease?

Mr. Fulton: The payments are not contingent on the price of copper remaining at a fixed level. The government has indicated its willingness to enter into a commitment for up to six months. The company has entered into a commitment to keep operating for as long as may be practicable. If the price of copper should fall I would assume the company would have another look at the situation. If the price of copper should rise, then I would assume that the need for assistance will be proportionately lessened, but that would be a matter for further negotiation.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I ask a supplementary question. I note that the minister said that assistance will be given by the government particularly with respect to housing the workers of Britannia mine. Will the government give similar assistance to the workers in the automobile factories of Windsor, who as of last week numbered about 16,000?

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a supplementary question. If the hon. member would like to have it answered I will call orders of the day and we will take the question as having been repeated. Does the minister wish to deal with it?

Mr. Fulton: Of course I cannot speak for the government on a general proposition of that nature. I was entrusted by my colleagues with the responsibility of negotiating some arrangement whereby we might enable these men to continue in employment for the winter. As I have pointed out, the situation here was that if there was closure of the mine not only would there be discontinuance of employment but there would be men thrown out of accommodation in an isolated community a week before Christmas. It was with that unique situation in mind that we have been able to find a solution to that particular problem.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Will the minister then give assurance that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not dispossess a great many of our automobile workers?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the minister a question related to the statement he just made. Does the minister expect to be able to make an early announcement regarding what will be done about ensuring that those who are not remaining in the employ of the company for the time being will be able to continue to reside in the houses they now occupy?

Mr. Fulton: As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which is still under consideration, and as soon as any solution of that problem has been found we will be glad to announce it right away.

Mr. Barnett: Does the minister anticipate that something will be settled soon with regard to that matter?

Mr. Fulton: I can only say in answer to that question that we are quite aware of the emergent nature of the situation and will treat it as such to the best of our ability.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to advise the house that I have just been handed a copy of a telegram received in my office, which advises me that the provincial government of British Columbia confirm that they are prepared to share in the cost of keeping the Britannia mine open on a temporary basis to the extent of 20 per cent up to a maximum of $30,000. On the basis of the figures so far available to me I am satisfied that the maximum would not be reached and that therefore we can expect a 20 per cent contribution from the province of British Columbia.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice and another to the Minister of Public Works. First of all may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he tell us whether the operations of the Britannia mine are carried on in his constituency?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, acting in my capacity as a member of the government, I regard myself as having a responsibility to the whole dominion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Afterwards; I have recognized the hon. member for St. John's East.

[Later:]

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): In view of the announcement made earlier by the Minister of Justice, will the minister advise the house whether a similar policy will be adopted by the government for other minerals such as zinc and lead, which are facing a problem similar to that of the Britannia mine and which today affect very seriously my own constituency of Gloucester and other areas in northern New Brunswick?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps my answer to that question must be somewhat the same as the answer I gave a little earlier, namely that I was entrusted by my colleagues with the responsibility of negotiating in the particular case of the Britannia mines. I am therefore unable to give a general answer to such a question, except that I know I can speak for my colleagues when I say, as I think we have demonstrated, that we are fully aware of the serious consequences of unemployment and that we are determined to take every action within our power to meet and to prevent unemployment from arising.

Mr. Robichaud: Then may I ask a supplementary question. As the Minister of Justice does not seem to be in a position to answer the question, could the question be answered by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), since it comes directly under his jurisdiction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has had a reply to his question, and I do not think he can repeat the question to another member of the government.

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT WINTER PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on the unemployment figures released at ten o'clock this morning by his department and by the dominion bureau of statistics.

In view of the alarming increase in unemployment and the corresponding decrease in the employment figures, and in view of the interest the government has shown, through the announcement made today by the Minister of Justice, in doing something about unemployment, can the minister say whether the government is taking any steps to speed up the winter employment program to which the Minister of Labour made reference in the house on November 20?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the hon. member as well as the house that we are continually, each and every day of the week, trying to push this winter program as quickly as possible. We are trying to interest all people, including organizations, municipal bodies and provincial governments, in participating in promoting winter employment. The result, of course, remains to be seen when the time arrives in the spring.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO PROTECT CANADIAN INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask an "in view" question of the almost "out of view" Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, but before doing so I want to bring to the attention of the house what unity amongst British Columbia members can do and also how commendable it is that the agreement respecting Britannia mine has been arrived at as the result of concessions by all parties concerned.

My "in view" question is this. In view of the serious threat to the economy of the base metals industry in the proposed increase in the tariff on lead and zinc entering the United States; in view of the increasing concern of the one-third of the employees of the industry who face the dire possibility of losing their jobs early in the new year, and in view of the fact that it now appears that only the strongest diplomatic pressure will persuade the United States government against action to increase these tariffs, will the minister inform the house of the definitive steps being taken by the government to protect Canadian interests?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I received a copy of this question just a few minutes ago. I have already answered a question on this point, I think from the hon. member for Kootenay East. I shall look into it further to see whether anything could be usefully added to what I have already said as to representations being made.

U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIAN EXPORTS TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister now prepared to answer the question which was posed on Friday, December 13, respecting shipments to the republic of China? There were two notices of motions then.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): No. I will have to take that as notice, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—REPORTED PURCHASE OF 1,500,000 BUSHELS BY AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce took as notice a question regarding the possible export of Canadian wheat to Australia. Can the minister now say that negotiations have been concluded with Australia, or at what stage negotiations are; or can the minister say how much wheat may be exported to Australia in this regard?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer is that I have no further information on this than I had the other day, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Herridge.]

HARBOURS

CHURCHILL—EXPANSION OF WHARFAGE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the increased use of the Hudson bay route, is the government considering expansion of the wharfage facilities which it is reported limit the use of the port of Churchill?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I might, first of all, say that berthage space at Churchill was enlarged this year to accommodate coastal vessels at a cost of approximately a quarter of a million dollars, and I am advised by the national harbours board that during the past season the facilities were quite adequate to accommodate the traffic.

Any future development of the port will be made known in the usual way through submission by the government of recommendations to parliament.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the hon. members for Burnaby-Coquitlam and Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare raised the matter as to which provinces had signed agreements with the federal government to provide for the recent increases in old age assistance benefits. I am now in a position to give the house the following information.

Seven provinces have signed agreements, effective November 1, 1957, with the federal government in connection with increases in benefits provided not only under the Old Age Assistance Act but also under the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act. These provinces are British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I have been informed that four of these seven provinces—New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan—actually paid the increased benefits in November. Another, Nova Scotia, apparently provided the increases in some cases, but the majority will be paid later with effect, of course, from November 1. I might point out that since these three programs are administered by the provinces, the latter have the responsibility for deciding when the increases are actually implemented.

As far as the remaining provinces are concerned, my department has received a verbal communication from the province of Quebec indicating its intention to share in the increased payments under these programs, and Newfoundland has also telegraphed its agreement. We have as yet received no communication from Prince Edward Island in this regard.

HOUSING

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have given him notice. Can the minister tell us what is the cause of the delay in proceeding with the federal-provincial housing projects announced several years ago for the city of St. John's? The second part of my question, sir, is: can the minister inform the house when a start is likely to be made with these projects?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. There are two projects in mind for the city of St. John's.

One project consists of 46 subsidized housing units, which is to be built on land in the central area of the city which has been cleared with the aid of a federal grant of $15,000 under section 23 of the National Housing Act. The site is part of a larger area which has been earmarked for redevelopment.

The other project consists of approximately 155 subsidized rental housing units. Tenders were called late in 1956. One bid only was received. It was rejected, as it was too high in relation to the original estimate. Ever since that time further proceeding with respect to those two projects has been withheld at the request of the government of Newfoundland.

WINDSOR—REQUEST FOR HALT TO EVICTIONS FROM C.M.H.C. HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Essex West now. I just wanted to have an interval in order to make it clear that an hon. member could not stake out a claim for a second question by mentioning it when he was asking his first one.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In doing so, may I commend the Minister of Justice for this very laudable attitude of representing—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): If hon. members do not want me to compliment the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker, that is quite all right. I wished to commend the Minister of Justice for his farsightedness in representing all of Canada. Now may I ask the Minister of Public Works if he will recommend to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that similar assurances be given to the tenants of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the Windsor area that they will not be dispossessed because of unemployment?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last week some of the members of the cabinet had the privilege of meeting with Mayor Patrick of Windsor and the mayors and reeves of other municipalities in the Windsor metropolitan area. In the course of that meeting His Worship pointed out to me that there was some question of eviction actions being taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Windsor. I promised him that the matter would be looked into at once, and that if any such actions were being taken, they would be stopped. That was done last week.

MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR HOUSE CONSTRUCTION ON INDIAN RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the urgent need for suitable houses on Indian reserves in the province of Manitoba, is the minister prepared to recommend a winter program for the construction of suitable houses on Indian reserves as part of the winter employment program referred to by the Minister of Labour?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of my recollection we do have provision for a house construction program in the estimates, and I believe a portion is allocated to Manitoba. It was not, I believe, conceived as a special winter program, but I am very grateful to the hon. member for his suggestion and will certainly take it up at once with the officials of the department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRIDGES

CAMPBELLTON-CROSS POINT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT FOR CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister inform the house if the government of the province of Quebec has now joined with the government of the province of New Brunswick in accepting in writing this government's proposal to build the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been a very persistent advocate of action in connection with the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge, and I am very pleased to tell him today that the province of Quebec has now agreed to co-operate with the province of New Brunswick and with the federal government in order that this bridge may be built.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, a copy of which was sent to him yesterday. Could the minister advise the house as to any proposed shipbuilding program presently planned by the Department of Transport, and as to when such a program will become operative?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice yesterday of his intention to ask this question, and I have the following reply:

Early in January we are going to call for tenders for the construction of six ships totalling in cost approximately $10 million. These will be as follows: A supply and buoy vessel, also fitted to carry out search and rescue work, for use on the west coast. A supply and buoy vessel, also designed for icebreaking, to be used on the Atlantic coast, gulf of St. Lawrence, northern and other waters where necessary.

Two supply and buoy vessels to replace existing ships at present on duty in the maritimes. A lightship for the St. Lawrence river. A work vessel and tug for use by the St. Lawrence ship channel division.

In addition to the foregoing new construction, the Department of Transport will also call for tenders early in January for the conversion of two L.C.T.8's to fit them for the transportation and handling of dry cargo and bulk fuel for the Foxe basin D.E.W. line sites. At present one of these vessels is in the maritimes and the other on the St. Lawrence. The approximate cost of converting these two vessels is expected to be about $1 million. Also, about the end of the first week in February my department will call for tenders for the construction of a small ferry to operate between Pelee island and the mainland.

I should like to add that the labour content of these projects I have just listed is approximately 3½ million man hours for Canadian workers. Contracts should be let about five to six weeks after tender calls, that is during February, for all but one of these vessels, and orders for materials and other work placed immediately thereafter. In placing contracts, account will be taken of the desirability of spreading this work among various shipyards, and of the promptness with which the work can be undertaken by the various shipyards so as to assist winter employment.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): May I ask a supplementary question. Following the explanation given by the Minister of Transport, could he tell the house that the same program was prepared, as were the plans, by the previous government?

Mr. Hees: If there is any credit due to the previous government I would be very glad to give it.

Mr. Bourget: Why did you not say so?

Mr. Hees: I think the important thing to all hon. members of this house and to the workingmen of this country is that the program is going ahead now.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I would like, if I might, to ask the minister a supplementary question. Is it proposed that the government of Canada should operate the ferry between Pelee island and the mainland?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the present plans are that we will call for tenders for an operator of the ferry.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his statement about a ship being constructed for use on the Atlantic seaboard and northern waters. Will this ship be employed to service bell buoys and light and whistle buoys in Newfoundland waters, or is the construction of another ship being contemplated for that service?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would speak to me afterwards I will give him the full details as to what these various ships are going to do.

IRON ORE COMPANY—STATEMENT ON DIRECTIVE RESPECTING OFFICIAL LANGUAGE FOR RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Saguenay asked if the Minister of Transport had approved a directive given by the Iron Ore Company of Canada to the effect that English will be the only official language used for railway operation on the railway between Seven Islands and Schefferville.

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. The Quebec, North Shore and Labrador Railway comes under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners and consequently is subject to any regulations laid down by the board under the provisions of the Railway Act as enacted by parliament. I am advised that the board has, on the application of the company, approved the use of the uniform code of operating rules. This is the rule book used by the major railways all across the country ever since there has been uniformity in railway operation in Canada.

ST. BONIFACE, MAN.—REFERENCE TO ACCIDENT AT LEVEL CROSSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Deniset (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I believe he has already received notice. It has to do with a railway line crossing the Windsor park community in the city of St. Boniface, Manitoba. Having regard to the near catastrophic accident which occurred at a level crossing on this railway line last Friday, the 13th, would the minister give the assurance that he will use his influence with the board of transport commissioners in order that they may make the necessary regulations to try to avoid similar or even worse accidents?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wants to deal with the question I will resume my seat, but it strikes me as being out of order to ask the government to try to influence the board of transport commissioners, who have the responsibility for dealing with this matter.

[Later:]

Mr. Deniset: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question I asked a minute ago, could I simply ask the minister if he will look into the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATOMIC ENERGY

REPORTED REQUEST FROM UNITED KINGDOM FOR CONSENT TO PUBLISH INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to be directed to the Acting Prime Minister, of which I gave him notice. Can the minister tell the house if the government has received a request from the government of the United Kingdom for consent, under the tripartite agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy, to the publication of information regarding the recent successful laboratory experiments at Harwell in controlled fusion explosions of hydrogen? If so, what was the response of the Canadian government?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for sending me notice of this question. The Canadian government has not received any such request from the government of the United Kingdom. Accordingly, the second part of the question is not applicable.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What consideration, if any, has been given to applying the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to the province of British Columbia?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the P.F.R.A. did do some work in British Columbia in years past. It was discontinued something over a year ago, I believe, and no consideration has been given to re-entering the field as far as the P.F.R.A. is concerned in British Columbia.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government through the house leader. I should like to know if the government would not speed up the answers to questions now on the order paper. I am informed that there are some 47 questions that remain unanswered. There are as of today five starred questions that are unanswered, and I am sure there are a number of orders for returns that have not yet been tabled. I think it is customary in the last days before the adjournment for the Christmas recess to ask the government to speed up answers to questions so that hon. members may have the requested information during the recess. I wonder whether or not the house leader would give consideration to this question.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I strongly suspect that hon. members will be busy with other occupations during the Christmas recess and will not be studying these answers to questions. However, we will be glad to bring down just as many as we can. I would point out that there have been 297 questions asked on the order paper, and if only 47 remain unanswered we have answered 250. That is not too bad.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST THAT BOXING DAY BE MADE ADDITIONAL HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that British Columbia and many other provincial civil servants and hundreds of thousands of other workers have a holiday on December 26, Boxing day, will the government consider granting this holiday to federal civil servants as well?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is probably aware the half day before Christmas and the half day before New Year's have already been granted as half holidays for federal civil servants. Subsequent to that announcement being made a letter came to my desk requesting that Boxing day be made a holiday. Since this would probably have involved recalling the two half days it was thought it was a late date at which to consider the matter for this year. Whether or not any other representations have been made to the civil service commission I could not say at this moment, but it is my opinion that time does not permit of changing the policy for this year.

Mr. McIlraith: You had better change your opinion quickly.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

STATEMENT AS TO EFFECT OF IMPOSITION OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Welland asked the following question:

> Would the government give consideration to making a proper survey of the effect on our Canadian economy of the proposed tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway? I ask this question having in mind that the tolls set should have no discriminatory effect against Canada or any industry in Canada.

In reply I can assure the hon. member that a desire to achieve the objectives he has mentioned in his question is the very reason why the present committee which is dealing with the seaway tolls is making a very intensive investigation of all aspects of this matter. The members of this committee are fully cognizant of the necessity of having a toll structure which is not discriminatory against Canada or any industry in Canada, and which takes full account of the effect of the proposed tolls on the Canadian economy.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—STATEMENT AS TO SAFETY PRECAUTIONS DURING TESTING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to an inquiry directed to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce on Saturday by the hon. member for Port Arthur as to safety precautions observed during the testing of the Trans-Canada pipe line.

The board of transport commissioners advise that the testing on the Trans-Canada pipe line is made in accordance with section 8 of the American standard code of pressure piping, which requires that during tests suitable steps shall be taken to keep persons not working on the testing operations out of the testing area, and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company had adopted the policy of sending their land men ahead of the testing to warn all residents immediately adjacent to the line that they are testing. In cases where people are considered to be living too close to the pipe line for safety the company insists that these people move out until the test has been completed, and pays all bills in connection with their moving.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF PRICE SUPPORT LEGISLATION TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether since his reply to me on Saturday he has now received representations from farm organizations asking that Bill No. 237 be referred to the agriculture committee? Is the minister prepared to reverse his decision and have the bill referred to that committee after second reading?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received two or three telegrams along that line, but I am not prepared to reverse my decision in regard to referring the matter to the agriculture committee.

[Later:]

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises out of his answer to the hon. member for Assiniboia that he would not consider sending Bill No. 237 to the agriculture committee. In view of the violent reaction against the bill by farm organizations, would the minister consider withdrawing the bill from the order paper, revamping it to meet the requests of the farm organizations, and reintroducing it after the holiday season?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this violent reaction about which the hon. member speaks. It is true that I have had a few telegrams in connection with the bill, but if any action is necessary with regard to revamping the bill I think it can be taken without the necessity of leaving it until the new year.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was just about to say that the question asked with respect to the bill and the supplementary question both appear to me to be out of order. I would ask hon. members not to ask further questions about the bill, as it will be the subject of debate shortly and they will have ample opportunity to say what they like about it at that time. There seem to be a great many people who want information on other matters today.

MAPLE SYRUP—REQUEST FOR APPLICATION OF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received a request from l'union catholique des cultivateurs de Quebec, or any other organization, asking that a support price be applied to maple syrup?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. As a result I was able to have my files searched, but I could find no written communication requesting this action, and I do not recall any having been made verbally.

INQUIRY RE STATUS OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON LAND USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me; I have been attempting for half an hour to rise and address a question. I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell the house if the important special committee of the Senate on land use established by the former government will continue to function?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and give an answer tomorrow or the next day.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN FOLLOWING STORM LOSS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, December 5, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare asked a question regarding possible action by the government to assist fishermen who have suffered severe storm damage to their lobster traps. I apologize to the hon. member for straining his patience to this extent and for the long delay in answering, but I think he will understand that some inquiry had to be made on the spot, and that takes time.

Officials of the department have investigated the situation locally and reported the estimated extent of the damage to me. As hon. members are aware, this is a recurring problem and these fishermen have the opportunity of insuring their traps against storm damage under the fishermen's indemnity plan. It is reported that 172 fishermen, representing approximately 18 per cent of the total in the affected area, had taken out this insurance. These fishermen are now making claims which will be given immediate attention. In general, losses appear to have averaged some 30 per cent of traps set, although there has been great variation in this average figure. It is also reported that most fishermen have additional traps which were not in the water when the storms occurred. Thus they will be able to carry on fishing despite their losses.

In view of all these facts the government does not consider it necessary to take special action at this time. Any fisherman wishing to protect himself against future possible losses may take advantage of the insurance offered under the indemnity plan. I might add that no request for such action has been received by the department.

CRIMINAL LAW

CRIMINAL CODE—AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY INTERPRETATION OF "OBSCENE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Benoit Chabot (Kamouraska): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is it the intention of the minister to amend section 150 of the Criminal Code so the definition of the word "obscene" will be more precise, clearer and more definite?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy in giving me notice of his question. I replied to a similar question on October 18, as reported at pages 125 and 126 of Hansard of that date; but since that reply I can say now that the Department of Justice is giving serious consideration to this question, along with consideration it is giving to a number of proposals that have been made for amendments to other sections of the Criminal Code.

It is not possible to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code at this session of parliament. It may be possible to introduce such a bill at the next session. I can assure the hon. member that when such a bill is introduced it will contain any amendments that appear to be necessary to improve the effectiveness of section 150 of the code in preventing the publication, distribution and circulation of obscene literature.

It may be that at that time it will be found desirable to set out in the Criminal Code a new definition of the word "obscene". However, that question can only be determined in conjunction with all the facts that are being considered in connection with other proposals we have received and that have as their objective the making more effective of all the legislation we have dealing with obscene literature.

[Mr. MacLean.]

HIGHWAYS

STEWART-CASSIAR, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO DOMINION-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has any firm agreement yet been reached between the government of Canada and the government of the province of British Columbia for the construction of the Cassiar-Stewart road?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works handed me this notice when I came into the house. I have to speak from memory, but I think it is accurate. There has been no firm agreement signed yet. The minister of mines of British Columbia wrote me near the end of October suggesting four amendments to the agreement, and I wrote back in the first week of November assenting to two of them, I think, and demurring on two others, and that is the last I have heard of it.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO EXPLORATION OF POSSIBLE SITES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of which he has been given notice. Is his department considering or exploring possible sites for the development of power in British Columbia other than on the Columbia river?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The answer is yes.

COLUMBIA RIVER—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT ON COST OF DAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has the present government indicated to the province of British Columbia that it is prepared to enter into an agreement on sharing costs with that province in respect of the building of a dam on the Columbia river?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can refer to Her Majesty's speech from the throne on October 14. The following statement was included:

My ministers are pressing for a favourable settlement of international problems in connection with the Columbia river to clear the way for a joint program with the province of British Columbia to develop the immense power in the waters of this river.

I think this statement was ample indication that this government was prepared to consider a joint program with the province of British Columbia. The aid could presumably be financial or otherwise, dependent upon the wishes yet to be made known by British Columbia.

NOVA SCOTIA—POTENTIAL SITES FOR THERMAL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am sorry I have not been able to send them notice, and they may wish to take this as notice. Were the Inverness coal fields overlooked in a survey of potential sites for maritime thermal power development? If so, will the minister take steps to rectify this oversight?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice and look up the report to see if that field was overlooked.

SHIPPING

GROUNDING OF C.G.S. "BAFFIN"—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received a communication from the Halifax master mariners club saying that in their opinion the published reports on the grounding of C.G.S. Baffin have cast rather serious aspersions on the master mariners of our area? If so, is he willing to do now what they are asking, and what I asked him on November 20 last, namely have an investigation or inquiry made under the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have not received any such communication.

Mr. Kirk: May I ask the minister whether he will take note of the second part of my question and have an investigation made under the Canada Shipping Act?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter.

COASTAL TRADE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport seems to be in an even more friendly mood today than usual, and I should like to ask him if he is in a position to give the house any further information with respect to when we may expect that the report of the royal commission on coastal trade will be available for our study.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, I am afraid I do not know.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN CONCLUDING AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if, as a result of the conference which I understand was held last week in his department with officials of the departments of health of the various provinces, the minister is in a position to say when we may anticipate some announcement from him with regard to progress being made in concluding agreements with any one of the six consenting provinces respecting hospital insurance?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, great progress was made last week at this technical conference. All I can say at the moment is that the conference is being followed up by further communication.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether or not as a result of that conference there is to be a conference of ministers before the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference, which I understand is anticipated some time in the new year?

Mr. Monteith: No, I cannot say; not necessarily.

[Later:]

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION—MENTAL AND TUBERCULAR PATIENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a supplementary question. Can he say whether, as a result of the conference held last week to which reference has already been made, he anticipates that legislation amending the Hospital

Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be presented to parliament at this session?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Only as intimated by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that the six provinces provision will be withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are discussions under way with the six agreeing provinces or any others concerning the inclusion of mental and tubercular hospitals under the act?

Mr. Monteith: There have been no further discussions other than what took place at the dominion-provincial conference.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the matter may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if we are correct in assuming that the only amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act contemplated by the government is that with regard to the provision of payment where six provinces have schemes in force? Is that the only amendment the government has in mind?

Mr. Monteith: Aside from this matter being government policy, Mr. Speaker, it is the only amendment concerning which we have given definite notice of action.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO REIMBURSEMENT BY GOVERNMENT OF COURT AWARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the government prepared to reimburse the C.B.C. for the $3,000 damages awarded Dr. Robbins for the C.B.C. television broadcast in February, 1956?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the C.B.C. operates within its own budget out of moneys allocated to it by parliament plus commercial revenues, and I am sure they will make such allocation of those funds as they see fit.

Mr. Speaker: That seems to be a proper question to bring up on the estimates rather than at this time.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—REFERENCE TO INAUGURATION BY SPEAKER OF SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the declaration made at the inauguration of the airport at Quebec by the Speaker of the Senate, does the minister think the airport building, which of course is under the control of his department, is a consequence of Mr. Duplessis' policy?

Mr. Marler: Collaboration raises its ugly head.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that question sounds like one I will have to take as notice. I will try to work out an answer for the hon. member.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PROTECTION PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Fisheries if he has received a petition from the fishermen of Musgrave Harbour, Doting Cove, Ragged Harbour, Ladle Cove and Aspen Cove urging construction of a work which would provide urgently needed employment and at the same time be beneficial to the fishermen?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, if such a petition has arrived it has not been brought to my attention yet. It may have arrived recently.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister give it careful consideration if it has?

Mr. MacLean: I certainly will because, where it is in my power to do so, I am very interested in providing employment for people who may be unemployed in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE TOTAL OUTSTANDING LIABILITY

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 199, respecting the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, DOWN PAYMENTS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Green—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954 to increase from two hundred and fifty million dollars to four hundred million dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act; and also to provide for the reduction of down payments.

Mr. Green: When this resolution was before the committee on December 4 I gave certain figures with regard to the amount of loans which had been approved under the agency loan plan. These figures will be found at page 1879 of Hansard. I thought it might be helpful if I brought those figures up to date today before hon. members deal with the resolution.

As of December 13 the total loans approved numbered 11,951, covering 15,456 units. The total amount was $146,072,339. In addition there were potential commitments—this is as of four days ago—amounting to $21,740,000, making a total of $167,812,339. The starts under the agency loan plan as of December 13 were as follows: British Columbia, 288; Alberta, 1,265; Saskatchewan, 258; Manitoba, 349; Ontario, 4,701; Quebec, 1,269; New Brunswick, 80; Nova Scotia, 110; Newfoundland, 10, or a total of 8,330. The branch offices report that construction is starting as quickly as possible after approval and that cancellations are likely to be few in number.

I have figures also by way of comparison of the results under this agency loan plan and under the insured loan plan, which is the normal National Housing Act procedure, for the third quarter of 1957. These figures are as follows. For insured loans, third quarter of 1957, the average income of the borrower was $5,943; the average income under the agency loan plan is $5,003, a decrease of 15.8 per cent. The average down payment under the insured loan plan in the third quarter of 1957 was $3,921; under the agency loan plan it has been $2,548, a decrease of 35 per cent. The average amount of loan under the insured loan, third quarter of this year, was $10,913; the average amount under the agency loan plan was $9,875, a decrease of 9.5 per cent. The average dwelling cost under the insured loan was $14,615 and under the agency loan $12,423, a decrease of 15 per cent.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin my remarks by complimenting the minister upon the lucidity of the explanation he gave the other night when this resolution was first considered by this committee. I thought he explained very clearly the objects he had in mind, and no doubt because he was anxious to have the resolution adopted with the minimum of debate he avoided repeating the more controversial statements he made earlier in this session in reply to questions on orders of the day.

I want also to thank him for the generous and complimentary references to his predecessor, Hon. Robert H. Winters. We in the official opposition, and particularly those of us who were associated with Mr. Winters in the previous government, know how sincerely interested he was in the whole question of housing and how fully he devoted his effort and attention to this problem. I believe that some of the statistics to which I should like to refer presently are an eloquent testimonial to the success of the policies for which Mr. Winters was responsible.

I should like to say also to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, how much the members of the official opposition appreciated having an opportunity of discussing the question of housing with Dr. Bates of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and two of his officials. They were good enough to answer many questions which were put to them and they added materially, I think, and I might also say in a very kindly way, to the sum of our knowledge on this subject.

I now come to the resolution before this committee, Mr. Chairman, which hon. members will recall first appeared in Votes and Proceedings on November 25. This, of course, was the first official intimation the members of this committee had of the intention of the government to introduce amendments to the National Housing Act. I should like to point out, however, that the Solicitor General had, as early as November 8, publicly announced outside this house the government's decision to present a bill to encourage the building of new houses. Having for so long listened to Conservative members who claimed that under the last government the rights of parliament were being ignored, and recalling the numerous Conservative promises to restore parliament to its former greatness, I can only say now that I am much surprised that the first announcement of this legislation was made, not in the speech from the throne, not in Votes and Proceedings, but in an address made in Montreal nearly three weeks before this resolution appeared on the order paper.

The words the Solicitor General used on that occasion are not without interest. I shall read from Le Devoir of November 9 an extract from the report of his speech. Here is what he is reported as having said, and as it is in French, but I shall translate it so the minister will fully appreciate the significance of his colleague's remarks:

(Translation):

The hon. Minister of Public Works is shortly to introduce a bill which, according to the Hon. Mr. Balcer, will promote home building. The Minister of Finance, on his part, is said to have in mind another bill which would settle the matter of interest rate and facilitate the borrowing of money.

(Text):

As there is no simultaneous translation, Mr. Chairman, I shall translate his words as follows:

The Minister of Public Works will shortly present a bill which—according to the Hon. Balcer—will encourage the building of houses.

I point out to the Minister of Public Works that his colleague was just about three weeks ahead of him in making this news public. But then, Mr. Chairman while that is what the Solicitor General said of the measure now under consideration, he also continued as follows:

The Minister of Finance, on his part, has in mind another bill which would settle the question of the rate of interest and facilitate the borrowing of money.

This last item is a most interesting bit of news, and as the matter is very closely related to the subject of this resolution on housing, I hope the Minister of Public Works, before this debate is concluded, will advise the committee more fully as to the project announced by the Solicitor General on the occasion to which I have just referred. The minister himself, in his explanation of the purposes of this resolution, said nothing either with regard to the rate of interest or with regard to any further legislation to facilitate the borrowing of money.

The presentation of this resolution affords an opportunity for a review of what has been accomplished under the legislation which it is now proposed to amend. I feel that for this purpose I should go back to the time when the National Housing Act was adopted in 1954. I have no intention of reviewing all that was said at that time but I think I might quote what was then said by Mr. Winters in presenting the resolution on which the National Housing Act was based. As reported at page 998 of Hansard for 1953-54 he said this:

The main object of the legislation is to broaden the supply of mortgage money by making that form of investment more attractive, increasing the number of lenders and making more funds available for mortgage lending.

Before coming to examine the extent to which this object has been achieved I should like to remind hon. members of the fact that mortgage lending in Canada has always suffered from a peculiar disability. I may add that I speak of the matter in the light of some personal experience, having been closely connected with mortgage lending in Montreal during the approximately 30 years I practised law before becoming a member of this parliament.

The peculiar disability to which I have just referred is that in good times industry, using the term in the broadest sense of the word, competes actively for the investor's capital and offers a more negotiable security than a mortgage on a house, while in bad times builders are not anxious to undertake the construction of large numbers of houses, buyers are scarcer and the demand for mortgage money falls off. It is in the light of this competition for the investor's dollar that we may now take a look at what took place after the National Housing Act came into operation early in 1954.

Hon. members will recall that under the former legislation it was the practice for joint loans to be made by the lending institutions and C.M.H.C., that is to say the major part of the funds were advanced by the lending institutions and only a smaller part by C.M.H.C. itself. Upon the introduction of the new act joint loans were abandoned, and a plan under which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would insure the mortgage loans made under the act by the lending institutions was substituted for it. In this way a National Housing Act mortgage was made more attractive as a form of investment, more secure and incidentally more easily negotiable.

Moreover, by adding the chartered banks to the list of approved lenders not only was the number of lenders significantly increased, but a substantial volume of additional funds was made available for mortgage lending.

I think most objective people would fully agree that the main object stated by the former minister has been achieved during the period which has elapsed since the act came into operation, because it is a fact that in that period both the volume of new residential construction and the amount of mortgage lending on new housing have attained unprecedently high levels. Up to the end of 1952 the number of new dwellings started in any one year had only once exceeded 90,000 units. That was in 1950. It was only in 1953 that for the first time the total of new dwellings started exceeding 100,000.

In that year, commitments by lending institutions to make mortgage loans also attained a new high level. Conventional mortgage loans amounted to about $119 million, while loans under the previous National Housing Act amounted to about $314 million, making a rather impressive total of approximately $433 million in all.

Though 1953 was a record year both as to the number of new dwellings started and as to the amount of mortgage commitments made, higher levels were attained in each of the succeeding years 1954, 1955 and 1956 under the housing legislation adopted early in 1954. Thus, according to "Canadian Housing Statistics", published by C.M.H.C., new units were started as follows: in 1954, 113,527; in 1955, 138,276; and in 1956, 127,311. Mortgage commitments were as follows: in 1954, $670.6 million which, Mr. Chairman, I would point out, includes some carry-over from the former practice of making joint loans; 1955, in which the total was $892.4 million or more than twice the record established in 1953, and in 1956 the total reached some $700.1 million.

It does seem to be a fact that the 1954 legislation gave a positive stimulus to the building of new homes. There was a substantial increase in the number of homes financed by means of conventional mortgages but an even greater increase in the number of new homes financed under the new National Housing Act. It is a fact that in 1955, the best year we have known so far, when more than 138,000 new dwelling units were started, over 65,000 were financed under the new legislation.

So that in the circumstances it seems reasonable to point out that the principal purpose of the new legislation to increase the number of houses built each year was fully attained in the three years in question.

I know, of course, that the number of dwellings started in 1957 is below the corresponding period of 1956 and even less than the number started in the peak year of 1955. But I suggest that if a tendency had not developed to look on 1955 and 1956 as normal years for residential construction, the number of starts in this year 1957 would be regarded as fairly satisfactory. It seems abundantly clear that the number would have been larger if there had not been such a strong demand from other borrowers.

But I might say that it was not so very long ago that a good number of people in Canada were wondering whether a continuation of the intensive activity in the building of new homes such as existed in 1955 would not bring about a serious inflation of building costs and indeed of the other costs associated with the building of new homes. I cannot help thinking that the slowing down in 1957 of the building of new homes, though it may have brought hardship in some quarters, will be considered by fair-minded people as a good thing both for builders and for home owners. There has been a period of consolidation which made it possible for home owners who wished to sell their homes to do so on not unsatisfactory terms, and for the development of a more substantial and solid demand for new housing units as they were built.

As I said a moment ago, another purpose of the new legislation was to increase the flow of mortgage funds by widening the group of approved lenders under the act. That this purpose has been fully achieved is demonstrated by the significant contribution that has been made by the chartered banks to the financing of new residential construction. The statistics as to mortgage lending published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation show that in the period from 1954 to 1956 the banks approved mortgage loans to an aggregate amount of nearly $650 million, to finance the construction of some 67,230 dwelling units. I understand, moreover, that in the current year, the banks are fully carrying out the commitment to lend $150 million to which the former minister of public works referred in the House of Commons early in the present year.

I appreciate, just as do other hon. members, that this is a lower rate of lending than prevailed in 1954 and 1955 when the banks started in this field of investment, but whatever may be the amounts currently being loaned by the banks, even the short experience that the last few years have provided has amply demonstrated the wisdom of authorizing and encouraging the banks to make insured loans under the act and to put at the service of prospective home owners the extensive facilities which the banks have in many centres large and small across Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to overlook the fact that we are at this moment more directly concerned with the question of the amount that may be advanced to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act, because this is one of the two objectives of this resolution before the committee. The present authority contained in the act places a limit of $250 million on the amount of these advances, and it is of course the moneys advanced under this authority that are used by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make loans under the National Housing Act when it considers it expedient to do so.

In connection with these loans made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under section 22 of the act it is interesting to note that in the three years 1954, 1955 and 1956, through loans made under the National Housing Act by lending institutions amounted to more than $1,500 million. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation itself loaned less than $65 million. In other words in that period, in which new high levels of home building were established, the financing of the construction of new dwellings was left almost entirely to the lending institutions, that is to say to the life insurance companies, the trust, loan and other companies, and the chartered banks, and they provided a record volume of mortgage money.

Now, in the first half of 1957, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has played a more active part in mortgage lending, and I understand that as of July 1 about $100 million of the amount authorized by the act had been committed. Since the present governnment has been in office Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has given further commitments for an aggregate amount of about $150 million, so that as the minister explained the present authority of $250 million has just about been used up. It is only natural, therefore, that further funds should be placed at the disposal of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and of course the purpose of the resolution is to place at its disposal a further amount of $150 million.

Mr. Chairman, to this proposal the official opposition has no objection, because it is obvious that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must not be left in a position of having no funds available for new construction, and accordingly we shall support the resolution which is designed to make possible the continuation of policies laid down in the National Housing Act, which hon. members will recall, was sponsored by the previous Liberal government.

However, I think I should point out to the present government that it would be very unfortunate if it were to create the impression that it is going to assume the responsibility of providing all the funds that are needed for new housing. This is a responsibility which rests upon other shoulders as well, and I hope the government will not in any way discourage other lenders from actively participating in meeting present needs for housing in the same way as they have done in recent years. In fact I might go even further and suggest to the government that it should, in ways which are open to the government to act, endeavour to persuade the lending institutions that this is a function which properly they should discharge.

Before I leave this subject of increasing by $150 million the funds available for loaning by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister another comment made by his colleague the Solicitor General. Le Devoir of November 9 reports his remarks as follows, and I think I should quote them even if it is necessary to translate them, because I think they are the sort of pearls that should not be lost sight of:

(Translation):

> Later, referring to the $150 million recently placed at the disposal of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the speaker stated that these credits would all soon be used up, because there were only $28 million left by now. He said that this was only a palliative, but that the crux of the matter would soon be settled by appropriate legislation.

(Text):

In substance, what the Solicitor General said in speaking of the $150 million which the government had already placed at the disposal of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was this was only a palliative, but that the crux of the matter, the fundamental problem, would soon be settled by appropriate legislation. Well, I suppose after hearing the words of his colleague the Minister of Public Works will realize that he is just accomplishing a routine formality in asking us to increase these funds by a matter of $150 million, but I hope before the debate is over he will tell us just what further legislation he has in mind to which the Solicitor General's description of "an immediate palliative" would not be considered to apply.

Mr. Green: You had better ask him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is he?

Mr. Marler: Of course if he were in the house I would be delighted to have him explain just what he meant, because it seems to me this suggestion is that what we are doing at the moment is merely to give the poor patient a shot in the arm, but that what we are really going to do is reset all his bones and bring him to life by some other legislative process. I must say this intrigues me enormously and of course, as I indicated earlier, I am also very much intrigued by the thought which the Solicitor General expressed that the Minister of Finance—who unhappily is absent this afternoon for good reasons, as we all know—actually had in mind doing something to bring down interest rates and also to facilitate the borrowing of money.

I know there are many people who would like to acquire the secret knowledge necessary to have this new facility made available, but perhaps the minister will enlighten us, when he speaks further on this subject today, as to what are the broader plans such as were announced by the Solicitor General.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to the second object of this resolution, the question of the reduction of down payments. This, as the minister has explained, has to be done by increasing the amount of the loan, and the minister has told us that instead of the loan amounting to 90 per cent of the first $8,000 of the lending value and 70 per cent of the lending value in excess of that $8,000, the amendment will enable borrowers to obtain a loan amounting to 90 per cent of the first $12,000 of lending value, and 70 per cent of the lending value in excess of that amount.

The minister put on Hansard a table showing the effect on down payments and the change in the ratio between the loan and the lending value, and it appears from that table that the change will reduce the down payment by $400 in the case of a house having a lending value of $10,000 and by $700 in the case of a house having a lending value of $15,000. We shall not oppose this change in the act which will afford some modest relief although I do not think the relief itself is particularly substantial.

It seems to me that the present difficulty with regard to the down payment does not arise from the way in which the amount of the loan is arrived at under the present provisions of the National Housing Act but from the practices that are being followed by lending institutions in their appraisals of the security. I think the statistics published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation fully bear out this contention. If we examine the statistics we find that the total average estimated cost of a one-storey single family dwelling has risen from $12,479 in the first quarter of 1955 to $14,725 in the second quarter of 1957 but during this same period the average loan under the National Housing Act on this type of house has risen, I think, from $10,147 to $10,900. This means that the down payment, that is the difference between the total cost and the amount loaned, has increased in the space of 27 months from $2,332 to $3,825, a jump of nearly $1,500. If I understood correctly the figures which the minister gave earlier this afternoon they would seem to show that this difference between the cost of a single family dwelling financed under the N.H.A. and the amount of the loan is now about $3,925.

I am going to leave those figures because I have not had an opportunity of digesting them but the point I would like to emphasize is that although the cost figures which are given in table 49, which table gives the building costs, are figures submitted by the applicant himself. I fully realize that he may be prone sometimes to exaggerate his costs, but leaving out this factor of understandable exaggeration I would like to say, from my own experience with lending institutions, that ever since the National Housing Act was first adopted they have followed very conservative methods of valuation.

If less conservative methods of valuation were followed and lenders were to bring their appraisals more closely to the actual amount usefully expended by the builder the problem of the down payment would just about disappear. I want to emphasize that I deliberately use the words "the amount usefully expended" because I do not think there is any reason to include in the security expenditures which do not produce value. I contend that useful expenditures do produce value to an amount corresponding to the amount of those expenditures. I would suggest that the lending institutions should take greater note of the actual amount usefully expended in the building of a new dwelling rather than to rely solely on a process of estimation and experience.

Let us look at the case from another aspect. As I said a moment ago, the average estimated total cost of a single family dwelling in the second quarter of 1957 was $14,725 according to table 49. Even on the present loaning basis the loan ought to be $11,907.50 but the statistics show that the average loan is only $10,900; in other words, in the average case the loan is about $1,000 less than it ought to be. Having regard to the fact that the loan is insured under what I think are not ungenerous terms I believe the government would be well advised to examine further into the appraisal being made to see if they are not at the root of our present difficulties with regard to the down payment. I believe that more can be done to reduce the down payment by realistic appraisals than by changing the present ratio between the loan and the lending value.

I see that my time is running out, Mr. Chairman, and there are just two other points to which I should like to draw attention. The first is the phenomenal increase in the cost of land. Table 49 of the Canadian housing statistics for the second quarter of 1957 shows that for a single one-storey dwelling the land cost has increased from $523 in 1947 to $2,273 in the second quarter of 1957. This I think is very disquieting because the factor of the land costs makes home-building so difficult for people of modest resources and adds so much to the cost of the completed unit. I cannot help thinking that this is a factor which ought to receive serious consideration so as to see whether it would not be possible to reduce this element of the total cost and to determine what are the primary causes that make the cost of land such a large element of the total cost of a completed dwelling.

It does seem to me that perhaps land speculation is a cause and another cause may be the high cost of providing the local improvement services; but whatever may be the cause it is a subject which ought to receive close attention and I would suggest that the fullest inquiry into the matter should be undertaken either by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or some other competent body.

The second point I want to mention arises from the facts which appear in table 24 of the housing statistics which gives the range of the borrowers' incomes. The minister in his remarks the other night and indeed again today referred to the average income of borrowers under the National Housing Act and as reported at page 1878 of Hansard of December 4 said:

> I was very much surprised to find that the qualifying income for the average National Housing Act loan made by approved lenders in the month of September of this year was $5,350. The average income for borrowers under the National Housing Act was $5,829.

The act and the present regulations undoubtedly encourage to a greater extent the building of homes for borrowers with higher incomes than for borrowers in the lower income brackets. Table 24 which I mentioned just a moment ago shows that of the 149,472 borrowers in the four years 1953 to 1956 inclusive all except 1,391 had incomes of $3,000 or more. In the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I ask if the time has not come for us to do something more for borrowers with incomes of less than $3,000. I cannot help thinking there would be a great deal to be said for a review both of the present standard of construction and of lending practices in connection with small homes. With such an objective in mind I feel it might be possible to design plans for homes which would be smaller and which would cost less than the average dwelling financed under the National Housing Act. I am convinced that by so doing we would be performing a useful service for a segment of the Canadian population which has perhaps not received as much attention as it deserves.

I fully realize, Mr. Chairman, that the statements I have just made in connection with the appraisals, in connection with the down payment and in connection with doing something for people in the income class under $3,000, might lend themselves to the question, why was this not done before? Well, Mr. Chairman, time does not permit me to deal with that question at all fully, but I think there is a good explanation. The observations that I have made, Mr. Chairman, have not been intended in any sense as being critical of actions of the government. I think it has not had adequate time to accomplish the changes that would have to be brought about to meet with the objectives that I have just outlined, but I do think the suggestions merit consideration.

I know that my time has run out, Mr. Chairman, but I wonder whether I might have one or two minutes more?

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

Mr. Marler: In his remarks on the resolution itself, Mr. Chairman, the minister informed the committee of the intention of the government to amend the present regulations so as to raise the ratio of debt service to the home owners income from 23 per cent to 27 per cent. The 23 per cent, as hon. members will recall, translates into percentage figures the old adage that a man should not pay for his housing more per month than one week's salary. The proposed change would permit a borrower to qualify for home ownership with less income than that. Of course, the wisdom of making the change can only be determined by experience.

I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that this does not form part of the resolution and is essentially a matter for which the government alone must accept responsibility. But I hope the minister will note from table 24, to which I referred a moment ago, that the statistics show that the average debt service to income ratio in the six periods which the table covers has never once exceeded 19 per cent. Therefore, it may well be that the change in this figure may not be very significant. I appreciate the danger of arguing from averages; that is, from the general to the specific, and I merely wish to conclude on that point, Mr. Chairman, by saying that this is a matter of government responsibility and we are not called upon to express an opinion on it.

If I might conclude, Mr. Chairman, I would say that we favour the adoption of this resolution but I do hope that the points I have drawn to the attention of the minister, namely the need for more realistic appraisals, the cost of serviced land and the need to give more attention to home ownership for applicants in the lower income groups will receive the careful and solicitous attention of the government.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss this most important subject of housing at this session, more particularly in view of the rather disquieting answers we received to questions earlier in the session regarding legislation to amend the National Housing Act. I was most pleased to learn, irrespective of the manner in which the announcement was made, that notwithstanding the minister's answer to me on October 21, that the government did not intend to bring down any amendment this session, they have seen fit to do so. I think the determination on the part of the members of this house, particularly the members from the opposition side, to stay on the job to discuss whatever legislation we could urge the government to bring down, is borne out by the fact that we are now discussing something which, in the earlier stages of this session, the government did not propose to bring down.

The previous speaker expressed a point of view which I think is definitely a little late in coming from a spokesman of that party, particularly in view of the fact that, as the hon. member pointed out, the cost of the average house under the National Housing Act had been going up year by year. Apparently the previous administration turned a deaf ear to pleas which we had made that some consideration be given to the Canadian citizens who are earning salaries less than $4,000 a year.

The C.C.F. position has been made clear on this matter over the years. We have called on the government to enact housing legislation to take care of the housing needs of all Canadians. We have argued that if priorities are to be given, then top priority should be given to Canadians in the lower income brackets. We find that the amendments to the National Housing Act which were passed in 1954 do not materially alter the situation. We still find the situation where, according to the minister's own figures, the average income increased over the years. For example, in 1955, the average income of a recipient of a loan under the National Housing Act was $5,023 per annum. In 1956, that had risen to $5,312. In the first quarter of 1957, it had risen to $5,615 and in the second quarter of 1957, to $5,829. The minister gave us a figure a few moments ago which indicated that in the third quarter of this year the average income had increased to $5,943. Therefore, the situation is becoming materially worse. The National Housing Act has tended to move farther away from the class of people whom we believe the housing legislation should serve first and foremost.

We in the C.C.F. have pointed out to the government that the ideal objective ought to be home ownership. It would be a very healthy situation in Canada if a great percentage of our people were to own their own houses. Certainly nothing has been done by the government in this legislation toward realizing that objective. However, apart from the home ownership provisions, we have always recognized the fact that there are a large number of Canadians who, because they receive incomes so low, irrespective of whatever provisions might be made in the National Housing Act for home ownership, would not be able to qualify. Then, again, there are sizeable numbers of Canadians who have jobs of a temporary nature and who are required occasionally to move from city to city for whom home ownership does not appeal. In order to serve the needs of that group of our population low-cost rental housing is the obvious answer. And yet, I recognize that there are provisions in certain sections of the National Housing Act with respect to limited dividend housing corporations and the like to provide so-called low rental housing; but there has not been too much activity in this field. Furthermore, the rents charged under no stretch of the imagination can be termed low.

The previous speaker referred to the general rule of thumb that a family is not able to, or should not be required to pay more than a week's salary, or roughly 20 per cent of their income for housing. What do we find? According to the statistics made available by the Department of National Revenue publication, Taxation Statistics of 1957, we note that of those making returns in Canada, whether they were taxable or non-taxable returns, 62 per cent of our people earned incomes of less than $3,000 a year. As a matter of fact, we know that there are well over a million and a half Canadians who earn incomes of less than $2,000 a year. If you accept the principle of one week's salary, or roughly one-fifth of the salary, as being the amount which a family can afford to spend on housing, then it is easy to see that if a person earns less than $3,000 a year he can hardly afford to pay more than $50 a month for rent. Those Canadians who earn less than $2,000 a year can hardly afford to pay more than $35 a month.

When we consider that this situation affects the majority of the people of Canada it is quite easy to see that the so-called low rental dwellings which have been made available are beyond the reach of the majority of the people of Canada. As a matter of fact, when the National Housing Act was amended in 1954 I referred to an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen at that time in which it was pointed out that a certain limited dividend housing corporation in the city of Ottawa, which was constructing so-called low cost housing, was charging rents well beyond the reach of a great percentage of the citizens of Ottawa.

Therefore, when the minister speaks of low cost housing, whether it be for home ownership or for rental purposes, I think we have to examine what he means by low cost housing, because certainly the type of housing which has been provided under certain sections of the National Housing Act has not resulted in rentals which the great percentage of the Canadian people can afford to pay. Thus, many of them are forced to live in substandard dwellings. The overcrowding that exists is something which must give us great cause for alarm.

It would appear obvious that the government ought to have given serious consideration to the whole question of low rental housing. I realize that in many instances the initiative is not being taken by municipalities simply because municipal taxes have reached such a high level in so many municipalities that they are loath to take any action which may conceivably bring about an increase in the mill rate, no matter how lofty the purpose may be. The result is that many municipalities with serious housing problems are not taking the initiative. In my opinion the fact that the sections under part II of the National Housing Act dealing with low rental housing have not been used nearly to the extent that might reasonably be hoped indicates the need for close attention on the part of the government to the provision of changes in the act to encourage a much faster rate of construction of low rental dwellings in Canada.

Apart from the question of low rental housing, with respect to which I realize the government can to some extent point the finger of blame at municipal bodies and provincial governments, there is, of course, the question of part I of the National Housing Act having to do with the encouragement of home ownership. Here again the statement we have made over the years that over 80 per cent of the people of Canada are unable to obtain any benefit whatsoever from the National Housing Act has been borne out by the statistics. As a matter of fact, the figure of 80 per cent which we have used was a little low. According to statistics issued by the Department of National Revenue, actually over 81.6 per cent of the people of Canada are earning incomes of less than $4,000 a year.

When we consider the average income of the recipient of a loan under the National Housing Act, we begin to realize the failure of the act to come to grips with the most important part of the problem. I appreciate the minister's concern about this matter. I note that in his statement on December 4 he said, as found at page 1880 of Hansard:

> Quite frankly, I should like to be able to help an income group even lower than those who will be helped by this legislation.

I note that the minister is quite frank in admitting that the legislation does not provide for the low income groups. At another point in the minister's statement he referred to people in ordinary circumstances. In view of the statistics I have put on the record, I believe you can hardly describe people who can qualify for a loan under the National Housing Act as being people in ordinary circumstances. It is true that their incomes might not be described as large but when you consider them as part of the general over-all population you realize they are people of more substantial means than the vast majority.

I also note that in his statement the minister pointed out that the amendments to be brought down in the bill will deal with the reduction of the down payment. This, of course, is something in which we have always been intensely interested. I think hon. members will recall that year in and year out we have advocated in the House of Commons a housing policy calling for a down payment of 10 per cent. But I would draw to the attention of the minister that along with our proposal to decrease the down payment to 10 per cent there was a companion recommendation that the interest rate should be reduced proportionately. If you reduce the down payment without at the same time reducing the interest payment you are going to add to the final cost of the house. While I recognize that under the circumstances it is most important to lower the down payment in order to include a larger group of people under the terms of the act, I can see no reason why the government did not take steps at this time to bring about a reduction in the interest rate.

I note the reference the minister made to the amendment to increase the amount of money which may be appropriated out of the consolidated revenue fund to be used by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in direct lending and that the amount is to be increased from $250 million to $400 million. Hon. members will recall that when the act was amended in 1954 the members of the C.C.F. group deplored the direction in which our housing legislation was moving. We pointed out with some alarm that the transfer of a greater measure of responsibility for housing from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation into the laps or to the tender mercies of the conventional lending institutions would bring about grave results, and indeed it has. I suggest that the very fact these amendments are being brought in today indicates an awareness on the part of the government that the private lending institutions have not measured up to the job which we expected them to do in 1954.

It is very difficult, as the hon. member who preceded me said, for housing to compete successfully in the money market with other forms of building and commercial ventures. In his statement the minister referred to the trend towards larger loans and larger incomes on the part of recipients of loans under the National Housing Act. As found at page 1878 of Hansard he went on to say:

> There is some reason for this trend because it is a good deal easier to handle a large loan than it is to handle a small one and I think some preference has been given by the different institutions to the larger loans.

Of course, that is the very point we tried to make in 1954, that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as a responsible agency of government seeking to deal with a social problem would be able to take cognizance of this fact and certainly would not give preference to those with higher incomes simply because it was more convenient or less trouble for them than to handle smaller loans. Yet, if we turn housing over to private enterprise how can we expect anything else than the very procedure which we have witnessed in recent years?

I suggest to the minister that it is the failure of the conventional lending institutions to provide the mortgage money needed for housing that has made this legislation necessary. Why this money was not made available is difficult to understand because, in the amendments brought down in 1954, there was an overly generous insurance provision which guaranteed the whole transaction at the expense of the borrower. Any risk, therefore, which would normally be involved in the lending of money was removed. It is very difficult to understand why sufficient money was not made available by the lending institutions to provide for this housing, if that is the problem as the minister suggests it is by the very fact this amendment seeks to increase the amount of money made available out of the consolidated revenue fund from $250 million to $400 million.

We are quite pleased to note that the government is putting greater reliance on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and is recognizing the fact that if we want to get the job done properly we have to take the responsibility ourselves for doing it. I suggest that the additional moneys made available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will enable them to do a better job. Now, the amount involved of course is quite interesting. If we recognize the enormity of the problem facing the country at the present time, we begin to realize how little the amount is in terms of the general need. I note that the minister, in his statement of December 4, pointed out that of the additional moneys provided for by the amendment, $100 million would be taken up in loans on lower cost housing. He suggested that perhaps a lesser amount of from $50 million to $75 million would be lent by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under other sections of the National Housing Act.

When we consider the tremendous need in this country for low rental housing, we realize how little is involved compared with the general over-all need. Unless the minister can assure the committee that the amount of money presently being made available by the conventional lending institutions will be maintained or increased, then it will simply mean we are going to increase the amount of money available for direct lending to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If the conventional lending institutions, under the insured plan, are going to reduce the amount they make available, then in the aggregate we are not going to be very much farther ahead. I believe this is something to which the members of the committee have to give careful consideration. I do not feel we can accept the assurances of the statement made by the minister that certain results are going to accrue from the passage of this resolution.

The hon. member who preceded me pointed out this very important question of the relationship of actual construction costs to the lending value placed on the dwelling. These two figures, of course, do not coincide and this involves an additional expense to be financed by the home purchaser. I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to the introduction of amendments that would bring the legislation in line with need. When I speak of "need" I am thinking in terms of the needs of people who are earning less than $3,000 or less than $3,500 a year.

The minister has stated that people can get a home with a down payment of $1,000 if they are earning $3,450 a year, but I think we will have to wait to see just how many people are able to get loans when they have incomes of $3,450. Even if we were to accept the results envisaged by the minister, we are still faced with the blunt fact that the majority of the people in Canada are excluded from the provisions of the National Housing Act. As a matter of fact, if one takes the $3,500 figure one finds that 73.1 per cent of the people of Canada earn less than $3,500 a year. Even if the legislation which the minister proposes to bring down is as good as he claims it is, it is still going to exclude almost three-quarters of the Canadian people.

I suggest that that is not good enough. I maintain that people who are earning incomes of only $3,000 or $2,000 a year are more in need of assistance under the housing act than any other group of Canadian people. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the committee, but I do want to refer briefly to the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount concerning the part played by land costs. I mention this particularly in view of the fact that I have recently received a communication from the city council of the city of Regina in which they asked me to intercede with the government in order that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations might be relaxed to the point where many areas in the city of Regina, now serviced with sewer and water and which are presently excluded from the lending provisions of the National Housing Act, might be included.

In my own city there are many people wishing to buy homes who are obliged to pay up to $2,000 for a lot. At the same time there are lots owned by the city of Regina which could be sold for $450 or $500, but which do not qualify under the regulations laid down by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These lots, therefore, under the terms of the act, cannot be made available for housing. I would suggest to the minister that serious consideration be given to some modification in the regulations to permit those areas in my own city, which are serviced by sewers and water and which are presently beyond the pale so far as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned, to be brought in at the earliest possible moment. This would make it possible to provide lower cost homes because the lots on which these houses would be built would cost much less than lots which might be purchased in other parts of the city.

Apart from the fact the legislation ignores the needs of at least 70 per cent of our people, the most glaring fault in the legislation is the failure of the government to do anything about interest rates. If people who want to buy homes under the National Housing Act are to be saddled with a tremendous debt brought about by excessively high interest rates, then of course the task of home ownership is going to be made that much more difficult. We in the C.C.F. have always argued that any reduction in the down payment should be accompanied by a reduction in interest rates. We feel that the failure of the government to introduce such a provision is the most serious flaw in the legislation coming before us. Therefore, in order to correct the situation, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That the resolution be amended by deleting the period after the word "payments" and by inserting at that point the following words: "and for a reduction in the rate of interest that may be charged by lenders under the act".

This resolution would then read, Mr. Chairman:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954 to increase from two hundred and fifty million dollars to four hundred million dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act; and also to provide for the reduction of down payments, and for a reduction in the rate of interest that may be charged by lenders under the act.

[Mr. Ellis.]

The Chairman: The hon. member will give me a few minutes in which to study the amendment.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to Your Honour that this amendment is not in order. It would involve an increased charge on the government's funds and any such proposal as this would have to be brought in by a resolution duly sponsored by a minister of the crown. I submit to you that it is entirely out of order under the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of Public Works amazes me again. The amendment does not, in my submission, create or increase any charge on the government. The amendment suggests that there should be a change in the act reducing the amount of interest that may be charged by lenders under the act. That word "lenders" was chosen quite carefully in the drafting of this amendment, having in mind that in subsection 21 of section 2 of the National Housing Act there is this definition:

"Lender" means a loan, insurance, trust or other company or corporation, trustee of trust funds, building society, credit union or other co-operative credit society authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property and a bank.

The amendment makes no reference to additional government expenditure or to interest on money lent directly by the government. It refers only to money lent under the act by private lenders as defined in the legislation. There is in the act section 4 which gives the governor in council power by regulation to prescribe the maximum rate of interest and the formula is spelled out. I need not read it in full just now. The whole point, Mr. Chairman, is that this amendment has nothing to do with increasing the charge on the government in any way. It deals only with that section of the act which enables the government to fix a maximum rate of interest that the private lending institutions may charge.

I see the Minister of Public Works getting to the edge of his chair. If he has any other points, I shall be glad to deal with them. Perhaps while I am on my feet I might as well answer any point that might occur to him. It is perfectly correct, as the minister said, that a private member cannot move an amendment to a resolution of this kind if the private member's amendment involves a charge on the government. But this is an amendment that refrains from involving any charge on the government and is simply an amendment under the terms of citation 440 of Beauchesne's third edition which reads as follows:

> The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the house with the Governor General's recommendation upon which a committee of the whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution.

I might point out to the Minister of Public Works that I have before me two instances of amendments being moved to resolutions of this kind. Of course I have chosen my instances with care. In both cases the amendments were moved by Conservative members of the House of Commons. One case was only a short while ago. On April 16, 1956, there was before the committee of the whole a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act. The minister will recall that the subject under consideration was a certain 90 per cent provision. The Conservative members on the opposition side of the house were not satisfied with the way in which that 90 per cent provision was to be applied. The hon. member for Kamloops, now the Minister of Justice, moved:

> That the resolution be amended by adding thereto after the words "not exceeding 10 per centum thereof" the following words:
> "the portion of the highway to which such increased payment is to apply to be designated by the province."

That is found at page 2980 of Hansard of April 16, 1956. A question was raised as to whether this amendment was in order and this initial ruling was given by the deputy chairman, Mr. Applewhaite:

> I might say that at the moment it does not appear to me that this proposed amendment would extend the financial commitment of the crown.

He made one or two other comments and then he said this:

> However, at the moment, before asking the committee to vote, I would be willing to consider the matter further. At the moment I am not refusing to accept the amendment.

After three or four pages of debate, in which both substance and point of order are intermixed, Mr. Applewhaite returned to the matter as recorded at page 2986 and said this:

> If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt I might say that there is a maximum provided in the resolution; that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of $250 million. Therefore I do not think it is possible for the amendment to increase the commitment. I have accepted the amendment.
> Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

The amendment was voted on. It was negatived by a vote of 74 to 38. The important point, Mr. Chairman, is that the present Minister of Justice—and I note with interest that he is now consulting the authorities—found it possible on that occasion to move an amendment to a resolution preceding a money bill, provided that it did not go beyond the financial commitment involved in the resolution itself.

The other instance that I have turned up goes back a number of years; but one must go back a number of years in order to find what happened when the Conservatives were last in power. I find that on March 29, 1932, Mr. Bennett had before the committee of the whole house a resolution preceding the bill concerning the unemployment and farm relief act of 1931. There had been an extended debate. This was one of those unhappy sessions in which closure had been used, and most of us in this house know what happens to tempers under that situation. But at any rate, when the house got into committee on the resolution preceding Mr. Bennett's bill it had become necessary, because of the passage of time, for the resolution to be amended. Let me admit readily that the amendment that was moved was proposed by another minister of the crown, namely by the then minister of justice, Mr. Guthrie, but Mr. Guthrie did not produce any royal recommendation for this amendment, arguing that it merely changed the terms of the resolution without increasing the financial commitment. There was a lengthy point of order debate in which such stalwarts as Mr. Mackenzie King, Mr. Ralston, Mr. Ian Mackenzie and others took part, with our late good friend Mr. R. B. Hanson in the chair as chairman of the committee of the whole house. But Mr. Hanson stood his ground that the amendment was in order and he used these words, as recorded at page 1505 of Hansard of March 29, 1932:

> The Chairman (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would not think it involved a greater commitment. It is simply a change in terms.

After further objection by Mr. Ralston, Mr. Hanson went on to say:

> May, at page 546, states:
> "The approval or the reduction of the expenditure under consideration, or a modification of the terms and conditions of the charge thereby created, are the matters specially entrusted to such a committee, and to these objects amendments are directed."

Now I have looked up that citation from May and I may say it goes on to say that amendments of this kind can be made only if they do not increase the financial commitment. Mr. Hanson simply said:

> That is sufficient, I should think.

I would like to point out that after a lengthy debate on the point of order was over, the ruling was accepted that the amendment was in order and it was passed by the house on that occasion.

So there, Mr. Chairman, you have two instances where a resolution preceding a money bill has been open to an amendment provided the amendment only changed the terms and did not increase the financial commitment in any way.

I submit that the amendment that has now been moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina City, does not increase the commitment in any way. It merely does to a greater extent what the minister's resolution already does. The minister's resolution seeks to change the terms of loans under the National Housing Act. My colleague's amendment makes a further change in those terms without involving one cent of additional commitment so far as the crown is concerned. It is a very simple proposition, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think the Minister of Public Works should think that every time someone on the opposition side of the house moves an amendment he should just stand up and say it is out of order.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, with regard to that last remark I really am amazed at the nerve of some people's children when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre thinks I have a lot of nerve if I get up once or twice and question an amendment that is moved, but since the hon. member himself gets up every day and sometimes two or three times a day on points of order I think I have a long way to go before I catch up with him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who raised this one?

Mr. Green: However, I do suggest that on two points this amendment is out of order. In the first place the hon. member has argued that this amendment would not make any financial commitment and he went on to say that these loans were made by lending institutions. Well, some of them are, but at the present time nearly all of the loans made under the National Housing Act are being made directly by this crown corporation, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I just read earlier this afternoon that something over $167 million of government money was committed under the plan which was announced by the present government. Now you could hardly have a case in which an amendment more directly affected crown money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister read the amendment?

Mr. Green: Of course I have read the amendment. The hon. member need not try to school teacher me like that. He seems to think he is the mentor of this house. He had a chance to be the Speaker, and probably a permanent Speaker, but he chose to remain with his party and carry on as a very active political partisan in the house. Now let him not suggest that the rest of us are not even doing him the courtesy of reading his amendments.

Then on the second point I have this to say: This amendment fails for the reason that it is indefinite. An amendment must be definite and must have a definite connection with the resolution which it is seeking to amend and with the legislation behind that resolution. I would like to point out that section 4 of the National Housing Act 1954 is one which provides for interest rates and the power therein given is to the governor in council to set by regulation a maximum rate of interest. Now this resolution has the words "and for a reduction in the rate of interest that may be charged by lenders under the act." The act leaves it wide open to a lender to charge as low a rate of interest as the lending institution may wish, and the only legal provision in the act is that the governor in council can set a ceiling over which those interest rates cannot go. So I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in seeking to tack on this amendment to the two other provisions already contained in the resolution the hon. member is proposing an amendment which is not at all relevant. You will notice the difference—

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Chairman, five o'clock.

Mr. Green: You will notice the difference in the section which provides for the down payments. There is a definite provision for the figure; the resolution brought in by the government properly deals with that matter. Therefore I submit, Mr. Chairman, on these two grounds the amendment is out of order.

The Chairman: When the house resumes at eight o'clock I hope to be in a position to deal with the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works.

It being five o'clock the committee must rise in order to permit the house to take up private and public bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Criminal Code (subversive activities).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prevent communism from extending its propaganda activities in this country. For the last few years the communist party of Canada and the Soviet embassy in Ottawa have been using the mails to pour out floods of propaganda originating in Russia and designed to establish international communism. I have here a pamphlet entitled, "The Fortieth Anniversary of the Great Social October Revolution", essays by the propaganda section of the Marxist-Leninist Institute, which openly advocates world revolution in favour of a socialist and communist system in all nations on earth. Those pamphlets have been sent to all hon. members of this house, to a large section of the Canadian population and they have been more particularly distributed in the province of Quebec. It seems to me high time that the necessary steps be taken to stop this active propaganda which is likely to contribute to the creation of communist cells whose spying is bound to be detrimental to us in the event of a war against Russia.

It will perhaps be claimed that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are keeping an eye on communist activities in this country but—and I want to stress this point—they will be powerless against the infiltration of communistic ideology among the poor, the unemployed and even among certain so-called intellectuals. All of these, once converted by that propaganda might do us considerable harm in case of war with Russia.

I have already submitted this bill on various occasions when I was sitting on the government side. Everybody here knows its contents. This year I have introduced changes to make it identical with an act passed by the United States government which, according to Mr. Edgar Hoover, chief of the federal bureau of investigation, has proved most effective in curbing communist activities.

I should like this afternoon by keeping my remarks brief to avoid taking up too much of the only hour reserved to a study of this bill so that hon. members who favour the adoption of the bill may vote before the house has used up all the time reserved to the consideration of public bills. I would therefore ask those who are in favour of the bill simply to abstain from any prolonged discussion which would rule out all possibility of this bill going through for otherwise it would drop down to the bottom of the order paper.

There is nothing to prevent us from approving the bill on second reading and then referring it to a committee of the house which would consider and even amend it should the committee feel that it falls short of the objective I have in mind. I strongly object, however, to any attempt to kill it by protracted discussion which indeed would prevent a committee of the house from giving it further study for what I am seeking through this bill is to prevent communist propaganda from spreading in our country at a time when the taxpayer is being heavily burdened precisely to face this enemy.

It might perhaps be suggested that if this bill were to pass it would lead to a breakoff of our diplomatic relations with Russia. This would be a misconception because the United States, in spite of their having adopted similar legislation, still have an ambassador in Moscow. I may add that the former leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), has often advocated in this house legislation against the communist party.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, regardless of how laudable we feel this type of legislation may be, that is the purpose to which it might be put in connection with the safeguarding of our institutions in this country, I believe it has some serious shortcomings in its ability to root out the type of person who might eventually be prosecuted under it. It seems to me that by far the best way to ensure that the type of person who would be subjected to prosecution under the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code would be known to the public would be for us to continue to see that they are out in the open, subject to public scrutiny in the ordinary course of our daily living.

In connection with the amendments proposed by the bill which is before us it would be almost impossible to determine what constituted a totalitarian dictatorship. As a matter of fact before I rose to my feet I was just in the process of going to the table of the house to see if it were possible to find even a dictionary definition of the term "totalitarian dictatorship". I am almost certain that no reference to it would be found in any legal dictionary and it seems there would be such wide latitude in the interpretation of the phrase "totalitarian dictatorship" that it would be impossible to maintain a prosecution under the particular section of the Criminal Code which the bill before us seeks to add.

It will be observed that almost all the subclauses in clause 1 which seeks to insert a section to be known as section 62 (a) following section 62 of the Criminal Code contain a reference to the term "totalitarian dictatorship". I have not had an opportunity of consulting the Criminal Code in this respect but I am almost certain that this term is not included in the original definition section.

As I said the whole intent and purpose of this section would go for nought if we were to get into any degree of difference of opinion about the meaning of these words. The words appear in subclause (a) of clause 1 as follows:

(a) attempts in any manner to establish in Canada a totalitarian dictatorship—

In subclause (b):

(b) performs or attempts to perform any act with intent to facilitate or aid in bringing about the establishment in Canada of such a totalitarian dictatorship;

In subclause (c):

(c) actively participates in the management, direction, or supervision of any movement to establish in Canada such a totalitarian dictatorship;

In subclause (d):

(d) actively participates in the management, direction, or supervision of any movement to facilitate or aid in bringing about the establishment in Canada of such a totalitarian dictatorship;

Subclause (e) reads:

(e) conspires to do anything made unlawful by this subsection,—

This of course again refers to the terms of the subclauses I have just read out. It seems to me that if we are in any doubt as to the proper definition of the key words in this amendment we could not expect any successful prosecution under it. As a matter of fact it reminds me somewhat of some of the legislation we had in the immediate post-war period. The wartime prices and trade board was asked to prosecute people for sales of various articles, which had formerly been under price control, at prices which were unreasonable and unjust. If you refer back to decisions of the Supreme Court of Ontario at that time you will find that the learned justices determined that it was impossible, under those circumstances, to interpret the words "unreasonable and unjust".

I might say, sir, that we have a habit of describing certain types of governments as being totalitarian dictatorships. On the other hand, from time to time, we seem to be able to get along with them; we seem to meet with them around the bargaining table and successfully carry out negotiations of various kinds for the general betterment of conditions throughout the world. It might be that with this type of designation we would run into continuing trouble in attempting, in these very serious times, to arrive at some method of communication with governments which might be described in the terms used in this bill.

I think it will be agreed, sir, that this legislation involves not only the descriptive words to which I have referred, but the second clause, section 154A, having to do with the use of the mails for the distribution of literature, in fact, represents the same kind of thinking. You will note that this section reads:

Everyone who posts, or causes to be posted, for transmission or delivery by or through the post any communist newspaper or any newspaper the purpose of which is to establish in Canada a totalitarian dictatorship the direction and control of which is to be vested in, or exercised by or under the domination or control of, any foreign government, foreign organization, of foreign individual . . .

Here again, sir, we find the use of the same words "totalitarian dictatorship". As a matter of fact, sir, we are asked to include in the Criminal Code the word "communist". I would respectfully suggest that there is even some doubt in my mind whether the Criminal Code contains any reference to or definition of the word "communist". I think, sir, that what we may be trying to achieve may be fairly important in so far as the government of the country is concerned. I know, that you, Mr. Speaker, are aware that we receive through the mails almost daily in the House of Commons literature of the type which my hon. friend has attempted to describe in this section. Sometimes I have thought it is not the type of literature which should be posted through our mails, but at other times I have felt that I would be a great deal happier if I knew or was able to read the thinking of people who disagree so violently with us as do the people who have used the mails for this purpose. Taking it all into consideration, sir, I have felt that perhaps we may have a better understanding of some of the other sides of the questions which come before us daily in the exercise of our government powers.

But you can see, sir, the problem which would face the Post Office Department in attempting to supervise or police—and I think it would fall to them to do this particular job—the literature of this kind which is coming through the mails daily. First of all, I assume it would be almost impossible to screen all the literature that comes through in this way. If it is picked up on spot checking, as they used to do with some of our mail during the last war, it would be necessary for the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) on each occasion to refer the particular item or piece of literature to the Department of Justice and to the law enforcement officers. Then, of course, we would get into the problem of determining what is the true meaning of "communist" because, as I say, I do not think it is defined in the code. We would be up against the question of determining the meaning of the expression "totalitarian dictatorship" and I am afraid, we would find we would be hopelessly entangled in legislation which would not bring any real protection to the Canadian people.

There is no doubt in my mind about what the hon. member is attempting to accomplish.

It is just as great a worry to us as it is to him. Whether, as a result of this legislation being placed on the order paper, it may mean that more serious study will be given to this particular problem will be for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to decide. I do not think that anything but good will come from it, and perhaps we can look the situation over thoroughly with a view to seeing if some kind of legislation may be devised to better take care of this particular situation.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, when the bill first came to my office and I had a chance to read it over I immediately said that its purpose was good. After thinking over the purpose that it was intended to accomplish I saw the situation in a different light. This thought ran through my mind. From the time the revolution took place in Russia, when violent changes were made, what have we accomplished by the methods we adopted to see if we could frustrate, handicap or defeat communism as we know it? In the early days of the advent of communism in this country we did not take it very seriously, because we did not think that communism could for one moment gain a foothold in Canada. I still think there is no possibility of communism gaining a foothold in this country. Communism gets a foothold in a country only where there is poverty and where people are living on subsistence levels. Be that as it may, it is a very serious situation that we have to consider. If we become complacent about it and just take for granted that it is not going to make any advances in this country, then it becomes a real danger; but I do not think that situation will arise or even make any serious progress.

I can remember some individuals in Toronto who were of the communist complexion in the early days and the methods they adopted to advocate the cause of communism. The inroads they made at that time were not too serious. There was a John Macdonald and his wife who were quite active in the labour movement in Toronto. They took a very prominent part in the trades and labour council of Toronto. They were advocating the policies of bolshevism as it was called in those days. There were a good many academic discussions about bolshevism, Leninism, Trotsky and so on and what parties would comprise communism at that time. But it soon became apparent that no parties were to be allowed in Russia and that communism was a philosophy, and in a way, operated without any parties.

Mr. Macdonald and his wife were both very admirable people. They were respected because of their education and their high standing in the community. They were accepted generally throughout the city, particularly in the labour field. But they were not aggressive enough for the communists. They were not possessed of the spirit of the Lenin and Trotsky segment of communism and ceased to take a very active part in communist affairs in Toronto.

Then Mr. Tim Buck was put in charge. I can readily realize what the hon. member has in mind when he refers to the progress they are making because in my own union we did not take too serious a look at the situation and we ended up by finding that the president and secretary of our union were avowed communists. They were representing our particular union at meetings of the trades and labour council of Toronto.

That was also the time of Jimmie Simpson, one of the outstanding labour men of that day. In fact, he was at one time a controller in the city of Toronto. He came to me and said that the communists were making certain inroads into the trades and labour council and asked me to do something to help to get our union back on the rails. I had not taken an active part before but I proceeded to do so then and it was not very long before the two officers were removed and we were back in control. The influence of the communists should not be taken too seriously. But it does take the co-ordinated effort of all who believe that inroads can be made if we become complacent, as I mentioned a moment ago.

In the course of events it was not very long before we put Mr. Tim Buck in his place. He carried on as their leader and he did enlist some outstanding men such as Charlie Sims and Stewart Smith. They embraced the communist philosophy and at one time the city of Toronto even had a communist controller and three communist aldermen, something that we did not believe it was possible for them to attain. But we contained them and kept them in their place until the war came along. Then they went underground and that is something I want to emphasize in connection with what the hon. member is trying to accomplish through this legislation. He desires to defeat the communists completely and wipe them out and that is where the danger lies so far as the legislation is concerned. It is not possible to wipe out any organization to the extent that the hon. member has in mind. You will drive these people undergound and when you do they become more dangerous than if they are out in the open. If they are out in the open you can watch them, trace them and trail them and you have a better understanding of what they are planning.

In Toronto such members of the communist movement as Joe Salsberg, a very affable and clever fellow, and A. A. Macleod succeeded in becoming members of the legislature of Ontario, and they always presented their very best front. They took advantage of every slight depression or adverse conditions to advocate the cause of communism, but at no time were we unable to contain them. As soon as the ban on communists was lifted they were back in their old circles and engaging in their old activities and it was much easier to keep them under control and observation.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing a remarkably good job of keeping these people under observation. Under the control of that organization they will be kept where they rightfully belong. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) referred to the fact that the literature which reaches our desks is rather annoying. I used to take it as it came to my desk and throw it in the wastepaper basket as not fit to be read but lately I have started to read it. Over the years this literature has been coming to my desk through different avenues. The branding of a man as a red or a communist was sufficient for people to say that he was a person who ought to be ostracized and that no consideration should be given to that movement. A lot of good people in this country have been branded as communists because they have had advanced and radical ideas. They have been smeared when they advocated something for the general good and have been called reds or communists or given some other appellation that indicated they belonged to that ideology.

Even Jimmie Simpson was classified and branded as a red in his early days in Toronto but he turned out to be one of the most sincere and ardent advocates of the poor and the labour people of Toronto. At the time of his unfortunate end by accident he rated very high in the city of Toronto. Yet at one time he was classified as a communist.

As I said, I have taken the trouble to read some of the literature that has come to my desk and I find there is a lot of good subject matter. Mind you, I would say that about 75 or 80 per cent of it is just tripe and does not come anywhere near the ideals of the people of this country with regard to the right of the individual to freedom of thought, freedom of assembly and to follow the dictates of his own conscience. Nevertheless, I feel we are capable of containing these people and should not be above reading some of these articles.

I recall one I read last week, which I thought was interesting. The writer was talking about sports and how sport had got into the realm of professionalism. He referred to the methods followed in the days when we were young when sport was primarily a game and people took part for the fun of it whereas now those taking part in rugby, hockey and other games dress in armour as if they are going into a battle. The writer pointed out that if sport is to be what it should be it should get back to being an honest game in which everyone can indulge, have fun and receive the physical training and so on that appeal to people's common sense.

The mere fact that it has been branded as communist literature does not mean that we should not read it. I went through a lot of it and I found that there were worth-while articles. The fact that this literature emanates from a particular group is no reason why we in this house should brand it as something that should not enter the country. After all, I think we should pride ourselves on the fact that we can keep our own philosophy, our own ideals and our way of life, even though this literature might be available.

While I would like to go along with the legislation suggested by the hon. member, I do know that in the past we have never been able to accomplish this objective and drove the communists underground. We proved that during the war. Even the investigation induced by Gouzenko, when Gouzenko, tried to tell us what was happening in our country. Finally he had to appeal to the prime minister because everybody was sceptical. An investigation was conducted and we found out what was going on. All this took place because we drove them underground. Had we allowed them to operate in the open, we would have been able to pick them off when we wanted to do so.

There was a group operating right in the Russian embassy in Ottawa and they were doing so because we had driven the communists underground, one also sat in this house. I think under the circumstances, knowing the way they have operated in the last 25 or 30 years since the Russian rebellion, we should leave them out in the open where we can observe them. We want them to be where we can see what they are doing and where we can get them if they are trying to upset the government of the day through subversive activities.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): I want to compliment the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) on the very sincere and very eloquent, if very short, appeal he made. I want to tell him through you, sir, that every one of the hon. members in this house sympathizes with his objective and appreciates what he has in mind. But, Mr. Speaker, it is only a question of what is the best means of attaining the same end. No one can question the sincerity of the hon. member who has moved this resolution. Nevertheless, must he not realize that since 1950, when this very problem was debated so vehemently in this house, conditions have changed very materially. I am open to be convinced by my hon. friend that the legislation which he suggests should be put on the statute books; I have an open mind.

I could not help but refer to the words of the then prime minister, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent), as found in Hansard for 1950, page 2086:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not think there are many Canadians who do not believe that there is ideological warfare going on and that there has been for a number of years a conflict between communism and Christian civilization. I am sure that there are very few Canadians who do not wish to see that war won by Christian civilization. It is a matter of opinion as to what are the best methods to be adopted to prevent the spread of communism in our country. I firmly believe that it has diminished over the last few years.

Now, those words were spoken in 1950 when there was one scare, one alarm, after the other. The then prime minister believed the problem had diminished, and if that was so in 1950 might I suggest to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency it is doubly so at the present time. Indeed, today the threat has receded in Canada to such an extent that one can only wonder whether there is a threat at all. All the prominent communists with the exception of Tim Buck, who recently had his way paid to Russia to meet with the communist party, have disappeared. They have at last been forced to find work. One finds them in different capacities, as waiters, shoe shiners and other vocations in which they are earning their daily bread.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that they no longer espouse a cause which is popular. It seems to me it might be a mistake, and I say this with the greatest deference to my friend, to bring in legislation at this time since there is no real desire for it. After all, the communist thrives on opposition. Everybody thrives on opposition, and without opposition people often disappear because of the futility of the cause which they espouse. I cannot help but think that nobody would be more delighted than the communists themselves to have a bill such as is before the house passed. It would give them fresh incentive, fresh hope, because then they would have some opposition which would unify them and would tentatively drive them underground where they could carry on their dire work.

They are in retreat, they are rent in twain. They have nothing in common. They have not even a doctrine in common. How different it is since the death of Stalin. Until that time communists were united in their common belief Stalin was a superman, almost a god on earth, and that communism itself was a sound doctrine. With the passing of Stalin and the explosion of the myth which was Stalin, we find the communists in Russia terribly divided, and this situation is reflected amongst the communists in Canada. Rent in twain as they are, without any fixed ideal, without any fixed objective, they are finally disintegrating and disappearing.

It is my respectful submission to my hon. friend, and in this of course I may be mistaken, that to make them prominent again, to make them popular again, even popular through the opposition that is being raised in this house against them, is exactly what they want. They are a badly disillusioned crowd. They believed in the principles of communism, but now they see there is no such thing as communism even in Russia. They say that they were the socialist states of Russia, but with the passing of Stalin they have found that it was one of the greatest autocracies, one of the greatest tyrannies of the world. Even the sincere communists in Canada have been disillusioned, disappointed and under the circumstances are ready to quit.

I think one of the most striking examples, Mr. Speaker—my hon. friend will perhaps agree with this—is that Her Majesty's minister for external affairs, running against a communist, was able to obtain over 10,000 votes against 212 for the communist. Even a dog catcher, without any experience in any affairs except that of dog catching could have done much better. In this world of ours we cannot afford to be narrow minded. We cannot afford not to heed the words of the hon. member, for whom I have so much respect. I have respect for him because he represents that other great race which forms an important part of our country. I say to him that he speaks beautiful English and I, in my stumbling French, will try to tell him what the situation is:

(Translation):

It was well and truly spoken, sir, in terms worthy of the pulpit. I congratulate him and, with your permission I will now attempt to speak French. I hope I do as well in French as he did in English.

May I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that in the great fight which Canada has been waging against communism since the war, our greatest bulwark against that philosophy which at one time threatened us has probably been the province of Quebec and the great French Canadian people.

We like French Canadians for many reasons: their outlook upon life, pervaded with what is called "joie de vivre" (joy of living), their natural kindness, their courtesy, their good manners, their appreciation of the fact that there are greater and more important things in life than the mere accumulation of material wealth. For all those reasons, we esteem the French Canadians, but what we admire most in them is their steadfast, unshakable faith, and their deep, bitter enmity to the godless doctrine of communism. For all this, we raise our hats to French Canadians, one and all.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walker: For all of this, hats off to French Canadians, without exception.

It is time we practised our French today. I will try even harder next time.

(Text):

You can therefore appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that we of the English speaking part of this house appreciate perhaps more than anything else in this house the contribution of the French Canadians to keep us on solid ground because never in the history of our dominion have we had a more solid, substantial body of 5 million French Canadians who, through thick and thin, through good weather and bad, have always wholeheartedly maintained their faith in the one Supreme Being and their hatred and detestation of communism. All of us appreciate that.

We know that communism, in its inceptions, and because of what it propagates and because of its very godlessness, is a hideous monster. It is a demon from hell incarnate. It is a blasphemer of God. It is the destroyer of millions in the image of God. By whom and for what purpose? By nations crazed with the lust for things material and with no thought of things spiritual. Have we not recently but staggeringly emerged from two of the most stupendous, blind and furious struggles ever known to the ages, to be met, when it is all over, by this communist threat which we are glad to see in this our dominion has faded out. It will continue to fade out, so long as hon. members of this house, of which the hon. member opposite me is a distinguished member, can guide the destiny of our dominion in such a way—above party, above race, above partisanship, above "isms" of every kind—so that we can keep this country prosperous, so that we can keep this country what Sir John Macdonald planned it should be, namely the country of the twentieth century where peace, happiness, bounty and goodwill are predominant. That is the best way in which to abolish the threat of communism.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to bring this discussion down to the practical level, may I say that the section of the Criminal Code, which I need not read to hon. members of this house—they are no doubt conversant with it—namely section 60 covers, I submit with great respect, every possible contingency which might be raised by the threat of communism. To my mind, speaking as a lawyer and speaking also as the parliamentary assistant to my distinguished friend and colleague the Minister of Justice, it is my respectful submission that there is at the present time no need for legislation such as this because section 60 of the Criminal Code covers every possible situation. But nevertheless if I am wrong in this submission, I am willing to be convinced. If my hon. friend, through his eloquence and that of his supporters, can convince me otherwise, then I am willing to be convinced that there should be an amendment. But let us all think well before we stir up and give fresh life and fresh hope to what is at present a very dormant cause.

Mr. F. C. McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, in rising, at this moment in this discussion I find a considerable degree of confusion. Certainly I am confused by a number of things about this debate. If I may be permitted to elaborate as to the nature of this confusion, may I say that I was under the impression during the recent election campaign that certain leading members of the so-called Liberal party laid claim to certain small "l" liberal principles. In fact, I recall from memory a statement made by the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent), then prime minister, in Winnipeg to the effect that he wished his brand of Liberalism to be worthy of the small "l" as well as the capital "L". I recall further the words of one who looks to be very promising in the forthcoming race for the leadership of the so-called Liberal party to the effect that he liked to think that over the years the capital "L" Liberal party has been the best embodiment of small "l" liberal philosophy. Certainly the suggestion that information of any description should be suppressed is not, I submit, consistent with any interpretation of small "l" liberalism. This afternoon, from the capital "L" Liberal side of the house we have such a suggestion. From this side of the house we have had objections.

May I refer to the principles outlined by John Stuart Mill, who was an important man in small "l" liberal circles, to the effect that everything in the way of literature is either all good, part good and part bad or all bad. If you apply suppression and censorship—which is what part II of this amendment amounts to—to something that is all good, the good in it is lost. If you apply censorship to something which is half good and half bad, the good part of it is lost. If you apply censorship to something that is all wrong, you merely strengthen it by suppressing it.

These principles in part have been enunciated by hon. members from this side of the house who have preceded me in speaking on this matter. If I may be permitted to recall an article which I was asked to write for the week end edition of the Globe and Mail of June 9, I should like to do so. In the city of Toronto a Conservative candidate was asked to write on the Liberal party, 1957; and a Liberal candidate on the other hand, was requested to write on the Conservative party, 1957. I was fortunate enough to be asked to write on the Liberal party, 1957.

In that article, speaking again from memory, the conclusions I reached and the statements I made were to the effect that, by reason of their activities, the leaders of the so-called Liberal party had no right to lay claim to the honourable title or small l liberal. I suggested further that if voters on the following day or the day after that voted against or to remove the Liberal party they would not be deserting their party but would be voting against the leaders who had deserted them. This I submit is but one more piece of evidence of the fact that this party, which you may recall was originally known as the Liberal-Conservative party, has inherited the support of those people in Canada who believe in liberal principles and do not merely preach them.

Mr. F. C. Stinson (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all through you, sir, extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) who has spoken with such eloquence on this matter this afternoon. I have had the pleasure of hearing that hon. member speak in a number of places and in great variety of circumstances and I can assure the house that the eloquence he has displayed today is indicative of the manner in which he may be expected to speak in this house over the years to come.

Now it is perhaps appropriate that a matter of this kind should be under discussion here this afternoon at the very time when certain leaders of the government of this country are in consultation with the leaders of the free nations of the western world who are attempting to work out programs under which the peace and security of the world may be maintained. While they are so engaged I think it is perhaps appropriate that we should be considering the kind of legislation which is proposed today and which is concerned with protecting the people of this country against the activities of those who might seek to bring us, through their actions within this country, under the domination of a foreign power.

I am pleased that we have this opportunity to discuss a measure which has to do with the liberty of the subject. In my constituency there are several thousands of Canadian citizens who have come to this country since the end of the second great war. I have the opportunity each weekend of meeting many of these people. I would like to tell hon. members of this house that while many of these people when they came here had in mind the building of a better way of life, from an economic and material standpoint, in most cases they came here to live in a country where they might enjoy freedom, the freedom which they had lost in the countries from which they came.

It therefore seems to me that when we consider legislation of this kind we must be very very careful in assessing the possible invasions of those freedoms which we now have with respect to our political activities. I have read the proposed amendment to the code with care and with great interest and I think it may very well be that the present provisions of the Criminal Code respecting those matters referred to in the proposed legislation may already accomplish in a very satisfactory way the objectives which the hon. member has in mind. I refer particularly to those sections of the code which define sedition and which refer to the offences relating to seditious activity and provide penalties for persons found to be guilty of engaging in such activities. I think that any of the activities which the hon. member plans to cover in the legislation he has put forward in his proposal this afternoon are already adequately set out in the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the offence to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It now being six o'clock the house will resume in committee of the whole the discussion of the resolution which was interrupted at five o'clock for private and public bills.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, DOWN PAYMENTS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Green—Mr. Courtemanche in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954 to increase from two hundred and fifty million dollars to four hundred million dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act; and also to provide for the reduction of down payments.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Before the committee rose at five o'clock the hon. member for Regina City had moved an amendment to the resolution respecting the National Housing Act in the following words:

That the resolution be amended by deleting the period after the word "payments" and by inserting at that point the following words: "and for a reduction in the rate of interest that may be charged by lenders under the act."

During the dinner hour I had an opportunity to read the remarks made by hon. members when they were discussing the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works. I have also had an opportunity to study the authorities in regard to the relevancy of the proposed amendment and I would like to read those authorities to the committee. Campion in his introduction to the procedure of the House of Commons, fifteenth edition, at page 278 states:

The scope of amendment is limited by the terms of the resolution which has received the King's recommendation. Any amendment exceeding the terms of this resolution would amount to the exercise by the house of the initiative in expenditure which is constitutionally reserved to the Crown.

It should be clear that not only any increase in the amount of the charge recommended but any alteration in the objects to which it is directed, even if no additional charge is incurred, implies the exercise of such an initiative and is therefore out of order. The King's recommendation may be figuratively represented as drawing a line round the objects of expenditure set forth, often in great detail, in the recommended resolution. Any changes entirely within, or exclusions from, this circle are in order. But nothing may be brought into it from outside.

May in his fifteenth edition at pages 678 and 679 in discussing this point says:

The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand or recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications, expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea).]

Citation 439 of Beauchesne's third edition reads in part as follows:

The object of the resolution recommended by the Crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure.

On the ground that the amendment attempts to impose a charge upon the crown, as the Minister of Public Works has stated, the amendment is of course out of order. On the other hand an amendment must have some meaning and must be relevant to the subject under consideration. I can find no provision relating to interest rates in the resolution before the committee. Therefore, basing my decision on the citations quoted above and on citation 344 of Beauchesne's third edition which in part reads as follows:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed—

I must rule that the amendment is out of order on the ground that it is not relevant to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is indeed an extremely timely one and the Minister of Public Works is to be congratulated for bringing it in at this time. Hon. members I am sure will agree that over the past 18 months this house has heard many discussions on the problem of housing and the relationship of tight money thereto. It has been frequently said that one of the reasons the country was finding itself in the awkward position of having so many unemployed was by reason of the fact that we did not have any money allotted to our housing scheme as we had in earlier periods of relative prosperity.

It would be the tragedy of all time, and in fact it probably is, that the conditions apparent today in housing are such that we have thousands and thousands of people who are desirous of owning their own homes but who have been denied and are being denied the right to do so merely because they lack the financial means which makes it possible for them to partake in the terms set out in the National Housing Act and the regulations made thereunder.

The fact is, however, as I noticed with some regret that the proposed amendments to the act are not received throughout the country as enthusiastically as many of us supposed they would be. I have a clipping from a daily newspaper, the British Columbian, dated December 9, 1957, which is headed, "Few Benefits Seen From N.H.A. Changes" and which reads in part as follows:

The Conservative government last week handed the voters a bright, shiny apple in the form of amended N.H.A. regulations—

I am sure that sounds very gratifying to the minister but the paragraph continues:

—but it will take up to three months for the voter to discover the worm.

I recognize that this article might be somewhat biased in its views because it expresses only the thought of certain real estate agents in respect of the application of the act. However I think it warrants some consideration because these were the views of a group of real estate people who are a part of the over-all scheme of selling homes. After citing the above opinion of two prominent realtors the article continues:

Their findings were backed up at the weekend by the Vancouver real estate board, which termed "inaccurate and greatly exaggerated" first impressions of low down payments on N.H.A. homes. The city realtors said that the new loan regulations, aimed at creating employment, would actually have an adverse effect in the next two months.

They added that the promise of N.H.A. homes for from $1,000 for a $10,000 house and $3,200 for a $16,000 house was "not borne out by the facts".

People are going to be awfully disappointed when they try to buy an N.H.A. home for $1,000 down. There is going to be the complaint that the builder has grabbed up the extra money," said Mr. Williamson.

That is the thinking of a New Westminster real estate agent. Further on in the article I find the following important comment:

Mr. Noseworthy said that the lending value of a house was usually from $2,000 to $3,000 below the minimum amount for which the property could be sold.

In simpler terms, a contractor may put up a house for an actual cost to himself of $12,000. His N.H.A. loan will be based on this figure. He will sell the house for $1,500 to $2,000 more, which means the buyer will still have to make up the difference. At the most, the buyer's down payment will be reduced $800.

The two realtors said the Ottawa announcement had had an immediate effect on the New Westminster area housing market.

"Many realtors have had sales cancelled by people who think that in a couple of months they will be able to buy an N.H.A. house for $1,000 down," said Mr. Williamson.

Another realtor quoted in this article is a Vancouver realtor, a member of the Vancouver real estate board who said:

—false hopes that good homes can be bought here for as little as $1,500 down can only lead to disappointment.

This is a consideration which I feel the government should take under advisement, the fact that many people will be disappointed because they expect as a result of the announcement made by the minister they will be able to obtain a home for $1,000 down. It may be that the government through the regulations will take such remedial action as is necessary to make it possible for homes to be made available for $1,000 down and I would be delighted to see such action taken.

As I indicated earlier, the question of housing has been discussed very often in this house. The Minister of Public Works has been possibly one of the most loquacious in respect of housing needs and he is probably as familiar as anyone is with what he said. The Minister of Agriculture likewise had a great deal to say about housing, and because the Minister of Public Works might just not know what the Minister of Agriculture had to say from time to time I shall read what the Minister of Agriculture said on April 1, 1957, as reported in Hansard at page 2920:

I should like to turn to another matter, Mr. Speaker. One of the notable omissions in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance is any review of the present situation in regard to housing construction, or any measures designed to improve it. During the latter part of the 1956 session we had many indications that the tight money policy of the government was having, and was likely to have, very serious effects on the housing industry. The replies of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works to inquiries made in this house last summer, and again throughout this session, as to what measures were contemplated to prevent a great decline in house building were really nothing more than a sort of soothing syrup.

Of course, the Minister of Agriculture has been accustomed to using fine phrases in criticizing some of the actions that the former government took along similar lines. While I am delighted that there is to be an amendment to the act, I also must agree with the Minister of Agriculture that perhaps the terminology he used in the quotation I have just given might apply equally at the present moment.

The hon. member for Regina City proposed an amendment which was commendable in every sense of the word. The people of this country realize full well that the interest rate paid on housing loans eats up a great deal of the amount used as a payment on a house; but—and there is a "but"—a question comes to my mind immediately and it is a serious one because it is something that we have been up against in the past several months. If we reduce the interest rate, will money be made available by private companies to make it possible for a continued expansion in housing that we would like to see? It is a very serious problem. It is a fact that we can borrow money on the open market at probably 6 per cent to 7 per cent. But when it comes to housing loans, and we try to reduce the interest rate to a point where the people can afford to pay it, we find at this time the money is denied us. It is indeed a very serious problem. The government should make it its business to see whether it is possible to bring the interest rate permitted on all loans in the country to the point where the public would be in a better position to pay and get the money at the same time. I know it is a difficult question. I realize it full well because if the people or the lending institutions who have the money do not get the interest rate which they have the right to demand, then the money will go across the line to the United States or to someone else who is prepared to pay the interest rate.

The suggestion that the interest rate on housing should be 4½ per cent is even unreasonably high because, since the Bank of Canada issues money at a lower interest rate, I believe the function of the bank should be to give Canada money at cost so that Canadians themselves would benefit thereby and not be paying an unduly large amount of their payments in interest in their endeavours to buy houses.

I did indicate that this question has been discussed frequently in this house. The lumbering industry in my province is in a desperate condition, which has been brought about by this and other factors. The fact that we have not a foreign market has affected it as well, of course, but the fact that the tight money policy had an adverse effect on housing loans made the problem just that much more acute. The effect has been that more than 50,000 men in my province who are dependent on a $500 million industry have practically lost their positions. Probably it is significant that in the change of government the former minister of trade and commerce, Mr. C. D. Howe, was not elected to this house. Probably the reason we have the present government is that he made statements such as the one I shall now quote which appeared in the Financial Times of February 15, 1957. The article is headed:

"Get Back to Normal" Howe Tells Industry Via Lumbermen

The article reads in part, and I shall not read very much of it:

And finally, and most significantly, the lumbering industry can not expect the government to do anything about it.

The reason we have had a change of government, Mr. Chairman, is that the lumbering industry expected the government to do something about it. If this housing plan that is proposed does not do all that we hope it will, then it is just going to be that much eyewash so far as the lumbermen in my own province are concerned. I am hopeful that it will be of considerable help. I expect it will be. I have said so before. If the people in British Columbia and in the rest of Canada are not in a position to find the down payment of $1,000 or more they will still be denied the right to buy a house and, of course, our industry will suffer. The relation of this problem to the unemployment situation has been well demonstrated, and it is one of the reasons why so many of us have asked from time to time to have a change made in the present interest rate. We are hoping that it will do something for the industry as a whole.

One of the objections that I have to the present amendment—and I wish that the minister had gone farther—is that it means that a man can only buy a house—that is, a man who has a desire to get one—if he has an income of approximately $5,000. When we were discussing the income tax bill the other day the Minister of Finance indicated that there were some 3 million Canadians who had an annual income which required them to pay income tax on not more than $2,000. This afternoon the hon. member for Regina City quoted figures to show that 81.6 per cent of the Canadian workers earn less than $4,000 a year. This act, even as amended, is not going to be of any particular value to the people who are desperately in need of houses.

The problem of interest rates, which I mentioned a few moments ago, was also brought to the attention of the government in a brief submitted to the federal government by the 39th annual general meeting of the Canadian construction association on February 26 of this year. I recognize that another administration was in office at that time. I draw the minister's attention to pages 4 and 5 of the brief, where I find the following:

The housebuilding section of the construction industry has to date been most seriously affected by the present credit situation and the competition for investment funds.

I would say that bears out some of the arguments I presented earlier with respect to the impossibility of getting money at a lower rate of interest.

It is still too early to assess whether or not the recent increase to 6 per cent from 5½ per cent in the interest rate for National Housing Act loans will be effective in increasing the amount of investment funds allocated for this purpose by the lending institutions.

We know as a matter of fact that increasing the rate to 6 per cent did not help. Despite all the hopes that the former administration had in that respect, no greater amount of money was made available for housing.

One certain result of the increase in interest rates, however, will be an added average expense of $900 to the homeowner spread over the life of the mortgage. In the association's submission to you a year ago it was stated: ". . . most of those with N.H.A. mortgages have annual incomes of $5,000 or more. Relatively few earning less than $3,600 a year finance the purchase of a house under the N.H.A. and yet the intent of the original national housing legislation was to assist those with modest incomes to own their own home."

That is a very pertinent statement. When the National Housing Act was put on the statute books in the first instance its purpose was to give the man who wanted to buy his own home and who earned $3,600 or less the opportunity to purchase such a home. That is being denied today. I do not feel the present act is doing much to alleviate that situation or that the proposed changes will do so either. Despite the earlier statement respecting the point of view of the real estate agents, I am fully aware that even if we say to the individual that he can buy a home by paying $1,000 down it will be just as difficult for him to find $1,000 as $1,400. For that reason I commend to the minister's attention the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hamilton South respecting the rent-lease idea and also the suggestion of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska who advocated following the same method used in the United States where a down payment of $400 on a $10,000 home is considered as sufficient.

I realize that there will be difficulties but the problem must be met. The objective in building homes is to provide homes for people who cannot afford the expensive type of luxury home because they do not earn enough to begin with or they have not even been able to save $1,000. In order to assist in financing I would urge the government to make use of the credit unions. Let the government make capital available to them so that they can make loans to their membership. In so doing the government will not only be helping the credit unions but also the individual who wishes to own his own home. I would say that the credit unions should have the same guarantee respecting housing loans as is now found under the insurance clause in the National Housing Act.

I should also like to draw the attention of the minister to a brief submitted to the former minister of public works by a large construction firm in the lower mainland of British Columbia. I am satisfied that when the Minister of Public Works hears the name he will recognize it. I refer to Greenall Brothers, a very well known firm. The management of the company was good enough to provide me with a copy of the brief and I should like to read parts of it and make certain comments with respect to the subject matter because I think this is going to be very pertinent not necessarily at the moment but in 1958 when we run into the problem of raising more money. The brief reads in part as follows:

> May we say at the outset that we are not against the principle of credit restriction as we feel the need for some control is self-evident in every car lot and appliance house across Canada . . .

That is self-evident. In that regard may I suggest that if the government should consider implementing credit restrictions at some future date those credit restrictions should not be imposed against a major industry such as the housing industry, as has been the case in the past year and a half, but rather against the use of credit to purchase smaller items such as appliances and so on. I believe that today there is some $814 million on the books of various merchants across the land. If that money were put into housing it would provide homes for a good number of people. But there is a more important point. It is not too difficult for the housewife to wait an additional six months to buy a General Electric teakettle at $14.95 but it is a lot more difficult to do without a home as so many people are wont to do because they do not have the wherewithal to purchase a home and they have pretty well used up their credit in some other way. The brief goes on to say:

> The firm of Greenall Bros. Ltd., have specialized in the production of low cost homes for income brackets of up to $4,000—

I should like the minister to recognize that fact. This firm has made it their specialty to make homes available to those with incomes of less than $4,000. I continue with the brief:

> The claim by C.M.H.C. that unsold N.H.A. homes in the Vancouver area constitute a surplus is not a valid one because the unsold houses are all at a cost level that effectively excludes the low income purchaser and we defy C.M.H.C. or any other body to show us unsold N.H.A. homes in the $9,000 to $11,000 cost range.

In keeping with that, Mr. Chairman, I have here a copy of the Financial Post of October 5, 1957 in which there is a table with the heading, "These Houses Didn't Sell." I find that 75 homes costing less than $10,000 did not sell. Between $10,000 and $14,999 there were 794, between $15,000 and $19,999 there were 671, over $20,000 there were 872 and there were 245 with regard to which the price was unknown. The total to the end of August was 2,657, and I would have you note, sir, that of the total of 2,657 only 75 of the homes costing less than $10,000 did not sell while 872 of those costing over $20,000 had not been sold or about one-third of the total number. The other figures are quite uniform, 794,671 and 872.

There, indeed, is the problem in a nutshell. The people who require assistance are not going to get it under the proposed changes in the act. Homes costing less than $10,000 represented only 3 per cent of the total number of homes still for sale at the end of August in the whole of Canada, a very nominal figure indeed. The brief to which I referred earlier continues in this fashion:

> The need for housing of low income workers is well established and through our agents we have a large number of people signed up as home owner applicants who are patiently awaiting what appears to be a non-existent loan set-up in the face of a definite housing shortage; it now appears that we will have to return their deposits.

In many instances these people have been refused loans. I have not checked into this question too closely, but as I understand it they have been refused loans on the basis that the contractor has money made available to him other than under the National Housing Act. A contractor may be building National Housing Act homes, he may use other money as well. Within a short time that particular source dries up and he is left without the means of carrying on the housing scheme because Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not permit direct loans. The minister might care to comment on that later. I cannot vouch for the authenticity of this statement, but I did obtain that information by discussing the question with a building firm within the area. This seems to be part of the problem.

There is one other observation that this firm had to make, and I shall read again from this brief:

One of the most effective ways to control a wild building boom with its spiralling of land and building costs is to require that all sales be to home owner applicants.

I think that would be a desirable feature.

This would effectively cut out speculative building and stop over-production of housing units which are priced over the market.

Now, Mr. Chairman, because I am so short of time I shall not read any farther. Probably the minister has a copy of this brief available to him. If he has not I shall be delighted to send him a copy. I think it is one which should be carefully considered, because here we have one of the largest construction firms in the lower mainland of British Columbia giving us their views on the reasons why potential home owners are not able to purchase homes, that is individuals who are earning $4,000 and less. I believe those views are worth noting.

Just before closing, I have one further question. I should like the minister to comment on what our research laboratories have turned up in the last ten years which makes it possible to reduce the cost of building a house, either through a reduction in labour or material costs or a combination of both. I am particularly interested in that because I find we spend a great deal of time in this house discussing principal costs, interest costs and a thousand and one other things. We have spent many hundreds of thousands of dollars on our research branch, and I have yet to find a single item that has in any tangible way reduced the cost of construction to the potential home owners in Canada.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Bourget: I hope the minister is not closing the debate.

Mr. Green: No, I am not closing the debate. We are in committee. I thought it might be helpful if I dealt with the points which have been raised by the spokesmen for the three opposition parties. I have no desire to stop my good friend from making a speech.

When I introduced this resolution on December 4, I pointed out that the legislation would have only two effects. The first one was to make more money available for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The need for that additional money arose because our small home plan had been so successful. We had set aside $150 million for this purpose, and it was obvious that that money was going to be used up and further sums would be required. It was for this reason the government changed its plan and decided to introduce amendments to the National Housing Act at this session. When we were doing so, we decided we should at the same time amend the act to lower the down payments. There is a further change made by way of a change in the regulations, and that is to raise the percentage of a person's income which could be used to service a mortgage. This, of course, did not require any amendment to the statute.

I admitted on December 4, and I repeat tonight, that there are many other ways in which the Canadian housing policy could be improved. We are only too glad to get suggestions from any source, particularly from members of the house and also from firms such as the one to which my good friend the hon. member for New Westminster has just referred. Whenever we receive a brief it is given most careful consideration by the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We regard ourselves as being in business for the purpose of improving housing in Canada, and particularly housing for Canadians in lower income groups. However, this legislation before the house only deals with the two things; first of all, to make more money available and, secondly, to reduce the down payment.

There have been very worthwhile suggestions made by all three members who have spoken on this resolution today. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount made a very thoughtful speech. It was quite obvious he had studied this question very carefully. He pointed out one of the main problems worrying me about housing. It is this. Next year, where is the money coming from to provide for the number of houses that should be built? The government obviously cannot take over the business of providing mortgage money. It simply cannot be done. What has already been done this fall has only been done in the way of helping to meet an emergent situation. The bulk of the money for houses in Canada must come from the lending institutions whose business it is, and from the banks. It is at that point that the argument advanced by the hon. member for Regina City this afternoon falls to the ground. He advocated, and he moved an amendment in support of his submission, that interest rates should be reduced.

There is nothing the government would like more than to be able to reduce interest rates on housing. If those interest rates are reduced to the extent that the lending institutions and the banks will no longer lend any money for housing, then we are in a real tailspin in so far as housing in Canada is concerned. This is one reason why housing has fallen away in Canada this year. These institutions could do better by investing their funds in bonds and many other types of securities than they could by investing them in mortgages. That is one of the reasons why mortgage money dried up to such an extent in 1957. Another reason, of course, was the tight money policy of the former government. I think perhaps they will now admit that that is one of the reasons that housing fell away. I believe that housing was hit harder than any other activity in Canada by the tight money policy of the previous government.

Mr. Marler: I think perhaps that is more debatable than what the minister said earlier.

An hon. Member: It could not be more correct.

Mr. Green: It may be debatable. I am giving my opinion on the question. But there is the difficulty about lowering interest rates at the present time.

Mr. Ellis: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Ellis: How would the minister reconcile the statement he made just before five o'clock to the effect that the bulk of the money which would be lent would be lent through direct lending through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with the statement he made that we have to depend on the conventional lending institutions for the supply of mortgage money.

Mr. Green: In arguing that the amendment submitted by the hon. member was out of order I pointed out that the bulk of the money being advanced now is coming from government funds through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and that is actually the case. But that situation cannot go on forever. That plan has been designed to meet a situation which I hope will be temporary.

Then the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount stressed the need for co-operation with the lending institutions, including the banks. I agree heartily with his submission. The hon. member for Regina City was critical of the lending institutions but my experience with this $150 million plan has been that we have had excellent co-operation from all of the lending institutions. It would have been quite impossible to get this $150 million out so quickly and to get houses started so quickly and thereby help to meet the unemployment situation if we had not had the closest co-operation from the lending institutions.

The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount also raised the question of lending values as did the hon. member for New Westminster. I agree that there has been a weakness there in the housing policy. Mind you, there is a reason for the position taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as there usually is for any of these policies that are adopted. In centres like Toronto, Vancouver, Ottawa, Winnipeg and some other cities in Canada the prices of lots have been skyrocketing and the officials felt it was unwise to include in lending value the total market value of these lots in cities such as those that I have mentioned. I have given instructions that that policy should be looked into and revised and I think you will now find that the lending values in these centres will be higher and more in line with the actual cost of the land. This is a place where improvements could be made and I think that under our new policy they will be made.

Then the hon. member for Regina City asked a question. I may say that the hon. member also made a very thoughtful speech. He has put a great deal of time on this housing question. I noticed in the last parliament that he spoke very well on all occasions on housing. He said, "Why could not the lending institutions lend more of their money on small homes?" He pointed out my remarks on December 4 to the effect that they had found it easier to lend money on big homes. The reason that the government has been able to channel this $150 million into the smaller homes is that we put on restrictions. We said that the house can only be a certain size and that if the house is over that size, they do not get the loan. The ordinary lending institutions cannot do that; it is impossible for them to carry out a policy of that kind. Our $150 million has been spent only in helping in the building of small homes.

The hon. member also dealt with the situation in Regina City and I sympathize with him in this matter because I had that situation before me just this week. In some parts of Canada we are in trouble because we are insisting on lots being serviced with sewers. We are refusing to approve loans where there can only be septic tanks. In parts of greater Vancouver that does not make very much sense, in my opinion, and we are having another look at that matter. But in Regina the situation is exactly the opposite. There are lots which are serviced with sewers but they are in parts of the city where there are very old homes. There it has been felt that it would be unwise to build these new homes in among the old homes. Hence in Regina the policy has been exactly the opposite of what it has been in greater Vancouver. I had a letter from the city clerk of Regina just this week. The city council is complaining that we will not approve loans on these lots. Mind you, the reason that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials have taken that stand is that they are trying to help Regina to build up the city on the basis of good town planning. I pointed out that that is not really our business, that it is the responsibility of the city to decide on town planning. Instructions have been given—yesterday, as a matter of fact, or Saturday, I forget which —that an official should go out to the city of Regina and look into this whole situation in the hope that we can change our policy and make loans available for homes on these lots. I agree with the hon. member that it would mean homes for people with smaller incomes and I am hoping that we can meet his complaint.

Then the hon. member for New Westminster said something about our plan being a lot of soothing syrup. I have here the figures up to four days ago and I should like to point out to him that in his own city of New Westminster this soothing syrup has meant 651 units being started, with loans of $6,228,610.54.

Mr. Hahn: Is that under the present act?

Mr. Green: That is before we get these improvements to the act. That is under the $150 million plan which has been in effect only for the last 12 weeks. We have put right into his riding—or it will nearly all be in his riding—651 new units with loans of over $6 million. I am sure there are many other members who would like to have soothing syrup to that amount.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if the minister, while he is referring to the British Columbia figures, would give the latest totals for the entire province? He made some reference in his speech on December 4 to the fact that British Columbia was—

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to do that because, coming from British Columbia myself, I have been very worried about the slowness with which builders there were taking advantage of this plan. When it was first announced, newspaper articles all said it was not half enough and it did lag quite a bit. But the total figures for British Columbia as of the 13th December were 1238 units for a total figure of $11,272,972.71. Now that deals only with approved loans and, for Canada, as of that date the total was $146,072,339. In addition there were potential loans of another $21,740,000 so that the British Columbia figure, including loans actually approved and loans on the way through, I should think would be close to $13 million or $14 million.

From now on, the west coast figures should go up much faster than anywhere else in the country because of the balmy climate there and other considerations.

Mr. Marler: No advertising please.

Mr. Green: The members from British Columbia will appreciate all those enviable advantages.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not the only thing that is balmy.

Mr. Green: I was greatly interested in a report in the Vancouver Province just a week ago today, to which I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend from New Westminster:

"Housing Loans Soar in B.C."

Mr. Marler: S-o-r-e?

Mr. Green: The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount will appreciate this article.

"Easier Money Boosts Sales"

The gloom which surrounded the housing industry earlier this year has rolled back as N.H.A.-insured loans hit new peaks and contractors report "amazing" pre-Christmas home sales.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation figures show the dollar value of loans in B.C. in November hit $7,662,000—more than 500 per cent over last November's total of $1,300,000.

The number of loans was 661 against 108 in November last year, and the number of units involved jumped from 128 to 772.

Of the 772 units authorized this November, 628 were agency loans financed by the $150 million released by the federal government in September to revive the sagging home construction industry.

"There is no doubt about it,"—

Mr. Marler: Did the minister write this himself?

Mr. Green: This is good, yes; this paragraph is good.

Mr. Marler: We recognize the Machiavellian hand of the minister.

Mr. Green: This shows that the "sore" part was before June 10.

"There is no doubt about," said Ted Ross, secretary-manager of the Vancouver Metropolitan Housebuilders' Association, "the change of government, the release of this money and the attendant publicity has revived confidence in the industry."

It has been like a shot of plasma into a vein. People aren't so worried about tight money and are buying homes again.

We are amazed at the number of new homes sold in the last few weeks. Usually people don't buy at this time of the year especially just before Christmas."

Mr. Marler: Miraculous.

Mr. Green: Coming from my own home town that is very sweet news.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that why the minister is not going home for Christmas?

Mr. Green: There are very few of those homes going up in Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Marler: Very discriminatory.

Mr. Green: May I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that we are very glad to have suggestions about ways of improving housing policy. Of course we think it is pretty good, but the problem is very complicated and will require the most careful study by everyone having any responsibility in connection with it. I hope that the committees made up of members of the respective parties who have been studying housing will continue to do so. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials will give such members every facility and then perhaps in the new session it will be possible to undertake a much wider revision of the National Housing Act.

In the meantime we are faced with this situation: We are asking for more money; we are asking to have these down payments lowered. We are right out of money now; we have reached the limit and we have got to get this legislation through. We have to convince the other place before they adjourn on Friday that the bill is a good one and I would be very hopeful for the co-operation of the members of this house in order that we may get these amendments written into the statute and made actual law.

Mr. Hahn: Before the hon. minister sits down, I wonder if he could explain to the house exactly what the research department is doing, if anything. I understand there is an amount there and I was wondering just what we were getting for it.

Mr. Green: The hon. member is referring to methods of building cheaper homes. That is a question which has also bothered me a great deal and, as he has said, there have been many attempts to lower the cost involved. I think the house builders of Canada, who have always been efficient, are steadily becoming more and more efficient but it does seem to be very difficult to prepare designs which will allow of a big decrease in the cost of homes.

For one thing every one wants all the latest improvements in a home. We are very conscious of this problem; it is one of the important jobs of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and whether it will ever be possible to make a drastic reduction in the price of homes, I do not know. There may be new materials devised which will bring about that result, but possibly people will continue to want better and better equipment in their homes and that may counteract whatever improvements may be found by research.

Mr. Marler: Before the minister concludes his remarks, could he tell us something about the grandiose measures of which the Solicitor General spoke early in November.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, probably the Solicitor General had in mind the steps we have taken. I think the results that have been obtained from the policy this fall might almost be described as grandiose.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pie in the sky.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question before he sits down. I wonder if the minister could tell the committee on what terms the lending institutions receive compensation when the loan is a direct government loan through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Green: In answer to that question I propose to quote paragraph 9 of the agency agreement for the administration of N.H.A. loans, the agreement made between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the lending institution or what is called an approved lender. Paragraph 9 states:

For the making and advancing of loans, the corporation will pay to the approved lender a fee of

(i) $100 for each loan made in respect of a house other than to a builder;

(ii) $90 for each loan made in respect of a house to a builder;

(iii) $80 for each loan made in respect of one or more multiple family dwellings plus $10 for each family housing unit therein but not exceeding in any event a total fee of $300 for such loan;

Provided that no fee shall be payable hereunder for a loan which has been approved but on which advances are made.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works when he introduced the resolution now before us. He said that the purpose of this measure in amending the National Housing Act of 1954 was to increase to $150 million the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act, and also to provide for the reduction of down payments. Before dealing with the proposed amendments I would like to examine briefly what has been done by the previous government in this field and the results which have been achieved.

The first federal legislation of national significance was introduced in 1935 when the Dominion Housing Act was passed. The statute introduced the principle of federal participation in the financing of homes and rental housing projects through lending institutions. In 1938 a new act was passed which carried forward the same principle but added provisions for low rental housing. The 1944 act carried forward the joint lending but added a number of features. It provided for loans to individual home owners and to builders who could build houses for sale to home purchasers. The act also contained provisions for loans to limited dividend housing companies to provide housing for families of low income.

The administration of this act was carried out by the Department of Finance until January 1, 1946. At that time hon. members will recall that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was established in order to carry out the principal activity of the federal government in the field of housing. Between 1945 and 1954 there were eight significant amendments.

The most important modification to the National Housing Act was made in 1954 when the house adopted what is now known as the National Housing Act of 1954. In this legislation there were two main provisions. First, it was proposed to widen the group of lending institutions to include the chartered banks and the Quebec savings banks with power to make loans on the security of insured first mortgages on residential property. Second, it was proposed to abandon the existing form of joint loans under the National Housing Act and to substitute a system of insured mortgage loans. Besides that, it was proposed to reduce the down payment from the 20 per cent then required under the National Housing Act. Steps were taken also to extend the period of amortization from 20 years to 25 years.

The salutary effects of this new legislation were reflected all through the years of 1955 and 1956. Reference to statistics published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shows that in 1955 the total of residential starts was 138,276, while the houses completed amounted to 127,929. In 1956 the corresponding figures were 127,311 and 135,700 respectively. It would be appropriate, I think, to mention here that it was in the middle of 1956 that the millionth post-war house was completed.

Again on April 23, 1956, the then minister of public works introduced a new measure for the further improvement of housing conditions. The main feature of this bill had to do with the widening of the scope of the existing legislation so that the development of cleared areas could be undertaken by private enterprises as well as public authority. A more flexible arrangement for the financial assistance offered to the municipalities by the federal government was also provided.

In addition the amount of loans for house improvement purposes was increased from $2,500 to $4,000 for the first dwelling and from $1,250 to $1,500 for each additional unit. Also, the aggregate amount of loans that could be insured by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under part I of the act was increased from $2 billion to $4 billion.

This, Mr. Chairman, shows that the statute under the Liberal government was kept constantly under review and provisions were added to meet new situations as they developed from time to time. It shows also that we did recognize the importance of this problem, having in mind its social repercussion and also that housing is part of our economic growth.

Coming back to the resolution, I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that although I approve of it, I find it far from what was expected from the present government having in mind the criticism and promises of its supporters when they were sitting on this side of the house. We recall the hue and cry raised by opposition members of that time who were claiming that people in the lower income groups could not avail themselves of the benefits of the act. We also remember their strong opposition to the government announcement of an increase in interest rates on loans made under the act. Well, to be consistent with their past attitude, they should have raised the same objection on October 28 last when the Minister of Public Works informed the house that in order to follow the upward trend of the interest rate structure the government had by order in council increased the interest rate on loans made under sections 16 and 17 of the act.

Even if the provisions contained in the present resolution are acceptable, the government is certainly not making good its promises. The fact that an amount of $150 million is placed at the disposal of the prospective borrowers and that the down payment is lowered does not mean that a great many more people of modest means—and I insist on that—will be in a better position to take advantage of the provisions of the act. In fact, these two amendments will not in any way decrease the monthly payments that a borrower will have to make even if the regulation is amended to permit applicants to assume debt service up to 27 per cent of their incomes.

Figures show that for a loan of $9,000 the monthly payments will be no less than $78 or $80 to amortize the capital and to pay for interest and taxes. If we add to these payments the ordinary expenses for maintenance, heating and insurance, it is only logical to assume that from a practical point of view a borrower who wants such a loan will have to earn a salary or have at least an income of $85 a week. According to statistics supplied by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, on page 6 of the booklet entitled "Canadian Housing Statistics", the report for the first quarter of 1956, the average income of the people who have bought houses under the act has shown an increase from $5,023 in 1955 to $5,300 in 1956 and, according to the latest information, it has reached $5,700. Consequently I think that the Minister of Public Works is very optimistic when he states that those with an income of $3,450 a year will qualify for loans of $9,000.

The minister mentioned that in order to help people build small houses restrictions were placed primarily in the nature of limitations on the floor area. For example, he said that the average floor area of bungalows under this plan would be 1,014 square feet compared with an average of 1,137 square feet for bungalows financed by National Housing Act loans through approved lenders during the year 1957.

Even if these restrictions are imposed I do not believe the cost would decrease sufficiently to benefit lower income people; certainly not those who live in the province of Quebec. In fact, in our province we find that the average weekly salary is $65, which represents an annual income of $3,380 before tax deduction. From that we can see that it would be very difficult for the great majority of our wage earners to meet payments on a $9,000 loan. The minister may indulge in illusions but I am quite sure he will be disappointed with the result.

Speaking for myself, Mr. Chairman, I think if the government really wants to fulfil its promises and at the same time make it really possible for those with moderate means to take advantage of the provisions of the act it should first of all lower the interest rate and also extend the period of amortization. On such an important matter as this I see no reason at this time why our fellow citizens should not benefit from an interest rate lower than 6 per cent. Within the last few weeks we have often heard the Minister of Finance say that inflation has been checked. Moreover, the government during this session has granted loans without interest to the western farmers for the storage of their wheat. On December 3, a resolution was carried unanimously in the house for a loan of $4 million, at an interest rate of 4⅛ per cent, to the commissioners of the Hamilton harbour board.

We have now on the order paper a resolution of the Minister of Finance in which the government is asking authority to make a loan of $30 million to the government of New Brunswick at an interest rate of 4⅜ per cent. In the circumstances, I feel that similar preferential treatment should be granted to the people of moderate means who would like to build houses by lowering the actual interest rate on their loans to 4½ per cent, at least to those who earn less than $5,000 a year.

With regard to interest rates, I think the task of the Minister of Public Works could be simplified in the province of Quebec if he asked his colleagues to help him convince the premier of our province to extend the 3 per cent interest rate reduction to those in Quebec who are desirous of securing loans under the National Housing Act.

As far as the amortization period is concerned, I think that if it were to be extended to 35 years or, better still, to 40 years, as recommended by the national house builders association, this would in effect substantially reduce the monthly payments.

I also wish to take this opportunity to raise another point which in my opinion is of vital importance to the population of the province of Quebec. To my knowledge, during the many years that the federal act has been in existence, the citizens of my province have benefited on one occasion only from the provisions of sections 23 and 36 dealing with grants to municipalities for the clearance of substandard areas, which are commonly called slums, and from federal-provincial projects respectively. When most of the other provinces were benefiting largely from these provisions and were building low-rental housing we in Quebec were merely looking on. Therefore, we missed a good chance of solving in some degree, at reduced costs, a problem which is just as acute in my province, if not more so, as in any of the other provinces. In that field, as in the trans-Canada highway program, we have lost millions which could have been used to such great advantage.

National Housing Act

On November 7, 1957, L'Action Catholique of Quebec city published a resumé of a brief prepared by the local section of the Quebec retail lumbermen's association, endorsed by five provincial organizations of the district. Under the subheading "Municipalities" the brief stated:

> The municipalities of the metropolitan area, and particularly of Quebec, should also intervene. The National Housing Act provides for loans and assistance from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for slum clearance. Through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the federal government assume a large portion of the expenses incurred by the demolition of decrepit houses and the improvement of blighted areas.

A little farther on, under the subheading "The Province", the brief states:

> The most productive part rests with the government of the province. It could have a most effective action on the present contingency . . . by enabling citizens to avail themselves of the provisions of the national act as well as those of the provincial act.

In this connection, the brief states:

> We do not see any justification in the attitude which insists that these two acts are incompatible. No one gains by it and the citizens of the province of Quebec lose a great deal.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, we find that the people of our province deplore, and rightly so, the fact that their provincial rulers have refused in the past to make it possible for their fellow citizens to benefit fully from the National Housing Act, as did other provinces.

I trust that the Quebec members on the government side, who are friends of the provincial premier, may at last convince him to help our towns and cities by making it possible for them to benefit from the provisions of the act, and thus bring about a solution to the crucial problem of slum clearance.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the minister that his words of commendation regarding the Hon. Robert Winters and the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are fully deserved. I am convinced that they have each one within the scope of his responsibilities striven to find the most suitable solutions to promote and help the construction of new homes in Canada.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, we in the province of British Columbia were rather pleased when the minister was appointed Minister of Public Works. We do not know what type of engineer he is going to be and how he will work out as Minister of Public Works. However, with regard to the matter of housing, a subject which is of such vital concern, the people of British Columbia will always have a most sympathetic and understanding man as minister.

[Mr. Bourget.]

We have arrived at a time when we have to take a look at what is happening in the field of housing. For some years we had considerable difficulty with the former minister in that he continually refused to acknowledge that a serious situation was beginning to develop nationally from the point of view of housing shortage. For an explanation of that attitude on the part of the then government we have to look at a statement made by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe on February 13 of this year when he was reported as having said that the record suggested that we had been building more houses in Canada in the last few years than the current rate of family growth in the country appeared to warrant. I believe he had reached the conclusion that it would be in the best interests of the country if there was a slow-down in the rate of house construction, and that was rather evident from the policies that were being pursued.

I do not wish to indicate any opposition whatsoever to the resolution but I should like to examine the National Housing Act to some extent. I should like to pay tribute to the work that has been accomplished under the provisions of the act over the years. I hate to think of what kind of housing situation we would be faced with if the former government had not initiated the act, in 1945 I believe. I should also like to pay tribute to the officials. I feel that within the limits of their powers they have in the main done whatever they were able to do to make the act a success.

However, I do submit that the National Housing Act has not met the housing needs of the Canadian people. We have only to look at the statistics to see that that is so. We find that since 1945 there has been a growth of 4,517,000 in Canada's population. That indicates an approximate need for one and one-third million new housing units. I submit that that number is far in excess of the number of new housing units built since the war. I believe we have approached the million mark but we have not anywhere met the needs of our growth in population. I have here housing bulletin No. 35 of the Vancouver housing association dated October, 1957. It deals with the local scene and in the first paragraph they say:

> According to provincial government estimates, the population of B.C. increased by 88,500 people or over 6 per cent during the year ended June 30, 1957. At 3½ persons per household, this means a requirement of some 25,000 housing units. During this period 15,000 dwellings were completed, indicating a shortage of no less than 10,000 units in a single year.

This year there has been heavy immigration into Canada. I have the annual report here and it indicates that 164,856 people entered Canada in 1956. I believe that the figures for 1957 will show that over 200,000 people have come to this country. If anyone cares to dispute what I have said, let me submit the problem to another test which to my mind is the acid test of whether the housing shortage is becoming worse or is being alleviated. I refer to the level of rents. I believe that the shortage of homes determines the level of rents, and we have not seen any major reduction of rentals since the war. The general movement of rentals has been upward and in my opinion that indicates beyond doubt that the situation is becoming worse instead of better.

The hon. member for Regina City went to some length to explain that the act has failed us in another respect. It has failed us in that the wrong people are receiving help from the government. I was very pleased to hear the minister express his sentiments when he indicated that he was most concerned about enabling people with low incomes to obtain housing accommodation. I submit to the minister that in the main the act has completely failed the people of Canada in this regard ever since it was first initiated.

I know that the theory can be put forward that if a rich man builds a home he moves out of his old home and therefore another housing unit has been made available so why should we worry about who gets the new home. To me that represents the philosophy of the crumbs falling from the table and the little people getting the crumbs, a philosophy to which I cannot subscribe. I think even the minister will agree that when the revenue of the government of Canada and the taxation of the nation are used to supply housing a responsible government will make every effort to make sure that government action will be the instrument to help those who really need help and that the National Housing Act should not be used to assist in the building of homes for people who can go to orthodox financial institutions and arrange their own financing. Where do the two-thirds of our people in the lower income category obtain money in order to secure housing? In order to show how serious the situation is I should like to place on the record a few advertisements taken from the Vancouver Sun of Saturday, December 14. Under "Money Wanted"; we find:

> First mortgage 7 per cent, $3,250 buys $4,000 at $45 a month.

Farther down, there is another ad:

> First mortgage, $2,000 bonus, $5,050 buys $7,050 first mortgage payable at $71.50 per month, 7 per cent.

Then, there is the address where you apply. There has been a long list of these advertisements for first mortgages at 7 per cent or more which are being discounted at 25 per cent or more, and second mortgages are worse. I have a letter here in which a man informs me that to get a second mortgage of $1,500 he signed a second mortgage for $2,000; he paid a bonus of $300; he paid a commission of $200, and he paid lawyer's fees of $38. There was paid out to him a net payment of $1,492. The interest rate was 7 per cent. I was very interested in noting that the terms of repayment were $61 per month. In other words, there was only a three-year agreement. Now, the ordinary people of Canada are being taken for a ride, a harsh ride and one that they can ill afford.

Here we have the government of Canada spending hundreds of millions of dollars a year on housing and that money is not being made available to these poor people who are in such desperate need. I realize the minister would like to limit discussion on this resolution because he believes the matter is rather urgent. However, he is asking for an increase in the capitalization of this institution, and I feel that subject is weighty enough. The minister himself has indicated that at a later date he hopes to bring in a broad revision of the act and therefore a detailed reaction of the members of the house at this time might serve a useful purpose by making sure that when the complete revision of the act does come it will contain something that will be really worth while for the Canadian people. Food, clothing and shelter, we say, are the prime necessities of life. In dealing with housing, one is dealing with shelter and I think this debate is just as important as any wheat debate in this house.

The economy of my province depends very heavily on a prosperous housing industry. Not only is our population growing at such a rapid rate, largely because of immigration into the province that we have a housing need, but also, Mr. Chairman, half of our people earn their living directly from the lumbering industry. At the present time we have much more than our share of the unemployed of our nation. There is nothing of which I can think that is as helpful in relieving unemployment as a real shot in the arm for our housing industry.

The resolution, Mr. Chairman, calls for an increase in the amount of money allotted under section 22 of the act from $250 million to $400 million. I should like to say to the minister that I believe this committee would have welcomed the raising of that amount even higher. I see no reason why it should necessarily be limited to $400 million. After all, $400 million accounts for only 40,000 houses, in effect, and we are today building each year 100,000 fewer houses than our nation really needs. We in this group have long advocated the establishment of a national investment board which would look after such social needs as housing.

However, if the minister feels that he cannot go along with that, might I recommend to him that a national housing bond issue be made. I noted that the other day the Minister of Finance did not have any difficulty at all in having the latest Canada savings bond issue oversubscribed. As the hon. member for Regina City said, we should make some move to lower the interest rate to those who need homes. The issuance of a national housing bond series at 3½ per cent I feel would make a billion dollars available. The government might then turn around and let the people who need this money most have it at cost.

I feel the minister might also investigate whether or not greater use could be made of the credit union movement. Lately this movement has, because of the need of its members, gone to great lengths in supplying housing money across the country. I feel the movement has now reached the age and gained the experience which would warrant the government granting it more recognition and making greater use of this medium. It is obvious that private sources of mortgage money at modest interest rates are disappearing. They have been disappearing ever since 1951, ever since the great expansion in our industrial empire began to take place. The insurance companies and the mortgage companies have shown less and less interest in supplying the money needed in the housing field. I recall when the former government brought the banks into the housing field. They did this for an excellent reason, and the reason was that the insurance and mortgage companies were rapidly leaving the field. The banks had to be brought in because apparently at that time they were the only source available of investment money.

At that time we in this group warned the government of the day that bank investments in the field of housing would last only so long, and then would level off. Today the banks, in the main, are only investing in housing the mortgage money that is repaid, and they are only investing that percentage in housing that has a relationship to the growth of the assets of the bank. Once again we have reached the end of the rope. Some day the government will have to realize that unless they are going to exert some pressure on the existing institutions they will have to take over this responsibility of supplying money.

I was not very happy, Mr. Chairman, with the answer the minister gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I believe the question referred to the fees paid to approved lenders by the government when they handle government money. The minister read out a table of fees from an agreement. I am not going to argue with that reply. However, if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway did not mean to ask this question, I mean to ask it. When the government supplies money to an approved lending institution at 3¾ per cent or 4 per cent—we do not know what the rate is—how is it that the lending institution in turn can charge the purchaser of a home 6 per cent? I never before knew of a table of fees. I hope the minister is going to reply to this question. Does the lending institution receive 2 per cent or 2½ per cent on the handling of government money and, in addition to that, receive a fixed fee as well? If that is so, I feel that there is something wrong.

Mr. Green: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that these fees are paid to the lending institutions only when they lend the money on behalf of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That has nothing to do with the ordinary loans which are insured under the insurance requirement.

Mr. Regier: In other words, I take it that this $150 million which the minister made available some months ago did not involve the use of the scale of fees?

Mr. Green: It is that money that was subject to a fee because the lending institution lent it out on our behalf. Under the ordinary insured loan, those loans are made in the name of the lending institution itself and the government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation merely insures those loans.

Mr. Regier: From the minister's reply I take it that even though the purchaser pays 6 per cent and the cost to the government of this money is maybe 4 per cent, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation receives the remaining 2 per cent. Am I right in assuming that?

Mr. Green: At the moment Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is paying 4⅜ per cent on the money. Then the fee to the lending institution is two-thirds of one per cent.

Mr. Regier: If 4⅜ per cent is the charge made for the money and two-thirds of one per cent is the fee, in my books that does not yet add up to the 6 per cent that the purchaser must pay.

Mr. Green: The purchaser pays 6 per cent.

Mr. Regier: What I want to know is this. What happens when I go to the Bank of Montreal and obtain a National Housing Act loan. The minister has told us that he is now supplying this money to the extent of $150 million because they were unwilling to lend on, or did not have any more money to devote to housing. I take it they are getting that money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for 4 per cent, or as the minister says 4⅜ per cent. Yet I as a purchaser must pay 6 per cent. Then the minister says in addition to that there is a scale of fees.

Mr. Green: In addition to the figures I gave to the hon. member there is an administration fee of one-half of one per cent per year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Does not the purchaser have to pay 2 per cent insurance?

Mr. Regier: I know that after I finished grade three arithmetic I went to grade four and then to grade five. Let us see if we can get a little bit more information. To my way of thinking 4⅜ per cent plus ⅜ of one per cent plus ½ of one per cent do not add up to 6 per cent yet. The thing I want to point out is this. In 1953 I took rather severe objection to the handling of government money as the situation existed prior to that provision, in that N.H.A. loans were supplied, 75 per cent by the lending institutions and 25 per cent by the government at that time. Government money was made available at cost to the lending institution. The lending institution added profit into that interest rate which was charged to the purchaser. That procedure, as the minister knows, was abolished when we amended the act.

At present we are again entering an era apparently where government money is being handed over or lent to the lending institutions. What I want to make sure of is this. I must say that the lending institutions and the banks especially have done recently a most remarkable job. The banks have reached many thousands of people in Canada which the lending institutions prior to that time refused to deal with. However, what I want to make sure of is that these institutions are not making a rake-off on the Canadian people's money and on these National Housing Act loans. If people lend out their own money, that is an entirely different matter from that of using the taxpayer's money for that purpose. I hope that later on we can get a little bit clearer answer to that question.

I have noted in the past considerable condemnation of municipal governments for their failures to take advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act. I feel that in the main these criticisms have been most unwarranted. I hope the minister, by means of regulation if he does not want to amend the act in that respect, will see whether things cannot be made much more attractive to our municipal governments across the country.

The hon. member for Regina City spoke of lots selling at $2,000 and said he thought that was an extremely high price. The minister knows full well that the average modest National Housing Act lot in his community and in mine is in price away over and beyond the $2,000 which the hon. member for Regina City thought was very expensive. If the municipal governments were given a little bit more encouragement I feel that many more of them would make lots available at a much more modest price.

The minister spoke of the down payment and he is also amending the regulations so that those devoting 27 per cent of their income towards meeting payments will be eligible. I think the minister was slightly contradictory on December 4 when he was asserting that this change in regulations would make more people eligible because, only a few sentences ahead of that, he admitted that naturally when you lower the down payment there is a larger amount owing and therefore the monthly payments are higher. Therefore, unless we amend the regulations, we shall be eliminating an even larger share of low income people. I just wonder why the 27 per cent was arrived at. Is the difference between 23 per cent and 27 per cent the percentage that is needed to keep the minimum income requirements at the same level as it was previously, or has there been any extra allowance in this change of the regulation? If that is so, then we might be guilty of misleading the people if we say that now more of them will be eligible because of this amendment.

The lowering of the interest rate proposed by the hon. member for Regina City would reduce the cost and would make more people eligible. I think that the principle is sound, as did the hon. member who preceded me. He pointed out a number of instances in which government money is being made available for all kinds of other interests in our nation at a lower rate. After all, housing is one of the basic needs of our Canadian people and there is no valid reason why this government should make loans to pipe line companies or any other industrial enterprise at a rate lower than that which the people of Canada are obliged to pay for housing.

I know that, if certain people had their way there would be a great deal of money available in the housing field. There is a very simple answer to the problem and that is to allow the interest rate to shoot away up high. I hope that is not going to be the philosophy that this government will adopt, namely that in order to obtain this money they will have to raise interest rates so high that they begin to compete with industrial enterprise in our country. I think those days are gone forever.

I should like to make just a few proposals.

I think the minister's regulations need amending in such a way that no man continuing to live in the same community can become eligible more than once for N.H.A. approved loans. I have witnessed considerable speculation on the part of people earning a fair income who, being very eligible for an N.H.A. approved loan, will move into a new home and the minute they have moved in the house is listed for sale. They bide their time and they can make a few thousand dollars, and they then move out of that house and in a new N.H.A. approved-loan home. I think that is something into which the minister might well look; I think it is an abuse for which this act was never intended.

I wish the minister would also order a comparison to be made as to why houses built under veterans legislation enterprises are so much more successful in meeting the real needs of the people than are those built under the National Housing Act legislation. I think there are many features of the veterans housing from which we might take a lesson.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Green: I wonder Mr. Chairman, if by any chance this resolution could be put through this evening and then hon. members could speak on the bill either on second reading or when it is in the committee stage. Otherwise we may not be able to get it to the other place this week which will mean that this legislation cannot become law. As I have pointed out in my earlier remarks, we are already over the limits allowed under the statute as it stands at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Although we have one or two members on this side of the house who do wish to speak on this subject, we would be willing to proceed as the minister suggests, provided we would be allowed to make speeches tomorrow at the second reading stage as if we were on the resolution.

Mr. Barnett: This sort of suggestion has been made a number of times before, Mr. Chairman, and then when we get to second reading we have found that some of the broader aspects of the matter under discussion were difficult to discuss because of the question of relevancy to the strict terms of the bill. I hope that if the suggestion which the minister has made is agreed to, at least as far as he is concerned he will allow us reasonable latitude in which to discuss the strong and the weak points of the matter, as we see them.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly raise no objection to discussion being on just as broad a basis as it could be under the resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the understanding I had was certainly on that basis and I am sure that is what the minister had in mind, namely that speakers on this side of the house would want to have full latitude to discuss the bill as if it were on the resolution.

Mr. Hahn: Just before the motion carries, Mr. Chairman, we in this group are likewise prepared to follow the suggestion of the minister on the understanding that we will be allowed greater latitude in discussing the bill than just the individual items called for in the amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have just one other question, Mr. Chairman. May I ask the minister if what he said a moment ago forecasts that if this resolution is passed tonight, we will take second reading of the bill tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Yes, that is what I had in mind.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Green thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 238, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May we have the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall commence with this bill and then follow the order which I announced last night: Item No. 18 on today's order paper, a resolution dealing with the Unemployment Assistance Act; then item No. 2 on today's order paper, the house in committee on the bill concerning a branch line for the Canadian National Railway Company; item No. 3, house in committee on an act respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners; then item No. 4, house in committee on an act to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; item No. 8, second reading of the amendment to the Pension Act; then resuming the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 16, an act to provide for annual vacations with pay, which is item No. 6 on today's order paper.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SURPLUS LABOUR AREAS

Question No. 282—Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many surplus labour areas are there in Canada as of the latest date?
2. How many persons are registered for employment in each area as of the latest date?
3. How many persons, single and married with families are receiving federal assistance to move to jobs elsewhere, in the past 12 months?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

The Minister of Labour under the provisions of order in council P.C. 1954-15/501 of 8 April, 1954, may designate certain areas as labour surplus areas for the purpose of providing transportation assistance under certain conditions to workers proceeding to employment from such areas. Assuming the question deals with areas so designated the answers are as follows:—

1. Five areas are designated as labour surplus areas at the present time. These are the areas served by the local offices of the unemployment insurance commission at New Glasgow, N.S., Springhill, N.S., St. Stephen, N.B., Windsor, Ontario, and Tilbury, Ontario —the latter being a part only of the area served by the local office at Chatham, Ontario.

2. The number of persons registered for employment on December 5, 1957, at local offices of the unemployment insurance commission serving these areas was as follows:—

New Glasgow	2,358
Springhill	845
St. Stephen	1,883
Windsor	14,052
Chatham	2,385

(Data are not available on the number of persons resident in Tilbury who are registered for employment at the Chatham local office.)

Questions

3. The dates at which the above areas were designated as labour surplus areas were as follows:—

New Glasgow, October 1, 1957; Springhill, October 1, 1957; St. Stephen, October 1, 1957; Windsor, May 15, 1957; Tilbury, October 29, 1957.

Since designation at these dates, a total of 16 workers received assistance in the form of transportation to move to employment from these areas. In addition, transportation assistance was provided, since December 1, 1956, to one worker and to the dependants of two other workers from the Sydney, N.S., area which was until December 31, 1956, designated as a labour surplus area.

POLIOMYELITIS STATISTICS

Question No. 295— Mr. McMillan:

1. What was the incidence in Canada of anterior poliomyelitis for the years 1955, 1956 and 1957 to date?
2. What number of cases resulted in death or in some form of paralysis?
3. How many children and adults have received the full complement of Salk vaccine?
4. Is the future supply of Salk vaccine likely to be ample?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1.

	Cases
1955	1,021
1956	607
1957 (preliminary figures to Nov. 30)	279

2.

	Deaths	Paralytic cases
1955	36	551
1956	51	369
1957 (preliminary figures to Nov. 30)	16	176

3. To July 1, 1957, the total number of persons vaccinated was approximately 3,800,000 of whom it is estimated 1,800,000 received 3 injections.

4. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at eleven o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Sixth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Rea.

STARRED QUESTIONS

UNITED DISTILLERS LTD.—INCOME TAX

Question No. 44—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. Has the government, at any time since June 21, 1957, reviewed the income tax file of United Distillers Limited in the light of discussions in the House of Commons, as recorded at pages 6595-6597 of Hansard for June 23, 1954, and at pages 1738-1739 of Hansard for March 4, 1955?
2. If so, what is the result of such review? Have any facts been brought out (a) which can be made public; (b) which cannot be made public because of the secrecy provision in section 133 of the Income Tax Act?
3. If the answer to question one is no, is such a review under consideration?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is no. The second part of the question is not applicable in view of the answer to the first part. As to the third part, in view of the fact that the matter has been raised I am prepared to consider with the officers of the department what review, if any, should be made of this matter.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY

Question No. 49—Mr. Kirk:

What have been the results to date of the investigation being made into the feasibility and practicability of the proposed causeway to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The Department of Public Works has undertaken a drilling program to examine the type of rock which could be obtained from Cape Tormentine close to the existing ferry terminal. A second investigation has been made to determine the cost of providing the present ferry transportation between Borden, Prince Edward Island, and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick. The department is not in a position as yet to make any definite announcement with regard to the result of these investigations.

FISHERMEN'S UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Question No. 50—Mr. Kirk:

1. For each province, how many fishermen (a) have applied for fishermen's unemployment insurance benefits; (b) are in receipt of such benefits?
2. For each province, what is the minimum, maximum, and average weekly benefit?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first part of the question is that any information regarding fishermen's benefits will not be available until after the close of the month of December. The answer to the second part is the same as that to the first part.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

C.G.S. SHIPS—EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE

Question No. 48—Mr. Fisher:

1. What is the practice in hiring men for C.G.S. ships each season?
2. Have members of parliament, from whose constituencies the ships sail, given those in charge of hiring any lists of eligible employee possibilities?
3. If so, what members of parliament?

MOTOR VEHICLE CHASSIS PURCHASES IN CANADA

Question No. 289—Mr. Thrasher:

1. Is the government giving consideration to the purchase in Canada of the following vehicle parts: chassis for fire trucks, chassis for snow-removal trucks, chassis for refueling trucks?
2. If so, how many such chassis have been purchased in Canada between June 21, 1957, and December 1, 1957?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER DROPPED

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to have permission to drop question No. 205 on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Question dropped.

AGRICULTURE

STATEMENT AS TO STATUS OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON LAND USE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bellechasse asked me the following question:

Could the minister tell the house if the important special committee of the Senate on land use established by the former government will continue to function?

Inquiries of the Ministry

The government leader in the other place informs me that the special committee of the Senate on land use has been re-established under the chairmanship of Senator C. G. Power, under whom it has already had several sittings during the present session.

PRICE STABILIZATION LEGISLATION—POSITION OF FARMERS' UNION OF ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received any communication from the farmers' union of Alberta regarding the bill to stabilize the price of farm products? If so, what was their reaction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is of a kind that we have had before anticipating a matter which is on the order paper, and which I believe is to be discussed today if it is reached. It seems to me that questions of that kind should be deferred until the matter comes before the house rather than be asked during the question period.

Mr. Quelch: It will not be reached this week, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I might say that I do not believe Bill No. 237 is on the order for today's business. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, as a last ditch effort, if he will give consideration to the withdrawal of Bill No. 237 and the introduction of a bill providing for price stabilization based on parity for agricultural products?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must rule this question out of order, in view of the pending discussion before the house of this matter.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the house leader. Can the house leader say now whether or not he expects to call Bill No. 237 for second reading this week? Bill No. 237 is the bill sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture for the stabilization of prices.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we hope to be able to do so.

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF FURTHER LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to propose any new legislation during the present session which will give a shot in the arm to the agricultural industry?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): I am passing that one to the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is in the same category as the others. We had a last ditch stand down there, and I do not think we ought to cross that ditch.

FINANCE

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM LOAN AGREEMENT—WAIVER OF INTEREST ENTITLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Has an official request been made by the United Kingdom for a waiver of the interest payment on her post-war loans from Canada?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, under an act passed at the spring session of the last parliament amending the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, the government of the United Kingdom has the right to defer payment of the annual instalment of principal and interest for the year, provided that no more than seven instalments may be so deferred.

Last week the Minister of Finance was advised by the high commissioner of the United Kingdom in Canada that his government would avail themselves of this right to deferment in this year. I believe yesterday an official announcement to this effect was made in the House of Commons at Westminster. The house will perhaps be interested in knowing that the amount involved for principal is $15,777,822.67 and for interest $21,932,432.33 or a total of $37,710,255. I understand, sir, that similar deferment action has been taken in respect of the United States loan.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERMEDIATE COURT OF APPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement in this morning's press by the premier of Quebec that a revised bill establishing a new intermediate court of appeal will be presented to the legislature to set up a seven man court of review, whose judges would be appointed by the federal government, may I ask the minister whether there has been any consultation with him in connection with this bill, and whether a decision has been reached to introduce concurrent legislation in the house?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I can advise that ten days or two weeks ago we received a copy of the bill introduced in the Quebec legislature. We have had the matter before us for consideration, but before any decision could be reached my attention was drawn to the statement appearing in this morning's press to which the hon. gentleman has referred; and under the circumstances, as the government of Quebec proposes to revise the bill, we are simply leaving the matter open for decision when the Quebec legislature will have finally dealt with it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA HOUSE, NEW YORK—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON RENTAL OF SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in his dual capacity as Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Public Works. Will he consider deferring any commitments on the rental of space in Canada house, New York, until the external affairs committee has had an opportunity of hearing witnesses and perhaps having the Secretary of State for External Affairs explain the decision of the present government to reverse the decision of the former government concerning the rental of this space?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): I think that question contains some facts which are not facts, but I will be very glad to look into the situation.

HIGHWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL POLICY ON SHARING OF COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the government determined what its highway policy is to be, particularly with regard to sharing in the cost of highways leading from provinces into federal territories?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): This question is being given very careful consideration, but at the moment I am not in a position to announce any policy.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—STATEMENT CONCERNING STEPS TAKEN TO PROTECT CANADIAN INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question from which I read the following:

> In view of the serious threat to the economy of the base metals industry in the proposed increase in the tariff on lead and zinc entering the United States . . . will the minister inform the house of the definitive steps being taken by the government to protect Canadian interests?

I was asked this question some days ago, and explained that there was constant contact with the United States government. I think all I can add to what I have previously said is that our embassy in Washington has this matter constantly in mind and is constantly in touch. As a matter of fact, the Department of Trade and Commerce had their last communication with the embassy this morning. I think I can assure the house that every effort is being made to omit nothing that can assist this situation.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Might I ask a supplementary question of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret I did not have time to give him notice, so perhaps he may wish to take this question as notice. In view of the widespread interest in the problems facing the base metals industry would the minister consider making a statement regarding the present position in which the industry finds itself?

Mr. Macdonnell: After having heard the question of my hon. friend I think I had better take it as notice.

AUTOMOBILES—STATEMENT ON EXPORTS TO ASIAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): While I am on my feet may I answer two other questions, one from the hon. member for Essex West, who asked:

> Is any consent of the government of the United States required for the export of automobiles from Canada to communist China?

The answer is that the consent of the United States is not required before an export permit is granted for the shipment of automobiles to communist China.

Inquiries of the Ministry

U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIAN EXPORTS TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on the same day the hon. member for Kootenay East asked this question:

Under the existing Canadian-American defence agreements, could a United States company prevent one of its Canadian subsidiaries from accepting orders for non-strategic materials—for example, automobiles—from the republic of China?

The answer to that question is that the United States government has no legal or formal power of control over the activities of subsidiaries of United States companies in Canada and there is no agreement between the two governments to that effect. The only way in which it could affect the exports of these subsidiaries is through its influence with parent companies. Since the Canadian government would not be a party to any arrangement of this kind if it were made, I cannot give any answer on that subject.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I submit a supplementary question. Would it be appropriate, therefore, for a large United States company having an affiliate in Canada to prohibit a Canadian exporter from exporting to communist China on the ground that it, the company, is not in a position to furnish a quotation because of policies of the United States government?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): This is because of regulations issued by the treasury department—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has completed his question.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Not quite, Mr. Speaker. I have just about done so. If you will permit me to complete it, I shall be glad.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member has completed his question and is now proceeding to give facts which are not necessary to the answering of the question.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): No, I am not, Mr. Speaker. You may rule on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the remainder of it.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): This is because regulations issued by the treasury department, foreign assets control department, had placed an embargo on shipments by United States companies and their affiliates, and further because these regulations are applicable to transactions involving the United States parent company as well as the affiliate company in Canada. I hold a copy of the letter in my hand.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should leave the matter to the minister, but it seems to me the answer the minister gave, to the effect that the action of the United States government with respect to United States companies was beyond the jurisdiction of this government and not a proper subject of question to this government because it has no responsibility in the matter, applies also to the further question, and that such question should not be asked of this government.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that as far as United States companies are concerned the United States government has control over such United States companies. What I am asking is this. Is it appropriate for a large United States company having an affiliate in Canada—this is an affiliate, not a subsidiary—to prohibit a Canadian exporter from exporting to communist China, and so on?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if this question is a proper question under any circumstances, surely there can be no doubt that it should be placed on the order paper rather than be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot see that it is a proper question and I must rule accordingly.

WHEAT—PROVISION OF CREDIT FOR POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Might I ask a question of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce based on a press report in the Regina Leader-Post of December 13, wherein the Polish chargé d'affaires in Ottawa is quoted as saying that if better Canadian credit were forthcoming, Poland could afford to buy even more wheat this year. Would the government consider extending credit beyond the three-year term, so that Poland and other countries that have shown interest in this matter may purchase substantially increased quantities of wheat?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the government is considering the question of extending credit to a whole series of European countries and, as I have also said, I do not think it is in the public interest to give details of these matters while discussions are going forward.

Mr. Argue: Then may I ask a supplementary question. Are the reports received correct, that the Canadian government is refusing and has refused to grant credit in excess of three years?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to answer that question. I have previously made it clear that I think the people who are negotiating should be left free, and I think I would be doing a disservice to the whole cause of selling wheat if I allowed myself to be drawn into giving this detail and that detail. It could only embarrass those who have the responsibility of making deals.

We have, however, every hope that as a result of negotiations substantial sales of wheat will take place. I am going to stick to the position, therefore, that I think to be drawn into giving this and that detail would be harmful to those who are carrying on the business.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would care to answer this question, then. Is it not a fact that no person or no organization in this country is opposed to credit extensions beyond the three-year period?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has had two replies, and I think he is pushing this matter beyond where it should go.

DISCUSSION OF BRITISH AND CANADIAN PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, for whom we all have deep respect and who has displayed a great knowledge of trade matters—and I say that very sincerely—if we are to conclude that the presence of the Minister of Finance in Paris at the moment indicates the government's intention that members of the delegation now in Paris will discuss with their opposite numbers in the British government the free trade proposal and the proposal of the Prime Minister of Canada for the transfer of purchases from one friendly country to another, and if advantage will be taken of the presence of Canadian ministers to pursue these discussions?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be back in a day or so, and it seems to me he would be the best person to answer this question if he should wish to do so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POWER

NOVA SCOTIA—STATEMENT ON POTENTIAL SITES FOR THERMAL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked a question yesterday along these lines:

. . . Were the Inverness coal fields overlooked in a survey of potential sites for maritime thermal power development? . . .

In answer to the question I can give him the assurance that the Inverness coal fields were not overlooked by this government as a source of power in the maritime area. It is for that reason, among others, that this government has agreed to pay a subvention on any coal produced in the maritime area and used in the production of thermal electric power in the maritimes.

In regard to the choice of sites in the Montreal Engineering report, which did look into the position in respect to pit-mouth sites, the engineers concluded that such a central station is not considered practical at the present time and recommended that steam plants be built reasonably close to load centres, and be on tidewater.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TO SENIOR CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the tributes to our civil servants which were paid from all quarters of the house a couple of days ago, will the Prime Minister state the government's position with respect to the charges which are still being made by the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. McPhillips) that many senior civil servants and even deputy ministers are Liberal partisans doing wilful damage to the government? Does the government doubt the loyalty of any senior civil servant or any deputy minister?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed my views with regard to the service rendered by the senior civil servants to the present government when I closed the debate on the motion for the address in reply. In addition, I have taken the same stand on several occasions outside the house and today again I say on behalf of the government that we have had splendid co-operation from the senior civil servants and that in our opinion Canada has the best civil service in the world.

It would have been quite impossible for a new government to have taken over the leadership of this country without great upset had it not been for the loyal co-operation given to us by the senior civil servants, and members of the government believe that this same loyalty and this same co-operation would have been given to any new government, no matter what party might have been elected to power.

These men and women have chosen the civil service as a lifetime career; all their energies are devoted toward making that service efficient, and improving it, and we feel they are doing a splendid job for Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT REPLY TO PROPOSALS OF MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER-BURRARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, but in his absence I will address it to the Minister of Labour.

In the light of the statistics supplied us yesterday by the dominion bureau of statistics with regard to the serious unemployment situation could the minister indicate the nature of the reply of the government to the excellent proposals which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has made with regard to this urgent matter?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer that question. Members of the government are very glad to receive representations from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard or from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam or from any other hon. member. These representations, as they come in, are given very careful and serious consideration, and the results appear from time to time in announcements of government policy.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, DOWN PAYMENTS, ETC.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 238, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

He said: As the house knows, I dealt with this matter on December 4 in introducing the resolution and again last evening, and I have nothing further to add.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation, though not without certain reservations, of Bill No. 238 now before the house, amending the National Housing Act to increase from $250 million to $400 million the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under this act and also to provide for a reduction in the down payment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the house settle down as quickly as possible so we can hear the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Robichaud: After studying the bill I am convinced that the amendments will not reach the objective they are intended to reach so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned.

When late in November, a week or so after a premature announcement was made by the Solicitor General, the minister announced that an additional $150 million would be made available for lower cost housing mortgages, he stated that the changes had been introduced partly to help maritime residents take advantage of the scheme. On October 25 last, as reported at page 398 of Hansard, in answering a question put to him by the hon. member for Bow River, the Minister of Public Works stated that as at October 18, 1957 two of the Atlantic provinces, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, had not as yet taken advantage of the additional $150 million which was made available for housing late last summer and which the minister stated was so successful. Out of this amount 50 units only had been approved in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, involving a total of $430,000, which represented less than 3 per cent of the amount made available for loans in late August.

From April 1 to November 30 of this year, only 90 loans had been approved in the province of New Brunswick, for a total of $500,000, with 240 loans in the Atlantic provinces for a total of less than $2¼ million. This total amount for the Atlantic provinces is somewhat lower than the loans which were approved for the city of Windsor alone during the same period.

On October 28 I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works, asking whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had accepted the recommendations of the national retail lumbermen's council in order to stimulate the house building program mainly in the Atlantic provinces. In his reply the minister stated that the brief submitted by this association was being given very careful study by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

At a later date, on November 4, as reported at page 703 of Hansard, I again asked the minister whether he was prepared to advise the house that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had reached a decision to implement the recommendations contained in the brief submitted by the national retail lumbermen's association. In his reply the minister stated that as yet no decision had been reached in regard to the matter submitted in the brief to which I was referring. I followed immediately with the following question:

> Does the minister realize that a very small proportion of that amount of $150 million is now going to the maritime provinces?

The minister immediately stated that the blame for so small a portion of this money being taken up by the Atlantic provinces rested with the builders in the provinces, or other bodies. He added:

> The money is there, available, and if applications for it are not made, responsibility for that rests with the people in those provinces.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot agree entirely with this statement by the minister. If the Atlantic provinces are not taking full advantage of the National Housing Act, as is so obvious from reports and statistics from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, it is not because the people of the Atlantic provinces do not want and do not have need for these loans; it is because they cannot meet the high standards and requirements of the act.

The brief submitted to the government by the national retail lumbermen's council of Canada, following a resolution dealing with low cost housing passed at their eleventh annual meeting held at Clear Lake, Manitoba in September of this year, clearly indicated that there was a reluctance on the part of lending institutions and on the part of the low income groups of Canadians to assume contracts under the National Housing Act and regulations. As statistics will show, there is a decreasing number of people in the low and middle income brackets who can obtain loans under the present regulations.

If the new act as amended is going to be of advantage to the Atlantic provinces, where we have at present an acute shortage of houses and an overabundance of lumber available, together with an unprecedented number of unemployed seeking employment, immediate steps should be taken to amend the requirements or standards of the National Housing Act. The suggestion made by the national retail lumbermen's council in their brief that the owner's labour be taken into consideration, together with the cost of his lot, could have beneficial effects in increasing the number of loans which could be approved by making it possible for a larger number of prospective home owners to raise the initial deposit or down payment required.

In reply to another inquiry which I placed on the order paper and to which I received a reply on Monday, November 11, we were told that the average loan by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in New Brunswick from April 1, 1956 to March 31, 1957, amounted to $9,865, while in the period April 1, 1957, to October 31 of this year, the average loan amounted to $10,339, an increase of $474 per loan. These figures do not seem to justify the statement made by the minister when, as reported at page 703 of Hansard, in replying to my question he said that the government was very much interested in the plan inaugurated a few weeks ago under which it had set aside $150 million for the construction of low priced homes.

When on October 16 I asked the minister whether any action had been taken by the government to give further consideration to the building of low cost houses which are badly needed in the maritimes, the minister stated in his reply, as reported at page 36 of Hansard:

> The hon. member apparently has not familiarized himself with the policy which has been adopted and which is designed to help in the building of low cost homes. It is having that effect; the average price of the homes being built under this policy is a good deal lower than was the average under the policy which was followed by the former government.

That was the reply I received from the minister. It is obvious that the statement I have just read does not agree entirely with the statistics or figures for the Atlantic provinces, where loans from April 1, 1957, to October 31 of this year average approximately $500 more per unit than during the previous fiscal year. If the amendments to the present act are to be of any advantage to the Atlantic provinces; if we in the maritimes are to derive any benefits from this additional $150 million now being made available for the construction of houses, further changes are required in the National Housing Act and regulations. This is the objective I had in mind when, since the opening of the present parliament, I have on many occasions insisted on the implementation of the recommendation included in the brief submitted by the national retail lumbermen's association.

We have in the Atlantic provinces an extremely large number of wage earners whose total income varies from $45 to $60 a week. These are the people who are in urgent need of shelter or new houses. These are the people who cannot qualify under the present regulations and will not qualify even under the amendments which are presented to us for consideration. These are also the people who, if loans were made available, could build new houses and provide an extremely valuable market for our oversupply of lumber and labour such as we have today in the Atlantic provinces.

The changes suggested in the act, such as to permit a borrower to commit up to 27 per cent of his income instead of the present 23 per cent in mortgage payments, cannot be considered as a service rendered to the wage earners of the country notwithstanding their urgent need for new homes. The interest should be reduced and the amortization period extended in order to facilitate the application of the act by making it possible for average members of the low income group to qualify for loans.

The government may have made a step in the right direction, but the proposed legislation does not go far enough and is not quite practicable. No man earning less than $4,000 a year can tie up 27 per cent of his income in mortgage payments and at the same time provide for his family. Any man earning less than $4,000 a year should be given at least 40 years to repay and his interest should not exceed 5 per cent.

The type of home referred to by the minister as low cost housing or cheaper homes could almost be considered small palaces or luxury homes for the average wage earner of the Atlantic provinces. If the present government is consistent with regard to its so-called new policy enunciated recently by the Prime Minister with respect to the Atlantic provinces, then the minister in charge of the National Housing Act should find out to what extent the people of the Atlantic provinces can take full advantage of the act even after the amendments proposed in the bill are passed by the house.

It may be permissible for the minister to tell the prospective home owners of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia that the money is there and is available, and that if applications are not made the responsibility rests with the people of the Atlantic provinces. But, Mr. Speaker, how can our maritime people take advantage of these loans if the regulations are enacted in such a way as to make it almost impossible for them to qualify? Unless our workers earning from $45 to $60 per week can qualify for loans of $4,000 to $5,000, then the statement made earlier by the minister to the effect that the changes have been introduced to help maritime residents to take advantage of the scheme will not be applicable or at least practicable.

In conclusion, I again urge the minister to give very serious consideration to the possibility of amending the regulations and the standard requirements of the act in order to make it possible for the class of wage earners I have mentioned to qualify for loans. Only then will the act be of real advantage to the Atlantic provinces and more particularly to the low income bracket working class, which is so common in the provinces concerned. More new homes in the Atlantic provinces will mean more work for our unemployed, a better standard of living for our workers, additional markets for our lumber and better living conditions for all.

Mr. W. G. Beech (York South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate may I on behalf of the people of York South whom I have the honour to represent congratulate the Minister of Public Works on the decision to make available another $150 million for the purpose of low cost housing, and all that means to the people of Canada. When we consider that the average income of those building under the National Housing Act in 1956 was $5,300 and in 1957 is $5,800, and that the average income across Canada during that period was $3,300, it is quite evident that there are many thousands of our people who are unable to build their own homes at present-day costs.

The new regulations covering lower down payments and the increased percentage of income that may be applied to National Housing Act loans make it possible for those with incomes as low as $3,450 to qualify for loans, but these regulations still do not help those having incomes of $2,000 to $3,000 a year. Therefore I am particularly pleased that part of the amount being granted is to be used for the construction of low rental housing.

It is apparent that those in this group cannot afford to pay the high rents now being required, and I believe it to be the duty of parliament to assist in the provision of decent housing for those citizens who, through no fault of their own, cannot afford the type of home in which the future citizens of this country should be raised. Anything that may be spent on this type of housing will be more than saved by lower welfare and health costs and through the type of citizen that will result. Many of our young married couples are refraining from raising families today because of the lack of the type of housing in which they believe their children should be raised.

The growing success of projects now being built for elderly persons under the limited dividend section of the National Housing Act indicates the manner in which low rental housing may be provided for those in the low income brackets without too much cost to the people of Canada. It is to be regretted that the government has found it necessary to increase the interest rate under this section, as there is a danger that it may curtail the building of these homes.

An indication of the growing cost of this type of project may be seen when it is pointed out that when the Beech-Hall project mentioned in the house by the hon. member for York-Humber and the hon. member for York West was first contemplated the interest rate was only 3 per cent, while now it is 4½ per cent. We were able to rent the Beech-Hall apartments at $29 to $35. Now we have to charge from $35 to $44 for similar projects. The latest project being planned by the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Company will probably cost $40 to $50, which is about the limit that should be charged for this type of housing.

The fact that the Ontario government makes an outright grant of 5 per cent of the capital cost up to $500 per apartment and the British Columbia government a grant of 33⅓ per cent indicates how much these governments appreciate the desirability of this type of housing. Most of these projects are being built by municipalities, although organizations such as the Canadian Legion have built or are building similar projects. I believe these organizations should be encouraged to continue to build and sponsor such projects, and thus release a new source of funds for low rental housing.

It is my opinion that in order to encourage these people this section should be amended to provide an interest rate of 3 per cent, and the 5 per cent profit allowed under the act should be increased in order to encourage more builders to take advantage of the act and to make the loans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation more realistic. It is interesting to note, although no mention of low rental housing was made in the speech from the throne, that since the government took office 5,845 units for rental to those with low incomes have been built, are being built or the contracts have been awarded by C.M.H.C. Of this number 2,860 units will be self-sustaining and 2,985 will be subsidized. This total is more than the previous government built during the past several years.

There is another phase of housing that has produced many hundreds of homes for veterans in Canada. I refer to part II of the Veterans' Land Act. Those who have been privileged to see the developments under this section must be pleased with the results. This section allows veterans to build their own homes under the guidance of officials of the Veterans' Land Act administration. Money is advanced without interest by the department to enable the veteran to purchase materials and pay tradesmen until the home is completed, when a mortgage is arranged by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which then takes over responsibility. As this involves delays occasioned by reason of duplications in the two departments, the Canadian Legion has asked for some years that part II of the Veterans' Land Act be brought under the complete control of the Veterans' Land Act administration, inasmuch as it concerns veterans only.

The people of Canada have shown their confidence in the financial stability of the nation by their ready acceptance of the last two government bond offerings. I am wondering if any consideration has been given to authorizing Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to offer to the Canadian public mortgage bonds, just as other public utilities throughout this country have done, as a means of obtaining funds for making direct loans.

These observations, Mr. Speaker, indicate some of the facets of this very important problem. We appreciate the courtesy of the minister in making available to the committee the experts from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The attention given by officials of that organization to questions asked by members of this house satisfies me that this government is sincere in its desire to provide decent housing for the people of Canada. I have no hesitation, therefore, in supporting this bill.

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that the changes proposed in the National Housing Act will only add to the ability of persons to go deeper and deeper into debt. The changes will mean actually that while the down payment will be less, the loan will be greater and the interest will be greater.

Nothing is being proposed and nothing has been done in the past to get at the crux of the housing problem in Canada. The need is not to provide housing that people cannot afford, but to provide low cost housing for the large number of Canadians who cannot afford these homes which are above their income levels. In the last three years the average cost of a dwelling in Canada has increased by $2,000. There are 62 per cent of Canadians who earn less than $3,000, and they are the people who cannot afford adequate housing. They are also the people who are being forced to pay rents far above their earning capacity.

The National Housing Act provides now, and has provided in the past, assistance to those whose incomes are in the better than average class. Nothing has been done to assist the larger percentage of people in low income groups who should own their own dwellings.

There is a job to do as long as any of our citizens do not have adequate housing. I echo the recent editorial statement of the Regina Leader Post that what the government should do at this juncture is put a firecracker under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's tail and tell it to get cracking immediately to provide the requisite leadership for a reduction in housing costs.

A well illustrated news story in the December 13 issue of the Christian Science Monitor tells of the development of plans in the United States for a three-bedroom home at a cost of $7,500. Here in Canada we have a news story in the Toronto Globe and Mail that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has joined the toy testing committee of the Canadian association of consumers to see what can be done about what might be called educational doll's houses in Canada. The newspaper added that as the result it may not be long before a split level doll's house is on the market. While I do not wish to prevent Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation from playing with dolls, I think it would be more appropriate if the government organization put its experts to work on providing actual low cost housing.

A few years ago the city of Moose Jaw completed arrangements under a tripartite agreement for the construction of 75 rental homes in the city which I have the honour to represent. We were one of the very few Canadian cities to take advantage of that part of the legislation, yet we had to prove beyond a doubt that there was definite need for at least three times that number of rental homes in the city. The tripartite arrangement is a step in the right direction, but much more is needed to provide adequate housing for people who are now forced to live in tar-paper shacks and converted box cars in this land of free enterprise and milk and honey.

The trouble under our economic system is that half the people do not know how the other half lives. Our housing is the worst example of our inability to plan for our own people. We read almost daily news stories of children losing their lives in fires the cause of which could be traced back to inadequate housing. This government should take a realistic, positive approach to a program to make sure that all our people have adequate, safe, sanitary and comfortable dwellings.

The land assembly plan under the tripartite arrangement of the act is not used too extensively to make serviced land available for housing development. In Moose Jaw it has now taken over three years to get a land assembly plan under way, and the lots there will not be available until next spring. In the part of the city of Regina that is within my constituency, the northern part of the city, serviced land is waiting for a development. The minister referred to this area last evening when it was mentioned by the hon. member for Regina City. Despite constant efforts by Regina contractors and citizens, every effort to make the land available for N.H.A. housing has been rejected. Continuing refusals have been made to requests for loans for houses at Premier place, Coronation park, Highland park, North Annex, North Annex additions, Glen Elm park and Rothwell place, subdivisions in Regina.

Most of the lots already serviced in these areas are city-owned, but loans, I am told, will not be granted. Such loans are available, however, for the development of privately owned lands on the southern outskirts of Regina. Last evening the minister suggested that loans had not been approved in the past for these areas because of the fact there are some very old homes there. This is only partly true, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest the minister has been misinformed.

These areas are in my constituency, as I have mentioned, so I know them. Notwithstanding what apparently has been reported to the minister, there are some new homes going up in one particular area where National Housing Act loans have been refused. These homes are being built by ordinary working people proceeding bit by bit. The people want to build in the area, the lots are serviced, and the fact that people have built new homes all around these areas suggests that the sites are desirable. The loans, however, are not obtainable.

The Regina city council passed a resolution to which reference was made by both the minister and the hon. member for Regina City last evening. It reads in part:

> That in view of the recent announcement by the federal government that a further one hundred and fifty million dollars will be made available for low cost housing with a reduced down payment, that this council request Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to approve such loans in all areas of this city that are serviced with sewer and water and zoned residential—

The minister announced that an official was to look into the whole situation there. This is a step in the right direction, but it all depends upon who this official interviews in Regina. If he sees the same people who have been pressuring for the development of the higher priced, privately owned lots south, east and west of the built-up area of Regina, he will come back with the same old information. There are some smaller contractors in Regina and some members of the Regina city council who represent this northern part of Regina who have been pressing their case for months. These people should be interviewed and their opinions obtained.

May I suggest that while the official is in the suburbs of Moose Jaw he might be advised to visit the officials of that city. If I recall correctly, a further application for another 75 rental homes under the tripartite agreement has been pending for many months. I am sure the city officials of Moose Jaw would be very much interested in reviewing the situation in regard to these homes and the long delayed land assembly plan with a view to speeding up these arrangements.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully urge the minister to make the National Housing Act serve the purpose for which it should be intended, to provide housing for people who need it; not to provide accommodation for higher income groups only but for the lower income groups as well.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the matter which is presently before us. The order paper states that we are discussing a measure to amend the National Housing Act of 1954, which has as its purpose increasing from $250 million to $400 million the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under section 22 of the act, and also to provide for a reduction in down payments. Last evening we listened to the affable Minister of Public Works as he explained the purpose of this measure. During his remarks he showed considerable confidence with respect to the achievements these amendments would bring about. He painted a very rosy picture.

Sir, there are serious shortcomings in this bill which would indicate otherwise. Any consideration of the bill and the implications of its text necessitates, I think, a consideration of several broader aspects of the housing problem in this country. In doing this it will become obvious that there are serious and embarrassing facts which we must face squarely. Perhaps the advantage of doing that is that it may spur us on to more equitable legislation with respect to housing.

An illustration of what I have in mind is seen in a clipping from the Financial Post of December 14, where on the first page there appear a few figures of some considerable interest to all those who are interested in seeing the national housing problem solved. I read:

> You pay a high price for slums. They bring in only 6 per cent of total city tax revenues (reports Montreal's planning director C. E. Campeau), but they account for 33 per cent of total population, 45 per cent of major crimes, 60 per cent of tuberculosis victims, 35 per cent of fires and 45 per cent of total city service costs.

The measure itself is positive proof that previous government appropriations and policies have been quite inadequate to meet the needs of the people in the matter of their housing requirements. In my opinion we have never had really vigorous action in this field. I think we have been far too slow and ineffective in handling this problem. There is definite room for improvement. I believe we should profit to a greater extent by our past mistakes. In contrast to what has been accomplished thus far I honestly believe that the Twenty-Third parliament of Canada has a splendid opportunity to demonstrate that Canadian democracy can be made a dynamic process, and that we can do big things for all classes in our society who may be in need of better housing.

The bill proposes amendments which deal with only two aspects of the problem; first, an increase of $150 million in the aggregate amount and second, some reduction in the down payments. I must say that these are two worth-while purposes. As indicated by the hon. member for New Westminster last evening, these are forward steps and we in our group will support them. We hope they will make a contribution to the stepping up of the housing construction program in our country.

However, I cannot escape the feeling that to the extent that this is all that is being proposed, we have here nothing more than a few patches placed on already out-dated legislation which is inadequate and not in keeping with the requirements of our time. One of the obvious shortcomings in the proposal is that it does not make any provision for reducing the present excessive interest charges on loans, and for longer terms for amortization. These possibly would contribute to a more equitable solution of the housing problem. What our economy needs most at this time is bold government action against high interest rates, which have contributed to inflation more perhaps than any other factor.

Another tragic aspect of the existing housing program is the fact that there is too little provision for people who need help most. We are supposed to be interested in the common man, but there is no equality of opportunity for small income groups—elderly citizens, veterans, labouring men with large families—if they are unable to take advantage of available legislation providing assistance in home ownership. If we really believe in equality of opportunity I believe their special problems deserve our special attention at this particular time.

May I point out that the old age pensioners, the people on low incomes, are least able to take on any additional financial burdens at this time. Hence the reduced down payments proposed will not, in my opinion, help them very much. It is true that the down payments are proposed to be reduced, but at the same time the carrying charges and the required monthly payments have been considerably increased right across the board.

I mentioned equality of opportunity. May I say that equality of opportunity to these people in the low income groups can only come through amendments which (1) provide reasonable interest rates; (2) extend the terms of repayment of loans; (3) provide income tax exemptions on interest payments made in connection with home ownership; (4) substantially reduce required down payments; (5) provide government policies which aim at a program of minimum rent public housing projects designed for those on the lowest rung of the economic ladder, and in this category a housing program suited to the comforts and needs of our elderly people in the country; (6) permit a complete re-examination of taxing laws, sales and other tax reductions on essential building material, these with a view to reducing the high cost of construction. An example of what happens when prices come down is seen in a report in the latest edition of the Financial Times, that one real estate firm in the city of Toronto reported the sale of 70 houses in one subdivision in four days when the builder dropped his prices; (7) bring an energetic program for slum clearance as well as one to produce better and more functional homes for the rural population.

I feel that these are basic requirements which deserve attention in considering amendments to the housing act. I believe we must recognize that there is a shortage of purchasing power in the hands of the people, and that it is time our taxation and fiscal policies took this fact into account. Until we recognize this situation as the principal consideration in formulating a program, decent homes and stability for Canadians will be difficult to achieve.

Continuation of policies that plainly place our people deeper and deeper into debt is not the solution. As an example of the trend which has developed in that connection I should like to point out that to a question I asked a few days ago with respect to the gross national debt I received an astonishing answer. The question was:

> In terms of dollars, what is the present position of the federal government of Canada respecting (a) gross national debt including all liabilities; (b) public debt in terms of per capita liability?

[Mr. Holowach.]

The answer to the question was that at March 31, 1957, the total gross national debt of the nation was $18,326,200,000. The second portion of the question read:

> Since its inception, what is the total amount of interest that has been paid on the nation's debt?

The answer to the question was to March 31, 1957, $9,924,493,432. That is an example of a trend and situation existing in other fields, for instance in personal, small business, municipal and provincial debt. I suppose the aggregate debt of all those agencies and fields must be staggering. It has always seemed strange to me that in a country such as Canada, housing and shortage of accommodation should ever have been allowed to become a persistent national problem. It is difficult to understand, considering that Canada is probably the largest and certainly the finest lumber producing country in the world. Our unemployment situation is worsening. There are many skilled hands to do the job of building. Many of our people are living in substandard dwellings and under overcrowded conditions. Hence it cannot be said that there is a lessening of demand for homes.

Clearly the problem is not what it would be if we had tens of millions of people. Our population is only 16 million. In relation to area the population density per square mile is approximately 4. Compare this figure with a country like Great Britain whose population is approximately 52 million, with a density of some 542 to the square mile. What about the situation in a country such as the Republic of West Germany? Their population is 52 million; yet in relation to the area, some 528 people are crowded into every square mile of that country.

What are they doing about their housing problems? Well, if we review the history of the remarkable recovery in those countries it is plain to see what can be done when money is not the limiting factor, and the only limiting factor is the physical capacity to do things. In a small book published by the press and information office of the federal West German government I was surprised to read that the turnover in the whole home construction industry in 1955 was over $4 billion. In our country in the 12 years of the activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation they have approved some $3 billion worth of mortgage loans. In the official report published by the West German government, I see this interesting comment. In 1955 alone the number of newly constructed apartments totalled 541,000. Since 1950 a total of $9.8 billion has been expended in erecting apartment buildings and further, in 1955, nearly 49 per cent of the total expenditure on housing was accounted for in the capital market, approximately $2.4 billion. These broad figures relate to the amount of capital invested in home construction.

Housing is centred on government aided social housing projects, as in the erection of apartments for which rent or other charges are kept at a low level by the means of loans at low rates of interest and with long-term amortization, within the reach of the broad masses of the population.

Their first housing act provided that a total of 2 million apartments of this kind should be built between 1951 and 1956. For the years 1957 to 1962 provision is made for a further 1.8 million apartments of the same kind. At first the majority of apartments completed contained few rooms, but larger apartments are now being constructed in a much greater ratio. In 1955 more than half the new apartments had four or more rooms including the kitchen.

Well, now, that is a small nation with limited material resources and possessing a special problem of meeting the requirements of some 11 million refugees and expellees. That that country is able to make such an impressive housing program presents, it seems to me, a sharp contrast to our own slowness. It also indicates how much more we in Canada could accomplish.

Let us look at what has happened in a country closer to our own. In its 24 years of operation the United States federal housing administration has insured over $40 billion of home mortgages and property improvements. Translated into the number of families affected this means that one out of every three families in the United States has benefited. These are outstanding accomplishments, and suggest that in the field of housing similar potentialities exist in our own country. One fact is clear, that of all the problems we face in this great country of ours the housing problem is, to say the least, the most embarrassing.

Who is to blame for all this? To be honest about it, I believe it is the horse and buggy thinking at the government level. The real story would show that money trusts have been operating against the best interests of our people. Government publicity keeps telling us of the tremendous progress we are making. That is not so. I am not suggesting we have not made progress, but I am saying that our progress in terms of what could be done has been quite unsatisfactory.

Let us look at these facts. It cannot be said that housing shortages in our country are of recent origin; the problem has been with us for the past 25 years, irrespective of who was in power, both in depression years and in times of relative prosperity. The question of providing adequate housing for our people has just never been resolved. The unhappy fact is that we have never made a proper effort to develop a comprehensive broad scale attack to eliminate substandard dwellings. Consequently today the greatest unmet need of our people is still in the field of providing homes on a fair basis.

What is the situation today? The minister in speaking recently somewhat played this down, but it is a fact that for two years now residential construction has been substantially dropping. This year starts were considerably lower than last year. I have in my hand daily bulletins from the dominion bureau of statistics, one dated Monday, May 6, 1957, which has this to say:

> Starts on the construction of new residential units were sharply lower in this year's first quarter, dropping to 7,769 units from 14,473 in the first three months of 1956.

A further bulletin dated Tuesday, July 9, 1957, has this to say:

> Fewer new dwelling units were started or completed in the first five months of this year than last, D.B.S. reports in an advance statement. Number of units in various stages of construction at the end of May was also smaller than a year earlier.

Then as recently as December 6 we have this information.

> Starts on the construction of new dwelling units in the January-October period this year numbered 102,197 units, some 11.3 per cent fewer than 1956's comparable total of 115,188, according to an advance D.B.S. statement.

Further on it says:

> Completions in the 10 months totalled 94,868 units, down 13.1 per cent from the year-earlier total of 109,160 units.

In many cities of Canada the sag in the home building program has become a very serious problem. In my own city of Edmonton this has been especially so. May I point out to the minister that in 1956 only 3,800 dwelling units were built in that city, while during that year we had a population increase of over 14,000 persons. The difficulties experienced with our growth have been compounded by the tight money policies prevailing. Mortgage restrictions have hit our city harder than any other area in Canada. We made repeated submissions to the previous government; nothing happened. It is true that many of their candidates said something would happen after June 10 when they were back in power, but I would sincerely hope that the new Minister of Public Works, in facing the situation, will take heed of Edmonton's interest by making substantial increases in the number of N.H.A. credits available for that area.

I would also ask that we look at the history of this national problem in order that we may know what to do in the future. During the depression years we had a period of decline in residential building. That was a period of paradox. The only thing that was short was money; there were plenty of materials and manpower available. There was no decline in the volume of homes needed then, but in spite of these factors it was a period in which everything sagged because of the shortage of money. There were the demands and the physical facilities at our disposal, but the money just was not there.

In 1939 Canada was involved in a war. Suddenly and mysteriously money was no problem. Our capacity to do things in a big way was demonstrated to the world. People were prepared to forgo satisfying their personal needs and convenience and comforts in order to meet the drastic requirements of that great war.

Immediately after the termination of the war the tremendous housing requirement and public opinion forced the government to make one notable change. They enacted the National Housing Act in 1946 and we had a short period of boom in building. Then suddenly they turned on the tight money policy again. The government allowed tight money policies to be forced on the people of Canada, which resulted in interest rates being raised seven times in the course of one and a half years.

The country was told that these policies were necessary in order to stop inflation. The actual consequences were the highest cost of living ever, the restriction of building, higher cost of building for prospective home buyers, and a drastically reduced amount of credit for home construction.

It is a very significant fact that the building going on of late is limited almost entirely to families of middle or higher incomes. I believe the minister is aware of this, because in the first statement he made he pointed out that the average income of the borrower was $5,829. Perhaps I had better quote this statement as made by the minister at page 1878 of Hansard, where he says:

> I was very much surprised to find that the qualifying income for the average National Housing Act loan made by approved lenders in the month of September of this year was $5,350. The average income for borrowers under the National Housing Act was $5,829.

I just wonder how many of our people qualify under those terms, or have salaries of that kind. The fact that the answer to inflation is production does not seem to have entered into the consideration of the government. This government and the previous government in sustaining tight money policies kept telling us they were necessary in order to stop inflation. Well, sir, there never was inflation in the first place, certainly not in the sense of the term which means, properly speaking, too much money chasing too few goods. It is true that we have had cost and price increases, but they were a direct consequence of the present taxation policies, and these increases were aggravated by the tight money policies being applied. There was a marked decline in residential construction, yet the proponents of tight money just went their own way.

I wish now to say a word about present interest rates. In this connection we regretted very much to hear the minister state that the government has no present intention of reducing the 6 per cent interest rate on N.H.A. loans. This denial of intention to lower interest rates is serious, and nullifies whatever advantage is proposed in the reduction of down payments.

I have never been able to figure out government thinking with respect to high interest rates and tight money. On the one hand they claim that this policy keeps housing costs down, but in fact the very opposite is the case, because as capital becomes scarce it becomes dearer to acquire, interest rates rise, and high interest rates result in less construction. Less construction, in turn, encourages higher rents and a very vicious discount practice which is being carried on in this country at the moment.

Instead of operating in the interests of people the existing policies seem to be operating in the best interests of lending institutions. Instead of homes being built, bigger profits are being allowed for a few. Instead of contributing to stability in the lumbering and construction industries the administration's tight money policies have depressed those industries. Tight money has contributed to promotional schemes and giantism in business.

What about the future? At the fourteenth annual convention of the national house builders' association, which met in Montreal on January 9, 1957, an important message was given by the association's president. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of January 19, 1957:

> He told the 500 convention delegates that home construction cannot be allowed to lag if the "truly colossal" growth of Canada continues far into the future, as many economists predict.
> "It has been predicted that we will require 4 million new homes in the next 20 years, necessitating a mortgage credit of $20 billion. If this is correct, and I think it is, the situation could become serious in my opinion if the production of houses is allowed to slip below the 1956 level", he said.

Well, it has slipped. Now, in bringing these facts to the attention of the house I do so because they illustrate how unsatisfactory the situation is, and how seriously the present government and the previous government have failed to solve the problem of housing on a long-term basis. We Social Crediters believe it is high time the government did something about this situation and made sure that public moneys are deployed for the benefit of the people and not for the sake of the profits of lending institutions. We want to see the finance costs of housing lowered in order that the small income man may benefit first. We want to see mortgage credits forthcoming in sufficient quantities and on a steady basis, not on a stop and go basis. We want to see interest rates lowered.

In this respect it is sheer nonsence to insist that an iron-clad government-backed guarantee would require an interest rate of 6 per cent. Our people are excellent credit risks, and this has been proven by the low percentage of losses on approved loans. The rate of interest return offered recently on the No. 12 series of Canada savings bonds was 4.46 per cent, which was advertised as the highest yield ever offered by the dominion government, and as being a very good investment. I agree that this is a good investment and a good yield, but if a government-backed bond produces interest at the rate of 4.46 per cent, then these housing loans, made through lending agencies and guaranteed by the government, should not require more than 4.46 per cent interest. In fact the loan should be issued at cost.

Finally, in our view there is no greater responsibility of government at this time than that of instituting a brand new approach, a far-reaching housing program designed to make home ownership possible for every Canadian family, not just for a select few. Toward this end we are prepared to give full co-operation.

I might point out that we had an election on June 10. The Liberals lost the confidence of the public. Temporarily the Conservatives are in power. It seems to me that the moral of this story is that no government in Canada remains long in power which does not give the people the type of management they desire. This government and all governments will have to recognize that a new period is dawning in which people are thinking of a better life and, consequently, a new and more dynamic concept of government is necessary. Our policies on housing must reflect this concept.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to make a few remarks regarding the changes in the National Housing Act. One speaker who preceded me this morning, the hon. member for Gloucester, has already dealt with what in his view will be the effect of these changes as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned. Perhaps I agree with him in some respects, but I certainly do not agree with him in all respects.

I would heartily commend the Minister of Public Works for the proposed amendment which would allow extra money to be allotted for home building. Certainly this extra money in my area of Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick will mean that our small contractors will have a better chance of carrying out work during the winter period, work which will employ men in the mills providing the lumber, give work to a number of other tradesmen, and certainly provide a great stimulus to the building industry.

In line with the remarks made by the minister yesterday to the hon. member for New Westminster, in which he stated that he was ready to receive suggestions as to any possible changes which might help, I will just say, as I have already stated, that I believe this extra money will be of great assistance in our area.

However, I would mention one matter which will be a further help at a later time. I refer to the matter set out in the brief of the national retail lumbermen's council, namely that owner labour be considered as part of the down payment. In my area, and in the maritimes generally, the Veterans' Land Act has been a good means of providing impetus and help in the construction of houses.

Three friends of mine undertook to build new houses outside the town under the Veterans' Land Act. I watched them with a good deal of interest. They did much of the work themselves. They called in skilled tradesmen at different times to do the necessary important work, but a great deal of the construction was done by their own labour. I know this because at one time I was almost conscripted into the labour gang, but I got away from that.

However, I would point out that in my area, and in the province of Nova Scotia generally, there are a number of co-operative groups which have built houses. Young married couples who work in stores, in the local car works or in various places of business, whose incomes are certainly not in the high brackets, have, by means of the Nova Scotia housing commission and in other ways, undertaken co-operative efforts. These young couples, by the use of their own labour, were able to cut down the cost of the houses, and it has proved to be a very successful effort.

To my knowledge, what has happened in the past is that contractors have been actually engaged in the building of houses under the National Housing Act. I recommend that owner labour be made a permanent and integral part of this act so that men can do much more of their own work, thus cutting down the cost and helping in the down payment. Perhaps they could hire a contractor to look over the whole project and employ the various skilled tradesmen, as is done now. I submit that this is a matter which could perhaps be studied by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and be included in the act.

The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, I believe, yesterday stated something to the effect that we should not discourage other lenders from taking part in lending in Canada. I agree with that, but I would point out that so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned a young man, or anyone, building a house is limited by legislation in the amount he can borrow from other lenders. In most instances he can get a loan of only 60 per cent of the appraised value of a house. Some companies limit the borrowers to 50 per cent of the amount. This makes it quite difficult for a young couple to raise the amount of the down payment in the first instance. As I have said, in the first instance it is 40 per cent of the appraised value of a new house and in the second instance, 50 per cent.

Mr. Marler: The hon. member is not referring to loans under the National Housing Act?

Mr. MacEwan: No; I am referring to private mortgage companies. I believe the change to 90 per cent of the first $12,000 of the lending value or any part thereof will help a great deal in our area but, as I have said, I believe there should be an amendment to the act in future to give builders a chance to have their own labour included as part of the down payment. I have received letters from various people in the area in this regard, and I have taken this opportunity to place the matter before the house.

Finally, one object of the amendment was to provide lower rental houses and smaller houses throughout Canada. I would close with a short quotation from a learned Englishman who said:

> The nations of the world dwell in the cottage, and unless the excellence of your statesmanship and the beauty of your legislation is reflected there on the minds and the hearts of the people, rely upon it, you have yet to learn the duties of government.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this government has learned those duties.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly with reference to the bill before the house, which proposes to amend the 1954 National Housing Act by increasing by $150 million the original amount of $250 million which was provided by the Liberal government, and also to provide for the reduction of down payments.

I am grateful to the Minister of Public Works for allowing us to speak today with as much latitude as possible concerning the National Housing Act. As a new member, speaking for the first time on the subject of national housing, I feel obligated to express my acknowledgment and admiration for the wisdom, courageous solicitude and initiative that the Liberal administration in the past demonstrated for Canadians by enacting federal legislation to more easily provide low cost houses in which our people may raise their families in comfort, intimacy and security.

The Liberal legislation expanding the scope of the housing act in 1956 by assisting the redevelopment of substandard housing and slum areas gave further proof of the active interest of the Liberal government in co-operating with municipalities and provinces in vital social problems involving the security of the Canadian family. Such legislation has promoted the morals, health and good citizenship of the Canadian family more than any other legislation in the history of Canadian parliaments.

Among the principal goals of our society are both the continual striving to overcome the housing shortage which still exists in Canada and the vigorous quest for higher standards of housing. This quest finds its expression not only in individual pride in being a home owner but also in the collective concern for the proper housing of all members of the Canadian community, be they young, old, poor or of moderate means.

However, durability of housing, its conservation and eventual replacement, must be considered important factors in the maintenance of the nation's housing resources. Moreover, I do not have to emphasize the fact that the construction and maintenance of homes is in itself a major industry, using the products of our forests and mines and putting into action the manufacturing industries producing building materials and domestic equipment and employing numerous skilled and unskilled labourers.

For all these reasons the minister of the federal government in charge of the national housing program has most serious obligations to fulfil. The introduction of piecemeal legislation, the curtailing of discussions and the refusal of necessary amendments to these fundamental matters will not solve the existing housing problems, as stated by previous speakers. In the long run it might even harm our national economy.

During the last federal election campaign Canadians were promised that the needs and desires of the Canadian people would be met and that good government would be provided. Alas, the numerous bits of legislation which have been actually forced through the present session of the 23rd parliament testify to the lack of sound planning on the part of the present administration. The argument that they have had only a short time in which to consider legislation is a very poor reason for very poor legislation, as there is no immediate deadline that must be met. The Canadian voters did not restrict the government only to six months in which to plan and introduce specific legislation in order to meet the needs of the Canadian people and the requirement to continue a sound economy in Canada.

The mere provision of just $150 million for housing and the small reduction in down payments are at best only a mediocre attempt to help the ailing housing industry, and certainly do not solve the housing problems of the Canadian family in the low income bracket. In September the government released $150 million from the federal treasury for the construction of small homes, particularly with the hope of reducing the number of unemployed in Canada. But we see that this $150 million did not improve substantially the amount of homes being built, nor did it improve the unemployment situation. We learned from the statisticians a few days ago that there are 100,000 more people unemployed today than there were in September of this year. The statisticians have also reported that 70 per cent of Canadians earn less than $3,400 a year.

According to the proposed changes in the legislation it will be possible for a man to obtain a loan of $12,200 on a $14,000 home only if his income is around $4,360. Even for a $9,000 loan the prospective home owner must earn at least $3,400 annually. If such low priced homes should be available, only 30 per cent of Canadians will be able to avail themselves of this privilege, leaving 70 per cent of Canadians out in the cold because they will not be able to benefit from the new legislation. The people who need low cost homes the most are being ignored by the government, even though the avowed intention of the national housing plan was to provide low cost homes for people in the low income brackets.

I do not mean to blame the affable Minister of Public Works entirely for failing to provide adequate help for the low wage earner, because on December 4, 1957, as found at page 1880 of Hansard, he made this confession:

> Quite frankly, I should like to be able to help an income group even lower than those who will be helped by this legislation.

This leads us to believe that many other factors, circumstances and perhaps persons in the present government have dissuaded the minister from presenting more generous and just legislation. Therefore the greatest blame once again falls upon the Conservative government as a whole for failing to assist adequately those in dire need. It would have been more just had the minister proposed more liberal changes by introducing greater reductions in down payments, a substantial reduction in the interest rate on loans and perhaps by reducing—

Mr. Rea: Will the hon. member for Trinity permit a question? Is the hon. member going to vote for the bill?

Mr. Haidasz: I will let the hon. member for Spadina know at the conclusion of my address.

Mr. Pickersgill: He voted to support the chairman the other night.

Mr. Haidasz: I was about to mention also that the abolition or reduction of the insurance fee on loans would be of help to the low income group. I cannot understand why the government could not have allowed the buyer to borrow 90 per cent of the full lending value. On a $16,000 house, the average price for a new, six-room, comfortable dwelling in the Toronto area from which I come, the down payment would only be $1,600 and the mortgage $14,400, with a monthly payment of $112 plus $20 for taxes. If the government had lowered the interest rate the monthly burden would have been lighter and the amortization period could then be extended more easily to 35 years or more. If the 2 per cent insurance fee were abolished this would save the prospective buyer another $228. These indeed would have been very liberal amendments, and would have really helped the poor workingman who is in need of a home.

However, there would still be thousands of Canadians who, being in the very lowest income brackets or because of their employment or for other reasons, would not find it practical to buy or own a home. For these people the solution is more low rental housing accommodation. There rests a definite responsibility upon the present government through its crown agency, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to provide more effective leadership in working with provincial and municipal authorities to set up and approve without delay greater numbers of more adequate low rental housing projects.

The National Housing Act amendments introduced by the past Liberal administration, which provided for substantial federal assistance to municipalities to clear up slum areas, are to be highly commended. Toronto in particular has taken advantage of this legislation and has succeeded in developing modern low rental dwelling units in the Regent park area. There are other areas in Toronto that need clearing and redeveloping, such as Alexandra park and Moss park. Proposals have been made by the Toronto planning board in this regard, but the mayor of the peculiar creature called the metro, created by the Frost government, is repeatedly postponing these and many other worth-while projects in Toronto. Since Mr. Gardiner's boss espoused the Tory leader, it is difficult to understand why there should be such opposition from the metro level.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, an urban renewal study for Toronto recently suggested that the National Housing Act provisions be altered to include financial aid to the city for improvement projects intended to remove the threat of blight, to enable long-range planning to prevent slums, and to build well planned areas in our cities. The present government would indeed be very helpful and wise if it would agree to provide such assistance to municipalities.

I have been informed that on October 1, 1957, representations were made by the association of Ontario mayors and reeves to the government requesting federal aid of up to 75 per cent of the cost of acquiring and clearing blighted and substandard areas in any municipality, and asking that the municipality's share of such cost be repayable by the municipality without interest over a period of 40 years. I suppose these representatives were also told that the government had considered the proposal, and the problem was swept under the carpet.

A more urgent need for Canada is to make available more low cost serviced land in and around our municipalities. There is no doubt that many cities missed the opportunity provided years ago under the National Housing Act to embark upon municipally initiated land assembly schemes. The federal government should take the leadership once again in this matter. The 2 per cent insurance fee charged to home buyers to protect the lender has already, we know, accumulated a surplus of $27 million. Could this money not be used to buy land and sell it at cost to municipalities for building really low cost housing areas, completely serviced?

The biggest beneficiaries in Toronto are the subdividers who had land for sale. With the return to the industry of many builders who had gone out of business previously, the subdividers have been able to unload their land holdings. This occurred at a time when market conditions had begun to force land prices down. It would appear that if there has been any benefit to the subdividers, there has been very little benefit to the potential home purchasers.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, in the Toronto metropolitan area the price of serviced land is too high to permit the construction of very small houses. It does not make sense to build a $12,000 house on a lot costing $5,000. A sharp distinction, therefore, has to be drawn between very small housing units, which is what the government is providing, and low cost housing which it was their avowed intention to provide.

Any experienced builder will tell you that the size of a small home may be increased by 10 per cent beyond the 1,050 square feet limit imposed by the government at an increase in cost of perhaps only 4 per cent. This extra size is the really low cost part of the house, and at the present time it is lost to potential home purchasers because of the existing legislation. It seems to me much more sensible to build the basic structure a little larger, to provide more adequate and durable accommodation to which the home purchaser can add extra features as his income allows, than to limit him to a very small, cheap structure which cannot be expanded nor be expected to last very long.

Another drawback of the present system is the fact that too many houses will be built in the same size range, and consequently the potential purchaser does not have the variety to which he is accustomed in a free market. The design is also limited, because it is most difficult to achieve good design and balance when the floor areas are so rigidly controlled. Just a few weeks ago the regional awards of the national design council were presented, and one could not help but be impressed with the giant strides that have been made in the design of small homes. It seems to be a bit inconsistent for the design council to encourage variety and beauty while, on the other hand, the government forces uniformity, drabness and that regimented appearance of those box-like structures of which we see so many and which we all deplore.

The big problem of the building industry seems to be one of cost, and it is a real problem which seems to be receiving little or no attention. The builders claim that over a number of years they have held down, within reason, the cost of the house itself in spite of tremendously increased wages and the rising prices of construction materials. The price of serviced land, however, has skyrocketed beyond their control out of all proportion. It is in this field that the federal and provincial governments will have to make a real contribution. But if, on the other hand, nothing is done and land prices, wages and the cost of construction materials continue to rise, then even the advantage of the reduced down payment to the potential home buyer will be lost.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the proposed amendments can only be regarded as a short-term emergency measure, a meagre palliative. I say that unless the regulations are changed as the result of much more thought than they appear to have been given, the results, rather than being beneficial, will remain inadequate to the building industry, to the home buying public and to the taxpayers of Canada who are underwriting the whole scheme.

Mr. Barnett: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, last evening my colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam expressed his pleasure that we have a much respected fellow British Columbian as the Minister of Public Works and the member of the government who is responsible for housing activities initiated by the federal government. He also gave the minister one or two good marks for attempting to do something about the housing situation.

I should like to say that I concur very heartily in the remarks that were made last night in this respect. However, at the same time I must also say that to me it is a matter of regret that the minister's horizons as to what can and should be done in the field of housing appeared to be quite restricted. Actually, of course, the amendments he is proposing to this house in connection with the National Housing Act are, I think one could fairly say, relatively minor.

In that connection perhaps I should remind the minister that when the act we are now proposing to amend was brought into this house he felt it was such a bad act that he was completely opposed to it and that he, along with his colleagues, when the vote on second reading was taken on January 29, 1954, opposed second reading of the bill which, as I suggest, he now is apparently content to deal with only by two relatively minor amendments.

In describing the amendments in that manner I am not attempting in any way to detract from the view that some good will be accomplished by them. However, I think the minister himself, in saying that he would like to do something more about housing, has made it clear that some of us have some justification for suggesting that his horizons on what can be done are rather limited.

I also recall that as the discussion progressed on the original bill which brought in the present housing act, some of the views which we in this corner of the house were then expressing were rather similar to some of the views we are expressing now, particularly when it comes to the matter of dealing with what should be done about interest in the provision of funds for housing. On March 8, 1954, as recorded at page 2758 of Hansard of that year, my colleague the then member for York South, the late Mr. Joseph Noseworthy, proposed an amendment on third reading of the bill. That amendment reads as follows:

> That Bill No. 102 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of amending it so as to provide a fixed limit as to the rate of interest to be charged on loans made under the provisions of the said act.

On that occasion the then hon. member for York South had this to say:

> It is said, for example, that there will be an advantage in the lower down payment. It is true a few dollars will be saved on the down payment but the interest rate will be higher, and any benefit which might accrue from a saving on the down payment will be swallowed up in the increased rate of interest over the years.

Then Mr. Noseworthy went on to say this:

> The bill does not solve our housing problem. It will be just as difficult for those in the lower income groups to get houses after this bill becomes law as it was under the old act.

The interesting thing, perhaps, about that matter, in addition to my suggestion that the views of the C.C.F. have been fairly consistent on this subject over the years, is that the present Minister of Public Works and his colleagues, after having opposed second reading of the bill, did not see fit to support that amendment for referral back to the committee, and that the then leader of the Conservative party, Hon. George Drew, made it clear that he was not prepared to go along with our ideas as to what should be done to ensure that a lower interest rate should apply on loans made under the National Housing Act.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, it becomes apparent that the principal stumbling block, as far as action by the present government is concerned, is similar to that which we felt was the principal stumbling block to effective action as far as the legislation of the previous administration is concerned.

In discussing this aspect of the matter, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some reference to what I consider to be a most important document, and one which in my opinion should be receiving much greater attention in this house than has been the case to date. I am referring to the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, which was addressed to the minister of finance under date of February 28, 1957.

This document I feel, Mr. Speaker, sets out in very clear terms an explanation of the financial situation in which we find ourselves today, and makes it quite clear that much of the loose talk we have heard in this house and across the country about tight money and related matters is just so much nonsense. It also, I think, could make a fairly important contribution to our thinking as to what it is possible and feasible to do about providing proper housing for the Canadian citizens. I am going to read from the report of Mr. Coyne some excerpts which I feel relate themselves most closely to the problem of providing adequate housing for our citizens. At page 5 of the report Mr. Coyne has this to say:

> Since the demand for loanable funds exceeded even the greatly increased supply, lending institutions have not been able to accommodate all potential borrowers in full; they have made such disposition of their funds as they chose, within the terms of any statutes governing their activities. In view of the rather frequent complaints which have recently arisen with regard to the availability of housing finance, it should, perhaps, be explicitly stated that banks, insurance companies, and all other institutions and individuals concerned with the provision of loans for this purpose are under no regulation in the nature of credit control preventing them from lending money for housing, or requiring them to reduce the scale of such lending. So-called "federal credit controls" do not exist.

Then, Mr. Speaker, on page 9 of the report following through with this discussion of this matter Mr. Coyne has this to say:

> This limitation on the availability of bank credit has not apparently affected the ability of the companies concerned to obtain funds from other sources.

I am sorry; that is a reference to instalment finance, but a little further down on the same page he says:

> Throughout 1956 the chartered banks continued to make substantial advances by way of insured housing loans, although commitments for new investments of this character progressively decreased. The total of new approvals of housing loans by banks in 1956 was about half as great as in 1955, and by the year-end the banks had very largely withdrawn from this field of lending.
> Long-term investments made from and limited by funds accruing from the growth of savings deposits are in quite a different category from credit expansion in the form of current or demand loans to businesses and individuals, which may reach excessive proportions. As discussed later, the financing of such credit expansion through the use of funds arising from savings deposits, both directly and from the sale of government bonds, in which savings deposits previously received had been invested, has been one of the less predictable and less stable features of monetary developments over the past two years.

Turning now to page 27 of the report in which Mr. Coyne is continuing his discussion of the banking system, I find these words:

> One reason why it is not possible to predict the effects of monetary measures with accuracy is the uncertainty, which must always exist to some degree, as to the reaction of the banking system itself to such measures. In Canada this has been more noticeable perhaps than elsewhere because of the extent to which commercial banking functions and savings banking functions are intermingled in the operations of the chartered banks. Over 80 per cent of total personal savings deposits in Canada are held with the chartered banks, and the pattern of investment of such deposits has varied widely at different times.

Then at page 29 he goes on:

> Housing loans and other investments have been the residual form of investment for the savings departments of the banks.
>
> In other countries personal savings deposits are chiefly held by separate and specialized institutions, sometimes called building societies, sometimes called savings and loan associations, sometimes called savings banks or mutual savings banks, which make a practice of investing such funds in housing loans and in relatively long-term securities.

Then on page 30 Mr. Coyne continues:

> In 1954 the Bank Act was amended to permit the chartered banks to make mortgage loans on new houses, loans insured under the National Housing Act. This was an important improvement in the machinery of the Canadian capital market. I believe it would be desirable if means could now be found to encourage greater stability in the rate of long-term investment by the banks in those fields where they may now operate . . .
>
> To maintain their relative position, the chartered banks may find it desirable and necessary to operate in respect of the resources of their savings departments in much the same way as a savings bank and use such resources to provide funds for the kinds of investment naturally associated with long-term savings.
> To the extent that personal savings were segregated from the commercial lending field, they could be regarded as likewise removed from the category of "money supply" . . .
>
> Fluctuations in mortgage lending would of course be much less pronounced. The workings of monetary policy would become more predictable and more effective . . .
> In any condition of an excess of physical demand over physical supply, some elements of demand must of necessity give way, lose out to others. Competition for money with higher interest rates produces fewer casualties and less social stress than unrestricted competition for goods with higher prices. Better a rise in the price of borrowed money . . . than a very great rise in the price of goods and housing, in the cost of schools and hospitals and public utilities.

I am reading that section, I might say, to indicate to the minister that I am attempting to give a fair picture of all Mr. Coyne has to say in this most important connection. He goes on:

> Whenever there is an excessive demand over supply, and the competition for funds with which to make the desired expenditures is intense, the results in terms of who gets how much at what cost will not give satisfaction to all. Those who find themselves unable to borrow as much or as cheaply as they wish, or unwilling to pay interest at the new and higher rates will naturally be dissatisfied. What is more important, the actual distribution of loanable funds may not seem to be the most desirable one from the point of view of society as a whole, or of large groups within it. This is a question of opinion, and a matter of public policy.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the governor of the Bank of Canada, I would suggest, very properly dumps this whole question right in the laps of those of us who are members of this house. He brings us his analysis of this situation and, on the basis of the facts which Mr. Coyne has so clearly set out, we should consider what action could and should be taken about the whole question of providing housing finance.

The Minister of Public Works last night, as recorded at page 2498 of Hansard, said:

. . . one of the main problems worrying me about housing. It is this. Next year, where is the money coming from to provide for the number of houses that should be built?

Well, the minister is not the only one who is worried about that, because I think all of us in this house recognize that the extra money which we are being asked to approve in this bill is not really enough to go very far toward solving the over-all need for houses across Canada. But the thing which concerns me is that the minister goes on to say that the government obviously cannot take over the business of providing mortgage money; it simply cannot be done.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that is where the minister and those of us who are in the C.C.F. party really part company. The minister says it cannot be done. As far as we are concerned, we say the only reason it cannot be done is that the minister does not want to do it; and if one follows through with the analysis of the situation which Mr. Coyne has made and which he has, as I suggest, dumped in our laps as members of this House of Commons representing the people of Canada, then I suggest that we are coming to the crux of the situation thas has to be debated.

Why could not the government take over responsibility for seeing that there is adequate mortgage money available for housing? Mr. Speaker, I suggest the reason this government, speaking through the Minister of Public Works says this cannot be done is exactly the same reason for which Mr. Winters, when he was minister, said it could not be done; and that is because of the fact that the Conservative party, like the Liberal party, refuses to recognize the basic fact that capital is something which is socially created. While it may be true that certain people legally have a large corner on certain amounts of it, nevertheless the reason we have capital which would make housing on a large scale possible, if it were devoted to that end, is that fifteen or sixteen million Canadians have created it.

We in the C.C.F. party maintain that at least a sufficient proportion of that socially created capital should be available to the people who created it in order to ensure that they shall have decent housing at a cost they can afford to pay. We maintain that it is not necessary for us to go on forever paying tribute to the moneylenders so they can continue to extract their pound of flesh over a period of 25, 30 or 40 years while a house is being paid for. That is the issue, and that is the challenge which those of us in this corner take up with the Minister of Public Works when he says this is something which cannot be done.

Mr. Speaker, we are dealing particularly in this bill with a provision to increase the direct lending activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and we have already made it clear that as far as the measure goes we are prepared to support it. But we have also made it clear, I think, that we do not feel it is necessary that the people of Canada should continue to have to pay the present kind of interest rates over a long period of years, as they will be required to do if nothing more than this proposal is put into effect.

The main discussion has quite properly turned on the idea of the minister of making additional direct loans available to those who are building family homes, individually. But I think we have to realize that included in the direct lending activities of the corporation there are some other activities which are a matter of concern, and that in increasing the amount of money available and refusing at the same time to make provision for lowest possible interest rates, we are creating a problem for those who are attempting to provide low cost housing for senior citizens for example, in the type of community project which is becoming increasingly popular in many communities.

I have one such venture in the particular part of my constituency in which I happen to live, where a local organization formed for the purpose of attempting to provide low cost housing for senior citizens feels it is right in the bite at the present time because of this question of what is going to happen about interest rates.

They have gone to the trouble of determining what difference in the rentals will be brought about as a result of the interest increase which took place in the housing field recently, and according to the figures as they have had them supplied by someone competent to work out these things, on the basis of amortization over a 40-year period, they arrive at this conclusion. For a loan of $110,000 at 3¾ per cent the annual payment will amount to $5,352.54. With interest on the same sum at 4½ per cent, the annual payment would amount to $5,977.75. This, they say, is an increase of $625 annually, or approximately $52 a month. They point out that if they had 26 people paying rent it would mean a rental increase of $2 a month merely to meet an increase in the interest rate of three quarters of one per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said, this idea of people in communities taking action to provide housing in this particular field is arousing increasing interest. For example, in another community in my constituency at the present time a group of people is interested in forming what it proposes to call the golden age housing society. This house may be interested to know that their plan calls initially for the erection of two units, one of which they propose to name in honour of the late J. S. Woodsworth, who was the first leader of the C.C.F. party, and the other which they propose to name in honour of Mr. A. W. Neill, who was for a long time the independent member for Comox-Alberni, because of the fact that both these gentlemen took a pioneer interest in the initial establishment of an old age pension in Canada.

I mention this because I know these people will be placed in exactly the same position with regard to interest rates as those of whom I was speaking a moment ago with regard to the other project.

So it seems to me that from whatever angle we tackle this question we get back to the problem raised by the pressure of the interest rates which must be paid over the period of up to 40 years, which add so much to the cost of providing these facilities whether for individual owners or as rental accommodation for senior citizens.

The minister has already made it clear in dealing with the amendment proposed by my colleague the hon. member for Regina City, at the resolution stage that we have not much hope of persuading him to do anything about changing this bill at the moment. Nevertheless, I think we would be less than kind to the minister if we in turn did not make it equally clear to him that the problems which arise in this connection are, in our opinion, going to continue, and that we in this group will continue to draw them to his attention and to the attention of the Canadian people with all the vigour of which we are capable.

[Mr. Barnett.]

We do not take the defeatist attitude toward this question that the minister takes. We do not say this is something which cannot be done. We believe in the adage "where there's a will there's a way," and we think it is becoming more and more evident all the time that the new Conservative administration just has no better solution than its predecessors had while in office.

Mr. Fraser: No matter what they did you would not be satisfied.

Mr. Barnett: As long as they are content to bandy about such terms as "state socialism" and all the rest of it, as some of the members of the Conservative party did with regard to the suggestions we were making when this act first came in, so long are we going to find them in a sea of despond as far as housing in this country is concerned.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although as I said at the outset, like a great many other people in British Columbia, I have a very high personal regard for the present Minister of Public Works, nevertheless I must say I cannot share his rather gloomy outlook as to what can be done to provide the Canadian people with decent houses.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this bill which proposes to make available an extra $150 million for housing and also to lower the down payments. I should also like to add my voice to those who have urged a change in the regulations under which these funds are now administered. This money is being made available by the parliament of Canada, and we therefore have a duty to see that it is used to help those who have the greatest need. That is not happening under the present legislation.

If I am to judge from past experience, the benefits to my province from this legislation will be negligible. Since the first $150 million was made available about two months ago I believe only $200,000 has been used in Newfoundland, and most of this has gone to people with high incomes. Of the $200,000, $117,300 has gone to St. John's for 11 units and the other $83,000 to the Gander area for 9 units. These were the official figures up to the end of last week. Of the first $150 million, only $2.3 million to date have gone to all the maritime provinces combined.

The reason, of course, is that the people in the maritime provinces and in Newfoundland are not able to benefit from this legislation because under the present regulations their incomes are too low to enable them to take advantage of the act. I know the minister deplores these facts as much as I do myself, but this situation is the result of regulations which cause federal housing funds to be distributed among the provinces in proportion to the average personal income in the provinces. Consequently Ontario, with the highest income, gets the lion's share and Newfoundland, with the lowest income, gets the smallest share.

One way to correct this situation is to change the regulations so that a proportion of the funds will be allocated to provinces according to population and need. Along with that I believe there should be a change in specifications to permit cheaper houses to be built in poorer areas. Statistics prove that persons with incomes of as low as $3,000 have been able to benefit even under the present regulations. These cases should be singled out for special study to find ways and means of building more houses for people in this income bracket.

The changes introduced by the present government to promote cheaper houses are commendable as far as they go, but they have two important defects. The houses are cheaper because they are smaller, and therefore they do not represent any increased value for the money spent. In the second place, they do not take account of human needs. A man with a small income very often needs a larger house than a person with a high income.

According to statistics, the average income of people benefiting under this act is around $5,000. Now that inflation is supposed to have been checked and credit restrictions are being eased, it should be possible for people in this income bracket to provide houses for themselves in the usual way without too much assistance from government funds.

I believe the government should concentrate on providing houses for people in the $3,000 income bracket and under. Unless this is done Newfoundland can never derive much benefit from this legislation. One way to do this is to encourage co-operative housing schemes and schemes for people who can build their own houses in whole or in part. Veterans have used funds under the Veterans' Land Act in this way with outstanding success. In particular I should like to see a special scheme to provide houses for fishermen. Fishermen do not need houses as elaborate as do people who dwell in the city, and most fishermen, particularly in Newfoundland, are able to build their own houses.

A family man actually needs two houses in his lifetime. He needs a small one when he is just married and starting out in life to raise a family. After four or five years, when the family begins to grow up, he needs a larger house. Then in later years, when the family has grown up and gone, he could get along better with a smaller house, with one or two bedrooms. I believe these facts should be taken into account, and some scheme worked out whereby one house could be traded in on another.

This extra money will be welcomed all across Canada on account of the unemployment situation. Newfoundland itself has a very acute unemployment situation, probably just as bad as that of any other province. Our unemployment figures are double what they were at this time last year. As I pointed out before, this money will not have any effect at all in improving the unemployment situation in Newfoundland.

It is commendable on the part of the government to try to kill two birds with one stone in this way, but I think we should keep in mind that the two goals of providing low-cost housing, on the one hand, and creating employment on the other, are not entirely compatible. The use of national housing funds in the past has in some instances helped to inflate housing costs. The primary aim of this money should be to provide low-cost housing, and we should take whatever precautions are necessary to ensure that this goal is attained. If the primary aim is to provide employment, then the objective of low-cost housing is to some extent defeated. I think we should have one or the other, but I have serious doubts whether we can have both.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I do not wish to cover the same ground that has been covered so well already. Furthermore, two of the Social Credit members have already outlined our position on this question nationally. There are, however, one or two things I should like to say about the local situation in Medicine Hat.

There is a need today for a plan whereby homes can be built with lower down payments and lower monthly payments. We also have a very definite need in Medicine Hat for a low rental housing scheme for some of our senior citizens and those people who have reached that stage in their lives when they are not prepared to invest in a new home. In that regard may I say that a committee considered the matter in Medicine Hat not too long ago. The committee was comprised of representatives of all sections of the community, and they agreed that there was a definite need for these two things.

Furthermore, recently a group of low rental apartments in Medicine Hat were closed. I certainly think it was necessary for them to be closed, because they were in such a condition that they were not fit for human beings to live in any more. But the fact remains that those people had no place to go. A large number of them were old age pensioners and, as I said, they do not wish to invest in a new home. It is quite a problem right now to find some place for them to go where they can obtain accommodation within their ability to pay.

I think the bill is a step in the right direction, and for that reason we are prepared to support it. Our main objection is that there is no provision to cut interest rates, and we think that 6 per cent interest on government-backed money is simply too high.

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on a subject which has concerned me for many years as a member of the city council of the city of Toronto. The bill we have before us today is designed to increase from $250 million to $400 million the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and it also provides for a reduction in down payments. In addition, in the minister's remarks in the house on December 4 there is reference to a reduction in the income level with respect to which applications for loans may be made.

The hon. member for Trinity has been most critical of this legislation. I wonder whether the hon. member is aware that there has been a decline in housing construction from the maximum level of 1955? I am sure he would not disagree with me if I were to say that this was the result primarily of the tight money policy instituted by the now defeated Liberal government. This decline reached a maximum point during the first six months of 1957, and along with it came the other great evil of unemployment in the construction industry. With an increasing labour force and an increasing population, the previous government's policies were geared to a slow-down in this vital field, and the result was that the construction industry suffered a degree of depression which it has not known for many years.

I would venture to say, sir, that as a result of these Liberal policies the people gave their answer on June 10 in an unmistakable way when they returned to the House of Commons only one Liberal from the 21 ridings in the Toronto area. That lone member is the hon. member for Trinity, who came here with a majority greatly reduced from that of his predecessor in the house.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Trinity is aware of the fact that so far as section 22 of the National Housing Act is concerned, no direct loans were made for ordinary home construction purposes in the city of Toronto under the previous government, and further that under Liberal government policies funds under this section were not available to house builders in the city of Toronto or other comparable large urban areas who were producing houses for sale or for rent. It is indeed alarming that the qualifying income for the average housing act loan was $5,350 in September of this year. This record of Liberal policy does not seem to be in keeping with the thinking of the hon. member for Trinity, who made such a strong plea for assistance to those in the lower income brackets.

The hon. member referred to the Regent park area in the city of Toronto, and was very critical about the slow progress the present government has been making in the field of housing. I should like to point out to him that since expropriation proceedings were taken by the city of Toronto on July 14, 1947, a total of 1,289 housing units were constructed over a period of 10 years. That is at the terrific rate of 128.9 or 129 units per year.

As a member of the housing committee of the Toronto city council I would have to say that there was indeed a great deal of red tape to be overcome in achieving even this figure. The contribution of the former government was $1,362,000 out of a total of $13,400,000 which the Regent park development cost the city of Toronto. We had to consult with the federal government authorities constantly to make sure that we made even this meagre progress. I should also like to point out that the Frost government, to which my hon. friend also referred, will have made a contribution of $1,289,000 on completion of the project, a sum almost equal to that granted by the previous federal government for the Regent park development.

In view of this history I cannot see how the hon. member for Trinity can lay any blame at the feet of this government. Indeed, in my opinion the government has done a great deal toward advancing the housing program in Canada.

The hon. member for Trinity also made reference to the chairman of the metropolitan Toronto council as a peculiar creature. I should like to point out that I am well acquainted with the chairman of the metropolitan Toronto council, and I can say that Frederick Gardiner is one of the finest municipal administrators this country has ever known. I do not think his record in the administration of municipal affairs will ever be equalled by any person in this house or outside it.

To paraphrase the words of the hon. member for Trinity, he also said that the present government has "swept the problem of housing under the carpet". I would say to him in reply that if that is his thinking, then in my view the former government buried the housing problem in the ground when they invoked the tight money policy, and when they restricted under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act the lending of moneys to the city of Toronto and other large urban areas for ordinary home construction purposes.

I also noticed that he criticized the former Liberal government for the 2 per cent insurance fee they placed on loans, and he now asks that the surplus from this source be used for the purpose of subsidizing subdivisions at the expense—this follows naturally, sir—of those small home owners who are now paying on N.H.A. mortgages.

The hon. member criticized the small homes which this legislation permits, and appealed for larger structures to be built on existing land parcels. I wonder if my hon. friend is aware of the zoning by-laws of the city of Toronto or any other municipality which control the density of population in given areas, and which prohibit a certain density in residential areas.

I might point out for the information of the hon. member and this house that even Regent park, the redevelopment which covers 42.45 acres, has 33.5 acres in open space occupied by playgrounds, park areas, lawns, parking plazas and the like. That is the way we plan in the city of Toronto and I think in most other municipalities which are making progress in redevelopment.

The hon. member also made a plea for reducing interest rates on mortgages under the National Housing Act. The hon. member seems to forget, however, that it was a Liberal government and their advisers who caused the increase in interest rates during the last few years of their administration and created the havoc of unemployment which reached such alarming proportions during the first part of 1957, prior to the ousting of the Liberal government from office last June 10.

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to miss this opportunity of taking part in the discussion about the National Housing Act of 1954. I represent, as I have said, a growing constituency which avails itself of the housing act administered by the C.M.H.C., another masterpiece of the Liberal regime. My constituency is not far from Montreal, the metropolis, and many people who have jobs in Montreal reside in these outskirts, thus enjoying the benefits of rural life on the south shore.

Several municipalities of my constituency have spent money and developed an overall plan under which public services such as sewers, water distribution, sidewalks, streets, etc. were provided in order to promote house building and qualify for loans under the National Housing Act. If the municipalities make sacrifices, it would seem that this legislation could be improved, particularly by lowering from 2 to 1 per cent the rate charged by the government to insure these loans. Since 1954, the government has accumulated, from this source, a profit of several million dollars. I realize that this insurance premium seemed warranted at first, but I do not think it was the intention of the government of the day to have this corporation accumulate profits at the expense of home buyers.

Experience has been favourable. The corporation has had to take back only one unit of all houses bought under this marvelous legislation, and then sold it at a profit. It would be good now to lower this rate and to have the small house owner benefit by saving the substantial amount of $125 or $150 a unit. As to those accumulated millions, the government could use them to buy off, at pro rata, the loans granted by finance companies, which would allow them to reinvest in new loans. Another suggestion which seems very appropriate would be to reduce the interest rate of 6 per cent to 5 per cent, as is being done in the United States. An interest rate of 6 per cent is prohibitive, and of no benefit either to the owner or the buyer.

It is easier for the government to borrow than it is for loan companies or institutions. It can, at no cost to itself, afford a rebate of $1,000 to $1,200 in interest over a period of 25 years, in favour of the worker or wage earner who seeks to improve his standard of living. In fact, if the government can afford to loan money without interest to western farmers, and loan several million dollars at 4 per cent interest to the Hamilton Harbour Commission, $30 million to the government of New Brunswick, etc., why should it not be able to provide loans at a reasonable interest to house buyers?

The down payment should also be lowered so that not more than $700 or $800 on a $12,000 or $13,000 house should be required, especially so when many municipalities went out of their way to provide public services to help prospective house owners. When the down payment is too high, it becomes prohibitive for workers with a family, particularly for young married couples who have a house to furnish, and other contingent expenses.

We must put our trust in these young people who represent the future of our country. There is no greater satisfaction for a human being, whatever his status in life, than to own his home and be able to provide adequate housing for his family. I therefore urge the government to consider these suggestions with a realistic and unbiased mind. The government should not forget the promises made during the last election. This is the time to show that they meant what they said, for in a few months it will be too late.

As the price of the lot is an important factor in the cost of a house, I appeal to the government to take whatever steps are necessary to put a stop to the shameless practices of exploiters who take advantage of our farmers' good faith, take up options on farm property, make the farmer sign unfair contracts, and then resell those lands at fancy prices, which only increases the cost of houses at the expense of the buyer.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, on page 550 of Hansard for October 29, 1957, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works informed us that of the 17,560 housing loans arranged from June to July of this year, 14,616 or 83.23 per cent went to centres with populations of over 5,000 people. Over 7 million Canadian people, that is about 45 per cent of our population, live either in rural areas or in towns smaller than 5,000. Thus only 16.8 per cent of the loans this year have been given to 45 per cent of the population, and 83.2 per cent of the loans have gone to 55 per cent of the population.

The people in the small towns and rural areas, if these figures hold true as to previous years, seem to be the orphans of the storm so far as housing is concerned, the new poor of Canada. The people living in small towns or rural areas have many other inconveniences so far as the amenities of life are concerned. This house has often been informed of the lack of television services and the fact that educational standards in these areas are not as good as in other areas. Quite often there are no lending institutions or real estate agencies to push housing for you, so these people, the 45 per cent of the population, seem unable to get the advantages of this particular legislation we have before us.

It is a joy to see semi-socialistic legislation such as this introduced by anti-socialists. I would hope that before this bill is finally approved our anti-socialist sponsors of the bill will explain to us what they can do to make sure that the advantages of this legislation are given to the underprivileged 45 per cent of the people. The government's own statistics show that, so far as housing is concerned, they are underprivileged. That is the only point I wanted to make at this time.
